Government would consent to an increased expenditure in the construction of the branch line. But, fortunately for the Island and the whole country, a change of management has been made. A great saving, as I shall presently show, has been effected in the expenses of running the road, the receipts more nearly equal the expenditure, and these are circumstances that lead the people to believe that there is now a fair prospect of the branch lines being constructed. I have said that things have changed for the better. From 1st May, 1878, to 1st February, 1879, the expenditure in connection with the road has been less than during the corresponding period of the year previous by about $60,000. The present Superintendent, Mr. McNab, has been able, with the assistance of two clerks, to do the work heretofore performed by Mr. McKechnie, Mr. Cunningham, and six other officials, effecting a saving in the office of the Superintendent alone of $5,000 per year. Mr. McNab has proved himself to be a careful and painstaking officer, and an able and efficient Superintendent. In the light of his arduous and responsible duties, and in consideration of the valuable services he has rendered in reducing unnecessary expenditure, and promoting the interests of the road, I trust the hon. the Minister of Railways will see fit to recommend that his salary be increased. The Government have acted wisely in reducing the number of officials, but it is no less its duty to see that those retained, and whose services are actually necessary for the proper working of the road, from the Superintendent down to the lowest employé, should receive a fair and adequate compensation for the services rendered. I now desire to call the attention of the House to another phase of this matter, more immediately connected with this motion. The people of the Island complain that the rates of traffic imposed by the Government are too high, and that they are proportionately greater than are paid on other Government roads. It will be remembered that the Island is essentially agricultural, and the object of the Government is and should be to afford the utmost facilities for the transportation to market of the products of the soil. Besides, the road is obliged to compete with water communication at many points, and rates that it would be expedient to adopt for inland railways will be found too high to enable it to compete successfully with cheaper modes of transport. It is a peculiarity, too, of the Island Railway, that, being a surface road and following as it does the curvature of the hills, a longer distance is traversed than if the road were straight, and the farmers are thus charged for greater mileage than what they derive benefit from. Now, if we compare the rates on the Intercolonial with those on the Island, we shall see at once how justly our people complain of the discrimination on the part of the Government in favour of the mainland route, and of the disregard there appears to be on the two lines between rates and distances. It costs 3c. per bushel to transport oats from Souris to Charlottetown, a distance of sixty miles. The freight per bushel on oats from Tignish to Charlottetown, a distance of 110 miles is 5c. The freight on grain from Montreal to Halifax, a distance of about 800 miles, is 8c. per bushel, or an average of 1c. per bushel for each 100 miles of road. It will thus be seen that, after we allow a little for the difference in the cost of terminal handling, we pay on the Island four times as much for the freight of our grain as is charged on the Intercolonial. This, we submit, is neither fair nor reasonable. Where lines of road are under the control of a Government, it has no object in charging one section of the people more than another, nor in levying more in proportion for a short haul than a long haul; and I am satisfied the matter will only require to be brought before the attention of the Government to be promptly and adequately remedied. I am satisfied, too, that the Government will find it to their interest to lower both the freight and the passenger rates on the Island Railway. It is a matter of constant experience that the lowering of the rates has a tendency to increase the amount of traffic; more especially is this case where the road is new. The people require to be educated and induced to travel and take advantage of the facilities of transporting their goods by rail. Then, in the course of time, it becomes a want and a necessity. The interests of the road and of the people are therefore, in this instance, identical; and the very measure that will enable and encourage the farmers of Prince Edward Island to get their grain to Montreal, and to use the road as a convenience of travel, will, in all likelihood, presently, and certainly in the future, be a source of constantly increased revenue to the Government. In view of the peculiar circumstances of the Island, the local character and cheapness of construction of its railway, and of the other considerations, to which I have briefly referred, I trust the Government will at least try the experiment of lowering the rates of freight for both freight and passenger traffic on the Island Railway.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION LANDS IN THE NORTH-WEST.

MOTION FOR ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

MR. SCHULTZ moved for an Address for copies of all Orders in Council affecting the settlement of Dominion Lands in Manitoba and the North-West, passed since 1870, together with copies of all notices to immigrants, based upon such Orders in Council.

MR. ROBERTSON (Hamilton): In seconding this motion, I beg to draw the attention of this House to a statement which I find in one of the public papers of this Dominion—an important paper, so to speak—the organ of the hon. gentlemen who now so admirably fill the places of the Opposition. In the Globe of the 20th of March, I find an article headed “Emigration from Canada:”

“Last Tuesday an emigrant train left Ottawa, and by the time it reached Cobourg there were 447 persons on board bound for Dakota, and only three for the Canadian North-West. The land regulations of the present Government deter large parties of people who wish to cultivate adjacent farms from taking up homesteads on the Canadian prairies. Emigrants acquainted with one another wish to form a community when they go to a new district, but the Conservative policy will not allow them to do so. Canada is losing the very flower of her hardy young men. They foresee that if they go on the wild lands of their own country they must pay for unnecessary roads, put up with the poor schools that alone can exist in thinly settled districts and suffer many inconveniences that will retard their prosperity in order that the speculators who are to be put in possession of half the soil may make a handsome profit on their investments.”

Now, if this paper only circulated in the Dominion of Canada, it would not make so much difference, because it is well known that its character for mendacity is such that the people of Canada would pay little or no attention to it. But, unfortunately for this country, this paper has a large circulation in the neighbouring Union. As we have a right to expect, and as we know from experience numbers of the inhabitants of the neighbouring States are leaving that country, and finding more comfortable and more hospitable homes in our own North-Western Territory. We also know from what we have heard that it is most probable, at all events, that a large immigration is likely to set in from the Western States to our Territories, and under these circumstances we have a right to expect that a paper like the Globe would feel it to be its duty to say all that it possibly could with the view of magnifying the importance and the benefits that are to be derived from a settlement in this country. But, when we know that, unfortunately, such is not the course followed by that paper, and that papers of great influence in the Union take up the utterances of that paper, backed, as they are, by the hon. gentlemen who occupy the Opposition side of this House, I think it is high time that this House took some steps for the purpose of showing to the country that such utterances emanate only from the Opposition press, which, with the gentlemen who support it, is not only in opposition to the Government, but in opposition to the prosperity of this country.

MR. BLAKE: We are all interested in destroying the prosperity of Canada.

MR. ROBERTSON: One would think the hon. gentleman is speaking the truth, if we were to judge from what we have heard from the Opposition side of the House this Session, and what we see daily in the Globe and the satellites that surround it. It is all very well for the hon. member for West Durham to get up in his place and say, in the sneering style for which he is so justly celebrated, that we are all interested in destroying the prosperity of this country. We are not interested in destroying the prosperity of the country. It is the desire of the great majority of the people of this country that the country should go on as it is going on, but, as long as the Opposition is in the hands of the gentlemen who now form it, so long will they detract from the prosperity of the country. When hon. gentlemen had the opportunity of governing this country, they brought it to the miserable state it was in in 1878. We do not feel inclined to let that come about again. I was going to say, when I was interrupted by the hon. member for West Durham, that it would make very little difference if this paper was not circulated outside of the Dominion. As I stated before, the Globe is circulated in the neighbouring Union, and I find that an important paper published in New York took advantage of the statement made in the Globe. I find in the columns of the New York Herald of March 23rd, this article:—

“A GOOD COUNTRY TO LEAVE. — A Toronto journal mournfully complains that on an emigrant train which left Ottawa a few days ago containing 447 persons only three were bound for what is called the Canadian North-West. The remaining 444 were all seeking new homes in the flourishing Territory of Dakota. These are evidently pretty shrewd emigrants, the very class who are needed and who are heartily welcomed in our Western States and Territories. If immigration upon this scale should set in from the older and more thickly settled portions of Canada toward the United States it would not take a great many years to depopulate the Dominion. The attractions offered by Dakota and other Territories are infinitely greater than any which Manitoba can present. The soil is more fertile; there is a higher state of cultivation. Many of the trunk lines of railroad are built, so that communication with the outside world is not difficult. On the other hand the Canadian North-West is a wilderness. A vast empire is marked out, but it is all on paper, in Parliamentary reports and Government advertisements. Canadian immigrants evidently believe that Canada is a good country to leave.”

What I wish to say in reference to this is that I am informed that this statement in the Globe is on a par with the great majority of the statements made with a view of injuring the National Policy, and that there is no evidence to show that 447 of those parties who were on that train were bound for Dakota. I think it is high time that the people of this country should know what the so-called loyal Opposition of this country is doing for the benefit of the country, while the majority of the people are trying to show that their country is one that they may be proud of. A policy has been inaugurated which will, no doubt, and which is daily, giving evidence of being such an one as will bring this country to that state in which we all hope to see it. On the other hand, hon. gentlemen of the Opposition decry it in every way they possibly can, supported by the Globe newspaper and all the penny-whistles of the Grit press.

MR. OLIVER: I desire to say a word or two upon this very important subject. It appears that the report published in the Globe newspaper was to the effect that a train left the city of Ottawa for the American Union, there being a certain number of emigrants for Dakota and other American States, with a very small number for the Province of Manitoba. This is the statement that has appeared in the Globe, and has also appeared in various papers in the country. My hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) has stated that this is a great injury to the country. I would like to ask if my hon. friend, after making as many rash statements as he has done to-day, has any proof that the statement of the Globe is untrue. If he has not, I venture to say that he has no reason to complain, because the object of the Globe and of that of every other newspaper in the country is to tell the truth.

MR. MACKENZIE: That is what he complains of.

MR. OLIVER: Because the statement is true, and has some bearing on the National Policy, he complains. I think my hon. friend, before he goes any further, ought to state to the House that the statement in the Globe is untrue. If he is not able to furnish that proof he has no case against the Globe. He says that if the Globe was only circulated in this country the statement would do no harm, as Canadians do not pay any attention to its promulgations. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman could not make a speech to this House without reading long extracts from the Globe newspaper. He knows the Globe wields an influence which is felt by everyone in the country, not only among those who believe in its doctrines, but amongst those who do not believe its doctrines. He is the very gentleman of all others that has most reason to fear the Globe. I have nothing to say on this subject except to take exception to the remarks of my hon. friend with reference to the Globe. The hon. gentleman seems to think some steps ought to be taken to put a stop to the circulation of truth in the Globe and other journals throughout the length and breadth of the country. Of all other hon. gentlemen in this House, he is the one who ought to take some steps to compel the Globe to write and print such articles as are suited to him. I trust that this fling which he has taken at the Globe will do him a very great deal of good.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex): Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to be very much alarmed at the influence of the press, and the influence of reporters in the gallery. One after another rises in his place and denounces the influence of the press, the circulation of facts in regard to public matters, and particularly such statements as they find in the Opposition press. My hon. friend from Hamilton generally occupies one-half his time, when speaking, in making quotations from the press, and they form the best portion of his speeches. Only for these quotations, I think his speeches would be very limited in length, and perhaps in information as well. The trouble of which he complains appears to be a very natural one. There seems to be a large emigration to the United States, the result of circumstances pretty well exposed when discussing certain pamphlets published by the Department of Agriculture. It is the certain result of the course the Government has taken in advertising American lands. If this large efflux of population has taken place, it is the result of the care with which the Government have given publicity to the advantages offered by American lands. I hold in my hand the Postal Guide for the Dominion of Canada, published under the authority of the Postal Department, of which I believe some 1,000 copies are circulated every quarter through the country. In the Guide for October last, I find the following:—

“Stop wrestling with stumps and stones for a miserable support. Go to the Arkansas valley and buy a farm at the cheap rates and on the easy terms given above, and in a few years at furthest, with the same effort and economy employed in Canada, you may possess the title to a royal farm with every home comfort and an enviable independence, with money to let.”

I suppose it will not be denied by my hon. friend the Postmaster General that it is published under the authority of the Department, and paid for out of the exchequer of the country. If my hon. friend is disposed to complain of the large emigration from Canada to the United States, I think it would be consistent with his policy that he should denounce the Government who are doing so much for the benefit and development of the country in circulating advertisements like this, and for inculcating in Canadians a disposition to leave their own country and go to the United States. It cannot be said that all the loyalty that pertains to this country is to be found in hon. gentlemen opposite. If this document, which I have read, is any evidence at all, it is an evidence that the Government has adopted a systematic policy of persuading people to leave their own country, and we have had it repeated over and over again in the pamphlets they are circulating. I am glad my hon. friend has drawn our attention to these circumstances for it gives us an opportunity of showing how utterly hollow and foundationless is that disposition, on which they pride themselves so much, to enhance the interests of the country. It is an old Tory doctrine to denounce the press, and has been practised religiously from the Stewarts downward; but the last attempt to muzzle and stifle the press of England lived and died during the régime of the Duke of Wellington. In this instance, we have an hon. gentleman, who would not be here but for the influence the press created for him, denouncing the press because it denounces the disloyal policy of the Government of the day. I am surprised that my hon. friend has never raised his voice against the system of advertising, in Governmental documents, the land interests of the United States, and thereby encouraging an efflux from the Dominion to the United States.

MR. JONES: It must be by mistake that these advertisements have appeared in these documents. I have not taken the trouble to hunt back to find if the Government documents, published by hon. gentlemen opposite for the last five years, contained similar advertisements or not. I was very sorry, indeed, to read the article referred to in the Globe, because it was a very misleading article, and one that should not appear in any Canadian paper. It is a misleading article for this reason. It states that an emigrant train left Ottawa, and that by the time it reached Cobourg it had 400 on board for Dakota and only three for our North-West country. Those 400 hailed from the Eastern States, and crossed over from Ogdensburg, in New York State, to Prescott. Two or three times a week large numbers of emigrants from the Eastern States go west via the Grand Trunk from the Eastern States and State of New York, crossing the St. Lawrence from Ogdensburg, N.Y., to Prescott. I very much regret that the press of any party should publish statements so misleading as this of the Toronto Globe now alluded to.

MR. SCHULTZ: I think that this whole discussion is the result of a misapprehension. The fact is, I think, that three emigrant trains have left this month for Manitoba. One on the second of the month, one to-day, and one at some period during the interval, the date of which I have forgotten. It turns out that while the first and last were announced as emigrant trains for Manitoba, the second was announced as a special train for Dakota. This second train left here with some forty or fifty Canadians, intending to go to Manitoba. The other passengers were made up of people from near Ogdensburg, who joined that train at Prescott. I have heard since that not only did we not lose any Canadians to the United States on that occasion, but so strong was the influence of the forty or fifty that embarked here, on the 350 from Ogdensburg, that when the train arrived at Glynden, some of the Americans who intended to settle in Dakota actually went on and settled in the Province of Manitoba.

Motion agreed to.

THE NORTHERN LIGHT STEAMER.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

MR. HACKETT moved for an Order of the House for a statement showing the number of bags of mails, passengers and tons freight, carried by the steamer Northern Light, on the route between Georgetown and Pictou, from the 19th December, 1879, to the present date; also, the number of trips performed, together with the earnings of said steamer on said route during said time.

MR. MUTTART: I rise to express my regret that the Government has seen fit to order the Northern Light to the Capes, especially as the experience of the present winter has shown that the navigation of the straits between Georgetown and Pictou for the greater part of the winter months is feasible beyond any doubt. During the winter of 1878-9, which, as hon. members will remember, was an exceedingly cold and stormy one, this steamer did good work; and it is confidently believed, by those qualified to judge, that were it not for her meeting with an accident, which, by the way, happened to her while in search of a new and better route, she would have continued her trips between Georgetown and Pictou for the greater part, if not the entire, winter. During the present season she has run with remarkable regularity until very recently, a regularity which has almost if not quite convinced the most sceptical of her capabilities as a winter steamer. I find, on referring to the returns, that since 19th of December, 1879, up to the end of February last, the Northern Light shows the following earnings:—

Made up as follows:—
Freight	$317 76
Passages	252 00
Meals	37 60
State-rooms	10 00
	$617 36
Earnings for the month of January, 1880	1,152 23
Made up as follows:—
Freight	$449 63
Passages	565 50
Meals	103 10
State-rooms	34 00
	$1,152 23
Earnings for the month of February, 1880	525 76
Made up as follows:—
Freight	$209 76
Passages	237 00
Meals	57 50
Rooms	21 50
	$525 76
Total earnings from time steamer commenced running up to the end of February last	<hr/>
	$2,295 35

This amount may appear small in comparison with the cost of running the steamer; but aside from the increase of trade which will be eventually built up in this direction, if steam communication be continued. The Island, according to the terms of Confederation, is entitled to efficient steam communication, winter and summer, for the conveyance of mails and passengers. Whatever difference of opinion may have existed as to the efficiency of the steamer herself—and I must say that I believe her to be a most excellent boat for the purposes for which she is intended—there can be little difference of opinion, I think, amongst unprejudiced men as to her unsuitableness for the route between Capes Traverse and Tormentine. Between these Capes is a distance of about seven nautical miles. A reef, about one and one-half miles in length, runs out from Jouriman's Island, near Cape Tormentine. The depth of water between Tormentine and Traverse ranges from six to sixteen fathoms. The water for a long way out from both shores is very shoal. Now, when it is remembered that the Northern Light draws over 21 feet of water; that the ice literally packs in, principally through the action of the tides, between the Capes, the unsuitability for this route, of a steamer drawing so much water as the Northern Light, must be apparent. I believe it is a mistake to expect uninterrupted steam communication to be kept up the entire winter with only one boat. If another steamer, along with the Northern Light, were placed on the eastern route, I believe that steam communication could be kept up for the entire winter. I am aware that any irregularity in the carriage of mails and passengers is very annoying to the public; and when the winter steamer happens to get jammed in the ice and unable to cross, people naturally feel like losing faith in the steamer. But it must not be forgotten that the same irregularities and delays would be likely to occur through stress of weather and other causes even in mid-summer, if we had to depend upon only one summer steamboat for the conveyance of mails, freight and passengers. With another winter boat on the Georgetown or eastern route, I believe winter steam communication between the Island and mainland could be kept up with regularity and satisfaction to the public. I may say that I agree with the opinion expressed in this House a few days ago by the hon. member for Antigonish, that Cape George is more accessible as a winter port for the Island steamer than Pictou. North-easters pack the ice in so closely at Pictou Island, and the approach to Pictou, that it is difficult to get through it; and this is invariably the cause of the interruptions which have occurred in the steamer's crossing. This might be obviated if Cape George were made the point of approach on the mainland, as more sea-room would be afforded, and consequently the ice would not be found so closely packed on this course as upon the route to Pictou, especially during the prevalence of north-east winds. I think the Government, instead of taking away the Northern Light from the Georgetown route, should give us another boat. This may seem somewhat absurd to the advocates of the Capes route; but, in the face of the Northern Light's record for the present winter, I think I am justified in asking the Government to place on the Georgetown route an additional boat of similar dimensions to that of the Northern Light. The people of King's county do not receive their fair share of steam communication during the summer months. I sincerely hope the Government may continue the services of the winter steamer on the eastern or Georgetown route, and as soon as possible put on another boat.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P. E. I.): I have no objection to furnish all the information asked for. There is no doubt that the Northern Light has been, during this season, a greater convenience to the people of Prince Edward Island than during those of former years, more especially in enabling the merchants to more readily receive their importations from abroad. But at the present time she is in the ice, and has been so for fourteen or fifteen days. By the last account which I received she was off Georgetown harbour, and, until the wind changes, it is not probable that she can make any progress. The mails have not been sent by her, and she has been employed alone in carrying freight and passengers. The Northern Light has cost over $130,000, and I feel bound to say that she has performed very little service indeed; and, the difficulty is, that her construction is such that when the season for which she is supposed to be specially adapted has passed, it is impossible to use her for any other purpose whatever. When she has taken on board five or six days' coal there is no room for any cargo, and although she is idle, still her expenses decrease but very little, for it is necessary to retain the services of her engineers and other officers at high wages, although she remains idle.

AN HON. MEMBER: Send her to Hudson's Bay.

MR. POPE: I wish I could see my way clear to advise the Government to send her to Hudson's Bay, for she might be employed in exploring and surveying there, but she cannot carry coal sufficient to enable her to reach there. With regard to the earnings of the boat, I regret that I can give but a very unsatisfactory account. So far the average cost of her trips from Georgetown to Pictou has been $500, and she has made about two trips a week. The earnings for the month of February amount to a little over $500, and an additional cost had to be incurred in sending the mails by the Capes. My opinion is that the Northern Light is not fit for the Capes route. She draws over 18 feet of water, and if she attempted to run between Cape Tormentine and Cape Traverse, before the shore or board ice is firmly fixed, she would be in great danger and probably lost. But a small, powerful boat could run the greater part of the winter, except in very stormy weather, daily, or twice a day. A steamer somewhat like that which plies between Point Lévis and Quebec would be worth a dozen steamers of the draft of the Northern Light. But she has been bequeathed to us by our predecessors, and we have her on hand and we must do the best we can with her. This season she earned about $1,000 for towing ships, which will somewhat reduce her expenses.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: The hon. gentleman, my successor, appears to be the sworn enemy of the Northern Light, notwithstanding what our friends from Prince Edward Island have told us of the performances of that vessel. Are these hon. gentlemen unworthy of credit, when they say her performances are marvellous? They are eye-witnesses of what she did, and of what she is capable of doing. I thought my hon. friend opposite, after listening to them, would have changed his mind, and cease his abuse and denunciations of the Northern Light, and, after due reflection, say that he was in error. If my hon. friend is right, why does he keep the Northern Light going? Why did he put her out again? He says now she is in the ice, and has been there fourteen or fifteen days. I suppose that cannot be avoided; that will happen to any boat; that was always my opinion; and the Northern Light has turned out better than any other boat for that service. If it is true, as the hon. gentleman says, that it has rendered no service, it is wrong to keep her in the Public Service. But hon. gentlemen from Prince Edward Island testified to the contrary. Either my hon. friend is wrong or his colleagues are wrong. If they are right he is wrong.

MR. BRECKEN: I do not think my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is wrong. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken says my hon. friend is the sworn enemy of the Northern Light. Our interests are so great in the winter season that anything that can be done for us is welcome, and as the Northern Light has been a partial benefit to us, and given us a helping hand during this winter, it cannot be said that my hon. friend is an enemy to her. The communication between the Island and the mainland is kept up in the summer months by two boats belonging to our Steam Navigation Company in the Island. They are very good boats, but summer boats are not calculated for the stormy winter season. The Northern Light thus takes up the communication in the winter months, and she has generally kept up communication to the third week in January. That has been a great benefit, and we recognise the advantages we have derived from her. But still I say that the Northern Light is by no means a fulfilment of the arrangement made with us that we should have full communication with the railway system on the continent. It was, perhaps, right and reasonable that two or three years should elapse to allow this experiment to have a fair trial. We do not wish to be ungrateful to the ex-Minister of Marine and Fisheries for his endeavours to supply us with the requisite means of communication; but the boat has not been a success. It is no doubt an advantage to us to have her there; at the same time I quite agree with the remarks of my hon. colleague, that the only reliable mail route is across the straits, and that it can only be carried on efficiently by the use of the small boats now in use, supplemented by a small steamer. I trust that before two years pass we will have the branch railways that I spoke of the other evening. When that improvement is effected, I do not think the House will hear so much on this subject.

MR. KILLAM: It is very pleasing for members on this side of the House to learn that there is some slight appreciation of the efforts of the late Government to secure communication with Prince Edward Island. We all rejoice that the Northern Light, which was to some extent an experiment, has been so successful. It struck me forcibly during this debate, that, notwithstanding all the attacks by the hon. the Minister of Marine on the Northern Light last year, nothing whatever has been done by the Government to secure better communication with Prince Edward Island, to which our good faith was long ago pledged.

MR. OGDEN: There appears to be a great difference of opinion among the members from Prince Edward Island in regard to the usefulness of the Northern Light, and as to the proper means of connecting the Island with the mainland in summer and winter. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., (Mr. Brecken) strongly advocated, a few days ago, the building of a railway from the Intercolonial Railway to Cape Tormentine, for the purpose of carrying out the arrangement entered into by the Dominion and the Island Government at the time of Confederation. I thought the hon. gentleman made some sensible remarks on that subject, and I was surprised that he should belittle the noble Province which he has the honour to represent, by calling it a "little island." That was a serious mistake on the part of the hon. member. The Northern Light, in my opinion, is performing a very fair service. She has only been out fifteen days making a run of forty miles. The hon. member for King's, P.E.I., (Mr. Macdonald) states that she was doing good service, since she was only five days in crossing when he was a passenger. That is good service, indeed. It only costs $500 a day. I think the most effectual way to carry out the terms of agreement between the Dominion and Prince Edward Island Governments, would be to send the Northern Light to Hudson's Bay, if a tug boat can be obtained to tow her there, and build a railway from some station on the Intercolonial Railway to Cape Tormentine. We would then secure constant communication between the Island and the mainland. The people are not so poor that they cannot lay in a sufficient stock of the luxuries—they produce the necessaries—of life to last them during the time that navigation is closed. I must congratulate the hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir Albert J. Smith) for having given us a steamer which performs the service so well. I think we might as well try to navigate the Rocky Mountains or climb Niagara Falls as to attempt to navigate the Straits every day in the year. If the hon. gentleman had complied with the request of his constituents in Westmoreland, when they asked for a supply of old rails, which were rusting in different parts of the country, the branch railway would have been built, and there would have been no reason for the hon. members for the Island coming here and yearly talking about the Northern Light. I think the vessel should be sold at once, and the money received for her expended in assisting to build a railway from some point on the Intercolonial Railway to Cape Tormentine. It would be advisable for the hon. the Minister of Railways to enter into negotiations with some company, and give some old rails for the completion of the road which has been referred to. The road would be self-sustaining. It will pass through a fine country, populated by as fine a race of people as exists on the face of the earth, misrepresented, I believe, by the hon. member for Westmoreland. I hope this will be the last we shall hear about the Northern Light, and that steps will be taken to construct the railway by the present Government, as the hon. member for Westmoreland, who was in power for five years, failed to do so, though he might have secured its construction by loaning some old rails to a company which was prepared to build it if those rails could have been obtained, and which were afterwards given to the late member for Queen's, N.B. With this record it does not look well for the hon. gentleman to be talking about easy communication with Prince Edward Island, which, had he done his duty to his constituency, might have so easily been accomplished.

MR. PLUMB: My hon. friend (Mr. Ogden) has made some practical suggestions; but it has often been said that it is impossible to become a seller unless you can find a purchaser. I do not think the Northern Light has exhibited those marvellous sea-going qualities that would lead us to a lively competition if she were offered for sale, and I think the position of my hon. friend would be greatly strengthened if such a disposition was made of the boat. It was stated, when the vessel was ordered, that she would cost $50,000. She was an experiment, made by hon. gentlemen opposite, to throw a cloud over the bargain made with Prince Edward Island. We were under obligations to keep up communication with the Island, and the Northern Light was to effect that object. Instead of the price stated, she cost $60,000. She was to run at all seasons; but we know now that she is utterly incapable of surmounting the obstacles she was designed to encounter. The vessel proved an utter failure, and nothing more ludicrous has been witnessed in this House than the attempt of the hon. gentleman (Sir Albert J. Smith) to convey his responsibility for the blunder to this side of the House. Not only did the hon. member try to do that, but he endeavoured to make out a worse case. There were great difficulties under which this unfortunate ship made her trial crossing; it seemed impossible to navigate her under such adverse circumstances. I consider it a very unworthy taunt of the hon. gentleman to insinuate that we are responsible for the Northern Light. She is costing $500 a trip, and I think the best disposal that could be made of her is to stock her in the yard.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: I suggest that we send the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) to attend to those matters.

MR. PLUMB: If I were there, I think I would manage better than my hon. friend opposite did.

GRAND RIVER FALLS, RICHMOND, N.S.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. FLYNN, in moving for an Order of the House for copies of all correspondence, petitions or documents, relative to the construction of a fish-ladder at Grand River Falls, in the county of Richmond, said: During the Session of 1873, a petition was sent to the Department of Marine and Fisheries from the inhabitants of Loch Lomond, in the county of Richmond, asking for a sum of money to remove the Grand River Falls, in that county, in order that salmon and alewives might be able to get into Loch Lomond Lake in the spawning season. That petition was referred to Mr. Kenny, the Inspector of Fisheries, who said it was desirable to remove the obstruction to the ascent of fish, in favourable localities, for breeding, and recommended that Mr. Rogers, Assistant Inspector for Nova Scotia, be sent to visit the falls, and make a report to the Department, which he did, in the month of October, 1873. Grand River opens at the Atlantic, and runs up three or four miles, until it meets a perpendicular fall of about 20 feet high. This fall prevents salmon and alewives getting into the large fresh water lake of Loch Lomond at the spawning season. This magnificent lake is nearly nine miles in length, and from two to three miles in breadth, and has everything to recommend it as a spawning ground. Mr. Rogers, in his report, stated "that he regarded the work as one of considerable importance; that the lake is a fine sheet of clear water, with splendid gravelly banks and beaches, and one of the most inviting places for fish cultivation that he had ever seen in the Province." He recommended the construction of a fish-ladder, and said "he did not know where $1,000 could be spent to better advantage in the service of the Fisheries than in removing this obstruction." No action was taken by the Department of Marine and Fisheries on Mr. Rogers' report at that time. Another petition was sent, and a second report made by Mr. Rogers, in which he again stated the importance of the work, and necessity of removing the obstruction. I brought these petitions and reports to the notice of Sir Albert J. Smith, the late Minister, and strongly urged the immediate removal of this obstruction. In the winter of 1878, he directed that the sum of $1,000 should be spent on that work, either by erecting a fish-ladder or removing the fall by blasting. Mr. Milledge, the resident engineer of St. Peters' Canal, was directed to visit the place and make a plan and specifications of the work, in order that the Department could call for tenders. When Sir Albert J. Smith consented to the work being done, this memorandum was made by the Commissioner, Mr. Whitcher:

"Minister authorizes expenditure of $1,000 on Grand River Falls. Write Mr. Wylde, sending him copy of Mr. Rogers' report, and instruct him to go there and consult with Mr. Milledge, resident engineer of St. Peters, and make a specification of the work so that we can call for tenders."

Mr. Milledge being occupied with other work, did not send his report until August. He recommended the erection of a fish-ladder, which might cost either $700 or $900. After the lapse of some time, I found that the Department were not asking for tenders, and in September I telegraphed to Mr. Whitcher why no tenders had been asked for the work. He replied that the sum involved was too small for a tender, and asked me to name a person suitable for the work and expenditure of the money. I did not wish to assume that responsibility, knowing nobody I considered competent for the work, which I regarded as very important. I preferred throwing the responsibility for this expenditure on the Department, and replied to that effect. Nothing was done that autumn, and when I arrived here last Session, I called on the hon. the Minister of Marine, and was told that nothing could be done in the matter. I was a little astonished at that answer; the work is one in which not only everyone in my county, but all engaged in the Fisheries of Cape Breton, are interested. I did not consider that, because I was in opposition to the Government, our important public works should be treated in this manner. If I had desired to make political capital out of it at the last elections, I might have spent the money offered me; but I did not want to assume that responsibility. Though the work was ordered during the Administration of the late Minister of Marine, I was quite satisfied that whoever succeeded him would carry on the work, which I could have ordered after the defeat of the late Government, as I had a telegram from Mr. Whitcher, so late as the 4th October, asking me to name a person for the work. Did I not think the present Minister of Marine would have ordered the work, I would have named a person to do it, and though it might not have been so well done, there would have been an improvement with the money spent. I need not tell the hon. gentleman how important it is that those rivers should be carefully protected; their proper protection and the improvement of the fish-supply, means an increase of the deep-sea fisheries. Before the river fisheries were destroyed, years ago, the deep-sea fisheries were more abundant. You have only to spend $700 to $900, in removing this obstruction, to make Loch Lomond one of the finest spawning grounds on this continent. I wished in these observations not only to promote this improvement, but to set myself right with the people who have been led to expect it. My object in making this motion is not solely to bring to the notice of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries the importance of this work, but I desire also to place myself in a proper position with the people of that section of the country, to whom I stated that the expenditure of $1,000 was authorised by the then Minister (Sir Albert Smith) in the erection of a fish-ladder on this fall. I therefore avail myself of this opportunity to tell them again that I had his authority for the statement, which the memorandum I have already read will fully prove, and that his successor now refuses to carry on the work. But, Sir, I trust the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will see the necessity of removing this obstruction, and that he will not hesitate to spend so small an amount as is required for this improvement when such beneficial results would flow from it.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURTS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 37.]

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

MR. MCCARTHY: Before proposing the alteration I intend to move, I may say that my attention was drawn to this matter by a member of the Quebec Bar, who, I thought, made out a very strong case for the repeal of the 22nd clause of the Act of 1875. He mentioned one instance in which a verdict was obtained. An appeal was made for a new trial, which was allowed on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, and upon this he determined to carry the case into the Supreme Court. But he was met by the difficulty created by this section of the Act. He then went to England, being forced to go to the Privy Council because the Supreme Court could not entertain the question, when the Court below had granted a new trial when it was within their discretion. He carried the case to England, when the Privy Council reversed the decision of the Quebec Court, and allowed the verdict to stand, as originally, in favour of the plaintiff. He has drawn attention to the fact that the Appellate Courts in England are not limited in this way. There is a case at present in Court—that of an engineer on one of the railways. At first he obtained a small verdict that he thought fair. The Court set that aside and granted a new trial. Then he obtained a larger sum for personal injury; but the Railway carried the case from Court to Court, although the only question is whether there ought or ought not to be a new trial. The object of having this Court is that people may have an opportunity of bringing their cases to it if they are inclined to do so. As long as that section stands, there is a certain class of cases that is cut out, and in regard to which the Court has no jurisdiction. The amendment I propose to make is nearly in the language of the Ontario Act in that respect.

MR. BLAKE: The observations of my hon. friend lead to the conclusion that it will be better that the amendments should be printed. We may have to consider, perhaps, the nice question, as far as other Provinces than Ontario are concerned, of jurisdiction. These clauses are, according to my memory, substantially similar to those which regulated the powers and duty of the Courts in Ontario, and, therefore, the Appellate Court may be said in acting on them to be exercising an appellate jurisdiction, because it is ordering that which this Court below should have ordered. We may have to consider whether the power of the Courts of first instance in some other Provinces is equally great, and how far it may be giving original jurisdiction, or creating confusion, to give the Appellate Court a power to make amendments which the Court below had not, according to the Provincial law, the power to make. I merely throw out this suggestion in order that the legal members of the House from other Provinces may have an opportunity of looking at the clause with that question before them. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that we ought to give to our own Court of Appeal power to entertain appeals on all grounds on which there may be a power to appeal to the Judicial Committee.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) : It is desirable that the clause should be printed, and I think it will be found that there will be no difficulty with reference to the jurisdiction of the Courts below. In my own Province I anticipate no difficulty whatever on that ground, and I fancy that the legal members of the House from the other Provinces will concur in the opinion that no difficulty will be found in the clause as at present proposed.

INSOLVENT INSURANCE COMPANIES WINDING-UP BILL — [BILL 18.]

(Mr. Ives.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. IVES : The repeal of the Insolvency Laws and the rather uncertain financial condition of several Insurance Companies that are now doing business in the Dominion, render some machinery for the winding-up of insolvent Insurance Companies absolutely necessary. I apprehend, therefore, that there can be no question as to the propriety of the second reading of this Bill. After it has been read and referred to a Select Committee, and is returned to the House with their report, it will be the proper time to go into a more lengthened discussion of its provisions. It may not, however, be inexpedient, as it is a very important measure, that I should briefly state some of the points which are raised by the measure, with the view that some general discussion may take place in the House for the benefit of the Select Committee to whom the Bill is to be referred. In the first place, I apprehend that discussion will be more likely to arise with reference to the following provisions of the Bill : First, with regard to Insurance Companies which shall be deemed to be insolvent and liable to be wound up by the provisions of this Act ; second, as to whether sufficient care has been taken in the measure to guard the interests of the company and the interests of the public, with reference to the issue of the writ ; third, as to whether the provisions of the measure which give the Judges primary jurisdiction in all matters, or nearly all matters, arising under this Act, is the correct principle to take, or whether we should follow the principle which formerly obtained under the Insolvent Act, of allowing the creditors to decide the matters which are necessary to be decided under the provisions of this measure. Having had some experience of the working of the Insolvent Act, my own preferences are in favour of leaving the questions to be decided under this measure principally to the Judges of the Courts. This measure provides that, with regard to whether a writ of attachment shall issue or not, whether a receiver shall be appointed or not, whether an accountant shall be appointed or not, and who the receiver shall be, in case a receiver is to be appointed, shall be decided by the Judge, after having taken the advice of the creditors and stockholders, who may be called together by notice, as provided for by the Bill. It seems to me that it will be found to work more satisfactorily to leave the decision of this question to the Judge, subject to the right of appeal, than to leave it to be decided by a meeting of the creditors, or stockholders, of the company. Now, the interests of the creditors and the interests of the stockholders are almost certain to be opposed with regard to whether a company shall be wound up or not, and with regard to the manner in which shall be wound up. It would be necessary, therefore, to give power to the Judge to decide between the conflicting advice given by creditors and stockholders, and therefore I think it best, although this will be a matter for the House and Committee to determine, to provide that meetings of the creditors and stockholders shall be convened by the Judge, and be held before him, and that he shall have the power of deciding questions, subject to appeal to a higher Court. This is a matter, however, about which I think it desirable that some expression of opinion should be given by the House, for the benefit of the Committee to whom I propose to move that the Bill should be referred. Then, again, with regard to when a company shall be deemed liable to be wound up under the provisions of this Bill. The 2nd section of this Bill is precisely the same as Section 3 of the Act which it repeals, cap. 21, 41 Vic. There is no change in the law. It provides that a company shall be held to be insolvent which fails, for the space of sixty days, to pay an undisputed claim which is due, or which fails, for sixty days after judgment has been rendered against it, to pay a claim adjudged due. Section 3 of this Bill is a new provision, which I think to be a very necessary and important one. In my own practice, I have known Insurance Companies that have been in the habit of leaving it for months uncertain as to whether they did or did not contest a claim, and it has sometimes been found necessary for the party insured, who has suffered a loss, to bring a suit and to see the defendant's plea in order to know whether the claim was really contested or not, and to know the ground on which it was contested. Section 3 provides, therefore, that a claim shall be held to be undisputed after it becomes due, unless the company gives notice to the party who has suffered a loss that it is a disputed claim, in which case they are also required to give at the same time the reasons for which they contest the payment of the claim. From that moment it becomes a disputed claim, and the insured party can take his remedy, either by action at law or by dropping the claim. A claim is held to be undisputed until they do give notice. They can give it any time within sixty days. The sub-section of that section requires that an annual return shall be made by all Insurance Companies doing business in Canada, of claims paid by them during the year, and of all claims resisted by them, with the ground upon which such claims were resisted. Now, it is a fact that some companies, to their credit, deal fairly and honestly with their clients, and, when an honest loss is sustained, their endeavour seems to be to adjust that loss and to pay it as soon as practicable. I think it right that such companies who deal in this equitable manner should receive the advantage, as it were, of an advertisement of the fact. On the other hand, there are some companies that, when a loss is sustained, seem only to ask the question as to whether payment can be awarded; then their next object is to ascertain for how small a sum they may be able to compromise the claim. Therefore, I think it desirable, when we are upon this subject, that some provision should be made for an annual return to be furnished to Government by all companies doing business here of the claims paid by them during the year, and the claims resisted by them, with the grounds upon which they have resisted payment. The 4th section provides that the hon. the Minister of Finance may take the initiatory proceeding necessary to wind up an Insurance Company. As the law now stands, the Government seems to be entirely powerless in the matter, and a company may go on doing business with an impaired capital or without any capital at all, and the Government, with whom the deposit has been made, seems to be entirely powerless to take any steps to wind up the company. This section provides that the hon. the Minister of Finance, or any creditor, may take the necessary steps to obtain the writ of attachment. The execution of the writ is provided for by Section 5; and Section 6, with its sub-sections, provides the procedure with which the writ may be contested by the company, or under which an adjournment of the proceedings may be had before the Judge upon application from time to time, until it shall become perfectly apparent to the Judge that it is necessary that the company should be wound up. For instance, if an application is made for a writ of attachment, the Judge has the power to adjourn the proceedings upon the application for a writ for a period of six months. He may or he may not appoint an accountant to investigate the affairs of the company, that accountant to report to him not later than six months from the date of the application. Upon that report being furnished, he may still further adjourn the proceedings upon the application for a writ, or he may appoint a receiver, or he may order the issue of a writ of attachment. If the writ of attachment issues without any adjournment of proceedings, the Bill provides for a contestation of the writ by the company. If, however, the writ of attachment does not issue until after one or more adjournments, I have thought it not necessary that there should be any provision for the contestation of the writ. The Bill provides that the Judge, upon the appointment of a receiver, may order the manner in which the company shall be wound up. The 11th, 12th, 13th, 14th and 15th clauses make similar provisions to those contained in the former Act. Machinery for the sale of the real estate of the company is provided, the protection of privileged creditors is secured, and the powers of the receiver are fully defined. The parts which it appears to me are not open to discussion are: as to what should constitute insolvency on the part of an Insurance Company in the first place; and, in the second place, whether the procedure to be taken should be determined by the creditor or the stockholder, or both, or by the Judge. After having taken the advice of one or both of these classes of persons, my preference is in favour of leaving the matter with the Judge after having taken the advice of the stockholders and creditors, and giving to all parties the right of appeal to a higher Court.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): The House, I hope, will allow the Bill of my hon. friend to be read a second time, and have it referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, where the provisions of the Bill can be carefully examined. There are some of the provisions of the Bill that I dare say will cause some discussion, and probably some amendments will be proposed. I take it for granted that the House will agree with my hon. friend and with me that the principle of the Bill is a good one.

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew): I do not propose to offer any objection to the second reading of the Bill. But I shall feel bound to move at a future step to amend the 21st clause. I find that this clause is almost an exact counterpart of Section 12 of the Act of 1878. The hon. member for West Durham will, I think, recollect that, when that Bill was before the House, I contended that the interests of a certain class of creditors were not recognised. The hon. gentleman did recognise the interests of that class of creditors in the Bill of 1878. I refer to the policy-holders. I believed that these persons, when the company whose policies they held had become insolvent, should be entitled to re-insure without the consent of the company from whom they held their policy. It seems to me, however, that, if the principle be conceded at all that the policy-holders in an insolvent Insurance Company are entitled, under certain circumstances, to re-insure without the consent of the company whose policy they hold, they should be entitled to claim for premiums from the time such re-insurance is effected. If the Bill comes back from the Committee with the clause in question as it is at present, I shall propose on the third reading the striking out of that clause, and the substitution of a suitable amendment.

MR. BLAKE: Of course, I do not object to the second reading of the Bill, because I have already said that it is essential to provide for the liquidation of this class of corporations. I wish to say, however, that I should have preferred the Government to have adopted the course adopted by the late Government with reference to the existing Act. I framed that law, but, after its introduction, it was adopted by and prosecuted under the responsibility of the Government of the day. In that measure, in regard to special particulars which the condition of insolvent insurance companies require, particular and special treatment was of course involved, but to all other particulars the General Insolvent Law was applied. As I understand the hon. gentleman who has introduced this Bill, he deals with the whole question, not merely with the exceptional circumstances to which I have referred, and which were grappled with for the first time by the present Act, but also with the other points which had been settled by the Insolvent Law. It seems to me that a measure involving so momentous and important interests should be taken under the charge of the Government.

MR. GUTHRIE: I notice that the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) has introduced another Bill, making provision for the winding-up of insolvent incorporated banks and other companies, and I think it worthy of consideration whether, instead of having two separate measures—one for insurance companies and one for incorporated banks and other companies—one measure could not be made to answer for the purposes of all. It is absolutely necessary, in the public interest, that some such measures as those before us should be passed. I think, however, upon examination, that it will be found that a great many provisions of the Insolvent Act will have to be incorporated in these Acts which the hon. gentleman has not inserted. The machinery provided by those two Bills is, I think, too meagre. There are a great many contingencies that will arise and which will have to be considered, for which no provision is made in the Bill. This, perhaps, is a matter for the Committee to deal with, but I would strongly urge upon the hon. the Minister of Justice the propriety not only of adopting the suggestion of the hon. member for West Durham with regard to this Bill, but also with regard to the other Bill for the winding-up of banks and other companies, so that we may have one measure for all classes of companies, and that measure introduced, or at least carried, through the House with the sanction and on the responsibility of the Government.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): The observations of my hon. friend are well worthy of consideration. It would be desirable, however, to have the Bill proposed by the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe submitted to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, and, after examination and discussion there, it will be time enough to determine the mode in which the measure shall be subsequently dealt with. That I believe is the usual mode of procedure, when the matter is of sufficient importance to be dealt with in the way suggested by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake).

MR. IVES: I think it will be found, if not impossible, at least inconvenient to incorporate the two Bills in one, for the reason that the provisions with respect to the insurance companies, particularly Sections 21, 22, 23, 24 and 25 are very important and applicable to insurance companies only. There would, it will be found, be greater difficulty in framing one measure than there would be in obtaining the necessary legislation in two separate Acts.

Bill read the second time.

REDUCTION BILL — [BILL 56.]

(Mr. Béchard.)

SECOND READING PROPOSED.

Order for second reading read.

MR. BÉCHARD: In rising to move the second reading of this Bill, I do not lose sight of the difficulties which stand in its way. I can well understand that the reductions contemplated by this Bill constitute a subject very delicate to approach, for it conflicts with regulations established in former years, and which seem to be shielded by the sanction of time. I also quite realise that it is not altogether an agreeable task for any member of Parliament, nor an easy undertaking for one not holding the position of a member of the Cabinet, or of the leader of a party, to attempt to have reduced by Parliament, salaries and allowances which Parliament has fixed years ago, and which are attached to positions that can be filled only by men of high standing or men of first rate talents, whose services it is the best interests of the country to secure. But, while I am quite prepared to acknowledge the difficulties and serious obstacles which this Bill has to contend against, I entertain the hope that the House will be willing to consider it with that sense of justice and fairness, and that patriotism which ought never to fail to guide Parliament in dealing with questions of great gravity. What this Bill proposes is no new thing, and hon. members will convince themselves that it contains nothing new, if they will consult the past record of the Canadian Parliament. They will find that, in the Session of 1859, the late Major Campbell, then representing the constituency of Rouville, introduced a measure to reduce the indemnity of members of Parliament to \$3 per day, if I am not mistaken. They will find that, in 1865, Mr. McConkey introduced a Bill also reducing the indemnity of members, and they will find that Mr. Chamberlain, who represented Missisquoi, in this House, introduced, during the Session of 1868, a similar Bill, to reduce that indemnity. Hon. members will also find that, in the course of that Session, the House, on the recommendation of the Committee on Contingencies, which no longer exists, adopted a resolution reducing by $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. the salaries of a certain number of public officials. Lastly, they will find that during that same Session, a Bill passed Parliament reducing the Governor-General's salary to \$32,000. I make these quotations to show that this Bill contains no innovation. What is proposed is simply a return to salaries and allowances which had been found sufficient before Confederation, and were found as such after Confederation, until the year 1873. Now, Sir, I wish it to be well understood by the House, that that Bill is not intended, and must not be interpreted, as being in the least possible degree a censure of the measure which passed Parliament in 1873, and by virtue of which certain increases took place. That Bill was enacted by the unanimous vote of the House, not a dissenting voice being raised against it. I was a member of the House then, Sir, and as such I have my own share of responsibility with regard to that measure, and since then I never did attempt, nor do I mean to ever attempt at any future time, to escape that responsibility. I consider that there were then justifiable reasons for Parliament to make those increases. In 1873 we had reached a period of very great prosperity, the price of labour of every service, of every commodity of life, had attained an unusually high rate, the several classes of our people were thriving, and lived contented and happy, our public revenue was continually increasing, and every financial year was crowned by a considerable surplus. But, Sir, that brilliant period has vanished away; the great prosperity we then enjoyed has given way to disastrous depression.

MR. BÉCHARD.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It has come back again.

MR. BÉCHARD: We have been from year to year expecting it in vain. For the last few years, instead of seeing prosperity, content and satisfaction amongst our population, we have been witnessing a disheartening distress, which is driving them out of the country by thousands; our public revenue, instead of continuing to increase, has been decreasing in considerable proportions, and our large surpluses have been replaced by large deficits. This state of things is well known to everybody, and no one will pretend that, in describing it, I give too much colouring to the picture. Now, Sir, I ask you if, under such circumstances, or rather, after such a change in the circumstances of the country, I am not right in saying that, while there were justifiable reasons in 1873 for Parliament to make certain increases, there are equally good grounds to-day for Parliament to make certain reductions. We have been told, since the opening of this Session, that efforts have already been made in some directions, and that efforts are to be made in other directions, with a view to serve the purposes of economy. Well, let me observe here that, should this Bill become law, it would assist, in a large measure, to obtain that amount of economy which is intended to be reached. This country is loaded with a large Public Debt, the yearly interest on which reaches the amount of $7,000,000, which constitutes nearly one-third of our revenue; we have great public works to perform, whose completion will involve an enormous expenditure; and, with such a prospect before us, I think Parliament ought to be disposed to curtail expenses in the administration of the public affairs of this country, in every branch of the Public Service, wherever it can be done without inconvenience. I do not pretend that this Bill is perfect, or that it is a model Bill; some of the reductions indicated in it may be considered too large, others may be judged too small, but, like every other measure submitted to this House, this Bill is susceptible of being revised and amended. It is not brought forth in any hostile spirit, nor with a view to annoy anyone; but rather as a suggestion, or a friendly invitation to the House, to consider the whole subject, in order to see whether some appreciable good could not be obtained from the several provisions of this measure. After these few remarks, I most respectfully submit this Bill to the fair consideration of the House.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Does my hon. friend intend the Bill to have a retroactive effect?

MR. LANDRY: I hope the House will give me the indulgence I want while I make a few remarks on this very interesting, but at the same time, very delicate question. I know I would do more justice to the subject if I were to speak in French, but I will follow the example of my hon. friend from Iberville (Mr. Béchard) and speak in English. A few days ago, when the Bill came in to put down the Supreme Court, the hon. member for Iberville sprang up, spoke in favour of the Supreme Court, denounced the Bill demanding its abolishment as a radical measure, and for that reason said that he would put his vote against it. Well, if the hon. member knows anything about logic he will, no doubt, be the first to enter his vote against such a measure as the one that is now before the House, for there never was such a radical measure brought before Parliament. It is true, as the hon. gentleman says, that it may be revised, and I hope it will be revised, for I intend, when this Bill is referred to a Committee of the Whole, to bring forth some amendments which will please the hon. members of this House, and which will most especially meet with the views of the hon. member for Iberville. My hon. friend went back into the past; he went back to 1859, 1865, 1868, and told us all that was done in those years in relation to the subject we are now discussing. But I believe that his statements were not all correct, and to point out but one error, let me remind you that the hon. member said that in 1868 a Bill, on a similar subject, was brought before this Parliament and carried. Well, I have serious objections to accept such a statement, and I have very good reasons to think and to affirm, that the Bill alluded to by my hon. friend was never passed by this Parliament.

MR. BÉCHARD: It was not passed.

MR. LANDRY: Oh; it was not carried. I am happy to hear the hon. gentleman correct himself, and say it was not carried; but if it was not carried, I do not see why the hon. gentleman should bring it, and rely on such a measure to authorise the present introduction of his own Bill. It is true that, having a little idea of the false step he is now making, my hon. friend has managed to secure the indulgence of this House in saying that his measure was only the result of individual initiative, and that, he being neither a Cabinet Minister nor a leader of Parliament, his measure could not assume that importance he could desire for it. Well, I may add to that consideration that such a Bill in the hands of my hon. friend will never gain any importance, nor will he deserve by its introduction in Parliament to ever be a Cabinet Minister or any leader of Parliament, and the future will certainly give approbation to this present assertion of mine. The hon. member for Iberville, in order to answer in advance an objection which his own doings in the past raise up to his mind and to his present measure, says that in 1873, when the salaries of the different members of this House and those of the Senators were increased, the country was prosperous, but that since those days the country went into ruin, and deficits have replaced large surpluses. If the hon. gentleman is so sincere in bringing forward this Bill, and if the motives of his conduct could only be found in that patriotic idea and good will to help his country in that way, when commenced the period of ruin and deficits? I am astonished, and more than one would be, that the hon. member did not feel before this day those patriotic starts which bring his Bill before Parliament only in 1880. Why did he not start up in 1874, in 1875, in 1876, in 1877, and in 1878, during the last Session of the late Parliament? Why did not his restless soul then search that pure source of the purest economy? It is true my hon. friend was not then a leader of Parliament, nor a Cabinet Minister, but his friends were in power, and I think he might have succeeded, being at the time a man of so great an influence he would undoubtedly have succeeded, in getting all his friends and the members of this House and all the Senators and the Governor himself to reduce their salaries. It has been said, and I believe the assertion to be true, for the hon. gentleman has himself made some declaration to that effect that the hon. member for Iberville was not as sincere as we may think. What have we seen? Last year a similar Bill was introduced by the same gentleman, but just in time to come too late. This year, the Bill makes its way at an earlier period, but my hon. friend has added to it a new clause, by which it is enacted that the salary of the Governor-General will be reduced to $35,000. Well, the hon. member knows very well that the attempt, tried in 1868, to reduce to that sum the Governor-General's salary, met with a complete failure, and that the Royal Assent was refused to such a Bill, and, notwithstanding such a lesson—we had better say just for that reason—here comes again a Bill containing a similar clause, fatally consecrating its author to the same unsuccessful result which he knows and which he desires. And, knowing those things, and desiring such a failure in his ridiculous attempt, the hon. member springs up to speak of his patriotic views and feelings, and of his patriotic measure. Well, if that is patriotism, if that is the patriotism of the hon. member of Iberville, the least he may say on that question the better. The hon. member knows well that, if the clause concerning the reduction of the Governor-General's salary remains in his Bill, the Bill will be choked, and I have no doubt that the hon. member has already asked some of his friends to do that work for him in the Senate. I also believe that, notwithstanding that result, the hon. gentleman will have the audacity to go before his people of Iberville and tell them that he tried all that he could to force the adoption of his Bill, but that the hon. Senators or the Governor-General himself, those enemies of the people, have refused to adopt so patriotic a measure; but, while he will be on that subject, let the hon. gentleman tell his constituents that in 1873 he was one of the first members in this House to sign, and get others to sign, a paper by which the majority of the members at that time urged the Government of the day to increase their indemnity. My hon. friend has signed such a paper. Let him deny this information if it is not true. I know it has been said by the hon. gentleman that, in 1873, he had many good reasons to justify him in raising his indemnity, and one of them was that the country was then prosperous. But, now that the National Policy has given us such good times, I do not see why the hon. gentleman should try to impress on our minds that we are worse than in 1873. I do not see why he should try to have the public to believe that we are returning to those bad times of 1874, 1875, 1876 and 1877, that we are going back to those days of misery, of depression, of bankruptcy, of deficits. I do not see, from all he has uttered to-day, that these evil days are coming back again. At all events, and whatever may be our appreciation of the present financial situation of the country, the hon. gentleman may always have an opportunity to prove the sincerity of his patriotism; if he is as patriotic as he pretends, if he really wants to do so much good to his constituents, we will afford him every chance of doing so, and, if the Bill is entertained, as I hope it will be, for I approve of the principle of economy it contains, I will, in convenient time, put as an amendment that the hon. member for Iberville be not allowed to take more than $600. But, if the hon. member is in search of easy popularity, let him not wait for that legislation, but give every year to his constituents the $400 he thinks he is unjustly taking, and, no doubt, by acting so patriotic a rôle, he will compel his constituents to elect him usque in æternum, provided he lives to that date, or that the people of Iberville do not make up their mind and choose a $1,000 worth member in the place of a $600 one. I understand that we must always try to do as much good to our country as we possibly can, and by every possible means. On the other hand, I think that it is prudent not to undertake too much at one time; we must not use too great an effort at first, but progress by degrees. When the child first begins to walk, he takes his steps slowly at first, and, as he tries more and more, he comes to walk easier and easier. Well, we will act in a similar mode here, and accept the lessons that nature gives us every day, and, in so far as the measure of my hon. friend is concerned, I think that its first application should be limited to the hon. member for Iberville himself. If the hon. gentleman does not complain of that new state of things, if he finds it sweet and nice, if he is able to swallow the pill without making too wry faces, well, we certainly will, after a few Parliaments, do the same thing; but, if he makes any complaint, if he does not find the measure pleasant for him, if it pains him, or if it kills him, I do not see why we should find it pleasant for us. So long as he will prove that that measure will not be beneficial to him, we shall not find it beneficial to us. I will not move any amendment to the principle of the Bill, for, as I have said, I approve of the principle of economy it involves, but I will, when the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole, propose the amendment of which I gave notice, and, with that understanding of what I intend to do, I believe that all the hon. members of this House will give their assent to this splendid legislation, which is to bring relief to Canada, and convert all possible deficits into surpluses.

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew): I confess I feel somewhat surprised that the hon. member for Iberville has allowed all these years to pass, since 1874, without any attempt to bring before Parliament this measure. We all know that although that hon. gentleman did not occupy the position of a Cabinet Minister or leader, he possessed a vast amount of influence, and he was a very prominent member of the party that occupied the Treasury Benches from 1874 until 1878. It seems to me that, if he was sincere in the desire to bring about the economy now proposed, he would have submitted this measure to the House when it was known, in 1877, that a large deficit had occurred between the revenue and expenditure. It may be the hon. gentleman felt that the hon. gentlemen who then occupied the Treasury Benches were entitled to a larger remuneration for their services than their successors, and thus deferred the introduction of his Bill until the present time. Whatever may have actuated him or been his reason for delay, it seems to me that this Bill ought to receive the serious consideration of the House. It ought not, in my opinion, to be treated in the light, cavalier manner of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Landry) who has just spoken. I am convinced that it is absolutely necessary that every possible effort should be made to reduce the general expenditure. I am not disposed to say the occupants of the Treasury Benches should have their salaries reduced; I believe the time they give to the service of their country merits as large a salary as is paid; but I think we might very fairly consider, as members, whether it is not our duty, representing as we do the people, many of whom feel and have felt the pressure of the hard times the last three or four years, to consider whether we could not submit to a reduction in our own Sessional indemnity. I am prepared to vote for the second reading of the Bill, for its principle, though I think some parts are objectionable, and in my own person I am ready to submit to the reduction of the Sessional indemnity proposed therein.

MR. LONGLEY: It occurs to me it is scarcely doing justice to the introducer of this Bill to impute to him unworthy motives. I am willing to assume his motives are good, as I think there are a number of members who will, in the main, agree with the proposals of his Bill. I think that nothing, perhaps, is more needed at this period than the introduction of what I will call economical reform, which should begin at the head and descend to the foot; that it should be equitable in all its parts and relations. I think, if that were done by the existing Administration or Parliament, that great credit would be accorded to them by the people of this country. I am free to confess this is the mode sometimes taken to secure cheap popularity; but I am not willing to conclude that that is the object of the mover of this Bill. We have been going on, during the last ten years, at a pretty rapid rate, increasing our annual expenditure; and if we go on for ten years more at the same rate, it might be profitable for all of us to enquire where we shall land. Now, it may not be possible at this stage to stay the progress of public works. We are, seemingly, laid under the necessity of going on—some think to destruction, and some think to ultimate triumph and success. It is a little problematical what will be the end. But it is within the compass of our means to reduce the annual expenditure of the country, and I am free to avow that in my judgment the annual expenditure of the Dominion during the last five or six years should not have exceeded $23,000,000, and that for the five years to come it should not exceed $25,000,000, which it will, unless some means of reduction are adopted. The principle of economy should be applied from the beginning to the end—to the head of the Government, to the Ministers and the officials all down through, and to both branches of the Legislature, in a proportionate ratio. I think the reduction proposed by the mover, as a fair indemnity to members, is rather liberal and disproportionate. I am not here to make political capital, but just to speak my sentiments. In my judgment $800 would be about a fair sum, which I would be willing to stand by and make it retrospective or retroactive. But it is pretty evident that nothing but failure will attend this movement of my worthy friend from Iberville (Mr. Béchard). He deserves credit for his boldness, however. This matter should be taken up by the Administration, honestly and sincerely, and carried through Parliament. No private member can hope to carry it through. This is, all will admit, a measure of very great delicacy. It certainly would be an exceedingly delicate matter to propose reductions in certain quarters, but they should be made, and the extravagant expenditure in high places controlled. If we were free to speak out here, we could be very much more explicit, but it is not called for at present. I do not wish to be understood as censuring the Ministry of the day in the remarks I have made, but, to a certain extent, perhaps, I might censure it. It was among its first duties to have taken up this question. It seems to me we are being almost legislated to death. Look at the salaries of the Lieutenant-Governors to begin with, six or seven getting $9,000 apiece, eight in all. It is but a trifle, it is true, in comparison with certain other expenditures; but, when you consider the expenses connected with the various Local Governments, and think what a tremendous expense is incurred in running this machine, it does seem to me we should be impressed with the folly that has characterised our action for years past, and about as much now as heretofore. I have been induced to make these statements now, but they are views I have entertained for a good while past. I should like to see this matter taken up in a bold, yet calm and temperate way, that we might elicit in some fair measure the real sentiment of the House. It is in vain for us to talk about reducing expenditure here and there, and the salaries of subordinates, who have barely enough to live on, while we refuse to clip our own emoluments. We shall not be credited with any sincerity unless we show a willingness to apply the pruning-knife to our own receipts. I believe we should considerably reduce our annual expenditure, and if we do not do so, we shall be brought to grief in the not very far future.

MR. BOULTBEE: I feel, like the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, that this is a matter of the very greatest delicacy, and that we must be very careful how we deal with it. I also agree with him that it is highly inexpedient to apply the pruning-hook too closely to ourselves. I think it would be a good thing to reduce the salaries of the Governor-General and the Premier and all his colleagues, in fact, as Artemus Ward says, "the pay of all ones wife's relations." But as to the amount of work that we do, and our value to the community, I cannot agree with that hon. gentleman, particularly when he says we should be satisfied with $200 a year. He wants a reduction of $800, to leave us only $200. I do not know where he boards, but if he lived where I do, he would have to leave his clothes. I think that would be applying the pruning-hook a little too closely. Various ideas suggest themselves to me on this occasion; I have thought that perhaps, with the relative strength of parties in the House, we should pass a measure making the indemnity to members of the Opposition $500, although they might retaliate when in power some future day; that also makes this a delicate question. All those considerations make its settlement a matter of immeasurable difficulty. I shall simply recommend for the present that the matter be left alone, and that the Government, if inclined, try to make a saving on their own salaries.

MR. LONGLEY: I simply rise to make an explanation. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman who has just sat down was joking or not. Perhaps he was indulging in that vein so characteristic of him, and perhaps he misunderstood me. I do not wish to be misunderstood. I said nothing about reducing the indemnity of members to $200, but that I thought $800 about fair. I would not propose anything so absurd as to reduce it to so low a sum as $200. If I went so far as that, I should say we might do like some similar bodies, serve for nothing—then members might leave their clothes or not, as they pleased.

MR. JONES: Some hon. gentlemen are inclined to treat this matter as a joke. I think they will find in the end that it is not much of a joke. I believe that, in 1873, a similar motion was made with regard to a general reduction of salaries. Sir John A. Macdonald's Government, who made that move, was rather unfortunate, having had to walk out; the hon. member for Lambton, who succeeded him, did not take up that question or go into the matter. I think, with the hon. member from Renfrew (Mr. White), that this Bill should be read a second time, and go to Committee for proper discussion. In the canvass through my county, matters like these were spoken of by the people. Hon. gentlemen here may imagine that the hard-working people of this country, many of whom think that $300 or $400 is a very good sum to live and support a family on for a year do not think anything of our indemnity, of $1,000 a year. I can tell them those people do think a good deal of it, and think we are pretty well paid. In order that we may study economy, though I think the times are going to be better, I should favour action in accordance with the views of the people in my constituency, for a general reduction of the expenses of government. I think we can reduce in many instances the salaries of officials as well as the salaries of members of the House of Commons, and the salaries of members of the Senate. I have received letters since the Bill of the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard) was placed before the House in regard to this matter, asking me to support it because during the last campaign a reduction of the salaries of members of the House of Commons and of the Government was advocated. The letter is marked private but I will read it. It is as follows:—

"I have received Mr. Béchard's Bill. There is a strong feeling in this Riding that members'

indemnity, and salaries generally, where it can be done, should be reduced. You advocated it during your last canvass, and I hope you will speak in its favour on the floor of the House."

When we look at the expenses of the Government of the country, at the expenses of the House of Commons and of the Senate, something like five hundred and odd thousand dollars per annum, and the expenses of the legislation of the different Provinces, somewhere about six hundred thousand dollars, something should be done to make these expenses less. How it should be done I cannot tell. For my part I am willing to take off, not $200, but to reduce it to $400 or $500. That is my opinion; and, if the hon. gentlemen occupying the Treasury Benches are too hard-worked, if they do not think it consistent with the duty they have to perform to reduce their expenses, well and good. I think, however, they should be reduced. I believe that the agitation for legislative union will become very strong, and I think the sooner we come to it the better, for the sake of economy. I hope the Government will allow this Bill to go to a second reading, and before a Committee, and that they will not treat it as a joke. It is no joke at all; and for my part I rise here seriously to advocate the Bill, with such alterations and amendments as may be thought advisable.

MR. ARKELL: I do not rise with the intention of opposing the Bill, but as only half the members are at present in the House, I think it inadvisable to discuss it now. I quite agree with what the hon. member has said who has just sat down. I think we are legislated to death, and I would like to see all the Local Legislatures of this country wiped out. So many bodies with legislating powers add vastly to the expenses of Government. The reductions, however, proposed by the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard), are only drops in the bucket. It seems to me he is commencing at the wrong end. I move the adjournment of the second reading of this Bill, so as to have a better attendance of the House when this matter may be fully discussed.

MR. SNOWBALL: This has been on the Paper before the House for some time. The members knew it would be up this evening; it is their fault, not that of the mover of this resolution, if they are not in their places. I fully endorse the principles of the Bill. I think that the expenses of legislation are entirely beyond all bounds; they have been increased from year to year, and I do not see that the hon. member for Iberville should be blamed for not bringing the Bill forward before. It was not unreasonable for us to keep looking for a return of prosperity, which would justify additional taxation; but that prosperity did not return, and it is high time to do something to reduce our expenditure. When the people of this country look at the expenses of legislation, and find, as has been stated by an hon. member, that these expenses now approach a million of dollars—he may have stated the sum rather fully, but I find it about three-quarters of a million—they may well be alarmed. When the hon. gentlemen opposite came into power, a year ago, instead of economising, as they should have done, I find, in looking over the returns put before us, that, for 206 members sitting in this Chamber, there were 207 clerks and messengers. Is this country to pay for 207 attendants to attend upon 206 members? It is no wonder the country complains. It is a mystery to the members on this side of the House what these 207 attendants and clerks find to do. Some hon. gentlemen opposite are said to have two or three secretaries or clerks each. The seventy members on this side of the House, I venture to say, have not had the services of ten of these persons, and I think the remaining 197 were rather too many for the other side. It is quite right that we should attempt to reduce expenses in the way this resolution suggests, and until you apply the reduction in this Chamber, the people will not be satisfied that we are in earnest. I, for one, Sir, think it is about time that Canada found 206 legislators willing to serve their country without a money consideration, and if this was accomplished, we would be freed from many of the evils of which we now complain.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne): This has been discussed amongst the electors of my constituency, and when the present Government came into power last year we were prepared, seeing the enormous deficits that had accumulated, to find some measures of economy introduced into the various branches of the Public Service. I believe we should commence at the head of the Government, and from that downwards to all the various Departments. I hold in my hand a statement of the expenses in connection with the Governor-General's establishment since Confederation. It shows salary $600,000, and expenses $900,000, making $1,500,000 in all. Not only the salary of the Governor-General, but those of the Ministers, of the Civil Servants, and also those of the Senators and members of Parliament should be reduced in proportion. There are many officers and many men in the Civil Service who faithfully perform their duties, but there are many others who, if called upon to perform outside work, would not earn a tithe of their present income. I am in favour of the principle of the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Iberville, although some of its provisions may be improved, and I hope it will go to a second reading and to Committee. I think we should adopt the motion made for adjourning the debate. To-day's trains carried away a large number of members, and I believe they should be here to record their votes and not make us responsible. It looks very much like shirking the vote, and it would be better when it comes up that they should all be present, so that every man, from the leader downward, shall have an opportunity of recording his vote upon it.

MR. BERGIN: It is quite evident that the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, is afraid that, even in this thin House, a vote may be recorded in favour of this Bill. I do not think he need feel any alarm; the Bill will not be carried. I was one of those who signed the round-robin which forced the then leader of the Government to increase the salaries of Ministers, and the indemnity of members of this House; and, if my memory serves me right, the hon. member who now introduces this Bill is the gentleman who placed that paper before me.

MR. BÉCHARD: I must say that the hon. gentleman is totally mistaken; I was not one of those who circulated that paper at all.

MR. BERGIN: May I ask the hon. gentleman did he sign it?

MR. BÉCHARD: I did assent to it. I admitted, in my opening remarks, that I had my share of responsibility with regard to the measure referred to. I well recollect that a couple of gentlemen asked members to give their assent, beforehand, to that measure. By whom had they been sent? I do not know. But I assented to the proposition, as did every other member of the House, with very few exceptions.

MR. BERGIN: I see no reason, having signed that document, and believing then that the indemnity was necessary and proper, why I should change the opinion formed on that occasion. I do not believe the indemnity is too large, nor do I believe my constituents will think I am too well paid. The constituents of other gentlemen may think so, but I feel that the majority of the constituencies do desire that the members who represent them in this House shall be properly indemnified; they have a proper regard for themselves, and for the gentlemen whom they send here, and they do not desire that we should lose our time entirely, or that the money we expend in their service should not be reimbursed. I do not sympathise at all with these buncombe Bills, or buncombe motions, or buncombe speeches, nor do I think it will add to the reputation of those members to go before their constituents with clap-trap economy of this kind. If they are really sincere, there are proper modes and times in which to attack the expenditure, which is certainly increasing, perhaps in a greater ratio than is necessary. But this is not the way to attack the expenditure of the country. The hon. member for Iberville for five years supported hon. gentlemen opposite, while adding million upon million to the Public Debt, and he strains at a gnat though he swallowed a camel. Perhaps, Sir, it would be well that the debate should be adjourned until there is a full representation in the House, so that the country may see that it is the almost unanimous opinion of this House that the indemnity is not at all too large. I have no sympathy with those hon. gentlemen who make an attack upon the expenditure necessitated by the maintenance of the Governor-General and his staff and his establishment. Neither have I any sympathy with the attack that is made upon the salaries of members of the Cabinet. On the contrary, I do not believe that the Premier and the members of his Cabinet are sufficiently paid. I said so in 1873, and I say so now. We know that many hon. gentlemen who come to this House do so at great personal sacrifice and at a great financial loss. Many of them, in fact, destroy their private interests, and those who have had large professional emoluments before entering upon political life, in a few years lose them entirely. Is not that a sufficient sacrifice to call upon them to make without requiring of them to defray, out of their private purse, the expense they must of necessity be at during the time occupied here in the service of the country.

MR. MACDONELL (North Lanark): I thoroughly agree with some of the remarks of the last speaker, though not with all. As my election expenses were comparatively trifling, probably I may be prejudiced in reference to the indemnities that members of Parliament should receive. I desire to state that the question of indemnity was not discussed on the hustings in the late election in North Lanark, and the action I propose taking in this matter is not intended for electioneering effect. I must, however, say that the feeling in that part of the country is opposed to the large indemnity paid to members of Parliament. There is no doubt that the members representing the Ottawa district are not put to the large expenses that hon. members from distant parts are. Still, I think the feeling of the whole of Ontario is that the indemnity of members is too large. For my own part, I would be satisfied if the indemnity were reduced to actual disbursements, inasmuch as I believe that we should come here for the honour of the position. I think the time will come when the people of this country will say the cost of Civil Government is too great for this country, and no member shall be sent to this House at the large expense of $1,000 per Session, but they shall receive a simple equivalent for the expenses they are put to in the Capital. In the Province of Ontario, the members of the Local Legislature increased their indemnity, and an outcry was raised from one end of the Province to the other against that increase. So strong was the feeling, that the Government of Ontario had to come to the rescue, and reduce their own salaries as well as the indemnities of the members. I do not think that this should be regarded as a political question, one way or the other, and I consider it most unfair that my hon. friend from Iberville (Mr. Béchard) should be charged with introducing this question with ulterior political motives. Every hon. member in the House should be prepared to express his honest views on the subject, apart from political considerations. When the Bill comes up for a second reading, and I hope it will come up for a second reading, I shall be prepared, probably, to propose that members residing near the city of Ottawa should receive a smaller indemnity than members from a distance. The fact of there being a thin House to-night I do not think we should take into consideration one way or the other. The hon. members who have left should have been here, and we cannot be held responsible for their neglect of duty. I am of opinion that the adjournment of the debate should not take place.

MR. WRIGHT: This is really a very grave matter, and my own view would be that, in the interest of the great body of the members of this House, it would be very desirable to have no indemnity at all. But, unfortunately, some of the most able members of this House are not able to give up their whole time to the service of their country, as some few might be able to do, and I think it would be a very serious loss to the country and to this House if they were not enabled to take their part in the debates of this House. With regard to the salaries of the Ministers, my own impression has been, knowing precisely the labours these hon. gentlemen have to encounter, that the sums they receive are entirely too small, and I should prefer that they were increased. I am exceedingly proud of our public men. They have all had opportunities of getting rich, and it is well understood that they are mostly poor. I think the time has come when hon. gentlemen should cease to talk buncombe, and look the matter gravely in the face. With reference to the expense incurred in regard to Government House and its surroundings, I think the less we say, perhaps, the better. For my own part, I have the greatest respect for the distinguished occupants of those buildings. In Russia, we are told that, when wolves are on the track of travellers, the latter throw out a portion of their freight for the purpose of appeasing for a time their ravenous pursuers. It seems that the economists are now upon our track, and I am willing to make a sacrifice to them. I am willing to sacrifice our Senators, who should be above trivial considerations of a financial character, and be willing to fall back upon the dignified position which they undoubtedly occupy. I can assure hon. gentlemen that representing a constituency adjacent to the Capital is not as profitable as some of them seem to think. I do not think the indemnity is too large, nor do I think that the salaries of the Ministers of the Crown, or the high officials of the Dominion, are too large. If we are to have good officers we must pay them.

MR. THOMPSON (Cariboo): I fully agree with the hon. member for the county of Ottawa in the remarks he has made. I do not consider that the Ministers, who have to perform arduous duties, are overpaid. I do not think that the Governor-General or the Lieutenant-Governors of the Provinces are overpaid, provided they fulfil the duties they are expected to perform. I look upon this motion as mere political clap-trap, brought forward for the purpose of enabling hon. gentlemen to go before their constituents and say: I advocated economy; I was willing to sacrifice my indemnity. I will suggest a practical test to these gentlemen. Let them go before their constituents next year and say: I consider I have received $200 too much; I consider I have received $300 too much; or I consider I have received $1,000 too much; and let them subscribe those sums to some charitable institutions in their respective counties. In this way they would show more sincerity than by saying: I was overpaid, but I put the money in my pocket. If they carry out this suggestion, they will have a substantial argument to submit to their constituents at the next election; and I would suggest that the most appropriate institution to which they should make their donations, being one in whose benefits they might themselves participate, would be an asylum for idiots.

MR. BÉCHARD: Mr. Speaker, before the motion for adjourning the debate is carried, I desire to say a few words in reference to what has been uttered by some

hon. members. I did not anticipate that the moving of this Bill would provoke the spiteful remarks which have fallen from the hon. members for Montmagny (Mr. Landry), Cornwall (Mr. Bergin), and Cariboo (Mr. Thompson). However, I have moved this Bill, I am responsible for it, and I am ready to abide by its consequences. I have already said that I considered it a grave matter and that, in view of the present circumstances of the country, I thought I was perfectly justified in bringing it forward. The hon. member for Montmagny said that I ought to know that the provision of the Bill which refers to the Governor-General's salary would prevent it from receiving His Excellency's sanction. Sir, the hon. member knows very well there is nothing easier than to have that clause removed from a Bill when it is disagreeable to the House; this occurs at every Session, and if this Bill be allowed to go to Committee of the Whole, let the hon. member move to strike off that clause, and I will not insist upon keeping it. I placed it in the Bill as the expression of my humble opinion that, in the present distressed condition of the country, every man holding a position in the service of Canada should be prepared to make a sacrifice for his country. The hon. member for Montmagny said that I was one of those who formerly went round and asked members to consent to an increase of the indemnity. Such is not the case. I was asked by an hon. member at the time if I would give my assent to the scheme, and I did assent to it like the rest of the House. But, Sir, my participation in the enactment of a law for which the hon. member has no responsibility, but of which he is happy to reap the benefit, and which he is defending, is a very weak argument against this Bill, and no reason why it should not receive the fair consideration of this House. The hon. member referred to the amendments of which he has given notice. Those amendments do not frighten me, and, if the House should see fit to pass them, inasmuch as they would effect me personally, I would be the last man to complain of them. Some hon. members, instead of directly facing this Bill, have preferred to attribute to me unworthy motives, and to impugn my sincerity. I have but one answer to make to those hon. gentlemen: let them inflict upon me the chastisement which they think I deserve, by voting for this Bill. Now, Sir, it has been insinuated that I might only be seeking cheap popularity; but those who know how I stand in my constituency can say that this insinuation is without foundation. My majority at the last election was 230, out of a total of about 1,600 votes, beside the fact that I beat a man who is considered one of the leaders of the Conservative party in the Province of Quebec. Surely, after having won such a victory, a man stands above the imputation of seeking popularity. I have brought this matter forward simply from a sense of duty to my constituents and to my country.

MR. LANDRY: I have but a word to say in answer to the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard), and with respect to the amendment I intend to introduce to the Bill. There is in English a well-known proverb to the effect that it takes nine tailors to make a man. We have had an illustration of that proverb to-night, but so that this illustration may never be forgotten, but always remain in the minds of this generation, and of the future one, I propose to extend the effect of my amendment to those gentlemen who, for the sake of easy popularity, have, like the hon. member for Iberville, spoken in favour of a Bill which they pray God and their friends not to allow to become law. Six members only have taken that ground. I hope that, before the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole, I will find out three other members, so that I may easily find my nine tailors—I beg pardon, my nine members—nothing but one. Parties who desire to join are consequently invited to give me their names. We all know why the hon. member for Iberville introduces this Bill. In his constituency, it is said, he met, one day during the last electoral struggle, a political opponent, who compelled him to promise that, if he ever got back to this House, he would introduce this matter.

MR. BÉCHARD: That is not true.

MR. LANDRY: Well, if it is not true, why did the hon. gentleman tell me so? Why did he give such an information to all his friends in this House, last year, when he first introduced this Bill? Let the hon. member repeat that my statement is not true, and I will immediately satisfy him with such proofs that will establish who is attempting to deceive this House. As I am very serious in the amendment I intend to propose, I think with my hon. friend for East Elgin (Mr. Arkell) that this question should be allowed to be discussed another day at a full meeting of this House. For that reason I shall vote for the adjournment of the debate, but, before resuming my seat, I have to make this declaration, that I do not in any way object to the principle of the Bill. It is a sound principle; economy must be practised by all reasonable means. I agree to that principle; shall vote for the second reading of the Bill, and in Committee of the Whole will press the adoption of my amendments, to which I hope this House will give a fair trial.

Motion agreed to, and Debate adjourned.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

House resumed the adjourned Debate on the proposed-motion (Sir Samuel L. Tilley): That the Resolutions adopted in Committee of Ways and Means (March 9th) be read the second time.

MR. SNOWBALL: In resuming the debate on this question, it seems to me very unfortunate that after a year's experience of this Tariff so many hon. gentlemen on this side of the House feel compelled to come forward and reiterate, in the strongest manner, the convictions they expressed last year in relation to this subject. I have been struck, during the course of this debate, by the earnestness which has been displayed by so many hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. I have also thought that hon. members on the other side of the House have not in all cases tried to meet the arguments which have been brought forward on this side as fully as might have been expected of them. The speech of the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) was delivered with the usual force of that hon. gentleman, yet, whatever failings there were in that speech, it presented the advantage of closely following the lines laid down by the hon. leaders of the Government in reference to this subject. The hon. gentleman in opening his remarks, told us that the first Budget of the late Finance Minister imposed a tax on this country of $26,000,000. Now, I have sought in the public records to find on what the hon. gentleman based his information, and, so far, I have not been able to find any ground for such a statement. I do find that in 1874, the late Finance Minister brought down an estimated expenditure for 1874-5 of $23,713,000. In the face of that, where did the hon. gentleman get his information in reference to the $26,168,000 he spoke about? When asked where he got it, he showed us a book, stating that that was where his statement could be proved. But that book did not contain the Estimates, but only the Supply Bill. The hon. gentleman told us he had studied this question, not only while he had been a member of this House, but during the many years he was in the Press Gallery, and that, therefore, he knew fully what he was talking about. Is it possible the hon. gentleman made that statement with the clear intention of deceiving the country? Or did he make it not knowing that he was quoting from the Supplies, that had no direct connection with the Estimates, and that these supplies contained an item of $13,107,000 which belonged to capital account? Whether it was an error or not, the statement will not raise the hon. gentleman's character as a financial authority. I find the hon. gentleman's speech is published in the Montreal Gazette, but in that paper he is not reported so fully as he should have been, for his statement in reference to that point is entirely omitted but I find that in the first portion of this speech he is reported as saying that the hon. member for Centre Huron, in the first Budget Speech that he delivered in this House, imposed upwards of $3,000,000 additional taxes upon the people. This is the first part of the argument which he adduced to prove the position he had taken in reference to this $26,000,000, the amount he stated was asked for in the first Budget Speech of the hon. member for Centre Huron. He asserts that that hon. gentleman added $3,000,000 additional taxation to the burdens of the people of this country. I suppose hon. gentlemen opposite are quite willing to accept the Estimates for 1873-4 of $23,828,300 as theirs; and the actual expenditure for that year of $23,316,000, showing an expenditure of $507,000 less than the Estimates, as the fair basis on which to estimate their last expenditure previous to going out of office. I find the hon. member for Cardwell, after labouring very nearly an hour to prove that the Liberals, when coming into power, had in their first year, that is, in 1874-5, imposed $3,000,000 additional taxes on the country, now abandons that statement entirely, and later on in his remarks states the amount of excessive expenditure in the year 1874-5 reached the sum of $1,417,000 in excess of the greatest expenditure of the previous Administration. By what rule of argument did the hon. gentleman so suddenly drop from the first position he took, and now adopt a sum or less than half of the amount that he argued so long to sustain? This statement, however, is equally at variance with the truth. As far as I can find out by the Public Accounts, the expenditure for 1874-5 was $23,713,000, and for this I defy contradiction, whereas, for the previous year for which the previous Administration was responsible, the expenditure was $23,316,000, making a difference only of $397,000, and an over-statement on the part of the hon. gentleman of $1,020,000 from his reduced figures. On what grounds can the hon. gentleman justify such gross misstatements. Now the hon. gentleman goes through the whole five years of the Mackenzie Administration, giving figures for each year's excessive expenditure, which are equally at variance with the truth; but let us follow him, and analyse his statements. The expenditure in 1875-6 was $24,488,000. Deduct now their expenditure of 1873-4, which, as before stated, was $23,316,000, and we have a balance of $1,172,000 which the late Administration expended more than the previous one did in 1873-4. But the hon. gentleman is not willing to put the sum at $1,172,000. He puts it at $2,152,000. In 1876-7, the expenditure was $23,519,000; take from this amount again the highest expenditure authorised by the previous Administration, namely, $23,316,000, and this is what the hon. gentleman asked, and you have a balance of only $203,000, whereas the hon. gentleman stated the balance was $1,223,000. The next year, 1876-7, the hon. gentleman stated the extra expenditure was $1,203,000, whereas it was only $186,000, and for the year 1878-9 he put the excessive expenditure at $2,155,000; it was only $1,139,000, and for this excessive expenditure the Mackenzie Government were not wholly responsible, as hon. gentlemen opposite came into power this year, and over-expended the Estimate by $786,308. I would, however, be willing to give them the benefit of all this, if they wish it, as I will show that the Mackenzie Government actually reduced the expenditure during their Administration. To sum the whole matter up, the hon. gentleman says there was an excessive expenditure during those years of $8,152,000, whereas, according to the Public Accounts, published by themselves, the excessive expenditure during these five years is only $3,097,000. There is an alarming difference in these figures, and some person should be able to account for them. But I can go still further, and show that in those years not only does the extra expenditure not exceed $3,097,000, but that the late Administration paid more interest on the money borrowed by the Government to carry on the public works of the country than did the former Administration, to this extent :—

In 1874-5—extra interest.....	$ 866,353 88
1875-6	676,465 76
1876-7	1,072,790 94
1877-8	1,324,447 24
1878-9	1,470,297 83

$5,419,355 65

And extra amounts paid to Sinking Funds :—

In 1874-5	$ 41,853 32
1875-6	309,033 32
1876-7	314,453 59
1877-8	431,826 02
1878-9	523,299 76

$7,030,821 66

Credit amounts expended in each year in excess of expenditure of 1873-4, namely :—

In 1874-5.....	$ 396,754 29
1875-6.....	1,172,055 36
1876-7.....	202,985 02
1877-8.....	186,841 50
1878-9.....	1,139,064 81

These figures show that they had to pay, as interest, $5,410,000 more in these years than their predecessors did. This money did not go into the ordinary expenditure of the country, and therefore they should receive credit for it. They also paid $1,620,000 into the Sinking Fund more than their predecessors, taking the years 1873-4 as a criterion, clearly showing that the Mackenzie Administration not only were able to check the enormous expenditure of their predecessors, but that they saved to the country $3,933,000 during these years instead of having, as the hon. member for Cardwell stated, expended over $8,000,000 additional. We all know it is very easy for Ministers, as it is for individuals, to increase their expenditure from year to year, but to check it is a more serious matter, and one which only can be accomplished with courage and ability. The late Finance Minister was able to reduce the expenditure of this country during the time he was in office, and I think that in the face of his having to pay this large amount of interest on the capital borrowed to conduct our public works, and of his having paid these large sums into the Sinking Fund, that his succeeding in doing so is a marvel. I find that the next subject, that the hon.

gentleman dwelt upon was the price of refined sugar. I did not intend to deal with this subject as it has already been largely dealt with by other speakers. There are, however, one or two statements which really require just a passing remark. He told us that he found that the average price of sugar in 1876 was $9.50; in 1877, $10.66; in 1878, $9.34, and in 1879, $9.00; and he adds that the effect is that the people of Canada, instead of having the price of their sugar increased, had it 1c. per pound cheaper than they would if the Tariff had not come into operation. That is a most extraordinary statement to make, that after an increase of 25 per cent. in the shape of duty, the people bought it for 1c. less per pound. If that argument holds good, they had better put on another 25 per cent. and see if it will reduce the price still more. Then he went on to tell us that the price has gone up this year in sympathy with the increased cost of raw sugar. Now, if that is the reason, and it undoubtedly is so in part, why did he not go on and tell us that the price went down last year in sympathy with the price of raw material, and if it had not been for the extra duty it would have been selling at $8.00 instead of $9.00. I saw in the Toronto Mail of 24th March, a criticism of the speech of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson). This is good Conservative authority, and it admits the present Tariff increased the price of fine sugar 10 per cent. That paper stated that we use, in round numbers, 120,000,000lb. of sugar annually. Taking last year's average prices, 9c., the country pays $10,800,000 for sugar, and 10 per cent. extra duty on this is $1,080,000, being the difference between the old and present Tariff, and for this large sum we are told we receive a benefit in the shape of having employment found for 400 men at Montreal. Why, if we divide this $1,080,000 into 400 shares, we shall have $2,700 for each of these 400 men. Did these men get that amount? And is that the reason why this large additional burden has been put upon the people? Did the hon. the Finance Minister consider these men in imposing this burden on the country? I think he had more consideration for the employers of these men than for the men themselves, who received but a very small portion of that money. So far from this sugar duty having decreased the price of that commodity, what are the real facts? This hon. gentleman tells us the prices in 1878 and 1879; but he does not tell what the price is in 1880. The price to-day, according to the Montreal Gazette, is 11c. per pound for refined sugar, whereas best refined sugar can be put on board ship in England at 6½c. per pound.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Why do not they bring it here?

