THE DEBATES

OF THE

HOUSE OF COMMONS OF CANADA

SECOND SESSION OF THE FOURTH PARLIAMENT OF THE DOMINION OF CANADA, APPOINTED TO MEET FOR THE DESPATCH OF BUSINESS 12 FEBRUARY, 1880, IN THE FORTY-THIRD YEAR OF THE REIGN OF

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, 12th February, 1880.

THE PARLIAMENT, which had been prorogued in the usual form, from the 15th day of May to the 24th day of June, 1879, and thence from time to time, was now commanded to assemble on the 12th day of February, 1880, for the Despatch of Business.

The Speaker took the Chair at a quarter before Three o'clock.

A Message was delivered by René Edouard Kimber, Esquire, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod :

“MR. SPEAKER,

“His Excellency the Governor-General desires the immediate attendance of this Honourable House in the Senate Chamber.”

Accordingly, the House went up to the Senate Chamber;

And the House being returned,

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

JUDGES' REPORTS.

MR. SPEAKER informed the House that he had received from the Judges selected for the trial of Election Petitions, pursuant to the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, 1874, certificates and reports relating to the elections,—for the Electoral District of the Town and Township of Cornwall, for the Electoral District of Argenteuil, and for the Electoral District of Montmorency, and that, in conformity with the Act 37 Victoria, Chapter 10, Section 36, he had issued his several Warrants to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, to make out new Writs of Election for the said Electoral Districts, respectively. He further informed the House that he had received from the Judge selected for the trial of the Election Petition relating to the Election for the Electoral District of St. Hyacinthe, a certificate declaring the sitting member to be duly elected.

VACANCIES.

MR. SPEAKER also informed the House that, during the Recess, he had received communications from several Members, notifying him that the following vacancies had occurred in the representation :—

Of Charles Gill, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Yamaska, by the acceptance of the Office of Judge of the Superior Court, of the Province of Quebec; Of Edgar Dewdney, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Yale, by resignation; Of Harvey W. Burk, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of the West Riding of the County of Durham, by resignation; Of Joseph Dubuc, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Provencher, by the acceptance of an Office of emolument under the Crown; and Of Daniel Galbraith, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of the North Riding of the County of Lanark, by decease.

He also informed the House that the Clerk of the House had received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery copies of Warrants showing vacancies which had taken place in the representation, viz:—

Of Hugh McLeod Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Cape Breton, by decease; and Of the Hon. Theodore Robitaille, Member for the Electoral District of Bonaventure, by the acceptance of an office of emolument under the Crown, to wit, the Office of Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec.

NEW MEMBERS.

MR. SPEAKER also informed the House that, during the Recess, the Clerk of the House had received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery certificates of the Election and Return of the following Members:—

Of Fabien Vanasse, Esq., for the Electoral District of Yamaska; Of Francis Jones Barnard, Esq., for the Electoral District of Yale; Of P. C. Beauchesne, Esq., for the Electoral District of Bonaventure; Of William Mackenzie McLeod, Esq., for the Electoral District of Cape Breton; Of the Hon. Edward Blake, for the Electoral District of the West Riding of the County of Durham; Of Joseph Royal, Esq., for the Electoral District of Provencher; Of Donald G. Macdonell, Esq., for the Electoral District of the North Riding of the County of Lanark; and Of Darby Bergin, Esq., for the Electoral District of the Town and Township of Cornwall.

MEMBERS INTRODUCED.

The following Members, having previously taken the Oath according to law, and subscribed the Roll containing the same, took their seats in the House:—

Francis Jones Barnard, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Yale; P. C. Beauchesne, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Bonaventure; Hon. Edward Blake, Member for the Electoral District of the West Riding of the County of Durham; Darby Bergin, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Cornwall; Donald G. Macdonell, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of the North

ADMINISTRATION OF OATHS OF OFFICE BILL.

(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

FIRST READING.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD introduced a Bill (No. 1) Respecting the Administration of Oaths of Office.

Bill read the first time.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

MR. SPEAKER reported His Excellency's Speech, and read a copy thereof to the House, which is as follows:—

“Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

“Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

“I have great pleasure in meeting you again for the despatch of the business of the country.

“The abundant harvest with which Providence has blessed Canada is a cause for the deepest thankfulness; and I heartily congratulate you on the evidences which surround us of a recovery from the commercial and industrial depression which has so long weighed down the energies of the people.

“Our returning prosperity should, I think, direct our attention to the less fortunate circumstances of our fellow subjects in Ireland, where so much destitution prevails, and I invite your consideration of the best means of showing our practical sympathy with their distress.

“We have reason to congratulate ourselves on the number of settlers who have, during the past year, come into our North-West from Great Britain and the United States, as well as from the older Provinces of the Dominion. The visit of two members of the Royal Commission on the agricultural distress in the Mother Country, and the favourable report of the tenant farmers who, at the instance of my Government, have examined into the farming capabilities of the Dominion will, it is believed, largely increase the number of immigrants during the present year. Preparations must be made for their reception, and your attention will be specially called to this subject.

“Every effort has been made to hasten the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway from Lake Superior to Red River, and no doubt is entertained that the railway will be opened for traffic between those important points within the time specified in the contracts. Under the authority given by Parliament last Session, nearly one hundred miles, from Red River to the western boundary of Manitoba has been placed under contract, and tenders are about being asked for, for the construction of another hundred miles from the boundary westward. The completion of these two sections will at an early day afford railway facilities through 200 miles of the most fertile land in the North-West. After an exploratory survey of the line from Port Simpson to the Pine River Pass and through the Peace River country, it has been decided to adopt the location of the line to Burrard Inlet, and contracts have been awarded for one hundred and twenty-seven miles of the railway between Emory's Bar, on the Fraser River, and Savona's Ferry. This work will be vigorously proceeded with so soon as the spring opens. Its construction will complete the most difficult portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and secure the connection by steam of the fertile district of Kamloops with the capital of British Columbia.

“The adoption of a rigid system of economy in the management of the Intercolonial Railway has, without impairing the efficiency of its working, effected such a diminution of expense as to warrant the belief that the country will in future be relieved from any considerable burden in connection with its operation.

“In consequence of the entire failure of the usual food supply of the Indians in the North-West, a large expenditure has been necessarily incurred to save them from starvation. It is hoped that the efforts which are now being made to settle the several bands on the reserves, and to induce them to betake themselves to the cultivation of the soil may prevent the necessity of similar calls for relief in the future.

“Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

“The Estimates for the ensuing year will be laid before you. They have been prepared with all due regard to economy.

“You will be pleased to learn that the effect of the tariff of last Session in the development of the varied industries of the country has on the whole been very satisfactory. The experience acquired since it came into operation in March last, has suggested the expediency of some amendments, to which your attention will be directed.

“Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

“Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

“Bills for the better organisation of the Civil Service, for the consolidation of the Inland Revenue laws, and for the amendment of the Acts relating to the Dominion lands, to the Public Works, to the Indians of the North-West, and to the Mounted Police Force, will be laid before you.

“The Acts incorporating the Banks of the Dominion will expire next year, and the present would seem a favourable time for a full consideration of our banking system, and of the subject of the currency as connected with that system.

“The subject of the laws relating to insolvency will doubtless engage your attention.

“The increasing foreign trade of Canada and the prospect that Her Majesty's Government will enter ere long into negotiations with foreign nations on the subject of their trade and commercial relations demand our closest attention and watchfulness, while the rapid development of the Dominion is continually giving rise to important matters requiring the support and action of the Imperial Government. With the concurrence of Her Majesty, I therefore recommend you to sanction the appointment of a permanent representative of Canada in London to guard her various interests.

“The subjects I have mentioned are of great importance. I commend them with full confidence in your wisdom and patriotism to your best consideration.”

Ordered, That His Excellency's Speech be taken into consideration to-morrow.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Resolved, That Select Standing Committees of this House for the present Session, be appointed for the following purposes :—1. On Privileges and Elections ; 2. On Expiring

Laws ; 3. On Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines ; 4. On Miscellaneous Private Bills ; 5. On Standing Orders ; 6. On Printing ; 7. On Public Accounts ; 8. On Banking and Commerce ; 9. On Immigration and Colonisation ; which said Committees shall severally be empowered to examine and enquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House ; and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon ; with power to send for persons, papers and records. —(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

PRIVILEGES OF THE HOUSE.

REMARKS.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

MR. MACKENZIE : Before the House adjourns, I desire to recall to the hon. gentleman's recollection the case of violation of the privileges of this House which occurred at the close of last Session. Upon the hon. gentleman's motion then, the person who was alleged to have violated the privileges of the House so grossly was ordered to attend. That he did not attend the Journals will show, and I desire to know the course the hon. gentleman now proposes to take.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : I am glad the hon. gentleman has called my attention to this matter, as it had escaped me altogether. I shall let the hon. gentleman know to-morrow what course I propose to take.

House adjourned at Five minutes before
Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, 13th February, 1880.

PRAYERS.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

CONTROVERTED ELECTION.

SUPREME COURT JUDGMENT.

MR. SPEAKER informed the House that he had received, from the Registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada, a certified copy of the judgment and decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, in the appeal of McKay versus Glen, relating to the election for the Electoral District of the South Riding of the County of Ontario.

REPORTS.

MR. SPEAKER laid before the House a Statement of Receipts and Disbursements of the Accountant of the House of Commons of Canada, for the year ended 30th June, 1879, with the Auditor's Report. Also, the Report of the Librarian of Parliament, on the state of the Library of Parliament.

PRIVILEGES OF THE HOUSE.

QUESTION.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman opposite promised yesterday to attend to the matter in the case of privilege, to which I called his attention.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I will do so as soon as the Address is disposed of. I can, at any time, move, as a matter of privilege, that the summons shall be returnable, say, in a week.

MR. MACKENZIE: Then the hon. gentlemen proposes to take fresh proceedings.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I shall base it on the proceedings of last Session.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House proceeded to the consideration of His Excellency's Speech at the opening of the Session.

MR. RICHEY: His Excellency the Governor-General, as the representative of our gracious Queen, having been pleased to summon the two branches of this Legislature for consultation, and to open the Session of Parliament with a Speech from the Throne, it becomes requisite that to that Speech this House should return an answer at once consistent with our duty to our Sovereign and with the dignity of this House as the great representative body of the people of Canada. I have therefore risen to move that a humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-General, to thank him for his gracious Speech at the opening of the present Session, and to give those further assurances in regard to the business of this Session which are expanded on the face of the resolutions. I may, without affectation, admit my consciousness of inability to meet the demands of this occasion in a satisfactory manner; and, in endeavouring to acquit myself of the responsibility, I shall aim only at a succinct rehearsal and review of those subjects which His Excellency has commended for the deliberations of this Legislature. I rejoice that the very first utterance in that Speech to which it seems proper to direct attention is that which acknowledges the beneficent Providence which has watched over this country during the past year, and vouchsafed to the husbandman an abundant harvest. The Providence of God has smiled upon and crowned with success the providence of man. This has been more conspicuous in connection with the agriculture of our country; but it is cause for thankfulness that it has not been restricted to that alone. We are enabled to rejoice also in increased development and activity in commercial and industrial pursuits. I know, Sir, and I do not think it is any subject for regret, that that prosperity has not flowed in upon us in as vast a volume as some have seemed to expect. I know that the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government of this country and those who are associated with him have been taunted because that prosperity has not seemed to flow in in the manner in which those who have brought the accusation and taunt have thought fit to assume was predicted regarding it. But there is abundant evidence that the tide has turned, and those who have read Macaulay's History of England will recall the simile by which he endeavoured to illustrate the advance of civilisation: likening it to the tide which, whilst it is rolling upwards and onwards, may seem to the casual observer at times to recede, but, with every fresh wave, marks a higher point upon the shore. Such a simile, I think, may be well applied to our position at the present time and the advance which this country is at this moment making. Mr. Speaker, whilst we are enabled to felicitate ourselves upon the advantages which we possess and that degree of prosperity which has been granted to us, it is matter for regret that other portions of the Empire have suffered distress. In England itself, the very seat and centre of this vast Empire, the last season has, like others preceding it, been marked by agricultural failure. But it is from Ireland—that home of a noble race which has contributed so largely to the glory of the Empire, giving valiant soldiers and generals to fight her battles and eloquent statesmen to adorn her legislation, and which has done so much for the colonisation of the Empire—that land to which, I presume, many may be found within these walls who can trace their ancestry, and also hundreds of thousands throughout this Dominion—it is from that land that the wail of distress is borne to us across the ocean; and I feel quite sure that there is no one in this assembly who will not respond fully, heartily and completely to the suggestion which His Excellency has thrown out, that we should consider the best means to be adopted to contribute our quota of relief to that suffering people. And, if I may appropriate an idea of which I do not claim to be the originator, I might ask what better means could be adopted of manifesting our sympathy than contributions in kind? If Providence has been so gracious to us that our barns are filled with plenty, why not send forward by the railways which we control to the sea, a portion of our surplus produce, and, at the sea, our own vessels are waiting to convey it to the shores of Ireland? I am quite sure that, when the flag of the Dominion is unfurled within the harbours of that island, a feeling will be excited exceeding far any that could be called forth by mere contributions in money. There I may advert to another portion of His Excellency's Speech, in which he refers to the distress of the Indians in the North-West. I cannot question that this House will cheerfully endorse the action of the Government, which has been induced by necessity to expend a large sum in order to save those aborigines from starvation. Whilst we congratulate Ministers upon the means which are being adopted for the settlement of those Indians in the country, and the turning of their attention to industrial pursuits, we look forward to the settlement of that country by a different class of people. During the past year, there have been a large number from the old country, from the older colonies, and from the United States, who have settled in the North-West. It is a striking evidence of the excellence of that portion of the Dominion which is being opened up, that the influx of population from the neighbouring States has been so great. Of 8,000 who entered it, under an arrangement made by one party who had the conveyance of those persons, 2,000, or one-fourth, are said to have come from the United States of America. If that statement be true, it furnishes a commentary upon much that we heard in connection with the relative advantages of our country, as compared with that on the opposite side of the border, during the last Session. There has been, to some extent, distress in other parts of the country, but this, I presume, will be sufficiently overtaken by local efforts of our people, with the understanding that, in all cases where local contributions and efforts are available and adequate, it does not come within the province of Parliament to afford relief. I have said that we may rejoice in the accession of population which has been witnessed during the past year in the North-West Territory, and we may certainly look forward, as a consequence of the visits which have been paid to this Dominion during the past year by the Royal Commissioners of Agriculture, and by the tenant farmers who came out to inspect our country and who have carried home such valuable and favourable reports, to a very great increase in the numbers who will seek to domicile themselves in this Dominion during the coming year. If there is one thing more than another in which I think this Dominion has failed in its duty towards those seeking a home in new countries it is in this, that proper pains do not appear to have been taken in order to make them thoroughly acquainted with the advantages offered in this country, and to facilitate their progress through it and their settlement in it after their arrival. I think, in accordance with the suggestion which is thrown out by His Excellency in his Speech, that it becomes the duty of Parliament to adopt such measures as may be necessary in order to afford to those who may arrive among us a proper reception, and that it will devolve upon the Government of the day to take such means in the appointment of their officers that, whatever reproach this country may have suffered from in the past will be entirely avoided in the future. The settlement of the North-West, the introduction of a large number of emigrants to it will however be entirely vain and futile if means are not adopted and promptly carried forward, for opening up communication between it and the other parts of this Dominion, and for affording facilities for the transit of the produce of that country to the markets of the world. It is on this account that I observe with pleasure the assurance that the Pacific Railway is being pushed forward with vigour and success, and that in a very short time we may hope to see the line between Lake Superior and Winnipeg in full operation, so that, before many years have passed—but little over two years at the outside, I presume—we may expect to have a locomotive travelling from Thunder Bay to Winnipeg. We have also, Sir, the information that one hundred miles beyond is already under contract and tenders are being received for one hundred miles still further, thus opening up two hundred miles into that wonderfully fertile country into which we are hopeful of introducing so large an emigration. That this is being done, and that the Government, as I am assured they do, expect to be able to complete that railway beyond Winnipeg and equip it fairly at an expenditure not exceeding $10,000 per mile are facts upon which we may well congratulate the Minister who has that Department more particularly in charge, and the Government with which he has been associated. Then, in connection with those facts, we have the information afforded us that, after a full survey and a thorough investigation of the various advantages afforded by the different proposed routes, the Government have selected Burrard Inlet as the terminus in British Columbia. That, I think, will afford satisfaction to both sides of this House, to all who are here assembled representing the different views which have obtained in this Dominion regarding that line of railway. I certainly participate in the feeling that the selection has been a most wise and judicious one, not only diminishing the cost of the railway itself and the distance to be traversed, and thus bringing us nearer to the eastern countries, but at the same time presenting advantages which must have commended it to the present Government as they did to the past. Although it would take a long time to traverse the distance that intervenes between the Pacific and the Atlantic, I pass at once, by transition of thought, from British Columbia to that portion of the Dominion in which I am more particularly interested, and the portions of country connected with it. I refer now to the Intercolonial Railway, regarding which we are assured that a system of the most rigid economy has been introduced in the interest of that particular branch of the Public Service, and in the interest of the country at large. No doubt, in carrying out this principle of economy, the Minister who presides over that Department must have felt that, whilst he was performing an important and necessary service, he was, at the same time, performing a somewhat ungrateful one. The cutting down of salaries, and the diminution of the number of employés upon a road such as that could not but be attended with some inconvenience to a large number of persons employed upon it. But, when we consider the fact that, year by year, there was rolling up a deficit of about $500,000 in connection with that railway, and how necessary it is to overcome the disadvantages which attend upon so long a line of railway, connecting us with our ocean ports, we must commend the course which the Government in this case has found itself bound to pursue. And I think, Mr. Speaker, after we come to study the figures, to learn how far that policy and that course has been successful, we shall exult in the prospect of a very rapid approach to a time when the discrepancy between the expenditure and the receipts will be entirely done away with. Deeply interested in that railway, as the representative of the city which is its eastern terminus, I have sought for some information connected with its management and have been favoured with that information, to a portion of which I shall call the attention of the House, in connection with this particular paragraph in the Speech. I have already adverted to the fact that we have been carrying a deficit in connection with that railway of $500,000 a year. I find that, for the last six months of the year 1878, that deficit amounted to $217,589.17. In operating the Railway, the working expenses, including general renewals, amounted to $1,117,427.60, inclusive of a charge from the General Renewals Suspense Account of 1877-78 of $168,396.03, deducting which, we have the net result of $949,031.57 as the cost operating the railway during that six of months, while the receipts were $731,442.40, leaving us with the deficit to which I have referred. Now, Sir, I find that, in the corresponding six months of 1879, instead of an expenditure of $949,031.57 we have an expenditure of only $753,469.13, and, although the receipts for that six months were somewhat less than for the six months of 1878, namely, $721,277.42, we have to congratulate the Government upon the fact that the deficit is only $32,191.71. I have said that the receipts for that six months were somewhat less than for the six months in the preceding year; but I am glad to be able to supplement that by the statement that, if we take seven months, including the months of January, 1879, and January, 1880, respectively, the receipts for the latter period are considerably in excess of the receipts for the corresponding seven months, ending with January, 1879. We have a total of something near $839,277, as compared with $812,308.42. When, Mr. Speaker, I thus refer to the reduction of a deficit which amounted to $217,500, to one of a little over $32,000, I ought not to omit to mention the fact that the miles of railway in operation have been 840 as contrasted with 714 miles in the previous year, thus showing an addition of 126 miles, owing to the transfer of the Rivière du Loup Branch. The statements in reference to the burden which it was said would be put upon the country in consequence of that purchase are thus proved to have been, in a large degree, unfounded. I may mention another fact in connection with this, namely, that, for the six months ending the 31st of December, 1878, the number of miles run by trains was 1,341,030, and, for the six months ending December, 1879, the number was 1,419,194, showing an increase of 78,164 miles run during the latter period. These statistics may be somewhat dry, but they convey important information, and I have thought it desirable, in connection with this paragraph, to place them before the House, having had the opportunity of obtaining them afforded me. I sincerely trust that the period is not remote when the Minister of Railways and Canals, having reached an amount of receipts commensurate with the expenditure which he finds it necessary to incur on that road, will be able to grant to the country such favourable terms as will enable us more effectively to open up an increased and continuous interprovincial trade. Whilst this burden of half a million dollars deficit per annum was weighing upon the country, we found it difficult to obtain all those concessions necessary to the development of trade. But now we look forward, under the present management, to realising the hopes long cherished on that subject. There are many industries—the agriculture of the west; our manufactures and mineral resources, opening up to some extent in the east—all of which we trust will reap advantage from the improved terms thus foreshadowed. The next subject to which I desire to direct the attention of this House is the realisation to an encouraging extent of the hopes based upon the passage of the Tariff Bill at the last Session of Parliament. It is cheering to see it recorded in the Speech from the Throne that the development of the varied industries of the country has on the whole been very satisfactory. In the east, we have felt some beneficial effects directly from the operation of this Tariff. We have seen our West India trade renewed. We have found that the predictions regarding the manner in which the prices of commodities would be affected have not answered the expectations of those who have ridiculed the Tariff on that ground. We have seen old industries revived, and new ones starting up. We have heard of the Minister of Finance receiving those assurances, from all sides, which must inspire him with confidence in the policy which the present Administration inaugurated, and are prepared to carry forward. But, although the Tariff was a thoroughly well considered and excellent measure, yet, as any work emanating from the most gifted human brain cannot be perfect at once, it is natural to expect that amendments will be required, and I, for one, shall feel under the necessity, on behalf of my own constituency, of drawing the attention of the Minister of Finance to some amendments which will be most desirable.

MR. RICHEY.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. RICHEY: In response to those ironical cheers, I have to say that we may felicitate ourselves upon possessing a Government willing to receive and anxious to consider those suggestions for improvements which may be found necessary. Yes, Sir, I shall be under the necessity of bringing to the notice of the hon. the Minister of Finance suggestions in the way of modification of the Tariff; and I have no doubt that similar representations will be brought from other parts of the country, and will receive due consideration. Leaving the subject of the Tariff, I may now refer to the proposal for Civil Service Reform. I believe that the Civil Service of Canada compares not unfavourably with that of other countries, but, if we are to adhere to the principle which has been adopted, of permanency in that service, if we are to rescue it from the evils to which it has been exposed through the excitement of party conflict, it is exceedingly desirable that we should have some scheme by which those who are introduced into it as permanent servants will reach it through something like a competitive examination which is found to work so well in another portion of the Empire. If that has been found to have been carried too far in some respects, and those who have tried it have had to recede in some degree from the position originally assumed, I trust that the Government, in preparing their measure, will avail themselves of all the information which has been obtained in the Mother Country, as I have no doubt they will, and that a measure will be submitted such as this House can adopt and readily carry through. Our attention is called to the fact that the law incorporating the banks of the Dominion will expire next year; and the necessity for a full consideration of our banking system and of the subject of the currency, as connected therewith, is suggested to us. All will admit the great desirability of placing the banking institutions of the country upon a firm and sound basis, and, as the circulation of the currency of the country is somewhat like the circulation of the blood in the human system—life depending upon its activity,—it is necessary that we should preserve it in healthful condition. I shall say nothing more in connection with this at the present moment than that, looking to the development of this country, looking to the vast resources we possess, looking to the opening up of that great North-West, I believe that the question of an increased issue of the currency of this Dominion may very well be submitted to us by the Government of the day. Another topic, and almost the last upon which I shall find it desirable to touch, is the Insolvent Act. To that subject our attention is invited, and, although I have strongly felt, and felt during the last Session, how possible it was that we should go too far in removing from our Statute-book legislation which stood upon it without some well-considered substitute; although I felt a desire that an Insolvent Act should be still continued, I confess that, after all that I have heard during the year that has since elapsed, and from what I have been able to gather of the feeling of the commercial communities of this Dominion, I am inclined to the conviction that it would be wise were we, for a time, to repeal the Insolvency Act. There are important matters which such an Act as that should subserve: there is the protection of the insolvent himself, the protection of his creditors, and the advantage to the country of setting free whatever commercial talent it may possess. If we can obtain an Act which will fairly answer these conditions, I shall be prepared and desirous to record my vote in favour of such a measure. In the meantime, this Act has not answered those purposes. It is found to be extremely inconvenient in its operation, and, guided by the old legal maxim that "an inconvenience is worse than a mischief," I trust that the course to be pursued in connection with this Act will rather be to abolish it altogether than to indulge in any more expedients in connection with it. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have thus run over the several subjects referred to in the Speech which seem to connect themselves with what we may term our internal affairs. With internal affairs alone this Parliament has to deal; internal affairs alone we have been called upon to consider on former occasions. To-day we are asked to consider a subject which connects itself rather with our external relations, and, whilst we have every freedom in connection with that legislation which pertains to our own country, there are many matters of the deepest interest and significance to us as a Dominion which must be transacted and negotiated through the Imperial Government, and all will feel how necessary, it is that at the very seat of the Imperial Government itself, we should have someone accredited who would have the opportunity and who would possess ability to represent this country fully and faithfully. Anyone entrusted with such a mission as that must be the possessor of rare qualities. He must be a man thoroughly conversant with all the interests of his own country, with a mind wide enough to grasp the general relations of the Empire, with firmness to discuss and enforce by argument all that is necessary to be considered in connection with the country he represents, and an urbanity which will render him acceptable to those he addresses. Such men are rare in any country, but I believe that Canada is not without them, and such a one I have no doubt the Government will be able to place its hands upon, should this House adopt the suggestion which has been thrown out for the appointment of a permanent representative of this country in London to guard her various interests. I shall not presume to detain the House further than to express my thanks for the patient hearing which I have received, and to move, as I now do, the resolution to which I referred in the earlier portion of my remarks.

Mr. HOUDE: Mr. Speaker, if, on the one hand, it is a difficult task for me to address the House on this solemn occasion, to second the Address moved by my honourable friend the worthy representative of Halifax, in answer to the gracious Speech of His Excellency, on the other hand, this task is rendered agreeable to me by the thought that in performing it I find a favourable opportunity of making myself the humble echo of the sentiments of approbation and confidence which the great majority of the people visibly entertain towards the present advisers of His Excellency, for the courageous, enlightened and patriotic policy which they have followed since their accession to power. But, before bestowing congratulations on them, however well merited they may be, it is proper that we should join with His Excellency in thanking the Almighty for the benefits which He has been pleased to shed this year on Canada, by blessing it with an abundant harvest, which has fortunately been accompanied by a visible improvement in the condition of commerce and manufactures. As to these benefits, we have not deserved them more than other people, who have not had the advantage of seeing their land, cultivated by their labour, produce with equal abundance. It is for this reason our gratitude should be so much more intense, more sincere, towards Providence, whose designs are unfathomable, and who often cherishes and saves all, by trials to a nation, as to individuals. And how could we prove it better than by joining cordially in the generous thought expressed in the Speech of His Excellency, to take a little of our abundance so as to contribute to the relief of the sufferings of an unfortunate people who are passing through the horrors of famine? I am happy that the Government of His Excellency should have suggested this practical means of coming to the assistance of our brothers in Ireland in the days of distress through which they are passing. It is an example of generosity given with delicacy, and which will no doubt produce its fruits. This substantial mark of our sympathy will touch the grateful hearts of the high-minded Irish people, and will draw still closer, if it be possible, the numerous bonds of firm friendship which unite them already to Canada. Not only do we compassionate their present misery, but I think there cannot be a single Canadian, of whatever origin he may be, who does not wish—while recognising, on the one hand, the moderation, the prudence, the nobility of the guides of public opinion at home, and on the other the wisdom and the liberality of the Mother Country—to see disappear one day the political causes, the origin of which takes us back to the struggles and revolutions of the Middle Ages, and to which is due, at least in part, the periodical return of these times of distress. I consider that we should be unworthy of the sweet and ample liberty which we enjoy, if we did not desire at the same time to see it shared by all our fellow-creatures, above all by those who live under the shadow of the same flag as ourselves and whose brilliant genius has already distinguished itself in arts, literature and science, from the first ages of our era, when the greater part of the nations which we admire at the present time were much less advanced in civilisation. To bind up the wound which, by impoverishing and embittering Ireland, embarrasses and weakens Great Britain itself, and that without violent revolution, but by purely initiatory remedies, is indeed one of the greatest social problems which has ever commanded the attention of publicists, politicians, and rulers, and the happy solution of which would make its authors more illustrious than the conquest of whole continents. Trusting in the sagacity of British statesmen, as well as in that tendency which, in our time, manifests itself a little everywhere, even in Scotland and England, I do not despair of seeing that desirable solution arrived at, which not only would renew the aspect of Ireland and increase still more the prestige and power of Great Britain, but would have, moreover, consequences almost incalculable for mankind. Picture to yourself Ireland, with her five millions of inhabitants, pacified, prosperous and happy, by the side of Great Britain, with which she has really so many identical interests, ten millions of Irish people spread over the five parts of the globe, living contentedly under the shadow of the same flag as the sons of England and of Scotland, and the rival powers or enemies not daring any longer to count upon the discontent of the Irish in order to paralyse part of the strength of the British Empire, and you will certainly agree with me that it would be a change, the consequences of which, happy without any doubt, for these three beautiful countries, whose interests are intimately bound together by nature, by their geographical position, and which ought to be so too by the aspirations of their respective inhabitants, would exercise a considerable influence on the modern world; and I think it would be equally for the better as to us Canadians. With regard even to the interests of our country, we should have to congratulate ourselves on the disappearance of a discontent and an agitation which, carried to the United States with the tide of Irish emigration, have already obliged us to spend large sums of money in order to provide for our safety in the past, and which have not yet ceased completely to be a danger for the maintenance of friendly relations with our neighbours for the future. Less than a century and a quarter ago, the British Flag raised on the Citadel of Quebec floated as a signal of mourning for the inhabitants of Canada. Since then, our fathers have defended it with devotion on the field of battle, and to-day their descendants carry it with honour on their national holidays. What it has been to Canada, we wish that it may be to Ireland; a guarantee of peace, of prosperity and of liberty. The country has observed with satisfaction that, since their journey to Europe last summer, the right hon. the Prime Minister and some of his colleagues have succeeded in attracting in a greater degree the public attention of the United Kingdom towards Canada, and in giving a more exact idea of its natural riches, and of the undeniable advantages which it offers to emigrants applying themselves to the noble work of agriculture. It was followed by the visit to our vast and fertile regions in the North-West of a delegation of the Royal Commission, charged to enquire into the causes of the depression of agriculture, and also from several competent agriculturists, who all left with a very favourable impression of our country. The Government, therefore, have reason to expect this year an increase in the number of emigrants belonging to the agricultural class, and they propose to take measures in consequence. We have not at this moment the same advantages to offer to other classes, to mechanics for example, that class being already overcrowded here in most kinds of industry. Parliament will, no doubt, second willingly the efforts of the Government to encourage, without too much expense, the emigrants of the first class to settle themselves permanently in Canada, to identify themselves with the country, and to work in common with us to make an inheritance worthy to be the pride, and to deserve the attachment, of their children. In the past, numerous causes have contributed to win away from our country the current of European emigration, and to increase the tide of emigration of our own population; but the principal ones appear to me to be the following: first, the want of a diversity of careers open to the fitness and to the tastes both of foreigners and of Canadians themselves; then, the want of knowledge of our natural resources on the part of a great number; moreover, the acrimonious contests which have agitated the country under the legislative union of the two Canadas; deplorable contests, which hindered at the same time the Canadians of different origins from fraternising together, and considering themselves as fellow-countrymen, and retarded the march of the state on the way of progress and national greatness; in short an exaggerated infatuation for the United States and their institutions. Thank God, these causes of our past difficulties are disappearing rapidly. Thanks to the National Policy, lately extolled by the Opposition, and since then repudiated by them, but boldly put into operation by the present Government, native industry is tending to take more diversified channels, agriculture to raise its head, commerce to develop itself, and a multiplicity of pursuits to increase in proportion. The fertility of the soil of Canada is better known; her climate so salubrious is less dreaded by reason of our winters; her noble and free institutions are better appreciated; the progress which she has made, and continues to make, is more observed; in a word, her future appears thrown into a more brilliant light. Fortunately, also, the establishment of the federal system, while favouring to a greater extent a spirit of enterprise and invention, and consequently material progress under various forms, has by the decentralisation of power, or the division of legislative and administrative labour among several political bodies, independent of each other in the sphere of their respective functions, removed at once the cause of much coldness of feeling, and the conflict of rival or opposition interests. Whence proceeds the gradual extinction of prejudices and a tendency towards mutual charity, because every day people learn to know and to esteem each other better. There are persons who deny the influence of political and legislative systems upon the character of nations; but this influence, nevertheless, does exist, and every attentive observer has remarked their influence in almost every country. Regarding, in this point of view, which appears to me a practical and a logical one, the legislation adopted last Session, one is compelled to recognise that it has had the effect of developing a wholesome public spirit in all the Confederated Provinces, by furnishing the means of showing more clearly the union of interests which exists among the various parties of one and the same country—that is to say, members of the same body—and that one portion cannot be strengthened without the others feeling the effect. This far-sighted policy, this enlightened public spirit which makes it to be approved and supported, causes me to hope that the patriotic scheme brought forward by the hon. the Minister of Agriculture seven years ago, when he was at the head of the same Department as part of a former Administration, will be continued this and the following years. I speak now of the encouragement given to Canadians living in the United States to return to their native country and rendering it more easy for them to go and establish themselves on the lands in our North-West Territory, a country with a great future before it. In every respect, one could not expect to find a class of colonists more worthy of the benevolent consideration of the Government. They are already acquainted by experience with our climate, almost all of them have already cultivated the soil, they have the same manners and customs as we have, they love our institutions and are attached to them, they ever cherish Canada as being their native land, which they have quitted with regret, being forced to do so by adverse circumstances, and with the intention of being absent therefrom as short a time as possible. Drawn away by an illusion, in common with many others, they thought that they might be able to make a little fortune in a short time and immediately return to the country. The greater portion of them failed in the attempt, but they do not the less deserve on this account our sympathy and encouragement, and so much the more, inasmuch as we have need of colonists of this character to open up our North-West Territories to agriculture and progress. It cannot be plausibly objected that, before doing anything to encourage Canadians now in the United States to establish themselves in Manitoba, or some other portion of the North-West, we ought in the first place to come to the aid of Canadians living here who equally desire to go west; for it must be remarked that the Government has not the same interest in favouring the mere transplanting of our population from one part of Canada to another as it has in attracting from foreign countries colonists whose establishment on our soil would add to our numerical strength and to our national wealth. Without reckoning the fact that the return to Canada of Canadians now living in the United States, forms one of the most efficient advertisements of the advantages offered by our country to emigrants who wish to devote themselves to agriculture, at the same time it is a commendation of our institutions as compared with the greatly extolled, perhaps too greatly extolled, institutions of our neighbours that ours contain the best provisions which are to be found in theirs without imitating their most defective features, and I do not believe that this fact is completely foreign to the desire, possessed by the greater number of Canadians living in the United States, of returning to live in their native country. It is a desire which honours them as much as it should rejoice us and revive our devotion towards preserving intact the precious arch of our own institutions. The country will learn with joy that, by reason of the vigour with which the Government has pushed forward the works of construction of that portion of the Pacific Railway between Lake Superior and Red River, we shall soon be placed in direct communication with the sister Province of the west, by a line of railway passing entirely within Canadian territory. We cannot fail to recognise the great advantages which the colonisation and development of Manitoba and the North-West will derive from the immediate construction of almost one hundred miles of railway to the west of the Red River, and from the construction afterwards of one hundred additional miles, being a prolongation of the first portion in the same direction across a fertile extent of land, well fitted for agricultural purposes, and which, in course of time, will attract thousands of colonists if, as we have every reason to expect, the price of land continues within the reach of every purse. With the watchful care which has so far distinguished it, the Government will take care that the great monopolists will not have too great license in extending the line of their speculations, to the injury of the interests of emigration and the advance of these important regions in the way of development and progress. In order to rival with advantage the United States, which contend with us for, and too often carry off, the better class of emigrants by means of the liberal offers which they make to them, by all means it is necessary that the price of our public lands, which we are desirous of colonising should be placed at the very lowest figure. For the first and the principal compensation which the country will expect in return for the burden imposed upon it by the construction of this gigantic Railway is the rapid settlement of these vast and now all but desert regions and the traffic thus to be derived from them through their surplus products and their importations in exchange therefor. The construction of one hundred and twenty miles of railway, to be commenced early in the spring and vigorously proceeded with is a tangible proof of the desire of the present Government to do justice to the inhabitants of that Province. The country will approve of the course of thus redeeming as far as possible the promise given in its name; as it must see with satisfaction that the Government seems to be of opinion that these works are proportioned to the resources of which it can at present advantageously dispose, and that, before putting the remainder under contract, they will, as I fancy endeavour to procure the necessary means otherwise than by new foreign loans, so as to avoid too much drawing on the future or incurring the risk of burdening the present inhabitants of the old Provinces for the over-exclusive benefit of a population not yet located in that country, and which, when they come to dwell in it, will have contributed least to these costly public works. The final selection of the Burrard Inlet route, and of the western terminus of the Pacific Railway gives the Government a two-fold title to our felicitations, because, in the first place, we are thus enabled to put an end to the heavy expenditure involved by the surveys in that difficult region; and, in the second place, because that decision proves that the Government are not afraid to follow, in the interests of the country, the footsteps of their opponents, when the latter appear to them to have followed a proper course. They regret perhaps that the late Cabinet should have left them so few footsteps in which it would be safe to follow. The public will learn with satisfaction that, thanks to the able and economical management of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, the Intercolonial Railway which those who opposed its construction said would be the ruin of the country has already ceased to be a serious charge upon the public chest. There is now no doubt but it will become a lucrative undertaking for the trade of the country, whereby the completion of the Canada Central and the extension eastwards of the Pacific Railway to the western terminus of the latter, or of some equivalent branch will have placed the Q. M. O. & O. Railway in direct communication with the North-West, and a suspension or other bridge across the St. Lawrence, above Quebec, will have linked the latter with the line from Levis to Rivière du Loup. This would be a sure means of largely increasing the traffic on the Intercolonial, while doing justice to the Maritime Provinces, and the Province of Quebec, and of avoiding the danger of the trade of the west being diverted from our railways, waterways and ports, in order to replenish the railways, canals and ports of the Americans after passing through but a small part of the Province of Ontario, from which our friends in that province would profit nothing, while the country in general would suffer serious loss. It is satisfactory to witness in this connection the manifest desire of the present Government not to expose useful and necessary Canadian undertakings to be ruined by unfair foreign competition. It is to be regretted that, in order to preserve the Indians of the North-West from the straits of famine, a large expenditure of money has this year been found necessary; nevertheless, it is still less costly to feed these primitive owners of the land we occupy than to hunt them away as is done in other parts of this continent, to say nothing of the fact that the former course is more Christian and more honourable. In this case the Government has shown itself faithful to the traditional policy of honesty, generosity and kindness characteristic of the authorities of Canada towards these wild children of the forest. The efforts of the Government to habituate them to cultivate the soil and to seek their means of subsistence therein are most praiseworthy, and it is not impossible that, with time and patience, we may succeed in a certain measure in accomplishing, on a large scale, what has been attempted with some success in a small way in other parts of the country. I was specially gratified, and my honourable colleagues of this House, no doubt, shared the pleasure with me, that, in the preparation of the Estimates for the ensuing year, due regard has been had to economy, so far as was compatible with the efficiency of the public service, and it is evident that the Government is awake to the fact that the burden of our public expenditure has about reached the limits marked out by prudence, and that it cannot be largely increased without bearing too heavily on the tax-payers. The proof that the leading plank in the platform of the present Government has not fallen into disfavour with the people in general is the fact that, in the individual elections, quite a number of which have taken place within a year, the friends of the Government have not lost an inch of ground, and have carried several strongholds from the Opposition. From the shores of the Atlantic to the shores of the Pacific, the great voice of the people has once more proclaimed that the country still places confidence in the Administration of the day. The latest echo of that voice which, under our Constitutional and Parliamentary system, makes and un-makes Governments, has just this instant reached us from the great county of Argenteuil. In selecting a gentleman personally so estimable as Dr. Christie, the electors of that county were confident of doing well; but they felt that, by substituting for him a Conservative and Protectionist, the Hon. Mr. Abbott, they were doing still better. I regret this for the sake of the hon. the leader of the Opposition, whose companions in arms are far stronger in valour than in numbers, but I rejoice at it for the sake of the country. The people see the various industries of the country resuming increased activity, furnishing more constant and remunerative employment to a greater number of persons, and, despite the sophisms of Free-trade theorists, they see that agriculture and trade alike feel the impulse given to home production, and cannot but benefit by a better home market induced by a restricting of foreign competition. It is natural in the elaboration of a new Tariff, more especially after a change of fiscal policy, that more or less of a margin should be allowed for unforeseen matters, so that it is not surprising that experience should have shown the expediency of adopting certain changes of detail in the Tariff adopted last Session. It will be our duty to assist His Excellency's Ministers in that task, in place of seeking uselessly to embarrass them. By preparing a measure for the re-organisation of the Civil Service, the Government have earned a further title to the gratitude of the people, for it is time something was done in the matter. From a thorough reform of the Civil Service, many important advantages must result. Offices will be filled in many cases by more competent persons, consequently a reduction in number will be effected; the work will be better done and will cost less; merit will be more easily recognised; Ministers will lose less of their valuable time; the representatives of the people will be more independent, and the members of the Government also. Besides, we may hope that the struggle for public offices will undergo a salutary relaxation, which is much to be desired, unless we want to see the number of public servants equal, or in fact exceed, those of the served. The necessity of a consolidation of the Inland Revenue Laws was keenly felt, for they are obscure, incomplete, and often defective. As regards the mode of dealing with native tobacco more especially there is great need of amendment and modification. While affording us a real improvement in this respect, the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue would afford us a pleasant surprise if, some fine day, circumstances should enable him to tell us that he had taken steps with a view to ascertain what kinds of tobacco would succeed best in this country, and the mode of culture it would be most advisable to teach and commend to cultivators, as is done with respect, for instance, to the cultivation of the sugar beet, so as to substitute as far as possible a native for a foreign product. I see here a good source of future revenue for the Government, and of wealth for many of our farmers. The other measures announced in the Speech from the Throne, in relation to Crown Lands, Public Works, the Indians of the North-West, and the Mounted Police Force, show that the Government has closely studied the requirements of the country during the recess, and sought for the means of meeting them, and that they intend to give us plenty to do during the present Session, a boon for which those who are naturally disposed to find the time hang heavily will owe them special thanks. It appears to me a happy coincidence that the bank charters of the Dominion are just about to expire at a moment when public opinion in the country is loudly calling for the enactment of more stringent laws particularly as regards inspection, in order to afford better security to the public and to the shareholders of the banks themselves, and when there is quite a strong feeling in favour of restricting the sphere of operation of the banks by further extending the circulation of Dominion notes. This is a question of vital importance to the credit and prosperity of this country, and demands our utmost attention, scrutiny and prudence. The Insolvency Law is also a most important question, with which we dealt at too late a period last Session. It is to be hoped that we may not separate this year without having amended it in such a way as to improve many of its faulty provisions; otherwise I should for my part feel bound to vote for a pure and simple repeal, as I did last Session; and I think the opinion of the House is still the same on this subject. Mr. Speaker, the last paragraph of the Speech from the Throne shows conclusively that the appellation "National" applied to the policy of the Government which the suffrages of the people placed in power by so splendid a majority on the 17th September, 1878, is well deserved. In fact, as a Canadian, one feels raised up by its far-seeing and public-spirited policy. In reading this paragraph, one sees the dawn of a new era for Canada, and that henceforth we shall count for something in the eyes of other nations. This will only increase the prestige of the Mother Country, to which we owe these progressive developments of our national existence—developments happily accomplished and which demonstrate both the excellence of the institutions with which she has endowed us and our own vitality. The appointment of a permanent representative of Canada in London will be an epoch in our history. Honour to the statesmen capable of accomplishing such great things without social convulsion or political commotion, who have found other means of making Canada great without diminishing the greatness of the vast and glorious Empire of which we form a part. With great pleasure, then, Mr. Speaker, I beg to second the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

MR. MACKENZIE: Before the Address passes, I desire to offer a few remarks to the House—not that the matter of the Speech affords much ground for debate. Altogether, the Speech contains the promise of the amendments of five measures, three of which have been consolidated or amended already by gentlemen opposite, a renewal of the Banking Law, and, as we learned from the speech of the mover, the abolition of the Insolvency Law. This is the entire programme provided for the Session. The hon. gentleman opposite was accustomed in former years to taunt the late Administration with the paucity of the bill of fare presented, although we never pretended to present a catalogue of our measures in the Speech from the Throne. But no such meagre bill of fare as this was ever presented to a Canadian Parliament. An hon. friend beside me remarks that this is Lent, and no doubt we have here a Lenten bill of fare. I would not complain of it were it from any other gentlemen in office; but, as the present gentlemen insisted in former years that the Queen's Speech should contain a complete programme of the work of the Session, we must assume that this is all the work they have prepared for us. Before proceeding to criticise, as I shall, some of the statements made, I desire to call the attention of the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government, and the Minister of Railways, to the gross indecency of putting special statements and returns, up to within a few days, into the hands of a member of the House, of which all other members have been deprived. We all had a right to those special returns; any paper used by the Government in debate must be produced to the House. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Richey) after telling us he was, to use his own words, "favoured with special information," proceeded to deal with the figures arranged by the Minister of Railways, and we are expected, without possessing the documents, to reply to his statements. I have never known anything of the kind done before. The subjects dealt with in the Speech suggestive of future action, apart from the two or three measures promised for the amendment of existing laws, are those to which little or no exception would naturally be taken. The congratulations as to the harvest should be fervently responded to by the members of the Administration, because, if Providence had not been kind to them as well as to the country in sending them a plentiful harvest, their state at present would be one of complete paralysis.

MR. BABY: We helped Providence.

MR. MACKENZIE: An hon. Minister says they helped Providence; well, I am not at all surprised that they imagine themselves capable of doing even that. However, we on this side of the House will stick to Providence.

AN HON. MEMBER: But Providence will not stick to you.

MR. MACKENZIE: Providential action will be much more beneficial than any ministerial measures could possibly be. I was somewhat surprised at the fervent manner in which the member for Halifax congratulated the House on the emigration policy of the Administration. He said—from his special information, no doubt, not given to any of us—that 8,000 people had passed from the United States into Canada last year.

MR. RICHEY: I said that, of 8,000, 2,000 came from the United States.

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes, and the 2,000 in the first place entered Canada at Ogdensburg and Montreal from the Eastern States, and were then classed as Americans, though really returning Canadians, coming into Canada, and, when they passed through Ontario, and again passed by Detroit or Sarnia into the Western States towards Manitoba, where they were again classed as emigrants from the United States; that method had the effect of doubling the number. But the hon. gentleman did not tell us how many Canadians went from Halifax to the United States, and from the port of St. John. I have special information also, though not from the Government, and learn that from the city the Minister of Finance represents, by the steamship line during the past season, no less than 6,000 left to settle in the United States, over and above the ordinary passenger traffic. How many went by rail-way or coasting schooners I am not able to say. I saw the statement of the United States Consul a few days ago, about a port in my own county, from which alone, it appears, about 24,000 Canadians have passed to settle in the United States. Instead of having matter for congratulation, we have reason to doubly deplore the existing state of trade and business which has compelled so many of our fellow-citizens to seek a refuge in a foreign country. We are asked to congratulate ourselves because a considerable number of people went from the older Provinces to the North-West Territories. I do not think it is any matter for rejoicing that people go from one part of the Dominion to another. It would be matter for congratulation if we were able to point to a large emigration from the old country; but gentlemen opposite were afraid of such an emigration, as they passed, lately, an Order-in-Council preventing the landing of any emigrant at Halifax, unless possessing $20; that is their method of encouraging emigration. I am not blaming them for discouraging unsuitable emigrants from leaving Europe. I know it is matter of bitter complaint in Toronto that hundreds have been arriving every week totally unsuited to Canada, and who never had anything to do with agriculture, but who have been, as paupers, thrust upon Canada, with assisted passages. Agricultural classes should be encouraged to come, and not stopped on our coasts by a demand for twenty dollars. This is the state of matters as respects emigration, and I am surprised that the member for Halifax should not, with his usual candour, have alluded to the real state of affairs. I am informed by some hon. members that, on the train by which they travelled hither from the East, were six or seven families, some, if not all of them, from a county of the name of Cumberland, who were passing to the United States, and that, by the way, some of the children were called Tupper. That train, like almost every other train on the Intercolonial, under the new management, had the misfortune to break down two or three times, and the name of Tupper was very freely used in the carriages, not altogether in a complimentary sense, but one of the urchins bearing that illustrious designation was a little troublesome and annoying, and they had to take care of the child; another was making too much noise, and, at a moment when the cars had broken down, or run off the track, there was a momentary lull in the noise, when a cry was heard again, another voice broke forth: "Shut up you monkey and do not waken Tupper." My impression is that Tupper wants to be wakened very much, and if those emigrants from Canada had succeeded in accomplishing that task, it would have been better than congratulating ourselves upon an alleged state of facts that does not exist. We are told that we are to have the bankruptcy and currency laws re-considered, and the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Richey) tells us, also, doubtless, on special information, that there is to be an increased issue of currency. Whether hon. gentlemen opposite have decided to adopt the bantling of the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace) or not we do not know, but the matronly appearance of that hon. gentleman seems to indicate the employment he was engaged in during the recess. It is true his infant has a rather disreputable appearance; it is, as the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government describes himself—"rather a rum un to look at;" whether it will also be like him—"a good un to go," I do not know. But I can congratulate the hon. member for South Norfolk that he looks and perhaps feels as well as could be expected, and I hope that he will succeed in impressing his views, not upon the Government or this House, not upon the country, but upon the smallest possible number of people; because we only want such a measure to complete the ruin of the country, from the point of decline to which the hon. gentlemen opposite have brought it. We are told we are to have a revision of the Dominion Lands Act, but not in what way. There was no congratulation upon the condition of the land laws or their administration in the North-West. It was only a very foolish remark uttered by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, when he spoke of the care taken in having proper persons to administer the laws in the North-West. We observed during the recess exceedingly improper persons chosen to administer affairs in that quarter. We had extraordinary accusations against some of the agents appointed by the Administration. The hon. gentleman at the head of the Government had one Gow appointed, who was accused of almost every crime against society. True, this appointment was afterwards suspended; but what became of the man himself? Whether he was suspended, as he deserved, or not, we do not know. The settlement of the North-West was seriously injured by the administration of the land laws by Ministers, and, although modifications were afterwards made, we were informed on excellent authority that, in the meantime, they had the effect of turning back a very large number to the United States. In one place in Dakota, no fewer than 856 Canadians had gone with the expressed intention of becoming citizens of the Republic, though they originally intended settling in Manitoba. It is gratifying to know that a very large proportion of the press supporting Ministers were manly enough to condemn the course pursued by the Government in reference to the settlement of the North-West. My own conviction has always been that it is impossible for any Government to make much money by the sale of lands; that it is infinitely better to afford ample opportunity to settlers to obtain free homesteads of suitable size where they can form comfortable homes, and trust to the increase of wealth and business by the increase of settlement rather than expect to make money by the selling of lands; and on that principle the Government of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) in Ontario, of which I was a member, acted in throwing off between $100,000 and $200,000 of arrears on lands sold to actual settlers in that Province. With relation to Indian claims and the administration of Indian affairs in the North-West, I believe it has been most injurious to the morale of the Indians as well as to the position of the Government. Anything that weakens the confidence of the Indian population in the Administration of the country has a most prejudicial effect upon their minds, and it is exceedingly difficult to remove any evil impression thus made. I have been informed that, when tenders were received in Winnipeg for supplies for the Indians, they were sent here with a recommendation of the local officers—they were detained a month, which made it impossible to forward the supplies to the Indian camps in time for their gatherings, thus necessitating enormous expenditure by the Government and discontent among the Indians, and destroying the confidence of the Indians in our good faith. I am informed also on the best authority that the special instructors, with the stock they had in charge sent to the North-West by the Saskatchewan River, in the Hudson Bay Company's boats, had not merely a longer delay than if they had gone overland by the usual route, but that this plan incurred more expense than the entire worth of the animals sent, while the cost by Winnipeg would have been little or nothing. I am prepared to admit that any Government would have some difficulty in dealing with affairs in a very remote country, but no Government is justified in endeavouring to make political capital out of a matter of this kind. This is what was pointed out on the appointment of those instructors and the despatch of the supplies. I am prepared to sustain the Government in any policy desirable in order to the settlement of the Indians and their instruction in the arts of peace, especially that of agriculture, but I am not prepared to sanction such measures as those of last year, coupled as they were in the Ministerial papers with the most gross, unfounded slanders upon the hon. gentleman formerly Minister of the Interior in the late Administration. With respect to the Intercolonial Railway, I am not in a position to discuss the figures and special information of the hon. member for Halifax, but I shall be able at the proper time to show his statements are altogether incorrect. It can only be shown to be managed more economically, when we have a precise statement of the condition of the rolling stock, the number of engines actively employed, the number built since the present Minister assumed office, the present condition of those locomotives, the number of cars of all kinds for freight, with their condition. I am informed that a very large proportion of the rolling stock is at this moment in a most deplorable state, and there is no doubt that, during this very week in which we are meeting there have been a number of accidents to carriages conveying passengers, as well as engines and freight cars which have broken down upon the road. My conviction is that, in order to present an appearance of economy, the stock has been deliberately allowed to run down, and that the road-bed is not in the condition in which hon. gentlemen opposite found it. My duty, Sir, as the late Minister of Public Works, led me to enquire very carefully into railroad management, and I was satisfied, as every railroad manager must be, that the first duty of a railroad superintendent is to get his road-bed in thorough condition, and then his rolling stock in thorough condition. Everything about the Intercolonial Railway was in such a condition. At the time I left office, there was no better equipped road on the continent, no better road in any respect, and I venture to say no better managed road; but as I said last Session, if the hon. gentlemen could effect any economy in the way of reducing salaries and at the same time maintain its efficiency, I should be delighted. I should be delighted now. These remarks have been forced upon me by the very extraordinary course I complained of a moment ago in submitting cooked and partial papers to one or two individuals in this House to which other members are denied access. Now, Sir, about the state of trade. The Speech from the Throne informs us "that the effect of the Tariff of last Session in the development of the varied industries of the country has on the whole been very satisfactory." Well, in the first place, I have to complain that such a paragraph should be here at all. It has been usual to have the Speech from the Throne written in an entirely non-committal manner so that no member of the House, no matter how small the minority he represents, should be committed by any statements in the Speech. We are asked, however, to commit ourselves to that statement, and I have to complain of this statement that it is not true, and it is impossible for us to allow ourselves to be committed to a statement which we believe to be wholly inaccurate. I believe, Sir, that, but for the bountiful harvest that Canada had during the last season, and but for the deplorable accident of a serious deficiency in the harvest in Great Britain and Ireland, but for those accidental circumstances, the state of Canada this winter would be the most deplorable that was ever known. There would have been no precedent for the distress which would have existed. Why, Sir, even as it is, in this city, what is the state of affairs? Almost every second house and shop is empty, and "To Let" is found everywhere. It is admitted by Government papers that there is an unusual amount of distress in the city. I know it is so in other cities, and we are told to go to the soup-kitchen, to rejoice in the fact that a Protectionist Government is in power. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance will attend meetings of manufacturers and their workmen at comfortable places or of temperance gatherings and weep pathetically, as Job Trotter alone could weep, for the miseries that existed before he came into office, and afterwards rejoice over his success in imparting renewed confidence and in procuring more employment. Now, Sir, I say there has not been more employment procured. I say that at this moment there is a much larger degree of distress than there was at the time the late Administration went out of office. I say that the state of trade over the country is infinitely worse than it was at that time. We have the extraordinary fact also that, while in 1878 the failures in Canada showed as the amount of liabilities $23,908,000, in the year just passed, under hon. gentlemen opposite, the failures have reached $29,347,000. Now these failures represent manufacturers as well as traders; they represent all classes that come under the Insolvency Laws. I know, as a fact, that at least half the manufacturers in the country have been seriously injured by the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. We are called upon to rejoice that the trade of the country has, on the whole, been satisfactory, although it is known that the hon. gentlemen imposed a taxation which should have yielded for the State some $7,000,000 for the year; and he has now to confess that he has actually received nothing from the new duties except what is represented by the burdens upon the necessaries of life, breadstuffs and coal. We are promised, I understand,—at least the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McLeod) announced during his election campaign, that he had the authority of the Minister of Railways for stating—that the coal duties would be reconsidered with a view to their increase; and we are told to-day by the hon. member who moved the Address so well, that the coal question should and must receive consideration, and he is willing to have the price of coal increased to his own city of Halifax, as well as to us poor people in Ontario, who must pay the duty upon every ton of coal we consume. I say, Sir, that the state of trade, instead of having improved, has very much retrograded. I blame the hon. the Minister of Finance for this, because he obtained his position in St. John by representing that there was to be no increase, but merely a readjustment of the Customs duties. I congratulate the hon. gentleman that he found so many as forty-six persons to give him a dinner under these circumstances. It must have been very pleasing to him. The hon. gentleman complained in his speech there that I had spoken of him as the lying spirit sent forth to delude the people. I referred to a well-known incident in ancient sacred history. There is just this difficulty in the simile, however, that I can nowhere find the representative of the angel that sent him forth, angelic qualities being scarce in that quarter. In another address which the hon. gentleman made in his own Province, he pointed out that what was really to be looked to in New Brunswick was the fact that it was becoming, or would become, a large manufacturing centre for the West. Manitoba was to be filled up immediately; the waste places in the Province of Ontario were also to be filled up by an emigration induced by the liberal policy of the present Administration. New Brunswick was to manufacture all the goods that this vast population would require. I venture to tell the hon. gentleman that New Brunswick has no peculiar facilities that I know of, for manufacturing purposes, beyond other Provinces, and that it is impossible for a large class of manufacturers to exist at all, except where there are large cities and a large population from which to draw the class of workers that are required. This has led to the failure of several manufacturing industries in various parts of Ontario. It was found impossible for one manufacturer to live in the town of Windsor, because he was only able to procure the class of labour he required from the city of Detroit; and so it would be elsewhere. I have always believed that the coal and iron of Nova Scotia would come into active operation as a large factor in the trade of the country at no distant day. There these are elements of manufacturing wealth, but there are no of such elements in the hon. gentleman's Province. When the hon. gentleman led the people to believe, as I presume he did, that New Brunswick would furnish this amount of manufactures to the west, he was merely indulging in a figure of speech, by which he, for the moment, got over a very unpleasant situation. The hon. gentleman showed a great deal of moral courage, for which I give him credit, in going to his Province at all after the disasters he had brought to that Province, in common with the rest of the Dominion. I admit that the measure of the hon. gentleman opposite of last Session has increased the wealth of certain individuals. I have always maintained, I maintain now—and I believe every political economist who thinks at all and speaks the truth must say the same thing—that no Government can create wealth, though any Government can distribute wealth justly or unjustly. The hon. gentleman has succeeded in re-distributing wealth by his legislation: he has succeeded in putting a million dollars into the hands of sugar monopolists at the expense of the whole country. He has succeeded in building up a few vast monopolies by his enormous duties which are now imposing enormous taxation on all the rest of the country. He has, in the matter of India rubber manufactures, for instance, and in some other cases, compelled the people of the country to pay largely increased prices for, I am sorry to say, a very inferior article. In some manufactures which he has stimulated, he has by the measure we so strongly deprecated last year, succeeded in forcing the people to take what was unsuitable at whatever prices the manufacturers thereof chose to impose. I maintain that any policy which, for the sake of employing a few hundred men, or a little steam power, any policy which deprives the people of the country of the privilege of buying cheaply does a great injury to the country. I am glad that a distinguished Canadian authority of the hon. gentleman's own party took that ground years ago. Sir Alexander Galt, in a lecture in Toronto, pointed out that it would be utterly impossible for any Government or Legislature to build up a system of manufactures in this country by the imposition of high duties. What we really want is an extended market. What the late Administration did was to encourage manufactures by developing markets in foreign countries. Under the impulse given by the exhibition we were able to make in Sydney, in the first six months after that exhibition was held a large amount of goods were sent to the South Seas. I venture to say that, under the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite which makes all these articles dearer, our people will find that that market cannot be kept, and that the so-called protection of our industries has resulted disastrously to the manufacturers themselves. Hon. gentlemen, over and over again, both in the House and out of it, have declared that the policy of the Government was retaliation upon the United States. Within the last few days the chief organ of the Government, alarmed at the menaces thrown out in United States political circles, has endeavoured to prove that that was not the case, that the discrimination was rather the other way. I need not remark upon the value of any Canadian demonstration representing 4,000,000 of people threatening a people of 48,000,000. Why, Sir, that people are strong and powerful enough, have sufficient variety of climate and other advantages, to set your idle threats at defiance. Our policy should be to cultivate peaceable relations and conditions of trade which would be just to both countries; but for a small country to threaten a big one is an act of supreme folly. That folly ministers have been guilty of. I am not at all surprised, but rather gratified, to find that the chief organ of the Government is endeavouring to show that there was no retaliation against the United States in the tariff. I trust that whatever is done with our tariff during the present Session there will be no boast by responsible Ministers—whose utterances must be taken in foreign countries as official—that there will be no utterances which would show that they were determined to destroy the most profitable trade which Canada has had in all her connections. There is one point in reference to our trade that I must advert to for a moment. We are given to understand in the Speech, what we have understood months ago in the newspapers, that the Administration have determined on appointing a General Agent in London. I did not credit that myself at first, because the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government attacked the late Administration because they appointed a General Agent. He declared it was wholly unnecessary, and objected to his continuance for even one year; and I could not imagine that he had so soon changed his ground. The late Administration made arrangements whereby financial matters should be attended to by Sir John Rose, and the attention of the Chief Emigration Agent confined wholly to his own department. I am not aware that this arrangement has worked ill, or that Sir John Rose has failed to attend to the duties entrusted to him, nor has the mover or seconder of the Address given the reasons for this appointment. The hon. gentleman who is to receive the appointment—Sir Alexander Galt—is a gentleman of the highest standing in the country,—a gentleman for whom I have personally the greatest respect, although I am not able to agree with him politically, I am glad to find that the hon. gentleman opposite and that gentleman have become reconciled so thoroughly. It must have been much more pleasant for the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government to be toasted by Sir Alexander Galt at the late banquet in Ottawa as his “distinguished friend and leader,” than to be designated here, as he was, as the Pecksniff of the House. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman will administer his duties in such a manner as to reflect credit on Canada. The only thing to be regretted is that his appointment and their reconciliation took place at the same time. The hon. gentleman who spoke last congratulated the House in the course of his remarks, on the result of the Argenteuil election; and no doubt he and his friends have reason to rejoice over this small victory; and I have personally, as well as in a party sense, to regret the absence of the late member for Argenteuil, who so long and so worthily, represented that county. At the same time we, in other respects, have reason to congratulate ourselves on this side of the House. The hon. gentleman on the other side committed an indiscretion from his own stand point in going to Ontario last summer, immediately after the prorogation of Parliament, and causing the local elections in Ontario to be conducted on protectionist principles, as the Dominion elections in 1878 were conducted. Many of his own friends were unwilling; but he succeeded in carrying out this policy. The hon. the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Finance and the hon. the Minister of Justice, I think,—the two former gentlemen certainly,—were good enough to go to the several constituencies in Ontario, and lecture the people as to their duty to maintain protective views at the elections and the gauntlet thus thrown down was taken up by the Reformers. I was surprised to find the hon. member for Hamilton here when I came into the House to-day. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) is a man whose word is not to be doubted, and, if the newspaper reporters are right, he stated that if Mr. Mowat's candidates were elected it would be impossible for him to take his seat in the House of Commons.

MR. ROBERTSON (Hamilton): I never said so.

MR. MACKENZIE: It was so reported.

MR. ROBERTSON: A great many things are reported.

MR. MACKENZIE: Perhaps in the course of the Session we will come to know who the bad reporters are. We will find out what he did say. It was the general report that such was the ground taken by the member for Hamilton; and the Mowat candidate was sustained in that city. Mr. Mowat's Government was sustained over the whole Province by a majority of two to one. A decided verdict was then rendered against the policy of the present Administration by their own shewing in matters of trade. They selected the ground and that was the result. Hon. gentlemen cannot avoid accepting the policy of their own leader, Why not follow him loyally in this as in all other matters? He may hope before the end of his Parliamentary term that he will be able to reverse this verdict. But I am greatly deceived, if he does. I do not propose to take up the time of the House much longer upon the topics of the Speech, and the measures to be submitted to the House. These measures, and particularly that relating to matters of banking, will receive from this side of the House the consideration to which they are entitled, apart from any political bias whatever; for these banking and currency matters deeply affect all our great commercial interests, indeed all interests. With regard to the Pacific Railway policy I fear that it will be impossible for us to coincide in the views expressed in the Speech and those of the hon. member for Halifax in regard to the expenditure incurred in that work. The first Pacific Railway Act passed by hon. gentlemen opposite, and subsequent enactments, declared the intention of the country to proceed, as fast as the resources of the country will permit, without increase of the existing rate of taxation, with the construction of the work; and all proposals, promises and negotiations were subject to that limitation. A resolution to that effect was proposed in the House first by the late Sir Geo. Cartier. It was successively enacted by the two Administrations which followed, and stands therefore as a parliamentary declaration of policy. I cannot help looking, with great alarm, on the prospective expenditure as being far beyond our resources. I do not object to the completing of the operations, so far as to enable emigrants from Lake Superior to proceed to the free prairies. This might be done with comparatively small expense. It is well known that the late Administration aimed at two things: first, to build sections of the railroad where no other means of conveyance could be had, and, in the meantime, to utilise the water between such points till the position of the country would permit us to proceed further, but building every section on the right line for an all rail route. Hon. gentlemen opposite affect to believe that the sale of lands would defray all expenses of completing the railway. I differ wholly from that opinion, and I enter a caveat against the supposition that we are to commit ourselves to the expenditure which is foreshadowed in the Speech from the Throne and in the remarks of hon. members opposite in reference to it. We will be prepared, on our part, to consider everything that may be submitted, in a fair, impartial, and just spirit, and in such a spirit as may best conduce to the general benefit of the country; but we will not be deterred, though small in numbers, from asserting what course should be pursued, and what course the country demands to be pursued in reference to this and other public works involving an expenditure on the country. Before sitting down I will say a few words about the Ministerial changes. The hon. gentleman at the head of the Government will doubtless give us information when the Address is passed; but I think it is a matter of great interest to us to know how Senator McPherson became a member of the Administration and the presiding officer of the other House—an office to which he will no doubt impart weight and dignity. He published two remarkable pamphlets, containing a great deal that was not true—in fact, very little that was true; but there are certain very remarkable statements in one of those pamphlets about another matter. We find that he condemned utterly and wholly any expenditure on the Pacific Railway; and now he becomes a member of the Administration which boasts of this expenditure, both that which has been already incurred and that which is to be incurred in prospective years. I hope he—or rather not he, but the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government—will be able to give us some satisfactory reason for such a change of policy on the part of the hon. Senator. He wrote the pamphlets, he told the public, not as a politician at all; though he used very strong language for one not wholly committed to any political party. For a gentleman in that position his language was exceedingly bitter and vigorous, and would induce any stranger to class him as an unscrupulous partisan. I have no doubt he will be able—or the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government will be able—to tell us whether Mr. McPherson has understood that there was to be an expenditure on the Pacific Railway, or whether he is now willing to agree to the expenditure so that he may have a place in the Government. The hon. gentleman opposite is to be congratulated on killing a formidable foe in this professed friend. He has performed the operation very often; but we are very glad to have the presence of a gentleman in the Cabinet who goes even farther than we want as to economy in regard to the Pacific Railway. Perhaps there is some mistake in the Speech from the Throne in reference to this subject—either the Speech was prepared before the hon. Senator was sworn in, or he misunderstands it and reads it in the opposite direction from that in which the hon. member for Halifax reads it. It seems, however, somewhat singular that a gentleman so free from party political bias could place himself in this false position in regard to expenditure upon the Pacific Railway. I will not refer to the matter any further. Other matters will develop themselves in the course of the Session, and matters will come up to bring this question fully before the House. We shall be ready to take our share of the public business, and criticise fairly and impartially the measures of the Government as they are presented, while maintaining our own distinctive views.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I must congratulate not only the House generally but the Opposition in particular, on the cheerful, nay, facetious spirit in which the hon. the Leader of the Opposition has opened the discussions of the Session. He is resolved to be merry under all circumstances, although according to the hon. gentleman the country is ruined, although had it not been for an interposition of special Providence, at which he is inclined to sneer, the Dominion would have been utterly ruined, still the depression has not affected his spirits. He has resolved, like a character in one of the novels to which he has alluded, to be merry under all circumstances. It turns out that the hon. gentleman has been reading novels. I did not at first understand why he was so very hilarious, I thought surely he must have given up his Scottish sternness of character and adopted that of the light-hearted hero of the story already so aptly cited. The hon. gentleman complained of the paucity of subjects in the Speech from the Throne, but explained that he would not have complained except for the fact that, when we were in Opposition, we insisted that every measure should be mentioned in the Speech. But that was a Reform Administration and we wanted to see if they had found anything to reform. We, being old Conservatives, cannot be expected to come down with an avalanche of reforms as the hon. gentleman did, and with which he deluged the country for five years; but it will be found before the Session closes that the measures alluded to in the Speech will fully occupy the time of hon. members, and that, what with the discussions on the banking system, the currency in connection with that system, Civil Service reform, the Government Railway policy, and the Tariff amendments, the usual time of the Session will be exhausted. The hon. the Leader of the Opposition has said there is not much to object to in the Speech, except that some of the statements are untrue. There are differences of opinion on that point. We have endeavoured, as our custom is, to lay before Parliament, through the Address, some idea of the exact state of the country, and we believe—indeed we know, and the country knows that, instead of the state of depression in which the hon. gentleman left the country, there has already commenced within the short period of one year, a real improvement, a real development, and I believe that under that Providence at which the hon. gentleman rather sneers, this improvement will continue from year to year so long as the present policy is developed, until the country is restored to the state of prosperity which it occupied before 1873. The hon. gentleman has spoken about the indecency of some remarks by my hon. friend who moved this Address.

MR. MACKENZIE: Not the indecency of the remarks, but the indecency of giving that gentleman documents which are not furnished to myself or to other members.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well, if he looks at the precedents in England, that the mover and seconder of the Address always are afforded the means, and it is only just to have it, to justify the various sentiments and propositions contained in the Speech from the Throne. If the hon. gentleman will read any one of the speeches of the mover and seconder in England, he will find both these gentlemen are instructed by the Government of the day so as to be able to speak with some reason as to the various subjects contained in the Address. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Richey) merely made these statements in corroboration, and in support of the paragraphs in the Address to which he alluded, and the hon. gentleman will find, when the papers are laid before the House, that those statements will be in every way corroborated and sustained. The hon. gentleman has spoken very strongly as to the extravagant policy of the Government with respect to the Pacific Railway, and he has quoted a resolution moved by the late Sir George E. Cartier, that the construction of that railway should be proceeded with only so far as the resources of the country would allow. That was the policy of the former Government of which I was a member. That was the policy which we carried out so long as we were in power, and that policy was only altered by the Government of the hon. gentleman himself, when in the first place, they decided to construct the whole work, specially by the Government, and pledged the Government, under the arrangements made by Lord Carnarvon, to proceed with the road and to finish a great portion of it within a certain number of years. That was the policy of the hon. gentleman's Government. Without any reference to our resources, without any reference to consequent taxation, without any reference to the burdens that would be cast upon the people by that arrangement, he pledged the Government, as a Government, to complete that road, to spend two millions a year, I think it was, in British Columbia, and to finish the whole road from Lake Superior by 1890—in nineteen years—and yet the hon. gentleman now says that we have adopted an extravagant policy and we are pushing the road too vigorously. Why, we are finishing the road commenced rather ineffectually by the hon. gentleman himself from Lake Superior to Red River. Surely he does not object to that. We have also given out contracts to complete 127 miles of road in British Columbia, based on the hon. gentleman's own advertisement for contracts. Was the hon. gentleman sincere when he advertised and called for tenders to build 127 miles of railroad on the Frazer River, or was he not? Was it merely to affect the elections in British Columbia? We must suppose that the hon. gentleman intended to build this 127 miles at the western extremity of the Pacific road. We are carrying out his own contracts between Lake Superior and Red River. I do not think the hon. gentleman will object—at least the Globe, his organ, or the organ of the Opposition, does not object—to building cheap railways across the prairies, to meet the rapid rush of emigrants into our North-West. That is the policy of the Government, and I do not see that we are in any way open to the charge of extravagance or extra vigour, made by the hon. gentleman in his speech just now. The hon. gentleman has objected to the management of the North-West and the management of the Indians by the present Administration. Sir, the policy of the late Government we have found to be very imperfect, perhaps they are not very much to blame for that, because this country is an enormous country, and new questions are arising every moment. A great proportion of the arrangements to be made were experimental. I admit that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) had a vast and unexplored region placed under his charge, and a new subject to enter upon when he took up the administration of affairs there. But I will say distinctly, that, whatever changes we have made in that country have been improvements which experience has shown should be made, upon the system of administration that was found when we assumed the Government. But the hon. gentleman says that we sent improper agents up there. I am not aware that we sent improper agents. There was one man named Gow sent up there who was appointed by mistake, and the moment the mistake was discovered it was rectified, and the person was discharged. With reference to every other man that has been appointed since the present Government came into power, I am not aware that any charge against their efficiency or their propriety can be made. The hon. gentleman says that he does not know what has become of Gow now. I do not know where he is, nor in what part of the North-West he may be—perhaps living under the same roof as Mr. Nixon or Dr. Hagarty, or some other gentleman appointed by the hon. gentleman opposite, but at all events, the moment the error was found out it was rectified, and the person was removed.