MR. SNOWBALL: The Ottawa Citizen, of the 20th of this present month says that twenty-five car loads of sugar ex Polynesian from England, were shipped over the Intercolonial Railway yesterday. If sugar is thus coming from England and paying the duty, how can our sugar be cheaper than that coming from abroad? On this 528,000lb. of sugar, the revenue will benefit \$17,000; but it shews that the refiners are not satisfied with the benefits given, but are straining the last fraction from the consumers. We are told that this Tariff bears equally and justly on all parts of the Dominion. If that is so, what mean the appeals from the hon. the Finance Minister's own native Province for relief from its evil effects? What mean the appeals we have heard from hon. members from Prince Edward Island? These hon. gentlemen, with one exception, supported the Government through every division on this Tariff, and now, after a year's trial, of a Tariff that they themselves assisted to force on this country, what do we find? Why, hon. members from that Province taking a stand far beyond that of hon. members from New Brunswick. We find them coming before this Parliament asking for money compensation for the damage done by the Tariff to their Island. We, in New Brunswick, do not ask for money considerations. What we ask is that we should be relieved from this burden; we do not offer to sell our rights for a mess of pottage. But they go further, and they use words which would be denounced as treason if coming from our side of the House; they say if this money consideration is not granted they will not be accountable for Prince Edward Island taking means to secede from the Union. Does the hon. the Finance Minister want any stronger appeal to show that his Tariff does not bear with equal justice? Can he, in the face of these appeals from his own friends, say that his Tariff bears equally? The hon. the Finance Minister told us last year, and he tells us again this year, that this Tariff is not intended and does not add increased taxation on the people of this country. But he has also told us that additional taxation was found last year to be indispensable, and he has told us further, that this further taxation was \$2,000,000. And still in the face of this, he tells us that the goods bought by the people do not cost a cent more than before. Last Session I brought before the House, in remarking on this Tariff, an English invoice and entry under the two Tariffs, and showed that the present Tariff largely increased the cost of the goods to the consumers. I now produce another invoice and Customs entry, which shows that the present Tariff has increased the duty to be paid on this invoice to the extent of 43 per cent. Now, this 43 per cent. on this small lot of goods must be paid by the labouring classes of the Province, and yet we are told that the people do not pay additional taxation. Speaking of our complaint about the duty on flour and corn meal, the hon. the Finance Minister also told us that the Province of Ontario paid more duty on those articles during the last six months than New Brunswick and Nova Scotia did on flour and coal combined. Of course we have not the same information on those matters that the hon. gentleman possesses. Certain returns are placed on the Table; but we have not the means to decipher them, as they are only for the Dominion, the proportion of each Province not being given. But, from the Trade and Navigation Returns of last year, I find that Ontario paid \$854 duty on flour, and that New Brunswick and Nova Scotia paid \$6,360 during the same period. Those Provinces also paid \$4,851 duty on coal, making a total of \$11,211. I have no doubt that the result will be proportionately the same this year. I maintain that the hon. Minister, in dealing with matters contained in the statistics brought down to the House, should use them in a manner which would assist us in the performance of duties connected with the investigation of such topics, instead of quoting them in a way which is misleading and bewildering. We were also told that the Tariff discriminated against the United States, and in favour of England. Two statements were made in this regard—one in reference to the importations of iron and steel, and the other with reference to the importations of cottons. The hon. Minister told us that manufactured iron and steel from the United States paid a duty of 24 per cent., whereas the same manufactures from England paid only $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Does he mean to tell us that, if the same goods we import from our neighbours were imported from England, the same duties would not be paid? Does he mean to tell us that the same Tariff does not apply to the same class of goods, no matter from what country imported? The fact is that we are in the habit of buying iron from England in rods, bars and plates, such iron as enters into the manufactures of this country, and a duty of from 10 to $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. is imposed thereon. We cannot buy that description of iron in the United States. That country is importing it at present for their own use, and it is not at all likely that we would import articles from the United States which they import themselves. Our importations of manufactured iron and steel from the United States, consist mostly of fine manufactures of these metals, such as steam pumps and engines, which are subject to a duty of from 25 to 30 per cent., and that is the reason why the average duty from that country was 24 per cent. instead of $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., as in the case of the importations of iron and steel from England. The same goods would have had to pay the same duty, no matter from what country imported. Such statements are misleading in their tendency, but the effect that they are intended to have is not gained when they are carefully and dispassionately examined. We were told that the Tariff has tended to diminish the exports from the United States, and to increase them from England. In examining the trade returns for the month of December, I find that the trade of the United States has improved greatly. That the United States imported from England in December last \$9,235,000 worth, consisting mostly of manufactured goods, against an importation of \$3,457,000 in December, 1878, showing the enormous increase of \$5,778,000 in that month, while the importations to Canada fell off \$60,000. A few of the goods on which this great increase to the United States were: On cotton manufactures, increase \$28,120 for the month; earthenware \$73,970; hardware, \$46,455; iron, \$2,218,000; steel, \$119,000; linen manufactures, \$738,260; iute manufactures, \$158,475; wool manufactures, worsted and carpets, \$1,383,000; machinery, \$12,545, and fifteen full cargoes of salt, and these figures are only the excess over the corresponding month of 1878. Is it to be wondered at then that our imports from the United States have decreased, when we find they have to import from our parent country themselves, and still the hon. the Finance Minister claims the credit for his Tariff. But to follow the hon. the Finance Minister's argument in reference to iron and steel. I find on examining the returns that our total imports last year amounted to \$31,000,000, on which we paid a duty of \$5,550,000, or an average of 18 per cent., whereas we imported \$40,000,000 from the United States, paying \$5,508,000, or an average of $13\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. This shows that there has been a discrimination against England in favour of the United States of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., instead of the discrimination in favour of England which the hon. Minister endeavoured to show. This statement is strictly in accordance with the reasoning of the hon. the Finance Minister in reference to steel and iron, and, while literally correct, is misleading, and such as should not be indulged in by hon. members on either side of this House, much less by an hon. Minister of the Crown. I find that the Dominion last year paid \$16,400 duty on corn-meal; of this sum Nova Scotia paid about \$12,000, and New Brunswick \$6,000. This does not represent all the corn-meal imported into the Lower Provinces during the four months this Tariff was in operation, because a large portion came in by way of Ontario. So the total duty was about \$30,000. Does the hon. the Finance Minister mean to say that the consumers of the Lower Provinces did not pay this duty, that it was not a tax on our people? I find, besides, that the duty on coal during the few months of last year that the Tariff operated, reached \$106,000, or $19\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., a pretty large tax, indeed, on such an article.

It has been stated that this duty is for the benefit of Nova Scotia, that the duty was imposed to increase the production of coal in that Province, and that such was the effect; that the additional quantity mined was 18,000 tons. But unfortunately it was not sold. We are told 33,000 extra tons were mined last year in the Dominion, that is including British Columbia, and that we have paid on it, as duty, $106,000. What, then, did it cost the Dominion? Why, if we are to count the whole quantity, it cost the consumers of this country $3.17 per ton to raise it, but if we only count the Nova Scotia portion, and the duty is for their benefit, it cost this country $5.84 per ton to mine their 18,000 tons of surplus coal that they still have unsold. And still we are giving the miners a little more Protection. Does the hon. gentleman undertake to assist my business or the great general industries of his own Province, the lumbering and fishing? No; he has done all in his power to oppress and wipe out the waning industry of New Brunswick, as he calls it. Why could he not give it some of this Protection? If he is going to protect the 400 workmen in Montreal, why not carry his Protection further; but no. The 400 in Montreal have received more consideration from the hon. the Finance Minister than the thousands of unemployed in his native Province. The hon. member for Niagara says "hear, hear." Well, Sir, I will give that hon. gentleman attention if he wants it. That hon. gentleman no doubt wishes us to understand that he speaks officially, and no doubt he is put up and down by the Ministers at pleasure. I think it was the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) who referred the other evening to the hundreds of labourers who congregated in front of this building, asking the Government to fulfil the promises made during the elections of 1878 that abundant employment would be found for them. The hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) thereupon got up, and, with his usual shrug of the shoulders, told the House that he had seen those people, and did not think they were quite so badly off as was represented. He told us they wore pretty good clothes. Are the workmen of Ottawa to be told that they must pawn their clothes, and eradicate every vestige of the comparative prosperity with which they were blessed under the late Administration, before the present Ministers will perform their promises to them? If that is the course proposed, the labourers, the people of Ontario, have not the pluck of the people of the Lower Provinces, if they do not mete out to those hon. gentlemen their just reward. The hon. the Finance Minister told us, in his opening speech, that he had looked forward to this debate, not with dread, but with satisfaction. If his heart is not made of steel—about the only important article in his Tariff free of duty—and if not callous to public opinion and the sufferings of the people, he will look back to this debate with remorse that will follow him to the grave.

MR. MACKENZIE: He has got past that.

MR. SNOWBALL: I was surprised also to hear the hon. the Minister of Railways—for whose opinion, however, I have a great respect—when he told us in this debate that Lord Derby had lately expressed approval of the Protective policy of this country. As I was in England when that speech was made, and had acquired a different impression of it, I thought I would refer to it to see if it bore out the description of the hon. Minister. I find that his Lordship spoke as follows on the occasion in question:

"We, in England, as I believe, are marked out by all our characteristic qualities for industrial supremacy; and, as far as Europe is concerned, I am not afraid lest we should lose it. I do not believe in short cuts to fortune. Labour enterprise, and saving give us the industrial position which we have earned, and those qualities alone can retain it. But it is argued that the whole world is shutting out our trade by Protective Tariffs, and our colonies are following the same example. Now, let us look into that a little. As to the Colonies, is there a particle of evidence to show that they have really and definitely adopted the theory of Protection? That they have tried it, or are trying it, as an experiment in some cases is certain; but if, as we believe, it is an experiment which must necessarily end in failure, why should that alarm us? No doubt each separate Colonial interest would like to be protected, but when each interest finds that it can secure Protection for itself only at the cost of paying for the Protection afforded to every other interest, the supporters of each will soon begin to discover that it is possible to buy gold too dear. The process of disillusion I am told, has already begun in Victoria, and when bubbles burst they do not burst gradually or by halves. I believe it is mainly the example of the United States that has influenced our Colonies, and when they change, as they must, the smaller communities which look up to them will do the same."

I cannot find anything in his speech to justify any person in saying that Lord Derby was in favour of Protection in the Colonies or anywhere else. There is another question I wish to notice—the currency. I look with dread upon this the third attempt being made to put a quantity of paper money into circulation in this country. This practice which may be indulged in to a certain extent, I believe is very dangerous. If each Finance Minister finds that he has only to resort to the printing press to meet his deficits there is great danger that it will injure the credit of this country. It is stated by the advocates of this scheme that the Government should participate in the benefits of a paper circulation. How much benefit is there in this circulation? Has the history of the banks of this Dominion proved that they receive too much profit from the business they are doing? If we do anything that will increase the value of money or diminish the amount of accommodation the banks are able to give, we at once raise the rate of interest. If the borrower has to pay an additional rate of interest he has to recover it from those who are dependent upon him, and in the end it amounts to an additional tax on the people in general. We might just as well put the tax on the people in any other form as in this. It is only another scheme for taxing the people of this country, and it may be National Policy No. 2. I am doubtful if the scheme will prove profitable. In the first place, the country is paying a considerable sum annually for the management of this paper currency. I find by the Public Accounts that we are paying $275,000 annually for the management of our loans, I suppose our loans in England; and I have heard complaints in England that it was not very well managed either. I think that is too large a sum to pay, and something should be done to save it. I think we should ask ourselves how much we are paying for managing the paper currency now in circulation, what benefits certain banks are getting out of it. When we consider the expense of managing it outside of the Department, such as the cost of printing, expensive steel plates, and the loss that must arise by forgeries and other causes, I doubt if the country would not do much better to go into the markets of the world and borrow money in a legitimate manner, instead of tampering with the currency that naturally belongs to the banks. If we are going into banking, we might as well go into any other business, and I am afraid that this scheme will only prove the entering wedge in a policy that will prove disastrous to this country. We are told by its advocates that the National Policy has increased the price of every thing in this country, and I am willing to admit it, with one exception. There is one thing it has not increased, and that is the rate of wages. I do not remember any period when the labouring population of this country were paid so poorly as during the year this policy has been in force. They have suffered more during the past summer and this winter than ever before. We were promised that this policy was to work marvels in six weeks, and now, at the end of a year, we are asked to wait another year before the policy can be tested fairly. While prosperity is looming up in the United States, England and continent of Europe, generally, Canada is not prosperous, and is far behind; and why are we behind? For the reason, principally, that this policy is hampering trade and preventing people from entering into enterprises that otherwise would be profitable. Bye-and-by, when prosperity comes, as come I believe it will from natural causes, then we will hear hon. gentlemen trying to take credit for it. They will never for one moment give God the praise for good harvests; they will not give old England any credit for the business we find there under her Free-trade, but they will assume the whole credit for it and ignore all other causes. I admit the price of some things has advanced. The price of tea has advanced 50 per cent., but does the hon. the Minister of Finance claim that his policy has had anything to do with the advance of tea in London? The article of tin, which we use in packing fish so largely, has advanced in Cornwall from £60 a ton to £95 a ton, and are we to attribute that to the National Policy? While the prices of nearly everything required in carrying on the business of this country has advanced, wages have not advanced. The taxes of this country are so great that I believe every labouring man who is earning a dollar wages at the present time has to pay 30c. of that dollar into the Treasury, and still we are told that the people are not being taxed. We are told they are not as heavily taxed now as they were under the old Tariff. People that are earning their living in this country have not yet come to realise that, including their local taxes, they are paying from 35c. to 40c. tax on every dollar they earn; that each dollar they earn only represents 60c. under Free-trade. When they do come to realise it they will rise in their might and sweep the whole system out of existence. If the rise in the prices of articles benefits those who have to sell, it injures in the same proportion those who have to buy. If the price of sugar or any other article is suddenly raised, just in proportion as the manufacturer benefits the consumer must suffer. The hon. gentleman also stated that the balance of trade has to be in favour of a country in order to show that the country is prosperous. Now, I do not think that necessarily follows. The exports and imports of a country are just the barter that is going on between it and other countries. I find in looking over the trade and navigation returns that the Dominion imported during the twelve years of Confederation $1,142,000,000, and exported during that time only $913,000,000. Consequently, there has been a balance against us of $229,000,000, or an annual average balance of $19,000,000. How has this enormous balance been paid? In the first place it has been paid for in part by the $87,000,000 the Government of this country has borrowed abroad to carry on our public works, leaving $142,000,000 as a balance still to be accounted for. Until the present Tariff came into force a large amount of smuggling was carried on across our frontier to the United States, which was computed to amount to $2,000,000 per year, or about $20,000,000 up to last year. The smuggling has turned the other way now and is going on to an alarming extent all over the Dominion. The next source of revenue we have is the shipping, which is computed to earn from $6,000,000 to $8,000,000 annually. That would produce an amount of about $90,000,000. The Railway, Telegraph and other Companies, outside of Government enterprises, have also been borrowers to a large extent, probably amounting from $20,000,000, to $30,000,000 more, so that the $229,000,000 balance of trade against us has been paid in these several ways. What has been the position of England during these years, I have the returns for the past eighteen years? and find she imported during that time $1,264,000,000 sterling more goods than she exported.

An Hon. MEMBER: How much was raw material?

MR. SNOWBALL: Almost entirely raw material, or fully 90 per cent. England did not pay any portion of that amount of excessive imports in specie, because the imports of specie during those eighteen years were £93,000,000 more than her exports. Therefore, no money went out of England to pay that large surplus. But that does not show a want of prosperity in England. How, then did she pay this £1,264,000,000? In the first place, there are represented on the London Stock Exchange sums loaned to foreign countries, the interest on which amounts to £60,000,000 annually. Then the shipping interest yields £65,000,000 sterling, annually, so that during these eighteen years, England received from these two sources alone £2,250,000,000 sterling, showing a balance in her favour of £986,000,000 as her net earnings during those years. She has also an enormous annual revenue derived from private loans not represented on the Stock Exchange, and the interest her subjects have in speculations abroad. Far from England becoming poorer from an excess of imports, she is growing rapidly wealthier. I would infer from these facts that an excess of imports over exports, instead of denoting poverty, is a sign of wealth and prosperity in an old country. But in a new country like ours, it only denotes that we are large borrowers of money from abroad. That money does not come into the country in hard gold, but largely in the manufactures of the country from which we borrow. In the case of Canada, the United States, Spain, Turkey, Brazil, India, and other countries, the exports exceed the imports; but do hon. gentlemen mean to tell us that that is because they are wealthy countries? No; it is because they have borrowed large sums of money abroad, and they have to send out more than they bring in, in order to pay interest, and, in some cases, a portion of the principal. Excess of exports over the imports of a country, so far from denoting wealth, is a sure sign of its indebtedness, and excess of imports, in old countries, over the exports is a sure sign of wealth. While excess of imports over exports in young countries, such as ours, denotes that we are large borrowers of foreign capital, and that this money borrowed comes into our country in materials to carry on our public works, and materials to supply the labour employed at them. So, when our country begins to export more goods than it imports, it will denote that we are improving, and have stopped borrowing abroad, and have begun to pay the interest on our loans. And when our exports exceed our imports by a larger amount than $7,000,000 or $8,000,000, the amount we now pay in interest on public loans, it will denote that we have commenced to pay back part of the principal. Now, it is estimated that there is at the present time over £600,000,000 sterling, $3,000,000,000 of British capital lying idle in the banks of England. I believe the time is not far distant when this money will in great measure be set loose. I believe that when this country and other countries, for we are all dependent on each other, become more prosperous, and of this we have now some prospect when that gigantic project the Suez Canal and other kindred works get fully launched on the world then the millions of old England will be let loose. Then a demand will spring up for the products of Canada. We shall then reap the benefit of the liberation of this large amount of capital now lying idle. Then it is that we shall begin to hear the "hum," not the buzz of a hornet, that like our so-called National Policy, that stings us on every side, but a true and genuine "hum," commencing in England and reverberating over the whole world.

MR. FLEMING: I think the friends of a Revenue Tariff have no reason to regret the discussion which has taken place in the House this Session. In looking carefully over the Debates I cannot, with one exception, put my finger upon a statement or a position taken up by the friends of a Revenue Tariff, that has been successfully controverted by the hon. gentlemen opposite. The exception was a statement made by my hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Casey), based upon information which he had received, and which he deemed reliable, with regard to the position of certain manufacturing industries in St. Catharines. I believe, however, that letters were sent here and read by the hon. member for Cardwell controverting that statement. With that exception, I do not know of a single proposition made on this side of the House that has been successfully challenged or proven not to be in accordance with the fact. I may say on behalf of the hon. member for West Elgin, that if he had thought the information was not reliable, he would never have offered it to this House. It has been contended, by advocates of the National Policy, that it has accomplished the object for which it was inaugurated. If its object was merely to benefit a few manufacturing industries, it has accomplished that object. If, however, it was meant to benefit all the industries of the country, then it is a failure, for I think I will be able to show that there is one very important industry which has suffered materially in consequence of this policy. The last speaker, who addressed the House before the adjournment, in favour of the National Policy, was the hon. member for Niagara. It would be a slighting upon an hon. member of so much importance not to take notice of him. The hon. member read to us an extract from the speech of my hon. friend the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). It was not fair for the hon. gentleman to read a portion only of the speech. He ought to have read more. He did not read this portion, which has a very important bearing on the argument which the hon. member for North Norfolk advanced. Mr. Charlton, in his speech in 1876, said:

"I think it can be clearly shown that the amount of Protection in that country (United States) has been altogether greater than was necessary for the purpose of promoting its interests, and in consequence of that over-Protection, monopolies and rings were created, and a gambling element was introduced into all business transactions."

He further stated in the conclusion of his speech:

"That while desirous of doing everything calculated to promote the manufacturing interests of th's country, he believed the Tariff then in existence (17½) adequate for the purpose."

The hon. member for Niagara also stated that the policy of the late Finance Minister had ruined the country.

MR. PLUMB: No, I never said that. The hon. gentlemen is incorrect.

MR. FLEMING: It was so reported in the Citizen, at all events. The hon. gentleman also said, in another portion of his speech:

"The depression which passed over the United States, and all other countries affected Free-trade and Protection countries alike * * * and that this was due to 'deep-seated and far reaching causes that had nothing to do with a Protective or Free-trade policy.'"

The hon. gentleman has saved me the trouble of contradicting him, for he has contradicted himself. The hon. member for Niagara gave as an illustration of the success of a Protectionist policy, the beet-root industry of France. Does the hon. member advocate that we should follow in the footsteps of Napoleon I, in the introduction of beet-culture into this country? Is he prepared to say that the people of this country shall pay 50c. a pound for sugar made from beets raised at home, when they could buy what was brought from other places for 10c.? Is he prepared to tax this country for forty years in order to build up a monopoly? If he is prepared to do that, then there is some force in his reference to Protection as applied to the cultivation of the beet-root in France. If Protection to beet-root sugar is to be afforded in this manner, what then becomes of the West India trade of which hon. members opposite boast so much about? The hon. member for Niagara went out of his way, and neglected to observe his customary courtesy, in making a personal allusion to my hon. colleague from South Brant (Mr. Paterson) when that hon. member was not in his seat. I venture to make the assertion that the hon. member for Niagara would not have so spoken if my hon. friend had been present and had a chance to reply. The hon. gentleman said my hon. colleague's speeches were like "Tales told by an idiot." I do not know of any hon. gentleman who introduces so many tales into his speeches as the hon. member for Niagara; and if I were to ask the House to say which of the two hon. members does this quotation more appropriately apply, the answer perhaps might be: "not the hon. member for South Brant." But since the hon. gentleman has taken the initiative in making comparisons, I will take the liberty of giving the hon. member for Niagara a quotation from a brother poet, Tom Moore, who, in speaking of an inveterate talker, said he was:

"Like a pump which coldly spouts and spouts away,
In one weak, washy everlasting flood."

The hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals spoke of his hon. friend the Minister of Finance in this way:—

"He has been able to come down with the evidence from the public records of the country and show that his expectations with reference to the effect of the Tariff upon the revenue have been abundantly sustained and placed beyond doubt in the mind of every person."

He goes on further to say:

"The hon. the Finance Minister shows he has redeemed his pledge of a year ago, and justified his judgment, that this policy would be eminently favourable to British interests, and restore the trade to that channel, which every loyal British subject must infinitely prefer to that favoured by the hon. gentlemen opposite."

I want now to make enquiry into what the expectations of the hon. gentleman were with regard to this policy, and how far it has been favourable to British interests. In order to do so I will refer, not to one of the hon. gentleman's speeches, but I will take a document presumably carefully prepared and carefully worded. It is a despatch sent to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, dated March 13th, 1879, which contains a memorandum from the hon. Finance Minister in which he gives his views with regard to the effect the National Policy will have on the trade with Great Britain. The hon. gentleman says, in general terms, that the effect of the Tariff would be most favourable to British mercantile and manufacturing interests; and then proceeds to give examples by way of illustration. Alluding to manufactures of cotton goods, he says:

"The cheaper kinds of cotton, bleached and unbleached, jeans, denims and kindred goods. The increase of duty on these classes will certainly lessen the imports from the United States, and the supply will be obtained partly from Canadian factories and partly from England, and will tend rather to increase than diminish the trade with the latter country."

Now, I will just refer to the return brought down, showing the comparative imports from Great Britain and other countries during the last six months of 1878, and the last six months of 1879. We will take the articles referred to by the hon. the Finance Minister. Cottons, bleached and unbleached, entered for consumption during the six months ending 31st December, 1878, 1,528,367 yards, valued at $108,521. Entered for consumption during the same period of 1879, 787,542 yards, valued at $56,195, being a decrease of 48 per cent. on quantity and value. In jeans, denims, and drillings the importations from Great Britain during the last six months of 1878 were, 8,668,550 yards, value $740,812; for the same period of 1879, importations of this class of goods had fallen away to 608,189 yards, valued at $67,535, or a decrease of 90 per cent. That does not look as if the trade with Great Britain had been increased rather than diminished by the Tariff. It is the same with regard to woollen goods. In reference to them the hon. gentleman says:

"The whole value of these goods in 1878 may be stated at $8,500,000, of which Great Britain furnished about $7,000,000 worth, of which amount the higher classes reached the value of about $5,000,000, and the duty thereupon is increased only from 17½ per cent. to 20 per cent., and as they cannot be made in Canada and could not be supplied from the United States, except at prices greatly in advance of English goods, the trade cannot be diminished by the small addition of 2½ per cent. to the duty."

While on this subject I desire to say that the hon. the Finance Minister last year told us that it was not necessary to put a duty on wool, because the Protection given to the manufacturers of woollen cloths and blankets would be protection enough to the farmer, inasmuch as it would give him a market for his wool. This Session, one or two hon. gentlemen have alluded to the increased price that farmers got for their wool, as an illustration of the benefits they derived from the National Policy. I think the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), alluded to the matter, also the hon. member for Centre Wellington, and comparison was made between the price of wool in December, 1878, and the price of wool in December, 1879. Both hon. gentlemen, although not practical agriculturists, represent agricultural constituencies, and I supposed they would have been better acquainted with the habits and customs of the farmers in their neighbourhood than they are. I supposed they knew that the former does in general sell his wool in December. It is usually sold in the latter part of June or the beginning of July. The price of wool in July, 1878, averaged 22c.; in June and July, 1879, it ranged from 19c. to 21c. Really, the farmers got less for their wool in 1879 than they did in 1878. I know some farmers who, in 1878, thought perhaps a Protection policy may raise the price of wool, and in this belief stowed their wool away until 1879. But they were obliged to sell it in 1879 for less than they could have got for it in 1878.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: They sold too early in the season.

MR. FLEMING: They were not aware of what the price would be in December: besides the rise in price then was not caused by the National Policy, but by the rise in price in the United States. But I was speaking with regard to woollen goods imported from Great Britain, and the prediction of the hon. the Finance Minister regarding them. We find that the blankets brought in during the last six months of 1878 were valued at $128,069; for the last six months of 1879 the amount was $38,902, or a decrease of $89,167, equal to 69 per cent. In carpets, the imports for the last half of 1878 was $218,336; in this class there was not much of a decrease, only 9 per cent. during the last half of 1879. In flannels, for the first period, the amount was $142,691; for the second, $114,138, a decrease of 20 per cent. In all other woollen goods, excepting wearing apparel and worsted yarn, the importations from Great Britain fell from $3,194,397 for the six months ending 31st December, 1878, to $2,182,741, the amount for the same period of 1879, or a decrease of $1,011,656, or 31½ per cent.—the average decrease on the classes named being 32½ per cent. Hon. gentlemen have only to look at these returns to see that the judgment of the hon. the Finance Minister with regard to the Tariff being favourable to British interests has been entirely at fault. At the same time, it is to be observed that, while the decreased importations imply an increase in the home manufactures, the prediction of a better market for the farmers' ware has not been fulfilled. It has been frequently stated by those who advocate Protection, that it will be the policy of the future that even England will have to abandon Free-trade; they maintain that she is falling behind; that the United States are able to send goods over to England, and to compete successfully with English manufacturers. I will show, however, from the Economist, that England has increased her exports to the United States during the past year. I will give one or two illustrations. Take cotton manufactures. She exported in 1878 to the United States $5,695,630 worth; in 1879 she sent them $5,915,445 worth. In earthenware and chinaware, she exported in 1878, $2,910,090; in 1879 the amount was $3,409,675. In iron—that industry which the United States has been protecting for nearly half a century—that industry which has flourished as we are told by means of Protection, we find that England's exportation in 1879, in iron and steel, amounted to $3,702,490 more than what they were in 1878, an increase of nearly six-fold; in railroad iron and steel the increase is thirty-fold. In linen and woollen manufactures, and indeed in almost every article of manufacture, there has been a marked increase in 1879 as compared with previous years. The true reason why the United States manufacturer sent goods to England, was their own depressed condition. They were glad to make any sacrifice to obtain money to carry them through the difficulties of the time. Lord Beaconsfield, in a speech he made in the House of Lords on the 28th of March, last year, said, in alluding to the state of British trade:

“It is perfectly untrue, as far as I can form an opinion on the subject, that we have lost the markets of the world, or that any branch of foreign industry, generally speaking of course, is successfully competing with the English.”

It is noteworthy that the greatest statesmen of both political parties, it is most remarkable, that statesmen in England still adhere to the cherished policy of Free-trade. It is contended by the advocates of the National Policy that it will lead to Reciprocity with the United States. The hon. the Minister of Railways emphatically declares that there is a change coming over the people of the United States; and that they would be glad now of a Reciprocity Treaty. I would ask the hon. gentleman to point to a single American of note who has been made a convert to Reciprocity by this Tariff.

MR. MACKENZIE: Or any American of no note.

MR. FLEMING: Yes; or of no note. There is not a single Professor of standing in any of the Colleges in the United States, who is a Protectionist. The system is looked upon by them as an evil. Protection is upheld in the United States in the interest of certain manufacturers who, by means of lobbying, control legislation in this matter. The hon. the Minister of Railways, speaking of manufactured goods, said: “Prices may rise, they will rise, because that prosperity in the United States will prevent goods being furnished in that country at the same price as they were before.” If this be so, if prices rise and fall in the United States, according to change of circumstances, then they would have risen or fallen just the same whether the National Policy was in existence or not. Slaughtering of American goods in Canada cease as soon as times improve on the other side. They are improving there now; the cause is producing the effect. What reason was there, therefore, for changing the whole fiscal policy of a country to meet an exceptional circumstance. I admit there is some improvement in the country over last year, but I deny it is owing to the National Policy. Do we owe the abundant harvest and the good prices we have received to the National Policy? No, for the one we are indebted to a merciful Providence, the other is attributable to the great failure of the crops in England. We are reaping the benefit of this, it is true; but it would be absurd to say that this is owing to any fiscal policy of ours. I come now to speak of a matter which I consider of great importance. Anyone who has bestowed the least thought on the export cattle trade of this country, must be astonished at the wonderful rapidity of its growth. In 1874-5, the value of the horned cattle sent to England was $33,000, while in 1878-9 it was $1,767,800; the total exports in that year of horned cattle, beef, sheep, and mutton, to the United Kingdom, being $2,256,174. Now, the question arises, is this trade worth keeping up? Is it worth taking trouble about? I believe it is true of nations as of individuals, that “There is a tide in their affairs,

Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune.”

Now is our time. If we only think for a moment on the enormous consumption of meat in England, over and above her own production, she requires $90,000,000 worth annually; think what a small proportion our trade is of that amount. If we desire to cultivate this trade, we must be on the alert to take the proper means to meet its requirements. And what are these requirements? We have keen competition in this market. The United States can send there as well as we can; Australia can send her cattle and sheep there also. It is necessary that we should have a fair chance if we are to continue the race. There should be no obstacle placed in the way. At present there is a very serious hindrance; that is, the embargo placed on cattle coming into this country from the United States. Under the late Government there was a duty of 10 per cent. on cattle imported. At that time the evil was not felt; but I believe, however, that if the late Government had continued in power, the agitation to remove that 10 per cent. would now have been as great as it is to remove the 20 per cent. duty. We have in Ontario an Agricultural College, where experiments have been made as to the best and most profitable mode of feeding cattle. Here is an example of what may be done in feeding with a profitable result: On the 1st December, 1868, Professor Brown got the use of $600 in order to purchase stock to consume an extra quantity of roots which were on hand. The statement he gives as to the result of his operation is as follows:—

Purchase of 7 steers, 2½ years old, half-bred Durhams, weighing 8,610 lb., @ 3¼c.....	$322 66
Purchase of three milch cows	135 00
Cost of turnips, straw and corn consumed	201 17
Attendance	26 10
Interest on $600 for 3 months @ 7%..	10 50
Total debit	$695 44

Cr.
Sale of 7 steers at the end of 3 months, 10,220 lb. @ 5¼c.	$541 12
Sale of 3 cows, and value of milk	160 00
Estimated value of manure	24 00
	$725 12
Balance, being clear profit.....	$29 48

So that not only did the Professor return the $600, with interest, at the end of three months, but a clear profit of 5 per cent. was made in the transaction. That is an example of feeding profitably. I will now give you an experiment in feeding, also tried in the College, which resulted in loss. Fourteen head of 2½-year old steers and two 3-year old heifers, mostly Durham grades, were bought for $728; they weighed 17,529 lb., or 4½c. per pound; they were fed for five months, from December to May. The balance sheet stood as follows:—

Dr.
Original cost of animals.....	$ 728 00
2,715 bushels turnips @ 8c.	217 20
905 “ mangolds @ 10c.....	90 50
12,960 “ pea-meal @ 1c.....	129 60
10,448 “ corn-meal @ 45c. per bushel, 56lb	83 70
Fodder, 24,000lbs @ $4 a ton.....	48 00
Bedding	15 00
Attendance	52 50

Cr.
Animals, 22,155lb. @ 4 2-5c.....	$974 80
Estimated value of manure.....	269 00
	$1,243 80

Loss..... $ 120 70
Here we have a loss of $120.70, besides the interest of the purchase money of the cattle, $728, for five months. From this experiment Professor Brown draws the following conclusion:—

“It does not pay to purchase steers at 4 1-7c. per pound, feed them for five months, and sell them for 4 2-5c. per pound. There must not only be an increase of weight, but an advance in price.”

The reason given by the Professor for purchasing steer, at this price was, that good cattle were not to be had for less money. Now, anyone can see by comparing these two experiments, that to make cattle-feeding a profitable business,

2½ or 3 year old steers would require to be purchased at 3¼c. or 3½c. a pound. Anyone acquainted with stock-raising in the wheat-growing districts of the country, knows that cattle cannot be raised for that money; besides, even if they could be raised, there is not enough of them in the country to keep up our present export trade. If the duty of 20 per cent. was taken off, farmers could bring in cattle from the United States at a cost of 3¼c. or 3½c. a pound; were they also allowed to bring in corn free of duty, they could do a profitable business, and increase the fertility of their farms at the same time. Before speaking of the corn duty, I desire to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Customs (Mr. Bowell) to the answer he gave to the question put to him by the hon. member for West Elgin, relating to the drawback on corn given to the starch manufacturers. The answer of the Minister is as follows:—

“As soon as any hon. member can prove to the Government that the residue left over for fertilising purposes amounts to 2½ per cent. of the value of the duty paid on the corn, that being the proportion allowed on that imported into the country which goes into the manufacture of corn starch, the Government will consider the question.”

I would ask the hon. Minister if anyone has proved to his satisfaction that this proportion of the value of the duty is left over for fertilising purposes?

MR. BOWELL: I am not aware that any hon. member has made the attempt.

MR. FLEMING: Well, I will try now then. The duty on 1,000 bushels of corn at 7½c. a bushel would be $75, 2½ per cent. of the value of the duty would be $1.75. Now, the value of the manure obtained from the consumption of one ton of Indian corn, according to Mr. J. B. Lawes, of Rothamstead, England, the highest authority on the subject, is £1 11s. 0d. sterling, equal to $7.75; now, 1,000 bushels of corn would be equal to twenty-eight tons, which, at $7.75 per ton, would give $217; deducting the $1.75, the 2½ per cent. of the value of the duty, we have $215.25, representing the value for fertilising purposes over and above the proportion asked for by the hon. Minister. Or supposing we were to place the value of what was left for fertilising purposes over and against the whole amount of the duty, the result would be as follows:—

Value of manure, 2,000lb. corn	$7 75
2,000 = 35 40-56 bushel @ 7½c.....	2 68

According to these figures, every ton of corn brought into the country and fed to animals, leaves $5.07 worth of fertilising matter in excess of the whole amount of the duty. I do not think the hon. Minister is able to offer one single reason against the whole of the duty being refunded when the corn is fed to cattle which are exported. Look again at the inconsistency of the Tariff in this matter, admitting manure free of duty, and taxing corn, which contains within it the elements of manure, 17½ per cent. But it is said by those who are in favour of the corn duty, that the farmer can use other coarse grains in its stead. In answer thereto the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) showed most conclusively the other evening the loss the country would sustain if barley and oats were substituted in its stead. I shall endeavour to do the same with regard to peas, which is probably the most likely grain to take the place of corn in feeding cattle and sheep. I shall not confine myself to the relative market values of the two grains, but will more particularly call attention to the superiority of corn to peas as a fat producing food. I shall base my argument on the result of an experiment in feeding sheep at the Agricultural College. On the 17th of March, 1879, twelve sheep were set apart for this purpose; different kinds of food were experimented with. I shall, however, only notice the result as produced respectively by feeding peas and corn. The result obtained from peas at the end of eighteen weeks was an increase in weight of 61lb., or nearly ½lb. per head per day; the increase from the use of corn at the close of the same period was 76lb., or nearly ½lb. per head per day. The quantity of peas consumed per head was 177½lb.; the quantity of corn fed to each animal was 159½lb. This gave 1lb. mutton to every 2·91lb. peas, and 20·09lb. corn. To produce 1,000lb. mutton would take therefore 37 bushels 18lb. corn, which, if purchased duty free, would be about 48c. a bushel, and would cost $17.91. Corn, duty paid, say 56c. a bushel, would make 1,000lb. mutton cost $20.90;

if peas were substituted for corn it would take 40·51 bushels to produce the same quantity of mutton, at 65c. a bushel would cost $26.55, or $8.64 more than it would have cost if it had been produced by corn purchased duty free. Now, the experiment proves conclusively that it would be utter folly in the farmer to feed his peas, if corn could be had, even with the duty. In order to show the benefit resulting from the purchase of corn and the sale of peas, I would direct your attention to the statement of imports for the last six months of 1878, when corn was admitted free of duty. There was imported from the United States during that period 5,472,000 bushels, costing $2,273,207, or 41c. a bushel; 4,059,425 bushels of this quantity was re-exported, realising $2,066,982, or 50¾c. a bushel. The balance of 1,412,575 bushels cost the country, therefore, only 14·59c.—a little over 14½c. a bushel. This quantity of corn introduced into the country enabled farmers to sell their peas. I have not the return of Exports for the last six months of 1878; but the quantity of peas exported in the fiscal year 1878-9 was 2,715,252 bushels, realising $2,056,079, or 75¾c. a bushel. It is evident that the exchange of commodities was beneficial to the country. In order to show what might be done with this 1,412,575 bushels corn, suppose that it was fed to sheep, and a result obtained such as was had at the Agricultural College, 37,848,899lb. of mutton would be produced, which, at 3c. a pound, would be equal to $113,546,000; deduct the cost of the corn, $206,285, there would be left $113,340,415 to pay for the hay and turnips fed in addition to the corn. I am sure if the hon. the Finance Minister would only give this matter his attention he would not tolerate these duties for a moment; their tendency is most injurious to the country. Hon. members speak of the importance of the manufacturing industries of the country, of the capital invested, of the number of men employed, without detracting from the importance of their interests one whit. I am bold to say that if all the restrictions and obstacles which are now in the way were removed, the growing of beef and mutton for the English market would be more important than any one of them. And so far as lasting benefit to the country is concerned, all the cotton mills and sugar refineries that can be established in Canada under a system of Protection during the next ten years, are not to be compared with it. A complete recuperation of the soil would be sure to follow wherever it was carried on. Fields, that under present management hardly yield ten bushels to the acre, would give a return of twenty-five to thirty. The soil of the country is rapidly becoming deteriorated by constant cropping, and there is no better way of restoring it to its original fertility than the feeding of cattle. Instead of benefiting the farmer by shutting out American corn and cattle, we are really inflicting upon them a serious injury. I would urge upon hon. members who support the Government the necessity of using their influence to get these restrictions removed, they would thereby be performing an act of justice to an important section of the community, and confer a lasting benefit on the country at large.

MR. FARROW: I do not wish to occupy the time of the House at any great length, but I desire to say a few words before this debate closes. The hon. member who has just resumed his seat made a great many good observations, and it is a pity that his remarks were not all composed of good things. I dare say he is a very good farmer, but his political proclivities appear to run away with his judgment. As a farmer, I cannot agree with him about the advantages to be derived by taking off the duty from corn and cattle. I know of no step that would create more dissatisfaction in my neighbourhood, and I come from one of the richest farming sections of the country. If I were to recommend the course suggested by the hon. gentleman, I would be requested to stay at home. My constituents said to me: "If you can induce the hon. the Finance Minister to put on 15c. duty on corn, be sure and do so, and if you cannot do so try and get it up to 10c." I have asked the hon. Minister to do so, but he is hard pushed on both sides. I do not know whether he will put it up to 10c. or not, but for my own part I would rather he advanced it to 15c. I was surprised to hear the hon. member, who is a great temperance man, talk as he did about corn. We know that Gooderham and Worts, of Toronto, and other large distilling firms, import corn for the purpose of making whiskey, and I am thankful that the hon. Minister imposed the duty, because in doing so he has discouraged the manufacture of whiskey.

MR. MACKENZIE: Has he?

MR. FARROW: In my opinion he has. There certainly has been less whiskey drank. Another point my hon. friend made was that the good times we are enjoying are attributable to the good harvest with which we were blessed. Well, I think the hon. the ex-Premier, and the other hon. members of the Opposition, ought to be thankful for that bounteous harvest. If my hon. friend has a memory, it will not be a great stretch for him to go back to 1877. He can read the reports of the Grand Trunk Railway, and also those of the Globe, to the effect that we never had such a fine harvest as in that year, and that such good prices had not ruled for years past. Let my hon. friend answer why good times did not follow then? How does he get it?

MR. FLEMING: I did not catch the hon. gentleman's question.

MR. FARROW: I think I spoke loud enough to be heard. My question was this: I was reading for the benefit of the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Shaw); why was it that we had not good times following the good crops and good prices in 1877?

MR. FLEMING: The crops were not so good in 1877 as the last year. True the hon. gentleman quotes the Globe reports, which were published about the time of harvest. Without any reflection on the Globe, or any other newspaper that gets its information in this way, I say that a great deal of the information furnished about that time is misleading. That given as to my neighbourhood last year was such. The true estimate of the crop is the quantity exported, and if the hon. gentleman can show me there was more wheat exported from the country in 1877 than last year, I will concede the point.

MR. FARROW: There can be no doubt about the good harvest in 1877 and the good prices following. But hon. gentlemen in Opposition have made, and often reiterated, the statement that there were more insolvencies that year than ever before. Those gentlemen are ever learning, yet never coming to a knowledge, of the truth. Only two or three years ago Ottawa was deluged with deputations from different parts of the country—for what? To induce the ex-Finance Minister to give their trades some relief; they complained that Yankee goods were slaughtered in Canada enormously, and that they could not make a living. What was his reply? That if they could not live they had better go out. Later, however, the people told him and his colleagues they had better go out, which they did. I call to mind also the fact that the supporters of the ex-Premier from Lower Canada, in 1878, begged him to give them Protection, which he staved off. The late Finance Minister would not yield to the entreaties of his own party; but in 1878, the country, from Sarnia to Gaspé, from the Pacific to the Atlantic, declared that those Ministers were merely flies on the wheel, who should be set aside. Yet with all the pride and haughtiness of party spirit, they exclaimed "the country is wrong and we are right." They were all in the same ship, and have all suffered alike. It appears to me that some of the late Ministers had a prescience that their ship was not going to last long, and hence the rattling witnessed. The proverb of the rats leaving a sinking ship was illustrated in this instance. Mr. Dorion retired to the bench, and three more became Lieutenant-Governors, leaving the vessel very feebly manned. I would like to mark the contrast between the late and present Finance Minister, as noticed all over Ontario. The late Finance Minister would not listen to the deputations—he was above all that. He set up a standard that he believed superior to the intelligence of every business firm in the country. Instead of arrogating to himself such great importance and great powers, the present hon. Finance Minister went about the country doing good. He was ready to glean a little information here and there, and I dare say what he got enabled him to understand the wants of the country better than before. The late Finance Minister seemed to feel the sentiment of the old song:

"I am monarch of all I survey,
My rights there are none to dispute."

But the hon. gentleman has found his mistake, and has been probably heard humming to himself :

“ Oh, solitude, where are thy charms ? ”

There never was a truer saying than that of the present hon. Minister of Railways, that if ever hon. gentlemen opposite came into power again, they would have to change their policy. It is alleged the farmers are not benefitting by the Tariff. I hold that they are.

MR. MACKENZIE : That settles it.

MR. FARROW : Notwithstanding the assertions of the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron), and of the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), who visited my county, I repeat that statement. My constituents would like one or two more visits from the hon. member for Centre Huron. He is a little shy now, however. The farmers there would not go back to the old policy, being quite content with the present. It is asserted that wheat is not higher under it.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) : It is not.

MR. FARROW : I agree with the Opposition that the price must be regulated at Liverpool. But besides prices being enhanced, we have got our own market at last, and the Ontario farmer has the Lower Province market, which used to be supplied from the United States, and to their profit. Now, however, our millers in the west can pay our farmers 2c. to 3c. more per bushel for wheat to grind and send to the Maritime Provinces. Is not that beneficial to our farmers? There has been a rise in oats also, as American oats used to glut our market. They sold in Toronto at 28c. a bushel last year. Now, oats, wheat, peas, and pork are all higher.

MR. MACKENZIE : What about barley ?

MR. FARROW : I will come to that by-and-bye. The hon. gentlemen opposite said, in 1878, that the farmers would get no more for their grain under Protection ; and now prices are considerably higher, so that the tables have been turned on those prophets. The farmers will hereafter believe scarcely anything they may say. Hon. gentlemen opposite jeered at the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) when he said that wool had risen in price. “ Does the doctor not know,” said the Globe, “ that there never was any increase on wool ? ” Does the Globe not know that protecting our manufactures, when the stock of American wool was used up, the factories had to use ours, there being a competition between the different factories in our own Dominion for the article. I do not care whether Ministers put 3c. or nothing on wool, as the competition for it in the country will raise its price.

MR. ANGLIN : It will make the wool fly.

MR. FARROW : Perhaps ; but I would like to hear something sensible from the hon. gentleman. With regard to barley, though the price has not improved, it has not fallen.

MR. MACKENZIE : It has fallen a-half nearly.

MR. FARROW : There has been little change either way. But what will most benefit the farmers is a ready market for their perishable products. We have been charged with having promised to bring in good times right off. We did, and we are going to bring in better and better times without delay. The improvement is moving in a kind of concentric circles. These are good times even for the farmers, who are hard-working men. The manufacturers are advancing the country, our goods being made at home, and are not now being subjected to the slaughtering by the Yankees or any other foreign country. I believe in Canada for the Canadians. When our farmers get a home market for their vegetables, poultry, butter, cheese, and all their wives have to sell, the store-bill is kept down, and at the end of the year there is a surplus to their credit, and they are happy as kings. When our hon. friends opposite were in power, the farmers had nothing saved at the end of the year, and had they remained in power, the bulk of the farmers might have sold out and gone to Manitoba. The reason so many of them have to go there now, was the policy of the late Government five years ago. Fortunately, however, we had a change of Government. I believe the good times already come, and still better coming, will keep thousands of our farmers and mechanics in the country. Where the farmer benefits, all the rest of the community prospers. Where he does not prosper nobody else succeeds. I have also talked with merchants about the change in Government policy, and have received letters from them, including one since I came here, in which the writer, after praising the National Policy, says: "I did not vote for you the last time, but will next. When the ex-Finance Minister held his great demonstration at Clinton, he called some of us pumpkins, to which I replied he was a squash." My correspondent has been a firm and fast friend of the hon. gentlemen opposite, but now says: "I am confident the present is the right policy; the Yankees were destroying our trade." He wishes us every success. That is only a sample of the great change in public opinion on this subject. How nice if hon. gentlemen opposite had won one by-election, or got one drop of comfort. But that has been denied them. I do not know how long they can keep up their hearts, but they deserve credit for their pluck in doing so thus far. I think that shows the merchants are better off. Another thing the merchants say is that they are getting good cloth now from our own factories, cloth that will wear and give satisfaction; whereas a few years ago they bought a shoddy rubbish that came pouring into this country, such as that of which the hon. the Finance Minister spoke last year; if a man put on in the morning a pair of trowsers made of it, and went to work through the day, his knees would be out before night. Now you can get cloth in our factories that will wear the whole year, and look decent. We are told that prices have gone up. I challenge hon. gentlemen to prove it on the floor of this House. I challenge hon. gentlemen to prove that the prices of woollen goods have increased in this city since last year. I can to-day buy as good a suit of clothes on Sparks street, in this city, as I could a year ago at the same price. It is the same in Toronto and other cities. Last year we had Toronto men here buying bankrupt stocks and selling them at a sacrifice, but there are no bankrupt stocks to-day. Notwithstanding these stocks, cotton and woollen clothing can to-day be bought as cheaply as last year, and I defy contradiction.

MR. MILLS: They cannot.

MR. FARROW: I can prove it to you, if you will come with me to-morrow, in a dozen places in this city.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

MR. FARROW: Before the House rose I was observing that there were signs of improvement among the agriculturists and the merchants of this country, and I think I succeeded in proving that such is the case. I spoke this afternoon about a gentleman who formerly belonged to the Liberal party, but who now supported the National Policy. He is a very prominent man in his section of the country, and is a great friend of the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron). I have a letter from him, stating that he had got disgusted with the policy of his friends, the Reformers, and could not support them, but would support the present Government, for they were the true Reformers of the day. Now that is one of our out-and-out Reformers; and this fact, with thousands of others, ought to open the eyes of our Reform friends.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron): Name.

MR. FARROW: It is Mr. Fisher, of Clinton. I know that my hon. friend is aware of his antecedents. The House might think I was a little hard, this afternoon, on the late hon. Finance Minister, but I did not mean to be. I think our party has a great deal to be thankful to him for, for I am persuaded that he has done more than any other man to bring the Conservative party back to power. I hope I shall not be offensive when I say that three-fourths of the Scotch people of this country are Reformers. You will recollect that the Globe, some time ago, called the hon. ex-Finance Minister a mixer and a muddler. Well, whenever you get anything right down into the Scotch mind they never forget it. There is a firm belief in their minds at this day that that hon. gentleman is a mixer and a muddler. They do not believe in him. Soon he will not be recognized by either party, and he will have to form a new party, called the "mixing and muddling party." When he made one of his Budget Speeches here, he said to us, after figuring out the account, that he could see no light ahead; all was dark. Well, we had to take that, and go home. Then, twelve months after, he came down again, and delivered his Budget Speech, and he said: "It is still dark, very dark, and I must tax you $3,000,000, and that will bring light." But it never brought any light; and he said: "I will put $500,000 more taxes on you, and then there will be light." He met Parliament again, but it was still full of darkness and deficits. And so it would have continued, and we should have been, financially, entirely lost if he had had the Government of this country for a few years more. I maintain that the manufacturers are better off now than during his regime. Is it not better for this country that we have two sugar refineries in Montreal, another about starting in the Lower Provinces, and another in Hamilton? Is it not better to refine our sugar ourselves than to let the Americans do it for us? The cry is, that sugars are dearer, but the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) proved satisfactorily, I think, that they are not much dearer, if any at all. But he did not go on and tell the House that the sugar we use now is pure. The sugar the Yankees gave us was a compound of glucose and saccharine matter; there was about 4c. worth of sugar and 6c. worth of glucose. I have seen it myself in a barrel, on a winter's morning, so sticky that it was very difficult to get any of it out—more like paste. Now, if the Redpaths are making money and spending it in this country, is it not better than that the Yankees should do the work for us? A great cry is raised by the Opposition that the sugar does not come into Ontario. But what of that? If it goes to Montreal or to Halifax, we have the carriage of it with all the profits derived therefrom. If I had time I could give reports from various parts of the Dominion, showing that manufactures are flourishing. In London, for instance, they are manufacturing a certain acid that they could never manufacture for themselves before; the Yankees did it for them. Several other new manufacturing interests have sprung up there, employing a great many men and involving a good deal of capital. Take my own town, Wingham second to none in the Province considering its age. We have a furniture factory there which was about going down, but now they have orders from Manitoba, and more than they can fill. What has occurred there is occurring all over the country, and our opponents cannot make sensible people believe these industries encouraged in the country are a loss. No, no. It has been said that wages have not increased; I assert that the volume of wages is greater now than it has been at any time during the five years of the regime of the hon. gentlemen opposite. The other day I was speaking with a piano dealer in this city, who said that he used to deal with the Yankees, but now he dealt with our own people. I asked him if it was better to buy of the Yankees or at home; and he replied that it was decidedly better to encourage home manufacturers. He said this was an industry that was entirely in the hands of the Yankees, but now we are getting it, and there are large profits made in it. I am persuaded from what I have heard from my friends, that the shipping interests in the Lower Provinces are prospering, and must be prospering. Look at the trade that has sprung up between this country and the Lower Provinces, and between this country and the West Indian Islands. Our ships and railways are carrying that trade. If it is only a small advance it is still better than when they had no trade at all, as when the Americans had it. There is another point which, in my opinion, proves conclusively that the National Policy is not condemned in this country. Hon. gentlemen are aware that there is a society in this country called the Grangers. It is composed entirely of farmers. There are about 30,000 in Ontario. They are banded together for mutual improvement. One object is the better education of their sons and daughters. They think they, the farmers of this country, are not properly represented in this House, and they have determined to educate their sons, so that they may hereafter take part in the legislation of this country. They firmly believe, and are persuaded, that there are too many lawyers, doctors, and other professional men, in the House—men who cannot, and do not generally, sympathise with the difficulties that lie in the way of the farmer, as they are totally unacquainted with that kind of life. These Grangers have achieved already a great deal of good in this direction. Another part of their creed is this: they are determined to do away as much as possible with the credit system. They look upon it as ruinous, and hence they want to do away with these middlemen, and they have succeeded to a great extent. The point I want to make is this. They met at Toronto last fall, and talked over all their grievances. I have thoroughly overlooked their work, but I have been unable to find a single word against the National Policy.

MR. RYMAL: Did they congratulate the country upon having a National Policy?

MR. FARROW: No, but they did not find fault with it.

MR. RYMAL: If they live up to their principles, politics are not allowed to be discussed.

MR. FARROW: I know that, but had they found it to be the ruinous policy our friends say it is, there is backbone enough in them, and courage enough to speak out against it, but they did not. Another point in regard to the National Policy, is that the Board of Trade, which met at Toronto, passed certain resolutions, one of which specially thanked the hon. the Finance Minister for his policy. Another argument I would advance to show that the National Policy is a benefit to this country, is the fact that our loan societies in the west, in their annual reports, show that the payments have been made more promptly, and that old arrearages have been paid up. Another point is that when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, the interest on money was from 10 to 12 per cent. Now the interest is as low as $7\frac{1}{2}$ to 8 per cent. on straight loans. This must be on account of the large amount received from day to day in permanent deposits, as well as cheap money coming or being brought in from England. Hon. gentlemen opposite have cited several things to show that the National Policy has had a bad effect upon this country. They say that the number of insolvencies is a proof of this. It is, however, no proof of that. It was patent to the country that Parliament had determined to do away with the Insolvency Law, and those who were in an insolvent condition went into insolvency at once. An hon. gentleman opposite spoke about our cities becoming depopulated. Who believes that? Does anyone believe that Toronto is becoming depopulated? Is it not a fact that several towns have become incorporated cities, and that numerous villages have become incorporated towns? Study well the country, and you will see that the population is increasing from day to day. Then hon. gentlemen say that bank stocks have fallen. If we adduce the Globe as evidence, hon. gentlemen will, perhaps, be satisfied. Last spring the Globe stated there was a ring of speculators at work, and that stocks were falling on account of over-speculation. But, subsequently, when it serves their purpose, they attribute the decline to the National Policy. A great deal is said by our friends opposite about the workingman. I hope that they really have the workingman's condition at heart; but I greatly doubt whether they have. Who are the real friends of the workingman? Did hon. gentlemen when they were in power help the workingman? Let us look at a few duties they put upon articles consumed by the workingman. What rate of duty did they put on tobacco? 240 per cent.; upon sugar the duty was 55 per cent.; rice, 40 per cent.; black tea, 30 per cent.; molasses, 35 per cent.; rum, 350 per cent.; beer was nearly double. All these articles are necessaries for the poor man. Now, contrast with these the duties put on goods chiefly used by the rich: silks, $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; satin, $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; velvets, $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; jewellery, $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; millinery, $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; French brandy, 80 per cent.; crushed sugar, 40 per cent.; port wine, 20 per cent.; sherry wine, 20 per cent.; cigars, 40 per cent.; and yet to-day, the very authors of this unfair distribution of the burthen of taxation, have the audacity to stand in their places in Parliament, and weep over the wrongs done to the workingman. In short, on every question affecting the breakfast table, or the poor man's necessaries, our opponents strenuously opposed any reduction. What did hon. gentlemen opposite do when my hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Colby) proposed to reduce the duty on coal oil from 15 per cent. to $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.? Did they not vote against it? It has been urged that the present Tariff militates against Great Britain in favour of the United States. This, however, is not so. The imports from the United States have fallen off 33 per cent., while those from Great Britain have only fallen off 7 per cent. The American Board of Trade which met at Washington recently, deploded the falling off in the export trade with Canada. Let me read to the House a description of the trade they did with us under the Administration of our hon. friends opposite. This is from the American Exporter:

"Last year (1877) the value of American goods entered at Canadian ports was $51,342,609; more than 50 per cent. of the total of imported goods from all quarters, and an increase of $5,000,000 over the corresponding figures of 1875-6. We are gradually superceding Great Britain in Canadian markets, as our exports have increased over 40 per cent. since 1872, while those of the latter country have decreased 35 per cent. in the same time. Considering the lower prices of merchandise, the quantity of goods sent from the United States must have been much larger than that of most of the previous years."

Now, under the existing Tariff the imports from the United States have fallen off 33 per cent., and those from Great Britain only 7 per cent. Does this show a favouring of the United States as against Great Britain? No, the facts are against it. My hon. friend from South Brant endeavoured to show that goods from the United States paid less duty than goods from Great Britain. He did not, however, make a fair comparison. He put the free goods and dutiable goods together. Take, for instance, steel and iron. On these articles Great Britain only pays 17½ per cent., while we charge the United States 24 per cent. Our Tariff does not discriminate against Great Britain in favour of the United States. Again, our opponents say, but you promised us better times right away. We had better times right away. Confidence was restored, and the money which was locked up in banks and different places, bearing very little interest, was launched into the commercial world as soon as this Tariff was announced. How could the country have confidence in the late Administration? From beginning to end they went back on all their promises, and their corruption or bungling jobs may be seen in the steel rail job, in the Fort Frances Locks affair, the Kaministiquia job, the Georgian Bay contract, the Goderich Harbour job, the Neebing Hotel purchase; their general corruption at elections, notwithstanding their previous professions of purity; their blundering policy in connection with the building of the Canada Pacific Railway. There was nothing in the whole conduct of the Government from beginning to end that would inspire the least ray of confidence in the people of this country. I maintain that had the late elections been run without the issue of the National Policy, the country would have condemned the reckless course of the late Government. The hon. member for South Brant asserted that we did not know what the National Policy meant ourselves. It is well known, however, that the object of the National Policy was to foster the manufacture, in our own country, of the goods we consume, to increase our labour market, and to keep Canadian money in Canada. I have just one fault to find with the Government. I am one of those who do not see perfection in everything the Government does. I trust the hon. the Finance Minister will see his way clear to help a certain industry in the west. I think he has done a great deal of good in the east, and now we would like to have a little help in the west.

Mr. MACKENZIE: St. John, for instance.

Mr. FARROW: Yes; all over the east. I think he has done a great deal of good in the east; and I think he might do equally as much good in the west. Whatever the hon. the Minister of Finance has undertaken to do he has done it well. He has paid a good many visits during the past year to various parts of the country; we do not blame him for paying so many visits, but—

Mr. MACKENZIE: But wants to be salted very much.

Mr. FARROW: But in not paying us a visit in the west. I think if we got him in the west we might show him our salt works, and he might do something for us. The hon. ex-Premier said he would like to do something for us when he visited us, but he never did anything for us. He only gave us pleasant looks, and left us to think over that, but the present hon. Minister of Finance has helped us a little. He put a duty on the Yankee salt. It did not help us much, because our people had already driven out that foreign salt. When salt was discovered in the county of Huron, the Yankees, hearing of it, said: "We will kill out that industry," and they sent ship-loads, one after the other, and cut the price $1.50 less a barrel than in their own country. But the people were not to be killed so easily. We said, "Two can play at that game," and we put the salt right down below that, and brought the salt down; but they have never been able to raise it, and the price to-day is too low. Mr. Speaker, when I tell you that a barrel of salt, including the barrel, is sold at 60c., sometimes 75c., I dare say you will see that that industry is languishing, is dying. What we ask the hon. the Minister of Finance is not a favour; we ask no favour; we do not want a Joseph's coat of many colours. We only ask that the salt in the west shall be dealt with as the coal in the east has been. A duty has been placed on that, and now increased to 60c. a ton. Salt is purely a Canadian interest, as well as coal, and has as much right to be protected. We ask him to put a duty on all salt coming in from England and elsewhere, except for that used for the Fisheries. I think the hon. Minister will see his way clear to give us this simple justice. About a million dollars has been sunk in the salt works in the counties of Huron and Bruce, and a majority of the wells are now closed, and the capital lying idle. Surely, therefore, something ought to be done to redeem that struggling industry. If salt had not been discovered in the county of Huron, the Yankees would have charged us a dollar a barrel more than we pay now; therefore the salt supplied to this country by the county of Huron has saved the country some five or six millions of dollars already. Let these works be closed, and we again depending on Yankee salt, and we will soon see the price go up. I am persuaded the hon. the Minister of Finance will look into this matter, and if he only touches it, if he only gives it his consideration, he will help it. We are willing to give our friends the duty on coal; if 60c. will not bring it up we will give them 75c., and when they bring up the coal to the west we will give them a cargo of salt. It has been thought our salt was not as good as English salt. We have had three chemists, who have analysed it, and found it to be the purest article in the world; and we have had another practical test this fall. Some people have said it would not cure butter and cheese as well as English salt; but we have had a practical test made in this way. They went to one of the cheese factories, and they salted a certain number of cheeses with English salt, and an equal number with Canadian salt, the curd being taken from the same vat; after the cheese was cured sufficiently, an examination by the best judges in the country was instituted; they did not tell these experts anything about what they had done. They carefully examined the cheeses, and they reported cheese number one the best, which was salted from salt made at Messrs. Coleman and Gouinlock's mill, Seaforth; best numbers two and three from Canadian salt also, and the fourth best from salt from England. Now what more do you want as to the purity of the salt. It has stood the chemical test and the experimental test, and it has been found to be the purest salt in the world. Let those who talk about Canadian salt not being as pure as English, when such facts as these have been established, cease decrying a Canadian industry of so much importance, and show a little more patriotism and faith in the resources of their own country. As a further proof of this, there is a large pork-packing firm in Milwaukee, in the United States, who use the Canadian article in preference to any other, and pay more per barrel for it than they would have to pay for American salt; they prefer to take ours even at the extra cost. Our Lower Province friends think it will not salt fish. Do they think we have no fish in Lake Huron? We have the best trout in the world, and the best white fish in the world, and we salt that fish. If it will cure fish, butter, cheese and pork, if it will stand all tests, experiments and chemicals, what more do you want? Nothing more, surely, but we must have Protection.

Motion agreed to.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I was under the impression that there were other hon. members who intended to speak on the Tariff, but, if no other hon. member desires to speak, I will—

MR. MACKENZIE: I think it is passed.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Well, I can find other opportunities if it is carried. I am not particular; but I was going to make a few remarks.

MR. MACKENZIE: Then we are to understand, Mr. Speaker, that the question is not carried?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I understand I am to close the discussion.

Some HON. MEMBERS: No.

MR. SPEAKER: I declared the motion carried. I will now put the first resolution.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I desire to address the House, and I am sorry that the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) is not in his place. However, I will reserve the remarks I intended to make at the commencement of my speech until he returns to the House. Oh, now, I see the hon. gentleman is in his place; and I will, therefore, say what I intended to say with reference to the remarks that fell from the hon. member in relation to myself when he was replying to the statements I made in submitting the Budget. That hon. gentleman, Sir, thought proper to criticise my humble judgment in rather an ungenerous and unfair manner.

MR. MILLS: Mr. Speaker, I wish to say—

Some HON. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. MILLS: It is to a point of order that I rise. There are a number of gentlemen who intended to address the House upon the question generally, but they are not here at the moment; but if other hon. members are to be restricted to the subject matter of each item—if they are not to be allowed to take part in the general discussion—the hon. the Minister of Finance will have to observe the same rule.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I understood there were hon. members who were very anxious to speak. I understood that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) wished to speak; and, therefore, I did not wish to close the debate.

MR. MACKENZIE: No one objects to the debate being re-opened; but what should be clearly understood is that, if the hon. the Minister of Finance is to be allowed to discuss the whole question generally, the same privilege must be accorded to every member of the House; otherwise the hon. gentleman can only speak to what is involved in any particular item discussed.

MR. MACKENZIE.

MR. MILLS: I know that a number of gentlemen intended to speak on the motion. I have a few notes which I took of the debate. I did not expect to speak to-night, and I have not got them here, because I supposed the debate would not reach a conclusion before Thursday. Of course, I can quite understand that the hon. the Minister of Finance is anxious that he should close it himself, and I have no objection to his doing so; but, after declaring the motion carried, the general debate is closed. I have, however, no objection to the hon. gentleman addressing the House generally on the Tariff, but only on the understanding that all those who have not already spoken, and who may desire to speak, some of whom are not for the moment in the House, shall have the same opportunity. The debate might be adjourned, and other Government business proceeded with.

MR. PLUMB: The hon. the Minister of Finance has by courtesy the right of reply. I do not see why he should not have it at this stage of the debate. If other members are to be allowed consequently to re-open the discussion on the main question, the business will never be finished. The debate will never be ended if they are to go on discussing the question generally upon every item that comes up on concurrence.

MR. SPEAKER: On the motion for the second reading of the resolutions the debate was general. I waited for some time before declaring the motion carried. Now, as the second reading of the resolutions has been declared carried, there comes the question of concurring in the resolutions, item by item, and in that case the debate must be confined to the subject matter of each item as it comes up, except it be specially understood that it is to be general.

MR. MACKENZIE: We have no objection on this side of the House to the general debate going on.

On Resolution 1, on item 7,

MR. PATERSON (South Brant): The subject matter of this item has been brought before my notice by the Principal of the Institution in Ontario for the education of the blind. It relates to the duty upon books that are fitted for that unfortunate class, embossed or raised letter books, I think they are called. It is a subject upon which I have no direct knowledge, but a gentleman informs me that the Tariff is exceedingly onerous, that the rates levied under the old rule, 6c. per pound, was something very great, but that under the ad valorem rate, as proposed by the hon. the Finance Minister, it will be 80 per cent. more than it was then. I am informed that this unfortunate class are unable, in a large measure, to provide their own books. Some are found by the Province, and others by the benevolent inclined. It is thought it would only be in the interest of humanity, and suffering humanity at that, if the hon. Minister would listen to the request in that direction, and announce whether he can see his way clear to give this relief. I am told that none of those works are printed in Canada, and never, in all probability, will be. They are published by humane institutions in the United States and elsewhere. The tax levied upon them will be a heavy burden on the class that can ill afford to bear it. Under all the circumstances, perhaps the hon. Minister can give us some assurance that the burden will be removed by a proviso, to the effect that books of that class be added to the free list.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: The subject to which the hon. gentleman has referred has engaged the attention of the Government, and two or three propositions of a similar character are receiving consideration. When the item is submitted, I will be able to state whether we will place them in the free list or not.

MR. MACKENZIE: Does this 15 per cent. mean the average amount collected?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Yes.

MR. MACKENZIE: One of the leading book-sellers—a gentleman with whom the hon. gentleman had some relations last year—informed me that the average collection was a trifle under 10 per cent. If that be true, we are charging 5 per cent. more under the new than we did under the old Tariff.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: By reference to the returns for the last six months, which have been laid upon the Table, the hon. gentleman will see that the duty paid is between 14 and 15 per cent., and that the gentleman interested in the trade suggested 15 per cent.

MR. MACKENZIE: What they suggested was that they would rather pay another percentage than another ad valorem duty.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: It is their own proposition.

On item 18,

MR. MACKENZIE: I would like to know what the item means. It is impossible to gather the meaning from the wording.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Under the present Act, mattresses made of hair are taxed at 30 per cent. This makes the duty the same on all mattresses, no matter of what material they are made.

On item 47,

MR. IVES: I regret that the hon. the Finance Minister has not seen his way clear to apply the same principle in regard to this article that has been applied to flag-stones, in item 16, that is, to give a specific duty. A year's experience has shown that the duty on roofing-slates is practically much less than it appears to be, owing to the admission of American slate at an under valuation. To those unacquainted with the trade, it seems easy to detect the difference between the various grades of slate, but it is really easy to deceive anyone not skilled in the business. The roofing-slate brought in under the new Tariff, has been valued at less than one-half the price it is sold for on the market. It is evident, therefore, that either the hon. the Minister of Customs must perform his duty more efficiently or the hon. the Finance Minister must give us a higher rate per cent. At the present time, slate worth $4.25 or $4.50 per square, is brought in and pays duty upon $1.50 to $2 per square only. I hope the hon. Minister will see his way clear to giving us a specific duty on this article. I would suggest that we should have 20 per cent. of the value of the roofing-slate imported. That would be a fair Protection, and would prevent the importation of American slate to a large portion of the Dominion. There are very valuable slate quarries in the constituency I represent, and they have done tolerably well during the past year, but the business is capable of being largely extended, and I think the step I have suggested should be taken so as to enable those quarries to supply the whole country as far as possible.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I am not aware that the attention of the Department has been called to this subject. I understand that the manufacturers allege that the imported slates are undervalued, but I do not think it can be fairly stated that the hon. the Minister of Customs is not looking after such matters. I think there are more complaints in the opposite direction.

MR. IVES: He is looking after tea more than slate.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: This industry has certainly a Protection of 25 per cent., because it is unlike many other industries, which have to pay from 15 to 20 per cent. for raw material. It is all really upon the labour they bestow on the work; and the value of the slates varies so materially, that a specific duty would in one case be 60 per cent., and in another 70, while in a different one 20 or 25 per cent. The difficulty we experience in dealing with questions of this kind, where the values vary so much, is not slight. In a certain case of very inferior slate, the duty proposed by my hon. friend (Mr. Ives), would be about 62½ per cent. The Government thought that by the imposition of 25 per cent. they would give this industry everything that could be desired.

MR. JONES: I think the difficulty lies in the inability of the Custom House officers to give the proper appraisement of these articles. It is almost impossible that every Custom House officer on the frontier should be able to appraise different articles correctly. The Customs Department has not adopted a proper system in the appraisement of goods throughout the country. They have tried a little too much to save some money by not appointing suitable appraisers to go to the different districts, and assist the Custom House officers in valuing the different articles. I think the trouble is that the Board of Appraisers is only sufficient to remain at Ottawa, and work here, but have scarcely the time to overlook the work of appraisement elsewhere. We want a staff to travel through the districts, from point to point, and look over the different entries passing through the Custom Houses, and teach the different officers their duty. I see in Toronto there is a great deal of trouble among the hardware men with regard to appraisement. In this article, particularly, there is an immense business done with the United States, and we know it is almost impossible for men, not properly trained in this branch, to state what the duties or prices would be. There has been no hardware appraiser appointed in the port. I think that is a great mistake, that it is penny-wise and pound-foolish, and that the Government is losing a great deal of money by not appointing proper appraisers. The board should be properly organized, if the Government wishes to carry out the present Tariff properly.

MR. MACKENZIE: Can the hon. the Finance Minister state what value has been placed on roofing-slate per square? We could soon ascertain the effect of the duty if that was stated.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: No; the return simply gives the value.

MR. MACKENZIE: The entire amount of the duty is only about $2,900 altogether; so the immense amount the Government has been receiving, according to the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Jones), is but very small. Still, I think the hon. the Finance Minister ought to give whatever duty is asked, because the higher the price the richer the people grow under the present regime. It adds to the wealth of the country, and keeps Canada for the Canadians.

MR. IVES: I would like to ascertain the facts in this matter. I think that the slate imported last year has not paid duty upon its value. I think it has been admitted at a valuation of from $1.50 to $2 a square. I am quite certain that the information I have received on that score is correct, and, if so, there has been under valuation. What the hon. the Finance Minister says, with regard to high-priced slate paying a very low duty, if it were a specific duty, and low-priced slate paying a high duty, relates to a difficulty that I do not think exists. If we were to attach a specific duty of so much per square on roofing-slate, excepting coloured slate, say $1, there would be no difficulty, because there is no very great range of prices in ordinary slate, Nos. 1, 2 and 3. If we were to take a specific duty of 25 per cent. upon the price of $4, and except fancy slate for the operation of this specific duty, we should then arrive at what we desire. The difficulty the hon. the Finance Minister mentioned does not really exist, because there is no very large margin between the price of Nos. 1 and 3.

MR. BOWELL: I can scarcely conceive what the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) wishes the Minister of Customs to do, except it be to look into and examine every invoice brought to the Department. To judge by the amount of roofing-slate imported last year, the House must come to the conclusion that there has been very little demand for it, or that the markets have been supplied from Canadian quarries. I understood the hon. member for Lambton to say that the total amount of roofing-slate imported amounted to the value of $2,800.

MR. MACKENZIE: No; I said the duties on what was imported amounted to $2,600 or $2,800.

MR. BOWELL: The total duties collected on roofing-slate imported was but $1,145. This proves that there has been little slate consumed, or the builders have used Canadian slate.

MR. IVES: It has been imported at a value of $1.50 a square.

MR. BOWELL: If that be true, it cannot have interfered a great deal with the industry to which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ives) refers, the import being so very small. The duty on all kinds of slate reached only $3,200, and on all manufactures of slate, only $526. Of roofing-slate, upon which no duty was paid, the value of the imports was only $2,700. If the Department had been informed that this article had been under-valued when imported, an investigation would at once have taken place. The only question ever brought before me has been the propriety of changing an ad valorem to specific duty. If the idea of the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Jones) were carried out, we should have to largely supplement the present staff of Custom House clerks, and ask for 50 per cent. more for salaries. At all the principal ports it is well known there are special appraisers for each branch. I do not say that all are as efficient as they should be, but I believe all attend to their duties assiduously. That they may be properly instructed, some of the Board of Appraisers in Ottawa constantly visit the ports throughout the Dominion, and instruct their officers more particularly in their duties. A report of an under-valuation or attempt at fraud is immediately followed by an investigation. As the hon. the Finance Minister says, if there is any complaint in the country at present, it is that we have been too strict in looking after importations, charging us with having impeded business, by trying to put a stop to what all the merchants have complained of for many years, under-valuation. I am at a loss to know what can be done further by the Department, unless to dismiss forty or fifty of the appraisers and select new ones, supposed to be more competent. I do not think the country would be satisfied with an increase of the number to the extent the hon. member for South Leeds desires, nor do I believe that much more can be done than has been done, hence I did not feel justified in asking this House to increase the expenditure of the Department in this particular.

MR. MACKENZIE: In giving the amount of duties collected, there was omitted what the class covers. It is slate and slate-manufactures of all kinds; they paid $307.80; roofing-slate, $682.10, and all other manufactures of slate, $1,987, or a total of $2,967 in the last half year. Roofing-slate, in the previous six months of 1878, yielded $725, or some $20 more than during the last six months, showing it was not materially affected in any way by the Tariff.

Item agreed to.

Item 49, Wool and woollens.

MR. CHARLTON: Will the hon. the Finance Minister inform the House what amount of wools pass into this country, and what revenue he expects from the duty?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I cannot say. The impression last year was that there was very little of this description imported, but we found such was not the case. We thought the wool imported came mainly from Africa, South America and Australia, and that such wool as is raised in Canada was not imported; but we found last year that 30,000lb. entered from Great Britain alone. But the opinion we entertained this time was, that indirect Protection would be given the producers of wool in this country, by the demand created for it by our own industries. It was stated to-day that the price of wool was very low during the summer; but our farmers sold it too early. Wool, then 22c. per pound, is now worth 32c. Last summer, while in Toronto, I was in communication with some gentlemen who had sent out orders for the very description of wool produced in this country, and a very considerable quantity was imported. I doubt very much whether the importation will be large, for a very large portion comes from Africa, South America and Australia, for use in the manufacture of the finer cloths, which cannot be made out of Canadian wool; it is used in the making of blankets and coarse goods. Last year, wool competing with Canadian, was imported, and it is to reach it that the duty is asked.

MR. MACKENZIE: Where does it come from?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Largely from Great Britain.

MR. OLIVER: What quantity of the fine wool raised in Canada enters into our manufactures? I know it is very large.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I cannot speak on the subject as positively, perhaps, as my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver). But, in conversations I have had with woollen manufacturers, I have learned that the larger establishments import nearly all the finer wools from Africa, and some from Australia and South America. Very little of the wool used at Almonte or the Sherbrooke mills is Canadian. Our own wool is used for coarse goods.

MR. CHARLTON: I wish to call the attention of the hon. the Finance Minister to the fact that the imposition of this duty is upon wools only of which we export a large amount and ordinarily import none, as the hon. the Finance Minister must be well aware, a deception sought to be practiced upon the farmer, inasmuch as only under exceptional circumstances and on very rare occasions can it have any effect on the price of wool. If he had imposed a duty on wool imported in large quantities, he would have got some revenue from it, whether he would have succeeded in raising the price of wool produced in Canada or not. But the present arrangement will neither give him revenue nor the farmers Protection. It is a sop thrown to the farmer—one of those promises by which he is deluded into the belief that he is receiving some sort of Protection of a piece with the duty on barley, peas, beans, and various articles of which we export enormous quantities, and import almost nothing. It will have no effect in raising the price of wool, or producing revenue. I think it is one of those dodges it ill becomes the dignity of the Government to resort to.

Resolution agreed to.

On item 5 of second Resolution,

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne): I would like to ask the hon. the Finance Minister if he would have any objection to add the words, "and sugar refineries." I ask this for the reason that in Nova Scotia, as he is aware, a sugar refinery is to be established during the present year. A large portion of the machinery used in it may be manufactured in Canada, but it will be necessary to import a considerable portion from the United States and Great Britain. I see no reason why the privileges extended to cotton mills may not also be extended to sugar refineries. After this refinery is in operation it will have to compete with Redpath and Company, the machinery for whose establishment was been imported under the late Tariff.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I am gratified to find that there is one hon. gentleman belonging to the Opposition who is of the opinion that a sugar refinery is not such a wonderful monopoly after all, and that the Protection which is alleged has been given by Parliament is of so limited a character that the machinery for it requires to be admitted free. Nevertheless, I am of opinion that this industry has sufficient Protection to warrant us in exacting a duty on the machinery for the sugar refineries that may be established.

MR. ROBERTSON: I did not say that that industry was not protected; on the contrary, I acknowledged it was protected. But I said that the sugar refinery in Nova Scotia would have to compete with Redpath and Son, whose machinery has been imported at a low rate of duty. Now, the sugar refinery in Nova Scotia will have to bring in its machinery at a high rate of duty, and will not be on the same footing as Redpath and Son.

MR. DOMVILLE: The hon. gentle man is quoting Redpath versus Redpath, because we know that they are large owners in the refinery in Halifax. Consequently, things that are equal to the same thing are equal to one another.

MR. ROBERTSON: What stock have they?

MR. DOMVILLE: A large stock—$20,000. I have it from the Redpaths themselves.

MR. ROBERTSON: $10,000.

MR. DOMVILLE: A large portion of that machinery has been for years in Canada. I have no doubt that my hon. friend occupies a high position in Nova Scotia, as he represents a large rural constituency; but he might leave Halifax and St. John to look after themselves. When the Halifax refinery is built and in operation, and if it makes the large amount of money it is claimed it will make, then I think they will have nothing to grumble at in paying a duty on machinery. The whole machinery for that refinery will not cost more than $60,000 or $80,000, the duty on which would be trifling in comparison with the profits the hon. gentleman alleges they will make.

MR. DALY: I may reply to one of the arguments used by the hon. member for Shelburne (Mr. Robertson), by saying that the Redpaths' refinery will not have such an advantage over that about to be established in Halifax, in respect to duty as he has alleged. Under the late Government, the machinery of Redpath and Son was utterly useless and could not be employed, but now they have been obliged to import machinery under the new Tariff, so that they have actually paid the same rate of duty as will be required to be paid by the new company about to start in Halifax. I regret that this concession, which I had already urged on the Minister, has not been made in the Tariff, but at the same time I am satisfied with the explanation given by the hon. the Minister of Finance, that the Protection which the Tariff in general terms gives to the sugar refining industry is so considerable as to enable refiners to pay the duty on their machinery.

MR. MACKENZIE: I think the hon. member for Shelburne ought to withdraw his proposition. If the hon. members for Halifax say they do not want any privileges for the sugar refinery in that city, such as has been enjoyed by other manufacturers, then the hon. member for Shelburne should cease his opposition, as the hon. members for Halifax must know best what their own people want.

Item agreed to.

On item 9 of second Resolution.

MR. ANGLIN: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will explain why this change is made?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Because it is raw material and not manufactured in this country, and enters largely into the manufacture of agricultural implements and other articles. It is not at the present time made in this country at all.

MR. MACKENZIE: It is made at Londonderry.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Not now.

MR. ANGLIN: Why limit the extension to 1882? Why not make the extension absolute?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: It is an indication to the English capitalists who are disposed to manufacture steel in this country, that the policy of the Government is to impose a duty on it before long.

MR. DOMVILLE: I feel that this item, to the uninitiated, covers a very large ground. It is hard to tell where iron ceases and steel commences. In the process of manufacturing iron, that is difficult to discriminate, except by experts, and they are not always able to form a conclusion as to where the line is to be drawn. I think a great deal of our nail-plate in this country could be brought in under the heading of steel, because it might be so manufactured as to answer for the making of nails and still come under the heading of steel. Again, under this heading, fish-plates come in free. Fish-plates have been made in this country, and can be made without any difficulty by the rolling mills, and would provide a large amount of work for such factories. The railways of the North-West and Canada simply, generally require annually some thousands of tons of fish-plates. I point this out because it may not yet be too late to alter the Tariff. I think it should be so amended so that fish-plates for railways, which can be made in this country very cheaply and by a simple process, should be made in this country. As I understand the National Policy, it is to favour the manufacturer in this country of everything that can be manufactured here. If fish-plates can be made here as cheaply and as economically as they can be imported from abroad, our people should be allowed to make them, and at the same time burn the coal of Nova Scotia or of other parts of this country in their manufacture. I do not throw this out with any desire to find fault with the hon. the Finance Minister but only as a proper suggestion to urge him on in the interests of the country. At the same time, I wish to point out that in importing steel or the manufactures of steel, almost everything that is brought in under the heading of iron may be called steel, because the difference is so slight that it is hard to discriminate. I point this out believing that we should have the right to make plates in this country. For every mile of iron rails laid down there are five tons of fish-plates required. The Coldbrook Works have been referred to in the course of the debate. If we could only get the making of one-half the fish-plates required for the Pacific Railway, we should be able to carry on our business to great advantage, and provide employment to a large number of mechanics. I think this House must admit that the hon. the Finance Minister has endeavoured to do the best he can for all the industries of Canada, and he has shown his willingness to put the manufacturing interest of the country on a sound basis after they had been run down by the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite.

MR. MACKENZIE: This is to add to the free list.

MR. DOMVILLE: I know it is, and I object to its being added to the free list. I object to the extension of the time to 1882 for certain articles that come under the denomination of steel. I do not object to steel rails coming in free, until the country is in a position to manufacture them. But when we come to the auxiliaries, such as fish plates, nuts, and bolts, and all those things, I want these to be made in the country.

Item agreed to.

On item 6 of third Resolution.

MR. CHARLTON: In connection with this matter of the Excise duty on spirits, I desire to call the attention of the hon.

the Finance Minister to one view of this case. In common with himself, I do not care how high the duty upon spirits may be. But I suppose his object is to secure as large a revenue as possible, and I much fear the rate of duty now imposed will be found to be too high for a Protective rate. I think a lower rate would be a more productive one. I fear this duty being so much higher than the Excise duty in the United States will lead to an enormous amount of smuggling, and also to a great amount of illicit distillation. It has been found in the United States that the highest rate of Excise duty yielded the least amount of revenue, and the experience of that country is that the present rate, which is 90c. I think, is more productive than the higher rates were. The Excise duty in the United States once was $2, and the smallest revenue ever collected from spirits there was under that duty. I think the hon. the Finance Minister will find this duty too high for revenue purposes.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: This duty is very little higher than the Excise duty of the United States, and as far as we can discover there are no spirits brought in from the United States. There may be some illicit distillation within the Dominion, but the premium offered to parties giving information in regard to illicit stills is so great, that illicit distillation is rendered very hazardous. Further than that, the increase of 10c. per gallon last Session, would naturally make very little difference indeed in regard to illicit distillation.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou), moved the third reading of the Bill.

MR. BLAKE moved in amendment :

That the Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be Resolved, That any change in the judicial system of British Columbia should be based on the utilisation of the existing staff of eight Judges ; that the proposed legislation will involve the pensioning of five of those Judges, in full health and vigour, at an annual cost of $8,000, and will thus increase the expense, while it will diminish the efficiency of the Administration of Justice in the Province.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) : I have just one or two observations to make in regard to the amendment proposed before it goes to the House. Hon. gentlemen will recollect that in the discussion upon the second reading of the Bill, I laid before the House the figures on which I asked the House to assent to the Bill authorising the payment of salaries to Judges, and those figures demonstrated that the appointments of Judges proposed would not cost the country a dollar. The amendment, as far as I understand it, is entirely misleading. It states that the superannuation of the Stipendiary Magistrates, whom my hon. friend terms Judges, would entail upon the country an annual expenditure of $8,000. It is very true that the pensioning of these gentlemen will entail the payment to them of their pensions, but the statement that it will cost the country that amount is entirely misleading. I demonstrated to the House that, although these gentlemen would retire from the active discharge of their duties, an arrangement of the judiciary could be effected, by which no additional cost would be necessitated. With this explanation the amendment as proposed by the hon. member will be indicative of his own views. I have only to say that it is misleading, in so far as it would tend to lead the House to believe that the appointment of these Judges would entail any additional cost whatever on the administration of justice in the country.

MR. BLAKE : By the hon. gentleman's own showing there would an increased cost of $400 a year.

MR. McDONALD : Perhaps the hon. gentleman will show me where that statement is?

MR. BLAKE : I can show the hon. gentleman his own speech.

MR. McDONALD : I said that deducting the salary of the Westminister magistrate there would be a small additional outlay.

MR. LONGLEY : If the hon. the Minister of Justice will demonstrate to the House that the Bill which he is about to ask us to endorse, will not lead to a considerable increase in connection with the cost of the judiciary of the country, I for one will be prepared to vote for his motion. But, unless he can do that, I shall not feel free to add to the cost of that particular branch of the service some $8,000. Any person having his attention directed to the expenses of the administration of justice for a few years past must have been struck with the fact that the expenses have been increasing in a very rapid manner. Even during the last year, if the figures before me are correct, those expenses have increased nearly $9,000. I, for one, do not feel free now to sanction any further increase in this direction.

Motion made and question proposed :

That the Bill be not now read a third time but that it be Resolved, That any change in the judicial system of British Columbia should be based on the utilization of the existing staff of eight Judges ; that the proposed legislation will involve the pensioning of five of those Judges, in full health and vigour, at an annual cost of $8,000 and will thus increase the expense, while it will diminish the efficiency of the Administration of Justice in the Province.—(Mr. Blake.)

GENERAL INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Baby.)

FIRST READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, to consider a certain proposed Resolution respecting "The General Inspection Act, 1874" (37 Vic., cap. 45), and the Act 39 Vic., cap. 33.

(In the Committee.)

MR. BABY : After considering the suggestions of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, the Government have decided to reduce the fees for the inspection of smoked herrings from 2c. per box to 1c. per box, $\frac{1}{2}$ c. per half box, and $\frac{1}{4}$ c. per quarter box. I hope this will meet the views of hon. gentlemen from the Lower Provinces in general, and the member of the county of Halifax in particular. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) stated that nobody had asked for this tax, but he is mistaken. As I said the other day, this is no tax at all; the object is only to fill up a deficiency in the law repeatedly asked for. The inspection fee now sought to be established is to remunerate the Inspector for his trouble, when called upon to inspect smoked herrings in boxes, the charges actually provided by law being only on barrels and half-barrels. The Statute in force since 1874 provides that where an Inspector of Fish is appointed, such fish as are mentioned in the law shall be inspected, but in the schedule to which I have already alluded, we find herrings mentioned only in barrels and half-barrels. I may add that I am informed that there are several contradictory judgments rendered in the Maritime Provinces on this subject; one to the effect that the Inspector is bound to inspect such smoked herrings without fee, and others that this officer is not bound to do so without remuneration. It is to remedy such defects that this measure is introduced. There was a complaint that the boxes were generally too small, but the Inspection Act regulates the capacity of the boxes, and states how many pounds of herring they shall contain. I trust that the resolutions now before the House will carry.