MR. MILLS: Is Dr. Hagarty still in the service?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : Yes, he is still in the service. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) has denied that there has been a large emigration into that country. He has said that Canada has been depleted by an emigration to the United States, and has pooh-pooed the idea, that there has been a considerable influx from the United States into that country. I can assure the hon. gentleman that he is mistaken, that there is a real and substantial flow of population towards the North from the United States. I can assure the hon. gentleman that there has also been a large flow of emigrants from England, Ireland, and Scotland. The hon. gentleman says it is not a matter of congratulation at all, that there is an emigration from the older Provinces of the Dominion. I do not agree with him. Every step taken by a farmer from Ontario or from Quebec, or any of the other Provinces which is at all likely to improve his condition is a matter of congratulation. Those men who have gone from Ontario, principally to the North-West, are the best settlers that can be found for a new country. They are accustomed to the system of farming in Ontario. They do not come from the old country, quite inexperienced and unused to our mode of agriculture. They go there ready at once to prosper, bringing all their skill and all their experience with them that they have learned in Ontario. And their places can be well filled. Their improved farms and buildings can be sold, and will be sold, and will be eagerly sought for by emigrants coming from the old country, who are not so capable of encountering the hardships of a prairie life as the people from Ontario, and who find in a cleared and improved farm a state of things very nearly like that of agriculture in the country which they left. I think that the whole movement of population into that country, from whatever source it comes, is a matter upon which to congratulate ourselves. The hon. gentleman charges us with having passed land laws which have been the means of stopping the flow of emigrants into that country. When the question comes up for discussion in this House, I shall be only too glad to enter fully into that subject, and the hon. gentleman will find that, whether it be with reference to the original regulations or to any amendments of the regulations, they were prepared and acted upon with every desire to improve the position of the country and at the same time to generate the fund which would enable the Government of Canada to build the Pacific Railway and to carry out its engagements, without laying undue burdens upon the shoulders of the people. The hon. gentleman says he has always opposed the idea of building the railway or settling the country by means of putting a price upon the land. But, if I remember aright, in days of old, a gentleman not now in this House, Mr. Young, moved that the railway should be built out of the proceeds of the sales of land in that country, and the hon. member for Lambton supported and voted for that motion. And, if I am not very much mistaken, the hon. gentleman, when he laid out the line of the railway running from Selkirk by the northern route specially reserved tracts of land on both sides of the line and withdrew them from settlement for the purpose of furnishing the means to build the railway. The hon. gentleman has declared that the country is still suffering and is in a state of distress. He quotes the number of failures that occurred last year as compared with previous years. The action of this House and the general opinion in the country was pronounced against the continuance of the Insolvency Law, so that every man who was aware that he could not pay twenty shillings in the pound, every man who was aware that during the five or six years of depression that have unfortunately existed he was unable to meet his engagements in full, has taken advantage of the law before it was repealed in order to make a new start. If that had not been the conviction in the country, I think that the large proportion of bankruptcies would not have existed. The hon. gentleman rather objects to the appointment of Sir Alexander Galt as our representative in England. Well, I think the objection is not well founded. This country, as the Speech says, is rapidly developing. We know that negotiations are about to go on between Great Britain and various European countries, especially France and Spain, and perhaps Austria, and it is of great importance that we should have someone on the spot to watch these negotiations. The hon. gentleman knows well from the experience he has had in the Government that it is impossible by correspondence to secure that watchfulness which is necessary to guard our interests in matters of this kind.

MR. MACKENZIE: Is he to have plenary power?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: No, we won't provide that his decision is to be final. The hon. gentleman says that we objected very much to the appointment of Mr. Jenkins. We objected for several reasons. In the first place as Agent-General he was merely to look after the emigration interest, as I understood at that time; certainly no other powers were specified here in the House, or in any resolution or step taken by the Government opposite. He was merely what Mr. Annand is now, a general agent. We objected to the increase of salary; and we objected especially to the selection of Mr. Jenkins,—a most estimable person in every way, but who was the last who ought to have been chosen for the post,—because he had placed himself in personal hostility to the Government of the day in England, and the agent of the Canadian Government should be a greater persona, a person acceptable to the Government of the day with whom he has every-day transactions. The hon. gentleman is in a very facetious mood notwithstanding the depression that exists in the country; and one reason, perhaps, why he is so happy is the success of his friends at the local elections in Ontario. He says that the Local Government was sustained by two to one. Well, it cannot be in consequence of any reaction against the National Policy that Mr. Mowat obtained his majority, because we have had a great number of elections for this House; we have had eight or nine or more for this House. The Government have not lost one seat that they held before, and they have won three that they had not at the time of the General Election.

MR. MACKENZIE: Where are they—in Ontario?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman evidently thought of no other Province, he always considers that the Dominion and Ontario are the same thing. It is quite clear that there is no re-action on the National Policy. We have had some elections in Ontario, and we have held our own there—we have not lost one, and we have gained three in the Dominion. We know that wherever there is a commercial depression it takes a political direction, and the hon. gentleman found, and complained when he was in the Government, that the failure of the crops and everything else was put upon the Government. But every Government must suffer from that. Wherever there is any discontent it takes a political direction and the Government of the day suffers. If there was a feeling that this country was suffering from the continuance of the National Policy, if there was a re-action against the National Policy, surely in some one of these constituencies there would have been an assertion of that fact, an evidence of the re-action by the defeat of the supporter of the National Policy. What, then, are we to consider was the cause of Mr. Mowat's success? The cause is this: the people of Ontario knew that the National Policy was safe in our hands and that they might safely act with regard to local affairs as they pleased. It is idle, it is folly, to suppose that there is a re-action in the country against the National Policy. I think every candid man will admit that the country is rising, slowly perhaps, but certainly, from the Slough of Despond into which it has sunk for the last five years. At the end of another year we will see that the policy which has now proved so efficient in its commencement will have developed greater strength and vigour.

After Recess.

MR. BUNSTER: I do not agree with some hon. gentlemen who have said the Address before us goes too far in certain respects, as, I think it does not go far enough. I am grieved that the Government have not devoted more consideration to the Pacific Province. The country agreed to build a railroad from Nanaimo to Esquimault, and, at the beginning, the British Columbia Government reserved twenty miles of land on each side of the route. They complied with their obligation, much to the detriment of the Vancouver Island population, as settlement was retarded in consequence. I am really astonished, therefore, that the Canadian Government has not considered that Island road, and given the contract for it the same as for the mainland road. It is more desirable that the Island road should be built, in consequence of Vancouver Island having the larger population, and more capital and trade to support a road at present. We have on the Island sufficient trade and commerce to keep a road running and paying from the start in exporting coal and carrying passengers and farm produce. I for one feel very much hurt that the Island road has been ignored in the Address, and I hope that this Government will not neglect it, but that, before Parliament meets again, they will have put it under contract. The late Dominion Government accepted the Carnarvon terms, and promised to expend two millions a year on the Island Road from Nanaimo to Esquimalt; but so far there has not been a dollar spent on it. This is a strange state of things. Where they found it would be a magnificent route, the surveyors were instructed to abandon it. There is no finer country in the world than the Island for a railroad. Hence, its neglect is a great injustice to this portion of the Province. I will now read the following resolutions of the British Columbia Board of Trade on the subject of the Esquimalt-Nanaimo Railway:—

"1. Whereas, by the terms of the Confederation between the Dominion of Canada and British Columbia, ratified by Her Majesty on the 16th May, 1871, the Dominion of Canada agreed to commence the construction of a railway from the Pacific towards the Rocky Mountains within two years from the date of the Union,

"2. And Whereas, in furtherance of the said agreement the Dominion Government on the 7th day of June, 1873, fixed the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway at Esquimalt, and applied for and obtained from the British Columbian Government, the reservation of a 20-mile belt of land along the eastern coast of Vancouver Island for railway purposes.

"3. And Whereas, the Dominion Government have claimed that a commencement of railway construction was made at Esquimalt within the term of two years agreed upon in the terms of Union.

"4. And Whereas, in the following year, 8th May, 1874, the Dominion Government, through its agent, Mr. Edgar, proposed to the Government of British Columbia 'to proceed with the construction from Esquimalt to Nanaimo immediately,' and 'to push that portion of the Railway on to completion with the utmost vigour and in the shortest practicable time,' coupled, however, with conditions relating to the mainland portion of the railway, which were not entertained by the Government of British Columbia, as they conflicted with the terms of Union, and postponed indefinitely the consolidation of British North America, which was the primary object of Confederation,

"5. And Whereas, in consequence, serious differences arose between the Dominion of Canada and British Columbia, which were referred to Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies, the Earl of Carnarvon,

"6. And Whereas, after protracted negotiations, the conditions contained in the despatch of Lord Carnarvon of the 17th November, 1874, to the Governor-General of Canada, were accepted as a settlement by the Governments of the Dominion and of British Columbia, the first condition being 'that the section of the railway from Esquimalt to Nanaimo shall be commenced as soon as possible, and completed with all practicable dispatch,'

"7. And Whereas, the Privy Council of the Dominion of Canada, on the 25th of March, 1875, decided that 'prior to the commencement of any work of construction on the proposed railway from Esquimalt to Nanaimo, the Province of British Columbia should convey by legislation to the Dominion Government a 20-mile belt of land along the line of railway between Esquimalt and Nanaimo,' which demand upon British Columbia was immediately complied with, by the Legislative Assembly of the Province passing an Act, 22nd April, 1875, No. 13, entitled: 'An Act to authorize the grant of certain public lands to the Government of the Dominion of Canada for railway purposes,'

"8. And Whereas, on the 5th March, 1875, the Dominion House of Commons in Committee of Supply appropriated $6,250,000 for the Pacific Railway, part of which appropriation was expended in the purchase of steel rails for the railway between Esquimalt and Nanaimo, and the rails were accordingly purchased and conveyed to Esquimalt and Nanaimo ready for use,

"9. And Whereas, in the year 1874-5, a construction survey was made of the line between Esquimalt and Nanaimo,

"10. And Whereas, no further action having been taken towards the construction of the said line, a feeling of intense and widespread dissatisfaction with the Dominion of Canada was created in the Province which resulted in 1878 in the election of a Provincial Legislature—the majority of the members of which were pledged to insist upon the Dominion carrying out the 'Carnarvon Settlement' or separation.

"11. And Whereas, official assurances were given the Legislature of British Columbia when last in session, that 'before the close of that year actual railway construction would be commenced in this Province,' and the British Columbia Legislature accepting these assurances in full belief that the Carnarvon Settlement would be carried out, adjourned without taking any action hostile to the Dominion interests on the Pacific,

"12. And Whereas, since the adjournment, the Dominion Government has confirmed the selection of Esquimalt as the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway—definitely located the line upon the mainland via Fraser River, and called for tenders for a portion of the railway in the interior of the Province, but so far as known has not taken any steps to proceed with the construction of the railway between Esquimalt and Nanaimo, to which for so many years and in so many ways it stands pledged and committed,

“13. And Whereas, good faith and a continuance of satisfactory relations with the Province require a speedy, active commencement of the railway between Esquimalt and Nanaimo, the construction of which is of vital importance to the development of the resources of the Vancouver Island portion of British Columbia, which contains more than half the population of the Province, and contributes a very large proportion of the revenue paid by said Province to the Dominion,

“Be it therefore resolved, that Sir John A. Macdonald, M.P., Hon. Amor DeCosmos, M.P., Hon. A. Bunster, M.P., and Senator Macdonald, as members in the Dominion House of Commons and Senate of Canada for Victoria City and Vancouver Island, be and are hereby instructed to urge and impress upon the Dominion Government the necessity of making such provision this Session of Parliament as will secure, this summer, the prosecution of this most important work.”

Coming to another very important question as regards British Columbia, I hold in my hand resolutions from the Workmen's Association of that Province, praying the Government for the insertion of a clause in the Railway contract prohibiting the employment of Chinese labour in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. This exclusion is desirable for various reasons. The Chinese, as a rule hoard their money and send it to China; hence its scarcity to some extent in the Pacific Province and Canada generally. We have no idea of the magnitude of the evil befalling and certain to befall us in consequence of the importation of these people. They will swarm the whole country along the line of the road as contractors will employ the cheapest labour. White labourers, English, Irish and Scotch, would settle along the road and add to the revenue and prosperity of the country. Chinese would contribute nothing, except rice were taxed more heavily. Last year, I asked the Government to impose on it ten cents per lb., and opium ten dollars per lb. with that object. The present tax is nothing, and we will have to struggle before very long to protect our own race against four hundred and eighty millions of Chinamen, who can send fifty millions to swarm us out, an operation already commencing, perhaps. Are we to protect a race that has no respect for our laws, religion or institutions, and does not contribute to our revenue, but robs us in various ways, while guilty of practices not to be described? I hope the Government will, before we meet again, watching over the interests of the Dominion, pass orders preventing the immigration of the Chinese. In California they nearly had a civil war on their account. The people of British Columbia have not been visited by any Minister lately, but would like to see one or two of these gentlemen out there in order that they may be able to see for themselves, and report the result of their observations to their colleagues. There has not been a visit to the Province from any responsible authority since the Pacific Province entered the Union, excepting in 1871, when the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Langevin) paid his official visit, and much good, certainly, had resulted therefrom. We should like to see him again, and, with him, the senior member for Victoria (Sir John A. Macdonald). I would guarantee them a reception that would be worthy of the country and of its distinguished visitors. While on this subject, I desire to congratulate the Dominion on the honours recently conferred by Her Majesty on some of its leading statesmen. British Columbia is especially proud that the greatest honour ever conferred a colonial statesman has been accorded to her senior representative, the present Prime Minister, who, in August last, was made a member of Her Majesty's Imperial Privy Council. We also feel proud of the honours to the Minister of Railways, though I must say he has scarcely done us full justice in the matter of the railway, but we hope for a better state of things before very long. The member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) said he was sorry money had been invested in the Pacific Province. Neither himself nor his colleagues ever visited it, though they sent out agents to buy a Province that was not in the market. We are not to be bought. We merely want our rights. I also desire to congratulate the Minister of Finance on being knighted—an honour he has fully merited by a long life of usefulness and honour. But while congratulating these gentlemen on their newly acquired honours, I cannot but express surprise that the important services of another hon. gentleman, the Hon. Mr. Langevin—one of the Fathers of Confederation and a colonial statesman of well approved reputation—should have been passed over in the recommendation for Imperial honours. This could not but be an oversight which ought to be rectified at the earliest moment. I take especial interest in this matter as Mr. Langevin had been closely identified from the start with British Columbia interests, and has been extremely desirous of helping the Province in every way in his power. His report on British Columbia was a recognised authority on all subjects relating to the Province, and had been the means of furnishing important information to the outside world, he was deserving of K. C. M. G., perhaps more so than some of those who got it. I consider an injustice has been done that hon. gentleman; but as I said before, I hope the wrong will be made right before many weeks are over.

MR. DE COSMOS: Before this Address in Reply is adopted, I feel it to be my duty to call the attention of the House to one matter mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. I would not do so if I could reasonably avoid it; but I am naturally expected by my constituents to express their views, with the object of assisting the Government in arriving at such a conclusion as will meet their wishes. The point in this Address that most affects the people of British Columbia is that with respect to the Pacific Railway. I am glad that the Government has at last decided upon a route on the west coast; but the Speech from the Throne and the Reply carry a very singular sentence, as follows:

“We thank His Excellency for informing us that after an exploratory survey of the line from Port Simpson to the Pine River Pass and through the Peace River country, it has been decided to adopt the location of the line to Burrard Inlet.”

Now, one would conclude from that section of a sentence that, as a result of the explorations from Port Simpson and through the Pine River Pass, a decision had been arrived at by this Government to adopt the Burrard Inlet route; but a more careful examination of the sentence does not convey that idea. It would appear that the line to Burrard Inlet is one adopted without any or full information with respect to the explorations by the parties sent out last year. In other words, so far as I can find facts to support me in drawing a conclusion, delay in the commencement of the railway in British Columbia was the main point to be attained by sending out exploration parties, and that, consequently, the Government has delayed the commencement of the construction of the railway in British Columbia for a year or more. If the Government has, without any information from the exploring parties that would warrant them in making the decision in favor of the Burrard Inlet line, decided upon it, I naturally conclude that it can only be for the purpose of delay that the exploratory parties were sent out. I go further: I find that no reason has been given why this route has been adopted by the Government. It is something like what we read of in Scripture: “There shall be two in the field; the one shall be taken and the other left;” and, I may add, no reason given. There were two routes in the field or before the country, and one has been adopted and the other not, and no reason given for its adoption. I presume that, hereafter, when the question comes up specially, we may get some information as to the why and the wherefore of this selection. We have the route selected, but I am not aware that we have any guarantee, judging from the past, that any more work will be done upon it than the completion of the contract between Emory's Bar and Savona's Ferry. We are told further on in this Address that it will secure a connection by steam to the capital of British Columbia. I would much prefer, if I could state that the district of Kamloops, in the language of the Speech from the Throne, is a “fertile district;” that it is an extensive fertile district; but, so far as my knowledge and judgment goes, the words, “the fertile district of Kamloops” convey a false impression to the House and country. The total number of farmers and stock-raisers in the Kamloops electoral district, as evidenced by the voters' list, is only about 69; the total voters' list is only about 126. The contiguous districts may be included under the head of this district; but, if they are, it would make this district extend to 100 odd miles in various directions. I believe the contractors will do their best to fulfil the conditions of the contract for building the road, and that the Government will urge them vigorously to secure its completion. But, representing the feeling of British Columbia in the section in which I live, I must state that there is a very strong opinion, indeed, that the Government has not acted wisely in giving foreigners the contract for the construction of the road. The feeling is that this action is hardly in accordance with the National Policy designed to protect our own people. Any profits made by them will pass out of the Dominion to the United States and China. It is also believed that those foreigners will derive further benefits from the road by influencing their employés to purchase their supplies from certain traders, and thus get a trade monopoly, and under the circumstances, the general trade of the country will not be benefited. I believe the wisest course would have been to have given the contracts to our own people, so that if any profit arose directly to the contractors, it would have remained in the country. The next point in connection with the selection of this section is that the river has been frozen over for eighty miles up thus preventing any approach to Emory's Bar. For one month and over no steamboat has left Westminster and reached Yale. I was frozen up sometime in the month of December, and the last newspapers I have received do not show that any steamer had reached Yale. The highest they could reach was about forty miles from Emory's Bar. Our people fully expected that the Government would do something towards the construction of that portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway between Esquimalt and Nanaimo. It was competent under the vote of the House for the Government to have put under contract sixty miles of that road, but it appears that the Government, for reasons which, I hope, they will be able satisfactorily to explain, did not place sufficient weight on the agreement made between British Columbia, Great Britain and Canada to induce them to do so. In 1872 I asked the present Minister of Public Works whether, if the Government selected the route by way of Burrard Inlet and Fraser River, they would build the line between Esquimalt and Nanaimo and consider it as an integral part of the Canadian Pacific Railway. That hon. gentleman rose in his place and stated distinctly, on behalf of the Government as well as for himself, that it would be so considered and done. In 1873, the Government, led by Sir John A. Macdonald sent to our Province an Order-in-Council asking that we would reserve a twenty mile belt of land from Esquimalt to Seymour Narrows. That was done, and the reserve has been continued from that day to this. At the same time, Sir John A. Macdonald sent out an Order-in-Council declaring Esquimalt the terminus. A further Order came also to the Chief Engineer in charge, instructing him to break ground for the Pacific Railway. That was done at Esquimalt when I and some others were present. A change of Government took place, and, in the autumn of 1874, the hon. gentleman who now leads the Opposition agreed with Great Britain and British Columbia that a road should be constructed between Esquimalt and Nanaimo, and that, as soon as possible afterwards, $2,000,000 a year should be expended on the construction of the road on the main-land. I believe the hon. gentleman was in earnest and honestly determined to build that section of the road. He sent rails there. He sent surveyors there, and passed a Bill through the House, and it was only thrown out through a coalition of Conservatives with some of the Liberal party in the Upper House.

Mr. HOLTON: And some British Columbians.

Mr. DECOSMOS: There may possibly have been one—at least only one that I am aware of—the Hon. Mr. Cornwall, and possibly not him. I am satisfied that the Hon. Mr. Macdonald was not one of those who voted for it, and I do not think the late Senator Carroll voted with the coalition. The leader of the Opposition not having control of that body, as the Conservative party has, he was to that extent excused for not pushing that work on. Now the leader of the Government was elected in Victoria. It had been stated broadcast that he had made pledges to the people of Victoria before he was elected that he would build the road, and that he would do this and that.

Mr. DECOSMOS.

Allow me to state on the floor of this House that he gave no pledges whatever. He commanded the sympathies of the people who elected him. Believing that a man of his large experience and influence ought to be in the Parliament of Canada. I for one voted for and supported him. But, Sir, we all felt and expected that the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues would carry out that policy which they had initiated when in office before; but I do not find anything in the Speech which warrants me in expecting that their policy of 1873 will be carried out. I recollect that, in a speech made by the hon. gentleman, not long ago at a banquet, he said he was elected without any pledge, and that, with God's help, he would meet the expectations of his constituents. I sincerely hope that declaration may be fulfilled, and it is for that object, that I draw his attention and the attention of his Ministers to his former policy, and with a view to taking action during this present Session that I raise this question. Without a railway running through Vancouver Island the interests of the people of that Island would be better served if they had joined the United States. Without such a railway, their interests are distinctly with the neighbouring republic. But, their sympathies being English, they preferred to sacrifice to a large extent their present pecuniary interests with the object of making the Confederation of Canada a reality. I hope that this Government will not pursue such a course as will keep up the irritation that now exists, an irritation that has only been partly allayed by the giving out of the contract for the Emory's Bar Section. The Legislature of our Province has not met for 1880, but I fully believe that, when that Legislature shall have met and the question of railways shall have come before it, it will again ask and insist that the agreement already made for the construction of the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Section shall be carried out. If that arrangement is not carried out by this Government, I believe they will carry their appeals again elsewhere, and ask the aid of the Imperial Government to induce, if possible, the Government of Canada to carry out the agreement of 1874. I believe I have said enough to show the expectation of the people of Vancouver's Island, and I am of opinion that none of the mainland constituencies would object to seeing that carried out. The members of the Local Legislature consider the Government of Canada should by all means build the road between Esquimalt and Nanaimo. The Board of Trade of British Columbia has recently forwarded here a certain preamble and resolutions in which they ask that the bargain made should be carried out. That board is not constituted of a class that is likely to be carried away by mere feeling; but, after duly considering all the bearings of the case, they have sent a circular here that I believe many members of this House have received. The fact that the Local Legislature is backed up by a body so influential, having most of the bankers and merchants in connection with it, ought to carry such weight at least as to induce this Government to take the matter into consideration and obtain a vote of this House for the building of the Esquimalt and Nanaimo line.

MR. BLAKE: I do not rise to join in the general debate, but there are two matters referred to in the Address to which it may be useful to direct the attention of the House for a few moments. The first is the proposal for the appointment of a representative of Canada resident in London. The Address states that "The increasing foreign trade of Canada and the prospect that Her Majesty's Government will enter ere long into negotiations with foreign nations on the subject of their trade and commercial relations, demand our closest attention and watchfulness." This is the primary reason given for the appointment of a resident representative. The second reason is apparently of a domestic character. The Address proceeds to state that "the rapid development of the Dominion is continually giving rise to important matters requiring the support and action of the Imperial Government." With reference to these two reasons for the appointment of a resident representative I have to say that, while I quite agree in the extreme importance of paying the utmost attention to the development of our foreign trade, I cannot reconcile with the true inwardness of the protective and restrictive policy adopted by the Government, any sincere effort of theirs toward the development of our foreign trade. Trade is exchange; and, if you want other people to take your commodities, you must be willing to take theirs; and, whilst you establish, support and maintain, as a part of the general permanent policy of the country, a system of obstruction and restriction as to the importation of those commodities which other people have to give you, it is a farce to talk of extending your foreign trade. It is, therefore, curious that, at the very moment at which the Government is engaged in the pursuit and improvement, as they say, of a policy obstructive to foreign trade, they should propound to us this other policy. As to the internal or domestic reasons which render it necessary that we should continually solicit the action and support of the Imperial Government I do not find it easy to conjecture what these are; the only one which occurs to me at the moment is the proposed guarantee, or other material aid towards the construction of the Pacific Railway. With a very considerable flourish of trumpets, it was announced, as a part of the policy of the Government, that the construction of this road should be presented to the eyes of the English people as an Imperial and National work to which it was their duty and interest to contribute, and the Government was at its own instance, directed and authorised during the late Session, to take measures to procure material aid from the Imperial Government. No doubt, Sir, that business has been accomplished as successfully as the other affairs which have engaged their attention, to which they have given some degree of publicity, but it is one of their good deeds of which we have heard nothing. Neither in the Speech from the Throne, nor in any other way has the result of the English mission been announced to us. Is the complete success upon this subject reserved for the present to be administered to us as a bonne bouche at some more critical period of the Session, or is this in truth the important concern in which Canada still requires support, and which makes it necessary that we should have an agent at the doors of the Imperial Government, in order that the solicitations necessary to success may be made with that importunity which experience has proved to be requisite? Perhaps after all, the importunities of last summer have not been successful, and we are now to reiterate these importunities through a special representative. I have more than once stated my opinion of Sir Alexander Galt, who needs no eulogy from any member of this House. But, although he may become the Agent of the Canadian Government in London, still, to become the colleague of gentlemen opposite, led as they are, would have been for him impossible. We have his views so late as September, 1875, when he wrote thus:—

“I continue to belong to that section of the so-called Conservative party which regretfully acquiesced in the condemnation passed by the country upon the late Administration, and I cannot blame those members of our party who found it their duty to sustain Mr. Mackenzie's efforts to carry on the Government, which he would have been utterly unable to do if dependent only on the support of his immediate political friends. The exigency of the hour necessitated a breach in the former party, and had I then been in Parliament Mr. Mackenzie would have received from me all needful support. This necessity has now passed away, and the Administration must henceforth be judged on its own merits, and not supported from any alleged fear that their resignation would absolutely restore Sir John A. Macdonald to power. My conviction in reference to this latter contingency is, that notwithstanding the great and acknowledged public service of that gentleman, it is impossible to ignore the circumstances that led to his defeat. I regard his election as a regular leader of the Opposition in Parliament, as a grave mistake, which tends to perpetuate the breach in the party, and must ultimately lead either to the formation of new party lines or to the final adherence of many of our friends to the so-called Liberal ranks.”

Men may alter their political opinions; convictions may change on measures, and on policy: new light may dawn on various questions of expediency, under the influence of reason and full discussion; but, upon a question of this kind which had been discussed for years—not a political but a moral question—the judgment of a gentleman deliberately expressed, in language all the weightier for its temperate firmness is obviously irrevocable, and it was therefore quite impossible that he could have become the colleague of the gentleman who leads the government. But, of course, while he could not act with, he may properly act under him; while he would not be a principal, he may rightfully be an agent or a representative. But perhaps even in the capacity of a representative, endeavouring to secure the assistance of the Imperial Government in constructing the Pacific Railway, although not absolutely bound, he may yet be somewhat embarrassed by his own recorded views upon that subject. To find them, it is not needful to go beyond the limits of the letter from which I have just quoted. He continues thus :

"I entirely adopt the views enunciated by Mr. Blake respecting the Pacific Railway and our relations to British Columbia prior to his joining the Government, and if I could reasonably hope that these opinions would henceforward be those of his colleagues, I should on this subject be their supporter and follower. I consider the proposition perfectly monstrous, that for the sake of the sparse population on the Pacific Coast, the prosperity of the four millions of people east of Lake Superior should be arrested and their political independence jeopardized. No one who observes the state of the country can doubt that it is of the last importance Canada should, in its public burthens, afford a marked contrast to the United States. Cheapness is the set-off we have to offer the emigrant against the milder climate of the South. High taxation, which must be by customs duties, approximates our condition to that of the United States, must exasperate our fellow-subjects in Great Britain, and thus, by double action, weaken the ties that bind us to the Mother Country and also our inducements to maintain our own system of Government, as opposed to that of the United States. I believe nine-tenths of the people of Canada are convinced that the construction of the Pacific Railway is at this time, and will be for many long years, wholly unnecessary; they know the cost will be prodigious, and no one fit to govern the country can be ignorant of the fatal consequences of undertaking such an outlay. The frank and honest course is to tell British Columbia that the engagement was improvident and its fulfilment impossible; to offer reasonable equivalents for its abandonment, and, failing agreement, to intimate our acquiescence in her retirement from the Confederation. She cannot complain that the connection has thus far been injurious to her; she would still remain in the Empire and subject to the Queen. I do not consider between members of the same Empire public faith can be construed to entail the most disproportionate sacrifices by the greater for the less, even if not involving both in common ruin. Public faith, in my opinion, is in a much more sacred way pledged to the public creditor, and it is certain that an enormous increase of debt attended by exhaustive taxation, would most seriously affect his position."

There are other passages in this letter which are almost equally important and instructive, but it will be obvious that in the pursuit of his duties, these words will perhaps involve him in some embarrassment and difficulty. Now I wish to say there is some danger that in taking this step we do not grasp a shadow and lose the substance. The step is one of great consequence, and we should guard against the possibility of Canada being from time to time bound and fettered by executive arrangements, concluded during the recess of Parliament under the greater facilities afforded by the establishment of the agency, while the voice of her people is unheard. We are not without experience. We remember one former occasion in particular, when we were told that great honour and advantage had been conferred upon Canada, that one of her sons was appointed to represent her on a commission in whose labours Canada was deeply concerned; and we were told afterwards that that Commissioner, being the agent of the British Government, could not act as Canada's representative in an independent capacity. I do not hesitate to say that the interests of Canada suffered severely from the circumstance that a Canadian represented her in that case. She was bound as if she had freely agreed, when in fact her representative was not free. It was a detriment instead of an advantage. My own opinion is that a more practical and important step towards the advancement of the material interests of the country, and towards the furtherance of a sound policy would be to effect an arrangement by which we should have an agent at Washington,—a man, enjoying the confidence of the people of this country, cognisant of its wants and able to facilitate by personal intercourse, commercial negotiations at Washington which would be productive of important results. Difficulties would thus be smoothed away, obstructions would be removed, misunderstandings cleared up, misapprehensions set right, and the true position set before the statesmen of the neighbouring Republic, from which would result, in my belief, a more enlightened policy on both sides, to the advantage of each. I would direct the attention of the Government to this question, as one of deep importance to this country. The only other topic to which I propose to advert is that of the contracts for the construction of 127 miles of railway in British Columbia. I desire to recall to you that, though the Government asked last Session for authority to contract for not exceeding 125 miles, this was on the understanding that the Imperial Government should be asked to give material assistance towards its construction. The hon. gentleman who moved the resolution said :

"I believe that, under these circumstances, we may look with confidence to the action of England in this matter, and, considering that Canada is at this moment committed to a large expenditure, in permeating the best and more accessible portions of the fertile prairies of the North-West we may ask the Imperial Government to give us substantial aid, or to give us a guarantee which will cost the Empire nothing, to assist us in reaching the rich prairies of the North-West, by penetrating the Rocky Mountains from the Pacific coast. And, Sir, we can go to the Mother Country with additional confidence, seeing that, again and again, having received her endorsement of our bonds, we have always maintained our credit, and have never allowed England to be called upon to contribute a single dollar in consequence of any guarantee she had given us. Under these circumstances, we look with confidence to the Mother Country as a source to which we are entitled to look for substantial aid in the construction of the work. But we are not only prepared to give the sound, untarnished credit of Canada in support of any aid or assistance we may ask, but we are prepared to place at the bottom of that national credit of Canada, one hundred millions of acres of the most fertile land in the world."

The hon. the First Minister spoke in the same or stronger terms. He said :

"We will allow the British Government to choose one Commissioner, we will choose another Commissioner and those two men shall hold a quasi-judicial position, somewhat like the Auditor-General in England and the Auditor-General, free from all political exigencies, from the chance of all political change. They shall be charged to faithfully and honestly administer that enormous estate of 100,000,000 acres, to invest it in Dominion securities, not to sell any land under $2 an acre, except with the joint consent of the two Governments, the Government guaranteeing and the Government honouring, and besides all that, to administer the operation of the railway itself.—Just consider what a hand, if I may use a simile from the gaming table a Minister would hold, who should go to England and say not only is the credit of Canada pledged for this road, but 100,000,000 acres of land are set aside for it, not to speak of this great railway itself and all its future earnings, which is to be built by Canada and kept free of incumbrances. It will be good substantial security for all it can earn over its working expenses. It is a scheme that must succeed, and not all the puny well-directed shafts by which it is attempted to disarrange this great work will have the desired effect."

Again he said :

"But I believe that when the scheme is presented to Her Majesty's Government, and they have seen the Imperial importance of this work—when they see the enormous advantage it will be to relieve the over-crowded portions of the Mother Country, by removing the surplus population into the New Britain in the Far West, they will grant a guarantee where they have granted it before, with this additional security which, without obliging England to pay a single sixpence, will enable us to push on the work and obtain all the money required for this great work on as advantageous terms as if it were a direct liability of her own."

And, after a string of resolutions showing the grounds on which the appeal was to be made, the House was asked and it agreed to authorise and direct the Government to secure the cooperation of the Imperial Government in this great undertaking and to obtain further aid by guaranty or otherwise in the construction of this national work. Inspired by these assurances on the part of the Administration, that the policy they propounded would succeed, and influenced by the formal resolutions to which I have referred, the House assented, as a part of the complete scheme brought down, to the Government, being authorised to enter into contracts for the construction of 125 miles in British Columbia. But there was a special reason given for this assent. The Government stated that they pledged themselves to British Columbia to commence construction during the then coming and now past season. It was, as the hon. member asserted, because there was an emergency, an exigency that the work should be commenced before Parliament would again sit, that the power was asked and given. The hon. gentleman opposite in his speech entered into some discussion as to the obligations in this particular of the Pacific Railway Act; but it is needless to follow him in this, for he did not deny or repudiate—on the contrary he expressly asserted—the propriety of obtaining the sanction of the House to such contracts as these. To use his own words he "endorsed the sound principle that all these contracts should be submitted to Parliament where possible." We were led to believe until very recently that the formal execution of these contracts had not taken place, and the language of the Speech is perhaps ambiguous as to the fact of execution, though it points with painful clearness to an intended completion without submission to the House. It is admitted that the work is not to be commenced until next spring. There is, therefore, no ground for depriving us of our power to deal with this question, and I trust that the contracts have not yet been executed, or, if executed, that they are to be laid upon the Table and made subject to the sanction of the House. There are two distinct grounds on which I claim this right. First, the authority for these contracts was an authority given as part of a general plan and policy, a material portion of which was that the Government were to obtain English assistance for the construction of the railway in British Columbia; and, if that policy has not succeeded, if they have not obtained that assistance, they are bound to give Parliament the opportunity of determining whether they will sanction the execution of these contracts and the commencement of this work, without that assistance. I say that it is an entirely changed state of things, on the assumption which we are entitled to make, in the absence of any announcement in that Speech from the Throne which tells us so many other things, that no favourable consummation of that policy has at this time been reached. We are entitled to assume that the foundation upon which Parliament was asked to permit these contracts to be let, has not been formed by those who asked us to allow them first to build the foundation and afterwards to erect the superstructure. I venture, though doubtfully, to hope that they have not erected the superstructure before they have built the foundation. There is another reason which is equally serious. The hon. gentleman stated that he endorsed the sound principle that, wherever it was possible, these contracts should be submitted to Parliament. He pointed out that the case was exceptional because it was absolutely necessary to take steps to begin the work in British Columbia in the season of 1879. Failing in his expectations, unable to commence the work in the last season, unable to conclude the contracts and execute them, at any rate until within a short time of the Session, it is quite obvious that, having regard to the reason which he gave, and, I have no doubt, honestly gave, to this House, namely, that he expected to begin work during recess, he would have been wanting in his duty if he used the authority which he obtained by virtue of that reason, when the reason had failed.

Having arranged for these contracts so late that the work could not be commenced till spring, and it being thus possible, contrary to his expectations, to submit the contracts for the sanction of this House, the hon. gentleman should—and I shall hope, until he negatives it, that it has been his course, as it was his duty—have completed the execution of the contracts only upon the usual condition that they would be subject to the sanction of this House. What did the hon. gentleman from Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) do in similar circumstances? In the Session of 1874, upon the same statement, made in the same way, he obtained the same special authority to let the contract for the Georgian Bay Branch without the sanction of Parliament, but, as the hon. gentleman was not able to let it until the approach of the Session of Parliament, having found that the purpose for which he had asked the special authority had failed, having found that it was possible for him, without grave public inconvenience, to give the House an opportunity of pronouncing upon the contract, he did not avail himself of the authority, which he had so obtained, but held it to be his duty to make these contracts subject to ratification, and to lay them upon the Table for the free action of the House during the second Session of that Parliament. Therefore, we have the hon. member's own statement as to the rule; we have his own statement as to the reason of the exception; we have the fact that the reason has failed; we have the precedent of the Georgian Bay Branch contract; and for this second reason I hope that these contracts have been or will be made subject to our action, and, if, as the Speech indicates, that is not the present intention of the Government, I hope that, after considering what I have said, they will modify their views and alter their course. For my own part, I believe that, assuming what I have assumed already in respect to the English mission and its results, and even on the contrary assumption, no graver material question is now presented to the consideration of the Parliament of Canada than the question of what, in the present circumstances of this country, and its future outlook as to its trade, its revenue, and its taxation, should be its policy as to the construction of the Pacific Railway. And, that being so, I hope that Parliament will be permitted to pronounce upon it as free and unembarrassed as I have pointed out was possible; but, whether free and unembarrassed, or complicated by the execution, within a few days from the Session, of contracts not subject to its assent, we are, in my opinion, bound during this Session to consider and determine whether, in the present and prospective state of the finances of this country, the public credit is to be charged with loans to an enormous amount, for the construction of a work wholly beyond our resources, if constructed in the way, after the fashion, and at the rate at which hon. gentlemen opposite propose to construct it.

Motion made and question proposed :

"1. That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, to thank His Excellency for his gracious Speech at the opening of the present Session, and further to assure His Excellency,—That we are grateful to His Excellency for the expression of his great pleasure in meeting us again for the despatch of the business of the country.

"2. That we feel with His Excellency that the abundant harvest with which Providence has blessed Canada is a cause for the deepest thankfulness; and that we receive with great satisfaction His Excellency's congratulations on the evidence which surround us of a recovery from the commercial and industrial depression which has so long weighed down the energies of the people."

Motions agreed to.

Motion made and question proposed :

"3. That we agree with His Excellency in thinking that our returning prosperity should direct our attention to the less fortunate circumstances of our fellow subjects in Ireland where so much destitution prevails, and are prepared to give our consideration to the best means of showing our practical sympathy with their distress."

MR. MACKENZIE; I would ask the hon. gentleman who speaks for the Government, in the absence of the leader, how it is proposed to act in this matter? No one, I presume, in the House can help concurring in the proposition here suggested. Everyone will be waiting that prompt assistance should be given by Canada under the distressing circumstance which are presented to us as existing in Ireland. I presume that the Government will not think of waiting until the regular Estimates are brought down, as I hope and believe there will be unanimity in this matter. I think the money should be sent as speedily as possible in order to effect the largest amount of good in the shortest time.

MR. JONES: What sum will be brought in?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: We will wait until the resolution is brought in.

MR. JONES: I would not like to see this Dominion give a paltry sum towards such a service as that. Large sums have been given in the neighbouring Republic, and I should not like to see our Dominion give certainly less than £50,000 sterling. I think the House, at the present moment, would give their consent that the Finance Minister should be allowed to telegraph to the other side of the sea that this Dominion will be willing to give £50,000 sterling for that purpose.

MR. ANGLIN: I would ask the Hon. the Minister of Finance what he thinks will be the earliest day, for the delay of a week may be a serious matter, and render our gift less valuable than it would be if promptly made. I am satisfied that if the Government propose on Monday next a vote in this House, authorising them to forward any sum of money that they may determine upon, the vote will pass unanimously. They will be quite justified in acting upon it, and afterwards bringing the amount in, in the Estimates in the ordinary way, but, if we are to wait until the Estimates come down, we may have to wait two, three or four weeks, and all that time thousands of people are famishing. It is to many of them a matter of life and death. Some time ago, I observed a letter from the Hon. S. G. Osborne in the London Times, in which he urged upon the people of England the importance of speedy action, and stated what he saw in the great famine of 1847, when a very large sum of money was contributed in England, and distributed carefully in Ireland; but, notwithstanding, it arrived too late to save hundreds of thousands of people from dying of starvation, and dying after, in some instances, they had had plenty of food to eat. Their system was so debilitated that they were unable to assimilate the food, which, in some instances, they consumed in large quantities. That accords with the result of my own observation during that dreadful visitation. I saw persons who, day after day, consumed more food than they would consume under ordinary circumstances; and, notwithstanding this, were dying of famine. Prompt action is of great importance in this matter. Whatever we are willing to do should be done at once. Whatever the Government is prepared to propose, if it be only as generous as it should be, I am satisfied the House will concur in.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: As His Excellency the Governor-General introduced into this paragraph of his Speech an expression of gratitude to Providence for having blessed us with a bountiful harvest, it did appear to the members of his Administration that it was a favourable opportunity to show their appreciation of the blessings that had been bestowed upon the Dominion of Canada by giving of our substance to aid those who were not similarly blessed. The Government felt that, on both sides of the House, no matter what might be the political opinions of members of Parliament, whatever proposition was made would be heartily responded to. I can only say to the hon. member who has just taken his seat that any contribution which the Parliament of Canada may make will not be made less valuable by any unnecessary delay, even the delay of an hour.

MR. MILLS: Since the hon. gentleman is anxious to secure in this matter the cooperation of both sides of the House, it would have been well that the answer to the Address had been put in such a form as to make it acceptable to both sides of the House. The hon. gentleman says in this paragraph "that we agree with His Excellency in thinking that our returning prosperity should direct our attention," &c. Now, a large number of gentlemen on this side of the House do not subscribe to the hon. gentleman's views with regard to returning prosperity, and why should he, in calling upon the House to grant aid to the people of Ireland in their suffering, undertake, at the same time, to force upon hon. gentlemen on this side of the House his view of the political situation of this country? If the hon. gentleman is so anxious, as he says he is, to meet the views of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, he might alter the phraseology of the paragraph in this way: "That we thank

His Excellency for directing our attention" &c, leaving out those words that the hon. gentleman knows right well are contested. I do not believe that the prosperity of this country is at this moment returning. I do not believe that the hon. gentleman has done anything to promote the prosperity of the country: and, holding this view honestly, and I believe as intelligently as the hon. gentleman holds to his own view, why should he in calling for aid to the Irish people—aid which I believe we on higher grounds are bound to grant—undertake to connect it with the political views of the hon. gentleman on the financial condition of this country?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: If the Government had asked in this resolution a vote of money, and compelled the House to adopt both, then there would have been something in my hon. friend's position, but it is not the intention of the Government to ask a vote on this resolution. If they had done so, then it might be a question whether this House saw anything objectionable in the paragraph which might involve an expression of opinion on the financial position of the country. We intend that it shall be a separate and distinct proposition, that both sides of the House will unite in.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman will see that the reason for giving aid to Ireland is that our returning prosperity should direct our attention to it. Of course our attention is directed to it by the fact that it is in the Speech, but the returning prosperity does not direct our attention to it. There has been no returning prosperity, but a deeper distress.

MR. CASEY: It may be that, in some sections of our own country, returning prosperity may call attention to distress in Ireland. But there are other causes in some sections which may have the same effect. In the city of Quebec, at least, it is more likely that the local distress may create sympathy with Ireland. L'Evenement, a paper which has gone over to the Government on the question of Protection, says that the distress in Quebec is something extreme. In an article published a short time ago on this very question—relief for Ireland—L'Evenement pointed out a parallel that existed between the condition of the city of Quebec and the condition of Ireland. Some time before that, this paper had published a story about a poor woman having had to kill and roast a cat to keep her children from starvation. This story having been challenged by the Chronicle of Quebec, L'Evenement returned to the charge, and stated that the story was actually true. It proceeds:

"For three or four months we have called attention to the destitution which desolates some districts of our city, and have appealed to public charity. And, we repeat it the destitution in Quebec is greater this winter than it has ever been. It has been given to ourselves to enter certain houses, and to see little children of a year old and less dragging themselves along the bare cold floor, naked, absolutely naked, whose mother tried to hide their nakedness by snatching them up and half covering them with her apron or a fold of her dress. There was no fire in the house. In a corner stood a dirty bunk serving instead of a bed. The night before, these poor people had sapped on a mouthful of dry bread, and that morning, the meagre provisions of the evening before being exhausted, nobody had breakfasted. They would have to go dinnerless and perhaps supperless.

"One may be certain that there are a large number of people (foule de gens) who go without food for days together. These poor people have seen better days when they dispensed charity themselves. This is why they do not and will not beg, and why it is hard to find them out."

Here we find that in the City of Quebec, one of the most important manufacturing centres in the country, a paper supporting the Protectionist policy of the Government—a policy which was to bring about returning prosperity—states that people are as necessitous and as deserving of assistance as the people of Ireland. To show this is no mere supposition, the same newspaper goes on to state:

"The generous movement in favour of unhappy Ireland meets with our most profound sympathy. * * * There is destitution in Quebec, there is the same in Ireland. * * * The members of the St. Vincent de Paul Society have done impossibilities hitherto, and now their resources are nearly exhausted. The number of poor who have asked relief from it this year is twice as large as last year."

I infer from the article that they based their application for sympathy to Ireland on the fact that the people in Quebec know what starvation is themselves. I think it would be much more correct, as far as the people of Quebec are concerned, if this resolution would state that, in consequence of the profound distress in many parts of Canada, our sympathies are warmly excited for people in the same condition in Ireland, and that we ought to afford them some relief.

MR. CARON: I am quite surprised at the deep interest which my hon. friend takes in the famine-stricken people of the city of Quebec. The hon. gentleman has told us that his information came from a paper which formerly supported his party. I have no doubt that the gentleman who wrote that article was simply intending to crack a joke at the expense of the hon. gentleman who at present takes such a deep interest in Quebec matters. I do not represent the city of Quebec, but I live within its walls. I am largely engaged in business there, and I may say I have better opportunities of observing what is going on in our city than the hon. gentleman, who gets his opinion from the newspaper formerly supporting his party. We always have, of course, in a large city like Quebec, more or less poverty at this season of the year but I can say, and I believe I will be borne out in my statement by every gentleman acquainted with the city, that in the city of Quebec this winter we have not had to deplore as great distress as last year or the year before; consequently my hon. friend is mistaken about the effects of the National Policy in Quebec, and I am sorry that he should be disappointed in his endeavours to make a point against the Government about its adoption. As for aid to Ireland, I agree with what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) has said. I believe it is our duty to help the people of Ireland in their deep affliction and distress, and I have no doubt that the Government will take proper measures to render assistance as quickly as possible. In extending a helping hand across the waters to the Irish, Canada should act in a manner worthy of herself, and worthy of the position she holds as containing within her borders so large a proportion of Irish people who have helped to build up this country.

MR. PLUMB: I had no intention of taking part in the discussion of the Address which has been so ably moved and seconded, and which meets with the hearty approval of the large majority of the members present. I have been much gratified to observe that the proposition to afford aid to the suffering people of Ireland has been received with marked and cordial approval by both sides of the House, and that a consensus of feeling and a generous spirit is manifest with regard to it. I was pained and disappointed when the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) rose and brought into the discussion the spirit of narrowness, illiberality, carping and prejudice, which we have seen him always ready to infuse into the debates in this House in which he takes part. I thought this subject would appeal to more generous sympathy in that hon. gentleman's bosom than he usually evinces, but the moment he began to speak it was perceptible that he intended to drag down even this painful subject to the contemptible level of a low partisan view, and to endeavour to chill the kindly enthusiasm of the House by turning it into an issue based upon an unworthy quibble. The Address merely affirms the intention of aiding the sufferers. There is no definite resolution before the House in respect to it, and there is no excuse for the sneering cavil of the hon. member. When the proposition comes up, as the Finance Minister has promised it shall speedily come up, it will doubtless be made acceptable to the whole House, and will then be a legitimate subject for examination and debate. I was pained but scarcely surprised to observe the position taken by the hon. member, but, when he was followed by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), I felt sure that the hon. gentleman's objections were to be supplemented by something still more illiberal and unworthy, through the flippancy of the hon. member for West Elgin and his self-sufficiency and incapacity for approaching any subject without betraying his peculiar characteristics. The hon. member's remarks were utterly out of place, and I mistake the temper of the House if they met with the approval of either side, and I feel warranted in expressing the belief that the whole House will be found in accord with the Government in affording promptly such a measure of relief to the poor sufferers as will be worthy of Canada, and will signify that her representatives here are not unmindful of her debt to the country that has furnished men to subdue her forests and open up her avenues of commerce and traffic. I have listened with painful interest to the feeling appeal of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), who was an eye-witness of the terrible sufferings of his fellow-countrymen in the famine of 1847, and whose remarks should have elicited a very different response from that which we have just heard from the gentlemen near him. I trust the tone of the hon. members for Bothwell and West Elgin will not be adopted by any other members of this House, and that we will all shake hands upon this question, laying aside party differences in view of the harrowing needs to which we are called upon to minister, and I believe that the Government will speedily bring forward a measure that will be in full accord with the feeling of the House, and meet with its unanimous and enthusiastic support.

Motion agreed to.

Motion made and question proposed :

"4. That we are sensible that we have reason to congratulate ourselves on the number of settlers who have during the past year come into our North-West from Great Britain and the United States, as well as from the older Provinces of the Dominion. That we are glad to believe that the visit of two members of the Royal Commission on the agricultural distress in the Mother Country, and the favourable report of the tenant farmers, who, at the instance of His Excellency's Government have examined into the farming capabilities of the Dominion, will largely increase the number of emigrants during the present year. That we are aware that preparations must be made for their reception, and that our best attention will be willingly given to this subject."

MR. MILLS: I would ask the hon. gentleman whether he would not strike out the words "sensible that we have had reason" in the first line and insert the words "We are glad to be informed that we have had cause."

MR. ANGLIN: It is well that it should be understood at once that several gentlemen on this side of the House object very strongly to the wording of nearly every one of these resolutions. Whether the Government intended to force us into moving amendments to the resolutions and, by making use of their large majority, to give us several hearty thrawings that we may appear in a every small minority on the Journals at the opening of the Session, or whether it was merely to annoy and worry us on this side of the House, I will not pretend to say. The wording of this resolution is highly objectionable. It must have been known to those who prepared the Speech that these words were objectionable to hon. members on this side of the House. I do not know that it is the intention of any one to propose an amendment. It is not, I presume, the intention of any one to ask for a division on the Address or on any particular paragraph, but I think it is our duty to let this go to the country that, while we allow the Address to pass without pressing amendments, we distinctly state that we object to several declarations made in the various paragraphs, and that we do not consider ourselves bound by the expression of any opinions which we are asked to express in this Address. Entering that protest, perhaps it would be as well to allow the Address to pass paragraph by paragraph without making any special objection to the expressions. It seems to be the desire of all parties to get through with the Address this evening. We certainly could not do so if we were merely to point out how objectionable many of these paragraphs are and how they are calculated to bind us to the expression of opinions which are not our opinions, and how they are perhaps deliberately calculated to place us in a false position before this House and the country. Perhaps we shall relieve ourselves from any responsibility by declaring once for all that we regard the whole form of this Address, and many of the expressions it contains, and many declarations set forth in it as highly objectionable and contrary to our views of what is right, and contrary to our opinions of what are the facts and what the circumstances of the country are.

MR. MACDONNELL: I cannot allow a clause to pass unnoticed, and particularly that part of it which asks us to congratulate ourselves upon the fact that a part of the North-West has been built up by persons removing from the older Provinces. I cannot understand how the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals can support such a clause as that. I cannot understand how the hon. mover of the answer to the Speech from the Throne can bring himself to support that clause. Is it possible that representatives of the Province of Nova Scotia, from which thousands of persons have departed for the United States and Manitoba and the North-West, can congratulate themselves upon the fact, when that Province is in such a state of want of prosperity, that there is such distress there, that the farmers have had to leave the country and seek a home elsewhere in order to gain a livelihood. It is a fact that many of our miners have left the Province of Nova Scotia. Is it to better their circumstances? I suppose it is—their circumstances require bettering. I see in that, however, no cause for congratulation and I cannot allow this clause to pass without entering my protest.

Motion agreed to.

"5. That we learn with great satisfaction that every effort has been made to hasten the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway from Lake Superior to Red River, and that no doubt is entertained that the Railway will be opened for traffic between those important points within the time specified in the contracts; that under the authority given by Parliament last session, nearly one hundred miles from the Red River to the western boundary of Manitoba has been placed under contract, and tenders are about being asked for for the construction of another hundred miles from the boundary westward; and that the completion of these two sections will, at an early day, afford railway facilities through two hundred miles of the most fertile land in the North-West. That we thank His Excellency for informing us, that after an exploratory survey of the line from Port Simpson to the Pine River Pass, and through the Peace River country, it has been decided to adopt the location of the line to Burrard Inlet; that contracts have been awarded for one hundred and twenty-seven miles of the railway between Emory's Bar, on the Fraser River, and Savona's Ferry; that this work will be vigorously proceeded with so soon as the spring opens; and that its construction will complete the most difficult portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and secure the connection by steam of the fertile district of Kamloops with the capital of British Columbia."

MR. BARNARD: I would not undertake to say anything on this question at present, were I not given to understand that the speech of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos) was calculated to mislead the House and create the impression that the people of British Columbia were not satisfied with the selection of the railway route made—the 130 miles section referred to in the Speech. I was in that hon. gentleman's constituency when the news arrived that the Government had adopted the Burrard Inlet route, and have no hesitation in saying that it was gladly received by almost every individual. I can fairly challenge that hon. gentleman to find a baker's dozen of his supporters to say the route chosen is not the proper one. With regard to his complaint of the delay last year, I would simply say that, on all occasions, when delays were sought, he assisted in obtaining them in the hope that a route more consonant with his views would be adopted. It ill becomes any hon. gentleman from Victoria or British Columbia to take ground against the present location. It was decided upon after mature consideration, by both Governments, and met the views of the people of British Columbia. The reason for the present selection is well understood there, as there exists between the frontier of British Columbia and the interior, or grain, growing portion of the country, the great canon of the Frazer, where the cost of transport is so great that I believe there has not been transported a bushel of grain for export or consumption at the seaboard. The whole frontier is being supplied with flour made in the State of Oregon. Nay, the farmers of Vancouver Island and the lower Mainland are using Oregon flour, while there is abundance of the home-made article in the interior. The completion of this section of the Railway will bring the two sections of country referred to in the Speech together, and enable the farmers of the interior to supply the increasing demand which is being created at the seaboard. The hon. gentleman speaks of the small number of farmers settled near Kamloops. Is it any wonder that there are so few farmers in that section, or that people hesitate to settle on lands so situated, or that little or no grain is grown in the interior? The reasons are obvious. There is no market whatever. The remarks of the hon. gentleman astonished me the more because the first speech I ever heard him make in reference to the railway was one in which he extolled this route, selected it as the only one that would be of any service to British Columbia. He was eloquent in his advocacy of this route and of the connection of the rich districts of the interior with the seaboard of British Columbia. I regret exceedingly that any British Columbia representative should have spoken as he has to-night. I do not think that we ought to regard this as a purely British Columbia question. The Pacific Railway was not designed for British Columbia, any more than British Columbia was made for that Railway. It is part and parcel of the great political scheme chalked out at Confederation—the great transcontinental railway is to be built in the interest of the Dominion, and not in that of British Columbia alone.

Motion agreed to on a division.

Motion made and question proposed :

“ 6. That it gives us much pleasure to know that the adoption of a rigid system of economy in the management of the Intercolonial Railway has, without impairing the efficiency of its working, effected such a diminution of expenses as to warrant the belief that the country will in future be relieved from any considerable burden in connection with its operation.”

Motion agreed to.

“ 7. That we are aware that, in consequence of the entire failure of the usual food supply of the Indians in the North-West, a large expenditure must have been necessarily incurred to save them from starvation; and that we share the hope expressed by His Excellency, that the efforts which are now being made to settle the several bands on the reserves, and to induce them to betake themselves to the cultivation of the soil, may prevent the necessity of similar calls for relief in the future.”

MR. MILLS : I have not the pleasure of knowing, like the hon. gentleman at the head of the Department to which this paragraph refers, that the Intercolonial Railway has been managed with a great deal of economy. The general impression abroad is that the facts would not bear out this statement. The hon. gentleman might insert, instead of the word “know” the words “we are informed”; that is the usual course adopted. Hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches, when on this side of the House, frequently asked to have the phraseology of the Address changed, that it might be unobjectionable. I think that we must either insist on a change of this resolution, or upon its being carried on a division. The change I propose would make the paragraph more acceptable to this side of the House.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER : I am quite certain that no alteration would meet the hon. gentleman's views, but one substituting for the words “much pleasure” as regards the effecting of economies the word “displeasure.”

MR. MILLS : We do not know anything about your economy; on the contrary, we know it is not the fact.

Motion agreed to on a division.

Motion made and question proposed :

“ 8. That we thank His Excellency for the assurance that the Estimates for the ensuing year will be laid before us, and that they have been prepared with all due regard to economy."

MR. MILLS: This is a not less objectionable paragraph. We are not aware that in consequence of the "entire failure" of the food of the Indians, an unusual supply was required. I believe there was not an entire failure of the food supply, but that there was a very considerable number of buffalo, and the usual supply of fish on which the Indians partially subsisted. If there had been an entire failure, these gentlemen would have been obliged to feed the Indians the whole year at the public expense. Will hon. gentlemen opposite say this was done? We are certainly not aware of the fact asserted, and we do not believe that Ministers are. It seems most extraordinary to call on the House to state as a fact in reply to the Speech something known to be contrary to the fact. I would suggest in place of the word "aware", the words "that we regret to learn" in the first line "has" instead of "must have" in the second line, and "we trust that the hope expressed by Your Excellency may be realised", instead of "we share the hope expressed by Your Excellency" in the third line.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I think there is certainly something in what the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says, that the failure was not entire; but there was a large failure, and there is a very large amount of distress.

MR. MILLS: A partial failure would cause that.

Motion agreed to on a division.

Motion made and question proposed :

"9. That we shall be well pleased to find that the effect of the tariff of last Session in the development of the varied industries of the country, has on the whole been very satisfactory, and that we shall willingly give our attention to any amendments of which the experience acquired since it came into operation in March last, may have suggested the expediency."

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: If a paragraph had been desired, calculated to make it impossible for the Opposition to concur in the Address, this would have been the one that would have suggested itself to the Finance Minister. I am willing to make a compromise with him, and to leave the entire resolution as it stands, with the addition of three or four words like these:—"The effect of the Tariff has been very satisfactory to Messrs. Redpath, Drummond and certain cotton manufacturers."

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: We are not astonished that the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, and those who sit near him, cannot comfortably vote for this paragraph. They are not pleased that the effect of the Tariff on our industries has been satisfactory—that is the trouble.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: We question your facts.

MR. GAULT: I am very happy to say that not only sugar refining, but cotton manufacturing and the whole trade of the country has been benefited by the Tariff. We have hundreds of houses now occupied in Montreal, as a consequence of the Tariff, that were formerly untenanted. Coming from my own house in the western suburbs of Montreal the day before yesterday, of 83 houses formerly idle, I could find but 27. In St. Antoine Ward and Point St. Charles, two very important suburbs, many houses used to be unoccupied, and many people were unable to pay rent. Now, I am happy to say, the people are fully occupied, and all the manufactories are working. One gentleman told me he was making castings for 400 railway cars for the Grand Trunk. Every industry in Montreal is fully occupied. No man stands higher to-day in Montreal than the Finance Minister; he is the most popular man in the city. I hope the policy he has inaugurated will be continued ten years, when we will see this country prosperous.

MR. MACKENZIE: It is very clear that the hon. gentleman who has just spoken has the best possible reason for cottoning to the Government.

MR. GAULT: I have stock in every industry in Montreal, besides the cotton, that yields a profit. I am not like hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side, many of whom boast that they do not hold a share of stock in the Dominion.

Motion agreed to on a division.

Motion made and question proposed :

"10. That any Bills for the better organisation of the Civil Service, for the consolidation of the Inland Revenue laws, and for the amendment of the Acts relating to the Dominion lands, to the Public Works, to the Indians of the North-West, and to the Mounted Police Force, which His Excellency may cause to be laid before us, shall receive our most careful consideration.

MR. MILLS.

"11. That we are aware that the Acts incorporating the Banks of the Dominion will expire next year, and that we agree with His Excellency that the present would seem a favourable time for a full consideration of our Banking system and of the subject of the currency as connected with that system."

Motions agreed to on a division.

Motion made and question proposed :

"12. That the subject of the laws relating to Insolvency will undoubtedly engage our attention."

MR. PATERSON (South Brant) : I desire to say a word in reference to that point. It seems evident from the remarks of the mover of these resolutions—I suppose those remarks were in a measure somewhat inspired; and the allusion in the Speech being very vague, we are forced to accept his remarks as to the probable action of the Government and wait—from that it would appear that the intention is to allow a Repeal Bill to pass. All I have to suggest or ask in the interests of the country is that they will facilitate in every way the passing of the Repeal Bill, if such is their intention, as it is very desirable, if that course is determined upon, that it should be done as quickly as possible, in order that we may not have a very large crop of insolvencies before it takes place.

Motion agreed to.

Motion made and question proposed :

"13. That we know that the increasing foreign trade of Canada and the prospect that Her Majesty's Government will enter ere long into negotiations with foreign nations on the subject of their trade and commercial relations, demand our closest attention and watchfulness, while the rapid development of the Dominion is continually giving rise to important matters requiring the support and action of the Imperial Government, and that we are therefore ready to consider the recommendation of His Excellency, with the concurrence of Her Majesty, to sanction the appointment of a permanent representative of Canada in London to guard her various interests."

Motion agreed to on a division.

Motion made and question proposed :

"14. That we feel deeply the great importance of the subjects His Excellency has mentioned, and are grateful to him for the full confidence in our wisdom and patriotism with which he is pleased to say that he commends them to our best consideration."

Motion agreed to.

Ordered, That the said Resolution be referred to a Select Committee, composed of Sir

S. L. Tilley, Sir Charles Tupper, Mr. Langevin, and Messrs. Richey and Houde, to draft an Address pursuant thereto.—(Sir Samuel L. Tilley.)

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY, from the Committee, reported the draft of an address which was read the second time and agreed to. (To be presented by Privy Councillors.)

SUPPLY.

Resolved That this House will, on Friday next, resolve itself into a Committee, to consider of a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.—(Sir Samuel L. Tilley.)

WAYS AND MEANS.

Resolved, That this House will, on Friday next, resolve itself into a Committee, to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.—(Sir Samuel L. Tilley.)

MR. BABY laid before the House,—Report, Returns and Statistics of the Inland Revenues of the Dominion of Canada, for the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1879.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 2) To repeal the Acts respecting Insolvency now in force in Canada.—(Mr. Colby.)

Bill (No. 3) To repeal the Acts respecting Insolvency now in force in the Dominion.—(Mr. Bechard.)

Bill (No. 5) to legalise the marriage with the sister of a deceased wife.—(Mr. Girouard, Jacques Cartier.)

PETROLEUM INSPECTION LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Colby.)

FIRST READING.

MR. COLBY introduced a Bill (No. 4) To amend the law regulating the inspection of petroleum and the products thereof.

MR. MACKENZIE: Will the hon. member explain what he proposes in this Bill?

MR. COLBY: The object of the amendment is simply to change that portion of the law which affects the "foreign" test of petroleum. In the law as it now stands, there are two tests, one for domestic, and the other for foreign oil. It is touching that point.

MR. ANGLIN: The hon. member does not say in what direction.

MR. LANGEVIN.

MR. COLBY: In the direction of uniformity and safety.

Bill read the first time.

CONTROVERTED ELECTION.

JUDGE'S REPORT.

MR. SPEAKER informed the House that he had received from one of the Judges selected for the trial of Election Petitions, pursuant to the Controverted Elections Act, 1874, a judgment in the matter of the Controverted Election for the Electoral District of Richelieu, declaring the sitting Member duly elected.

PRIVILEGES OF THE HOUSE—JOHN A. MACDONELL.

ORDER FOR ATTENDANCE MADE.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the Journals of the 12th and 13th May, 1879, be read.

Motion agreed to and Journals read accordingly.

MR. SPEAKER informed the House that, in obedience to the order passed on the 12th May, 1879, he had issued his summons for the attendance of John A. Macdonell at the Bar of this House, and that he had received from H. Vincent Green, an affidavit, setting forth that, on the 15th May, 1879, he personally served the said John A. Macdonell, with a copy of the said summons.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Mr. Speaker, we remember that last Session the motion which I made was made on May 12th, the House was prorogued two days afterwards—the 15th—on which day you, Mr. Speaker, acquainted the House that you in obedience with the order of the House had issued a summons for the attendance of Mr. John A. Macdonell at the bar of this House, and that you had received an affidavit that a copy of the summons had been personally served on Mr. Macdonell. Now, Sir, I move that Mr. John A. Macdonell be summoned to attend at the bar of this House on to-morrow week.

Motion agreed to.

REMOVAL OF THE LATE LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR OF QUEBEC.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD delivered a Message from His Excellency the Governor-General.

MR. SPEAKER read the Message, and it is as follows:—

“LORNE.

“The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons under the provisions of the 59th Clause of the British North America Act, 1867, a copy of an order of the Honourable the Privy Council, dated the 25th July, 1879, containing the cause assigned for the removal of the Hon. Luc Letellier de St. Just, from his office of Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec.

“GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
“OTTAWA, 16th February, 1880.”

MR. MACKENZIE: I would like to ask the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government if he will bring down, without any motion, all the papers relating to Mr. Letellier's case. There was a despatch published during the recess, one from here and one from England, which I think have not yet appeared among our papers.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Certainly. There is no necessity for a motion. I will have all the papers brought down connected with the case.

NEW MEMBER INTRODUCED.

MR. SPEAKER informed the House, that he had received a certificate of the Returning Officer at the last election for the Electoral District of Argenteuil, that the Hon. John J. C. Abbott was duly elected for the said Electoral District.

The Hon. JOHN J. C. ABBOTT, member for the Electoral District of Argenteuil, having previously taken the oath according to law, and subscribed the roll containing the same, took his seat in the House.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I ought to move at this moment that this shall not be taken as a precedent as the return has not yet arrived.

MR. MACKENZIE: Has the hon. gentleman brought his indenture, or the certificate of the Returning Officer with him?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There is no indenture now. He has the certificate of the returning-officer.

MR. MACKENZIE: He must have one or the other.

Resolved, That, in admitting the Hon. John J. C. Abbott, elected to represent the Electoral District of Argenteuil, to take his seat upon the certificate of the Returning Officer; this House still recommends a strict adherence to the practice of requiring the production of the usual certificate of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery of the return to the writ of election.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

AID TO THE ONTARIO PACIFIC JUNCTION RAILWAY.

QUESTION.

MR. COCKBURN (Muskoka) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to aid, by way of a subsidy or otherwise, the construction of the Ontario Pacific Junction Railway between Gravenhurst and some point on the line of the Canada Central or Canada Pacific Railways.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I am very much afraid it will not be in the power of the Government to give the desired aid to the railway in question.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF THE TEMPERANCE ACT, 1878.

QUESTION.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) enquired, Whether the Government have engaged counsel to argue the constitutionality of the Temperance Act of 1878 before the Supreme Court; and if so, when.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): The Government here engaged counsel in that case. Counsel were retained on 17th January last.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex): I desire permission to add the words “and whom.”

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): Mr. Christopher Robinson on the one hand, and Mr. Lash, Deputy Minister of Justice, on the other.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—BRITISH COLUMBIA CONTRACTS.

QUESTION.

MR. BLAKE enquired, Whether the contracts for the construction of 127 miles of Railway in British Columbia have been executed by both the Government and the contractors: and, if so, on what day: whether such contracts will be laid on the Table at an early day; and whether they or any of them are made subject to the sanction of the House.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I beg to say, in reply, that contracts have been entered into for the construction of the 127 miles of Railway in British Columbia. They have been executed both by the Government and the contractors. I do not remember for the moment the day on which they were executed, but that will appear upon the copies of the contracts themselves, that will be laid on the Table, I presume before the House rises to-day. They are not made subject to the sanction of the House, but are executed under the authority given last Session.

PERMANENT REPRESENTATIVE OF CANADA IN LONDON.

QUESTION.

MR. BLAKE enquired, Whether there is any correspondence with the Imperial Government on the subject of the appointment of a permanent representative of Canada in London; and whether any such correspondence will be laid on the Table at an early day.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There is correspondence on this subject. That correspondence is not yet completed, but I believe it will be completed at an early date. As soon as it is completed, it will be laid before the House.

PARLIAMENTARY PRINTING CONTRACTS.

QUESTION.

MR. BLAKE enquired, Whether, in view of the recent developments as to the practices by which the contract for the printing of Parliament was procured, the Government intend to propose to Parliament any steps to remedy the injurious consequences to the public of such practices in the present instance, and to prevent their repetition in the future.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is the intention of the Government to ask for the reappointment of the House of Commons members of the Printing Committee of last year; and a motion will be made in this House instructing them to press upon the Joint Committee the necessity of enquiring into the recent developments—to use the language of the question—and report upon the best means of avoiding a repetition of such developments in the future.

BOUNDARY BETWEEN CANADA AND ONTARIO.

QUESTION.

MR. BLAKE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government during the present Session to propose a measure ratifying the award on the subject of the boundary between Canada and Ontario.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is not the intention of the Government to propose any such measure.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—GEORGIAN BAY BRANCH.

MOTION FOR ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

MR. COCKBURN (Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, the change of policy on the part of the Government since last Session with reference to the Georgian Bay Branch of the Pacific Railway must be my justification for proposing the motion which I am about to make. This change of policy I believe has entailed serious consequences not only upon the country at large, but upon my constituency in particular, a county which embraces a territory nearly one hundred and twenty miles in length by nearly sixty miles in breadth. It will be in the recollection of most hon. gentlemen that a contract was let to Messrs. Charlebois and Company, on the 2nd August, 1878, for the construction of fifty miles of railway on the south-west side of Lake Nipissing, forming a link between the western terminus of the Canada Central Railway and a point on French River. The road was to be completed on the 1st July, 1880. The contract price for all the work, including track-laying, was $809,813, or at the rate of $16,180 per mile, a very moderate price indeed. With the accession to power of the present Government, it was feared by many that this project would be discontinued, particularly as the chief organ of the Government foreshadowed some such policy; but, as the present Government took a vote of $800,000 last Session and allowed the contractors to put up store-houses along the line, and to fill them with supplies and appliances at an enormous cost, and to employ a large force in clearing out the entire line, to purchase railway ties, etc., it was not to be wondered then that parties placed full reliance upon the faith of the Government to carry out the scheme. The consequence was that large numbers of people, at much inconvenience and expense to themselves, emigrated to the country adjacent to the proposed line, bringing with them their wives and children, expecting to derive a subsistence either directly or indirectly from the construction of this work, only to be disappointed by the untimely and abrupt stoppage of the construction of the road by the Government. It may be urged that these circumstances are of little importance to the public interest, but I propose to go further and show that a great waste of money must have inevitably taken place, in recompensing the contractors for their losses for work done, and for transporting their supplies to and from the work. It may be that the claims of the contractors will amount to nearly sufficient to have completed the work, and, on the score of policy alone, I fear a grave error has been committed, and I believe further that an error of judgment has also been committed in the abandonment of this project and the substitution of another. To those who object to the building of branch lines as part of the Canadian Pacific Railway, I can show that the Georgian Bay Branch would have served as part of the main line to Sault Ste. Marie or on to Lake Superior. The crossing of the French River according to the engineers' reports presented no great difficulties; as by one route the widest channel or branch is 250 feet, and by the other the widest place is only 200 feet, and it has already been shown that the fifty miles of railway was not costly or the gradients heavy. I have noticed in one of the reports that a sum of $1,900,000 would secure the construction of the railway fully equipped with rolling stock, and navigation to Lake Huron. I think this ought to have been a matter worthy of more consideration than it appears to have received at the hands of the Government. I have observed a suggestion in another report as to the advisableness of constructing a territorial road from South-East Bay of Lake Nipissing, which is supposed to be the terminus of the Canada Central Railway, to the head of Lake Superior, and that such a road might be constructed from the funds originally intended for the construction of the Georgian Bay Branch. I strongly protest against this scheme for two good reasons: first, I have no faith in the utility of the territorial or wagon road; experience has shown that roads constructed through a wilderness are speedily covered with a thick growth of tall young trees; and, in the second place, I protest against the grant of the money for the Georgian Bay Branch being used for purposes other than for the original scheme, or to aid the construction of the Ontario Pacific Junction Railway or some such scheme. I am sorry to hear the Minister of Railways and Canals say that the Government do not intend to assist the Ontario system of railways to connect with the Pacific Railway. I now beg to move that a humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-General, for copies of Orders in Council and correspondence which led to the postponement or abandonment of the Georgian Bay Branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and copies of all claims preferred by the late contractors for compensation in connection with the suspension of their work, and a statement showing what settlement or arrangement, if any, has been made with the contractors; also, copies of reports of engineers respecting the several routes in the vicinity of Lake Nipissing.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: There is no objection to the motion of the hon. member for Muskoka. The papers will, all of them I expect, be laid upon the Table of the House in a short time, and probably it would be more convenient to take any discussion in relation to the papers when the papers are brought forward. They will be given at an early day.

Motion agreed to.

COTEAU DU LAC RAILWAY BRIDGE.

MOTION FOR REPORTS.