MR. ANGLIN : The hon. the First Minister stated, on a former occasion, that it was not intended that the inspection should be compulsory. I understood the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue to state now that the inspection would be compulsory.

MR. BABY : The law says that the inspection of all fish mentioned in the list shall be compulsory where an Inspector has been appointed at the request of the Board of Trade.

MR. ANGLIN: That is a point on which we would like to be satisfied. My own impression is that this Bill would make the inspection compulsory. If such is the case, it will render it necessary for those interested to view the matter differently from what they would if it were optional. It would, perhaps, be necessary for us to appeal to the House for such changes as may be desirable in the interests of our constituents. Failing in that, we must only submit to the inevitable.

MR. LONGLEY said that he thought there was some confusion in regard to boxes and half boxes. He was not aware that any half boxes were put up in his own county.

MR. BABY said the boxes would be defined by the law.

MR. LONGLEY said the hon. Minister would search the law in vain for the dimensions of half boxes. He was glad the Government had decided to reduce the inspection fee. Since the last discussion, he had ascertained that those interested in the industry would rather have the inspection optional. The Boards of Trade might be good authorities on the matters they understood, but the men who put up the fish are the best judges in regard to this question. He suggested that an hon. member (Mr. Gillmor), who understood all about the vast herring fisheries of Grand Manan, should give his views on this important matter.

MR. GILLMOR said he did not know much about the size of the boxes, but he was satisfied that if the hon. Minister understood the trade he would not have recommended inspection for the herrings put up at Grand Manan. Nine-tenths of the herrings exported from the Dominion are exported from his constituency, and he was quite sure the hon. Minister would not willingly interfere or obstruct that trade. Compulsory inspection would be a grave inconvenience. Local inspection might be well enough, but it would be a needless job to appoint an Inspector to go over the district, where the herrings are packed. The men engaged in this industry understood this matter, and their interests should be consulted. He thought this measure was unnecessary and opposed to the interests of those engaged in the herring packing trade.

MR. LONGLEY asked if it was proposed to make the inspection compulsory.

MR. BABY: My intention is not to disturb the Act, but to leave it as it is. It has been decided by the Courts in Nova Scotia that the Inspector was bound to inspect herrings notwithstanding the fact that no fee was provided.

MR. LONGLEY said he understood there was a clear distinction between the inspection of pickled fish and smoked herrings; the one being compulsory and the other optional.

MR. BABY: According to the law of 1874, they were to be exactly on the same footing. But it will be better to wait until the Bill comes down before discussing this matter.

Resolution ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

(In the House.)

MR. BABY introduced a Bill (No. 84) To amend the General Inspection Act, 1874, and the Act amending it.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

PRAYERS.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced, and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 85), For the amendment of the law of evidence in certain cases of misdemeanour. —(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

QUESTION.

MR. VALLÉE enquired, Whether the Government has come to a decision with respect to the building of the Coteau Bridge; and, if so, what is it?

SIR CHARLES TOPPER: The Government has come to a decision on the subject, which has already been communicated to the Coteau Railway Company, and made public: namely, to require the structure to cross the St. Lawrence at that point to be a high-level bridge.

LAND WARRANTS IN THE NORTH-WEST.

QUESTION.

MR. ROYAL enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to redeem scrip or military or police bounty land warrants, so as to prevent the said warrants becoming worthless, or to accept the same in payment for railway or pre-emption lands in the several belts, as was intended when such warrants were first issued by the Dominion Government.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That subject is now engaging the attention of the Government.

CROWN TIMBER PERMITS IN MANITOBA

MR. ROYAL enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to issue instructions to the Crown Timber Agent in Manitoba, so that permits may be dispensed with in the cutting or taking away of dead timber, whether fallen or standing, on Dominion lands?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: No, it is not the intention of the Government to give any such instructions.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES—COLLECTION OF CUSTOMS DUTIES.

QUESTION.

MR. ROYAL enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to discontinue the present system of collecting the Customs duties in the North-West Territories, by the men of the North-West Mounted Police, and to appoint, at an early date, other officers; and, if so, at what points?

MR. BOWELL: It is the intention of the Government to appoint Customs officers, to be stationed at points on the frontier of the North-West, as the trade of the country develops itself, so as to justify such appointments. At present, I am not in a position to state at what points these officers, when appointed, will be stationed, or when any appointments will be made.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—RUNNING OF TRAINS IN MANITOBA.

QUESTION.

MR. ROYAL enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to direct that proper means be adopted in the running of Canadian Pacific Railway trains over the River Seine bridge, and along the Provencher Avenue at St. Boniface, Manitoba, for the better protection of life and property.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I beg leave to say in reply to the question of the hon. gentleman, that along the Provencher Avenue, at St. Boniface, there is only a temporary line, and it will not, I presume, be necessary to continue it after the completion of the temporary pile bridge.

MAIL SERVICE BETWEEN VICTORIA AND CASSIAR, B.C.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. DECOSMOS, in moving for an Order of the House for a return containing a copy of any correspondence, in 1879, respecting the conveyance of the mails between Victoria and Cassiar, and way-ports north of Comox; and showing the number of mails despatched each way between Victoria and Lake Town, Cassiar, in 1879, the dates at which the mails were despatched, and a statement of the expenditure for the transmission of the said mails, said: As I observe that the hon. the Postmaster-General is now in his seat, I wish to call his attention to this matter, and particularly to the fact that Victoria and Cassiar are at a distance from each other of about 1,100 miles, and that at the present time during the winter season there are some 300 persons in Cassiar and in the summer time about 1,000 and upwards, yet no provision is made for carrying the mails between Cassiar and Victoria, or between Wrangel and Glenora, and between the latter and Laketown. I find, Sir, among some of the letters published in British Columbia on the subject, the following from Mr. Lovell, who was the Postmaster, until recently, at Glenora:—

“R. Wallace, Esq., Postmaster, Victoria:

“DEAR SIR,—During the past year, though no provision has been made for any mail service to Cassiar, you have been in the habit of putting packages of mail matter on board the steamers for Fort Wrangel, Alaska, addressed to me as Postmaster at Glenora; you trusting only to the generosity of anyone who would take them up the Stickeen river for nothing. And as you have refused to make any provision, or to pay anything, or promise to pay anything for the delivery of any mail at Glenora, I request you will have my name taken off the list of Postmasters, and address no more packages of mail to me as such at Glenora, unless by an authorised messenger, as I object to be a party to any such fraud on the public.

"And it is better for the public to know that, notwithstanding Cassiar does pay so large a proportion of the Dominion revenue, yet there is no mail service provided for the Cassiar District.

"I am respectfully,

"Your obedient servant,

"JOHN B. LOVELL."

Now, Sir, I ask the attention of the Government to this matter. So far as the Government of the United States is concerned, they supply a mail between Port Townsend, W.T., and Wrangel, in Alaska; and the only provision to be made by our Government would be to arrange for sending the mail by every steamer to or from Wrangel, making permanent provision for the mail between Fort Wrangel and Glenora, and then, seventy-five miles from Glenora, to Laketown, in Cassiar. Another letter, published in the Victoria papers, coming from the hon. the Postmaster-General's Department, is as follows:—

"OTTAWA, January 3rd, 1880.

"SIR,—I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 10th ultimo, remonstrating against the action of the Department in discontinuing the mail service between Victoria and the Cassiar district.

"In reply, I am directed to say that the service in question was discontinued because the price paid for it was out of all proportion to the annual revenue yielded by the offices interested, each trip costing the Department more than double the amount of such revenue.

"I am, Sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"WILLIAM WHITE,

"Secretary.

"Mr. J. LOVELL,

"Victoria, B.C."

Mr. Lovell writes:

"If the above reason for not sending a mail to Cassiar was applied to every district in British Columbia, how many would receive mail service at all? Cassiar pays a large amount of revenue to the Dominion Customs for which she receives absolutely nothing in return. The real reason is that Cassiar has no political influence.

"J. B. LOVELL."

Now, Sir, I think this is a very poor reason for the Department to give, that so many people should be deprived of their mails. I trust that the Government will see that some provision is made for carrying the mails to and from Cassiar and Victoria, and the way-ports, Alert Bay, Fort Rupert, Fort Simpson.

MR. BUNSTER: The hon. gentleman introduced Comox, which happens to be in my district. I am glad he has mentioned it, for it was badly treated by the late Postmaster-General. Comox was promised a weekly service, and the service is large enough for the boat to run twice a week. There are 200 voters in that district, which is a good indication of the number of inhabitants. At present we have only a mail once a fortnight, while the contract was let for once a week. The bondsmen were never asked to pay the amount of the sureties for the performance of the contract. I trust that when the contract is let again justice will be done to Comox, as well as to the east coast of Vancouver Island. When bogus bondsmen go as sureties I think the authorities ought to look that they do not get straw bail. I have no doubt the hon. the Postmaster-General will do justice in this case.

Motion agreed to.

BRITISH COLUMBIA — APPOINTMENT OF MR. TRUTCH.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. DECOSMOS moved for an Address for a return containing a copy of all correspondence, papers, and Orders in Council, respecting the appointment of Hon. J. W. Trutch to office in British Columbia.

MR. MACKENZIE: I would like to ask what position Mr. Trutch is appointed, and what are his duties and salary.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The return just moved for will show all that.

MR. MACKENZIE: If the transaction is complete, the hon. gentleman should tell us now. We may not see the return until next year.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I promise to have the return down in a few days.

Motion agreed to.

TRENT WATERS CANAL SURVEYS.

MOTION FOR REPORTS.

MR. KEELER moved for an Order of the House for copies of all reports of recent surveys made by D. Stark, Esq., Civil Engineer, of the proposed canal route from Port Hope to Rice Lake (Trent Waters).

MR. McCUAIG: I am opposed to applications for reports in regard to undertakings which I am quite sure the finances of the country are inadequate to carry on.

MR. MACKENZIE: This matter has a more serious aspect than hon. gentlemen opposite are inclined to think. What object the Government could have had in sending an engineer with a party to examine the country from Lake Ontario, at Port Hope, to the interior, is past comprehension. According to the local papers, the engineer reports that he found the country of such a nature that it was possible to build a canal, and that the ascent to the Lake near Peterborough, was about 360 feet. I think the House ought to have some information about this matter. Parliament never authorised a survey of this country for the purpose of making a canal. An effort is also being made to have the Trent works continued. By that route, after traversing the Trent valley for eighty miles, you are only ten miles from Lake Ontario. These wild projects are utterly absurd, and it is a waste of public money to send engineers to examine such projected works. I do not think the Government has a right to undertake such a work as the one under discussion, when Parliament never sanctioned it, and no vote was asked for the purpose.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I may say that the hon. gentleman knows there is a general vote for surveys, and where a question of this kind arises and the Government think it desirable, before entering upon any considerable expenditure, it is usual to obtain information in a cursory way, as was done in this case. The officer was engaged only a few days; and I am inclined to think it is not a very great stretch of Departmental authority, when a question of this kind arises, for the Minister to satisfy himself by a small expenditure for the purpose of ascertaining how far he would be warranted to take the matter up. In this very instance, the result of a very small expenditure and of a few days' examination was sufficient to satisfy me that we would not be justified in coming to Parliament and asking for any considerable expenditure for the purpose of prosecuting the investigation. I think the hon. member for Lambton will find this is a very insignificant expenditure compared with a good many expenditures that he felt himself quite warranted in undertaking without any larger amount of authority from Parliament.

MR. MACKENZIE: I am not aware of a single one, and would be glad if the hon. gentleman would mention one instance. Here is a work which would cost not less than $15,000,000 to $20,000,000, and an engineer is gravely sent to see whether it is wise or not to proceed with it. A single glance at the map, at the general geography or topography, would show, apart from the information in the possession of the Department, that this is one of the wildest schemes ever spoken of. The vote of $10,000 or $15,000 for surveys, and such matters, was never intended to be used for the purpose of making an examination of the country for a gigantic project that never was even mentioned in Parliament. When we desired to examine the coasts of the Northumberland Channel, we took a special vote for the purpose. With regard to the examination of harbours, there is an appropriation for the purpose, and it is generally mentioned in Parliament; but it has been very different in this case. It is a matter that could not possibly have engaged the attention of the hon. the Minister of Canals seriously—the construction of this canal. Supposing the report of the engineer had been more favourable, that the work would only cost half what it would, would the hon. the Minister of Canals really submit a project of that kind to Parliament? It was done, no doubt, to please some of his local friends; but they ought not to be satisfied at the expense of the country. There is information about all those waters in the Department now. This scheme has been deliberately abandoned by the Government for the last twenty-five or thirty years; and yet we have it revived, an engineer sent to examine it, and newspapers sounding the praises of the Government on the report that this work is to be undertaken; that the survey has been started, and so far everything has been found most favourable. It is a pure farce.

Motion agreed to.

POST-OFFICE INSPECTORS.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

MR. BOURBEAU, in moving for an Order of the House, for a statement from the offices of the Post-office Inspectors for each division, showing the salary and class of each employé, the number of mail conductors on trains, the railway line on which they travel, the number of trips made by each of them per week, and the distance they travel, said: Important changes have been made in the Province of Quebec in relation to the offices of Post-office Inspectors. Thanks to the now ex-Postmaster-General, a new division, called the Three Rivers division, has been organised, and, thanks, also, to the hon. Minister, we experience the pleasure of having as Inspector of that new division a French Canadian, the only French Canadian who holds such a position in the country. That officer has no deputy, but he has a first-class clerk, who performs the duty of deputy. The Post-office Inspector, whom I met yesterday, informed me of the fact that, his clerk not being his deputy, ex officio, cannot by consequence travel in the room and stead of the Post-office Inspector, who is obliged to make long journeys and travel over a country as yet unprovided with railways. Certainly the distance which he has to travel over, sometimes in vehicles, is very long and very fatiguing. It would, therefore, be more advantageous to him to have a Deputy Inspector to take his place occasionally. I also think it my duty to call the attention of the Government to the fact that the difference between the salary of the Three Rivers Inspector and that of the Inspectors of the other divisions is very great. I have no doubt that the Government will do justice to the Inspector of the Three Rivers division, either by increasing his salary so as to make it equal to the others, or by reducing the salaries of those officials who occupy a similar position to his, so that they may, as nearly as possible, be all placed on a like footing. The hon. the ex-Postmaster-General has exercised economy in the county of Arthabaska, and I avail myself of the opportunity of alluding to the matter which my motion for the information for which I have applied presents; I desire to say that my thanks are due to the Government for the economy instituted in my county. The electors whom I represent are always glad to hear of economy being practised. It has, however, been pointed out to me that, although the two railway mail clerks on the Arthabaska and Three Rivers Branch of the Grand Trunk Railway have been placed elsewhere, the services of such officers being no longer required on that branch, complaint is made that like economy does not prevail in connection with other lines of railway on which the services of railway mail clerks are required. The complaint is that the mail officers work only two days in each week. The motion which I have the honour to propose will have the effect of providing us with all requisite information.

MR. LANGEVIN: I must, in the first place, thank the hon. member for the praise which he bestowed on me just now in relation to the economy effected in the Post Office Department. I regretted that that economy should have been made at the expense of his county, but I knew that the hon. member was too patriotic to offer any opposition to that economy being effected there rather than elsewhere. As to the mail clerks of whom he spoke on the railway between Quebec and Ottawa, he will, when he ascertains the number employed on that line, see that it is limited, and that those officials have as much work to do as those who are employed on the south side of the St. Lawrence—upon the Grand Trunk Railway, for instance. In reference to the Post-office Inspector for the Three Rivers division, I am certain that my hon. friend from Drummond and Arthabaska speaks in perfect good faith in reporting what the Inspector said to him. I think, however, that that officer is well aware that the rules of discipline require that he should, in the first instance, make his representations on the subject of his salary to the Department, by which he is employed. If he has representations to make, he should do so to the head of his Department, and not request a member to come and speak here on his behalf. And I am satisfied that the hon. member misunderstood what the Inspector said, or else that the latter did not express himself in such a way as to convey his ideas clearly. There is, therefore, a mistake on that point. As to the Inspector, he is an excellent officer, and he will, I have no doubt, satisfy the Department, if he continues, as I believe he will do, to perform his duty as faithfully as he has hitherto done. His inspection district not being as large as some others, his salary could not at once be as high as he might later expect it to be, if he continued to do his duty in a satisfactory manner. With reference to the motion now before the House, I am informed by the hon. the Postmaster-General that the information sought for by the hon. member is contained in the Report of the Post Office Department. The hon. member should, therefore, be satisfied with the discussion which has arisen and withdraw his motion.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. STEPHENSON moved for an Order of the House for returns, in detail, showing the expenditure by the Dominion Government during the year 1879, on account of the North-West Mounted Police, as well as the number of officers and men and horses composing that force, and the names of the stations where they are located; also, the names of the contractors and others furnishing supplies to said force.

MR. MACDOUGALL: The hon. gentleman has not given any reason for moving this return. I know it is not regarded as a very pleasant duty which is sometimes imposed on unofficial members to make objection to returns that hon. members may choose to move for. But it appears to me, in this case, that all the information asked for must be contained in the report of the proper Department, or if it does not appear there, which this motion assumes, it is much to the discredit of the Department. Our paper is full of motions of this kind, more than I remember to have seen at this stage of a Session for many years, and they seem to go without any objection. I do not wish to find any fault with the heads of Departments, whose duty it is to prepare the annual reports, but it seems to me most of our time this Session has been taken up in discussing motions for information which the public reports ought to give us, and, in my opinion, really do give us, if we would take the trouble to consult them.

MR. STEPHENSON: In reply to the remarks of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) I may say that if he would take the trouble to read over the returns which were brought down last year, in reference to the expenditure on the North-West Mounted Police, he will find there information of a very unsatisfactory character. We find there that $352,749.05 have been expended for supplies for that force, and upwards of $350,000 for each of the two previous years; which supplies were drawn chiefly from the United States, while we have men in Canada prepared to furnish the same supplies at a much cheaper rate. Moreover the returns show that pears have been supplied at the rate of $13.78 a case, and other luxuries in the same proportion. If the hon. gentleman would also carefully investigate the detailed accounts in connection with the Mounted Police, produced before the Public Accounts Committee last Session, he would have seen that barley, oats, potatoes, and other articles of food which we have always supposed were grown in abundance in the North-West, were supplied from Chicago or St. Louis in the United States. He would also find that pork bought in the western portion of Canada, was brought down in this direction and sent back over the same line of railway and through the United States, at an enormous cost, when these provisions could have been bought much nearer the point where they were to be used, and supplied by Canadians, too. I think if he would call for returns showing the tenders accepted during the present year, he would find, too, that in consequence of the exposure of the gross mismanagement and extravagance which attended the purchase and furnishing of supplies to that force by the late Administration, a large amount of money will be found to have been saved to the country. Since the publication of these facts relating to the Mounted Police Force in the North-West during 1875, 1876, 1877, and 1878, I have heard the people on all sides energetically condemn that policy of the past in this connection, and now they demand that, in accordance with the principles of the National Policy, and in the interest of Canada and Canadian producers, the furnishing of supplies for the North-West Police Force should, so far as possible, be given to our own people. The publication of returns, similar to those called for last year, has already been productive of much good, and no doubt had directly effected a saving of at least $25,000. By the improved system of obtaining supplies for the present year, without doubt a still larger saving would be brought about, and due encouragement given to industries within our own borders.

MR. BLAKE: I wish to take this opportunity of calling the attention of the hon. the Minister of the Interior to a return to an Order of the House made on the 17th of March, for the names, etc., of contractors for supplying cattle and beef to the Mounted Police and the Indian Department in the North-West. This return is limited to the contractors who have supplied cattle to the Indian Department, and it altogether omits that portion of the Order which referred to the Mounted Police. The reason given by the Deputy Minister is:

"As similar information in reference to contracts by the North-West Mounted Police is also asked for in the Address above referred to, but which is not furnished herewith, I have the honour to inform you that a memorandum giving the particulars of direct contracts, etc., and such other information as Mr. Ryan, M. P., the mover of the Address, wished to obtain, was given to him, and he, Mr. Ryan, expressed himself satisfied with the information contained therein.

"I presume, therefore, that the clerical labour which would be necessary to prepare the the portion of the Return required from this Branch of the Department may be dispensed with."

I am sure that was not an intentional disrespect to the House, but I am sure it cannot be satisfactory. The House unanimously made the Order, and that the hon. member for Provencher was subsequently supplied privately by the Department with the information which the House ordered should be sent down for the use of the country is not a very good one for not complying with our order.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I have no doubt that is my memorandum to the Deputy Superintendent of Indian Affairs, and never intended to be included in the return. Of course the return must be made.

MR. MILLS: The hon. gentleman will find, if he looks at the various localities where the Mounted Police are stationed, that there are points which it would be impossible to furnish with supplies from any place in Canada. Take, for instance, Fort McLeod, close to the American border, and near the base of the Rocky Mountains. The hon. gentleman will see that these men are 800 miles in a direct line from Winnipeg. He will find again that the Mounted Police stationed at Fort Edmonton, or in that vicinity, are still further away, and that it will be necessary to supply them from the adjoining American territory at the nearest point. The only reason that supplies were taken from Baker and Company, who obtained the contracts, was that they supplied the articles at a smaller sum than they could be got for from any other parties. I cannot speak with regard to the Mounted Police, positively, because they were not attached to the Department of the Interior when I had charge of it, but I believe the practice was the same. In regard to the Indians, we were obliged to make our payments through bankers in Montana, and I suppose that will be the case for some time to come. It is perfectly obvious that it would cost us an immensely greater sum than it does if we were to say we will not take supplies from the United States for these purposes, but with a view of stimulating industry at home, and carry out the miscalled National Policy, we are disposed to purchase everything within the limits of this country. I am very sure that when the return comes down the hon. gentleman will find that supplies are still obtained from the American side of the border.

MR. STEPHENSON: I would like to ask the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) if it was not the practice of the late Government to get these supplies from Messrs. J. G. Baker and Company, of Chicago and St. Louis, without giving other merchants an opportunity of tendering, and whether, when a considerable quantity of pork was purchased from a certain party, resident at Ingersoll, Ontario, public tenders were called for and public competition invited?

MR. MILLS: I cannot say what was done in the other Departments. I know it was not done in the Department with which I was connected, and I believe it was also done in the Department of the Secretary of State. The practice, I believe, was to solicit tenders from the merchants and traders in Montana, and the contract was given to Baker and Company as the lowest tender. There were not many of them, and they were invited by letter to tender. But where the supplies could be obtained from Canada, tenders were advertised for.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : Of course it must be the object of every Government to try to get its supplies for the Public Service as cheaply as possible. At the same time, it is the duty of the Government, all things being equal, to forward the industries of the country. It is quite impossible, however, to send supplies from Winnipeg to Fort McLeod, because the cost of transport would amount to four times the value of the articles sent. This difficulty will cure itself by degrees as the country becomes settled. I have no doubt the late Government found it absolutely necessary to get supplies from Montana for the Mounted Police at Fort McLeod, Fort Walsh, and other points under the Rocky Mountains. You might as well make Ottawa the point of supply as Winnipeg for that portion.

MR. MACKENZIE : I would like to ask whether, in regard to the contract recently made with Messrs. Baker, tenders were advertised for.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : Yes, and theirs was the lowest tender. The Hudson Bay Company have a contract for a portion of the supplies, and private individuals, some in London and elsewhere, have also contracts for certain supplies.

MR. MILLS : In advertising for tenders, are the supplies for those distant portions separate from the general supplies. It is obvious that the supplies could not all be drawn from the same source

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : It is rather unfortunate to have this discussion without notice. I will bring down the advertisements, which provided that the parties contracting must deliver the articles at the several points specified in the advertisements.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAY COAL CONTRACTS.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne), in moving for an Order of the House for a copy of all correspondence with the Department of Railways and Canals, or its officers, in reference to the extension of contracts for supplying the Government Railways with coal, and the reasons for said extension, as given by reports of officers to the Department, with a statement showing what contracts were extended, showing rates and dates, said : It was customary, under the Mackenzie Administration, to ask for tenders annually for the supply of coal used by the Government Railways. The Acadia, Halifax and Intercolonial collieries in turn enjoyed this contract. The Intercolonial Company's contract expired on the 30th of June last, and it was expected by the other companies that an opportunity would be given them to compete for the supply for the current year. To the surprise of everybody, the contract was continued to the Intercolonial Company, causing great dissatisfaction and much newspaper comment at the time. I am also creditably informed that the agents of these collieries in Charlottetown intended to tender for supplying the Government Railways in that Island, and were assured by Mr. McNab, the Superintendent, that tenders would be asked for, which was not done. My object in moving for this correspondence is to ascertain upon whose report, and upon what grounds, this contract was extended to the Intercolonial colliery without the customary tenders being asked for.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER : There is no objection to the information asked for by the hon. gentleman being brought down. In dealing with this question, I was guided by the reports of my officers and the character of the coals supplied by the contractors under the contracts made by the late Government, and I believed it would be in the interest of the public to extend them for the present year. They were therefore extended accordingly.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—SUPPLY OF NUT-LOCKS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. ANGLIN, in moving for an Order of the House for a return showing the amount paid for nut-locks on the Intercolonial Railway, and the name of the person to whom such sums were paid, the amounts paid for placing such nut-locks on the rails, and any additional cost for supplying cars or locomotives, the quantity of bolts, nuts and other materials used in consequence of the placing of such nut-locks on the rails and the value thereof, the names of any persons employed as Inspectors of the work, and the amount paid as salary or wages to each such person, and copies of any reports received from any of the officials employed on the Intercolonial Railroad since these nut-locks were placed on the rails, respecting the manner in which they answer for the purpose for which they were designed, said: It will be remembered that last year there was some controversy as to the value of these nut-locks, and as to the expediency of using them at all on the railroad. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), who might be supposed to have some acquaintance with the subject, was of opinion that they would be of little or no use, and that they certainly would not prove so valuable as to warrant the expenditure of the large sums proposed to be paid for them. According to the information I have received, from what I believe to be good sources, that hon. gentleman's estimate of the value of these nut-locks has proved to be quite correct. I am told by those who profess to know something about it, that the nut-lock is not useful on railroads, but that it is calculated to lead to neglect of necessary precautions in the examination of nuts and bolts on the railroad, the men naturally supposing that the nut-lock would effect all that was promised for it, and relieve them of any necessity for such close examination as before. But that has been found not to be the case. Moreover, I am told a very large number of bolts and nuts were destroyed because difficulty was found in undoing some of them when the locks were to be put on, and others had to be used. I think it would be very desirable for us to know how much the experiment has cost the country, how much has been paid for these nut-locks, and how much has been expended in applying them, as well as how far they have answered the purpose for which they were intended. My impression is that they have not at all answered that purpose, and that the money expended in this way was—I will not say wastefully—but to little purpose expended.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I shall have great pleasure in obtaining and laying on the Table of the House the information asked for; and I hope when I do that, I shall also be able to show that the expenditure was a very wise expenditure, that it has been attended with the best possible results; and that, further, instead of the contractors being able to supply the nut-locks at the insignificant cost indicated by hon. gentlemen opposite, they have been put to great cost, and have made very little money out of the transaction. The Department have every reason to be satisfied with the way in which the nut-locks have worked, and the wise and judicious economy that they have been enabled to effect. The track-masters, who have special means of observing the operation of this patent, have stated to me, one of them in particular, who had the largest opportunity of knowing, that, where formerly barrels of nuts and bolts had to be served out at very frequent intervals to maintain the road, a section-man could now take in his pocket all that was required for a long time. My information is certainly very different to that given by the hon. gentleman opposite; my information, from the highest officials down to the track-masters, has been of the most satisfactory character.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman has stated that the cost was infinitely more than was anticipated. He was the champion of this nut-lock business; and it is not very likely that he should find officials giving opinions on the subject adverse to his own. How is it that these nut-locks could not be sold to the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and the other great companies in Canada? There has been nothing of the sort adopted by them; they found them utterly useless. That is the report I have received from officials of different roads; and to adopt them it is to lose money, which the hon. gentleman will find out. I have no doubt about it at all. The hon. gentleman has no doubt made the motion very comprehensive, but it does not quite embrace everything. I am informed that some cars and locotives were placed at the disposal of the contractors, and I would like to have information on the expenditure thus incurred brought down.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The contract was, I think, laid upon the Table of the House, and I may say that no expenditure was incurred by the Government outside of that which the contract required.

MR. ANGLIN: My motion asks for the entire cost of applying these nut-locks, and, whether under the contract or otherwise, if locomotives and cars were supplied to the contractors they will cost the country a certain amount, and therefore the information on this point should be included as part of the information asked for.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The information shall be as full as possible.

MR. MACKENZIE: I propose that the motion shall be amended so as to include in the information asked for any additional cost incurred by supplying cars or locomotives to the nut-lock contractor.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY — CAR- RIAGE OF SUGAR.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. ANGLIN, in moving for an Order of the House for a return showing the quantities of sugars sent over the Intercolonial Railway from Halifax to all other places in the Dominion, in the year ending December 31st, 1878, and in the year ending March 11th, 1880, and the rates of freight, distinguishing the sugars imported from Great Britain, the West Indies, Brazil, and other countries, said: My object in making this motion is to obtain from the returns information on a matter of very considerable interest to all parts in the Dominion. One of the objects to-night to be attained by the new National Policy was the encouragement of the sugar trade, and much has been said with regard to the quantities of sugar which have been imported by way of Halifax during the last year. I have watched the progress of that trade, and there is reason to believe that of the sugar coming to Halifax, only a small portion, at all events not much more than the usual quantity, went into the regular trade of the city of Halifax; and, further, that very small quantities were sent over the Intercolonial Railway. In point of fact, while there was a great show of increase in the trade, there was in reality only a very small increase caused by the Tariff. I think it desirable to ascertain the facts in this respect. If 11,000,000lb. or 12,000,000lb. of sugar have been brought from the West Indies last year and landed at Halifax, and then distributed in the way of trade, it must have rendered a very important service to the commerce of that port, but, as far as I have ascertained, such was not the fact. Some of the sugar was never landed at all at Halifax, but was shipped to ports in the United States, and that a portion was sent to the port of Montreal, the markets having been previously secured. I would like to add to this motion, "and the rate of freight charged for transmission of the sugar." I see by the papers that it is stated that twenty-two car-loads of sugar arrived at Halifax from Great Britain; and as I had in view the obtaining of information with regard to the West India sugar trade, I would like, with the permission of the House, to have the information asked for confined to returns of West India sugar imported or sugar imported from Brazil and sent to places in the Dominion by the Intercolonial Railway. These returns will be of interest to all the members of the House. It has been just suggested to me that I should, however, put the motion in another way, namely, that the returns should embrace all sugars, but that it should distinguish between sugar from the West Indies and Brazil and sugar from Europe.

MR. DALY: I think it should be amended so as to give information on the amount of trade done in the port of Halifax, the number of cargoes that have been shipped from Halifax to Montreal. Sugar may have been imported by way of Halifax and forwarded to Montreal. Therefore, the return asked by the hon. member will not show the full extent of the business transacted.

MR. MACKENZIE: That will require a separate motion.

MR. DALY: I think it would be better to add it to this.

MR. MACKENZIE: If the Government have to go to Montreal and other ports to examine the accounts of the harbour offices, it is quite clear that considerable time will elapse before we get the return. It will be difficult to get what the hon. member asks, but if it can be got it may be very interesting; but what the hon. member for Gloucester asks can be got immediately.

MR. MACKENZIE.

MR. DALY: But it would not really show the point the hon. member for Gloucester wishes to demonstrate. Unless this addition is made the object of his asking for this correspondence will be futile.

MR. ANGLIN: My object is to ascertain how much more business we are doing than formerly. If this sugar comes into Halifax, is handled by Halifax people, stored for a time in the city, and then transmitted to other parts of the Dominion, it must increase the trade of the Province. I want to know the character and extent of this increase, if there be any. If a vessel comes into Halifax, merely as a port of call, and receives orders to proceed elsewhere, the trade of the city is not increased, although the vessel is a Canadian ship employed in the transportation of sugar. We have reason to believe that as many vessels were employed in that trade formerly as now. I think it would be better if my hon. friend made a separate motion asking for the returns he has referred to.

MR. DALY: I would ask to move the following addition to the motion of the hon. member for Gloucester:

Such return to show also the quantity of sugar conveyed by vessels to the port of Montreal from Halifax and Quebec.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: If the sugar goes from Halifax to Montreal, it may, perhaps, never be landed at Halifax at all. A vessel may arrive at the port, and parties in Montreal may purchase the cargo, and she will proceed direct to that port. The same remarks apply to purchasers in the United States.

MR. DALY: The vessel would have to be entered in Halifax, and the return would show the fact.

MR. CASEY: I should judge that the object of the motion of the hon. member for Gloucester is to ascertain to what extent the commerce of the port of Halifax and the trade of the Intercolonial Railway has been benefitted by the sugar traffic. It certainly would not give a fair idea of this if the return should include cargoes coming to that port and which are merely entered and sent to some other port.

MR. MCLENNAN: There seems to be a slight difference of opinion in regard to the returns desired. The mover wishes to know how little the trade of Halifax has been under the change in the sugar duties, and the hon. member from Halifax wishes to know how much it has been. Since the question is open, I venture to say the House will prefer to have the most full and complete returns. I was not surprised to learn that the hon. member for Gloucester made a mistake as to the value of the shipping trade of Canada, but one would suppose that the gallant knight, who was formerly Minister of Marine, would know that the incidental business of bringing a cargo from the West Indies in a Canadian ship is a matter of some value to us.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: I did not hear all that the hon. gentleman said, but I think he made some reference to myself. His observations seemed to be predicated on the opinion that all sugar taken to the United States is carried in British bottoms. The returns show that a good deal of the trade is done by foreign ships.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

SHIPPEGAN GULLY CHANNEL, GLOUCESTER, N.B.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. ANGLIN, in moving for an Order of the House for copies of all correspondence, reports of engineers, and other papers respecting the completion of the breakwater and the other works for the improvement of the channel at Shippegan Gully, in the county of Gloucester, N.B., said: This is a matter which relates particularly to my own constituency, but it is also of general importance, since the Shippegan channel is very largely used by hundreds of smacks and small vessels employed in the fisheries in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. In years past, I had occasion, more than once, to bring this subject before the House, and perhaps it will be an old story for some hon. members to hear that in this particular district there has been serious losses of life, owing to the condition of the channel and the want of a harbour of refuge. Some years ago I induced the hon. the Minister of Public Works to order a survey of the channel, and it was shown that to carry out the improvements then designed a large expenditure would be necessary. One of the plans would require something like $300,000 to carry out, and another, according to the engineer's estimate, $180,000. But, although the improvement is of so much importance, as many as seventy lives having been lost once owing to the want of sufficient water in the channel, I could scarcely expect the Government to incur such a large expenditure for what was, in most respects, a work of local character. Some years afterwards, however, with the assistance of a gentleman now in the employ of the Department of Public Works, another system of improvements was devised. It was estimated that by the use of what is known as the brush breakwater, an expenditure of $20,000 would effect such a deepening of the channel as would make it in all states of the weather available for the numerous fishing-smacks employed in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. At present there is scarcely a place from Point Miscou to Miramichi, a distance of seventy or eighty miles, to which the smacks can run for safety at low water. There is a place known as Little Shippegan, to which, when the weather is not very bad, vessels can run at high-water; but Shippegan Gully should be so improved as to enable craft to run in at all times of tide. It was intended that this brush breakwater should be run beyond the outer edge of the sand-bank, which obstructs the entrance of the gully. It would be much better to have a double breakwater, one at each side, as this would enable us to get a channel for vessels of considerable burden; but we were moderate in our expectations, and simply asked for what was necessary to enable the fishing-smacks to come in at all times of tide, and all kinds of weather. We thought we had succeeded in securing this when the contractor broke down. Other parties took the work up, but they also broke down, after carrying it forward a short time. Then there unfortunately came a change of Government, and there was a lull in the operations. At the time the contractors stopped there was a sum of about $7,000 of the sum appropriated for the work remaining unexpended. I think that that sum, judiciously expended, would have been enough to carry out the original plan of extending the breakwater beyond the edge of the sand-bank. I am sorry that the hon. Minister saw reason, last year, to absolutely refuse expending the balance of this appropriation for effecting this improvement. He pleaded that there was no money to spare. I shall not stop to complain that while so many millions of dollars are being poured into the North-West, works of importance, like this, in the Lower Provinces are starved; but I think I have a right to complain that money voted for this work has not been expended. The work will cost more now than it would have cost last year. The sand washed into the channel round the end of the breakwater, is already a serious obstacle in the way of the boats, and the passage, as I am informed, is by no means as good as it was last year. I asked the hon. gentleman who now presides over the Department of Public Works to proceed with this work, but I have not received any assurance that it will be done, and nothing was left for me but to come before Parliament and state the case of my constituents and show how important this work is to the fishing interests of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. I do think, and I believe the House would agree with me, though perhaps the majority would vote the other way if forced to a division—appealing to their sense of equity and fair play—that it was harsh treatment indeed that money voted once and again for so important a work as this has not been expended, and that the work has been left in its present condition. I have no personal interest to serve by pushing this work. I presume, if it were undertaken and finished to-morrow, my interference in any way would not be permitted. I presume, if any favour were granted by the Government, it would not be to me or through me, but to those who have always opposed me. But so much do I value this work, so great an importance do I attach to it, so sensible am I of its great need to my constituents, that I sincerely urge on the hon. the Minister of Public Works to make careful enquiry into the merits of this case. If he does, he will satisfy himself of its importance, and be convinced that if it were completed probably very many lives would be saved within the next year or two; because very many have been lost during the last few years for want of such a work. I am sure that, having satisfied himself of the importance of this work, he would not allow any party interest to sway his judgment a single moment, but would feel it his duty to ask for a sum sufficient to complete the work.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I assure the hon. gentleman (Mr. Anglin) that it was from no indisposition to meet his views that I was not able to expend the money he desired for that work. The only expenditure incurred for this work was to put it in such a state as I believed would prevent it from taking harm in the meantime. I was in hopes the efforts I had made to meet the views of the hon. gentleman would have relieved me from his imputation, that I was not disposed to give fair consideration to the claims of this work, in consequence of the source from which the representations came. The hon. gentleman must see from the appropriations brought down by myself last year for public works of this character, that every possible effort was made to restrict them to the lowest possible amount, in the interest of economy, to deal with works under contract, where it was absolutely necessary to go on with an expenditure to prevent previous expenditures from being thrown away. I had no doubt then, nor have I any doubt now, as to the importance of this work, and I should be extremely glad to find that the hon. the Minister of Public Works was able to deal with it in such a way as to satisfy the hon. gentleman. It was simply because the Government found all possible economy necessary that the work has not been completed as the hon. member for Gloucester desired.

MR. LANGEVIN: My hon. friend the Minister of Railways having settled with the hon. member for Gloucester, I need only say there is no objection to his motion. I believe the hon. member for Gloucester might have avoided bringing in the political question by insinuating that it was for party reasons this work was not completed. He might have saved himself that trouble, and allowed the matter to be discussed on its merits. Of course, he finds it very unfortunate that we occupy the Government Benches, but I do not think the country takes that view.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: It does.

MR. LANGEVIN: I think the country is better pleased that each party occupies its present position. If the Government, after further consideration, should discover any absolute necessity for spending money on this work, it will be favourably considered. But, up to the present, the reports have not shown any absolute necessity to proceed with the work this year. Should I get information to the contrary, I will examine the matter free from party spirit, as usual.

MR. ANGLIN: I have no documents or special information to furnish to the hon. the Minister of Public Works, in regard to this work. I might safely refer him to the officer in his Department, who was formerly at the head of a sub-department in St. John, N.B., and who knows something of the importance of this work. If the hon. gentleman cannot, from what he may learn from that officer, and otherwise, make up his mind to recommend the work, I have nothing more to say, than personally to assure him of the importance of this work to several thousands employed in the deep-sea fisheries of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. From personal knowledge I tell him that very many lives have been lost within a few years, because this gully was impassable to vessels at low water. A few thousand dollars, the balance of the appropriation voted by Parliament, would, if wisely expended, be sufficient to complete this work so as to render the passage an open one at all times of the tide for vessels fishing in the St. Lawrence. I do not know that I introduced politics into the question, but I cannot resist the conviction that, if any hon. gentleman on the Ministerial side had as strong a case as this I have presented, the money would, ere this, have been expended on it. So strongly do I believe in the importance of this work; so necessary do I consider it to the large fishing interests of the Gulf, and for the preservation of the lives of the fishermen, that I have felt it my duty to take the present course. I have no other special information, nor other means of carrying conviction to the hon. Minister on this subject, or of touching his heart.

Motion agreed to.

GRAND ANSE BREAKWATER, GLOUCESTER, N.B.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. ANGLIN, in moving for an Order of the House for copies of reports of engineers, correspondence, and other papers respecting the necessity for immediate repair of the breakwater at Grande Anse, county of Gloucester, New Brunswick, damaged by the great storm of last fall, and also respecting the importance of extending that breakwater so as to make the harbour of refuge perfectly safe in all weather, said: This was a harbour constructed on a very dangerous part of the coast of the Bay of Chaleurs. To make it a good harbour, a small expenditure is required; but it seems to be quite hopeless to ask for that at present. During the great storm, accompanied by the tidal wave, which did so much damage in that part of the country last fall, the breakwater was badly shattered. I called on the gentleman in that part of the country who had acted as Inspector of this work during its progress, to make to me a special report on its condition, and the amount of repairs necessary, and that I enclosed in a memorial to the hon. the Minister of Public Works, requesting his attention to the matter, and urging him to take immediate steps for prompt repairs; for if another storm so great should arise, the probability was that the work would be completely destroyed. I do not suppose the repairs would cost a great deal; but repairs are required, and I felt it my duty to call the hon. Minister's attention to the fact. I have received no assurance that the repairs will be made, and, as in the other case, I have nothing left but an appeal to Parliament and the Ministry.

Motion agreed to.

UPPER CANADA LAND IMPROVEMENT FUND.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. HESSON, in moving for an Address for copies of all papers and correspondence between this Government and the Government of Ontario, in reference to an award made under the British North America Act, dated September 3rd, 1870, in so far as said award relates to the Upper Canada Land Improvement Fund; also, a statement showing the amount of such sum under said award, the sum since paid, if any, together with the names of the municipalities to which such sums were paid; also, the sums now due, with the names of the municipalities to which such sums are due, adding interest until January 1st, 1880, said: My attention has been called to this matter on several occasions by the various municipal township councils of the county I represent. It is a matter of very great importance to them. They claim that a large sum of money is due them from this Fund, which was established by the Act of 1853, sec. 14. The description of the fund will be found in the Statutes, in the Act entitled, "An Act respecting School Lands." It will be seen that under the Act 12th Vic., Cap. 200, 1,000,000 acres waste lands of the Crown were set apart and held at $2.50 an acre, while the other Crown Lands were held at $2 an acre. A demand was made on the Government of that day for a more liberal land policy. The settlement of the townships was very materially retarded by the miserable state of the roads, and it appears the Government were advised to enact a more liberal policy in connection with those lands, and in consequence the Government, on the recommendation of Mr. Rolph, then Commissioner of Crown Lands, did so, fixing the price at $2 an acre for School Lands, and that of the Crown Lands at $1.50, and setting apart one-fourth of the proceeds of the sales of the Public School Lands and one-fifth of the Crown Lands for what is now known as the land "Improvement Fund," to be appropriated to the making of roads and bridges and such works. In consequence of the new regulations, a very large increase of the population took place in a few years, a large amount of the wild lands being taken up. On March 6th, 1861, by an Order in Council, this Improvement Fund was cancelled, but the municipalities interested claimed that all the moneys accruing from the sales, from the date of the establishment of the Fund, in 1853, and up to the period of cancellation, should be appropriated to the purposes mentioned in the Act. The inhabitants of the counties of Perth, Huron and Bruce, very properly claim the Government should carry out its promises, promises on which they were induced to enter the then wilderness. These counties have expended very large sums for the purpose of improvements, at their own cost and entailing heavy liabilities, which would have been avoided had the Fund been paid over from time to time, as promised to the townships. They now claim the money should be refunded them. I, as representing North Perth, think this should be done as early as possible. I am aware great difficulties have arisen through the lapse of time, and from other causes; but, nevertheless, I trust hon. Ministers will be able to devote some attention to it during the recess, and that a just settlement will be arrived at. The matter was brought before the Ontario Legislature recently, when the responsibility for the delay was partially thrown on this House. I hope there will be complaints on that score no longer. No less than $124,685 is claimed as having been received by the Government from the sales of School Lands, from 1853 to 1861, and from the sale of Crown Lands, $101,771.86, making a total of $226,456.86, one-quarter of which is claimed by the municipalities interested in those lands, on the School, and one-fifth on the Crown Lands. In North Perth, the townships of Elma and Wallace claim that large sums are due them, the figures for which are now in my hands. Whether the amount is correct or not I cannot say; but I trust the Government will see to some action being taken whereby this matter will be settled as early as possible, and justice done to the municipalities.

MR. FARROW: I am glad the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) has brought this matter up. It much concerns several counties and a great many townships, and especially the northern part of the county of Huron. I remember well that when I went into that county, twenty-five years ago, it was a wilderness. The price of the land was $2.50 an acre for the School Lands and $2 for the Crown Lands. It then required a good, stout-hearted man to take his axe and go into the backwoods, where the wolf was howling and the bears were prowling about. The hardships were very great, and there were no roads; it was thought, and justly too, that the price charged by the Government for the land was too high. Upon these representations to the Government, a reduction was made in the shape of a fund called the Land Improvement Fund, by which one-fifth of the proceeds of such land should be paid back to the municipalities for improvements thereon. The municipalities got this money up to 1861. From that date to 1867, the Government paid no money to the municipalities out of this Fund, and the money has remained in the hands of the Government. I am sorry that our friends opposite did not settle this matter when they were in power. The Privy Council confirmed the decision of the Arbitrators between Ontario and Quebec, when they were in power, and I think they ought to have taken it up and given the municipalities their just share. I suppose they were so busy in the elections that they could not attend to it, and I suppose our friends on this side were so busy last year about this National Policy that they could not take it up. I hope they will lose no more time in setting the matter right. The money is the peoples, and they want the Government to pay it over to them. The municipalities paid this money into the Treasury, and those hard-working sons of toil ought not to be kept out of it any longer. The Government was to collect this money for 6 per cent., but it has actually charged 20 per cent. for collecting it. They ought to pay over forthwith the money and the 20 per cent. in addition that they have taken for collecting.

WASSALL'S BRIDGE PATENT.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. LONGLEY, in moving for an Order of the House for copies of petitions, papers and correspondence relating to the claim of Mr. Wassall, for use by the Government of his bridge patent, said: With reference to this Order, I may say that Mr. Wassall is a Civil Engineer, who resides in the town of Digby, Nova Scotia. He is a gentleman who has attained eminence in his profession. Some years ago he invented a patent for the construction of bridges out of old iron rails. He makes complaint that the Government has been using this patent while refusing to reimburse him for it. Mr. Wassall has forwarded to the Governor-General, a petition setting forth his complaints, and I have asked for the correspondence with the view of moving at the proper time that the whole correspondence be referred to the hon. the Minister of Railways, who, I presume, will have to deal with the matter in the end.

NOVA SCOTIA—GEOLOGICAL SURVEY IN QUEEN'S AND LUNENBURG.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne), in moving for an Order of the House for a copy of all correspondence with the Department of the Interior, asking for a geological survey of the counties of Shelburne, Queen's and Lunenburg, in Nova Scotia, and replies thereto, said: I trust the hon. the Minister of the Interior will see fit during the present season to authorise some officer of the Geological Survey to visit the counties mentioned in this resolution. Nearly every season the eastern counties of the Province of Nova Scotia have been visited by some one connected with the Survey, while the counties which lie to the westward of Halifax have never been reported upon by that Department. During the past year extensive discoveries have been made of the existence of gold and silver in the counties of Lunenburg, Queen's and Shelburne. On the borders of Lunenburg large quantities of iron ore are to be found. If persons who are seeking for mines and minerals have the assistance of official geological reports on those sections of that Province, I think valuable discoveries will be made.

MR. KAULBACH: With respect to this motion I would urge the Government to give a satisfactory answer to the request made by the hon. members for Queen's, Shelburne and Lunenburg last year. I claim that the county I have the honour to represent is very rich in mineral deposits. Several discoveries have been made during the past few years, one of copper, in the northern part of my county, which is said to be very rich, and another, in the western part, which is supposed to be equally so. I have no doubt that many other rich deposits will open up shortly, and so facilitate this very important object, and open up this county, which, I believe, is second to none in mineral wealth in Nova Scotia. I would urge that a geological survey be made at an early date, and would suggest, that as my name appears first in the letter of request to the hon. the Minister of the Interior, and Lunenburg county, the more important one of the three, that it be surveyed and reported upon first.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURTS.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

MR. KEELER in moving for an Address for a statement in detail, showing the date and duration of each sitting, respectively, of the Supreme and Exchequer Court, since 1875, said: In making this motion for the purpose of obtaining further information with respect to this interesting body, I cannot help thinking that some of my hon. friends who spoke on the Bill I introduced for the abolition of the Supreme Court, were not possessed of the information they should have had, and for that reason I make this motion. I have not had much success in obtaining information of this character before, having made several attempts to get similar information, which, so far, have not borne fruit. On one occasion, last Session, I made a motion, which was passed by the House, and a return was ordered, which has not yet been brought down. I have done the same thing this Session; I think I introduced a motion on the very first day of the Session. I am sorry to say that up to this time, I have had no better success. I hope it will turn out that the Supreme Court is not beyond or above furnishing such information; I hope it is not higher than this High Court of Parliament.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): There is no objection to the motion passing. I would say to my hon. friend that I regret the information has not been furnished him earlier. On more than one occasion word was sent to the Registrar of the Supreme Court, requesting the information to be forwarded, but it has not been received. I will take care that it shall be furnished at as early a date as possible.

BEAUHARNOIS CANAL PAYMASTER.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

MR. BERGERON, in moving for an Order of the House, for a copy of all papers and documents respecting the appointment of Mr. Thomas Brossoit as late Collector of Tolls and Paymaster of the Beauharnois Canal; and also, copies of all reports and accounts made and furnished by him to the Inland Revenue Department and Public Works Department, while employed as above mentioned, said: I make this motion simply to be able to reply to the strictures of hon gentlemen of the Opposition in regard to the dismissals of which they were talking some days ago. When Mr. Brossoit was appointed Collector on the Beauharnois Canal, the hon. gentlemen on the Left, who were then in power, superannuated a gentleman who could well perform his duties, but who was a Conservative. Mr. Brossoit, at the time of his appointment, was practicing advocate, in the town of Beauharnois, and continued so to be. Fortunately, Mr. Brossoit himself came to the conclusion that he could not satisfactorily perform the functions of his office while practicing as advocate, and he resigned his position.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—DOMINION SAVINGS BANKS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. DECOSMOS, in moving for an Order of the House for a return showing the names of depositors in the Dominion Savings' Banks, Victoria, Nanaimo and New Westminster, in British Columbia, with the respective deposits over $1,000, held on June 30th, 1879, and stating the rate of interest allowed on said deposits, said: I have no wish to make this return inquisitorial. I have no personal desire to find out the names of depositors, or the respective amounts to their credit; but I know of no other way of getting at the policy of the Government respecting Savings' Banks. It will be found that the returns of Dominion Savings' Banks in British Columbia show that the deposits have been, in Victoria, $960,306; in Nanaimo, $1,040; in New Westminster, $112,056, making a total of $1,179,402, on which the Government pays from 4 to 5 per cent. interest. I find that in the city of Toronto the total sum of money on deposit in the Savings Banks, at the end of the last financial year, was $227,267. There seems here to be a great disproportion between Toronto and Victoria, taking into consideration the relative populations of the cities of Toronto and Victoria. In the city of St. John, the total amount deposited was $963,366; total New Brunswick, $1,705,781. Halifax, $1,473,695; total for Nova Scotia, $2,499,406—British Columbia having in the Savings' Banks nearly one-half as much as the Province of Nova Scotia. My opinion of Savings' Banks may be different from that held by the Government. My opinion is that these institutions are created with the object of making the working classes more provident, of laying something by and of drawing interest on it until such time as they can use it to better advantage. It seems to me that in the city of Victoria large sums of money are deposited by capitalists who draw from 4 to 5 per cent. interest. These large sums of money are kept out of circulation, and operate against the prosperity of the country. To carry out the idea of making a Savings' Bank a provident institution, no larger sum than $1,000 should be allowed to be deposited by any single individual. In these times of great want of faith in banks, I see no objection to the Government taking charge of the money, but it appears to me that instead of the Government paying interest on money deposited by capitalists, they should charge a percentage for taking care of it. The hon. the Minister of Finance will no doubt give the House an explanation of the Government policy in regard to the Savings' Banks of British Columbia and elsewhere.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I think there is a serious objection to giving the names of the parties, but there is no objection to furnishing the information asked for. The policy of the Government has been to receive money at 4 per cent. in larger sums than $100. But if they deposited it on three months' call they obtained 5 per cent. It has been a question with the Government whether it is desirable to continue that arrangement, because at the present time the Government can obtain money on better terms than 5 per cent., and at present the Government is considering whether money should be taken for more than 4 per cent. There can be no objection to furnishing the information the hon. gentleman requires, giving the number of persons who have deposits of over $1,000.

MR. DECOSMOS: Is the Government prepared to take any amount of money over $1,000?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Sums of

$5,000 or $10,000 have been received, and in some cases larger amounts have been taken, but I think it is left generally to the discretion of the officers, who generally refuse to receive large sums for a short period.

MR. BUNSTER: I am considerably interested in this notice, inasmuch as the hon. gentleman has mentioned the city of Nanaimo, which I have the honour to represent. Both the late Ministry and the present Ministry have done a great injustice to that city. I want to draw the attention of the Government to one of the most important and flourishing cities on the Pacific coast, and to the importance of building in that city a Savings' Bank, a Post-office, and a Custom-house. It is one of the most villified cities in the Dominion, but with the assurance from the hon. the Minister of Justice that justice will be done to the city, I will leave the matter in his hands.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Every justice will be done the city of Nanaimo.

PRIVATE BILLS.

SECOND READING.

(Mr. Girouard, Jacques Cartier.)

RECONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

Order for the consideration of the said Bill, as amended by Committee of the Whole, read.

MR. JONES: I am very sorry to say that I am obliged from a conscientious point of view to oppose this Bill. I think from what has appeared in the press, and from the petitions laid before the House against the Bill—there is scarcely a petition in favour of it—I think that it should not be pressed to a conclusion. I am of opinion that this measure has been brought forward for the furtherance of some private interest, although I do not know what the interest may be. It has been forced upon this House, and I do not see why, without any call for it—without any petition for it—we should initiate a Bill of this kind. Such legislation has always been refused in the Mother Country, and when the measure comes up for a third reading I shall move an amendment to it.

MR. STRANGE: The Bill now before the House is one that ought to receive a most careful and thorough consideration. The social principle of the Bill has been recognised in Canada for years, and I believe that the voice of the people, when the Bill was introduced, was largely in favour of these marriages. I wish, as an humble member of the Church of England, to state the reasons why I differ from the Bishops of my Church in the position they have taken on the subject. One of the principle reasons, I believe, assigned in these petitions for opposing this Bill is a passage of Mosaic law. As I read it, however, so far from such marriages being prohibitory they are enjoined on the Israelites, and, so far as the Mosaic law applies to us, I think it is equally applicable at the present day. In some instances also the Mosaic law renders it imperative that a brother shall take the widow of his deceased brother to wife. I am of opinion that as far the Mosaic law is concerned there is no objection to the Bill. Another objection to the Bill is that an injustice would be done to the sisters who would take charge of the households of their deceased sisters. I believe that instead of an injustice being done in this regard, that it would place them in their proper position. When we find men in this country occupying high positions, both in the ecclesiastical and civil worlds, marrying their deceased wife's sisters and feeling no conscientious scruples thereat, I think it is a very strong argument in favour of this measure. I remember that only a few years ago the President of the Wesleyan Conference of this country married his deceased wife's sister. The act was regarded as a laudable one, and the lady was received into the best society. I am aware that there is a great objection in England to the principle of this Bill, but I believe that is more an objection of prejudice than of common sense. I cannot conceive that any woman would make a better step-mother than the sister of a deceased wife. It seems to me that no woman is better adapted to act as a mother to a man's children after his wife's death than his deceased wife's sister. I think the principle embodied in this Bill is a laudable one, although I am aware that there is a certain amount of objection to it in the Church to which I belong. Still, I can see nothing to prohibit such marriages, and I hope eventually to see in every country, as well as in Canada, that the principle of this Bill will be allowed. I shall therefore have much pleasure in voting for the Bill.

MR. SPROULE: I cannot see any objection to this Bill. In looking over various passages of Scripture, said to apply to it, there does not appear to be anything in them binding or compulsory, and the only passage at all bearing on it is the 18th chapter of Leviticus, 18th verse, but even that does not bear against this Bill. It bears on the marriage of a wife's sister whilst the wife herself is living. Greek and Hebrew scholars, who have taken the trouble to investigate the subject, all seem to agree that the passage has reference only to marriage in the lifetime of the wife. The great opposition comes from the Episcopal Church, or Church of England; but I believe there is a diversity of opinion between the Church of England ministers on this question; and, further, in the House of Commons, they have passed such a Bill, but it has been rejected by the House of Lords. The reason why it was rejected in the House of Lords is easily understood; it is not because there are real objections. It is simply due to the fact that the House of Lords is composed partly of Bishops, and thus by their influence the Bill is successfully opposed there. We believe that there is as much intelligence and as strong a desire among the members of the House of Commons to do justice to this question as in the House of Lords. Well, one party says it is right, and the other invariably says it is wrong. If the members of Parliament, in the Commons, are almost universally in favour of the principle, as I am persuaded they are, and believe there is nothing wrong in it, then why should we not pass the Bill? I think the day has come when we should regard the marriage law as a civil contract, to be dealt with by the civil law, and not to be controlled by ecclesiastical law at all.

MR. HOUE moved :

That the Bill be again recommitted to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to strike out, in Clause 2, the following words:—"but nothing herein contained shall affect any rights actually acquired by the issue of the first marriage previous to the passing of this Act; nor shall this section render legal any such marriage when either of the parties has afterwards, during the life of the other, and before the passing of this Act, lawfully intermarried with any other person."

MR. GIROUARD: I do not see any objection to this motion for amendment. I really believe these words are not necessary:—

"But nothing herein contained shall affect any rights actually acquired by the issue of the first marriage previous to the passing of this Act."

I think the subject matter of this enactment properly belongs to the Local Legislature. As to the last part of the paragraph, it seems to me that it is sufficiently covered by the first part of the clause. I had some conversation with some hon. members, who are not now present, and it was considered best to strike out these words.

MR. JONES: I would ask if this is not retroactive.

MR. GIROUARD: The clause, as amended, only renders legal those marriages in which the parties are now living together as husband and wife.

Amendment (Mr. Houde) agreed to on a division.

House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole.

(In the Committee.)

Bill, as amended, ordered to be reported.
House resumed.

(In the House.)

Bill reported.

MR. LANGEVIN: I would ask the hon. gentleman who has charge of the Bill to allow this report to stand over a few days more, because we may concur in the report on the day when it comes up again, and let the Bill go to a third reading.

MR. GIROUARD agreed to the suggestion.

MORTGAGE REGULATION BILL.

[BILL 11.]

SECOND READING.

(Mr. Orton.)

Order for second reading read.

MR. ORTON: The object of this Bill is to reduce the rate of interest on real estate. It is well known that perhaps 70 per cent. of the real estate of this country is encumbered by heavy mortgages. From the Income-tax returns in England we ascertain that no less than \$500,000,000 is lent out by British capitalists. After deducting what is borrowed by the Dominion Government, the Local Governments and the different Municipalities, there is still a very large margin which cannot be accounted for otherwise than by the conclusion that a vast amount of British capital is invested in loans to private individuals in Canada, which must be a drain on the resources of Canada. The object of the Bill is not only to try to stem that drain, but to do justice to the people of this country who are paying large amounts of interest to capitalists in Europe. In fact, Sir, we all know that the operation of loan societies have been of so injurious a character, that it is a wonder the people of Canada have submitted so long to the injustice done, in consequence of the grasping tendencies of the monied men, and especially the loan societies of this country. The effect of all this is a large drainage on the industrial classes, in the shape of exorbitant interest, which has a damaging effect on the welfare of the people. It is not only the means of preventing agriculturists, but manufacturers, and those engaged in the development of the mineral and other natural resources of the country, from reaping the full results of their labour. The interest charged varies from $7\frac{1}{2}$ to 14 per cent., and I think we might take it as an average that on the money lent to farmers of this country the rate of interest is $9\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Agriculture cannot be pursued profitably or give a good return for the capital invested at this high rate. It is impossible for the farmers of this country, especially the older Provinces, to get a good return with a burden of that kind; they must be serious losers. The great bulk of them are simply tenants of the loaners of the money; and these loaners are not residents in Canada, but they are residents of a foreign country. Our farmers are tenants of money lenders living in a foreign country. I think now is the time to speak, while the the country is young—in the early part of the country's history—before money has obtained too much power over this country as it has in other countries. The power which money sways is one which the masses of the people should defend themselves against. I venture to say that these money-lenders do not count more than one in a thousand. Is the Government of this country, then, going to allow legislation to bear in the interest of one out of a thousand, in favour of the few as against the many, in favour of 4,000 out of the 4,000,000 of our people? I wish to show somewhat in detail how the people, and especially the agriculturists, have suffered from the operations of these companies. I will ask the House to listen to some instances of injustice that have befallen the hard-working classes who have been compelled to have dealings with the money-loaners. I will read an extract from a letter, which shows in as strong a light as possible how unjust the system is:

“In view of the Bill introduced by you, respecting interest, I take the liberty of giving you an instance of the operation of loan companies, which has recently come under my notice as Master in Chancery. A bill for foreclosure is filed against A; and subsequent encumbrancers being called on to prove their claims, a certain loan company proved under two mortgages, in similar terms, on different properties. The company, for example, lent to A say \$2,000, professedly at 6 per cent., for ten years, being \$120 per annum, or for the whole term, \$1,200; the mortgage was taken in 1878 for \$3,200, payable in yearly instalments of \$320, with 12 per cent. fine on overdue payments. The borrower, I suppose, never calculated what he was paying, namely about $10\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and with fines, etc., $11\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. But the point in the case is that the prior mortgagee, having filed his bill, compels the mortgagor to pay off all the encumbrances on the property, and the loan company, by the rules of their company, which form part of the mortgage, get nine years unearned interest discounted at 6 per cent., or in effect he pays \$1,200 discounted at 6 per cent. for the use of \$1,200 for one year. This is a crying shame upon the legislation of our country. The loan companies are eating up the vitals of the yeomanry of the country. There ought to be a proviso in such mortgages, that if a prior mortgagee forces payment, the interest on the mortgage should cease. If I have not made the above explicit enough, I shall be happy to afford you more detailed information.”

This shows that the borrower is not only obliged to pay the amount of interest that appears on the face of the mortgage—6 per cent. payable annually in instalments, which really brings it up to $11\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.—but if there happens to be a previous mortgage he is obliged to pay a much more exorbitant amount of interest than he contracted to do. They have the power to call upon the mortgagor to pay, not the simple amount of the principal with the amount of interest which he has actually agreed to pay, but an amount of 15 per cent. in many instances. I will read one or two other extracts in support of this proposition:

“MOOREFIELD, March 9th, 1880.

“George T. Orton, Esq., M.P., Ottawa.

“DEAR SIR,—I see by the papers that you have introduced a Bill to regulate the rate of interest in Canada; should you be able to carry your Bill through the House this Session, you will confer a great boon on the people of this Dominion. I am sure it will be the most popular Bill with the greatest number of people in this Dominion that has come before the House for many years; in fact it will be only second to the National Policy, if not its peer.

“Should you not succeed this Session, it will be sure to pass next year; most likely it will be made a Government measure next Session.

“Our country is spotted over with usurious corporations, like so many plague-spots or gnawing cancers, eating the vitality of the Dominion. Nearly every village and town in the land has one or more self-styled bankers, who act like so many hungry leeches, sucking the life-blood of our farmers, and any others whom they can fasten their fangs on. These festering sores are spreading over the country very fast, and if not stayed by some such remedy as you propose the country will be utterly ruined.

“I will give you an idea of how some of those corporations do business with farmers and others.

“I saw an advertisement in the papers of money to loan at 6 per cent., by an agent of the Provincial Permanent Building and Savings Society, Toronto. I enquired of the agent, who lived in Fergus, and was told by him that I could get all I wanted at that rate by giving good security. I made application, and it was accepted, everything enquired into and papers made out all right, as I thought, and I signed them without reading them over; but when I got a statement, I saw what the whole thing was, but too late. Instead of 6 per cent. I was paying 12 per cent. or over, counting insurance policy, interests and fines, and lawyers' fees. The loan was $2,000, payable in twenty years, twenty instalments of $222.40 each year, paying principal and interest in that time. After seven years I wanted to sell. I wrote for a statement to know what I would have to pay to lift the mortgage. The statement called for something more than $2,300—all that amount, after paying seven payments amounting to $1,556.80, not including insurance policy, of double the amount of some other companies' lawyers' fees and fines, which would amount to close on $200 more. Money at such a price is ruinous, sapping the foundation of our agricultural industries, and sending thousands of the hardy pioneers to seek a home under a foreign flag; or move to the inhospitable regions of the North-West, and leave the homes they have laboured so hard and so much to hew out here for themselves and families.

“I will just add up what I have had to pay for the use of $2,000 for the space of a little over six years:

Seven instalments, $222.40	$1,566 80
Fines, insurance policies and lawyers' fees, say	200 00
Balance to take up mortgage at end of seven years	2,300 00

“You will see by the above what these licensed robbers will do; this is only one instance out of thousands of cases all over the country. I could mention another case, of a private individual in Elora, fully as bad as the above, but I will leave it for another time.

“The foregoing are facts that cannot be disputed, as they can all be proved.

“I am real glad you have taken it in hand, and sincerely hope you may succeed in your worthy undertaking; try and make it retrospective.

“Many people say, and truly, ‘you are the best friend the farmer has in the House.’

“Believe me,

“JOHN D. JOHNSON.”

This gentleman occupied the position of Reeve in a township in my own county, and I will guarantee that he is correct in every statement that he makes. I will read another letter, from a gentleman who was also Reeve of another large township in the west, and opposed to me politically:

“GARA, March 3rd, 1880.

“G. T. Orton, M.P.

“DEAR SIR,—Your letter, accompanied by copy of Bill, received. I need not say that I am in harmony with you in the matter, and am of the opinion that it will be the means of calling forth more expressions of approval, irrespective of party, than any former public measure you have had the honour of promoting. There are so many of the people, Grits and Tories alike, that have felt, through their public souls—their pockets—the evil effects that your Bill is calculated to relieve, that self-interest—the most potent public motor—will incline them toward it. From the common classes of men, the almost universal expression that I have heard is in accord with its provisions. Walter Green borrowed $2,000, payable by twenty instalments, one a year, for twenty years. He paid, for four years, $220 per year, making $880, and then desired to have the mortgage discharged; but they—the Trust and Loan Company—would not, unless he would pay $2,385 cash to do it. Edmond Smith borrowed $2,000 for ten years, repaying $320 a year. He paid four years—$1,280 of the $2,000—yet, to get a discharge he gave $1,700, nearly 25 per cent., for the $2,000, $980, besides expenses, for the use of less by considerable than the $2,000 for the four years. I regret that I had not longer time to give particular instances. Men who borrow are, as a rule, somewhat reticent about their loss. Widow Alexander paid 1 per cent. per month on unpaid payments, interest being added each month, beside over 12 per cent. on the principal; in other words, it was 12 per cent. on principal, and the same on part of same principal, with interest added, compounded monthly. Had I been on the alert a few weeks ago, we could have presented a sad catalogue of wrongs. But we doubt not that every member of the House is more or less acquainted with the grinding and deceptive practices of loan companies, if they are not too weak in the back to brace up against the money power that has to be met in this matter. Though you may not secure the passage of your Bill, yet remember that many great and beneficial reforms have fought their way up hill against powerful odds, and finally triumphed over oppression and wrong. God knows, I do not intend you to apply this to our municipal affairs in Gara at present. Right does not triumph yet in Gara. Public donations thankfully received and gratefully acknowledged by

"Yours faithfully,

"J. JEFF DOBBIE."

I might read a number of letters of the same kind, but I think I have given the House sufficient evidence to prove the extortionate practices of the company. Is it just, in view of all the circumstances, that loan societies should have the power and privilege of exacting 1 per cent. a month from borrowers who are behind in their payments. What a howl there would be, if doctors, lawyers, store-keepers, and others, were empowered to exact 1 per cent. a month from customers who did not pay their bills when due. I call upon hon. members and upon the Ministry, who possess the confidence of the people in such a marked degree, to rise in their might and destroy those unjust privileges. We find that the companies are making great headway in the North-West. The labour of the men, who go to open that country, is seized by the money-lenders. In Winnipeg, their agents can be numbered by the score, and there are many building societies in Ontario which have given up their legitimate business to traffic in this profitable pursuit in Manitoba. We find them in every village and town of this country pursuing their illicit traffic, and destroying the happiness, peace and prosperity of the people of this country. I wish to show to the House that I am not speaking my own mind simply, or talking for popular applause. It matters not to me whether the Bill is popular or not. I have been accused of advocating it for cheap popularity. I do not come here for popularity, but to benefit those I represent, and whether the Bill pleases or displeases the Government I usually support, I shall endeavour to do my duty in regard to this point for the interest of my constituents and the country. I can show I am backed up, not only by influential individuals, but by corporations. I have here resolutions passed by the corporation of the township of Arthur:

"The Corporation of the Township of Arthur.

"Copy of resolution passed by the Municipal Council of the Township of Arthur, on the 6th day of March, A.D. 1880.

"Moved by Mr. Allen, seconded by Mr. Gilmore, That the Bill to regulate the rate of interest on loans of money on real estate or otherwise, is considered by this Council a step in the right direction.—Carried.

ROBERT GORDON,

Reeve.

I have resolutions from the township of Garafraxa and the village of Fergus in similar terms. It is not necessary to add to the proofs I have given that the people demand the redress of their great wrongs in this respect. I hope the House will give this matter its most serious attention. The Bill further proposes to do away with the ordinary transactions of the agents of loan societies, who, it is well known, perpetrate the grossest frauds. Only the other day, in my county, the advertised agent of a loan society, occupying a high position in the community, undertook to obtain a loan for a farmer, and drew the money, which he was allowed to keep for the moment. He afterwards failed, the farmer losing the money entirely, and having no recourse against the loan society. The farmer's farm was thus mortgaged for a very large sum, for which he got no benefit. The Bill proposes to prevent the agent of any loan society or lender of money from being agent of both borrower and lender. Agents sometimes extort large sums from farmers, who do not know where else they might obtain money wanted. Many arguments are used against regulating or fixing the rate of interest; one is, it would drive money out of the country. This country ought to be able to provide all the money wanted in it—all our people require. We have got what many countries with a larger accumulated capital want—an unlimited amount of the best land in the world, and we ought to have the facilities for providing our people with all the money they need at moderate interest, in order to develop our resources. Therefore, I think that the expulsion of foreign capital would not be a great injury to our people. As to the argument that capitalists would not lend money at this rate, I reply that, if not, they would probably employ it in some other way; they would be obliged to look for their higher interest in developing the internal resources of the country in one way or another—in promoting its manufactures, and in other modes calculated to increase its wealth and prosperity. It is said that money should be as free as any other commodity; and it is asked, why should not its owners get as much for it as they can? My answer is, that we have not all got money, its possessors being very few, not more than one in a thousand, and we are bound to legislate in the interest of the larger class, the great bulk of the people. The Bill aims at abolishing another wrong. Our country store-keepers give unlimited credit to the owners of good farms, men supposed to be well off; up to a certain point they will give any amount of credit, always taking care at the end of six months to add 10 per cent. to the farmer's running account, sometimes 12 per cent. This may continue for years, the debtor getting every facility to buy more goods; but when the store-keeper imagines his customer has got all the credit he can bear he insists on getting a mortgage on his farm for the goods bought at prices considerably over cash rates, which, if not paid in time, is weighted with compound interest of 10 and 12 per cent. every six months. The Bill proposes that no mortgage on real estate shall be valid where any part of the debt shall consist of interest over 7 per cent. Now, our farmers, when crops fail, are often obliged to borrow small sums of $100, $150 or $200. They pay often to the numerous private banks, which advance only when the borrowers are perfectly secure, 12 per cent. I have known many farmers pay 40 to 80 per cent. for loans on short time. The farmer, unable to pay, has his debt doubled or trebled by interest in a few years, and is obliged to give a mortgage, with the usual fatal result. The Bill would abolish that wrong. The lenders of money enjoy another great privilege they have no right to—they pay no taxes whatever. If the rate of interest was fixed, means could be employed by which they would be obliged to pay their legitimate share. Money-lenders grind the money out of the people into their pockets without steam, water power or electricity, or being subjected to the influences of climate or weather; they secure their money from the industrial classes, without any care or responsibility or risk. I think they are the last class that ought to have those special privileges which they now enjoy. We know what the accumulating power of money is, and that it enslaves men in the process. The accumulators, sometimes, claim to be charitable men, living in large mansions, built through wrong and injustice done to thousands of their countrymen. They sit in their fine buildings and glory over the great good they do their fellow-citizens; professing, in the reports of loan societies, to furnish the means of developing the resources of the country, and to be its redeemers. They feel happy because their pockets are full; but if they saw the misery, hardship and trouble they cause, they would experience serious thoughts, and honestly form different views. There is no single cause, why men leave our shores and go to the Republic, more patent than the charging of those exorbitant rates of interest. None get fair play but those who have money to loan. Men who have worked forty or fifty years hewing out homes in the backwoods, and beautifying the country, and building up happy homesteads, have to hand them and their chattles over to grasping money-lenders. No wonder such men leave the country, hoping never to see it again. Another clause deserving attention is, that requiring returns to be made to Parliament, through the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, of all moneys loaned by societies, specifying the foreign and domestic capital. The absence of means of ascertaining the amount loaned on real estate is a great want. Such returns would afford the best index or gauge, better than the imports or exports, of the prosperity of the country. I hope the House will take this question into consideration, and, at any rate, allow the Bill a second reading, so that it may be discussed in the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

MR. PLATT: I think the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) feels a little sore on this matter. It appears to me he has borrowed money in Toronto, and has not kept his word or made his payments, and suffered the consequences, and hence feels sore. The borrower sees matters differently from the lender as a matter of course. I remember, twenty years ago, when the Usury Law was in existence, lenders were not allowed more than 6 per cent., but money was worth, in reality 12, 15, 20 and 25 per cent.; you cannot make a law on this subject that people will not take advantage of. It is better to leave money alone; like flour or wheat, it will bring no more than it is worth. You can now get money in Toronto at 7 per cent., but if you interfere with money, you will drive it out of the country.

MR. ORTON: I wish to state that the statement is not correct.

MR. PLATT: I had the proof from the city I belong to.

MR. ORTON: We can get any amount of money in Montreal or Toronto for 6 or 7 per cent. by giving good security. A large amount of capital is coming into the country from England at the present time, and people are beginning to have the advantage of getting cheap money. If we pass usury laws we will find that money will leave the country.

MR. MILLS: This does not seem to me to deal with the subject of usury at all. When that subject comes before the House we may fairly consider it upon its merits. This is a Bill rather to regulate encumbrances upon real estate, a matter that, in everything except the subject of interest, is beyond the jurisdiction of this Parliament. The hon. gentleman undertakes to say now how real estate shall be held, under what circumstances encumbrances upon it shall be valid, and in what cases they shall be void. He undertakes to say how procedure shall be taken in certain civil cases, to give directions to the Registrar of a county in the discharge of his duties, and also to regulate the subject of agency. He provides that an agent who receives over $5 shall be subject to a fine. It seems to me this whole subject lies beyond the purview of this Parliament. We have nothing to do here with the subject of real estate in the Provinces, though we may deal with the subject of interest. We may say what the rate of interest shall be, but we have no right to say how parties may deal with real estate, or what sum agents may receive in the discharge of their duties. I do not think, therefore, the Government would be justified in allowing a Bill of this kind to go to a second reading, a measure that, in all its main features, is wholly beyond the powers of this Parliament.

MR. SPROULE: I feel that the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) is doing an act of justice to a large class in his community by introducing this Bill. Whether we have the power here of regulating interest on money that may be invested in mortgages upon real estate, is a question that I am not acquainted with. But one thing I do know, that if we have a right to regulate interest on money loaned by banks, it seems strange that this Parliament has not the right to regulate the interest on money in other investments. Now, I think that of all loans, mortgages on farms afford the best security for the investment of money. The rules of loaning societies do not allow agents loaning money on farms to loan for more than one-third, or at the outside, one-half the value of the farm. As a consequence, there is a large margin to work upon, and so people look upon investments in mortgages on farms as the best kind of security. Then there are outstanding accounts that, perhaps, have to be rendered every year, and on that class of accounts you can only collect 6 per cent. if they are collected by distraint. If a bank loans you money, it is not allowed by law to charge more than 7 per cent. Its security is not so good as a mortgage, because a bank loans money on almost every kind of security. Then when we come back to the best kind of security, we have a margin to work upon that is larger than any of the others. Again, if we look at the profits that must accrue from banks, it is another argument strongly in favour of lowering the percentage of money in those investments. If a farmer buys a farm, and tries to borrow money on it, he finds he is not able to pay more than 5 or 6 per cent. on the money he pays for it. If he tries to rent his farm, he finds that he can only obtain 4 or 5 or 6 per cent. on its value. If money invested in a farm will only realise that amount when you come to rent it, how is it that a man is able to pay 10, 12, and sometimes 15 per cent. for money that has been loaned to him on that farm? The history of these transactions generally seems to be the same. A man goes into a new country and buys a farm for $1.50 an acre. He pays the Government interest at the rate of 6 per cent. on the money. After he has cleared up a little land, perhaps an agent of some loan society comes to him and tries to induce him to borrow money on his farm. The agent offers him all the money he wants at a low rate of interest, and induces him to borrow not only enough to pay the land, but enough to build a barn, or a house, or to buy stock. Very few men of his class calculate the amount of interest they would have to pay for the money thus borrowed, nor understand what it will cost to pay that mortgage on the farm. With a little care and economy he could get along without borrowing. But these agents are distributed so thickly through the country, that it is to their interest to persuade the farmers to borrow money of them. The man borrows money at, say 6 per cent. interest, and pays off the indebtedness of his farm. He pays one or two payments. The mortgage is made usually so that he pays that money back in several equal annual instalments. He makes, perhaps, three or four payments, has a succession of bad crops, and is unable to raise enough money to keep up the payments. He falls behind, there is a fine imposed upon him, and he finds he has got to sell his farm or re-mortgage it again, if it is worth enough so that he can raise any more money on it. He goes through the same transaction again by force of circumstances, and is compelled to accept that company that offers money on the most advantageous terms. He struggles on year after year, and perhaps, if he is fortunate, he manages to sell his farm. If he makes a calculation of the amount he is still owing, strange to say, he finds that it is nearly as much money as he borrowed in the first place, after all the money he has paid in interest. He is therefore compelled to sell, and go back to the old trade of a hewer of wood and drawer of water. There are various ways of investing money. We can invest it in mortgages or in manufacturing establishments, or in a hundred other ways that will yield fair remuneration. In looking over the returns of the different banks, I find that their stock is quoted at 153 and upwards, while of the loaning societies the stock of the Canada Permanent is quoted at 184½; the Western Canada, 153; the Union, 134; and the Canada Loaning Society, 136. Now, if the banks are restricted to 7 per cent., and their business yields a profit with economical management, and still their stocks stand so much lower than those of loaning companies, I think we ought not to allow these latter to have more latitude in their investments than the banks. I think it is essentially necessary, in the interest of a large class in this country, that we should pass some stringent law to regulate the interest on investments of that kind, and to make rules so plain that farmers may understand what they are doing with their money. I claim that to-day they do not understand the principle in borrowing money from these societies. You cannot find two men in this country who can calculate the rate of interest exacted by two or three of the loan companies, and arrive at the same conclusion. When these societies loan money to farmers in this underhand way, they are really doing so under false pretences. They pretend to charge only 7 or 8 per cent., but a calculation shows that at the expiration of a given time the farmer has paid from 10 to 15 per cent. I know this to be the fact, because I have borrowed money myself, and have paid it in half-yearly instalments, and I know that after that money was paid it amounted to 15 per cent., and I paid no fines at all. Now, if that is the case, according to the conditions that are embodied in these mortgages, what must be the condition of things when a fine is imposed, when a fine in some cases every month is added to it? It runs on for a few years until the whole capital of the farmer is taken from him and he is left in a worse condition than before he bought the farm at all, after having laboured many years in clearing it up. I think it is very desirable that if this House is prepared to pass any such law, it should pass some law regulating interest in that direction. While I would not fall in with every feature of the Bill, it would be against the interest of a large class of people that it should be voted down or given a six months' hoist, because I think that when it gets into Committee these objectionable clauses may be so modified as that the Bill may prove a great boon to the farming community.

MR. LANE: I do not think we can undertake successfully to regulate the value of money. I have an idea that people wanting to borrow money have a right to make such arrangements as they see fit as to the rate of interest they will pay for it. I know from personal experience, and from my knowledge of the affairs of the country generally, that these loan societies are in the habit of imposing to a certain extent upon their customers, but, at the same time, there is no doubt whatever that the parties borrowing money from these societies really require the money, and judge it best in their own interests to borrow it. I do not think that the farmers, or any other portion of the community, would be benefitted by a restriction such as is here proposed. I do not see exactly how legislation can be applied in the interest of parties borrowing. Some hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this subject are under the impression that money may be regulated by Act of Parliament. I do not think that is the case. I do not think we can to the advantage of the general public regulate the amount of interest that anyone has a right to receive for the money he loans, and I do not see why money should not be placed in the same category as any other property, belonging either to public bodies or to individuals. If a man has $10,000 to loan, it is to the advantage of the public that he should be allowed to loan it on whatever terms he can agree with the borrower. If he is not allowed to do it in that way, he certainly will not do it at all, and will invest his money in a way that would be probably less advantageous to the public than if he had loaned it, at a rate of interest that by some hon. gentlemen might be considered too high. This question of interest is one that has been discussed for a great number of years in this country. It may be a very popular cry amongst the farming community; but I do not see that the proposal contained in this Bill would be in the interest of the public. People will not invest their money unless they can profitably invest it. Some hon. gentlemen have given instances in which loaning societies have been guilty of extortion. I have no doubt that this is the case, and if we could in any way pass an Act to bring them under certain regulations, perhaps it would be advantageous, to the farming community especially. Notwithstanding all that has been said on the subject, the regulation of the rate of interest should not be attempted by Act of Parliament. I believe that whatever law might be passed upon this subject would be evaded. When a farmer becomes financially involved, he must pay the rate of interest demanded or go without. In the majority of cases, the farmer does not borrow money unless he can turn it to advantage. I know there are some farmers who borrow with a view to selling their land, but there are very few of that kind. When this is done, however, it is principally the fault of the agent and not of the company. I am of opinion that this Bill should not pass, and I do not think that the common sense of the House will allow a Bill of this kind to pass.