MR. MACKENZIE moved: that an Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-General for copies of the reports of C. S. Gzowski, Esquire, or other engineers on the subject of bridging the River St. Lawrence near Coteau du Lac; and also for all correspondence between the Government and any parties relating to such bridge; and also for all Orders in Council and other papers concerning the same. He said: this question was brought before the Railway Committee last Session, and also before this House, and there was a very strong opinion expressed in favour of bridging the river at the point referred to. The evidence of several engineers was then taken upon the subject, notably the opinion of Mr. Walter Shanly. The Government promised to have the matter examined into and reported on immediately; but I am not aware that any decision has yet been given on the subject. It appears, however, from the newspapers that a gentleman was appointed to make the examination. I refer to Mr. Gzowski, whose engineering qualifications cannot, I am inclined to think, be placed nearly so high as those of Mr. Shanly and Mr. Page. He is not a Civil Engineer of celebrity so far as I am aware of; he has been entrusted with the construction of no great works, except that he had the building of the Intercolonial Bridge at Buffalo, as a contractor; and I do not think that there is anything in his engineering qualities that places him in advance of the gentlemen I have mentioned. My own conviction last year was, and my own conviction now is, that there is no valid objection to building the bridge across the St. Lawrence at the place mentioned. I have to object to the report made, as it overlooks many important facts that have a great bearing on this question. We know, for instance, that there are no less than eleven bridges across the Mississippi—at least I am so informed—the greatest river highway on the continent; we know that the same gentleman, Colonel Gzowski, built a bridge over the St. Lawrence at Buffalo where there is ten times the traffic that will pass below the proposed bridge at Coteau du Lac. The evidences are all in favour of the construction of that work. As a Canadian, I would not personally desire to place any serious obstruction on the St. Lawrence by bridging, but I feel bound to say that transportation by rail has become as great as by water, railways have so gained upon public esteem and public utility in the transportation of merchandise that we cannot look upon a possible obstruction, to some extent, of the St. Lawrence as a serious thing, to afford facilities for railway traffic. I am satisfied, from my local knowledge and otherwise, that it would not be any serious obstruction in this place, and I hoped the result of enquiry would show that the Government would so decide. It was proposed to connect the Ottawa and Coteau Railroad with the railroads now built or being constructed in the Ottawa Valley and through the centre of Ontario, and a large proportion of the opposition to it came from the Grand Trunk Railway Company, an institution with which Mr. Gzowski is in intimate connection. I move for the papers in order that we may as soon as possible have the views of the Government expressed, and I hope that any Order in Council that may be adopted and any document not expressly called for by this motion but which may relate to this question will not be objected to be produced by the hon. the Minister, and will be laid upon the Table of the House.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The papers are not voluminous, and they will be laid on Table of the House at an early day. I may say that there was a very great diversity of opinion on the question under consideration not only among the members of the Railway Committee, but also among engineers of very high standing, who were called to give evidence before that Committee. The hon. gentleman opposite knows very well that a gentleman in whom he has very great confidence, a gentleman in whom I myself place great confidence, and in whom the House would be disposed to place great confidence, Mr. Page, the Chief Engineer of Canada, entertained an opinion adverse to the construction of the bridge. On the other hand, Mr. Walter Shanly, a gentleman of high standing, entertained a strong opinion in opposition to that of Mr. Page; and, in consequence of this conflict of opinion—their opinions being all entitled to great weight—it was finally resolved, and the Government found it necessary, to obtain further assistance in the solution of this question. The Government, in fact, pledged itself to the Committee that they would obtain the services of some other able engineer, and, after due examination and investigation of this question, decide what the interests of the country demanded. Now a good deal of difficulty was found in fixing upon an engineer who possessed the confidence of the Government, and who would be at the same time acceptable to the promoters of this enterprise; and Col. Gzowski was selected, not only because he would be able to give an independent and impartial opinion, but because he was found to be acceptable to the promoters of the enterprise. The matter was referred to him, and I have heard with some little surprise from the leader of the Opposition that Col. Gzowski is not an engineer. But I believe that the people of this country have regarded Col. Gzowski as an engineer possessing qualifications of a high degree. The very fact that he was equal to the work of constructing the International Bridge at Buffalo, to which the hon. member has referred, is a proof of his capacity as a hydraulic engineer of high standing. At all events, the selection was made in the belief that he was able to give a valuable opinion in relation to the matter. The hon. gentleman must remember that, in the main, on the important point connected with this question, Col. Gzowski concurred with Mr. Page, for whose opinion the hon. member expresses the greatest respect. Under the circumstances, the Government felt it impossible to disregard the statements contained in Col. Gzowski's report, which commended themselves to their judgment as judicious, and no time was lost in adopting the report and placing it in the hands of the promoters of this enterprise. The Government had less hesitation in adopting the report of Col. Gzowski, because he pointed out that the construction of such a bridge as alone, was admissible across the St. Lawrence at the point in question could not but be attended with such great expense as to prevent it being carried out. He stated it as his opinion that the additional cost of constructing a high level bridge would be very insignificant if any at all, taking into account the maintenance of a draw, and there would be no difficulty in avoiding all the principal objections to the bridging of the St. Lawrence at that point by adopting that course. Under these circumstances, the Government adopted the report and the opinions which Colonel Gzowski arrived at in connection with this question, and at once communicated with the promoters of this that work, under the circumstances, they could not permit the construction of a swing bridge at that point, but that a bridge such as was indicated would be allowed to be constructed, the plans and location first having received the approval of the Governor-General in Council.

MR. ANGLIN: It seems to be admitted that what the papers all through the Dominion have published is a correct copy of the report of Colonel Gzowski in this matter. If so, I may say that it contains some very curious statements. It seems to me to go the length of condemning the construction of a bridge of any character at that particular place, although, after having proved to his entire satisfaction, apparently, that no bridge ought to be constructed there, Colonel Gzowski comes, strangely enough, to the conclusion that it will be safe to erect a high-level bridge. He states, amongst other things, that one objection to the proposed bridge is that the piers come close upon the steamboat channel, where that channel is tortuous, that the stream is very rapid and steamers passing down are consequently managed with difficulty. He further states that the line of the current at that particular spot does not run according to the line of the piers of the bridge and his whole argument leads inevitably to the conclusion that a steamer going down through the bridge—whether it be a high or a low level bridge—must be in great danger, indeed, of coming into collision with the piers. As it must be necessary to make the piers for a high level bridge much wider and stronger than the piers for a low level bridge, the danger of such a collision must be materially increased if the bridge be built at a high level. Notwithstanding all that, Colonel Gzowski comes to what seems to be a strange and extraordinary conclusion—that a high level bridge may be built there. The chief objection to the low level bridge is that, from Coteau Landing, where steamers touch, the distance is but four thousand feet, and that, while a steamer is making that short distance, where the current runs at the rate of six knots an hour and the steamer herself must be running at a high rate of speed, it will be difficult or almost impossible for those in charge of the bridge to have the swing open in time. But it seems to me that it would be a very easy matter indeed to make regulations that the swing must be open before the steamer leaves Coteau Landing at all. From Coteau Landing she could very easily signal those in charge of the bridge, and those in charge may be bound to open the swing immediately, under pain of a severe penalty for neglecting to open it within a proper time. But there is no necessity whatever that a steamer should leave Coteau Landing at all for the purpose of passing through the bridge until the swing is first opened. The delay in any case must be very trifling. Colonel Gzowski, I think, in that strange report of his, goes into the commercial question, a matter with which he had nothing whatever to do, unless indeed he acted in this according to the instructions sent to him. But he does undertake to deal with it, and his conclusions on this matter are as lame as those on the other. I understand he is a gentleman of high reputation as an engineer and otherwise, and I do not pretend to say that he did not report exactly what he believes. I confess I do not think it is a report sufficient at all events to justify either the Government or this Parliament in refusing a charter to those who ask for the construction of the bridge if there is nothing else to prevent the granting of it. There are other questions raised of great importance and it is not necessary now to say whether they should induce us to refuse the charter or not, but I must say that, having read over the report carefully, and given it much consideration, I was forced to the conclusion that it did not justify the Government in refusing permission for the construction of a low level bridge.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. the Minister of Public Works refers to Mr. Page's report, and calls my attention to the fact, as he says, that Mr. Page's opinion and Colonel Gzowski's coincide.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: On the main point.

MR. MACKENZIE: No, I think not. I think the hon. gentleman is under a mistake. Mr. Page's whole objection to it was not the high or the low level, but that the piers would cause a rise in the water. Mr. Gzowski never touches that point, and that was the sole point that caused the Railway Committee any difficulty in giving an opinion. It was not whether traffic would be seriously impeded, but whether the channel would be so affected, and the adjacent country so affected by the rising of the water as to impose a large amount of damages upon the country in consequence. Now, Mr. Gzowski has carefully avoided, as far as I can see, any reference to that point. I only received his report half an hour ago, but, from my hurried reading of it, there is nothing in it that contradicts or is opposed to Mr. Shanly's conclusions in that respect.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: But he has not touched that point at all.

MR. MACKENZIE: No, but that is the sole point which was to decide the policy of building a bridge he had nothing to do with. He dealt simply with the engineering difficulties, and the great point of controversy between Mr. Page and Mr. Shanly, and I think Mr. Keefer, was whether the water would rise in consequence of the piers being built in a certain position. There is no man in America in whose judgment I have more confidence than Mr. Page, but I was compelled to differ from him on that occasion, as I could not see that there was evidence enough to justify us in believing that the water would be seriously raised in consequence of piers being built in the shallow part of the river, or that the flood of water would be seriously affected thereby. There is another point that Col. Gzowski fails to touch, and a very important point. He says a high level bridge will not be so serious an inconvenience as to cost, when compared with a low level bridge, after deducting the expense of maintenance of a bridge which is to be opened or shut when vessels or trains approach. But there is another point he has not touched upon—it would necessitate a very serious grade, and what we have to contend with principally in the construction of our roads is the difficulty of obtaining a proper grade. Now, as an instance of what a grade will effect in promoting the prosperity of roads let me mention one fact, that the largest train that can be taken by the most powerful engine on the Intercolonial Railway is twenty loaded cars, while, on the Canada Southern, where the grades are extremely favourable, every engine takes from 40 to 45 loaded cars over it, thus reducing the cost of transportation immensely. Now, if the construction of a high level bridge at this point necessitates, as it must necessitate, a very steep grade, probably not less than from 50 ft. to 60 ft. per mile, it would be a most serious obstruction, and one that, apart from all other considerations, must so prejudicially affect the flow of traffic on the road as to make it non-paying, when otherwise it would yield some revenue. Now, we are not, in this House, or in the Railway Committee, to be controlled in such matters by the agency, or influence, or interests of another railway corporation. There is no doubt of this, that the Grand Trunk Railway Company have been great opponents of this scheme. I believe that, when our means of communication are completed throughout the west, there will be abundance of room for two great lines running eastward. Another objection was urged in committee by certain gentlemen, that this line would pass into the United States, but that need not be dwelt upon, because the Grand Trunk also passes into the United States, and the bulk of its traffic goes to a United States port. All we have to consider is simply what is best for the interests of Canada. What are the interests which will be sacrificed by the Government insisting upon a high level bridge, when one is not necessary, and what will be most profitable to those who seek another highway to the sea by the easiest and best possible route? I have to complain of this report being somewhat disingenuous also. Mr. Gzowski quotes the authority of Major-General Warren, United States Topographical Engineer, upon the question of bridging the Mississippi, but he forgets to tell us that General Warren's opinion did not prevail, that other engineering opinions were wholly against his, and that, at this moment, there are no less than eleven low level bridges suspended across the Mississippi, and that there are charters in existence for bridges over the St. Lawrence at several other points, and that one bridge is actually built. While every public convenience seems to point to the necessity of having this bridge, it is objected to wholly in the interests of the Grand Trunk Railway and all those who are interested in seeing the traffic continue to follow that route. That is what I seriously object to. The thing has not been treated upon its merits. There is no man in Canada who personally commands more respect from myself, as from every person else, I think, than Mr. Gzowski, but I maintain that there is no reason to believe that his engineering abilities are such as would qualify him in being selected to give an opinion which would be superior to others mentioned, or justify the Government in selecting him as an arbiter to decide upon this point, upon which Mr. Shanly gives such decided evidence, and which Mr. Page did not oppose.

Motion agreed to.

CARILLON WORKS CONTRACT.

MOTION TO PRINT.

MR. MACKENZIE moved that the return of last Session relative to the Contract of R. P. Cook and Co., on the Carillon Works be printed. He said: Last Session a return was brought down, and two small papers containing a report of two engineers upon a part of the contract were not printed. As there is no Committee at present appointed, I make this motion.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I am afraid it is hardly competent for this House to pass the motion. I think the hon. member will bear me out in my recollection that the practice has been not to press a motion, the printing of which involves public expenditure, until the matter has been reported to the Printing Committee.

MR. MACKENZIE: But there is no Printing Committee to send it to, and there will not be for some days.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I am extremely anxious that these papers should be printed, but I do not see how we can depart from the precedent, and to pass the motion involves expenditure.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY ROUTE.

MOTION FOR REPORTS.

MR. MACKENZIE moved for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General for copies of all reports made since the first day of March, 1879, respecting any portion of the route or proposed route of the Pacific Railway; also, reports of explorations of any portion of the country between the neighbourhood of Fort Pelly and the Pacific Ocean via the Peace River Valley or Pine River Pass, with copies of all Orders in Council respecting such explorations or the adoption of the route of the said Pacific Railway; and also, copies of all correspondence relating to the same.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I have no objection to the adoption of this motion, but it will take some little time to lay before the House all that is mentioned in this motion; but no time will be lost.

MR. MACKENZIE: I would observe, in regard to time, that it took very little time for the hon. gentleman to change his opinion in regard to adopting my route, the Burrard Inlet route, and I cannot conceive that the documents can be long when he was able to read them in so short a time.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I am sorry to find the memory of the hon. member so defective. I should like him to indicate when he learned that I changed my opinion as to the adoption of the Burrard Inlet route. The hon. gentleman's impression is entirely erroneous. Last Session, I frankly stated that, if compelled to adopt any one of the routes for the Canada Pacific Railway, in the light of all the information I then possessed, I would adopt the Burrard Inlet. The hon. gentleman is therefore quite under a misapprehension in saying I changed my mind on the subject. With reference to the intimation that some little time would be required, a considerable portion of information was covered by those papers that does not necessary require to come under the observation of the Government, in the determination of the route through the Rocky Mountains; and the reports of those explorations that have been somewhat extended are now in course of preparation. It was because we wanted to present them as fully and carefully as possible that I said some little time would pass before the House would receive all that is covered by this resolution. I shall be very glad to give the additional information in the Report of Mr. Marcus Smith upon the recent explorations, surveys and locations from the western boundary of Manitoba to the valley of—

MR. MACKENZIE: I was under the impression that the hon. gentleman had asked this House to vote that to select the Burrard Inlet route would be premature.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I did not do so.

MR. MACKENZIE.

MR. MACKENZIE: He was very anxious to condemn our selection of it.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I was not.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman could not have been in possession of very detailed information at the time he gave expression to a new opinion—though he says he did not change it. He could only have had a telegraphic message from Edmonton. It was impossible, when the change took place, when our policy was reverted to, that he could have had detailed reports of the engineers, or they showed an expedition never known to me in traversing that country. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos) has suggested to me that it would be desirable to add the following words:—"Also, copies of all reports made by Capt. Brundage, upon Port Simpson, and the navigation of Dixon's Entrance."

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I shall be very glad to furnish the additional information desired. I wanted it declared last Session that the location was premature, giving as a reason the desirability of further information touching the Pine River Pass and the more northerly route. The location of the route which I, upon all the information possessed, approved of, was adopted after we received sufficient detailed information from the engineering party which had come through from Fort Simpson to Edmonton. I do not mean to say that, if we had not been bound by the pledge given to the House to take action during the past season, we would not have awaited still more detailed information. But that information was sufficiently accurate to remove any doubt in the minds of the Government as to the advisableness of adopting the Burrard Inlet route. When in possession of it, we lost no time in endeavouring to keep faith with the House in relation to the question.

MR. DECOSMOS: I asked the hon. member for Lambton to amend his motion as proposed. If it produces no better result than the publication of the report of a special and most careful survey of that part of Port Simpson and the adjacent waters to the entrance, I believe it will be of great advantage; for, hitherto, there has been no survey of that locality. It will be of material advantage. True, Port Simpson has been surveyed, but, beyond the headland, nothing whatever has been done.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: This subject will be embraced in the reports, all of which will be brought down.

MR. ANGLIN: If I understand the Minister of Railways rightly, I have been labouring under a misapprehension. I understood, from reports in the public papers, that a special surveying party was sent out to examine the country in the Peace River District, and ascertain whether that would be the better route for the Railway. I think I now understand that he has received its report. I was under the impression that, if he had received any report, when the Government decided in favour of the Burrard Inlet route it was a report from a number of gentlemen who, starting from the Pacific coast, made their way through the western country, and arrived in this part of the Dominion long before I supposed it would be possible to receive anything like a valuable report from a surveying party sent out to make an examination. I would like to know if one of the reports was received from a party of tourists, including a reverend gentlemen of this city—if in fact that party was not sent out to make a report.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The hon. gentleman is entirely under a misapprehension in this matter. Our information is not from a party of tourists, but from some of the ablest engineers in the Government service, Messrs. Cambie and McLeod. Rev. Mr. Gordon accompanied them, being anxious to visit the country in the capacity of a tourist. I dare say he acted to some extent as secretary for those gentlemen, but the report was that of Messrs. Cambie and McLeod. We had their opinions and report before us before the adoption of the Burrard Inlet Route.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

NEGOTIATIONS WITH FRANCE AND SPAIN.

MOTION FOR INSTRUCTIONS.

MR. MACKENZIE moved for an Address to His Excellency the Governor-General for copies of all instructions given to Canadian Commissioners respecting negotiations with France and Spain, with copies of documents conveying Her Majesty's sanction of such negotiations, and all correspondence with the Imperial Government on the subject. Also, for a statement showing in detail the several amounts paid to Canadian Commissioners or others in connection with such negotiations, with the names of the recipients and the nature of the services rendered. Also, for copies of all reports made by such Commissioners, or any other documents which will show the progress made with such negotiations. He said: We are informed in the Speech from the Throne that the negotiations in question had the sanction of Her Majesty. We were informed last Session that we would have the first report of the Commissioners down before the House rose last spring, and I hope the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government will see that it is laid on the Table at as early a date as possible. These are papers which will be essential to our discussion of financial and trade questions when they come up.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: There can be no objection to bringing down these papers, and they will be submitted at a very early date. The correspondence relative to the trade with France was prepared, and we hoped to have been in a position to have laid it before the House at the close of last Session, but there was some confidential correspondence which formed a part of it, between the Minister at Paris and the British Government, which His Excellency the Governor-General was anxious to get permission to make public. It was delayed for that purpose. I think I laid the papers before the hon. the leader of the Opposition the last day of the Session in order that he might have an opportunity of perusing them. There will, however, be no delay in the matter.

MR. MACKENZIE: I desire to say a word in reference to the change of opinion upon this matter of the hon. the leader of the Government. The proposal that Canada should send envoys to foreign countries was denounced in this House. I ventured at that time to vote with Sir Alexander Galt, and when he was condemned by his associates on the other side of the House. I congratulate the hon. gentleman in coming thus far and in admitting that Canadians may possibly manage their own affairs, even in foreign trade.

Motion agreed to.

DEPARTMENTAL PRINTING.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) moved for an Address to His Excellency the Governor-General, for a return showing copies of all advertisements calling for tenders for the Departmental printing, printing paper, and binding; the names of the newspapers in which such advertisements appeared, the specifications and quantities of the work to be performed, and copies of all tenders, correspondence and Orders in Council relating thereto, and contracts entered into.

MR. BOWELL: All the information asked for by this motion with the exception of the names of the newspapers in which the advertisements were inserted, will appear in the report of the Secretary of State, which, if not laid on the Table of the House to-day, can be at any time; and, if the information in regard to the names of the newspapers containing the advertisements is desired, that will be brought down also.

MR. ROSS: It is not material to have the names of the newspapers.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES—IMPORTATION OF CATTLE.

RESOLUTION PROPOSED.

MR. MILLS moved: That in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that the people of Manitoba and the North-West Territories be permitted to import cows and oxen from the United States. He said: We are all more or less interested in the progress of emigration, and hon. gentlemen opposite have expressed a desire to correct any mistakes that have been made. I am not asking for any change in the fiscal policy of the country by this motion, but an Order in Council was passed, prohibiting cattle being brought into Canada from the United States, and a similar order has been made by the American Government, in retaliation, thus preventing settlers in Manitoba and the North-West from carrying on their farming operations. I have had this matter brought before my notice by persons located there, both by correspondence, and by being personally called upon, and they have expressed their intention of going out next spring to Dakotah and

Mr. Ross.

Minnesota, unless they are allowed to go into the adjoining States to purchase their necessary supplies of oxen and cows to enable them to subsist. In a large measure they must subsist on their cattle until their crops are produced.

MR. POPE (Compton): I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that it is most important for the people of Manitoba and the North-West and British Columbia to be allowed to import from the United States, not only oxen and cows but bulls, and, looking at it in that light, when we passed the Order in Council, it was so framed that it did not apply to Manitoba, or British Columbia, or the North-West. Therefore, the people of those parts can import as many as they like, and consequently I presume that this motion may be withdrawn.

MR. MILLS: I merely stated the fact that persons have communicated this to me, both orally and in writing.

MR. POPE: If the officers of the Government have misrepresented this Order in Council, it is very much to be regretted.

MR. MILLS: It would be Mr. Bradley, of Emerson who made the misrepresentations.

MR. POPE: What he has represented is, that it is important that cattle from the United States should be allowed to go into the North-West free of duty. The hon. gentleman is mistaken as to the opinion Mr. Bradley entertains about this matter.

MR. RYAN (Marquette): The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) said he did not desire that the Government should alter its fiscal policy. I think it would be as well if the Government could alter its fiscal policy. It would advance the interests of the emigrants to the North-West if they could be allowed to import cattle duty free; and I hope they will be allowed to do so.

MR. MILLS: If the Order in Council does not prohibit the importation of cattle into Manitoba and the North-West, I do not wish to press the motion, but representations have been made to me that they have been prohibited.

MR. POPE (Compton): If the hon. gentleman has information of that kind, the mistake shall not occur again; but I am sure, from my information from Mr. Bradley, that it is not so. If, however, this has really taken place, he should be censured for it.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

The following motions for Returns were severally agreed to :—

Address—Copies of all papers and Correspondence exchanged between the Government of Canada and the Imperial Government, in reference to the admission of cattle from the United States into Canada and from Canada into England, be laid upon the Table of The House.—(Mr. Caron.)

Address—Copies of all tenders for works on the Pacific Railway since January, 1879; copies of all tenders received, showing the names of all sureties, the nature of the deposit made as collateral security; and the names of the parties to allow any contracts have been awarded; also, copies of all Departmental reports respecting such tenders; Orders in Council and correspondence, not heretofore brought down.—(Mr. Mackenzie.)

Address—Copies of all tenders received in 1878, and subsequently, for the works on the Carillon Canal and Dam; also, for all Orders in Council awarding the contracts for such works; also, all Reports respecting such works from the Minister of Railways and Canals, or the Departmental Engineers, made since the Return brought down last Session; also, for copies of all Correspondence respecting the letting of such contracts as are now existing.—(Mr. Mackenzie.)

Order of the House—Return showing the expenses, in detail, incurred by the several Members of the Government, and any other person or persons in the service of the Government, or paid by the Government, sent to England or elsewhere, on behalf of the Government, or in the service of the Government, from the 1st day of November, 1878, to date.—(Mr. Cameron, South Huron.)

Address—Detailed statements showing: 1. All judgments rendered by the Supreme and Exchequer Courts in suits, from 8th October, 1875, to 1st January, 1880; 2. The names of all parties to each of such suits; 3. The amounts of debt or claim in each of such suits; 4. The amount of costs in each of such suits; 5. The date of commencement and termination of each of such suits; 6. The amount of fees paid to the Registrar of said Courts, from 8th October, 1875, to date of statement.—(Mr. Keeler.)

Order of the House—Return of the employes on that portion of the Intercolonial Railway extending from Rivière du Loup to Chaudière; also, the salaries they receive and the nationality to which they belong.—(Mr. Grandbois.)

Order of the House—Return showing the exports and imports, in detail, from and into the Dominion of Canada, during the six months ending the 1st day of January, 1880, and also for those during the six months ending the 1st day of January, 1879.—(Sir Richard J. Cartwright.)

Order of the House—Return showing the receipts and expenditure, in detail, of the Dominion of Canada, during the six months ending the 1st day of January, 1880; and also during the six months ending the 1st day of January, 1879.—(Sir Richard J. Cartwright.)

Order of the House—Return of all vessels carrying cargoes of tea direct from China and Japan, entered at any port of the Dominion of Canada, and at any port in the United States in transitu to Canada.—(Sir Richard J. Cartwright.)

Order of the House—Return showing a statement of the several sums of money on deposit to the credit of the Dominion of Canada, together with a list of the several banks in which the same are deposited; also, of all sums on deposit with the agents of the Dominion or any other parties in England, on the 1st day of December, 1879, and on the 1st day of February, 1880, showing the rate of interest then payable in each case.—(Sir Richard J. Cartwright.)

Order of the House—Return showing what drawback was allowed on goods manufactured in Canada in 1879, and exported; to whom paid, and description of goods.—(Mr. Fleming.)

Order of the House—Statement showing: 1. Abstract of expenditures compared with Estimates for the year 1878-9; 2. Unprovided items for the same period; 3. Balances of appropriations lapsed for the same period; 4. Balances carried forward for the same period; 5. General abstract of expenditure for the same period; to be prepared in the same form in which they have been formerly placed in the Public Accounts for several years past.—(Sir Richard J. Cartwright.)

Order of the House—Statement showing the principal classes of exports and imports, in detail, by Provinces, for the six months ending on the 1st January, 1880, and for the same period of 1879; showing also, the several countries to which and whence the said exports and imports have been exported or received; also, showing the several rates of duty levied thereon, and, in the case of non-dutiable goods, the several classes of goods composing the same.—(Sir Richard J. Cartwright.)

Order of the House—Statement showing the quantities of sugar entered at the principal ports of entry of Canada for the six months ending on 1st January, 1880, and for the same period of 1879.—(Sir Richard J. Cartwright.)

Order of the House—Statement showing the amount of securities bearing six per cent. payable in Canada outstanding on the 1st day of February, 1880.—(Sir Richard J. Cartwright.)

Order of the House—Return showing the terms on which the Dominion Loans, including the last loan of £3,000,000 stg., were negotiated in London; together with the prospectus and form of tenders, the rates obtained for the said Loans, the commissions and all other expenses incurred in negotiating the same; and all correspondence between the Minister of Finance and the Agents of the Dominion, or any other parties respecting the same.—(Sir Richard J. Cartwright.)

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

CONTRACTS PRESENTED.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER laid before the House—the several articles of agreement entered into between the contractors and Her Majesty Queen Victoria, represented by the Minister of Railways and Canals, in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE APPOINTED.

Resolved, That a Special Committee of seven members be appointed to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the Select Standing Committees ordered by the House on the 12th instant, said Committee to be composed of Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Leonard Tilley, Sir Charles Tupper, and Messrs. Masson, Mackenzie, Holton and Laurier.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

RELIEF OF THE DISTRESS IN IRELAND.

QUESTION.

MR. MACKENZIE: I would like to ask whether the Government have taken the steps they proposed to take to send whatever contribution is to be made to the Irish Relief Fund. I suggested on Friday evening that whatever is sent should be sent quickly, so that it may do the greatest amount of good.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is the intention of the Government to adopt the precedent of the grant made by Parliament to the sufferers from the Crimean War. There will be a Message from the Governor-General calling the attention of the House to the matter, and specifying the sum. I shall then move for an Address from this House, and that will be communicated to the other House when adopted; it will be a joint Address.

PRAYERS.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 6) To amend the Act respecting the Election of Members of the House of Commons.—(Mr. Bolduc.)

SIR CHARLES TUPPER:

Bill (No. 7) To consolidate and amend the Acts respecting the Inland Revenue.—(Mr. Baby.)

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY— IMPERIAL AID.

QUESTION.

MR. BLAKE enquired, Whether there is any correspondence between the Canadian and Imperial Governments, or any report showing the result of the resolution of last Session, whereby the Government was authorised and directed to use its best efforts to secure the cooperation of the Imperial Government, and to obtain further aid, by guarantee or otherwise, in the construction of the Pacific Railway, and whether any such correspondence or report will, at an early day, be laid before Parliament.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I beg leave to state that there has been a confidential communication made to the Right Hon. the Secretary of State for the Colonies, in writing, on the subject of Imperial aid for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which it is not in the interest of the public to lay before Parliament at present. But there is no report on the subject, and no aid has been promised by the Imperial Government.

A QUESTION OF PROCEDURE.

MR. MACKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, I desire again to call your attention to the matter to which I called it the other evening. You stated in your remarks then, that a Bill in a printed shape was put into your hands.

MR. SPEAKER: Not when I put the motion.

MR. MACKENZIE: No, but afterwards. The title of the Bill reads: "Act to repeal the Insolvency Laws now in force in the Dominion of Canada. Received and read the first time, Monday, 3rd March, 1879. Second reading, 17th March, 1879." Singularly enough, the name of Mr. Béchard is scored out and that of Mr. Colby put in its place.

MR. SPEAKER: It is not the same copy, I am sure, because someone called my attention to it. The hon. member asked me if it was a Bill of last Session. I looked at the back of the Bill and saw it was dated for this year, 1880.

MR. MACKENZIE: If you received a copy, of a reprinted Bill, it ought to have been marked as printed in the Minutes, as the Clerk assures me that this Bill was sent to him.

MR. SPEAKER: There must be some misunderstanding. I know very well the Bill which was put into my hands bore upon its back the date of the present year.

MR. HOLTON: I presume that was the manuscript, the covering of the Bill. The copy was sent up afterwards probably.

MR. SPEAKER: Not at all; I looked at it.

MR. COLBY: I think the hon. member is in error in saying that this is a copy of the Bill that was placed in your hands. The Bill that was placed in your hands is a duplicate form of the Bill, which will be printed for the second reading without any change whatever. I had an individual memorandum upon the Bill which was placed in your hands, which does not appear upon this Bill. It may refresh your memory, Mr. Speaker, when I remark that, after you had passed that to the Clerk, and the Clerk had returned it to you, I saw an hon. member of this House request you for a copy of the Bill which you had in your hands, which was the same Bill that I handed to you, which you passed to the Clerk, and which the Clerk returned to you afterwards. That hon. member may now have in his possession, and may have inadvertently omitted to return to you or to the Clerk the original which I presented to you, which you passed to the Clerk, and which the Clerk afterwards returned to you.

MR. SPEAKER: I remember very well I gave a French copy of the same Bill to two hon. gentlemen of this House.

MR. HOLTON: If the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) presented a Bill to this House printed with his own name, there could be no doubt whatever as to the legality of his proceedings, but there must be other copies of this Bill, and, in view of the misunderstanding and confusion which seems to have arisen, it would no doubt be very satisfactory if my hon. friend from Stanstead would favour us with another copy of his Bill of this year.

MR. SPEAKER: The Clerk has just handed me the manuscript which was put into the hands of the Law Clerk, received Monday, February 16th, 1880, reading: "Mr. Colby, Act to repeal the Acts respecting Insolvency now in force in the Dominion of Canada." This copy I am sure is not the copy I had in my hands yesterday. It would be easy to ascertain all about the matter if I had the French copy which I saw, because I handed the French copy to a member of this House.

MR. COLBY: I will say, in order to be more explicit, and that the House may see that I am not in error, in stating that it is not the Bill which I placed in your hands, that the Bill which I placed in your hands yesterday was a Bill which, before doing so, I referred to my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) for his revision, and he, in his own handwriting, noted what he conceived would be the proper addition of the Bill. That was before the presentation of the Bill, which was placed in your hands with my name on the back of it; and that is certainly not the Bill. The Clerk has, erroneously perhaps, had another copy which was used as a draft. I think you will recollect that, while the Bill was upon your desk, after it was sent to the Clerk, an hon. member of this House requested the privilege of taking the Bill, and that he took the Bill which should have been handed to the Clerk.

MR. SPEAKER: Here is the French copy exactly. I had two copies in my hand: an English version, and a French version, and here is the French version I handed to the hon. gentleman from Iberville (Mr. Béchard).

MR. GIROUARD: I recollect perfectly well that yesterday, when the hon. member for Stanstead, (Mr. Colby) showed me the Bill printed, as the seconder of the Bill, I made a little amendment in my own handwriting. Most assuredly the Bill, which was a few moments ago in the hands of the hon. member for Stanstead is not the one I saw yesterday.

MR. MACKENZIE: I would never have dreamed of doubting the statement of the hon. gentleman himself that he presented the Bill, but I was not aware of it. I asked the Clerk for the Bill which was presented after you stated that you saw it in French, and I got a copy of the Bill of the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard) of last year from the Clerk, and it was my duty in this instance to point out to the House that there had been some mistake about it, and that the hon. gentleman's Bill was not entitled to precedence.

The moment he stated that he did present the Bill, I would never have dreamt of disputing his word.

THE MURRAY CANAL.

MOTION FOR REPORTS.

MR. KEELER moved for an Order of the House for copies of all reports of Engineers of the Department of Railways and Canals since 1878, upon the Murray Canal, by way of the original Canal Reserve in the township of Murray.

MR. McCUAIG moved in amendment that the following words be added to the motion:—"And also of all other surveys made at any time for the site of the Murray Canal, not already laid before Parliament."

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY ACCIDENTS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. MACDONNELL (Inverness) moved for an Order of the House for a return of the number of accidents which have occurred on the Intercolonial Railroad since the first day of January last, with the date, nature, and extent of each. He said: I am prompted to make this enquiry owing to the fact that, during my journey to this city a few days ago, which journey occupied three days on the railway, three accidents occurred, two upon the Intercolonial Railway and one upon the branch line between Rivière du Loup and Point Lévis. The first of these accidents occurred near New Glasgow, and this House and the country have heard with regret that that accident resulted in the death of the engineer then on the train. I heard the news of that accident immediately after my arrival at Pictou. On the following day, the 11th inst., I heard that the engine had left the track in a dangerous locality on the road between Truro and Halifax, and the accident, though not resulting in a loss of life, resulted in a great loss of property. The next day another accident occurred to the train upon which I was travelling, when two wheels of the tender got off the track, and the train ran several hundred yards in that position. This was very disquieting to the passengers. We were all much pleased when we arrived at the end of the journey. When I heard the Government inform this House that they had observed the strictest economy in the management of our railroads, and coupled this with the circumstances I have just mentioned, I was struck with the necessity of an enquiry of the kind I now make. I think it is the duty of this House to see that economy, which in itself is most laudable, does not imperil the lives of persons travelling on the railroad, and does not deter the public generally from using it as much as they otherwise would. No person will be more happy than myself if, when the information comes down, it is found that there is no cause for alarm, notwithstanding that these several accidents occurred in such quick succession. I hope that such experience as mine is not common, and that, when the information comes down, it will prove that this economy which has been introduced in the management of the railroad is quite consistent with the safety of those travelling over the road, and with the general utility of the road.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I am extremely glad the hon. member for Inverness has made this motion, because it will afford an opportunity of disabusing the House and the public mind of an impression which is laboriously endeavoured to be circulated throughout the country, that the economy which has been practised in connection with the Intercolonial Railroad has been effected at the expense of the permanent way and the rolling stock. I am prepared to invite the most exhaustive examination into that question. I am free to say that a more mistaken economy—it would not be economy but extravagance—could not be practised than a diminution of the expenditure at the cost of the permanent way, or the efficiency of the rolling stock. I can only assure the House that I have taken the utmost pains to satisfy myself that neither the one nor the other has been made in the slightest degree to suffer in this way. I am satisfied that it can be well established that the permanent way and the rolling stock never were in a state of greater efficiency than at this moment. The road never has been operated in a more thoroughly efficient manner than during the past year, as regards speed, regularity of trains or safety from accidents. While the Government has been obliged in former years to pay large sums for accidents to passengers and loss of life upon the road, I am happy to say that, during the past year, no accident to a passenger has occurred in the operation of this railway. As regards accidents to employes, the road will compare very favourably with the past history of the road or the experience of other roads. I deplore very much the loss of the life of an employe the other day on this railway, in consequence of a locomotive going over an embankment; it was not caused by any deficiency in the rolling stock, or any defective wheel, but by a new frog, which showed no indication of any weakness at the point where the fracture occurred. The fracture may have been due to the changes and severity of the weather, and could not have been foreseen or prevented by any possible care. No doubt, the rolling stock of the road has been taxed to its utmost capacity, owing to the impossibility, up to the present, of obtaining the requisite rolling stock for the Rivière au Loup section, acquired in August last, notwithstanding our obtaining of all the rolling stock procurable from the Grand Trunk Railway; and our rolling stock will continue to be overtaxed until our new supply for that section is completed. The rough condition of a portion of that section, which must so remain till we are able in spring to relay it with steel, must involve a great pressure upon the rolling stock.

RELIEF OF THE DISTRESS IN IRELAND.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD delivered a Message from His Excellency the Governor-General.

MR. SPEAKER read the Message, and it is as follows:—

“LORNE.

“The Governor-General recommends to the consideration of the House of Commons the propriety of granting $100,000 for the relief of the present great distress in Ireland.

“GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

“OTTAWA, 17th February, 1880”

COMMISSIONERS FOR THE MANAGEMENT OF THE INTERNAL ECONOMY OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD delivered a Message from His Excellency the Governor-General.

MR. SPEAKER read the Message, and it is as follows:—

“LORNE.

“The Governor-General transmits to the House of Commons an approved Minute in Council, appointing the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, Minister of the Interior, the Hon. Sir Leonard Tilley, Minister of Finance, the Hon. Sir Charles Tupper, Minister of Railways and Canals, and the Hon. G. Baby, Minister of Inland Revenue, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as Commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of the Act 31 Victoria, Chapter 27, intitled: ‘An Act respecting the Internal Economy of the House of Commons, and for other purposes.’

PRAYERS.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced, and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 8) To amend the Act respecting Joint Stock Companies to construct works to facilitate the transmission of timber down Rivers and Streams.—(Mr. White, North Renfrew.)

Bill (No. 9) Respecting the Boundary between the Province of Ontario, and the Territories of Canada.—(Mr. Mills.)

BOUNDARY BETWEEN ONTARIO AND UNORGANISED TERRITORIES OF THE DOMINION.

MOTION FOR COMMITTEE ADJOURNED.

MR. DAWSON: Mr. Speaker, I bring forward this motion because I believe the time has arrived when some action should be taken in the matter to which it refers. I assumed the initiative in drawing attention to the subject last Session, because the debateable ground of the boundaries was in my constituency. If the recent award should be carried out, the district which I have the honour to represent, will be as large as all the Maritime Provinces combined, with Newfoundland and Gaspé added. It would have the great lakes of the Dominion for its boundaries on the south; on the north it would cover some hundreds of miles on the shores of Hudson's Bay, and reach on the west, it to the borders of the great prairies. There would, in that case, be something like half a continent in one constituency. Before the award can take effect, however, it requires the sanction of Parliament, but any action on the part of this House cannot reasonably be asked for without the fullest possible information and I know of no way in which that information can be so readily obtained as by means of a Committee empowered to examine witnesses, and send for persons and papers. There has been a great deal of writing about the extent of French Canada, and the claims of the Merchant Adventurers of England trading to Hudson's Bay, but much of it, however valuable in a historical view, is irrelevant as regards the question at issue, and documents, which are of great intrinsic value, are buried in what I may call mountain masses of foreign matter. Only one side of the case has received any considerable degree of attention, and the advocates on that side have culled from these voluminous writings such documents as seem to support their views. They have acted, not as statesmen dealing with a great national question, which, from their high position they might have been expected to do, and should have done, but like retained advocates who do not hesitate to exaggerate the strong and conceal the weak points of their case. They have gone so far as to ignore and set aside Acts of the Imperial Parliament, to distort the evidence afforded by Imperial Proclamations and Commissions to Governors, and, being practically unopposed, have in this way succeeded in obtaining a verdict of which I would say that, however much it might be to their own individual liking is certainly not in the best interests of Ontario or the Dominion at large. This is a case in which all the Provinces are greatly, I may say, equally interested, and in which whatever should conduce most to the general advantage would be most in the interests of Ontario. It is not a case into which party politics should, or I believe can, enter at all. I will not go largely into the merits of the award at present, but I would point out several reasons why I believe it is desirable that this House should be in possession of more information than it now has, before being called upon to legislate in a matter in reference to which the action to be taken must have a lasting influence for good or ill on the Dominion. In the first place, I would call attention to the fact that, in dealing with the Western Boundaries, the advocates, who alone seem to have had anything to say in the matter, have utterly ignored two Acts of the Imperial Parliament, which, taken in connection with the Imperial Proclamation of 1763, are tolerably clear as to the matter of boundary. I allude to the Act of 1803 (43 Geo. III, cap. 138) and the Act of 1821 (1 and 2 Geo. IV, cap. 66). The first of these Acts describes the Indian Territories as being "not within the limits of the Provinces of Lower or Upper Canada or either of them;" and the next refers to these same territories as being "to the Northward and Westward of the Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada." The position of the Indian Territories so decidedly specified in these Imperial Acts, as being beyond the limits of Lower or Upper Canada, should have been clearly ascertained and submitted to the Arbitrators before asking them to make an award, as they had no power to go beyond or interfere with lines fixed by Acts of the Imperial Parliament. It may be said that the limits of these Indian Territories were never defined, but the Imperial Proclamation of 1763, to which I have already referred, will throw some light on the subject. It is as follows:—

"And we do further declare it to be our Royal will and pleasure to receive under our Sovereignty, protection and dominion, for the use of the said Indians, all the lands and territories not included within the limits of our three new Governments, or within the limits of the territory granted to the Hudson's Bay Company, as also all the land and territories lying to the westward of the sources of the rivers which fall into the sea from the west and north-west, as aforesaid."

The lines produced by the Arbitrators are drawn without the slightest regard to these Indian Territories or the Imperial Acts of 1803 and 1821; therefore, I believe that their award—if for no other reason—should be received with caution by this House. But there are many other reasons why it should be carefully considered before being accepted, and among these is the fact that, on the north-east and north, it gives to Ontario a large extent of territory which she does not want, has never claimed, and has no earthly right to. If any territory at all had ever belonged to the Hudson's Bay Company, it was surely that on the confines of Hudson's Bay. That Company, as was well known, held but a troubled tenure for the first forty years of its existence, but, after the Treaty of Utrecht (1713), there never has been a question as to its rights to the territory bordering on Hudson's Bay. The Company has been in undisturbed possession from the date of the Treaty of Utrecht, up to the time at which they transferred their territorial rights in virtue, of a payment of a million and a half of dollars to the Dominion. Surely a possession practically undisturbed for a hundred and fifty years should of itself constitute some claim, and yet the award utterly ignores all claims and rights whatever in the direction of Hudson's Bay. Again, as regards the Western Boundary, the Act of 1774 (14 Geo. III, cap. 83) commonly known as the Quebec Act, had fixed the western limit of the Province of Quebec, as bounded by a line drawn "northward" from the point of junction of the Ohio and Mississippi to the territories of the Merchant Adventurers trading to Hudson's Bay. Now, the territories of the Merchant Adventurers are, in the maps of those days, exhibited as extending inland for a hundred miles or two from the shores of Hudson's Bay, and the advocates opposing the Dominion have striven hard to show that they came no further inland, so that, admitting that these territories are delineated with some degree of accuracy, a line drawn northward from the point indicated in the Act would have rather been to the eastward than to the westward of north; yet it is claimed that northward meant north-westward along the banks of the Mississippi. How absurd this contention is, a single glance at the admirable map compiled by the Government of Ontario will show. On reference to that map, it will be seen that such a line would not have gone to the territories of the Merchant Adventurers, as then known, at all, but on the contrary, would have run far to the west of them, among the slopes of the Rocky Mountains; therefore, I consider that the integrity of an award which ignores this northward line, established, as it was by Act of the Imperial Parliament, should be regarded with extreme caution. Another reason why the House should not be asked to confirm the award without investigation exists in the fact that the advocates opposing the Dominion have suggested no less than eleven different western boundaries for Ontario, and as many as ten northern boundaries with not one of which does the award agree, so that, on the showing of the counsel for Ontario, the Arbitrators are decidedly in error. No one could be more anxious to advance the interests of Ontario than I am, but I doubt very much whether it would be to her advantage that this award should be confirmed. Ontario has no means of dealing adequately with these distant territories, and whatever policy would lead to their most speedy development would be the most in her interest. The land, until the Indian title was extinguished, belonged in fact to the Indians. The Dominion Government had purchased it from them or at least a portion of it—some 50,000 square miles, or so—in lieu of which the Indians had annuities paid to them which, with other allowances, amounted annually to about $25,000 or $30,000. The residue of the territory within the limits designated by the award might cost as much more, so that it would eventually involve Indian payments to the tune of some $50,000 or $60,000 annually. Of course, the payments to the Indians form in fact a lien on the land, and Ontario is in no position to assume such burdens, more especially, as the opening up, organisation and development of these vast regions would cost her millions more. In this territory, she would have a white elephant which might amuse the people at first, but the older districts would soon become weary of so costly a pet. The true policy, in my opinion, would be to come to some arrangement with Ontario by which the whole of Algoma, including the new territory, could be formed into a separate Province. It is with the cities and the settlements of Ontario that the trade of these new regions must always be. As a Province, their great natural resources would become sooner developed, and therefore it is in the interest of Ontario that a new Province should be formed. It should never be forgotten that the claims of Quebec to, and interest in, all the territories of Old Canada beyond the limits of the Provinces were equal to those of Upper Canada. Quebec and Upper Canada, for a long period, exercised concurrent jurisdiction in these territories, and previous to the Union, Quebec had issued writs for execution at Lake Superior, in the vicinity of Fort William, as Upper Canada had also done. There is one other question connected with this matter which I think deserving of the gravest consideration. It is this: when the scheme of Confederation, which was so happily carried out, was under consideration, the part of the then Province of Canada known as Canada West, had certain well defined limits. In general estimation, it was considered to have been bounded north and west by the Height of Land. Had it then been suggested that its area would, in the near future, be more than doubled by the addition of the fairest portion of the vast territories at that time claimed by, and afterwards purchased from, the Hudson's Bay Company, would the other Provinces have consented to an arrangement which they must have believed would ultimately give to Ontario a vastly preponderating influence in the Confederacy. It will not be out of place I conceive to refer to documents which have been called for and laid before another Legislature. Among these is a letter bearing date the 23rd September last, addressed to the Secretary of State, in which the Government of Canada is called on to confirm the award. The reasons for making this demand are set forth at some length, and, in arguing the case, the following passage occurs:—

“ If the merits of the award have been considered by the Government of Canada, they will have observed certain preliminary things in connection with the question which were and are beyond controversy. Among these are the facts that Ontario is entitled to the same limits as Upper Canada had, whatever these were; that these limits embrace as much of the British Territory, west of the division line between Ontario and Quebec, as belonged to France before the Cession of 1763, and (what is the same thing) as much as belonged to the Province of Canada before Confederation.”

Before the Cession of 1763, the whole continent, west of the Ohio, belonged to France, or was at least claimed by France, and, if Ontario had now all that remained to Britain after the War of Independence, her boundaries would extend to the Arctic Sea on the north, and to the Rocky Mountains or Pacific Ocean on the west. But the Province of Upper Canada never did embrace as much of the British Territory west of the division line as belonged to France before the Cession of 1763, and what belonged to Canada before Confederation, is not by any means the same thing. The Province of Quebec was limited to the west and north by the Proclamation of 1763, which reserved all lands west and north of the St. Lawrence water-shed for the use of the Indians, and the Imperial Act of 1803, as well as the Imperial Act of 1821, clearly specifies the Indian territories as being beyond the Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, or either of them, and these Indian territories are part of the territory which belonged to France before the Cession of 1763. A little further on in the same document, a great deal is attempted to be made of the expressions used in Commissions to Governors, but surely a Commission issued eighty or ninety years ago should have no more weight than a Commission issued forty or forty-five years ago; and the Commissions of the latter time, although they extended the jurisdiction of the Governors to the shores of the Hudson's Bay on the north, restricted it to Lake Superior on the west, so that, admitting for the moment all that the advocates of a vast westward extension claim in virtue of Commissions to Governors, the same authority which gave those extensions can curtail them, and, according to the Commissions to the several Governors from 1838 up to the Union, the western boundary of Upper Canada was limited to Lake Superior. The same authority which carried the boundary to the shores of Hudson's Bay on the north confined it to Lake Superior on the west, so that, if the argument made use of in this document were carried to its logical conclusion, it would, in fact, tell against the claims of Ontario, and that very seriously. Commissions to Governors might extend jurisdiction, but they could not alter boundaries established by Imperial Acts. I believe the jurisdiction of the Governors of the old Province of Quebec extended to the point at which the due western line from the Lake of the Woods touches the waters of the Mississippi, but this does not alter the boundaries as established by the Quebec Act; and the Act of 1803, giving concurrent jurisdiction to Upper Canada and Quebec, in the Indian Territories, effectually settled the matter. The document goes on to say :

“Further, the Territory so awarded to Ontario is less than was comprised in Upper Canada, according to the true intent and meaning of the Quebec Act, 1774, as shown by its recitals and by its known objects and its history, including the proceedings thereon in the House of Commons, as reported in the ‘Cavendish Debates,’ and as set forth in the letter of the Right Hon. Edmund Burke, dated 2nd August, 1774, to his constituents, the Province of New York, whose agent he was at the time.”

The letter of the Right Hon. Edmund Burke refers solely to the boundaries of the then Province of New York of which he was the agent, and the true intent and meaning of the Quebec Act, 1774, as explained in the judgment given by the highest Court existing in Canada in 1818, is very different from that claimed for it in this paper. The advocates opposing the Dominion always try to make little of the unanimous decision of the Judges in the De Reinhard case, but let any unprejudiced person read the report of that trial, and he will see that the whole case hinges on the matter of the boundaries. He will see that the case was most ably argued on both sides, that there was no want of information, and that those taking the Upper Canada view argued the matter with a power and an eloquence which contrast very strongly with the feeble arguments put forth in the same direction nowadays. The Judges who gave their decision on that occasion, as to the western boundary of Upper Canada were as high in position, and as able to come to a reasonable decision, as the Arbitrators who made the late award, and they had evidently studied the case, which the latter do not seem to have done. But it is said in this paper that “the decision was come to without the Court being aware of the terms of the Royal Commissions to the Governors.” On this point, the Court ruled that the Crown could extend the jurisdiction or withdraw it again within narrower limits. This is admitted by the present advocates of the westward extension of Ontario, and what would they make of the later Royal Commissions limiting the western jurisdiction of Upper Canada to Lake Superior. In claiming so much for these Commissions, which are often contradictory the one of the other, they seem to have forgotten that the rule might work both ways. The paper goes on to say : “De Reinhard though clearly guilty, was not executed, and the only known or supposed reason for pardoning him is that the British Government were advised that the conclusion of the Court was not maintainable.” This is begging the question with a vengeance. The true cause of the pardon was that the case was considered by the Imperial authorities to have been one of homicide or manslaughter rather than of murder. For, in the official documents of the time, the country is described as being in a state of “private warfare” and in fact a war in which many lives were lost had been for a long time going on between two powerful rival corporations—the Hudson’s Bay Company and the old North-West Company of Canada. The document goes on to refer to what the Hudson’s Bay Company were content with in 1701, thirty years after the date of their Charter, but every one knows that they had then very powerful opposition, that France was at that time able to cope with England on the high seas. The true date from which to estimate the value of the rival claims was 1713—the date of the Treaty of Utrecht—when there was some sort of a definition of boundaries agreed on, in a measure, by both nations. But, if the award were far less objectionable than it is, if it did not run into territories the size of European kingdoms, which the country purchased from the Hudson’s Bay Company, to which, until that purchase was effected, Canada had clearly no claim, I will repeat that it demands a most thorough investigation by this House. It is useless to say that the territory is not valuable. It has rivers navigable for hundreds of miles from the sea inland, forests of great commercial importance, agricultural lands of vast extent, fisheries susceptible of great development, and it is all within the habitable parts of the continent, much of it having a climate equal, at least, to that of Ottawa. This is proved by a very able pamphlet issued by the Ontario Government, and by the recent reports of the Geological Survey. I now beg to move that a Select Committee be appointed to enquire into, and report to this House upon all matters connected with the Boundaries between the Province of Ontario, and the unorganised Territories of the Dominion, with power to send for persons and papers; said Committee be composed of Messrs. Dawson, Robinson, Geoffrion, DeCosmos, Brecken Royal, Trow, Mousseau, Caron, McDonald (Cape Breton), and Weldon, of whom five to form a quorum.

MR. MILLS: Is this in order? I introduced a Bill which was read the first time a few moments ago asking this House to affirm the award made by the Arbitrators. I think this motion is not consistent with the action of the House upon that Bill. At all events, whether it is in order or not, it will be extremely inconvenient to appoint a Committee to enquire into the matter until the Bill I have introduced is either carried on the second reading or defeated.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There can be no doubt about the motion being in order. The hon. gentleman has certainly introduced the Bill referred to confirming the Act of the Province of Ontario. The hon. member for Algoma moved for a Committee to enquire into matters connected with that award, which I regard as perfectly in order.

MR. HOLTON: I think the point of order is not quite so simple as my right hon. friend would intimate. The House has not merely permitted the introduction of the Bill, but it has ordered the second reading of the Bill to confirm the award of the Arbitrators in respect to the point under consideration. The hon. member for Algoma brings a proposition counter to that—in reversal, in point of fact, of the Order of the House. He is opposed to the confirmation of this award, and he proposes that a Committee should be appointed to establish reasons for the non-confirmation thereof. I simply submit it as a point of order; it is not a question I am prepared to discuss or to consider on its merits at this stage. The House has ordered a second reading.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It has ordered that it should be set down for a second reading.

MR. HOLTON: The Order of the House is that it should be read a second time to-morrow. When that Order is called, it will be competent for my hon. friend from Algoma to negative that motion by a proposal that, instead of the Bill being read the second time, the Committee should be struck, or, the Bill having been read the second time in pursuance of the Order of the House, it will be in order for the hon. gentleman to propose the reference of the Bill to a Select Committee. I have my doubts whether, the House having ordered a second reading of the Bill for a given purpose to-morrow, it is strictly in order to admit a distinctly counter proposition as shown by the argument of the hon. gentlemen who makes this motion.

MR. SPEAKER: I do not see that the motion of the hon. member is out of Order. It is true that the hon. member for Bothwell presented a Bill which was read the first time and ordered to be read the second time to-morrow, but the House has not pledged itself to any policy or to anything with relation to the Bill. I think the House ought to see that it is required to give a most liberal interpretation of this matter, and that enquiries of such a nature are far from being objectionable. I hold the motion is in order.

MR. MILLS: I am opposed to the appointment of the Committee for which the hon. gentleman asks in his motion. I think, Sir, that the Parliament of Canada, or at all events, the Government of Canada, are in honour and in good faith bound by the award made by the Arbitrators appointed to decide this question of boundary. My objection to the appointment of a Committee, if the question were still open, is that a Committee is a very inconvenient means of obtaining the information of the sort required. The Government of the First Minister, I think, in 1871 or 1872, appointed Mr. Ramsay, now Judge Ramsay, to investigate this subject and report upon it to the Government. Mr. Ramsay did so, and I presume obtained all the information he was able to obtain on the subject, and he made a report embracing that information. Subsequently Mr., now Judge, Armour, was also appointed as agent and counsel of the Government of Canada, to investigate the subject, and to argue the question before the Arbitrators that had been agreed upon. He carried on this investigation for some time. The information which he acquired, at his elevation to the bench was communicated to Mr. McMahon of London, and to Mr. Monck, a gentleman of Montreal, who were appointed agents and counsel of the Government of Canada, to inform themselves upon this question, and to argue the case, on behalf of Canada, before the Arbitrators. Mr. McMahon collected all the information he could get, and the information so obtained is embraced in the case that was submitted to the Arbitrators on behalf of the Government of Canada. I was myself appointed by the Government of Ontario to report upon the subject in 1872, and again in 1875 to prepare the case. My instructions were to make an exhaustive enquiry into this subject, to collect all the information bearing upon the case, whether it favoured the contention of Ontario or the contention of Canada. That report and case were submitted to the Government of Ontario, and I believe have been put in the possession of the members, or, at all events, a large number of the members of this House. The archives of Paris were searched at the instance of both Governments for information, the public records and state papers at London and other places were examined for information, both on behalf of the Government of Canada, and of the Government of Ontario, and all the knowledge it was possible to glean, was obtained at that time. There were a few documents referred to in various communications, as, for instance, the map referred to in a communication to Lord Bolingbroke, of Mr. Prior, who was Acting British Minister at Paris. This map was searched for both at Paris and London, but could not be found. Now, Sir, I do not believe that a Committee such as the one asked for would be a proper instrument for obtaining additional information. I do not believe there is any additional information to be obtained. If you take the cases of the Government of Ontario and the Government of Canada, they will give you all the information you want on the subject. If the gentlemen on the Treasury Benches believe that further information can be obtained, and that it is necessary to get it, they should appoint competent gentlemen who must be sent to London and to Paris to get what further information, if any, can be obtained.

But there is one thing certain that, there is no information which the Committee can get that is not already in the possession of the House, or which the House cannot have if the case for the Government of Ontario and the case for the Government of Canada are brought down to the House. I do not wish to discuss this question on its merits. I purpose doing so when the Bill which I intend to submit is brought before the House for the second reading. That will be a more convenient time. The hon. member for Algoma has alluded to some Acts of Parliament and certain other matters which he says have been overlooked by the Arbitrators. Among these Arbitrators, there was Sir Francis Hincks, a gentleman of rank, one well versed in public affairs; there was Chief Justice Harrison, a distinguished jurist, and Sir Edward Thornton. These gentlemen were quite able to appreciate the facts to which the hon. gentleman has referred. The Acts of 1803 and 1821 have no bearing on this question. The hon. gentleman has also referred to the King's Proclamation of 1763, and he says that certain territories are there spoken of as Indian territories. These words are perfectly intelligible; no difference of opinion could exist in reference to them. The King, in the exercise of his prerogative, agreed with France in the Treaty of 1763 that the Mississippi river should be the boundary on the west, and the King, in further exercise of his prerogative, parcelled out of the ceded territory a Province called the Province of Quebec, which corresponded very much to the present Province of Quebec. All the territory lying west of that Province was Indian territory—including Michigan, Wisconsin, Ohio, Illinois, and Indiana,—and the Indians in it were placed under the supervision of Sir William Johnston. The hon. gentleman has said that the western boundary of the Province of Ontario or Upper Canada was the meridian line from the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. I do not believe it is possible, after looking into the facts of this question, to come to that conclusion—either from the grammatical construction of the preamble of the Act of 1774, or from the circumstances which led to that Act. If the hon. gentleman will refer to the Act of 1774, he will find that it refers to the portion of New France which England had ceded to her in 1763. In the Act it is declared that the Province of Quebec shall embrace all those settlements which were then east of the Mississippi river. There was one settlement on the Wabash river, another at Detroit; but four-fifths of the population proposed to be embraced in the Province of Quebec would be found on the banks of the Mississippi in the western part of the Indian territory. Well, when this Bill was introduced, the description of boundaries was in this form: that the Province should embrace all these territories, countries and islands southward to the Ohio, westward to the Mississippi, and northward to the possessions of the Merchant Adventurers of the Hudson's Bay. These were the words—

An HON. MEMBER: The boundary line was to follow the banks of the Ohio until it reached the Mississippi.

MR. MILLS: The Act as it came down from the House of Lords mentions distinctly all these territories, countries and islands southward to the Ohio, westward to the Mississippi, and northward to the territories of the Hudson's Bay Merchant Adventurers. That was the form in which the Act was introduced in the House of Lords, and in which it was introduced into the House of Commons. The French had always claimed the country to the southern watershed of the St. Lawrence; they claimed to go south of the St. Lawrence river, and south of Lake Ontario; but the Province of New York claimed that their territory extended to the St. Lawrence river and Lake Ontario, on the north; and what Mr. Burke—who was acting as agent for the Province of New York—complained of, was that encroachments might be made southward under the Bill. He said:

“You have not stated what the boundary is to be; and it would be possible to press down your boundary to the very gates of the city of New York.”

These were, in effect, the words of Mr. Burke, and he insisted on the boundary being laid down in the Act itself. Lord North, who took charge of the Bill in the House of Commons, and who, I think, was Prime Minister at the time, stated that it was desirable to fix the boundary between the French and English settlements, upon the ground that there were, south of the St. Lawrence and Lake Ontario, no English settlements, and he believed there were some French settlements, and that it was desirable that they should be included in the Province of Quebec. After some discussion it was agreed that the southern boundary should be defined throughout its whole extent; and Mr. Burke and some other gentlemen retired for half an hour upstairs to alter the Bill; and Lord North said he would have no objection if they could make the line satisfactory. He undertook to define the southern boundary, but defined no other. Any hon. gentleman taking the Act of 1774 will see that the countries, territories and islands bounded on the south by a line running from the Baie des Chaleurs westward to the Mississippi, and northward to the territories of the Hudson's Bay Company are embraced in the Province of Quebec. Lord Thurlow, one of the law officers of the Crown at that time, pointed out that the gentlemen were confounding Canada, a province of France, with the Province of Quebec. I am not going to discuss this question minutely, or upon its merits, but I merely call the attention of hon. gentlemen to these facts, in opposition to what the hon. gentleman has said who introduced this motion. For this House to grant a Committee of Enquiry for the purpose of attacking the award of the Arbitrators in this matter, instead of confirming it, would be acting just as our southern neighbours would have done had they refused to abide by the Halifax award. It would be just as flagrant a breach of good faith as if Great Britain had refused to pay the money awarded by the Geneva Arbitration. The Government of Canada is continuous. Its obligations are not ended by a change of Ministry, and Ministers are solemnly bound by any action of a previous Government. Would it be proper for Mr. Hayes, at Washington, to ignore the Halifax Commission as an obligation undertaken by his predecessor, Mr. Grant? Would that be a right and proper mode of proceeding? And yet that might as well be done as to repudiate the award of these Arbitrators. The gentlemen composing the Board of Arbitration had a full opportunity of considering the case, and they gave it their fullest consideration. Sir Edward Thornton, I may say, came to consult the Government in reference to the matter, long before the Arbitrators sat; and I know that the other gentlemen, the late Chief Justice Harrison and Sir Francis Hincks, also considered this subject very fully. To sanction the appointment of this Committee to seek to set aside the award of these gentlemen would be as great a wrong, as gross breach of faith, as if one Administration of this country were to repudiate the public debt incurred by another Administration, or do anything which, in the public estimation, it is derogatory for a Government to do. I think the House ought not to grant this Committee; such a Committee cannot without dishonour and bad faith be appointed. If the Government think that the Arbitrators were bribed, or that they were wholly incompetent men, then they ought to assume the responsibility of opening up the question only with the consent of the other party, and by obtaining information through the proper channels, instead of appointing a Committee, a course which can lead to nothing but delay in the confirmation of the award which has been made.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou): I do not intend to occupy the House at present with any discussion on the merits of the important question raised by the motion of the hon. member for Algoma; and I trust, in saying so, I shall fulfil my promise better than the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, and who began by saying he did not intend to discuss the merits of the question. Of course, I will not contradict him, but the House must judge as to whether my hon. friend has not, during the time he has occupied, fully discussed the merits, in fact has made to my mind a case which imperatively demands the enquiry which the hon. gentleman for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) seeks. Now, the only embarrassment, if embarrassment should be felt on the subject—a subject so important to the whole Dominion and to the Government having charge of the interests of the Dominion, when we are required to abandon a tract of territory large enough to constitute a Province equal, as was remarked by the hon. member for Algoma, to the territory of all the Lower Provinces,—I say, if any embarrassment should be felt, it would be from the high standing, the high character, and the great learning of the gentlemen whose award will probably be under review of the Committee sought for by this resolution. But it does appear to me that this House would be wanting in its duty to the country if it allowed any decision, coming from men however eminent, to control the interests of the country and to deprive the Dominion of its territory, if in their opinion the decision arrived at was erroneous—not wilfully erroneous, for no one would imagine for a moment that either of the eminent men who composed this tribunal, could come to any decision that was not dictated by the purest motives and, I have no doubt, by the most searching enquiry. But, on a question of this character, I think there is nothing derogatory to the position which they occupy, to order an enquiry—and the fullest enquiry—before this House, or before any tribunal that this House may think proper to appoint, for the purpose of reconsidering the decision at which these gentlemen have arrived. It may be, as the hon. mover of the resolution has stated, that, on that occasion, the case of the Dominion was not fully put. It may be, as the hon. mover of this resolution says, that further information has been obtained, which it is desirable should be considered, in connection with the adjudication on this important subject; and, if I recollect aright, in the able report of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), made at the instance of the Ontario Government, he challenged the validity and force of a judgment bearing on this question given in the Supreme Court of Quebec, on the ground that, at the time the judgment was given, all the facts and circumstances which have since become available—largely through the industry of the hon. gentleman himself—were not put before the Court. Very well, as it is stated on the authority of the hon. member for Algoma, that such information is still open for consideration, I do not really think that the admitted authority of the Arbitrators ought to induce this House to abstain from further enquiry and investigation. The hon. member, I think, very unfairly insinuates that the action of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government is dictated by the circumstance that the Arbitration was initiated by the gentleman who preceded him in power. I am quite certain that is not the case, nor has the Government been impelled by any such consideration. If I recollect aright, when the hon. the leader of the Opposition assumed the reins of Government, there was a proposition by the Government of Ontario, a fair and reasonable and proper proposition, to determine, to use the words of the Minute of Council on which this Arbitration was appointed, the boundary between the Dominion of Canada and the Province of Ontario. It was not to make a boundary, it was not to authorise two or three persons to ramble over that immense extent of territory, and fix the boundary wherever in their judgment the boundary should be, but it was to determine, from a fixed, known point of departure, what the line was which should determine the respective territories of the Dominion on the east and Ontario on the west. Now that, for the reason that the Province claimed a larger and undefined extent of territory, was objected to by Ontario. The Government of Ontario put it on the ground that they claimed a territory further to the west than the line defined by the correspondence on that occasion would give them, that is the line running due north from the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, and they declined to appoint a Commission. They went further, and, if I recollect rightly, they instructed the Commissioners who had been appointed not to proceed with the investigation. I think that was the position of matters when a reply was received from the Government of Ontario that, as they claimed a line further to the westward than could evidently be given to them by the line running north from the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, they declined to proceed or to instruct their Commissioners to proceed. Now, it does appear to me that the hon. gentleman has no reason to complain that we object to the proceedings thereafter, not that the Government were not influenced by the very best motives, but that, after the Government of Ontario had made a claim for territory which the Government of the Dominion at that time expressed their belief they were not entitled to, the Government ought to have had the authority of Parliament before authorizing any Commission or any body of men to determine as to the rights and territories of the Dominion of Canada. These gentlemen were authorised to determine, not the line starting from any particular point which was to be fixed as the boundary between the two countries, but they were to determine whether, Ontario should own three or four hundred thousand square miles of territory, that the Dominion of Canada, through its Government, had claimed that Ontario did not own. Now, I think that on that ground it is perfectly right and just that this House, either through a Committee, or by some other mode of enquiry, should have the opportunity of determining whether they will adopt the conclusions at which that tribunal arrived, conclusions taking from the Dominion of Canada an immense extent of valuable territory. There is another reason why I think the Committee ought to be granted, and that is that many of us think that the conclusion at which that Commission arrived was not justifiable by the evidence. I say this with the greatest possible diffidence, but I am bound to express the opinion which I entertain, and entertain very strongly, though I do so with diffidence as indeed every lawyer would, who felt himself obliged to differ from the opinion of so eminent an authority as Chief Justice Harrison. But, without further discussing the merits of the question, I am quite sure that some of the eminent lawyers on the other side of the House would come to the same conclusion, if they were to consider the meaning of the Act of 1774. If that Act of Parliament was passed to-day in the light of the judicial decisions and the construction which those words have already received in the Courts, I do not think there could be any doubt or difficulty. Nor do I conceive that, in view of the judicial decision which took place some time after the passage of that Act, we could doubt what the intention of the Act was. There is no doubt whatever, as everybody must know, that, at that early date, in England particularly and among English people, there was not a very profound knowledge of localities in Western America. I do not know that we would slander our English fellow-subjects if we stated that even at this date, when they can travel by steam to the extreme west, they could not make a plan that could be relied upon as to the boundaries of the territory which we occupy now. There was one point clear and distinct which was easily perceptible to anyone who took the trouble to investigate it, and which was clearly understood by the eminent men who took part in the discussion in the Imperial Parliament, when the Act of 1774 was under discussion. That Act was watched, as the hon. member for Bothwell says, very carefully, and with great jealousy, by Mr. Burke and other eminent members of Parliament who were interested in the old English Colonies. They appeared to take little interest in the territory lying west, but they took the extremest interest in the western boundaries of the Colonies which they represented. As members of the House know, some of these older Colonies had Charters which granted them an extension westward to the South Sea, now called the Pacific Ocean, and that at that very time there was a question as to whether Pennsylvania and New York and the British Colonies lying along the sea coast should extend westward beyond the Alleghanies or not; therefore it was that this Act was watched during its passage through Parliament with the greatest jealousy and care. These intelligent men, having maps of the country before them, knew that in 1763 the western boundary of the British possessions extended to the River Mississippi. It was declared by the Treaty of 1763 that the boundaries between the territories of His Britannic Majesty and the King of the French, west, should be the River Mississippi from its source to its mouth. That was the boundary recognised on the maps of the time; and, with this map before them, these eminent statesmen and lawyers, evincing the care and anxiety with which they watched the progress of the Bill, and the intelligence and ability with which they defined the boundary in which their own Colonies were interested, declared that, instead of following the banks of the Mississippi, the line, when it reached the confluence of the Ohio and the Mississippi, should run northwards to the territory of the Hudson's Bay Company. The only question which appears to me for discussion is, not what the preamble of the Act would indicate, but what the intention of Parliament was, as indicated by the words employed; because it may be said that the intention of the British Parliament was not to annex this large stretch of territory in the North-West Territory, between the due north line and the banks of the Mississippi, a territory so large as to embrace, at the present day, portions of two or three of the largest and most prosperous States in the United States. I say it might have been the intention of Parliament to establish there another Government for the management and control of the territories in that stretch of country. The Act was deliberately passed by Parliament, not under circumstances which would indicate that they were misled, or that it was hastily done, because the Act was for several days under the closest scrutiny; and by it Parliament declared that the line which should bound the new Province of Quebec, or the territory added to the then Province of Quebec in 1774, should be a line running northward from the point at which the Ohio and Mississippi united. Now what does the word northward mean? What was the construction at that time put upon it? I say frankly that I have not been able to find any judicial decision on that point in England, at about the time the Act was passed. But so early as 1805 or 1806 the Supreme Court of New York, a body recognised as a very able and learned one, held directly and in the strongest terms, that the word northward, without further words to direct the inclination of the course, in charters or grants of the time, meant due north; and the Judges who decided two of these cases, one in 1805 and one in 1806, declared in the strongest language, not only that such was the true construction, but that it was then settled law. In 1818, we find the judicial construction of the Supreme Court in the Province of Quebec, on the first action on which the question arose, declaring that the line running due north from the junction of these two rivers was to be the true dividing line. With reference to the question put by my hon. friend from Algoma so strongly—and I think it is a most pertinent question—whether the Provinces of the Dominion which consented to enter into the Confederation, would have so readily entered had they supposed that the great Province of Ontario, which certainly, at that time, was not supposed to have her limits so far to the west, was to be by the acquisition of this territory enlarged to nearly twice, if not altogether twice, her supposed area, at the same time I quite admit that, if, in point of law, if, in point of fact, if, in point of justice, she is entitled to the territory, she should not be excluded from its attainment simply because of such a misapprehension. Another view may be taken of the question, which fully justifies the request of the mover of this resolution, and that is why is it that we never heard of this claim on the part of Ontario while the Dominion of Canada was assuming, with her consent, very large and extensive liabilities in connection with the purchase of that great territory from the Hudson's Bay Company. One argument forcibly used by my hon. friend from Bothwell in his report was that Ministers of the Crown, while negotiating with the Hudson's Bay Company for the purchase of their property—

MR. MACKENZIE: Will the hon. gentleman say how much of this disputed territory belonging to the Hudson's Bay Company was purchased?

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): A great deal of it. I cannot say how much, but, looking at the map, I should say there was a very large area indeed. But, if the contention of the hon. member for Bothwell be correct, then the Arbitrators, have done the greatest possible injury to Ontario. They have not given Ontario the territory to which she is entitled, and that is another reason why I think the hon. gentlemen opposite who advocate the cause of Ontario ought to be very glad that this discussion has arisen, in order that Ontario might, if she is so entitled, obtain her rights in this particular. The contention of the hon. member for Bothwell is that, running up the banks of the Mississippi river and running north until it strikes the territory of the Hudson's Bay Company, as anyone can see who looks at the map, the line would never strike the territory of the Hudson's Bay Company, and therefore, by running to the west of it, would give the whole of North America, with the exception of what the Hudson's Bay Company could hold, to Ontario. So much in reference to the line on the westward, which I think is at any rate of a sufficiently uncertain character to entitle this House to the fullest information on the subject before it ratifies that award. I have only to say, with reference to the line on the north, and the claim of the Hudson's Bay Company, that, so early as 1703 or 1704, a discussion took place in reference to the boundaries between themselves and the British Government. It was then shown, upon the map prepared by themselves, that the boundary should coincide with the height of the land beginning at Cape Grimington and going, as the hon. mover of the resolution said, to Lake Mistassini, running thence south-westerly, striking parallel 49°, and thence west. It appears to me that, looking at the map, it will be seen that, rightly or wrongly, whether the claim can be sustained or not, the Company at that time, before the dispute arose with reference to any other boundary than their own, claimed by that new boundary up the height of land of the waters running into Hudson's Bay. On these grounds, I think that the House will be justified in adopting the resolution for an enquiry. If the case of Ontario be so strong as it is said to be, no harm can be done, and the territory will be given to that great Province with the entire concurrence of this House, and the people of this country; but, on the other hand, if, through mistake or otherwise, territory has been assigned to her which belongs to the Dominion, then I do not think that the Province of Ontario, or the friends of that Province in this House, would desire the ratification of the award.

MR. BLAKE: I do not propose to trouble the House with any observations upon the question as to the true boundary line between Ontario and the unorganised territories of Canada. There are, however, one or two considerations with reference to the proposal now before the House, which, I think, should receive attention. It may be convenient, before proceeding to discuss those considerations, to refer to a suggestion made by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, who argued that, in consequence of some action taken by the Provincial Government of Ontario, at a time when I happened to be responsible for the conduct of its affairs, this House would be justified in taking the course it is now proposed to adopt. The hon. gentleman stated that, upon a former occasion, after a Commission for the establishment of the boundary line had been appointed, in consequence of instructions given by the Government of Canada to their Commissioner, to start from a defined point and from that point to ascertain the boundary, the Government of Ontario had ordered their Commissioner to desist from acting under the Commission.

MR. McDONALD (Picton): I said they had started from a defined point, giving the course due north from that point.

MR. BLAKE: The hon. gentleman thinks there is only one line. There was a good deal more in the instructions than he has stated. It will be found that, whereas, up to the time to which I refer, it had been assumed that that Commission was for the purpose of ascertaining and establishing the boundary line, the instructions to the Commissioner, which I have before me, limited his functions to marking upon the ground, to the location upon the ground, of a boundary northerly and westerly according to certain defined lines laid down in the instructions. A tracing was given to the Commissioner showing the point of commencement and indicating the due north line to which the hon. gentleman refers; and thus disposing of one part of the boundary. But the Commissioner was to run a line due north until he struck the southern boundaries of the Hudson's Bay Territory, and the instructions then proceed to state what that southern boundary is. They state:

"This is well understood to be the height of land dividing the waters which flow into Hudson's Bay from those emptying into the Valleys of the great lakes, and forming the Northern boundary of Ontario; and the same is to be traced and surveyed, following its various windings till you arrive at the angle therein between the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, as the latter is at present bounded, having accomplished which the same will have been completed."