MR. CASEY: The Bill before us is one of a kind that very frequently crops up early in a Parliament, intended to catch the favour, and, if possible, the votes of some class of the community. And I consider it almost an insult to the class which I specially represent, that the farmers should be chosen as the class supposed to be the most gullible and the most likely to be entrapped by a measure of this kind. It seems to me absurd, at this period of our history, to introduce a Bill which seeks to limit the rate of interest at all. Why it should be thought more proper to limit the rate of interest to be paid on real estate security rather than the interest paid on any other security, I am quite at a loss to imagine, nor why such a proposal should have been made, unless for the purpose of catching the vote of that class who are chiefly interested in real estate. To come to the root of the matter, what is the nature of this payment, called interest, which we are asked to limit? It is a payment of exactly the same nature as rent paid for land or wages paid for labour. Why do you pay a man wages for his labour? Simply because his labour is worth something to himself, or would be worth something to any other employer, and he foregoes the benefit he might derive from working for himself and the pay he might get from somebody else. These are the two factors which go to make up the rate of wages. You pay him then for something he foregoes and you enjoy. It is exactly the same in regard to the rent of land. When you rent a piece of land you pay the owner for its productiveness, which benefit he foregoes and you enjoy. The rent depends upon the fertility of the land, which is the chief factor. What is the difference between these cases and the case of interest. Absolutely none. When a man lends you money, you pay interest for the capital furnished, whether in the form of bills, notes, or coin. Why is interest paid on capital? Simply because the lender foregoes the profits he might make out of it himself. Interest will bear a fixed proportion to the average productiveness of capital in the country at the time the loan is effected. It will depend, in spite of all legislative efforts to regulate it, on the amount of available capital and the average profits of that capital, when productively invested. Consider how it varies in different countries. In England, where capital is very plentiful, the rate of interest is invariably low. In Canada, where capital is not so plentiful, the rate of interest is comparatively higher. In Manitoba, where capital is very scarce, and where the employment of capital yields very much larger profits, the rate of interest is extraordinarily high. I understand that from 12 to 15 per cent. is not considered an extremely high rate, and the borrowers make a profit out of it even at these rates. Here we consider 8 per cent. to be a fair rate, and 10 per cent. very high. It perhaps did not occur to the introducer of the Bill, that the average rate of interest might not be the same in every part of the Dominion. He desires to fix the rate of interest on money borrowed in Manitoba at the same rate as on money borrowed in Ontario or Quebec, or any other Eastern Province. He has not considered that money is worth more to the borrowers in Manitoba than it is here, and that it is worth more here than it is in some of the other Provinces. It appears to me as ridiculous a task to attempt to regulate the rate of interest as to attempt to regulate the rate of profit all over the Dominion. It is clear then that the rate of interest is naturally guided by considerations I have named, the abundance of capital and its average productiveness. Is it possible to disregard this economic law, and prevent the rate of interest from going beyond a certain figure. I say, emphatically, it is not. The experiment has been tried again and again. The hon. member must be aware that usury laws have been tried in various countries as well as our own, and they have always been found to be miserable failures. If such a law were now to be put in force, one of two results would follow. Either some ingenious lawyer would devise a plan for loaning money at higher rates than those named in the Act, or lenders would refuse to make loans if they could not get the average rate of interest. If the hon. gentleman's Bill passes, either the farmer could not negotiate loans at all, or he would have to pay by a roundabout and illegal method much more than the market rate of interest. I think the question requires very little further consideration, as far as the general principle is concerned. With regard to the particular provisions of the Bill, there is perhaps one that appears to be of a beneficial character on a cursory reading. Section 3 provides "that mortgages on the instalment plan which require annual payments on principal, while interest is paid on the whole sum for the full term, shall be illegal." That section appears to me to be intended to prevent the lending of money in such a form as to deceive the borrower, and give him the impression that he will have to pay less interest than is really exacted. I am not prepared to say that such provision would be improper. Indeed, I think it proper to protect the borrower, who is not versed in the intricacies of mathematical calculations, against deceit practised on him by loan companies. It might be proper to provide for the insertion in mortgages of some clause by which the borrower might know exactly what rate of interest he is paying, though it might be possible even under some such arrangement not only to gull the borrower, but to deceive the law itself. But that particular section, I think, touches the real evil; and the Government should give attention to the ques.

tion. I repeat that it is very hard that the farming class should be selected to be gulled by measures of this kind. I say it is scarcely possible to use strong enough language in denouncing Bills of this kind, which lead people to believe that something can be done which cannot be done, which stir up dissatisfaction with the existing state of things that cannot be remedied. It is also unfair to all other members of the House who are compelled to follow their own convictions and their knowledge of the ordinary principles of economics; and not only this, but it has the effect of demoralising public opinion, leading the public to believe that the Government can do anything for them in the way of giving them money at cheaper rates than it can be got for in the market. They might as well profess to provide the manufacturer with labour at a lower rate of wages than it is worth in the market, or to provide tenants with land at a lower rent than it was really worth. You might as well try, Sir, although the cases are not exactly similar, to fix the price of any commodity in the market, because, although money is not sold, still the interest is the amount of rent that the money will fetch, and it is as inevitably fixed by supply and demand as the price of wheat, or peas, or pork. It is not unnatural that such a measure should be introduced, however, after the example set by the Government. They have led the farmer to believe that legislation could better his position by artificially increasing the price of his produce; and the hon. member for Centre Wellington now wishes the farmer to believe that the economic laws which rule the rate of interest can also be broken up in his favour so as to reduce the price at which loans of money can be obtained. The farmers know better though. There is no more intelligent class in the country, and they know that money cannot be obtained forcibly below the average rate, and that if prevented from getting that rate the lender would not lend it at all. They will know that this Bill is—if I may use the expression without being unparliamentary—a humbug; and that it is one which could not be rigidly enforced, but which would lead, in fact, to heavier burdens being heaped upon them. For these reasons I am afraid my hon. friend from Centre Wellington will not reap the fruit

MR. BLAKE: I think that the main object of this Bill, so far as it is within our jurisdiction, is opposed to sound notions upon the subject; but there are some points upon which I believe some legislative provision would be useful either here or elsewhere. Nobody, who has watched the condition of affairs at which the hon. gentleman's Bill is directed, can fail to be convinced that free-trade in money has proved to be an advantage, that freedom from legislative restriction is the best rule, at any rate, in this matter. I am old enough to remember what was the state of things before we had free-trade in money. Mortgages were created at legal interest for sale, and were sold at a discount. This double machinery involved increased cost to the borrower; but besides there was a certain risk under the existing laws, and that risk the borrowers had to pay for in the shape of a higher rate of interest than would have been exacted if the lender had not had to incur that risk. Since the Usury Laws have been abolished, as a consequence of freedom of trade in money, there has been a gradual accumulation of domestic capital which naturally flowed into the most profitable channel, and which is represented partly by the large sums invested on mortgage by private lenders, and by the vast amount invested in the stocks of loan societies, and also by considerable sums lent on deposit to these societies, who invest their resources on mortgage. There has also been a very large influx of British capital, tempted by the higher relative rates of profit attainable here. I quite admit that some few private lenders in Ontario, who had kept within the law, took advantage of its repeal to raise their prices: and that thus, in some instances, there was a temporary raising of the rate, which affected the price of money in isolated places, pending the influx of capital. I believe, further, that in Quebec there was, among the lenders of money in the rural districts, a very considerable rise in the rate. The truth is that special circumstances had largely influenced the question. The influence of the clergy among their flocks had been strongly and most properly and effectually exercised to prevent the violation of the Usury Law. It was almost impossible for those who lived in the rural parts to send elsewhere their small accumulations of capital; and thus they were lent in the neighbourhood at low rates. When the Usury Law was repealed, the rural restraint ceased and much higher rates were charged. I presume that these have been modified by the operation of the general law of supply and demand; but even if circumstances have prevented that law having its full operation, you must not suppose that to re-enact the provisions against usury would restore the good old times. It would be impossible now, after the experience lenders have had, to induce them by any pressure to lend their money below its value; and if they would not find devices, as they have done before, to evade your Act, they would make other uses of their capital. It would flow away from the locality. To return to Ontario. I remember that about twenty years ago it was not difficult to get investments on the best farm lands in Ontario, as safe as if in the Bank of England, at a rate of interest as high as 14, 16 or even 18 per cent., payable half-yearly. You can now freely borrow in Toronto, on prime security, at 7 or $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. interest, payable yearly. I have a letter from a gentleman conversant with the business, in Western Ontario, stating that there never was such a competition for investments on mortgage, and that money is freely offered at 7 per cent. interest, payable yearly. We have thus found the beneficial results of freedom of trade in the accumulation and influx of disposable capital, and a steady reduction of the rate of interest; and the proposed interference with that would be, in my opinion, not merely useless, but mischievous. There are, however, some points which may form a proper subject for legislation here or elsewhere, with a view to curing certain evils which have arisen in connection with the system of lending by loan and building societies. There have been evils of three kinds. The first is that these societies, while lending on what is, in my opinion, a wholesome system for the farming community, a system involving the payment of the capital borrowed, and of the interest thereon, by equal instalments, composed of principal and interest, payable yearly, during a long time, have exercised the powers conferred on them by the exaction of large fines for arrears, under rules unknown to or not present to the minds of those who borrow from them, to the oppression, in many cases, of the borrower. I do not object to the compounding of interest; I say it is perfectly fair. If I contract a loan with you, upon which I agree to pay you 10 per cent. interest yearly, that you should stipulate with me that if I made default in paying the interest at the agreed time, I should pay you interest at the same rate upon the sum in default. That is fair. Nor perhaps can one logically object to the extension of that system by providing a higher rate, if the borrower knows what he has contracted for in that respect. But if there has been delusion or deception practiced by means of these rules, or if they have not been made known clearly to the borrower, then I do object. Under the actual circumstances, a very much higher rate of interest and profit is nominally obtained by the society, by reason of the man getting into arrears, than if he should keep up his payments, a much higher rate than he is led to believe he has stipulated for. Much mischief has thence resulted in times past, and still results. You tell a borrowing farmer you are charging him 10 per cent.; but under your rules, of which he knows or understands nothing, in case he makes default, he is called on to pay you 1 per cent. a month, or 12 per cent. a year. Now, the whole advantage of this peculiar scheme of borrowing is, that it gives to the farmer the opportunity of reducing by a manageable and equal yearly payment the incumbrance, and this advantage is diminished by any plan which makes it the interest of the lender to encourage arrears. It is indeed the true interest of both parties to avoid them. For the loans are often made on a narrower margin, in view of the anticipated yearly reduction, than would be thought safe were the whole principal to stand for a long term of years, and thus, by making haste, in this sense to become rich through arrears, many losses have been made by the lenders, which, of course, means that many borrowers have been ruined. I believe it to be best for both parties that neither party should gain by defaults; but that the same rate of charge should be exacted on arrears as was stipulated for on the loan; and the considerations as to the deception practiced on borrowers, to which I have adverted, influenced me as a member of the late Government to propose such an interference with regard to companies under our legislative control as is contained in the proviso to the 97th section of the Joint Stock Companies Act of 1877, which reads as follows :—

“ Provided always, that no fine or penalty shall be stipulated for, taken, reserved or enacted, in respect of arrears of principal or interest, which shall have the effect of increasing the charge in respect of arrears beyond the rate of interest or discount on the loan,”

I think it may be usefully considered whether we should not extend this provision to the like cases which it does not now cover. The second point to which I wish to advert is one of great importance, in view of the mode frequently adopted, by which a particular amount, being but the principal and interest, are blended, and a fixed equal, annual re-payment, including principal and interest, is agreed for; it not appearing on the mortgage what is the real rate of interest, and the calculation being so complicated as to be quite beyond the powers of ordinary borrowers. I regret to say that by some, but only some, of these societies, deceptions have been practiced on the borrowers in this matter. The advertisements have stated their rates of interest at moderate figures, but these figures have been reached, so far as I can judge, by no proper calculation, by no honest process. It is quite impossible that some of these rates can be justified. To reach them the borrower cannot have been allowed interest, or at any rate he cannot have been allowed interest at the rate charged him on his repayments of capital; and it is a painful thing to say that thus borrowers have been too often deceived. There are many societies, I believe, which act honestly in this matter, but the opportunity for deception exists; it has been too freely used, and some remedy, here or elsewhere, should be devised for it. I think that in all loans which are not what are called “straight loans,” that is loans repayable with a rate of interest specified in the mortgage, that instrument should contain a declaration of the amount really advanced, and of the rate of yearly interest to be paid;

then the borrower would know the true rate of interest, and that rate of interest would govern the case in any Court in case of a dispute at any time touching the amount enacted for these mixed repayments. The third proposition; which I venture to put forward, relates to the repayment in France of long loans. Some loan societies issue loans repayable at a great interval of time, sometimes at fifteen and twenty years. This is often an excellent thing for the borrower; and I think it a very good plan for farmers in many cases. But it is liable to abuse. It sometimes hampers the disposition of the land and thus interferes with freedom in that respect; it sometimes happens also that long before the end of the term the borrower finds himself no longer in want of the money; he would repay it; but he is nevertheless burdened with the payment of interest which he could very well save. True, he is told by the society that he can repay in advance, and will be credited with interest on his payments; but the rate at which he is credited is greatly less than the rate charged on the payments to the end of the term; and the consequence is that here again the borrower is deceived into his bargain. He has to pay an enormous premium for the privilege of repayment in advance, a premium of which he would have no adequate conception from the representations made to him. Here again I speak only of the customs in the past of some societies. But the opportunity for deception is so great, and has been so widely used that it might be well to provide that, whatever the length of the loan, the borrower might, after the term of say five or seven years, repay the principal and interest to the date of payment, on six months' notice, or by paying six months' interest, and so discharge the loan. I believe that much of the existing difficulties has been created by loan agents, who pursue a similar practice to that adopted by fire insurance agents in former days. I dare say it has occurred to most of us to have an application from our insurance broker to insure in a fresh company. It puzzled me at first, but I found the reason was that if my broker only got my renewal for the old company he received a small fee; while if he gave the risk to a fresh company, he would get the initial commission at a higher rate. So with the loan companies, changes have been made by borrowers at the instance of an agent, simply because a fresh commission would be obtained upon the new loan, although the old company would have continued the loan at as good a rate. I believe there are instances in which loan societies have obtained memoranda from the registers of the mortgages made to other societies, with the view of offering to the borrowers nominally cheaper money, and thus paying the earlier loan. What between these efforts of the loan companies and the agents, it would be impossible for the business to be carried on if there were not some permanency in the loan. The protection to which the societies at present resort is the extra price for redemption in advance, and the payment of this price, together with the agent's charges, make the change frequently unprofitable to the borrower. These companies conduct a large part of their business on a tolerably narrow margin. They borrow at one rate, and lend at a higher rate. Out of the difference they must provide for all losses and expenses, and find a profit besides. If under such circumstances they were liable to immediate re-payment at the option of the borrower they could not carry on; and in the end money would become dearer. The risk would so affect transactions that the interests of borrowers would in the end suffer. Therefore, I should not propose to give a statutory right of redemption, apart from contract, at a date earlier than five or seven years. In truth the evil has, to a great extent, been caused by the operation of the great general law of supply and demand, which the hon. member for Centre Wellington attacks by this Bill. The operation of that law has produced such an abundance of capital that lenders are not any longer masters of the situation; straight loans are taken at from 7 per cent.; and in many cases power is given to the borrower to pay at any time on six months' notice, on reasonable terms.

MR. WHITE (East Hastings): There are only one or two companies that permit that.

MR. BLAKE: I think there are more; but I will tell the hon. gentleman this, that, in the present state of the money market, what one or two respectable companies do others will be obliged to do also, because there is such a competition for investments that those giving exceptional advantages will get the cream of the business.

MR. WHITE: When the parties come to pay the loans back to the societies from which they borrowed them, they pay down so much extra interest, that it would be better to stick to the old companies than go to the new. As to existing transactions you cannot interfere with them. No Legislature would venture to unsettle the foundations of property and of order by a wholesale interference with contracts lawfully made. But, as to the future, I have stated to the House what my remedy would be, namely, a statutory right, no matter how much longer the stipulated time, to redeem after five or seven years on six months' notice or payment of six months' interest without any further charge. It would, I think, be the best, and an adequate remedy. I have now to repeat that, having suggested the three principal points for consideration here or elsewhere, I do not think they can be reasonably said to be within the principle of this Bill. Its principle and essence is an attempt to reduce the rate of interest by legislation. Its theory is vicious; and its adoption would defeat the end proposed, and work infinitely more harm to the borrower than to the lender; and, therefore, I cannot give it my support.

MR. PLUMB: I think that the hon. member has done a signal service in introducing this Bill. I did not have the pleasure of hearing the remarks which he made in favour of it, but I can well sympathise with him and truly congratulate him on having brought this important matter up for discussion. I have heard, however, the attack made upon my hon. friend by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), which was quite characteristic of that hon. gentleman. He not only discussed adversely, and in his usual flippant style, the principle of the Bill, but travelled out of the way in the most erratic manner, and ingeniously, if not forcibly, took both sides of the argument. He accused my hon. friend having attempted, in introducing and advocating his Bill, to hoodwink and deceive the farming community, who, he assured us confidently, could not be hoodwinked in any way. In almost the next breath he told us that the farming community had been hoodwinked into supporting the National Policy, which is a perennial fountain of bitterness, of which himself and his friends are compelled daily to drink. His argument, as they bore upon the Usury Laws, were too trite and too feebly put forward to merit special attention. They may or not be prompted by selfish considerations. There is a wide difference of opinion upon the subject of usury laws. The hon. gentleman from West Elgin spoke upon the question as if my hon. friend from Centre Wellington had taken ground in attempting to restrict the rate of interest, which had been abandoned by common consent. Now, I can tell the hon. gentleman that there is by no means a consensus of opinion on that subject. One of the greatest States of the American Union—and I commend this fact to hon. gentlemen who are constantly quoting the United States, and enforcing their arguments by referring to its example—the State of New York, a year ago passed a usury law, by a large majority of its Legislature, to the following effect:—

“Sec. 1. The rate of interest on the loan or forbearance of any money, goods or things in action, shall be $6 upon $100 for one year, and after that rate for a greater or less sum or for a longer or shorter time. But nothing herein contained shall be so construed as in any way to affect any contract or obligation made before the passage of this Act.

I am not wholly in favour of that legislation, and I only cite it to show that my hon. friend who introduced this Bill is in accord with a large proportion of the community whose Legislature passed that Act. I do not altogether approve of his Bill, but I think the House is under very great obligation to him for having brought it forward and eliciting the discussion which has taken place to-night, and particularly for affording the hon. member for West Durham an opportunity to give the clear and lucid statement to which we have just listened. That hon.

member stated that there is a very substantial grievance in respect to the manner in which companies who make it their business to lend money on land have transacted that business. I rose more particularly to advert to one point, and that is the habit which is prevailing among certain chartered loan companies, calling themselves respectable, having directors and shareholders who, in their individual capacity, would not stoop to gain advantage or profit by means of the misrepresentations of their agents, or through the ignorance of their customers. I refer to the practice of concealing from the borrower the actual rate of interest, which his contract compels him to pay, a concealment effected by various devices, such as payments of principal and interest in yearly instalments, not distinguishing principal from interest. A case came under my observation in which a neighbour of mine effected from a loan company, in Toronto, a loan upon his farm, one of the most valuable on the Niagara river. The security was ample. The loan was for \$8,000. I think it was represented that the rate of interest would be about 8½ per cent. on the loan, which was to be repaid by instalments, the whole amount to be paid in the course of a certain number of years. He asked my advice in the matter and I showed him, by means of a simple calculation, that he was paying a much larger rate of interest. The agent told him that he could convert his loan into a straight loan, which I suppose is in contradistinction to the crooked one into which he had been entrapped, on interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, the principal payable in a lump sum at the end of the term of the loan. I advised him to convert it immediately. He went to the company; they told him “Yes, you can do that, but you will have to pay the difference between the value of the amount of the existing loan and one yielding 8 per cent. The sum demanded seemed exorbitant. I went to the company and told the manager that the loan had been effected either through misstatement or misunderstanding. That their agent had led the borrower to believe that he was paying but 8½ per cent.; that it could be converted into a straight loan at 8 per cent.; that there were witnesses to the bargain, and, if the wrong was not remedied, I would expose it. After great annoyance, expense and delay, my friend succeeded in getting out of the clutches of the company, and the money was lent in a direct, straightforward way by a firm, of which my hon friend from West Durham is at the head, at $7\frac{1}{2}$ or 8 per cent. interest. Complaints of transactions of this character have been universal. I have suggested to several directors of loan companies that I think it would be proper for Parliament, or any Legislature which had jurisdiction, to pass an Act, whereby the rate of interest should be fairly declared in every contract made by the companies, and that any excess should cause the whole rate of interest to be forfeited. The companies are bound by every principle of honour to state to the people who borrow from them exactly what rate of interest they will have to pay.

MR. WHITE: They will never do it unless they are compelled.

MR. PLUMB: Well, I believe in compelling them then; and I had a short Bill prepared for that purpose, but, owing to the pressure of other business, and my inability to consult my friends about it, I have not yet decided to introduce it. I trust that this discussion will cause the House to carefully consider whether the abuses should not be stopped by means of legislation. I desire to say that I do not by any means intend to convey the impression that all, or even a considerable number of loan companies, resort to the unworthy devices complained of; many, and I believe most of them, are conducted in the most honourable and straightforward manner, and have been of great service in introducing British capital into the country. I fully agree with the hon. member for West Durham, that there should be a limit to the time of long mortgage loans. I believe that long loans frequently hamper property in such a way as to be seriously detrimental to the interests of the borrowers or those who may be their successors, either by device or otherwise. I very much regret to say that, although I sympathise with my hon. friend (Mr. Orton) in the feeling which has induced him to bring this Bill forward, I am not in favour of it. I do not think it would effect the object he has in view. I do not believe the rate of interest in this country can be lowered by the kind of legislation he proposes. I do not believe the Bill, if it should pass, would effect the objects it seeks to attain, and, while I am very glad this discussion has taken place, I feel myself constrained to vote against the Bill.

MR. BUNSTER: The importance of the Bill, I dare say, will sufficiently recommend it to the favourable consideration of the House. Notwithstanding the remarks of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), particularly his allusion to British Columbia, in which he states that it is not proposed to lend any money to British Columbia, I favour the Bill. He should know that British Columbia is not a borrower from the other Provinces of Canada. On the contrary, Canada is indebted to British Columbia for not carrying out her contract. Notwithstanding that, the hon. gentleman never loses an opportunity of casting an ill-natured complaint at British Columbia. That Province has been branded as an inhospitable country and sea of mountains. He cannot think, however, that his feelings are so particularly hostile as he would represent, but he speaks for party purposes. British Columbia has plenty of gold, and men to take it out of her mountains.

AN HON. MEMBER: Not the Chinese.

MR. BUNSTER: We do not want Chinese; hon. gentlemen can go on interrupting if they like. If they think that British Columbia has not rights on the floor of this House, they can say so, and the Province will be more cheerful in withdrawing from the Union than Canada will be at the sight.

AN HON. MEMBER: Let her withdraw.

MR. BUNSTER: Five years indebtedness has been spoken of. The party of the hon. member for West Durham was in power five years, and can we call their rule favourable to the interests of the country. The hon. member says "yes," but there are not five outside his party's ranks who could say those years were prosperous. Since the National Policy was introduced the country has exhibited a degree of prosperity never before shown. Lumber that covered the flats in Ottawa is moving off. Previously, there was no inducement to move it away; it is going to the North-West to build happy homes for the people. The question affects every household in the land. It is a question of interest—not political interest, but the interest of the people—whether money should yield 7 or 12 per cent. I am sorry that a Bill intended to benefit the working classes should not have received the support of every hon. gentleman. I regret that a Bill like this cannot be introduced without sneers over British Columbia and attempts to run it down. To-day it is the only Province that exports more than it imports. Its resources invite the whole happy family of Europe to come to the Province and make in it happy homes. The Bill would be in the interest of the country. A similar law prevails in the United States, which have set us a good example in this respect.

Motion negatived.

MR. WHITE (East Hastings): I believe that the mover of this Bill deserves great credit for bringing it forward, his experience showing how much a member should consider such a step before taking it. It appears that there are many connected with loan societies in this House. It was certainly painful to hear the remark of the hon. member for East Toronto in regard to the mover of the Bill. I would like to ask why should a member of this House, because he introduces such a Bill, be told by the representatives of loan companies in Toronto that he had had to pay them and consequently felt sore? I think it is not fair, just, becoming or parliamentary, to use such language towards a member. The fact is the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Platt) is president of a company which only puts into the pockets of its stockholders 12 per cent. at the expense of the unfortunate borrowers of the country. The poor people must suffer that a man like him should be "monarch of all he surveys."

MR. PLATT: I am not president of any such company.

MR. WHITE: If not president the hon. gentleman is a director of one. I think it unfortunate that men that have to borrow—and such include the men who keep business going in the country, the farmers and mechanics—should have to pay any such interest. The moment a man borrows money from such companies they commence to watch him, but they have no right to open their mouth to comment on his poverty and straightened circumstances. The hon. gentleman says they did not ask us to borrow; but men borrow through necessity and are often afterwards deceived. Does not the hon. member for West Durham say so also? Did not the House listen silently to his language in this sense? The hon. member for East Toronto, knows that there is a society in Toronto the most despotical of any in Upper Canada. It cannot be denied that it pays the manager $7,000 per annum.

MR. PLATT: It is not true.

MR. WHITE: Does not the Canada Permanent and Building Society pay their manager $7,000 per annum and pays 11 per cent. per annum to its shareholders?

MR. PLATT: That is not true.

MR. WHITE: How many of the banks in the country pay 11 per cent. and the manager $6,000 or $7,000 a year? I do not rise to say an unkind word of the hon. member for East Toronto, because I believe he is as kind hearted a gentleman as any gentleman sitting in this House; but I want to tell him that the trouble is that there are members in the House, too many, who are disposed to crush the fallen and the poor. The hon. member for West Durham, in his eloquent practical way, says the present system is an evil; and are the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches to listen to that language and permit that evil to continue. There are only one or two Ministers here at present. When such an evil is brought prominently before the House and country, Ministers should be in their places to deal with it, and both the Opposition and the Ministerial party should combine to place the people of the country in a proper position in regard to this matter. Not only have borrowers to pay large commissions to the agents of those loans societies, many of whom are lawyers, but high rates of interest as well. I do not desire to specially condemn the lawyers, but they, now and again, deserve a little rub. Those agents get 1 or 2 per cent., the lawyers putting the loans through by endorsing or promising to pay the first two payments. They promise to put the loan through for 60 or 100, as the case may be, requiring, in addition, a chattel mortgage against the goods of the borrower. Not only do the companies get security on the land, but on the goods and chattels. One-half of the residents of the different counties have not only their lands but their chattels mortgaged to those companies. That surely is a matter that the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) should give ear to. •I believe he is against the landlords of Ireland ; but, so far as the loan companies of Canada are concerned, they occupy a similar position in Canada to that of these proprietors. If the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) would bring in a practical Bill to deal with this evil, I believe he would get the support of the members following the Government.

AN HON. MEMBER : Would the hon. gentleman support his Government ?

MR. WHITE : I would, in all good measures, and would not object to an honest Irishman at the head of the Government—I would like to follow such a leader. I believe the hon. gentleman would gain the support of the majority on both sides of the House if he would bring in such a Bill, and he certainly should have mine. It is high time that the Government of this country, with their majority of seventy or eighty, should see that they have a duty to perform to the people of this country, unfortunately under the power of these loan companies—companies which should be restricted to a moderate rate of interest. Why keep silent in the matter ? Those loan companies take away the best trade of the banks, which get only 6 or 7 per cent. for their money, as against the 9, 10 and 11 per cent. of these companies. I am glad the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) has broken the ice in this matter. If he brings in a Bill in some other shape to remedy this evil, and the Government do not take hold of it, he will get a majority of all the independent men who have money to loan.

MR. PLATT : I wish to correct the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, by saying that our secretary does not get $7,000 a year.

MR. WHITE (Hastings) : I said your manager got that.

MR. PLATT : That is not true, nor is it true that the company pays 11 per cent.

MR. ORTON : What does the manager get ?

MR. PLATT : $5,000 a year.

MR. GAULT : I have been connected with a loan company for over twenty years, during which time we have lent a large amount of money, I think mutually satisfactory to borrower and lender. During those twenty years I do not think we have sold five properties. The company I am connected with pays its manager but $1,200 per annum, and our loans are made solely on real estate in the city of Montreal. I am quite astonished to hear some of the remarks made about capital this evening, because there is no question that if this Bill becomes law, it will not only prevent the influx, but lead to the withdrawal of a large amount of capital invested in this country. At present many Scotch and English companies are lending money in Canada and their rates are so low that private individuals are glad to get 6 and 7 per cent. interest for loans on good property. The Bill now under discussion, if passed, will prove a great detriment to the country. I am sure that in Canada West the farmers themselves like to get good investments ; they take their deposits out of the banks, which only pay 4½ and 5 per cent., and place them with the loan companies, wherethey can get 6 per cent. or more ; and in London, Ontario, and in Toronto the farmers have invested large amounts in this way. I have a letter from the manager of a Scottish company, which is a very large investor of capital, stating that if this Bill becomes law it will close its office and withdraw its capital, an example that would be followed by other companies. I would recommend the hon. gentleman for Centre Wellington to withdraw his Bill, otherwise I shall be compelled to record my vote against it.

MR. BOURBEAU : I have much pleasure in seconding the Bill of the hon. member for Centre Wellington. If there is anything which is prejudicial to the interest of the settler, it is most certainly a law which allows a money-lender to lend, as is now done, at an exorbitant rate of interest. The settler, having borrowed at a ruinous rate of interest, ultimately loses heart, and finds that he has no alternative but to start off his children to the United States to repair his fortunes, shattered by usurious loans. If the children fail in the task, the father, too, is compelled to expatriate himself. If we have now so great an emigration of Canadians to the United States, I am satisfied that the reason is in great measure to be found in the fact that a large number of them have fallen victims to the usurious lenders of money. Hon. gentlemen who are opposed to this measure fear that if the rate of interest is limited, as the Bill provides, it will be impossible, in future, to borrow money, as capitalists will refuse to enter into transactions at such low rates. I am of opinion that, making the loaning of money at lower rates compulsory, it would be doing a great service even to those who lend at such high rates; for in that way the borrower could, in any case, pay what he owes; whereas, if he promises to pay more than his means justify, he is invariably compelled to dispose of all that he possesses to his creditor, or to others, who thus become proprietors of it at a very low price. Often the creditor is obliged to buy his debtor's property and to re-sell it at a loss, while if the debtor had been able to borrow at a lower rate he would have been able to meet his engagements. Some hon. member has reproached the hon. member for Centre Wellington with entertaining a grudge against certain loan associations, in consequence of his having failed to meet his engagements with some such association. I think the reproach an unjust one; we should congratulate him on having brought in this Bill. If I had time I could quote many letters which I have received from the united counties of Drummond and Arthabaska, to show how popular the principle of this Bill is in that electoral district. Most of the electors there are in favour of the Bill, especially those who observe the emigration of Canadians to the United States to be increasing day by day; they know that the unfortunate settlers who are going away have been ground down by usurers. Money-lenders have all kinds of ways at their command to induce the acceptance of their pretended favours. One plan that they have for imposing on the settler, is to lend him at first a small sum of $10 or $20, charging 50c. to $1 a month interest, which amounts to a rate of interest of 50 or 60 per cent. Often they go further; by these means a settler is induced to borrow at from 80 to 100 per cent. The money-lenders, who are to be found in our country parts as well as in our cities, do society an exceeding ill-turn by gently victimising it. On one hand they ruin the borrower, on the other they yield no revenue to the public chest. So well aware are these lenders of the advantages which they reap from the loaning of their money, that they prefer adopting that course to investing it in real property or in manufactories. They contribute in no way to the encouragement of education, because, having for the most part no real property, they have no taxes to pay for the support of the schools. Nor do they contribute to the cost of maintaining the roads, because, having no real property, they cannot be taxed. Unfortunately, in this country, there is no law providing for the taxation of money-lenders, as there is in the case of those who engage in other callings. With these few remarks I shall conclude; I believe it to be my duty and in the interests of my constituents to support the measure introduced by my hon. friend from Centre Wellington, and I have to congratulate him on the largeness of the views manifested by this Bill, the object of which is to do away with the unfortunate abuses committed by those who engage in the traffic to which the measure relates, and which it is intended to regulate.

MR. ROSS (Dundas): This is a question that has been before Parliament many times since I have been a member. My voice is hoarse to-night, but I feel it my duty to support most heartily the principle of the measure introduced by my hon. friend for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton). I do not agree in the rate of interest that he proposes to fix, because I believe that in the circumstances of our country that rate is too low. But there is great reason for fixing it at a certain maximum rate. It is lamentable that many hon. gentlemen in this House seem to argue that if the rate of money was fixed by law, the price of money would advance, and, on the other hand, they contend that free-trade in money brings the price down. Supposing the rate was 8 per cent., how is it possible that people would have to pay a higher rate than that fixed by law at 8 per cent., if money can be had at 7 to 7½ per cent. as asserted; I would like to have those hon. gentlemen, who are connected with loan associations, show me how the poor borrower, who toils day after day to procure bread for his family, is able to pay 10, 12, and 14 per cent. interest and live. A law that permits such things is an injury to the poor but industrious workingmen of this country. An hon. gentleman said here to-night that a man ought to be permitted to do as he pleases and as well as he can with his money. Do we do that in any other case? Do we allow any man to do just what he pleases, when he injures others by so doing? Is there any man in this country whose character is more detestable than that of the extortioner? He is a curse to the country. Because money is necessary to some extent, ought we to leave upon our Statute-book a law that allows the money-lender to do what he pleases with his neighbour and to grind him down? If a man gives a note for $100, and it is afterwards discovered that the maker of the note has been deceived, and has been a victim of false pretences, no Judge or jury will condemn him to pay that note. But that is not the case with loan associations. There is no means of bringing them to account. No instance can be pointed out where the loan companies have been interfered with, and where the payment of the loan has been successfully resisted. The law is singularly in favour of these societies. However, I fear the hon. member for Centre Wellington will not succeed with his Bill, however ably he may advocate it. He may use all the eloquence of which he is possessed, but he will, I fear, find that he can make no headway in this House. But I say boldly that if this question were submitted to the people for their decision, and if they were asked whether the rate of interest should be fixed not exceeding 8 per cent., it would be carried by a two-thirds majority. British capital is now coming into this country, and we should therefore provide by a law, by which the people may be protected from the obligation of paying 10 to 14 per cent. for it. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) proved to-night that the stock of these loan associations was higher than any other stocks in this country. If a man has money, and is willing to loan it at a fair rate of interest to others, who want to use it, why should he not do so on honest principles? Why should we allow a law to exist in this country which permits money-lenders so easily to make victims of their debtors? I would ask, is it right that a legislative body like this should be upholders of a system of this kind. Some means should be adopted to prevent money-loaners from misleading their clients, and to enable borrowers to know exactly the amount of interest they are paying, and thus protect the poor, overworked man, with his hands hardened and bones rheumatic from unceasing toil, paying over the counters of these companies 10, 12 and 14 per cent. earned by himself and family, often having to deny themselves of nearly every comfort to make up the accruing interest at those extortionate rates. Would hon. gentlemen like to be thus treated. Then do as we would others should do unto us.

MR. ARKELL: I have no desire to make any charges against building or loan societies, but I can corroborate the statement that in the towns and villages of Ontario men are in the habit of paying 10, 12, 14 and 16 per cent. on money borrowed from some of these societies. I am cognisant of a great many instances in my own town where men have paid these high rates of interest. I think it is now time this state of things should be checked by the action of this House. I am in favour of the rate of interest being fixed at 8 per cent., and when the Bill goes into Committee I hope an opportunity will be afforded to amend some of the clauses to which I object. I hope the Bill will be supported by a majority of this House, as I am satisfied it will be favourably received by a very large majority of the people of this country.

MR. SHAW: I am of opinion that the circumstances of the country should always be taken into consideration in regard to legislation of this kind, and I think the rate of interest may be advantageously regulated in the country at the present time. It may be that 7 per cent. may be too low, but I doubt it. I have heard it argued since this discussion commenced, that money can be readily obtained at from 7 to 7½ per cent. from societies lending money. If that is so I would like to know how this measure is going to prevent money from being introduced into the country. But in case the fixing of the rate at 7 per cent. would tend to prevent money from flowing into the country, it might be well, perhaps, to fix the rate at 8 per cent. I am in favour of recognising the principle of the Bill by giving it a second reading, and any modifications it might be necessary to make could be effected in Committee. I believe there are several provisions in this Bill, in regard to which the House has no power to legislate and which should be struck out. Several clauses do more than merely regulate the rate of the interest. They affect private rights and deal with right ones, which it appears to me Provincial Legislatures can alone deal. There is one point to which I would like to direct the attention of the House, and it is this: many parties emigrating to this country who have not owned land before, are ignorant of the management of real estate. They are also ignorant of the profits to be derived from agricultural pursuits, and of the knowledge that there is less profit to be derived from the management of real estate, than perhaps from any other business. They are apt to think that the ownership of real estate is connected with extravagant living, and consequently they very soon get into debt. We find, however, that parties coming from France and Germany who have been accustomed to the management of small properties, are more economical in their habits than those coming from Great Britain or Ireland. We may expect in the future a large emigration from Great Britain and Ireland, which will probably go principally into our North-West, and those emigrants will go through exactly the same process as have the emigrants to Quebec and Ontario. Money will be introduced there from the Old Country, and it will be lent at very high rates until the people become acquainted with the country, and know that they will not be able to derive very large profits from agricultural pursuits. If money can be lent here at 7 per cent. and $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., why should it not be lent at the same rate in any other part of the Dominion. I do not think the passage of this law would prevent the introduction of capital into the country. My recollection is that a law, limiting the rate of interest, has existed in the State of Michigan for many years, and I see it has been introduced into the State of New York. The Americans have had experience in this matter, and I do not think we ought to overlook that experience. I trust the Bill will be favourably received by the House.

MR. KILLAM: Before this question is settled, I think it would be well to understand what the policy of the Government is upon it. This measure has been under discussion some three hours, and has, perhaps, received more attention than any other subject except the Tariff. As yet we have heard nothing upon the subject from the Administration. We have heard hon. gentlemen complaining about the state of affairs in the country, and of farmers borrowing money at excessive rates of interest. I thought we were told a year ago, that under the National Policy all these things would be rectified, and prosperity would shine upon us. I think it is due to the hon. gentlemen who complained so much about the depression existing in their counties, and about the disadvantages under which farmers were labouring, that the Government should explain to the House what policy they intend to adopt in the matter. The hon. the Minister of Finance is not even in his place, and the Ministerial Benches are practically empty. Only three members of the Government out of eleven are present. I desire to say a word on behalf of the agriculturalists of Quebec and Ontario. Hon. gentlemen have stated that farmers are compelled to pay these exorbitant rates of interest for money they do not want, and that they are influenced to do so by agents who travel round; also, that their farms are taken from them, and that, consequently, they are compelled to emigrate to the North-West. I believe it is nonsense to say that the intelligent men of this country do not know what they are doing; and that they give themselves away in the manner described. We ought to let a question of this kind alone, and permit the people to borrow and lend at what rates or interest they like.

MR. HUNTINGTON: I have been struck by the observations of several gentlemen in the course of this discussion. I happen to represent an agricultural constituency, in which the farmers generally know whether they are paying 6 per cent. or 16 per cent. Some hon.

gentlemen have mentioned 6 per cent. as the proper rate of interest, and some say 8 per cent. They might as well try to fix by legislation the price of wheat per bushel or the price of meat per pound. I do not want, Sir, to refer to the National Policy, which has been professedly inaugurated to raise prices. I think its object has been to enable the honest Protectionist to raise his prices. If he has seen a shoemaker who has said: "These boots have been bought too cheap at $2," the object of the National Policy has been to give that shoemaker $3 for those boots, the shoemaker having represented that that was the proper price that should be obtained for them. I do not see why the money-lender should not feel the same way. I think the public generally think money an object of some interest, even if some hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this subject this evening do not. If a man wants money he considers what he wants it for, and he knows what to pay for it. It is as nonsensical to get up here and propose to say what a man shall get as interest for his loan, as it is to try to fix what the price of boots should be. I think that is sufficient on the face of it to show the absurdity of this discussion. When we deal with insolvency, we declare, supposing that there should be something of this kind in regard to the question of loaning money, that non-traders should not be allowed to pay 6 per cent. The consequence would be that traders would get the loans and non-traders would get nothing. Speaking for an agricultural constituency, I beg to state that my county will for one be counted on this question. They know well enough whether they pay 6 per cent. or not. There may be some improvident farmer, as there are some improvident traders, who do not take any trouble or care in these matters; but no agent can induce the farmer generally to borrow money at rates of interest which they cannot pay, any more than a dry goods man can induce a man to pay a higher rate for goods than he wishes to pay. I do not believe that we can fix what shall be the price of money. The great money market is not in this House; it is regulated by considerations in the great commercial centres of the world, and it is worth what it will bring. If the hon. gentlemen think they can legislate so as to control the price and value of money they are mistaken; they can no more control it than they can the prices of cotton and wheat or any other article. I do not believe there is any difference in this connection between money and other things; they must be regulated by supply and demand. If there is any special legislation required to protect individuals against companies which are pursuing a system of business which is practically a fraud, if there is special legislation of this kind required it is not the Bill of my hon. friend, but some Bill with specific provisions to prevent fraud that will meet the evil. As to the general purposes of the Bill, as shown by the general drift of the discussion, I think it sufficient to say that money like grain, like iron, like any other commodity, must be regulated as to the price to be paid for it by the demand, by what people are willing to pay for it.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to be very much surprised that the Government should not oppose a question of this kind. It is quite competent for any hon. member taking a strong interest in any public question, to submit a Bill for the consideration of the House; and it is quite impossible for any person to listen to the discussion which has taken place on the second reading of the Bill, moved this evening, without coming to the conclusion that there is a very great diversity of opinion. I cannot agree with the opinion of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that this Bill is unconstitutional; the question to which it relates is entirely within the purview of this Parliament. There are some provisions in this Bill which may be regarded as interfering with the province of civil rights, and are such, perhaps, as could only be dealt with by local legislation; still, the Bill in its main feature cannot be treated as unconstitutional, or not in the power of this House to entertain. I hope, however, that my hon. friend will be content with the expression of opinion elicited on the question from this House. I do not think at this period of the Session, even if the Government were prepared to deal with the question, that we could give a measure of such vital interest the consideration it merits, and I hope that, having had an opportunity of presenting his views very clearly before the House, my hon. friend will feel justified in withdrawing the Bill. If not, I shall feel compelled to vote against the second reading.

MR. ORTON: I do not feel that I would be doing my duty to withdraw this Bill. It has been brought up for second reading and put off on several occasions. It is one in which deep interest is felt by the people of this country, and I think it is highly important to have it decided by an expression of opinion in this House. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), whose opinion has very properly much weight in this House, referred to the difficulty which he said there would be in negotiating mortgages if the Bill passed. It is very true that it would be difficult to make mortgages in their present shape negotiable; but it is easy enough to alter the shape so as to make mortgages negotiable, by an affidavit from the mortgagee that there is no flaw by which the mortgage might be rendered invalid by this Act. I was very glad to hear the hon. member for West Durham acknowledge three of the principles of this Bill, and that he agrees that the evils comprised thereunder should be remedied as provided by this Bill, but I was astonished when, notwithstanding that admission, I heard him express his disapproval of this Bill and try to banish it from the House, and thus prevent justice being done to the people. I shall therefore be glad to see him record his vote, and ascertain whether he will support the former or latter part of his speech in this Bill. He admitted that a five years term of mortgage would be reasonable, but this Bill provides that after one year the borrower may be relieved on payment of three months' interest. However, I will not make any lengthened remarks; but ask for the second reading of the Bill.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria): Before the question is put, I wish to say a few words to explain the reason for my vote. The Bill is the outcome of a very wide-spread feeling of dissatisfaction in Ontario for many years past. It has been the common custom for the agents of loan companies to represent to the farmers borrowing money that the interest was compounded at 8 per cent., and in some cases at a lower rate of interest; but when the figures came to be worked out the real rates were found to be infinitely higher, on account of the compounding by monthly or quarterly payments, and by the fines imposed on the unfortunate borrower for arrears, and he had to ultimately pay such a large sum of money that he could not redeem the loan and his farm was sacrificed. A great many have thus been driven from fine farms. I do not say that loan societies are all to blame; and I admit that the great abundance of money has to a great extent diminished the evil. The competition has become so great that a man with any good security can get money on very favourable terms. That, probably, is a strong argument against restrictions being placed on the rate of interest to be charged; and I should on that ground feel it impossible to vote in favour of the Bill. But this Bill does not only deal with loans or security of land, but it deals with other loan matters, with exactions and interest charged on ordinary transactions in lent money, or ordinary contracts, where it can result in establishing any charge upon land; and it provides that no land shall be charged for any loan in which any higher rate of interest than 6 per cent. has been charged or secured. Loan companies are carried on now in a fair and reasonable spirit, and the rates are so much reduced that they can hardly be said to be unreasonable. I have a letter from one of my constituents, which I would like to read. It says:

"I am of opinion that the financial depression of this country is made ten-fold more aggravating by our accursed usury laws. Three of my tenants failed lately, also a neighbour for whom I had endorsed. The history of one is the history of the whole. They had been extravagant, and bought on credit in 1876-7. The bad crop of 1878 compelled them to borrow at high rates. Each loan had to be paid off by other loans at still higher rates. I found they had been paying 2 per cent. per month, 3 per cent. per month, and $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per day, which is equal to 24 per cent., 36 per cent., and 91 $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. per annum. The latter lacks only 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of highway robbery. In the above cases, the usurers have taken all, and left me and a score of others without anything. In this manner the usurer robs his victim directly, and the general public indirectly. I am led to believe, from my own experience, and from enquiries that I have taken the pains to make, that in this indirect way nineteen-twentieths of the public are made not only to feel but to suffer from the financial depression. The present long-continued depression has created a whole army of usurers in this country. The desire to 'shave notes' amounts to a mania. Not only the brokers, but merchants, hotel-keepers, and even dry-goods clerks, have caught the mania. Four professional brokers in this town are said to have from \$5,000 to \$20,000 each loaned at these exorbitant rates. I am informed that the greater part of the bailiff and sheriff sales in this county can be traced for their origin to the usurers."

This is only one of many letters I have seen and read, giving expression to the general feeling of dissatisfaction which prevails in regard to the extortion of those usurers, who charge high rates for the money they loan. I think, however, that it is impossible to make men prudent by Act of Parliament. The evil complained of arises from the extravagance and want of business tact displayed by the persons who become victims of those transactions. At the same time there is no doubt that the mortgaging of farms to an extent which borrowers are quite unable to meet has been expensive, and the result has been to drive hundreds of Ontario farmers to the North-West. If I thought the passing of this Bill would remove the cause of the evil complained of, I would be disposed to support it, but I do not think that legislation of this kind will cure the evil. On the contrary, I think that the passing of such a measure would be introducing a wrong and dangerous principle, and would have the effect of making money dearer rather than cheaper.

MR. CHARLTON: I wish to say a word in regard to the vote I am about to give. I quite sympathise with the motives of the hon. mover of this Bill. I sympathise with any desire that is expressed or entertained for obtaining cheaper money, and if I thought the principles of the Bill would obtain that result I would heartily support them. But, in my opinion, all usury laws are calculated to work to the detriment of the borrower. It is impossible to enact a usury law which would affect the rate of interest, except in the way of creating dangers in loaning money. The practical results of all usury laws is invariably that higher rates are paid than when no law exists, and for that reason I am opposed to a law of this kind. Its effect would be to drive large sums of money from the country, and raise the rate of interest. There is no difficulty in getting money now at 7 per cent.

MR. WHITE (East Hastings): Where can you borrow it?

MR. CHARLTON: If the hon. gentleman will furnish me good security, I will put him on the track of borrowing money at that rate. If anything could be done in the way of remedying the evil of companies charging higher rates than agreed upon, I would heartily concur in it. But I do not think this Bill provides the proper remedy. Its tendency is rather to aggravate than remedy the evils.

MR. FARROW: I understand we are going to have a vote on this question, and I rise simply to explain the vote I intend to give. I am in favour of the principles of the Bill, but I shall have to vote against it, because I do not think it is going to benefit the farmers. I think the remarks of the hon. member for West Durham were very conclusive, but he might have told us that there are two evils connected with the borrowing of money at present. There are a great many lawyers in this House, but I will state without any bashfulness that one of the greatest evils is the fee charged by members of the Bar in connection with loans. Why should a lawyer charge from $15 to $50 in such cases? I have been connected with those societies for years and I have borrowed money and induced others to borrow from them, and the evil I find is, that when a poor man gets behind they impose the fines referred to. I think the sooner we legislate in the direction proposed by the hon. member for West Durham the better. The hon. member for Centre Wellington says that everybody does not possess money, but I would suggest that everybody does not possess a medical education, and I want to know whether anyone charges more exorbitant rates for their services than doctors. I think the hon. gentleman has not gone far enough—he should have brought in a Bill to regulate doctors' fees.

MR. ORTON: They are regulated by Act of Parliament.

MR. FARROW: They are regulated by the doctors. I contend that many of those companies have done a great deal of good. I know a number that offer to lend money for 7½ and 8 per cent.

Money is like every other commodity—it is cheap or dear according to the supply and demand. I do not think the Bill is practicable or I would vote for it.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk): I would like to make a suggestion for getting rid of the evil spoken of. Hon. gentlemen would do good by endeavouring to get up in their own constituencies good honest loan societies, for the purpose of lending money at 7 per cent., or as much below as is possible. Nobody would pay 12 per cent. if such societies were in existence.

MR. BANNERMAN: There is one clause in this Bill which does not cover exactly what I would like to see remedied, namely, that the fines of 1 per cent. should not be imposed. It is a shame that such fines are imposed, but I think Parliament has a right to do away with such a law. Suppose a man has paid 10 per cent. per annum for a loan on his farm, and owing to some cause or another he is unable to pay the instalments, is it right that this fine should be imposed? I think not, and I think it is the duty of Parliament to enact some legislation on the subject.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell): At this late hour I desire to say only a word or two, to explain the vote I am about to give. I concur with a great deal of what has been said on the other side in relation to the difficulty of fixing the price of money. But no one could have listened to the speech of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), who addressed himself to this question seriously, without coming to the conclusion that there are very serious evils to be removed in connection with the loaning of money. We have the experience of our friends on the other side of the line to guide us. They are a shrewd people and understand their own interests perhaps as well as the people on this side of the boundary; and yet it is rather a remarkable fact that in every State of the Union the price of money is fixed by the Legislature. It is fixed in forty-seven States and Territories. Out of the forty-seven there are only thirteen wherein, although there is a minimum rate, the general rate may be fixed by contract. The maximum rate varies in a great many States. For instance, in eleven they cannot go, even by contract, higher than 6 per cent. In six States they can go as high as 8 per cent.; in nine as high as 10 per cent; in seven as high as 12, and in one, Idaho, as high as 24 by contract. But in all, except thirteen States, they have deemed it expedient, where the conditions of business are very similar to ours, to fix even the maximum rate of interest by law. Now, I think that in view of that experience and of the statements made by the hon. member for West Durham on this subject—an hon. gentleman who has had large experience in this matter—we might very seriously consider this measure. I do not agree with all its details, but I think it is worth the serious consideration of Parliament, and for one I am prepared, as believing some remedy for the present evils to be necessary, to affirm my opinion in a practical way by voting for the second reading of this Bill, on the understanding that it shall go to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, to be there considered.

Motion made and question proposed.

That the said Bill be now read the second time.

Motion resolved in the affirmative.

Bill read the second time, and referred to the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce on the same division.

MR. MACKENZIE : I would ask the hon. gentleman opposite what he proposes to do to-morrow? I understand that it is proposed to go on with the Tariff debate. Is that the intention?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY : It is proposed to take up the resolutions with reference to the Fishery Award.

MR. MACKENZIE : I do not object to the Government giving up any day they like for the discussion of this question ; but Government business is so far behind that I suppose they would like to get it advanced. It seems as if the Government were anxious to avoid discussing any of their measures.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY : In view of the importance of this question, the Government are prepared to give it precedence on the next sitting of the House.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

The following Motions for Returns were severally agreed to:—

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, 1st April, 1880.

“MR. SPEAKER,

In the Senate Chamber.

His Excellency was pleased to give in Her Majesty's name, the Royal assent to the following Bill:—

An Act to repeal the Acts respecting Insolvency now in force in Canada.

And the House being returned,

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 86) To repeal Cap. 40 of 42 Vic., entitled an Act to amend the Maritime Jurisdiction Act, 1877.—(Mr. Patterson, Essex.)

Bill (No. 87) To amend Cap. 32 of the Act of 33 Vic., 1870, entitled an Act to empower the police court in the city of Halifax to sentence juvenile offenders to be detained in the Halifax Industrial School.—(Mr. Richey.)

Bill (No. 88) For the appointment of a Resident Representative Agent for Canada in the United Kingdom.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

FISHERY AWARD—CLAIMS OF THE MARITIME PROVINCES.

ADJOURNED DEBATE POSTPONED.

Order for resuming the adjourned debate, on the motion of Mr. MacDonnell (Inverness), in relation to the division of the Fishery Award, read.

MR. RICHEY: In resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the hon. member for Inverness, I may be permitted to express my regret that there should have been imported into this discussion any virulent party spirit, and that the motion which I felt it incumbent on me to make, for the adjournment of the debate—

MR. MACKENZIE: I rise to a question of Order. This is a Government day, and it is impossible to take up a measure in advance in this way that belongs to another day. No one has moved to pass over these Orders, and it cannot be done. The Orders must be taken consecutively.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I understood it was arranged that we should proceed in the way attempted; but, if the hon. gentleman opposite presses the point of objection, we must yield.

MR. MACKENZIE: There was no arrangement further than this, that the hon. member for Halifax said he would take the course now attempted; but, if the Government do choose, in the present state of their own business, to give up a day, it should be done in the proper way. If they have no business for their own day, they must move that the House pass to a certain Order. Members cannot be allowed to take up an Order whenever they choose.

MILITIA ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

[BILL 70.]

(Mr. Masson.)

SECOND READING.

MR. MASSON: The first clause of the Bill relates to the enrolment to take place in 1881. The Bill proposes to defer it until February, 1882. The second clause takes power to call out the Militia under other than the present circumstances. To-day, the force can only be called out in case of emergency or war, and difficulties have occurred when it has been necessary to call out the Militia for other purposes, such as furnishing a guard of honour to His Excellency the Governor-General, etc. It has been thought that the Militia Act does not empower the Government to call out the force in such circumstances. This clause is to clear up that point. The third clause provides a penalty for personation in certain cases. As the law exists at present, a militiaman is punishable for personation; but the penalty only applies to a volunteer or a non-commissioned officer. The object of this clause is to make it general, to extend the penalty to anybody else who personates a militiaman. The last clause of the Bill provides for the establishment of canteens, which are to be only open to volunteers, whether they are called out for active service or for drill. There is a proviso, which states that, in those municipalities where the sale of liquor is prohibited, the present Bill will not override the local laws in that respect. These are all the provisions of the Bill.

MR. MACKENZIE: With respect to the clause for calling out the Militia, do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that additional power is to be given in regard to troubles in municipalities.

MR. MASSON: No, it is only on holiday occasions. It has been found that, in cases where the force was called out merely to guard an armory as a precautionary measure, the men had no authority to arrest an individual who was trespassing on the premises. A case occurred in London, Ontario, where the guard of an armory proceeded to arrest a man who was loitering on the ground, and the man resisted and showed the volunteer's rifle away. The man sued the soldier, and had him punished, because he tried to arrest without legal authority.

MR. MACKENZIE: I hope the hon. gentleman's Bill will not confer powers upon the Militia to make arrests or act as peace officers when called out under similar circumstances. That is what was done in the London case. The volunteer had no standing as a peace officer. Now, it frequently happens that commandants of regiments call out their men for drill, and appoint a guard, say at the brigade office, or some other place. I hope that under this Bill the Militia, on such occasions, will not receive authority to make arrests. If the present Bill proposes to give such powers to the ordinary

Militia, called out for any other purposes than those provided in the Militia Act, and under the direct authority of the Government, it will be a mistake.

MR. MASSON : As the law stands today, the Government or the Military Commandant of the district have the right to call out the Militia only in case of war or threatened war, or invasion, or some similar emergency, except when called out in aid of the civil power. The present Bill proposes to extend that right, so that the Active Militia may be called out for the purpose of guarding an armory or other place where arms or militia stores are kept.

MR. MILLS : It appears by the 3rd clause of this Bill that it is the intention to make the Militia a constabulary force, for the purpose of preserving the peace. I called the attention of the House last year to this principle in the measure introduced then by the Government. I think we have recognised the rule that the administration of justice and the preservation of the peace in the various Provinces belong to the Local Legislatures and Governments. If that be the case, there is no doubt the Local Legislatures should organise a constabulary force for the purpose of preserving the public peace. They could officer that force and state how it should be managed. They could make the militia officers constabulary officers. It is equally true that, if the militia force of the country is to be called out to serve the purpose of a constabulary, they are to discharge a duty belonging to the Local Administration. We are here required to give Local Legislatures the power to call out these men, with their arms, if we propose to permit the arms to be used by a constabulary. But, when we go beyond that, and give the parties the right to take their arms and ammunition, and act as a constabulary force when we, in fact, create the constabulary force, I think we go beyond the powers that are vested in us. There is always more or less confusion arising from the calling out of the Militia to act as a constabulary force in aid of the civil power, with the duties of a purely military body. Now, it is a well recognised principle in our system of Government that, when a man is enlisted into the army, he does not cease to be a citizen, and, if he sees a crime being committed, it is his duty to arrest the criminal precisely as if he had not been so enlisted. This principle was well recognised during the Lord George Gordon riots in London. There was a full discussion of that principle in the House of Lords, and subsequently, when the Mayor was tried for a failure to discharge his duties. Those who remember that incident in English history know how far these riots proceeded, how churches were burned, property destroyed, and the lives of citizens endangered ; how the riot continued for some days, until it had assumed the serious proportions of an insurrection before any action was taken by the Government to suppress the riot. The Mayor was held to be responsible for the failure to keep the peace, and he was fined accordingly. It was stated that the military force that was in the city was at his disposal, if the constabulary force was insufficient, and that he had the right to call them out and control them. But, whether they could be ordered out under their officers, whether they were required to obey their officers, and to act as a military body in the discharge of their civic duties, was a question upon which there was, apart from legislation, a difference of opinion. Hon. gentlemen who have read "Clode's book, on the Administration of the Army," will remember that he quotes many cases in which the leading Judges on the English and Irish Bench have expressed different opinions as to the actual condition of the law in this particular. But while no such questions as I have mentioned can arise as to where the jurisdiction is vested, it is clear from the principles there recognised in the administration, that the moment a body is called out for the purpose of preserving the peace, as in suppressing ordinary riots, it is called out under the authority and under the obligations resting upon the Provincial Governments of this country. That being the case, I think we ought to take care in our legislation here that we do not confound the volunteer force of the country, when serving in that civil capacity, with the volunteer force as a military body, unless we are prepared to assume, I may say usurp, the maintenance of the peace of the country and the duties that now constitutionally devolve upon the Local Legislatures. I think we ought not to go so far as the hon. gentleman proposes in the 3rd section of the Bill. For the purpose of further illustrating the idea I wish to convey to the House, I would say that, if at the moment there was a riot or disturbance existing in a city in the Province of Quebec, it is extremely doubtful whether the Government here would have the right to send a military force from the Province of Ontario for the purpose of preserving order in the Province of Quebec. The duty devolves upon the Local Government, and it must depend upon its own citizens. It is quite true we can send the volunteer force of the country to any place we please. It is equally true that, when the volunteer forces of one Province are called from that Province, and are stationed within the limits of another Province, they are for the time being citizens of that Province, in which for the time being they are stationed, and have obligations and duties of citizenship resting upon them, and are amenable to the laws binding upon every citizen for the preservation of the peace. They are precisely in the same position as aliens are in any part of the country. In the event of a riot or disturbance breaking out, it would be the duty of such alien to obey the orders of any party who had a right to command him to assist in the arrest of a criminal or the preservation of the peace. An alien is for that purpose a citizen of the country in which he is, and is subject to its laws. That is precisely the rule here. If a military body is sent from one Province to another, and, while it is in that Province, a disturbance takes place, it may be called out for the preservation or restoration of the peace; but it would not do to call them out simply as a military body, without authority from this Parliament, for they could not then use their arms, and the Local Governments would have in that case to furnish them. It is in the power of the Local Legislature to say that the officers of the Militia Force shall, for the purpose of suppressing riots and preserving the peace, be constituted and held to have the same rank as in a constabulary force. I think that, in this Bill, the Government have confounded the duties which devolve upon a constabulary force with the duties which devolve upon a Militia force, and they are proposing to interfere with civil rights and encroach upon the liberties of the subject.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I hardly thought the point raised by the hon. member for Bothwell came up in the harmless Bill before the House, but, if it does, there will be abundant opportunities of dealing with the matter in Committee. The question of whether the Militia on duty should act as special constables or not is an important one, but that, too, can be considered in Committee of the Whole.

MR. BLAKE: I think the question has been very rightly raised by my hon. friend at this stage, because, as I have had occasion more than once to mention, it is extremely important that the House should have an opportunity at more than one stage of considering what are the objections to Bills. The hon. gentleman opposite will have an opportunity now of considering this point, which, perhaps, would not have attracted his attention if my hon. friend had not mentioned it. It is questionable, apart from the point of jurisdiction, whether this clause should pass in this shape. I confess I do not precisely understand its full effect. It seems to me to be framed in a manner which is not consistent with the principles which I understand regulate these relations of civil and military jurisdiction. Provision is made, not on occasions of riot or disturbance, but on peaceful ceremonial occasions, upon which there is no likelihood of any riot or disturbance, that a portion of the Militia shall be called out. They are to act as special constables, which would make them civil officers, amenable to any order of those persons who ordinarily control special constables. We find here, however, that while they are named as special constables in one breath, the clause orders them to obey the commands of their officers, and proceeds to state that they “Shall be considered to act as such so long as they remain so called out, but they shall act only as a military body, and shall be individually liable to obey the orders issued by their immediate military commanding officer only.”

The civil power is in no way concerned in the calling out of the force. The case to which hon. gentlemen have alluded, arose, as I remember it, upon one of those peaceful occasions to which we have referred. It was at a drawing-room held during the visit of His Excellency and Her Royal Highness to the city of London. On that occasion a number of persons were naturally anxious to pay their respects to those distinguished personages and, I believe, a bayonet was pointed at some rather intrusive gentleman.

MR. MASSON: No, he placed the rifle crosswise.

MR. BLAKE: I do not know how he used the rifle, but I object altogether to any law which shall prevent the citizens of this country from appealing to the Courts of this country, which shall preclude that appeal by the statement that the offender, under such circumstances, obeyed the order of some captain, major, or colonel of the Militia. I say we should not create any such defence to any such action.

MR. MASSON: The Militia may be called out any day by the civil authority not merely to prevent an actual riot, but in apprehension of a riot, that is, when the riot is threatened; and, if this power is given in apprehension of a riot, surely there should be power in actual danger to an armoury or any place over which the military mount guard; and it is only reasonable in that case that there should be this clause, that:

“Every officer, non-commissioned officer and man of such active militia or portion thereof shall, on every such occasion, obey the orders of his immediate commanding officer, and the officers, non-commissioned officers, and men, when so called out, shall, without any further or other appointment, and without taking any oath of office, be special constables, and shall be considered to act as such so long as they remain so called out; but they shall act only as a military body and shall be individually liable to obey the orders issued by their immediate commanding officer only.”

MR. MACKENZIE: But who calls them out? Before, they were to be called out by a civil magistrate.

MR. MILLS: That is exactly the point.

MR. MASSON: That is not the point.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman opposite is mistaken. These clauses make an entire difference. As soon as a magistrate has called the Active Militia, that moment they become peace officers; but you are now making them peace officers without being called out by a magistrate.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I do not see the difference, I must say. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), say it is a fusion of military and civil authority, and that we have no right to do this. Now, it makes no difference whether the troops are called out by the magistrate or by any other authority. They are a military body, and, if we have no power to combine the military and civil authority in a military body, we have no power to appoint them peace officers under the authority of a magistrate. Either we have the power or we have not; the power of appointment of peace officers either rests with the Dominion Legislature or it rests with the Local Legislatures. The Militia Act of 1868 provides that, no matter how called out, if called out for legitimate purposes by a magistrate, they are called out for a military purpose, and, being so called out, both Acts—the Act of 1868 and the proposed Act—say that they shall have power as peace officers. And the hon. gentleman says, in both cases, that is beyond our jurisdiction; that that belongs to the Local Legislature. The Militia Act provides that, although called out to act as peace officers, they shall not be liable to the magistrate, but only to their own officers, commanding them as military officers. The fusion between military and peace officers is just the same in both cases; the fact that they are called out in aid of the civil power makes no difference; in either case they are called out in aid of the law by the law; and, if we have the right to call them out to guard the Royal residence, or to guard the armoury, we have the same right as when called out by a magistrate as peace officers, to declare that they shall act as peace officers under the directions of their military officers alone.

MR. BLAKE: As I understand the existing law, it provides that, when the Militia are called out in aid of the civil power, they are to act as a military body in aid of the civil authority. But we must remember that they can be called out only by the civil magistrates. If the magistrates think it necessary, they can invoke the aid of the Militia in case of a breach of the peace. Then the civil power is the dominant, or moving power, and takes the initiative. There is no intervention of the civil power, however, in the action of these guards of honour. They are neither called out by the magistrate, nor are they in anywise under their authority after being called out. In the character of the occasion, and also in the absence of an initiative by the civil power, there are distinctions between this and the old law, which require our consideration.

MR. COURSOL: Having for several years had some experience in military matters, in connection with the Volunteer Force, I may be allowed to say a few words on this subject. I believe that the promoter of the Bill does not intend it to enable the military to shoot down citizens with impunity. I only regret that it does not cover all the occasions on which the volunteers are liable to be called out, and on which they are often unable to protect themselves from annoyance and even insults. As it is, however, the Bill aims at preventing any collision between citizens and volunteers. It is well known that the volunteers may be called out on other occasions besides that of assisting the civil authority. In many cases, they have nothing to do with the magistrate; I mean in the case of a review or sham-fight, and so on; on which occasions large numbers of citizens will gather together, and collisions have sometimes, unintentionally perhaps, on either side, taken place; but the volunteers, being under arms, could not leave their regiment or brigade. And, as it often happens that sufficient policemen cannot be stationed at different points on the ground, to be of any real use, the soldiers themselves, being constituted peace officers under this law, could render this service effectually.

MR. MACKENZIE: If the speech we have listened to from the hon. member for Montreal East (Mr. Coursol) embodies the views of the Government, then upon any occasion it will be competent for the Governor-General, by special order in that behalf, to clothe the military with these extraordinary powers. This is handing the whole thing over to the Governor-in-Council, and he may order them out whenever he, in his discretion, sees fit, and make every soldier a peace officer.

MR. BLAKE.

The authority given by the last clause of the first sub-section is one of a most extensive character, and one which no Legislature should submit to.

MR. MASSON: According to the hon. gentleman's argument you would have to put an officer at every point of the field in the case of a review or sham fight.

MR. MILLS: Leaving out of consideration for a moment the question of jurisdiction, you will see that as the law stands in England, while the force acts under the command of a military officer, still the officer and the men under him act under the guidance and control of the civil authorities. The commander has no power to come out of himself; he comes out at the instance of a magistrate, and the application must be made in writing and signed by the party in presence of a witness. I remember a case—it is some time since I looked at it—to this effect, that parties were examined in reference to the decision, I think, of Judge Willes, who held that, if an officer, and the men acting under him, took the life of a party, they subjected themselves to the civil law of the country; and General Napier observed that officers and soldiers were placed in a very awkward position, being liable to punishment by court-martial if they disobeyed orders given by superior officers, and, on the other hand, liable, under the civil law, to be hanged if they did obey those orders. This Bill proposes to confer upon the Governor-in-Council the power that under the English law is only given to a magistrate.

Bill read the second time.

* House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

MR. BLAKE: I would like to understand, supposing any unwarrantable act is done by a soldier under the command of his officer, whether there would be any liability on the part of the soldier for that act.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: By all means, he would be liable if the act were illegal.

MR. BLAKE: And would there be any liability on the part of the officer who gave the order?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is the intention.

MR. BLAKE : If that is the intention, it is not expressed.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : I think it is, very clearly.

MR. MILLS : Does the Premier hold that, if the Act provides that every man or officer shall, on every occasion obey his superior officer, that does not protect the person who obeys the order so given, seeing that the law says he must obey such order ?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : The order must be a legal order.

MR. MILLS : Then the word "legal" should be inserted.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : The Mutiny Act provides that soldiers shall obey the command of their officers, but both officers and soldiers are held below the law, and are liable for any breach of the law ; they are responsible, the officers for giving any illegal orders and the soldiers for obeying them ; just in the same way as a constable acting under a civil magistrate. The constable must obey, you may say, the orders of the magistrate, but the constable and the magistrate will both be liable if the order given and executed is illegal. This being a quasi military body, they are to look for their commands to their own officers alone, just as a body of police must look to the magistrate for orders.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH : If the law makes it imperative upon the soldier to obey the officer under whose command he is, he cannot exercise any judgment ; he is a machine ; and surely, being compelled by law to execute the command of his officer, he cannot be held responsible for the consequences resulting from his enforced obedience to the order given.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : For the maintenance of discipline in the Militia, the law, as contained in the Militia Act, provides that a soldier shall obey the commands of his officer ; but I have no doubt in saying that the command must be a legal command. The only object of the clause is to define, to point out, to whom the soldiers and officers shall look for orders when called out, under the provisions of this Bill.

MR. BLAKE said, if that was the only object, it was clear that the third provision of the Act was unnecessary.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was well there should be uniformity in legislation of this character.

MR. BLAKE : But not a vicious uniformity.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : I do not see the vice in this instance. The law simply says that, if they are called out, say to protect the Governor-General or the Legislature, they shall be under the command of their officers and not extraneous persons.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said the Act would put the Force on the same footing as Her Majesty's Army. In one case, in Halifax, where a soldier was taken to the guard-house, he was gagged by direction of the sergeant. The man died during the night, and both the sergeant and the soldier who carried out his instructions were tried and convicted of manslaughter.

MR. MILLS said he would call attention to the actual state of the law in England, which was given by Mr. Clode, as follows :—

"Such are the grounds upon which the officer would be justified in giving the order ; and the justification of the soldier in obeying it would be, first, under the rule of the common law, that an inferior, in an ordinary criminal case, must be held justified in obeying the directions—not obviously improper or contrary to law—of a superior officer, that is, if the inferior acted honestly upon what he might not unreasonably deem to be the effect of the orders of his superior ; and, secondly, under the Mutiny Act and Articles of War.

"Unfortunately, Chief Justice Bushe is said to have thrown some doubt upon the question whether a soldier is so bound to obey his officer, as to be free from criminal responsibility for the act of obedience. At the trial arising out of a riot at Newtonbarry, Wexford, in July, 1831, in reply to enquiry by the jury, whether, 'If a military body be called out, and if the commander gave the order to fire, are those acting under his orders exempt from the consequences?' he is reported to have said, 'My opinion is that no subject of the King is bound to obey an illegal order, and if an officer gives an illegal order, those who obey him are not exempt.' A ruling which, however, assumes the whole question.

" 'If this be true,' said Sir Charles Napier, 'such a principle dissolves the army at once ; it reduces the soldier to a choice between the hanging—awarded to him by the local law—for obeying his officer, and the shooting—awarded by the military law—for disobeying his officer. In such law there is neither sense nor justice, and (being one of those unlucky red-coated gents thus agreeably placed between shooting and hanging) I beg to enter my protest against this choice of deaths. If such is law, the army must become a deliberative body, and ought to be composed of attorneys, and the Lord Chancellor should be Commander-in-Chief.'

"It is presumed that such is not the law, but so long as the military are acting in the bona fide discharge of their duty, obedience to a military command is a justification. 'How far,' said Mr. Justice Willes, 'the orders of a superior officer are a justification to his inferior who acts on them, I do not undertake to decide. Of course, in actual war with reference to foreigners, there is an absolute justification. With regard to Englishmen in England, questions have been raised. I believe the better opinion to be that an officer or soldier acting upon the orders of his superior not being plainly illegal, is justified; but, if they be plainly illegal, he is not justified as to Her Majesty's subjects, though he is as to foreigners; for as to them, it would be an act of war if Her Majesty chooses to ratify it.' The Legislative Council of India, in framing their Criminal Code, in 1860, put forward this case of absolute obedience and consequent immunity as an illustration. 'A,' a soldier, fires on the mob by the order of his superior officer in conformity with the commands of the law. 'A' has committed no offence.

"Probably the indictment preferred at the Summer Assizes for 1864, at Exeter, against Major-General Hutchinson (in command of the Western District, for the death of a man resulting from the artillery practice at Plymouth, negligence being imputed to the accused), is the most recent instance of criminal proceedings being taken against a military officer. 'Maaslaughter,' Justice Byles charged the jury, 'is where one man is killed by the culpable negligence of another. If in using the place for firing, although it might be too low (for safety), he was simply obeying the military orders of his superior, in my opinion he would not be guilty of maaslaughter'—transferring, I presume, the criminal responsibility to such superior giving the order.

"It is clear that there is no exact definition of what are the relative duties of the civil and military authorities when acting together in the suppression of riot. Of this the late General Sir Charles Napier made serious complaint. His contention was that, in riots, the whole responsibility of calling out the military should rest with the civil magistrate; but that, when the military were called out they should have a separate and distinct action and responsibility; that the civil magistrate should act with his constabulary under his own code till he can act no longer; and that then the military officer should act with his force and under his code."

Hon. gentlemen would see from this quotation that the law was not settled on this point.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said hon. gentlemen evidently believed that the object of this little Bill was to overturn the Constitution, and bring about a military despotism in the country. The Government did not propose to bring any such force into the country as suggested by the hon. member for West Durham. The technical objection had been raised that, unless the civil authorities set the law in motion, we had not the power to authorise the calling out of the Militia. Hon. gentlemen opposite said we could not make the Force act as special constables, but the Bill only proposed to change the machinery by which this could be done, from that adopted by the Militia Act of 1868. It made no difference who set the law in motion, the same authority in both cases, an Act of this Parliament, existed for calling out the Militia; but he thought the power of setting the law in motion might be just as safely vested in a responsible Minister of the Crown as in a magistrate. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) seemed to think that the Militia was a foreign mercenary force, ready to shoot down the people without mercy. He should remember that the members of the Force belong to the people, and would not use their powers improperly. Both officers and men were just as intelligent and felt their responsibility just as much as the magistrates whom the hon. member would like to have control of the forces. Allusion was made to a case in London where the force was called out to do honour to the representative of the Queen, but it should be understood that on such occasions as this the men were acting as much as guardians of the peace as military guards. The hon. member for West Durham referred to shooting down people upon the streets.

MR. BLAKE: I did not say shooting them.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: The hon. gentleman asked if the hon. Minister meant to shoot down the people.

MR. BLAKE: The hon. Minister said the man would have a rifle in his hand, with power to use it, and I asked whether he meant the man should have power to shoot down people.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: The hon. gentleman meant that we were giving the man power to shoot down people. Hon. members opposite should remember that on a certain occasion the Militia were called upon in large numbers to fill the streets of one of our most populous cities, and ammunition served out with the intention of preventing any breach of the peace.

MR. MACKENZIE: Who did it?

MR. KIRKPATRICK: It took place when the last Government were in power. We know that the orders came from the hon. gentleman's Government giving the magistrate the power to so use the force.

MR. MACKENZIE: No.

MR. MASSON: The hon. gentleman does not mean to say that he was not consulted in regard to that matter.

MR. MACKENZIE: I do.

MR. MASSON: Then I am very much mistaken.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman cannot say that I was consulted. I informed the Mayor that, if the force was called out, we would make arrangements to send our own batteries there. I had no right to advise anything, and the hon. gentleman should not make capital out of this matter.

MR. MASSON: I state that the hon. gentleman was consulted upon the subject of sending troops to Montreal.

MR. MACKENZIE: By whom?

MR. MASSON: By the General in command of the division.

MR. MACKENZIE: The General had no more authority than I had to call out the troops.

MR. MASSON: The General in command consulted the hon. gentleman during the Montreal riots.

MR. MACKENZIE: He did not. I consulted him in regard to taking command himself if the troops were called out. The calling out of the troops was a matter with which I had nothing to do.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: I raised this point for the purpose of showing the slurs cast upon the Volunteer Force, and to prove that the force was called out and their services availed of by the hon. gentleman himself, on an important occasion.

MR. MACKENZIE: We never did so. We could not legally call out one man.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: Then I am certain we must have been misled about everything that occurred at that time, if the hon. gentleman's Government and the Minister of Militia were not responsible. We know that the Government introduced a Bill to defray the costs and charges of calling out the troops in such cases out of the general expenses of the country. I would like to call attention to a very important omission in the present Militia Act, which I think should be rectified in the Bill passing through the House. There is at present no power given to the commanding officer to discharge any man from his corps without going through the formalities of a court martial.

MR. BLAKE: The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) says he must protest against the apprehension expressed on this side that the Volunteer Force would shoot down citizens in the streets—against the sneer at that force. It is not we, but the hon. gentleman, who is attempting to create some little political capital by suggesting that we expressed such apprehensions and uttered such sneers. In dealing with legislation on subjects of this description, we are bound, no matter who the persons are to whom special powers are to be given, to consider the possibility of the misuse of such powers, to remember that, in a moment of excitement, there may be some abuse of powers conferred on individuals in the interest of the public. It is our duty to recollect this principle, and guard the public against the possibility of such an abuse of power. These observations should be permitted without the slightest suggestion that the making of them is a sneer upon the Volunteer Force generally, or indicates an apprehension of a general misuse of such power. Nobody suggested that this force stood in the same position as a horde of foreign mercenaries; nor does any one believe that it, or even individual volunteers, as a rule, would, willingly, in cold blood, abuse their powers. But it is a large force, numbering many thousands, including members whose tempers are hasty, whose judgment is not the coolest; and, when you place them in trying circumstances, and entrust them with unusual powers, it is expedient to see that they are made responsible for the use they make of their weapons and their authority. Now, with reference to the suggestion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Kirkpatrick), that it is becoming in the Parliament of a free people to agree that it is much better and safer to give to the Government, the political Executive, the power of calling out the military, than to leave it with the civil power—if I had wanted to cast back upon the hon. gentleman the aspersion which he has attempted to cast on this side, I would have referred to the sneers thus cast upon the magistracy of the country—to the implied suggestion that they were unworthy and unfit to exercise the powers the law has wisely and properly entrusted to them of calling out the Militia. I do not say that the magistrates are all wise, are all sure to act rightly upon all occasions, are all Solomons. I could not say that of all the members of this House. But, notwithstanding, we are entrusted with very large powers in the management of the concerns of this country, and so of the magistrates; you must take them as a whole. It is an old doctrine—not I hope so old as to be worn out—that a constitutionally governed people should be extremely jealous of establishing in any shape or sense, however limited, martial law, or in according to the political Executive the duty or power of calling out the military. The hon. gentleman might almost as well suggest that we should change that old constitutional rule, take away the power given to the magistrates, and give to the Governor-in-Council the right to determine in all cases when the military force should be called out.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: With all due respect to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake), who has, in a very calm, judicial tone, lectured me for daring to find fault with anything he says, I must say a few words. I, a very humble member, admit I ventured to protest against some of his remarks, for which I have received from him, in a totally different tone from that in which he ordinarily addresses the House, a long lecture on my duty, and the manner I should assume here.

MR. BLAKE: No, no.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: I am very much obliged to the hon. gentleman; but will leave it to the House whether I was not justified in protesting against his sneers against the Volunteer Force. He said he would not trust himself to any captain, colonel or private of that force.

MR. BLAKE: I did not.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: I did not say, what the hon. gentleman charges me with having said, that the Act should be changed, and that the sole power to call out the military should be thrown on the Government. But I said that, if the magistrates should have the power of calling out the military to set the law in motion, in apprehension of a riot, I thought we could not go far wrong in entrusting that duty to responsible Ministers, in the cases prescribed by the Act. We know that, with the exception of such cases as the Montreal riot, the volunteers would be called out without ammunition; so there would be no likelihood of their shooting down the people.

MR. BLAKE: The Bill says they shall have ammunition.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: Is it likely that, when called out to form a guard at the opening and close of the Legislature, or for attendance upon the Governor-General, the men would have twenty rounds of ball ammunition served out to them?

MR. CASGRAIN: Why not?

MR. KIRKPATRICK: If the hon. gentleman, who thinks such a thing likely, ever gets into the Government, I should like to relieve him of that power; but I do not think it is likely to be exercised by the present Government. Little confidence as I had in the last Government, I would as soon have entrusted it with the power of calling out the Force for the purposes mentioned, as some of the magistrates, against whom I uttered no sneer, any more than the hon. member for West Durham himself, who admitted they were not all Solomons.

MR. CASGRAIN: I want to understand the Bill. Now is the time to make it clear and cut clean. If I understand the hon. Premier, he says a soldier is obliged to obey orders, but that they must be legal orders. Is the soldier to be the judge of their legality or illegality? Does he intend to say that with our Militia Force as composed, one brother would fire at another? Does he think that the soldier in such cases would not judge as to the validity of the order? You must make the law clearer. If the soldier is obliged to obey under this law, he must not be responsible for carrying out his orders, he being a mere machine. The law should be understood by all, and not have to be interpreted after action under it, as now, by the leader of the Government. Let us decide, one way or the other, whether the soldier may or may not disobey any of his orders, or submit to them without personal responsibility.

MR. KIRKPATRICK suggested the re-introduction of the clause in the Act of 1863, omitted from the Act of 1868, with reference to striking off the roll of the company or corps members guilty of disobedience, neglect or misconduct. At present, a commanding officer could not expel a member for such offences. He (Mr. Kirkpatrick) thought the restoration of the clause very desirable.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he hoped his hon. friend would not press his motion now. There must have been some good reason for the omission of the clause, and he would like to consult General Smyth and the military authorities before deciding on the matter.

Bill ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

(In the House.)

Bill reported.

MR WHITE (Cardwell): As a question of fact has arisen, with regard to an event that occurred in Montreal, I desire to read two paragraphs from letters addressed by the hon. member for Lambton, then Premier, to the Mayor of that city. The first is dated the 18th of June, 1878, and referred to the question of the magistrates calling out the troops.

"Of course, I am quite aware that the maintenance of order is in the hands of the local authorities, but I am desirous of aiding as far as the law permits the Federal Government to do so, and perhaps you will not seriously object to my expressing my opinion to you personally as to what I think it would be advisable to do."

That was written on the 18th June, long before any question of the magistrates calling out the troops had arisen. Then, in a subsequent letter, of 3rd July, also before the question of the magistrates calling out the troops had arisen, the hon. gentleman wrote thus, in the last paragraph of his letter to the Mayor of Montreal:—

"I have also to ask that you should consider what force may be necessary, and make a requisition either upon the Lieutenant-General in Command, at Ottawa, or upon the Deputy Adjutant-General, as you deem best, at as early a day as possible, and I will see that the troop, immediately in the pay of the Dominion, as well as some other volunteer regiments, are available for the preservation of the peace."

I think, in view of that statement, the assertion of the hon. member for Frontenac was perfectly correct.

MR. MACKENZIE: It is not correct. There is nothing in those letters that impugns my statement. The troops were called out by the magistrates of Montreal. I asked them to make a requisition either upon the Commanding Officer at that city, or the General here, if they made any requisition, and that I would send the two batteries among the other troops that would go thither. That was all. There is nothing in those letters that I feel in the slightest ashamed of, or that casts a shadow of blame on the late Government. But there is a great deal reprehensible in the conduct of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, and others on that side, in endeavouring to make political capital on both sides, with the Orangemen on the one hand and the Catholics on the other. I look back with unmixed pleasure to the course the late Government pursued in aiding to keep the peace, and I am very glad we sent General Smyth to command the troops in Montreal on that occasion. It had the effect of preserving order in Montreal in a way in which it could not have been maintained, if hon. gentlemen like the hon. member for Cardwell had had their own way in the transaction.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I look with unmixed pleasure, as well as the hon. member for Lambton, on the course he took on that occasion, because it appears to have had a good effect in maintaining the peace and preventing bloodshed. I think the hon. gentleman deserves credit for that action, but the wonder is that he denied having taken any action on that occasion. He first said he had no right to consult the Major-General, but in his last sentence uttered, he said he was very glad he had sent Major-General Smyth to Montreal to keep the peace. It was denied that the hon. member for Lambton had acted; but it is now admitted that he not only acted, but acted successfully; the recollection of which excites his pleasure. He should not allow his modesty to prevent his acknowledging his real merits in this matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE: What the hon. the Minister of Militia said was that I consulted with Major-General Smyth about the calling out of the troops, and I deny I had any consultation with him on the subject. I said we consulted together about the course he was to pursue as commanding officer; but we did not, and had no business to, consult about calling out the troops. For that matter, I stated distinctly that neither he nor I had any business with or control over it.

Mr. MASSON: The hon. member, as leader of the Government, interfered in the matter, when he should not have done so until he had in his hands the requisition of the magistrates.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think I had a right to express my opinion, as the head of the Government, to the chief magistrate of the largest city in the Dominion, with a hope that he would endeavour to preserve order when a civil commotion was threatened. If I had no right to do that, I had no right to do anything, being responsible, as I was, for the government of the country. But I can quite understand the course the hon. gentleman and his associates are pursuing, did pursue in in that matter, and have pursued ever since. It is to endeavour to distract the attention of the public from the real merits of the matter, and they are perfectly indifferent whether the city and the country sink or swim, so that they are able to make some political capital out of it. I wish them joy of all the capital they can make out of it, for it will be but short-lived. The country knows what it has suffered from trusting its safety to them.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell): I desire to disavow any intention of making political capital out of this matter. I entirely approved, and approve now, of the policy the hon. gentleman pursued at that time. I have no hesitation in saying here that the course he pursued was a good one in the interest of the peace of the city of Montreal. But I desire to call attention to the fact that the discussion in relation to the Bill has been entirely as to whether the Governor-General's advisers shall have anything to do with calling out the troops. Yet here is a statement made by the hon. gentleman that he himself, at a time of great difficulty in the country, wrote to the chief magistrate of the city, inviting him to act in the matter, prompting him to act, and offering the whole power of the Federal Government to back his action up. Now, it seems to me that, in view of that, it can hardly be said by hon. gentlemen opposite that this Bill contains anything which is likely to be injurious to the interests of the people of this country.

Mr. ANGLIN: Hon. gentlemen in referring to this matter seem to forget—I will not say conveniently forget—that the Mayor of Montreal, on that occasion, did not act upon the advice of the Premier of the day. Other magistrates acted according to their own judgment in calling out the troops. But, although no action was taken on the suggestion of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) to the Mayor of Montreal, I think, on the whole, that from a party point of view it was exceedingly impolitic to make that suggestion. I was glad to find that the hon. member for Lambton rose above mere party considerations in a case of that kind, and was desirous that, if the troops were to be called out at all, those approaching to the character of regulars should be employed on that occasion, as being more amenable to control and less likely to be led away by their personal feelings and prejudices. I believe, as a matter of fact, that these bodies of troops did act properly and well on that trying occasion, while it is known that some volunteers who were called in from the outlying parts of the country acted very improperly. At all events, when the hon. member for Lambton made a denial, it was not a denial of having suggested to the Mayor of Montreal what he thought should be done to preserve the peace on that occasion, but it was a denial of the statement that he had himself called out the troops, or had anything to do with calling out the troops, or that he had consulted the Major-General with regard to the manner of calling out the troops. That denial has not been impugned in any way. I presume that he, and he only, had the right to call upon the Major-General to assume command on that occasion in person, and in doing that he must have impressed on him the serious character of the crisis.

Bill read the second time.

BILL.—[BILL 7.]

(Mr. Baby.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. BABY: Before I propose the second reading of this Bill, I think it but just to make some explanations of its character. When I introduced it, a few days ago, I stated that besides consolidating the Laws now in force, it contained some amendments which were, some merely verbal, and others tending to harmonise the different Acts, and to put them into such a shape that they might be more readily understood, and finally, some quite new in their character. For the intelligence of these remarks, I may say that the amendments in question can be divided into five classes. First, are the verbal amendments, properly speaking, which do not change the law but simply harmonises the Acts sought to be consolidated; these Acts, not being few in number, and having been amended at different times, might lead to some confusion in their interpretation. Secondly, the incorporation of so much of the 37 Vic., cap. 8, as relates to the compounding of spirits. This amendment will not impose any new duties, or any additional restrictions on compounders, but only transfer from the Act in question to this one that which forms part of the Excise Laws, entitled an Act to impose licences upon the compounders of spirits. Thirdly, some slight changes in the rates of duties are made, in order to avoid fractions of cents: First, the present duty on methylated spirits is 14·4c.; it is proposed to make the duty 15c.; secondly, on vinegar, the present duty is 3 6-11c. without regard to quality or strength; now it is proposed to define the later and make the duty 4c.; thirdly, the duty on spirits made out of molasses, in bond, in excess of the duty on spirits made from raw grain, is 3·6c. and this was equivalent to the Customs duty paid on grain, and the Excise duty paid on malt used by distillers from raw grain. It is now proposed to make the extra duty only 3c., which is deemed to be a sufficient equivalent for the grain and malt duty. Fourthly, the additional duty of 2c. per gallon on spirits made exclusively from malt in bond is proposed as an equivalent for the duty paid by distillers from raw grain on the malt necessarily used by them with their grain, and as a compensation for the survey of the malt-houses, when the malt from which this class of spirits is produced is malted. It is evident, therefore, that the above spirit duties do no more than classify the spirits as those—chiefly made from raw grain; exclusively from molasses in bond; and exclusively from malt in bond. Generally, the amendments in relation to distilleries do not impose additional restrictions, and are only intended to make the law clearer, an object which all legislators must have in view. Here, I might say, that one of the amendments refers to chemical stills. At present, there is no provision in the law authorising the use of such stills, except upon the payment of the full amount of a distiller's licence fee, and compliance with all the conditions imposed in the licence. Several applications having been made from time to time by respectable chemists for permission to use small stills in their business—not for manufacturing spirits, but for reclaiming the same, which would otherwise be lost, from pharmaceutical preparations, it was deemed proper to accede to the request. In England, the use of such stills is legal on payment of a small fee, and it is proposed to introduce the same practice here. The fee charged will be $10. Fourthly, the charge of a small licence fee for bonded warehouses and the increase of the licence fee for manufacturing tobacco. On the first point, I think it is but right to dispel, in a few words, any doubts that may arise in the matter. It has been said, somewhere, that Government had the intention of charging double fees to the manufacturer, that is to say, that it would exact a fee for the licence and another for the bonded warehouse, whilst now the fee was for both. I may say at once that it is not the intention of the law to impose an extra charge for a bonded warehouse that is already comprised in the licence, and granted to a manufacturer. The object of this clause is to oblige every person who desires to have a bonded warehouse outside of his business premises to pay a small fee, which will, to some extent, meet the expenditure for travelling expenses and others incurred by the Department, from the fact of these warehouses being situated sometimes at a great distance from the head office. The demand for such bonded warehouses, which always require a great deal of supervision on the part of the officers of the revenue, has been continually increasing. Applications are made every day, and, if no restrictions are put upon the multiplicity of such places, by-and-bye every manufacturer, every tradesman and retailer, will ask for a bonded warehouse; and where will the line be drawn? To protect the revenue, the Department would feel obliged then to increase the number of officers to a considerable extent, thereby considerably diminishing our Excise revenue. As the law now stands, a fee is charged for having a bonded Custom-house; and there can be no hardship in the Government charging also for Excise bonded warehouses. Now, respecting the second point, I may say that the present license fee on tobacco manufactories is $50. To the large manufacturer this is a very small matter as compared with his whole business. But the smallness of the fee is no compensation for the surveillance of the many small factories, established, very often, at considerable distances from the Inland Revenue offices. In many instances the travelling expenses and other costs of survey amount to as much as, if not more than the duties collected and the licence fee put together. Moreover, there is very great danger that the whole revenue will not be collected at the out-of-the-way places. It is therefore proposed to advance the license fee from $50 to $75, as a means of checking the increase in the number of such factories. Fifthly, we have come to the most important amendment contained in the new law, that respecting the cultivation, manufacturing, and charge of duty on Canadian tobacco. I trust that the hon. members representing rural constituencies will give more than a hurried attention to my remarks on this subject, as it interests the farmer in a high degree. So far, an Excise duty has been placed upon Canadian grown tobacco. Last year that duty was reduced from 10c. upon the raw leaf to 4c. Now, it is the intention of the law to do away entirely with the duty on the Canadian raw leaf, in order to give to this industry all the Protection it is entitled to. For a number of years it has been the experience of the officers of the Inland Revenue Department that there was a very considerable illicit trade being carried on in the raw leaf of Canadian grown tobacco, and that this trade was not to the advantage of the manufacturer, not to the advantage of the grower, but to the advantage of the illicit dealer only, a large revenue being lost to the country thereby. After thoroughly examining the question, the Government, and both the manufacturers and the growers, saw that it would be to their interest to have a law which, whilst doing away with many restrictions now existing and wiping off altogether the duty on the common raw leaf, would protect all parties interested, including the revenue. Hence, in the Bill now introduced, the important changes, of which I am about to give you, Mr. Speaker, a short synopsis. They are: Firstly, To limit the unlicensed cultivation of tobacco by restricting it to the quantity usually considered necessary for the personal use of the cultivator; and the members of his family, resident with him on the farm; the quantity being estimated at 30lb. per annum for each adult male; only 10lb. for each family being now allowed by law, a quantity found to be inadequate. Secondly, That the cultivation of tobacco for sale shall only be permitted by those who take out a license to that effect. For such a license it is not proposed to charge any fee, but the cultivator will be required to give an account of what he grows and how he disposes of it; a most reasonable request, all will admit. Thirdly, The cultivator may also be licensed (without fee) to manufacture common Canadian twist tobacco, and sell it, but he will be bound to stamp such tobacco, at the rate of 4c. per pound, before he offers it for sale. Fourthly, Tobacco may be taken direct from a farm to a licensed warehouse, loose or unpacked, but with the exception that both leaf and manufactured tobacco must, when in transit, be in stamped packages; not duty stamped, of course, as the Excise duty is only payable on the manufacturing of the tobacco. Fifthly, Manufactured tobacco, made exclusively from Canadian leaf, in manufactories wherein no foreign leaf is used, will be charged with a lower rate of duty than tobacco in the manufacture of which foreign leaf enters. This is a great advantage, and a proper protection is given to the Canadian grown tobacco. This duty consists in 14c. on every pound of manufactured Canadian tobacco, instead of 20c. upon that of American manufacture, upon 30c. per pound on cigars made out of the Canadian leaf, against 40c. per pound on cigars made from American leaf. Everybody will see, at a glance, the changes thus operated—in fact it is a reduction in favour of the farmer or grower of 10c. per pound. Then it is the intention of the Government to grant licences at a reduced fee for the manufacture of Canadian tobacco. As the law stands now, there is only one licence granted for the manufacture of tobacco of all description made entirely of the foreign leaf, or partly of the foreign leaf and partly of Canadian leaf. Now, the manufacturer may, if he thinks proper, separate the Canadian from the American leaf. Whomsoever wishes to manufacture Canadian-grown tobacco alone can do so by paying a license less than the license imposed for the manufacture of tobacco from the American leaf. Yet this is meant to protect the Canadian grower and to give him a market to enable him to go to the manufacturer and sell his tobacco openly, instead of smuggling it as has been done, everybody must admit, for a number of years past. I think this great change is to the advantage of the manufacturer, as well as to the grower, and will be beneficial likewise to the public revenue. Whenever anything, which will tend to the happiness and welfare of the Canadian people can be encouraged, I think we ought to do it. We do not go, perhaps, as far as we would like to in this respect, but it is, nevertheless, a step in the right direction, I am sure, and the people of the rural districts must be impressed with the idea that the Government is not indifferent to their welfare. There are other amendments, also, respecting tobacco, but they relate to all manufactured tobacco, such as the establishing of a uniform standard in reference to moisture, namely, 90 per cent. of solid matter, and 10 per cent. of moisture. The putting upon the market of all manufactured tobacco in stamped packages only, distinguishing the American from the Canadian; the removal of stamps from all emptied boxes; the stamping of all imported packages of tobacco, etc., etc. All the above amendments are not without their importance, and have been introduced after much mature reflection. Sixthly, The present law in relation to the manufacture of goods in bond does not state with sufficient clearness the conditions under which the bonded manufacturers license may be granted. The chief article used in these manufactories is alcohol, and the high rate of duty upon it has greatly increased the importance against any illicit use on removal of spirit after it has been entered in a bonded manufactory. It is also necessary to empower the Department to provide more fully against legalising the manufacturers of goods containing articles in such form and proportions as might endanger the public revenue. Methylated spirits and vinegar are the chief products of bonded manufactories, and to render the possibility of fraud, in relation to these articles, to the narrowest limits, it is considered necessary that the Department should absolutely control the quality and strength of the wood-naptha used in the one case, and the strength and quality of the vinegar produced should truly represent the quantity of spirits from which it is alleged to have been made. The amendments proposed are intended to accomplish these objects. The last amendments proposed relate to fines. So far, the penalties imposed by the Act have been altogether too high, so much so that whenever the officers of the Department have had occasion to prosecute anybody in Court, for infringing the provisions of the law, it has been almost impossible to get a verdict. The penalties imposed range up to $500. It is thought proper to reduce these penalties upon the first offence, so that a verdict may be more likely arrived at. People generally say of such offenders, "Oh, it is only the Government that is concerned, why inflict such a high penalty upon a poor man; after all he was only working to keep himself and his family, and he ought not to be punished so harshly for that." It is to avoid this kind of reasoning by juries; and the just punishment of those who infringe the law, that the penalties have been reduced. When we go into Committee I shall have much pleasure in explaining more in detail the changes and amendments proposed in the law. Such are, Mr. Speaker, the remarks that I was bound to offer in proposing the second reading of this Bill. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will now proceed to repeat in French what I have so imperfectly said in English, principally in regard to Canadian tobacco. The principal question which presents itself in connection with the motion for the second reading of this Bill is that as to Canadian tobacco. For several years back, and more especially since the imposition of duties, a solution has been sought to the problem: can the Canadian farmer, under the circumstances in which he is placed, cultivate the plant so as to be remunerated for his labour? It was asserted that the cultivation of the Canadian plant was an injury to the manufacture in this country of tobacco brought from other countries, burthened with heavy duties, and yielding a large revenue to the Treasury. Notwithstanding that the Government last year reduced the duty on Canadian leaf from 10c. per pound to 4c., in order to promote the payment of the tax by the grower, yet I must say that the Treasury has not been largely benefitted thereby. The time has, therefore, come for a calm and deliberate examination of the question, in order to ascertain whether it would not be possible to protect the Canadian grower in the legitimate trade he carries on in that article, without, however, depriving the State of the revenue it must derive from tobacco. At present there is an Excise duty both on the leaf and on the manufacture, and consequently there is this difference: that the tax is 24c. on Canadian tobacco once it is manufactured, and 20c. only on American leaf when it has reached the same point. By the law now introduced it is the intention of the Government to remove that anomaly. Not only do we take off the 4c. on the leaf, but we largely reduce the duty on the manufacture, by putting it at 14c. in place of 20c. Moreover, at present each family is entitled to keep in its possession only 10lb. of Canadian tobacco, any excess being liable to seizure and confiscation. Under the provisions of this Bill, each individual of the family is entitled to keep 30lb. of tobacco for his own consumption. This is most assuredly a very liberal allowance. The surplus may, under license, be converted into twist and sold on the market, when stamped to the amount of 4c. per pound.

MR. BABY.

This is in order to encourage the Canadian grower. It is an undeniable fact that an enormous quantity of tobacco is grown in this country. This article is now so extensively cultivated that farmers deem it a matter of great importance, more especially in the counties situated on the north shore of the river St. Lawrence. So much so, that several proprietors have, to my own knowledge, visited Virginia and South Carolina, in order to study for themselves and ascertain the best mode of cultivating tobacco. They have acquired knowledge, which they are applying with marked success in growing the article in our country, and in fact the quality of our Canadian tobacco is now, if not superior, at least equal to the quality of that grown in the State of Connecticut. As a matter of course I do not speak of those fragrant tobaccos which are grown in the island of Cuba and in the Southern States, and which the soil of Canada cannot produce. Those who have read the proposed amendments will have seen that the Department will require that farmers who cultivate tobacco for sale shall take out a license, which, however, is to be granted free of charge. Fears have been expressed in certain quarters that this license which the Government is about to impose on those who cultivate tobacco for commercial purposes, would be somewhat objectionable, and would be looked upon as a species of encroachment on the liberty of the subject. But all such apprehensions are easily removed. While we desire to protect the producer and the manufacturer of tobacco, we must also protect the Treasury. This is necessary in the interest of the manufacturer, in the interest of the producer himself, because, by protecting the Treasury, we protect both these classes themselves. If this be so, growers of tobacco can manufacture and sell their product openly, and they are not liable to have their tobacco sold at a ruinously low price because of those who seek to avoid paying the duty a practice now carried on on a large scale. Now, by compelling those who wish to grow tobacco for commercial purposes only, to take out a license, the Excise officers know exactly those persons who are licensed and who intend to grow tobacco for commercial purposes, and can more easily look after them and even protect them, if need be, against those who want to defraud the revenue, and do them an injury. Another provision of the law which must, I feel convinced, meet with general approval, is that which relates specially to those persons who are engaged in the cultivation of Canadian tobacco and who have hitherto had, so to speak, no market for their product. Immense quantities of Canadian tobacco are, as it is well-known, disposed of secretly and in violation of the law. Every day the Excise officers are called upon to make large seizures of that article. It is but very rarely that the owner of the tobacco is discovered. It is carried on the railways, steamboats, and highways, and no one knows by whom it is sent or to whom it is to be delivered. These persons give up their whole time, and often the greater part of their small capital, to the cultivation of Canadian tobacco, and then lose it all at a stroke because they will not comply with the requirements of the law. Well, we now say to those persons: "If you desire to sell your tobacco to the large Canadian or American manufacturers, it is quite easy to do it. You can take it to them and dispose of it in broad daylight and for the price it is worth." Our tobacco always commands its price, and if the sales, of which the Department has cognisance, amount to but a few hundreds of thousands of pounds, it is because a very large quantity is sold in secret. But I feel confident, that for the future, when the farmer wishes to dispose of his tobacco, he can take it openly and in broad daylight to the manufacturer, and it will be to the interest of the latter to purchase the Canadian leaf, because he will have a differential duty of 6c. in his favour, as I have already stated, and 10c. on cigars. I think these provisions of the Bill are a step in the right direction, and that they will meet with the approval of this House, and more especially of the hon. gentlemen from the Province of Quebec, whose constituents are so largely interested in the cultivation of the plant. Opinions may differ as to the expediency of encouraging the cultivation of tobacco. It is said to be injurious to health and prejudicial to those who use it, but I leave it to the doctors to decide that question, with that unanimity of opinion which is, seriously speaking, the universal characteristic of the faculty. Moreover, the use of tobacco has now become engrafted on our civilisation, and its cultivation is, to-day, one of the great interests of the country. The Canadian grower has long been asking the Government to grant him the right to cultivate and manufacture the leaf, under suitable restrictions. I think we have discovered the means of meeting the wishes of the people. It is quite possible that the proposed law may not be perfect, no law can be said to be absolutely perfect; but, at all events, I think it is, as I said before, a step in the right direction, and I am confident it will meet with the approval of both sides of the House.

MR. LAURIER: The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, who has just taken his seat, has confined himself in his discourse to treating principally of the Excise duty imposed upon the cultivation of tobacco in the Province of Quebec. For my part, I have not forgotten, and I am convinced that my hon. friend has likewise not forgotten, the torrents of eloquence which were set flowing during the elections of 1878, and for several years before that time, against the tyranny exercised over Canadian farmers, and especially over those of the Province of Quebec, by dealing a blow to the cultivation of tobacco by imposing an Excise duty upon it. Many and many a time I remember to have heard the hon. gentlemen of the right making severe remarks upon their adversaries; not because they had imposed a duty upon tobacco, but because they had judged it proper to make a law to regulate the tobacco trade, and to increase the duty by a few cents. At that time I was of opinion, and I am still of the opinion, that if there is one article which ought to pay a tax that one is tobacco. There can be no doubt on that point. Seeing that the Government requires a revenue, it is clearly preferable to tax objects of luxury, such as tobacco, than objects of prime necessity. It is, in my opinion, infinitely more desirable to put a tax upon tobacco than to put one on flour; and I am convinced that the farmers of Quebec if they had the choice would express themselves as being of the same opinion. Now, as to the amendments proposed to be made to the existing law, the only change effected, if I understand the hon.

Minister, is made under the pretext of lessening the tax. It is alleged that they are going to diminish the duty on tobacco, but, in my opinion, the new provisions of this Bill will have the effect of rendering the duty heavier. As it is levied to-day, the tax is reduced to an insignificant affair, and presses lightly upon the cultivation of tobacco. If I have understood the hon. the Finance Minister, when he made his financial statement, he declared that from his new tax on tobacco he expects to gather a revenue of $200,000. It is evident that if the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, by means of this new law, collects a revenue of $200,000 per annum, this will be a tax which will weigh more heavily upon the cultivators of tobacco than the present one does. Besides, the burden of this tax presses entirely upon the farmers in the Province of Quebec. There is very little tobacco cultivated elsewhere. According to the hon. Minister, the policy of the Government is based upon the supposition that the tax borne by the people at the present moment is too heavy to collect a revenue from it, and they intend to lessen the tax in order to make its collection easier and more general. Consequently, the tax will be heavier next year than it is now. If this is the case, I cannot conceive how the calculations of the hon. gentleman can be realised; I cannot conceive how the cultivation of tobacco will be encouraged. I do not share the views of the hon. gentleman as to the cultivation of tobacco in the Province of Quebec. I have already had occasion to pronounce my opinion upon this question, and I am perfectly convinced that the soil and climate of the Province of Quebec are infinitely better suited to the cultivation of cereals than to that of tobacco. It is known that the tobacco plant is extremely sensitive to climatic changes, and that the Province of Quebec is subject, to a greater degree than the other Provinces, to climatic changes. Up to the present time the cultivation of tobacco has not been profitable. I am much in doubt whether this crop can ever become remunerative, for the simple reason that the climate of the Province of Quebec is not suited to its cultivation. Besides, I doubt much whether these fiscal conditions, imposed by my hon.

friend in the Province of Quebec, will be popular. If he really has at heart the encouragement of this product, if he believes that the soil of the Province of Quebec is as suited to its cultivation as to the cultivation of cereals, why does he wish to injure it by the imposition of a tax? My hon. friend would not desire to impose a tax upon the growing of wheat, and upon that of other cereals. His argument appears to me illogical, if he is sincere in his opinion that the soil of the said Province is more suitable for the cultivation of tobacco than for that of cereals.

MR. BABY: It is as well suited for the cultivation of tobacco as for that of cereals.

MR. LAURIER: Then if the soil of the Province of Quebec is suitable for its cultivation, this is a good reason for favouring its cultivation, and not to impose any tax whatever. I am inclined to believe that making the obtaining of a license a condition by each person wishing to cultivate tobacco for the purposes of trade, will have the effect of putting a powerful restraint upon the farmers. Why would they grow tobacco if it was not for the purposes of commerce? It never has been the intention of any Government to impose a tax upon tobacco consumed on the farm, and it never has been the intention of any Government to compel the taking out of a license for those who grow tobacco for their private use. A license has always been insisted on in the case of those only who sell this article. In this matter my hon. friend makes existing legislation much more onerous than it is by his fiscal restrictions. I am certain that all the speeches, all the harangues which we have listened to about the tyranny of those who would wish to oppress the cultivators of tobacco, will rebound upon the heads of those who, having always protested against any tax whatever being imposed upon tobacco growing, do, nevertheless, impose one at the present hour.

MR. BERGERON: In the Province of Quebec the tobacco question is a very important one. In some of our counties, tobacco is as largely grown as wheat; and if it is now possible for us to compete with American tobacco, it is in consequence of the improvements in the law effected by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue. It is not a matter of surprise to me to see the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), formerly Minister of Inland Revenue, rise to reply to my hon. friend on the subject of the amendments which he has made to that law. He says that our friends imposed a duty on Canadian tobacco. If my recollection serves me, our friends imposed a duty of 6c. on Canadian tobacco, and when the Government, of which the hon. member for Quebec East formed part, was in power, the duty was raised to 10c. a pound. During the last election our friends made this question a point of contest; they maintained that if anything in the country was to be taxed, it should rather be articles of luxury, such as tobacco and liquor, than articles of absolute necessity. That is true, and that course is precisely the one which the Government which is now in power, in accordance with its National Policy, adopted. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, by now placing a duty of only 4c. on Canadian tobacco, proposes to protect our growers and promote the cultivation of home-grown tobacco, in preference to the foreign article. It has been said that the Canadian soil is not adapted to the cultivation of tobacco. It may be so; but if our farmers are content, if Canadians prefer to smoke their pipe of home-grown tobacco in preference to foreign tobacco, why should they be deprived of the privilege? And it was their affair if, on the 17th September, 1878, the Canadian electors declared that it was their desire that the cultivation of tobacco should be favoured by the Government. Why should they now be told that they were wrong, and that the late Government was right when it imposed so heavy a duty on the cultivation of tobacco? The hon. member who has just spoken says that he is satisfied that the law inaugurated by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue will not be popular. That statement is premature; we do not know whether it will be popular or the reverse. In my opinion it will be popular; but one thing we do know, and that is, that the law of the old Government was unpopular. Our farmers had to pay a duty of 10c. a pound, and if they were unable to do so, they had either to give up growing tobacco or else grow it by stealth. Now, a farmer who wishes to make tobacco, can do so openly on payment of a slight duty, and will not be compelled to defraud the Government. We know that it is commonly said that to steal from the Government is no great matter. That went on upon a great scale under the old Administration. It has been said that the old license was not observed. That is true. Should the electors be allowed to believe that, when the Government makes it their duty to take out a license, they ought to pay no taxes? Ought they to be led to believe that they should rob the public chest? No, but under the former Government they had either to pay 10c. a pound, to be able to walk erect and sell their produce without fear, or else they had to sell it in secret and rob the Government. I am of opinion that the cause of the farmers was very well pleaded by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, and that the former Minister of that Department was unable to defend the policy of his Government. No further proof is necessary to show that the electors will be satisfied, and that our Canadians will be content with being able to make tobacco, whether they sell it or smoke it themselves.

MR. BABY: I had intended giving explanations on this subject in Committee, but in order to satisfy my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier, I may tell him that the license will be purely and simply granted, in order to be able to put the farmer in communication with the Government. A responsible officer of the Department will be appointed in every place, where required, in order to issue gratuitously such licenses. In conformity with the Order in Council which we shall subsequently make, these licenses will be sent either to the postmaster of the place, to the secretary-treasurer of the municipality, or to any other person whom the Government may deem suitable. In every case we will give all possible facilities to the farmers to procure these permits. The license will be issued gratuitously. The object of the license is, as I have just stated, to place the Government in connection with those who cultivate tobacco in large quantities, and for purposes of commerce. There are several of them who cultivate, not only hundreds, but thousands of pounds of this commodity. In the counties of Montcalm, Joliette, Berthier and L'Assomption and others, there are farmers who cultivate and gather from 3,000lb. to 5,000lb. of tobacco annually. The Government has a right to know what becomes of this tobacco and where it is consumed.

MR. LAURIER : And if they wish to cultivate it for their own use.

MR. BABY : My hon. friend ought to know that according to the law now in force, each family can only keep at one time 10lb. for its own use, and any surplus is liable to seizure and confiscation. The present Government acts with much more liberality. We allow each member of a family, that is to say, the father and sons, to have and keep 30lb. for his personal use. We speak to them in this way : You are not dealers in tobacco. You may keep so much of it as is necessary for your personal use ; but, if you wish to make a business of it, then you must provide yourself with a license, which will cost absolutely nothing. In this way, none but those provided with a license will be able to sell tobacco to the manufacturer, and also on the market when in a "twist," the law in this case requiring the affixing of a stamp upon each packet of Canadian tobacco, at the rate of 4c. per pound.

MR. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier) : Will the farmers be obliged to give security before obtaining this license, and what will be the consequences of failing to obtain a license ?

MR. BABY : The farmer trafficking in tobacco will not be compelled to give security. There is an error in this respect which occurred when drawing up the section, and which will be remedied in Committee of the Whole. If such a farmer has not this license, the result will be as follows : If he has in his possession a quantity greater than that mentioned in the proposed law, that is to say, 30lb. for each member of the family, the surplus will be liable to seizure and confiscation, in the same manner as provided by the law in force.

MR. GIROUARD : How can the Inspector know whether a field of tobacco will produce more than 30lb. for each member of the family, or more than the quantity required by the family ?

MR. BABY : It is the duty of the officer who issues the license to estimate the probable yield of a field of tobacco.

MR. BABY.

I do not think that any difficulty will be found in this respect. All that we can do is to give every facility possible to the farmers to cultivate tobacco, and to do it in the manner the most practical, and, excuse the expression, the least bothersome. As to the licenses, I repeat that it is the intention of the Government to place them within the reach of the farmers, so that every person may procure one when he requires it, and the stamps will be in the same position.

MR. DUGAS : It is my duty, in the interest of my constituents, to stand up on the floor of this House and speak in favour of this measure, which must be a great advantage to the agricultural community. We all know how we have to make amendments to laws passed years ago ; even the great scheme, the National Policy, experience has shown, requires some slight modification. I was greatly surprised at the remarks made by the ex-Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Laurier). He depreciated the climate and the soil of this country. We are here not to work in the interest of a party, but in the interest of the country. In 1878, a notice of motion was given which had in view the promotion of the interest of tobacco-growing in the Province of Quebec, and I was to second that motion ; and I am glad that the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue and the hon. the Minister of Public Works are fulfilling the promises they made in 1878. The ex-Minister of Inland Revenue said that it was an object of luxury. I certainly differ in this opinion. We want the producer to pay no tax on it whatever ; and that is the object of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue. I am sorry to say that the ex-Minister of Inland Revenue is more actuated by party sentiments than by sentiments of interest for the country. The hon. the ex-Minister of Finance, in his Budget Speech in 1878, said that the predominating interests in Canada were those of the agricultural class. But whatever did he do in the interest of the agricultural class ? It is the duty of the members of this House to vote in favour of the Bill brought forward by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue. I did not intend to make a speech on this matter, but I felt it was my duty to do what I could to promote the interests of the agricultural class. I hope this law now before the House will be passed as it is. I am sure it will be received well by the agricultural class of the country.

MR. PATTERSON (Essex): As I understand the measure brought down by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, its object is to do away with the duties on the Canadian raw leaf tobacco altogether. This, I think, will be highly satisfactory to the people engaged in the cultivation of tobacco, and, as my county is largely interested in that cultivation, I feel it my duty to cordially support this measure; but I do not quite understand the clauses in regard to factories for the manufacture of tobacco. I do not see how a separate factory is to be established for the manufacture of Canadian leaf alone. In the town in which I live there is a manufacturing company; Mr. W. E. Saxton, a large manufacturer from Detroit, having established a tobacco factory, which turns out tobacco for the Canadian market very extensively. He is a large importer, but is willing also to use the Canadian leaf, and to buy the raw tobacco from our farmers; and I think, therefore, it would be better for the manufacturers to have a bonded warehouse on their premises, for the purpose of storing our Canadian leaf. Otherwise our farmers might be deprived of a market; and I am told that the farmers of Essex, who grow tobacco, would be compelled to seek their market at Montreal, and that their profits would be eaten up by the cost of transport. I think, with regard to the imported leaf, which is more valuable than Canadian leaf, there should be in addition to the Inland Revenue duty, per pound, an ad valorem duty. I would urge this upon the consideration of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue. There is not sufficient margin, at present, to encourage the growth of Canadian tobacco. By imposing an additional duty on foreign leaf, in the shape of an ad valorem duty, the tax will be more on a level. An excellent quality of tobacco, can be produced in Essex, especially in the southern townships, and in Pelee Island, and the present changes will tend to foster the growth of the Canadian tobacco, and will, I feel assured, be highly satisfactory to our farmers. I must congratulate the hon. Minister on having had the courage to grapple with this question, which has been shirked by so many of his predecessors, and the country, I doubt not, will appreciate his action.

MR. PLUMB: Coming from a district well adapted for the cultivation of tobacco, and in which tobacco is successfully grown, I feel an interest in this matter; and I must congratulate the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue on his having brought forward a measure for the encouragement of the cultivation of that important staple. We might ask the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, if, with a view to encouraging tobacco-growing in the Dominion, it would not be desirable to give information in regard to the best methods of culture and cure, and to procure and distribute the most suitable kinds of seed, through the local agricultural societies, in those districts where it is desired to make experiments. The laws heretofore existing, and which are by this Bill to be changed, have prevented our farmers, generally, from making extensive experiments; but I may say that during the late war between the Northern and Southern States, when the supply of Southern tobacco was cut off from the Northern States, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Ohio, and some of the States along the border of the slave line, commenced the culture of tobacco, and in Connecticut, where the land had been largely tilled and exhausted, tobacco became a great staple; in Ohio, too, it is now a crop of enormous value, and there is no reason in the world why it should not be an equally valuable crop for Canada. It was necessary to remove the unpleasant restriction which existed in the shape of being subjected to the visit of a tax-gatherer to collect a duty upon whatever tobacco might be grown beyond ten pounds weight, to encourage the farmer to make his experiments on it, and I again congratulate the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, in support of what has been said by my hon. friend from Essex (Mr. Patterson), in having grappled with that difficulty, not so much with the view of raising the public revenue as with the view of giving the agricultural classes a large source of profit, and by giving them a full opportunity to cultivate the tobacco plant. Tobacco is known to be an exhaustive crop; it is known to take out of the soil that which cannot be given back to it; but our soil will bear the crop by rotation for many years without damage. The plant has been cultivated largely, and can be again cultivated, in Ontario, particularly in Lincoln, Kent and Essex. In the Province of Quebec it will be found an important item in the list of crops. Through the arrangement now adopted of getting the revenue from the manufacturer, it will ultimately yield a large revenue to Canada. I remember well, when this matter was under discussion here three years ago, that there was a great difference of opinion between two of the hon. Ministers of the Crown. One, then Minister of Inland Revenue, claimed that the proposition to remove the duty from home-grown tobacco was of no consequence, because it could not be grown in the Lower Provinces; he ridiculed the affair. The other, then Minister of Finance, appealed to the hon. gentlemen, then in Opposition, now on the Treasury Benches, to aid him in sustaining the Excise duty, because, if it were taken off, the Treasury would lose $800,000. But it has been proved that the hon. gentleman who had charge of the Inland Revenue was mistaken in his estimate of the value of this tobacco-culture, or the consequences of removing the duty. There is no reason why it should not be one of the most important staples produced in Canada, and I trust the Bill of my hon. friend will meet with the general acceptance of the House, and that he will receive the credit he is entitled to for having sedulously and laboriously prepared a measure which, I have no doubt, will meet with general favour among the agricultural community throughout the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier): It has been represented from both sides of the House that tobacco is an article of luxury more than of necessity. I believe that, in the opinion of the majority of the people of this country, tobacco is as much an article of necessity as tea or coffee. Thirty or forty years ago tea was almost unknown as a beverage, while to-day it is regarded as an article of necessity. Tobacco stands on the same footing. For that reason I would be in favour of seeing it as lightly taxed as possible. However, for the purposes of revenue, I am perfectly willing that some taxation should be imposed on tobacco, but it seems to me that that taxation should be levied in accordance with the general policy of the present Government, that is, to protect the Canadian product and tax the imported article. The Bill before the House seems to me to be a decided improvement on the tobacco laws introduced by the late Government. We all recollect that the tax then was 10c. per pound on the leaf and 20c. Excise duty, making altogether a tax of 30c. per pound on tobacco of Canadian growth. This was a very heavy burden on the Canadian farmer. The present Bill is more in accordance with the Protective policy of the Government, by introducing a differential duty in favour of Canadian grown tobacco, as against the imported article. But the Bill forces the cultivator to take out a license to raise tobacco for the trade, and to this license I object, in the name of an agricultural county. I doubt that, before imposing this new restriction on the agriculturists of Canada, the Government has seriously considered the consequences of their policy. The "cultivator's license" is a new feature brought into our legislation. It should not be exacted. The farmer should have the privilege of putting into his fields whatever he pleases, free from any restriction or examination by Excise or other officers. I think we ought to do as they do in the United States, where the planter has the privilege of growing as much tobacco as he wants for family consumption. Another important feature of the American law is that no license is required by the planter; and most assuredly, if there is any country interested in seeing that its revenue laws are not evaded in respect to tobacco, it is the United States. We all know that the Southern States are the great tobacco-growing States, and there the planter, although he puts into the soil thousands upon thousands of dollars, worth of tobacco, is not compelled to submit to the annoyance and importunities of Excise officers. I think we ought to follow that example. As in the south, the farmer ought to be forced to sell his tobacco to a licensed dealer, to be found in every village, and to no one else. I think the Bill before the House will produce very serious and damaging results to the grower of tobacco in the Dominion, an especially in the Province of Quebec. Before the farmer becomes aware of the new stringent provisions of the Bill, he will have his crops in orripe, and they will be liable to confiscation, and himself subject to heavy fines. A measure of this kind ought to be announced at least one year before it is submitted to Parliament, or comes into force. With the exception of this cultivator's license I highly approve of the general feature of the Bill; but I object to the agricultural community being subjected to unnecessary restrictions unknown up to the present time in Canada, and which are unknown on the whole of this continent. When the Bill goes into Committee, I shall propose some amendment as far as the cultivator's licence is concerned.

MR. CASGRAIN: To carry out the system of Protection consistently, the cultivation of tobacco should be protected in its entirety, that is to say: it should be free from all taxation; and, on the contrary, a tax should rather be imposed on imported tobacco than on that grown in the country. If my recollection serves me, when the same question was under discussion some two years ago, the Minister of Public Works, and, I think, the Minister of the Interior, also expressed their views in that sense, both verbally and by their votes; and I think that they are now changing their course, that is, that they do not choose to follow up the ideas that they then enunciated. I am of opinion, as has been said by the hon. member who preceded me, that this course will impose a restriction on trade to which a large number of our farmers will be unwilling to submit; that it will impose a restriction which may, up to a certain point, appear to be a simple formality, but which, from the farmer's point of view, is not simply so. He maintains that he has a right to sell his wheat, his barley, and his tobacco, without a license; and this policy is one which, I consider, will recoil upon its authors, who are now putting it in practice. On another hand, since the question now comes squarely before the House, I must as squarely express my opinion against the Bill. It is true that from one point of view the tax appears to be diminished, yet on the other hand the hon. the Minister of Finance tells us that that tax is to yield to the public chest a sum of $200,000. This is how it is asserted that the tax will be diminished. For my part, I do not approve of that policy; and in the name of the Province of Quebec, which is the most interested, because the burden is laid more heavily upon it than upon all the other Provinces, I must oppose this tax.

MR. LANDRY: I ask pardon of the House for venturing to speak immediately after one who considers himself, and wishes to pass for, the authorised chief of the squad which is called the French Liberal faction of the Province of Quebec. Whether or not he speaks in the name of that fraction is his business, and may or may not be satisfactory to those whose mouth-piece he claims to be; but what I deny the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Casgrain) is the right or the liberty which he takes of speaking in the name of the Province of Quebec, as he has just done. We have indeed just listened to him. It was in the name of the Province of Quebec, he said, that he protested against the presenting and the passing of the Bill which the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue has just laid before the House. It is neither the right nor the duty of the hon. member in any way so to express himself, and, for my part, I protest against such an assertion and such an encroachment. This is not the only error of the hon. member. What have we just heard? We can hardly believe our ears; but the hon. member's words have been pronounced, and what did his accusing voice say? That barely two years ago the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Langevin), and the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Baby), rose in this House to protest against the imposing of a tax upon tobacco; but that since that period those two hon. gentlemen had turned aside to approve to-day what they then condemned. Before replying to the accusation itself, may I not ask whether the past conduct of the hon. member for L'Islet does not give me an incontrovertible right to turn to him and enquire whether the course which he proposes to follow now is not in strange contradiction to that which he adopted in 1874, whether he does not to-day burn what he then worshipped? In 1874, when the late Administration called upon the House to impose a tax of 10c. upon Canadian tobacco, what did the hon member for L'Islet do? That virtuous apostle of the people, who does not wish that the people should be taxed, then supported the Government of his friends, and, without a frown, voted for the 10c. tax, and the farmers of his Province then felt the heavy burden of taxation upon their shoulders. That was what he did in 1874; that was what he maintained for the five years during which his friends remained in power, and every effort of our friends to diminish the amount of the tax invariably found an opponent in the hon. member for L'Islet. To-day we find the hon. member for L'Islet, now mounted on the steed of a leader, but still fighting, and always fighting against the interests of the people, in the name of that same people, who certainly did not send him here to display that species of valour. It is, in fact, known to everyone, and the hon. member for L'Islet cannot but be aware, that the present legislation proposed by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Baby) must produce a threefold result. First, It will diminish the tax imposed upon Canadian tobacco. Second, It will promote the cultivation of that aromatic plant. Third, It will produce to the Treasury, by more efficient inspection, a greater revenue. And, Sir, in the face of this threefold benefit, in the face of important improvement in the working of a law which has, up to the present time, given rise to great discontent, we find the hon. member for L'Islet rising, in his indignation, to protest against the proposed legislation, and to refuse, he, one of the members of the Reform party, to refuse to fall in and walk in the path of true reform. What does the hon. member say to explain this anomaly? He repeats the assertion, more than once adduced, that a tax on Canadian tobacco interferes with its cultivation, and is therefore injurious to the interests of the farmer. "Tax foreign tobacco," adds the hon. gentleman, "tax foreign tobacco, and I go with you, for that tax will necessarily promote the sale of our tobacco; but in mercy impose no tax on Canadian tobacco, unless you wish to stop the cultivation of it." Let us examine this question. In my opinion there is nothing easier, and two words will suffice to place it in a proper light. I lay it down as a principle that it is the consumer of an article, and not the producer, who ultimately pays, not only its intrinsic, but also its extrinsic, value. It is the buyer, and not the seller, upon whom the taxes press. The hon. member for L'Islet wishes that foreign tobacco should be heavily taxed; and in this connection I congratulate him upon having at last understood the nature and the value of Protection, and upon his thus endeavouring, though in a somewhat round-about manner, to cause the principles upon which it rests to triumph. If tobacco grown in foreign countries is subjected to a high tax, the farmer will necessarily, in order to escape the obligation of paying a considerable sum, himself cultivate his own tobacco. But if the duty on foreign tobacco is high, the Canadian farmer will not only grow the plant for his own use, but will likewise cultivate it for purposes of trade, because he will be able to sell it at a high price and compete, with certainty of success, with the foreign producer, who will be obliged to charge a high price for his tobacco, in order to reimburse himself for the cost of production, transport and duty. Naturally, therefore, home production would overwhelm and kill off the importation of foreign tobacco. But if you kill off that importation, you deprive the Treasury of a considerable source of revenue, and you, consequently, place yourselves in the position of being compelled to impose fresh taxes. That is the whole question. How do the Government propose to solve it? In the simplest and most judicious manner possible. Their Bill is before us, and anyone who takes the trouble to examine and understand it, must see that it is highly favourable to the interests of the grower, and that it will secure for the public Treasury an amount equal to that which the reduction of imports of foreign tobacco must of necessity entail. Under this Bill any farmer can raise for himself and his family all the tobacco they require, without paying a single cent of tax. If the farmer is now desirous of extending the sphere of his operations, he can do so; the duty on foreign tobacco is now high enough, not only to permit, but, in fact, to stimulate the production of native tobacco, and the farmer can cultivate the plant for commercial purposes. But, so soon as the farmer undertakes to grow tobacco for sale, he must pay to the Treasury a sum of 4c. for each pound of tobacco so placed on the market. This tax is sufficiently low to render Canadian tobacco easy of sale, consequently it is not injurious to its production. Moreover, it is not on the Canadian grower it falls, since, as we have seen, it is not the producer but the consumer who pays the value of the article he buys. The last advantage of the present Bill is, that the duty levied goes to the public Treasury to replace the sum lost to the State by reason of the diminution in the importation of foreign tobacco, which is the necessary result of the Protection granted to the production of our own. The interests of all are therefore carefully guarded; that of the farmer, who consumes his tobacco, that of the Canadian grower who cultivates tobacco for commercial purposes, and that of the State, which protects both of them and gives the advantage to its own people. But, in order that this result may be attained, the law must not be a dead letter. Its provisions must be such as to secure its faithful execution. I have every hope that the working of the law now before us will prove the efficacy of the measure, and will set at rest the exaggerated fears which have been expressed here this evening. I heard it stated—and I think it was the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) who made the assertion—that our people, and more especially those in the Province of Quebec, were not prepared to receive the measure now presented, in so far, at least, as regards the licenses which the Government propose to issue in order to legalise the production of tobacco grown for commercial purposes, and in order to provide a more effectual mode of collecting the duties imposed on the cultivation of this article. I could understand the truth and fitness of the hon. member's assertion, if the proposed law were an innovation; if there were not already in existence a law still more stringent and placing a heavier burthen on the shoulders of the people. But everybody knows that the late Administration introduced and carried a Bill imposing heavy duties on the producer of Canadian tobacco. And now that the present Government ask for the adoption of a more lenient measure, calculated largely to reduce the tax imposed on the people, it is surely not the time, even were it correct and judicious, to assert that the people are not prepared to accept the benefit sought to be conferred upon them. Let the hon. member compare the two measures, that which is now proposed and that which was left to us by the late Administration, and he will see that section for section, law for law, that which is now proposed is by far the least severe; it will be more easily put in force, and will be more efficient. The people are prepared for it, and will receive it with the greater satisfaction, and with the more gratitude, because they have so long suffered from the many inconveniences and from the heavy taxation which the former measure entailed. I think that I have replied to all the objections which have been timidly urged in this House. One, however, still remains, but cannot, for a moment, hold its ground before the facts, and would certainly be without any value had it not been advanced for the second time by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier). That hon. gentleman maintains, in substance, that the Canadian soil is not favourable to the growth of tobacco; that it is an exhausting product, the growth of which ought not to be encouraged. I at once admit that tobacco, like most aromatic plants, like textile plants, is an exhausting crop, the cultivation of which necessarily impoverishes the soil which produces it. But is that an objection to its cultivation? Certainly not. If, in this country, only enriching plants were to be cultivated, cereals would not be grown, and our soil would refuse to produce those plants and that grain, which are now articles of daily consumption. And does not manure furnish us with the means of restoring the loss caused to the land by the growing of exhausting crops? And if the farmer chooses to turn his attention to the growing of this plant, let us leave him at liberty to do so; it is his right, and, perhaps, despite the hon. member's objection, he may find it advantageous. For all these reasons, whatever may be the point of view from which it is regarded, I think it is our duty to approve of the proposed legislation, and to support the laudable effort which the Government is making to improve the position of the farmer, and, at the same time, to secure for the public revenue a more simple and a more efficient mode of collecting the moneys which the growing of tobacco yields to it. I do not speak on behalf of the Province of Quebec in particular; I cannot assume the dictatorial tone which the hon. member for L'Islet endeavours to adopt whenever he claims to speak in the name of his beloved Province, or at least in the name of the Liberal fraction from Quebec, but addressing this honorable House call upon members, from whatever Province they may come, to adopt a plan of legislation which diminishes the tax imposed on the growth of Canadian tobacco, which will promote the cultivation of that plant, and will secure to the revenue greater returns, an enactment which should receive the hearty and sincere support of all those who claim to be the friends of their country.

MR. BABY: The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) is afraid that the license required to be taken out by parties who cultivate tobacco for sale will hamper the growth of Canadian tobacco. I think my hon. friend is under a misapprehension. The tax is altogether done away with on the Canadian leaf, That being taken off, we must necessarily have some other means of controlling the cultivation of tobacco, otherwise the law will be a dead letter. But under the new arrangement it is hoped to prevent the fraudulent dealer from carrying on the business to the detriment of the honest dealer and the honest farmer. Why do the farmers require this change? Because they are willing to pay the tax, and say, "We know it must come from some source or other, and we are willing to pay it if we are protected from dishonest dealers who do not pay it." If the practices suggested were followed by the Department, we would require an army of officials, and what would be the use of collecting duties if the aggregate amount is to be expended for the payment of the salaries of officials. With regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Essex, I would state that while the manufacturer takes out a license for tobacco coming from foreign ports, he can mix it with tobacco grown in Canada, but if he wishes to employ Canadian leaf alone he requires a separate license.

Bill read the second time.

MR. LANDRY.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the said Bill.

(In the Committee)

MR. GIROUARD moved in amendment "that the grower of tobacco should not be required to take out a license."

MR. BABY: I cannot consent to that amendment, which would defeat one of the objects of the Bill.

Amendment negatived.

On the suggestion of Mr. LAURIER,

MR. BABY made an amendment to clause 10, providing for the issue of licenses to growers of tobacco, by other officers besides officers of the Excise.

BILL INTRODUCED.

SUPPLY.

IV. ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.

Order for the House to again resolve itself into Committee of Supply, read.

MR. RYKERT: Before you, Mr. Speaker, leave the chair, I would like to make an explanation, in connection with a personal matter referred to in the speech of the hon. member for West Middlesex, during the debate on the Budget, and in reply to a speech which I made a few days ago. I do not desire to occupy much of the time of the House, and I would very much have preferred to let his remarks pass for what they were worth, knowing the spirit of revenge which that hon. member and his friends always exhibit towards me; but when I find his statements and remarks, which I know to be untruthful, published in the official record of the Debates of this House, I feel that I ought not to permit them to go uncontradicted to the country. In justice to myself, and to those who send me here, I think I should give the true version of the facts in connection with that matter, in order that the antidote may accompany the poison. The attack made upon me was entirely unprovoked, as every hon. gentleman in this House must have seen; for there was nothing in my speech, from beginning to end, which could be construed into a personal attack upon those to whom I was replying. It was read by the hon. member for West Middlesex, during the debate, that I was guilty of acts of immorality, of a political character, and that I had been censured, therefor, by a Committee of the Legislature of Ontario. Let me explain as briefly as possible the facts, and then I will be content to leave the House and country to judge whether or not I am liable to the imputation cast upon me by the hon. member for West Middlesex. In 1874, a public meeting was called in Wallacetown, county of Elgin, by Hon. Archibald McKellar and Mr. Thomas Hodgins, in the interest of the Government of Ontario, to discuss public questions in connection with the administrative acts of that Government. I felt it to be my duty, as an opponent of that Government, and as one who had publicly arraigned the members of it for their extravagance, to appear at that meeting, and discuss political matters with them. Instead of meeting the arguments which I advanced in opposition to the policy of the Government as they should have done, the Hon. Archibald McKellar, a member of that Government, poured upon me personal abuse, and charged me with having sold my political services. This unwarrantable attack was justly resented by the intelligent electors then assembled, although the great majority was not in political accord with me; but that spirit of fair play which usually characterises the Canadian people, compelled my opponents to permit me to make a personal explanation, promising, at a future time, to furnish evidence of the untruthfulness of the charges. The statement made at that meeting by Mr. McKellar, was as follows:—

the most determined manner. He then suddenly wheeled round, and gave it an equally strong support. You will be somewhat interested to know the cause of so sudden and so complete a change. (Hear, hear.) Well, I will tell you the true cause. When the promoters of the road asked him to use his vote and influence in their favour, he said, ‘Four thousand dollars is my price, hand over your money.’ (Cries of shame on him.) I challenge him to bring this matter before a Committee of the House, or before a Court of Law, and clear himself if he can. But I have not done with him yet. Two years afterwards the promoters of the same road asked the House for certain amendments in their charter, allowing them to reduce the gauge and giving them the right to construct the St. Clair Branch. But Mr. R. is now found opposing with all his might the amendments asked by the Company, and I will tell you why. The Great Western were of course using every endeavour to kill off the Canada Southern, and they had offered, and my little friend accepted the offer of a cash bonus of $5,000, as a price of his opposition to the Canada Southern, and of his support to the Loop line.’”

That was a charge of which I was not guilty, and should not lie under. I at once challenged that gentleman to meet me on a public platform in St. Thomas, in the same county, and make good the charges made against me. I subsequently fixed a day for the meeting, and invited the whole of the members of the Ontario Government to meet me and discuss Ontario politics, and at the same time to make good Mr. McKellar's charges. At that meeting Mr. McKellar alone appeared in behalf of his colleagues. After freely discussing the administrative acts of the Government, I called upon Mr. McKellar to make good the charges he had made, and if he had any evidence to produce it to the meeting. Instead of doing so, he poured forth a volume of personal abuse, which was speedily checked by the people thus assembled, and which resulted in his being obliged to leave the meeting amid the jeers of the crowd. I then produced my evidence of the untruthfulness of the charge. The first evidence which I offered, was a letter written by Æmilius Irving, Esq., Reform M.P., for the city of Hamilton, the solicitor for the Great Western Railway, and a gentleman whose word will be taken at all times. His letter was as follows:—

“HAMILTON, 14th July, '74.

J. C. Rykert, Esq., St. Catharines.

“DEAR SIR,—I have your letter of yesterday enquiring whether certain statements made recently at a meeting held at Wallacetown, in reference to yourself, as contained in the annexed writing, is true in any particular.

"I believe the statement to be untrue in all matters which affect your conduct in unworthy terms.

"In 1867 you sustained the Canada Southern Railway in obtaining a charter under the name of the Erie and Niagara Extension.

"In 1869 the Canada Southern party, not by that time having done anything, as far as could be seen by the public, sought for an extension of time to commence operations.

"At the same time the G. W. Railway was trying to obtain a charter for the Air Line.

"Many persons doubted Mr. W. A. Thompson's ability to build the Canada Southern, and believed that if the Great Western got a charter a line of railway would be built immediately; and that the Canada Southern, having hitherto failed, the Great Western should have a chance.

"It was a case of competition between the two parties, you espoused the side of the Great Western, doubting, as you asserted, if the other line could be built.

"The suggestion that you were paid for your Parliamentary influence in behalf of and by the Great Western Company, either $5,000, or any other sum, is simply untrue.

"I remain, dear Sir,

"Yours truly,

"ÆMILIUS IRVING."

I also produced a letter signed by Joseph Price, Esq., Treasurer of the Great Western Railway, a gentleman who is well known to many hon. gentlemen of this House, and who would be incapable of stating anything which was not strictly correct. That letter read as follows:—

"August 6th, 1874.

"J. C. Rykert, Esq., M.P.P., St. Catharines.

"MY DEAR SIR,—Your favour of 13th ult. has been forwarded to me here referring to the charges made against you in the following words * * *

"I do not know who makes such a charge against you, but there is not the slightest grounds for such a statement. No inducement of any kind, either directly or indirectly, was ever held out to you to induce you to take charge of the Loop Line Bill and oppose the Southern Bill, and you never stated or intimated in any way that you would require any remuneration from the Company. The intimation that you were paid for your Parliamentary influence in favour of the Loop Line has no foundation whatever, and can only be characterised in the simple expression that it is utterly untrue.

"Yours very truly,

"JOSEPH PRICE."

I also produced a letter from W. A. Thomson, Esq., M.P., denying, in the most positive terms, that I had opposed his Bill when first introduced, and repudiating the idea that I had ever, directly or indirectly, asked for or been offered anything for my services in connection with his Bill. Immediately after the opening of the Ontario Legislature I formulated a resolution referring the matter to a Committee of the House. Mr. McKellar, who by that time had ascertained that he had no evidence whatever to support his charge, formulated other charges, as follows:—

"2. That M. Rykert, in 1870-71-72-73 did accept and receive from persons opposing the Ontario Street Railway Company $150 or thereabouts, in order to induce him in his place, and otherwise as a member of this House to oppose, and he was thereby induced to oppose it.

"3. That he did accept $100 from the Montreal Insurance Companies in order to induce him to support, and he was thereby induced to support the said companies.

"4. That he did accept $150 from E. D. Tilson in order to induce him to vote for an Act of Incorporation."

That Committee met, and in support of the original charge, namely, that I had originally opposed the Canada Southern Railway Bill, and for a consideration of $4,000 turned round and supported the same, the evidence of W. A. Thomson, Esq., (Grit M.P. for Welland) was taken. At page 171 of the Journal, will be found the following:—

"W. A. Thomson, sworn—I was never told of any offer to Mr. Rykert for his support; there never was one made by the Canada Southern to Mr. Rykert. * * * At the first Session, Mr. Rykert supported my scheme: he never opposed it in the first Session. I never had any such conversation as is mentioned in the charge before the Committee. I never promised Mr. Rykert $4,000, or even $4 to any person. Neither before nor during the Session of 1867 and 1868 did I offer Mr. Rykert, or any person for him, any consideration for supporting the Bill, nor did Mr. Rykert, or any one for him, ask for, or require such consideration, nor did I make any such statement to Mr. McKellar."

This charge having hopelessly broken down, the Committee proceeded to investigate the second charge, namely, that the Great Western Railway had offered my little friend (meaning me) the offer of a cash bonus of $5,000, as the price of his opposition to the Canada Southern and his support to the Loop Line. In support of this, Æmilius Irving, M.P., Solicitor for the Great Western Railway, was sworn:

"Q. Read the letter written by you to Mr. Rykert and see whether it expresses your own knowledge and feeling now as it did then?

"A. It does."

MR. RYKERT.

This charge having broken down and Mr. McKellar standing convicted as a public slanderer, it was necessary, in the interest of the Grit party, to push the matter further. During the investigation it came out in evidence that I had been paid $1,000 for my professional services in connection with the Great Western Railway Company. These opponents of mine were so keen to find some charge with which they could drive me from the Legislature, if possible, that they at once accused me of having received the sum of $1,000 for my Parliamentary services. In support of this new charge, which it will be seen had not been referred to the Committee, they called Mr. Price. The following questions were asked him:—

“Q. Then this money was given to Mr. Irving, I understand, for the purpose of being paid Mr. Rykert, for services performed by him?”

“A. General services in the interests of the Company.

“Q. When had he rendered these services?”

“A. He had rendered services in reference to the removal of the embargo on importation of cattle; our live stock transportation was stopped, and he obtained the renewal of the order. The loss to the Great Western Railway was $3,000 to $10,000 a week while it lasted. Mr. Rykert specially went to Ottawa. The embargo was on four weeks and ordered to remain until October, and he got it removed in August. It would have been a loss of $50,000.

“Q. Have you any reason to believe that the $1,000 was paid for opposing Thomson's Bill?”

“A. It was given for services before that time.”

That evidence which relates to the first charge reported in the Debates, as to my receiving $1,000 for my Parliamentary services, will satisfy any reasonable man that the charge utterly failed like the others. With regard to the next charge that I had been paid money by the Street Railway Company, one of the proprietors of the Street Railway swore positively he had paid me $100 as solicitor, for services rendered by me in the City Council, in Toronto, and not for Parliamentary services. During that examination, it came out that the Hon. Rupert M. Wells, Speaker of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario, who had charge of the Bill for the Company, was paid for his Parliamentary services $50. I asked the Committee to report that fact, but they refused to do so. In addition to the evidence of the proprietors of the Street Railway, that of the Solicitor, Mr.

Ferguson, was taken, who, being sworn, was asked:

“Q. (Mr. Rykert). Did you learn, or even draw an inference, that my Parliamentary influence could be used?”

“A. Certainly not, that is not the reason why I retained you. You told me that the matter should be taken before the City Council, and you undertook to help me there. I know that you did interest yourself at the Council. I consulted you, night after night, and you always advised me to legislate in the City Council. I sent you a brief to St. Catharines, and told you that Patterson was working with City Council. You communicated to me, from time to time, the result of your action in the City Council. I did not employ you to act in the Legislature.”

Yet on the face of this positive evidence to the contrary, this fair and impartial Committee of the House reported that I had been paid the money for my Parliamentary services. The next charge, that I had received $100 from the Mutual Insurance Company, hopelessly failed. They were obliged to abandon that charge, but during the investigation it came out in evidence that Hon. E. B. Wood, M.P.P., had received $150 for his Parliamentary services in connection with this Insurance Bill, which fact, however, the Committee failed to report. The other charge was, that I had received $100 to induce me to vote for, and whereby I was induced to vote for, the incorporation of the town of Tilsonburg. During that investigation, the promoter of the Bill swore that I was not paid for my Parliamentary services, but that he paid me for professional services rendered outside of Parliament altogether. In the course of that investigation, it came out that a certain gentleman (Mr. Cattnach), a partner of the Hon. Adam Crooks, M.P.P., Chairman of that Committee, received $250 for his services in the House, in connection with this Bill, yet the Committee did not report that fact, because they did not think it right that the partner of their friends should be prevented from receiving fees from persons promoting Bills in Parliament. The minority of the Committee reported that they found “that no evidence had been adduced before them to substantiate the charges contained in the said order or any or either of them;” but that portion of the report, that fair and impartial member for Middlesex failed to read to the House, and, as a consequence, does not appear in the Hansard. Any person who possessed a particle of honour, or desired fair play would have read that portion of the report, and in fairness to me, would have concealed nothing. The Globe, of December, 1874, which I have in my hand, in its editorial on this subject, uses language which entirely corroborates the report of the minority of the Committee; and coming from that source, hon. gentlemen will be inclined to think I am justified in saying that the charges were completely and satisfactorily met by me. The following is an extract from that paper:—

“We may as well, at the outset, do Mr. Rykert the justice of saying that there is, so far, no direct evidence that he altered his line of conduct in consequence of the moneys paid him. In one instance, the inferences are unfavourable to Mr. Rykert, but in the other cases, he appears to have only acted when he had received or been promised money in accordance with opinions previously formed.”

It is a most extraordinary circumstance that, in the same Legislature, a motion was made by Mr. Macdonald, seconded by Mr. Gifford, in the following terms:—

“That it is inexpedient that any member of this House should be permitted to engage, either by himself or any partner, in the management of Private Bills before the House, or any Committee thereof, for any pecuniary reward to be received by such member, or by any person standing in any relation of legal professional partnership with him.”

Now, one would suppose that these gentlemen, who had pursued me with such bitterness, would have voted in favour of the resolution, having evinced such a strong anxiety to uphold the independence of Parliament, by following me so keenly. But no, they put up Hon. E. B. Wood, who had so often taken fees for Parliamentary services, to move an amendment, striking out all after the word “expedient” in the Resolution and in inserting the following:—

“That such members of the House, as are of the long robe, shall be of counsel on either side on any Bill depending before the House.”

The effect of this was to let the partner of any member take fees, but not the member himself. All the Grit members voted in favour of the amendment. They were willing to allow a partner of the Chairman of a Committee of the House to receive fees, for promoting legislation in the House, but they would not allow an individual member of the House. I have the satisfaction of knowing that, notwithstanding that partisan report against me, and notwithstanding the fact that the Hon. J. G. Currie, the Chairman of that Committee, went about my county parading the Great Western Railway cheque. I met my constituents shortly afterwards, and defeated one of the richest and strongest men in Lincoln, and that, too, in spite of the united efforts of the Ontario Government. Not satisfied with their unjust attack in the Legislature, my enemies followed me for three years, with unrelenting bitterness and hatred, in a Court of Law, determined to drive me out of the Ontario Legislature, if possible. In this, however, they most signally failed; and I have also the satisfaction of knowing that while that suit was pending, and while I still held my seat as a member of the Ontario Legislature, I was returned for this House at the General Elections, against another rich and powerful opponent, by an overwhelming majority. I think it will be admitted, by all fair and candid men, that I have no reason to feel ashamed of my record in the Ontario Legislature, especially when it is borne in mind that the people who ought to know me best have given me their confidence so often, in spite of the charges made against me. I know the party opposite have endeavoured for years to weaken my influence in, and, if possible, to drive me out of the Niagara Peninsula, where they have felt the effects of my labours in behalf of the Liberal-Conservative party. So far, they have signally failed. One after the other of the strong men of their party has been pitted against me, and each one has, in his turn, been compelled to succumb. And I have had the satisfaction of seeing the chairman of that partisan Committee, who was so anxious for the independence of Parliament, degraded and driven from the profession as one unworthy of a place among honourable men. I know that the party opposite contains men who are distinguished for their desire to wallow in political filth—men whose greatest ambition is to play the part of political scavengers and dirt-slingers—men whose only ambition and desire is to destroy the reputation of all public men who do not agree with them—men who are not possessed of that political honour and love of fair play which tends so much to elevate the standard of political morality —men who, when argument fails them, seek to encompass the ruin of their opponents by doing that which every honourable man seeks to avoid, and men who, for personal and party gain, will sacrifice every principle which an honest politician holds dear. I know of no man in that party who possesses all these characteristics and qualities in a more eminent degree than the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross). I trust that while I remain in this House, I shall never forget my duty as a representative of the people, and that I will never so lower the dignity of Parliament as to be compelled to meet argument by foul abuse. So long as I know that, as a public man, I am backed and endorsed by the people who send me here, I have no fear whatever of the result of the attacks upon me. I apologise to the House for having trespassed upon their time. I felt it to be my duty as a representative of the people to make this explanation, because I found in the Debates certain statements which I know to be untrue, which were deliberately and maliciously published by a member who, himself, knew them to be untrue, and which, if allowed to go uncontradicted, would reflect seriously upon my position as member for the county of Lincoln.

MR. RYKERT.

Mr. ROSS (West Middlesex): I am glad to hear my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) tell us that he is going to eschew all personal references while a member of this House. If my hon. friend, when he made his remarks the other night, to which I replied, had taken that course, it would have saved me the trouble, and, I may say, the pain, of exposing the hon. gentleman, whose speech consisted, from beginning to end, of reference of a personal character to hon. members of this House. My hon. friend has a reputation in the Province of Ontario which is not enviable. He has a reputation as a member of the Local Legislature for personal virulence and a disposition to discuss everything from a personal, rather than a political, standpoint. That, I believe, has followed him into this House, that, I fear, will follow him to the end of his days. In fact, the illustration he gave us of that disposition, the other night, is, perhaps, as conclusive evidence as I can give that he is disposed to follow the same course as that in which he won distinction some time ago. The reply I made to my hon. friend was not tinged with any personal bitterness, so far as I was concerned—at least I did not intend it should be. However, I do not propose to take a word back, to withdraw a single statement, unless my hon. friend can secure, by some means I do not understand, the expurgation from the journals of the Province of Ontario of the charges which I read. I tell my hon. friend that the Committee to which he referred was an impartial Committee. Not only did the majority find him guilty of the charges alleged by Mr. McKellar and others, but the minority of that Committee seemed to be strongly impressed with the same fact. The opening words of the report of the minority are as follows:—"They find that the said J. C. Rykert, while a member of your honourable House, received, or was paid, the following sums of money by persons who were, or had been, concerned in seeking or opposing legislation before your honourable House, or the Committee thereof." Then they went on to state the amounts of money which the hon. gentleman was paid, and which were as follows: $1,000 by the Great Western Railway Company; $150 by the Toronto Street Railway Company, and $100 by one Edward D. Tilson, of Tilsonburg, and so on, and, as if to give colour to the spurious character of these payments, the Committee concludes:

"Your Committee further beg leave to report that, in their opinion, the practice of permitting payments to or receipts by any member of your honourable House, of any sum of money or any other consideration for professional services performed in connection with or with reference to any legislation under the consideration of your honourable House, is calculated to seriously impair the independence of Parliament, and should be prohibited by legislation or other enactments."

I ask why did that minority report contain the statement that the independence of Parliament should be specially protected in connection with this investigation, if they did not feel that the independence of Parliament was being encroached upon by the money which the hon. gentleman received. And they went on further to say:

"Your Committee desire to express their unqualified disapprobation of the practice of members of your honourable House, under any consideration, accepting or receiving any valuable consideration or sum of money in acknowledgment of assistance previously rendered in connection with private or other legislation before your honourable House or any of the Committees thereof."

Here we have, in the concluding sentence of the report of that Committee, a most unqualified condemnation of the course which the hon. gentleman pursued, a condemnation which stands on record, which no amount of apologies on his part will ever expunge from the memories of the members of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario, or from the journals of that body. Amongst the distinguished personages who signed that report were Messrs. M. C. Cameron and W. Meredith, two leaders of the hon. gentleman, making an unqualified statement to the effect that the course pursued was one which met with their unqualified disapprobation. I think the less my hon. friend says about these matters the better. So far as I am concerned, I would be delighted if my hon. friend could explain it away. I could give him a good deal more to explain away. I think there is a good deal more of the same material embodied in the reports of the Law Courts of Ontario.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I really must rise to order. It is only by the courtesy of the House that the hon. gentleman is allowed to speak at all. At this moment he is committing a breach of order in answering a personal explanation made by hon. an gentleman.

MR. MACKENZIE: What is the breach of order?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I am speaking.

MR. MACKENZIE: I rise to order. The right hon. gentleman interrupted an hon. member while addressing the House on a motion to go into Committee of Supply. I want to know what the point of order is, and what right he had to interrupt the hon. member for Middlesex.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: If the hon. gentleman had not been so very violent, and in so great a hurry, I should have given the information desired. This is not a subject which can be legitimately discussed on going into Supply. My hon. friend was making an explanation, justly called for by the remarks made by the hon. gentleman. The speech made by the hon. gentleman, the other night, was inexcusable. My hon. friend has made his defence, and instead of allowing it to go at that, the hon. gentleman rises and speaks about some charges brought against the hon. gentleman in the Law Reports of Ontario. The course is unparliamentary and unworthy of the hon. gentleman as a member of Parliament and a man.

MR. ROSS, (West Middlesex): I had about finished my remarks, when I was interrupted by the hon. the First Minister. I do not know that the interruption is at all necessary. I am glad to find he is so warm in espousing the cause of hon. gentlemen on that side of the House. I wish he was as ready to defend members on this side of the House. I had finished my remarks, and I have nothing to withdraw or explain away.

MR. BOULTBEE: I was in the Local House with the hon. member for Lincoln when these transactions were alleged to have taken place. I should feel glad, and I am sure the House would feel glad, if they could believe implicitly the utterances of the hon. member for West Middlesex. He said he would be glad if he could completely absolve the hon. member for Lincoln from the charges made against him. But we must be led to doubt whether he was honest in that expression, because he went on to throw out some rather nasty insinuations against him, insinuations which I think one man should not make against another, and one hon. member of this House should not make against another. It scarcely showed a kindly and charitable feeling on the part of the hon. member for Middlesex. The hon. gentleman tells us that the minority report substantiates what he stated. I have reason to know that the feeling which animated the Hon. M. C. Cameron in making that report, was not so much in connection with what had been done by the hon. member for Lincoln, as it was with a practice that was prevailing extensively in the Ontario Legislature, that legislation was being promoted and passed by the partners of gentlemen in that House, and who were supposed to be, and, in fact, were known to be, receiving very large fees for their services, part of which went into the pockets of hon. gentlemen who were in the House, and their views were to stamp out that practice as much as possible. We have seen an instance in the Local House of Ontario, in which the partner of the hon. the Prime Minister received a very large fee—a thousand dollars. I think it was for acting in a matter against the Government, in which the Attorney-General, his partner, acted on the other side, and sharing the fee. This was not thought, I believe, to be a very satisfactory way of doing business, and the less of it there is said, I suppose, the better. I simply rose to say that on the occasion when these charges were preferred against Mr. Rykert, he being a friend of my own from boyhood, I took a great deal of interest in the matter. I enquired into it carefully, and I may say that the charges were not supported by the evidence. I might further add that, while in the Local House, and I shall be borne out, I think, in this, by many hon. members of both sides of politics, there was scarcely a private member more useful, more industrious, or more valuable to the House and country than the present hon. member for Lincoln, who just made these explanations. He is a man of indefatigable industry, and worked day and night to obtain a clear knowledge of matters which were of the very greatest importance to the country. His industry, his capacity for work, his energy, and his courage, have doubtlessly made him exceedingly valuable on many occasions to his party and it cannot be denied that this hon. gentleman, during the course of his political life, has been subjected to most unfair, virulent attacks on the part of the other party. He has suffered an amount of malignant persecution that would have broken down a man of less energy than he possesses. I must confess that I was much pained when I heard the attack of the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross). I was much pained by it, as any man would naturally be, to find a man, sitting in the same House with himself, attacked in that way; and the hon. member rises to defend himself, because he feels what his constituents must feel, when they find him attacked in that manner, for any stigma fixed on him would attach to them. The history of a man is known best where he lives, by those with whom he associates; these are the men better able to judge of his position for honesty and integrity than the hon. member for West Middlesex. His return by a triumphant majority of his constituents, is, in my opinion, the best and a complete refutation of the charges made against him, and is enough to strike away the foundation from beneath the hon. member for West Middlesex, when he rises in this House and makes those charges, and this, more especially, when we consider that his fortunes have been so impaired by the bitter personal and political persecution he has suffered at the hands of his opponents, that he was unable to contend financially with the means used against him, having nothing but his energy and popularity to rely on.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

22 Miscellaneous, Justice, including North-West Territories	$15,000.00
23 Travelling Expenses of Stipendiary Magistrates in North-West Territories	$4,500.00

MR. BLAKE: I would like to know whether any rate has been fixed. The original idea was to fix an annual allowance for these travelling expenses of the Stipendiary Magistrates, and I would like to know what the present arrangements are.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): In the instance of Mr. Richardson, an arrangement has been recently made by which his travelling expenses are fixed at $800 a year, while actually engaged in the duties of magistrate.

MR. BLAKE: Then why not carry out that rate in reference to the other magistrate?

MR. McDONALD: It probably will be.

MR. BLAKE: Then for the two $1,600 would be sufficient; but the vote being for $4,500 is an unnecessary amount.

MR. McDONALD: Occasions may arise when a larger amount may be required. However, I do not know that there is any reason to strictly adhere to the vote.

MR. BLAKE: Experiment having shown that $800 a year for each Magistrate for travelling expenses is sufficient, I think a vote of $3,000 would be ample.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Although there are only two Stipendiary Magistrates, the law provides for three; and before Parliament rises, we may find it expedient to appoint the third.

MR. BLAKE: Then taking $800 as a basis for one, three times $800 would be $2,400; therefore $3,000 would be an ample vote for the three.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): I think there would be objection to that.

Vote agreed to.

24 Circuit allowances, British Columbia$10,000.00

MR. BLAKE: I may observe that my remarks on the previous vote apply to some extent to the present one. Judging from the results of the last two or three years, $10,000 would be an inordinate sum. But that is not the only reason for reducing it. We have been economising; and the hon. member produced a calculation showing that there would be an additional expenditure of $400 in this service, and that shortly there would be a saving in circuit allowances of $2,600. I do not find that this saving has been effected, but I hope the hon. gentleman will reduce the expenditure to the sum I have named.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): The Bill to which my hon. friend refers has not yet become law. It is, therefore, impossible that I should estimate the expenditures under that Bill. At any rate we have to ascertain whether the grounds upon which this item was based are well founded or not. I do not think it would be advisable to reduce the item under present circumstances. There has been a large increase in the population of the country, and we cannot anticipate the exact expenditure.

MR. BLAKE: In 1877, when there still existed a branch of that organisation at Montreal, as well as at Ottawa, the expense was but $9,883; in 1878, $10,616; in 1879, $11,112. It is now proposed to increase the vote from $12,000 last year to $13,000; so that you are running up the change to the figures of the old time, when the Montreal staff was kept up, without that staff to keep up.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): The number of the men in the Police Force has not been increased, and I hope the additional $1,000 asked for may not be spent. But last year a good deal of extra police work was called for in connection with Rideau Hall, more police protection being necessary while their Excellencies were travelling. I thought it better, instead of paying for such services out of Contingencies, to take a vote for an extra $1,000, to spend only when it should be required. During the Art Exhibition, for example, two or three extra policemen had to be retained.

Vote agreed to.

VI. PENITENTIARIES.

In reply to Mr. BLAKE,

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said the increase for maintenance was $1,107 this year, being per capita, and representing a larger number of convicts than were maintained last year. There was an increase of $9,500 on capital account, $4,800 being granted at the request of the Warden of St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary, who wanted a grist mill. A new pump and hydrant, with other water apparatus were also required, the whole to cost $9,500.

MR. BLAKE said he knew that the Warden had wanted that grist-mill a long time, and even when he was Minister of Justice. But, with a sincere respect for the Warden's good intentions, he was unable to see that it would be judicious to put that mill into the institution, or would prove remunerative. It should be the object of the Government to economise as much as possible in the management of those institutions, and to provide that class of employment which gave the maximum of labour at the least expense of machinery. It was well known that expensive and delicate machinery was not best suited to convict labour. He very much doubted whether this grist-mill would prove remunerative. It was not enough to say the Warden wants it; there should be a tangible statement as to the probability of profitable results, such as cheaper flour and so forth.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said he had in his hands a memorandum from Mr. Creighton on the subject, recommended by Mr. Moylan, Inspector of Penitentiaries, in which the Warden stated his grounds for requesting the grist-mill. The building in which the mill was to be set up was erected by convict labour. For the increased accommodation required in the prison, it was essential that new engines and pumping apparatus should be supplied. He stated that an expenditure of $4,800 would not be large in view of the fact that he would thereby be enabled to grind all the flour wanted in that large institution, and thus save a considerable sum.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: Are there any millers in the Penitentiary to work the mill?

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): I should think, from the variety of the handicrafts represented by the prisoners, there would be no difficulty in finding competent millers.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I doubt that. I believe you will have to employ outside help. It is a question if any of the convicts can be trusted at that work, or possess for it the requisite skill.

MR. BLAKE: The working expenses for 1880-81 amount to $20,366.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): I visited that institution lately, and the prisoners seemed to be constantly employed, and the institution appeared to be in most excellent order, and well conducted. I have a report from the Warden, indicating that he has not been able, so far, to find employment for those who are in the institution.

MR. MACKENZIE: I would like to know what the revenue has been, and the sources of that revenue, during the past year. I recollect that, in the Session of 1877-8, the hon. gentleman now at the head of the Government deprecated very strongly the competition of convict with free labour, and I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman has devised a plan to avoid all such competition, and to produce a revenue at the same time. I presume he would not have attacked the late Government on this account unless he was prepared when he came into office with some plan to avoid such competition. I called attention to this subject last year, but got no satisfaction. I presume it is now all made satisfactory, and the House would like to know what has been done in that direction.

MR. McDONALD: I see from the Public Accounts of last year that the receipts from the sale of manufactures in all the Penitentiaries were $53,115. I have not the report of this year at hand, but, if the hon. gentleman thinks it necessary, I will make the enquiry.

MR. MACKENZIE: It is not possible that the present Government is allowing any competition of convict labour with the free labour?

MR. McDONALD: I do not know that we allow any such competition. We endeavour to employ those confined in these institutions, and the labourers, with the exception, perhaps, of a few broom-makers in St. John and Halifax, are all engaged upon public works. For instance, the tailors of Kingston are engaged in making the uniforms for the Mounted Police, and clothing for the Indians of the North-West, and for those prisoners who are in the other institutions; and the shoemakers are engaged in the same way. It is impossible for me now to state to what extent this has been done, but if desired I will have a statement made, showing exactly the amount sold in the open market, and the character of the goods so sold.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: Perhaps the hon. member for Victoria (Sir John A. Macdonald) does not take the same interest in the question of free labour in Kingston as he did a year or two ago. However, I would say to the hon. the Minister of Justice that I would be glad if he would let us know what decision has been come to. I would also like to know what is being done with reference to the large amount of land which is now under cultivation, and how the products of that land are value to the institution. I take it for granted that in this account is not included the quantity of farm produce raised on that farm by the convicts themselves. I would like to know how that is under the present management.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I would say that my interest in this question continues unabated, although, perhaps, I am not so intimately acquainted with the injurious effects of the convict labour in Kingston as I was some years ago; but I am bound, as a member of the Legislature, still to represent that portion of the Dominion.

MR. MACKENZIE: That is the Penitentiary.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I can represent the Penitentiary just as well as I ever did. I have the same interest also in the surrounding country. I have a joint interest with the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) in the county of Lennox, which is not far from the city of Kingston, and the manufacturers there, and the tradesmen who have been injuriously affected by the competition of convict labour with them in the open market. But, seriously, I agree with all that has been said about the importance of avoiding as much as possible the competition of the products of convict labour in the open market with the work of the honest artisan. That has been clearly stated in the annual reports, both in England and Ireland, in the employment of convict labour. In accordance with that view, the convicts in our Penitentiaries have been employed as far as possible in the performance of strictly Government works, in making clothing for themselves and for other prisoners, and for the Mounted Police, and similar work. It seems to me that this open competition should be avoided as much as possible. It is a special injury to the artisan in the immediate vicinity of any prison or Penitentiary. It greatly disturbs the labour market, and renders the position of the artisan and small retailer and manufacturer in the vicinity of prisons and Penitentiaries, very hazardous. I agree with the hon. gentleman opposite in the importance of doing away as fast as possible with the contract system. It interferes with the labour and with one of the chief objects of imprisonment, the reformation of the convict. There is no way of checking or controlling them, so long as they are under a contractor, whose business it is to get work out of them.

MR. McDONALD: With reference to the question of the hon. member for Centre Huron, I would state that the proceeds of the farm in connection with the Penitentiary are estimated by the Warden in his report, as I am instructed, and the goods manufactured in the Penitentiary, and sold outside, are put to the credit of the Receiver-General and appear in the account.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: Are these farm products part of the $34,000, which appears on the other side of the account?

MR. McDONALD: That I cannot tell just now, but I am informed they are not. The reports which I hold in my hand show the quantity of the work done at the Kingston Penitentiary.

MR. BLAKE: I think it would be extremely convenient that the arrangement of the Penitentiary accounts should be such that the receipts from the land which is worked in connection with the Penitentiary and the working expenses of that land should be kept separate. It is easy to effect an apparent reduction in the cost of maintaining the prisoners if you obtain a large acreage of land adjoining the Penitentiary, the expenses of working which are put in amongst the general expenses, and the returns for which do not appear anywhere, and are, of course, all consumed in the Penitentiary itself. The practical result is that the actual cost of the land and the annual cash disbursements for labour, animals, superintendence, etc., are items which must be set against the returns and increase the cost of maintenance. There may be a reason in this. While the cost of maintenance at Kingston looks lower than it does at some other Penitentiaries, in point of fact a fair comparison may show it to be not any lower, if there were a separate working account showing all the cash expended upon it. I ask the hon. gentleman, what were the general details of this item of $20,366, working expenses. I wish to say, with reference to the statement of the hon. the First Minister, that that I did not myself announce, when I held the position of Minister of Justice, that I had made arrangements for the supply of work to the Public Departments, in order to avoid competition with free labour. In truth, I could not have properly said that, because I could not get any other employment for them than that which I did get, and I was really unable to observe how free labour was any less interfered with when it was deprived of profits which it would have had by working for a Government, than it would have been if it had been deprived of the profits which it would have had in working for another person. It did appear to me that, if there were provided by the convicts a certain number of semaphores for the Canadian Pacific Railway, which otherwise would have been manufactured by machinists, a certain number of boots or shoes, which otherwise would have been provided for by shoemakers, a certain quantity of clothing, which otherwise would have been contracted for by tailors, I was interfering with the sum total of labour required by the country just as much as if it had been Mr. A. or Mr. B. who had employed the convicts to do the same labour. Again, in getting stone for the Military College, and Public Works, I do not think it was wrong to do those things, and I fail to see how the stonemasons of Kingston were less injured by that stone having been got by the convicts than if it had been used in the erection of a mansion for yourself, Mr. Chairman, in the city of Kingston. I agree with a great deal the hon. gentleman said with reference to the contract system. I think these institutions ought to be made self-sustaining. The gross expense is enormous, and something ought to be done in the way of reducing the maintenance or increasing the production in these institutions. I agree that there are great evils in the contract system, and I would be delighted if any other mode could be adopted for utilising convict labour than the contract system. When I left office, there was no contract in the Penitentiary at all. We had made efforts to continue some of the old contracts, but unsuccessfully. There was a certain amount of machinery which had been used in a former lock contract. That machinery and material were left upon our hands. I was not aware that, during the time of the late Government, and subsequently, any new contract had been made for the use of that machinery, but I am told now that a contract exists for the use of that machinery, and that large quantities of nails and locks are being turned out. I should like to know, as a matter of fact, whether there is such a contract, what rate is paid for the convict labour, and what price is being paid the contractor for the locks.

MR. McDONALD: I understand there is practically a contract, inasmuch as the same person is still working there in the manufacture of locks, but it is only on sufferance, as it were. I cannot give details of the information the hon. gentleman desires, but I will have a report of it furnished as we go through the Estimates.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I would like to ask the hon. the Minister of Justice whether I am correct in supposing that this item of $20,366, for working expenses, should practically be deducted from the $34,000. As it is stated here, it would appear to me that the receipts are really put at $34,000.

MR. McDONALD: The hon. gentleman will see that the maintenance is put down at $57,396, and working expenses at $20,366. And then there are retiring gratuities, and everything that is not charged to capital account goes to give the aggregate expenses of the institution. Then the $34,000, or the amount shown as received from all sources deducted from that would give the real cost of the institution during the year. I hope to get passed an Act authorising the appointment of an accountant for these institutions. For various reasons I was not able to insist upon the reform which I was last year authorised to make by the appointment of an accountant, but I propose to do so at once, and the result of that will be, I hope, to enable me so to improve the manner in which the accounts are kept in all these institutions as to put in a much more convenient form all the information which I think should be given.

MR. ANGLIN: It seems to me we ought to have these accounts furnished much more in detail than they are at present, and I trust these details will be laid before the House before we are asked to concur in this particular vote. Hon. gentlemen opposite, two or three years ago, strongly denounced the Government of the day because they allowed the products of Penitentiary labour to come into competition with the free labour of the country, but they have been unable to devise any means of carrying out the principles they endeavoured to inculcate in the long and earnest speeches delivered in this House and elsewhere. We find they acknowledge they are following in precisely the same footsteps, in this respect, as their predecessors. Hon. gentlemen insisted that means could be found, and would be found, if they were in office, of preventing convict labour from coming into competition with free labour, but nothing has been done by them in that direction. I must confess I was quite surprised to find that celery entered into the ordinary diet of Penitentiary convicts. Celery is regarded as a luxury, and there are, probably, many honest persons who do not taste it from one year's end to another. I do not suppose, however, that celery is given to the convicts. It is grown for the officers of the institution, but it ought not to appear in the Public Accounts at such an enormous price. I would suggest, with reference to the grist-mill, in all humility, that the hon. gentleman should carry out the principle adopted in reference to the Tariff, of consulting business men in regard to the establishment of that mill. If he did, I think he would find there is no money to be saved by putting up a grist-mill, to grind the small quantity of flour used by these convicts. The labour of the convicts should be employed in grinding the grain required for the institution.

MR. CASGRAIN: The item of $10,000 for the construction of a grist-mill is rather a heavy one, and if it is added to that sum 7 per cent. interest and the loss by wear and tear to the grinding machine, it will be seen that the cost of the bread will be rather too heavy. The convicts, at a comparatively trivial cost, could be made to grind the wheat for their own bread, and it would be found that a limited speculation of this character would be the most profitable.

MR. MILLS: We all remember very distinctly how hon. gentlemen opposite deplored the management of these institutions under their predecessors. We also remember very distinctly the arguments of hon. gentlemen against bringing convict labour into competition with free labour. They told us the system then in vogue was all wrong, and that, if they changed places, there would be no difficulty in discovering a solution of the evil complained of. The hon. gentlemen have been in office now nearly two years, and, instead of having found any remedy for the evil, they have actually reproduced it in a more aggravated form. It is proposed to establish a mill, in which the convicts shall be compelled to grind their own flour. But, Sir, if this institution is to be efficient, it must be self-supporting, and, if the convicts are to be efficiently employed, it must be in the production of things that can be sold in the open market outside, and in those trades and callings which will be of practical utility to the convicts when they are set at liberty. I say that, instead of seeking to mislead the public, and make the people dissatisfied with the way in which the persons in the Penitentiaries are employed, the hon. gentleman ought to admit his position to be indefensible. It is of great importance that persons in Penitentiaries should be efficiently employed, and that they should, in a large degree, be made self-supporting.

MR. CURRIER: I have no doubt it is, or ought to be, the study of the Government to reduce the expense of keeping our convicts to the lowest possible figure. I doubt if the construction of this grist-mill will tend in that direction. I know something about mills, and I do not think it would be a good investment, merely for the purpose of grinding the wheat to feed the prisoners. As hon. gentlemen will see, the difference between the price of wheat and the price of flour is very small, and it might require a large number of convicts to be employed on it.

MR. MACKENZIE: You might have to employ a miller.

MR. CURRIER: So that the construction of that mill will not tend to reduce the expenses per capita of the prisoners. Besides, $10,000 would be a sum quite inadequate for the construction of a mill of that kind.

MR. BLAKE: The amount to be set apart for the mill is $4,800 only.

MR. CURRIER: I do not see how they can build one for $4,800.

36 St. Vincent de Paul.....$81,800.02

MR. BLAKE: Will the hon. gentleman explain the items for maintenance and working expenses; there is an increase in both.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): The increase in maintenance is partly due to the increase of population from 325 last year to 400 this year. It was ascertained that the amount per capita ($76) was not sufficient to cover the actual expenditure; and we now estimate the cost at $81 per capita or an increase of $5. The $2,000 increase in the working expenses is owing to the fact that last year there was a considerable stock of hay and straw on hand and it was expected that the farm would produce the rest. This year there will be no stock on hand and the farm does not produce sufficient.

MR. BLAKE: The increase in maintenance is practically $7 a head. The amount per head in Kingston Penitentiary was $74, and it was thought necessary to put on $2 more per head for St. Vincent de Paul; and now another $5 is added.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): I can only explain it by saying that the cost of the necessaries of life is higher in the Province of Quebec. Everything is tendered for, and every effort is used to keep down the expenditure. It was formerly thought that the heavier expense in this respect was due to the fact of St. Vincent de Paul being out of the way; but that cause is to a certain extent removed by the railway now running in that locality. The fact of the matter is that the scale of prices appear to be greater. There is every desire to economise, but the practical result is as has been stated.

MR. BLAKE: As the railroad has removed the cause to which I, when in office, attributed the extra cost of maintenance of St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary, there is no longer any reason for that extra cost, unless the members from Montreal will say that Montreal is a dearer place to live in than Kingston.

MR. GAULT: The cost of maintenance ought to be much less at St. Vincent de Paul than it is at Kingston.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell): Not at all; nothing of the kind.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. GAULT: Groceries and meat, and provisions of every sort can be had cheaper at Montreal than at Kingston; and so can clothing; but I go further, I say that the expenditure in maintaining these institutions, as well as all branches of the Civil Service, should be reduced some 10 or 20 per cent. The men connected with these institutions are overpaid; they and their families get their provisions, and so forth, over and above salary.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): Some of the higher officers may be paid too high a salary in some cases, perhaps, but the keepers and others of that class of servants do not receive more than is required to secure efficient men. Another cause of increased expenditure in St. Vincent de Paul is that there are a larger number of male prisoners than at Kingston, engaged in manual labour, thus resulting in a larger consumption of food and clothing than those engaged in sedentary occupations, such as tailors and shoemakers. Everything is supplied on contract, except mere articles of food or other articles that may have fallen short. Contracts are taken for all supplies and are rigidly enforced. These are well scrutinised; but, practically, it is a fact that we do not get the supplies as cheaply as at Kingston.

MR. BLAKE: As to outdoor employment, when I was in office, we had the men employed not only on the farm but in making bricks and in the quarries; but, in view of the finishing of the Penitentiary shortly, that will let the men free from that work, so far as the larger portion of the convicts are concerned. What is to be done with this excess of labour?

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): I think there will be no difficulty as to the employment of convicts at that Penitentiary hereafter, in the making of bricks. I understand that a contract has been obtained by the Warden of a favourable character, which will enable him to employ the men in the manufacture of that article. Besides, the hon. the Minister of Public Works has arranged for a further extension of the institution which is required, in the shape of another wing, and he expects to engage all persons who are fit to work in the institution. With regard to the statement of the hon. member for Montreal West (Mr. Gault), that the prices of food were as cheap at Montreal as in Kingston, I may say that I do not know that he was kind enough to give us any advice; and I shall be very glad to take any advice or receive any suggestions with a view to economising in these institutions.

MR. BLAKE: I would recommend the hon. Minister to stick to the system of letting by tender.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: I would like to enquire why the proportionate number of guards is so much larger at St. Vincent de Paul than at Kingston. There may be some special reason for this that I am not aware of.

MR. BLAKE: No doubt the reason is that, during the completion of the Penitentiary, a considerable number of guards were required. It is evident that you cannot decrease the number of guards as you decrease the number of convicts.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): It is also evident that the greater the number employed outside the more guards are required.

MR. ANGLIN: In Kingston the number of guards is six, and the number of keepers three. The number of other employés is exactly the same.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

SUPPLY.

VI. PENITENTIARIES.

House again resolved into Committee of Supply.

36 St. Vincent de Paul.....$81,800.02

MR. BLAKE: The hon. Minister

referred to some extra amounts. Are we to understand that the bulk of this item is of the same character as last year?

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): Yes, with the exception of the sums specially mentioned.

MR. BLAKE: I observe that the number of convicts to be maintained is 400, instead of 325, the number provided for last year. I suppose that is in consequence of the capacity of the Penitentiary being enlarged.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): Yes, and there is an item for the addition of another wing, to accommodate 120 persons.

MR. BLAKE: Last year the hon. gentleman stated that the increase was due to the depression of business, which caused the crime. I suppose the increase this year is owing to the expected revival of trade which is to follow the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. At any rate, this is the only evidence I can observe of the Government providing for an increase in business. Are the bad times never to end?

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): We can neither correct the morals of the people nor make good times in an hour. The bad effect of the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite was not confined to the pockets of the people.

MR. LONGLEY: Judging from the sum the chaplain receives, I think the morals of the inmates of the Penitentiary must be carefully looked after.

MR. BLAKE: There are two chaplains, one Roman Catholic and the other Protestant.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): I hope the hon. gentleman does not begrudge the convicts any comfort they derive from the chaplains.

MR. LONGLEY: Well, I may simply remark that the convicts in the Nova Scotia Penitentiary receive the benefit of prayers at $100 a term, and at that rate I think the chaplains of the Penitentiary under discussion would be well paid if they got $400 a year. I observe also that the sum of $500 a year is paid to the matron. I know hundreds of instances in which females, as intelligent and fairly respectable, render as valuable services as the matron for $60 a year. It would be an enviable state of things if all the females of the country were in such a good position as the matron of this institution. If no improvement in the matter of salary and otherwise can be effected now, it is to be hoped that what is said now may bear good fruit.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): I do not think that the officers of the higher grade are too highly paid—that a man performing the duties of Mr. Creighton, taking into account his entire competency and the careful manner in which he administers the affairs of that large institution, is over paid at $2,600 a year. The same may be said of his deputy, who occupies a responsible and arduous position. If the hon. gentleman visited some of those institutions, he would come to the conclusion that the officials are not paid too well. Taking into account the ordinary salaries paid to clergymen, I do not think the amount for the chaplain, under the circumstances, can be considered large. Of course it is larger for the clergymen of the larger institutions than for those of the smaller; because those at the smaller prisons have parishes in the neighbourhood, and do not devote their whole time to the care of the prisoners.

MR. LONGLEY said that, without desiring to depreciate those prison clergymen, he thought that in, nineteen cases out of twenty, clergymen were not too well paid. Then again, $560 was a pretty fair salary for an ordinary sort of man, a gardener. Beyond dispute, a great many intelligent, industrious men throughout the country worked all through the year for one fourth that amount. There was a generosity manifested towards those officials, exceeding greatly that exhibited in the case of officials outside the favoured precincts of Government institutions. In the interest of the country, it was time there was a reform in this respect; there should be less liberality in paying those officials. Such salaries ground down the poor for the benefit of people in better circumstances.

MR. BUNSTER said he would like to know if the chaplains of the Penitentiaries were at all prejudiced, so far as religion was concerned. It was very delicate to appoint a clergyman to a prison, unless he was thoroughly independent in religious matters. Political influence should have nothing to do with his appointment. He wanted to know the names and denominations of the Penitentiary chaplains. He thought there had been unjust appointments, and that all denominations should be fairly represented.

In reply to MR. BLAKE,

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said there were no female convicts in the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary; they were sent to Kingston, to which place he thought they would continue to be sent even after the completion of the St. Vincent de Paul institution.

In reply to MR. BUNSTER,

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said he could not at present give particulars as to the names and denominations of all the Penitentiary chaplains. There was a Catholic and a Protestant chaplain at each large institution.

Vote agreed to.

37 Dorchester.....$54,300.00

MR. LONGLEY said he thought this item large, and would like explanations.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said there was an entirely new item of $16,280, for the expense of reorganising and setting in order the new institution, and furnishing it. That item should be deducted from the $54,300. That sum was the estimate; it had not yet been spent, however. They hoped to occupy the institution early in the season. He did not propose to spend more of the estimate than was absolutely necessary. Some Penitentiary furnishings might be taken from St. John and some from Halifax. Whatever was valuable would be utilised and transferred with the prisoners to the new institution. They could not set in operation such a large institution without a considerable expenditure.