Therefore, it is plain that the instructions to that Commissioner were simply to lay down on the ground the whole of the boundary according to certain directions which are contained in the instructions. These directions involved the cession by the Province of Ontario of territory which it had long before occupied, settled and organised, and in respect to which it was then exercising jurisdiction, in respect to which claims for money therein expended had been advanced by the Canadian Government and conceded by the Provincial Government on the ground that they were moneys spent within the Province of Ontario. Those who were responsible for the conduct of affairs in Ontario were not able to accede to the view that that was the true boundary line between Ontario and Quebec, and, because they were not able to do so, they declined to permit the prosecution of that Commission. In response to a communication announcing that decision, regret was intimated that the Province of Ontario had not on its part declared what it believed to be the true boundary line, and a communication was made in reply stating what the Province of Ontario thought was the boundary line; subsequently, a suggestion was made for a reference of the whole matter to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. That the matter should be referred to some tribunal was agreed to be reasonable, but it was thought by Ontario that the tribunal might better be constituted on this side of the Atlantic, and that suggestion was made on behalf of the Province, and the negotiations for some time stood at that point. In the year 1875, if I rightly remember, the Government of my hon. friend the member for Lambton acceded to the proposal that the tribunal for the disposal of the matter should be formed upon this, instead of the other side of the Atlantic, and with that view a Commission composed of eminent persons was named. Now, that Commission was formed for the ascertainment of the boundary, not for the marking, upon the ground, of a boundary line according to directions and instructions to be given to the Commissioners, but for the purpose of determining what the boundary line was, its marking being a process to be reached subsequently. Parliament was informed during the ensuing Session of the policy of the Government, and of what had actually been done—that the Government had agreed to the reference of this matter to a Commission—and no exception was taken so far as I remember—none, I am confident, by vote—to that policy and action. Then passed before the Commission sat—its operations being delayed by the acceptance by one of its members of an office, thought incompatible with the execution of its duties—

no less than three Sessions of Parliament after this announcement of the Commission, during which there was no proposal or suggestion to reverse that policy—to decide that it was unsafe or inexpedient that this question should be entrusted to a Commission or to this particular Commission. The matter so proceeded, and three years after the formation of the Commission, the Commissioners met and decided the question, and the members of the present Government, understanding the question, had not, even last Session, decided what course they would take—whether the award should be repudiated, or acted upon and confirmed. It is unfortunate that the papers in relation to this question were lost—they were not to be found in the pigeon-holes. Duplicates could not be obtained, and it was utterly impossible for the Government to come to a conclusion on the subject. Since that time, we have had no announcement, except that of the Government the other day of its intention on the subject. That announcement was that it was not the intention of the Government this Session to bring down a Bill for the confirmation of the award. Now, I think the point before us is more serious and grave than a mere territorial question, more important than the question whether the award be strictly right or wrong, than whether there be a mistake, error of judgment, or anything else in this matter. I think the question is one of much greater importance than those suggested. The Minister of Justice says that this award is of no consequence; that the arrangements made four or five years ago for the disposition of this matter by persons high in the confidence of the people of Canada are of no consequence, and that it is fit and proper that the whole question be now thrown open and discussed by a Committee selected by the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson); that fourteen or fifteen members should discuss the legal and constitutional questions, questions of fact, questions of interpretation arising in this matter, and that their report should dispose of it. Now, I admit there may be cases in which an individual or a nation may be justified in breaking a bargain, or refusing to be bound by an award; but they are, and must be, cases of a wholly exceptional character. A very great responsibility is assumed by that country, whatever its rank in the scale of nations, which declares it will not be bound by the result of a solemn convention. I esteem this in the same light as a convention between two different countries, for, as between Canada and Ontario, they are separate and distinct in this matter. The rights of the one and of the other are, it is said, in conflict. The question, what was the true boundary, was the question for resolution. I do not pretend we are absolutely bound by this award, nor does any man sitting on this side of the House. It is certain we are not so bound, and that the Act made by which this country can be formally bound by any award is an Act of Parliament, and that the power to decide questions of this kind, even by Act of Parliament, was given us not very long ago by an amendment of the British North America Act. But, while that power exists, the question of international morality subsists also, and what we have to consider is whether a case is here made out clearly sufficient to justify the procedure suggested to-day, based as that procedure is on a disregard of the award as a cogent instrument. Now, the first proposition I shall advance is that, as the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) well observed, there is a continuity in Government, and that observation applies with still greater force to a question of policy submitted to and practically disposed of by a Parliament, which Parliament had the power and free opportunity, during several Sessions, of pronouncing upon, and which never pronounced, nor was even asked to pronounce, adversely to that policy. I maintain that Parliament has assented to that policy. I say this question rests, with respect to the Government of the day, just in the same position as if the Government of the day had been responsible for the original Commission. No hon. gentleman opposite can say that the present Government, or any of its supporters, are any the less bound than was the Government of the hon. member for Lambton in reference to the issue of this Commission, or its consequences. My second proposition is that, if it be proposed not to ratify the award, but to open the question again, and throw that instrument aside, such a proposal as that should be made.

upon the responsibility of the Government of the day, and with all the gravity which such a course of action demands. I maintain that it is for the Government which feels that there has been such a serious miscarriage of justice, such a gross mistake, such a dreadful error or worse as to render it necessary that an international award—using the most convenient, though not a strictly accurate phrase—should be discredited and cast aside—it is for the Government which reaches that painful conclusion to come down and say so to the House, and to bring forward its justification for such a line, and to propose its solution. I maintain that no question of this description should be pitchforked into the hands of a Select Committee at the instance of a private member. I do believe the appointment of a Select Committee to discuss a question agitated so many years, in reference to which it is said there is so much evidence before the country and the House, and so much more to come, would be nothing but a farce. I do not think that, with the other duties which the members of the House are called on to perform, it is other than farcical and ridiculous to suppose that any great additional light would be thrown, during our brief Session, on this question. But the proceeding proposed is an easy mode, perhaps, for the Governments to escape responsibility and to procure some opinion from a Committee, that the boundaries are different from those laid down, and, having procured that opinion, and fortified thereby, the Government may take courage, some other time, to enter upon more active proceedings to repudiate more fully the award. What I object to in their conduct is the skirting of responsibility involved in this procedure. I should not have yet made this objection if a member of the Government had not supported the proposition that a private member should move for a Committee of Enquiry in this matter. What a novel and entirely indefensible proposal it is that a private member should take charge of this great material and moral question—moral as to whether a national award should be set aside, and material as to the extensive territory involved. It is the bounden duty of the Government itself, if disposed, to take steps which, in its opinion, the interest of the country requires—steps tending to the disturbance and upsetting of this award,—so to state, frankly, itself, to propose those steps on its own responsibility, and to justify its course. Holding those views, I object to the appointment of the Committee, and I hope the House will be divided on the motion. I also object to the composition of the Committee, which, I think, should be chosen by the House. But my main position is that the responsibility properly devolves on the Government of dealing with the question which I, as a resident of, and a member from, the Province of Ontario, I do not hesitate to declare, I regard as infinitely more important in its moral than in its material aspect.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), in his concluding remarks, says the Government desires to escape the responsibility of adjudicating or deciding on this question, by allowing the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) to present this motion. I never have understood that the submission of any subject to a Committee is an avoidance of any responsibility that constitutionally is thrown on the Government of the day. A Committee of this kind may assist the Government, but can in no way deprive them of, or shield them from, any responsibility the Constitution imposes on them. But the hon. gentleman went on to say that this Committee, if struck, should stand on the responsibility of the Government, and not appear the result of the act of a mere private member. Well, if it be true that a private member cannot introduce a resolution on this subject, how can a private member introduce a Bill? I understand that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills)—a private member, without consulting with the Government, I suppose for the purpose of helping the Government to escape or avoid its proper responsibility,—has taken upon himself to relieve the Government in the matter, by the introduction of a Bill on the subject. The hon. member for West Durham seems resolved to help us too. We are very much obliged to the hon. gentleman, but we will take the responsibility of any ultimate action on this subject. The manner in which the discussion arose has been correctly stated by the member for West Durham. It is quite true that the instructions given by the Dominion Government were limited to the ascertainment of the true line according to the law. It was not the desire or intention of the Dominion Government to pass by the Commission, or act of the Commission, to decide that question. The great question was—what was, by law, the legal boundary between Ontario and the western country? This question, the members of the present Government thought then, and think now, should only be decided by a legal tribunal. The British North America Act of 1867 provides that the western boundaries of Ontario and Quebec shall be the western boundaries of the old Province of Canada, as provided under the Acts constituting the Province of Canada. The proposition was made that the question should be left to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. And why? Because it was a question of law, of the construction of a Statute, as to the boundaries of the old Province of Canada, according to the Imperial Statute; and no other tribunal could satisfactorily settle that question but a court of the highest resort. We should all have been obliged to submit to that perforce. The enlargement of Ontario, or the diminution of its bounds, was not a matter that could be raised or decided before any ordinary tribunal. If the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, or court of highest resort, had solemnly declared that, by the law of the land, the boundary between Ontario and the North-West was so and so, it would have been satisfactory. But the Government, without the previous consent of Parliament, left the question to three Arbitrators, only one of whom was a lawyer, the other two being laymen, and provided that the decision of the majority should be final. So that we might have had the two laymen differing from the legal Arbitrator, and deciding as to the construction of a Statute, upon the question of the boundary according to that Statute. It seems to me it was a most unwise thing to assume so great a power without the previous solemn deliberation of Parliament. It is well enough to say it was afterwards mentioned in Parliament, after the good faith of the Government was pledged, and that no objection was taken by Parliament. That is not the way in which Parliament ought to have been treated by the Government, its servants, who ought to have taken it into their confidence. The right to submit the question in this manner ought to have been given by Parliament, instead of its being assumed to be within the proper jurisdiction of any Government, which I deny. No Government could thus decide to give away hundreds of miles of country, or millions of acres of land, without the authority of Parliament. The member for Bothwell says that this Government is continuous. Yes, but Governments are not despotic; and this act far exceeded the right of any Constitutional Government. Fancy the Government of England leaving it to be decided by a Commission whether France or England should have the Channel Islands, which formerly belonged to the Duchy of Normandy, without the previous submission of the question to Parliament? In the present case, it was always believed that the reference was to be: what was the true boundary according to law, and the nature of the respective titles of the Dominion and Ontario? Does the member for Bothwell mean to say that this is the true line? Has he not written a book to show that Ontario has a right to infinitely more land? Has he not declared that this Arbitration is not an award of what the real line, according to law, is? But they have settled a boundary and made a mistake similar to that of the King of the Netherlands, with respect to the boundary between New Brunswick and the United States. He made the mistake of running a compromise line. They did not commit any breach of faith—such was never charged by the British Government.

MR. BLAKE: Neither the United States nor the British Government assented to it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The British Government would have been pleased to accept that award if the United States had accepted it as a compromise line. Both parties declared it was not the line—that it was beyond the reference. There was no breach of faith there; and, if the British Government had assented, there would have been no breach of faith in regard to the award, which far exceeded the powers given to the Arbitrators. So it is in this case. The Bill declares that it is not the true line.

MR. MILLS: No.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It declares distinctly that it is not the true line.

MR. MILLS: The Act of the Ontario Government claims more; and the Government of Canada maintained that it was less.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Exactly; the hon. gentleman will not argue that in a Statute the Legislature of Ontario would assert a claim which they do not believe to be a just one. The Act states that they would claim a larger line and a much larger proportion of country.

MR. MILLS: They say that they have done so.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: You must remember, Mr. Speaker, that the two questions are quite distinct. The first is what is the true line between the countries, and the next, what is the expedient line between the countries? To meet cases such as this, an Act of the Imperial Government was passed stating that no Province of the Dominion, or the Dominion, could enter into an arrangement by which any Province may be enlarged or diminished. It was under this Imperial Act that the Ontario Government agreed to diminish their boundaries; therefore, this is altogether a conventional line, and the great mistake in that matter is in the Act assuming a power and leaving it to any three Arbitrators to decide what was the best line between the Dominion and the Province of Canada. The Constitution gave them no such power. It is an unconstitutional assumption; and, in making this reference, they mistake the consequence of an unconstitutional course.

MR. BLAKE: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; if I rightly remember, the Commission did not empower the Arbitrators to define what was the best line. It empowered them to ascertain what was the best line.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: No; to determine the line, not to ascertain the line. Moreover, we know that the Arbitrators did not decide it as being the true line. We know that beyond doubt; the hon. member for Bothwell will admit that.

MR. MILLS: No.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Then I will bring you three elaborate articles written in the Monetary Review by Sir Francis Hincks, giving the whole ground for a decision, and in which it is distinctly stated that they reached the best line they could under the circumstances. The tribunal to which the matter was referred was a bad tribunal, because it was not a tribunal of experts in the construction of Statutes. No one has a greater respect for the general and political ability of Sir Francis Hincks than myself; no one has a greater respect for the high standing and diplomatic weight of Sir Edward Thornton; but neither of them is a lawyer competent to decide upon the consideration of these Statutes. This is a fair and proper subject for discussion in Parliament, met, as we are, to protect the rights of Canada and the rights of the Dominion; and I am quite sure that the hon. member for Bothwell, although formerly a paid agent of the Ontario Government will, as a member of Parliament, feel and assert his independence, and disregard the fact that the Government of Ontario were formerly his clients. I am confident that he will think only of what is just in the matter, as affecting the various Provinces of the Dominion. While the Government of Ontario claim that it is a conventional line, the Government actually decided, without the provision being left to Parliament, that these three men might give away territory equal to any great European Kingdom by a vote of a majority; and, although the hon. gentlemen opposite, when on this side of the House, were bound to protect the interests of Canada, that Government never thought of securing a right of way for the Canadian Pacific Railway from Thunder Bay to Red River. They ought, previous to this arrangement, to have made a bargain, for 20,000,000 acres of land on each side of that road is one of the conditions under which the conventional bargain should have been made. They should have made some arrangement by which the country which was to be opened up at the expense of the older Provinces of the Dominion, should have contributed at all events by land, if not by money, in the construction of the road. They have not only neglected to do that but they did not even procure a right of way, and we have an application made to Arbitrators to decide how much will have to be paid for every acre of land that is absorbed in that country. The utter disregard of the interests of the Dominion which are involved in this matter is one that calls for the most serious consideration of this House, as well as for the most serious consideration of the people of this country. The Province of Ontario after all, perhaps, will not get as much as it expected, because a great portion of the Indian title to the land is not extinguished; while, in regard to those portions that are extinguished, if the award was consistent, they have the right of sovereignty, and the title belongs either to the Indians or to the assignee of the Indians, which is the Dominion Government. But, if that is the case, then there should have been a provision in the conventional line that, before that country was handed over, the Ontario Treasury should repay, or agree to repay, to the Dominion Treasury the amounts that had been paid to Indians, or agreed to be paid to them in future for all time, for the surrender of these lands. What is the consequence of this reckless conduct on the part of the gentlemen opposite? That the Dominion Government are obliged, under Treaty obligations, to pay money for all time to come for the extinguishment of titles, without the Province of Ontario being asked to contribute directly a single dollar.

MR. MACKENZIE: No, no.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is not too much for the Government, acting in the interest of the Dominion as a whole, to say that this matter must be sifted to the bottom. It is clear that it is a conventional line, and, being a conventional line, I do not think we can do better than to have it looked into, in order to ascertain whether it is a good or a bad bargain. If it be a bad bargain, there is no question of good or bad faith in the matter. It is a question for Parliament to decide, whether they will agree to diminish the eastern boundary and give up a certain tract of land which is claimed to belong to the Dominion or not. The hon. mover of the resolution and the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) have both made themselves familiar with this subject and may be regarded as experts in this great question. By leaving the matter to a

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Committee, we will get all the information we require.

MR. MILLS: What about? There is nothing to enquire into, according to your views.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman says there is nothing to enquire about; there is a great deal to enquire about. I say it is a conventional line, and the Province of Ontario says it is a conventional line.

MR. MACKENZIE: No.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The Statute bears out my statement. The Imperial Act allowed the Province, and allowed the Dominion, to alter, diminish, or increase the boundary upon the terms and conditions mentioned. The award was made without any terms or conditions, and without Parliament being consulted about it. Therefore, we have a right, and we should be wanting in our duty to the people of this Dominion if we did not ascertain whether the award was satisfactory to this country and the people of Canada.

PRIVILEGE—INSOLVENCY ACTS REPEAL.

REMARKS.

MR. BÉCHARD: Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to call the attention of the House to a matter which is personal to myself. I was not in the House when the hon. member for Lambton referred to the Bill introduced by my hon. friend from Stanstead, or I might have given such explanation as would have prevented further misunderstanding in the matter. I see, however, that the insinuation has been made that I received from the Clerk the Bill introduced by my hon. friend, and that I kept it hidden in my desk, and sent back to the Clerk a copy of the Bill introduced last year, with a view to giving my Bill precedence over that of my hon. friend. With the permission of the House, I will relate the facts connected with the case. After my hon. friend from Stanstead had introduced his Bill, and I had also introduced mine, I went to the Clerk to see my hon. friend's Bill, with a view of comparing it with mine, and ascertaining whether his Bill was for a repeal pure and simple, and whether it contained other dispositions respecting insolvency. The answer of the Clerk was that my hon. friend had sent no Bill, but a blank. I returned to my seat and in a few minutes afterwards you, Mr. Speaker, intimated to me by a sign of your hand that you wanted to see me. I went to you, and, while standing by your Chair, you showed me a couple of copies of Mr. Colby's Bill, and offered them to me. I told you one would be sufficient. Then you told me to take the French copy, and that I could keep it, whilst you kept the English copy. These are the facts exactly as I know them, and as they were in this matter. I never had any idea of keeping my hon. friend's Bill from the Clerk, or of keeping it in my desk for the purpose of giving my Bill precedence. I would scorn such conduct as unworthy of a gentleman. I desire now to read a few lines which are entitled "Parliamentary Notes," and which were published in the Montreal Gazette:

OTTAWA, February 17th.

"To-day's was short and sweet, the House rising at 4 o'clock. After clearing off a very scanty order paper, the probable discussion on the second reading of Mr. Colby's Insolvency Repeal Bill being struck off by some unaccountable difference between the one as handed to the Speaker and that produced by the Clerk, the latter turning out to be a copy of Mr. Béchard's measure of last year. The little foundlings had been changed by someone, and eventually it turned up in Mr. Béchard's desk, thus exactly completing the parallel to the thrilling adventures of the true heir who, notwithstanding all machinations, comes to his own at last. To say the least, it is curious that this episode should occur just when there is such rivalry between the two sides of the House as to who should introduce the measure, and Mr. Mackenzie's attempt to rule out Mr. Colby's Bill, on the strength of the alleged discrepancy, tallied oddly with the place where it was discovered."

I thought, these insinuations having been made, that it was due both to the House and myself, that I should offer these explanations, to vindicate my character against slanderous insinuations.

Mr. COLBY: I extremely regret that these insinuations should have been made against my hon. friend, who, I am quite sure, never contemplated the act of deliberately appropriating the Bill which I submitted, for the purpose of getting precedence. I regret that any misapprehension should have arisen out of the circumstances connected with it, for I am sure my hon. friend, whom I have known ever since I entered this House, is quite incapable of conduct of that kind. But, while my hon. friend has been a martyr to the newspapers, I wish also to take this opportunity to do what I have never had occasion to do before, to bring a little matter which is personal to myself, and arose out of the same question, before the attention of the House. I see by a recent newspaper published in this Dominion that, in connection with the very same matter, I have been charged with having perpetrated a trick, in order to gain petty applause. The concluding paragraph of the article referred to is as follows:—

"It may be so, but Mr. Colby's course is very unlike that usually pursued by the member for Stanstead, and resembles rather a specimen of Yankee smartness and trickery, which might be expected in the United States Congress but not in a British House of Representatives."

The article is headed an "Un-British Trick." I also have observed, in two other newspapers, paragraphs of a similar purport, although not couched in precisely the same language. I think it but fair to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, and to myself, that any misapprehensions which have arisen out of this matter should be disproved by a clear statement of the facts, for, while I should extremely regret that my hon. friend should rest under an unjust imputation, he would, I am sure, equally regret that I should be misrepresented in the same way. I took the opportunity of giving notice, upon the first day of the meeting of Parliament, of the introduction of two Bills on subjects in which I have taken a very great interest in former years: one concerning the Insolvency Act, and the other in reference to petroleum. These notices went upon the Order Paper before that my hon. friend from Iberville, who also gave notice on the same day of a Bill in reference to insolvency. At the proper stage, I made my motion, and you, Mr. Speaker, asked me to send you a copy of the Bill. I sent you a copy which was a proof-sheet of the Bill, precisely as it is now distributed, both in English and in French, to all the members of this House. By some unaccountable means—by some blunder that Bill was not in the Clerk's possession at the time my hon. friend the member for Lambton made an enquiry in reference to it. My hon. friend from Lambton stated his entire satisfaction with the explanation I had given that the Bill had been placed in the Speaker's hands the day before. My hon. friend from Chateauguay, I believe, also expressed his entire satisfaction with it, and that the proceedings were entirely regular. On one other point, I desire simply to make a brief reference. It has been intimated in these newspapers that I was guilty of some discourtesy in taking the initiative in the introduction of a Bill for the repeal of the Insolvency Law. Now, I am quite sure that, having been a member of this House for many years, the members of this House do not consider me as one who is in the habit of infringing upon rights or wounding the feelings of other members, and, if I took an early opportunity of introducing that Bill, I was not under the impression that there was any impropriety in my so doing, after having introduced a Bill in 1871 against the Insolvency Laws, and carried it against the Government I was then supporting. I also introduced a similar Bill in 1872, and carried it by a most persistent and laborious effort against the Government I was then supporting, and I have, from time to time, in season and out of season, and on all occasions, endeavoured either to effect an entire abolition of what to my constituents and myself, is an obnoxious law, or its thorough amendment. It seemed to me that there was no unfitness in my coming forward at this early stage and introducing the Bill, which was likely to be effectual in repealing the Insolvency Laws, and if, by so doing, I have wounded the feelings of any member of the House, I sincerely regret it.

MR. COLBY.

PROCEDURE—PREMATURE PRINTING OF PUBLIC BILLS.

REMARKS.

MR. BLAKE: I desire to call the attention of the House to a practice which is now being pursued, and which, unless some new practice has been established during last Session, is irregular. I refer to the practice of Public Bills going to the Parliamentary Printer and being printed anterior to their introduction. I never heard before that any member had the right to have his productions of that description printed. We know that Government Bills are sometimes printed before the commencement of the Session, and introduced in that way. I always understood that private members' Bills had to pass the first reading before they reached the hands of the Queen's Printer. While on this subject, I may refer to another proceeding which seems to be also irregular. We have found on our desks, during the last few days, slips printed by the Queen's Printer intimating the intention of two private members to propose amendments to the Bill for a repeal of the Insolvency Law. While it is competent and very convenient to give notice on the Notice Paper in the usual way of such amendments, it is contrary to our practice, that there should be separate fly-sheets printed and distributed in this manner.

MR. SPEAKER: It is my intention to call the attention of the Clerk to the rule and I will see that it is not disregarded again.

MR. BLAKE: You will observe that the early printing of the Bill gives to a member who is allowed the privilege the advantage over one who is not, and, in the present case, had the member for Iberville been fortunate enough to catch your eye, he would still have been postponed at the second reading by virtue of the earlier despatch in printing accorded to the member for Stanstead.

MR. COLBY: It would have made no difference in my case.

MR. BLAKE: If the hon. gentleman will look at the Notice Paper of the last few days, he will find that it might have made a difference.

PROCEDURE—NOTICES FOR PUBLIC BILLS.

REMARKS.

MR. HOLTON: While on the subject of a procedure of the House, I might remark that there is another irregularity not of recent origin, but which has led to inconvenience on this occasion. It is that notices for the introduction of Public Bills—I refer to the two days' notice—do not appear upon the Orders of the Day, as well as upon the Votes and Proceedings. Then the question arises whether the gentleman presenting or introducing a Bill has given the regular notice, and it is necessary to refer back to the Votes to settle the question. If the notice should appear in the Votes and Proceedings and on the Order Paper as well, the question of precedence could readily be determined, and such difficulties as have just arisen could hardly occur.

MR. SPEAKER: As the hon. gentleman from Chateauguay is aware, notices of motions for the introduction of Bills, in accordance with the practice of many years, are never put upon the routine papers. If it is the desire of the House—and I think a change might be made very properly—we might alter our procedure in the direction suggested.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There is no settled practice of the House in this regard. Some settled practice should be adopted. I think that motions for the introduction of Bills should appear amongst the notices of motion.

MR. HOLTON: There is a manifest inconvenience in allowing Bills to be introduced as at present. Their appearance on the Notice Paper would establish their precedence.

MR. SPEAKER: In that case it would be necessary to insert a paragraph at the head of the Orders of the Day, and give the Bills in the order in which they should be presented each day. If the House desire such should be done, I will give the necessary orders.

COMMITTEES APPOINTED.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD reported lists of members to compose the Select Standing Committees of the House, from the Special Committee appointed to prepare said lists.

Ordered, That the said Report be concurred in.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

The following Committees were also appointed:—

Select Committee to assist Mr. Speaker in the direction of the Library of Parliament so far as the interests of this House are concerned, and to act as members of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the Library.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

Select Committee to supervise the Official Report of the Debates of this House during the present Session, with power to report from time to time.—(Mr. Bowell.)

Ordered, That a Message be sent to the Senate requesting that their Honours will unite with this House, in the formation of a Joint Committee of both Houses, on the subject of the Printing of Parliament, and that the members of the Select Standing Committee on Printing will act as members of the said Joint Committee on Printing.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 10) To regulate the employment of children, young persons and women in the workshops and factories of the Dominion of Canada.—(Mr. Bergin.)

Bill (No. 11) To regulate the encumbering of real estate, by loans of money, or otherwise.—(Mr. Orton.)

Bill (No. 12) To encourage the sale of farm produce.—(Mr. Vallee.)

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURTS ACTS REPEAL BILL.

(Mr. Keeler.)

FIRST READING.

MR. KEELER introduced a Bill (No. 13) To repeal the Supreme and Exchequer Courts Act, and the Acts amending the same.

MR. ANGLIN: Opposition was offered last Session to the introduction of a similar Bill. In my opinion it is due to the people of the country that the Government should take upon itself to oppose the introduction of a measure which must be looked upon as an attack on the valuable institutions of this country. This is a very serious question, and I think it is scarcely right to allow the introduction of this measure, unless the Government believe that such a question should be seriously discussed. I have a very strong feeling that they should take the initiative and resist a motion of this kind.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Perhaps my opinion may not be of much weight on this question; but I do not think it at all necessary to oppose a Bill of this kind. I think a Court of Justice or an institution of any kind which cannot stand investigation cannot stand very high in the estimation of the country. I shall be glad to hear any discussion on this or any other matter, and I do not think that allowing the Bill to be introduced can be objected to. I think to object would be an act of discourtesy to the hon. gentleman who proposes to introduce it. The Supreme Court, I admit, is a high tribunal, and one which should receive the protection of the Government and the Country; but the Senate and other institutions have been attacked before now; and, although I do not believe in the expediency of abolishing the Senate, still I should not object to the introduction of a Bill to do away with it altogether, if any hon. member should think proper to introduce such a Bill.

Bill read the first time.

SABLE ISLAND—TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION.

QUESTION.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to connect Sable Island with the mainland of the Province of Nova Scotia by marine telegraph, during the present year.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is under the consideration of the Government.

STRATFORD POST-OFFICE AND CUSTOM-HOUSE.

QUESTION.

MR. HESSON enquired, Whether the Government have decided to accept the valuable lands proposed to be donated by the town of Stratford for the purpose of erecting a post-office and Custom-house thereon; and, if so, is it the intention of the Government to erect said post-office and Custom-house at an early date?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: In the absence of the Postmaster-General, I may state that we do not find that there has been any such offer made to the Government.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

MANITOBA—ALLOTMENT TO MINORS. QUESTION.

MR. SCHULTZ enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to proceed with the allotment to minors in the unallotted parishes of Manitoba.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD stated that the allotments had taken place in St. Boniface and several other parishes, and were received on the 17th instant, and the Agent of the Dominion reported that the allotment in St. François Xavier and the remaining parishes would be sent in a few days.

BOUNDARY BETWEEN ONTARIO AND UNORGANISED TERRITORIES OF THE DOMINION.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

House resumed the adjourned debate on Mr. Dawson's motion:—"That a Select Committee be appointed to enquire into, and report to this House upon all matters connected with the Boundaries between the Province of Ontario, and the unorganised Territories of the Dominion with power to send for persons and papers; said Committee to be composed of Messrs. Dawson, Robinson, Geoffrion, DeCosmos, Brecken, Royal, Trow, Mousseau, Caron, McDonald (Cape Breton), and Weldon, of whom five to form a quorum."

MR. MACKENZIE: Before the vote is taken, I desire to notice very briefly some arguments and statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite in the debate yesterday. I regret that the hon. the Minister of Justice is not in his place, as I desire to allude to some of his remarks, but I will defer doing so until later on. The hon. gentleman at the head of the Government strongly objected to the mode of settlement, and devoted remarks yesterday to showing that the course pursued by the late Government was not one which should have been taken; but there are some reasons why we may fairly doubt whether his own opinion was always in that direction. When the matter was first brought under discussion, under the late Sandfield Macdonald, that gentleman employed the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) to make some preliminary examinations by inspection of maps, plans, books, papers, Acts of Parliament, and other documents. I do not propose to discuss the report of that hon. gentleman at all; but he was the one who, in the first place, suggested an arbitration for the settlement of this question. He reported officially on the 9th of March, 1872, (that was in his second report) that he "suggested in a friendly unofficial way, to members of the Dominion Government, and of the Government of Ontario, the expediency of appointing, before the Commissioners begin their discussion, a third person of ability and position unconnected with Canada, to act as umpire in case of dispute, subject of course to the approval of Parliament; and then he says, so far as "he could judge, Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir George E. Cartier, to whom he made the suggestion, viewed it favourably." I do not present this as any argument to prove whether the proposal once made by hon. gentlemen opposite, namely, to refer the matter to the Privy Council, or that proposed by the late Administration, to have Arbitrators named on this side of the Atlantic to decide the question was the best, but I mention it as showing that at one time our scheme was favourably entertained by the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government. We conceived it to be the best, because we believed that access to such documents as could only be obtained in England and France could as well be obtained for use here in this country, and a larger amount of evidence could be obtained on this side of the water, where the whole question was better understood than in England; and we believed, that people on this side were much better acquainted with the history of, and all matters connected with, the subject than any Judges of the Privy Council could possibly be. This, I admit, is a matter of opinion; but we had no doubt upon the question; and we informed Parliament when the Arbitrators were appointed. The hon. gentleman at the head of the Government took exception yesterday because only one legal gentleman sat as an Arbitrator, although that one occupied the highest position that could be attained at the Bar of the Province of Ontario. The late Judge Wilmot, of New Brunswick, was named by the Dominion Government; but, before the Arbitrators could meet, he died. It then became the duty of the Administration to select someone in his place, some one of position, and possessed of high abilities; and their selection fell upon Sir Francis Hincks. I think no one will venture to say that that gentleman was not eminently fitted to undertake the office. He had been Prime Minister of Canada for years, and subsequently acted as Governor of another Colony; had spent most of a long life in the country, and was well qualified, from his natural abilities, to fulfil a duty of this kind. No objection was taken to him at the time; and only now is the objection taken, because he was not a member of the legal profession. It has been the custom in appointing Arbitrators to select one legal gentleman, while the other two are laymen, so that no real exception can be taken on that ground to the Arbitrators. The hon. the Minister of Justice yesterday, and the mover of the motion before the House, made some remarks. I am not quite sure that the Minister of Justice said much on the point, but the mover of the motion, did say that the parties who were appointed by the Dominion Government to conduct the case before the Arbitrators were not able to conduct the proceedings.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): I said nothing of the kind.

MR. MACKENZIE: That was certainly implied. The gentleman who moved the resolution, however, did not hesitate at all in saying so.

MR. DAWSON: The hon. gentleman will pardon me, but I did not say so.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman even impugned the integrity of the award, and stated that the proceedings were not properly conducted. The award might be wrong, but, at the same time, nothing can be alleged against its integrity. The hon. gentleman who moved the resolution reflected upon all those who were managing it. He said the case on the part of Ontario was admirably conducted and was altogether better managed than that of the Dominion. Now, Sir, in the first place, the hon. gentlemen opposite appointed a very eminent lawyer in Montreal, Mr. Ramsay, and he prepared the case. A pamphlet, which was published and was before the Arbitration, contained Mr. Ramsay's case. That gentleman became a Judge, if I recollect aright, before the proceedings had gone very far. I do not say that Mr. Ramsay was appointed to appear before the Arbitrators, but he was appointed to prepare the case before the Government of the hon. gentlemen opposite left office, and they had, of course, the advantage of that gentleman's investigations. The late Administration afterwards appointed Mr. John Armour, one of the present Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench in Ontario. No one can allege that Mr. Armour was incapable of conducting a case of that kind, or that he was not amongst the ablest men of Ontario to whom such a case could be submitted. He was succeeded, after giving considerable attention to the case, by Mr. Monk and Mr. McMahon, of London, who spent months studying the question, gentlemen who finally conducted the case to conclusion before the Arbitrators, assisted always by the Deputy Minister of Justice; and no one who was present at any of the meetings of the Arbitrators could doubt that the very greatest possible attention was given by all the parties who were engaged by the Dominion Government in the settlement of the case. Now, Sir, the hon. the Minister of Justice was not able yesterday, apparently, to confine himself to the argument upon the merits of the case. He went out of his way to allege that the Government of the Province of Ontario took good care not to mention anything about the amount of money which the Government had to pay in 1870 to the Hudson's Bay Company. They were willing, he said, to take the territory, but they took care to make no claim to it until the Government had expended a large sum in paying the Hudson's Bay Company for their territory.

MR. McDONALD (Picton): I am sure the hon. gentleman does not wish to misconstrue what I said. I said that it was a subject of enquiry why Ontario did not raise the question of the boundary at the time of the negotiations with the Hudson's Bay Company.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman spoke at the time of money that had to be paid.

MR. McDONALD (Picton): I mentioned payment incidentally, but that was the argument.

MR. MACKENZIE: Both the argument and the implication were that Ontario wished to obtain possession of some territory for which money was paid to the Hudson's Bay Company.

MR. McDONALD (Picton): On the contrary, the very point I raised was raised in the case by Mr. McMahon himself, that Ontario, if she had a right, waived that right by not making a claim during the negotiations.

MR. MACKENZIE: I do not know what claim she could possibly have to make; there was no claim whatever in the matter. The question was, where was the boundary? The hon. the Minister of Justice spoke as if Ontario was claiming part of the Hudson's Bay Company's territory. Ontario claimed nothing of the kind. I asked the question across the House, if the hon. gentleman could tell me how much of the Hudson's Bay Company's territory Ontario was claiming, and he was not able to tell me.

MR. McDONALD (Picton): Yes, I did; I said all that was west and north of the true line.

MR. MACKENZIE: And that is what the hon. gentleman considers the Hudson's Bay Company's territory; and he asks if Ontario was simply claiming what was Ontario's. Ontario wanted nothing but her own true boundaries, and whatever was within those boundaries the Hudson's Bay Company had nothing to do with; and, when the hon. gentleman made an attempt yesterday to cast imputations of selfishness and impropriety on the Ontario Government and people, he forgot the very basis of the claim. Why, Ontario could not, and dared not, claim before any Arbitration a portion of the Hudson's Bay Company's territory, and it was for that territory that the money was paid by the Dominion Government—£300,000 sterling. Now, the question to be decided by the Arbitrators was simply, what were the true boundaries of Ontario, and, in order to ascertain that, it became necessary to examine maps, treaties, Acts of Parliament, Governors' Commissions, and all correspondence, and even the speeches of public men in the Imperial Parliament. Such were the documents presented by the respective parties to the contest, before the Arbitrators, and it was upon the careful perusal of all such documents, maps, and treaties, and the natural wording of the Act of 1774, that the decision was ultimately given. The hon. gentleman, if I recollect aright, then—if not himself then it was his leader—ridiculed the idea of Governors' Commissions being at all referred to, as overriding in any respect other evidence or constituting evidence in themselves. Governors' Commissions were simply cited as evidence that whatever territory was covered by them and the accompanying Instructions must necessarily have been included in the old Province; that that would be not only very strong corroborative evidence, but would be actually positive evidence that the territory was so defined and appointed. The hon. the Minister of Justice also referred to the language of the Act of 1774. Now I am quite sure that the hon. gentleman, if he looks at the language employed in that Act, will think that it entirely goes against the interpretation that he put upon it. I do not intend at the present moment to enter upon an argument as to what the boundaries were or were not, nor would I refer to this at all for a moment but for the remarks of the hon. gentleman himself, who took it for granted that northwards from the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers must mean due north. Now if you were to make such application of the words westward on the Ohio River, you would never reach the junction of the two rivers at all, because it is not due west, but a very long way off due west, and, if the term westward means along the banks of the Ohio in a westerly direction, it is clearly the case at the same time that the word northward along the banks of the Mississippi must mean the same thing. You cannot interpret the two words in a different way.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : "Northward along the banks of the Mississippi" is not in the Act.

MR. MACKENZIE : I am speaking of the word "northward."

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY : And "along the banks of the Ohio" is not in the Act.

MR. MACKENZIE : But that makes no difference as to the interpretation of the two words, because, if it was meant to be due north the words would be used "due north" not "northward." Why should the word northward be used? Simply because the word westward was used in the sentence immediately preceding? The word northward indicated the line to be taken, and, besides that, the banks of the Mississippi were used in other documents as the boundary which was there described in the Act of 1774 showing that there was no ground whatever for the contention that due north was the direction intended to be indicated. Another point which the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government made was this. He said: What was to become of the Indian land? The Dominion Government had extinguished the title to lands in a part of this very country covered by these negotiations; were these lands to become the property of Ontario at the expense of the Dominion? he asked. Well, I may ask the hon. gentleman if this is the first case of the kind that has occurred in which lands so situated were dealt with. The hon. gentleman knows it is not. The hon. gentleman has only to search the public documents and he will find that the lands covered by the Robinson Treaty next to the lands he now speaks of, many years ago, are embraced in the definition of the boundaries of Ontario by himself. He knows also that the Dominion of Canada treated these Indian subsidies under the Robinson Treaty as a mere matter of account chargeable against the Province of Ontario, and all the money that the Dominion Government pays out for subsidies to Indians upon land within the territory of Ontario, is to be repaid to the Dominion Government by Ontario. Now, I recollect very well calling Mr. Mowat's attention to this very thing. I have no strong impression, however, of that territory, and I told him that, so far as my personal opinion was concerned, I would rather have the Indian money paid back than have possession of the territory. According to the plan pursued with the land held under the Robinson Treaty, the Dominion Government could have the right to claim the sum of over $100,000, already paid to the Indians, under Treaty No. 3, that is for the Indian lands east of the line through the centre of the Lake of the Woods; nearly the whole of the lands embraced under that Treaty were embraced also in the territory declared by the Arbitrators to be within the boundaries of Ontario, and we would be entitled for all time to the amount of the annual annuities payable to the Indians, which was something between $17,000, and $18,000. The argument, therefore, of the hon. gentleman at the head of Government was without a particle of force in this respect, as we had no difficulty whatever in regard to the transference of claims for the Indian lands. The hon.

gentleman at the head of the Government based a long argument, mixed with a good deal of declamation upon the fact that the word "determine," which was the word used in the Ontario Act, did not convey the idea of a final definition of the true boundary line but of a conventional line. It so happens that the word "determine" does not bear the meaning that the hon. gentleman attached to it, and that it was used through all the correspondence and negotiations—in the first Order in Council passed by the Dominion Government on 12th Nov., 1874, appointing Mr. Wilmot to represent the interests of that Government; in the Ontario Order in Council, appointing the Hon. Mr. Richards, late Chief Justice of Ontario and of the Dominion; and the award of the Arbitrators proceeds in this way:—

"The undersigned having been appointed by the Governments of Canada and Ontario as Arbitrators to 'determine' the Northernly and Westernly Boundaries of Ontario, do hereby 'determine' and decide that the following are
* * * such boundaries."

Then comes the specification of the boundaries, followed by a description of the true boundaries as there ascertained. The word "determine" is not only in itself a perfectly proper word, but it happens to be a word that was used throughout all those documents, where the object was to ascertain the true boundary. The preamble of the Ontario Act of 1879, containing the foregoing, then proceeds as follows:—

"Whereas, the effect of the said award is to give to this Province less territory than had been claimed on behalf of the Province, and more territory than the Government of Canada had contended to be within the limits of the Province, or than was contained within the Provincial boundaries aforesaid."

After which follows an extract from Cap. 28 of 34 and 35 Vict. giving the authority to define and alter boundaries. This language in the preamble, and in the recital of the above Act, was assumed by the hon. gentleman opposite to be in itself an acknowledgment that Ontario received more than she was entitled to, whereas the language was simply used as a recital of the authority by which the Legislature was empowered to declare in conjunction with the Dominion Government the boundary ascertained. The claim of Ontario was one which the Arbitrators had no difficulty in coming to a conclusion upon. The hon. gentleman, therefore, cannot claim that the mere recital of the words which were used in the Imperial Act could be used to vitiate the claim of the Province of Ontario, or to imply that the Ontario Government conceded that it was obtaining territory it was not entitled to or expected. It was in fact using the language of the Imperial Act. The language of the first section of the Ontario Act was sufficiently extensive to put beyond dispute any claim in the future which might be brought up in the Courts of Justice, as to whether this was or was not the true boundary. Assuming that it is possible that the Arbitrators have made a mistake, even if a mistake has been made in any particular, the award nevertheless remains as a final award, and the boundaries so declared will be for all future time the true boundaries of the Province of Ontario. The hon. gentleman at the head of the Government seems to think it is a very light thing to set aside an Arbitration of this kind; he seems to think that because a new Administration is in office, it is quite competent for it to treat the old Government and all their Acts very much as the Stuarts after the Restoration treated all the administrative acts and legislation of Oliver Cromwell. Our Administration would appear to have been treated as a usurpation of authority, and the hon. gentleman himself and his friends to be the true rulers, by divine right, of this country. That appears to be the hon. gentleman's doctrine, and it is his doctrine in relation to many things beside the case under discussion. I have no objection whatever to the hon. gentleman using his power in this House to set aside the legislation of the last Government if he thinks it wrong, but I fear that, if he were living in another country, he would find some difficulty in setting aside solemn treaties that have been entered upon, such as the Treaty for the settlement of the San Juan question. If the decision on that occasion of the Emperor William were to be set aside, it would be as justifiable from an International point of view as the setting aside of the award in the present case. The hon. gentleman would have no more right to set aside the award than he would have to set aside the Treaty of Washington. I therefore protest, with all the earnestness possible, against the conclusion at which the hon. gentleman has arrived in this matter, and in the meantime all the evils which could possibly arise from the non-settlement of this difficulty continue to exist. No doubt the Government of Ontario can assume, as they have the right to assume, jurisdiction within what they have believed to be their boundaries, and any question of jurisdiction which may arise can be determined in another way. In the meantime, we know that Justices of the Peace were appointed by the two Governments, and that a conventional line was drawn from Hunter's Island due north, beyond which the Dominion Government could give deeds for land and timber limits, and within which, to the eastward, Ontario exercises sole jurisdiction and authority. Apart from this arrangement about the lands, the inconvenience which will arise from such a state of affairs was pointed out by the hon. gentleman himself in several Minutes of Council, which still exist. Now, I think we have reason to complain of the course the hon. gentleman took in another particular. Unless he assumes that it was desirable that this unfortunate state of things should continue, why did he not take some action during the late Session of this Parliament; how is it that some eighteen months have elapsed since the hon. gentleman assumed office, and he has taken no steps of any kind in order to reach a settlement. I could understand why he delayed last spring; I have no doubt whatever that he delayed it in order to aid himself and his friends in electioneering in the Province of Ontario, hoping to be able to fill certain offices. It did not, however, do him much good, and I venture to say, apart from all sectional considerations whatever, which I trust will find no place in this debate, that public opinion throughout the Dominion will condemn the course that the hon. gentleman has taken, and which is so unjustifiable upon general principles, as well as being against the evidence which we possess to the fact that the Arbitration was conducted impartially and justly, and that no one can claim that either of the Arbitrators who were appointed by the Dominion to conduct the case, has in any way whatever neglected his duty, or in any way whatever failed to perform all that was expected or required of him.

MR. DAWSON: I beg to say that, in referring to the gentlemen who acted for the Dominion, I meant to cast no reflection upon them whatever. I believe that they were very capable, and I know Mr. McMahon, a personal friend of my own, to be an able lawyer, but I will say that they were placed in a false position, that sufficient time was not afforded them to look into the volumes produced by Ontario, which would take any man a year to wade through. As to the award itself, I pointed out the extraordinary manner in which vast territories had been dealt with, but I certainly did not reflect on the gentlemen who acted for the Dominion Government.

MR. BLAKE: If it would take a year to look into those books, as the hon. gentleman stated, how does he expect the Committee to do it in six weeks.

MR. DAWSON: That remains to be seen.

MR. MACDOUGALL: The hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House was good enough to make some reference to a recommendation of mine, when I was employed as a Commissioner for the Province of Ontario, to investigate this question of its western and northern boundaries, and to report to that Government the facts, evidence, views and opinions resulting from that investigation. I suppose the hon. gentleman gives me some credit—I took it in a complimentary sense—that, on that occasion I recommended the appointment of a third person to act with the two Commissioners appointed by the respective Governments, whose report might take the form of an award. That is quite true, but in attempting to make that recommendation a cover for, or to commit me in any way to the approval of the award which has been made, the hon. gentleman compels me to say that, if the members of this House will refer to the correspondence published in the Journals of the Local Legislature, they will see that it was not intended, nor did it enter into my mind, that the report of the Commissioners should be a definitive award like that which we are now considering. It was to be an examination of the history of the question, a collection of material facts which might be found pertinent to a decision of the question, Is there a western or northern boundary line of Ontario? If we found it, we were to report the fact. We had no authority to make or declare a boundary. With the indulgence of the House, I will take the opportunity to make a few remarks upon the gravity of the question we have to deal with, and upon the objections which have been made to the proposition of the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Dawson) to refer to a Committee of this House the duty of examining and reporting upon this award. In the first place, the extent of territory that is involved, the material interests that are at stake—or rather the control and jurisdiction over these material interests—as well as the political questions involved in the action which this House is invited to take by the hon. gentleman opposite, when he asked us to approve of the award, are too important for off-hand or summary treatment. I have in my hand a report prepared by the Ontario Government, accompanied by a map illustrating the extent of territory, and the importance of the interests from a Provincial point of view that are involved in this question. I will take the liberty of reading a single paragraph which will enable the House to see how important, in the estimation of the Local Government of Ontario, at least, is the question we are now discussing. In mentioning the area of country involved, the compiler of this official document states :

“The district included within these boundaries is of equal if not greater area than the whole of the rest of Ontario, exclusive of the Lakes Ontario, Superior, Huron, and Erie. Omitting those Lakes the Province, within the limits embraced in the proposition of the Dominion, contained about 64,000,000 acres, or 103,000 square miles of territory. From the Quebec boundary line—from Lake Temiscamingue to James Bay—to the Lake of the Woods, the distance cannot be much less than seven hundred miles; while measured from north to south the new territory covers a breadth of country varying from over three hundred to one hundred miles; the Province of Ontario will consequently in future possess an area of fully 200,000 square miles. This is 80,000 square miles greater than the area of the United Kingdom; only 12,000 square miles less than the whole German Empire; only 2,000 square miles less than France, and equal to the combined areas of Holland, Portugal, United Italy, Switzerland and Belgium. The awarded territory alone possesses an area greater by 20,000 square miles than the group of countries just named, excepting Italy.”

MR. MACDOUGALL.

So it will be seen from this short statement, that a very large portion of the earth's surface is waiting the decision of this Parliament with respect to its future municipal and territorial jurisdiction. It cannot be said that such a question ought to be disposed of per saltum, by a new Parliament. A large number of the members are new to this question—at least they have not dealt with it as legislators hitherto, or been called upon to investigate or discuss it. I have already found hon. members, well informed on most questions, who say they have not had an opportunity of perusing those documents and voluminous reports, one by the late Minister of the Interior, and another by a distinguished literateur of Toronto, Mr. Lindsey, and another published by the Ontario Government, which deal with the history of the question. If members desire to inform themselves as to the truth and cogency of the statements made by the advocates of the different boundaries proposed, and to pronounce intelligently upon the merits of the case, it will be necessary that some means be adopted to furnish the House with information, and that time be given it to decide. I am not quite convinced that it is not the duty of the Government, in a matter of such gravity as the present, to take the matter into their own hands. I confess I felt the force of the objections made on the other side of the House, against handing over a question like this to a private member, allowing him to take the control of it, and to name the Committee, of which he is to be Chairman. So far as I can judge from the speech of the Minister of Justice, yesterday, and from what has since transpired, the Government do not object to this Committee. If appointed, I think it will be necessary for its members to go over the whole ground already traversed by those concerned in the previous discussions. I think that, the question having remained for nine years since the first Commissioners were appointed, without friendly settlement or final adjudication, it may properly remain a few weeks, or even a few months longer, under investigation, before the Parliament of the Dominion is called upon to make its final judgment in the case. As one of those concerned in the earlier enquiries into the question of our north-western boundaries, and having been charged with the duty of examining and reporting upon them, I have always felt anxious for, and have urged a speedy settlement. The Government of the Dominion in 1871, as well as the Local Government of that day, felt the importance, in view of the administration of justice in the disputed territory, of having it clearly established what authority had jurisdiction in it. The Local Government of Ontario in 1872—a change having taken place, and the member for West Durham having acceded to the Premiership—thought proper to take this question into their own hands, in a spirit wholly different from that which moved those who first undertook to settle it. The case was being investigated, Commissioners had been appointed, one by the Dominion and the other by Ontario; but final instructions had not been given them, and they had never met. It had been part of my duty in connection with the negotiations for the acquisition of the Hudson's Bay Territory, to examine the maps and authorities bearing on this subject. On the resignation of Mr. Sandfield Macdonald, and the assumption of office by the hon. member for West Durham, I was called on suddenly to report as to the progress of the Commission. After some correspondence between the Local and Dominion Governments, I was called upon to report my views, opinions and conclusions, with reference to the whole case. In obedience to this pressing demand, I prepared a Report, which you will find in the Sessional Papers of the Local Legislature for 1873, Part 3. It is merely a preliminary paper, setting forth the difficulties of the question, and the different constructions which might be put on the Act of 1774, and referring to the Commissions and Instructions given to the Governors of the Province of Quebec, with other authorities. It states also the conclusions at which I, as an individual, had arrived, after reviewing all those authorities. As soon as that paper came into the possession of the Local Government, I was instructed to cease all operations or proceedings as a Commissioner. In fact, I was very civilly, or, perhaps, I should say, uncivilly, dismissed. I was discharged, at all events, from any further duty or concern in the matter. The member for West Durham took the case into his own hands, as head of the Local Government, and, after some correspondence, which you will find in the papers published by the Local Legislature, a change of Government took place in the Dominion, the hon. gentleman's political friends acceding to office, and he himself becoming a Minister; and for five years from that period hon. gentlemen opposite, with their political friends in the Local Government, had the question under their control. They had the Dominion Parliament and the Ontario Legislature at their back; the case had reached a certain stage of progress when it fell into their hands, and upon them rests the responsibility for its non-settlement while they remained in power. They did not settle it, although it had been urged previously, on both sides, that a speedy settlement was very desirable, in view of the possible commission of crimes in the disputed territory. Public works were commenced there, under the Administration of the hon. gentleman who now complains of a few weeks delay. The Arbitrators were appointed years ago, and some of them died without having accomplished their mission. In view of these facts, it does not come with very good grace from hon. gentlemen opposite, to press a new Parliament, dealing with this question for the first time, to dispose of it per saltum, by a vote, without any enquiry or examination of the different questions connected with it. I believe the majority of the House will take this view, and that the people of Canada will consider that, from the importance of the case, as stated by representatives of Ontario, we ought to enquire into, and carefully consider the question in all its aspects. I have no hesitation in expressing my own opinion that the right of Ontario to claim her boundary in the West, as far as the North-West Angle of the Lake of the Woods, is capable of conclusive demonstration. I do not agree with the Minister of Justice in his strict construction of the Act of 1774. We know now under what circumstances that Act was introduced and how it was dealt with. In 1839 the Report of the Debates on the Quebec Bill was discovered among the Egerton Manuscripts in the British Museum. That report is a very interesting document to the historical student of this country, for it shows the views that prevailed in England as well as in America with regard to many of the political questions then at issue between the two countries. The Cavendish Debates, as they are called, were reported by a skilful stenographer, and were not published until 1839. From them it appears that, when Lord North introduced the Quebec Act of 1774, in which the boundaries of Canada were defined, he submitted it to the House of Lords on the responsibility of the Government, and in that Act the Mississippi river was distinctly declared to be the Western Boundary of Canada.

MR. MILLS: Of Quebec.

MR. MACDOUGALL: Of Quebec of course, that being the name of the Province then. While the Act was under consideration in the Commons, Mr. Burke, then a distinguished member of that House, and the paid agent of New York, in discharging his duty to his employers, as well as to his constituents, felt it his duty to object to the loose way in which the boundary was declared in the preamble to the Bill. The House suspended proceedings, the report observes, during half an hour, while Burke and other members went up stairs to consult the maps; they came down with an alteration in the description. In the Bill, Quebec was declared to be bounded on the south by the Ohio river, on the west by the Mississippi, on the north by the Hudson's Bay territories. In the amended description, a liminary line is laid down. The description was altered so far in order to avoid interference with the then Colony of New York on the south. With this object Mr. Burke ran a line until he came to the expression "northward," in the original description. He had got down to the junction of the Ohio with the Mississippi, and, having no further interest in the matter, he did not interfere with the Bill any further. But the new description was inapplicable and incongruous, because the words "the left bank of the Mississippi" were omitted. I shall read the description of the country added to the Province of Quebec, by the Act of 1774, as it was expressed in the Bill when it passed the House of Lords:—

"Be it enacted, that all the said territories, islands and countries, (referred to in the preamble), heretofore part of the territory of Canada in North America, extending southward to the banks of the River Ohio; westward to the banks of the Mississippi, and northward to the southern boundary of the territory granted to the Merchant Adventurers of England trading to Hudson's Bay, etc., and they are hereby during His Majesty's pleasure, made part and parcel of the Province of Quebec," etc.

All the territories, etc., lying within the bounds mentioned, east of the Mississippi river, were annexed to Quebec, and, except the portion afterwards surrendered to the United States, became part of Upper Canada, when that Province was created. The description in the Act as finally passed, after defining a line on the south to the north-west angle of Pennsylvania, is in these words:—

"And thence along the western boundary of the said Province until it strikes the River Ohio, and along the bank of the said river westward to the banks of the Mississippi, and northward to the southern boundary of the territory granted to the Merchant Adventurers of England trading to Hudson's Bay."

Now, of course, the whole argument turns upon the proper interpretation of this word, "northward," as used in the Act. We have the Act before us, and, according to a rule of construction which I remember to have read a good many years ago, you cannot look at the surrounding circumstances in interpreting an Act of Parliament. You cannot read the speeches of members of Parliament when the Act was under discussion to discover the meaning of obscure passages. But in more modern times I find that, in the United States, and also in England, the Judges have found it necessary, in delivering their judgments, to consult the records of Parliament, and even to consult Hansard. There are cases in our own Courts in which the Judges have referred to what took place in Parliament as a means of ascertaining and explaining the meaning of ambiguous expressions. And I think that, in a great political question of this sort, we are justified in looking into its history. A brief exploration enables us to ascertain the object of the Imperial Government in adding these territories to the old Province of Quebec. The object as stated by Lord North was to include certain trading posts not then within the jurisdiction of the Province of Quebec, in order to give them the advantages of an organised Government. These posts, as we well know, were beyond the boundary which would have been assigned to Quebec if the line were to run due north from the junction of the Ohio with the Mississippi. The very object of the Bill would have been defeated by such a construction.

MR. MACDOUGALL.

There is enough doubt in the case, at all events, to justify its reference to a Committee of the ablest men in Parliament. If the members of this House representing the other Provinces are under the apprehension that, by agreeing to this conventional boundary, they will be giving to Ontario great additional territory and political power, which in the future might be used adversely to their interests, then they have a right to demand that this question shall be judicially determined by the highest judicial authority in the Empire. In that case, I apprehend all parties and all Provinces will acquiesce in the decision. The people of the other Provinces do not, I believe, desire to deprive Ontario of her just rights. If entitled to this territory, she will get it and no one will have a right to complain. The people expect at our hands that we shall defend, not only Dominion, but Provincial rights, and I doubt if any Ontario member on either side of the House will hesitate to exercise the authority given him by his constituents, to defend the rights of the people of that Province to the last. We want the true boundary, so far as it can be ascertained, nothing more, nothing less. Now, let me call the attention of the House for a few moments to the difficulties connected with that question. It is a boundary that can only be ascertained by reference to certain points mentioned in the Act of 1774, and in Royal Proclamations and Commissions to Governors. So long as you are on the Mississippi, you have a natural boundary on the west, but when you get to Lake Itaska, the most northern source of that river, you are left on the prairie, and then, having nothing to explain the course intended by the word northward, I suppose you must go due north. Then on the north we have the limit "to the southern boundary of the territory granted to the Hudson's Bay Company." The Minister of Justice is under the impression that we did not make any attempt to claim or define boundaries in the discussion with the Hudson's Bay authorities. That question, Sir, was very thoroughly discussed, and Mr. Mowat adopts the argument we used on that occasion, and makes it a part of his case.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou) : I did not say that my hon. friend did not raise the question of boundary at all ; but I said that Ontario did not, antecedent to that discussion.

MR. MACDOUGALL : The question had not arisen until Confederation, as regards Ontario, and, in every controversy with the Hudson's Bay Company, we always contended that our boundary went very far west of the Height of Land. The Government of Canada, on every public occasion, disputed the right of the Hudson's Bay Company to territory outside of the undefined circle about Hudson's Bay. They took that ground upon the final settlement of the question, when Sir George Cartier and myself represented the Government, and I never heard any complaint about our argument, except my right hon. friend said on our return : " You used pretty sharp language." I, for one, felt very warm upon that question, when I found that an ex-member of the Imperial Government had been appointed Governor of the Hudson's Bay Company, and that, before our negotiations were concluded, we had to meet the arguments of a gentleman to whom we had shown our hand when the statement of our rights as against the Hudson's Bay Company was confidentially laid before the Imperial Cabinet. Our territorial claims as against the Hudson's Bay Company are set forth at length in the correspondence between the Canadian Delegates and the Colonial Office, and our arguments are quoted by Mr. Mowat in his statement of the case for Ontario, as being cogent and in accordance with facts. We were acting of the name and on behalf of Canada. We felt that we were reiterating the views entertained and expressed by the Government of Canada on all occasions since the question was first raised in Parliament, and I am not aware that the contention of the Canadian Government that the proprietary rights of the Hudson's Bay Company were restricted to the country they occupied prior to the Treaty of Paris of 1763, has ever been officially withdrawn or denied. If the Hudson's Bay Company had no legal right to the territory beyond the line laid down on the maps of that period—one or two hundred miles, perhaps, south of Hudson Bay—if that was the extreme extent southward to which they had laid claim, we have now to find, and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, if the question be referred to them, will have to find, the southern limit of the territory of the Hudson's Bay Company as laid down by themselves. That will be as very difficult proposition—a very difficult question to dispose of by metes and bounds. The Hudson's Bay Company at different periods extended their claims. The French Government on the other hand, on behalf of their citizens and traders, pushed the boundaries of the French territory as near to Hudson's Bay as possible. Commissioners were appointed on behalf of the two countries, who met and discussed the matter, and maps were submitted. I do not know that a Court of Law could find any rule or precedent applicable to such a case, that would justify it in fixing a boundary outside of the limits laid down by these Commissioners. I think it probable that a line must be found somewhere between these two. It will be impossible to mark it upon the ground by reference to any known landmarks or natural objects. It will be a matter of reasoning and conjecture, and therefore, in regard to that part of the case, it seems to me the question is one that can very well be disposed of by the authority of Parliament. The country between the southern boundary of the Hudson's Bay territory as claimed either by the English or French Commissioners before the Cession in 1783, and James's Bay, which is given to Ontario by this Award, is of little value for any purpose. It is said to be frozen within a few inches of the surface all the year round. There is no timber there of any consequence, as explorers tell us. It may be rich in minerals, but our country is full of mineral deposits in regions much more accessible. I do not agree with the hon. member for Algoma, that the country is too far distant, to be properly administered by Ontario. I think our Local Government is quite capable of administering justice or doing whatever is necessary for this territory up to James's Bay. The hon. gentleman proposes to establish a new Province in this rocky, treeless, and frozen region—I think we have Provinces enough of that description. I do not find that the Dominion is at all helped, or its financial burdens lessened by establishing new Provinces under such circumstances. We are expending a great deal for Manitoba—a fertile Province—and for the territory beyond and we are about to pay, if this House approves of the contracts the Government have given out, a good many millions for the construction of a Railway in British Columbia, one of these newly acquired Provinces. I think Sir, in view of these facts, there is not much inducement to the taxpayers of this Dominion to create new Provinces unnecessarily. I see no necessity for it in this case. Ontario numbers nearly two millions—one half the population of this Dominion. It is the richest Province—the most productive Province—of this Dominion. It is the only Province that to-day pays a surplus into the Dominion Treasury. The other Provinces take more out of the Dominion Treasury than they contribute to it.

Several HON. GENTLEMEN : No no.

MR. MACDOUGALL : Hon. gentlemen say no—they ought to move for the publication of the report made by Mr. Langton, in answer to an Address of this House, of the income from, and the expenditure in, the several Provinces, for the first six years of Confederation. I think it will be seen from that report that a very considerable portion of the revenue and all the surplus came from Ontario. I am not blaming the other Provinces, nor do I regard it as a reason for changing our liberal policy towards them. The people of Ontario are more numerous, they occupy a richer soil and enjoy a finer climate, their productive energies are greater, and they can afford to pay more, but, when we are told that they cannot control or govern a certain portion of territory, because it is too distant, and would prove too burdensome, I think my hon. friend will have to find some better argument to justify the creation of a new Province in the North. Upon the whole case, it appears to me there is no occasion for dispute—no reason for exciting sectional feeling, in this matter. The people of Ontario will be satisfied with an adjudication which is legal and conclusive, and they will accept whatever territory is awarded to them by a properly constituted tribunal. I believe they will accept what the Arbitrators have given them if confirmed by this House. It is less than many of their public writers and advocates claim, but still, if this award is not confirmed by Parliament, the question must be determined by the highest judicial authority in the Empire. I hope, Sir, that, if a Committee be appointed, it will be composed of members from different Provinces, who will give their closest attention to the history, as well as the legal and constitutional aspects of the question. It will soon be discovered that it is not capable of mathematical or astronomical solution. It cannot be finally disposed of by any report or recommendation of a Select Committee. The Government will be responsible for the action of this House, and no Committee can relieve them of that responsibility. A Committee will be able to collect the material facts and the evidence bearing on the case. They will be able to report upon it more easily now than at any former time, and Parliament will, after such examination and report, be in a better position to determine either to confirm the award or remit the question to a legal tribunal.

MR. CASEY: I do not feel, Sir, that this motion can be allowed to pass without some protest from even the less prominent members from Ontario. I consider, Sir, that this is the most important question relating to Ontario that has come before this House since Confederation. The hon. member for Halton has ably observed that, dealing with a question involving so great an interest as the possession of 64,000,000 acres of land we should proceed with the utmost gravity, solemnity and deliberation. The hon. mover of this motion, the hon. the Minister of Justice and the leader of the Government, have asked us to practically settle this question now. They ask us to utterly disregard the award. I think I am borne out by the resolution, which shows no reference to the award at all. You would never know from the wording of it that there had been an award made. You would suppose that the question was still as open as it was during the period before the Arbitrators decided the question. Now, Sir, this is something the people of Ontario will not endure in silence. I doubt if even the Conservative members from Ontario in this House will tolerate it in silence, or even after the use of vigorous language. At any rate, they cannot vote for this resolution without destroying the title deeds of Ontario, to this enormous extent of territory. The people of Ontario would object to anything in the slightest degree calculated to injure the authority of this award. They will object still more strongly to the ignoring of that award in a spirit which is eventually hostile to their Province. We have no difficulty in discovering from the speech of the right hon. gentleman opposite, and by his sneering remark that "Ontario would, perhaps, get as much as she expected by the award," his hostile feeling to the Province. Perhaps, sir, he is aware that, although he has a majority in this House from Ontario, he has not the people of that Province at his back, and is hostile to her because he knows her hostility to him. Perhaps the hon. gentleman is calculating on the profit he would make, in a political sense, by favouring the sister Province of Quebec, but I am quite sure, from what I know of the members of the French race who sit in this House, that they would not countenance the perpetration of an injustice upon, or a breach of faith with, the larger Province. The hon. gentleman may find himself amiss in the calculations he has made. What are the grounds on which the right hon. gentleman has attacked the award? Was it because of the personnel of the Board who made it? No. Because of a defective presentation of the case before them? No. Because of any suspicion of foul play by them? No. It was on the sole ground that the mode of appointing those Arbitrators was irregular—that they should not have been appointed by the Executives of the Dominion and the Province without the consent of Parliament. He says tragically: "Fancy an English Government appointing a Commission of that sort by an Order in Council without authority from Parliament." The hon. gentleman's memory must be very short if he forgets he himself was appointed by the English Government, without authority from Parliament, a member of the Joint High Commission that sat at Washington to conclude the Treaty which concerned the boundary line between the Dominion of Canada and the United States, along with other matters. It was this Commission, appointed without the assent of Parliament, that concluded the Treaty by which we lost the Island of San Juan on the Pacific coast. When the Emperor of Germany decided, under the Treaty made by my right hon. friend, that that island did not belong to us, did we hear that decision questioned on the ground that the English Government should have asked the assent of Parliament before appointing the Commission? There was no such argument as that. When we were awarded five millions of dollars under the provisions of the same Treaty, did we hear the objection from the right hon. gentleman that the Joint High Commission was appointed without the consent of Parliament? Not at all. Why, when the American Government agreed to institute an enquiry, similar to the one now proposed, to make objections to the award of the Geneva Arbitrators, and when they raised objections on the same grounds urged by the mover of this Committee, or similar ones, did not Canada rise in indignation at the thought that they should seek to question a tribunal to which they had agreed to submit the case? The American Government confined themselves to making representations to that of England. When these were not entertained, without any further haggling, they honestly paid the money awarded by the Arbitrators. We have instances in England of important steps being taken without the express consent of Parliament. The noble lord at the head of the Government in England, to whom the head of our Government here is said to bear so strong a resemblance took over the island of Cyprus without asking Parliament; he assumed the protectorate of Asia Minor, and made wars without asking the assent of Parliament. Now, Sir, what is the decision come to by the right hon. gentleman as to the course to be pursued? He says the Arbitration was informally appointed, although I cannot see who could have the right to make a binding agreement in the matter, if the Executives of both the Dominion and Ontario could not do so. We are told that a Committee appointed by this House would be better able to consult the interests of Ontario and the Dominion than the Arbitrators to whom the question has been submitted. If Ontario were likely to gain a few thousand square miles by this step being taken, what would be thought of us if we advocated it? Why, the other parts of the Dominion would be entitled to reprobate us for such conduct. It is evident, however, that, if the hon. gentleman who makes the motion wishes the award to be broken, it is in order to take from Ontario what she has got. It would be very difficult for Ontario to retain what belongs to her under the findings of that Committee; for only two of the gentlemen who are proposed to form that Committee are from Ontario—only two out of twelve composing the proposed Committee.

MR. DAWSON: There are three from Ontario, and the Committee is to consist of eleven, not twelve.

MR. CASEY: Oh, yes, I see, I was mistaken. But even that proportion must weigh unfavourably against the interest of Ontario: besides, the hon. mover of this motion is included in the three nominally from Ontario. He wishes to be the representative of a new Province, and could hardly be trusted to look after the interests of Ontario, since he is the very party seeking to abrogate the award. I wish to refer to some remarks of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall). He said very properly that this was a matter of the gravest importance, and he gave figures to show its gravity and solemnity, one which a new Parliament should hesitate to deal with. Yet the appointment of this Committee which he favours will have the effect of breaking up the award and so virtually settle the matter offhand.

AN HON. MEMBER: The Committee, for anything we know, may confirm the award.

MR. CASEY: But, until the Committee does confirm it, the award is virtually done away with. They will have to go into the whole affair de novo. Their very appointment will break it up. They may make another award in the same terms or in different terms altogether. He says, further, that we should consider the award carefully before confirming it. Now, when an individual submits to an arbitration, all that he has to consider afterwards is whether the trial has been fairly conducted, and, if it has, he has nothing to do but to submit, unless there is a provision for obtaining a new trial elsewhere in a higher Court. The same rule applies to International arbitrations. If a party to an arbitration is to have the right of complaining against and breaking up an award, because that party does not like it, the possibility of arbitration between Provinces and between nations is gone forever. It has been said this is a new House, and should not consider this matter hurriedly. Now, Sir, this House is in its second Session; the same parties as were here last year are here now. If notice had been given of intention to discuss the question, we would have been ready to pass upon it now, although, for my part, I hold that we should not pass upon the justice of the award at all. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) says that the people of Ontario will be satisfied with a legal and judicial decision. This they have had already, and the people of Ontario have shown their satisfaction with it. It would be a gross breach of faith to attempt to interfere with the award. The hon. gentleman says further that the award should be final and of the highest authority. I suppose there is a way of appealing to the Privy Council, if it is not final. I do not suppose that a Committee of eleven members of this House—of gentlemen who have not been noted for any legal or Constitutional acquaintance with the question of these boundaries—is a higher and final authority—or would give any more authoritative decision than that of the Arbitrators whose award is in question. The people of Ontario will look upon the appointment of this Committee, not as in furtherance of a desire to secure a higher decision, but as being done with a view to break up the award, and to substitute for that the decision of a partisan Committee. If the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government thinks he could face the country after such a course, we on this side should have some reason to congratulate ourselves on the manner in which he would be received after such conduct by the people of Ontario.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria) : As a Conservative member for Ontario, I desire to say a few words, in consequence of the tone and line of argument of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down. He has taken upon himself to threaten the Conservative majority of this House, and to dare them to go to the people of Ontario, after the course being now pursued in regard to this boundary question. This, however, is only a reiteration of what we read in the Globe of yesterday. We were warned by that mighty organ of the dire consequences, which would follow if we did not confirm this award, and give to Ontario the whole of this disputed territory. The hon. gentleman, however, who has taken up the language of the Globe is too gentle, too amiable, and, may I add, too weak, to adopt the role of threatener and intimidator, and crack the whip over the heads even of such an insignificant body as the Conservatives of Ontario. When we read the article in the Globe, we knew a mighty power was talking to us; but, when we listen to the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), we know he is too good-natured to mean what he says. But, to discuss the matter seriously, I think, Sir, if there ever was a motion which ought to be adopted, it is the one now before the House. We have before us a question of a most difficult and intricate character, and one which involves matters upon which the majority of the members of this House are entirely ignorant. We have a large tract of territory in dispute; we have an award that has been made on that question, the validity whereof is disputed; the jurisdiction of the Arbitrators who made that award is questioned; and the award itself is of such a peculiar character that it requires the assent of this House before it is binding. It is therefore very reasonable that we should have the matter referred to a Committee, as a more convenient body to consider and ascertain the true facts of the case than the whole House, and so that time could be allowed for members of this House to form an opinion with the report of the Committee before them. The House is adopting the most proper and convenient means of obtaining information to guide it in pronouncing an opinion upon the question. Speaking as a representative from Ontario, I can safely say that Ontario wants nothing but her true boundary. That is the real feeling of the Province of Ontario. Ontario is rich and large enough not to want to steal these few acres of land. If this territory belongs to Ontario, she wants it, but not by any snap judgment of an unauthorised tribunal. It wants a careful and full investigation; it does not want this disputed territory per fas aut nefas. The good feeling of our constituents the people of Ontario will prompt them to say: "Let us have it if it belongs to us, but not otherwise. Investigate the question in every way, and we will be content to abide by the result."

MR. HOLTON : I think, Sir, that we had better postpone our decision. We have heard that this is a question of great importance, a question involving sovereignty over an Empire; and surely, therefore, it ought to receive the amplest consideration. I do not know what the intention of the parties may be as to a division; but I think that the discussion upon the merits of the award has come up very irregularly. I ventured to think, yesterday, that the introduction of such a motion was out of order, but I bowed to your decision then, and I do not intend to dispute it now. I have, however, no hesitation—whatever may be my views, which I do not intend now to explain, as to the merits of the award, on the policy of confirming or rejecting it—I can have no hesitation, I say, in voting against referring the subject to a Committee of the House, because I consider that it is a most objectionable proceeding. It is an abnegation of the duty of the Administration of the day to allow a private member to move for a Committee, to raise a question upon which it was their own duty to advise the House as to the proper course to be pursued. They have had ample time to do that since the award was given, they have had the whole Recess to gather information to guide them to a correct decision, and to enable them now to get the views of the House thereon. I shall vote without considering the merits; for the consideration of the merits will come up more legitimately on the Bill of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills). I shall vote against this motion: first, as being irregular, and, in the second place, as being improper to originate with a private member of the House, at all events, until the Government had submitted the question, which has been so properly described by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) as being of the nature of an international question.

MR. ANGLIN: Coming from a Province which has no special or direct interest in the matter, I have listened to the debate so as to form an opinion as to how I should vote. But I am still somewhat at a loss. If I understood him correctly, the position taken by the leader of the Government was that this is a question which must be submitted to the Privy Council in England, for settlement. If this be so, I cannot see what can be gained by the appointment of the Committee now proposed. Is it supposed that the Committee will gather information that it may be useful to submit to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council? The hon. member who has just sat down contends that, in a matter on this importance, the Government should not allow any private member of this House to take control of the proceedings. The hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) is within his right in moving his resolution, but the leader of the Government would only be doing his duty to this House and the country in stating that he would not consent to a Committee of this kind being appointed, unless some good could be accomplished by it; and what good can be done by it I can hardly imagine. It would have to enter into abstruse questions about which there is so much difference of opinion between gentlemen who have studied the subject so thoroughly. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) informed us that it would be impossible for the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to say positively what is the boundary line, as defined in any existing Act of Parliament, or other document of an authoritative character. He described the vast territory under dispute as equal to an area comprising many nations of Europe; but the hon. gentleman subsequently stated that the portion about the proprietorship of which there can be any reasonable doubt is within comparatively narrow boundaries, and is treeless, barren, and worthless, except for the minerals it may possibly contain. I think the question is one of so intricate a nature, Sir, that it cannot be considered thoroughly by a large Committee of this House, unless it sit from day to day, and devote its whole time to the subject. The hon. member for Algoma has stated that very important Acts of Parliament were never taken into consideration by the Commissioners. I regard that as a mere assertion on the part of the hon. gentleman. He believes that such was the case, no doubt; but there is nothing to show that the Arbitrators did not consult those documents.

MR. DAWSON: I said that they were not brought forward by the advocates who appeared before the Arbitrators; I did not say they had not been considered by the Arbitrators.

MR. ANGLIN: I do not know whether those Acts of Parliament are of importance or not, but I do not see that a Committee of the House would be competent to decide this question, or that anything could be gained by appointing such a Committee. I have no interest in the matter, and only desire to do my duty as a member of this House; and, really, I do not yet feel competent to pronounce upon this question; I must, however, vote to the best of my knowledge, although that knowledge is certainly not such as to enable me to vote to my own entire satisfaction.