MR. BLAKE said he feared, from the largeness of this estimate, that the hopes of economy formed in connection with this new institution were not likely to be realised. The item for salaries was $25,300, while that for the salaries for the St. John and Halifax institutions, last year, reached but $20,530. In St. John Penitentiary, owing to the arrangement made before Confederation and continuing ever since, the staff was obliged to take charge of a very large number of short-time prisoners as well—the number far exceeding the number of Penitentiary convicts that could be at all expected from Prince Edward Island. Besides, those short-time prisoners were very much more difficult to handle than the long-time prisoners. They were more difficult to get into habits of discipline, and it required a greater degree of management and care to handle the Penitentiary, composed, as it was, of a certain number of long-term and a certain number of short-term prisoners, than if it had been composed of the same number of long-term men. Now, while they had two separate institutions, two Wardens, and two sets of officers, an estimate of 160 for St. John and 90 for Halifax, altogether 250 persons, they had salaries of $20,500. It seemed to him that this was a very disappointing exhibition. He had been strongly in favour of the erection of the new Penitentiary. He thought it would be a good thing in the interests of the country in economy as well as in the interests of prison discipline, that there should be a first-class Penitentiary for the Maritime Provinces. But certainly, if he had supposed that it was proposed to organise the staff at Dorchester upon a more expensive and extensive scale than the aggregate staff of the two old Penitentiaries, taking charge, as they did, of the short-term prisoners at St. John, he would have hesitated a long time before concurring in any such expenditure. He agreed in the proposition that they could not reduce the expenditure of a Penitentiary proportionately to the number of convicts. But that observation had its limits, as they knew from what was done in Halifax with reference to guards and keepers and salaries, and from what was done in St. John. But here they had forty-four officers for Dorchester Penitentiary, and they had only fifty-seven, a full complement, for St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary. They had a number which was disproportionate, if they looked to what was done in Halifax or St. John. In St. Vincent de Paul they had twenty-four guards only for 400 convicts, while there were twenty guards for 120 convicts at Dorchester. It seemed to him that in this, as in some other particulars, the staff was proposed to be organised on altogether too expensive a scale. Referring to what the hon. member who had just made some observations had said, there was of course, a difficulty in retrenching the salaries already established. The evil ways of the predecessors of the present Government had been too much trodden in. In this particular they had endeavoured to retrench; they had not increased any Penitentiary salaries; the salaries of existing officers were retained and those of new ones as far as possible reduced. But it was another thing altogether when a new institution was to be organised, when they were commencing with a clean slate, in which they might consider both the salary that should be attached to officers who were not yet appointed, and also the extent of the staff. If the staff of one institution was to cost a great deal more in salary and be larger in numbers than the two staffs that were required to control more men in two separate institutions, it is a very extraordinary result.

MR. McDONALD: I suppose it would have been well if the hon. member, in building the central institution at Dorchester, had calculated the requirements of the institution. It is true we can only get 120 people there now. But at this moment there are about 30, if not more, convicts from the Maritime Provinces in Kingston, whom we were obliged to transport to that prison for want of room. The result is that we would be obliged immediately to add to the institution another wing to accommodate even the prisoners that are convicted in the Lower Provinces. The hon. gentleman himself observed that we require for an institution containing from 120 to 200 people, a staff almost as large as for one containing double the number, particularly in an institution in the circumstances in which that at Dorchester is now placed. The difference in the aggregate amount of the salaries between the two institutions of Halifax and St. John, and the salaries in Dorchester, arises principally from the amount allowed for guards. The Inspector of Penitentiaries states, in his report, that, inasmuch as there was no fence, no wall, and no protection outside the doors of the institution for prisoners engaged in work, if they were to be so employed, there must be a larger than ordinary staff of keepers employed until such time as the necessary repairs were made. In Halifax, there is a solid mass of stone-wall, many feet high, which enables a small number of men to keep under their eye the whole body of the prisoners while engaged in labour within the walls. I understand the same observation will apply to St. John. With the exception of that requirement, let me compare the salaries proposed to be given to some of the officers at Dorchester, and those given always heretofore to the same grade of officers at Kingston and St. Vincent de Paul. The Warden at Kingston gets $2,600, the Warden at Dorchester, $2,000. The Deputy Warden at Kingston gets $1,400, the Deputy Warden at Dorchester, $1,200. The Accountant at Kingston gets $1,000, and at Dorchester, $900. The Surgeon at Kingston gets $1,800, and at Dorchester, $1,200. The Chaplains at Kingston get $1,200 each, at Dorchester, $500 each. The Chief Keeper gets $800 in both cases. All the other minor salaries are somewhat similar, except that, in Kingston and St. Vincent de Paul, the Warden is allowed a Clerk, which is not allowed in the Dorchester Penitentiary. So that, except where the salaries are such as I thought ought not to be reduced, the salaries of the other officers are all lower, and the estimates in that respect are on the side of economy. The twenty guards have $9,000, and the three keepers have $1,000. The numbers and cost at St. John and Halifax are as follows: St. John, eight guards, $3,500, three keepers, $1,500, or $5,000 in all. At Halifax, the keepers and guards receive $8,200. If we are to maintain the institution with efficiency at all, keeping in view something like an equalisation in salaries between that and other institutions of the same kind, I cannot see how the House can be asked to reduce the estimates. I trust that within a year or two, the person responsible for the estimates in this institution will be able to show that it is possible to dispense with some of the labour included in these items.

MR. BLAKE: With reference to the suggestion that this Penitentiary should have been built at first large enough to accommodate all the prisoners for some time to come—

MR. McDONALD: The hon. gentleman misunderstood me: I said large enough at any rate to accommodate those now waiting to be confined in it.

MR. BLAKE: The hon. gentleman said that, for want of that, thirty men were sent to Kingston. I venture to say they were not sent to Kingston for that reason, because the Dorchester Penitentiary had not been built. It was ascertained that the proper and most economical mode would be to build a central building, the rooms and that sort of work to be of the full and permanent size, also to build one of the wings and, as was done at St. Vincent de Paul, to place as many of the convicts as could be placed in that wing, and to use a portion of the apartments which, being built for the Penitentiary of a large size, would be far larger than would be required at first to make temporary cells in them for the accommodation of the remaining convicts. The question was carefully gone into, and, according to the then ratio of the increase of crime and the then number of convicts, it was estimated that the amount of accommodation that would be so afforded would be ample to commence with. It was thought extremely important to reserve for convict labour as large a portion of the construction of the Penitentiary as possible. That is the explanation with reference to the amount of accommodation which at the start was intended to be provided for at the Dorchester Penitentiary. As to the hon. gentleman's suggestion that it is necessary to preserve some sort of equalisation between the salaries in the different institutions, I do not agree with him on that view. The Penitentiary Act itself states, I think, three grades, or, at any rate, a minimum and a maximum grade for the different salaries. It is impossible to talk of equality with reference to the responsibilities connected with an institution designed to accommodate 150 or 180 convicts, and one which accommodates 700 or 800 convicts. The situations are entirely different. I am not now discussing the question whether $2,000 is a sum too large or too small for the Warden, but to the general proposition that it is a great evidence of economy not to have given the maximum salary prescribed by law for the Wardens of all the Penitentiaries, I must demur. Then, again, I concur that the surgeon who has for many years received $1,400 for the care of 700 or 800 prisoners in Kingston, should receive an addition of $400 a year to his salary in consequence of the insane criminals being added to his charge. An hon. gentleman informs me it was $1,200, which is the same as the surgeon of the Dorchester Penitentiary receives. I do not agree that the duties of the surgeon of the Kingston Penitentiary, with the criminal lunatics added to his charge, duties which involve the care of between 700 and 800 criminals, at all correspond with the duties of the surgeon of Dorchester Penitentiary. I do not think there is rhyme or reason in fixing the salary of the latter officer according to that view, for it is an excessive salary for those duties. I believe it was alleged, and with truth, that the practice of Dr. Lavelle was almost entirely broken up in consequence of the constant attendance required by his clientèle in the Penitentiary. It would be a different thing entirely if there were only 200 convicts instead of 750; there would be presumably only one-third the attendance required. Why should the salary be the same, then? With reference to the chaplains, I may observe that, in the larger Penitentiaries, it was the understanding that the chaplains would have no other care than the cure of souls. Their sole business was to attend to the spiritual concerns of the convicts within the walls. But I do not presume it is intended to apply that to Dorchester any more than to Manitoba or British Columbia, in which the principle that was adopted by the late Government was to procure the services of some suitable minister for that purpose, whose ordinary duties brought him into convenient relations with the Penitentiary itself. The suggestion of the hon. gentleman that additional force is required so long as the wall is not built is certainly a reasonable one. I quite agree with him that, while the convicts are building the wall, it is impossible to go on without some additional assistance. I hope that, in making the appointments in that connection, such arrangements will be made as will enable him to dispense with the services of certain of the guards as soon as the necessity has ceased. May I ask how many female convicts there are in the Penitentiary for the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. McDONALD: I think not more than six or seven. I am instructed that it is necessary to have a matron. At first I thought there was no necessity for a matron for so small a number of convicts, but the officers say it is just as requisite to have a matron for three or four as for twenty. The matron will reside in the establishment.

Mr. ANGLIN: The whole expenditure is unquestionably too large, and it will be utterly impossible to reduce the expenditure if we start on this scale. Just glance at the figures. In Kingston we find one officer for every ten prisoners; in St. Vincent de Paul, one officer for about every eight prisoners; in Dorchester one for every four prisoners. That is a most unreasonable provision, and if we examine the details it appears loose. At the Dorchester Penitentiary, where there are only 120 convicts, I can see no necessity for a Deputy Warden. A hospital overseer is unnecessarily employed here, at a salary of $560 a year, to wait until some one gets sick to attend to. Then could not the accountant, at the same time, be storekeeper and schoolmaster? Two teamsters, at a salary of $500 each, are employed. Could not that work be done by the convicts? Taking it all in all it is manifest we are starting here on a scale of unprecedented extravagance. As the intention is not to employ all the keepers permanently, it would be well to distinguish between those who are to be employed permanently and those who are merely engaged temporarily, so that those temporarily engaged, would not be able to make any claim against the Government for vested interests. With regard to the chaplains, $500 per annum seems to be a reasonable sum to allow clergymen living at a distance.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou): In answer to the hon. gentlemen, I would say, I cannot understand why a mechanic is not worth as much in Dorchester as he is in St. Vincent de Paul or Kingston. The general details which the hon. gentleman has criticised were settled by persons officially responsible for the due performance of their duties, and who, from their long experience and known ability, were the most competent to deal with them. The hon. gentleman will pardon me if I accept the recommendation of these officials in preference to that of the hon. gentleman, who has not displayed remarkable sagacity in recommending that convicts should be employed as teamsters, who have to travel all over the country in the discharge of their duties. I do not think, under the circumstances, we shall be called upon to take the hon. gentleman's view of the requirements of the several classes of persons who will properly fill the positions in the service of this institution. The hon. gentleman complained that there were keeper instructors who were men of considerable intelligence in the particular branch of mechanics they had charge of. The hon. gentleman ought to know that for the first few years the labour of the convicts will be employed under the superintendence of these mechanic instructors in the construction of a wall round the building and additional wings to the institution itself. Therefore, it was considered advisable that, in order to utilise to the best advantage the labour of these people, heads of the various mechanical departments should be appointed to take charge of the several departments. With regard to the farmer gardener, it is absolutely necessary to have a man of proper skill and intelligence to utilise the fertile belt of land surrounding the institution, and I do not think $160 a year is too much to give a man capable of performing these duties. I am satisfied that there is not a single officer on the list of officials whose services are not absolutely necessary for the proper care and conduct of the institution. With reference to the suggestion that the guards should not become permanently attached to the institution, it is my purpose to employ every keeper and guard, now in Halifax or St. John, who is not too old or not otherwise incapacitated, but with the distinct understanding that, whenever, from the advanced state of the works or the fulfilment of other conditions it is expedient to dispense with their services, they shall have no claim for permanent employment in connection with the institution.

MR. ANGLIN: What I said in regard to the employment of mechanics was that, if we have a blacksmith instructor, I did not see why we should also have an engineer and machinist. What sort of machinery is he to attend to?

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): I omitted to explain, with reference to the engineering machinist, that the institution is heated by steam from a large boiler built into some part of the lower apartments; and I am told that it would be very dangerous to the building and the inmates for a person not accustomed to take care of boilers of that description to be placed in charge of it, and that it is necessary to have some persons skilled in engineering.

MR. ANGLIN: It seems to me that $780 is a great deal to pay every year for that work. We know that in hundreds of private houses, where the heating is done by steam, all this care is necessary, just as much as in this Penitentiary; but you would never think of incurring such an enormous expense for simply watching the boiler. I think a skilled blacksmith might very well attend to that work; and that it would be quite possible for two persons to do all the work of four of the men included in this staff. I would like to know—if this institution is really to be worked economically—why there should be a Warden and a deputy-warden to take charge of 120 men, unless the Warden is to be the head, and to be allowed to drive about while his deputy is discharging his duties. I would like to know too what an accountant has to do in an establishment of this kind. Is it to keep account of the stores? Then he must go to the storekeeper. There is no pay list, and we are not to have a manufactory established there; and even if there was I really cannot see what necessity there is for an accountant, or what he can have to do in that establishment beyond the work which the storekeeper might very well do himself. Then there is a matron and a deputy-matron.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): I was informed by the officers of the Department that these were necessary.

MR. ANGLIN: We are not here to be instructed by any officer in the Department; the members of this House are competent to judge whether so many officials are required. Then, as to the two teamsters, the hon. gentleman says these teamsters are to be sent over the country. What in the world for? All the supplies, being tendered for, are brought to the institution by the contractors. I have some acquaintance with the duties of teamsters; but what they are to go over the country for I cannot define, nor is it to be conjectured. I cannot see any economy in the readjustment of this staff. We talk of the extraordinary expense of maintenance at St. Vincent de Paul, where 400 convicts are to cost $32,497.52; but the proportionate cost of maintenance is about the same at Dorchester, where the Intercolonial Railway runs close to the Penitentiary. The merchants of the Lower Provinces will not surely say that they cannot furnish supplies as cheaply as at Kingston, flour perhaps excepted. Sir, why there should be such an extraordinary increase in the expenditure in these Penitentiaries I cannot see; but such an increase is going on. With regard to the skill appointed on this staff, I regard it as one of the most unprecedented extravagances.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: It is very natural that the younger members of this House should criticise this estimate; but I must say that I was surprised when the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) turned, in such a patronising manner, to the hon. member for Annapolis, and said that he quite agreed with him in regard to what he called this largely increasing expenditure on the Penitentiaries, and that we should put a stop to it; and I thought I would look over the tables of expenditure from 1873 down to the last year of the late Administration. I took the years 1873-4, 1874-5, 1875-6, 1876-7, 1877-8, and 1878-9, and I find that the average expenditure on Penitentiaries for these years was $327,484, against the present estimate of $313,711, notwithstanding the increased expenditure this year at Kingston, and the $8,000 additional in Manitoba.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: I really think, in regard to the erection of the walls, there will be more than two teamsters required, and I do not think there is much to complain of in that respect, and with reference to the number of guards, when the institution is completed, if they are reduced, and put in the same proportion as at St. Vincent de Paul, there will be a saving of $6,000, so that really the amount for salaries would be reduced to $19,000. With reference to the chaplains, I want to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Justice to the fact that, while there is a resident clergyman in Dorchester, and I presume he is resident and lives very near to the institution, the Catholic clergyman will require to come from a good distance—about five miles—and will require the use of a horse and vehicle in order to be in attendance to perform his duties. I think, therefore, that some additional allowance should be made to the Catholic clergyman to defray his expenses of driving. That subject, I have no doubt, will receive due consideration. I would like to ask when the Penitentiary is likely to be ready for occupation, and whether it is intended in the course of the summer to construct one of the wings to give increased accommodation.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): I hope the institution will be ready for occupation by the commencement of the financial year; and I believe the hon. the Minister of Public Works proposes to make arrangements for the construction of an additional wing as early as circumstances will permit.

MR. BLAKE: I hope to receive a repetition of those cheers which greeted the hon. the Finance Minister a few moments ago, when I read the record of expenditure on Penitentiaries which he very ingeniously referred to for the purpose of showing that I was not justified in the remarks I had made. I did state that the Penitentiaries cost too much money, and that it was important to see that these expenses were reduced, and that in organising a staff care should be taken to put it on an economical basis; but I guarded myself against making any charge of extravagance against the Government which preceded the late Administration. As appears by the comparative statement referred to by the hon. the Minister of Finance, the expenditure on Penitentiaries for 1873-4 was $395,551. The expenditure is an annually increasing one; therefore, it would be naturally expected that in each of these years following 1873-4 there would be an increase on this $395,551. But we find that in 1874-5 the expenditure was $337,593, or a reduction of about $58,000; in 1875-6 it was $312,015, or a reduction upon the preceding year of $25,000, and a reduction on the first-mentioned year of $83,000; for 1876-7 (my first year) the expenditure was $303,169, or a further reduction on the previous year of $9,000, and a total reduction on the first mentioned year of $92,000. The expenditure for 1877-8 (my second and only further year) was $308,102, an increase of $5,000 on the preceding year, but a nett decrease, on the first year of the comparative statement of $88,000 or thereabouts.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY : The hon. member admits that only $5,000 additional was asked for the two years 1878, and 1879. The hon. gentleman censured the Government for their large estimates, but I think it is evident that the late Government were liberal in their estimates. The hon. member says there was a sudden jump in 1873 up to $379,000. I do not know what lead to that increase. The figures show clearly, in view of all circumstances, that the estimates of my hon. friend are less than they were last year.

MR. LONGLEY : I think that a Warden having a salary of $2,600 should be able to get along without a deputy. Most of us are aware of the extravagance which prevailed under the late Administration, but I want to see some improvement under the direction of public affairs by this Government.

MR. JONES : I scarcely think the salaries are too much. I notice one item of $16,000 for organising, expenses of tools, and transfer of the whole plant; and I would like to ask any hon. gentleman who is acquainted with saw-mills, whether he could transfer the plant for less than $16,000. I think that item is quite a reasonable one.

38 Manitoba.....$25,573.50

MR. BLAKE said he could not approve of the proposal to increase the salary of the Warden of this Penitentiary from $1,400 to $2,000. The Penitentiaries Act, passed in 1875, showed the intention of Parliament with reference to the general scales of expenses of the officers of the Penitentiaries. It was obvious they must be paid at different rates, according to the different character of the institutions. The maximum sum was $2,600, and the minimum $1,000. It was not possible to conceive any good reason for giving the Warden of such a small institution as the Manitoba Penitentiary, $2,000. Instead of keeping his salary down to the minimum, it was proposed to advance it to a point approximating to the maximum, or the salaries proper to large institutions like St.

Vincent de Paul and Kingston. This increase of 50 per cent. was proposed in a serious assembly of business men because the Warden had to entertain persons visiting that country. That explanation did seem really ridiculous. Something near the minimum salary in this case ought to be fixed. It ought not to be increased partly because he had been provided with a better establishment and other advantages. The expenditure for the smaller Penitentiaries should certainly be kept down, because at the best they would prove terribly expensive considering all the work they could do. An increase of $600 in the case of this Warden, who had so little to do, compared with the Warden of Dorchester or St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary, did appear an act of extravagance.

MR. PLUMB said there was a necessity for a constantly growing expenditure in this direction. He was somewhat surprised at the argument of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) that the salaries of the Wardens of the Penitentiaries should be graduated according to the number of the convicts attended to. He (Mr. Plumb) had yet to learn that those officers should have a percentage upon the number of convicts under their charge. In this Manitoba case, the Warden lived twenty miles from Winnipeg; his expenses were large, while it was difficult in that country to get a suitable man for such an office. Hon. gentlemen opposite were exceedingly careful of the public expenditure when not responsible for it. He had not seen the same care evinced, the same exhibition of economy, when those hon. gentlemen held the keys of the Treasury. He thought they had overdone their criticism in this matter, and that they would but injure their influence by wasting their ammunition in this manner. Nothing was so important in the administration of justice as the wholesome administration of the Penitentiary system. It would be false economy to employ unsuitable officials in those institutions for the sake of economy. He did not think the record of the late Government justified the criticism of hon. gentlemen opposite on this occasion. Though the Opposition had a perfect right to criticise the Estimates, the hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir Albert

J. Smith) and the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) had evidently desired to appear as zealous guardians of that Treasury which, when in office, they did so much to deplete.

MR. ROYAL: I would like to say a few words in connection with this item, "Manitoba Penitentiary." The item, no doubt, is a most important one, not only to the administration of justice in Manitoba, but also in the North-West Territories. We must not lose sight of the fact that this Penitentiary is both for Manitoba and the North-West Territories. Though the staff may be small, the duties they are called upon to perform are certainly as responsible as those of the staff of any other Penitentiary. The object, I suppose, of a Penitentiary is to reform as well as to punish, and the Warden requires to exercise a great amount of energy and prudence; to have a good idea of discipline and some experience that will give him the prudence to carry out with efficiency the objects of the institution. In the present case, I believe the Warden (Mr. Batson) has been a most efficient officer. He was appointed in 1871, and was taken from the Volunteer Force in which he was an eminent officer. He was requested by Governor Archibald to assume the duties of Warden of the Penitentiary that was then provisionally established. Mr. Batson conducted this institution with a great deal of success, both for the benefit of the institution and the Province. Under the administration of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) as Minister of Justice, Mr. Batson's claims to the wardenship of that institution were acknowledged, and the appointment gave universal satisfaction in the Province. Now I believe that Mr. Batson is as competent to discharge the duties of a Warden as the same officer at Kingston or any other place. We must remember that in a few years the population of that part of the country will largely increase, and the number of convicts will unfortunately increase probably in the same proportion. I suppose then that the Government will not object to add a few hundred dollars to Mr. Batson's salary. Besides, the present Warden of the Manitoba Penitentiary has no deputy, and has to perform all the duties of that prison without any assistance.

MR. PLUMB.

MR. BLAKE: He has got a chief keeper.

MR. ROYAL: Yes; but the chief keeper does not act in the capacity of a Deputy Warden, and is not competent to discharge the duties of a Deputy Warden. Then Mr. Batson resides at some distance from Winnipeg, and has to go to that town very often on business. He has to keep a horse, which must add considerably to his expenses. I trust, under these circumstances, the Committee will agree in the recommendation of the Minister of Justice, to increase Mr. Batson's salary by $600, which certainly is not too large a sum to pay him.

39 British Columbia Penitentiary. . $15,826.30

MR. CASEY: I desire to call the attention of the Government to a consideration which refers to Penitentiary management in general, rather than to this particular item. It has been suggested to me by several members of our County Council that, in view of the large expense incurred by the counties in sending prisoners to the Penitentiary under the care of the Sheriff, a course should be adopted by the Dominion Government similar to that adopted by the Local Government in regard to the Central Prison. I believe in that prison they keep two bailiffs, who are sent out to the country to bring in the prisoners. It was suggested that the same system might be adopted by the Dominion Government, and thus save a considerable sum to the counties. If the prisoners were brought in by bailiffs sent out by the Government the cost would be less than at present, where the Sheriffs in the different counties have to perform that duty.

MR. McINNES: Under this item I take the liberty of calling the attention of the hon. the Minister of Justice to a matter to which I called his attention last Session—that is, the small salary that the Warden of the New Westminster Penitentiary receives. It is not all in keeping with the salaries received by the Wardens and Deputy Wardens of the other Penitentiaries of the Dominion. I find, for instance, that in Kingston the Warden of the Penitentiary receives $2,600, and the Deputy Warden $1,400 per annum; at St. Vincent de Paul the Warden receives $2,600, and the Deputy Warden, $1,400. In the Dorchester Penitentiary the Warden receives $2,000, and the Deputy Warden, $1,200; in Manitoba the Warden receives $2,000, and the Chief Keeper, $800. Now, I find that the Warden of the British Columbia Penitentiary receives $1,200. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) stated, a few moments ago, that, under the Penitentiary Act of 1875, the minimum salary for Wardens was fixed at $1,000, and the maximum at $2,600. It was during the term of office of that hon. gentleman that he appointed the Warden of the Manitoba Penitentiary, and fixed his salary at $1,400. Two years afterwards the Warden of the British Columbia Penitentiary was appointed at a salary of $1,200. Now, why this discrepancy should be I am unable to understand. Certainly, the cost of living in British Columbia is 25 per cent. higher than in any of the Eastern Provinces.

MR. BLAKE: Than in Manitoba?

MR. McINNES: I believe it is even higher than in Manitoba. The hon. gentleman stated that this scale of salaries for the Wardens was fixed according to the size of the Penitentiaries. I think the additional expenses of living ought to be taken into consideration more than the size of the institution. But the institution itself has from 400 to 600 convicts and has a correspondingly large number of guards and keepers. I therefore trust that the hon. the Minister of Justice, in the Supplementary Estimates, will add at least $400 to the salary of the Warden of the British Columbia Penitentiary. Even if it was placed at $1,600, it would still be $400 less than that of the Warden in Manitoba. I am happy that the hon. the Minister of Justice has appointed the Chief Keeper to be Deputy Warden. I would also ask that his salary be raised from $800 to at least $1,000. I think that is certainly most reasonable, when we take into consideration the salaries paid to other officers throughout the Dominion. Even our Courts are only paid in the same proportion, although the cost of living is so much higher than it is elsewhere. I would like to ask the hon. the Minister of Justice if it is compulsory on the surgeon of the British Columbia Penitentiary to visit that institution once a day.

MR. McDONALD: It is compulsory.

MR. BLAKE: This is an occasion on which I am in a position to support the hon. the Minister of Justice. It is true that I fixed the salary of the Warden of the Manitoba Penitentiary at $1,400, which, upon the whole, I thought a fit salary for that officer. When that Penitentiary was about to be organised, he was offered that office at a salary of $1,200, and he accepted office at that salary. He had been keeper of the gaol, and was thought to be a most suitable person for the position. But I do not see, unless the principle of the hon. the Minister of Justice as to the equalisation of salaries is adopted, that the salary of the Warden in British Columbia should be raised. I do not suppose the expense of living can be so much greater in British Columbia than in Manitoba. An officer recently appointed at a salary at which he accepted the office has I think no reasonable ground upon which to ask for an increase of salary. Why the Chief Keeper should have $200 more, I do not see. Having all through my term of office endeavoured to keep down the estimates, I feel bound, morally speaking, to pat the hon. the Minister of Justice on the back, and to help to keep this item down.

MR. McINNES: The hon. gentleman from West Durham says he was recommended by a gentleman to that position as being well qualified. If he was recommended by one individual, it must have been my predecessor, Mr. Cunningham, and I believe that all the Senators and all the members of the Commons signed the recommendation for another. They reduced the salary from $1,400 to $1,200, and I believe that is the principal reason why $1,200 is all the salary the Warden gets.

MR. MACKENZIE: I would like to ask whether Mr. Speaker has any power left in reference to the appointment of any clerk, or of doing anything. I infer from a memorandum that I have been shown, that he has practically been shorn of all his power in this House. I have also been led to this conclusion by other indications, such as occurred last year, when we found the Speaker was not aware that the Assistant Clerk had been dismissed until he was told of the removal in the House. We found a new appointment had been made, and he was not even aware of the new appointment. Now we find the Speaker is shorn of all the power this House entrusted him with, and that he has nothing to do but take his seat in the Chair and do whatever the Commission bids him. I think the House is entitled to some explanation, because we look to the Speaker as the representative of the authority and power of this House, and we are desirous of maintaining the Speaker in his rights, as far as that can be done. We are not desirous of seeing the Government of the day usurp all the power and authority which belongs essentially to the Speaker. For the first time in the history of this Parliament or of any British Parliament anywhere, the Speaker has ceased, for the first time, in your person, Sir, to exercise the right, authority and duties that are incumbent upon the head of this House. I wish to know whether this is done with the assent of the Speaker himself or whether by the members of the Government, who aspire to control this House and make all appointments independently of the Speaker.

MR. SPEAKER: I thank the hon. gentleman for his expression of sympathy in regard to Mr. Piché. I may say that I knew nothing of the matter, because I was not Speaker when the change was made. That was the reason I spoke from the Chair as I did when interrogated by hon. gentlemen about Mr. Piché's resignation. The Public Accounts mention some changes that have been made in the number of sessional clerks and permanent clerks. As to their appointments, I make them myself. Of course, when I think proper, I take the advice of the Commissioners. I do so, generally, because I know that it is the duty of the Commissioners of the Internal Economy to look carefully to the finances of the country. I take the advice of the members of the Commission, but I make the appointments myself, and I am disposed and willing, and desire to make them myself as Speaker of this House, and I hope I will make them in the interest of the proper conduct of the affairs of this House. I trust, in future, that this House and every hon. member will give me their support in this respect; and that I shall be able to show at the end of my term of office, most satisfactory results—in fact a better management of the affairs of this House. I want the moral support of the hon. members on both sides of the House in the discharge of my duty, and I desire it to be understood that when I think a change or an appointment is necessary for the despatch of business and the proper Administration of the affairs of this House that I am able to judge by myself, and take all the responsibility devolving properly on me as Speaker.

MR. MACKENZIE: We are all delighted to hear the explanation of Mr. Speaker; but the explanation was really very necessary, because we were under the impression that the hon. gentleman's good nature had yielded too far in making the multitudinous appointments that have been made; but the Speaker has assumed the responsibility of all these, as well as all those which I understood the hon. gentleman to say were crowded upon by him the Commissioners. However, if the Speaker assumes these, he has undertaken a burden that I would not be willing to assume. As a member of the House I will give him my support. I will give him a little more support than he is willing to receive. I am glad to know that he has determined to resist the encroachments of the Executive, and to vindicate the privileges of Parliament. Long may his independence flourish.

MR. SPEAKER: I take the responsibility of this Session; but, although I took the responsibility of last Session, every hon. member is aware that last year I was in fact overpowered.

MR. MACKENZIE: By whom? The Commissioners?

MR. SPEAKER: Not only by them, but the members of this House, too. I was not blamed by hon. members on the other side of the House; they did not disturb me at all; and if ever there was an occasion when I might very well say: Save me from my friends, that was the occasion. I tried gradually to take control myself. I think I have succeeded; and, as every member is aware, the new system has been working very well, and to the satisfaction of the House and the public. I will not only expect the support of members on one side of the House, but the support of both sides of the House—not the forced support, but the willing support, of all the members of the House in the discharge of the duties that devolve necessarily upon me.

MR. BLAKE: After the very frank explanation of the Speaker, I am sure we shall deal as tenderly as we can in sharing the results of this dreadful overpowering. There is an old adage, that “when things come to the worst they mend.” I am told that there was a motion made last year from these Benches for a return which resulted in a change, which—so far as the consequences estimated would lead to the inference—has been a change for the better, in the administration of the affairs of the House. I think the Speaker might be a little kinder to my friends; for they must have given him very strong and effectual moral support when they proposed to him a plain statement which resulted in a very great change for the better from that moment. I am sure, as my hon. friend beside me has observed, that the Speaker may rely on support from this side of the House. So long as we have a Speaker, and the Speaker acts up to his position, it is the duty of every member to sustain him in the exercise of the most important functions exercised within the walls of this House. I desire to know in reference to this item, what is the system upon which the sessional clerks are paid. Three dollars a day is the amount stated; but are they paid according to the time they are in attendance, or from the time of their appointment or arriving here for duty?

MR. SPEAKER: There are paid from the first day of the Session to the last day. Those that come late are, of course, only paid for the days they are in attendance. They are all discharged on the last day of the Session.

MR. BLAKE: And, in case of absence, what then?

MR. SPEAKER: Supposing it is on account of some unavoidable circumstance, as for instance, a decease in the family of the clerk, we consider him as present.

MR. BLAKE: But under other circumstances?

MR. SPEAKER: If he leaves on his own account he must lose his pay.

MR. BLAKE: Was that the result last Session, for instance?

MR. SPEAKER: Well, last Session, a certain number were paid for the Session, others were discharged during the Session, because we thought their services were not required; but this year they have always been busy from the first day of the Session.

MR. BLAKE: Then the enormous sums of money that were disbursed were represented by so many days of attendance, during which we had the benefit of their presence?

MR. SPEAKER: Yes.

MR. BLAKE: May I ask how much we paid for that benefit last Session?

MR. SPEAKER: The item is in the Public Accounts.

MR. BLAKE: I was not able to add it up, myself.

MR. HUNTINGTON: I do not like to add to the time occupied in this discussion. I sympathise very much with the Speaker, who was pressed so much last Session. I do not think it was in human nature to resist that pressure. I am quite sure that the promises of the hon. gentleman are sincere; and as he knows that he should have the support of the House in order to be able to do his duty, he should extend his gratitude to my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), for, if my hon. friend had not made his motion last year, attention would not have been called to the matter, and the Speaker might, during the present year, have been pressed by his friends, as in the past. I am really astonished that he did not express his thanks to the hon. member for North Norfolk, for thus saving him from the vortex into which he was being plunged. If my hon. friend from North Norfolk had been a politician, in the true sense, he would have held back; he would have said: We will let these people take rope enough, and they will hang themselves. But, instead of doing that, he said: No; the Speaker is an honest man, and he must be protected; he must be snatched from the gulf that is yawning in his path. I am sure all my friends on this side of the House,—and perhaps they will all speak before we get through,—will give the Speaker their support in his endeavours to properly administer the affairs of the House ; but I must say again that he would do well to express his gratitude for the kind admonition given him by the hon. member for North Norfolk.

MR. SPEAKER : The motion of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) came in good time. It was a very patriotic move on his part—I never complained of that—and it had its effect of course in diminishing the difficulty. I will not say in which way. Some were dismissed ; some gave their resignations. As the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington) has manifested a desire that I should return my thanks to the hon. member for North Norfolk. I do so with the greatest pleasure. This year the hon. member for North Norfolk has been also very vigilant ; he has moved two motions as to the accounts of expenses—he had a right to do this—and the returns were properly put before the Committee on Public Accounts.

MR. BLAKE : There is another point. Of course, I only speak from the record of what passed last Session on this subject, as I was not present ; but, according to that authority, the hon. the First Minister made a promise, with considerable positiveness, that there should be a reorganisation of this system, that, in fact, the evil system of having extra sessional clerks should be abolished, and that those clerks required during the Session should be permanent servants ; and, according to my memory of the debate, it was suggested that it would be proper to take into consideration some gentlemen possessing the political virtues of this side of the House, who had occupied the positions of sessional clerks during our term of power ; and the hon. the First Minister was understood to say that, in the proposed change, these persons would be considered. I am anxious, therefore, to know in what respect that understanding has been observed, and in what proportion the officers have been appointed.

MR. SPEAKER : I did not ask about their political opinions ; I presumed that they were able to do the work ; in fact there are a great many of these clerks who have the same political opinions as hon. gentlemen opposite.

MR. BLAKE : I am speaking now of the re-appointments.

MR. SPEAKER : I did not enquire about that. I presume that they are men who have not taken any positive party side. I thought it proper to have young men, who could stand the work, and sit up late at night ; and I do not think they will have formed any decided political opinions. But I can only say I do not know their political opinions. I tried to apportion them fairly from the Lower Provinces, the Province of Quebec and the Province of Ontario. There was a certain number among them who were here last Session, and a certain number of new appointments.

AN HON. MEMBER : How many from Manitoba ?

MR. SPEAKER : There is one.

MR. BLAKE : I am a little disappointed, Mr. Chairman ; I do not know the name of one of these persons who have the political proclivities of this side of the House. If the hon. the Speaker had been carrying out the pledge which, speaking for him, the hon. the First Minister made, he would have ascertained the political opinions of these persons.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY : No, no.

MR. BLAKE : Pardon me ; the question is not to be avoided in this way. It is out of the question that these persons, who came recommended by his political friends—because I presume that they did not come from the opposite political party—

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY : Suppose they did not.

MR. BLAKE : That is just what I do suppose ; and, of course, knowing that, or presuming that, when Mr. A put in his credentials from his own political friends, he did not say : are you a true blue ? We do not do it that way.

SOME HON. MEMBERS : Hear, hear.

MR. BLAKE : It is not necessary. He now says : Oh, I made no enquiry as to the political opinions of the applicants. No, but he knew, as every member of this House is convinced, that all these men, except by a miracle, belonged to his own side.

MR. HESSON : Hon. gentlemen opposite set us the example.

MR. BLAKE: It was proposed to establish a new régime with reference to the servants of the House; and it was perfectly understood that, whatever side came in, the Sessional servants would not be all appointed from their own ranks. It was stated that there would be a change, and that in future, when a change in the Administration came about, there should be no change in the status of those persons. That certainly was my understanding of the statement. I, of course, speak subject to correction, as I was not here at the time. Are we to understand that, as the new arrangement was evidently made to give permanent appointment to political friends, in the good time coming for us—which has already come for the Liberals of England—we will be able to act as circumstances demand?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I recollect perfectly well the discussion that took place last Session when the hon. gentleman was not here. Perhaps we might have been spared a great deal of the eloquence of the hon. gentleman if he had been here at that time. The system which obtained for so many years was admitted by all to be a vicious one. Very many of the employés had been engaged in previous Sessions, and many were quite ignorant and untrained, and unfit for their work. That had been the case for the five years previous, and it was also the case to a great extent last year. The matter was discussed by the Commissioners on the Internal Economy of the House. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) spoke as if the Commissioners and Mr. Speaker were two different authorities. The Speaker is the presiding officer of, and acts with, that Commission in carrying out the internal economy of the House. It was thought it would be well to do away with the system referred to. Hon. gentlemen opposite admitted last Session that pressure was brought to bear upon them in regard to the appointments, and, when the present Speaker was elected to preside over this House, he also experienced similar pressure; and, in order to get rid of that vicious pressure, it was arranged by the Commissioners that the sessional clerks should be a small fixed body of men chosen from among the best of those employed in previous years, instead of a large scratch corps raised at the beginning of each Session. The opinion of the Clerk of the House was taken as to the competency of most of those officers. A report was made on this point and then we made enquiry as to the representation of the different Provinces, allowing three men from each instead of four. In past years it was found that, owing to the continual pressure I have spoken of, more men were engaged than there was work for. Well, these twenty-five men were selected, and the hon. gentleman says, there should have been a political selection. I am not aware that any arrangement of that kind was arrived at. The hon. member for West Durham states that the hon. member for Gloucester made some suggestions with reference to the persons being chosen with regard to their political opinions. I think that would be a bad system to adopt. I have no doubt that, both as to the selection of the men and the ability they possess, my hon. friend (Mr. Speaker) is just as successful as any of his predecessors. There is no doubt that he has taken just as much care in the selection of those clerks as the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) did. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) said there was an indication of the good times coming, when there would be a change in the system. We have heard similar statements not only with reference to the clerks of the House, but with respect to the whole Civil Service. Even the service has got notice, through the organs of the hon. gentlemen opposite, that, when the "good time" comes, the American system is to be introduced.

MR. BLAKE: No.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is the notice which has been given. There are four years left in which to lay the basis for the introduction of the American system, when, according to wildness of hope which characterises the sanguine disposition of the hon. member for West Durham, they are to come back again. If I was a civil servant or sessional clerk, and was enjoying office with a comfortable salary, I do not think I should be disturbed by that illusion.

MR. SPEAKER: I hope the hon. member for West Durham will allow me not to follow the advice he has just given.

I would not like to be put in such a position. How would it be if, after finding out whether the candidate was a Liberal or Radical, the Speaker should ascertain the man was not fit for the office? If the man was rejected, the newspapers would declare that it was on political grounds.

AN HON. MEMBER: Suppose he was fit for the position?

MR. SPEAKER: In that case we would not consider his political opinions at all. The officer is the servant of the House, and must do everything ordered by the House. If a candidate happened to a Liberal, and I found he was a fit and proper person to discharge the duties of the office I would appoint him.

MR. WRIGHT: I think the Speaker has solved a problem which has been troubling me from the beginning of the Session. I had two unfortunate French messengers who disappeared suddenly from the House, and I did not know whether to blame the House or the Speaker. Two others were appointed who opposed me during the late election. I feel satisfied that the Speaker has been animated by the purest and most lofty motives in his selections; by that sense of public duty, and by that economy which are the eminent characteristics of all Conservatives, and more particularly the Speaker.

MR. ANGLIN: It was stated last year that the intention was to appoint a number of sessional clerks who should hold their positions permanently. I then said to the right hon. gentleman that, if that were to be done, it would be but right to commence with a fair proportion of those I had selected during my five years' incumbency of the Chair, and who were supposed to be favourable to the Liberal party. The right hon. gentleman said that ought to be done, and I was pleased that he was induced to act so fairly and justly. But that expectation was disappointed. It is now stated that no distinction was made on the score of politics. I am not aware that any one of the sessional clerks I appointed is now in the employment of the House.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I think the chief door-keeper was appointed by the hon. gentleman, and he occupies a much more important position. That officer was re-appointed this Session.

MR. SPEAKER.

MR. ANGLIN: I am now speaking of sessional clerks. When I was first elected to the Chair, I found a great deal of difficulty in making my selections, owing to the fact that a large number of persons had been employed as sessional clerks for many years, and, though they had been appointed because they were in accord with hon. gentlemen opposite, I do not think I displaced one. If the appointments were to be considered permanent, I think we should have started with a fair proportion of those in office when the Speaker was elected to the Chair. Nobody can sympathise with Mr. Speaker more than I do with regard to the pressure brought to bear upon him. I experienced a similar pressure for some years. These were men of capacity, men of intelligence and fully fitted to discharge any of the duties devolving upon them. They are supported by members of the House, some through sympathy for their necessities, and it is exceedingly difficult for a Speaker to absolutely resist pressure of that kind and never to employ a man more than is required. I was more than surprised on my way to Ottawa to see in the Montreal Gazette a speech said to have been delivered at Argenteuil by the hon. the Minister of Railways, in which he spoke of the extravagance into which the late Government had plunged, and also of myself as a Speaker who had allowed himself to be button-holed and subjected to improper and undue influence, and had appointed an enormous number of clerks and others, not at all required by the service of the House. He then proceeded to speak of himself and colleagues as men who had come to make great reforms—the idea being something like the cleansing of the Augean stables, stating that they had an enormous task before them in sweeping out all the supernumerary clerks and officers whom I had employed. I really wondered if the hon. gentleman quite believed all he stated on that occasion and imagined that what he and his colleagues had done during the Session of 1879 had really been done by me in 1875, 1876, 1877 and 1878. It is true that in 1877, 1878—and 1878 particularly—a larger number of sessional clerks was employed than was absolutely necessary. I adopted the plan of employing only a few in the earlier days of the Session, and others only as the work grew, and sometimes a larger number than necessary were employed. One day, during the last Session, I found that a number of the young men had nothing to do, and were disporting themselves about the streets. I called for a report, which should have been voluntarily made to me, and on obtaining it I dismissed seven clerks, who I found had actually done nothing for several weeks before more than draw their pay. That might have occurred under any administration, but I do not feel that anything that I have done justified the extraordinary charges of the hon. the Minister of Railways in regard to my extravagance. He must have imagined that I was guilty of what was done after I left the Speaker's Chair. I think the number here will be quite competent to do all the business. I find, during the latter years of my occupancy of the Speaker's Chair, the Committee work was very much less than in the earlier years, and that, when Special Committees were struck, very often the Chairman would insist that some particular person must be employed, because he had devoted a great deal of time and attention to the particular questions to be considered and could materially assist the Chairman and do the work very much better than anyone taken from the ordinary staff; and on three or four occasions I found myself almost compelled to go outside the circle of the ordinary clerks, and appoint those men because of their supposed special qualifications. That may occur again, but I believe that, under ordinary circumstances, twenty-five sessional clerks, besides the French translators, who were always included among the sessional clerks in my time, are quite sufficient to do all the work.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I can only say, in reference to the statement of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), that, at the nomination in Argenteuil, a very bitter attack was made on the present Speaker of the House by the candidate in the interest of the hon. gentleman opposite. I felt bound to state, in explanation of the charge, that he had enormously increased the number of sessional clerks, that the practice that had grown up during the incumbency of the former Speaker, had led to a great deal of pressure being exercised by members for such appointments. I think the hon. gentleman has sustained fully the statement I made in reference to himself in the remarks just uttered.

MR. ANGLIN: I do not.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The hon. gentleman has admitted that he was pressed by supporters of the Government or button-holed, and induced to appoint a great number of clerks not required, and that he had learned afterwards that some of them were walking about the streets instead of performing their duties to the people, and he makes a merit of having discharged those clerks. The hon. member for Gloucester stated that the present Speaker was not entitled to all the credit for the economy effected in his Department, and asked him to return his thanks to the hon. member for North Norfolk for having assisted him in getting rid of a number of these supernumeraries. So, I ask the hon. member for Gloucester to return his thanks to the hon. member for Frontenac, who kindly assisted him in getting rid of a large number of those he had appointed and charged upon the public revenue, persons who had no duties to perform, or who neglected the little work assigned them. The hon. gentleman has no reason to complain of my remarks in reference to the example he had set the present Speaker, of appointing unnecessary officials, after his attack upon that gentleman, under the circumstances. His own admissions on this occasion justified the charge I made. He has confessed to having been obliged to yield to the pressure put upon him by members and persons outside the House, in reference to appointing a large number of clerks, whose services were not required, and who were so disrespectful towards the Speaker as to disport themselves about the streets and pay no attention to their duties. The Commissioners on Internal Economy has found the present Speaker most ready and anxious to give the heartiest cooperation and support to the proposition to place this matter on an entirely different and satisfactory basis. The Speaker, with his colleagues, has been anxious to have the duties of these officials discharged, not only in a most thorough and efficient manner, but with the utmost regard to economy and the Department has been relieved from that excessive expenditure which grew up so rapidly under the administration of the previous Speaker, and which it was found absolutely necessary to check. Instead of treating the officers appointed by the late Speaker as he described, one of his appointees has been promoted with our increase to his salary.

MR. ANGLIN: Will you tell us the reason why?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I am quite willing.

MR. ANGLIN: You know it was because he assisted in canvassing Westmoreland against the present hon. member for that county.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I was not aware of that fact until this moment. If I had been, it would have furnished an additional reason for the promotion. I want to remind the late Speaker that we have not treated his appointees harshly, and the fact now mentioned shows that he had selected a gentleman of very considerable discernment for the office, for, when that officer found himself wrong, it appears that he was disposed to take the proper course in the interests of the people. The hon. member for Gloucester was not so impartial when he occupied the Chair as he now professes, for he dismissed a gentleman from the post-office who had the misfortune to be a Conservative.

MR. ANGLIN: Will you tell me the reason why?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The hon. gentleman's great anxiety to have officers of the House dispensed with, his most wonderful economy and impartiality with regard to appointments, seem to have only arisen since he ceased to be the head of the House.

MR. McLENNAN: I do not wish to prolong the discussion, but, if there is to be a general thanksgiving, I also have some claim to the gratitude of the hon. member for Gloucester. When I came to this House a stranger, and was taken in very kindly, I did not take my friends by the throat; I did not say they should make appointments to please me. I never had an appointment made to this hour. But I met in a Committee-room, a clerk who had been canvassing in my county very vigorously against me; he is now one of the permanent clerks—made so or retained by my friends. I have not asked for his discharge, nor do I do so now; but I do ask the hon. member for Gloucester to admit that in this case the Government has been generous.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I think there is some difference between the position of the hon. member for Gloucester and the present Speaker in the matter of the appointment of these clerks. I recollect very distinctly that the attention of the House was called by the member for Frontenac to what he called the excessive and extravagant number of clerks appointed by my hon. friend (Mr. Anglin). My recollection is that the number at that time, described as very great, was thirty nine. The other day a return showed that eighty-nine had been appointed by my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Speaker Blanchet), and now I am quite aware that he was hardly responsible under the circumstances for that large number.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I think fifty-eight is the number appointed last year. I fear the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) has understated one number, and overstated the other.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I am open to correction, if wrong. I speak from recollection, and think I am correct in stating that there were eighty-nine sessional clerks, and sixty extra messengers—in other words, not very far short of one hundred more in these two classes than the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), in the previous year, had appointed. The difference between thirty-nine and eighty-nine is a little too considerable to have warranted the hon. member for Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper) in declaring that the hon. member for Gloucester had been a vast deal more extravagant in this matter than the present Speaker.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I never made any such statement.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I saw that report made. It might not have been correct, however. If the hon. gentleman states that he asserted before the electors of Argenteuil that the hon. member for Gloucester had appointed two-fifths of the number of the officials the present Speaker had appointed, and that that action was gross extravagance, I will take the statement back; but I do not think that was the impression made upon the minds of the electors of Argenteuil. I am glad to hear of the improvement about to be made; but there is no comparison between the number of appointments made by the Grit Speaker, and those made by the Speaker of the party at present in power, who claimed before they got into power that they were going to be a vast deal more economical than the Government they supplanted. The fact that some dozen or half a dozen too many were appointed by the late Speaker did not quite justify the present Speaker and colleagues in appointing nearly 100 clerks last Session.

MR. HUNTINGTON: I would like to know if the hon. member for Cumberland said the Speaker did make a mistake, or that the floodgates of corruption had been opened by the hon. gentleman who preceded him (Mr. Anglin), and that it would be necessary for him to follow in the same path. It appears the Speaker, according to the hon. gentleman was not to be satisfied by doing as much as the hon. member for Cumberland, but was to go a great way beyond him. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman from Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper) if he does not know that this country had a history before the hon. member for Gloucester took the Speaker's Chair, and that this system had been prevalent for many years? My private opinion is that this system is a bad system all round. I am speaking for myself, not in a party sense, and no one is responsible for what I say. But, however the Speakers on the one side or the other may attempt to gloss over the interests which compelled them to do this, that, or the other thing, we know that they appoint, when they are in power, men who are supposed to have claims upon the party under whom they hold office. I believe that the sooner we get rid of that system the better, the sooner we follow the example of England the better, and adopt some system by which patronage may be taken away from the Government. I know very well that, on this side of the House, there is no great advantage from exercising this patronage, but I suppose there must be some great advantage in it to the other side, from the extraordinary explanations we have just listened to. We have the Speaker expressing regret to-night that he had gone too far in the appointments of last year. We all know he went too far, but we had the hon. members for Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper), and Argenteuil (Mr. Abbott), attempting to impress upon the people of Argenteuil that they ought to drive out their own member and return another man here, because the Speaker had been misled by the example of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin). Was there no Speaker before the hon. member for Gloucester when this system prevailed for a long time? Why did not the hon. gentleman from Cumberland state frankly, as the Speaker has told us to-night, that there had been a mistake made, and that it had been rectified this year? Why does he not give the people, if he expects them to believe him when he addresses them, a frank, fair statement of public affairs? Why does the hon. gentleman exaggerate? This is what is apparent to-day in Argenteuil, and is what his enemies claim, and, I believe, his friends admit, he does in other places. Sir, I believe that a public man who occupies the position of the hon. the Minister of Railways, when he speaks upon questions of this kind, is bound to tell the people frankly what are the facts. I believe it is the duty of a public man addressing this House to speak frankly as to the manner in which he exercises the patronage of this country; and with all my own leanings towards the present Speaker, with all my disposition to support him in every proper emergency, I would have felt better, because he is the First Commoner in this country, if he had told us frankly, what every man of intelligence knows well, that he had appointed no man to office who had not claims, according to his belief, on the party which he supports; and he might have added, that the system which compelled him to do that compelled every other hon. Speaker to do the same thing, and was a system which both sides might properly unite to find some means of doing away with altogether. But what I complain of the hon. gentlemen for, is this—and I think it is a complaint to which significance attaches, not only with regard to the particular contest in Argenteuil, but to the contests which go on throughout the country,— that public men who profess to be honourable men, who, themselves, are fully cognisant of public affairs, should stand up before the people, who have not had an opportunity of discussing and considering, and reflecting upon all these questions, and seek to mislead them, as did the hon. gentleman opposite in Argenteuil, by persuading them that the Speaker was justified in the appointments which he had made, and which he, himself, has acknowledged were extravagant, and which the hon. gentleman, if he had been willing to be fair to the people of Argenteuil, should have admitted frankly were extravagant, instead of attempting to extenuate and justify them. Sir, the politics of this country can never be made respectable, public life in this country can never commend itself to honourable men, so long as hon. gentlemen occupying the high position of Minister of Railways will go into the country and discuss questions, not on their merits, as they have been discussed to-night by the Speaker, but by seeking by an ad captandum trick to mislead the people, and divert public attention from the real facts. The hon. gentleman refused to acknowledge the facts as they exist, and has made a statement which he knows himself, which he must have known, which, at any rate, he has learned to-night, is not justified by the circumstances. I am convinced that the position which the hon. gentleman occupied towards the canals and public works in the county of Argenteuil influenced the result of that election; but, when the people hear that the hon. gentleman has been convicted by the hon. the First Commoner, that a statement which he made there—he, the great parliamentarian—he, the chief of the railway system in this country—he, whom the people expected to tell them the truth when he talked to them at all—when they see, speaking on his right hand, the Speaker of this House condemning the fallacies and false statements which he made to them, they will regret that the hon. gentleman ever came into Argenteuil at all. They will tell him that, if he had not gone there, the situation would have been different, that he deceived them, and they will learn, as I hope the people of this country are learning, that the extravagant statements which the hon. gentleman makes from one end of the country to the other when he addresses the public, are statements which they must discredit, which they cannot believe. I say it without offence; I suppose in the burning eloquence which the hon. gentleman exercises, he makes himself believe his own statement. His eyes are like a magnifying glass, and make him believe that the seven men dismissed were “a great number,” as he stated repeatedly to-night. I say the people will learn to understand that the hon. gentleman goes there to plead a cause which, according to his ideas, is to be pleaded without regard to the facts, without regard to the population, without regard to any of the circumstances which should be submitted for a fair and impartial judgment on the part of the people. I think it is well that the people of Argenteuil should understand. I do not know but it is too late to-night for them to get a report of the hon. gentleman's condemnation by the Speaker, for I think it is to be regretted that this supplement to the hon. gentleman's speech, should not be recorded in such a way that the people of Argenteuil may understand the true character of the caballeur who, occupying the high position of Minister of Railways, went down there and misled them, making immense statements which have been contradicted by the First Commoner of this House, and which the hon. gentleman ought not to repeat.

MR. DOMVILLE: I have listened to my hon. friend who has just sat down, with a great deal of amusement. We know buncombe is the order of the age. When my hon. friend the hon. member for West Durham was on this side of the House, he took the very same tactics he has taken to-night; he tried to make the country believe he was economical, and we have found he did not reduce the expenditure a bit, but largely increased it. I am satisfied it will be a long time before the people will make the change the hon. gentleman indicates. They have tried both sides; they have tried our friend when he was a Minister of the Crown, and they said: We cannot stand your unfulfilled promises, we want a change for the better. My hon. friend brought in the election for Argenteuil. What has that to do with the question of sessional clerks? I have no doubt we will see in the papers to-morrow that the hon. gentleman made a great speech on the question—like that of my hon. friend from Queen's, whose speeches are telegraphed from here to the St. John papers by a reporter for that paper in the Gallery, who is reported to write them for him, and the flourish is made at the same time through that paper that Mr. King made a noble speech in defence of his country; and I believe it filled two or three columns in the newspapers—buncombe again. And when the hon. member for the city and the county of St. John (Mr. Weldon) made a few remarks, the newspapers gave a report ten or twenty columns long—more buncombe. Now, the people of this country are too intelligent to stand that bosh. We have had a long discussion to-night about Penitentiaries, and one hon. gentleman who was speaking did not know the difference between a female matron and a male matron. The hon. gentlemen belonging to the other side seem to-night to be talking for their constituents, to make political capital by their buncombe. I think, on this question of sessional clerks, the whole difficulty is that we are in power, and our hon. friends are in Opposition, and they seem to wish to induce the country to believe, when they speak buncombe, they are really in earnest.

MR. TASSE: Some hon. gentlemen have been complaining that the present Speaker has appointed no Liberal clerks this Session, but, if he has been actuated by party considerations in his appointments, he has only followed the custom of the hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in power. In former days, when the Conservative party was at the head of affairs, on many occasions not only did they employ ordinary sessional clerks who belonged to the opposite party, but newspaper editors who were writing against the very Government that employed them. I would like to know when the Liberal party has given such an illustration of their liberality towards our friends. The hon. gentleman from Shefford (Mr. Huntington) has stated he was sorry he was not at the Argen-teuil nomination to refute some assertions of the hon. the Minister of Railways, concerning the expenditure of this House. Well, I think there are very few people in this country, or, at all events, in this House, who are sorry he was absent from that nomination, especially if that hon. gentleman intended to give to the electors of that county an enlarged edition of his too famous Argen-teuil speech, which was condemned, not only by the Conservatives of this country, but by many Liberals, including a most prominent Liberal member of this House, who is now no more.

MR. ANGLIN: The hon. the Minister of Railways began his speech by saying I had made an attack on the Speaker, that I charged the Speaker with not having employed any Liberals on the staff of this House. Now, I beg to say distinctly that I made no such charge: I found no fault with Mr. Speaker, and made no objection to anything he has done. I carefully avoided any reference to anything in which the Speaker's conduct might be a subject of remark. But, in regard to the statement made by the hon. the leader of the House, that hereafter those who were formerly employed as sessional clerks should be employed permanently, I suggested that if the positions were to be made permanent, it would be but fair that some of those appointed during the five years of my incumbency, should be included. I do not blame the Speaker for not having carried out that arrangement. I stated, furthermore, that, when I assumed that office, I found in the employ of the House, as sessional clerks, a large number of persons appointed by hon. gentlemen on the other side, whom I was reluctant to displace, because they had been some time in that position and were dependent upon it. Only one case has been pointed to, and that is a strong confirmation of my statement. That clerk was reappointed, and only dismissed when a serious charge was made against him. Mr. Kerr, of Northumberland, charged that this young man had been an active canvasser during the previous election, and that he was a leader of a band which disturbed one of his public meetings, and I think the leader of some men who interrupted him frequently while addressing the electors on nomination day. I felt then, as I feel now, that conduct such as that could not be tolerated on the part of any person employed in the House of Commons. I interrogated the young man, and he did not quite deny the charge, and, in dismissing him, I did not think I was dealing harshly with him. As I did not discharge him until a complaint was made against him, the House will see how tenderly I dealt with the Conservatives I found in office. The hon. the Minister of Railways in a speech made at Argenteuil, reported in the Montreal Gazette, February 7th, represented that I was responsible for the appointments of last year, that I had set such a frightful example, by appointing so many useless persons, that the present Speaker and Commissioners, though determined to be economical, could not resist the pressure in one Session. I did not put anyone into a position whom I did not think I could find some useful work for, in which he could earn all he was to receive. The dismissals of which I spoke were made previous to bringing down the return asked for by the hon. member for Frontenac, and were not made in consequence of any apprehension that the return would be made. My principle in making the appointments was to accept nominations from my friends, and from those who were members of the party to which I belonged before I was elected Speaker.

MR. BABY: The hon. gentleman took credit for having acted tenderly towards an official whom he afterwards dismissed from office, because he was reported to have led a crowd which interrupted an hon. gentleman at election meetings. I do not like to make any comparison, but I would like to ask how the hon. gentleman would have acted had the clerk in question come forward against the hon. member himself as a candidate for Gloucester? Now, it so happened that when Mr. Speaker ran for the county of Bellechasse, he was actually confronted by a permanent clerk of this House and, may it redound to his honour, Mr. Speaker, after he took the Chair, never thought of disturbing this indiscreet individual who still occupies his position in this House. What does the hon. member say to this?

MR. HESSON: The hon. ex-Speaker was never supposed to have made any preferences in regard to Conservatives, and I am sure the Conservative party would have been much surprised if the hon. gentleman had made such appointments. Hon. gentlemen opposite did not, however, credit the present Speaker when he said he had no political leanings in respect to those appointed as sessional clerks and messengers. I can testify to the truth of that statement from my own knowledge. I, myself, tried to have a sessional clerk put on for the county I represent, a county, by the way, never yet fairly dealt with by the Government. Hon. gentlemen may imagine my surprise when, after having applied to the Speaker I found a person who resided in my county, who was an active, hard working and enthusiastic Grit, had been taken into the service of the Speaker of this House, while my Conservative friend's application was not accepted. That individual held a position here for a month, I am sorry to say regardless of objections of Conservatives on this side, until hon. gentlemen on the other side complained that there was too large a staff. Then he was dismissed together with a great many Conservatives whose services were dispensed with also. What I complain of is that the hon. Speaker did not consult those he ought to have consulted in regard to this appointment. Had he done so that individual would not have been appointed. Taking this into consideration, I do not think hon. gentlemen should discredit the Speaker, when he states that he did not question the appointees' political leanings. I think it right that the members of this House who have supported the party in power should be considered, and, whilst it is important that all civil servants should be continued in office so long as they discharge their duties faithfully, I yet believe that all new appointments ought to be made from friends of the party in power. The late Speaker very frankly confesses that he viewed his duty in that light and acted accordingly.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria): The hon. member for Gloucester takes credit to himself for having acted with great impartiality in reference to the dismissal of a clerk from the Post-office Department of this House. We are told that, when the complaint was made, the young man was sent for and questioned in regard to the matter. He admitted the truth of the statement, and the late Speaker thereupon dismissed him. I recollect seeing at the time a statement in the newspapers, of which I have no reason to doubt the correctness. From the information I have, I think my hon. friend's memory is very much at fault. The statement I have heard is that, the hon. member for Gloucester never had any communication with the young man on the subject when the complaint was made. The only communication on the subject made to the clerk in the post-office, was that the Clerk of the House walked into the post-office and told him he was dismissed. He never had one word with the hon. member for Gloucester. It was a very contemptible piece of small revenge on the part of the then member for Northumberland, to have this young man dismissed, because he was known to be an active opponent. When the responsibility was put upon him he endeavoured to repudiate it altogether. The hon. member for Gloucester endeavoured to show impartiality, and that he was only dismissed when charged with improper conduct. That statement was contradicted at the time; an opposite statement was made, and, from enquiries, I am inclined to think that the statement of the hon. member for Gloucester is a mistaken one.

MR. ANGLIN: This took place some six or seven years ago, but I remember distinctly having had a conversation with that clerk on the subject. I cannot remember whether he came to see me of his own accord or I sent for him. I told him the charge that had been made against him; he did not deny the charge, but he endeavoured to qualify it. I never made any defence or statement in the newspapers, no matter what was said of my conduct. I felt that, in my capacity of Speaker, I was only accountable to this House. I had forgotten all about it until now reminded of it by the hon. the Minister of Railways. I told the young man I could not tolerate such conduct as that charged against him; he did not deny the charge, but said his conduct was not so bad as represented. Virtually, however, he admitted the charge.

MR. CAMERON: The young man denies distinctly that he had any communication with the hon. member for Gloucester, or that he was told, before he was discharged, what he was dismissed for.

MR. BOWELL: Would the hon. gentleman say in what way the young man qualified the charge made against him?

MR. ANGLIN: I think he admitted that he was at a meeting as charged; that there was a tumult at the meeting; that he was amongst the crowd, but that he was not one of the ring-leaders as had been charged against him by Mr. Kerr.

MR. BOWELL: His statement was that he had worked against Mr. Kerr, but that he had nothing whatever to do with the riotous conduct; and his statement is, further, that he knew nothing of those charges until he was dismissed.

MR. ANGLIN: He admitted he was there.

MR. GAULT: I think the publishing of the Debates causes this House to sit longer than is necessary, and thus brings on a daily expense of $7,500, for what—to use an expression which fell from another hon. gentleman's lips to-night—is nothing but buncombe.

In reply to MR. MACKENZIE,

MR. BABY said there was no detail of this vote; it was not proposed to increase the salaries of the existing officers in the Library, but there was before the Committee a certain proposal for reorganisation, and no report had yet been made; and, when made, it must be concurred in by both Houses.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex): In connection with the Library, it will be remembered that a catalogue was printed during last Session, and that a vote was submitted for over $5,000. I called the attention of the House to the fact that the contract price was only $2,535, and I was promised by the hon. the First Minister that it would be seen into, and that no higher than contract prices would be paid for it. I find, however, by the Public Accounts that the actual amount paid was $3,942. I merely remind the hon. the First Minister that his promise, as reported in the Debates, has not been carried out.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I recollect something of the circumstance now my attention is called to it. The catalogue was printed by other persons instead of the contractors, because it could not be got ready otherwise in time for the use of the House; and the Librarian assumed the responsibility of sending it out to be done by other persons so as to ensure despatch. I said it would no doubt be paid for under the contract rate of price; and I have heard nothing about it until now.

PRAYERS.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 33) To prevent and punish wrongs to children.—(Mr. Richey.)

REMARKS.

MR. TROW: Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to call the attention of the House to a question of privilege, in reference to a pamphlet which I wrote on Manitoba and the North-West, in the year 1877, which was circulated in the Dominion and Great Britain extensively. The hon. the Minister of Agriculture stated here that I might have participated in the profits derived from the sale of this pamphlet, but, after examining the records of his Department, he acquitted me of having received anything at all. Since then, I observe in the Ottawa correspondence of the Montreal Gazette, the following statement:—

Mr. Ross.

This statement is made in direct contradiction to that of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture and Emigration, that I had received nothing. I have the returns called for in my hands, and I find there is nothing to show that I received anything whatever. I deny the charge entirely that I ever received a cent, nor would I have accepted it if it had been offered, for it would have been contrary to my principles.

PRIVILEGE—CORRECTION OF NEWS-PAPER REPORT.

REMARKS.

MR. ORTON: I desire to refer to a report of my remarks on the Interest Bill, which appeared in the Mail of April 1st. I am there made to say that 25 per cent. was charged by the Trust and Loan Company for the use of $2,000. I think this is reflecting very unjustly on the Trust and Loan Company, and I wish to state that I never mentioned that Company during the course of my remarks. I looked into the Debates to see whether I had made any remark of that kind, and found that I had not. What I did state was, that $2,000 was borrowed by a certain individual, and, for the use of that money for a little over six years, he paid, with lawyers' and insurance fees, and the instalments to be paid to redeem the mortgage, etc., no less than 25 per cent. This was paid, not to the Trust and Loan Company, but to the Western Canada Loan and Savings Company.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I was not in the House when my hon. friend made that statement. If he had said so with respect to the Trust and Loan Company, I could have corrected him. I have been connected with that Company for thirty years, and I have never known a case in which they have taken more than 8 per cent. It has never charged for a renewal, or fine, or anything of that kind, but has solely collected its interest as allowed by law.

PRIVATE BILL.

THIRD READING.

The following Bill was considered in Committee of the Whole, reported, read the third time, and passed:—

Bill (No. 21) To empower the Stadacona Fire and Life Insurance Company to relinquish their Charter and to provide for the winding up of their affairs.—(Mr Casgrain.)

MARITIME PROVINCES HERRING FISHERY LICENSES.

QUESTION.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to require parties engaged in the Spring Herring Fisheries, in the Maritime Provinces, to take out a license for the purpose.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.): It is not the intention of the Government.

NOVA SCOTIA LOBSTER FISHERY.

QUESTION.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make any change in the Order in Council now in force, regulating the prosecution of the Lobster Fishery, either upon the south coast of Nova Scotia or in the waters of the Gulf of St. Lawrence; and, if so, what change is proposed.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.): It is not the intention of the Government to make any change in the Order in Council now in force, regulating the prosecution of the Lobster Fishery upon the south coast of Nova Scotia. So far as regards the waters of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, that is under the consideration of the Government.

SHELBURNE, N. S.—LOCKPORT HARBOUR BUOY.

QUESTION.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place an automatic or bell buoy in any position off the entrance to Lockport Harbour, Shelburne county, Nova Scotia, during the present year.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.): It is not the intention of the Government.

QUESTION.

MR. SKINNER enquired, What Church is referred to as "The Established Church" in section No. 358 of the Regulations and Orders for the Militia of Canada, recently published by the authority of the the hon. the Minister of Militia and Defence?

MR. MASSON: This regulation is an exact transcript of the Queen's Regulations, but, as there is no Established Church in this country, the Government intends seeing that this regulation is amended.

GUYSBOROUGH, N. S.—DISTRESSED FISHERMEN.

QUESTION.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) enquired, What assistance the Government have extended, pecuniary or otherwise, to the distressed fishermen of the county of Guysborough? Whether they are prepared to afford similar relief to others so situated on the southern coast of Nova Scotia? Whether they have received any information or made any enquiries as to the extent of the distress, and whether they will lay the result before the House?

MR. LANGEVIN: The Government has extended assistance to the distressed fishermen of the county of Guysborough to the extent of $1,000, which we shall see is recouped by labour at the proper time. If other representations are made to the Government, they will consider whether they can afford any further assistance. The information that has been laid before the Government on this matter will be laid before the House.

KEEWATIN—MAGISTERIAL JURISDICTION.

QUESTION.

MR. ROYAL enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to take such steps as will prevent such conflicts of jurisdiction as the late commitment at Rat Portage, in the district of Keewatin, of a man accused of murder, by a Magistrate holding his commission from the Executive of Ontario, and of the sending of the accused to the jail at Prince Arthur's Landing, in charge of a constable commissioned by the same authority, there to stand his trial before a Court of the same Province?

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): When the circumstances referred to in the question came to my knowledge, I took immediate steps to obtain a full statement of the facts and circumstances connected with the matter. I have not received that statement yet, but, when received, the action of the Government will be governed by the facts to be gathered.

MANITOBA SETTLERS.

QUESTION.

MR. ROYAL enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government, in view of what has just taken place in the Courts at Winnipeg, in the case of the Hudson's Bay Company vs. Ayotte, and in order to prevent the recurrence of similar troubles, to protect settlers who are in a position to prove, by sworn testimony, their occupancy prior to the 15th July, 1870, of certain lands which were subsequently included in the townships.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The attention of the Government has not before been called to this subject. I have not seen the case mentioned, but will take an opportunity of seeing it, and be governed accordingly.

NOVA SCOTIA—LIGHTHOUSE ON JEDDORE ROCK.

QUESTION.

MR. DALY enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to provide for the construction of a lighthouse on Jeddore Rock, in the county of Halifax, N.S., during the present year.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.): This is under the consideration of the Government.

AMERICAN CATTLE IMPORTATIONS.

QUESTION.

MR. PATTERSON (Essex) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to remove the restrictions on the importation of American cattle, and more especially of cattle for stock-breeding purposes.

MR. POPE (Compton): This matter is, and has been for some time, engaging the attention of the Government. Some correspondence has taken place between this Government and the Government of Great Britain. It is important to keep disease out of the country; and that our farmers should not only be protected, but be enabled to obtain a profitable market. We have obtained some concessions, and we still believe that our first duty is to the farmers of this country, at the same time to cause as little embarrassment as possible to the trade of the country, and all we can do to assist and encourage stock-breeding, having a due regard to keeping disease from the country we will do.

NOVA SCOTIA—LIGHTHOUSE ON CROUCHER ISLAND.

QUESTION.

MR. DALY enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to provide for the construction of a lighthouse on Croucher Island, Margaret's Bay, in the county of Halifax, N.S., during the present year.

MR. POPE (Queen's P.E.I.): It is not the intention of the Government to do so.

RESOLUTIONS PROPOSED.

MR. CHARLTON, in moving for a Committee of the Whole to consider certain Resolutions declaring the expediency of disposing of the public lands of Canada by selling them, so far as practicable, to actual settlers only, said: Mr. Speaker, the Resolutions I am about to place in your hands are of more than ordinary importance; the subject to which they relate is not only one affecting the interests of the hour, but also of the future. I propose to discuss this question briefly; and I shall endeavour to approach the discussion, not in a partisan spirit, not with the view of cavilling at anything and everything which the Government have done or may propose to do; but with a sincere desire to advocate what I believe to be for the best interests of the country. Some features of the Government's land policy are undeniably objectionable, and calculated to produce a pernicious result in the near future. No hon. member in this House should be indifferent as to the question of the best mode of management and sale of the public lands of this Dominion. The wilderness character public domain will rapidly change; large tracts will annually pass under the transforming process of settlement; already the vanguard of the mighty hosts yet to come has entered the field and on the prairies of the Great Lone Land so lately unknown, and still so indefinitely known ; there is —“the tread of pioneers,

Of nations yet to be,
Shall roll a human sea.”

In discussing this question, I shall lay down at the outset one fundamental proposition, namely, that it is desirable in the interests of this country to secure the most rapid settlement that is possible of the public lands. The possession of a vast wilderness extending through many degrees of latitude and longitude, even though it has great capabilities and enormous undeveloped resources, adds neither to our wealth or our power as a state. We want this vast territory and its immense resources developed ; we want its prairies converted into farms and dotted with cities, towns and villages ; we want this region traversed by railways as rapidly as possible ; we want to see its productions flowing in vast and ever increasing volume along our commercial routes, giving employment to our railways and our lake and ocean marine. When all this is realised, our great North-West will have become an element of greatness and strength to Canada ; and our policy should be shaped with a view of hastening, in the most rapid possible manner, the development which we desire. Now, if this fundamental proposition be correct, and I believe it cannot be controverted, we must bear in mind that we have a rival on the south of us, through whose territory the tide of emigration seeking our North-West must pass, and emigrants, while passing through to the North-West, will have laid before them all the advantages offered by our neighbours, as an inducement for emigrants to settle on their lands. If we take into consideration the significance of this fact, I should proceed to draw the obvious conclusion that we must offer inducements equal, nay, even superior, to those offered by the United States ; if not, we cannot expect to secure any considerable portion of the emigration. Now, Sir, the question is, does the policy of the Government, do the land regulations emanating from the Department presided over by the right hon. the First Minister, offer inducements to emigrants superior to those offered by the United States ? I answer that they do not. The land regulations now in force are based upon resolutions of this House passed on the 12th of May last. By these resolutions it was provided that 100,000,000 acres of public land in the North-West should be set apart for railway purposes, that these lands should be vested in a Commission, and that the Imperial Government should be represented upon the Commission. The resolution providing for a Commission has not been carried into effect. The resolution also provided that the lands should be set apart in a belt twenty miles wide upon each side of the Railway, but that lands might be taken elsewhere if the lands within this forty mile belt were not of fair average quality. The authority granted by this clause has been made to cover not a belt forty miles in width, but one 220 miles in width in the best portion of the North-West. The resolutions provided that such lands were to be sold by the Commissioners at not less than $2 per acre, the price to be fixed by the Governor-in-Council. I am aware it will be held that the average price at which the lands are offered is more than $2 an acre, and that, therefore, the provisions of the resolutions are complied with, but I think the language is very explicit, and that we are warranted in construing it to mean that the minimum price should be $2 an acre. If that construction is true, the provisions of the resolution have been violated, because the land in two belts each fifty miles in width on each side of the line is offered for sale at $1 per acre. The regulations were issued on the 9th of July and were to go into force on the 1st of August. Pending the final adoption of the route for the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Government proceeded to lay down an assumed route passing to the south of Lake Manitoba, and projected as far west as the confluence of the Shell and Assiniboine rivers, and the aggregate width of the belt of land reserved is 220 miles. This is sub-divided into five belts, upon each side of the assumed line. The first, Belt A, is five miles in width on each side of the assumed line ; Belt B is fifteen miles in width on either side ; Belt C, twenty miles ; Belt D, twenty miles ; and Belt E, fifty miles. No portion of Belt A was open for homestead or pre-emption, and the price of the railway reserve lands was fixed at $6 an acre. In all the townships of the various belts sections 11 and 29 were reserved for school purposes and sections 8 and 26 comprised the Hudson's Bay Company's reserve. Each township comprises thirty-six sections. In Belt B, sixteen of the even-numbered sections were reserved for homestead settlement and preemption, eighty acres being allowed for each homestead and preemption claim; and the sixteen odd numbered sections were reserved for railway purposes. The price of homestead and preemption lands was fixed at $2.50 an acre; that of the railway lands at $5 per acre. In Belt C, the sixteen even-numbered sections were reserved for homestead and preemption, and the sixteen odd-numbered sections for railway purposes. The price of the former was fixed at $2.50, and the latter at $3.50 per acre. In Belt D, the sixteen even-numbered sections were reserved for homesteads and preemption, and the sixteen odd-numbered sections for railway purposes, and the price per acre of both was fixed at $2. In Belt E, the reservations were the same, and the price fixed for each was $1 per acre. The terms of sale were for railway lands one-tenth down, and the balance in nine equal annual instalments, with interest, annually, at 6 per cent; for homestead and preemption lands, four-tenths at the expiration of three years, and the balance in six equal annual instalments at 6 per cent interest. The effect of those regulations, which proposed to place between the homestead settler and the Railway, an unoccupied belt of land of five miles in width, and which give him only one-half the amount of land for a homestead claim that he could procure in the United States—regulations by which he was made to pay a higher price for preemption or railway lands in Belt B, C and D, than the Government of that country charged for similarly situated lands—was to send intending settlers to Dakota and other American territories. This effect, moreover, was so palpable as to cause the Government to change the regulations within two and a-half months from the time they went into effect. On the 14th October, new regulations were issued, under which the assumed location of the line remained the same, as well as the location, number and width of the respective belts, but the regulations changed the conditions with reference to Belt A, by permitting homestead settlement and preemption claims to the same extent and under the same conditions as in the other belts. By these regulations sixteen even-numbered sections in the townships were reserved for homestead settlement and preemption, and sixteen odd numbered sections for railway purposes. A change was also made in the price. The price in Belts A, B, C, of homestead and preemption lands, was fixed at $2.50 per acre; in Belt D, $2 per acre, and in Belt E, $1 per acre. The price of railway lands was, in Belt A, $5; Belt B, $4; Belt C, $3; Belt D, $2, and in Belt E, $1 per acre. The terms of payment remained the same. The regulations of October 14th were made retroactive in one respect, to the advantage of speculative purchasers or purchasers of railway lands. The retroactive clause is as follows:—

“9. These provisions shall be retroactive so far as relates to any and all entries of Homestead and Preemption Lands, or sales of Railway Lands obtained or made under the Regulations of the 9th of July, hereby superseded; any payments made in excess of the rate hereby fixed shall be credited on account of sales of such lands.”

Now, no changes were made in the prices of preemption lands, the only change in that regulation being that Belt A was open to preemption. But changes were made in three belts, in the prices of railway lands, the price in Belt A having been reduced $1 per acre, the price in Belt B, $1 per acre, and the price in Belt C, 50c. per acre, and those changes were made retroactive, to the advantage of speculators who had purchased previous to the issue of the regulations of October 14. A brief recapitulation of the terms and conditions of the regulations of October 14th presents these salient points: The amount reserved for railway purposes in the different townships of all the belts was sixteen sections in each; the amount available for homestead settlement in each township was eight sections out of thirty-six, and the amount available for preemption was eight sections out of thirty-six. The amount available as a homestead to each settler was 160 acres, instead of 80, as under the previous regulations; and the amount available for preemption in each township of each belt was 160 acres to each settler, instead of 80 acres, as under the previous regulations; and the highest possible number of homestead grants in each township—providing the whole was arable land, and that the alternate sections in no case fall on lakes, swamps or muskegs, was thirty-two. If the intention of my right hon. friend the Minister of the Interior had been to locate the lands granted and set apart in each township for homestead settlement, in such a manner as was calculated to put the greatest possible amount of obstacles in the way of their settlement; if his object had been to make it as little desirable as possible to settle on the homestead reserve of the North-West, then the regulations adopted are eminently well designed to secure that result. But, if, on the contrary, his object has been to secure the rapid settlement of the unoccupied lands in the North-West, his policy will need revision. I hold in my hands a diagram showing the mode and manner in which thirty-six sections, comprising each township, are divided, and I defy human ingenuity to take eight sections out of the thirty-six, in a manner securing a more perfect degree of isolation to each homestead settler than is secured by these regulations. In the first tier of six sections are three half-sections set apart for homestead settlement, and each half-section is separate from its fellow half-sections by an intervening space of one mile. In the second tier, one mile in width and six in length, are two half-sections; in the third tier, are three half-sections; in the fourth, three; in the fifth, two, and in the sixth three half-sections out of the six sections in each tier. Now, let us examine for a moment what will be the condition of the homestead settlers in the North-West taking up homestead claims, where the utmost number will be thirty-two settlers in a township six miles square. On an average four or five of those half-sections will prove to be worthless, and will not be occupied. Suppose the whole number occupied, we have, under those circumstances, in an entire township, not enough homestead settlers to form an average school district. Each settler will be called upon to construct and keep open, on an average, one and a-half mile of road—an amount equal to an ordinary road beat in Ontario. We shall have those settlers compelled to travel those great distances if they wish to go to a market, a mill, or a blacksmith's shop. Then, what is their prospect in regard to Church accommodation and Church privileges? The whole population of a township would not make an ordinary congregation. It will be their fate to suffer from isolation, the want of social intercourse, and the want of school and Church privileges. The conditions on which those homesteads are granted are certain to exclude the very class of settlers wanted in the North-West. It has been said by some author that "peace has its victories no less renowned than war." Some twenty years ago, when the shadow of a great national calamity was creeping over the United States, in the Congress of that country, a Southern orator threatened that, in case the Republican candidate was elected President, the South would close the Mississippi to the North-West; and a Northern member retorted that, when the South did that, the North-West would hew a path to the Gulf with the sword. The time came when the threat was carried into effect and when the prediction was fulfilled. The path to the Gulf was hewn with the sword—it was a broad path, marked by the havoc and desolation of war, but, when the people whose armies marched down to the Gulf and to the sea wish to point to their brightest achievements, they do not point to Fort Donaldson, Pittsburg Landing, Vicksburg, Chickamauga, or Missionary bridge, but to the victories of peace—to the settlement of that vast wilderness of the West within the life-time of men now living, and it is on that theatre that the most dazzling achievements of the Anglo-Saxon race have been obtained within the memory of living men. Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota having been won from the wilderness. All those great commonwealths have grown to their present dimensions, from the foundation in this period; and, when we look over those prairies now teeming with life and activity, where the most advanced form of civilisation has been developed, when we remember that this lately reclaimed region has cities containing half a million inhabitants, and hundreds of minor cities, towns and villages; that it has more than 30,000 miles of railway; that its population numbers nearly 14,000,000, and that the products of its fruitful fields glut the avenues of commerce, and are sufficient to feed millions in the seaboard States and cities, and tens of millions in Europe, we can realise the importance of the changes enacted within the last fifty years; and, if we scan this field closely, one object will loom up high in importance above all others—that object; that character—is the pioneer. It was before his advance that barbarism and desolation gave way. He made the first inroads upon the wilderness, and it was only in his path that all the mighty forces of civilisation could follow. They never could or did precede him, and, although he is rough, untutored, uncultured, and has little idea of the importance of the rôle he plays in the mighty drama of progress, yet he has been the central figure; his services could not be dispensed with, but were in the highest degree necessary and essential. He has finished his task in what were the North-West Territories of the United States, and is waiting for new fields to conquer. My right hon. friend can have his services. He is ready to carry the star of empire westward once more, and lend his assistance in building up vast commonwealths in the present wilderness of our own North-West. But he is not ready to render his services on the terms we offer. He wants different conditions, which, if my right hon. friend is a statesman, he will grant; for it is essential to the growth and prosperity of the Dominion that the services of this important class should be obtained. The Resolutions I am about to offer, do not affirm that the system of homestead settlement should be more extended than it is. But I believe, as an abstract principle, that the system might be, and ought to be, very greatly extended. In fact, I believe that the country would derive vastly greater benefit from the settlement of its wild, waste lands, even if they were given away, than it would from the revenue derived from their sale, if that revenue is secured at the expense of retarding the settlement of the country. Of course there are various descriptions of public lands. This system could not be applied to mineral lands, pasture lands, to lands that require irrigation at heavy expense, or to timber lands; but it could and should be applied to the arable lands of the Dominion, in my opinion. We are called on, for the first time, to deal with this question. But we may avail ourselves of the experience of the nations that have dealt with it, and have had ample experience as to the best mode of the management and disposal of the public lands; and, if we take advantage of the experience of the United States, we may learn many useful lessons. That country first commenced the system of selling public lands on credit. They speedily abandoned the system for very good reasons, which my right hon. friend might find it useful to study. For fifty years, the system of selling lands in the United States went on without any agitation springing up with reference to the propriety of introducing a policy of granting homesteads. But a party at last took up the homestead principle, and advocated the propriety of throwing open all the public lands of the United States to actual settlers, as a free gift, the condition being occupancy and cultivation, and after some years of agitation, that proposal became law in 1862. That law has had an ample trial. The experience of the United States, acquired under the operation of the homestead law, should, by this time, enable them to judge very justly as to the propriety of continuing that system. Recently, Congress appointed a Commission, charged with the express duty of examining into the entire question of the management of the public lands. This Commission reported a few days ago, and its report is worthy of the consideration of my right hon. friend. The Committee recommend the division of the lands into arable, irrigable, pasture, timber, and mineral lands, with special regulations for the management and disposition of each class. They recommend, besides, the absolute abolition of the preemption system, holding that, in practice, it has enabled settlers on homesteads to double the quantity of land that it was the intention of the Government they should occupy. It recommends also the absolute reservation of all arable land for homestead settlement, and the formation of colonies, not exacting as a condition that the settler should settle on the lands at once, but permitting the formation of colonies and the cultivation of lands without residence upon them. I think I may safely urge upon the attention of the Premier the three recommendations of this Committee. First, with reference to the absolute reserval of arable lands for homesteads; second, with reference to the abolition of preemption; and, third, with reference to the permission to form colonies instead of settling upon lands. It is very easy to form exaggerated opinions or estimates as to the value of the public domain. In the United States, it has been a common practice to estimate their public lands as worth a fabulous sum, a value as high as $1,000,000,000 has been placed upon them. Commencing in 1796, I find statistics which gave a very correct idea of the actual money value of the public domain. In the United States, there has been surveyed up to the 30th June last, 734,501,236 acres, and there remained, of the public domain, something over 700,000,000 acres exclusive of Alaska. The total amount received for lands sold from 1796 till the 30th June, 1879, was $204,547,812. If we deduct the expense of management, probably not far from 15 per cent., but let us place it at 10 per cent., it gives an average of $2,216,707 annually. Now $44,338,120, capitalised in 1796 at 5 per cent., or $55,417,650, capitalised at 4 per cent. would have represented to the United States the value of its public domain up to this time. Would it not have been better to have made no attempt to secure revenue from the public lands, and to have opened up the public domain to free settlement from the commencement? Would it not have facilitated settlement, and earlier pushed it westwards, and would not the result have been a vastly greater gain through the earlier development of the country, than the amount of money obtained for those lands?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Will the hon. gentleman add to the amount received by the United States, the amount received by the different railways for the lands given them and sold by them?