After Recess.

MR. MACDONNELL (Inverness): I propose to ask the attention of the House to a few remarks on the subject before it. The hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron) stated what is very true, when he said that few members of this House understood this question thoroughly. For my own part, I scarcely knew that such a question was in existence, until the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) moved his resolution. I have, however, paid the strictest attention to the remarks of the hon. gentleman, and to the arguments which have been adduced for and against his motion. In the course of the debate, I have learned that this question has been under consideration for many years past; I have learned that both the Government of the Dominion and the Legislature of Ontario appointed an Arbitration to consider and report upon this important question. The selection of the Arbitrators made by these two Governments has been accepted as unexceptionable. The three gentlemen chosen for the performance of the task entrusted to them were men of most eminent and distinguished character, that is to say, the late Chief Justice Harrison, Sir Francis Hincks, and Sir Edward Thornton. Against Sir Francis Hincks, I should think the hon. gentlemen opposite could raise no objection, since he was a colleague of the members of the present Government, when they were last previously in power. I have been given to understand that objection has been taken to the validity of this award, owing to the fact that no legislation was had in this Parliament, authorising the Government to submit the question to arbitration; that such legislation was had in the Legislature of Ontario, and this is advanced as a ground for nullifying that award. Although there may be some validity in this objection—if the award made by these gentlemen is a proper one, if they gave the fullest and most careful consideration to the question, if learned counsel appeared on each side, if they had before them all the documents and the information necessary to enable them to arrive at a just decision in the premises—I think this House would be committing a great wrong to object to that award, on the ground of the simple technical objection advanced by the right hon. the leader of the Government. The award must be attacked on one of two grounds. If it is just and right in itself, it should not be attacked, and the time of this Legislature should not be taken up in promoting another enquiry, in having another tribunal constituted, to take into consideration the same question, and, for aught we know, to arrive at the same conclusion at which the Arbitrators arrived. This award has cost the country something already. I am told that a high fee was paid to each of these Arbitrators, that the eminent counsel who appeared on behalf of the Dominion were also paid high fees for their services. This award must be set aside, as I have said, on one of two grounds, either that there has been an irregularity—and that irregularity must be other than the one taken exception to, that there was no legislation on the part of this Dominion previous to entering into that arbitration—some irregularity in the making of it, or that the Arbitrators have been guilty of some misconduct whereby that award should not receive the sanction of this House. The hon. gentleman from North Victoria arose in his place, and attempted to administer, in the shape of sarcasm, a castigation to the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey). I am not aware that it lies in the mouth of that hon. gentleman to taunt my hon. friend from West Elgin with being a weak member of this honourable body; I am not aware that the hon. gentleman who thus attacked my hon. friend stands himself in a much more powerful, in a much higher, in a much more respected position, than does my hon. friend from West Elgin. The hon. gentleman from North Victoria says it is all right to submit the award to a Committee to secure a report; he could not then have read the resolution of the hon. member for Algoma, in which no reference whatsoever is made to the award. That award is ignored, to use the language of the hon. member for West Elgin, and is treated contemptuously—not only the award, but the Arbitrators who made the award. The award is not referred to, even in the way of recital, in the motion before the House. The Order before the House is: “that a Select Committee be appointed, to enquire into and report to this House upon all matters connected with the boundaries between the Province of Ontario and the unorganised territories of the Dominion.” What can be the object, I would ask, of having this matter reconsidered? Does the Government, does the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution, pretend to say, that better Arbitrators can be chosen than the hon. gentlemen who have already acted as such? Does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that a better tribunal could be obtained, one better calculated to decide this question, than the one we have had? Can it be said that any Committee of this hon. House is so well calculated to consider and decide this question as the Commissioners who have done so? Those chosen by the Dominion and by Ontario, were disinterested and able men, and Sir Edward Thornton held the balance of justice evenly in his hands between them. The right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government, says there was but one lawyer upon that Commission. Why, if this House should decide against the award upon that ground, it will be the first time that I have known an assembly of this kind to pay such a tribute of respect to lawyers. If the resolution before the House asked us to set aside the award on some specified ground, I could understand it; but it seems to me that the award is impregnable, and its enemies have not attempted to attack it in any particular. Now, it has been said that we are endeavouring to take territory from the Province of Ontario. Sir, I can understand that, but the statement is not made that any undue territory has been given to Ontario by the Arbitrators. I believe the award is a just and correct one, and, if so, any tribunal capable of discharging their duty, which may hereafter be appointed, must arrive at the same conclusion, and, therefore, no injustice can arise from sustaining it. This award has been arrived at after the most searching investigation and deliberation by competent men, and I feel it my duty until that award is impeached successfully to vote against the resolution before the House.

MR. McCARTHY: I do not desire to give a silent vote on this important question, representing, as I do, an Ontario constituency; and, while I think we must disregard in the consideration of this matter, the locality that we may happen to represent, yet, as representations have been made upon the floor of this House, as threats have been uttered as to what might be done to representatives of Ontario constituencies, if they did not support the award which has been made, it is well, I think, in our own interest, at all events, if not in the interest of the Dominion, that those who intend to support the resolution of my hon. friend from Algoma (Mr. Dawson) should give the grounds for the conclusion at which they have arrived. I agree that when the award has been made it ought to be adhered to by the parties who have agreed to the submission, and that strong grounds should be shown by either party who does not propose to submit to it. I have to say, however, that I do not understand, in the first place, that the reference of this matter to a Committee to make an enquiry and determine upon the various matters—which, to a great number, at all events, of the members of this House, will be very desirable information, before we express a decided opinion upon the validity of the award—I do not conceive, I say, that such a reference as that is at all improper. I admit, at the same time, that some ground ought to be shown, and for my part I have made up my mind that there is good ground why, before we adopt that award, we ought to have some more information on the subject than we possess at the present time. Let me recal to the attention of the House the position in which this case stands. By the British North America Act, the limits of the various Provinces were defined. So far as the Province of Ontario was concerned, they were to be those of the Province of Upper Canada before the Union of Canada in 1841.

That was not to be increased. No power was given either to this Parliament or to the Local Legislature to alter or change the limits of that boundary. There was a boundary line on the north-west as well as upon the north, although it may have been difficult, perhaps, to determine where that boundary line was. Still, that line had an existence, just to the same extent as the boundary line between two men's farms, although they may dispute as to its precise locality. Now, then, a dispute arose between the Province of Ontario and this Dominion, as to where that boundary line was. It was proposed in the first place, as I understand the papers, that the question as to where the boundary line was should be referred to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the highest tribunal to which the people of this country can appeal. That proposition met with a counter proposition, and it was determined and agreed upon to constitute the tribunal who made the award. The hon. the leader of the Opposition concurs in my understanding of the purpose of the reference, and, as he has told us, it was finally arranged that, this tribunal thus constituted, one Arbitrator having been selected by the Dominion, another by Ontario, and a third having been appointed by the consent of all parties, this Court thus created should meet and do—What? Were they to settle a conventional line, or were they to ascertain where the true boundary line was? Now, it strikes me that this is the pivot of this discussion. I doubt much if many of us have been able from the perusal of the papers that have been brought down—and we have to go to the Ontario Legislature for an inspection of Sessional Papers— I doubt much if we are able to say now, except from the statements that have been made upon the floor of this House during the debate, what it was that was submitted to this tribunal. I understood the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), who has been engaged in this matter for many years past, and who, perhaps, knows more about it than the great majority of the members of this House, to say, and he was corroborated by the hon. member for Lambton, (Mr. Mackenzie), that the question that was submitted to the Arbitrators was not the power to determine a conventional line, but to ascertain where the true line was,

and that only. Well, now, I have looked at the Act of Parliament passed by the Ontario Legislature, and I am surprised to find that a matter of this grave importance, affecting this Dominion, was not thought worthy of even a written document, as far as I can ascertain from any of the papers I have seen, empowering the Arbitrators to act. No Act of this Parliament is to be found on the Statute-book, by which it was so agreed to refer this question to arbitration. The Ontario Legislature acted in a widely different manner, in a much more careful manner, and one much more becoming the importance of the question. We find that in 1874 it passed an Act expressly empowering the Governor-General-in-Council to name an Arbitrator, or rather it named an Arbitrator, and empowered him to name a substitute. But when I look through the Statutes of the Dominion, although I find an Order in Council, passed in 1874, upon the recommendation of the leader of the Opposition, that legislation should be had, in order to give the Governor-General-in-Council power to appoint an Arbitrator, I look in vain for any Act of this Parliament, by which the Government was empowered to submit this question to Arbitration. I look in vain for any record of any kind, by which it may be seen what was the question submitted, and we are unable to find from the proceedings of Parliament what it was that the Governor-General of this Dominion, acting under the advice of the hon. gentlemen opposite, thought proper to submit. These are certainly circumstances which, one would say, render it more than usually necessary that the proceedings of this Arbitration should be investigated by this Committee. We do, however, find that, whatever that Arbitration decided upon was to be subjected to the approval of this House, as well as subject to the approval of the Local Legislature. Before that award obtains any validity, before that award is of the slightest value, it is to receive the sanction of the Parliament of Canada. Well, are we to be told that in the absence of all information in our own Sessional Papers, knowing that this matter was treated so carelessly by the hon. gentlemen who had charge of it that they did not think proper to submit a Bill to Parliament, seeing that they never even thought proper to have a form of deed, or document, or reference, are we to be told that it is improper, in the absence of information on this subject, that the question should be referred to a Committee to take evidence and inform the conscience of this House, as to what we should do and how we should discharge our duty. I understood from the hon. gentleman who conducted the matter, the hon. gentleman from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), that the question which was submitted was as to the true boundary line between the Province of Ontario and the Dominion Territories, and yet, looking at this Act of 1874 passed by the Local Legislature, I think most lawyers would come to an opposite conclusion. In this Act of 1874, it is recited that in 1871 an Imperial Statute authorised the Parliament of Canada to increase, diminish or otherwise alter the boundaries of any Province. It is further recited that, subject to the approval of the Parliament of Canada, and the Legislature of Ontario, it has been agreed by the Governments of the Dominion of Canada and the Province of Ontario, that the questions which have arisen concerning such boundaries, should be determined by reference to Arbitration, and further that certain gentlemen were named as Arbitrators, and that the determination of a majority of the said Arbitrators should be final and conclusive, as to the limits to be taken as and for such boundaries. It goes on to enact that the Province of Ontario consents that this Parliament may declare that the boundaries the Arbitrators may decide on shall be the boundaries. And that this Parliament "may thereby increase, diminish or otherwise alter the northerly and westerly limits of the Province of Ontario."

MR. MILLS: Hear, hear.

MR. McCARTHY: The hon. gentleman from Bothwell says "Hear, hear." By that cheer, if I may so call it, he condemns his own case, because he stated to the House yesterday that the reference made by the Dominion was to ascertain the true line, wherever it was. We find, on the contrary, that the Ontario Legislature was acting on a different principle, and they were going in for a conventional line; so that the matter has been treated in one way by one party, and in another way by the other party, and that, while the Ontario Legislature thought they were referring to one subject, the late Government thought they were submitting another matter to the Arbitrators, and no wonder that, under such circumstances, the award was as we find it to be.

MR. MILLS: Not at all.

MR. McCARTHY: "Not at all," says the hon. gentleman. He must remember that he is much biased in this matter. It is an unfortunate circumstance for the Dominion that the hon. gentleman happened to be the paid agent of the Ontario Government, when he received his first impressions on this subject. That was quite proper; I make no objection to it. It was quite proper that the hon. gentleman should be engaged, he is skilled in this matter, and his knowledge as a public man pointed him out as a fit person to assume that charge, but it was unfortunate that, when he became a member of the Government of this Dominion, and took charge of his Department, he had also to present the other side of the case. I say that, under these circumstances, this is another ground why, perhaps, we should scrutinise with care the result of this reference.

MR. MILLS: After I became a member of the Government, I took no part in the discussion of this question. The matter was dealt with entirely by the First Minister and by the Minister of Justice.

MR. McCARTHY: I supposed the Government was a unit; we have been told about the continuity of the Government, and now the hon. gentleman tells us that he took no part in the discussion of this question. I suppose, then, he takes no part in it now, and takes no interest in the case because, if he was incompetent to do it as the Minister of the Interior, he must be equally incompetent, as a member of this House, to take any part in the discussion. However, this is a reason, in my judgment, that we should scrutinise with considerable care, the result of this reference, and, when we are told by the hon. member for Algoma, who has taken a great interest, as it was natural he should take, this being his constituency and containing the principal portion, if not all, the territory in question, that the case was inadequately presented before the Arbitrators, there is still further ground for enquiry, still further reason why we should not "go it blind," to use, perhaps, a vulgar but an expressive term—I say that we must go to the foundation of this whole question. If we determine that our Arbitrators were authorised simply and solely to ascertain the true boundary line, and that they ought to have determined the true boundary line, there would be very strong reason, indeed, for our submitting to their award, even though we did not think it to be proper or right. But if it turns out that we really did not know what we had agreed to submit to our Arbitrators, then I say, it is manifest that the award cannot stand; it is manifest under these circumstances, that the whole matter is open to review, and must be reviewed by some other tribunal. But here is another view to be taken of this question. It appears to me that, rightly or wrongly, the Arbitrators did establish a conventional line. Every gentleman who has spoken on this subject, and who has any knowledge of it, including even the hon. member for Bothwell—if not, I am open for correction—all agreed that no person pretended, prior to the pronouncing of this award, that the line which the Arbitrators established, was the line which any person ever contended or believe to be the true line. I have failed to find any evidence, even to show that the line established by the Arbitrators, was contended for by any politician or public man prior to the pronouncing of this award. It is contended on the one side, that the true boundary is a line, north, from the junction of the Ohio with the Mississippi—in behalf of the Dominion. On the part of Ontario, it was contended that the true boundary line was on the east bank of the Mississippi. If you look at the Act of 1774, there is no difficulty in tracing the boundary down to the confluence of the Forks of the Ohio; but when you reach that point the dispute commences. One party says "northward" means—and I must say there is great force in that contention—the most direct line north, to the Hudson's Bay Territory. Another side contends that that is not the meaning, among them being the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall). He thinks the proper meaning of the Act, read by the light cast by the debate, and by contemporaneous documents, is, that the boundary should be by the Mississippi River. But, whether his view be correct or not, the Arbitrators have adopted another, which is not either of the lines as contended for under the Act of 1774, if it be admitted to be, as I believe it is, the foundation of the whole controversy in this matter. Again, what warrant is there for the eastern boundary established by the Arbitrators? They have chosen to project an eastern boundary—

MR. MACKENZIE: An eastern boundary?

MR. MCCARTHY: An eastern boundary in effect it is—the line north of Lake Temiscamingue.

MR. MACKENZIE: They had nothing to do with it.

MR. MCCARTHY: Who had nothing to do with it?

MR. MACKENZIE: The Arbitrators.

MR. MCCARTHY: The award distinctly says, north of the Hudson's Bay.

MR. MACKENZIE: That line was settled by Quebec and Ontario before.

MR. MCCARTHY: If that be so, I have misread the Act. On looking at its language again, I find the hon. gentleman is right. I took that to be the line, which is only a point from which it starts. The main point, however, is still this: they have established, as a part of the Territory of Ontario, this line running to Hudson's Bay. No person ever contended for that view prior to this award. From the document itself there is plain evidence that this is a conventional line, and is only to be upheld, if upheld at all, under the Act of 1871, which gives power to Parliament, with the consent of the Legislature, to alter the boundaries of any Province. If this is a true conclusion, then every hon. member of this House, who was a member of the last Parliament, knows that it never was in the contemplation of that House to delegate to these Arbitrators our powers of legislation with a view to altering the boundaries of Ontario. That all we supposed was being done, was the establishment of the means of ascertaining the true boundary line; but none of us ever dreamt that an attempt was being made to give Ontario more territory or take any from her. If that has to be done, we have got to know what we are doing, and to proceed with more caution and deliberation, and with different facts from those brought before the Arbitrators. So that it is proper that this matter should be referred to a Committee, upon the report of which only could the House properly and fairly discharge its duty, in this important matter, both to Ontario and the Dominion. My hon. friend from West Durham took high ground on this subject. He argued, I think, that it was immoral for us now to attempt in any way to repudiate this award, the result of this Inter-provincial Treaty. Why, we have our duties here to discharge to the Dominion; and it cannot be called immoral, if we discharge them fairly and honestly. We do not come here as representatives of Ontario as distinguished from the representatives of Quebec, or representatives of New Brunswick as distinguished from the members for Nova Scotia, but as representatives of the Dominion, to which belongs our first duty. We are bound to see that its rights are properly protected; and I must say, that the whole dealing of hon. gentlemen opposite with this matter, and of the late Administration, has shown, to say the least, very great carelessness. I say advisedly that, when we find here that, although my hon. friend the member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) suggested the propriety of legislating on this subject, they never submitted a Bill—that there is no Act on the Statute-book authorising this reference—that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) is hardly yet able to say what the arrangement agreed upon was. I say that when the matter was conducted with such carelessness, it behoves us now to take the matter into our own hands, and deal with it broadly, fairly and honestly, both as regards Ontario and the Dominion. Comparison has been made of the Geneva and Fishery Awards. I do not think that our American friends would have hesitated to reject the Fisheries Award if they had had any loop-hole; but as the reference was simply to ascertain the value of the fisheries to the Americans, it was simply a matter of dollars and cents. We know quite well that everything in the Treaty that affected us had to be ratified by this Parliament. I do not, for a moment, pretend to express any positive opinion about this award—to say that it is not a fair and just disposition of the controversy between Ontario and the Dominion; but I do say it is a case for an enquiry, and before we vote to sustain the award we ought to know on what ground it is based, what was referred to the Arbitrators, and whether they acted within the scope of their authority. I do not pretend to say that they were actuated by any improper motives. No hon. member has ventured to assail their conduct; but although they may have been perfectly honest, and may have acted honourably, as I have no doubt of it, they may have misunderstood the powers delegated to them by the Governor in Council and by the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario; and, if that be so, the award must necessarily be set aside, leaving matters as before. I do not think that this House would delegate to arbitrators, knowingly, the power of determining boundaries in a conventional manner like the present. I do not think that it was ever intended when the Imperial Parliament, by the Act of 1871, gave this House the power to alter the boundaries of Provinces, that we were to delegate that power to arbitrators. That is a matter of legislation and not of administration. Parliament has not the power to delegate its authority to arbitrators, no matter how high their authority. On that ground also this award must be treated as void. On the merits of the question itself, it does appear there is a good deal to be said from the view of the Minister of Justice. I cannot accept the construction which the member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) places upon the Statute. He reads the contemporaneous documents and discussions when the Bill was introduced, and from them assumes that it does not express what was intended; but there is no principle of the construction of Acts better established than this—that within the four corners of an Act of Parliament must be found the meaning of the Act; and that we are not at liberty to depart from that meaning for the purpose of showing that language, perfectly plain, was intended to mean something different. An amusing illustration of this principle occurred in the Supreme Court herelately. The Attorney-General of Ontario was arguing a question of insurance legislation, which had given rise to a controversy. He stated that the Bill was introduced into the Local Legislature by the Government, with the intention that it should affirm the principle he was contending for, when the counsel on the other side, also a member of the Legislature at the time, declared he had voted for that Bill understanding it in quite a different sense, and that, had he thought it meant what the Attorney-General asserted, he never would have voted for it. It is better to confine ourselves to the language of the Act, and disregard the expressions used in the debate, in order to arrive at the true meaning of the law.

MR. MACKENZIE: And not trust much to the lawyers.

MR. McCARTHY: Not much to the lawyers, nor to laymen, if we take the conduct of the hon. member for Lambton, in dealing with the matter, as an example. It appears to me, from what we have heard to-day, that the members of this House, or the late Government, meant one thing, and the Ontario Legislature another. It is quite clear those two contracting parties, Ontario and the Dominion, never had a common understanding on this subject—the consensus necessary to the formation of a contract; they were driving at different points. The Dominion Government were endeavouring to appoint an arbitration to fix and determine the true boundary of Ontario, while its Legislature was driving at something else. Under these circumstances this award cannot stand. If, on the other hand, it was intended to delegate to arbitrators the powers of this House, it would not be legal. On this ground also, the award should not be allowed to stand. Let me refer to the words of the Act of 1871. After giving the authority already referred to, to increase, diminish, or otherwise alter the limits of a Province, the clause reads: "Upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed to by the said Legislature, etc". Evidently it was contemplated that, if the limits of the Province were altered, a bargain should be made, just to all parties. The hon. member for Lambton, I am quite sure, never intended to make any such new agreement, or conventional line; but the Arbitrators appear to have thought there was such an intention, and dealt with the subject on that understanding. On these grounds, I think, the matter ought to go to a Committee; and that we should have the fullest information on the whole subject, before being called on to swallow this award and assume its correctness, when all the circumstances point in an opposite direction.

Motion made and question proposed:

"That a Select Committee be appointed, to enquire into, and report to this House upon, all matters connected with the boundaries between the Province of Ontario and the unorganised territories of the Dominion, with power to send for persons and papers; said Committee to be composed of Messrs. Dawson, Robinson, Geoffrion, DeCosmos, Brecken, Royal, Trow, Mousseau, Caron, McDonald (Cape Breton), and Weldon, of whom five to form a quorum."

The House divided:—Yeas, 123; nays, 52.

MR. CASEY : I desire to call attention to the rule that members named on a Committee of this kind, who vote against such a motion, cannot serve on that Committee. I ask, Mr. Speaker, for your ruling on that point.

MR. SPEAKER : Of course a member opposed to a question cannot serve on a Committee appointed to consider that question.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : The objection ought to have been taken before the vote was recorded.

MR. CASEY : But these gentlemen had not declared themselves in any way before they voted. I think Mr. Speaker will have to give directions to strike them off according to his ruling.

MR. SPEAKER : What I meant by the ruling I gave was this : That any member speaking against the question to be investigated by a committee, cannot serve upon that committee. I had, however, declared the motion carried, and it was too late for my hon. friend to call my attention to the subject. The hon. member for Chateauguay, while he stated the committee was inopportune, did not declare himself against the question to be considered.

(Mr. Colby.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. COLBY : It is not my intention to detain the House but a moment by any remarks which I shall make on the second reading of this Bill. The subject of the Insolvency laws is one which has been so often and so thoroughly and so exhaustively discussed in Parliament, in the press and on the hustings, that nothing remains to be said. I am sure that no words of mine would influence the vote or opinions of any member of this House. Whatever may have been the necessity for this law when it was passed, I think that now it is unquestionably a fact that it has outlived its usefulness and that public opinion is definitely settled and has declared itself in a way that is unmistakeable, in favour of an immediate and summary repeal of the Act. Now, Sir, I am not nor have I ever been one of those who believe that a Bill for the relief of honest and unfortunate debtors was under all circumstances an unmitigated evil. On the contrary, I can quite understand that after periods of great commercial disaster, at periods when men through no fault of their own—through no dishonesty, extravagance or inattention to business, but solely through the fault of others—have been overwhelmed in the common ruin, a temporary law which shall give relief to that unfortunate class, may be a public advantage, as it is certainly humane in its spirit. That by the continuance of that law, when it came to be understood that it was a permanent law on the Statute-book, it became rather a means of escape for the dishonest and designing debtor than a mere means of relief for the honest and unfortunate debtor. Another feature of the law, which has always commended itself to the favourable consideration of the creditor class, has been the principle, which is certainly most excellent in theory, of placing the administration of insolvent estates in the hands of the creditors, to be administered by agents of their own selection. It would seem, theoretically, that nothing would more tend to secure the proper and economical administration and distribution, of an insolvent estate, than that system. But, Sir, experience has also shown in this country, and in other countries I believe, that the rapacity of assignees, the dishonesty of debtors, the greed of some creditors, the inattention of others, have thwarted the beneficent intentions of the law; and instead of there being an economical and honest administration of assets, the practical operation of the law has been characterised by a wasteful extravagance, and too often by a dishonest administration. I think it is unmistakably the case in this country, where the law has been a long time on the Statute-book, that it has tended to the demoralisation of trade, and to lower the standard of commercial morality. It has tended to recklessness in trading, and in living to extravagance. It has tempted many persons, wholly unsuited for business, to risk their fortune in business enterprises that were little understood by them. The whole effect of the law in recent years has been unfortunate and disastrous. I think, Sir, that it is the sentiment of the people of this country, generally, that it has tended, in some considerable degree, if not to create, at all events to aggravate, the commercial distress which has unhappily prevailed in this country. But there have always been objections to the total repeal of this law. There is no doubt, however, that when it is repealed, there will be inconvenience; but I am happy to believe that that inconvenience is likely to be lessened by the action which I understand is to be taken by the Government of Ontario in the introduction of a Bill, which I have not seen, but which I believe is to be brought down and passed this Session, introducing a law similar in principle to that prevailing in the Province of Quebec, for the just and equitable distribution of estates. Should that be done in Ontario I have no doubt the example will be followed by the other Provinces of the Dominion; and if we do not have a law in all respects uniform in procedure, we will have laws uniform in principle, so that creditors in every Province can understand the principle upon which the assets are to be distributed in the other Provinces. If there is to be an abrogation of this law I think, perhaps, the present is more timely for action than any former occasion upon which the proposal has been made before this House. It is an undeniable fact that many, anticipating action during this Session of Parliament, have prepared themselves for it, and the great rush during the past year into the Insolvency Court is clearly an evidence of this. The effect of a repeal at the present time on the debtor class will not be as embarrassing as if it had been enacted with less notice. Again, Sir, I think that we are all agreed that the country is exhibiting a degree of commercial and industrial prosperity which unhappily has not existed for many years past, whatever may be the occasion of it. We will not discuss that point now. I think there is a unanimous feeling of renewed confidence, that we are on the eve of a greater degree of business prosperity than we have enjoyed for many years past. I think, under these circumstances, if the law is ever to be abrogated the present is a timely opportunity for enacting its repeal. With regard to the details of the Bill which I have the honour of submitting to the House, I would invite the attention of the legal members of the House, and particularly the Minister of Justice, to any necessary suggestions or modifications which may be properly considered when the House is in Committee on the Bill. No reference has been made in the Bill to Banks or incorporated Companies, and I would suggest to the legal gentlemen of this House, that they would consider what would be proper to enact in this regard. With these, I hope not too lengthy remarks, I have the honour to move that the Bill be now read a second time.

MR. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier) : I do not desire, Sir, to repeat the remarks I made last year in reference to the Insolvency law. I only desire to say one or two words, giving my reasons for seconding the Bill of the hon. member for Stanstead. It will be recollected that last year, several insolvent Bills were referred to a Special Committee. One of the first proceedings of that Committee, was to consider whether the Insolvency Laws should be repealed purely and simply, or whether a new Act should be framed. I voted on that occasion for a repeal, pure and simple. The motion for a repeal was lost, and a sub-Committee was struck and instructed to prepare a Bill for the approbation of the House. I was on that Committee, and a Bill was reported. This Bill was proposed by the hon. member for Stanstead and seconded by myself. We all know the result of that Bill. The House voted a repeal, pure and simple, by a majority of 24. I was in favour of the Bill of the Committee, because great concessions had been made in favour of non-traders generally, and more particularly in favour of farmers. It was further represented at that time, that the country was not prepared for a repeal, pure and simple. But I desire to submit to the will of the people. I believe the people of this country are tired of the Insolvent Law and the regime of Official Assignees, under which they have suffered for some years past. I now second the motion for the second reading of the Bill, to repeal the Insolvency Laws, pure and simple. If the second reading of the Bill is carried, and I have no doubt it will be, I intend when the Bill is in Committee to propose an amendment to the following effect:—

“All insolvents under the provisions of the Insolvent Acts of 1864, 1869 or 1875, or Acts amending the same, who have not yet obtained a discharge under the said Acts, and who have delivered up the whole of their estate, and have not been guilty of any fraud within the meaning of any of the said Acts, shall henceforth and forever be discharged from their liabilities to the extent provided by the said Acts. But all remedies now existing may be enforced by any creditor who shall prove any such fraud or want of delivery of the estate of his debtor.

“2. This Act shall not apply to any case where a discharge has been refused by the court or judge for fraud or want of delivery of any portion of the assets of the insolvent.”

It is well known, Sir, that, under the Act of 1876, a debtor was not entitled to his discharge unless his estate realised 33c. on the dollar; a discretion being left with the Judge to grant the discharge or not. By a subsequent Act this discretion was removed, and the amount increased from 33c. to 50c. We know that there are unfortunate insolvents who have acted honestly, but who have not been able to get a discharge. It seems to me that we should start with a clean sheet; and therefore I propose that a jubilee should be extended to unfortunate traders and merchants who have given up everything and have been guilty of no fraud.

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew): In the discussions upon this question upon former occasions, I have expressed an opinion that the Insolvent Laws ought not to be repealed pure and simple. I do not now propose to advance any arguments in support of that view, because I believe that the House is prepared to vote, by a large majority, for the repeal of the Insolvent Laws, as they stand on the Statute-book at present. Nothing I can say will alter the determination which I am convinced the House has come to in this matter. One of the principal objections to the repeal of the Bill, is that in many Provinces no law exists for the distribution of the assets of insolvent debtors. It is said, and I believe truly said, that the Ontario Legislature are likely to pass a law which will have the effect of allowing the creditors of an insolvent debtor to participate in the assets of his estate. But I would like to draw the attention of legal members of the House to one phase of the question, which I think has not presented itself very forcibly to most of the hon. members of this House. If I understand the case aright, there is no provision in the Province of Ontario by which execution debtors may be punished for the concealment of any portion of their assets. I think, in repealing this law, some provision ought to be made by which the penalties imposed by the Insolvent Laws on insolvent debtors for the concealment of their assets, should be imposed on the person whose assets may be seized under a writ of execution. That is all I propose to suggest to the House in reference to this matter.

MR. BECHARD: I do not rise with the intention of discussing the question of insolvency at large, it has been a subject that has been exhausted in the discussion which took place last year, as was said by my hon. friend from Stanstead; but, Sir, allow me to congratulate my hon. friends from Stanstead and Jacques Cartier for the attitude which they have taken this year respecting this question of insolvency. I am sure, Sir, that the course followed by my hon. friends this year will meet with a better reward than that which they at first adopted last year with respect to the same question. When my hon.

friend from Stanstead introduced his Bill, I feared it might possibly be the same voluminous Bankruptcy Bill which he, seconded by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, moved last year, with a view to have it substituted for the existing law, and which was defeated upon my motion in amendment for unconditional repeal. But, Sir, upon examination of that proposed measure, it was gratifying to me to find that it was exactly the same Repeal Bill which I had the honour of introducing last year, and which was carried in this House. It will be remembered by everyone that this Bill, after it had been carried in this House by a majority of 57, was rejected in the Senate by a slight majority of only four votes, after an active canvass of that honourable body. Notwithstanding that check, the friends of repeal were not discouraged; they felt that defeat was temporary, and that my Repeal Bill was a knife sunk deeply in the throat of the Insolvency Law, which was bound to expire this session. I repeat, it is gratifying to see my hon. friends from Stanstead and Jacques Cartier, who last Session endeavored to impart new life and vigour to the moribund Bill, hastening to-day, in order to be on time, to receive its last breath and piously close its eyes. That Repeal Bill of last year, although rejected by the Senate, I venture to say, was so welcomed by public opinion, so well received by the people, that it was thought of since in high quarters, and became a general conclusion, amongst politicians, that nothing less could satisfy the people but the absolute repeal of the Insolvency Law. I consider it to be a foregone conclusion, that this Bill will be successfully passed through Parliament this Session. I am sure it will receive new supporters in this House; and from what I learned about the dispositions of some of those hon. Senators who opposed it last year, I am certain that it will also be carried there. Therefore, Sir, the Insolvency Law will be repealed. We will get rid of it, and the people will receive full and entire satisfaction upon that question. The will of the people is, I think, manifest. They abhor a law, which, in the course of its existence, has given rise to so many abuses, and which they consider as contributing, in a high degree, to delay the restoration of that confidence amongst business men, which is so essential to the commercial prosperity of any nation. It is true, Sir, that we hear in some quarters some voices clamoring in favour of an Insolvency Law, or of amendments to the existing law; but I believe they constitute but a small portion of our people. Their number is confined to some wholesale merchants, who would like to have, very likely, an Insolvency Law framed, as that which was introduced last Session by my hon. friend from Stanstead—a law altogether in favour of creditors and which placed debtors at their feet. But the large majority of the people do not want any Insolvency Law; and I venture to say that no public man to-day would assume the responsibility of moving any such law. Sir, I need hardly say that I will vote for this Bill; it is my Bill; it is precisely, word for word, the Bill which I introduced last year, and which I introduced again this Session. I was the father of the Bill last year; and when I look at the Bill to-day it is impossible for me to disown the child. But it appears that that little individual has attractive powers; for it was taken from me, and is now appearing before you under the care and patronage of an adoptive father. The measure, or a similar one, was originated in Parliament by Mr. Barthe, formerly member for the county of Richelieu. It was introduced twice, and every time I voted for it. But last year—Mr. Barthe being no longer a member of Parliament, and my hon. friend from Stanstead, who, in former years was the champion of repeal, having abandoned that course, and adopted, last Session, a course antagonistic to repeal—I took that cause in hand and introduced this Bill. By acting in that way, I am sure I was not trespassing on those rules of courtesy which good education impels me to observe towards every one of my colleagues in Parliament.

MR. MACKENZIE: I think, before discussing the present measure further, that it would be desirable to know when the Government propose to introduce the measure respecting insolvency, referred to in the Speech from the Throne.

AN HON. MEMBER: That will depend upon the result of this Bill.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): In answer to the hon. the leader of the Opposition,

I may say that the subject is under the consideration of the Government.

MR. MACKENZIE: I think that is not a satisfactory answer to the question. A measure relating to insolvency was promised in the Speech from the Throne, and I think we have a right to ask the Government when that measure is likely to be introduced, because it might materially change the views of the House. Last year the Government had not the courage either to promise or propose a measure; and the hon. the Minister of Justice became a champion in opposition to the Bill brought in to repeal the Insolvent Laws. Now, when we have a distinct measure promised in the Speech from the Throne, it is strange that there is not a gentleman prepared, on behalf of the Government, to answer my question. I see that the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government is now coming into the House. I would suggest that whenever he leaves the House he should leave some one in authority. He keeps his family under too great subjection. I may now tell the hon. leader of the Government, that I wish to ask when they intend to introduce the measure, relating to insolvency, promised by the Speech from the Throne.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: This is a most laudable curiosity on the part of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie). He says, I keep my family in too great subjection. Well, Sir, we are a unit perhaps. The hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition has not been so successful as myself, in that respect. He says we have promised a Bill on the subject of insolvency. If, however, the hon. gentleman will examine the wording of the Speech from the Throne, he will find that what is there said is, that the subject of Insolvency will "engage the attention" of the House. Now, Sir, I think that subject is engaging the attention of the House now. When we ventured to prophecy this we were so certain of the truth of the premises that we placed the language in the mouth of His Excellency the Governor-General. It has engaged the attention of the House—on both sides—at the invitation of the Crown, at the very beginning of the Session. But, seriously, Mr. Speaker, the Government of the day have a duty to perform. As leaders of the House they have to submit such measures as they think proper and expedient for the good of the country. This subject was announced as one of importance, by the Speech from the Throne, and it really makes no difference whether the measure is in the hands of one member or another, or whether it is in the hands of a member of the Government or in the hands of a member who is not a member of the Government of the day. If the hon. gentleman who has the Bill in charge had not brought it forward, the Government would certainly have introduced a measure. Had he failed to do so, or had hon. members opposite failed to do so, the Government would have felt it their duty to introduce a measure for the repeal of the Insolvent Laws. The measure, however, is before the House, and will receive due consideration.

MR. MACKENZIE: That means that the Government have no measure, but pick up one wherever they can find it.

MR. CASEY: It is gratifying to hear the hon. the leader of the Government state that it makes no difference who brings in a measure. He says that the Government simply prophesied that such a measure would be brought forward. I was not aware that we had such a rival of Vennor. I suppose we may hope to see it in the almanac for next year that on such a day in February you may expect a Bill to repeal the Insolvent Act.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There is one thing we will not find in the almanac; we shall not find it recorded that we were favoured with an eloquent speech from the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey).

MR. SPROULE: It must be a matter of satisfaction to those gentlemen who took part, a year ago, in the arguments urging the repeal of the Insolvent Laws, to know that they have, at last, succeeded in convincing gentlemen who took so strong a stand against the measure. At the same time it seems almost incredible that it should have taken such a length of time, and such an amount of argument, to satisfy intelligent men of the uselessness of the Insolvent Laws, all their amendments made from year to year are only, to-day, standing monuments of folly and unstatesmanship. If this Insolvent Law had been repealed a year ago, there would not now have been those arguments hon. gentlemen opposite have been pleased to use so strongly against the National Policy. I mean the large number of insolvencies they cite as having occurred since last year. But if hon. gentlemen opposite had been honest, they would have attributed them to their natural cause, namely, the anticipation of the repeal of the Act, and not to the depression brought about by the introduction of the National Policy. But public opinion has been too strong against the continuance of these laws, which apply to one class of the community only, to prevent their continuance upon the Statutes of our country. They have only held out inducements for parties so disposed, to shape their affairs in such a way, even to change from one line to another, so as to enable them to take advantage of the Act, and pay their debts with twenty, thirty or forty cents on the dollar. I believe it is generally recognised that there is not more than one honest trader out of every three or four who have taken the benefit of that Act since it was placed upon the Statute-book. It seems strange that, if the law was so beneficial, it should have been made applicable only to commercial people; and that all professional men, labourers and mechanics, and all the agricultural classes of the community should be entirely left out from the benefits supposed to accrue from that law. It seems strange to me also, in view of these facts, that the law should continue so long, and that we find those who ought to be the leaders of public opinion, and who took such strong grounds a year ago in favour of the continuance of that law, whose judgment and experience should have enabled them to understand the feeling of the country, are to-day retreating from their position of last year. It must be humiliating to these men to-day, to sit in their seats and not have one word to say in favour of the continuance of that law.

Mr. CAMERON (North Victoria): While I am prepared to admit that a majority of the people, certainly of Ontario, are opposed to the existing Insolvency Law, and while I know that a majority of the members of this House are in favour of its total repeal, I am not prepared to assent to the large terms of the proposition of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) who stated that there was an almost universal consensus of public opinion in favour of the total repeal of the law. For my part, I have always felt that a well considered and well administered Insolvency Law, was necessary for the proper carrying on of the affairs of an extensive commercial community. That opinion I still retain. I also am of opinion that the evils of our existing law are evils of administration, and not evils inherent in the principle on which the law is based; and those faults arise almost entirely from the mercantile community itself, which is most largely interested in the matter. I believe it is owing to the laxity and the want of attention on the part of creditors, that the Insolvency Law has been so badly administered; and that if they had paid more attention to their own affairs and had looked more carefully after the administration of insolvent estates, we would not have had that general feeling of objection to the Insolvent Law which now exists. They have tried the experiment in the United States of a total repeal of the law, as you are aware; and within a very short time after it was totally repealed, we find a large number of the Boards of Trade in the most important commercial cities, petitioning Congress at this very Session in favour of the re-enactment of a Bankruptcy Law. So we find that after a large experience in the United States, in a very short time, a feeling arose, and petitions began to pour in, in favour of a re-enactment of such a law. I had hoped that some member of the mercantile community in this House would have had something to say on this subject, because, really, it is one that interests them more than any one else. No doubt it will be found that the wholesale trade, at any rate, throughout the country, both in Montreal as well as in the western Province, are, as a body, opposed to the abolition of the Insolvency Laws. The Board of Trade of Toronto, certainly, and I think of Hamilton and other cities in Canada, have passed various resolutions within the last few months against the total repeal, and in favour of certain specific modifications and improvements which ought to be introduced into an Insolvency Law. For my part I would have preferred to see a judicious series of amendments to the law rather than its total repeal. The hon. member for Stanstead says, it is now unimportant, so far as Ontario is concerned,—from which Province the objection came most strongly last Session—because the Ontario Legislature are about passing a law which will remedy those crying evils which would have arisen if, in that Province, they had no Insolvency Law and no provision such as is contemplated in their proposed Act. I am not aware what these provisions are, but I do think it is premature for us to legislate for the total abolition of the Insolvency Laws, because the Legislature of Ontario is about to legislate in some way that we do not understand, by a measure which they have not yet passed. I think it would be better for us to wait and see what they do, and see whether the measure they propose to pass as a substitute for the Insolvent Law, will meet the case and satisfy the wants of the mercantile community in Ontario, before we totally repeal the law. I am aware it would be quite useless in this House to force to a division opposition to a repeal of the law. I, therefore, content myself with entering my humble protest against too rapid action in that direction. I should be glad if one who has given so much attention to the matter as my hon. friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake) did, when he introduced a series of amendments to the Insolvent Law, which were then represented as likely to make it almost perfect, would favour the House with his views on the question, and let us know whether he is prepared to assent to the total repeal of the Law; whether he thinks it is incapable of amendment so as to make it work satisfactorily, because any opinion on that subject from one of his experience, would be valuable to the House. While I dissent from the action the House is taking, I feel that the opinion here is so generally in favour of repeal that it would be useless to divide the House on the question.

MR. MCCUAIG: I have been informed that a Bill is now before the Ontario Legislature to protect creditors generally against the first execution creditor sacrificing the debtor's property to the injury of his other creditors for his own exclusive benefit; and though I have doubts, by reason of the power held by the Dominion Parliament over all legislation on matters of insolvency, of the constitutionality of the proceeding of the Ontario Parliament, I, nevertheless, hope it may meet the wants and expectations of its promoters, and be found to work satisfactorily. I shall vote for the repeal of the Insolvency Law.

MR. WELDON: I am fully alive to the evils of the present Insolvency Law, but I quite agree with the member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron) that, these come from the administration of the law rather than from its principles. In dealing with this matter we should look to the example of the Mother Country, where the principle of the Bankruptcy Act has never been repealed or departed from since it was first introduced into British legislation. While alterations have been made, from time to time, to endeavour to carry out the principle which was intended to be carried out, they have never departed from that principle or attempted to repeal the legislation. I consider it is essential to any community, where people are engaged in commerce, that there should be some means to protect the unfortunate debtor from the rapacity of his creditors, as well as to protect creditors from dishonest debtors. The objection has been urged against the Bankruptcy Law, that it enables persons to be dishonest in trade. I think, however, that if the Bankruptcy Law has fallen into disrepute, it is due rather to the system of credit, than to the law itself; and, further, that if the Sheriff, by execution upon judgment, or other process of law, puts the property on the market by a forced sale, to the detriment of the honest trader, it is no more than is complained is done by the Bankruptcy Law, with this difference, that the creditor who happens to be in first will get the benefit, and the others will go without anything. That would be the effect. The debtor's property is swept away to pay one of the creditors, and he is left to the mercy of the others, who, without regard to his family, may prevent him from going into business again. I am satisfied that parties in many cases go through, who have no right to get a discharge; but I cannot agree with the hon. member who has just taken his seat, that no one should be discharged. The difficulty has been among creditors themselves, who have not taken the trouble to ascertain whether a man was entitled to a discharge or not. One of the features of the Bill introduced last year, was to throw upon the debtor the necessity of getting the consent of his creditors to his discharge; and the debtor, if he could prove that he had fully, honestly and fairly dealt with them, and that it was by misfortune, and not by fraud, that he had become insolvent, he would have no difficulty in obtaining that consent. With regard to the legislation to be introduced into the Ontario Legislature, I have not seen the Bill yet, but I understand it is a Bill to do away with priority of executions. I am not aware of the nature of the Bill, but if it is of that kind, it is very questionable whether any Bill introduced into any Local Legislature, for the distribution of the assets, may not trench upon the jurisdiction of this Parliament. With regard to New Brunswick, after the Bill was first introduced, and when it was shown that attempts to repeal it were made, and a new Bill was introduced in 1875, the legislation of that Province materially changed. I have no hesitation in saying that if this Bill should be repealed and the legislation remain as it is in that Province, it will cause serious embarrassment and loss. It would, to a certain extent, destroy our trade, which is to some extent subjected to the Attachment and Garnishee Laws now in force there, by which parties are enabled to take priority, and which we can only get rid of through the Insolvent Act; and unless those laws are repealed it will seriously embarrass trade in that Province. A Bill like this involving matters of so much importance, it seems is a matter which the Government should take charge of, instead of leaving it in the hands of private parties. While I feel that the disposition of the House, as announced by the vote of last year, is to repeal the Bill, I wish to rise merely to state that I entertain the same opinion I then expressed, and feel that in repealing that Bill we may be only getting deeper into difficulties and embarrassments, and probably in a few years this Legislature will be called upon to give again some relief to the unfortunate creditors.

MR. HESSON: I desire to explain briefly my views as to the vote I am about to give on this question. It is now about a year since a similar measure was brought before this House, and several amendments were brought in by the hon. member from Stanstead (Mr. Colby), and also by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard). It will be remembered that the Committee appointed to make some amendments that would meet the wishes of the community at large, did not meet, at all events, with the support of the majority of the members of this House. I was satisfied that some change was required by the country, whilst I was loathe to see the Insolvent Act totally repealed without some amendment to meet the emergency that would at once fall upon the trade of the country, and I voted against the repeal of the Insolvent Law then, but I also voted for the amendment, as I felt that it would be some relief if any improvement could be made. I find the year passed away, and that no measure has been submitted to the consideration of this House, and that we are now called upon to consider the repeal of the Act. I must say, that the effect of that law as it exists, is most disastrous to the mercantile morals of the country, and I feel that as the Ministry have not seen it their duty to introduce an amendment to the present Act, it is now the duty of this House, and the country calls upon this Parliament, to repeal that law entirely. I have no hesitation in saying here, that I am prepared to vote for the repeal of the Act, in view of the fact that no amendment has been submitted to this House; and that the trade of the country cannot be worse in consequence of this repeal from any change that may ensue. As a trader myself, of over twenty years standing in the country, I feel that the wholesale merchants may, perhaps, be the greatest sufferers for a time; and in their interests I voted for a continuance of that law last year, in the hope that something better would be introduced. That not having been done, I now feel myself called upon to support the Bill, introduced by my hon. friend from Stanstead.

MR. MCLENNAN: Before this question is disposed of, as I do not see any members representing Montreal in the House, and reference has been made to the relation of the commercial interests to this question, I beg to say that I quite agree with my hon. friend from North Victoria (Mr. Cameron), and also with the hon. gentleman from St. John, (Mr. Weldon), that no commercial community can carry on business for a long time satisfactorily, without some provision of an Insolvency Law; and if there is no movement made in this Parliament to repeal the absolute repeal of that law, I may say that in my opinion, it is not because the great commercial community is a party to this Act, but because the opinion of the country at large has been expressed so strongly, that it appears to be the wisest course, at the present moment, to allow this law to go by the board, and so let the evil that will follow work the necessary cure. Speaking with some knowledge of the large commercial interests of the country, I believe that the impression is quite in favour of an Insolvency Law; and I believe that after the experiment of its abrogation has been tried, we will have another law. I may say that a provision in the Law of Lower Canada, for the distribution of our estate in execution, is not regarded as of so satisfactory a nature as would be implied from what has been said to-day. I believe that mercantile men and others have found that law to be inadequate in Lower Canada, and I have no doubt at all that if a law is passed in Ontario, such as is now contemplated, it will be found to be quite inadequate also. I do not look for any good to come from the passing of such a law. I merely make these remarks to prevent the idea from going abroad that the repeal of the Insolvency Law is carried with the approbation of the large commercial interests of the country. I believe that these interests will be found to be in favour of an Insolvency Law, and that they are simply acquiescing for a moment in its repeal until the evil shall work its own cure.

MR. ROBERTSON (Hamilton): I cannot allow the measure, which is now before the House, to be voted upon without expressing my view in reference to it. During the last Session, I had an opportunity of doing so, and as I continue to hold the same opinions, I wish to state them by way of protest to this Bill becoming law. I am perfectly satisfied the commercial community, at all events, of Ontario, and, I believe, of Quebec, are fully confirmed in the idea that it is absolutely necessary that a well considered Insolvency Law should be on the Statute-book of our Dominion. On considering the views expressed in this House and the votes given, it is quite apparent that those constituencies which may be regarded as commercial constituencies, have always, by their representatives, voted in favour of the continuance of the law. No doubt, the opinion is very strong that the law may be beneficially amended; but I agree entirely with the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron) and the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon), that the law as it now exists is really, in its principles, all that can be desired, unless it be capable of amendment in reference to the Official Assignee. It is strange, that where a community, like the commercial community of this country, is so much interested in this very question, that they do not interest themselves more in the winding up of insolvent estates. Experience has taught us that they leave their interests in the hands of one or two Inspectors, and of the Official Assignee, and the consequence is that instead of getting, in many cases, fifty to seventy-five cents in the dollar, they generally came out with but ten or fifteen cents. That has given great dissatisfaction; but the property should be managed by those whose claims upon it stand strongest. I think it would be a great calamity to dispose of the Insolvent Law in the manner proposed by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby). That would leave us in the same state we were in preceding the enactment of the Insolvent Law. I understand that hon. members are willing, so far as Ontario is concerned, to allow the Bill now before the House to go, because it has been announced that the Ontario Government is about introducing a measure that will afford some kind of relief in that direction. I believe that that is the intention of that Government; but this is a very early part of the Session of Parliament, and we do not yet know the purport of the Ontario measure, and, therefore, I would suggest to the hon. member who introduced this Bill, that he allow it to stand over for a week or ten days, in order to give us an opportunity of seeing what will be proposed for Ontario. If this be not done, I think it would be worth while to consider whether it would not be wise, in the interest of the honest traders, to introduce some amendment to the Bill which would do away with the advantage which the sharp creditor would have, and which the dishonest debtor would give him, by allowing the first execution to come in and sweep off all the assets. Such a measure was proposed last Session, but was rejected; when, fortunately, the Senate came to the relief of the country, and rejected the Bill then passed. The delay I recommend can certainly not jeopardise the fate of the Bill, because I feel there is no doubt whatever that the House is determined to repeal the present law; but, at the same time, I cannot understand that there should be no provision whatever for the protection of creditors. We have in Ontario an Absconding Debtors' Act, which may be beneficially used to work out something for the creditors; and I understand this is the idea to be carried out by the Ontario Legislation; that is, that when a debtor absconds, a writ is issued, and all his estate is taken into the possession of the Sheriff, and held for the general benefit of all the creditors who may get judgment within a certain time. Something like this might be done now; and, in case anything should happen so as to prevent any Bill of that nature passing in Ontario, I certainly think it would be well, if the member for Stanstead would consent to allow his measure to stand over ten days or a fortnight, in order that we may ascertain the fact.

Bill read the second time.

REPORT.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER laid before the House,—Annual Report of the Minister of Railways and Canals, for the fiscal year 1st July, 1878, to 30th June, 1879, on the works under his control.

House adjourned at

Twenty-five minutes before
Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, 20th February, 1880.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

NEW MEMBER INTRODUCED.

MR. SPEAKER informed the House that he had received a certificate from the Returning Officer at the last election for the Electoral District of Montmorency, that Aguste Réal Angers, Esq., was duly elected for the said Electoral District.

AGUSTE RÉAL ANGERS, Esq., member for the Electoral District of Montmorency, having previously taken the oath, according to law, and subscribed the roll containing the same, took his seat in the House.

MR. LANGEVIN: As the return made to you, Sir, is on the certificate only, I beg to move the ordinary resolution in such a case.

MR. MACKENZIE: If this motion is a proper one to make at all, it should be made before the member is introduced.

MR. LANGEVIN: I think this is the ordinary course which has been followed in similar cases since I have been in Parliament.

MR. HOLTON: I think my hon. friend will find that the motion is generally made before the admission of the member, who is not entitled to admission, except as a matter of courtesy on the part of the House, until the regular return is received. We have been in the habit of admitting members formerly on indentures and then passing a resolution analogous to this; but the authority for the newly elected member to claim his seat is founded upon the return to the writ made by the Returning Officer. As it frequently occurs that the member arrives in advance of the return, the uniform practice has been to admit members upon presentation of the indenture or certificate, but by a resolution of the House before they took their seat. No member has a prima facie right to a seat here when the return has not been received, unless a motion has been previously made.

MR. LANGEVIN: In 1877, after my second election, when I came to the Bar of the House and claimed my seat, I was admitted, and then a motion was made by the hon. member for Lambton, similar to the one now before the House. I have no doubt the hon. member for Lambton will consider that a very good precedent.

MR. MACKENZIE: I think the authority seems to be indisputable.

MR. HOLTON: I am quite sure it was not the former practice, and I am equally sure that, by whatever authority it is sustained, it is a faulty practice, because the right to a seat reposes primarily on the return of the writ. I cannot, in view of what my hon. friend has just stated, say that it has been the uniform practice to make the motion before the introduction, but it is the proper practice, and I am quite sure it was the practice in the earlier years of my experience.

MR. MACKENZIE: My recollection is that, when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Langevin) was introduced, I called attention to the irregularity, and moved the resolution in order to get over that irregularity as well as possible.

MR. MASSON: By reference to the Journals of the House, the hon. gentleman would see that this was almost the invariable practice when he held office.

Resolved, That, in admitting A. R. Angers, Esq., elected to represent the Electoral District of Montmorency, to take his seat upon the certificate of the Returning Officer, this House still recommends a strict adherence to the practice of requiring the production of the usual certificate of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery of the return to the writ of election.—(Mr. Langevin.)

THE LATE ACCIDENT TO THE VICE-REGAL PARTY.

REMARKS.

MR. MACKENZIE: I wish to call the attention of the hon. the leader of the Government to a matter which I think should engage the attention of the two Houses. Last Saturday, a dangerous accident happened to His Excellency the Governor-General and Her Royal Highness the Princess Louise: an accident which might have resulted seriously, if not fatally, to both of them. Several municipalities have tendered their sympathy with these illustrious personages, and congratulated them on their escape, and I think it would have been only proper that this House should express its sympathy with these illustrious personages under the circumstances, and express its congratulations that they escaped from the much more serious injury to which they were exposed. Everything is of interest to this House, and to the people generally, which concerns His Excellency the Governor-General, and his Royal Consort, the dear daughter of our beloved Queen, who, since she has come to Canada, has made herself so beloved by all. I would suggest the propriety of Parliament giving expression to the sympathy which is universally felt. I have allowed the matter to rest for several days, thinking the matter would be proceeded with by the Government. I have no doubt that the members generally will concur in the propriety of such a proceeding.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Every member of the House will, I hardly need say, agree with the hon. gentleman as to the propriety of expressing our sympathy with regard to the unfortunate accident which happened the other day to the Representative of the Sovereign, and the daughter of our beloved Queen. It has not escaped the attention of myself and colleagues that it is expedient to express the regret which we all feel in reference to that unfortunate occurrence. The reason why it has not been submitted to this House before, and why, no doubt, it has not been submitted to the other House is—as the hon. gentleman can quite understand—that, at such a distance from England, it was of importance, and it was the desire of His Excellency the Governor-General, that no alarm should be given to our beloved Sovereign, the Mother of Her Royal Highness, by attaching, perhaps, undue importance to this unfortunate accident; as it might have had the effect of increasing alarm in England. I am happy to be able to state, that, though they have had an accident in which they had a very narrow escape from the most serious consequences, the Vice-Regal party have nearly overcome the consequences. I would here take the opportunity of calling the attention of the House to the remarks in one of the newspapers to the effect that the accident resulted through the refusal of the Department of Militia to send an escort to the Vice-Regal party on the occasion. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) will see how absurd such a statement is. An escort is ready at any time at the request of His Excellency; and any escort that might have been asked for or required would have been granted in this case; but none was requested. His Excellency was not desirous, on such a night, of exposing the Dragoon Guards, who, however, if desired, would have only been too glad to form an escort. But, as His Excellency wished to spare them, the usual requisition was not made.

INTRODUCTION OF PUBLIC BILLS.

NEW RULE.

MR. SPEAKER announced that a new rule had been adopted by which in future a place would be given, to Bills for introduction, in the printed list of Votes and Proceedings of the House.

THE ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD delivered a Message from His Excellency the Governor-General.

MR. SPEAKER read the Message, and it is as follows:—

“Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

“I acknowledge with thanks the Address you have loyally adopted in answer to the Speech with which I opened the Session, and I rely with confidence on the assurance that the important measures submitted to you, will receive your careful and full consideration.

“GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

“OTTAWA, 27th February, 1880.”

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Robertson, Hamilton.)

FIRST READING.

MR. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) introduced a Bill (No. 14) To amend the law with reference to procedure in criminal cases, and the duties of Justices of the Peace out of Sessions, in relation to persons charged with indictable offences. He said: The object of the Bill is to declare, as part of the law of this country, two sections of the Imperial Act, 30 and 31 Vict., cap. 35, commonly known as Russell Gurney's Act. By that Statute, in England, when a person is charged with a crime, he has a right to ask the magistrate who is investigating the charge, previous to his committal or dismissal, as the case may be, that his witnesses may be examined; so that if he is too poor to compel their attendance by subpoena, they may be bound over to give evidence at his trial. Section 3 of the Bill now introduced proposes to amend the 32 and 33 Vic., cap. 30, sec. 30, of the Dominion by striking out the words “or is absent from Canada.” This section proposed to be amended enables evidence taken before a Magistrate on the investigation of a charge against a person accused, where the depositions of the witnesses are properly signed by the witnesses and by the Magistrate taking it, to be used at the trial, in case of the absence by death or illness, of the witness, or if absent from Canada; but, by this amendment, it is intended that the deposition shall be read against the accused only when the witness is absent, through death or by illness, but not when he is simply absent from Canada. My experience has taught me that that section of the Dominion Statute goes too far. In England, the law on this point only extends to cases where the witness has died or is too ill to travel. Two or three cases within my own knowledge have demonstrated that the law as it stands is capable of being enforced most prejudicially to the accused. It is proposed, therefore, to strike out that part of the clause which makes this practice applicable to cases where a witness, having left Canada, is not present at the trial. Section 4 of the new Bill proposes to amend the 35th Section of the 32 and 33 Vict., Cap. 30, which enables a Justice or Magistrate,—if he thinks it in the interests of justice,—to expel, all persons from the room where the examination is going on. Now, on several occasions, in my own experience, Justices have thought it allowable to inform counsel, in attendance on behalf of the accused, that they were there on sufferance, and that, if it was not the pleasure of the presiding Magistrate, they could not be there at all. I propose, therefore, to add a proviso that, while it shall be in the power of the Magistrate to exclude the public, the prisoner shall not be deprived of counsel learned in the law, to watch the case, and both cross-examine witnesses against the accused, and examine witnesses on behalf of the accused; in fact to make it quite clear that prisoners may retain and employ counsel and attorneys at their preliminary examination. Section 5 of the proposed Bill has reference to the exclusion of witnesses at the trial in criminal cases. In Ontario, witnesses can be excluded in civil cases, but not in criminal cases. This new proviso proposes to give either the Crown or the prisoner the right to require all witnesses, not under examination, to be excluded from the Court-room during the trial. Section 6 proposes to repeal sub-section 2 of section 45, chap. 29, of 32 & 33 Vic., the Dominion Act, and to substitute a new section; the difference between the two is very slight. The law, as it is now, declares that, on the trial of any persons for an indictable offence, the reply of counsel shall be so regulated that, whether the accused calls witnesses or not, the Attorney or Solicitor-General, or any Queen's counsel representing the Crown, shall be entitled to reply. I propose to amend that by confining the right of reply to the Attorney-General or Solicitor-General, when prosecuting in person. In England there is no statutory provision on the point, but it is the practice there that, in all cases where the Attorney-General prosecutes, he shall have the right of reply, but here in Canada, it has been extended to a Queen's counsel acting on behalf of the Crown. As this House is aware, a question has arisen as to who are Queen's counsel; and I propose to settle the matter, so far as this particular part of the criminal procedure is concerned, by asking that the Statute may be amended by confining the right of reply to the Attorney-General, or Solicitor-General, when prosecuting in person. These are the amendments which I propose to make to the present Bill.

MR. MACDONNELL (Inverness): In my opinion that right to reply is given to the public prosecutor by virtue of his acting on behalf of the Crown, not simply as being Attorney-General. I think this right is allowed to the Crown and not to the Attorney-General in his individual capacity, and that, therefore, it should be allowed to all public prosecutors acting for the Crown.

Bill read the first time.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 15) To fix the rate of interest, and to prohibit usury in the Province of Quebec.—(Mr. Methot.)

BRITISH COLUMBIA—ADDITIONAL SUPREME COURT JUDGES.

RESOLUTIONS CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee, to consider certain proposed Resolutions, respecting the better Administration of Justice Act, 1878, of British Columbia, and to make provision for the salaries of two additional Judges of the Supreme Court of British Columbia.

(In the Committee.)

MR. McDONALD (Picton): It will be in the recollection of this Committee that at the last Session a similar resolution was adopted by this House, and a Bill founded thereon and passed through the House. For some reason the Bill failed to pass through the other branch of the Legislature. The Act for the better administration of justice in British Columbia not having been repealed, I ask the House to adopt this resolution, on which to found a Bill, providing for the salaries of two additional Judges. The subject was discussed during the debate on the Bill last Session. I will, therefore, only make one or two observations, showing the necessity which, in the opinion of the Legislature of British Columbia, exists for the addition which they ask to their Judicial staff. At present that Province has three Judges of the Supreme Court, with five County Court Judges, or Stipendiary Magistrates, who reside in different sections of the country and who were appointed at the union of that Province with the Dominion. It is the opinion of the first officer of the Crown in that Province that the mode of administration of justice, at present, is neither efficient nor effective, and it is proposed to add two Judges to the Supreme Court, making it five instead of three, who should be County Court Judges as well as Judges of the Supreme Court. The judicial strength of the Province, will then consist of five Judges of the Supreme Court who will exercise all the duties pertaining to their functions as Judges of the Supreme Court, and who will also be County Court Judges, within their several judicial districts, which are defined and set forth by another Act. The Act also provides that three of these Judges shall reside on the mainland, two residing in the city of Victoria in Vancouver Island. The question suggested last Session, on the discussion, was as to the expense incurred, the additional cost, as it was said, in the administration of justice in that Colony. I need scarcely repeat what I said then, in reference to that subject. The members of the Committee, who recollect that discussion, and were familiar with the history of that colony during 1870 and 1871, will recollect that the present Stipendiary Magistrates held office as Indian Agents, before the union of British Columbia with the Dominion. They were continued in office on terms specified in the Terms of Union, and on condition of being entitled to receive a superannuation, or retiring allowance, in the event of their ceasing to hold office. They were on retiring to receive two-thirds of their salaries. There were six Stipendiary Magistrates at the time of the Union. The Magistrate resident at New Westminster at that time has since died, and his place has not been filled, although at present there are five Stipendiary Magistrates receiving salaries. A comparison which has been submitted to me of the saving which the change would make shows a balance in its favour of $2,042. So that, as far as I am able to judge, the change would not entail any additional expense upon the Dominion, in the administration of justice in that Province. I am informed, however, and I have no doubt correctly, that the change would really occasion a very large saving in the travelling fees payable to the Judges of the Supreme Court, who go on circuit. As to the exact amount which would be saved, it was stated during last Session by some gentlemen opposite, and perhaps with some truth, that the Judges residing in the mainland districts would also be entitled to trifling fees in attending Courts. That may be, and still I fancy the saving which they would make in the ordinary administration of justice as County Court Judges would make a very material difference. The travelling expenses of the Judges in that Province for the last four or five years according to the memorandum I have received from the Auditor-General are as follows:—1875, $12,400; 1876, $11,836; 1877, $8,996; 1878, $8,900; 1879, $7,034. So that the expenses appear to be gradually decreasing, and, if the information on which I make the statement be correct, there could be little doubt that, so far as expense is concerned, the change is a desirable one. I presume the House will feel that the Legislature of British Columbia is more competent to determine the judicial requirements of that Province in the ordinary administration of justice than this House could possibly be. I therefore move the resolutions.

MR. BLAKE: I think we ought to consider the subject a little more fully before coming to the conclusion proposed by the hon. gentleman. The question was before the House last Session, and also before the other branch of the Legislature, and it received a long discussion in both branches. I suppose the hon. gentleman has perused the report of the views that were unanimously expressed in the Senate, by the members representing British Columbia, on the working of the judicial system in that country and its peculiar needs. They made remarks of extreme consequence to us in deciding whether we ought to take the course now proposed. I have always maintained, while I had the honour of sitting here, that we are not bound, simply because a Provincial Legislature proposes the appointment of a Judge, to provide a salary. I think any other view of our duties would result, in the nature of things, in a very expansive notion, on the part of the Local Legislature, as to what the judicial requirements were. When you find one body creating judgeships, whose occupants are to be paid, not by their creators, but by another body altogether, it is natural that the creating body, not being checked by the consideration of expense, should be extremely liberal; and it is necessary that the scale of judicial requirements should be carefully scanned by those who are to bear the burden of paying the officers. Therefore, I regard it as important that in every case we should assert our right to consider what the general scale of expenses for the administration of justice should be in the Province, and to decide whether, upon the whole, there are reasonable grounds for the addition proposed. At the same time, I cordially concur in some part of the remarks which were made, as I see by the report, by the hon. gentleman who leads the Government, and by the leader of the Government in the Senate last Session. I quite agree that, as a general rule, unless there are good reasons the other way, great weight ought to be attached to a proposition deliberately made by a Provincial Legislature. But this subject is one of peculiar significance. It has been pointed out before, and I repeat, that the expenses for the administration of justice in British Columbia are, relatively to its population, enormous and utterly disproportionate to those of any other Province; and I say that, even when due regard is had to the circumstances that a reduction in numbers does not proportionately reduce the cost, and that the area of British Columbia is large, and the difficulty of access to some portions of that Province are great, nevertheless, all said and done, it is a most serious thing that the expense we are called upon to provide in British Columbia, for a judicial staff for a population of between 10,000 and 15,000 whites approximates nearly to that for the judicial staffs in the Maritime Provinces, in each of which there is relatively an infinitely larger population. Now, the comparison of cost the hon. gentleman has made, if it were indeed a fair comparison, would entirely break the force of what I have just been saying, because the hon. gentleman contends that the true result of this change will be, to effect a considerable saving. But the process by which the hon. gentleman has reached that result is very peculiar. It was conceded, last Session, that there would be an increase in salary, though it would be but a moderate increase of between $3,000 and $4,000, but the hon. gentleman, for the purposes of his argument, and in order to produce this saving, has been pleased to raise the ghost of the deceased Judge Bushby, who departed this life five or six years ago, who has never been replaced, and for a successor for whom no need was found until it was required in order to found an argument before the Committee this afternoon. It is not pretended, so far as I know, that there will be any necessity for replacing that County Court Judge supposing this measure does not pass. It was during my tenure of office that the subject first came under consideration. I was not able to advise Parliament that a case had been made out for the replacement of that Judge. It appeared to me, from the best consideration I could give the subject, that there was no occasion for it, and that view was adopted; and, although during one or two years a vote was asked, it was only asked conditionally, in case it should be necessary to replace the Judge, but he never was replaced. In the comparison that the hon. gentleman has made, I desire to introduce another element which I think is only reasonable. While it is to be admitted that, in reference to County Court Judges, there has been a diminution in salaries, though not in travelling expenses, owing to the death of this Judge, it is to be remembered that, upon the occasion of Confederation, there was an addition to the Supreme Court. That was composed of two Judges, but upon the suggestion, if I remember rightly, of the

hon. gentleman then holding the office of Minister of Justice, and now leading the Government, and who thought that terrible consequences would ensue if there were only two Judges in any Province, an additional Judge was given to British Columbia, and also to Manitoba, so that in case of a division of opinion there might be a decision. The staff, then, is left at its original point as at Confederation, though at an increased cost. Now, I maintain, no strong reasons have been given to induce us to agree to this change. The hon. gentleman has alluded to the difficulty arising from the extended area of the Province. In the interior of the Province, to which it is difficult to obtain access, there are comparatively small fluctuating and changing populations engaged in mining industries, and it is, of course, necessary that there should be some means of administering justice amongst those people. But I do not think the proposed measure, which is one partly of centralisation, because a fewer number of Judges is proposed, is calculated to grapple with the difficulty. I think that to have Judges of an inferior grade who can travel cheaper, and who will reside nearer the centres of action, will be found to be more satisfactory to the people, and more economical to the country. I think that the three Supreme Court Judges and the five County Court Judges are, if properly placed, adequate, notwithstanding the distances which they are obliged to travel, efficiently to administer justice in British Columbia. The relatively small increase—for I admit that the increase is relatively small—will not be productive of increased efficiency. You are pensioning five Judges who have administered such justice as is required satisfactorily in the remoter parts of that community in the smaller classes of cases; you are replacing these five with two new ones, and I do not believe this will give equal satisfaction, on the contrary, you will soon be called on for more Judges. It may be considered rather impertinent for a member of this House to be setting up his wisdom against that of the Legislature of British Columbia, but I am not speaking on my own judgment alone, though I gave the general question much consideration when in office; I am stating very shortly the view that was unanimously taken by the representatives of British Columbia in the other branch of Parliament. The Hon. Senator Cornwall, and two other gentlemen from British Columbia, discussed this question there, and they pointed out that the proposed changes would not give equal satisfaction to the present system, that there would be greater difficulty than now in getting justice administered expeditiously, and they insinuated what I, for one, should never have dared to insinuate, that the object of this Bill, which was based upon a request of the Legislature of British Columbia, was to make two places which must be necessarily filled by Provincial politicians. Such was the view which was taken by the representatives of that Province in the Senate, of the objects and motives which had inspired that legislation. With reference to the travelling expenses, they have been cut down. I found, when in office, that a course had been adopted which I thought peculiar. First of all, according to the old system, the Judges, had been paid travelling allowances, which covered all their travelling expenses, and a per diem allowance besides. But, shortly after the accession to office of a learned Judge, appointed by the hon. gentleman opposite, it was suggested that the Judges, as in the older Provinces, should receive a fixed circuit allowance of $100, but not as in these Provinces in a substitutionary sense. The arrangement was that they should be paid the old travelling expenses and allowance, and that they should receive, in addition, that which represented the travelling expenses in the older Provinces. By that process the expenses, always too large, were considerably increased. Another example of the same mischief to which I have referred, as flowing from the creation by one Legislature of expenses to be provided by another Legislature, was in reference to the circuits ordered by the Local body. We found an Act of the Legislature ordering a circuit in a remote part of the country the travelling expenses of which, judging from experience, would reach $2,500, and on which there would be perhaps one, perhaps no case tried. We resisted as far as we could such legislation as that, and indicated in very clear language that it was impossible that the administration of justice should be conducted on such an expensive scale. I mention these things in order to show how it happens that the travelling expenses of 1878 were so much less than they had been in former years, and why it is that we are not to expect that it will continue so low if we reduce the number of Judges, and consequently increase the amount of travelling they will have to do. Believing that this measure is not in the true interests of the people of British Columbia, or of Canada; and agreeing with the observations made by the representatives from that Province in the other branch of the Legislature, having formed the opinion that the supposed increased expenditure will not really represent the measure of the increase, both by reason of the amount of travelling expenses, and because we will presently be called on to appoint men to fill the places of those whom we are displacing to-day, I have thought it right to make this statement to the House. I do not propose personally to ask the House to divide at this stage of the resolutions, but I did not think it was fit that they should pass through Committee without reference to the considerations which were cogent enough to induce the other House last year to reject this Bill and, in my opinion, are sufficiently cogent to require us to pause before we pass it this year.

MR. ANGLIN: I was one of those who last year opposed this measure, because I could not see, nor could I be satisfied by any arguments produced on the other side, that this increase in the Judiciary was necessary to British Columbia. I was rather inclined to regard with suspicion the theory then propounded, that, because the Local Legislature chose to provide for an increase in the Judiciary, we must supplement their action in this House. The older members of this House must recollect that, when the Union with British Columbia took place, there was some discussion with regard to a number of gentlemen then known, I believe, as Police Magistrates. It was shown then that it would be better to retain those gentlemen in the positions they occupied, although it was said some of them were not lawyers at all, than to pension them off, as was provided for by the Resolutions of Union. It is now proposed to have two additional Supreme Court Judges. If it is necessary to have five Judges now, because of the extent of territory, it will be found difficult by-and-bye to have those duties discharged by means of only two additional Judges. The territory is a very extensive one, and requires a larger number of Judges, in proportion to its population, than any of the older Provinces. My impression last year was, and it is the same this year, that the present staff, in that Province, should be amply sufficient for all the work it is possible they may be called upon to do. Last year I spoke of the extraordinary amount which was paid to Judges in that Province for travelling expenses, and, without having consulted the books, I ventured to say that they were about as large as the salaries. That was then laughed at on the other side of the House, as entirely unwarranted by the facts, but I think the statement read this afternoon by the hon. the Minister of Justice, proves that I was nearly correct. A few years ago those charges amounted to a great many thousand dollars every year. How they have been reduced in these later years, whether it is that the Judges formerly overcharged, or made journeys entirely unnecessary, or whether it is that the amount of work in the Province has been reduced, and, therefore, that they are no longer called upon to hold Courts so frequently in the remote districts, as in former times, we are left entirely to conjecture. Now, I do not believe that under the provisions of this Bill any saving will be effected. The Judges to be superseded will descend into private life, upon large retiring allowances. They are a number of gentlemen, who, for some years past, have been rendering services of more or less value, and you are endeavouring to supply their places by appointing a number of Supreme Court Judges, who will have to discharge in that country, not only such duties as the Judges of that rank perform in the other Provinces, but also, to some extent, the duties of Police Magistrates. I do not know why we should provide for the performance of the duties of Police Magistrates in that Province, any more than in any other Province of the Dominion. The other Provinces are required to provide the salaries for Police Magistrates. I believe, by and by, the Judges will themselves desire to be relieved of the discharge of those duties, and that a measure will be brought into this Parliament for that purpose.

MR. ANGLIN.

MR. DECOSMOS: Will the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) explain what the police duties may be, that the Judges may have to perform?