MR. CHARLTON: I will give my right hon. friend the fullest information on that point, to which I was coming. So much for the assumed value of the public domain. I have shown that, in the United States, the sales of public lands realised annually only a sum equal to 4 per cent. on $55,000,000. My object is to show that we are very likely to fall into an error in the assumption we make as to the value of our public domain, if we adhere to the present policy of selling our lands. I will now proceed to say something about the railway grants of the United States, and, before entering on this branch, I may say that the amount set apart for the Canadian Pacific Railway, 100,000,000 acres, is entirely out of proportion to the amount of land granted by the United States to any of their railways. The highest land grant received by any American road was that to the Northern Pacific, which was 47,000,000 acres. Yet the conditions of this grant were that the road should be absolutely restricted to a certain belt and should take alternate sections, irrespective of the quality of the land. It might be arable land, it might be the bad land of Dakota, or upon the alkali plains of Montana; it might be in the heart of the Rocky Mountains, or it might be land among the mountains of Washington Territory. The railway had a belt, and in that belt it had to take alternate sections, and it has been estimated that, out of the total grant of 47,000,000 acres, the road would not realise more than 15,000,000 acres of good arable land. I do not vouch for the accuracy of that estimate, but it is one that has been made. Now, by the provisions of these resolutions more than double the amount of land is set apart for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway than was set apart for the Northern Pacific, and the terms of the resolutions permit the Government, in case the land is not of fair average quality, to extend their belts; and what have they done? Why, they have stretched a twenty mile belt, as provided by the resolutions of the House, on each side of the railway to 110 miles. They have taken the resolution which gave them forty miles and have extended it so that it covers 220 miles in the best part of the North-West. They intend to get, as nearly as possible, 100,000,000 acres of arable land. The total amount of land granted, up to 1876, in the United States, was 215,203,807 acres. The roads were absolutely restricted to alternate sections in the belt over which these grants extended, and these grants invariably covered a greater or less amount of land than had previously been settled, so that the road in no case realised the amount of land covered by the grants. A careful estimate renders it probable that, out of the amount of grants I have named, the roads will realise 187,785,853 acres. Now, of this land, at the time I have mentioned, there had been certified or patented 42,000,000 acres. Of this land there was granted to the Pacific Railway, and trunk lines, and lines upon the Pacific slope, all but about 55,717,000. Of the 55,000,000 acres granted to other roads, it was estimated they would receive 37,500,000. Now, these grants have been made to aid and promote the construction of some eighty-three railways. Many of these lines were of great length on the Pacific slope. This amount of land granted had led to the construction and completion, at the expiration of 1876, of 13,544 miles of railway. There are, besides this, 10,000 miles more, that are either to be completed before the lands are granted to the road, or the lands will lapse to the Government; so that these grants were made for the construction of some 23,000 miles of road, while it is proposed in our own case to grant 100,000,000 acres of land for the construction of one line of road. With regard to the policy of the United States in granting the lands, a great many opinions are held. By some it is believed that the policy was a faulty one, that the country would have been supplied with roads as rapidly as the wants of the population required without land grants at all. But there can be no question that the policy of granting the lands did lead to a rapid construction of the railway lines that were then, or would be ultimately, needed, and that the settlement of the country was, to a considerable extent, promoted. There can be no question either that, in very many cases, these land grants, although so small, as compared with the grant that is proposed to be given to our Canadian Pacific Railway, were of an inordinate amount. There can be no doubt that, through the manipulations of the lobby and rings, Congress was induced to vote land grants to railways vastly in excess of the requirements of those roads. But, upon the whole, it may justly be held that their land grant policy was a wise one, and that the country has received value for the land granted to these railway corporations. I may say, in justice to the policy of the right hon. gentleman, that it does not perhaps matter whether the amount of land reserved for railway purposes be excessive or not, so long as the Government intend to build the road. The matter is in a different position from what it would be if we were dealing with a company who were to receive the land. It matters little whether the land reserve is 50, or 100 million acres, if the Government is to build the road; but it does matter what the policy of the Government is with reference to the disposal of these lands. It does matter whether the Government itself is to reap the advantage in enhanced value of lands which is to result from this vast expenditure of capital in building the Railway, or whether the Government is to allow somebody else to reap that advantage at its expense. Now, the Government, as the regulations stand at the present moment, have so arranged this matter as inevitably to play into the hands of speculators, as to throw away voluntarily every advantage that ought to accrue to it, if these lands are expected to recoup the expenditure of this vast sum of money. By the regulations allowing a man to buy land and pay one-tenth down, and the balance in nine annual equal instalments, what do we have? Why, we have in Belt A a regulation which permits the speculator to obtain the control of lands contiguous to the roads for 50c. an acre. In Belt B he may obtain control of this land at 40c. an acre; in Belt C, twenty miles wide on each side of the road, at 30c. an acre; in Belt D, twenty miles in width on each side of the road, at 20c. an acre; and in Belt E, fifty miles in width on each side of the road, at 10c. an acre; at these rates of payment, in cash, in the respective belts, the speculator can obtain control sixteen sections in every township of thirty-six sections in that broad belt 220 miles wide, and in a portion of that belt, 100 miles wide, the speculator can obtain control of sixteen sections out of every thirty-six for 10c. per acre. The Government could only have carried its liberality to speculators further by giving the control of these $1 lands without any payment down. Now, what is likely to be the result of this policy of the Government, in offering these lands upon credit for this small sum down, upon so long terms, and in unlimited quantities? I have in my hand a bill, introduced into this House to organise a company in which three hon. members of this House are joint incorporators with other gentlemen, and entitled: An Act to incorporate the North-West Colonisation Land Company. The Company is to have a capital of $1,000,000, and they are to operate in these lands which the Government is offering for the payment of one-tenth down. Among their powers the Company will purchase lands and hold the same for a period not exceeding twenty-five years, and can sell the same in whole or in parcels and on such terms as may be agreed upon. Do any of my hearers know anything about the operations of the Canada Company in Ontario? Are they aware of the character of the operations of this Company, so far as they affect the interests of settlers in Canada? Are they aware of the odour in which that Company is held by the honest yeomanry of Ontario? Here is a proposal to establish something fully as bad as the Canada Company. I hold in my hand the prospectus of another Company, entitled: The Scottish, Ontario and Manitoba Land Company, with a capital of £500,000 sterling, and what does this Company propose to do? It proposes to operate in the lands that my right hon. friend is offering for sale at 10c. an acre, cash down, and the balance in payments that may be made or may not. They propose to purchase land in the newer districts, particularly Manitoba and the North-West territories, with the view of holding it until, through the settlement of the country, these districts are fully developed. Why, the Canada Company will be thrown entirely into the shade. These are but the first batch of schemes of this kind, and to show what individuals' operations are, I will read you a letter addressed to an hon. member of this House, written by a gentleman living in Manitoba. I presume it is a specimen of many others. In this letter the writer asks how he may obtain early information as to lands about to be brought into market in the Turtle Mountain district, which are in Belt E, and will be sold at $1. He informs my hon. friend, the recipient of the letter, that, within five years, these lands will be worth from $7 to $10 per acre, and that $30,000 are deposited in the Ontario Bank, Winnipeg, awaiting speculative investment in these lands—enough to secure 300,000 acres. And he says very significantly: "I would advise you to invest in this thing yourself." He concludes by remarking that he intends to locate 1,500 to 2,000 acres. Well, Sir, what do these things indicate? What is to be the result of these unheard-of facilities offered for speculation? The result will be that a vast proportion of these railway lands will pass into the hands of speculators. Now, I presume my right hon. friend will tell us that that evil will correct itself. I presume that we shall be told that these persons purchasing the land, and holding it for speculative purposes in the North-West, will speedily be compelled to relinquish that line of action through the operation of non-resident taxation. I have no doubt that, when township organisations are effected in that country, when thirty or forty settlers have proceeded to form a township organisation and find themselves surrounded in every direction by the lands of speculating non-residents, whose operations are retarding the growth of the country, very likely the lands of the latter will be taxed heavily. Such things have come under my own observation in the United States. I have known cases there where school-houses have been built where there was no school population; I have known where roads and bridges were built at a cost to the taxpayers four times as great as their actual cost. I have known where rascality has been perpetrated, and onerous taxes inflicted upon non-residents for the purpose of forcing them to sell their lands. Likely such taxation will be resorted to in our own case, but I know further that such a state of things is productive of the gravest consequences. It saps the foundations of political morality. I hold it would be very difficult to say how large a proportion of the political rascality that prevails in the West originates in the very state of things. The resident land holder suffers from high taxation as well as the non-resident, and I think it is a sad commentary on the wisdom of the Government that they propose to remedy one evil by introducing another. It would be much better to keep out the non-resident speculative land-holders than to rely upon remedying that evil by inflicting upon them an unjust taxation. With reference to this credit system the consequences cannot be otherwise than vicious. It has been a source of difficulty, I venture to say, to every Government that has had any experience with reference to the credit sales of land; the recovery into the Treasury of the amount for which such lands were sold has uniformly been a most difficult matter. But in this case the difficulties of the matter are certain to be enhanced from various causes. Sales will doubtless be made to an enormous extent. The Government will be subjected to vast additional expenses by the appointment of an army of clerks to keep the accounts, and perhaps my hon. friend will not consider that a disadvantage, as it will give him additional patronage, but it will increase the expenses of the Government and diminish the nett results from the sale of those lands. My right hon. friend must be well aware, because he does not expect to be always at the head of affairs, that the time will come when the combination of those interested will bring to bear great political influence on the Government of this country for the purpose of obtaining a reduction of the amount they may owe to the Government, and we might not always have so incorruptible a First Minister as now, and the time may come, when these influences will produce their legitimate effects, which are greatly to be dreaded. But the viciousness of the system is enhanced by the fact that it works to the detriment of the settler. The speculator and the settler are brought into direct competition, and the speculator has every advantage in his favour. We will suppose a tract is being surveyed and about to be brought into the market. The speculator has superior means and is probably possessed of superior intelligence as compared with the settler. By means at his command, he keeps posted day by day as to the character of the lands which are being surveyed. He has the data in his possession, and the moment these lands are brought into the market he, knows which are the desirable sections. He is there on the spot to purchase them. He is ahead of the settler in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred. Not only does he have this advantage, but he will have other advantages. If necessary, by being in collusion with the land agents, it will be an easy matter to procure the withdrawal from the market on various pretexts of certain lands until the speculator can examine those lands and ascertain whether he wishes to purchase them or not. This has been so in the United States, and it will be so in the North-West, and the speculator will drive the settler to the wall and obtain the most desirable locations when the lands are brought into market. The profit to be derived from the Government sales of these lands goes into the wrong pocket. Neither the Government nor the settler gets the advantage from the enhanced value of these lands. One of the most serious features in the case is that the settlement of the country will be seriously retarded. Such has always been the case, and ever will be the case, where large speculative transactions in land take place. Let me call the attention of my right hon. friend to the great desirableness and urgent necessity of procuring, if possible, the more rapid and healthful growth of this country. It is a sad thing to see this country falling, year by year, more, and still further behind the United States when the disparity between their population and resources are already so great. We want, if possible, to introduce a system that will diminish this disparity. Now, from 1861 to 1871 the increase of population in the Dominion of Canada was a trifle less than 13 per cent. During the corresponding decade in the United States, although the country had passed through an exhausting civil war, it increased in population 22.65 per cent., almost double that of Canada. I venture to say that, in the decade which is just ending, the increase of population in the United States will be at least double the ratio in Canada. When these facts stare us in the face, the duty rests upon the Government to provide, by every means in its power, for the more rapid development of the resources of Canada, and this policy is calculated to produce results exactly the reverse. The Government is building a railway in the North-West, and it stands in the position of a railway corporation, and the Government naturally wants business for that road after it is built. It wants it to be a productive property, and does not want it to be like the Intercolonial, a dead weight upon the country, run at a greater outlay than the amount of the revenues of the road. What course does the Government intend to take in order to provide business for the road. It certainly will not do it by running it through a wilderness unoccupied by settlers. They want to push it through settled lands, and offer inducements for the actual settlement of the country, and thereby secure a business for the road which would be of infinitely greater advantage than to secure a paltry sum on speculative land sales, leaving the road an unproductive enterprise. The United States Railway Corporations understand their interests. They receive grants of land and endeavour, by every means in their power, to secure the settlement of those lands. They are chary of selling them to land speculators and are exceedingly anxious to sell them to actual settlers, because they know that, in addition to getting the price for their land, they are getting business for the road by developing the country. A large tenant class is an undesirable class in a country like this. We do not want a condition of things similar to that which existed in the feudal ages. The tenant has not a love of home, because he has no home. He has no hearthstone, if he does not own the acres he tills. He cannot have that love of country in its highest sense which the freeholder has. It is unwise to adopt a policy that would encourage and lead to the creation of a large tenant class. On the contrary, Sir, the freeholder is the natural upholder and supporter of free institutions. It may be desired in a monarchy—especially in an absolute monarchy—to have a large tenant class, but it is in the highest degree desirable to have a large freeholder class in this country; it is the class that naturally upholds free institutions. We do not want in this country a population like the fellah of Egypt, who toils beneath an African sun and is content if the exactions of the lord of the soil leave for him his scanty rations of black bread and onions. We want no class similar to the Russian serf, now raised to the condition of a debased peasant, who never in his stolid ignorance for a moment dreams it possible that the Almighty designed the broad acres of this beautiful earth for the free homes of free men. We want no state of things similar to that existing in the land for which we lately voted aid, where a non-resident aristocracy draws from the country its very life blood, and saps the springs of its prosperity and power. We want in this country no such state of things as exists in England, where a proud aristocracy owns the greater part of the soil, where the yeoman who cultivates the soil cannot be to any extent, the owner of that soil. We want a policy which will make the public domain in this country the people's heritage. We want to declare our belief that it was designed by the Almighty for the homes of free men, rather than for the stock-in-trade of speculators and land-sharks. If we do not adopt this policy, the least evils that will ensue will be that the legitimate occupiers of the soil will pay vastly more for that soil than the Government receives. The public lands should be considered by my right hon. friend as a sacred trust to be administered for the benefit of the population in this country, and for the benefit of posterity; and he should be governed in the management of this matter by this motto: "The greatest good for the greatest number." He should not play into the hands of those who design to absorb vast tracts in this land for speculative purposes, but he should by every legitimate method in his power discourage the purchase of this land in large quantities. He should allow no middleman to go between the cultivator of the soil and himself in such transactions. We have, in the Province of Ontario, a class of farmers who are organised for the purpose of dispensing with the services of middlemen in the purchase of the ordinary productions that they require, and I would advise, if my voice should reach these organisations, that they should take into consideration the importance of dispensing with the services of middlemen, whose operations are much more likely to prove inimical to their interests than the operations of ordinary middlemen who deal in goods. I would advise these organisations to advise my right hon. friend that the operations of land speculators must be discouraged and discountenanced, and that the public domain of Canada must be so administered, so managed that great landlords should not possess vast tracts of land. Occupancy should be the unvarying condition of sale; occupancy as to time and as to amount of land, such as reason and experience might dictate. The nation's wealth is not increased by the manipulation of stock gamblers. These men may pass money from one pocket to another; one may be robbed, another may be enriched, but the aggregate wealth of the country by their operations is not increased one dollar. The wealth of the country is not increased by the operations of brokers on the grain exchange. The services of these men may be in a measure necessary to move the crops of the country, but, when they go beyond that and gamble in grain, they do no good to the country. But the operations of the stock gambler, the operations of the grain gambler are innocent in their consequences compared with the operations of the land gambler; the first trade in something which is a creation of men, the last trade is something which is the gift of God. They might just as well try to get a corner upon air, or a corner upon sunshine, or a corner upon water, or anything else essential to man's happiness, as a corner upon land. Their operations should be discouraged in every possible mode, for they are the enemies of humanity. The party who does deserve our kind and careful consideration is the toiler, whether he be a worker in the factory, the mine, or the forest. Wherever we have the toiler, there we have in process of operation an agency that is adding to the aggregate of the wealth possessed by the human race. It is the toiler that deserves our consideration. That land is a happy land where the majority of its population belong to the yeomanry class who are owners of the soil they till. The country, the majority of whose population belong to this class, is secure from the tides of Socialism and Communism, that combat against and threaten to overturn the Christian state and the Christian family, and may defy their assault. The state that has a majority of its population belonging to this class has made secure the foundation for its national prosperity in their thrift and industry. The state that has a majority belonging to this class has a class which will ever be ready to respond to calls of patriotism for the defence of our homes. The state that has a majority belonging to this class may be annihilated, but never can be enslaved. In looking around me, I see the representatives of the people of this Dominion. They are sent here by their constituents to guard their interests, but I am certain our constituents expect more than they receive. They have a right to expect of us that, in dealing with a question like this, we shall deal with that question unbiassed by party considerations. They have a right to expect from us that, in dealing with this momentous question, we shall be governed by what reason teaches us is for the interest of the great mass of the people of this country. Should we not for a moment forget the bickerings, the animosities and the bitterness engendered by our petty ambitions, and rise superior to the chicanery and devious ways of modern political methods? We shall speedily leave this place. Just before me is a vacant chair (Mr. Holton's) that reminds us every day that the time will come when we shall lay down our burdens and relinquish our task. When that time comes, we will drop out of the ranks of life, and the world will scarcely pause to see who is gone. There may be a slight ripple in the current when we sink beneath the stream, but the flood of the ages will sweep on utterly oblivious that we existed, and that we are gone. But, Sir, our acts will live after us. Our acts will tell upon the interests of this country throughout all the ages of its history, and this consideration should deeply impress us. The horizon of this country may be bright with promise, but, if these anticipations are to be realised, we must discharge our duty with some degree of faithfulness, and, in dealing with questions such as this, we must endeavour to promote the true interest of this country. We cannot, of course, obtain an exact knowledge of the future, but the imagination may make excursions down its shadowy vista, and come back with impressions that may be pretty accurate outlines of future realisation. There may come to our ears, if we listen in a prophetic spirit, the sounds of distant and future millions toiling in our great North-West, each individual making puny additions to mighty aggregates of human endea-ours, and human accomplishments. The interests of these future millions are in a sense in our keeping to-day. With these considerations weighing upon us, I hold that we should ever remember that the consequences of any mistakes we may make, whether accidentally or intentionally, being so far reaching, we should study carefully the ground we are treading; that we should endeavour to arrive at a just and dispassionate conclusion, and that we should remember that no duty can be more momentous in its consequences than the duty of providing a land policy that will be in the interests of the yeomanry of Canada present and future. I move, Mr. Speaker, the following resolutions:—

1. Resolved, That in the opinion of this House, the proper policy with reference to the disposition of the public lands of Canada should be, so far as practicable, to sell such lands to actual settlers only, on reasonable conditions of settlement, and in lots or quantities limited to the area which can be reasonably occupied by a settler; and that the sale of public lands to speculators, free from conditions of settlement, is impolitic and calculated to injuriously affect the settlement of the country, by keeping large quantities of land locked up for years, and by obliging the settler thereon, ultimately to pay a price much larger than that which is paid into the Public Treasury for the same.

2. Resolved, That, as, under the existing regulations respecting the disposal of public lands for the purposes of the Canadian Pacific Railway, large quantities of fertile lands are being offered for sale and sold to speculators at one dollar per acre, for one-tenth cash down, and the balance in nine equal annual instalments, with interest at 6 per centum per annum—terms which enable the speculator to obtain control of lands for a cash outlay of 10c. per acre; thereby not only in effect loaning to the speculator on the part of the Government, nine-tenths of the capital required for speculative investments, but giving rise, as experience shows, to great expense in the keeping of accounts, and to indefinite delays in the realisation of the stipulated price; that so long as the system of selling public lands to speculators without conditions of settlement, or restrictions as to quantity is continued, the price at which such lands are sold should be paid in full in cash, at the time of sale.

Motion made and question proposed:

That the House do now go into Committee of the Whole, to consider the said resolutions.—
(Mr. Charlton.)

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I have listened with great pleasure to the eloquent speech of my hon. friend. I have no doubt that all of those who have heard him must have admired the lofty patriotic sentiments which he has uttered with so much fervour and so much fluency. I shall not attempt—it is out of my line altogether to attempt—the same course. As I cannot give the House as much eloquence as my hon. friend, I will try to give as much common sense. The point that struck me from the beginning is, that I could not learn from my hon. friend's speech exactly what his views were, as to the mode of disposing of the great domain that we have in the west. In the first place, the hon. gentleman says that we would do better by giving our lands away altogether to actual settlers; in the next place, he says that the terms are so hard and so severe that they will prevent emigrants from going to settle in that country, and that they will go to the United States; in the third place, he says we are giving the land away for next to nothing by charging so little for it, and giving parties ample opportunity to pay for it. The hon. gentleman does not point out what course he would advise us to adopt—whether he wishes us to give away the lands altogether to settlers, or whether he wishes us to sell them, on what terms, and at what prices, or whether he thinks we are too severe or too lavish in our terms. I cannot learn to which of the three modes of disposing of these lands his opinion inclines. We must consider that this is a complex question. I shall endeavour, in any remarks that I may make, not to go into any premature discussion as to the Pacific Railway Policy of the Government. That will arise more properly, and in an infinitely preferable manner, when the discussion arises on that point. But we cannot forget that this is a complex question, and one very difficult of solution. We know that the country has cost a great sum of money in the original purchase. It has cost us a large sum of money in preparing it for settlement. It has cost us a large sum of money in the construction of the Pacific Railway, as far as it has gone; and we have to take into consideration, not merely the settlement of the country, but the mode of carrying out the engagements of the Government, and of opening up and developing that country by railway, in such a manner, as not to oppress the inhabitants of the whole Dominion. We have got to keep that in view; and as we have to keep that in view, the question is not so easy of solution as the hon. gentleman imagines. When that country was first bought it was in a great degree a wilderness; it was the universal opinion that we had no object after acquiring it. It was seen that the opening up of the western prairies could only be done by a railway system, and it was, therefore, necessary that we should, by the universal desire of the people of Canada, make the railway as speedily as possible, but at the same time, so as not to weigh down the energy or increase the taxation, unduly, of the people of the older Provinces. When it was proposed, in 1872, to build the Canada Pacific Railway, this Parliament—both sides of the House—unanimously adopted a policy which declared that the railway should not be undertaken as a Government enterprise, but by private aid on grants of land to such persons or companies as would undertake the work of building the railway, and by additional aid in money. These companies were to have additional grants of land, not to be given away, but to be sold by the companies, under the terms of the Railway Act of 1872, at prices to be settled upon between the Company and the Government. I believe that if this original policy had been carried out successfully, we should now have seen the railway stretching nearly across the continent, without any heavy burden being imposed upon the people of this country. However, there is no use in lamenting what is past. Suffice it to say, that that idea of building the railway by private enterprise was afterwards abandoned; and the Government which introduced that idea, and of which I was a member, made room for another Government, headed by my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), who also felt the same necessity of relieving the people of Canada—the olders settlers of the Dominion—from any heavy pecuniary burden, and of, in fact, carrying out the same policy as that enunciated and adopted by their predecessors. In the Canada Pacific Railway Act of 1879, introduced by the hon. gentleman, passed by Parliament, and now the law of the land, it was provided that contractors for the building of the line should receive a grant of $30,000,000, and a land grant of 50,000,000 acres, at prices to be agreed upon by the Government and the contractors. That policy was precisely the same as that of the Government which preceded it. In the original scheme of 1872, it was provided that a subsidy should be granted of $30,000,000, and a grant of 50,000,000 acres of land made to any railway company which would undertake the construction of the road; but that this 50,000,000 acres should be laid out in alternate lots on either side of the line of railway, and in such a way that every second block should be reserved, that is, that another 50,000,000 acres should intersect, in alternate blocks, the 50,000,000 acres granted to the company undertaking the work, these alternate blocks being intended to be sold to settlers on terms that would ultimately recoup the $30,000,000 subsidy. In the 1874 Bill it is provided that if the Government should find it more expedient to construct the work as a Government work instead of by the intervention of railway companies undertaking the work, they might make it a Government work; and that was the plan on which the work of building the railway from Lake Superior to Red River was undertaken, that is as a Government work. What the policy of the late Government would have been in carrying out the completion of the other portion of the railway we do not know, because we had not at the time they ceased to be a Government, got so far as to have any policy announced on the question; but when we came in, we decided to undertake it as a Government work, because the construction from Lake Superior to Red River was through a difficult country, expensive for surveying, and a very poor country, which would not make any adequate return for the expense; and as it was quite clear that the railway westward from Red River to the Rocky Mountains would run through a rich country, which would render the construction of the road more remunerative, the policy of this Government, became a humble imitation of that pursued by the American Government, and which receives the eulogy of the hon. gentlemen opposite. At the same time it should be stated, that although the plan of the American Government in railroad buildings is precisely the same as our own, still, wherever ours varies in practice to that of the American system, it is on the side of greater liberality. In making up our minds to undertake the work west of the Red River, as a Government work, we had regard, as I have intimated, to the system pursued by the American Government in constructing their railway lines. In the United States every alternate block is kept by the Government, and the other block is sold for the highest price. Then, Sir, the policy of my hon. friend, of giving the land away to actual settlers, is not the policy of the late Government or of the present Government; because when the late Government laid out the land running from Red River to Selkirk, and to the north of Lake Manitoba, they, by three separate Orders in Council, reserved all the land running along the railway excluding the emigrant altogether. The policy of the late Government, and that of the present Government, had in view the relief of the country at large from any undue burden of taxation in the construction of the railway and carrying it across the continent. The system adopted by the present Government, however, is complained of as far too liberal. We are told that we are far too lavish with these lands. I could not quite understand the hon. the mover of the resolution now before the House, whether he was in favour of preemption or not. The hon. gentleman called my attention to the report made by a Commission in the United States, in reference to doing away with preemptions altogether. I am not aware that the American Government have adopted that plan. I have reason, on the contrary, to believe they have not, from a telegram received from the Land Department at Washington, but that the system of preemption is, at this moment, as much in force as it ever was; and yet the hon. gentleman would have us adopt a plan less favourable to the emigrant, less favourable to the actual settler than the system existing in the United States. We are giving to every emigrant, every head of a family of eighteen years of age and upwards, who chooses to go and settle there, 160 acres of land; and, if he settles there for three years, not five years, he gets his deed for that 160 acres, and then he has a right to purchase another 160 acres adjoining at the prices mentioned in the regulations. I think that is the greatest inducement in the world. He gets his 160 acres free; he is raising his family—perhaps of boys—and he has another farm alongside of him; he gets his homestead for three years; he is not called upon to pay on his preemption until the fourth year, and then he pays an easy proportion. These are inducements and advantages that I would not like to see the settler deprived of. If we were to deprive him, then the charge that we offer less favourable terms than the United States offer, would be true. Now, the hon. gentleman says we have violated the spirit or the express terms of the resolutions of last Session in regard to the Pacific Railway. He says we have sold land at $1 an acre, although the resolutions restricted the minimum price at $2 an acre. But the hon. gentleman should remember that the resolutions of last Session provided that the land to be so dealt with should be within a belt, on each side of the line, of twenty miles, all the land outside of that was not railway land; and by the terms of the Dominion Lands Act, all lands are sold at $1 an acre, not one acre of those lands comes within the terms of the resolutions of last Session. Now, the hon. gentleman says we should make actual occupation one of the conditions. I would ask the hon. gentleman, I would ask this House, who would go and buy land that he could not sell? The fact of selling in fee-simple is consistent only with the idea of making no such condition. We have reserved these lands for homestead purposes and for actual settlement, and for the purpose of building the railway; and for the purpose of relieving the people of Canada from the burden of taxation which the work would otherwise entail, we have offered every second lot at an upset price, so that the road may be eventually built without costing the people one single farthing which will not be recouped. I believe that land can be made productive under the terms of the resolution to complete the whole of that road, to open that immense country and give us a magnificent railway from sea to sea, without adding to the burdens of the people, or without causing any necessity for an increase of taxation. We can do it all by the sale of the lands which we hold as a sacred trust for the purpose of defraying the whole expense of the construction of the Pacific Railway. So, Mr. Speaker, I can disabuse the mind of the country, or the minds of any of the hon. gentlemen who hear me, of any apprehensions that the construction of the Pacific Railway will be so burdensome as to be oppressive to the people, and discouraging to the future development, prosperity and growth of the Dominion. The hon. gentleman has stated that our terms in other respects were more generous than the terms of the United States. I may say that our surveys are conducted on the same principle as the surveys of the western territory of the United States. In that country, and in Canada, every even-numbered section is kept as a homestead section, and every odd-numbered section is kept as a railway lot. Then, here we keep two sections for the Hudson's Bay Company, and two sections for school purposes. The hon. gentleman drew a dreadful picture of the people being isolated, and not being able to have schools and churches in common; but we see schools and churches growing in the United States, on the same principle and same plan that we have adopted here. The only difference is, with regard to the man who goes to the North-West with only his strong arms and willing heart, is that he is offered much more favourable terms than the same class of settlers in the United States. We give him a homestead of 160 acres free, and he has the opportunity of securing 160 acres contiguous to his homestead at $1 an acre, and he gets three years time in which he need not pay a farthing for that. This gives him the opportunity to break up his soil and raise his crops. But in the United States he has to pay $2.50 for the same privilege the moment he goes on his land. He gets no credit there. He gets his 160 acres, and he must pay $2.50 an acre in cash for his preemption claim. Even in the railway belt lying close to the railway where the farmer has the road passing his door, the preemption price is only $2.50 in the most favourable locality; whereas in the United States no matter where the land may be, whether twenty, fifty or one hundred miles away from the railway, he must pay the exemption rate—the $2.50 an acre directly he takes up his claim. I would ask, Mr. Speaker, whether the terms of the United States are more favourable than our own. I think the answer is conclusively in favour of Canada. But then comes this great bug-a-boo of the speculator, who is going to take up the lands. The system is the same in the United States. The land speculator has got to pay cash, and that is a check to his imagination; but we give the purchaser the opportunity of paying, because we believe we will be able to sell the larger portion of those lands much more speedily and rapidly, so as to be able to recoup my hon. friend the Finance Minister the drafts upon his Treasury for building the Pacific Railway. It is of the greatest consequence that we should do that. It is the pledge made by the Parliament of 1872, the pledge made by the Parliament of 1874, and the pledge made by the Parliament of 1878, that this land should be utilised for building the railway; and, to use the language of the Act of 1874, the railway is to be built as rapidly as it can be done, so long as it does not unduly increase the burdens of the people.

MR. BLAKE: It says, "without increasing the existing rate of taxation."

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman is right. That is the language of the Act. The recital of the Bill is as follows:

"Whereas, the House of Commons of Canada resolved in the Session of the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-one, that the said railway should be constructed and worked by private enterprise and not by the Dominion Government, and that the public aid to be given to secure its accomplishment should consist of such liberal grants of land and such subsidy in money or other aid, not increasing the then existing rate of taxation, as the Parliament of Canada should thereafter determine; And, whereas the Statute 35 Vic., cap. 71, was enacted in order to carry out the said agreement and resolution; but the enactments therein contained, have not been effectual for that purpose.

"And, whereas by the legislation of this present Session, in order to provide means for meeting the obligations of the Dominion, the rate of taxation has been raised much beyond that existing at the date of the said resolution; and, whereas it is proper to make provision for the construction of the said work as rapidly as the same can be accomplished without further raising the rate of taxation."

You see that the rate of taxation was raised in 1874, but not for the purpose of railway construction. It was done before the railway policy was commenced or before Parliament had announced any such policy for the purpose of meeting a number of existing obligations to which the faith of the Dominion was pledged. It was decided that the railway should go on as rapidly as can be done without increasing the rate of taxation. It is of importance that this road should be built. The hon. gentleman has told us that the rate of increase of population in 1860-61 was only 13 per cent. in the Dominion of Canada; whereas it was 22 per cent. in the United States. There are several reasons for that difference. In the first place, a large railway construction was going on in the western portion of that country, and was bringing a large population into the Great West. Large grants had been made to railways, which had the result of making those roads act as agents to bring settlers to their lands; and the hon. gentleman must admit that that was one of the great causes, while we had only an increase of 30 per cent. in our population, and they had an increase of 22 per cent. They had a protective system, and we had not.

MR. BLAKE: Whose fault was that?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: We have gathered light, and we contend that in the next decade our 13 per cent. shall be equal to their 22 per cent. In order to say what we may fairly expect to get from the sale of these lands, I have caused an approximate estimate to be made, because all those estimates must be merely approximations, and we can only draw our conclusions from what we can learn from the experience of the United States. There are one or two postulates which I must ask the House to consider, because, if we admit them the rest is simply a matter of calculation. It is believed, from the best information we can get, that 20,000 people went into the North-West last year.

MR. BLAKE: There were not more than one-tenth of that number.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I can inform the hon. gentleman from the returns of the hon. the Minister of the Department of Agriculture, that 12,000 are known to have gone in, and, from the best information we have got, as many more went in that could not be counted, who were not under the supervision of that Department; but let us say that 8,000 more went in, and that only makes the 20,000. If we are to judge from the reports we have heard, we may rely upon it that 50,000 people will go into that section of the country this year. We know that in the United States, when railways were about to be opened across the prairies in the various States and territories, a large influx could always be calculated upon, because there is always an increasing rush towards those lands which are being opened up by the construction of railways. We are told that 50,000 will come in, but let us put the number at 25,000, and I have been informed by everyone—and I have spoken to a great number of persons who have come from the North-West, and who have the best means of judging—that that estimate is ridiculously absurdly small.

MR. MACKENZIE: I suppose it was the same person who informed Lord Beaconsfield, who thought it was absurd.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Very likely. I would ask the hon. member for Lambton, if he does not really believe that number will go in.

MR. MACKENZIE: As the hon. gentleman has asked me a question, I will tell him that I do not believe so, nor do I believe that 20,000 went in last year. I think a large number will go, but not the number he stated.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Then the hon. gentleman is the first person that I have heard say that 25,000 was not altogether too small an estimate of the certain rush of emigration going to that country this year. That number, of course, includes the baby as well as the adult; it includes the whole population moving into the country. In ordinary cases the estimate is: the average family numbers five—the head of the family and four others. In the Western States the average is not so large, for obvious reasons; because so many young men go in without families to settle there, and the average is reduced to three instead of five. But in the future I cannot calculate upon such a low estimate, because if there is the rush estimated, families will move in there in larger numbers than in any previous year, as many have sent on their sons before them as pioneers. We have made an estimate of four to the family. It is a larger average than has occurred hitherto in Canada or in the Western States. If, then, you take four to a family, we estimate that of the 25,000 or 24,000 that go there, 3,000 will be heads of families, occupying homesteads and preemption claims. Every man takes up his preemption claim. He gets his lot free and he looks forward to having an additional farm, from the preemption; and that is one great advantage of our system over the American system, where a man is obliged to pay cash down for the whole amount of his preemption claim. Then, we estimate that one-fourth of the adults, or 1,500, will become purchasers of railway lands—men coming from England, Ireland and Scotland, and some from the United States, who possess money. Notwithstanding the sneer of the hon. gentleman opposite, a great many Americans are going into that country. There is a large move about to take place from Pennsylvania into the North-West. As I stated, one-fourth of the 20,000 will buy railway lands. They have got money; and every man will take up his homestead and preemption claim and become a purchaser of railway lands as well. Probably another fourth will be labourers, men with families, but men who will not take up land. Some hold that that is too high an estimate, and that a mechanic will take up his lot and work it in such a way as to secure a title thereof; but in making this calculation, we are trying to keep within the bounds, rather than make a statement which would be considered excessive. I calculate that 25,000 people will go into our North-West this year; that 3,000 heads of families will take up free homesteads; that 1,500 will purchase railway lands, and 1,500 will not purchase any. That is a moderate calculation. If this estimate is admitted, then the rest of the problem is altogether a matter of figures. Of the railway lands, we calculate that the average purchase will be 320 acres for each head of a family. We then take the average price of the whole of the lands extending from the $5 section, within five miles of the railway, to sixty or 100 miles away. The average price of the lands sold to the 1,500 purchasers would be $3 an acre—this is greatly under the average. What then would be the result?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

MR. BLAKE: Over the whole belt—220 miles?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Yes. Take $1, $2.50, $4 and $5 per acre, and the average, $3; admit we sell at those terms lands, in 1880, to the value of $1,440,000, of which we shall receive one-tenth the price, or $144,000, we should receive from the fees from the homestead and preemption grants $60,000 more, making in all $204,000 in cash. Then we calculate that, as 25,000 people would go in this year, we may add each year an increase of 5,000, so that we may expect 30,000 to go in next year. That is a very small percentage, if we look to the results from railway enterprise in the United States. We assume, therefore, an increase of 5,000 a year till 1890, and expect in that year 75,000 settlers in our North-West.

MR. BLAKE: Can you not make it another 10,000?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think that is a very moderate estimate. On those figures, the estimate of the total cash revenue to be received for the lands, by 1890, is $38,593,000.

MR. BLAKE: That is up to 1890.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Yes, and including 1890.

MR. BLAKE: That amount with interest.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: We expect $38,593,000, including simple interest for the lands sold in that period.

MR. BLAKE: What proportion is principal and what interest?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I cannot say. That will be the total sum received in cash to the end of 1890. But, besides, there will be all the instalments to come in after 1890, accruing yearly, so that the lands sold in 1890 will be one-tenth paid for nine years afterwards—for each year there will be an instalment of one-tenth paid. The actual value in 1890, of the preemption, up to that date, unpaid, will be $16,440,000. The actual value of the railway lands sold up to that date will be $16,272,000, making in all, $32,712,000. If you add to that total, unpaid, the $38,593,000 that will be paid in 1890, you get a grand total of $71,305,000. Deduct from that the estimated cost of surveys for the ten years, $2,000,000, and of the land officers, $400,000, and you reduce it by $2,400,000. Having shown that the estimate of the number of settlers, if the land to be taken up, and if the average price, is not excessive, we find we shall have $69,000,000 either of money in hand, or money for which we shall have the best security in the world—the land itself. The whole estimated cost of the railway, including surveys, and construction through the difficult as well as the prairie country, does not exceed, by the most excessive computation $75,000,000—for the work from Lake Superior to the Pacific Ocean. I believe hon. gentlemen opposite will be surprised, yet, to find it built for less than $75,000,000. It will not cost more in the most rigid calculation. Some gentlemen and newspapers have said that the Engineer-in-Chief is one of the most extravagant engineers possible. We can, therefore, place some reliance on his calculations. If we finish the road for $75,000,000, and in the first ten years only sell half the lands we estimate, where will be the burden on the people? That would not make a very serious invasion into the very large tracts of land we should have still to sell. As the road progresses, the annual sales of land will more than be sufficient to meet all the possible cost of the railway. In addition to all that, we must remember we shall be pouring into that country an enormous population which, on a prairie soil, will rapidly become—not with the painful toil of the people of Ontario and Quebec, who have had to clear the forest—consumers of dutiable goods and contributors to the revenue. We shall be receiving a large revenue from that country altogether independent of the products of the lands. Where, then, is there any danger of this country being overridden by taxation, or being oppressed? There is none. I believe, under this scheme, we shall settle the country rapidly; that the proceeds of the sales of lands will meet our engagements, as the work progresses, including the claims for interest. I believe that the interest upon the railway expenditure can easily be defrayed without adding further to the taxation of the country.

After Recess.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: When the House rose, at six o'clock, I was speaking of the increase of population in the Western States. I hold in my hands a return showing the populations of several Western States in 1850, 1860, and 1870. My hon. friend from North Norfolk has called our attention to the fact that, during the last ten years, the United States were suffering from war, and the deprivation consequent on the war. The following is the populations of the several States at the periods named:—

	1850.	1860.	1870
Minnesota..	6,000	172,000	446,000
Iowa.....	192,000	674,000	1,190,000
Missouri...	594,000	1,064,000	1,721,000
Arkansas...	162,000	344,000	484,000
Nebraska...	nil	28,000	129,000
Kansas.....	nil	107,000	373,000
Illinois.....	851,000	1,711,000	2,539,000
Wisconsin..	305,000	775,000	1,064,000

The rate of progress in those States was most remarkable. And the causes of it were the rush of emigration to the United States, the opening up of the country by development and the railway policy of the United States Government, in granting liberal subsidies of land. Now, that country has been filled by emigration from the East, from Europe, and from the South, which was directed mainly to those States, and I hope and believe, and have every reason to expect, will flow into the North-West and Manitoba. The hon. gentleman asked me what proportion was interest in the calculation I made. The principal and interest are in the proportion of two-thirds and one-third. One of the objections which my hon. friend made to the policy of the Government was the opportunity it would give to speculators to get hold of large tracts of land, and to lock them up from settlement in view and with the hope of getting enhanced prices. Now, the same principle applied, I take it, to the United States. The United States Government, when they conveyed the alternate lots to the railway companies that they subsidised, made no conditions as to settlement. Those companies, we all know, made no conditions, and sold without condition upon receiving their set price. They could not do so, because it was their object, and they were successful in it, to get the highest price possible for their lands; and they sold their lands at $1, $3, $5, $7, even $10 an acre; and in those places where there were mineral lands and good locations for cities, towns and villages, they made enormous profits. There, indeed, was an opportunity of large speculation, and there, indeed, largespeculators succeeded in getting large tracts of land. We read of farms of 10,000, 20,000, and one large farm of 40,000 acres. Now, such an accumulation of land in a single hand cannot occur in the North-West under our regulations. By the wise provisions of these regulations, no man can get a large tract of land. In any one railway belt no one can get a continuous large plot. He cannot get a whole township, as the speculators have succeeded in getting in the United States. As I have explained, and as the regulations show, every alternate lot is held and sold—every alternate lot in the mile square which forms the township—the even numbers of 160 acres are kept for actual settlement, and the neighbouring 160 acres are kept for preemptive right of the individual settler, and can never be disposed of by him to anybody else, and he has the sole right of that preemption until he gets his deed, after having, for three years, improved his farm. So that no one can get any large tract of continuous land. But his next neighbour who buys a lot, is an actual settler, who is either attached to the soil with his interests in the advancement of the country, and is interested in the improvement of the country, and all his interests are opposed to those of the speculator, or the land owner merely for the sake of gain. What is the consequence? The consequence is plain. Municipal institutions have now been introduced into Manitoba. At first they only passed a permissive Bill, but now they have passed a compulsory Bill. They have divided the Province of Manitoba into twenty-eight town districts, and these are compelled, in the course of this summer, to adopt a municipal system, which is that of Ontario in principle. Every one of these districts is obliged to establish a municipal system with the organisation that obtains in Ontario, so that the people who own every second lot will have a direct interest in insisting upon, and in imposing a non-resident tax upon all speculators. The danger of large tracts of land getting into the hands of speculators is absolutely out of the question. They cannot get them continuously in large blocks, and only in blocks of 640 acres. By no possibility can they get more than that, and they are checked by the fact that the actual resident settlers will see that a non-resident tax is put upon these lands, so that the operation will be the same as it was in the old Province of Upper Canada. I remember the time, before the land tax was passed, when every old inhabitant had a large tract of land which he kept for speculation; but the land tax system altered that, and we had yearly sales of lands for taxes, and the speculators were obliged to sell their lands because they could not afford to pay the taxes put upon them.

MR. MACKENZIE: It was precisely the land speculators that bought up the lands.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: But they sold again. Of course the land speculators bought them and paid the rates, and the municipalities got the money and laid it out in roads and bridges, and the improvement of the country; and the new speculators who bought those lands were obliged to sell them or continue to pay taxes, and we all know the consequence was that such things as large land proprietors, which have been pictured to us by the hon. member for North Norfolk, do not exist in Ontario. My hon. friend conjured up the idea that we were going to have a proud aristocracy, as he called it, like that of England, owning millions of acres, keeping down the tenant-farmers and grinding them to powder. Why, we know that the people most to be commiserated in England are the land owners. Landlords cannot get a tenant-right; the tenantry are going to become landlords themselves by coming to Manitoba and the North-West. There is no fear of our having a serfdom like that in Russia; I thought there were 10 serfs in Russia, and I thought that the people that were most completely free from serfdom in the old world are at present the men who were formerly serfs in Russia. They own the soil, they stand exactly in the position of the farmers in the Province of Quebec. There is a small and very inadequate sum by paying which each gets free of his superior. They are so free that, strange to say, in many portions of Russia the emancipated serfs are anxious to get back under the paternal rule of their seigneurs again. This is the fact, as we know. The hon. gentleman shakes his head. If he would be kind enough to go to the library and read that most interesting book, Wallace on Russia—

MR. MACKENZIE: I have just read it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Then he will find it to be a fact, if he has read it attentively, and I can show it to him to convince him, that instead of being governed and oppressed by the seigneur, they are now governed and oppressed by the commune—by themselves, the mir, or the commune, as it is called in France. The land is held in common. The commune governs the landlord and divides and sub-divides the land among themselves on a purely democratic principle; and the people find this so oppressive, they wish they were back under reasonable guides, and under a small rate of taxation or rental that was placed upon them by the landlords.

MR. MACKENZIE: The commune is not a new thing; it is not a new system.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I do not say so, but Wallace will tell the hon. gentleman, who appears to have read it—but not very attentively—that the mir is not a new thing, but the landlords stood between the individual serfs and the commune before; they protected the individual serf from the tyranny of his neighbour. That is what Wallace says, and I think that the hon. gentleman, now that I have called his attention to it, will remember that this is so. But the hon. gentleman from North Norfolk commenced his speech by attacking the first resolution for the sale of the land. Now, I have no hesitation in saying that these regulations were reasonable and fair ones. By the first regulation there was an A belt lying on each side of the railway five miles in width, which is withdrawn altogether from homesteads, and these lands are to be sold. Now, while I think the homestead system is a correct one and the best that can possibly be devised for settling the country, certainly no one has a right to expect that he can have a railway built free to his own door for nothing. We all know how Ontario and the older Provinces were settled, but the farmer in the North-West has no such difficulties to encounter. The day after he arrives in his new home he can put his plough into the soil, and commence to sow his crop. But while I think it is quite reasonable that the men who are getting the land on the line of railway, or within five miles of it, should purchase the land, yet such an outcry was raised about this regulation and about its driving away emigrants that we changed that. An unpatriotic cry was got up by hon. gentlemen opposite, and by some of their ill-regulated organs, such as the Globe. From the moment these resolutions were published, a howl was raised, and a direct attack was made upon the Government. No one knows better than the hon. gentleman from West Durham (Mr. Blake) how unpatriotic that paper is when it has a partisan policy to pursue; no one knows better how reckless it is whether it injures the country or not, whether it drives away emigrants or ruins the reputation and credit of the manufacturer, if a temporary political triumph can be obtained. The howl that was raised by a paper of extensive circulation, the organ of a large and patriotic party, would, of course, have its effect. It had its effect on the party, and we were apprehensive that this outcry, unworthy as it was in purpose, and unfounded as it was in statement, would have the effect which it desired, of keeping emigration out of the country; and the Globe might afterwards point its finger at the policy and say: This is the policy of the Government, and see how it has failed of success. Although I think that the first regulations were quite just in themselves, and that, if they had been insisted upon, there would have been no diminution in the number of emigrants, and we would have had more money in our coffers, and more means to press on the public works in that country, still we were resolved that we should not be foiled. We rendered our regulations more liberal. We bound them to agree with us. We resolved that every one of the terms must be less onerous to the public and more favourable to the settler, and we have succeeded. I know, as a matter of fact, that these regulations are well thought of in the North-West, where they are so anxious to have immediat settlements, and their country opened up and developed. I have only to say that, by the terms I have endeavoured to explain to you, we hope to encourage the settler by giving him fair terms. We have given him a free grant of 160 acres of land; we have given him the right to acquire, at a moderate price, 160 acres more, with plenty of time to pay up. That secures the settlement of the country. We want to build the railway, and we want to raise money to build the railway in the manner I have explained to you, on the estimates I have ventured to lay before you, and they are not estimates made by me. They are estimates made by experts, who have made these calculations on an extended personal experience. Our terms are better than those offered in the United States, and will secure for us purchasers for our lands. We gain by this two objects, the settlement of our country within a reasonable period, and the certainty of raising a fund that will relieve this country from all danger of being oppressed by a burdensome taxation, in order to carry out the obligations which the Dominion has placed itself under, and which we cannot, without a loss of honour, a loss of prestige, and a loss of position, ignore. When we gain these two things, we can throw ourselves confidently on the good sense of the House, and the good sense of the country, for the support of our railway policy. I therefore say these resolutions must be passed. Our regulations demand and require, and I believe will receive, the approbation of this House and the country. They are liberal without being lavish, and will operate so as to encourage the poor man to become a rich man, and enable the country to carry out the great object of developing this country, and of building our magnificent railway connecting the Atlantic and Pacific.

MR. ANGLIN: The right hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat, discussed a rather important portion of the Pacific Railway Policy of the Government upon the question raised by the hon. member for North Norfolk. It would evidently be very inconvenient just now to follow him at length in the course which he has chosen to pursue. Notice has already been given that a resolution will be moved, as soon as the hon. the Minister of Railways has promulgated his policy regarding the Pacific Railway; and it is understood that that will be the proper time for taking up this whole question with regard to the best mode of constructing the Pacific Railway. The propriety of taking up this branch of the subject now, I leave the right hon. gentleman for himself, and those sitting behind him, to consider. But it occurred to me that it would, at all events, be well to make one remark with regard to the very extraordinary calculation prepared for the right hon. gentleman by experts and submitted by him to this House. To the representatives of New Brunswick there was nothing novel in the mode of dealing with the question which he has chosen to follow. Many of us from that Province have, for many years past, been familiar with this mode of discounting the future. We have had calculations, almost precisely similar in their character, submitted from time to time as a justification for plunging the country into extraordinary expenditures. We were told how the population of the country would multiply. Careful calculations were produced to show that the population would grow even without the aid of emigration; and we were often told of the magnificent future in store for our country when our wild lands were cultivated, and the wilderness was blossomed as a rose. In no single instance was one of these anticipations realised, was a single one of those prophecies fulfilled. All of them have proved to be grossly delusive, as I have no doubt the calculations submitted to the House, this afternoon, will be found in the course of time to be delusive. I moved several weeks ago for a return showing what quantities of land the Canadian Government has sold to Manitoba and in the North-West, from the days on which we first acquired possession of that country up to the end of last year; showing further the whole amount of money raised from the sale of these lands; and also the cost of survey, the management, and the conduct of the sales, so that this House, when they come to the consideration of the Pacific Railway policy of the Government, should have some actual facts upon which to base their estimates and calculations for the future. If hon. gentlemen are allowed to manufacture their data, they can bring us to any conclusion they please. I asked for data which would be reliable, but, for some reason or other, that return has not found its way on to the Table of this House, and possibly we may be called upon to discuss this policy by-and-bye without having these figures to guide us to a just conclusion. I was about to say that, in this extraordinary calculation, one very important, palpable and flagrant omission has been made. While the hon. gentleman calculated very carefully the interest accruing on the price of lands sold, he omitted altogether to calculate the interest on the amount of money we are borrowing from day to day, and expending on the Pacific Railway. On June 30th, as the Public Accounts show the actual expenditure on that work was about $12,500,000. Since that a very large expenditure has been made, and I think it is not too much to assume that at this moment we are in debt in that amount to the extent of $15,000,000. That money will cost us at least 5 per cent. per annum. We borrow nominally at 4 per cent., but I think 5 per cent. is actually the very lowest rate we pay for that money. Five per cent. on $15,000,000 is just $750,000, and it will be necessary next year to sell lands enough to realise $750,000 to pay the debt at this moment due on account of the Pacific Railway. The right hon. gentleman calculated that 25,000 people would go into that country next year. I think it a very extravagant calculation; and let me say, moreover, that the hon. gentleman calculated that these people would come from other countries, and add to the population of this. Whereas, it is known that a very large portion of those who have gone to the North-West have gone from the Province of Ontario, and so diminished the population of that Province. But setting that aside for a moment, I want to make this one point. We will have to realise $750,000 by the sale of our lands to pay the interest on the money borrowed. Taking the emigration at 25,000 persons, that sum will represent $30 per head for every man, woman and child that, even according to the hon. gentleman's own statement, goes into the country. Then the hon. gentleman says that $75,000,000 are to be spent in ten years, when the road will be completed. I do not know whether there is anybody in Canada, besides himself, who believes that that road can be built for $75,000,000. Fifteen millions from $75,000,000 will leave $60,000,000 to be expended in the ten years, or $6,000,000 to be expended annually. The annual interest upon the latter sum will be $300,000 a year, to be added to the existing interest. This year we will have $750,000 interest to pay by the sale of lands; next year we will have to raise $1,050,000; the year after, $1,350,000; the next year, $1,650,000; and so we would go on until at the end of ten years, we will have to raise from the sale of those lands, merely for the purpose of paying interest on the $75,000,000, no less a sum than $3,750,000. His calculation, that there would be an emigration of 75,000 people during that last year, according to which it would be necessary for every man, woman and child of that emigration, to pay $50 a piece into the Dominion Treasury, to pay the interest on the $75,000,000. This was lost sight of, and I maintain that there is nothing to satisfy any reasonable man, who wishes to weigh the facts of this case carefully, that the sale of lands in the North-West will be sufficient to enable the Government to pay this enormous amount of interest. This is the only point I desire to make, and, I think, it is one that hon. gentlemen on the other side would do well to take into consideration.

MR. PLUMB: Mr. Speaker, I expected, when my hon. friend the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) rose, that we would have a temperate, clear and dispassionate discussion of the great question involved in the terms of his resolutions. My hon. friend has an aptitude for collating statistics and presenting them in a clear and effective manner. But my hon. friend has one peculiarity, which I think, has been exhibited in all the important speeches he has made in this House. It will not be Parliamentary for me to say, the hon. gentleman has not the sincerity of his convictions, but it is quite certain, that when he begins with an argument upon one side of a question, he usually manages before he concludes, to introduce arguments upon the opposite side from that upon which he started that entirely do away with the force of his original proposition. My hon. friend began by questioning the land policy of the Government. I acknowledge that there may be great room for differences of opinion upon grave questions, such as that of the policy to be adopted for peopling a wild country like our North-West, and the building of a Trans-Continental railway. Differences of that kind we must expect will be earnestly advocated and supported by arguments strenuously urged in this House. We must expect that such arguments from gentlemen on the other side of the House, will be tinged with party spirit. I do not object to that—and I hope we shall hear in the course of this discussion, for our information and examination, from gentlemen on both sides, every reasonable view which can be taken of the subject. But I did not expect to hear from the hon. gentleman on the one hand, that the Government had granted for the building of the Pacific Railway an inordinate quantity of land—a grant so large that it was simply reckless, extravagant, and improvident. I did not expect, on the other hand, to hear him assert that that quantity of land would be inadequate for the building of the road. Nor did I expect to hear from him that there had been grants of one-fourth the quantity, not so good space as ours, to important railways in the United States, on the proceeds of which their lines had been constructed. These statements do not tally. I will not follow the hon. gentleman in his argument, but I must say that I cannot conceive that in the great North-West there is not land enough for all kinds of bargains and arrangements which it may seem politic to the country to make. There is ample provision made for the settler. There is ample provision made for him in the first place by giving him 160 acres as a homestead, and in the second place a preemption of another 160 acres which he can take if he likes. It is very unfair for the hon. gentleman to attempt to persuade this House that the land laws of the United States are more favorable to the settler than ours. I happen to have before me the regulations of the United States Government, in respect to preemption and homesteads, which regulations show that, until recent modifications took place, a settler could get for a homestead only eighty acres of land, and could acquire but eighty acres more by preemption. The prices of the latter were fixed, according to location, either at $1.25 or $2.50 per acre, and yet the hon. gentleman boasts of this system, which in reality is not nearly so liberal as our own. In 1879, under pressure of representatives in Congress, who were hostile to the holders of the large land-grants for railway purposes, or who wished to strengthen themselves in constituencies, where such grants are restrictive and monopolising, there was a modification of the land statutes, and an Act was passed by which the homestead-grant was extended to 160 acres and the preemption privileges to 160 acres also; but, the minimum and maximum prices, $1.25 and $2.50, remain the same. This is all I have to say, in reply to the hon. gentleman, in that regard. When the hon. gentleman says that our regulations are calculated to obstruct the settlement of the North-West. I entirely disagree with him. Does he suppose that this Government are in a league to defeat their own objects—that they are going deliberately to work—understanding the regulations of the United States—to commit political suicide and destroy the opportunity presented to them, of carrying out the great engagements laid upon them,—engagements I may say, in passing, laid upon them by the hon. gentleman opposite and his leaders, for the original policy was changed by the late Government. The hon. gentleman goes on to say, that in order to open up our great North-West, it must be left free to the typical pioneer; and the hon. gentleman, with a fine poetic fancy, pictures that avant-courier of settlements, after having finished his work in what was once called the Far-West, having no more wilderness to conquer in the dark and bloody ground where he flourished fifty years ago in his buckskin hunting shirt, and squirrel-skin cap, with his powder-horn at his side and his rifle on his shoulder, standing ready to take these accessories of civilization into our Great Lone Land. But the hon. gentleman assures us that the fastidious person he described will not vouchsafe to give us the inestimable benefit of his co-operation, unless we legislate here for his especial and exclusive benefit. Now, the hon. gentleman should know that his pioneer has ceased to exist ; that he is a creature of an age that has gone by ; that he is as utterly extinct as the Mastodon of Big-bone Lick, who disappeared a few ages earlier. His mission was to defend himself with his rifle from the hostile red-man, to keep his scalp intact, and with his axe to fell the vast dreary forests which frowned along the shores of the Ohio and the Mississippi. If a stray individual of his race still survives, Sir, he would find on the Red river or the Saskatchewan, none of the difficulties with which he had to grapple in his old home. There are no grim foes to meet except occasional blizzards, no forests on which the labour of half a life-time must be spent before they can be conquered. The virgin soil is ready for the plough, a single summer will yield a prolific harvest on the first breaking up ; nature has prepared an easy path for him with the application of the vast improvements that labour-saving implements supply. The country we are offering has already passed the bounds which the pioneer reached when his work was done. The hon. gentleman has sketched a poetic picture, romantic enough, but one which will not stand the strong, clear light of common sense. The hon. gentleman has also said, that there is a great objection to opening the land in the Far-West to the speculator. I say that if any one wishes to buy this land within the restrictions placed upon it by the Government, he should be allowed and encouraged to do so. I say that I want to see the capitalist go there, take an active interest in the settlement of that country, and become an emigrant agent, endeavouring to get settlers there ; and if, as has been hinted, he finds himself uncomfortably taxed, he will be the more anxious to get settlers upon his land to share his burthens, and there will be no harm done ; there is ample room and verge enough for the emigrant and the capitalist : I have been looking over the report of the English tenant farmers who visited Manitoba last year, which shows that large tracts have been taken up by men of property going from Ontario, men who have sold their improved lands here and who have had means to acquire land enough for themselves and their sons in the North-West. What possible objection can there be to giving such men the privilege of acquiring ten times the quantity named as a homestead if they desire it ? It would hardly be expected that we could adopt any policy that would meet with approval of hon. gentlemen on the other side, and I anticipated nothing less than the attack made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) but I have been very much disappointed in its force. All the possible mischief which it was intended to inflict has been done away with, most effectually, by the hon. Premier in his able and eloquent reply. I do not hesitate to say, Mr. Speaker, that every utterance of hon. gentlemen opposite since the opening of this Session, has been made with a view to damage the interests of this country ; and it has been painful to the community at large as well as to all dispassionate men in this House, to notice the attempts of the minority to thwart and obstruct that progress toward a restoration of confidence and a return of prosperity, which would come naturally but for the conduct which I am compelled to characterise, as anything but patriotic in the Opposition. Since they sat on the Opposition Benches they have attacked and worried every interest of the country and that, gentleman among them who was able to make the strongest statement in illustration of the country's ruin was the one they most loudly cheered. It was not, however, altogether with the intention of answering the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) or the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), that I rose to address the House to-night. I do not see any argument of the latter that demands reply. The hon. gentleman's statements are merely hypothetical and cannot be made the basis of any mathematical proposition or logical refutation ; it is therefore not worth while to talk about them. In the State of Iowa, where I became interested in lands in 1857, when the population was under 300,000, and which contains now a population nearly five times that number—a state comparatively free from debt and burthensome taxation—one of the most important of the Western States, its extensive system of railways which have largely contributed to its rapid growth and its great prosperity, were built almost entirely by land grants and in advance of settlement. This has been the case with nearly all the States of the West having railways running through them in different directions. There is a new line to terminate in Texas, which is now under construction, across the Rocky Mountains and the mountains upon the Californian coast, starting from a point far south of San Francisco. Capitalists of well-known ability have undertaken to construct this line without other advantage or subsidy than a grant of land estimated at eighteen millions of acres. I have here the average price of railway lands sold by the principal railway companies in the United States, up to 1876. I think it fair to take it up to that time, higher prices have since been obtained, but the condition of settlement then came more nearly to that of the North-West now. The Topeka and Santa Fe, $5 an acre; the St. Paul and Minnesota, $6.20; the Northern Pacific, $4.74; Lake Superior and Mississippi $7.50; the Pere Marquette, $8; the Central Pacific, $5.29; the Union Pacific, $4.32, on a grant of 13,000,000 acres; the Kansas Pacific on a grant of 6,000,000 acres, $2.72, the last report of that road being in 1873; the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific, $7.91; the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy, $12.25. It therefore does not seem very rash and reckless to make the calculations given by my right hon. friend, the First Minister., of the value of our lands and the probability of sales. It was not for the purpose, however, of addressing the House on this question, as I have just stated, or upon Mr. Charlton's resolutions alone, that I rose to-night; and perhaps I may be pardoned, if I take a different range, in order to bring forward some statistics on matters of importance to this House and the country. My principal object in now addressing the House, was to call attention to the English labour and food question, and to couple them with the probable settlement of the great North-West. My object was to show that my right hon. friend Sir John A. Macdonald, had no chimerical idea, when he looked upon our great fertile belt in that country, as being the future home of a great community, loyal to the British Crown, and forming perhaps the most important portion of the British Colonial Empire. I have endeavoured to bring important statistics bearing upon the food and labour question together, in such a way, as to present them concisely to the House. I wish to state first, from the data that I shall be able to give, that the culture of wheat, is constantly declining in the United Kingdom, the acreagesown having fallen from 3,831,054 acres in 1871, to 3,381,791 acres in 1878; and to 3,085,428 acres, it is estimated, in 1879. This enormous diminution is caused by large areas of new lands under wheat culture in other parts of the world, coming in successful competition with Britain wheat-growing. The acreage thus taken from wheat culture does not produce any other crop giving the same amount of flesh-forming constituents as that of wheat, 480lb. of which is equal to 550lb. of meat, and 4,800lb. of potatoes. Of course, as long as coal or iron will buy, or will produce what will buy wheat, just so long can the population of Britain be fed. But she is in a peculiar position. She requires not only to import food largely, but she must import great quantities of raw material for her manufactures—more, perhaps, than any other manufacturing country. She imports hemp, jute, silk, cotton, leather, wool, and wood for building purposes, and those imports have to be paid for by exports of manufactures. At a period not very remote, a surplus of food supplies was raised in the kingdom, and large quantities of cereals were exported; but it is now absolutely necessary for England to face the food question as well as the question whether her imports can be increased in proportion to the wants of that class of the population which depend entirely upon manufacturing as distinguished from agricultural pursuits. I shall be able to show figures to sustain what I have said. In 1871 the population of the British Isles was 31,484,661. It is now estimated at 35,000,000. The acreage of wheat in 1871, was 3,831,054; yield 53,620,000 cwts., or 100,024,000 bushels. Wheat imported in 1871, 43,310,000 cwts. or 80,850,000 bushels; consumption, 97,000,000 cwts., or 180,874,000 bushels. Acreage of wheat in 1878, 3,381,701; yield 55,350,000 cwts. or 103,420,000 bushels; wheat imported in 1878, 58,760,000 cwts. or 109,690,000 bushels; consumption 114,110,000 cwts. or 213,110,000 bushels.

MR. PLUMP.

Acreage of wheat in 1879, 3,056,428 acres half a crop estimated; wheat imported in the first ten months of 1879 57,000,000 cwts. or 106,400,000 bushels. Mr. Caird states the yearly present consumption of wheat to be 110,000,000 cwts. or 205,340,000 bushels, of which 55,000,000 or 102,670,000 bushels is imported. Other cereals imported probably supply the place of wheat used for others purposes than human food. Of meat the home product in 1878 was 25,000,000 cwts.; of butter and cheese 3,000,000 cwts.; of milk, 6,000,000, cwts., making an aggregate of home raised animal food of 34,000,000 cwts. Imported meat in 1878 6,000,000, cwts.; imported butter and cheese 4,580,000 cwts.. Total consumption of animal food, 44,580,000 cwts. Potatoes, home grown in 1878, 100,000,000 cwts.; potatoes imported, 850,000 cwts. All these foods vary in life sustaining power in proportion to their richness in flesh-forming constituents. It is calculated that the nutriment contained in 480lb. of wheat is the average-quantity required for each individual of the population; and that 480lb of wheat is equal to 550lb. of meat and 4,800lb. of potatoes. Reduced to a common flesh forming standard and expressed as wheat the consumption of food in 1878 was as follows :

Meat equal to...	21,820,000	5,740,000
Dairy food	8,000,000	3,720,000
Potatoes.....	10,000 000	870,000
	95,170,000	69,090,000

The calculation shows that in 1878 the consumption of wheat was 48½ per cent. home grown, 51½ per cent. imported. Of meat reduced to wheat standard, 79¹⁷/₁₀₀ per cent home grown, 20³³/₁₀₀ per cent. imported. Of dairy food 68²⁵/₁₀₀ per cent home; 31⁷⁴/₁₀₀ per cent. imported and of potatoes, 92 per cent. home, and 8 per cent. imported. In all, 58 per cent. of the total food consumed was produced at home, and 42 per cent. was imported in 1878. The total consumption in 1878 was 164,000,000 cwts.; in 1871, 143,000,000 cwts.; and in 1862, 135,000,000 cwts. Divided among the population at those periods they make, in wheat equivalents, the consumption per capita in 1861, 522lb. ; in 1871 512lb.; in 1878 538lb. allowing 5 per cent. for export the remainder comes very near the calculation of 480lb. of wheat, or its equivalent, for each period. Besides these main articles of food there are minor ones of little comparative importance, namely; eggs, vegetables other than potatoes, fruits, home raised and foreign, and beverages. The value of the total consumption of food in 1878 was estimated at £167,000,000 sterling, made up as the following :

Cereals	60,110,000
Sugar, fruit, &c.....	29,150,000
Alcoholic beverages.....	7,840,000
Other beverages.....	12,080,000
Miscellaneous.....	17,840,000

Total£167,000,000

Allowances are made in the estimate of alcoholic and other beverages for the grain used in their manufacture; its enhanced value in the shape of the beverage is merely given. According to the careful estimate of the great English statistician, Mr. Caird, Britain now derives half its bread and one-fourth of its dairy produce from abroad. Mr. Samuel Bourne, from whose valuable tables I have largely quoted and shall largely quote, estimates that of the 35,000,000 of population which the next census will show in the United Kingdom, at least 17,000,000 must be fed by imported food. A great and deplorable waste of food is its conversion into alcoholic drink. During the twenty years ending in 1876, nearly 30,000,000 hundred weights—55,000,000 bushels—were converted into beer and spirits; enough food was thus absolutely destroyed to support a twelfth part of the inhabitants of the United Kingdom, say 3,000,000 of persons. The question arises whether any changes in the conditions under which the agricultural operations of Great Britain are carried on can increase the food-supply of the Islands. It does not follow that a change in land tenure and a larger investment of capital in agriculture would insure the sustaining of a larger number of people by increased home production. Much would depend on the kind of produce of which the quantity raised would be increased. The potato feeds the greatest number per acre, but it is deficient in giving muscle and capacity for work—in strengthening power. There is but little likelihood that the legumes, although admirably adapted for sustaining life, and giving healthy vigour and tone to the system, will come largely into use, or that anything will take the place of wheat, or depose it from its supremacy as the staff of life in the British Isles; whether because of the weight which each acre will produce as compared with other descriptions of food, or of its fitness for man's consumption. Now, it is certain that wheat is just the kind of crop which is most likely of all to be displaced in Britain, by the introduction into the market of that country, of wheat of foreign growth. We have seen, as I have previously stated, the effect of a cheaper foreign supply in reducing the wheat acreage from 3,821,054 in 1871, to 3,056,428 in 1879, which, allowing an average crop of fifteen bushels an acre, would be equal to a decrease in the crop of eleven millions of bushels. Throwing land out of wheat culture into that of any other description of food, however profitable it may be for the cultivator, lessens the number per acre which the land will feed. In changing it from arable to grazing purposes, eight acres of pasture will only yield as much food as one of wheat. Fruit and vegetables will not contribute anything like the same degree of sustenance, that would be afforded by the wheat, of which they may take the place. Increased population and thriving trade also absorb more land for erection of buildings and means of transit, and for open spaces for recreation. These demands, it is not desirable to limit. Reclamations of waste land may only serve to supply the deficiency thus caused. High farming and improved machinery will not be able to hold ground against the opening up of new areas of wheat culture in other countries, and will be probably applied to those foods which need the largest acreage. On the whole, it is held that it cannot be expected that the life-sustaining power of the soil of Britain will be increased, unless continued adversity drives its people to the use of simpler food. There is every reason for believing that every year will diminish the power to support increasing numbers upon the food raised in the British Isles. They must also resort largely to the produce of other countries to supply raw material for manufactures, for it has been often said that, except in iron and coal, no manufacturing country is more deficient in such material. Cotton, silk and jute are wholly of foreign growth, and flax, leather and wool are largely imported. An average of twelve years shows the value of these articles imported yearly as follows:—

	£	Home consumption. £	Home production. £
Flax...	5,160,000	3,302,000	2,000,000
Jute....	2,470,000	2,190,000
Silk	15,180,000	12,400,000
Wool....	15,550,000	5,060,000	8 500,000
Total ...	£80,500,000	£32,390,000	£10,000,000

For erection of buildings and manufacture of furniture we use foreign woods. From these data it will be found that it will be necessary for British statesmen, gravely and speedily to consider the condition of their country, where the manufacturing population is largely increasing, and where the increase of the agricultural population is almost at a stand still. The manufacturing class must be fed by the export of the manufactures they produce. And we have seen that not only these, but that one-half of the population altogether, now depends on imported food, to pay for which manufacturers must find an export market. At the Census of 1871, out of the 31,484,000 persons who were enumerated, 2,989,154 are classified as agricultural; 6,425,137 as industrial; these numbers include workers' wives and children. Probably the next Census will show an industrial population of 8,000,000, and that of the following decade might give 10,000,000 or 12,000,000. This calculation, and the probabilities of an augmentation in the ratio of increase of population, are justified by a late report of Dr. Farr, the Registrar General, who states that in the most healthy districts of England, during the ten years ending 1870, the mortality was seventeen in the thousand, and the whole number throughout the country was twenty-two deaths in the thousand. He argues that the death rate will decrease, and that consequently there will be a much more rapid increase in population in the future, owing to better hygienic and sanitary regulations. To feed the population thus increasing, at the end of the next decade, will require the export trade to be doubled or tripled, and every branch of manufacturing industry extended 50 per cent. The exports of the Kingdom arrived at their maximum in 1872, but the imports did not do so until 1877. Since 1878 both have been decreasing. It is claimed that what is called the balance of trade is entirely fictitious. The gross sums returned as the amounts of exports and imports it is said, and truly said, do not truly represent their values, and that the amount paid for imports is less than their valuation by the profit on freight, commissions, etc., and that in the same way, more is received for exports than their entered cost on departure. The following tables show the official values of imports and exports for twelve years, with a revision, taking into account the added or diminished values just alluded to :—

The foregoing figures represent millions sterling, and show an apparent balance of £1,050,000,000 of imports over exports since 1867, which the revised figures in the last columns reduce to £504,000,000, of which it will be observed that £390,000,000 has accrued since 1873. It was contended by the extreme school of political economists which our opponents blindly follow, that the imports, however much in excess, must be really paid for by the exports, and, therefore, that the balance only shows the profit that accrues from the exchange. Some of our ultra-Free traders have gone so far as to say; that the more a country buys the richer she grows. The events of the last few years, however, and the extreme depression of trade, must surely convince any but the most obstinate theorists of the fallacy of this contention. It is now generally admitted, the member for Bothwell and his confreres, to the contrary notwithstanding, that England has been liquidating her balances by the sale of the bonds and securities acquired during prosperous years, and in fact that the English people are paying out their hoarded savings. The recent rise in the Bank rate is due to the apprehension that the United States which, owing to the protective system, buy little or nothing from England, will demand gold for the food they are called upon to supply, having regained possession of the bonds and securities which they formerly sold to England. In 1867 the aggregate exports of England exceeded her importations of food by £80,000,000; last year the excess was but £26,000,000, a sum quite insufficient to pay for the raw material of foreign production worked up into the manufactures exported. In short, the whole product of British labour and capital employed in industries for exportation fail to realise enough to pay for the food she imports for home consumption. Let the figures be examined, and their import scrutinised in whatever way you will, and the conclusion is still irresistible that, at the present moment England is unable to provide food for her own people either from the produce of her own soil, or by the exchange of her manufactures and produce. It will be argued that these times are not a fair criterion, that there will be again a flood of prosperity, that the savings of the past will tide her over the ebb, and that the depression is universal. In other countries trading and manufacturing companies are the minority, in England the majority. England, essentially a productive and commercial nation, has been the manufactory of the world, but is every day becoming less exclusively so, since other nations have discovered that they possess the same sources of mineral wealth. It is perfectly evident also from the figures under consideration, that the profits of previous years have been expended for the purchase of raw material, and of the food necessary to feed the English population. Then comes the question as to whether the revival of trade will restore England's position. It may be said that England is really a nation of producers, a nation of workers, a nation of manufacturers. From her vast stores of coal and iron, and owing the rapid development of other countries, who purchased largely from her, she had great stimulus given to her industries, but it is not believed that that prosperity can permanently return, and it is not possible that she can double or treble her export trade in order to provide food for her increased population. Other countries have discovered that they have the resources which made England rich and strong, and have adopted protective measures for the encouragement of their own manufactures and the exclusion of hers. Some scheme of disposing of the rapidly increasing surplus population must, if it has not already done so, impose itself upon English statesmen, and the necessity of the hour in the next decade will be to consider how that population shall be provided for. Thoughtful men are studying these facts and conclusions, and are asking whether it is desirable that the kingdom shall be converted into a vast and overcrowded workshop, with all the evils which now are attendant upon densely populated centres, enormously increased. Shall the British people be pent up within narrow limits which shall be hot-beds of discontent, where ill-fed, ill-clothed, ill-disciplined, ill-taught masses shall be ripe for the harvest of the demagogue—a constantly increasing mob, who can scarcely be blamed if they cannot be kept within the restraints of law and order during the periodical revulsions of trade that must occur—that can scarcely be blamed if they listen to the persuasions of the Communist or the Nihilist in a country where the contrast between wealth and misery is ever before them. In such seething masses the instincts of self-preservation will survive all other impulses except perhaps the appeal of starving wives and children. Is it true philanthropy, or true policy, or true statesmanship to wait till such a state of things has grown to proportions so appalling that they refuse to be dealt with. What then shall be the manifest duty of the governing classes? Let us see. Sir, I have produced these elaborate and somewhat tedious groups of figures for the purpose of showing the House the position England will occupy when she finds it is absolutely necessary to meet the great food question; when she will be compelled to ascertain whether she can enlarge her own agricultural fields of labour; whether she can manufacture so cheaply as to be able to force her manufactures upon other countries, and thereby obtain the food necessary for her people. Some think it has been well established, as I have stated, that she cannot enlarge her food products. Shall she, then, meet the case by an enlightened system of deporting her population—sending out an advance guard of the best and strongest, who can be induced to emigrate, to prepare the way for a further emigration of her labourers and artisans, who shall thus be rescued from squalor, misery, and poverty, and carried to a land where they can find happy homes, and the prospect of a new life. Suppose it were possible, by some great convulsion of nature, suggests Sir Julius Vogel, that a continent should be upheaved on the west coast of Ireland, containing all the elements for the best development of society; that the climate would require labour, as the first necessity and the greatest boon, that can be given man; a climate that would not enervate but strengthen the system, and best develop the physical as well as the moral condition of the inhabitants; suppose it were a virgin soil, offered broadcast, and almost free of cost, to the whole people of the United Kingdom, how long would it be before the new land would be covered by an industrious population, bringing with them all the appliances and improvements of agriculture, manufactures, art and science. Wealth would flow into it and would build cities, and cultivate farms, and construct railways, and supply means of education, and furnish luxuries of all kinds, and everything that denotes progress in the better state of civilization—all these, the result of labour and capital, would spring up like Aladdin's palace, like a dream, or an exhalation of the morning, but not like them to fade suddenly away. Yet, such a continent is practically what is offered to England to-day by the great North-West, which has been, as it were, discovered but yesterday—a country which now offers the solution of the difficulty in which England is soon to be placed. That great country which was unknown five years ago, except to the Hudson's Bay employes, or the Indian trapper, or the pioneer who ventured at the hazard of his life across the illimitable prairies, is now, as one may say, a continent risen up beside the Green Isle which needs it to redeem its starving millions. That country is practically as near to England to-day, by the great improvements in navigation, by the telegraph cable which flashes news beneath the Atlantic, as Lands End was to Inverness thirty years ago; as near, almost, as London was to Edinburgh forty years ago. It is offered to England. She will, within a few years, need to choose whether she will allow her festering masses to live on in squalid poverty in her great manufacturing centres, or to say to them, I will give you homes in our own territory, under our own meteor flag, where you can be safe beneath its protecting ægis. Let me read, Sir, the eloquent words of Mr. Bourne, to whom I am largely indebted for the statements I have now made, which were listened to with approval and applause, at a late meeting of the Royal Colonial Institute, presided over by the Right Hon. W. E. Forster, in the absence of the chairman, the Duke of Manchester, and attended by a very large number of distinguished persons:

"One other motive which should induce the Mother Country to foster the further colonisation of her dependencies remains to be noticed—it is the sense of responsibility arising from the relationship in which she stands towards them. It is not only that her own soil fails to provide sufficient for the wants of her growing population; that there seems little likelihood of greater or improved cultivation increasing her produce to the necessary extent; that our manufacturing and trading operations which have hitherto procured supplies from abroad, now fail to keep pace with the growth of those whom they have to support, and our producing power appears to be overtaking the demands of our customers. These are urgent reasons why we should send forth a large number of our people. It is not only that the conditions of existence which have grown up amongst us, the modes of life fostered alternately by inflated prosperity and seasons of depression, require the breaking up of many connections, the changing of many habits, the infusion of new life into the several classes of society; these offer many inducements to place our people in altered circumstances, and to surround them with new influences. Neither is it solely because by the diffusion of our people, the fresh start they may make, and the development of multiplied life, there is much wealth to be gained. These are encouragements to the occupation of new lands and the enlargement of our intercourse with the natives occupying many of our possessions. It is that, above all these, there should be the conviction that we have solemn duties to perform and sacred trusts to execute.

"If we trace the various means by which England has become lord of the vast territories which already own our Sovereign's sway, and those which it seems we cannot avoid acquiring—at one time by right of discovery, and another by that of conquest; at others for the purpose of restoring order or preserving peace; at one period in pursuance of selfish policy dictated by the greed of gain; at another from motives of the purest philanthropy and the most earnest desire to benefit those whom we have brought under control—we cannot fail to see that it is neither by accident nor for useless ends that we have thus been led to appropriate so vast a portion of the earth's surface. Whatever our past policy may have been, we cannot ignore our present obligations, nor refuse to admit our responsibilities in the future. Whether for good or evil the burden rests upon us, and we cannot cast it off. The destinies of many nations are in our keeping and the peopling of many countries at our disposal. If we have been enabled to settle our own freedom on a firm foundation, we have to secure the same liberty and give the same relief to those who are as yet unable to claim, or unfit to exercise the full privileges of British subjects. If we have drawn to our shore the wealth created in our Colonies, or obtained by trade from other nations, we have to employ our capital in fostering commerce and manufactures for their benefit. If we have arrived at so great a knowledge of, and obtained so great a mastery over the powers by which the earth's products may be utilised, we have to impart these gifts to those who are yet in ignorance, and therefore in poverty. If we have joined the ends of the earth together for our own convenience we have to unite the whole of our possessions together, and to ourselves, by yet closer links, and more enduring ties. If we are in the enjoyment of all the comforts and benefits which a high state of civilization confers, we have to train our dependent to secure the same advantages. If the principles and the practices of morality are to prevail, we must introduce them where they are unknown, and fill our lands with those who will aid in their propagation. If we ourselves are blessed with the light of religious truth, we must strive to cast the reflection of that light over the dark places of the earth, and seek to raise up a seed to serve Him by whom it has been bestowed. These are solemn duties we dare not decline; glorious privileges we would not lose. * * * *

I have spoken of the necessity imposed upon the Mother Country, that she should extend and perfect the colonisation of her numerous possessions, but is it not equally a necessity to those possessions that they should be fully colonised? She has more than an abundance; they, with few exceptions, a paucity of population. She is unable to raise her own food; they can raise more than they can consume. She has a plethora of wealth which seeks employment in foreign lands; they have need of more than she can give to develop their untold resources. She has the knowledge, the refinement, the treasures of art and science, accumulated in the course of the years that have past; they have yet to obtain these invaluable possessions in the years that are to come. The necessity is mutual; let both be gainers by its being met and supplied. These are considerations which can no longer be neglected or evaded. They force themselves upon us in our homes and our offices, in solitude and society, in the palace and the hovel; they will tax our intellects and should lie near our hearts. When these sentiments prevail, and—presumptuous though it may be in me to say so—not till then, will there be any solid return of national prosperity. Whosoever they are held by the leaders of public opinion, and responded to alike by the voice of those at home and those in our colonies, the work will be received as the most important that can occupy public attention, and all together will join in its performance—then the most important and influential member will not be the Minister, who sits in the Home Office not the one who presides over war—nor even he who rules the Exchequer, but the honoured individual into whose hands Her most Gracious Majesty commits the affairs of the Colonial Office.”

That, Sir, is the line of argument pursued and accepted by representative men in England, and I claim that it bears directly upon the question of the settlement of the great North-West. That is largely a solution of the question that must press itself upon the attention of parties in England, no matter which may be in power. Notwithstanding there has been a change in the Government, to the regret of many, the same obligation to deal with this question rests upon the new Administration whatever statesmen may be at the helm. The day is far distant when that narrow and selfish policy will again prevail which ruled prior to 1865 and 1866. The colonies and appanages of Great Britain are now considered among the true sources of her greatness. Every dispassionate man in the House and country believes that no greater and truer source of power lies in the grasp of England to-day, than the settlement of the great North-West upon the principles to which I have referred. It was no dream of the present Dominion Government that the Pacific Railway could be constructed out of the proceeds of our own lands; no dream when the hon. the Premier read those statistics, which were received with incredulity, almost with scorn, by the hon. gentlemen in Opposition. The calculations of the Government are justified by the statistics and facts I have given. I believe that, under the providence of God, the great North-West is destined to play a most important part in the history of civilization, and in the destinies of the British Empire. Nothing, I repeat, could more conduce to the greatness of England than to send us her yeomen—an advance guard of the best, strongest, and most intelligent of her population. When the strong come here, they will provide homes for the weak—for those who cannot come as pioneers, and that the strong will come, anyone who reads the report of the delegation of the English tenant-farmers' may be perfectly certain. Those reports, made without partiality or prejudice, made by men who are not the hired tonters for land companies or railway men, who came here to see the country for themselves, who went where they liked and drew their own conclusions, cannot be read or heard in Britain without producing great effect upon the people whom they addressed. My hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) has suggested that it would be imprudent and improper to permit large capitalists to go into the North-West and there acquire extensive tracts of lands—even though they will settle upon and, perhaps, cultivate those lands. There can be no better policy than to encourage such settlers. They will give employment in the meantime to men who may not be able to purchase or settle, who will take up land afterwards and establish comfortable homes for themselves. Many of the English tenant farmers purchased lands when in the North-West, and have unanimously recommended it as a most favourable country for enterprising men, not afraid of work; and to men of capital they say, there is no place where a better investment can be made. Those indisposed to face the hardships of a new country, may find in Ontario or the Eastern Townships that they can buy the fee simple of excellent farms for a sum per acre not exceeding two or three years' rental in the United Kingdom. There has been a studied attempt, Sir, on the part of the Opposition, which cannot be too emphatically and severely characterised, to decry the value and availability of the vast territory in question, which was acquired for Canada through the far-seeing statesmanship of my right hon. friend (Sir John A. Macdonald). Permit me, in support of my argument and of the conclusions which, I trust, are warranted by it, to read extracts from a letter written and published by Mr. J. W. Taylor, the Consul of the United States at Winnipeg, who is considered an indisputable authority :

"A comparative statement of temperatures at St. Paul, Winnipeg and Battleford, for the first months of the current year, including April, having been published by me and noticed in the Pioneer Press, I assume that your readers will be interested in a similar statement for the year ending July, 1879, to which I have added the monthly observations at Toronto.

"These positions are as follows .

	N. Lat.	W. Long.
Toronto	43.39	79.23
St. Paul	44.52	93.05
Winnipeg	49.50	96.20
Battleford	52.30	109.00

"It will be convenient to refer to latitudes as Toronto, 44 degrees ; St Paul, 45 degrees ; Winnipeg, 50 degrees ; Battleford, 53 degrees. The place last named is situated on the Saskatchewan river, and is the capital of the North-West Territory of Canada, as the vast district west of Manitoba (longitude 99 degrees) to the Rocky Mountains is now known geographically and politically.

"A statement of mean temperature during the agricultural season from April to August inclusive, exhibits the following proportions :— Toronto, 57 degrees, 65 minutes ; St. Paul, 65 degrees, 5 minutes ; Winnipeg, 58 degrees, 19 minutes ; Battleford, 58 degrees, 53 minutes. Thus it will be seen that the climate, in its relation to agriculture, is warmer in Manitoba and over territory seven hundred miles north-west, than in the most central districts of Ontario ; while St. Paul, in latitude 45 degrees, is 7 degrees, 40 minutes warmer than the vicinity of Toronto, in latitude 44 degrees.

"I hope soon to be in possession of similar statistics at Fort McMurray on the Athabasca river, and Fort Vermillion on Peace river, respectively 1,000 and 1,200 miles due north-west of Winnipeg, and I have full confidence that the climate at these points will not be materially different from Battleford. The altitude of the Athabasca and Peace river district is less, and the tread of the Pacific winds through the Rocky Mountains is more marked than at Battleford. It was on the banks of the Peace river, well up in latitude 60 degrees, that Sir Alexander Mackenzie records, on the 10th of May, the grass so well grown that buffalo, attended by their young, were cropping the uplands.

"But I find my best illustration that the climate is not materially different west of Lake Athabasca, in latitude 60 degrees, than we experience west of Lake Superior in latitude 46 degrees, in some personal observations of the north-western extension of wheat cultivation. In 1871, Mr. Archibald, the well-known proprietor of the Dundas mills, in southern Minnesota, visited Manitoba. He remarked that the spring wheat in his vicinity was deteriorating—softening, and he sought a change of seed, to restore its flinty texture. He timed his visit to Winnipeg with the harvest and found the quality of grain he desired, but the yield astonished him. 'Look,' said he, with a head of wheat in his hand, 'We have had an excellent harvest in Minnesota, but I never saw more than two well-formed grains in each group or cluster, forming a row, but here the rule is three grains in each cluster. That is the difference between twenty and thirty bushels per acre.' More recently, Prof. Macoun, the botanist of the Canadian Pacific Railway survey, has shown me two heads of wheat, one from Prince Albert, a settlement near the forks of the Saskatchewan, latitude 53 degrees, longitude 106 degrees ; and another from Fort Vermillion, on Peace River latitude 59 degrees, longitude 116 degrees, and from each cluster of the two I separated five well formed grains, with a corresponding length of the head. Here was the perfection of the wheat plant, attained according to the well-known physical law, near the most northern limit of its successful growth.

"The line of equal mean temperatures, especially for the season of vegetation between March and October, instead of following lines of latitude, bends from the Mississippi valley far to the north, carrying the zone of wheat from Minnesota away to the 60th parallel in the valley of the Peace River, and reproducing the summer heats of New Jersey and southern Pennsylvania in Minnesota and Dakota, and those of northern Pennsylvania and Ohio in the valley of the Saskatchewan. * * * Within the isothermal lines that inclose the zone west and north-west of Minnesota, which is being or is soon to be opened to cultivation, lies a vast area of fertile lands from which might easily be cut out a dozen new States of the size of New York.

"I assigned Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and even southern Minnesota to the zone specially adapted to corn, as the more southern states constitute a cotton zone ; and observing the imperative natural restrictions in the Mississippi valley upon the successful production of wheat, I hazarded the statement that three-fourths of the wheat producing belt of North America would be north of the international boundary. This arithmetical division has since been questioned by the Pioneer Press.

"I will venture to illustrate the climatic influences which control the problem under consideration, by some citations from 'Minnesota: Its place among the States. By J. A. Wheelock, Commissioner of Statistics,' which, though published in 1860, is all the more an authority for the confirmation of twenty years. The general law of limitation to the profitable cultivation of wheat is thus luminously stated: 'The wheat producing district of the United States is confined to about ten degrees of latitude and six degrees of longitude, terminating on the west at the 98th parallel. But the zone of its profitable culture occupies a comparative narrow belt along the cool borders of the district defined for inland positions by the mean temperature of fifty-five degrees on the north and seventy-one degrees on the south, for the two months of July and August. This definition excludes all the country lying south of latitude forty degrees, except western Virginia, and north of that it excludes the southern districts of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and Iowa, while it includes the northern part of these states, Canada, New York, Western Virginia, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota and the Red River and Saskatchewan valleys. In general terms, it may be stated that the belt of maximum wheat production lies immediately north of the districts where the maximum of Indian corn is attained.' * * *

"Will the great interior of the continent contribute to our exportations of wheat and its flour? I refer to the territorial organisations of Montana, Idaho, Wyoming, Colorado, Utah and Nevada. Let us take the most favoured of all, Montana. Grand as are its resources, I am constrained to believe that only one-thirteenth of its surface is within reach of the unavoidable condition of irrigation, and that the mountains, with their mineral wealth, and the uplands as grazing grounds for cattle and sheep, will be the chief theatres of industrial activity. After careful enquiry in 1868, as United States Commissioner of mining statistics, I committed myself to the following statement: 'The area of the territory (Montana) is 146,689 35-100 square miles, equal to 93,881,184 acres—nearly the same as California, three times the area of New York, two and a-half that of New England, and yet no greater proportion is claimed by local authorities as susceptible of cultivation than one acre in thirty, or a total of 3,346,400 acres. Of course a far greater surface will afford sustenance to domestic animals. The limit to agriculture, as in Colorado and New Mexico, is the possibility of irrigation.' * * *

It is the crowning feature of the 'fertile belt' which broadens with reduced altitudes and constant air currents from the Pacific coast, that the immense trapezoid, whose apex is bounded on the Mackenzie, has a sufficient quantity of summer rains for all the purposes of agriculture as organised in the Atlantic and Mississippi States.