MR. ANGLIN: I understand that those were Police Magistrates who tried ordinary cases of crime, such as theft, assault and battery, and the use of abusive language, if that is a criminal offence in British Columbia, and prosecuted preliminary enquiries in cases of a more serious character. These are merely the duties performed by Police Magistrates in various parts of the country. Whether these Police Magistrates in British Columbia have a right to try men charged with higher offences, not capital, and questions affecting property, I am not prepared to say. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman can enlighten us on this point. Of these Police Magistrates some were not even lawyers. Nevertheless they performed their duties to the general satisfaction of the country, administering, I suppose, a rough, even-handed justice. It is as a substitution for these gentleman that we are asked to create additional Judges of the Supreme Court. I do not think it is desirable that we should require the Judges of that Court to discharge duties of this kind. I do not believe that, if they were called upon to discharge those duties, they would be discharged very efficiently. The argument that we are to save any money by this proceeding, I think, has been proved by the hon. member for West Durham to be delusive. The Bill was passed last year, notwithstanding some opposition from this side of the House. I presume the resolutions will now pass; but, having opposed the scheme last year, because I believed it uncalled for, I feel it my duty to repeat briefly the objection I then made.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I acknowledge there is a great deal in the arguments used by the hon. member for West Durham, and by the hon. member who has just spoken. But, as has been said before, it is very difficult indeed for the Federal Parliament to decide, when a wish is expressed by the Legislature of any Province, that it should be disregarded. The constitution, organisation and maintenance of the Courts are left to the Provincial Legislatures. The costs and responsibility for the administration of justice, excepting the salaries of the Superior Court Judges, are thrown upon the different Provinces, whose Governments are responsible for their peace and good government. So that, when a Provincial Legislature passes an Act, declaring that an additional number of Judges is required for the due administration of justice, it is incurring a great responsibility for the Federal Parliament and Government to say: You do not want them; you can administer justice and keep the peace of the land without them, and therefore we refuse to appoint them. As a general rule, I think we may safely trust to the discretion of the Provincial Legislatures in this regard. They have their own responsibility, and must know that, in putting additional burdens on the Treasury of the Dominion, they are increasing the burdens of their own people. Of course, I quite understand the answer that will be given is, that the immediate advantage there of the salaries of the appointees will overcome, perhaps, the reluctance of the people in the Province, to pay their share of the burden.

MR. BLAKE: Some of the Provinces do not pay into, in the same proportion as they receive from, the general Treasury.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That may be; but I do not know that, every time a question arises as to whether an additional Judge should be appointed in any Province, we can enter into the question of the amount of its contributions to the Treasury of the Dominion. I do not think we ought to import that question into this discussion.

MR. BLAKE: I was not importing it in that sense, but as giving an additional reason why some Local Legislatures should be more careful in regard to expenditures of this kind. The right hon. gentleman said the people of British Columbia, would be putting their hands into their own pockets; but sometimes people put them into other people's pockets.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: No doubt such considerations should not be overlooked. The burden of the administration of justice is thrown on the Provincial Legislatures; and when such powers are given them exclusively, we having no right to interfere with their powers, it is assuming a very great responsibility for us to say: Although you declare certain Judges are wanted, and have passed an Act constituting a particular Court, we refuse you the means required to carry that policy into effect. I quite understand we are not obliged to grant the salaries; and, if it was proved to the consciousness of the House that, beyond a doubt, the Legislature of any Province had made appointments solely for the purpose of creating new offices, and getting the advantage of them in the expenditure of the salaries, we should be justified, on reasonable evidence that that was the design of the Legislature, in refusing to gratify that wish and motive. But it is not suggested here that that is the case. It is quite true that the white population in British Columbia is not very large as yet; but there is a large Indian population, some 50,000 souls.

MR. MILLS: About 30,000.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is also a disputed point; but say 30,000 besides whites. They are scattered over that "Sea of Mountains"—I beg the pardon of the hon. member for Vancouver for using that expression—living at isolated points, and the administration must extend to them, as well as to the white population. The Indian criminal must be tried exactly in the same way as the white. It is a country of magnificent distances, and therefore it may be necessary for the Judges to make long and difficult journeys; and I presume the Legislature of British Columbia thought it was necessary to increase the number of Superior Court Judges, and scatter them over that country, for the purpose of more conveniently and speedily bringing offenders to justice. The hon. member for Gloucester thinks that Superior Court Judges would not efficiently perform their duty in small cases. I do not think there is any fear of that, but that they would perform small and great with equal zeal and efficiency. In Manitoba, the Judges hold small as well as large Courts in the administration of summary justice. The reason why the Government has brought this proposal down again, is this: The Act is on the Statute-book, and we think it is our bounden duty, as there is no evidence that the Legislature of British Columbia acted through any improper motive, or any other motive than duty to the Province, in the organisation of Courts of Justice, not to refuse it, by saying they were altogether mistaken, and thereupon refusing the salaries required. I would have been well pleased had that Legislature postponed this legislation. I might personally think that, with the present number of Superior Court and County Court Judges, the demands of justice in that Province might be fairly met; but I do not know that I have a right, in the absence of all evidence that the Legislature was wrong, to assume the responsibility of saying that, although in the exercise of its Constitutional right it declared two additional Judges were wanted, it should not be granted the means for the payment of their salaries.

MR. MILLS: The right hon. gentleman has taken a somewhat different view on this from that which he expressed on another question lately. He thinks the House must assume that the British Columbia Government acted properly, unless it can be shown it acted improperly in this matter; I think the burden of proof lies the other way. I think the House is exercising an independent power; it has undertaken to vote this money, and when the hon. gentleman asks us to provide for the payment of additional Judges, on him devolves the responsibility of showing that additional Judges are necessary. Certainly, when County Courts were wanted in Nova Scotia, he did not take exactly the same view as to the functions and duty of the House in the appointment of Judges, and in providing for their salaries, as on the present occasion. I remember that, then, the friends of the hon. gentleman in the other House rejected the proposal to provide for the payment of the Judges in a Court which the people of Nova Scotia thought necessary for the due administration of justice. Before the House is called upon to provide for the payment of two additional Judges for a Province containing less than 40,000 people, all told—a population which, in Ontario, has justice administered by a single Judge, in nearly all civil cases—the hon. gentleman should prove conclusively to the House that the Judges of the present Courts are inadequate to the discharge of the duties devolving upon them. That has not been attempted. He should have called upon the Provincial authorities for proof that the Judges were overworked and needed help.

There should have been no difficulty in getting information to convince the House that this provision is necessary. But the right hon. gentleman said he, himself, was not convinced, but was rather inclined to think that the appointments are not necessary, and that the only protection which the country had, and has against unnecessary demands is that the cost of such Courts would devolve exclusively upon the people of the Province. He has not undertaken to show that the appointment of these Judges would impose any additional burdens on the people of British Columbia or what amount of the existing burdens in the administration of justice they bear in connection with their Courts. All this would have been useful and proper, and would have enabled members to deal intelligently with this question. The hon. gentleman should give us this information before asking us to vote the money required. He has been anxious, of late, to send matters of this sort to Committees. It seems to me, therefore, that the hon. gentleman should appoint a Committee to investigate this question and so obtain the information necessary to enable the House to arrive at an intelligent conclusion on this proposition.

MR. THOMPSON (Cariboo): When this subject came before the House last year, I gave the reasons which I thought justified me in supporting the Bill. I then stated that the County Court Judges, to the best of my knowledge, had given satisfaction—at least in the portions of the country with which I am acquainted—by their conduct, but that the general opinion of the people of British Columbia was in favour of the proposed change. I thought it my duty to support the Bill, more especially as it would have the effect of more expeditiously administering justice throughout the country, at the same time lessening its expense, as regards the detention of prisoners before trial, and the travelling expenses of Judges, constables and witnesses. The long periods during which prisoners have been detained, awaiting trial, have proved a serious detriment to the Province, and I think the House will agree with me that this evil should be remedied. Prisoners have been kept from nine to twelve months in jail, awaiting trial, and afterwards acquitted. Why were they detained so long? Simply to economise the operations of the Supreme Court, which was limited to the holding of one circuit per annum, instead of two, in the country parts. If an offence was committed in the month of November, prisoners accused thereof were obliged to be in jail, sometimes fettered on account of there not being officers to watch them, for ten or eleven months, until the Chief Justice, or one of the other Judges, came around to hold the Court of Assize, and this was done at the expense of the Province. In one case five prisoners were imprisoned for nearly a year, and at the end of that time three of them were acquitted. The hon. member for Gloucester has made some statements, which in my opinion need correction. He has said, for one thing, that County Court Judges, whom it is now intended to supersede, performed the duties of Magistrates. It is true they did perform that duty before Confederation, but since then they have refused to perform such duties, in cases where Justices of the Peace were within a distance of a hundred miles, who could be brought to adjudicate upon them. In some cases it was impossible for the County Court Judges to adjudicate upon them. In cases of infringement of the law prohibiting the sale of liquor to Indians, an appeal is provided for from two Justices of the Peace to a County Court Judge. The County Court Judges cannot, consequently, hear cases of that sort. The hon. member for Gloucester has also stated that the expenses of travelling of our Judges are nearly equal to their salaries. It is true, he stated that he made that statement without having looked into the matter closely, but when he comes to make an assertion of that kind he should first scrutinise the Public Accounts, which show that, out of $85,000 paid to our Judges only $7,000 is charged to travelling expenses. The member for West Durham has laid great stress upon the argument which was brought forward in the Senate last year, that the County Court Judges were acting as Indian Commissioners, as Gold Commissioners, and as Police Magistrates. As I said before, they have absolutely refused to attend to any of these duties with the exception of that of Gold Commissioner, which was thrust upon them against their will by the Local Government, who made the duties of the Gold Commissioners part of those of the Judges of the County Court. I think, Sir, the House will see that this measure will greatly reduce the expenditure of the Province in maintaining prisoners, paying the expenses of the witnesses, constables, etc. I objected to the Bill last Session because no provision was made, stating the particular localities in which these new Judges should reside, but an additional law having been passed by the Legislature of British Columbia defining those localities, I think that it will be a benefit, not only to the Dominion at large, but also to British Columbia, if we accede to the request of the people of that Province, and provide the salaries which are requisite for the payment of the proposed new Judges.

MR. BLAKE: The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has asked for information from the hon. the Minister of Justice. I am aware that arrangements were made some years ago for obtaining returns of the cases tried, and the amounts involved in the British Columbia circuits. I suppose the hon. gentleman will have no objection to bring these returns down before the second stage of the measure, so that we may see what work is done by these Judges. I have reason to believe our position will be strengthened by these papers.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): We shall be very glad to bring down the information the hon. gentleman desires.

MR. DECOSMOS: Whenever this question has come up before this House—the making provision for improving the judicial machinery of our Province—some members have taken occasion to question the propriety of it. This has usually proceeded from certain hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. It might be well, I take it, if certain hon. gentlemen who are not acquainted with the judicial system of British Columbia, would devote a few moments to the matter in order that they might understand the judicial system of our Province. In the first place, before the creation of the colony of Vancouver Island, Civil and Criminal cases were to be tried before the Courts of Upper Canada, under certain Acts passed in the reigns of George the Third and George the Fourth. When Vancouver Island was created a Colony, an Imperial Act was passed, making provision for the administration of justice within it. Subsequently, an Order in Council was passed, creating a Supreme Court of Civil Justice in Vancouver Island; and in connection with that Order a Court of Inferior Jurisdiction was established, which in some degree was like the County Court systems of England. That system continued from the year 1849, the date of the organisation of the Colony, down to 1866. The present Chief Justice of Trinidad was at one time Chief Justice of Vancouver Island, and also administered in all cases in the Court of Inferior Jurisdiction. On the mainland of the Province, however, in 1858, another Colony, known as British Columbia, was created; and in that other Colony a Supreme Court with Civil and Criminal jurisdiction was established. Later the County Court system of England was adopted with such modifications as were necessary to make it adaptable to the circumstances of the new Province. The Supreme Court of British Columbia on the mainland existed for a long time afterwards. In 1866, Vancouver Island and British Columbia were united into one Colony bearing the name of the latter. After the Union, the Supreme Courts of the united Colonies were merged into one. The County Courts through the country have continued from the time they were started down to the present moment. The necessity of changing the existing judicial machinery did not grow, as the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) intimated, out of the desire to provide judgeships for two lawyers in the Legislative Assembly. At the time the Act for the better Administration of Justice was passed, only one lawyer held a seat in the Assembly, and he is the only one now in that body. Hence the statement of the hon. member for West Durham that there were two lawyers in the Provincial House is a mistake. I believe also, in relation to one gentleman in the Local Assembly, that he has no wish ever to sit upon the Bench in British Columbia. That sets at rest for once, and I hope for ever and all time, the statements made by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake). The real object of the members of the Law Society in British Columbia, in asking for a change in the judicial machinery was this: they wished to see new machinery established in order that litigants before the Courts through the Province would have justice done them promptly, cheaply, and in accordance with the law. It is their belief, and I speak from personal knowledge and personal intercourse with them, that the judicial system in British Columbia does not secure justice to the people in Civil cases. And as far as Criminal cases are concerned, they maintain that there is great delay in the administration of justice. But there is no wish that the Provincial Government should impose undue burdens on the Dominion Government. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) has said that one body may impose burdens that another has to pay; in other words, that no Province should change the constitution of its Courts, and entail increased expense on the Dominion. There is another side to this question, and it is this: The Dominion, by refusing reciprocal legislation, may entail heavy and inordinate expense on a Province, with the loss of prompt and equal justice. Now, I ask whether the Dominion Government—if it refused to agree to the Act which is here proposed as a corollary to the Better Administration of Justice Act of Columbia, and as a remedy for the evil of prisoners lying a twelve-month in jail—would not, by that means, be imposing additional expense on the Province? I will cite a singular instance in illustration of my argument. In Cariboo, a year or so ago, there were four prisoners charged with felony, and after remaining, so I am informed, in jail twelve months, three of them were acquitted as innocent men. Whereas, if a Supreme Court Judge had been located there, no such evil could have occurred. Another remarkable instance of the evils of our present judicial system arose recently. Unfortunately, late last autumn, a number of young men in the southern section of British Columbia committed several murders. Now, what had the Provincial Government to do in this matter? It had to send a posse to capture these men; and, as there was no Judge of Assize within 350 miles of the place where these men were captured, these five or six young men had to be conducted by a posse of guards all the way down to New Westminster, which is about 250 miles from the scene of the murders. When you take into consideration that, in the trials of these young men, the witnesses have to be brought 250 miles also, there will be a large additional expense. When the whole expense attendant upon the capture, the pay of the guards, the cost of transportation, the expenses of witnesses, and charges at the trial shall have been settled, then, in all probability, Columbia will have to pay about $7,000 for the expenses of this single case alone. Had the proposed judicial machinery been in existence, there would have been a Judge at Kamloops, and the expenses of carrying these men to New Westminster, and the other heavy expenses connected with the trial would not have been rendered necessary. They would have been carried to the jail at Kamloops and speedy justice would have been done. One of the sources of expense in British Columbia, in connection with criminal justice, is the Indian population. One year, I recollect the expenses amounted to some $70,000. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) has said that the expenses of the administration of justice in Columbia were, relatively, enormous in proportion to the population, as compared with the other Provinces. The hon. member for West Durham is always clamouring about the small population of Columbia. Allow me to state to this House that, if Ontario, with its admitted population of two millions, paid the same rate per capita as the Province of British Columbia does, the Dominion Treasury would receive from Ontario $40,000,000 a year. I ask, therefore, whether such language as that used by the hon. member can be regarded as becoming in him or as reflecting honour on this country? But to return to our judicial machinery. We require judicial machinery adapted to the great extent of the Province. A few years ago, I employed an engineer to estimate its area in square miles, and he made the Province contain 357,000 square miles. Victoria is situated a little south of the 49th parallel. On the 59th parallel, we have a settlement composed of miners and traders and some County Court machinery, and that is 10 degrees, or about 700 miles nearly, north of Victoria, without considering the sinuosities of the route that makes the travelled route about 1,100 miles. We have a mining settlement there that is paying a very considerable sum directly or indirectly into the Treasury of this Dominion.

Now, is it a supposable case that two or three Justices living in Victoria can attend to the Civil and Criminal duties of such a remote portion of the Province as that? It would be something like Judges located at Sarnia, discharging their ordinary civil and criminal duties at Cape Breton, without such rapid facilities of transportation. And this has to be done where there is no railway by which they can approach that settlement. Take again the case of Cariboo: There is no railway connecting Cariboo with Victoria, from which it is distant some 600 miles. Is it to be supposed that a Judge in Victoria could attend to the legal business in Cariboo? or that annual circuits is all that is required? Then there is Kootenay at the extreme south-eastern boundary, 600 miles away in another direction. We might just as well take the Judges from Ottawa here to hold Court at Fort William, as to require them to go from Victoria to that remote settlement. We now come to the question of expense. I am one of those who believe that expense ought not to be regarded as the chief point. I believe that the securing of the proper administration of justice in the Province is the main point. I state frankly that I believe that it will cost more to pay for the new machinery than it does for that now existing. The increased cost, however, will not in my judgment exceed a few thousand dollars, if the Government employ the five Stipendiary Magistrates, who act as County Court Judges, in other branches of public services. I can scarcely imagine how the Government overlooked, in the appointment last year of a gentleman to the North-West as Indian Commissioner, the pressing necessity of providing employment for Stipendiary Magistrates so as to make pensions unnecessary. The Government knew that a change must shortly take place in the Province, and here was an appointment that might have been filled by one of the Magistrates who had had a large experience in governing Indians. Mr. O'Rielly, one of the Stipendiary Magistrates, has been 20 years in the public service of the country and his large experience in the administration of the law renders him a more suitable person to send to the North-West to discharge the duties of that office than a member of this House. In that case, a pension might have been saved. Then, there is Mr. Ball, another Stipendiary Magistrate who would have been a suitable person to fill the office to which Mr. Trutch has been appointed, so far as it may be connected with Dominion lands in Columbia. If such were done, another pension might be saved. There are three others who might be provided for in connection with the Indian Department of the Province or elsewhere. If such were the policy of the Government, the increased expense of the proposed machinery would be very small. The hon. member for Gloucester alluded to the Judges doing police duty. I believe, however, the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Thompson) has satisfied the hon. gentleman's qualms of conscience on that point. I have only to state that the prevailing feeling, I believe, in the Province is largely in favour of the proposed change in the judicial system. There may be those who honestly entertain a different view, but the prevailing feeling in the Province is that we must have a change. I trust there will be no failure in connection with this measure when it is sent to the Upper House. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) laid great stress on the speeches of three hon. gentlemen in the Upper House. Now, with respect to one of those gentlemen, it is alleged that he preferred a County Court judgeship to his seat in the Senate, and that that may have influenced, in some measure, his opposition to the Bill last Session. From the high character of that hon. gentleman, one might conclude that his opposition to the Bill last Session may be attributable to his unbiassed belief that a change in our judicial machinery was undesirable. Another hon. gentleman in that body may have, from a personal feeling in favour of the present Justices, opposed the Bill. Of the third Senator, it is unnecessary now to enquire why he opposed the measure. I hope that this House will see that the Bill is pushed through, and that the Government will see that competent lawyers are sent to the Province of Columbia, or, what I would prefer, that some of our own Bar be taken to fill the two seats on the Supreme Court Bench. But, if otherwise, let them be lawyers of the highest legal training.

MR. DECOSMOS.

MR. BUNSTER: This is one of the most important measures, in so far as British Columbia is concerned, that has come before this House, always excepting that for the construction of the Pacific Railway; and I will try to disabuse the impression with regard to it tried to be made on this House by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake). The cause of the hon. gentleman's opposition to the Bill is as plain to me as A B C. When he looks at the Treasury Benches, and sees who now sit there, he knows very well that he has no chance himself to be one of the new Judges—hence his disgust and opposition. Do you suppose that we would have him as one of our Judges? No, Mr. Chairman; and I hope that the Government of the day will never cause British Columbia to suffer under such an infliction. We do not want men of his calibre. Under the new system there are to be two additional Judges at a small salary of $4,000 each; and, if we take into consideration the saving of expense on the existing system we shall find that the actual facts and figures will show a saving of $2,245 in favour of the proposed change. These facts and figures cannot be disputed. And then take into consideration the injustice done to our citizens for want of a proper Judiciary, particularly at Nanaimo and in remote districts. Not many years ago a riot was reported to have taken place in one of the mining districts, but it appears that no riot had taken place at all, the miners had made no threats, nor had they assumed a riotous character; however the incapable Magistrate—a Mr. Spalding—actually wrote a demand for a man-of-war to come to his assistance. The miners who were said to have been rioting never disobeyed the officers of the law, but one of them that had a sick child in the house asked for further time, so as not to take his child and the mother out into the streets, which was refused, and they were dragged down like slaves to Victoria, and, if they had not had respectable men to bail them out, they would have been consigned to a dungeon. Do you call that human? Is that justice? I think not. The sooner we have a change the better; we have wanted a change for years, and at last the Government has given us a hearing, notwithstanding the opposition of the hon.

member for West Durham. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) spoke of British Columbia in an abusive way.

AN HON. MEMBER: No, no.

MR. BUNSTER: I have so got it down in my notes. He said very distinctly that we were in the habit of using strong language. I claim that, notwithstanding constant annoyance and irritation, the people of British Columbia do not use abusive language—they have been very mild.

MR. ANGLIN: The hon. gentleman has misunderstood me entirely. In enumerating the offences coming under the jurisdiction of the Police Magistrate, I spoke of abusive language, and I added "if abusive language is criminal in British Columbia." I did not say that anyone from British Columbia was abusive in this House or anywhere else.

MR. BUNSTER: Oh, well, that is a different thing. I wish I could only find language to put this case properly; but, as I feel it will be done best by the present Government, I leave it in their hands. It has been said that gentlemen in our Local Legislature are anxious to be made Judges. All I can say is that the gentlemen connected with our Local Legislature have all been highly honourable men. I may say that, if our citizens had not been peaceable, the ignorance of our Judges might have caused bloodshed. There is therefore all the more reason for a change. The hon. the Minister of Justice, however, has taken hold of this matter in the right spirit, and I shall be perfectly satisfied with the result.

MR. BOULTBEE: I rise with some little reluctance; but I think that the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Bunster) should scarcely have a place in this House, unless we consider that he comes from that far-off land in the west, where thoughts break out in language more plain than polite. I think that the hon. gentleman should scarcely have attributed the opposition and remarks of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) to disappointed ambition, and I scarcely think that the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver were founded on truth, for I believe that, if the hon. member for West Durham were desirous of being appointed, the present Government would appoint him. Although the Government would be sorry to lose the benefit of his legal knowledge and general ability here, yet it is possible that he might have the appointment, if he wishes to be appointed a Judge in British Columbia, and, I might say, to less able men it might be an object to be made a Judge in that land. Perhaps it would be an object of ambition to many a member of the Bar to be made a Judge in British Columbia, especially when their enlarged views as to mileage in that Province are considered. I may say that, perhaps, in considering the position of British Columbia, members of the Opposition have treated the question too much in a pecuniary light. If British Columbia is to be a respectable and important part of the Confederation, there is nothing more important than to provide her with an efficient Judiciary. British Columbia, though small in population, is an important portion of this Confederation, and it is not well, when her interests come up for discussion in this House, that we should deprecate the amount of money to be spent on her, because her population is small. We cannot expect to see her population increase and become more intelligent, wealthy and great, and thus more and more influential as a part of this Confederation, unless we afford them proper means for the due execution of the laws.

1. Resolved, That whereas, by an Act passed by the Legislative Assembly of the Province of British Columbia, in the year 1878, and known as the Better Administration of Justice Act, 1878, provision is made for the appointment of two Judges of the Supreme Court of British Columbia in addition to the number of Judges now authorized to be appointed to that Court, it is expedient to make provision for the salaries of such additional Judges.

2. Resolved, That the salary of each of the said two additional Judges of the Supreme Court of British Columbia shall be $4,000, payable out of any moneys forming part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.—(Mr. McDonald, Pictou.)

RELIEF OF THE DISTRESS IN IRELAND.

VOTE OF CREDIT.

House resolved itself into Committee, to take into consideration the gracious Message of His Excellency the Governor-General on the subject of the relief of the distress in Ireland.

(In the Committee.)

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: After the discussion which took place on the Address, I do not think it necessary to occupy the Committee with many remarks. We all know, and we are sorry to know, that our fellow-countrymen in Ireland are suffering great distress, and, in the language of His Excellency, we ought to show our sympathy with them on account of that distress, by contributing towards its relief. In submitting this matter to Parliament, and this Committee, the Government had to consider in the first place the sum which ought to be contributed, and, after due consideration, $100,000, it was thought, would be a substantial evidence of our sympathy and at the same time not unduly press upon our own people or in any way obstruct or diminish the private charity which is happily going on throughout the Dominion. If we gave a much larger sum, the charity of private persons might be stopped, for they might very reasonably say that the Government of the Dominion had given sufficient without anything being necessary from themselves. I move—and I would ask the hon. member for Lambton to second the motion—that there be granted to Her Majesty $100,000, to enable her to aid, to that extent, in the relief of the distress under which so many of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland are now suffering.

MR. MACKENZIE: Before seconding the resolution, I desire to ask the hon. gentleman in what way the money is to be applied?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I would state that the intention of the Government is to do as we did with regard to our contribution in 1854, to relieve the wounded in the Crimean War: that is, to transmit the money to the hon. the Secretary of State for the Colonies, to be applied by Her Majesty's Imperial Government for the purpose for which it was voted.

MR. ANGLIN: I was led, by the language of the Speech, to expect that a larger amount than this would have been voted for the relief of Ireland by this Parliament. We are asked to give, not out of our poverty, but out of our abundance, for the relief of people, hundreds of thousands of whom have, for many weeks, been on the very verge of starvation, and who are to-day suffering from the want of food. It was to be the gift of a great nation, stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific, to another nation forming part of the same Empire, whose people are the kith and kin of a large number of the people of this Dominion, and for whom we feel all the sympathy we possibly could feel for a kindred suffering people. I had hoped that the amount mentioned by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Jones) of £50,000 sterling—would possibly have been the amount proposed by the Government—an amount not too great for this Dominion to subscribe, and not too large for such a purpose; scarcely commensurate, indeed, with the extent of the distress which it is intended to relieve. The amount now proposed is handsome enough in itself but it is small for so great a country, being only two and a half cents per head of the population of Canada. I did not rise to complain of the amount; it would be ungracious to complain of it. As one who, though a Canadian, still regards himself as an Irishman, it would be ungrateful to complain of any gift that is graciously offered, under the circumstances, to the sufferers in Ireland. It is a handsome gift and it is intended to be, no doubt, a generous gift. But more even for the sake of Canada itself, than for the sake of the suffering in Ireland, I regret the amount is not larger. I would like it to be an amount of which I could boast, and to which I could point as an evidence not of the mere kindly feeling, but of generosity and noble munificence of the people of Canada, as represented in this Parliament. With regard to the proposed mode of disposing of this amount, perhaps it is scarcely to be objected to. The Government perhaps think that the only course open to them is to send the amount to Her Majesty's Secretary of State. I must, however, express my own regret that the right hon. the Premier did not see his way to send this amount, say to the Mansion House Committee in the city of Dublin. There are jealousies, there are suspicions, there are some doubts expressed as to the mode and manner in which funds already subscribed to various committees in Ireland have been distributed. I do not pretend to say that there is any foundation in fact for any of these doubts, but I think it would have rendered this contribution all the more acceptable, and have shown more consideration for the feelings and wishes of the people, if we had resolved to send the subscription to the body which possesses the entire confidence of a very large number of the people of that country, composed as it is of some of the first men in Ireland. Unfortunately the British Government has not shown much alacrity in dealing with this terrible famine; they have not shown, at all events, any very great eagerness to save the people from hunger and from death. They talked of undertaking some public works. They have talked of making other provisions which by and-by may relieve some thousands of people, but months have passed away since it first became known that the people were starving to death, and up to this day I doubt if one thousand, at all events if ten thousand, of all the suffering people have received the slightest relief, because of any action taken by the British Government. Misunderstanding as to the state of the facts in the first instance stood in the way, and also an unwillingness to admit even to themselves the horrible fact that large numbers of people were dying of hunger in a country so near that the cries of the famine-stricken must almost reach the Throne. When the existence of widespread famine too large to be denied covered the land, the trammels of red tape caused delay. Whatever the reasons were, we know that the people of Ireland, and Irishmen everywhere throughout the world, are complaining to-day, because the British Government have not shown the promptitude in dealing with this terrible affliction which it was their duty to exhibit. They have been slow and remiss. It is for this reason, amongst others, that I regret to find the right hon. gentleman has thought it his duty to follow what is perhaps strictly the official course in this matter, and to transmit this sum to the Secretary of State for the Colonies. But I may venture to suggest, perhaps without impropriety, that it should be accompanied, at all events, by the suggestion that it should be paid over at once to the Mansion House Committee, which has the machinery now actually in existence for the purpose of distributing relief, and with respect to whose distribution of contributions already made, there is, I believe, no well founded cause of complaint. As an Irishman, I return my thanks, on behalf of my suffering fellow countrymen, to the gentlemen of other nationalities in this House, for their generosity and kind feeling. If the First Minister had proposed a larger amount, I am sure there would have been no objection, and I believe he would have given more satisfaction to the great majority of the members of this House, and the great majority of the people of this country, but for what is now proposed, I again offer my heart-felt thanks, and the thanks of all my fellow-countrymen.

Mr. WRIGHT: I think many members of this House will join in the expressions of regret of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), that the Government did not see its way clear to give a larger sum in aid of our suffering friends in Ireland; but one must remember that we have a great many poor in our own midst, and that in Canada generally, and in the larger cities especially, there is a considerable amount of suffering. I think, under the circumstances, the Government have done a wise, graceful, and generous act, which will be fully appreciated by the Irish, and, indeed, by all people throughout the length and breadth of Canada. England's great dramatist tells us that "One touch of nature makes the whole world kin," and the fact of there being starving people anywhere would induce the Canadian people to do their best to relieve that suffering. But, when it comes to the sufferings of a kindly and generous race like the Irish, I think under the circumstances we should do the very best we can to relieve them. I think the hon. the Premier expressed the feeling generally that perhaps the granting of a large sum would prevent private contribution. It possibly might have that result, but I trust that, aside from this gift, the people of Canada will manifest those generous instincts which have distinguished them in the past.

Resolved, That there be granted to Her Majesty the sum of One hundred thousand dollars, to enable her to aid to that extent, in the relief of the distress under which so many of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland are now suffering.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

Resolution ordered to be reported.
House resumed.

(In the House.)

Resolution reported, read the second time, and agreed to.

Resolved, That a humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-General, to thank His Excellency for his gracious Message of the 17th instant, recommending to the consideration of this House the propriety of granting $100,000 for the relief of the present great distress in Ireland, and to inform His Excellency that this House has passed a Resolution, granting to Her Majesty the sum of $100,000 for such purpose; and further to pray His Excellency to cause the issue of the sum so granted from the Consolidated Revenue Fund, and to assure His Excellency that this House will make good the same.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

MR. BLAKE: I think there was a good deal of force in the observations of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), though I quite agree myself in the course the Government proposes to take as to the channel through which this fund should be forwarded; but it appears to me that, having regard to the purpose which animates us, it would be well that it should be indicated in the communication in some way, that, while we send it through the Secretary of State, the design is that it should be intrusted for distribution to such persons as they think proper, to aid in those efforts which are being made in Ireland. We know the Imperial Government is taking certain measures of its own which, in their nature, cannot produce results so rapidly as this contribution may, if promptly used, and, if the circumstances of the case require that it should be immediately used, I hope the intention I have indicated will be made clearly to appear; and that our contribution will not be made part of any scheme for indirect relief propounded by the Imperial Government.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I quite agree with the remarks of the hon. gentleman, and it is the intention of the Government, having obtained the sanction of this House, to use the cable immediately for the purpose of informing Her Majesty of this grant, and requesting that it should be applied for the immediate relief of the poor in Ireland. The Government had thought of the suggestion of the hon. member for Gloucester, that we should indicate the fund.

MR. BLAKE.

We think it is better that we should not indicate the fund. There are several funds, and there are some jealousies, and we have no means of judging as to the justice or injustice of those jealousies, but we are quite satisfied Her Majesty will apply this money as requested, to carry out the expressed wish of the Parliament of Canada, that the money be applied for the immediate relief of the poor in Ireland. It is the intention of the Government to ask the Upper House to join in this matter.

Address read the second time and agreed to. (To be presented by Privy Counsellors.)

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

THE CENSUS.

QUESTION.

MR. FARROW enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to take the Census this year; if so, at what time of the year.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: The provision of the Act is that a Census shall be taken in 1881; it will not, therefore, be taken this year.

HARBOUR OF REFUGE, TWO CREEKS, KENT, ONT.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. STEPHENSON moved for an Order of the House for a return of copies of all official reports and plans of surveys made under the authority of the Canadian Government, relating to the improvement of the outlet of Two Creeks, in the county of Kent, Ont., and the construction of a harbour of refuge for vessels at that point. He said: A number of years ago, a project was started for the purpose of constructing a ship canal across the peninsula, from Lake St. Clair to some point on Lake Erie, at or near the mouth of what is known as Two Creeks, near the boundary line between the counties of Kent and Essex. This project has now been revived, but on a smaller scale. It is contemplated by the present plan to construct a ship canal from the waters of Lake St. Clair, commencing at or near the mouth of the River Thames, and continuing across the townships of Tilbury East and Romney, to Lake Erie, to the locality already mentioned. The plans of the old surveys made of Two Creeks Harbour, being in the possession of the Government, it is deemed requisite, in the interests of the promoters of this new project, that they should be produced, and I, therefore, move for these reports, plans and notes, of all Government surveys made, and now in the Government's possession.

Motion agreed to.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—CLAIM ON FISHERY AWARD.

MR. BRECKEN moved for an Address to His Excellency the Governor-General, for copies of all papers and correspondence between the Government of Prince Edward Island and the Dominion Government, from the 24th of March, 1879, to the present date, relative to the claims of Prince Edward Island to a portion of the Fishery Award. He said: I am aware that a delegation from the Government of Prince Edward Island waited upon the Dominion Cabinet, during Recess, on the subject of the Fishery Award. I wish, at the commencement, to draw the attention of the House to the position that Prince Edward Island occupies, in relation to this very important question. To give this House some idea of the value of the fisheries around the coast of the Province that I come from, I may state that the evidence taken before the Commission at Halifax proved, and it was admitted by Mr. Foster, the United States Agent, and one of the leading counsel before that Commission, and I here quote his very words, "that the three mile limit of the bend of Prince Edward Island, and down by Margeree were the two points to which almost all the evidence of inshore fishing in this case related." The mackerel constitute sixty per cent. of the whole catch taken by the United States fishermen in British waters; their great value must have contributed considerably in arriving at the amount of the award in favour of Great Britain. I believe that from two-thirds to three-fourths of the mackerel caught by American fishermen were taken around the coast of Prince Edward Island. I may further state that the two principal sources of wealth now left to us are agriculture and fisheries. The Treaty of Washington was signed in May, 1871. On the same day, Mr. Fish, Secretary of State for the United States, addressed to the British Minister at Washington a despatch in which, by direction of the President, he proposed "that as the Treaty could not come into effect until after the legislation contemplated for its ratification should have taken place, it seemed to him (Mr. Fish) to be in accordance with the interests of the Government of Great Britain and the United States, and in the furtherance of the object and spirit of the Treaty, that the citizens of the United States should have the enjoyment of the Treaty to fish within the three mile limit." Earl Kimberley, in his despatch of 17th June, 1871, to the Lieutenant-Governor of Prince Edward Island, strongly urges upon the Government of that Province that, for reasons stated in his despatch of the same date to Lord Lisgar, the application made by Mr. Secretary Fish should be acceded to by Prince Edward Island. The people of that Province have always looked upon the fisheries as of very great value; they then believed that the principal market for their agricultural produce and fish was to be found in the United States. The advantage of the American market was sensibly felt and appreciated during the continuance of the Reciprocity Treaty. The fisheries of the Island are, perhaps, for their extent, the most productive and valuable in America, and are very much frequented by American fishermen. We have always looked upon those fisheries as of such value in the eyes of the Americans that they would, in case of negotiations, have gone far to bring about another Reciprocity Treaty, or, at any rate, such trade concessions as would admit the produce of our farmers and fishermen, duty free, into the United States markets. The inhabitants of our Island were very unwilling to yield up such a rich mine of wealth without receiving a just and substantial equivalent therefor. But the Government of the Island, while feeling that a commercial arrangement with the United States would have been more acceptable than a money compensation, and finding that the British Commissioners at Washington failed to induce the American Government to change its policy, the people of the Island being loyal and much attached to the institutions of their Mother Country, in deference to the strongly expressed wish of Her Majesty's Government, recommended that the application made through Mr. Secretary Fish should be granted, so that American fishermen might be allowed, during the year 1871, the provisional use of the privileges they would be entitled to enjoy after the ratification of the Treaty. Our people were glad that the prospect of an amicable settlement of the disputes, which then unhappily existed between England and the United States, should be arrived at. They yielded, as I have already said, to the request of Earl Kimberley, Secretary of State for the Colonies, and expressed their willingness to accept any reasonable money compensation in addition to the privileges secured by Treaty, but at the same time stated that nothing of the kind had been guaranteed to them. The Customs officers of the Island were, in July, 1871, instructed to discontinue, for the season of that year, and until further orders, the observance of the Fishery Laws affecting American fishermen. Subsequently, the Treaty of Washington, so far as it affected the Island, were ratified by Act 35 and 36 Victoria Cap. 3, passed in June, 1872, which provided for the admission of fish and fish oil, the produce of the fisheries of the United States, duty free, into Prince Edward Island. From that date the Americans have secured the right to fish within the three-mile limit for the term of the Treaty. In making the concession asked for by Mr. Fish the Colonists, who were engaged in fishing and were exporters to the United States, sustained a loss. Since the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty, the duty on Colonial caught mackerel was $2 per barrel. I may here state that the mackerel fishery is the only one that Americans take an interest in around our coast. When Mr. Fish asked for Americans to be allowed to fish within the three-mile limit between the signing and ratification of the Treaty, the American Government promised to recommend to Congress that the duty on fish and fish oil should be remitted from July, 1871. After the concession asked for had been made, and the Americans had received the very profitable advantage of fishing in common with our fishermen within the three-mile limit, and when the refusal of the duty promised was asked for, the President of the United States declined to recommend to Congress to make such refund, stating that the proposal made through Mr. Fish contemplated the united action of all the British Colonies, and that it would not be practicable to separate them, or carry into effect for one what the President was willing to recommend for all the Colonies. This refund of duties has never been made, although the American fishermen have reaped the profit from their side of the bargain. Prince Edward Island entered Confederation in 1873. Had the Commission which sat at Halifax been appointed and organised within a reasonable time, we would have occupied the same position as the Colony of Newfoundland, and would have been entitled to receive our share of the award, upon the same basis as a million of dollars have been apportioned to that Province. When we yielded to the request of Earl Kimberley, we entertained the reasonable expectation that we would have been dealt with, as Newfoundland has been, and I submit most strongly that the accidental delay, which postponed the Fishery Commission at Halifax, to the year 1878, ought not to prejudice the claims of Prince Edward Island, so evidently based upon the principles of justice. Had that award been made before we entered Confederation, no one would deny our right to be considered in the same way as Newfoundland has been. I believe that the right hon. the leader of the Government has a warm side for Prince Edward Island, and that he will not overlook our claim on account of a technical objection, that, since we have entered Confederation, the fisheries have been a Dominion right. They are practically and substantially a territorial and Provincial interest. What, I would ask, has the prosperous and wealthy Province of Ontario, the great North-West Territories, about whose illimitable and undefined boundaries, we have heard so much these last few days, what have they in common with the fisheries of the Maritime Provinces? The destruction of the fishing industry in no way affects them, and here, I may state, that the extravagantly destructive manner by which American fishermen follow that occupation in British waters, through the use of nets and seines, has very much injured and depressed fishing as an occupation in the Maritime Provinces, and is fast rendering it a profitless occupation for our own fishermen. I have said that we have a strong equitable claim for a share of the Fishery Award, and one strong point I urge is that, we are an island during five winter months, we are cut off from all trade communications with our more-favoured Provinces of the mainland, and completely deprived of participating in the advantages of those great and costly works, such as railways, locks and canals, which are so necessary for developing the resources of this Dominion of ours. We Islanders do not allude to this subject in a narrow or sectional feeling. We believe the great outlay for these costly works is absolutely necessary, and we cherish the hope, in common with other parts of the Dominion, that they will tend to build up this country. At the same time the Government must not forget that, while we bear our share of the cost, we directly receive no equivalent. And even, during the summer months, when communication is open, the advantages to us, forming as we do part of the selvaie, are very imperceptibly felt. On that ground, I strongly urge upon the Cabinet led by my right hon. friend that we have strong claims to have the application that I now make favourable entertained. There is one other subject to which I wish to allude; last Session a new trade policy was inaugurated, known as the National Policy. I have been a supporter of that policy, and have, as yet, seen no reason to change my opinion. I believe it was necessary to build up the industries of the country generally, and that already good results are beginning to show themselves. In my humble opinion, it will be well that this policy should have a fair trial, and, under the control of our able Finance Minister, we have reasonable grounds for expecting a revival of trade and employment of the people. But, while this is all true with respect to the mainland and those portions of the Dominion that possess facilities for establishing manufactories, the National Policy does not directly benefit the little Province that sends me here. We have neither mines, nor minerals, nor a surplus population, and, while well off and independent, no great accumulation of capital, nor any inducements to warrant the people to engage extensively in manufactures. In making this application, I hope it will not merely result in bringing down the correspondence between the Dominion Government and the Government of Prince Edward Island, but that the Government will give this matter their serious consideration, and make some substantial recompense to the Island of Prince Edward for the serious injury which her fishing interests have sustained by allowing foreigners to compete with them in what has hitherto been a valuable and paying business.

Mr. HACKETT: The motion before the House is not altogether a new one; a similar motion having a similar object in view was discussed here during the last Session, and such motions will be introduced and discussed until Prince Edward Island receives justice in this matter, or at all events until a definite answer is given. When it became known that the Imperial Government had paid over to the Government of Canada the amount of the award under the Washington Treaty, the people of Prince Edward Island presented their claims to a portion of this award. They did so believing they had a just claim, from the fact that, at the time this Treaty was entered into, Prince Edward Island was an independent Colony, having no connection whatever with the Dominion of Canada. They were called upon to ratify this Treaty so far as the Island was concerned, which they did at the urgent request of the Imperial Government who were most desirous of having this Treaty concluded with the United States as it would remove serious international complications. The Government of the Island, however, only consented to ratify the Treaty on conditions and with the understanding that the Island would receive a money compensation for the privileges thus surrendered. They expressed the opinion that, in the interests of the Island, they had hoped to be able to obtain some trade concessions from the United States in return for the fishery privileges granted them, but, being an extremely loyal people, they did not want to throw any obstacles in the way of a peaceful settlement between the Mother Country and the United States, and would willingly take an equivalent in cash. It will thus be seen that the people of the Island most reluctantly abandoned what was to them a valuable privilege, and it would be great injustice to withhold from them a portion of this money that has found its way into the coffers of Canada, in consequence of their giving up so dear a right. It is a well-known fact that this award would not be so large had not the Island been included in the provisions of the Treaty. It is admitted, by every practical man, that the inshore mackerel fisheries around the coasts of Prince Edward Island are the most valuable of our Gulf fisheries. Mr. Foster, the able American Counsel, stated before the Halifax Commissioners, when about closing the American case, that the principal advantage received by them, according to the evidence submitted, was in fishing inside the three-mile limit around the coast of Prince Edward Island. What I want to discuss now is: were these waters the property of Prince Edward Island before Confederation. On this point, I do not think there can be two opinions; it is a well-established fact that the Imperial Government recognised the right of the Colonies to the waters around their coasts. We see this in the case of Newfoundland, which Colony has been paid a large amount of this award. We also know that, previous to Confederation, the Island Government issued fishery licenses to foreign vessels coming into the Island waters to fish, and that the moneys arising from the sale of those licenses went into the Island Treasury, showing clearly that those waters were Colonial possessions. The next point is: did the Island, on going into Confederation, surrender to the Federal Government, any claims that she had to a portion of this award? I contend she did not; not one word written or implied can be produced, having reference to it. The Terms of Confederation are silent with regard to it, and there is nothing to show that the Island surrendered in anyway to the Dominion of Canada rights which she held by treaty before she became a part of the Dominion. It must be apparent, then, to every fair minded man that the Island's claim stands as good to-day as it would if she had remained out of Confederation. The fact of her entering Confederation, previous to the award being made, should not prejudice the claim. Had the Commission sat and the award been made as it should have been, before she entered the Union, her share would have been paid over without a word. I cannot see how the mere accident of her since becoming a member of this Confederation can operate against her interests in connection with this matter. The payment of this money to Prince Edward Island at the present time, would be a great relief to her people. For some years past, the revenue of the Island from all sources has fallen much below the expenditure, and the Government have been compelled to resort to direct taxation to meet the requirements of the Province, and, as the people believe they have an equitable claim to a portion of this award, and that, like Newfoundland, they would have received a share of it, had they remained out of Confederation, and should their claim now not be recognised and paid, it will have the effect of rendering them very dissatisfied and discontented, and I should not be surprised to see them, like their compatriots in British Columbia, openly discussing secession. The people of the Island do not look for their share of this award; from any narrow or sectional standpoint, they look for it believing it to be their right on all principles of equity and fair play, and I hope that our friends from the older and larger Provinces will be honest and generous enough to give us our rights in this matter. The people of Prince Edward Island have not been benefitted by the present system of Protection to such an extent as the other Provinces of this Dominion. Our principal industries are fishing and farming; we have no manufactures worthy of the name, and it was not expected that the National Policy would do as much for us as it would for the larger Provinces, with their large populations, their extensive manufacturing industries, and their large undeveloped resources. Nevertheless, the people of the Island supported the policy, believing that it would benefit the whole Dominion, that it was required in the interests of the whole people. And now, when we find that this policy is realising our most sanguine expectations, when we see confidence restored amongst our enterprising business men, when we see Canada enjoying a season of prosperity, we trust we are not asking for anything unreasonable if we ask them to give, out of this abundance, to small Prince Edward Island, what properly and justly belongs to her—a share of this Fishery Award.

FREE ADMISSION OF COAL.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) moved for an Order of the House for a detailed statement of coal admitted free into the Dominion, during the past year, for the use of steamers, steamtugs, etc., on the lakes and rivers of Ontario and Quebec; the persons to whom such privileges were granted, the ports where such entries were made, and all correspondence and Orders respecting the same.

MR. BOWELL: I observe that the hon. gentleman has added the word "free," which materially changes the motion.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne): The word was in the original manuscript. The omission is the fault of the printer or clerk.

MR. BOWELL: I do not take any objection to the change, I merely wish to point out that there has been no coal admitted in the sense in which this resolution would indicate, that is, free. There has been coal admitted in a similar manner to that in which it was admitted some years ago, in bond, for the use of steamers plying from one port in the United States to another. The same concessions have been made to Canadian steamers, when plying between a Canadian and foreign port, so that they should not be under any disadvantage, as compared with American steamers.

MR. ANGLIN: I am surprised to hear that the steamers should profit by being deprived of the advantages of the National Policy.

MR. BOWELL: I am not at all surprised that the hon. gentleman is "surprised" at this. I should be very much surprised indeed if any explanation given in reference to this matter would satisfy him. The steamers have not been deprived of any of the advantages that would be derived from the National Policy. It will be shown, should a discussion grow out of this matter, that the Government has acted in the interest of the trade of the country and in accord with its policy, without injuring any one, and at the same time aiding the shipping interests of the country. The Government has no objection to bring down the statement asked for in the motion, when it will be found that the amount of coal admitted free is nil.

MR. MACKENZIE: My hon. friend the member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) made a mistake in saying that these steamers were deprived of the advantages of the National Policy; it is disadvantages of the National Policy that they were deprived of, inasmuch as they got their coal free; but the hon. the Minister of Customs says it is a mistake that the coal is allowed to come in without paying duty, and that it was merely admitted in bond, until some American, and afterwards Canadian, steamers took it for the purpose of coaling. He tells the House that it was only done for American and Canadian steamers.

MR. BOWELL: I did not say only. The hon. gentleman should not put words in my mouth. I said American steamers, and afterwards it was taken advantage of by Canadian steamers.

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes, exactly what I said. The privilege was given first to American steamers, then the advantage was extended to Canadian steamers, and afterwards it was given to all who chose to apply for it.

MR. BOWELL: No.

MR. MACKENZIE: Then there was partiality shown, was there; but we will know when we get the papers down, who he favoured in his magnanimity, but we have the fact before us that a certain class of Her Majesty's subjects, who could afford to pay the duty, were allowed to get their coal in without paying duty, whilst the poor people in this country were compelled to pay the exactions of this Government, and that is called a paternal Government.

MARITIME PROVINCES LOBSTER FISHERY.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) moved for an Order of the House for a return of copies of all petitions and correspondence with the Department of Marine and Fisheries, regarding the Order in Council regulating the prosecution of the Lobster Fishery in the Maritime Provinces. He said: This subject is one of considerable interest to a large section of the Maritime Provinces. For my own part, I am quite willing to assist the Government in any regulation they may deem necessary for the preservation of these fisheries. And whilst the Government may have been actuated by the desire to preserve the lobster fisheries, by the Order in Council passed last year, I do not believe the persons who furnished the information upon which that Order was passed were actuated by any such patriotic motives. Speaking more particularly for that section from which I come, I may say that the Order in Council hastily passed last year, was the cause of much destitution in that part of Nova Scotia. The matter is one of great importance, and I trust the Government will look upon it as such and do all in their power to remove the evil complained of.

Mr. POPE (Queen's, P. E. I.) : There is no objection to furnish the House, with the petitions and correspondence which have been received in reference to this matter. The hon. gentleman seems to think that this Order in Council, which was passed last year, limiting the lobster fishing to certain seasons, has been injurious. All I can say is, that if ever an Order in Council was necessary to regulate our fisheries an Order was necessary in this case. We find that those engaged in this fishery, who were most strongly opposed to the passage of this Order at the time, have since changed their minds, and have come to entertain the belief that, if the lobster were allowed to be taken all the year round, in two or three years the value of that fishery would be gone. The largest quantity of fish was caught by Americans, and, if they were allowed to fish, without being controlled they would soon deprive the fishery of any value. It is the duty of the Government to protect the Fisheries, and not allow them to be destroyed. Formerly, Orders in Council were passed, and never enforced, but we have endeavoured to have them strictly adhered to as far as lay in our power. If the Order in question is wrong, it should be amended, but, at the same time, a certain amount of protection was required, and that amount should be given. If there is any class of fishing, who have reason to complain, it is those within the Gulf, who are often prevented from fishing all the month of April, and part of the month of May, owing to the accumulation of ice. Those outside the Gulf cannot so complain ; they have four full months for fishing, every season, for lobster.

Mr. ANGLIN : As a representative of a county very largely interested in the lobster fishery, I think it my duty to say, in reference to the remarks of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that, as far as I am aware, the regulations made from time to time with regard to the lobster fisheries have, as far as I know, been always duly enforced in that county. There may be districts in which they are not enforced, but I have never heard that, in the county I represent, the regulations were not enforced. The question is one that is surrounded with very great difficulty. I am not, for my own part, disposed to hold the Minister very strictly responsible for anything more than an honest endeavour to do what is best and right in the interests of this country. It is exceedingly necessary to determine what are the best seasons in the different waters of the Dominion. The hon. the Minister has stated that, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and more particularly in the Bay of Chaleurs, the ice remains until a late period. After the ice disappears, the water remains so cold that the fish do not come inshore, and the fisheries are not profitable if commenced in the early part of the season. Therefore, the persons engaged there in fishing complain that their season is unreasonably short ; that it is impossible for those engaged in catching or canning the fish to realise a fair amount of profit within that period. I think an application has been made from my county, very recently, to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, on this point, and I trust he will give the application his most serious attention. If the hon. gentleman has not always, from facts submitted to him, come to conclusions satisfactory to all, he has, I think, come to such conclusions as he believed his duty required him to draw. There has been a long conflict amongst those engaged in the fisheries as to whether there is any season which should be a close season. Of course, I would like to see those engaged in our fisheries accorded all the liberty possible, consistent with the due preservation of our fisheries; therefore, I endeavour, season after season, to ascertain exactly what should be done. Some, I find, are in favour of preventing the prosecution of fishing during certain months in any but a water of a certain depth, in which they say spawning lobsters are never found. How much truth there is in that allegation I am not, from a personal acquaintance with the matter, prepared to say; but that has been urged upon me by many engaged in this fishery, and particularly those fishing in deep water themselves. It is very necessary, perhaps, and very desirable, that there should be a long close season, so that the lobster fishing may not be destroyed in a few years. Nevertheless, it is also of very great importance, that the very large number of people engaged in that industry should not be prevented unnecessarily from pursuing their occupation as long as possible. I hope the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, will continue to devote his attention to this subject—gathering all the information possible—and that he will deal as leniently and considerably as possible, with those engaged in this branch of the fisheries, which of late years has become of such very great importance.

COAL OIL TESTS.

MOTION FOR REPORTS.

MR. CASEY moved for an Order of the House for copies of all reports made by Government Analysts as to the examination made by them of any samples of Canadian coal oil submitted to them; also, of all report by officers of the Customs, as to the fire-test to which coal oils have been subjected when entered at the Canadian Customs, and how high a test such oils have been found to bear. He said: It is notorious that explosive Canadian coal oil is used which will flush to 90° or less, though the law requires it to bear a fire-test of 105. I wish to find out how such inferior oil can have evaded the Government officers and be allowed to be sold.

MR. BABY: I would suggest that the words "Officers of Excise" should be substituted in the motion for "Government Analysts."

MR. CASEY: I understood that samples of coal oil had been submitted to Government Analysts, and been found defective; and I was under the impression that these Analysts were required to report to the Government the result of their examination.

MR. BABY: No, they are not.

MR. CASEY: Very well, then, I will substitute "Revenue Officers" for "Government Analysts." As to the second part of the motion relating to American coal oils, the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) has a Bill on the Notice Paper with regard to the admission of American coal oil, and it is for use in the debate on that Bill that this information is required. I would like to know, therefore, if the information can be quickly obtained.

MR. BABY: The Department will furnish the House with the information with the greatest possible speed, but we have to send for it to Halifax and other distant ports.

MR. CASEY: But you will send it down as fast as returns come in without waiting for all?

MR. BABY: Yes.

PORT STANLEY HARBOUR TOLLS.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

MR. CASEY moved for an Order of the House for copies of all Returns made by the Great Western Railway Company of tolls and other receipts from Port Stanley Harbour, showing on what class of imports the tolls have been collected, and the expenditure made by the said Railway Company in connection with the said harbour. He said: This Railway Company is, so to speak, the trustee of the harbour receiving the tolls under a lease, and bound to expend them on the maintenance of the harbour. The returns asked are those which the Company is bound to make annually to the Government. It is the feeling of my constituents that a reduction should be made in the tolls, especially in those charged on coal. Coal is imported by way of Sarnia, with London, for instance—about 24 miles from Port Stanley—for the reason that tolls are not charged at that port (Sarnia), and it is considered that a discrimination of that sort is unfair, and that some modification should be made in the tolls charged at Port Stanley —the deficiency in revenue being made up by this Government.

MR. LANGEVIN : I am not aware of any complaint having been made. There is, however, no objection to this motion.

Motion agreed to.

FINANCIAL RETURNS.

MOTION FOR STANDING ORDER.

MR. MACKENZIE, moved :

“That it be a Standing Order of this House that immediately on the commencement of any Session there be laid upon the Table of the House (unless previously printed in the Canada Gazette, Returns in detail showing :

“1st. The receipts and expenditure of the Dominion of Canada from the commencement of the fiscal year to the first day of January in each year, or in case the said House should meet before the first day of January in any year, then to such other convenient date, not being more than six weeks previous to the opening of the said House, as may be found convenient.

“2nd. A return, in detail, showing the several rates of duty paid thereon, and in the case of free goods, the several classes of goods, of all articles exported and imported into the Dominion of Canada during the same period, with the same proviso.

“3rd. The same, by Provinces, showing also the countries whence and to which the said exports and imports were received or exported.”

MR. BOWELL : The hon. leader the of the Opposition cannot surely have reflected upon the effect of this motion. To the first portion of the motion there can be no objection, except as to making it a Standing Order. The returns of receipts and expenditure can easily be brought down, but to bring down a detailed statement of the imports and exports of the Dominion, as well as for the Provinces, would be utterly impossible in the time required by the motion.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY : If I remember aright, the hon. the leader of the Opposition, when he was at the head of the late Administration, brought down a proposition to make a retrograde movement in the returns. He proposed that the Public Accounts should be made, and the fiscal year commenced, on the 1st of March; or the 1st of April, I think, instead of the 1st of July or the end of June, and it is a little extraordinary that he should now seek to require the returns so far ahead in a particular branch of the Government. I think I am not mistaken in reference to the proposition which the hon. gentlemen made as to the Public Accounts; and I believe that the measure

he proposed on that occasion passed this House, and would now have been a fixed regulation if the Senate had not rejected it.

MR. MACKENZIE : Well, I think I will see if the motion can be altered; I will see what shape it can be put in by Monday.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : Yes, I think that would be as well. It is a very serious thing to change the Standing Orders.

MR. MACKENZIE : I admit that.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY : It is scarcely necessary to make it one of the Standing Orders, because in two or three days I hope to lay upon the Table of the House, the returns for the last six months, from the 1st July to the 1st January, that were asked for a few days ago. There can be no difficulty in that respect; but the difficulty is in respect to the trade returns; it is, I repeat, scarcely necessary to make it one of the Standing Orders, because no delay can take place beyond two or three days.

MR. MILLS : That would be a reason for making it a Standing Order, because the motion is made every Session. Information of this nature is always required from whatever Government may be in power, and it would save the necessity of making this motion if it were made a Standing Order.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : Of course if this resolution is regularly made and granted, it may as well be a Standing Order. But I understand this motion calls for particulars that will make a large volume of 950 pages.

MR. MACKENZIE : The only difficulty in making it a Standing Order is that, perhaps, it will almost necessarily affect, not only the Rules and Government of this House, but the general business of the country. There may be something in that. I would much rather the matter should stand over as a notice.

MR. ANGLIN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and Debate adjourned.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—DISMISSALS AND APPOINTMENTS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. ANGLIN moved for an Order of the House for a return giving the names of the men who were employed in any capacity on the Intercolonial Railroad, or in connection therewith, on the 1st day of October, 1878, and who were subsequently dismissed; also, the names of any of the men so dismissed, who were subsequently employed, and the date of employment; also, the occupations in which the men were engaged at the time of their discharge; also, the names of all not previously employed, who were employed in any capacity on the Intercolonial Railroad, or in connection therewith, after the 1st of October, 1878, and before February 1st, 1880; the date of the appointment of each, and the salary or rate of wages paid to each of the persons so employed. He said: I desire to be perfectly frank with the hon. the Minister who now has control of the railways of the country. I think it right to say that I make this motion because rumours are widespread in the Lower Provinces, with regard to the manner in which these dismissals, appointments, and re-appointments have been made during the past season. Towards the close of last Session, the hon. the Minister of Railways was kind enough to lay before the House a statement showing the number of persons, in a general way, employed before that time on the railroad, who were then dismissed. I think it also showed the reductions made in the salaries and the rates of wages. It was rumoured in the Lower Provinces—perhaps the rumour was entirely void of foundation—that, after those men had been dismissed, several of them were re-employed, and that, in the selection of the staff so employed, care was taken that none suspected of Liberal tendencies should be amongst them. It was further rumoured that other persons who had never been employed on the road in any capacity, were employed afterwards, one or two of them in high positions on the road. It was rumoured, that a gentleman, whose name was used here last Session as authority for the statement that a large reduction was made in the staff of the Railroad without any diminution in its efficiency, was subsequently employed in an important position on that road. Mr. Black, also, was employed as a travelling agent on the road, and, as far as I am aware, he still continues in that employment. It is for the purpose of ascertaining what foundation there is for these rumours, and to afford the hon. the Minister an opportunity of dispelling them if they are without foundation, that I move this resolution.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I would suggest to the hon. gentleman from Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) that he change the terms of his motion and add the words "dispensed with or dismissed." I draw a great distinction between those terms. If he asks me to make a return of the number of persons dismissed, I am happy to say the return will be a very small one; but if he asks me to make a return of the number of persons whose services have been dispensed with, it will be a very large one. I can state to the hon. gentleman that I am prepared to lay upon the Table of the House a return of all the persons in the employ of the Intercolonial Railway in September, 1878, and a corresponding return, covering the same portion of the road that was in the possession of the Government, in 1878, that is to Rivière du Loup, showing 400 less persons on the staff as officers or employés. The hon. gentleman will, therefore, see that the number of persons whom he would cover by the word "dismissed" would be a large one. I am happy to say the number of persons who have been dismissed is not large, and I do not think the hon. gentleman would consider it right that we should put in the same category persons who have been dismissed from the service for misconduct or neglect of duty, and men against whom there was no charge whatever, but whose services were dispensed with, because the road could be operated with equal efficiency and, at the same time, effect the saving of a large amount of money. I would, therefore, suggest that the hon. gentleman use the term "dispensed with or dismissed," because I would mark those who have been discharged for failure in duty or misconduct, and draw a distinction between them and persons whose services have been dispensed with to save cost. There will be a very considerable number of persons covered by the return the hon. gentleman has asked for; the number of those whose services were dispensed with and who were subsequently employed, because as far as I was able, I was extremely anxious, in dispensing with the services of parties for the purpose of reducing the staff, to have it in my power to employ them. I am glad the motion is made, because it will enable me to place before the House, in the most specific form, a statement that will enable the House to examine closely into the mode in which this large economy has been effected. I am glad for another reason : because it will satisfy the hon. gentleman himself that the rumours which he says he has heard, and which have attributed to me partiality towards political friends and supporters, are unfounded. The rumour which has reached my ears, and which comes to me day after day, is that I dispensed with the services of political supporters of the Government, or those who regarded themselves as having claims upon the Government, and retained in the service men who had been opposed to the Government, and who had no claims upon it. That is a rumour which reaches me from friends, and in correspondence that I open every day. It has not been because I was desirous of favouring political opponents, but because I called upon a gentleman upon whose information and knowledge of the subject I relied, to make me a return of how many officers were required for the purpose of operating efficiently, and maintaining, the Intercolonial Railway, without reference to who those officers were, and without means of knowing their politics; and the staff was reduced accordingly. When vacancies have occurred, and I have had an opportunity of placing persons in the service, I do not hesitate to say that I preferred those who had claims upon the Government to those who were opposed to it. In so doing, I think I am only acting fairly and properly, as any gentleman on the other side of the House, in my position, would act, in preferring those who are political friends, when there is an opportunity of filling a vacancy. But I think I may say with safety that, in the administration of the Intercolonial Railway, I have fairly subjected myself to the charge of retaining persons in office, regardless of the fact that they were strong political opponents, where I found them able to do their duties efficiently.

Mr. MACKENZIE : The hon gentleman has endeavoured to create the impression, from his remarks, that the staff now working the Railway is 400 less than when he obtained possession. He knows that it is not a correct impression ; he knows that most of the people were engaged in building or in repairing rolling stock at the Government workshop ; and the return of the dismissals, when it comes, will, I presume, show what particular employment the persons were engaged in, and then we will be able to compare the different classes and the different kinds of work, as they existed then, and as they exist now.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER : The hon. gentleman is accurate to this extent, and I have so stated on a former occasion: Three locomotives were built at the Moncton shops per annum, and the labour required for that purpose amounted to something like $17,000, and the $220,000 saved in the expenditure upon the employes of the Intercolonial Railway may be subjected to a deduction of something like $17,000 or $20,000 at the outside. The only work to maintain the rolling stock of the Intercolonial Railway, that is asked for by tendering or contract is the construction of locomotives, the rest being done in the shops. I found I could effect a large saving by asking for the construction of locomotives by tender and contract, instead of building them in the shops, because it costs a much larger amount to construct them of the same character ourselves than to obtain them from companies who make it their sole business to build locomotives. But there is still, outside and independent of all labour that is required for the construction of that work, which is now given out by tender and contract, a reduction of over 400 in the working staff of the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. MACKENZIE : The hon. gentleman should know that the cost of the various works of mounting the three engines and the postal car, and the other works upon which the men were employed, such as that connected with the water supply, reached, not only $17,000, but over $57,000, in 1877-8.

Mr. ANGLIN : I did not intend, in using the word "dismissed," to attach any stigma to the men who were discharged, or to say more than that their services were dispensed with. If the hon. the Minister of Railways thinks that this would imply that the men were discharged for misconduct, I have not the slightest objection to change the resolution in the way he suggests, and we will see then who were those whose services were dispensed with and who were dismissed for cause.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY — EMPLOYÉS AT MONCTON.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. ANGLIN moved for an Order of the House for a return showing the number of men employed on the first day of October, 1878, on the first of December, 1878, and on the first day of February, 1880, in the workshops of the Intercolonial Railway at Moncton, N.B., at Campbellton, N.B., at Richmond, N.S., and in the workshops of the Province of Quebec. He said: This may seem to be in part a repetition of the previous return, but it aims at obtaining information somewhat different in its character. It is notorious that a great many men employed in the workshops at Moncton were discharged; the other return will show whether any of these men were re-employed. It is asserted that while the number of men employed at Moncton was so reduced, the number of men employed at Richmond station, near Halifax, was considerably increased. There may be a justification for this course on the part of the Minister, but at all events, I think the public are entitled to know whether the statements of that kind are correct or not. There was a workshop of a small class at Campbellton, New Brunswick, and there, I believe, the services of all the men were dispensed with. I desire to know how far the hon. gentleman at the head of the Railway Department, whose sympathies are strongly Nova Scotian, has allowed those sympathies to influence him in the management of the road. It is said that a large number of men were employed during the last year coming from the hon. gentleman's own Province. It is said that a very large proportion indeed of the best positions on the road are filled by Nova Scotians. There is considerable feeling in New Brunswick on this point. The people in New Brunswick, even those who are not opposed to the Government, are naturally much excited by the belief that Nova Scotians are supplanting New Brunswickers, even in New Brunswick, and they condemn this part of the hon. gentleman's management very heartily. There is a great deal of feeling on this point, and perhaps the hon. the Minister may take this opportunity of contradicting those rumours, if they are without foundation.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I am indebted to the hon. gentleman for making this motion because it will enable me again to convince him, as well as any other person who has been misled by the unfounded rumours to which he has given expression, that they are entirely at fault. It is quite true that a large number of the prominent officials in connection with the management of the Intercolonial Railway are from Nova Scotia, but the hon. gentleman will hardly, I think, expect from me that I should dismiss persons who I found had been for years serving the country in that capacity under my hon. predecessor; and that was the state of the case. He will find, after a close examination, that no favouritism has been exhibited by me towards persons from my own Province, but that quite as many persons have been sent by me from New Brunswick into Nova Scotia, as have been brought out of Nova Scotia into New Brunswick. I shall be glad to give the hon. gentleman the means of investigating that point himself, and he will be convinced that no favouritism has been exercised. In fact, the circumstance that I have alluded to, the reduction in the number of officers and employés on the road, has prevented there being any considerable patronage in connection with the work at all. But, where vacancies occurred, they have been filled, so far as possible, by persons previously in the service, and I think I may state that there is not at this moment in that service a single officer of any importance that was not previously in the employment of the Government when I assumed charge of that road.

MR. MCKAY: With respect to the complaint of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), I may say that there is a general feeling in Nova Scotia that New Brunswickers are taking all the places. I shall be glad when this return comes down to have a look at it and see who is correct. In Nova Scotia, there is a general feeling that, when a vacancy occurs, a New Brunswicker fills it up.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—ROLLING STOCK AWAITING REPAIR.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. ANGLIN moved for an Order of the House for a return showing what locomotives, first-class passenger cars, box and platform freight cars, snow ploughs, and other rolling stock were awaiting repairs in the workshops of the Intercolonial Railroad, or at any station, or any place along the line of the Railroad on the first day of February, 1880. He said: I make this motion because I have heard it stated, on what I believe to be very good authority, that a very large number of accidents have occurred on the Intercolonial Railway, within the last few months, and that the rolling stock of that road has been reduced to a very deplorable condition. It has been stated in this House, that the efficiency of the road is thoroughly maintained, and that the plant and rolling stock were never in better condition than at present. Any number of repetitions of a statement of that kind will not convince the public of its truth, unless it is supported by evidence of a strong and satisfactory character. I think it would be necessary only to appeal to the experience of the hon. members of this House, coming from the Maritime Provinces to throw the strongest doubt upon the accuracy of that statement. Accidents have been very numerous. To my own knowledge, the arrival of the northern mail from the Upper Provinces to St. John, during some weeks past, has been very irregular—some days two or three hours late, and some days seven or eight hours late. The report always was that the mail train was delayed, either because of some freight train having broken down, or because the mail train itself had suffered a calamity of some kind. I heard a few days before I came up here, from a respectable gentleman from my own county, a touching account of the hardships he had had to endure. He drove in the first place, sixty miles, to take the train at Bathurst, and arrived there an hour before the train was due. He went to the railway station and remained there from ten o'clock at night until about seven o'clock the next morning, before the train arrived. News came from time to time, that the train was on the road, detained by some accident, but that it would arrive shortly. He and others were detained all night at the station, waiting for the train. When the train arrived in the morning, he was compelled to take passage from Bathurst to Moncton in a smoking car, because the first-class car had given out on the way. This was one of many accounts of accidents on that road. Sometimes it was the track that was torn up, sometimes a wheel of one of the cars that gave way, sometimes the locomotive itself had broken down, and so delay was occasioned until some other locomotive came to the rescue. On more than one occasion, I think, passengers have been compelled to travel long distances in second-class cars. I have seen it stated in the newspapers that, on one occasion, a car gave out and the passengers were divided, the women and children being put into the Pullman car, and the men into the smoking car. I have heard a gentleman sitting on the other side of the House state that, in the first place, he was delayed because the regular passenger train did not arrive in time; the mail train, however, made its way to the station where he was waiting; after much difficulty he forced his way into that train despite the conductor; at Campbellton this train was stopped because one of the car wheels gave way; at Chaudiere, Quebec, the same train was again stopped because another wheel had broken down; and so they made their way along this road. I have heard an hon. member from Prince Edward Island state that he was four days on the road from Moncton or Pictou. One day he was detained at Campbellton, that being on Sunday, but three days were occupied in doing the work of two days. There are many other members in this House who could recount experiences of a similar kind. These accidents have occurred so frequently, that the impression is general that the road and rolling stock have been allowed to fall into a very bad condition indeed. I heard, as I was coming up, of a rather characteristic accident, in which the whole bottom of a car had all but fallen out of it. I have not made any effort to gather up a large number of cases, as I might have done, but I do assure the hon. the Minister of Railways that he is entirely mistaken if he supposes that any assertions or assurances of his, no matter how sincere he may be, no matter how earnestly they are made—he is always earnest in making these statements,—will satisfy the public that the road is efficiently managed, and that the economy he is pursuing there is a true economy. Many of us in the Lower Provinces were inclined rather to laugh at one specimen of this economy. The rumour spread that, in order to save the expense of polishing the brasswork on a number of locomotives, all the brass was covered with paint, and this we now know to be true. However, I am not disposed to quarrel with any saving which will not impair the efficiency of the road, or deteriorate the character of the rolling stock. In a country such as this, where we cannot afford to waste any money, I would be rather disposed to commend the extraordinary economy of painting the brasswork of the locomotives, for the sake of saving the expense of polishing them. The rumours of which I have spoken reached me in such a way that I can scarcely doubt their truthfulness, but I wish the Minister to understand that I have obtained none of my information from parties connected with the road; I never put a question to anyone connected with the road, nor have I ever spoken in regard to the condition of the road, to any of the employes who were appointed on my recommendation, or who were appointed by the Liberal Government, and indeed I have always been careful to abstain from affording the slightest pretext for treating any gentleman so situated as an enemy of the Government. Perhaps, if I did seek information by that means, I could submit to this House a much stronger case than I have now submitted. But the matters I have stated are matters of notoriety, and are discussed freely amongst the people of the Lower Provinces. They are matters which have been discussed very freely amongst the members on both sides of this House since we began this Session. The rumour I refer to is that, some two or three weeks ago, there were no less than thirteen locomotives waiting for repairs at Moncton, in a condition which rendered them entirely unfit to be used on the road. If this is true, it can scarcely be contended that the rolling-stock of the Intercolonial has, during the past year, been maintained in the excellent condition in which it was found when hon. gentleman opposite took office. At that time we could all point to the Intercolonial with pride as being inferior to no railway, and superior to nearly all, on the continent. I hope and trust sincerely that the Minister of Railways will be able, not merely to assert that the road is in as good a condition now as formerly, but prove conclusively such is the fact.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I am quite aware that the hon. gentleman who has just given such a graphic and deplorable account of the Intercolonial Railway is only re-echoing in the House those statements which a party press has been generally diffusing throughout the country. But I am consoled by the reflection that it is nothing new to see a great organ of public opinion sacrificing, as far as it can, the interests of the country, to misrepresent the conduct of its political opponents. The people for ten or twelve years could not take up this paper, the leading organ of hon. gentlemen opposite, without noticing a column of "smash-ups and crash-ups" on the Grand Trunk Railway. Generally, it has been inserted from Monday morning to Saturday night, with denunciations of the gentleman in charge of that road, who, if the organ of the party of hon. gentlemen opposite is to be believed, was the most unfit man in the world to be entrusted with the lives and property of the people. Yet, we are all familiar with the fact that, when a personal or party object was no longer to be gained by continuing that style of abuse and denunciation, the same organ was prepared to sustain that same gentleman as the best to be found, in the interest of the country, to take charge of this great public work, the Intercolonial Railway. I am consoled by the reflection that the past conduct of that party organ has rendered the public mind familiar with its tactics and the unreliable character of the statements prepared, echoed and re-echoed by it for party purposes. When did the hue and cry as to the deterioration of the Intercolonial Railway commence? At the very moment when those hon. gentlemen were brought face to face with the fact that, under their management of this road, the public had suffered an enormous loss of money, through the greatest possible extravagance in the conduct of its operations. When that fact came out, that organ and its satellites, great and small, threw themselves into battle array to denounce the management of the Intercolonial. They ought to remember that every man that endeavours to excite alarm in reference to travelling on that Road, or strike a blow at the traffic and business it requires, in order to prevent the public exchequer from suffering by paying half a million a year, in the future as in the past, for the carrying on of its operations, is acting unpatriotically, and sacrificing the interests of the public for party and unworthy purposes. It would be idle for me to make statements here as to the condition of that Road, from personal knowledge, as I am not competent to express a trustworthy opinion on the subject. I must be guided and governed by the testimony of professional men. I have, in the first instance, the testimony of a gentleman referred to by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), the late Mr. Tandy, respecting whom that hon. gentleman threw out the insinuation that the person who recommended these reductions was found, subsequently, holding a position of emolument under the Government. I knew nothing of that gentleman. I enquired for the ablest and most efficient man to assist me by examination of the Intercolonial, and as to the number of persons employed in connection with it—as to how far economy could be practised, while maintaining the efficiency of the road and rolling-stock—and I was told that, in Mr. Tandy, a gentleman of whom I had never heard and whom Mr. Schreiber had never seen, of whom he knew nothing but that he had been recommended as the best and ablest man for that purpose, I should find a suitable officer. I was largely influenced in the reductions made in the staff by Mr. Tandy's statements as to how great an economy could be effected while yet maintaining the Road and its rolling-stock in the highest efficiency. I believed I had sufficient knowledge of his reputation and character to warrant me in placing confidence in his statements. I subsequently asked him if he would, as Inspector of the rolling-stock, undertake to carry out those economies and yet maintain the efficiency of the Railway. I was fortunate thus to retain his services. I regret he has since passed away, and I believe that, in his death, the country has sustained a very serious loss, because I scarcely know where to find a man equally efficient for the purpose. Those economies were not made as a matter of experiment, but were cautiously and carefully proceeded with in the light of knowledge, experience, and practical information of the highest character I could obtain. The chief management of the Intercolonial is in the hands of Mr. Schreiber, whom I found holding a high position under my predecessor, and who was placed in the Intercolonial Department, in connection with the operations of this Railway before we went out of power, after our satisfying ourselves that he was eminently qualified, professionally and in every way, for the discharge of such duties. The leader of the Opposition, last Session, bore testimony to the high character he considered Mr. Schreiber was entitled to, and to the confidence he had placed in him. His report has been laid on the table and, after carefully investigating this matter, Mr. Schreiber commits himself to the declaration that the efficiency of the road and the rolling-stock was never superior to the present. I ask what has the hon. member for Gloucester to place against that statement. Is he prepared to dispute it from the few idle stories he hears from one person or another? Everyone knows from the public papers that there has been, during the last two or three weeks, an unusual number of mishaps of no great importance on the Intercolonial. Why? Does he not know that the storm that occurred, while His Excellency was coming up from Halifax, blocked up, stopped and paralysed a great number of railroads; that the great and sudden changes of weather have tried the rolling-stock of the Intercolonial in a very unusual manner? But, notwithstanding this fact, and that the purchase of the Rivière du Loup Branch, 124 miles of additional road, without time to obtain rolling-stock to operate it, has severely taxed the rolling-stock of the Intercolonial, we obtained from the Grand Trunk Railway all the locomotives we could, but we could not obtain what were necessary to operate the road. We are now having locomotives manufactured for the road. Thus, the managers of the road have been placed in very great difficulties. Rolling-stock could not be ordered until the title of the Rivière du Loup Road was obtained by the Government, which was only in August last. It was not possible, afterwards, to procure the necessary rolling-stock for the demands of the road. All the principal officers of the Intercolonial were in the service of the late Government, and I have the utmost confidence in them. I have already said that any economy obtained by allowing the road and rolling-stock to deteriorate would be the greatest extravagance. I am prepared to show that all those attempts to alarm the public mind, to prevent people travelling on the road, and to prevent its success, are unworthy, and are founded on misrepresentations, and that the management has been so successful as to have enabled the Government, with a decreasing traffic to show, instead of an enormous deficit, the previous deficit reduced to a comparatively insignificant figure. I am glad to be able to assure the House, notwithstanding all detraction, that the condition of the rolling-stock is all that could be expected, and will compare, most favourably, with that of any other road. Hon. gentlemen opposite ought to know that, down to last year, the rolling-stock of the Intercolonial was charged to capital account, and cost $125,000 for the years 1877-8. How much rolling-stock does the hon. member for Gloucester suppose that, with the exception of three locomotives, was put on as a charge to revenue? One postal car. We have maintained the road and rolling stock and reduced, something like $500,000 of a deficiency in their time, to less than $100,000, which I confidently expect in a year to extinguish altogether. I expect its revenue will suffice for its expenses, unless hon. gentlemen opposite, by just such unpatriotic speeches as have been made to-night, based on idle rumours, so alarm the public mind as to prevent the road performing the duty expected of it by the country. I put it to the people whether the fact that not a passenger on the Intercolonial lost his life last year is not a proof of the falseness of the stories as to its improper condition. In so attacking the Road, people are only echoing the most malicious and unfounded slanders published by the party organ of hon. gentlemen opposite—an organ which, as I have said, after devoting twelve years to the work of breaking down the character of and holding up to execration, the Manager of the Grand Trunk, proved ready to take it all back, and sustain the same man as the ablest public man for a Railway Manager to be found in this country, when it suited the purpose of its party to take that course.

MR. MACKENZIE: I have no intension of entering on any discussion of the condition of the Intercolonial Railway, until I have examined the documents brought or to be brought before the House. I asked the hon. gentleman not to continue such gross attacks upon members on this side of the House, without a particle of justification for them. I defy the hon. gentleman to point out a word I ever said, anywhere, since I left office, about the Intercolonial, either to its disparagement or injury.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I do not think the hon. gentleman understands me to make any reference to him.

MR. MACKENZIE: You said the words—the gentlemen opposite and their organ.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I referred to the Globe as the organ of the party, and the remarks of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) and the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. MacDonnell).

MR. MACKENZIE: To what they said in the House?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Yes.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman alluded to political gentlemen here making disparaging and untrue remarks about the Intercolonial Railway, and now it appears that he is not able to lay his finger on any such observation. He charges us, besides, with doing great injustice and injury to a public work. Are we never to say a word about any Government work for fear of injuring it? Are we not to be able to expose mismanagement of this Road for fear people shall cease to travel by it? The hon. gentleman wants to shut every man's mouth and prevent a free discussion in this House in order that he may be able to continue his mismanagement of this work. There is no member of this House who has travelled over this road to take his seat, to whom I have spoken, who has not told the same story. Some of them have met with three accidents in the course of one journey, and the prevailing opinion is that the rolling stock has run down to such an extent that it has really become unsafe.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: No.

MR. MACKENZIE: Why, the hon. gentleman has admitted that, owing to a train of circumstances, a very large number of accidents has taken place within the last three months. He does not deny that an unusual number of accidents has taken place, but he says that they were caused by snow storms. Why, a large number occurred when there was no snow. The hon. gentleman makes an attack upon the Globe. I dare say the Globe is able to defend itself, but I would like the hon. gentleman to point out any passage in that newspaper that will justify his extraordinary statement. That paper very properly denounced the mismanagement which existed for many years in the direction of the Grand Trunk Railroad, where much public money was sunk. It is the business of every newspaper to denounce mismanagement of this character. Everyone knows the hon. gentleman's friends made the Grand Trunk a political machine in the past, as they are making the Intercolonial a political machine in the present time. The hon. gentleman's puny attack upon a great newspaper is one only to be laughed at. We will be able to see, from the statements to be laid before the House, in what condition the traffic of the road is. We will be able to see how much traffic has been carried over the road. The hon. gentleman speaks of the decrease of the traffic. Has the traffic, then, really decreased? The traffic was rapidly increasing at the time I left office, and everything was in excellent order. Now we are told, by every person that travels over that road, that not only the rolling-stock, but the road-bed is getting into a dilapidated condition. It is the duty of every member of this House to see that, even for economic reasons, this great national highway, which cost so much to build, shall be maintained in a proper state of efficiency. The hon. gentleman was never slow in attacking the policy of the late Government in reference to the road. At the time of the General Election he got a Mr. Black to grossly misrepresent statements made in my office and elsewhere, and he came out with false statements in the Halifax papers in order to influence the elections against us. That man was afterwards rewarded by being appointed to a position on the road which he was not capable of filling. This road has been used as a political machine, and the hon. gentleman will find that he will not be able to prevent a free discussion of the mismanagement of this road of which he has been guilty.

MR. DOMVILLE: The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) says that there is not a single member who has passed over the road who has not met with an accident.

MR. MACKENZIE: That I spoke to, I said.

MR. DOMVILLE: There is the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon).

MR. WELDON: But we were delayed a little by a break down.

MR. MACKENZIE: There is another testimony.

MR. DOMVILLE: Well, we did break down on the road. The engine which took us to Metapedia got out of order, and we were detained there for an hour, but we got into Montreal on time. With reference to the remarks of passengers, about the dilapidated condition of the rolling-stock, I cannot understand how a first-class passenger can obtain much information about the rolling-stock on his journey over a road covered with snow, or about the road-bed. The hon. gentleman would hold a member of the Cabinet responsible for acts of his subordinates. I have no doubt that there are faults to be found with the road, as with all roads, but I think to throw discredit on that road, is not fair to the Lower Provinces. I think the hon. gentleman should have made a specific charge. He should have stated the real grievance, and have explained how the rolling-stock was diminished. I have not observed the depreciated condition of the road, and I should be loath to accept it as a fact, until I knew it to be so, until I was assured of it from a more reliable source than mere rumour, as it is most unjust to the operatives of the line to complain in general terms, without being able to substantiate such precarious charges.

MR. MACKENZIE.

MR. MACDONNELL (Inverness): I am sorry that the hon. the Minister of Railways should have charged me with trying to create an alarm as to the efficiency of the road in question. I simply, in as few words as I considered necessary, asked for information, a few days ago, in regard to the number of accidents which have occurred on the road since the first day of January last. I did so, as I stated at the time, for the purpose of dissipating any alarm that existed in the mind of the public as to the state of the road—if such alarm was not well founded. The hon. gentleman said, in reply, that he was happy to be in a position to bring before this House a statement of efficiency. Now, however, the hon. gentleman admits that the road is not in an efficient condition. He says that the purchase of that section of the road from Rivière du Loup to Point Lévis, was a great strain on the road, and he apologises on that account for the inefficient state of the road-bed.

MR. SNOWBALL: I have had opportunity of ascertaining some particulars in regard to the management of the Intercolonial. I can assure the hon. the Minister that there are portions of the country in which complaints are numerous in reference to the management of the road. The section of the country in which I live is deeply interested in the Intercolonial, and it would be a great loss to us if anything should occur that would interfere with the usefulness of that road. But I must say, in support of what has been said in this House, that the complaints made against the management of the road are very strong. Person from all sections of the country who have occasion to pass over it complain strongly in reference to the condition of the road. In travelling over it, a few months since, to Halifax, the train at the way station at which I embarked was four hours behind time. I know of no reason why the train should have been behind time on that occasion. We arrived in Halifax three hours behind time. It was quite a serious matter for the steamer that should have got away at 2 o'clock, but did not in consequence of the train being late, get away until dark. The complaints were general amongst the passengers, on account of this delay, and I understand that this detention of the steamers in this way is not an uncommon thing. The passengers who came down on that train complained of the road being rough. On my return from England we experienced undue delay in getting away from Halifax. I do not blame the Minister for this because he could not control it. We arrived at 8 o'clock in the morning and were informed that we would get away immediately, but, instead of that, we had to wait in Halifax four hours—until 12 o'clock—and only two hours before the departure of the regular express. After getting under way, we commenced to lose time, and did not arrive at Moncton until the time the regular train was due there. It was a clear, cold day, and this further delay should not have occurred. We left Moncton and partly ascended the grade, when, to our surprise, we came down again. This they kept up for a considerable time. I had been away from home for some months, and, being so near home, I was naturally uneasy at this detention. I got off the train to ascertain the trouble, and found we had to go back to Moncton for assistance. At Moncton an engine was obtained, which shoved us up the grade. Further on, the train continued stopping. Upon making enquiries in regard to this stoppage, I was told the axles of the engine, which had just come out of the machine shop, had not been previously tried, were red hot, and that they were in danger of being twisted off. After a great many delays, we got as far as Barnaby River. The next mishap we met with was the breaking of the flanges of the wheels of one of the postal cars, which, in consequence, got off the track, cutting up the track for some distance, and doing other damage. It was said that this accident would not occasion more than a couple of hours delay, but, being only two miles from the junction, and being also in a hurry I started to wait. I was told subsequently that the train was delayed from 11 o'clock, the time at which the accident took place, to one o'clock the next morning, and, as the ordinary express was coming up behind, that train also must have been detained. After they started in the morning, I understand that other mishaps occurred, but these, as I was not then on the train, I will not refer to. Now, there seems to be cause for complaints, and I am surprised that more has not been said than has been. The hon. member for Gloucester has said that there are a large number of locomotives in the round-house at Moncton under repair. I know that, about the first of January, there were eight locomotives at Richmond, some of which had been there for nearly twelve months. I think that, in view of these facts, an inspector should be sent over the road, and something should unquestionably be done in the matter. The public complain that locomotives are hired from other railways, as the Minister of Railways admits, to do the work of the road, whilst a large number of our own locomotives are lying in the shops, and the shops almost idle and without mechanics to repair them. I do not think the Government are justified in discharging employes and in reducing the time of those employed when there are eighteen locomotives lying in the machine shops at Moncton and eight at Richmond for repair. It is stated that, under the late management, each locomotive was required to take so many loaded cars, and I believe the minimum was fourteen or fifteen. It is now asserted that it is hard to find a locomotive that can draw more than six or seven cars, and there is only one or two locomotives that can take twelve full cars, instead of being able to take about twenty. If these facts are true, this, I consider, is the place to ventilate the grievance. I know that my constituents would not excuse my neglect of duty if I did not raise my voice upon this question, and I do so in a friendly manner. My experience of the road is that it is a very rough one. Inured by constant travelling to hardships, I can sleep almost upon any railroad, but I must confess my inability to sleep upon the Intercolonial. These things undoubtedly require investigation, and, unless something is done energetically and quickly, the road will get a reputation it will take a long time to remove.

MR. MCKAY: If the story told by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Snowball) and all the incidents are as greatly magnified as one portion of it, then it is a pretty good story. I was aboard that train as far as Truro. After we left Moncton, we got stuck in a cutting, and, as soon as we returned, an engine was procured which pushed up through that cutting. The road was very heavy, and, before we got to the Junction, something did happen, and we got off the track. We were there some two hours instead of being from seven o'clock to eleven o'clock the next morning.

MR. BOULTBEE: I only rise to take exception to some remarks that were made by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Snowball). He said the condition of this road was made the subject of a grievance, and that the country was calling upon us to take a stand in the matter. Now, I take exception to those remarks altogether. I think the country is not calling on us to take any such stand. I am surprised that such charges should have been made as these—all, with one exception, made on the tongue of rumour. It does seem to me extraordinary, that hon members should get up and make charges which they are unable to substantiate, except by saying that they heard that such and such was the case. That is not the way our business should be done, and, if charges of this kind are to be brought forward, the public will expect to have them supported by some sort of proof. With regard to the reference of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) to the alleged reports circulated against this railroad, I am sure that neither you, Sir, nor any man in this House, ever travelled over a long reach of railroad, without hearing every man, and every woman, and especially the old women, begin to talk of the evils of the road, how the train shook how it bumped on the track, how many accidents had occurred on it, and so on; and that is the sort of information the hon. gentleman formulates against this Railroad, upon which the present Minister of Railways has effected such a satisfactory reduction in the expenditure of the country. I have not heard such rumours against the Intercolonial Railway as have been referred to as being made in the newspapers. I have not seen any of these attacks upon it in the public press; but I see that an hon. Senator, the other day, in his seat in Parliament, stated that the Intercolonial Railway, with its rolling stock and all its appurtenances, was in a very good condition, and that gentleman was one of the Commissioners who built the road. There was a man who might be said to have authority on the subject, stating that the Intercolonial Railway is in a very satisfactory condition. There is one gentleman, the member for Northumberland (Mr. Snowball), who goes further than the other gentleman. He gives his own experience, and, if one, while listening to him, had his eyes shut, he would have imagined that the hon. gentleman was one of those ancient personages to whom I have alluded just now. I never heard such an amusing account of railroad travel; but, the hon. gentleman so mixed up matters that it was impossible to tell whether the incidents occurred on that one night that he was kept away from the bosom of his family, whether they occurred in one night, or one day, or one trip, or during a period of four months; and we do not know whether he was suffering from his own absurd imaginations, or from the effects of the absurd stories of those with whom he was travelling; and how it is possible that he lived, suffering from hunger and the bumping about of this train, unable to sleep by night, and, I presume, unable to sleep by day, if he could not sleep by night, I am at a loss to divine. But I understand the hon. gentleman is an expert in those cases. He has a railroad of his own; he has been the President or Manager of a railroad,—not one, however, stretching over a distance of 800 miles, and passing through districts, in which, especially in winter, delays in the arrival and departure of trains are unavoidable; but his railroad is only 5 or 6 miles long; he can survey his own railway very easily from the top of any high stump in the vicinity. His experience as a railroad proprietor has not been successful, though his line is only five miles long. It went wrong somehow, and the hon. gentleman desires to get a portion of the rolling-stock from this already depleted Intercolonial Railway and the aid of its staff, to assist him in working his gigantic undertaking. There is an expert for you. If the Intercolonial Railway is in the terrible state which he says it is, then the country calls upon him, it demands that he shall not assist in its depletion by taking away its rolling-stock to supply his own road. It wants its stock and staff as much as his road does.

the risk of incurring the displeasure of the hon. the Minister of Railways, I may say that I was a passenger on the train with the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Snowball), and I can confirm his statements. The hon. member for Colchester, (Mr. McKay), was also a passenger and one of the principal grumblers at the delays which occurred. Reports are current in the Lower Provinces against the management of the Intercolonial Railway, and you may take up any of the newspapers, whether Conservative or Liberal, and find almost every week, and sometimes two or three times a week, reports of accidents on that road. Almost every train carrying the mail from Halifax to Montreal is delayed ten hours at least. The rolling-stock is not in complete repair, and along the line of the Intercolonial much dissatisfaction prevails in reference to its present management.

MR. ANGLIN. The House must have remarked that the tone and manner of the hon. the Minister of Railways, when he replied to the remarks I made when introducing this resolution, were the tone of one who was deeply hurt, and the manner of one who felt that the charges made against the management of the Intercolonial Railway are very serious, and that it is impossible for him to answer these charges satisfactorily. He charged me with having denounced the Intercolonial Railway, and then he attacked the Globe, and he so mixed myself and with the Globe that it was impossible to tell when he was attacking me, and when he was attacking the Globe. He charged me with being unpatriotic, and he spoke of the introduction of this resolution as part of a system of attacks commenced by the Globe for partizan purposes; and he said that we sought, by throwing discredit on the road, to prevent its doing the work it would otherwise do, and deter persons from travelling over it. I contend that my course is truly patriotic; I am simply discharging one of my duties to the country, as one of the people's representatives, when I submit for the consideration of the House of Commons the statements I have made. All I desire is that this railroad shall be put into proper condition, that its rolling-stock shall be safe and sound, and that it shall have restored to it the high character it once bore, and which has been destroyed within the last few months. It is too well known to the people of the Dominion, and to many in the United States, that, of late, the mails are frequently delayed on this road, and that accidents are continually happening on it. Quite recently, a man was killed on that railway. We cannot hide these facts; and, even if we could, would it be our duty to conceal them, and allow the management to go on from bad to worse, until the road become impassable? No, Sir, it is our patriotic duty to raise our voice against such a management, and to warn those in charge that the road must be put in a better condition. In stating that in some respects there had been an increase of expenditure, I did not mean to make an insinuation, as the hon. the Minister of Railways ingeniously puts it; I merely made a plain and simple statement of facts. The hon. gentleman contracted himself with regard to the condition of the rolling-stock, for he maintained in the first place, —in fact he stated more than once,—that the road and rolling-stock were in a state of the highest efficiency; and afterwards he said the rolling-stock was over taxed, because the Government has been in possession of the road from Rivière du Loup to Point Lévis for the last few months. I think it was the general impression, some two years ago, that the Intercolonial Railway was thoroughly equipped, indeed that there was an excess of rolling-stock of all kinds; and the addition of some 120 miles of road ought not to have overtaxed the rolling-stock as the hon. gentleman has said. They were unable, he says, to find a sufficient number of locomotives to do the additional work. Why did they not keep the locomotives they had in repair? Several of the men who were discharged from the workshops at Moncton, were still at that place waiting for employment, and there need have been no difficulty in keeping the locomotives in proper repair. When the rolling-stock was falling into such a condition, why were so many men discharged? Why were the hours cut down to eight hours a day at Moncton, while at Richmond the men were working ten hours a day? Whatever the reason was, there were plenty of men to do the work, and ample means for doing it; yet, for some reason unexplained, these locomotives—thirteen, it is said—were allowed to remain out of repair at Moncton. We have the statement of the hon. member for Northumberland that there were eight locomotives waiting at Richmond to be repaired, and one of these has been waiting for twelve months. Why were not these repaired? It was not for want of workmen or workshops. It was not my intention to work up a case. If I had wished to do so, I could have worked up a case of a much more serious character. Somebody charged me with not having sustained my statement by evidence. I have stated what I knew personally. The hon. members for Inverness (Mr. MacDonnell), Northumberland (Mr. Snowball), Shelburne (Mr. Robertson), and even the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McKay) himself, have furnished most conclusive proofs of breakdowns, delays and accidents, which fully sustain the charges made by me. As I have said, I did not attempt to make out such a serious case, as might have been made up. I have brought forward a simple statement of what I believe to be facts, in order that they might be fully investigated, and that the hon. the Minister of Railways might have an opportunity of disproving them if they are not facts. I think, Mr. Speaker, that after what has passed this evening, the hon. the Minister must be convinced that there is something in the management of this Railway which requires careful supervision on his part. The country holds the hon. Minister and his colleagues directly responsible for the management of this great public work, and it will not be sufficient for him to say, when anything goes wrong, that not himself but those concerned in the actual working of the Road, should be blamed. When the statements made here to-night go to the country, the public will have before them more than those newspaper articles, which have so stirred up the indignation of the hon. the Minister of Railways, and they will observe that these statements have not even been fully contradicted. The hon. Minister did not, I think, if my memory serves me aright, attempt to contradict any one of the statements which I made. He did not say that there were not thirteen locomotives lying at Moncton some time ago waiting for repairs; and he will not, I think, pretend to say that, while these were unrepaired, while no special effort was made to repair them, it was the addition of this 124 miles of railway that caused all the damage to the rolling-stock and the consequent delays and accidents. I do not care to follow this matter much further. I had no desire, either to denounce the management of the road, or to make any special attack on the hon. gentleman or his colleagues. But, coming myself from the Maritime Provinces, and having heard much, from what I believe to be good authority, with regard to the condition of the road, and having found myself, on the way up, that the road in some places had become very rough indeed, I felt it my duty to bring this subject before the House, in order that the hon. the Minister might ascertain by an expression of opinion of the House, what the feeling of the country is, and in order that he might modify his system of economy, so as to secure hereafter to the people travelling over that road, at all events, such immunity from accidents as it is possible to secure. If only two or three accidents had occurred, it would have been wrong to have made such a motion. Accidents will occur on railroads despite all the vigilance that can be exercised, although, in most cases, what are called accidents are the result of negligence or carelessness on the part of the officials. If there had been but one, or two, or three accidents on that road during the last month or two, I would have refrained from making this motion, but the accidents have been so numerous and so serious,—fortunately there has been no loss of life, with one exception, though there has been great destruction of public property,—that it certainly was the duty of someone to bring the matter before the House. I shall be much pleased if it can be shown that the hon. gentleman at the head of this great work has really laboured to keep it in the state of efficiency in which he fancies it now is. Others do not think it in such a state of efficiency, and no attempt to conceal the truth, no bold repetition of the assertion that the road and rolling-stock are in the highest state of efficiency will serve to remove the impression that the road is now in a much worse condition than it was when the present Minister of Railways assumed control of it—an impression which, I once more assure him, prevails far and wide.

MR. LONGLEY: I am not going to take upon myself to pronounce upon the condition of the Intercolonial Railway, or upon the accuracy or inaccuracy of the statements which have been made by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin). I happened to travel in the same train with that hon. gentleman, in making my way to Ottawa, and I should like to ask him a question or two. Did we not arrive at Montreal on time? Now, I can state that, in travelling from Halifax here, we left Halifax at sixteen minutes past one o'clock on Tuesday, and we arrived at Montreal at half-past six o'clock on Thursday morning, being not one minute behind time.

MR. ANGLIN: We travelled up pleasantly on the road. We heard of accidents that had happened, but we met with no accident, though we lost two hours on the way. We did arrive on time next morning at Montreal, having made up the lost time.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I would ask the hon. gentleman whether he travelled more rapidly on the Grand Trunk, if he came over that line, than over the Intercolonial?

MR. ANGLIN: I cannot answer, for I was fast asleep on the Grand Trunk.

MR. LONGLEY: I do not think the hon. member has much broken the force of my remarks. Facts are stubborn things, and I am simply stating a fact in regard to the time we made between Halifax and Montreal. There was a slight detention in two or three places on the road coming up, I am ready to admit, but they were slight, and the fact of our arriving at Montreal on time, proves that we fully made up the delay. Now, I do not think it should be a matter of great surprise that, about the Metapedia Valley, where the snow is three feet deep and the frost intense, the road should be a little rough. I imagine it is seldom indeed that at this season of the year, and in our climate, a road of 800 or 900 miles long is smooth over its entire length, and that would be a sufficient excuse in regard to the deficiency of rolling-stock, as has been alleged. Surely the addition of 124 miles to the length of the road, with the increased demand upon the rolling-stock which this addition would necessarily entail, should be taken as sufficient excuse for some mere delay, and greater uncertainty about getting over the road, than if it were fully supplied with the necessary rolling-stock, or than would have been the case had not the length of the road been increased. Now, I do not for a moment wish to undervalue the testimony that has been given here to-night, if testimony it can be called; I would rather say, the statements that have been made, either pro or con, for or against, the management of the Intercolonial Railway, should be regarded as much more reliable than official reports. But what I think we have a right to attach importance to is the report of an efficient engineer, and one whose reputation is not confined to a narrow space, one who is recognised wherever he is known, as thoroughly competent to discharge the duties he has been appointed to fulfil. Now, I think the report of such a gentleman as that, the Chief Engineer of the Intercolonial Railway, will pass for more than the private statements of members of this House, however intelligent they may be. I think my hon. friend who spoke from one of the seats near the Treasury Benches hit the nail on the head. There has been no approval expressed in regard to the result of the reduction of cost of management in connection with the Railway, but what is now attempted to be done is to bring down the credit acquired by those who reduced the expenses. There, it seems to me, is the secret of the ebullition of feeling we have had on the part of those gentlemen who had such a deplorable time in travelling over the Railway. I think that every gentleman present who travelled in the train with my hon. friend from Gloucester could give testimony entirely coinciding with that which I have given, and, I might add, if they had not a purpose to serve, they would have done so.

MR. SNOWBALL: The hon gentleman from North York (Mr. Boulton) said he did not understand what I said. Well, I certainly did not expect that he would. When he said that I am President of a railroad, and the road I am connected with is not more than five or six miles in length, I wish to tell the hon. gentleman that I am not President of any railroad, and the road I am connected with is not five or six miles in length, and possibly the hon. gentleman knew that his statement was not correct. I certainly did not blame the hon. the Minister of Railways for not assisting, at that time, the road with which I am concerned. The hon. the Minister treated me on that occasion, as he has always treated me, with the utmost courtesy. I was willing, and am still willing, to accept the answer received in good faith. I might have made use of the information I received from that enquiry, and, as I did not do so, I think the hon. the Minister should not have put the words in the mouth of the hon. gentleman that I applied for assistance.

Motion agreed to.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

The following Motions for Returns were severally agreed to:—

Address—Copies of all reports and correspondence relating to the dismissal of Mr. A. Cauchon, a clerk in the Canal Office in Montreal, in June, 1879.—(Mr. Holton.)

Address—Copies of all correspondence between the Government and the promoters of the Credit Valley Railway, relative to the right of way from the western limits of the city of Toronto, to its terminus in said city.—(Mr. Oliver.)

Address—Copies of all Orders in Council, regulations, correspondence, etc., between any person and the Government, since the last Session of Parliament, respecting the drawback promised on ship materials; also, a statement showing the names of all applicants, the particulars of the applications made, the amount applied for, the amount allowed and paid in each case, with the dates of such payments.—(Mr. Weldon.)

Order of the House—Return of the amounts expended on the repairs done to the Negro Point Breakwater, in St. John, since the damage, Fall of 1878; also, the money realised from the sale of any lumber which was a part of the said Breakwater; also, the amount paid to Mr. D. W. Clark for his services in connection with the same, from the time of its damage to the present.—(Mr. Weldon.)

Order of the House—Return of all wheat-flour, rye-flour, oatmeal, cornmeal, wheat, barley, Indian corn and oats, imported into each of the Provinces (exclusive of British Columbia), since March 14th, 1879, up to 1st day of February, 1880, and the duty collected thereon.—(Mr. Weldon.)

Order of the House—Return of all coal and coke (distinguishing kinds) imported into each Province of the Dominion (exclusive of British Columbia), since March 14th, 1879, up to February 1st, 1880, and the duty collected thereon.—(Mr. Weldon.)

MR. LONGLEY.

Order of the House—Return of all teas imported from the United States in each of the Provinces of the Dominion, since the 14th March, 1879, up to February 1st, 1880, on which an additional duty of 10 per cent. has been collected; the weight and value thereof, and the amount collected thereon.—(Mr. Weldon.)

Order of the House—Return of all old rails sold by the Government or their order since first of January, 1874, up to present time; the quantity sold, the dates of delivery, the prices sold for, the parties sold to, and the dates of payment for same, and what portion sold for shipment to the United States or shipped to United States on Government account; also a similar return of all scrap iron sold during same period.—(Mr. Weldon.)

Order of the House—Return of copies of all letters addressed to the Government by the Official Assignee of the District of Shelburne, Nova Scotia, during the years 1877, 1878 and '79, resigning said office, together with the replies thereto, containing the reasons (if any) for the non-acceptance of his resignation, and also a copy of the bond filed by that officer, and any information the Department may have as to the financial position of his sureties.—(Mr. Robertson, Shelburne.)

Order of the House—Return showing the names, residence, occupation and date of appointment of all Official Assignees appointed between the 8th day of April, 1875, and the 18th October, 1878, and between the 18th October, 1878, and the 16th day of February, 1880.—(Mr. Cameron, South Huron.)

Order of the House—Return showing receipts and expenditures under the Weights and Measures Act for the last six months of 1879.—(Mr. Ross, West Middlesex.)

Order of the House—Return showing the sums of money expended for confidential printing during the years 1877-8 and 1878-9, and the last six months of 1879; also, the names of the persons or firms to whom such moneys have been paid.—(Mr. Ross, West Middlesex.)

Order of the House—Copy of any claims made by Messrs. MacLean, Roger & Co., against the Government for damages, for breach of their contract for the Public Printing, and for all petitions, papers, and correspondence relating thereto.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

Address—Copies of all rules, regulations and Orders in Council affecting the importation of grain of any kind in bond, together with a statement of the quantities of the several classes of grain so imported and the amounts so imported at the principal ports of entry of the Dominion.—(Mr. Mackenzie.)

PRAYERS.

RECEPTION OF PRIVATE BILLS PETITIONS.

Resolved, That the time for receiving petitions for Private Bills be extended for ten days.—(Mr. Robinson.)

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS—REFERRED.

Ordered, That the Public Accounts of Canada, for the fiscal year, ended 30th June, 1879, and the report of the Auditor-General on appropriation accounts for the same year, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 16) To authorise and provide for the winding up of the Stadacona Bank.—(Mr. Vallee.)

Bill (No 17) To incorporate the Bell Telephone Company of Canada.—(Mr. Kilvert.)

Bill (No. 18) To make provision for the winding up of insolvent incorporated Fire or Marine Insurance Companies.—(Mr. Ives.)

PREVENTION OF CRIME BILL.

(Mr. Blake.)

FIRST READING.

MR. BLAKE introduced a Bill (No. 19) For the more effectual Prevention of Crime. He said: Some years ago, when it was the duty of the late Government to call attention to this subject, statements were made which indicated that the rate of increase of crime in Canada was of a very extraordinary and alarming character. I have not, upon the present occasion, taken steps to ascertain the general rate of increase of crime since that period. I had hoped that there would have been ere now presented to us the report of criminal statistics authorised by the Act then passed, which would have enabled us more accurately to trace the rate of increase, but it is sufficient for the purpose, I think, to refer to such statistics as we have in our possession of the graver classes of crime as evidenced by the number of convicts remaining in the Penitentiaries. I do not propose to go far back, but I will give you the statements from December, 1876, at which time, according to the reports, there were 1,048 persons in the Penitentiaries; in June, 1877, there were 1,081; in June, 1878, 1,159, and in June last, 1,318; showing that there has been an increase in two years and a half of not less than 270 or at the rate of twenty-five per cent. But that even does not represent the true state of the case, because the ratio of increase is unfortunately progressive. The rate of increase for the fiscal year 1878 is about seven per cent., while for the next fiscal year it is almost fourteen per cent., or very nearly double. There is something radically wrong in such a state of affairs. Our population has certainly been increasing during these two or three years, at a very slow rate, while there has been this increase in the graver classes of crime of at least twenty-five per cent., which is certainly extremely disheartening; nor do I believe that the increase, as represented by the Penitentiary prisoners, at all equals the true rate of increase in the serious classes of crime, or the increase of crimes committed by hardened or habitual offenders; and it is in order, to some extent, to remedy the latter evil that I venture to submit to the House the measure I am now asking leave to introduce. I believe that, in the larger proportion of cases, old offenders, persons who have been subjected to one or more prior convictions, have escaped the consequences of these prior convictions, by reason of there being no proper means of identifying them as old offenders, and I believe that the Act for the Summary Administration of Justice, an Act under which speedy trials take place, has, amongst some good consequences, produced evil consequences in this particular, from the shortness of the interval between arrest and trial, and from the comparative privacy of the trial. Now, this is a serious business; because I think it may be fairly laid down that, whatever opinions may be held with regard to the first offence, whatever principle, amongst the divers and opposite principles of treatment, you may adopt with reference to the first offence, there is a tolerably general concurrence of sentiment amongst those who have looked into the matter that, after several convictions, we must, as a rule, treat the offender as an enemy to society, as one whom the interests of society require to be imprisoned for a very long term of years, and that, if there be, as I should be loath to say there is not, a chance for his reform, that chance depends on his having a long period of imprisonment and of the discipline, if it be improving discipline, of the Reformatory and Penitentiary. So that, whether you regard the interests of society and adopt the view that the reform of the criminal is almost hopeless, or whether you regard the interest of the criminal himself, I maintain it is absolutely necessary that long terms of disciplinary imprisonment should follow repeated convictions. It is then essential that we should provide greater facilities for identifying persons who have already been convicted, and one purpose of this Bill is to provide that there shall be kept in each Province of Canada a register of convicted criminals, the particulars being supplied by the Wardens of the Penitentiaries or Reformatories, and the Sheriffs of the various districts, pursuant to instructions to be prescribed. There is also a provision authorising the Governor-General in Council to make an Order for the photographing of convicts. That is one set of provisions of this Bill. The second set of provisions enacts, with reference to persons proved to be for the second time convicted that, for a term of years after the expiration of their sentences on the second conviction, they shall under special circumstance be guilty of an offence punishable by imprisonment. The first circumstance is if, being charged with gaining his livelihood by dishonest means, it appears to the Court that there are reasonable grounds for believing that the convict is so gaining his livelihood. The second is if, being charged with any crime, and being required by the Court to give his name and address, he refuses to do so. The third is if he be found in any place under suspicious circumstances, such as may lead to the presumption that he was there for the purpose of committing a crime, or was waiting for an opportunity of doing so; and the fourth is if, being found in any dwelling-house, warehouse, or adjoining premises, he is unable to give any reasonable grounds for his being so found. The last provision of the series is one authorising the Court, in the case of persons more than once convicted, and against whom the previous conviction or convictions are proved, if the Court thinks fit, to award, in addition to the sentence for the crime last committed, a sentence of police supervision for a certain period of years. Every such person is required to give notice of his place of residence to the Chief of Police of his own district, to report each change of residence to that officer, and thereafter to report himself monthly—failure to complete with this provision being made a punishable offence. None of these provisions are novel. They have all been introduced into the Imperial Criminal Law; first by the Act of 1869, amended and modified by an Act passed in 1871. I bring this measure before the House as, in my opinion, calculated, I will not say to remedy the very serious evils which at present exist, and under which the number of our criminal population is so largely increasing, but to go some length towards remedying some of those evils. It appears to me imperative that we should, in the first place, provide better machinery for the identification of old offenders, with a view to their appropriate punishment, and that we should, in the second place, give greater facilities for the confinement of those who, having been more than once convicted, are found under suspicious circumstances, and are unable to explain to the Court in any reasonable manner the reason for their being so found, and, in the third place, that we should provide for hardened criminals a system of police supervision which will enable the authorities to keep watch over them to a certain extent. I entirely recognise the view that legislation generally on the Criminal Law is more fitly to be carried on under the responsibility of the Government. I have taken this step, which seemed to me to be the most convenient for bringing the subject under the notice of the House, but I shall be only too glad if my hon. friend the Minister of Justice will take charge of the measure, with such modifications as may be thought proper to propose.

Bill read the first time.

RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS' COURT BILL.

(Mr. McCarthy.)

FIRST READING.

Mr. McCARTHY introduced a Bill (No. 20) For instituting a Court of Railway Commissioners for Canada, and to amend the Consolidated Railway Act, 1879. He said: The object of this Bill is, in the first place, to constitute a tribunal with power to determine disputes arising between railway companies as to their crossings, the arrangement of their traffic, the adjustment of rates for passengers and trade, and matters of that character. It also proposes to give power to this tribunal to determine matters in dispute between railway corporations and municipal corporations, as to the alignments of their tracks, and places where the companies may use the streets and public highways within the limits of their respective corporations; and lastly, to transfer to this Commission the power which the Railway Committee of the Privy Council now exercise with regard to matters under the head of "powers" in the General Railway Act, including "highways and bridges," "traffic arrangements," and "tolls," transferring, in a measure, all those powers, except that with regard to the opening of roads which I propose still to leave to the Governor in Council. The amendments proposed to be made in the General Railway Law are of a character to place the arrangements made by the railway companies, and the tolls, from time to time, proposed to be charged by them under the control of this Commission. But there is one special grievance which I propose to strike out, one about which I feel warmly, and from which my constituents have suffered greatly, and that is the power which the railway companies think they have, and perhaps have according to law—there is one case, at all events, deciding that they have that power, virtually—to amalgamate with other companies. Rival companies have chosen to amalgamate and can do so without coming to the Legislature, and without getting any express power in that direction. I do not think that should be permitted. I do not think it ever was intended that a corporation empowered by Parliament to build and run a road in one section has a right, without express power from Parliament, to go and amalgamate with another line, which perhaps it was constructed and designed to compete with. The case to which I allude is one of great hardship. The municipalities of the county of Simcoe granted a sum of nearly half a million dollars for the construction of the Hamilton and North-Western Railway. It was established to be a competing line, to a certain extent, with the Northern Railway. This Hamilton and North-Western road, having been aided by the Ontario Government, was constructed; it went into operation and continued to run for six or seven months, when, without any power on the part of the municipalities to interfere, they made an arrangement with the Northern Railway, so that the competing line which the people had subscribed this large sum of money to construct virtually fell under the control of the old road. That was done under the general power given in the Railway Act, and it has been decided by the Court of Chancery in Ontario that that arrangement was legal and could not be prevented. I desire to have it expressed, for the future at all events, that no such power can exist without an appeal to Parliament. I also propose to introduce what is known in England as the "Equality Clause."

MR. MACKENZIE: I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether he proposes by his Bill to repeal the powers which various companies now possess to make precisely the same arrangements that was between the Northern and the Hamilton and North-Western Railways. That is not an amalgamation, properly speaking.

MR. MCCARTHY: No, I do not propose to interfere with any private Charter. I propose that, under the general Railway Act, there should not be power, as it were by aside issue and under colour of making a traffic arrangement, for companies to make an amalgamation, and that, if they desire to amalgamate, they should be obliged to come to Parliament, and get leave, and then it would be for Parliament to say whether it should be given them or not. I was going on to say that I propose to introduce what is known in England as the "Equality Clause," which gives railway companies power to alter their tariff from time to time but they must do so so as not to impose greater burdens upon one person than upon another, so that there can be no monopoly resulting. Although that has been the law for many years in England, it has never yet been introduced into our Statute-books. There are one or two other provisions in the Bill but I may say there is nothing very novel in it. It proposes to be practically an enactment in this country of the English Statute of 1873, the history of which will be found in the Report of the Joint Committee of the House of Lords and the House of Commons of the preceding Session of Parliament.

MR. MACKENZIE: I would ask what arrangement the hon. gentleman proposes for the payment of such Railway Commissioners.

MR. MCCARTHY: With regard to that, the Bill is, of course, in a great measure, silent. That matter must be dealt with by the Government. There is no provision for their payment out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, and, of course, there could not be by a private member. I propose that the Railway Commissioners may have authority, under the Governor in Council, to impose fees, and that out of the fees so imposed upon the litigating parties, there shall be paid such sum as the Governor-General thinks proper.

MR. MACKENZIE: My reason for asking about the payment is this: I think the hon. gentleman, if he proposes to impose tolls at all upon any of the companies must introduce resolutions in Committee of the Whole, upon which a Bill may be founded. Of course, it will not be competent for him to deal with the Consolidated Fund.

MR. MCCARTHY: I have not overlooked that, but I take it that the power to impose these fees may be granted, subject to the approval of the Governor-General in Council. At all events, if there is any objection of that kind, I will withdraw those clauses of the Bill.

Bill read the first time.

RIMOUSKI PIER.

QUESTION.

MR. Fiset enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to restore and widen the pier at Rimouski, and make other improvements in the harbour of that locality.

MR. LANGEVIN: I have the honour to inform the hon. gentleman that the subject is under the consideration of the Government.

MR. MCCARTHY.

PACIFIC RAILWAY — LAND COMMISSION.

QUESTION.

MR. BLAKE enquired, Whether the Commission authorised last Session, on which the Imperial Government is to be represented, and in which are to be vested 100,000,000 acres of land and all the minerals they contain, for the purpose of constructing the Pacific Railway, has been appointed; if not, is it intended to appoint the Commission, and when?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The Commission has not been appointed, and the appointment has been deferred for the present.

PORT HOOD WHARF REPAIRS.

QUESTION.

MR. MACDONNELL (Inverness) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to repair the public wharf at Port Hood, in the county of Inverness, or to build a new wharf at that place, and when?

MR. LANGEVIN: The matter has not escaped the attention of my Department, but no decision has yet been arrived at.

POST OFFICE DISMISSAL—D. H. WATERBURY.

QUESTION.

MR. DOMVILLE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to pay Mr. D. H. Waterbury, late clerk in the post-office in St. John, the damages awarded him by a St. John jury, for improper dismissal and defamation of character.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): Mr. Waterbury, a clerk in the post-office at St. John, was dismissed, and he brought an action against Mr. Dewe, the Post-Office Inspector. There is now an appeal pending from the Supreme Court of New Brunswick to the Supreme Court of Canada. It was inscribed for hearing, but was allowed to stand over the present term at the instance of Mr. Waterbury. As soon as the litigation is determined, the Government will consider the matter, and decide what shall be given him.

BEAUHARNOIS CANAL.

QUESTION.

MR. BERGERON enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to widen the Beauharnois Canal?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: It is not the intention of the Government at present to widen the Beauharnois Canal.

CUSTOMS CONFISCATION OF KEROSENE OIL.

QUESTION.

MR. BORDEN enquired, Whether the Government permits kerosene oil which has been confiscated for violation of the Customs, to be sold or disposed of for public use, without being first subjected to the fire-test required by law, and whether the Government is aware of a sale having been so made by an official or officials of the Customs.

MR. BOWELL: The Government does not permit kerosene oil introduced in violation of the Customs to be sold or disposed of for public use. One case came under the notice of the Government in which the Collector had sold such oil. As soon as it was brought to their notice, the Collector was severely reprimanded for having done so.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES INSPECTORS — REFUND OF SUPERANNUATION MONEY.

QUESTION.

MR. OLIVER enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to refund to the Inspectors of Weights and Measures the amounts paid by them into the Superannuation Fund, previous to 1st October, 1879.

MR. BABY: Yes, it is the intention of the Government to do so—those who have acted as such, and who are proved not to be defaulters.

FRASER RIVER, B. C.—LIGHT-SHIPS ON THE SAND HEADS.

QUESTION.

MR. McINNES enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place, this spring, a lightship or lighthouse on the Sand Heads of the Fraser River, B. C., to take the place of the lightship removed therefrom, last August.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P. E. I.): It is the intention of the Government to place a lightship in that place. The lightship that was there has been found unfit for use, and, in fact, is entirely ruined. The Government has in contemplation to erect a lighthouse there, to be placed on iron piles.

CASCUMPEC HARBOUR IMPROVEMENT.

QUESTION.

Mr. HACKETT enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to expend a sum of money, this year, in improving the navigation of Cascumpec Harbour.

Mr. LANGEVIN: I have the honour to inform the hon. gentleman that the reports in this case have been laid before me, and they are now engaging my attention. I expect to come to a decision on the matter, and submit my report before the Estimates are brought down.

RIVER TRENT NAVIGATION WORKS.

MOTION FOR ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

Mr. KEELER moved for an Address for copies of all Orders in Council passed since the 1st day of May last, relating to the River Trent Navigation and Canal Works; also, copies of all reports of D. Stark, Esquire, Civil Engineer upon his recent surveys, examinations or enquiries respecting said Navigation and Canal Works. He said he had brought the matter of the Trent Navigation before this House last year in consequence of these works having been transferred by the last Administration to the Ontario Government, and he had obtained a special Committee to examine into the whole question and to take evidence respecting it. The Government had during the last summer sent engineers to make a thorough inspection of the Trent Navigation with the view of coming to a proper knowledge of the capabilities of this very important line of inland navigation. The object of this motion was to have the reports of the engineers upon the feasibility of the construction of the proposed communication and more particularly as to the supply of water for the Canal, brought down for public information and to take further action to promote the interests of the work.

Motion agreed to.

MANITOBA AND NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES LAND SALES.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. ANGLIN moved for an Order of the House for a return showing the quantities of lands sold by the Government of Canada in the Province of Manitoba and the North-West Territories, distinguishing the lands within each of the belts along the line of the Canadian Pacific Railroad, the prices at which the lands were sold, and the total amount of money received on account of such sales, up to December 31st, 1879; also, the cost of surveying these lands and preparing them for sale, and the cost of management generally; also, the quantity of lands in the Province and in the Territories, disposed of by free grant or otherwise, to the same date. He said: My object in moving for this return, is that the public may be enabled to learn how much money has actually been received for lands sold in the North-West Territories, from the day we became owners of that part of Canada, up to the end of last year, and so to be enabled to form some opinion as to the amount we may probably obtain in future by the sale of those lands, to be devoted to the payment of the cost of the construction of the Pacific Railway. Great pains have been taken, from time to time, to create the impression throughout the country, and indeed in this House, that a very large proportion of the cost of that Railway will be obtained from the sale of those lands. We had, last year, a proposal submitted to us almost dazzling by its magnificence. We were to apply to the Imperial Government for its cooperation in the management of those lands, asking it, in the first instance, to guarantee the loans we may require to negotiate from time to time, the money obtained by the Commissioners from the sale of the lands to be devoted to recouping the Imperial Government, or securing it against loss by reason of its liability on its guarantee. We have just learned that that project has not been carried out; that the appointment of a Commission has been deferred—I think we may safely conclude it has been indefinitely postponed;—that some other mode must have been devised, of raising the money for the construction of this vast undertaking. When we were invited to pass the resolutions for the admission of British Columbia into the Union, I and a good many other members thought that the conditions we were asked to accept were exceedingly onerous. We were asked to pledge ourselves solemnly to commence that enormous work within two and complete it within twelve years. The resolutions proposed were adopted by the House, and afterwards embodied in the Royal Proclamation, and they so became part of our Constitution. Subsequently, a resolution was submitted to the House, I think by the late Sir George Cartier, declaring that, in accepting those terms, we did not mean to pledge ourselves to prosecute the work at any such speed as would impose undue burdens on the people of Canada, or increase the rate of taxation. But, when Mr. Dorion, then sitting on this side of the House, proposed, as an amendment, that an Address should be presented to Her Majesty, asking her to incorporate that proposition in Her Proclamation, hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House voted that amendment down, and the original bargain remained unchanged, binding us, so far as words could, to carry out its extraordinary terms. It has been said, this Session, that the hon. member for Lambton, when he acquiesced in what we know as the Canadian Terms, for the first time bound the Dominion to construct the Railroad, or a portion of it, within a fixed period. I confess that, although I knew such a statement had been made in various parts of the country, I was not prepared to hear it repeated in this House, so absolutely and plainly contrary to the facts of the case is it. When the resolution stating the Terms of Union was passed, I said that we were solemnly binding ourselves to carry out terms far too onerous; but, when the other resolution was proposed, I argued that we could not, by any subsequent resolutions of this House, or Acts of this Parliament, modify in the slightest degree the terms of the Royal Proclamation—that we could in no way release ourselves from the bargain we had made. My views, with regard to the expediency, the policy of constructing that Railway so speedily, never changed; but I felt that, if this Parliament and Government chose to undertake certain obligations, they should be carried out in spirit and to the letter, if possible, and that we should not endeavour to avoid—indeed, that we could not modify—that obligation by any subsequent resolution. But, in every bargain made, there are some implied conditions which must always be observed, and the implied condition in that case is that we have the power to do what we promised. I think the people are now satisfied, that we have not the power to carry out the original bargain, made under the direction of the hon. gentlemen opposite, as the bargain which the hon. member for Lambton assented to, when, I suppose, under the pressure of the Imperial Government, he accepted what are known as the Carnarvon Terms. We are not in a condition to carry out the one bargain or the other. I think it is time—with enormous burdens already upon us, and an enormous deficit staring us in the face, and with the vast contracts entered intolately, with the rate of expenditure on the Railway rapidly increasing—to enquire seriously into our circumstances, and ask ourselves what means we have at our disposal for carrying the great burdens we are now incurring. Looking at the Public Accounts, I find that, before the 30th June last, we had spent about $12,500,000 on that work; in that amount, I presume, no interest is included. I think the interest on all the money borrowed has been charged to our ordinary expenditure; and we have gone on from time to time, instead of charging interest to the work and so ascertaining what it really costs us, paying that interest out of revenue. Five per cent. is about as low a rate as we now get money for; at that rate the interest on $12,500,000 would reach the enormous figure, for interest alone, $625,000 a year, paid by the people of the older Provinces. The interest on the amount spent on this Railway from the beginning would reach, if the accounts were properly made up, to at least $2,000,000 or $3,000,000. How much of this have the lands of the North-West furnished during all this time? I am afraid that, when the returns come down, it will be found that the expenditure on surveys and management has almost swallowed the total amount we have received from the sale of the North-West lands. Last year, the influx of emigrants to the North-West was unusually large, and, perhaps, it would be as well if the amounts received in that year were distinguished from those of the preceding years. I find that last year nearly 2,000,000 acres were disposed of,

but I failed to find from the Report how much money was actually received. I notice, also, that the expenditure on account of those lands, for surveys, management, and so forth, was last year $91,000. I think the people should have an opportunity of judging how much of the cost of the Pacific Railway they may expect as the product of the sale of the lands in the North-West. Rapid progress will never probably be made in portions of the West. Two large sections, completing the portion of the road between Thunder Bay and Winnipeg, have been put under contract, and the other two sections are far advanced; besides, 100 miles on the prairie, west of Winnipeg, are under contract. I think it will be found that, by the time the prairie portion is completed and equipped with rolling-stock, even that will have cost us a very large amount indeed; and there is talk of another 100 miles beyond being put under contract very soon. We also find another extensive portion of the Railway in the mountains put under contract. We have found that the actual expenditure on various sections far exceeds the original estimates, and we cannot, looking merely at the contracts, ascertain, with any degree of certainty, what the actual cost of these sections will be. Probably we shall have to add 25 to 50 per cent. to the estimated cost. We also have learned that a large amount has been spent on steel rails. The member for Lambton was charged with having purchased 50,000 tons of steel rails before they were wanted, and some hon. gentlemen who were too cautious to allege, as others did, that he was actuated by any improper motive, nevertheless objected that the rails were purchased when not wanted. I think the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) laid down briefly and emphatically the doctrine that, however prudent it might seem, Governments should make no purchases which it was not absolutely necessary to make at the time.

MR. PLUMB: I said, in other words that Governments ought not to make speculations.

MR. ANGLIN: Yes, that puts the whole case in a few words; but we find that, within a short time past, the present Government has purchased some 50,000 to 60,000 tons more. These were purchased at a very low rate, and it was to the public advantage that this purchase was made, but, nevertheless, it was made on speculation quite as much as that made by the late Minister. The Finance Minister borrowed last year some $15,000,000; part of this was used to pay off old bonds, but some $8,000,000 or $9,000,000 is to be used in making payments on the Pacific Railroad. This is added to our present debt and for this we are paying interest, how much as yet I do not know, as I presume a portion of that loan is still in deposit, and bears interest. Our debts and liabilities are growing with extreme rapidity. Our gross debt on June 30th, 1879, reached $184,000,000, and, even if we deduct $36,000,000 of available assets, we have still left about $150,000,000 of public debt. This debt has been increased by millions since June, and our liabilities have been increased enormously and yet, at this moment, I doubt if there is any hon. member on this, or on the other side, who has any clear idea as to the means by which we are to raise money sufficient to meet those obligations, as they accrue. We shall have to face a deficit, and the time is come when we should have some means of forming an accurate opinion as to the amount we are likely to receive from the sale of those lands in the North-West.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There can be no objection to the motion being adopted. The resolution covers a considerable quantity of work which will appear in the report of the Department of the Interior; however, a return will be brought down with all convenient speed. The hon. gentleman has entered into a discussion of the general policy of the Government in regard to the Pacific Railway. I do not think it would be convenient that we should on this motion enter into a discussion which will more properly arise hereafter.

Motion agreed to.

IMPORTATION OF TEA.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell) moved for an Order of the House for a statement of the quantity of tea imported into Canada direct from the countries of production, either by the St. Lawrence or in transitu through the United States, for each six months, between 1st January, 1874, and 31st December, 1879, specifying by which route the imports were made. He said: I desire, Mr. Speaker, to amend the return so as to extend it back to the 1st of January, 1872, for these reasons: It will be remembered that, in 1872, I think it was, the Government introduced a measure making tea free. Subsequently, it was discovered that a measure had passed the Congress of the United States, placing a differential duty of 10 per cent. on all products east of the Cape of Good Hope, when imported from countries west to the Cape of Good Hope; the effect of which was to make tea sent from Canada to the United States, chargeable with 10 per cent. more than if it had been imported from the countries of production. Sir Francis Hincks, then Finance Minister, introduced a special measure applying the same principle, in so far as the imports of tea and coffee from the United States were concerned. That law remained in force until 1874, when it was repealed by the late Government. At the last Session of Parliament, it was re-enacted by this House under the advice of the present Administration. As to the object of the law, it was not so much to induce direct importation by the St. Lawrence as to place in the hands of Canadian merchants, as distinguished from New York merchants, the Canadian distributing business in tea and coffee. The tendency of the legislation of the last five years, I am informed, has been to destroy that trade to a large extent. By carrying the motion back to the year 1872, we will be able to determine pretty accurately the effect of the legislation in regard to the tea trade, and I have reason to think from the information which I have received, not from the Government, but from merchants, that the result will prove that the legislation of last Session was eminently in the interest of the trade of this country, a boon conferred upon the direct trade with countries of production.

MR. BURPEE (St. John): We have always understood that the object of the differential duty on tea was to divert the trade, if possible, to the River St. Lawrence direct from its place of growth. I venture to say that not one box of tea which has come into the country during the past year has come by the St. Lawrence. This trade has been done entirely by Americans in New York, or through the instrumentality of Canadians doing business in New York. Thus the monopoly of the trade has been secured. The result of the present differential duty has been to fix the monopoly in one or two large centres of Canada, while smaller merchants in different parts of the country cannot go to New York and purchase their tea in bond without paying the additional duty of ten per cent. It is a direct protection to a few merchants doing a large trade, as against a large mass of traders in the smaller towns of the Dominion, and I venture to say that not one box of tea has come to Canada from China or Japan by way of the St. Lawrence, as was the intention when the law was passed in 1879, imposing an additional 10 per cent. duty on tea imported from the United States.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: The hon. gentleman is somewhat mistaken as to the object of the Government in passing this law. It was not simply to bring tea by way of the St. Lawrence. It was to transfer the trade from the United States to Canada. Under the operation of the law from 1874 to 1878, the wholesale trade was transferred to New York and Boston, and it was for the purpose of giving the merchants of Canada a portion of that trade that that law was enacted.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

INVERNESS — DISMISSAL OF FISHERY OFFICERS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. MACDONNELL (Inverness moved for an Order of the House for a return showing the number of dismissals and appointments of fishery overseers and wardens, in the county of Inverness, during the year 1879, with the names of the same. He said: I am informed that, within the period specified in my motion, not less than eleven or twelve removals or dismissals of fishery overseers and wardens have been made in the county of Inverness. Three overseers were removed for causes which I know not, and so, also, were some eight or nine wardens. Why this "slaughtering of the innocents" took place in that particular county, I cannot understand, and I would be most happy if the Government, in making the return to the House, would show the number of dismissals, as well as of those appointed within the period mentioned, and also, inform the House of the reasons why these dismissals were made. No doubt, Sir, some charges have been made against some of these officers. Mr. Rogers, the Inspector of Fisheries for the Province of Nova Scotia, visited that county, and, shortly afterwards, these changes were made in the ital of the fishery overseers. I am told, Sir, that that gentleman went through the county from officer to officer, and from house to house, making enquiries as to the particular side of politics to which these men belonged—not whether they were inefficient, but whether they voted for myself at the last General Election. This shows that the removals were made on account of the political complexion of the officers in question. I think that the House will be anxious to know from the Government what the grounds are upon which these removals and appointments were made. I have no doubt, as I have said, that certain charges will be made against them, but I cannot conceive that all these officers, some eleven or twelve in number, can be guilty of misconduct, unless it be sufficient misconduct in the eyes of the Government that they voted for myself.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.): There is no objection to furnish all the papers asked for. I may say that there are a large number of fishery officers throughout the Dominion, most of whom receive salaries varying from twenty to forty dollars a year. This is not sufficient to pay them to devote much of their time to the protection of the fisheries, and many of them do not take the slightest trouble or interest in the matter, consequently the river fisheries in many places have been almost entirely destroyed. Instructions were given to the Inspectors, more particularly to those of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, to make a thorough inspection throughout these Provinces, and to report to the Department, it being distinctly understood that every officer who would not attend to the proper discharge of his duty should be dismissed, but that no removals should be made on political grounds. All the dismissals in the hon. member's county were made on the recommendation of the Inspector of Fisheries for Nova Scotia.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne): So far as I know, the vacancies which have been caused by these dismissals have been filled up entirely from the Conservative ranks. In the constituency I represent, the principal fishery officer has been removed, and a strong Conservative appointed in his place, having no experience in the management of the fisheries or any other recommendation than his politics. The Inspector referred to may be regarded as a travelling missionary, cruising around as he does, preaching Protection in the interest of the Government.

MR. DALY: I can assure the House that, in each case where a dismissal has taken place, it has been necessitated by inefficiency on the part of the official. We know that the Inspector who has been referred to by the hon. member for Shelburne (Mr. Robertson), has been performing a good work this season. He has visited one county after another, and has attended to the duties of his office in such a way as to reflect credit on himself, and to present a favourable contrast to the conduct of the officer who occupied that position before him, and who distinguished himself only by the way in which he neglected his duties. I think if the Government were to dismiss the officers who occupy the positions of river wardens more generally than they do, the service would be more satisfactorily performed. There are men occupying these positions—I care not whether Grits or Tories—who do not discharge their duties efficiently; and I think, when their delinquences are brought to the notice of the Government, they should be visited with instant dismissal. I for one would very gladly commend the Government for dismissing a Conservative who holds such a position, if he fails to perform the duties devolving upon him. I think, in this instance, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has done a good service, prosecuting, to the utmost extent, and visiting with severe condemnation those fishery overseers in the Province of Nova Scotia who have neglected their duties. The only mistake is that they have not gone far enough in that direction. I may say that the county of Inverness is not less remarkable for the way in which the fisheries have been encroached upon by the inhabitants than other counties. Under these circumstances, we should look for the appointment of fishery wardens and Inspectors who will perform their duties without favour or fear of the inhabitants of the counties where the laws are disregarded.

MR. MACDONNELL (Inverness): I am glad to find that the hon. gentleman has paid such attention to the fishery interests of Inverness County as to be able to refer to them as he has done. He seems to possess a personal knowledge that the people of that county persistently violate the Fishery Laws. I am not aware that Inverness County is peculiar in this respect. I am certainly, however, at a loss to know whence the hon. gentleman gets his information. We have a very valuable river in the county of Inverness called the Margarie, upon which the officers of that county are chiefly located. I would ask the hon. gentleman who gives so much credit to the Government for their conduct in this matter if he is aware of any Tory overseers being dismissed in the county of Inverness, or in the Province of Nova Scotia, under the present Government. He says they were dismissed on account of their not performing their duties. I will say, without fear of contradiction, that it is purely on account of politics that these dismissals have been made, and that there was not a single man who voted for me that was not dismissed. That is the fact, and I reiterate that the Inspector, Mr. Rogers, an individual from Cumberland County, went through the county of Inverness and made the most particular enquiries as to the political complexion of those officers. He is not the only officer from the county of Cumberland who goes through the Province as a political agent. The people of that county cumber the whole Province of Nova Scotia with officials. We find them in all situations. The hon. member in this House for that county cumbres both the railways and canals of the Dominion. It may well be called the county of Cumberland. The Government is also chargeable with appointing several officers in Inverness County, and that purely in order to reward friends of the Government. I was often asked to appoint officers on some of the same streams, but I invariably refused to recommend the appointments, owing to the fact that it was a useless expenditure of public money.

Motion agreed to.

KAMINISTQUIA RIVER—DEPTH OF WATER.

MOTION FOR REPORT.

MR. PLUMB moved for an Order of the House for a report of depth of water on the bar at the mouth of the Kaministiquia, and return of soundings from thence to Neebing Hotel, as taken during the present winter. He said: It will be remembered that, in their wisdom, the late Government selected for one of the most important works to be built in this Dominion, namely, the Pacific Railway in the North-West, the Kaministiquia River as its present eastern terminus. A great deal of discussion in regard to the selection took place at the time, and many gentlemen on both sides of the House took part in the discussion. Evidence was taken as to the fitness of that place for such a terminus, and it was contended by the then Opposition that it was not a fit place. That discussion was carried on, not only in this House, but in the public press and on the hustings during the late election campaigns, but it was always insisted on by the head of the late Government and his party that that place was the best possible one that could be selected. It was, on the other hand, contended that a place where a vessel had to ascend four miles a stream from two to three hundred feet wide, with a shifting sand-bar at its entrance, requiring continual dredging, having great difficulty of access, and being closed by ice sooner in the fall, and opening in spring considerably later, than adjacent parts of Thunder Bay, was a very unfit place for the terminus. It was also contended that it was proper to erect this terminus upon a paper city—the town plot of Fort William—that it was proper to deflect the line of this Railway, and bring it down along the front of this town plot, along the banks of the river, when it is in evidence taken under the Commission appointed for enquiring into it, that there was equally good land to be had where it could be got a great deal cheaper, and without having to deal with fifty or sixty proprietors, who were associated with Messrs. Oliver, Davidson and Company original proprietors of the town plot, and then holding a large proportion of the lots. This town plot of Fort William was that of a town which existed only in the vivid imagination of certain acute speculators, except that it was distinguished by three or four structures, rendered historical through the public press, for, after it was decided to select that terminus, a magnificent hotel was constructed immediately upon the line to be occupied by the Railway, for which the Government was obliged to pay $5,200—the celebrated Neebing Hotel—only rivalled by the Windsor at Montreal, for accommodation to the travelling public. Well, Sir, there was a little doubt upon that side of the House which I had the honour to sit upon whether it might not have been well to secure the land for the terminus before it was given out that the terminus was absolutely fixed upon. Persons in their individual capacity, having their own personal interest in view, would have taken previous good care not to have given out that the site of the terminus had been determined upon before they had secured the land. By this omission, our late rulers committed the country to a purchase, the cost of which has swelled to nearly $75,000 for some 90 acres of land in a wilderness, where the same quantity of land on either side could have been obtained for a tenth part of the sum. But the ways of Governments are strange and mysterious—particularly of Reform Governments. We never have been able to fathom the depth of the inducements which occasioned the selection; although it was easy enough to fathom the depth of the river in front of it, which is every year lessened by the wash from its alluvial banks, and will require constant dredging every year, as well as the bar at the harbour's mouth. It is most unfortunate that that place, of all others, has been selected for the great work in question. It is most unfortunate that any possible inducement, or any error of engineering, if it can be called an error of engineering—and I do not see how it can be so called—has induced the selection of such a place, a selection that has already caused so large an outlay, that its very cost seriously embarrasses those upon whom the construction of the Railway now rests in considering the question of changing it. I remember, on visiting Thunder Bay, entering it from the east, that, on rounding the cape, we observed, five or six miles from the curve of the north-west shore, a cluster or group of low, small islands. Behind these islands and quite concealed by them, is a dip of marshy ground, through which the Kaministiquia debouches into the Bay—shifting sand-bars obstruct its entrance and render constant dredging indispensable, for its availability even for vessels of moderate draught. The banks of the river, composed of alluvial soil, are caving in with the pressure of the enormously thick ice formed upon its surface, and the whole course of the stream from the townplot downwards, is constantly filling up. Why the terminus of the Pacific Railway is there, the gentlemen on the other side of the House know better than we do. The land forming and adjoining the town plot belonged largely to an influential firm, one of whom was a member of the Ontario Legislature, until he resigned his seat to give place to a certain gentleman in Ontario, a member of the Local Government, who was in search of one, having been defeated in East Toronto. I do not mean to attribute anything wrong to Mr. Oliver, Mr. Davidson or Mr. Brown. They did but what they had a right to do: they owned a property, and they drove a profitable trade. When I sought an investigation into this matter, in the Committee of Public Accounts, years ago, I was informed by the then leader of the Government that I had taken a very violent partizan stand on this and other questions.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is impossible.

MR. PLUMB: Certainly—I tried to do my duty fairly, upon public grounds, and to make no personal attacks. I said that that terminus had been selected by the Government. I charged that that particular spot had been selected. I charged that Mr. Sandford Fleming, in his sworn evidence before the Select Committee of the Senate, had stated that the Government selected that place, and that he, Mr. Fleming, did not select it. The late First Minister saw fit, as he was then at the head of the Government, which gave him a large majority, and as he was then attended in Committee by a large number of his obsequious supporters and claqueurs, to read me a lecture, in a way that seemed very unbecoming and unprovoked, a way which he frequently adopts when he rises in this House to reply to or rebuke those who differ with him. I was discharging my duty on the Committee as a member of the Opposition, as I had a right to do. The hon. gentleman flatly contradicted my assertion as to who selected the terminus, and said that Mr. Fleming never said the Government had selected the Fort William Town Plot. I said he had said so, and I brought the sworn evidence of Mr. Fleming in entire corroboration of the statement I made. But I regret to say that the hon. gentleman, after reading me a severe lecture, had not the candour to acknowledge that I had made my point correctly, but took care to have his denial carefully reported and published. This question is of great importance to the country. The construction of the Pacific Railway under the present Government is perfectly certain. The work is to be pushed forward as vigorously as it can be, commensurate with due consideration for the resources of the country. The line is now rapidly approaching completion between Kaministiquia and Red River, and will soon be extended far towards the eastern slopes of the Rocky Mountains. It will soon be in a condition to test, to a certain extent, the capabilities of the country through which it is to pass; that gap which was to have been left while the notorious water-stretches were to be utilised is now to be filled by a continuous line from English River to Rat Portage. The water-stretches and the Fort Frances Locks, as to which the late Minister of Public Works so thoroughly committed himself and his Government, had been wholly abandoned by the late Government, long before it went out of power. When the railway line to Red River is completed, the embarrassment connected with this terminus will probably be more apparent than it is at present, but I do not know but that it may not be found, after all, that it is the right selection. It may be found, after all, that those who have criticised it may be in the wrong, and my object in moving this resolution now is to ascertain whether the enormous expense which has been incurred in dredging the mouth of the harbour and the river, in attempting to make both navigable for vessels such as will be required for the trade, has been successful.

I am anxious that it should be shown what are the capacities of this river for the great traffic which is sure to spring up at the terminus of the Pacific Railway. I hope also that we shall get from the Government during this Session a detailed account of the expenditure connected with the acquisition of land upon the town plot of Fort William, which I twice moved for when the late Government was in power, and failed to get. And I may say in this connection that, having sold all the river frontage of their paper city to the Government at town lot prices, the ingenious projectors, finding that possibly more might be got out of the rigid economists at Ottawa, extended the town plot and made a large addition to it in the adjoining township of Neebing, and sold hundred foot lots in that wilderness at fabulous city prices, as if there had not been enough pocketed in saddling an innocent Ministry with half of the lots in the town of Fort William. I have been informed that the traffic of this year, which has been confined to vessels carrying freight and supplies for the Government, and for Government contractors, small as it necessarily is, has been impeded by the want of depth of water on the bar and in the stream sufficient for those vessels that have been compelled to go up to, and deliver their cargoes at, Fort William. I understand that, on the 5th of November of this year, there was so much ice in the river, while all the bay about it was quite free, that it was impossible for vessels to go up to Fort William, or to get within hailing distance of that magnificent structure, the Neebing Hotel, whose attractions were thus offered in vain to the impeded and anxious traveller who was tantalised by the sight of the single stove pipe that towered and smoked an invitation from its lofty though unshingled roof. In a discussion here between the late First Minister and the present Minister of Railways and Canals, the former angrily disputed the statement that there was a difference in the closing of the harbour at the mouth of the Kaministiquia, and the closing of the adjacent harbours of the Bay by ice in the autumn, and its opening in the spring. I remember well when that discussion took place, and the manner in which the hon. gentleman opposite disputed the position of the hon. the Minister of Railways, and that he produced a register showing the periods at which this river closed and opened, and showing that there was a difference of from ten days to three weeks between the opening and closing of the river and the harbour outside of it in favour of the harbour. Without dwelling further upon this matter, I desire to move for the information called for in my resolution, seconded by Mr. Dawson, who has a personal knowledge of the locality, and, from his long experience in the neighbourhood, and his knowledge as a practical engineer, will be enabled to give a much more perfect statement of the necessity for the information sought than I have been able to give. I know that the hon. member will be able to give this House more valuable information with respect to the transaction connected with the location, and in respect to the location itself, which I think has been characterised either by unnecessary haste or by needless waste, or by some other motive which I do not think it would be quite Parliamentary to specify by its true designation upon the floor of this House.

MR. MACKENZIE: I have no objection that the hon. gentleman should distinguish himself every Session, if he likes, by repeating pitiable slanders and falsehoods, which have been retailed in connection with this matter.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. MACKENZIE: I am in order. I say the hon. member has revived pitiable slanders and falsehoods. I am in order in saying so. I did not say the hon. gentleman himself tells any falsehoods.

MR. SPEAKER: I think it is not exactly Parliamentary.

MR. MACKENZIE: I cannot characterise the statement in any other way.

MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. member believe that of the hon. member for Niagara.

MR. MACKENZIE: I do not, but I say he retails them. In the first place I am not to discuss the subject at length, or to follow the hon. gentleman. I would simply say this: that the site was selected by the Chief Engineer, that I agreed in the selection, that I concur now in the selection. I believe it was the best that could have been made, that the harbour and the river are the best, on the whole, of the harbours on the lakes of that class. The creek at Buffalo, the river at Cleveland, the river at Chicago, and the river at Milwaukee are all of that class, the largest harbours on the lakes; and, curiously enough, I had a visit to-day here from a gentleman who sails the largest steamer on the lakes, the Peerless of Chicago, a vessel very much larger than the largest of the Canadian vessels, and she has been in that harbour repeatedly. He was in it this year when the water was 18 inches lower than its normal level, as every man must know who has any knowledge of the lakes, and even this year he was able to go in with his large ship, drawing eleven feet and three inches, showing that the stories about want of water are altogether untrue. I have seen captains of other vessels who told the same story. All this was fully known and understood at the time the selection was made. I believe it was made fully in the public interest. But the hon. gentleman says that he has not been able to fathom the inducements. Well, I challenge him to try and fathom any inducements that ever led me to do anything but what was in the public interest. I believe this was in the public interest, and I believe the present Minister will find himself confined to that selection if he consults, as I trust he will solely consult, the public interest also.

MR. DAWSON: I had no intention of taking part in this discussion, but I may remark that I believe the placing of our great railway on the Kaministiquia River was a mistake. It is a narrow and comparatively shallow stream, and the terminus is placed about five or six miles inland from the deep water of the lake. At the mouth of that stream there is a wide bay, across which a narrow channel has been cut. As to the Peerless entering there, she was not loaded at the time.

MR. MACKENZIE: She was drawing eleven feet three inches.

MR. DAWSON: That may be the report but I have heard a different report. I heard that she drew less than ten feet, but, if the hon. gentleman asserts, from better information, that she drew more, I do not wish to contradict him.

MR. MACKENZIE: The captain of a sailing vessel told me so.

MR. DAWSON: The report I heard was that she drew only ten feet, if so much, and that, although so light, she stuck in the river and had to be towed through by a tug. There can be no question that it is a very narrow stream and the system of dredging that was pursued upon it is not one that will render it navigable. I believe the mouth of the river can be rendered accessible to vessels, but it will be on an entirely different scheme to that which has been followed hitherto in dredging it. It is inconvenient in many ways. Two vessels would hardly have room to pass in such a narrow stream; but what was the necessity of deepening it? There is an excellent harbour near it. A great deal has been said about Thunder Bay by the rival parties, one supporting the river, and the other Prince Arthur's Landing. It is said by interested parties that Thunder Bay is exposed to storms. We have, however, the best proof that it is not, in the fact that, within the last ten years, the official returns show that 2,200 vessels have visited Thunder Bay. They have come and gone in weather of all kinds, in the storms of the fall and in the ice of spring, and not so much as a single accident has occurred; not a single vessel has been damaged. Now, as the proverb hath it, "the proof of the pudding is in the eating of it," and a harbour which shows such a record as that must certainly be a good harbour. As to the reports of engineers, the only one who ever reported in favour of the Kaministiquia was Mr. Kingsford. After the mischief was done, long after the improvident selection had been made, he went up and made a sort of report, but I believe the Chief Engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway utterly denied that he recommended it.

MR. MACKENZIE: He did not.

MR. DAWSON: But I have been told that he stated before a Committee of the other House that he was not responsible for the selection.

MR. MACKENZIE: He did not.

MR. DAWSON: I think, in a letter which is now published, he says he was not responsible himself, or something tantamount to that, and he says also that Mr. Hazlewood, who was then Resident Engineer was not responsible for the selection. I know that none of the other Engineers will assume the responsibility of placing the terminus there; they all consider it inexpedient.

MR. MACKENZIE: Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask who were the Engineers that said this.

MR. DAWSON: Every Engineer of any standing who has been there.

MR. MACKENZIE: Tell us the name.

MR. DAWSON: I do not know that I should name the gentlemen in this House. I say that, of all the Engineers who have been there in charge, none would assume the responsibility of the selection.

MR. MACKENZIE: Did they say they would not?