"I have no pride of opinion as to the accuracy of an impromptu estimate of proportions north or south of the boundary. I would cheerfully waive it, confessing to an arithmetical inaccuracy, if assured of a general acceptance of the opinion with which the article of the Pioneer Press concludes, namely, that 'in the Hudson Bay Territory, outside of the old Provinces, 200,000,000 acres are adapted to wheat raising.' That admission is more than enough to justify a railroad policy, which will push, within ten years, the locomotive from Winnipeg fully 1,200 miles beyond its present bourne on Red River."

Now, Sir, let us hear what was said by Mr. James Biggar, a delegate of the tenant farmers from the Stewartry of Kircudbright, Scotland, upon his return from Canada, at a meeting in the Town Hall, Castle Douglas, on the 22nd December last:

"As a field for wheat raising I would much prefer Manitoba to Dakota. The first cost of land is less; the soil is deeper and will stand more cropping; the sample of wheat is better, and the produce five to ten bushels per acre more, all of which is profit; and as soon as the new railway is opened the cost of delivering it at the seaboard will be the same or less. The average crop of the United States is surprisingly low, the returns for a good many states being as low as twelve to fourteen bushels per acre; this evidently does not pay the grower, and many are therefore giving up wheat, and going in more for other branches of farming. Much of the wheat producing land in the east being thus, for a time at least, exhausted, supplies will have to come from the virgin soils of the west; and as these are rapidly undergoing the same process, the farmers of the United States will, before very many years, be very much on a level with the farmers of this country. The virgin soils of Canada are, however, much more extensive, and will probably be able to send us wheat when the United States have ceased to be an exporting country. We saw land which had been in wheat from thirty-five to fifty years, and took samples of the wheat soil and subsoil. We also saw some first-rate turnips. We did not see any signs of manure being applied, though we saw manure heaps, the accumulation of twenty years. As there is no decrease of crops the natives do not think it necessary to use manure yet. On the whole, I was favourably impressed with Manitoba, and the other delegates whom I met expressed the same opinion. No one who sees the immense extent of fertile soil and the excellence of its products can doubt for a moment that there is a great future before that country."

Mr. Biggar states that wheat in Manitoba was selling at 70c. a bushel, leaving good profit to the grower, and, at that price, would cost, delivered in England, about 4s. 6d. a bushel, a price which would not pay the English farmer for raising wheat at home.

"As a field for money-making and enterprise we consider the North-West decidedly the best part of the Dominion; and those who are willing to face the difficulties and disadvantages of pioneer life—difficulties and disadvantages which will be rapidly overcome, and which are nothing to those which the early settlers in Ontario had to contend with—have every prospect of success and independence. It would be a great mistake to suppose that I recommend Manitoba to all who think of emigrating. The propriety of going there depends very much on the means and habits of the emigrant; but young people with health, energy, and some means, accustomed to work, would certainly improve their position and do well. There are many families, too, who may be working as hard here, without making things any better, as they would have to do there, for whom the change would be a good one.”

Referring to improved farms in Ontario, which he thinks a certain class of intending emigrants would do well to purchase, he says :

“We visited Niagara, and were much impressed with the grandeur and magnificence of the falls. The surrounding country is very fine and largely devoted to the growing of fruit. The neighbourhood of Grimsby and St. Catherine's are also famous for apples, some farmers growing 2,000 to 4,000 barrels, worth 6s per barrel. The whole of the western peninsula of Ontario is fine, and we would have liked to visit the counties of Kent, Huron, Wellington, Grey and Bruce, all of which are fine lands, but the ground being covered with an early fall of snow, we had to give up that idea. A fine stretch of land lies all the way from Kent to Lake Huron; the County of Huron being recently settled, land is cheaper than in other districts, and very good land can be bought at £5 to £10 per acre. East of Toronto, along Lake Ontario, there is some good land, especially in the neighbourhood of Markham, Whitby, and Port Hope, prices reaching £16 to £20 per acre. The land round the bay of Quinte, is considered the finest barley soil in Canada, and large quantities of barley are grown and exported to the United States. Some farmers here grow barley on half their farm, and keep very little stock. The crop ranges from 30 to 50 bushels per acre, worth 5s to 70 cents.

“We have already noticed Manitoba, and may now confine our remarks to the older Provinces. Of these Ontario and the Eastern Townships of Quebec impressed us very favourably. A great deal of Western Ontario would compare very favourably with some parts of England. The land is good and fairly managed, there is a nice proportion of timber, and the farmers' houses are in many cases exceedingly neat and comfortable. They have, in fact, an air of refinement and prosperity beyond what we expected in a comparatively new country. We believe it would be hard to find in any country of similar size so many men who have done as well as Ontario farmers. Many who went out thirty to forty years ago with nothing, now own farms and stock worth £2,000 to £6,000.”

Another delegate, Mr. George Cowan, of Wigtownshire, says of the farm of Mr. Kenneth Mackenzie; a Scotch emigrant, who settled first in Guelph, Ontario, and thence removed to Manitoba, where he is the proprietor of about 18,000 acres :

“I was certainly surprised at the wonderful fertility of the soil, which is a rich black loam, averaging about eighteen inches of surface soil, on friable clay subsoil, five and six feet in depth, beneath which is a thin layer of sand, lying on a stiff clay. The land is quite dry, and is well watered by a fine stream which flows through it.

I went over a large field of 180 acres on which had been grown this year a heavy crop of wheat and barley, this season's crop was the ninth in succession without any manure; indeed it appeared to me that it would not require any for many years to come, and that its fertility could be renewed at any time by bringing up an inch or so of new soil. It was quite a sight, and would gladden the heart of any farmer, to have seen the various stackyards on the farm, taking into account the comparatively limited quantity of land at present broken up. Mr. Mackenzie, when turning over the virgin soil in the early summer, merely pares the surface, he then backsets the furrow after harvest, ploughing about a depth of three inches, turning over a very broad furrow, varying from twelve to sixteen inches in width, and so far he has not yet exceeded a depth of four inches on any of his land. He considers the fertility of his land is practically inexhaustible, as in his opinion the friable clay underneath the surface soil, after a little exposure to the action of the atmosphere, will be as fertile as that above it. With respect to the yield of his crop, he favoured me with his average for the seasons of 1877 and 1878, and his estimate for the present year; these were as follows :—Wheat crop, 1877, averaged 41 bushels; 1878, 36 bushels; this year he expects it to be close on 40 bushels per acre. The variety grown is called Rife wheat, which has a hard, flinty plump kernel, reddish in colour. The average weight is from 60 to 62 lbs., but has grown it as high as 64 lbs. per bushel. His estimate of the oat crop for this year is from 75 to 80 bushels per acre, weighing from 34 to 35 lbs.; last year he had a yield of 83 bushels from two bushels of seed sown on an acre; has grown potato oats of 42 lbs. and upwards, but considers he is better paid by the extra yield from the black tartarian. His barley this year he expects will be from 40 to 45 bushels, of from 50 to 52 lbs.; the variety sown is 6-rowed. He drills his seed in as follows :—1½ to 2 bushels wheat, 2 bushels of oats, and 2 of barley per acre. The wheat is sown from 15th April to 12th May, oats up to the 25th May, and barley from 24th May to 8th and 10th June. Reaping generally takes place in August. The Manitoba wheat is much prized by millers in the United States for its superior quality, and brings the highest price in the market.

During our drive along the Red River to the Springs we passed through the well-known Kildonan settlement, one of the oldest in the province, and which was settled on as far back as 1812 by a colony of Scotchmen taken out by the late Earl of Selkirk. The soil in this district, bordering on the Red River, is a loamy clay of great depth and very fertile. The crop this season had of course been gathered long before the period of my visit, but the strong and thick stubbles showed that it had been a good one; and I was told that it would average at least 28 or 30 bushels of wheat per acre.

* * * I was very highly impressed with the fertility of the soil, some of it being without exception the richest I have ever seen, and I have little doubt it will continue for many years to produce excellent crops of grain without any manure, and with very little expense in cultivation; and I would say to any one blessed with health and strength, who is possessed of moderate means, and who is of sober and industrious habits, that in Manitoba or the North-West he would have no difficulty in realising a competency in a very short time, and in many cases, in a few years, a fortune. For example, 160 acres of land is now being offered by the Canadian Government free on the condition of settlement, and 160 acres more at a price that would not amount to one year's rental of very moderate land in this country. Of taxation, meantime, there is almost none. * * *

I will only further remark, that in my opinion, a very great future awaits Manitoba, and the Canadian North-West. Its boundless prairies will soon be brought under cultivation, and when opened up by railways, and also by water communication through the Hudson Bay direct to this country, it will become the granary of the world."

Mr. Gordon, of Annandale, says :

"I now come to the important questions—Is Canada the place to emigrate to? and, if so, which of her Provinces is the most desirable? The first question I will answer in the affirmative, (1) because of its boundless extent of cheap and at the same time fertile lands; (2) because of its proximity to our own country, and therefore to the best market in the world! (3) because of the similarity of its people to ourselves; and (4) because of its loyal allegiance to the British flag. The second I will leave you to decide for yourselves, after pointing out shortly the advantages and disadvantages of each Province as I was able to discover them. The capital required varies, of course, according to the system adopted and the district chosen, and may be roughly estimated at from £3 to £30 an acre. This includes the first cost of the land. After that, of course, there is no rent to pay. Land, however, can be bought to be paid in a certain number of years, with interest on the unpaid portion. * * *

Then, gentlemen, if any of you can make up your minds to leave the shores of your native land to find a home on Canadian soil—if you can make up your minds to face the inconveniences and hardships I have endeavoured to portray—and if you come to the conclusion from these remarks of mine, and from information you have gathered or can gather from other sources, that you can better your position by going there, I may tell you that you will go to reside among a people in whose veins runs the blood of your own ancestors—a people strong in the hope that a great destiny awaits their country—a people peaceable and law-abiding—a people of like aspirations with yourselves in social and intellectual life, who will extend to you the right hand of fellowship with a vigour and an earnestness which will cause you almost to blush."

Mr. Elliot, of Stow, says :

"The Dominion of Canada, from the energetic nature of its people and boundless resources of every kind, has a great future before it. With regard to farmers emigrating to the Province of Ontario, or the Eastern Townships, Province of Quebec, I have not the slightest hesitation in recommending them to do so; as I am satisfied from what I saw, that men with moderate capital could do better than at home; and that for several reasons. In the first place, you can buy and stock a farm for little more than it takes to stock one at home; then there is no rent to pay, and taxes are very light; they do not exceed from 4d. to 10d. per acre, according to the value of the property."

Mr. George Hutchinson, of Penrith says :

"The great wealth of the Dominion of Canada undoubtedly is in her soil. Although only a new country as compared with others, she is already well-known as a great meat and corn producing country. There is not, I believe, a more contented man in the world than the owner of this soil; he may not have command of as much capital as some English farmers, nor does he keep his land in such a high state of cultivation, yet the land he works is his own, his taxes are light, and as a rule he is a happy and independent man. * * * To the labourer or farm servant who may think of going to Canada with little spare cash after his passage is paid I will say, you will find plenty of employment in Ontario or the Eastern Provinces at about the same wages as at home, if employed by the year, and in Manitoba at a little more, with the prospect before you of free education for your children and the probability of becoming by industry and perseverance your own proprietor even of a farm. As will be seen by the Land Regulations the Government make you the offer of 160 acres of land free, only I think a man without some capital would be better at first to hire himself to others.

"To the farmer with from £200 to £500 in his pocket, who may think of going to Canada, I would say, you will find plenty of partially cleared farms for sale at all prices, and I would advise you to look well about you ere you buy, as you will be one the worse of even a year in the country working to others, and if willing to rough it a little for a time, by all means go to the North-West at once, and I am pretty sure you would soon find yourself not only your own laird, but independent.

"To the farmer with capital, I would only say, if he be well at home and have no cause to change, he should remain; only if anxious to try to better his condition more quickly and independently than he is likely to do at home for some time to come in farming, he will find either in Manitoba or Lower Canada, plenty of scope for his energies, and a good deal more interest for his money. He will find himself surrounded by his own countrymen, go where he will, all anxious for the prosperity of their adopted country, and all loyal sons of their Mother Country."

The testimony of all the delegates was to the same effect as that which I have produced. It is in regard to statistics and statements like those that I have brought forward that the visit of the Commissioners and tenant farmers to our country becomes of incalculable importance, and I cannot but wonder at the persistence with which gentlemen possessed of any spark of patriotism still cling to a partisan and narrow view of our position, and endeavour to decry the advantages which we offer in aid of the solution of the grave and pressing question which is forcing itself upon the attention of British statesmen, and eventually override all party topics. I trust, however, that nothing that I have said will be construed to intimate in the least degree that there is any sign of decadence in the prestige and power of Britain.

Of bringing heroes forth."

I cannot doubt, Sir, that under God, the United Kingdom is destined to continue in ever-increasing degree the great centre and treasure-house from which will be disseminated the beneficent principles of religion, of liberty, of law and of philanthropy, which have made the English name honoured and revered wherever those great chief elements of the highest development of the human race are recognised and understood; and that no unimportant part in seconding the extension of those principles is to be played by the illimitable region which it is our mission to present to the Mother Country as a home for her overcrowded millions. The magnitude of the subject, and the momentous consequences that logically may be deduced from the facts that I have presented, cannot fail to arrest the serious attention of the country, and of the representatives of the people who are sent by them to this House as a Committee to look to the interest of the Dominion. I am aware that I have presented it very hastily and imperfectly, but if it has obtained a hearing, I shall not have spoken in vain; and in view of all that I have shown, I cannot believe that we shall not be able to utilise our resources in such a way as to carry our railway policy to successful completion without adding to burthens of taxation which, I may say, in passing, are light compared to those of any other country which offers inducements for emigration. It seems cowardice to imagine that, with all those resources, and with the credit of the Dominion improved and improving, through the declaration that the Government intend to vigorously prosecute this work, we should not be able to complete it and fulfil our engagements. If it is not desirable in regard to the execution of our engagements, or on other grounds than our inability to complete it, convince us of the fact—there would be some force in that argument. But, to say, that the Dominion cannot do what three men did in California, who built a line across the Sierra Nevada, a far more formidable route than that through the Cascades and Rocky Mountains in British territory—would imply that we do not deserve the advantages promised by such an enterprise, and we certainly do not, if we have not the courage to grapple with it manfully. I assert, Mr. Speaker, that the half-hearted policy which has characterised hon. gentlemen on the opposite side from the very first, is indicative of what they intend now to press in this House. I believe that within a few days we shall have that policy defined. I trust the remarks that I have made in respect to the position which England must necessarily occupy to this great West, may have some influence on hon. gentlemen on this side in sustaining our friends in their arduous undertaking. This undertaking is made more arduous by the unpatriotic conduct of the Opposition, as manifested by the hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the land policy of the Government to-day. It has been made difficult by the constant endeavours of my hon. friends on the other side to belittle and deride the resources of the country. It has been made difficult by the persistent efforts of the Opposition to prevent the due development of the prosperity of this country; to obstruct the policy of the country by their threats that, if they unfortunately succeed to power they will reverse that policy. Capital is sensitive, and business men who are just now rising from the commercial depression are met at this moment by representations that the country is in a state of ruin, that the policy we have adopted is a disastrous one, and that the hon. gentlemen on the other side are pledged to reverse it. They may take that position and we will take ours. I believe they will be perfectly powerless to prevent the prosperity which is coming upon the country. Nobody pretended it was to come in a day. It is childish to talk about a great public policy being adopted at night and showing its results the next morning. I am surprised that those gentlemen are so fatuous as to commit themselves to that position, for I assure them we will hold them to it to the very letter. I desire to say also, that there is nothing speculative or exaggerated in the statements that have been made as to the power of the great North-West to enable us to construct the Pacific Railway. The land in that country, if it is properly utilised, and if we can have anything like fair play from the hon. gentlemen on the opposite side, will enable us to bring to a successful completion the work which they have left upon our hands. The hon. gentlemen changed the whole character of our obligations. They were not bound by them, they need not have gone on with this work, but they chose to assume it as a Government work. It is not long ago since I had an opportunity of showing to this House the manner in which my hon. friend the late Minister of Public Works, now leading the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie) had done his part of the work in respect to the contracts between Kaministiquia and Red River. We have his burthensome legacy on our hands, and I believe we shall be able to sustain it. I was glad to hear to-night the encouraging words uttered by the right hon. the Premier (Sir John A. Macdonald.) The whole House on our side—the great majority—responded to him as one man, and will sustain him as one man. My hon. friends have reckoned without their host, if they suppose that they can bring forward any resolution which will deter our hon. friends on the Treasury Benches, from carrying out the scheme which they have taken upon themselves; my

hon. friends are mistaken if they supposed they will find any weakening on this side of the House in respect to that policy. They will find the Conservative party a unit on that question, and the day is far distant I trust, when any disturbance can be made in its ranks, either in this House or the country, by the resolutions now brought forward, or any other resolution which is promised to us, no matter how it may be intended to catch the ear or effect the judgment of gentlemen who are working with us. We know where we stand, and I believe we shall be able to show the hon. gentleman how egregiously they have been mistaken in the disposition of the country and of this House, to sustain my right hon. friend and his colleagues in the liberal and enlightened policy they have adopted for the development of the North-West, and the construction of the Pacific Railway in the best and truest interests of this Dominion, and of the fair land beyond the sea, to which she owes and yields the truest and most unchanging fealty.

MR. TROW: It was not my intention until this morning to say anything on this subject. I do not think anything further need be said after the able and exhaustive speech of my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), which I think was sufficient to satisfy every unprejudiced member of this House that, the policy of the Government, in reference to the disposition of the land in the North-West and Manitoba, is not a good, desirable or safe policy to adopt. In travelling through that great country westward, leaving the city of Winnipeg about seven miles distant, you come upon a tract of country that is totally undeveloped for a stretch of forty miles, without seeing scarcely a single inhabitant or a single acre of land under cultivation; and the question arises, what is the reason that this section of the country is not settled, while thousands of settlers are located further west. The land is all that could be desired and centrally located. The answer is simply that the greater portion of that tract was a reserve of 1,400,000 acres the Government appropriated to the half-breeds, and has been since sold by them to speculators, who hold, probably, four-fifths of the whole of that reservation. Travelling through the country, isolated settlements here and there are found like so many oases in the desert, and the people are very discontented in consequence. From Poplar Point to Portage la Prairie, or even to Rat Creek, we pass through a flourishing settlement, many thousands of acres under cultivation, thousands of bushels of grain ready for market immediately after harvest, yearly; but it is utterly impossible, on account of the bad state of the roads, through non-resident lands, for the farmers to carry their produce down to the city of Winnipeg. It is nearly sixty-five miles from Portage la Prairie to Winnipeg, and the greater portion of their produce remains in their barns, or under the straw stacks, until the following summer, on account of the state of the roads, and the poor settler is frequently under the necessity of borrowing money to tide him over winter. For the last three or four years the seasons have been unusually wet, consequently the roads have been in such a state that it is almost impossible even in summer to take produce to market. I have had a little experience in Western Canada during the last thirty years, in reference to non-resident lands, and the undeveloped state of the country where large monopolies were in possession of large limits. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said, that the Canada Company had large limits in Western Ontario. I am aware of that fact. Being a representative from that section, I know from experience, that they have large limits; something like a million and a-half acres originally was granted to that company. Having some municipal experience for a quarter of a century, I know that no company contributes a just and fair proportion of taxation. I am aware that even in the county of Perth, that Company value their wild lands in some municipalities at from $20 to $30 an acre, which they purchased for one shilling and ten pence sterling. These lands are improved in value yearly by the labour, push and perseverance of the actual settlers. I am aware that in no instance are non-resident lands assessed as high as the lands of residents. We frequently find that municipal corporations attempt to assess these lands on a par with that of residents, but invariably fail, even if an appeal was made to those in authority. These companies find some loophole to escape being properly assessed. In one township lands are offered for sale by this same company at $20 per acre, and assessed at $1 per acre. It is impossible to get a school section formed, or to get roads kept in a proper state of repair, through these non-resident lands. The hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) states that there are lands enough in the great North-West, and it was a matter of indifference who gets them. I dissent entirely from that erroneous view. I think it is much better to have the lands settled and located by honest bona fide settlers, who will become contributors to the revenue of the country, who will become producers, and contribute to enrich the country. The hon. gentleman was unfortunate in his remarks about one Kenneth Mackenzie who, he said, had located about 2,000 acres in the North-West. I had the pleasure of visiting that gentleman on my westward trip. The hon. gentleman also stated that he (Mackenzie) had five sons. Well, 2,000 acres for himself and five sons is not a large territory. Mr. Mackenzie was possessed of large means when he left Ontario, and has done, probably, more good than any other settler in the North-West, in introducing improved breeds of stock as a practical farmer. The speech of the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb), it struck me forcibly, was more about Protection and the balance of trade—imports and exports with Great Britain—with an occasional fling at the policy of the late Administration in their construction of the Pacific Railway. The hon. gentleman wandered away and scarcely once alluded to the subject under discussion. The hon. mover of this resolution complains that the lands are sold to non-residents; he is afraid that large monopolies will be created by this policy. He also complains in his resolution that non-residents, or men of means residing in other parts of the Dominion, or even in the United States, can monopolise large tracts of land on payment of one-tenth down, and keep the lands out of market indefinitely. The hon. member for Niagara has stated that Mr. Taylor, the United States Consul, in describing the North-West, states that the climate is something similar to that of Toronto. No doubt the atmosphere is very invigorating and healthful. It is true that it is somewhat warmer in summer, perhaps, than in Toronto, and possibly somewhat colder in winter, but the weather is regular, not subject to such sudden changes as we find in the Province of Ontario. The hon. member for Niagara seems to think it would be an easy matter for the Dominion to construct a railway across the continent, since the United States had done so. But it must be remembered that the United States did not succeed in some of their undertakings. The Northern Pacific Railway has been a failure so far, notwithstanding all the resources of the Government, and of the great capitalists of the country, who have afforded it assistance. The failure of this scheme brought about the financial crisis in the country. They had only constructed a few hundred miles of that road when the crisis came, and the result was that there was a money panic throughout the whole country. If the United States, with all their resources, failed with their wealth and a population of fifty millions of people, how can we expect to complete a similar work, a work of greater magnitude, with a population of only four millions? The right hon. the Premier, I must say, made an extraordinary speech, and I consider that he travelled a little outside the record in replying to the speech of the hon. member for North Norfolk. My hon. friend from North Norfolk, spoke chiefly about the danger of creating monopolies in the great North-West, and I do not think he has been answered on that point, either by the hon. the Premier or by the hon. member for Niagara. They say there is plenty of land and they digress a little from the question, and talk about the expense of constructing the Pacific Railway. I think they are anticipating the future discussion on the Pacific Railway, for the purpose of producing some effect on the minds of hon. gentlemen in this House. But in reference to this Pacific Railway, not one I understand, not even the most eminent engineer, can give us an approximate idea of the magnitude of that undertaking. It is true, that for the first twelve hundred miles across the plains, until you arrive at the mountains of British Columbia, the railway may not be very expensive to construct, and the balance of the road through that sea of mountains, all eminent engineers agree, must be very expensive. I have heard it stated, that it would cost $50,000,000 to construct the road through British Columbia to the Pacific Ocean alone. At all events, that is nothing to do with the question before the House. The question is, whether the right and proper policy for the Government to pursue, is to sell large tracts of land to any one individual, or any company. I think I heard it stated, when I was in the North-West, that there was one gentleman in the city of Winnipeg in possession of 50,000 acres of land. The hon. the Premier said it was contrary to the law and land regulations that any one individual should hold more than one section—that is, 640 acres. I think it is possible for a person to get all the land he wants, if he has the money to pay for it. The land regulations are that one individual can only hold one section it is true, but, at the same time, he can take a dozen of his friends or associates into the land office with him. He could purchase land, 640 acres for each individual, and immediately after coming out of the office transfer it to himself. Any person could get any reasonable quantity of land in any section of the country in this manner. A few years ago a number of Mennonites settled in Manitoba. There were sixteen townships set apart for them in one settlement, and on fifteen of the sixteen townships there was not a single tree, and it is questionable, in my mind, whether a single inhabitant in Ontario or in any of the older Provinces would have settled on that tract of land. Now we find they have upwards of fifty little villages dotting the prairie. It is only a few years since a discussion took place in this chamber on the subject of encouraging Mennonite settlement, and many hon. gentlemen are here now who opposed the grant or loan, that was made to these Mennonites, of $100,000; they only received $85,000. It was not a grant, it was a loan, every cent of which will be honourably repaid. We find that these people, who went there without friends or a knowledge of the country, among strangers, destitute of means, have now 14,324 acres under cultivation; they raised last year 127,407 bushels of wheat, and that the total value of their crops is $134,483; the value of their stock was $204,200; and the value of their buildings on the farms, $134,200. Now, if these sixteen townships had been taken up by non-residents, the value of that land would not have been increased, but by the surrounding developments. They probably could have purchased that land for 30c. to 40c. per acre, which now is worth from $3 to $4 per acre. The 1,400,000 acres which were set apart as a reservation for the half-breeds, is yet barren of settlement, a perfect waste. It strikes me forcibly that this reservation should have been retained, and under no circumstances should any transfer from a minor be tolerated or acknowledged by the Government. They should not have been given script, because that was disposed of to unscrupulous land-sharks and speculators, for absolutely nothing in many instances. The children of half-breeds disposed of their lands, and their parents went security that the contract would be carried out when they became of age, because a minor could not give a title to property. The result is that they received little or nothing, in many cases, for their portion of land, and all that tract of country is now unsettled—a total barren waste. The Hudson's Bay Company have very extensive limits. In the first place they received 50,000 acres in the most selected parts of Manitoba and the North-West; at the confluence of rivers or in locations where railways will likely be constructed; they have also two sections in each township, numbers eleven and twenty-nine, or the twentieth part of the whole territory. And the agreement is that they should make their selections in these municipalities at any time within ten years after the survey is made. The right hon. Premier made a very remarkable calculation in reference to the proceeds, which he expects to receive from the sale of lands, and the enormous, fabulous amounts he anticipated receiving from the bonâ fide settler. The whole proceeds, according to his calculation, was to be derived from the poor honest settler. I do not think he made any calculation in regard to the speculator. He stated that so many settlers would come in this year and so many next year, and they would purchase their land, for which they would pay on an average

$3 per acre. They would also have the right to preempt 160 acres adjoining their homesteads, and the result was that a very large amount of money would be realised in a few years—some $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 by 1890. I would like to know what he expects to realise from the sale of lands to non-residents. I presume that the hon. the Premier concludes that the whole of that country is arable. I know there are gentlemen in this country who have issued pamphlets descriptive of that great country, and that those pamphlets have been purchased by the Department by tens of thousands. Many of those who wrote or compiled those pamphlets infer that the whole of the lands in the North-West are arable and adapted for settlement. I have travelled very extensively in that country, and I know some of those gentlemen who have issued pamphlets and written glowing descriptions of the great North-West know, comparatively speaking, nothing about it. There is one pamphlet which I know has been freely circulated, and which was written by a gentleman who had only travelled sixty-three miles in the country, but as a matter of course, must know a great deal about the fertility of that country for 1,500 or 1,600 miles distant. There are four or five pamphlets now in circulation, and I am prepared to state, that not one of the writers of these pamphlets has ever travelled a hundred miles west of the city of Winnipeg. I think we should not decry our own country. There is room for happy homes for millions of people in the North-West; but at the same time, there are millions of acres in that country, described in these pamphlets to be arable, which are totally unfit for settlement, absolutely worthless. We have certainly a great heritage in the North-West, and I hope the Government will adopt some reasonable policy to attract emigration to that country. I am not prepared to state what the policy of the United States Government is in reference to the disposal of its lands, but I know that I have frequently read and heard that their uniform price was $1.25 an acre, and if that land remained in the market for five years, it was reduced 25 per cent. if for ten years, a further reduction of 25 per cent., etc., etc.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is $2.50 per acre now.

MR. TROW: I have no desire to contradict the statement of the right hon. gentleman, but at the same time I think I am perfectly correct in saying, that the United States Government charges $1.25 per acre, and no more. Of course this is within certain described limits, and certain distances from railways. Is it reasonable to suppose that emigrants will go past these lands and not be induced to locate, because in the meantime until a railroad through our own country is made they have to pass through the United States, through millions of acres of similar land that we have for disposal, with equal or in some instances better privileges—that is in reference to price, railway facilities and convenience to markets. I do not think any better, in reference to quality of soil, can be procured on the continent than we have in the North-West, but I have no doubt that they can purchase that land much cheaper than they can our lands under the policy of the present Government, under which our lands for five miles on each side of the railway are sold at $5.00 per acre; and from fifteen to twenty miles from the line, $4.00 per acre; for another twenty miles $3.00 per acre, and so on. I know that there are better provisions, and that lands are cheaper in many of the Western States than they are in our North-West, according to the figures laid down under the Order in Council, October, 1879. I hope the Government will reconsider that policy in reference to the sale of lands, because if a poor settler has got to homestead or pre-emption 110 miles from the line of railway, the only belt in which land can be purchased for $1 per acre, it will require many years of toil, unremitting labour, push and perseverance, before he will have an opportunity of realising much from his place or getting facilities to convey his surplus produce to market. We have certainly a great heritage in the North-West; containing 2,750,000 square miles. Some writers imagine, and many believe, that the whole of that is arable. I travelled from the Hudson's Bay post, at Ellice, for over 150 miles, to Touchwood hills, and it is questionable, in my mind, whether a very large portion of that tract is arable, or adapted for successful colonisation; and beyond the Touchwood hills, we cross the Salt plains, which extend probably for fifty miles, in which there is neither wood nor water; and from the 49th parallel of latitude or boundary line, stretching to the line of the Pacific Railway and extending nearly to the base of the Rocky Mountains, will be found unsuitable for settlement. That constitutes a very large tract of country.

MR. PLUMB: There is plenty without it.

MR. TROW: I am quite aware of that; but hon. gentlemen exaggerated the extent of and fertility of that great country. The unbounded resources of that country is certainly a great heritage; we need not exaggerate, our limits are certainly enormous. We find by calculation that it is 1,375 times larger than Prince Edward Island; that it is 192 times larger than Manitoba; 126½ times larger than Nova Scotia; 100 times larger than New Brunswick; 14½ times larger than the great Province of Quebec; 25½ times larger than the Province of Ontario, prior to its last acquisition by the late Award, by which it acquires 85,000 square miles more. I have considerable confidence in the ability of the hon. the Minister of Emigration in this matter. But it certainly would be agreeable and result in much good, if the hon. gentleman would visit these settlements in Manitoba and the North-West and see for himself, what the resident occupiers of the soil can do for a country, in preference to the non-residents who are drones in the hive of busy workers and who speculate on the exertions of the poor and honest settler. I am aware that there are non-residents who will and have purchased lands in Manitoba, and who are now offering their land for sale at an advance of from $2 to $4 per acre. Even in this city lands in Manitoba are sold at fabulous prices by speculators, who have been purchasers at from 30 to 40 cents an acre. While I was in Manitoba I was offered fourteen different claims of 240 acres each—or 3,360 acres—for $1,000 cash, and these claims no doubt now would be worth from $4 to $6 an acre. At that time I was writing against land-sharks and speculators and I was determined that I would be consistent, at all events would not speculate in land. It has been stated here, and in my county frequently during the elections, that I hold very large limits in Manitoba. The extent of my limits is 320 acres; at the same time I was in possession of means and every facility for purchasing large limits, but I declined doing so, being convinced in my mind that the land should be kept for the poor and honest settler. We find that the Americans "euchre" us in many respects with reference to the sale of lands. They have their paid agents in all parts of Europe. I am informed that these railway companies have their agents located at every station on the leading railways in Europe. There are over 1,000 paid agents in the Old Country. The intending settler can hardly land from the Old Country at Point Levis before the American agent endeavours to entrap him into the purchase of lands from his company. They offer special inducements to settlers, and in hundreds of cases they have succeeded in entrapping settlers who started from the Old Country with the intention of settling in Manitoba. Mr. J. Dyke, Dominion Emigration Agent, Liverpool, in his able report says:

"A considerable proportion who passed through this office proposing to go on to Manitoba, and, as a rule, had substantial capital, but I regret to state that many of them were intercepted on their way by emissaries of Dakota or other land agencies, and by representations, more or less highly coloured—to apply a mild phrase—led away from their proper destination. With the view of checking this to some extent, I have advised all subsequent emigrants for Manitoba and the North-West, to obtain drafts for their money on Winnipeg city, and this when done, at all events necessitated them visiting the capital of that Province; but, in some instances they have actually been followed as far as Winnipeg and taken out of the Province."

I also find in the report of Mr. Wm. C. B. Grahame, Dominion Emigration Agent, at the port of Duluth, the following:—

"On the Northern Pacific and St. Paul and Pacific Railways agents are employed either by the railway companies or by land speculators, who give emigrants a glowing description of lands for sale in Minnesota and Dakota, and who paint their superiority to the Dominion of Canada in strong colours."

Is it any wonder that they settle in the United States? They and their families, when their means are exhausted, sick and fatigued after a long voyage, they are glad to settle somewhere, and the result is that thousands are induced to settle in the United States, who started with the intention of settling under the British flag. In my own neighbourhood there is a gentleman who is employed by these American companies, and receives 2½ per cent. for all the capital he gets to go over into Nebraska, Dakota and Minnesota. In one municipality alone, in the North Riding of Waterloo there are fifty good farmers that have disposed of their property and taken out of the country a large amount of capital and settled in Nebraska. We should have some means to counteract this tide of emigration continually moving and swelling the American Union. The lands in Manitoba will, ultimately, be good; but it requires a great amount of labour to make the lands dry and fit for cultivation. If there was a possibility of taxing non-residents it would be all right, but I have never yet seen that accomplished successfully. I have tried to do it for the last twenty-one years as a municipal officer in my county, but never yet succeeded in making non-residents pay one-third of the taxation that was imposed upon residents; and it will be the same in Manitoba. It is the greatest grievance that could exist to have a lot of speculators holding these lands from honest settlers; it would be much better to give the whole of the lands to actual settlers for the price of the survey alone, than to sell to speculators and land-sharks at any price. It is hard enough for the settler to go up there and have to pay about 200 per cent. higher for everything, in the shape of lumber and every article of husbandry he may require, the expense of transport being enormous on account of bad roads. The trails are strewn with broken vehicles, dead horses, etc., the traveller being reminded of the battlefield of Waterloo. The right hon. Premier stated that 20,000 settlers had gone to the North-West this year; but on a careful calculation, made by an energetic agent who resides in Duluth, and who is daily on the trains, it being his duty to go with the emigrants down the Red River, he says, in his report, that the number of souls arriving at Manitoba, via Chicago and St. Paul, in 1879, was 7,893, and via Duluth, 3,488, making a total of 11,381 that went into the country last year. We know that a great number of these were visitors, hundreds of whom returned. We find by the report of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, already alluded to, that there were only 30,717 emigrants came into the Dominion altogether; and I find on the other hand, to counterbalance this, that there were 23,256 settlers left the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario, and located in the United States, and remained there; we find there were 4,072 left Nova Scotia, and located in the United States; from the Province of New Brunswick, 2,691 left and settled in the United States; from Prince Edward Island, 557, and from British Columbia, 580 went over to the United States, making a total of 31,156 who left the Dominion last year, and settled in the United States; leaving our population, from immigration, 439 less for the year 1879, 439 more having gone out, than came into the country. I hope that the expectations of the right hon. Premier, in reference to his wild calculation of the numbers that will locate in the North-West for the next ten years, will be realised. I know there are lands enough to give comfortable homes for as many as can be induced to go to the North-West; and I do hope that the hon. the Minister of Agriculture and the Executive will use their utmost endeavour to induce settlers from the surplus population of the Old Country, to locate in the North-West. There is a great movement from the Dominion to settle in Manitoba. The hon. the Minister of Agriculture, last year, adopted a plan encouraging a number of practical farmers from England, Ireland, and Scotland, to visit the older Provinces and Manitoba, whose reports were circulated in the newspapers in the Old Country, and all over Europe. The people of the Old Country particularly the tenant farmer are in a fit state now to be induced to come out. Times have been very hard also upon the poor labouring men and there are good homesteads for them as well as the tenant farmer in the older Provinces, and the best settlers for the North-West are settlers from these Provinces if we could but induce the tenant farmers from England, Ireland, and Scotland to come and take their places. These latter could not so well endure the North-West, they could not so well endure the hardships; but here, in the older Provinces, they could get a homestead, without considerable outlay, in the midst of civilisation, convenient to markets and railway facilities. There is one great reason why these tenant farmers should be encouraged to settle here and that is: we have been establishing a large trade in the Old Country for our surplus stock. In the last year we find that there was sold in the English markets, from the Dominion, 25,009 head of cattle, 80,332 sheep, and 460 horses, amounting in value to an aggregate of $3,199,306. This is a trade which should certainly be encouraged. Our land requires a different system of farming in the raising of stock. It will be much better for the tenant farmers to procure a comfortable home in the older Provinces than by going to Manitoba and the North-West. I have had occasion to travel a little in the Old Country, and I know—as many hon. gentlemen who have visited France, Germany, Switzerland and Belgium, must know—that the people in those countries are very much better off, and are placed in much better circumstances, than in England, Ireland or Scotland; and I attribute their comfort and happiness—in France, Germany, Belgium, Switzerland and other countries, as compared with the United Kingdom—entirely to the distribution in those countries of land among the people. The order of the day in England, Ireland and Scotland, is centralisation and a monopoly of the land among the privileged class by the operation of the law of primogenitures the lands in the United Kingdom are kept in the hands of a few. In France there are 5,000,000 landed proprietors; and we find that when the late Minister in France called for a loan to pay the last instalment of that heavy indemnity imposed upon the nation, by the Prussian Government, he had not to go to foreign capitalists, to obtain the loan, but that 4,000,000 of their own citizens lent the amount, purchased stock or Government bonds, so that the interest, yearly accruing therefrom, was kept in the country as a benefit to the people themselves. In the western section of Canada, where I reside, the proceeds of the sales of land have been sent to London, England, for the last thirty or forty years: in the first place to the office of this land monopoly in Toronto, and afterwards to England. It would be a similar result in this great North-West, unless the Government adopted a different policy. For illustration, I will give a few figures as to the ownership of the land in the United Kingdom: The total area of England and Wales, after deducting the quantity of land within the limits of the metropolitan, is 37,243,859 acres. Sixty-six persons own 1,917,076 acres; 100 persons, 3,917,646 acres; 280 persons, 5,425,764 acres or one-sixth of the whole; 523 persons own one-fifth of England and Wales; 710 persons own one-fourth; 874 persons own 9,267,031 acres. The woods, commons and wastelands are not included in these calculations. In the county of Northumberland, which contains 1,220,000 acres, twenty-six persons own more than one-half of the county. In England, one person owns 186,397 acres; another person, 132,996 acres, and a third, 102,785 acres. A body of men not exceeding 4,500 own more than 17,498,200 acres. In Scotland, the total acreage is 18,946,694 acres; one person owns 1,326,000 acres; a second person owns 434,000 acres; a third, 424,000 acres; and a fourth 373,000 acres. These four proprietors hold one-fourth of the whole. Seventy persons own 9,400,000 acres, or a-half of Scotland. Upwards of 2,000,000 acres has been depopulated in order to make extensive deer parks—many thousands of once happy homes taken from the poor to gratify the sporting ambition of the rich. The total area of Ireland is 20,159,678 acres. 452 persons own each upwards of 5,000 acres; 135 persons, each upwards of 10,000 acres; ninety persons, each upwards of 20,000 acres; fourteen persons, each upwards of 50,000 acres; three persons, each upwards of 100,000 acres; one person owns 170,119; 292 persons own 6,458,100 acres, or one-third of Ireland; 744 persons own 9,612,728, or a-half of the whole. In England, the twelve largest landed proprietors own 1,058,883 acres; in Scotland, the twelve largest landed proprietors own 4,339,722 acres; and in Ireland, the twelve largest landed proprietors own 1,297,888 acres. It is estimated that 7,600,000 acres of commons, which was held in common, has been enclosed by the rich taken from the poor in England and Wales, since the beginning of the present century.

It is estimated that the House of Lords own more than one-third of Great Britain, and two-thirds of it belong to peers and commoners, whose large estates are continually growing larger. In France we find a different system. Distribution is enforced; every child inherits a share of his deceased parents' estate; 50,000 proprietors are in possession of 750 acres each on an average; 5,000 proprietors have an average of 75 acres each, and 5,000,000 landed proprietors own, on an average, seven and one-half acres each, and in that country we find happy homes. You scarcely ever see a pauper in the streets of the cities or towns of Switzerland, France or Germany. Go to Ireland just now, and what do you find? Poverty and famine which appeals to the charitable and benevolent all the world over. If the landed proprietors of Ireland would remain in the country, instead of squandering the rents of their poor tenants in England and other foreign countries, Ireland would be much better off, money would be circulated there, where it is so much needed, and there would not be that poverty and wretchedness in consequence of the bad management of non-resident landed proprietors, which stares us in the face. I simply mention this to enforce the sentiment initiated by the hon. member for North Norfolk. I sincerely believe that no greater calamity could befall any nation than to centralise its lands in the hands of non-resident proprietors or great monopolies. I endorse the sentiments, so ably expressed in the resolutions, heartily, and concur in the wisdom of putting an immediate check upon the sale of lands in the North-West upon any other terms than actual bond fide settlement.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved in amendment that all the words after "that," in the resolution, be expunged, and that the following be substituted: "This House do now pass to the Orders of the Day."

Motion made and question proposed:

That this House do now pass to the Orders of the Day.—(Mr. Domville.)

MR. CASGRAIN: I have listened with a great deal of attention to the statements and figures given by the hon. leader of the Government, in his speech on this subject, and I would be very glad if I could concur in his views. At the same time, he did not condescend to tell us the exact authority for his figures. There is such a great discrepancy in the views entertained by the engineers and men supposed to be perfectly conversant with this subject, that I cannot accept his figures, the more so as they appear to me as coming from sources that seem to be interested in setting forth his views in the best possible light. His figures are now in the archives of the House and will remain there, so that hereafter we shall be able to judge whether they will prove our condemnation or the justification of the hon. Premier in the statements he has made. I have made my own calculations, and we differ toto celo from one another, though I readily admit that the Premier's intelligence is so much superior to my own. His figures, however, are far below what they ought to be, I think. But, for a moment, I want to direct attention to their inaccuracy. I take exception to one statement of the right hon. gentleman, who says he expects in the next year 30,000 emigrants will go to the North-West. At this moment there is a fact staring the Government and all of us in the face, that every day at the railway stations you meet emigrants from Quebec going en masse to the United States. Why does the Government not stop them and direct them to settle in Manitoba? At this moment I have a letter from one of my constituents, whose opinion is of great weight. He is an old settler, well-to-do, and now is a Local representative from my county. He says that, at this moment, in his locality, one-third of the population are going away to the United States, and we are running after emigrants who are to settle in the moon! Why not take these people to the North-West, who are going to the United States. The hon. the Minister of Agriculture, ought to be in his seat now to give us some substantial explanation of these facts. It is very easy to dream of the future and build up visions as the hon. member for Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper) builds castles in the air. Let us look at things in their true light, as business men. Let us look at our finances, and ask the hon. the Minister of Agriculture if he cannot stop this emigration to the United States. Can the Government not find the means of taking the emigrants to Manitoba, which is to be the great future country. Rather than dream of the future let us look at the present. It seems as if the Government were the sole owners of this North-West region. They ought not to forget that one-twentieth of it belongs to the Hudson's Bay Company, which is able to sell their lands and compete with the Government as private individuals. The profits of the Company can be better managed in their way than any profit attempted by the Government. The Government will have strong competition in these sales, as the Company can select one-twentieth of the best lands. We are working to-day in this matter, not so much for ourselves as in the interests of the Hudson's Bay Company. I sincerely hope that each party will treat this question in an enlightened manner, and not make it a party issue, so that if the country is going to ruin we may know it, that we may not be mistaken, and that we may be able to take the right remedies. The good sense and patriotism of the House should enable us to decide who is wrong, and reach conclusions desirable in the interests of the public.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell): I do not propose to detain the House more than a few minutes, on addressing myself to this question, the importance of which no one can over-estimate. What occurs to me is, that it is somewhat difficult to know the ground taken by the hon. gentlemen opposite. Some of the statements of the hon. member who has just resumed his seat are full of significance. He has just told us that, in connection with the settlement of the North-West, we have the competition of the Hudson's Bay Company. That is quite true. There is no doubt whatever that now the Hudson's Bay Company has begun to realise the fact that they have in that territory very important sources of wealth in their lands, perhaps quite as valuable, if not more so, than their old source of wealth, the fur trade, and they are adopting a policy of selling these lands, and encouraging settlement. But how that should be a competition with Canada I am at a loss to understand. Every settler that goes into that country, or is brought in by the Company, is a contributor to the wealth of the country, instead of being a competitor he is an assistance and not an injury to the Dominion. But the hon. gentleman says that there is a very considerable emigration to the United States from a certain portion of old Canada, particularly from certain portions of Quebec. There is no doubt of this. There are two reasons for the movement. In the first, place there have been strikes in some of the manufacturing districts of the United States recently, and a large number of agents of manufacturing establishments have been going through the parishes inducing people to go to work in the place of the strikers. We see by the papers this morning that, in one place, there was danger of collision between the strikers and the French Canadians. Then I believe it will be found that this emigration is simply the order of spring emigration of Canadians, who are annually going to the United States to reside there temporarily, and that they will return. But in what way has the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casgrain) the right to complain that the Government does not induce these people to go to Manitoba, instead of the United States? What special advantages have they in the United States that they would not have in Manitoba? Those who wish to go to the manufacturing districts to obtain employment in the large factories will not go on land in either the Western States or Manitoba. And as to those who desire to take up land, there has been nothing advanced to prove that the condition of settlers is better in the United States than in the Canadian North-West. It is quite true, and, I think it is simply another illustration of what we have heard so much of this Session, that hon. gentlemen opposite, or some of them, are almost afraid that too high an opinion should obtain in connection with this country. They are alarmed that people may form too high an estimate of the country. The hon. gentleman from Perth (Mr. Trow) who, doubtless, knows a good deal of the North-West, made a statement, which I am bound to say, I was astonished to hear, that from the Touchwood hills to Battleford there was scarcely a foot of land fit for settlement.

MR. TROW : I said south of the railway.

MR. WHITE : Even that statement is hardly quite accurate. I happened to pass over the country last summer, between Winnepeg and Carlton, and I found for 500 miles the quality of the land equal, on the average, to that of the country from Montreal to Sarnia. In some parts of that country, the land looked less fitted for settlement, when compared with the rich alluvial deposits of Manitoba. And yet near Duck Lake, where the land was precisely the same, we found large wheat fields, which I have since been told yielded, this year, thirty-five to forty bushels to the acre. But what is there in these land regulations which render them inferior to those of the United States? If we refer to the right of people to obtain considerable areas of land, we know that in the United States people have the same privileges, and do obtain these large tracts. I venture to think, that nothing has tended more to attract emigration to Dakota, than has the large Dalrymple farm of 40,000 acres worked by one man, and the fame of which has passed to every part of this continent. Every man who visits the North-West visits that farm as one illustration of what can be accomplished. This man is practically an emigration agent, perhaps more so than any ordinary Government emigration agent can be. There is another fact in connection with the settlement of that country. The most efficient emigration agents are not those appointed by the Government, but those whom one meets on the train travelling towards the west, who are to be found on steamers coming to this country, in the English and European cities, on railway and steamboat lines, and who are the agents of private transportation companies and of those speculators whom we have heard denounced as being injurious to the country; but who, by means of their systematic emigration agency, are able to outstrip any Government in the work of bringing settlers into the country. Everyone knows that Government emigration agencies stand at a great disadvantage as compared with private organisations, and it is greatly owing to the greater activity of these private organisations to the fact that the United States have placed in the hands of individuals, or companies, large tracts of land, and have delegated to those persons the work of settling the country and of introducing emigration that so much success has been achieved. That is the chief cause why the bulk of emigration has been going to the United States. When I was going to Manitoba last summer, I met on the cars, between Pembina and St. Boniface, a man who made a dead set upon three or four well-to-do families who would make most desirable settlers. This man talked against Manitoba and the land regulations, taking for his authority the Toronto Globe which he had in his hand, to prove that the country was unfit for settlement, and he offered to conduct them himself to more desirable farms in Dakota where they could settle. I found this man was not a Government, emigration agent, but an agent of just that kind of private organisation which hon. gentlemen opposite so greatly deprecate in connection with the settlement of our own North-West. To this class of agencies has been largely due the fact that the Western States have been able so far to outstrip us in emigration matters. But we should remember that we are only opening up this country. Until last year we could not, without great difficulty, go into the country at all. We are only beginning, therefore, to compete with the United States; and I think everyone must regret that just at this stage of our work, in connection with the settlement of that country, we should have speeches made in Parliament, and articles and letters in the newspapers, the tendency of which is to warn the people that the advantages offered settlers by the United States are greater than those offered by our own country, and that we should thus have placed in the hands of these agents of foreign companies the opportunity of using Canadian testimony against Canadian territory. The hon. member for North Norfolk referred to the greater comparative increase of the United States over Canada in population during the last decennial census, and he left us to infer from his comparison, that the policy of the Government had not been such as it ought to have been, having regard to the full developments of the country. The answer is that, in the first place, we had no North-West, at that time, to compete with our friends on the other side. But, as a matter-of-fact, let us look at this pretended increase. The one thing which makes the United States what they are, is this: that you cannot buy an American to say an unkind word of his own country, while in Canada, for no higher motive than mere party objects, you will find men prepared to decry their country.

MR. WHITE.

MR. TROW: The hon. member for Niagara mentioned one American, the United States Consul at Winnipeg, who spoke in favor of Canada.

MR. WHITE: Mr. Taylor does not speak disrespectfully of his own country; but he says, that three-fourths of the grain producing area of this continent is in Canadian territory, and his frank statements should shame hon. gentlemen opposite. The decennial increase in the population of Canada, during the decade between 1860 and 1870, was 12½ per cent.; during the same period in the United States, it was 22 per cent. Let us look at the United States east and south of Lake Erie, which corresponds somewhat to Canada, Maine, Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Ohio. In these ten states the increase was only 14·48 per cent., only two per cent more than that of Canada. We find, moreover, that during that decennial period, not a single Province of this Dominion had been stationary. Quebec, which increased the least of any of the Provinces, increased 7·20 per cent., while of the states I have just mentioned, Maine and New Hampshire actually decreased in population during that period. The state of New York, with its great urbane population centred in the cities of New York, Brooklyn, Buffalo, Albany, Rochester, and others, only exceeded in its growth that of Canada by one-half of one per cent., and that in spite of the fact that New York was becoming more and more the outport of all the grain produced, in consequence of the great development in the west during those years. Another significant fact is the increase in the manufacturing states, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New Jersey and Pennsylvania, the aggregate increase in those states being just about equal to the aggregate in the whole United States, a fact which should afford us some confidence in the result of our National Policy upon the industrial, and therefore population, development of this Dominion. In the other five states, Maine, Vermont, New Hampshire, New York and Ohio, including the great commercial state New York, and the great agricultural state, Ohio, the increase was only 11·14 per cent., or nearly 1½ per cent. less than in Canada. I think these facts show that, having regard to the relative positions of the two countries, we have nothing to be ashamed of in the increase which took place during that period. We are told by hon. gentlemen opposite that the large emigration from the older Provinces to our western territories is of no advantage to us. I do not agree with them. If these men leave the older Provinces, it is because they are becoming too straightened in their circumstances where they are, and if they did not go into our territory they would go to the United States. Let us look for a moment at the land policies of the two countries. In the United States, under their land grant policy, the price of land within the railway belts is $2.50 an acre. Outside their railway belts the price is $1.25; but outside the railway belts in Canada, and for a large portion of the territory, the price is $1 per acre, so that the price here is actually less than in the United States. In the United States the price is cash, in Canada it is time. The settler can get his homestead lot of 160 acres and take his preemption lot alongside of it, and have it for three years to enable him to break up the ground and prepare it for settlement; and then, by paying four-tenths down at the end of the three years, he has six years more in which to pay the balance, while in the United States he would have to pay cash for the whole at the start. It seems to me that, under these circumstances, it cannot be said, with truth, that the policy of this country is not at least as favourable as the policy of the United States, in respect to the settlement of our unoccupied territories. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin),^a made a statement which I know is frequently made; he pointed out that the enormous interest account was still going on, and could not be made up by the sale of lands. Well, suppose we admit that; what does the hon. gentleman propose to do? Does he propose to take the course of the hon. member for North Norfolk, and give the lands away, in order that we may be more fully recouped in paying the interest upon the expenditure? Or, is he prepared to stop the expenditure, and thus prevent the realisation of the hopes we have of the future of that country? If the latter course, then we shall lose, practically, all the money that has been spent, for we are at this moment spending money, the results of which we are to see hereafter. We are at the most critical period of our national existence—if I may use that expression—precisely at the time when large expenditures have to be made, looking to the realisation of profits in a future more or less distant. Is the hon. gentleman prepared to stop all this expenditure, and say, that we had better give the land for nothing, or practically for nothing, because we have no immediate return for the expenditure made in developing it? I doubt much whether the hon. gentleman fairly considered where his argument really leads him. But after all, what is the gravamen of the charge against this policy? After all we have heard of the enormous price that is asked for lands, the charge is that they are going to be given away too cheaply; and while on the one hand, the hon. member for Perth has stated the highest price for the most favourable lands, as the general price of lands which will deter emigrants from going there, on the other hand, we have the hon. member for North Norfolk, stating the lowest price for the most inferior lands, as an argument on which to base his resolution against speculators, to entrap votes in this House. I hope he will not be successful, and I, therefore, beg to move the following amendment to the said proposed amendment:

MR. SCRIVER: I do not propose at this late hour to detain the House by any lengthened remarks. However, at the risk of being considered unpatriotic by some of the hon. gentlemen opposite, I desire to say a few words. If there are any evils with regard to the land system of the North-West, we ought certainly to be prepared to examine into that system fully, and discover where such evils exist.

I agree with the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, that a part of the great emigration to that country, which has taken place this spring, can be accounted for by the reasons he has given us. There is no doubt that there is something in the special condition of things in the manufacturing towns of the Eastern States, which has led to a portion of this emigration. There is no doubt that special efforts have been put forth by emigration agents to secure emigrants to take the place of parties who have joined in the strikes which have lately taken place in the Eastern States. There is a normal emigration from the Province of Quebec, which takes place every spring, and those emigrants return and live in Canada during the winter. This would account for a portion of the large emigration which has taken place from the Province of Quebec during the last few weeks. I am well aware that a large emigration has taken place to the Western States and Territories also, which we should like to have seen attracted to our North-West. This emigration, to my certain knowledge, is still going on. One reason why emigration has taken the course it has taken is the general impression which prevails that the advantages offered by settlement in the American territories and states are greater than the advantages which are now offered by our own country. I am bound to say that a general impression prevails that the regulations existing in the American system are more liberal and more advantageous to settlers than our own. I believe that that impression has some foundation in fact, and for this reason. The hon. the First Minister in his statement in the House neglected to state, after making a comparison of the prices charged for land in the two countries, that the lands in the United States of which he was speaking were railway lands. There is no doubt that in the reservations made by the American Government for railway purposes, the alternate sections are advanced in price from $1.25 to $2.50 per acre, but there are large tracts of land open to settlement in the United States which are not railway lands, and which can be obtained by settlers for $1.25 per acre. There is this peculiarity, with reference to these lands, in the United States. They are more accessible for settlement than our lands in the North-West, which we have fixed at a higher price than that demanded for American lands. Take the territory of Dakota for an example, to which a great tide of emigration is setting in from the province of Quebec and I believe from the Province of Ontario. In the central and southern portions of that territory, there are no lands set aside for railway purposes. They are all open for settlement, and the settler going in there cannot only select a homestead of 160 acres, but he can also preempt 160 at $1.25 an acre, which he is not obliged to pay for for three years. In addition to that, he can get 160 acres for planting, within five years, ten acres with trees. He practically gets that for $1.00 an acre. Settlers going there, have thus the opportunity of getting 480 acres of land by paying $1.25 at the end of three years for 160 acres. There is another advantage to which I have not referred. Railways are rapidly extending into that territory. From the adjoining states three great lines of railway are proposed to be built which will traverse that territory diagonally from the southeast to the north-west, and before very long will intersect the Northern Pacific railway, thus bringing all the arable lands of that territory, practically, within reasonable railway communication. I mention these facts as reasons why we should adopt an exceedingly liberal policy in regard to our lands in the North-West, and why we should correct the impression which now prevails, not only among those who are going from our older Provinces, but also among the emigrants from abroad, that our land policy is not as liberal as that of our neighbours. We should offer, at least, as great advantages to new settlers, as do the Americans. It may be true—I suppose it is—that the class of emigration agents to which my hon. friend from Cardwell refers, are very persistent in their attempts to induce settlers by plausible representations to remain in the United States. I need hardly say that, if the reports of these gentlemen are not founded on fact, they will not carry weight to any great extent. The false impression which they may succeed in creating at first, will be very soon dispelled. I am afraid, however, there is some foundation at least for the representations which these agents make. I will not detain the House any longer. I desired to say a few words as the seconder of the resolution, and to express my wish, that the Government would reconsider their land policy. They have already reconsidered that policy once, and made important modifications. I think there is room for still further improvement, and I trust the discussion which has taken place this evening, will have the effect of leading to that improvement in the land policy, which we have all earnestly desired.

MR. BOULTBEE: I did not intend to take any part in this debate, but I desire not to let it close without referring to some remarks that fell from the latest speakers. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down, says, that the tide of emigration flows into the United States, and the conviction that attains among people generally, is that the United States offer a better field for emigration than Canada. I dare say there is much truth in what he says, and I do not think he would say it unless he believed it. But it is worth while to enquire why it is that such a feeling should prevail—why it is that people should be led to believe that the United States affords a better field for settlers than our own fertile prairies; the hon gentleman gives no argument. He states no facts, but simply makes the assertion that such is the fact. Very likely it is. The hon. gentleman who spoke before him said, if we are going to be ruined we want to know it, and he no doubt expressed the feeling which pervades a large number of hon. gentlemen opposite. When utterances, of hon. gentleman, to this effect are republished in their papers, circulated throughout the length and breadth of the land, and hawked about by American emigration agents, is it wonderful that the conviction, which the last speaker dilated upon, gains ground. The settlers whom these statements effect are, to a great extent, illiterate and ignorant. They know these men are members of the Parliament of Canada, and they scarcely recognise whether they are supporters of the Government or opponents of it. But they attach great importance to the language that falls from these hon. gentlemen, and I say that there could not be anything more painful to the community, there could not be anything that could be a source of greater regret to a man who takes an interest in Canada, than to hear the utterances of these gentlemen who profess to be interested in her fate, to prophesy ruin and decay unless the administration of affairs should be entrusted to them. They held the Administration for several years, but they did not administer the affairs of this country in a way satisfactory to the people, and they were turned out of office. It seems to me that it would be more patriotic of them on the present occasion, in this Parliament, in this Session, if you like, and in future Sessions, not to decry so much the position which Canada holds. I have alluded briefly to the remarks of the hon. gentleman who spoke before the last speaker. I was not in the House when the hon. member for Perth began his speech. I only heard his concluding remarks. He was giving the House, as I entered, a collection of statistics, showing the amount of land held by the great landowners in England, Scotland and Ireland. In the abstract these statistics were not particularly interesting. There was nothing in their abstract value to enlist the attention of the House. If they had any value it was for the purpose of showing that the system advocated by the Government would lead to similar large holdings of land in the North-West. I followed the hon. gentleman as carefully as I could in my memory, and I think he stated that something like 20,000 people in Great Britain and Ireland held 100,000 acres of land apiece; and I suppose the purpose of his argument was to show that the policy of the Government would lead to similar large holdings in the North-West. Making calculations without the aid of pencil or paper it seemed to me that if we got as large holdings as this in the North-West; if we got 20,000 people holding 100,000 acres of land apiece, even if we only received $1 an acre for that land, it would amount to $2,000,000,000. But we might deduct very largely from the hon. gentleman's figures. We may reduce his figures by twenty, and we shall still have a much larger sum than the Government requires to build the Pacific Railway, without increasing the taxation of this country. I apprehend that the hon. gentleman would be as delighted with that result, as I would be, or the House would be, or the country would be. I do not suppose we shall discuss this subject at greater length now, but I would urge again, as I have done before, that it is scarcely fair to the country, or the duty of hon. gentlemen to their constituents, to so persistently, on every occasion, place Canada in an evil light in comparison with other lands. I think it is not a fair or correct thing. The policy of the United States is one that has made that country great, and has attracted to her the largest emigration that any land ever has had. I desire, in this connection, to refer to a quotation from a work by a judge of human nature, not inferior to any other man distinguished in English literature. The late Charles Dickens, in one of his novels, notices one of his American characters, Elijah Popham, I think, says: "Sir, we must be cracked up, we demand this and we must have it, and if we are not cracked up there will be trouble, stranger." It was rather an exaggeration of a national characteristic, but that is one feature that, as Mr. White suggested, has tended to make the United States great, and has directed to her as large an emigration as any country ever saw. That is their steadfast, persevering determination, whenever the United States are mentioned; they speak of her in terms of eulogy, instead of dispraise. It is the duty of patriotic Canadians to imitate them in a measure, and not to be everlastingly running down their own country.

MR. MACKENZIE: It will be observed that on no occasion will hon. gentlemen opposite condescend to speak on the merits of a case; but invariably content themselves with lecturing the Opposition, telling members of the Opposition what it is their duty to do. The hon. member who has just sat down is a very young member of this House, not very young in years, but young in political experience, young as a Parliamentarian, and yet he presumes to address and lecture hon. members on this side of the House with a degree of political impertinence which is scarcely tolerable. He thinks all he has to do, when he gets up, is to abandon the argument, and deal out the most vituperative language against his opponents.

MR. BOULTBEE: I do not think I used any such language. I defy the hon.

gentleman to point out any single word of mine that was vituperative. I used nothing but proper Parliamentary language.

MR. MACKENZIE: I do not say there was any unparliamentary language.

MR. BOULTBEE: Nor vituperative.

MR. MACKENZIE: Why, did not the hon. gentleman gravely tell the House that there was no patriotism on this side of the House? I cannot imagine anything more vituperative than the language he addressed to us in making that statement. But the hon. the Premier used the same kind of language.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I deny that most emphatically.

MR. MACKENZIE: We are told we are delighted to see a blot upon the country. If that were true, if it were a fact that a blot afforded us delight, we have a huge blot opposite to us every night; we have those in front of us who have blotted every page of history in every conceivable manner; if we choose to expose every blot that we might expose, we would be doing nothing else. I appeal to the hon. gentleman who last spoke in so exasperating a tone, if the hon. member for North Norfolk did not speak to the point, or if there was anything said on this side of the House that was improper.

MR. BOULTBEE: I am not aware that I made any remark with regard to the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). I think he spoke to the point, and that he made a very good speech.

MR. MACKENZIE: My hon. friend from North Norfolk is patriotic then, and the course he has pursued is patriotic. Who are those members on this side that are not patriotic? Was it the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow)—was it he who was lacking in patriotism?

MR. BOULTBEE: If you want me to answer, I can do it.

MR. MACKENZIE: It is the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Casgrain) who is unpatriotic, perhaps. Well, I have known that hon. gentleman for some years, and those who accuse him of being unpatriotic, I think, will fail to make good their charge. It is the duty of members of Parliament in Canada to expose everything tending to the injury of the country, no matter whether they are the acts of the Government or others, and no matter whether acts of commission or omission; and we have endeavoured faithfully to discharge that duty. We are not to be deterred by the lectures of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Boulton), but, on the contrary, we shall always continue to expose what we consider is injurious to the country. That which has given rise to this discussion, is nothing but a belief on our part that the line of policy adopted by the Government is not conducive to the general interests of the country, but is calculated to retard the settlement of the Great North-West. The hon. the First Minister, who replied to my hon. friend from North Norfolk, told us, amongst other extraordinary things, that the land policy, as first submitted, was the right one, but that the want of patriotism on the part of the Globe newspaper, in attacking that policy, compelled them to change a policy that was right: that he was induced by the strong opposition of that newspaper to enter upon a different course, to enter upon a course that was improper; that, therefore, he had not the patriotism himself to abide by the principles and the policy which he declared to be right. The Globe had created such an impression among his friends, that some change should be made, that he was willing, rather than hold fast, to make the change in opposition to his own convictions, and in defiance of what he conceived to be the interests of the country. The right hon. gentleman has not answered the speech made by the hon. member for North Norfolk, he devoted nearly the whole of his speech to a defence of his railway policy. I could not conceive why that was done, until I learned that there was a good deal of uneasiness among his followers in reference to that policy; and I understand now that there is to be a caucus between them to-morrow to discuss it; therefore the right hon. gentleman took the opportunity of defending his railway policy, as that defence will do service in another place on another occasion. I do not propose to go into the discussion of that policy now; we will go into that discussion at the proper time, when the question comes up on the motion, of which notice has been given by my hon. friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake). I merely rise to-night to rebuke as far as we are concerned, that spirit of intolerance which prevails, that dictatorial and offensive spirit with which hon. gentlemen opposite charge hon. gentlemen on these Benches with a dereliction of duty, and with a want of patriotism. We understand our duty, we understand what we have to do; and hon. gentlemen opposite are wasting their breath in attempting to deter us from following that course and that policy which we believe to be in the best interests of Canada. We know we have the ear of the country; we know that hon. gentlemen opposite, with all their professions, are quite conscious that they have lost the confidence of the people of this country; they know they have utterly failed to redeem their promises, that their National Policy is a fraud and a delusion; and that their land policy shaped in the interest of speculators is injurious to the people at large and to the general interests of the country, and that their railway policy is ruinous; they know that these matters will rise in judgment against them one day, and they know that an exposure of all their political crimes will only hasten that day.

MR. BOULTBEE: Is not this a little vituperative?

MR. MACKENZIE: We shall do our duty just the same as if the hon. member for East York had not ventured to lecture members on this side of the House.

MR. BOULTBEE: I ask the hon. gentleman if his language is not vituperative?

MR. MACKENZIE: I have used no words, not a single expression but what is perfectly correct. The hon. gentleman may say "political crimes" is vituperative. Political offences are political crimes; and I am sure that hon. gentlemen opposite will not deny that they are guilty of that; they will not deny either that they have failed to redeem their promises on which they obtained office, and that is a political crime, is it not? They sought to make false impressions on the country; the hon. the Finance Minister assured the people of his Province what his policy would do for them, and we have repeated denials from his own Province that any benefit resulted. Is not this a political crime? Let the hon. gentleman go back to his election in St. John. In discussing this and every other measure before Parliament, Sir, we shall exercise our right, our undoubted right, in perfect freedom to criticise with just as much severity as we think proper, every part of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, and they might as well refrain, in future, from these lectures of which we have had such an abundance to-night.

MR. McLENNAN: The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) does not lecture, he scolds; and not only this House but the country. Perhaps he may have reason from his point of view. He has lately made several appeals to Ontario, but the farmers of Ontario have got away from him and beyond him; they have ceased to follow that Chinese lantern—the daily Globe: they have taken up the torn book of political experience; they know their own minds; their determination is fixed; they are sound to the core, and that's what is the matter. But, though the hon. member will not admit the principle of protection in the National Policy, he is full of that self-sufficiency which is the protection of narrow minds, and so he scolds this House and the country. The hon. member says we have got away from the question; no one has done so more widely than himself. I do not quite agree with my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Boulton), that the hon. member from Huntingdon (Mr. Seriver), has given no reason why emigrants should go to Minnesota and Dakota; he has given a good reason—the facility of access by railways to those States. It suggests a good reason for the use of all diligence on our part to reach our lands in the same way. We should have had that access now but for the halting policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, who went about constructing the two ends of the route between Thunder Bay and Red River, leaving a great gap of mud and water in the middle. The question of the land policy was opened, in a fair and temperate manner, by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and I think he was fairly and fully answered by the right hon. the First Minister. I think the statement in reply had the full approval of the House. With regard to speculation in the lands of the North-West, Sir, you cannot keep the speculator out, he will have his hand in land as in everything that forms the subject of human enterprise or human cupidity; but the speculators are not a separate and hostile class; you hardly meet a settler who is not a speculator; he has preempted a lot adjoining his homestead in the name of his son or his daughter or perhaps some mythical member of his family, and holds it for sale to the next settler who comes along. Speculation is practiced by the poor man as well as by the richer man. Wherever there is much land there will be speculation. But I am glad to say that in the North-West there is land for all, and no danger that the speculator will monopolise it. The hon. member for Perth (Mr. Trow) complains that for forty miles beyond Winnipeg the land is taken up. Does he not know that it is taken up by the native half-breeds, and I presume with the approval of both the Governments that have dealt with the country. Then he says that the farmers beyond that (at Poplar Point and High Bluff) are so far from Winnipeg as to have no market for their grain. Well, I can tell him that now there are buyers of grain at the Portage, with a warehouse and all the modern appliances, and a steamer plying on the Assiniboine to carry away any surplus; but in fact the farmers of that locality—and there are fine farms and good farmers there—have this year got very good prices for their grain: 90c. for wheat, and 55c. for oats—a very high price for the great yield of their fields. I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman say that he does not wish to depreciate his own country; from his manner of comparison of our own lands with the lands of Minnesota and Dakota, I should have inferred that he intended to do so.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk): I have not had the advantage of hearing what has been said by most of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken, and do not intend to trespass much on the time of the House; but I would like to say a few words before voting, on this subject. With regard to these land regulations, I think, myself, that it was a very great misfortune that they appeared as they did in the first instance. I admit with pleasure, that they are much better, as they now stand than when they first came out. Still, they might, and I think ought to be very greatly improved.

MR. MACKENZIE.

We ought to assimilate them as much as possible to, or in some other way, make them quite as favourable as those of our neighbours in the United States. We have a country fully as good as their's, and in many respects better. Our land, taken as a whole, is superior, but still we must give as much encouragement to emigrants to settle on it as the Americans do for the filling up of their territory. So far, we have certainly not done so. Indeed, I think that our land policy, from the very commencement, has been a mistake. We commenced by allowing settlers to go in upon our lands, in the first instance, before any surveys were made, entirely overlooking that one-twentieth of the Fertile Belt belonged to the Hudson's Bay Company, and so complicated matters very greatly, instead of having surveys made as fast as possible for the comparatively small number of settlers of the first few years. In short, there has been a lack of knowledge on the part of the Government and in the House generally, with regard to the North-West, and it is only very lately that our people have woken up and found that we do possess a very fine country in the North-West. The hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow) has stated that, while there is a great deal of good land in that region, it is not all good. It certainly is not all good; but still I think it is saying a great deal when we assert, and this we can safely do, that, as a whole it is not only equal to, but better than the land of the great Province of Ontario. But while we locked up great portions of the land along the railway line, by asking for it $6 an acre, and until the recent change in the regulations permitting no settlement by homesteads in the first belt, on the other side of the Line settlers could get good lands in any portion of their railway reserves for—as the Premier admitted, $2.50 an acre—that is, after having taken a free homestead of 160 acres they could preempt another quarter-section at $2.50 per acre, and also get the lands of the railway companies on very favourable terms. In the United States they really favour actual settlement, while we, by our present policy, would be very apt to lock up a great portion of the country and place it in the hands of speculators. It certainly is not wise to allow the land to go into the hands of large companies and speculators. It has been said the Hudson's Bay Company have a large portion of good land. True, but that is no reason for multiplying such companies. The Hudson's Bay Company's acquisition or retention of its lands you could not prevent. They owned all the lands at the time of the transfer, and you had to make the best possible terms with that Company. The Hudson's Bay Company may safely be trusted to act with the greatest liberality in disposing of these lands, but I have always thought it would have been infinitely better had the Canadian Government—and I wish this to apply to both Governments—extinguished the landed rights of that Company altogether, and purchased its lands for the public, when it had an opportunity of doing so. It would be quite impossible to get the lands from the Company at present on anything like the terms for which they could have been obtained, under the arrangement I refer to, and no one can question that it would have been a great advantage to have had the lands in the hands of the Government. We know the evil results of locking up lands in other countries, and why should we repeat them in our North-West? There are companies asking for charters to hold lands in that country. They could get Government lands for about $1 an acre, and under the present regulations would have to pay but 10c. an acre in the first instance, the payments being spread over ten years. I think nothing could be more injudicious, or more hostile to the interest of this country than such transactions. I understand the hon. Premier has stated his belief that, within ten years we shall have half a million people in that country, and that its lands will have returned to the Treasury something like $75,000,000.

Mr. BLAKE: $40,000,000, actually collected, and $75,000,000 to be due within the ten years.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk): I sincerely hope and trust, as I am sure every hon. gentleman does, that this may be our experience. But we shall find that even in the favourable sections of the United States, the progress has been nothing like what the right hon. gentleman expects. While we may look forward to a large influx of settlers, we can hardly hope it will be so great as to give us half a million in that time, and I cannot for a moment imagine we shall receive that large amount of money from the sale of the lands. I think our first aim should be to settle the country, by giving every possible assistance to the colonists, or actual settlers, not, however, restricting them to 160 acres or thereabouts, as some propose. There should be a guarantee given, that all to whom lands are sold should be actual settlers. In several parts of the United States, a great advantage is given those who take up lands for settlement. For instance, they are allowed a rebate of one-half the price, even when not exorbitant, $5 or so an acre, for each acre broken up and cultivated within three years. Some encouragement of the same kind might very well be extended to the settlers in our North-West.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell): Only one railway company gives that rebate.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk): I know one, at any rate, gives it, and that company finds it very greatly to its advantage. What may profitably be done by this company, will no doubt be followed by others, and should be done by a great Government like that of the Dominion. Everything should be done to assist railways in the North-West. Nor need we be afraid of their competition with the Canada Pacific. It will be some years before it crosses the Rocky Mountains; and meantime, parallel lines within thirty or forty miles of it would all greatly assist in the opening up and settlement of the country. It is found in other districts, whose lands are not better than those of Manitoba or the North-West, that a space of some twenty or thirty miles on either side of a railway, is amply sufficient for its maintenance; that is, apart from the working expenses, a very fair profit can be made out of the railway. That is not the experience of one, but of many districts and railways passing through such a country as the North-West. In Manitoba and the North-West, we have very unfavourable land upon which to make ordinary wagon roads. While the weather is dry, nothing can be better than the roads, but it is well known that during the wet weather the roads are almost impassible, so that for the short distance of sixty miles between Winnipeg and Portage la Prairie, it sometimes takes three or four days to make the journey. It is therefore especially necessary in that country that assistance should be afforded in the construction of railways, not that the Government should build them, but there should be power given to those who are willing and prepared to do it. When we find people willing to build railways there, and to complete them within a reasonably short space of time, and this should be made a stringent condition of ever charter, we ought to give them every assistance. The hon. member for Perth (Mr. Trow) has remarked that, after all a great deal is not gained by emigration into the North-West from the older Provinces. I cannot agree with my hon. friend in that view, I believe that the more eligible people who can be got to go from the old Provinces to the North-West the better, as their places will be quickly filled by those from the other side of the Atlantic. While in England, a short time back, I had quite a number of applications from people who proposed to emigrate, and certainly in most instances they preferred making their homes in a country already settled instead of, as they said, going into the backwoods or on to the prairie. They preferred beginning their farming life in the older Provinces and purchasing improved farms there. So we may look, for a reasonable emigration into the old Provinces in the near future. In my humble opinion the Government have made a mistake in making so many reserves for particular nationalities. The Mennonites are an excellent and industrious people, and they have done wonders since they have been in the North-West, but I believe if they had been distributed, as is done in other portions of the continent amongst the other settlers, it would have been much better. And so with regard to the Icelanders, there can be but one opinion as to their desirableness as inhabitants, but it would have been much better for themselves as well as for the country generally, if they had not been placed in those isolated settlements, but had been encouraged to scatter themselves over the Province. No Government has been wise in this matter, but each successive Government ought to act upon the experience of its predecessors, and not fall into the same mistakes. I looked upon it as a step in the right direction, when the Government decided to turn the line of railway from the north of Lake Manitoba, to the south, as the settlements were almost wholly in the latter direction; but at the same time I must say, that in my belief, the land on the north of Lake Manitoba has been greatly depreciated, and it would not surprise me to find substantial men coming forward at an early session and asking Parliament to give them a charter for a colonisation railway over the greatly decried northern route, along which I fully believe a great deal of excellent farming land will be found. Now that this road has been definitely located, I trust it will be proceeded with as fast as possible. If it had been in the hands of private individuals we would have had the railway built already fifty miles to the west. I would impress upon the Government the necessity of using every effort to get colonization roads into that country. A comparatively small portion of the millions that have been spent in surveys through portions of the country where there will certainly be no settlers for many years to come, had it been used in opening up the prairies to cultivation, it would have ensured to us now a much larger population than we have at the present moment. The resolutions of the hon. member for Norfolk ought to commend themselves to every member of this House, and I, for one, have great pleasure in supporting them.

MR. MACDOUGALL: Though the House is impatient to vote, I desire briefly to state the difficulty in which I find myself in consequence of the amendment that has been proposed by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White). The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has proposed that this House shall affirm, as a rule for the disposal of public lands, that they shall be sold to the actual settler, on the best terms practicable; in other words, that the lands shall be treated, not as a source of revenue, but as a means of providing for the speedy settlement of the country. He has condemned, in his second resolution, the practice of selling the lands to speculators, as he calls them. I suppose that includes everyone who purchases lands without settling upon them. Now, if we were dealing with the question ab initio, I have no doubt many members of this House, from the experience we have had in the old Province of Canada, would be disposed to agree that, in the interests of the country, it would be better to deal with the public lands in the manner proposed. But we are not in that position. Unfortunately, we have adopted a revenue policy, with regard to the disposal of the public lands in the North-West. This House affirmed, last year, the propriety of setting apart 100,000,000 acres of land in that country, for the construction of a great public work, and directed the Government not to dispose of them for less than $2 per acre. I objected to that proposition, as I find in the Hansard report; I expressed the views which I then entertained, and which I still entertain, with regard to those resolutions. I thought they were not adapted to the circumstances of the country; that they would not be found to work advantageously, even for the purpose of revenue, and it was with some satisfaction that I heard, a few months afterwards, that the Government had decided, in consequence—if the hon. member for Lambton has correctly understood the remarks of the hon. the Premier—of the remonstrances and attacks of the Globe newspaper, to change the policy that had been affirmed by this House, and adopt a new one. I trust that it was not from that motive altogether; and I am confirmed in the opinion that the Government must have been influenced by a belief that free grants could not be dispensed, when the hon. member for Cardwell proposes now, with their approval, to say that the revised regulations are the wisest and best the Government could have adopted under the circumstances. I am not quite convinced that the House ought to take that course. The hon. member for North Norfolk moves his resolutions, an hon. member proposes to proceed to the Orders of the Day, and the hon. member for Cardwell moves an amendment to the amendment, calling upon the House to declare that the policy of the Government with respect to the public lands in the North-West is the true policy, both as regards settlement and the construction of the Pacific Railway. Is the House prepared to commit itself to such a proposition, by way of amendment to the motion of a private member? I think the hon. member for Cardwell ought to withdraw his amendment, and then we can negative the propositions of the hon. member for North Norfolk, by passing to the Orders of the Day. I can vote for such a motion without difficulty. When, Sir, we remember that we have undertaken serious obligations, with respect to the settlement of that country, that the old Provinces are called upon to incur an enormous debt for the purpose of opening up a new and productive region, not only for the benefit of their own surplus population, but to provide farms for millions of Europeans and strangers, I think we are not in a position to say that all the lands in that country shall be given up to the new comers as a free gift, or that the Government ought not to secure a sufficient revenue to repay the old Provinces some portion, if not the whole, of that expenditure. I believe that a large majority of the people of this Dominion are disposed to lend their credit and run considerable risk for the purpose of opening up that great inheritance of ours in the North-West, but they expect indemnity in the future. I was glad, Sir, to hear an ex-officer of the Hudson's Bay Company (Mr. Smith) tell us, to-night, that we have a vast quantity of rich and cultivable land in that country. I was glad to hear that testimony from that quarter, for our ears are not accustomed to it. I believe we have in the North-West an enormous territory of good, arable land, better than any that remains in the old Provinces; and that the people of the old Provinces will, in large numbers, proceed there under the policy of this Government. I believe this policy, so far as it provides for the sale of alternate sections of these lands, for the purpose of producing a revenue to meet the expenditure in the construction of the Pacific Railway, is a wise and just policy, and will be approved by the people of this country. If any hon. member of this House were to go before the taxpayers of the country and propose that, after all we have expended, after all the debt we have incurred, after all the responsibilities we have undertaken, we should give up these rich lands for nothing, and thus compel the people of the old Provinces to pay for their development, I believe he would not find many persons to agree with him. The course the Government has taken in the allotment of these lands is an experiment. It may prove successful, and the experience and practice of our American neighbours in that direction are encouraging. I would prefer to leave the Government untrammelled in matters of detail, and not say that this or that policy shall be pursued. The right hon. gentleman stated, in his opening remarks, that he did not desire to mix up the Pacific Railway question with this land question. I do not desire to commit myself to an approval of what appears to be the policy of the Government in respect to that Railway, but I desire to say that I concur with the principle the hon. member for North Norfolk has embodied in his resolutions, except in its application to that portion of the North-West which will be benefitted by, and therefore ought to bear the burden of, the Pacific Railway. Nearly twenty years ago, when Commissioner of Crown Lands for the old Province of Canada, I endeavoured to impress upon my colleagues the opinions I entertained that free grants to actual settlers was the true way to settle the public lands. Now lands are practically given away in Ontario and Quebec, on condition of settlement; and public opinion, I think, as far as Ontario and Quebec are concerned, is educated up to the point of the hon. gentleman's resolutions. We have had our Canada Companies, and our British American Land Companies. We have seen large tracts of good land remain in the hands of these companies for a generation; and we have seen that the country has not progressed under that system. In Ontario we discovered, many years ago, a means by which that evil could be rectified. We discovered that, under the system of local taxation large tracts of uncultivated land were brought into the market, and the evil which formerly existed has been removed. I think it will be found that land companies like those referred to will find no room in the North-West, and the evil of non-resident speculation will be rectified by the people themselves. The settlers on these alternate lots will find means, through municipal taxation, of compelling those who have purchased the adjacent lands to bring them into the market. Therefore, I have no great fear of the consequences of the system which the Government has adopted. I think the policy of the Government is an experiment which it is safe to try. We cannot afford to give away all the lands of the North-West, and build the Pacific Railway at the expense of the residents of the old Provinces, and I do not believe the hon. gentlemen who advocate that system have any public opinion outside of this House to sustain them.

MR HUNTINGTON: The word or two I have to say at this late hour of the night, are not so much upon the merits of the question, and are not so appropriate now as they would have been, had I had an opportunity of speaking immediately after the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan). We all in this House regarded the election of the hon. member for Glengarry to a seat in this House—those at all events who knew his reputation—as a matter of importance to the commercial interests of this country. The hon. gentleman was widely connected with the interests of the commercial metropolis of Montreal, and we expected he would be a guiding light, so to speak, on commercial questions. For myself I should be sorry to speak in any sense disrespectfully of the hon. gentleman. I should be sorry in any way to disparage his abilities, which we all recognise, or his position in this House. But as a humble member of the party, which is, I admit, rather feeble in point of numbers, I take exception to the position the hon. gentleman is continually occupying in this House in reference to the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie). The hon. member for Lambton may be a very disagreeable and contemptible person in the opinion of the hon. member for Glengarry, but on this side of the House we regard him as a very respectable man. If the hon. gentleman expects to be treated with the consideration which his commercial experience entitles him to, he must at least extend to others the same courtesy which is extended to him. If he attacked myself or some other humble member of the House, the matter would be allowed to pass. The hon. member for Glengarry, on account of his commercial connection, is not so insignificant as to permit of his remarks passing without observation. Let me tell the hon. gentleman, with all my respect for his abilities, that there are many hon. gentlemen in this House able to express their opinions as fluently and intelligently as himself. If he was fit to pursue this aggressive policy with regard to my hon. friend—

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Oh.

MR. HUNTINGTON: I will venture to say to those hon. gentlemen that there is not a man on that side of the House who does not feel the impropriety of the course the hon. gentleman has pursued. There is no man there who does not respect the hon. member for Lambton, and who does not know that the hon. member for Lambton is not liable to these constant attacks upon him. Let the hon. gentleman consider that those who differ from him in opinion may not be amenable to his sneers, or let him take the consequences which will undoubtedly follow.

MR. CHARLTON: I wish to refer to one or two points that have been alluded to in the speech of the right hon. gentleman. Before doing so, I may advert to a misapprehension the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) entertains, with respect to these resolutions which is very likely entertained by other hon. members of this House. The resolutions I have offered do not affirm the propriety of making homestead grants. The first resolution affirms, in general terms, that the public lands should, as far as practicable, be sold to actual settlers only; and that the sale of public lands to speculators, free from conditions of settlement, is calculated injuriously to affect the interests of the country. And the second resolution affirms, that, so long as the system of selling public lands to speculators, without conditions of settlement, or restrictions as to quantities, is continued, the price at which such lands are sold should be paid in full, in cash, at the time of sale. These, in brief, are the terms of the resolutions. The hon. the First Minister in the course of his speech challenged any hon. member on this side of the House to point out in what respect the land policy of the United States was more favorable to settlers than the policy contained in the regulations of the 14th October last. Now, that challenge was pretty fully met by my hon. friend, the member for Huntingdon, (Mr. Scriver.) In order to secure the settlement of our lands, we must make the advantages co-equal with those of the United States. We cannot expect to settle those lands rapidly under the present regulations. Hon. gentlemen may impugn our patriotism as much as they please, but our object in bringing these resolutions before the House was to rectify a wrong. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) alluded to my having drawn the attention of the House to the disparity of growth between Canada and the United States, and he said I brought it up as a charge against the Government. I did nothing of the kind. I alluded to the fact in a spirit of sorrow. I said the object of these resolutions was to remedy the state of things which had led to such disproportionate growth on the part of the United States. The hon. the First Minister gave us some astonishing statistics in regard to emigration. He thinks that in ten years we will realise $79,000,000 from the sale of public lands in the North-West.

Some HON. MEMBERS: No.

MR. CHARLTON: Did he not say so?

Some HON. MEMBERS: No, seventy millions.

MR. CHARLTON: Well, Sir, by a return lately brought down I see that the sale of lands in the North-West and in Manitoba for 1879, amounted to 247,315 acres. If these lands brought an average of $3 per acre, the total amount would be less than $750,000, and yet the sales in ten years are to amount to $70,000,000. The right hon. gentleman estimates the emigration for last year at 25,000; the total sales of public lands last year were made to 882 purchasers. If these were all heads of families numbering five persons each, it would represent an immigration of less than 4,500, in place of 25,000. The hon. gentleman's calculations are preposterous. I hope they will be realised, but I have not the faintest idea that they will. The hon. gentleman bases his calculations of this revenue on the sale of land to settlers, and yet he tells us in his speech—I have his exact words—that we could not sell a single acre in the North-West if we made settlement a condition of sale to actual settlers.

Some HON. MEMBERS: No.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is not what I said.

MR. CHARLTON: If not, the hon.

gentleman cannot object to the terms of the resolutions now proposed, which amount to keeping the lands out of the hands of speculators.

MR. DECOSMOS: I have only one remark to offer. It has been said that there was no railway line in the United States with land grants extending further than twenty miles on each side of it; now I believe that, if the hon. gentleman will refer to the Northern Pacific Railway land grant, he will find there that its lands extend forty miles on each side of the road.

MR. SMITH: One portion only.

MR. DECOSMOS: And that the pre-emption price is $2.50 per acre.

Motion made and question proposed:

That the House do now go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolutions:—(See p. 1,051)—(Mr. Charlton.)

That all the words after the word "That" in the said motion be left out and the following substituted instead thereof:—"this House do now proceed to the Orders of the Day"—(Mr. Donville.)

That all the words after "That" be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof:—"the policy of the Government for the disposal of the public lands in Manitoba and the North-West is well calculated to promote the rapid settlement of that region, and to raise the moneys required for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway without further burthening the people, and that it deserves the support and approval of this House."—(Mr. White, Cardwell.)