MR. DAWSON: I wish to reflect upon no one, nor to say anything harsh in regard to any person, but merely to convince the House that a very great mistake has been committed in placing the terminus there, and one which if, it is persevered in, will involve the country in a very large and unnecessary expenditure. This harbour closes up early in the fall. It is not the water of Lake Superior, but the water of a mountain stream, which in the first place runs over rapids, where in frosty weather it becomes chilled, and then it subsides into a sluggish stream, and freezes with the first hard frost; whereas, in Thunder Bay, there are currents, and even tides, from the great open lake, and it does not freeze until winter is far advanced. On the 7th of January last, Thunder Bay was frozen only to the distance of one mile from shore, and that is an important matter as regards the navigation of Lake Superior. That lake can be navigated during a great part of the winter, for it is always open outside the headlands, and terminal harbours could be kept open by means of steam vessels adapted to passing through ice of moderate thickness. In view of a railroad to Sault Ste. Marie, and the practicability of navigating Lake Superior, for at least a part of the winter, the absurdity of placing the terminus of our great Railway five miles inland, on a narrow shoal-locked stream, which closes with the first hard frost, must be apparent to anyone who bestows the least attention on the subject.

MR. PLUMB: Since the question has arisen, with respect to the selection of the Kaministiquia River and Fort William town plot, I have procured the Journals of the Senate for 1877. There was a Special Committee appointed to enquire into the purchase of the property at Fort William, for the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I find that Mr. Fleming was the first witness examined, and I will read now a portion of his evidence :

“Question. When Fort William was fixed upon as the terminus, did you expect the ground would cost any considerable sum? You saw what it is said to have cost—over $51,000—did it strike you as being an extravagant price? Answer. I was very much surprised to see it.

“Question. Who selected the terminus point; who located it? Answer. The Government selected it.

“Question. But who located that particular point? Answer. The Government selected the terminus of the Pacific Railway on Lake Superior.

“Question. Who selected the particular piece of ground? Answer. I did. I recommended that particular piece of land shown on the plan before the Committee, coloured red, as the land required for the Pacific Railway.

“Question. Did you do that under the instructions from the Government? Answer. No. The Government selected the spot where the Railway should terminate, and I recommended that all this land (pointing to the map where it was coloured red) should be secured for railway purposes. The Government selected the spot where the land should be secured.

“Question. Who staked it out? Answer. I do not know; the land was marked out before these lots had already been in existence. The plan of survey had been previously made by the Ontario Government.

“Question. The town plot was surveyed and laid down on the map; the Government fixed upon the town plot as the terminus; and Mr. Fleming recommended a certain portion of the town that should be taken for the terminus? Answer. Quite so.”

I would say now, once for all, that the hon. gentleman on the other side, always, and everywhere, makes the same statement that he has been making now, sometimes with more temper and sometimes more calmly, but he usually flies into a temper whenever he is in the wrong. I think I have now proved to the satisfaction of every man in this House that my hon. friend opposite was a little mistaken in his statements, in what he pleases to call facts. I trust that I shall not be compelled, as I have been twice before, to bring this book to corroborate statements, which I knew perfectly I was right in making, when the hon. gentleman chose to brow-beat me in the Committee of Public Accounts on a previous occasion, and a time when he swayed this Government in a manner much more tyrannical than courteous.

MR. MACKENZIE: I am quite sure I may leave it to every fair-minded man in this House, if the hon. gentleman has made out his point. Mr. Fleming very deliberately states that he selected the land; indeed, I recommended, in the first place, going higher up the river, going above this point several miles, because I believed the river would ultimately—as I still believe it will,—be the great harbour of Lake Superior, and I saw no necessity for bringing the railway so far down as the points located by Mr. Fleming. I believe we could reach the river higher up and save some miles of railway; making it even where we did saved five miles by not going to Prince Arthur's Landing. The whole evidence will show, if read carefully, that what I state is absolutely correct. The Engineers reported that the banks were high above the point selected, and it was necessary to come down to this point in order to obtain the necessary rock elevation, and the evidence the hon. gentleman has read entirely bears out what I have stated.

MR. DAWSON: No distance would have been saved by going further up the Kaministiquia, but to the eastward of where the railroad now is the Ontario Government has recently run a colonisation road through a level country. Had the Railway been located near the same ground, the costly bridging and embankments at gullies on the borders of the Kaministiquia would have been avoided, and the lake would have been reached in about the same distance that had to be overcome in reaching the present inland terminus. There are other good harbours on Thunder Bay to the eastward of Prince Arthur, any or all of which are far preferable to the Kaministiquia.

MR. TROW: The member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) should have been satisfied with the evidence given before the Committee of the Senate, on this subject, last Session. We had the evidence of several captains or masters of vessels, who had sailed over that line, several of them, for a quarter of a century, and who stated that the place chosen was the best possible harbour that could have been selected. Not only did Canadian lake-captains give such testimony, but United States sailors and masters of vessels, corroborated that assertion. I am surprised that the member for Niagara does not treat the House to some little variation when discussing this subject, instead of a continuous rehash about the defects of the Kaministiquia harbour. The river I know, from personal examination, is not as narrow as represented by the hon. member. It is true it is a sluggish stream three or four hundred feet in width, and deposits but little, if any, débris at its mouth, as stated by that hon. gentleman. I have seen the place with parties who understand the nature of the soil on the bar; instead of its being a moving sand, as stated by the hon. member for Niagara, it is blue clay, and, if taken out, will remain so; nothing scarcely has filled in since the dredging was made. All it requires is more extensive dredging. The bar which the hon. member represents as moving sand is as old as the Falls of Niagara, and will remain permanently if only sufficiently enlarged. It is too narrow at present to enter with safety during rough weather. The harbour of Prince Arthur's Landing is dangerous, being an open lake of twenty-four or twenty-five miles in length, by twelve or fifteen in width, having no shelter, and getting the whole swell from the lake when winds from the south prevail, through the wide gap or entrance at Thunder Cape. It is often so rough as to be dangerous to enter the harbour. I was in a vessel on one occasion, when the Captain had to keep the vessel three hours in the open Bay, before venturing to enter the harbour. I am satisfied that the Kaministiquia Harbour is by far the safest and best selection that could be made.

MR. BOWELL: If that is the case, if the hon. gentleman could not enter the harbour for three hours, how could he have entered the mouth of the Kaministiquia River?

MR. TROW: The approach to the river is very much sheltered by Pie Island, and not subject to the enormous swells that flow through the gap of six or seven miles in width between Thunder Cape and Pie Island.

MR. MACKENZIE: It was not I in the first instance who sent an engineer to survey that route. It was the late Administration. When I came into office

I found that Mr. Murdock had gone there, and had at first surveyed the line as nearly as possible in the present direction, and it was from his survey that Mr. Fleming made the map in the winter of 1874, that was sent up to the proper office to have the lands registered as required under the Railway Act.

Motion agreed to.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

QUEBEC AND LAKE ST. JOHN RAILWAY COMPANY.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. VALLÉE moved for an Address for copies of the documents and correspondence which have passed between the Government of Canada and the Directors of the Quebec and Lake St. John Railway Company. He said: I shall avail myself, Mr. Speaker, of the opportunity which this motion affords me to raise my voice once again in favour of the opening up and colonisation of the Lake St. John Valley. I am aware that it is difficult to deal with this matter in this honourable House, for, at the first sight, the question appears to be one rather of local than of general interest; and I have in this respect to contend, I will not say with prejudices, but with opinions which have been formed too hastily and without sufficient examination of the subject. If the House will kindly grant me a few moments attention, I shall briefly submit some remarks which will show that it is a right, I will even say the duty of the Government, to contribute largely to the developments of the Lake St. John Valley. That tract includes a vast territory, but access to that territory is difficult to a degree. True it is that the Local Government has under its control the colonisation of Crown Lands in the Province of Quebec, but it is also true that it is the duty of the Federal Government to direct its attention to immigration, with a view to populating the territories of Canada. The Lake St. John tract may be regarded as the granary of the east. We constantly hear of the peopling of the west, it being regarded as the future grain producer, destined to yield, not only to Canada but also to foreign countries, a wonderful quantity of wheat and grain of other descriptions. It is well to encourage and to promote the colonisation of these new territories which we have acquired, but there is a danger to be avoided. It must be remembered that, from the earliest days of the settlement of the Red River country, and of Manitoba, the harvests have on occasion, been completely destroyed by disastrous scourges. Should a large tide of emigration be directed towards the west, it is to be feared that the early resources of that country will prove insufficient, and that if similar, disasters to that already experienced, in the shape of a failure of crops, should occur, the population would suffer from famine. Now it seems to me that we may provide against this peril by taking steps to develop the Lake St. John territory. It may appear strange that I should bring forward this circumstance in support of my argument but, if I do so, I do it with the object of promoting the colonisation of our wild and uninhabited, but fertile lands, and thereby of providing food for the population, not of Canada only, but of Europe, where similar disastrous failures of crops from time to time occur. At the present time we learn from European newspapers that the wheat crop has completely failed in the most fertile districts of Russia, and that a famine is now raging there. Sir, the same thing may occur in Canada; it may be that that great development which is being encouraged in the west, at the cost of the east, may later be fraught with disappointment. And, should a famine occur in the west, what means have we at our disposal with which to meet the evil? I feel it, therefore, my duty to call the attention of the Government to the matter, with the view of preventing the lamentable results of such occurrences, and the means to be adopted is to provide as much as possible the colonisation of territory in the east. I need not, Sir, point out that this question is within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, for, in fact, it comes within the scope of the powers of both Governments, and should engage the attention of both the Federal and Local authorities. But the Local Government of the Province of Quebec has exhausted its resources in the construction of great railways, which facilitate the travel of emigrants and the exportation of the produce of our country. The Lake St.

John Railway Company, a private company founded by earnest persons, has undertaken the opening up of the magnificent and fertile territory of the Lake St. John Valley. A part of that railway has been built, and the works are at a standstill, for want of means to carry them to completion. Financial difficulties, from which the Local Government has suffered, has prevented it from extending aid to the undertaking. Let it be here remarked that that Government has expended large sums in order to place the Province of Quebec in communication with the rest of Canada, and, in so doing, has rendered great services to the whole Dominion. While the Federal Government yearly devotes considerable sums to the improvement of communication between the west and other parts of our country, should we not, at the same time, apply a reasonable sum to drawing to our midst that French Canadian population which has emigrated to the United States and which has there undergone the suffering which has been common to all? Some years ago a sum for the repatriation of Canadians in the United States was voted, but, unfortunately, that sum no longer appears in our Estimates, and, Sir, I think it right to call the attention of the Dominion Government to this question, and to request them, on behalf of my Province, to promote that repatriation by granting a sum for the development of the Lake St. John Valley. The means by which that district is to be opened up and brought into communication with our great centres is the construction of a railway. I will adduce a further argument, a wider one: I mean one more plainly bearing on the case from a Dominion point of view, and one which will, I think, convince the House. It is this: large sums have been expended for the construction of the Intercolonial Railway, which extends to Quebec, and which is connected with the great system of western railways by the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa, and Occidental Railway built at the expense of the Government of Quebec. The Lake St. John Railway, when completed, will connect with the Intercolonial, and will, therefore, in accordance with the principle laid down by the Mackenzie Government, have a right to claim assistance from the Dominion Government. We have seen local lines in the Maritime Provinces encouraged by the Government, because they connected with that great national work, the Intercolonial Railway. I may now adduce the same argument in favour of the building of the Lake St. John Valley Railway. Strong in that precedent, I say to the Government: If, for the time being, you cannot directly give us a sum of money to assist us in building this railway, you can aid us indirectly by placing on the Estimates a sum of $50,000 for the repatriation of our countrymen, and the Lake St. John Railway Company will undertake in each year to settle a certain number of Canadians, who have been restored to their country, on the lands in the district of Lake St. John. This is a work which I may well suggest and recommend to the Federal Government. I am well aware that a question of money is one beset with difficulty for any Administration, but I think I am fairly entitled, on behalf of this Railway, to ask at least for the favours which have been granted to the Nova Scotia Railways. You have still old rails removed from the Intercolonial Railway at your disposal. Well, grant us a portion of them, and I promise you that we shall carry out our engagements towards the Government, and return them or pay you the price or value as faithfully as Nova Scotia. If there is no possibility of our getting direct aid in money from the Government for this object, we ask to be helped in the manner I have just suggested. Last summer, we were honoured by a visit from the hon. the Prime Minister and the hon. the Minister of Railways. They came to examine our works and to judge and see for themselves as to our efforts to open up that district. They saw a portion of the country and greatly admired it. They then promised to assist us so far as the Dominion Government would permit them to do so. Mr. Speaker, a favourable opportunity is now offered, and, if the Government desire to give effect to the project I now submit to them for the repatriation of our fellow-countrymen, let them give us some little aid towards completing the Lake St. John Railway. If I am blamed for asking aid for purely local work, I answer without hesitation or fear, that, when we grant money for buildings in any particular locality, or for particular railways—say the Canada Central, or for the improvement of certain rivers in Ontario—no doubt such works are carried out only in one Province, but we vote the money because it will produce good results for the country generally. This is the fact as regards the Lake St. John Railway. It will be of great use, in the first place, to the Intercolonial Railway, and then, in a general sense, to the Dominion of Canada, inasmuch as it will open up for settlement a vast tract of territory, capable of supporting a large population, a territory which will one day become a vast granary and serve to shield us from famine in the event of a failure of the crops in the west. I shall say nothing more on this point at present, as I shall have occasion to refer to it again during the course of the Session, but I have confidence in the generosity of the Government, and I hope the hon. the Minister of Railways will see that this understanding is destined to be of great service to the Dominion and that it is, therefore, entitled to receive aid and support.

Mr. CIMON: The hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Vallée) deserves the thanks of this House for having brought before us this important question of the railway from Quebec to Lake St. John. The hon. gentleman has already for several years agitated that question, which is a deeply interesting one, both for the whole Dominion and for the Province of Quebec. In the capacity of editor of one of the most important newspapers of the city of Quebec, he has made the public aware of the great importance of building the railway. If any subject in relation to the Province of Quebec deserves the special attention of the Dominion Government it is surely the question of this Railway; for it is destined to open up for settlement one of the largest territories in the Dominion of Canada. The Lake St. John district, considered in relation to its extent, is far larger than the Province of Manitoba itself; it is a territory capable of containing and supporting a much larger population than Manitoba. One of the great objections urged against the construction of this Railway, and specially against the Lake St. John territory, is that that part of the country can never bring any contributions to the Dominion Treasury. Now, that objection is perfectly futile, and was simply raised as a motive for refusing aid to the undertaking. If we look at the statistics and at the returns of the Customs at Quebec, we shall find that that territory deserves the consideration of this House. A reference to the statistics shows that the number of vessels, transatlantic and home trade, entered at the various ports of the Saguenay represents a tonnage of 1,577,760. These returns show, therefore, that the ports on the Saguenay river stand in the third rank in the Province of Quebec. First we have Montreal, then Quebec and next the Saguenay River, classed as to their respective importance in this sense. This fact is conclusive and deserves the special attention of the Government of the Dominion. If so large a number of vessels have traded with the Saguenay district, it is evident that a large amount of revenue must have accrued to the Dominion Treasury. Last summer, the public heard with pleasure the remarks made by the hon. the Prime Minister and the hon. the Minister of Railways when they visited the city of Quebec and travelled over that portion of the Railway which is in operation. Those hon. gentlemen expressed themselves as favourably disposed in relation to the construction of the road. Those words were read with satisfaction throughout the Province of Quebec; the hon. gentlemen were thanked for them, and we trust they will carry out what the people expect of them. I shall not detain the House any longer in relation to this matter and I shall in conclusion again thank the hon. member for having this evening placed this question before the Government of the Dominion. I thank him sincerely for the active part he has taken as to this question.

MR. LANDRY: I desire to give the support of my feeble tongue to the eloquent remarks made by my hon. friends the members for Portneuf (Mr. Vallée) and Chicoutimi (Mr. Cimon), and, together with them, to plead before the Government for the construction of the Lake St. John Railway, and for the settlement of that immense and fertile valley, destined by nature to become the well-filled granary of the Province of Quebec—truly a noble cause to advocate. Nevertheless, if I may be permitted, I will at once correct an error into which my friend the member Chicoutimi has fallen: quite involuntarily I am willing to believe. Statistics in hand he has sought to prove to the House that the Saguenay ports' held the third place in respect to commercial importance, ranking immediately after the ports of Quebec and Montreal. Such is the allegation of the hon. member; but what has he to say about the port of Montmagny? He has evidently overlooked it in his researches, otherwise he would have given to the harbour of Montmagny the importance it deserves, and the Saguenay ports would only have held the fourth place. But the question before us concerns more important interests, to which special interests must naturally give place. I unreservedly adopt the view taken by the two members who have just spoken, and I hope the Government will understand the full importance of the question now submitted for debate. There is a consideration which my hon. friends have not treated of at length, which ought, as it seems to me, to have its justification here, and that it should not be lost sight of. It places the question on a much wider basis, by giving it all the importance of a matter which no longer concerns a single Province, but the whole Confederation. Now this consideration, Mr. Speaker, may be stated as follows: The North Shore Railway is destined inevitably to become a portion of the Pacific, an indispensable link in this great iron highway. From the various surveys which have been made up to the present day in order to run a line and locate the Lake St. John Railway, the fact has been ascertained that it is possible, if I mistake not, to construct a branch starting from some point near Batiscan, reaching the head of Lake St. John, encircling this Lake with its girdle of steel, crossing the immense valley which surrounds it, and coming south by way of the Ste. Marguerite River Valley as far as Tadousac. The last named place would become the terminus of the Pacific, and, nature having made it a winter port, we should have at every season of the year the most direct and shortest line from the Atlantic to the Pacific. In this aspect, Mr. Speaker, I think that it is the interest, not only of the county of Chicoutimi, but of the Province, of the whole Confederation to support the scheme proposed by the hon. member for Portneuf. It is also my hope—I might say, further, that it is my conviction—that not only will the members of the Province of Quebec, but also the members of the other Provinces, friends of their country and of its prosperity, unite in a common effort, to exercise for its benefit their salutary influence upon the Government of the present day, so as to cause it to make accurate surveys, in order to determine to the satisfaction of all the important question now submitted for our consideration.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I have a lively recollection of a pleasant visit to the locality indicated by the hon. gentlemen who have just addressed the House; and I think I have a clear recollection of guarding myself, as I would be in duty bound to guard myself, under any circumstances, from making any very positive pledge in relation to any aid to this important line of railway. I am the more inclined to think that I was tolerably careful, because, if I had committed myself to the extent that the gentlemen who have so eloquently addressed the House in favour of this railway would seem to indicate, they, being masters, as they are, of the English language, as well as the French, would have been apt to remind me of my promise in language I could understand. I need not say that any person who knows anything of the section of country that is indicated between the city of Quebec and Lake St. John must be quite aware of the great importance of such a line of road in the development of, perhaps, one of the finest portions of the Province of Quebec, and, I think I may safely say, one of the finest sections of country to be found in any of the older Provinces. The advantage of such a road would be, not only in the general development of the country, but as opening up a most inviting field for emigration and colonisation in the Province of Quebec; the importance of such a line of railway would be adding greatly to the volume of trade of Quebec Harbour, and promoting business over the Intercolonial Railway, of which it would form a most important feeder by the connection by the ferry, with the terminus at Point Lévis. This would, no doubt, make this line of communication one of great importance to the whole country, and one which it would be greatly in the interest of the country to promote by every means in our power. I am afraid, however, that the large claims upon the Government for railway construction, claims that press more immediately upon it, and that are of a character that cannot well be postponed, will make it extremely difficult for the Government to give such aid as it would be really in the interests of the country to give to the line under consideration. I can only say that the communications that have been made to me, and to the Government, in relation to this important work, have engaged my attention, and that I shall, at an early day, bring it formally under the notice of my colleagues, with the view of giving a definite answer to the communications which we have received on the subject.

CIVIL SERVICE—INSIDE DIVISION.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. MUTTART moved for an Address for a return of the Inside Division of the Civil Service, by Departments, showing:—

1st. A list of employés appointed from the several Provinces composing the Dominion, from July 1st, 1873, to the present date; also, showing the proportion in which these Provinces are now represented in the Service.

2nd. A list of employés appointed from countries other than Canada, since Confederation, showing the nationality of each, how long resident in Canada previous to appointment, and present salary, if now in the Service.

He said: My object in making this motion is that, when the Civil Service Bill comes up for discussion, I may be in possession of such information as will enable me, as a representative of Prince Edward Island, to discover whether certain complaints respecting the Inside Civil Service are correct or not. I am of opinion that the Island Province is not represented in this Service as she ought to be. As the Island now forms part of the Dominion, it is nothing but fair that she should be represented in the Inside Civil Service according to her population. If we put down the population of Canada at four millions, and the population of Prince Edward Island at 120,000, then the population of the Island is about one thirty-third part of the Dominion. There are, I believe, over 600 positions in the several Departments in Ottawa. The one thirty-third part of 600 would be about eighteen, and this number would represent the share to which the Island is entitled in a fair distribution of the offices in the Inside Civil Service. Another object which I have in view in asking for these returns is this: it is stated that a great many of our best offices with the largest salaries are filled by those who are not Canadians. It is stated that in some of the Departments more than half the employés are imported from abroad. If this be true, it is surely time for us as Canadians to know the fact, and to take some measures that will prevent this injustice to our own people. We do not expect the Government to dismiss worthy and efficient officials of the present staff, but we hope, in the future, in the working of the new Civil Service Bill, the foreign element will be dispensed with. While we are trying to protect our native industries it is nothing but fair that we should endeavour to protect our native talent. It is hoped that in the new Civil Service Bill the motto "Canada for the Canadians" will be duly considered.

GRAIN IMPORTS FROM THE UNITED STATES.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron) moved for an Order of the House for a return showing the quantity of wheat, oats, peas, barley and corn, imported from the United States from the 15th March, 1879, to the 1st day of February, 1880, together with the duty actually collected on each kind of grain, and the quantity of wheat and oats in bond on the 1st day of January, 1880; and also a copy of all bonds now existing and held by the Government in respect to wheat and oats. He said: I should like the Minister of Customs to make the return by Provinces. It was suggested by several hon. members that this would be more satisfactory than an aggregate return for the whole of the Provinces. I may also say that I do not want a copy of all the bonds, because, if there are many of them, it would make the return too voluminous, and prevent its being laid on the Table in time to be of any service in the discussion that will undoubtedly take place this Session, on the proposed amendments to the Tariff.

MR. MUTTART.

If the hon. gentleman will make a copy of any one bond—if there is such a thing in existence. I do not know whether there is or not—and furnish me with the names of the obligors to the other bonds, all the purposes I require will be served. All I know about the matter is that which I saw in a newspaper last August. One of the journals in Western Ontario, published a letter signed by "A Miller," drawing the attention of the public to the fact that some Orders in Council had been passed by the Government, under which certain large millers were entitled to import into Canada from the United States, wheat free of duty or in bond, and also allowed a year in which to make their returns. At the end of the year, they either had to pay the duty on the wheat so imported, or account for its equivalent in flour that had been exported. The two firms alluded to in the letter in question, as having had some understanding or agreement with the Government, with respect to the matter, emphatically, distinctly and positively, over their own signatures, denied that such an understanding or agreement existed. A few days afterwards, I saw in the same paper what purported to be a copy of the Order in Council under which millers were permitted to import wheat as originally charged by the correspondent. This Order was dated the 10th July, 1879, and it confirmed the statement that was made by the person who wrote the letter signed "Miller." It is, of course, desirable that the information in reference to this matter should be obtained before a discussion takes place upon other questions that will undoubtedly come up before the House, in connection with the discussion that must follow the proposed amendments of the Government to the Tariff. I therefore desire that these returns be brought down at an early day.

MR. BOWELL: There is no objection to change this motion as suggested by the hon member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron). If he looks at the motion carried, moved by the hon. member for St. John, N. B., (Mr. Burpee), he will find that gentleman asks for a return of the different grades of wheat, peas and barley and that too by Provinces. I should like it to be understood that we should take these two returns and combine them in one, as there is scarcely any necessity for duplicating them. The Government is most anxious to give the hon. gentleman all the information he requires, and I am quite satisfied that, if he had paid a little attention to and read the Official Gazette, he would have seen the Order in Council to which he refers. The hon. gentleman has based his statement on articles published in newspapers opposed to the whole policy of the Government. I am well aware that a charge was made that the rules had been relaxed so as to admit grain from the west into this country free. The names of the millers were also indicated, who it was alleged were the favoured parties, and these gentlemen, over their own signatures, denied at the time the charge was made, that they had imported a bushel of wheat since the new Tariff came into force. The hon. gentleman will remember that, during the discussion on the question of the Tariff last year, it was distinctly stated by the Finance Minister, on behalf of the Government, that every facility would be afforded to millers in different sections of the country to import grain from the west, and grind it in bond, and subsequently export it. I will also, in bringing down this return, attach the affidavits in reference to the exportation of the wheat so bonded, or its equivalent in flour. The bonding system was also discussed very freely for a long time, when the question of the Tariff was under consideration. It seems to me that, after the party opposed to the policy of the Government had found that the mills in the western section of the country were not shut up, they made an attempt to convince the farmers, particularly those in the west, that the Government had practically so relaxed the Tariff as to repeal the duty that had been placed on wheat, without indicating to Parliament the fact that they intended to allow grain to be imported and manufactured in bond for exportation, even if there were reasons for opposing the bonding system. I repeat, it was distinctly understood when the Tariff was under discussion, that, in order to encourage the manufacturer of flour and meal in this country, grain would be permitted to be entered and manufactured in bond on the parties giving bonds that that grain, or its equivalent in flour or meal, should be exported from the country, or duty paid upon it. The Government has no objection to this motion passing; and the House will find, when the return is brought down, that the Government has not exceeded, in any one particular, the promises made when this question was under discussion last year.

MR. ANGLIN: This matter attracted my attention at the time there was so much discussion about it in the newspaper press, and I think I read the Order in Council also; and, unless I am mistaken, the hon. the Minister of Customs has not put the matter fairly before the House in the statement he has just made. The objection is not that American wheat is allowed to come into this country to be ground. The complaint is this: that just at the time when the Canadian farmer, who happened to hold any wheat on speculation, had a right to expect that he would get a larger price for his wheat—because of the insufficiency of Canadian wheat and flour in the country for the home demand—at that very time, some large millers were allowed to introduce American wheat into this country, and place the flour made of it on the Canadian markets without having paid any duty thereon. They were permitted, by the terms of their bond, to grind other wheat when the new harvest had come in, and the price of wheat had fallen. They derived an advantage from being allowed to grind wheat of the new crop, for that which they imported, when there was a scarcity of the wheat of the old crop, and farmers would have obtained higher prices had no flour made of American wheat been allowed to enter the Canadian market without paying duty. Now that is an entirely different state of things from what we were led to expect last year. The Premier, in reply to some observations made at that time on this side of the House, stated most emphatically and in the strongest language, that while the Canadian farmers had a bushel of Canadian wheat to sell no other wheat would be allowed to be consumed in Canada, unless it paid duty. The whole spirit of the National Policy as propounded last Session, as far as it affects the farmers of this country, has been deliberately disregarded and violated by the very men who claim the credit of having protected the farmers and the farmers' interests.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY : Oh.

MR. ANGLIN: The hon. the Finance Minister may laugh, but that will not alter the matter in the least.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

ONTARIO NORTH - WEST BOUNDARY.

MOTION FOR COPY OF AWARD.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron) moved for a duplicate or copy of the award respecting the North-West boundary of Ontario, and all documents and papers relating to such boundary, and all correspondence between the Government of Ontario and the Dominion Government on the subject of such boundary. He said. At the close of the last Session of Parliament, I enquired of the First Minister whether he was prepared or not to lay on the Table of the House a copy of the Award respecting the North-West boundary, and any Order in Council or papers in the possession of the Government in relation thereto. The answer he then made was, that the original Award, or the duplicate itself transmitted to him and all the papers connected therewith were lost or mislaid in his office, and that he would cause an enquiry to be made for those papers and bring them down at the earliest moment. Some days afterwards the enquiry was renewed by me, and a similar answer was again returned. I am aware that before the House rose a copy of the Award and papers bearing on the question were transmitted to the First Minister, and were in his possession; but, so far as I know, he never brought them down to the House. Now, it is absolutely necessary that the papers connected with the north-western boundary should be submitted to the House before any further discussion takes place on this important question; and had they been submitted at the close of last Session—as the First Minister, I think, led the House to understand they would be submitted—they would have aided the gentlemen who took part in the discussion which took place on this question the other day. The papers were not submitted to Parliament; and I now ask that they be laid on the Table of the House.

MR. ANGLIN.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY : There is no objection to the motion.

Motion agreed to.

WILLIAMSBURGH CANAL—DEPTH OF WATER.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. ROSS (Dundas) moved for an Order of the House for a return showing the depth of water on mitre sills in each lock on the Williamsburgh Canals during the season of navigation for the past six years, giving the highest and lowest points of water on sills each month for the period asked; also, showing the number of vessels or steamers detained in said canals each year for same period, in consequence of insufficiency of water in said canals, and the length of time so delayed, and copies of all correspondence in relation thereto. He said: My reason for asking for this return is in order to show the House, and particularly my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals, the pressing necessity there is that we should have our canal system perfected, as we all, I hope, desire it shall be, sooner or later. The great difficulty experienced in the Williamsburgh Canal is the great deficiency of water, in consequence of which vessels with large cargoes are frequently detained for a day or two when proceeding westward. It is very well understood that vessels do not generally use the canal on their downward trip, but undoubtedly they do use them on their upward trips; and frequently many vessels, heavily laden; are detained and sustain a loss which is calculated to throw discredit on our canal system—a system in regard to which we have in this country taken a great deal of credit to ourselves. In the Chief Engineer's report for 1875 I find he says:

“In October, 1872, the river was so low that there was only six feet seven inches of water on the sills of the guard lock Rapide Plat; clearly establishing the fact that the bottom will have to be lowered about five and a half feet to secure a depth of twelve feet at low water.”

There is a great difference of opinion, I believe, as to what the depth of those canals should be. Last year when this matter was before the House, I took the ground—and I have seen no reason to change my opinion since—that six feet at what we call extreme low water, would be found quite sufficient depth for all necessary purposes. I mentioned that, because the variation of the river at this point is very peculiar. That depth would give all the water required for the transportation of the country. It is settled upon, I understand, that we should have at least a twelve feet canal system throughout. We shall have that in the Welland Canal, which is to be shortly opened, and we have it in the Lachine Canal. That being the case, there can be no two opinions that the intermediate canals should be of a corresponding depth. I think these two extremes point to what the general depth should be. The Chief Engineer further remarks :

This corroborates what I said last year, that the water varies from four to six feet in twenty-four hours. My object now is to press upon the House and the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals, that the people in our section of the country, believe there is a pressing necessity that this work should be proceeded with at once. I hope the hon. gentleman will place in the Estimates this year, a sum that will assure us that the Williamsburgh Canal will be proceeded with and enlarged. The Beauharnois Canal has a depth of ten feet, the Cornwall Canal from nine to ten feet, whereas the Williamsburgh Canal, in the fall of the year, when there is a great amount of business to be done, frequently has a depth of not more than seven feet. Therefore, it will be easily seen, that the next appropriation for the enlargement of the St. Lawrence canals, should be expended on the Williamsburgh section of these canals. When the return comes down it will show that, in 1872, and in the various years since, this difficulty arose in regard to the Williamsburgh Canal. Every Canadian ought to take an interest and a pride in having our canals perfect; and forwarders prepared, by means of proper steamers and barges, etc., to compete with any rival that may be carrying to the seaboard. Both Governments have been committed to the enlargement scheme, and I think there can be no sound reason why we should longer delay ; and the country will, I am sure, bear out the Government in any expenditure that may be incurred in widening this canal. While it may be advisable to proceed to that magnificent country on the Pacific slope other interests should not be sacrificed. We can well afford to rest and take our time to get to the great Pacific slope, but it is important that we should increase the communication by water with the St. Lawrence. But this question will, I hope, be further discussed when it comes up at a later time, and when I have the pleasure of hearing from the Government that they have placed in the Estimates half a million of dollars for the improvements of the Williamsburgh Canal.

Motion agreed to.

WELLAND CANAL — SUPPLY OF LUMBER.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. TROW moved for an Order of the House for a copy of the advertisement asking for tenders, and for copies of all tenders, for the supply of timber and lumber for the Welland Canal, submitted in answer to advertisement of January 12th, 1880, marking the one accepted ; with statement showing the hour at which each tender was delivered at the office of Mr. Ellis, Canal Superintendent, and, in case the lowest tender was not accepted, the reasons for the selection made ; also, for copies of all tenders submitted for the supply of iron or ironwork for the said canal, and a statement of all circumstances connected with the letting of the contract for such ironwork ; also, for copies of all correspondence in reference to the cancellation of contracts for supplies on the said canal, which were in force previous to April, 1879 ; and in reference to the purchase of supplies for the canal since that time, whether by contract or otherwise ; and in reference to the employment of men on the said canal since 10th October, 1878 ; also the names of all parties furnishing supplies and performing blacksmith or other work without tender, and the amount paid to each such person during the said last mentioned period.

He said: The reason for making this motion is; that it is alleged by some contractors that the contract was not let to the lowest tender, and that the tender of the successful party was not put in until after the hour mentioned in the advertisement.

MR. DREW moved that the following words be added at the end thereof:—"Also, copies of all advertisements asking for tenders for blacksmithing, iron, ironwork, lumber and timber, between January, 1874, and September, 1878—the names of the papers in which said advertisements were published—copies of all tenders for the said work and supplies—distinguishing those accepted; also the names of all parties furnishing supplies and performing blacksmith work without tender, and the amount paid to each such persons annually during the said last mentioned period."

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I do not see any objection to the motion or the amendment. I can only say that I directed that tenders should be invited in the usual manner; that, having received a report from the Superintendent recommending the acceptance of the lowest tenders for the work, I directed that that should be done; and I can only say that I am not aware of any complaint being received by the Department, or of any coming to the knowledge of the Department, in reference to anything unfair or irregular. If anything of the kind did take place, I should like to know of it. We shall furnish the information asked for as closely as possible in the form moved for.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

TORONTO CUSTOM-HOUSE DEFALCATIONS.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

MR. PATERSON (South Brant) moved for an Address for a statement showing the amount of the defalcations in the Custom-house at Toronto, together with all reports, correspondence, Orders in Council, and other papers respecting the same.

MR. BOWELL: There is no objection to the production of the papers asked for, from which, when brought down, the House will see, that a defalcation existed at that port in 1874. This fact was brought under the notice of the late Government by one of the Inspectors. Had the facts then been investigated, the present large defalcation would not, in all probability, have occurred.

MR. BURPEE (St. John): That is the first intimation that I ever received of any such defalcation at that time.

MR. BOWELL: Inspector Kavanagh reported the fact to the Department that one of the officers now dismissed was in default in 1875. If the hon. gentleman did not know what was doing in his own Department it is not my fault.

Motion agreed to.

INSOLVENCIES IN 1878 AND 1879.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron) moved for an Order of the House for a statement showing the number of insolvencies in the several Provinces, and the whole number in the Dominion, in the years 1878 and 1879 separately; the amount of liabilities as furnished by the insolvents, or otherwise obtained, the average for each estate; the claims proven, the average for each estate; the receipts upon all the estates, the amounts paid by way of dividend, the amounts paid for costs, commission, etc.; the average percentage paid by way of dividend upon the aggregate amount of such furnished liabilities, and the average percentage paid by way of costs, commission, and other disbursements upon the assets realised. He said: Similar returns were brought down in the year 1874. I find that in 1879 returns were submitted to Parliament containing information similar to that called for by this motion, for 1876 and 1877. I now move for returns down to 1878 and 1879. I am quite sure the information thus obtained will well repay the trouble in making them out; because the information in the two returns brought down is exceedingly interesting and valuable. I have no doubt those for 1878 and 1879 will be still more interesting and valuable. I am quite sure the Government can have no objection to the returns, because if the statements of the Government are correct, that the country is prosperous, and trade has revived since their advent to office, the returns must show that the number of insolvents has largely decreased.

MR. TROW.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: It was stated by the leader of the Opposition the other night, that the amount of failures the last year exceeded that of the previous. A similar statement was made in the leading organ of our friends opposite, and also the announcement that the largest number of failures took place in the United States in 1878, just before the good change in that country appeared, and it is very probable that here, also, the worst year is the precursor of better times, so, as last year was the worst, the next year may be the better.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron): How does the hon. gentleman get that information, as there is no Insolvency Law in the United States?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: That is just the position we are to be in also.

Motion agreed to.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY EMPLOYÉS.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

MR. LANDRY moved for an Order of the House for: 1st. A statement showing, in separate columns, the names of the several persons employed on the Intercolonial Railway, in the Province of Quebec, their ages, their nationalities, the religious faith to which they belong, their places of residence, the nature of their employment, the present amount of their yearly salaries, the date at which they entered the service, and the amount of their salary on entering such service; 2nd. A similar statement for the Province of New Brunswick; 3rd. A similar statement for the Province of Nova Scotia; 4th. A statement showing, in separate columns, the names of the several superior employés in the service of the Intercolonial Railway, their ages, their nationality, their religious belief, their place of residence, the nature of their employment, the present amount of their annual salary, the date of their entering the service, and the amount of their salary on entering the said service; 5th. A statement showing, in so many separate columns, the names of the several employés of the Intercolonial Railway who have ceased to be employed on the Railway since the 18th October, 1878, their nationality, their religious belief, the nature of the post they held, the salary attached to such post, the cause of discharge or resignation, by whom they were replaced, the names of their successors, the nationality and religious belief of such successors, their salaries, their place of residence, the name of the Province to which such discharged employés belonged, and of the Province to which their successors belong.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I think a motion has already passed this House asking for a return somewhat similar, so far as applied to the Rivière du Loup branch. I only desire to say that it is not desirable to multiply these returns; and, if the information asked for in this return covers that asked for in the previous motion, it would be desirable to drop the previous motion. The hon. gentleman, in the motion now before the House, does not state whether he requires the dates upon which the officials upon the Rivière du Loup branch entered the service of the Grand Trunk Railroad Company or the Government. The great bulk of the officials upon that branch of the road entered the service of the Government when they became owners of the road. I would like the hon. gentleman to state whether he means when they entered the service of the Government, or whether he wishes to know how long they have been in the employment of the road.

MR. LANDRY: The hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals wishes to know whether by "the date at which they entered the service," spoken of in my motion, is meant the entry into the service of the Government, or, in a more general way—at least in so far as regards the Province of Quebec, that part of the Railway which extends from Rivière du Loup—the entry into the service of the Company which owned that part of the road before the Government purchased it, is to be understood. It is the latter interpretation I give to my motion, and, if the thing is possible, I ask the Government to interpret it in that sense. At the period of the transfer to the Government, important changes took place; salaries were reduced. I wish to know and I wish the public to know, all that occurred at that time. In support of the motion I have just made, it will not, I think, be out of place to say a few words as to a rumour which is generally current and which is perhaps well founded. I trust, nevertheless, that such is not the case, and this House will be gratified should the Government in general, and the hon. the Minister of Railways in particular, take the necessary steps to remove the feeling of uneasiness which exists in the Province of Quebec. But what is the rumour? What is this feeling of uneasiness? It is useless to conceal it, Mr. Speaker, the Province of Quebec, or at least, that part of the Province which is traversed by the Intercolonial Railway, complains as to the distribution of patronage on the Railway. Are these complaints well founded? I am quite willing to believe that they are not, but special instances are spoken of, and, to mention but one, it has been asserted of late that the superior employés of the Railway had taken the trouble to bring up from the Maritime Provinces a certain number of carpenters to work at the Chaudière Station, in your own county, Mr. Speaker, which you represent with so much honour. Now everybody knows that the county of Lévis, or the county of Montmagny can furnish in abundance all the labour required, for the construction of public buildings erected within their limits, without seeking unnecessary aid at all events from distant Provinces. I am not aware as to the truth or falsehood of this charge, but, true or false, it is the interest of the Government to remove from the public mind the effect which such statements may produce. It is the interest of the Government to protect the rights of the Province of Quebec. The hon. the Minister of Railways has already taken one great step in that direction, and the appointment of Mr. MacDonald of Kamouraska to the post of Assistant Superintendent of the Intercolonial Railway has been received by the public with a feeling of well grounded satisfaction. But the action of the Government must not stop there, and I trust that every time promotions are to take place in the Province of Quebec, the selections may invariably be made from persons residing in the Province. By so acting, the Government will meet with general approbation and the support of all lovers of justice, and the charges made against the present Administration, while they may have been well founded in the past, will fall to the ground of themselves and be utterly forgotten.

Motion agreed to.

MR. LANDRY.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

The following motions for Returns were severally agreed to :

PRAYERS.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 21) To empower the Stadacona Fire and Life Insurance Company, to relinquish their Charter, and to provide for the winding up of their affairs.—(Mr. Casgrain.)

Bill (No. 22) Further to amend the Act therein cited, incorporating the Canada Guarantee Company.—(Mr. Girouard, Jacques Cartier.)

MR. FLEMING.

Bill (No. 23) To incorporate the French Atlantic Cable Company.—(Mr. Cameron, North Victoria.)

Bill (No. 24) To incorporate the Dominion Commercial Travellers' Association.—(Mr. Gault.)

Bill (No. 25) To authorise the establishment of Superannuation, Provident and Insurance Funds by the Great Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Robertson, Hamilton.)

Bill (No. 26) To incorporate the Emerson and Turtle Mountain Railway Company.—(Mr. Royal.)

Bill (No. 28) Further to amend an Act respecting the security to be given by officers of Canada.—(Sir Samuel L. Tilley.)

ADDRESS TO HIS EXCELLENCY.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I move for the adoption of an Address of this House, concurring in the recommendation in His Excellency's Speech, in relation to the distressed people of Ireland.

MR. MACKENZIE: I do not desire to say a word in seconding the motion, except this: I observe from some of the telegraphic despatches that an amendment has been made to the Government Bill in England, providing for relief of the sufferers from famine in Ireland, to the effect that every person who receives relief shall be disfranchised. It seems unaccountable to me that there should be such a provision. Still, the despatches seem to say so. I have merely to suggest to the hon. gentleman that, when the money is sent to the Secretary of State, it should be accompanied by the request that no Canadian contribution should be used for the purpose or with the result of disfranchising the Irish sufferers.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think the hon. gentleman is not under a misapprehension in merely reading the telegraphic reports. The hon. gentleman is quite correct in supposing the existence of a provision in the law disfranchising certain recipients of relief. But such would not be the case as regards this Canadian contribution. There is a provision in the Poor Law of England and Ireland—the ordinary Poor Law—that the acceptance of relief from the parish is, of itself, a disqualification.

MR. HOLTON: What is the effect of this change?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Any sum of money, any grant of indoor or outdoor relief by the Poor Law Guardian, to a voter, disqualifies him—I do not know for how long—from the exercise of the franchise.

MR. HOLTON: Does the amendment made to this Bill place the beneficiaries from this fund in the category of those receiving relief under the Poor Laws of the country, working their disqualification—that is the point?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: No voluntary contributions, any more than an ordinary gift, can have that effect. The policy of the law is that a party who is a pauper, according to the construction of the Poor Laws, by getting parish relief out of the fund provided by law, should be disfranchised. This merely voluntary contribution of the people of Canada can not have any effect in law in that way.

MR. HOLTON: in view of the statement that a Bill has passed the British House of Commons, under the auspices of the Imperial Government, causing the disfranchisement of all who participate in the benefits of the relief appropriated by that Bill, my hon. friend the member for Lambton has properly suggested that we should take care that such direction is given to our contribution as will not make us parties to the disfranchisement of the temporarily poor, by placing them in the category of those who are burdens upon the parish.

MR. MILLS: That would seem to be the burden of the Bill now before the Imperial Parliament. It places the recipients of any relief exactly in the position of those who receive relief under the Poor Law, and, of course, that being the case, all who receive relief from the Imperial Treasury will be classed as paupers and disfranchised as such. Great care should be taken that we be no parties in any way to any measure of that sort.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: By no possibility can our contribution have such effect, any more than the subscriptions of private individuals or corporations.

MR. HOLTON: Every care should be taken that our contribution be not made to work towards the disfranchisement of the suffering Irish.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I shall take care it will not.

MR. ANGLIN: It is very difficult to understand what the telegrams mean. We know that some time ago the Imperial Government authorised Boards of Guardians in Ireland, in several Poor Law Unions, to extend relief to the suffering in some way not very well defined. I think now that this Bill is introduced to legalise that course—to authorise those Boards to extend relief outside of the ordinary poor-rate relief. The effect of the amendment proposed would probably be to extend to persons relieved under this Act the operation of those clauses of the Poor Law which disfranchise those who receive relief from the poor rates. The difficulty, then, is that if our money be by the Imperial Government handed over to the Poor Law Guardians for distribution, it may be so employed as to destroy the rights as electors of those receiving such relief, and we know that a general election is approaching, and every means will be used by one side or other to disfranchise those supposed to be hostile to the Tory or Liberal candidates.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I shall take every care to guard against such results.

Resolved, That the following Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-General:—

“To His Excellency the Right Honourable Sir JOHN DOUGLAS SUTHERLAND CAMPBELL, (commonly called the Marquis of Lorne) Knight of the Most Ancient and Most Noble Order of the Thistle, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and St. George, Governor-General of Canada, and Vice-Admiral of the same, etc., et.,” etc.

“MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY:—

“We, Her Majesty’s dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Canada, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to approach Your Excellency with the expression of our deep sympathy on behalf of our fellow-subjects in Ireland, who, on account of the failure of the crops and the prevailing destitution amongst the labouring classes in that part of the United Kingdom, have been subjected to grievous want and destitution.

“We have, upon the invitation of Your Excellency, cordially and unanimously concurred in a proposal to grant to Her Majesty the sum of one hundred thousand dollars for the relief of the present great distress in Ireland; We pray Your Excellency to cause the issue of this amount out of the Consolidated Fund for this purpose; and we assure Your Excellency that we will hereafter cheerfully agree to the necessary propositions for making good this appropriation, according to law."

Ordered, That the said Address be communicated to the Senate for their concurrence.

VENTILATION OF THE CHAMBER.

REMARKS.

MR. CHARLTON: I desire the indulgence of the House for a moment, while I refer to a matter of personal interest to us all. It is believed to be the function of an Opposition to find fault, and every member should find fault with whatever may be wrong. Acting on that belief in the past, I have taken occasion many times to find fault with the ventilation of this Chamber, and, as I have been somewhat conspicuous in finding fault, personally, it may not be deemed an assumption on my part, if I take the initiative in making some complimentary acknowledgement to the Minister of Public Works on the great success with which he has grappled with this difficult question. For this Chamber, from the day it was first used, has been unfit for the Legislature to assemble in. To secure its proper ventilation seemed to be a problem impossible to grapple with, until it has been successfully solved by the Minister of Public Works. We sit to-day in a Chamber which I venture to say is the best ventilated legislative hall in America. I therefore feel I can do no less than rise in my place and compliment the Minister of Public Works on his success in this important work. We sit here now in comfort, without the risk of contracting disease from bad ventilation, and, if that hon. Minister succeed as admirable in the discharge of all his duties as he has in the ventilation of this Chamber, he will leave behind him a very enviable record indeed. I hope it will not be deemed ungracious if I refer to the only remaining grievance, with respect to the lighting of the gas. It is allowed to escape at times to such an extent as to pervade the Chamber with an offensive odour. I throw out the suggestion whether it would not be possible to ignite the gas so that it may not pervade the Chamber.

MR. PLUMB: Having cooperated with my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Charlton) in bringing before the House the no slight grievance of its imperfect ventilation, I am quite happy to join with him in congratulating the Minister of Public Works upon the perfect success he has attained in removing what seemed to all the members a very great inconvenience, and very great source of ill health to those compelled, night after night, to sit in this House as ventilated up to this time. I think also I may say that the Minister of Public Works has thus contributed to the good, the perfect ventilation of public questions; because, when members are sitting in this House, overcome by the heavy atmosphere, they are not able to attend to their duties with that vigour and efficiency which they ought to evince, and, as our friends on the opposite side are small in numbers, we will be very happy to give them every possible facility to make the best use of their powers. I wish to add my personal thanks to those expressed to the Minister of Public Works for the most efficient manner in which he has brought about this improvement. I trust that some improved method of lighting the gas may be devised, so as to prevent escape and diffusion throughout the House, at the moment before ignition.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

MR. LANGEVIN: I thank both hon. gentlemen who have just spoken for the way in which they have noticed the change in the ventilation of the House. Of course it was my duty to attend to the representations made on the subject. I am not so selfish as to take to myself the compliments just passed upon the ventilation. If it has proved a success, the credit is due to the officers who have performed the work under my orders. As to the gas, I know there is a defect to remedy; I hoped to be able this year to substitute for it the electric light, but have been disappointed. However, I hope that, the next time we meet, we shall have the electric light substituted for the present gas, which will dispose of the grievance now felt.

PRIVILEGES OF THE HOUSE — JOHN A. MACDONELL.

HEARING AND DETERMINATION OF THE CASE.

Order for the attendance of Mr. John A. Macdonell at the Bar of the House, read.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that John A. Macdonell be called in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER directed the Sergeant-at-Arms to call John A. Macdonell to the Bar of the House.

Mr. McLENNAN: Before Mr Macdonell is called in, I wish to be allowed to read an apology he has placed in my hands.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I rise to a point of order. The motion that John A. Macdonell be brought to the Bar is put and carried.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: It is not carried.

Mr. SPEAKER: It has been carried. John A. Macdonell now appeared at the Bar of the House.

The CLERK read the statement made by Mr. Mackenzie on Monday, the 12th of May, 1879, which is as follows:—

“That on Saturday last, a person named John A. Macdonell, while sitting inside the House, made offensive remarks towards a member of this House, namely, the member for Shefford, who at the time was sitting in his place in the House, viz.:—that the said member was a cheat and swindler; that the offending person was ordered by the Speaker to withdraw from the House, but that he nevertheless again returned, when he was again expelled by the Sergeant-at-Arms. That immediately afterwards a letter was received by the member for Shefford in the following terms, presumably written by this same person:—

“To the Hon. L. S. Huntington, M.P.:—

“SIR,—I desire to state out of the House, what I stated in it. You are a cheat and a swindler.

“J. A. MACDONELL.”

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD then examined the said John A. Macdonell, as follows:—

Question:—Have you anything to say with respect to the charge just read?

Answer:—I desire to apologise to this honourable House for the remarks made by me to the hon. member for Shefford.

He was then directed to withdraw, and remain in attendance.

Mr. McCARTHY moved that leave be granted to Mr. John A. Macdonell to make the apology and explanation that he desires to make.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. John A. Macdonell was called in, and leave was granted him to make the explanation he desired.

Mr. John A. Macdonell said:

To the Speaker of the House of Commons of Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER,—I desire to express to you, as Speaker of this honourable House, my sincere regret for having, on the evening of the eleventh day of May last, while admitted by the courtesy of the House to a seat on the floor of the House, committed a breach of the privileges of this honourable body by referring to one of the members of this House in terms which should not have been used within the walls of this Chamber. I desire to state that my language was not addressed to the member in question, nor to any member of the House, but to a gentleman sitting beside me at the time on the seat which is allotted to strangers.

I did not intend to speak in a voice which would be audible to the member for Shefford, or to any member of this House, for I had no desire to commit any breach of the privileges of this House of Commons, for which I entertain the highest possible respect, but the words unguardedly used by me having been heard by the member with reference to whom they were used, or having been mentioned to him as having been spoken by me with reference to him, and the matter having been brought to the attention of this House, and as I am advised and believe that my language constituted a breach of the privileges of the House, I now apologise to this House for the offence to the House, and to assure you that I most deeply regret that I should in any way have infringed upon the privileges of the House of Commons of Canada.

With reference to the note addressed by me to Mr. Lucius Seth Huntington, I am advised and believe that that act did not constitute a breach of the privileges of this House, not having been committed within the House, and the words used not referring to any action of Mr. Huntington in his Parliamentary capacity; but if you, Mr. Speaker, and this honourable House, think otherwise, and that it did constitute a breach of your privileges, I am prepared to offer, and do offer to this House, my apology for the same, and to express to this House my sincere regret therefor.

He was again directed to withdraw, and remain in attendance.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: I think, Sir, that, when first the conduct of Mr. Macdonell was complained of by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), he should have followed it up by a resolution affirming that such conduct was a breach of the privileges of this House, but, that motion not having been made, I consider it necessary now, before we take any further action in the matter, to declare that this conduct was a breach of the privileges of this House, or we should declare that it was not. I assume that, by the action of this House in summoning this person to attend here, it is virtually admitted, or I should say virtually resolved that it was a breach of the privileges of this House, but before we go further I think we should put such a resolution upon the Journals of the House. I think that should have been done in order that you might have informed Mr. Macdonell as he stood at the Bar that his conduct, or the conduct of the person who has transgressed, had been adjudged a breach of the privileges of this House, but, that having been omitted, it is better that it should be done now than left undone. Therefore I move :

That Mr. Jehn A. Macdonell having, as he admits, used the offensive words towards the hon. member for Shefford, complained of by the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, member for Lambton, in his place on the 12th of May, last, was, by his said conduct, guilty of a breach of the privileges of this House.

MR. MACKENZIE : The hon. member for Frontenac's resolution is not what it purports to be. It is there stated that this man (Mr. Macdonell), having admitted etc., is thereby guilty. It is not his admission that makes him guilty. He is quite as guilty whether he admitted it or not. The question is whether he did commit the offensive act. If he denies that he committed it, we would have had to consider the proof which was convenient. The resolution of the hon. gentleman makes the admission the basis of the motion, not the commitment of the offence itself. I would ask him to alter it so as to remove that objection.

MR. KIRKPATRICK : I think the hon. gentleman misinterprets my motion. The words "was by said conduct guilty" I think meet the points raised by the hon. gentleman. We cannot find Mr. Macdonell guilty of a breach of the privileges of this House until either "he has been guilty on proof, or until he has admitted his guilt." In this case he has admitted it, and we must take into consideration that no proof is necessary.

MR. MACKENZIE : You use confession as a proof.

MR. CASGRAIN : You cannot do that. I think there is a little mistake in this, if I may be allowed to say so. If you find a man guilty, and you want to punish him, you must take a legal and proper means to do so. In this instance, the person who is at the Bar is guilty of two offences—the first offence is that committed on the floor of the House ; and that offence the House must take cognizance of. The second offence he admits to a certain extent, if it be an offence. I do not see for my part, and I believe I shall be sustained by the legal members of this House, that the second offence would not be such as we would have a right to commit him on. I would suggest to the hon. member, that the proper shape in which to put this matter before the House would be to make the addition that the offence was committed on the floor of the House, or within the precinct of the House.

MR. KIRKPATRICK : That is stated in the complaint made. My resolution refers to the complaint made on the 12th of May last.

MR. CASGRAIN : I think that my suggestion is a good one, and that the charge must appear specifically on the paper if you want to proceed hereafter. At any rate, I think I may fairly lay this proposition before the hon. the Premier, who may understand better than anyone else in the House the value of the suggestion now made.

MR. MACKENZIE : I would suggest that the hon. gentleman should alter the preliminary part of his motion in this way. At present it reads in a continuous sentence :

" Mr. John A. Macdonell, having admitted that he used offensive words towards the hon. member for Shefford complained of by the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, member for Lambton, in his place on the 12th of May last, was, by such conduct, guilty of a breach of the privileges of the House."

I would suggest that he should change the motion to read in this way " Mr. John A. Macdonell, as he admits at the Bar of this House, having used," and so on.

MR. MCCARTHY : That is the same thing.

MR. MACKENZIE : No it is not, because you put these words in brackets: "having as he admits."

MR. KIRKPATRICK : There is no harm in that.

MR. MCCARTHY : I find in Mr. Hope's case a motion in these terms. Mr. Courtney moved : " Mr. Hope, having confessed himself to be the author of the letter, is guilty of a breach of the privileges of this House." The whole matter, the hon. member will see, appears on our Journals. The Speaker has read to Mr. Macdonell the complaint which the hon. member for Lambton made in May last; that shows the charge, Mr. Macdonell having been brought to the Bar to answer both charges. The first he admits is a breach of the privileges of the House, and apologises for his conduct. In regard to the second, he is advised that it is not a breach of the privileges of the House, but says that, if the House considers it also a breach of the privilege, he also apologises for that one. My hon. friend moves that he, having confessed the truth of the charge which the hon. member for Lambton made against him, is guilty of a breach of the privileges of this House.

MR. CASGRAIN: In regard to which?

MR. MCCARTHY: In regard to the first of the two charges. I doubt whether we have any power to deal with the second charge. Perhaps, if Mr. Macdonell had not appeared at the Bar, we would have felt ourselves in rather a ridiculous position.

MR. CASEY: Do I understand the hon. mover of this resolution, which professes to define the offences committed by Mr. Macdonell, to say that he wishes to confine that offence to the use of the words verbally uttered within the House, to the exclusion of the letter which was afterwards written? Because, if that is the case, it would sustain the contention made by Mr. Macdonell at the Bar that that letter was not a breach of the privileges of the House.

MR. MILLS: I do not think that the motion read by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) in reference to the letter of Mr. Hope, is a case strictly in point. In that case, in order to determine who had committed a breach of privilege, it was necessary to establish by whom the letter was written, and the party himself admitted that the letter was written by him. Then he was recognised as the party by whom the breach of privilege was committed. The hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington) stood up in his place, and made a statement that the person who was brought to the Bar of this House to-day had used certain words which were a breach of privilege. Now, the fact that a breach of privilege has been committed in no way rests upon the confession or testimony of the person accused. That fact was before established by the statement of the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman will see that, by adopting that resolution in its present form, the testimony of the hon.

member of this House would go for nothing. It seems to me, looking at these cases, that this fact is established: that the testimony of the hon. member is itself conclusive in regard to the fact. We do not require further testimony. You do not require to bring the accused to the Bar of the House with a view to establish the fact that a breach of privilege had been committed. The House was cognizant of that before he was brought to the Bar.

MR. MCCARTHY: The only thing that appears on the Journals of the House was a statement made by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie). Of course that is what we are dealing with.

MR. MILLS: Prior to that, the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington) called the attention of the House to the fact of the breach of privilege, and subsequently the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) made his motion. I think that the House, although it was reported only in the Debates of the House, has the statement before it.

MR. MACDOUGALL: I hope the hon. gentleman who has made this motion will adopt the suggestion of the hon. gentleman opposite with regard to the condition that the offence was committed within the precincts of the House. It appears to me that this is necessary in order to give us jurisdiction.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman will see that the complaint made by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) was that the offence had been made within the precincts of this House. The person, having been brought to the Bar of the House, admits the charge that the language was used within the precincts of the House. It seems to me that he was in full possession of the complaint that improper language had been used within the precincts of the House. The party admits that he used this language, and apologises for it. It is true the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington) stated in his place that he had been insulted by a person near him, but, if I remember rightly, he specified no language.

MR. MILLS: Yes, he did.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Perhaps he did. At all events it does not appear on the Journals of the House. The motion I made last Session to bring Mr.

John A. Macdonell to the Bar of the House was repeated this Session, and that motion was based on the motion of my hon. friend from Lambton. It seems to me that we have the case before us now.

MR. CASGRAIN: The case is before us, certainly, but we are creating a precedent, and, in doing so, I think the offence should be specified.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There can be no objection, it seems to me, to the course proposed by the hon. gentleman. It might be well, therefore, to state in this resolution that this language was used within the precincts of this House.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: I have made the alteration as suggested and inserted the words, "having used, as he admits, the offensive words within the precincts of this House, as complained of."

MR. HOLTON: It seems to me that it is much stronger as it is. The complaint is that it was made on the floor of the House. Where are the precincts of the House? In my opinion the charge is specific on the floor of the House, while the House was sitting. I do not think that there can be anything more specific, as to the locale of the offence.

MR. GEOFFRION: We have a precedent which was established in the first Session we had in Ottawa. A person insulted a member of the House outside of the Chamber. He was brought to the Bar of the House, and condemned to be kept under guard by the Sergeant at Arms, during the rest of the Session. In the case now before the House, as I understand the matter, it is proposed to make it an offence to insult a member within the walls of this Chamber. Is it the intention of the House to declare that a member can be insulted in the lobby or in front of the House without a breach of its privileges? I am opposed to such a declaration, which would virtually be an inducement to outsiders to insult members when going or passing along the lobby. I think we should, at least, declare that no one can insult a member within the hall, in the lobby, or on the grounds of the buildings, without a breach of the privileges of the House.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

MR. MCCARTHY: I propose to follow up the resolution which has just been declared carried by the following resolution:—

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

That Mr. Speaker do communicate the said Resolution to Mr. John A. Macdonell, and do further inform him that, under all the circumstances of this case, this House, taking into consideration the regret and apology made by him at the Bar of this House, does not feel itself called upon to proceed further in the said matter.

MR. MACKENZIE: If it is the intention of the House to apologise to Mr. Macdonell for the inconvenience he has been put to, the language had better be slightly changed. A very slight alteration will do it.

MR. MILLS: The hon. gentleman at the head of the Government has expressed no opinion as to the letter written to Mr. Huntington, while in the discharge of his duties as a member of this House, written within the precincts of the House, in the Reading Room, and delivered to Mr. Huntington within the House itself while the House was in session. When Mr. Macdonell was brought to the Bar of the House, he declared that he did not think he had committed a breach of the privileges of this House when he wrote the letter, and we ought to know from the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government whether that is to be laid down as precedent in this matter of Parliamentary privilege. It was important, before the motion was put into your hands, Mr. Speaker, to know what views the Government held upon that letter, as to whether they consider that a letter containing offensive language and written within the precincts of this House, and sent to him while in his place in this House, is a breach of its privileges, and whether it is not as much so as the offensive language used here. This House will be derelict in the discharge of its duty if it should permit such an apology as the one read to be received, and if it should allow Mr. Macdonell to be discharged without further notice. The House has a right to call upon the leader of the Government to deal with this question fully, the right hon. gentleman having brought the offender to the Bar of the House.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman says that the House is entitled to know what is the opinion of the Government in this matter. It is not a matter merely for the Government, but for the House—for the youngest member and for the oldest member in the House equally—and the Government have no right to obtrude their opinion in a matter of privilege. Every member in the House, whether on the Treasury Benches or in any other part of the House—the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, and every other member whatever—has an interest and an equal right in such a matter as this. With respect to this letter, the hon. gentleman says he believes it was written within the precincts of the House. I do not know whether it was or not, nor do I care where it was written, but I know that Mr. Macdonell states that he is advised that that letter is not a breach of the privileges of this House, but he says further that, if this House should say it was, he would apologise, and in fact did apologise with many manifestations of regret.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No, no; not unless it should be declared a breach of privilege.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There was a resolution adopted that it was a breach of privilege.

Mr. CASEY: The hon. the leader of the Government says that every member—the youngest as well as the oldest—has an equal right to interest himself in upholding the dignity of this House; but it is not to be supposed that these junior members have the same powers as himself to perform that task. The hon. leader of the Government is expected to take the foremost part in protecting our privileges, since he has the power at his back to do so; and we are entitled to require some distinct opinion from the Government on the matter. The hon. the leader of the Government, however, has not only not given us his opinion, but he has declared that it is not his business to state whether he thought it was a breach of the privileges of this House or not.

Some HON. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. CASEY: He said distinctly that it was as much the business of the youngest member in the House as his. We ought to have a motion to decide whether it was a breach of privilege, or at least a declaration of the hon. the leader of the Government, as to his own individual opinion. This is specially required, since it has been stated by the mover of the last resolution (Mr. Kirkpatrick) that he wishes to declare that the spoken words only and not the letter are a breach of privilege.

Mr. ANGLIN: I think there can be no doubt that the sending of this letter to the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington) was a gross violation of the privileges of this House. It matters little as to the extent of such punishment as we have tenderly inflicted on the gentleman brought to the Bar of the House. It matters little whether we shall require him to alter his apology, and, as far as the hon. member for Shefford is concerned, I do not suppose he cares in what form the apology is made; but it matters to this House for the future whether we shall allow a charge of this kind to pass unnoticed—a charge, Mr. Speaker, of having written to a member of this House a letter which you, I am sure, are convinced is a breach of the privileges of this House. The fact having been brought before the House it behoves us—all of us—without resentment towards anybody, but upholding the dignity and privileges of this Parliament, to deal with the matter as the laws of Parliament require, and not to set a precedent which may be made use of hereafter to the prejudice of the dignity and rights of this Parliament. I think we should declare that the sending of that letter was a breach of the privileges of Parliament. The letter was sent in to the member for Shefford immediately after the insulting words had been used. After the insulting words had been used, Mr. Macdonell was hurried out by some friends; then he came in at the door on the Speaker's right with a very defiant and threatening attitude, and, hurried away from that, he again appeared at the door in front of the chair. A few moments after he had made these defiant demonstrations, the note complained of came to the hon. member for Shefford. We ought to distinctly declare this to be a violation of the privileges of the House, and to require a distinct and unqualified apology—no conditional apology, such as the gentleman has been advised to make, but a complete, distinct and unconditional apology. I do not think that gentlemen on the other side of the House, that gentlemen on either side of the House, can conscientiously come to the conclusion that we ought to be satisfied with the conditional and incomplete apology that has been offered. I feel reluctant to annoy or offend Mr. Macdonell in any way, but, when the dignity and rights of the House are in question, I have to put aside all private feelings, and say that I regard this proceeding on his part as a gross offence against the privileges of this House, and I urge that it should be dealt with so that there may be no doubt hereafter, and so that nobody should have an opportunity of drawing into a precedent for misconduct the decision of the House in this case.

MR. MACKENZIE: As I said last year, I threw upon the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government the responsibility of deciding what action should be taken in reference to so gross a breach of the privileges of this House. He seemed reluctant to assume the responsibility; but he did assume it, and I have left it in his hands, because, in the first place, he the proper person to deal with it; and because, in the second place, he has the votes behind him to enable him to carry into effect anything he may decide to do. No one could help noticing that the hon. members opposite took a very great interest in this offender against the House and a prominent member of it. There seemed to be a disposition to consider the offence a trivial one. The hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) was prepared with a written explanation to read for him, and, but for your declaring the motion to bring him to the Bar carried, he would have been spared any appearance at our Bar. Every effort was made to prevent his being brought before the Bar of the House. The hon. gentleman at the head of the Government tells us this is none of his business any more than it is the business of the youngest member of the House. The hon. gentleman will not find that doctrine accepted, where Parliamentary Government exists, or its usage are of any value. What do we find in the English Parliament? There, during the present Session, a member made use of offensive language, imputing improper motives to another member, whom the offending member satisfied by apologising; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as the leader of the House, was not willing that it should rest there; he determined to vindicate the privileges of Parliament. But here we have an utter stranger, allowed to sit on the left hand side of the Speaker of this House, who afforded him a seat there—a privilege only accorded to distinguished persons—a seat of honour, the highest to which a stranger can be brought—and, whilst sitting there, he utters the most offensive language possible to a member of this House. If a political friend of mine had made use of such language in the House towards, say the late Minister of Militia, who occupies the corresponding seat on the Ministerial Benches, a very different course would have been taken with regard to him. But the person now before the House was connected with the Ontario Conservative Association, as its Secretary and organiser. Through him all the manipulations of the Tory party were carried on, and we cannot avoid seeing a determination on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite to save him from the opprobrium he so justly merits. But, if the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government thinks fit to take the responsibility of establishing such a scandalous precedent as this motion establishes for future reference and guidance in the Parliament of Canada, we, on this side of the House, protest most strongly against any breach of the privileges of Parliament, and shall throw the entire odium upon gentlemen opposite.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There is no necessity for the hon. gentleman to speak so warmly on this subject. A resolution was moved, and the hon. gentleman proposed an amendment, in order to meet the views of gentlemen opposite, and it was generally adopted by the whole House. The motion was amended and the conduct complained of was unani- mously declared to be a breach of privilege. Therefore, the hon. gentleman says he throw the responsibility on me. Why, he has assumed the responsibility himself, and so has every member in the House. In discussing the matter, there was no necessity for the hon. gentleman to travel out of the record. It does not at all strengthen the privileges of this House to make the matter a matter of political party feeling. To declare any conduct a breach of privilege is the most grievous censure that can be passed, either in England or anywhere else. A breach of its privileges is the only offence that the House of Commons in England can take notice of. Some hon. member has made a remark about the letter sent into this House by Mr. Macdonell. Well, I have grave doubts whether that letter—most offensive and improper as it was, most libellous and defamatory as it might be—was a breach of privilege. No language could be strong enough in censure of that letter. But the question is whether that letter, written beyond the precincts of this House—no matter how criminal, no matter how improper, or how offensive—is such a breach of privilege as we can deal with as a House of Commons. Thus, having a grave doubt in my own mind, there was not any necessity for me to do anything. Anything that I might do would, being thus doubtful, only weaken the action of this House respecting its privileges, and the protection of those clear privileges about which there can be no doubt.

MR. MILLS: The letter was sent into this House.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I take it that the hon. gentleman will not say that all the letters he has received have had regard to his dignity as a member of this House, as such, but only as an individual. If the hon. gentleman will look at the precedents, he will see that, for an offence of this kind to be a breach of the privileges of Parliament, it must be respecting the dignity of a member as a member, and not as an individual. Having this grave doubt, I thought it better to leave the matter where it was, namely: that there had been a gross breach of privilege in the language used in the House, without importing into the matter the very doubtful breach, if it was a breach, involved in the letter; but to take the feeling of the House with respect to the letter. Therefore, it seems to me that I was exercising only due discretion, in not giving undue importance to that letter, but in asking the House to, or agreeing that the House should, censure as a breach of privilege what was beyond mistake a breach of privilege.

MR. HOLTON: I quite agree with the right hon. gentleman that the motion now before the House is one that is of importance. The previous motion, unani- mously carried, with some verbal altera- tions, does charge Mr. Macdonell with being guilty of having violated the privi- leges of this House. We are now dealing with what purports to be an apology for that, and with a proposal that we should accept it as final. Well, I think that apology is not complete. I doubt whether it ought to be accepted. I do not think the right hon. gentleman evinces a proper appreciation of the duties of his position. Notwithstanding what he has said, as to the equality of rights among members, he is, in a special manner, charged with the care of the privileges of this House. Now, I doubt much whether this pretended apology ought to be accepted without its including, and without the House insist- ing on its including, an apology to the member who was insulted in his place in this House and in respect to whom, this wanton outrage has been committed. The hon. gentlemen who have looked through cases to-day to prepare themselves for this discussion need not be told (for, although I have not referred to any book to-day, I have read something on this question be- fore), they will not dispute that an apology to the member insulted is insisted upon by the House of Commons; it is laid down clearly in May that it must be done. It was done only the other day, as we read, in the case of Mr. Plimsoll. Of course that case is not parallel with this, except in this regard, to establish the fact that an apolo- gy to the members who had been libelled, and against whom the charges had been improperly brought, was exacted; and that the vindication of the privileges of the House, apart from that, was insisted upon by Sir Stafford Northcote as leader of the House. But, apart altogether from precedent, I put it to the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House whether it is to be tolerated, that a stranger should abuse his position on the floor of this House, abuse the courtesy of the House, and address offensive language, grossly insulting language, to a member of the House, sitting in his place in Parlia- ment, with whom he has no relations whatever, except the relations subsisting between a member of the House and an ordinary stranger admitted here in cour- tesy; whether it should be permitted; whether the House is prepared to take the responsibility of affirming, that this matter should be dismissed without an apology to the member insulted—in a manner that may occur to any of us any day—being insisted upon as a condition to his release from the penalties to which he is subjected, by having been guilty of a breach of the privileges of this House; and this brings me to the masterly declaration made by my honoured and learned friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), when he doubts whether this Parliament be either a Parliament or a simple corporation, or is empowered to vindicate its own privileges. I was astonished to hear that doctrine enunciated by him. One thing that I rejoiced to find in the British North America Act was that, for the first time outside of the British Islands, a Parliament was established. The Legislature of the Dominion was declared to be a Parliament. That either meant something or it meant nothing. I maintain that, within our jurisdiction, we have all the privileges that the House of Commons possess. We can vindicate our privileges, we can commit for any offence against our privileges, and I would like to see that right called in question before any Court of Superior Jurisdiction in this country. I simply desire to express that as my opinion, and not to enlarge the discussion beyond a protest, as emphatic as I can make it, against what I believe to be not only a false, but a dangerous doctrine—dangerous as belittling our position as a Parliament, and making light of our privileges. On the other question, I do hope that the hon. gentleman who must, perforce, take the responsibility of the decision to be arrived at to-day, will consider well whether we ought not, whether it is not due to a member of this House who has been insulted, or to any member who may be in the future insulted, to declare, that before we acquit a person guilty of a breach of the privileges of this House, who had grossly offended him—whether we will not, at least, demand that he should apologise to the offended member before he obtain such release. I should hope, therefore, that the hon. mover of this resolution would be advised to insert words to the purport that I have now indicated, providing that the discharge of Mr. Macdonell should be conditional upon his doing that which he, as a gentleman, is bound to do, which the House is bound, by its duty to its own members to insist upon, that is, that his apology should include a specific apology to the offended member.

MR. MCCARTHY: My hon. friend whose remarks upon questions of order and practice are always listened to with the greatest attention, and with almost universal respect in this House, has ventured perhaps to go a little beyond the sphere which he travels on ordinary occasions and to indulge in a lecture upon Constitutional Law. For my part, while I am quite willing to accept that lecture upon an ordinary question of principle, I do venture to entertain upon this matter an opinion different from his own. If my hon. friend would look at the British North America Act, he will find there that the privileges and immunities enjoyed by this Parliament are such as this Parliament from time to time by Act of Parliament may choose to give to itself. As we never, except in one case, gave ourselves any privilege or immunity, we are therefore in the same position—although perhaps it may be humiliating to my hon. friend and to this House, to have to say so—we are in the position of any other Colonial Assembly. We have not the rights or the privileges, the undoubted privileges, which the British House of Commons possesses, and has possessed from time immemorial. If my hon. friend will look at the case decided in our own Supreme Court only two years ago, coming from Nova Scotia, he will find that the law laid down there, not simply as to our Local Legislatures, but also as to the power of this House, that until we give ourselves the rights which the House of Commons in England enjoys, and which we have the power to do by the 18th Section of the Act, we have no inherent right to interfere with the liberty of the subject. The 18th Section of the Act says:

“The privileges, immunities and powers to be held, enjoyed, and exercised by the Senate and by the House of Commons, and by the members thereof, respectively, shall be such as are from time to time defined by Act of the Parliament of Canada, but so that the same shall never exceed those at the passing of this Act, held, enjoyed and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and by the members thereof.”

Now, my hon. friend must know that we have never defined the word “privileges,” that we have to deal simply with the powers which that section gives to us, and, until we do define our powers, which ought to be defined and placed beyond doubt, we had better be careful how we interfere with the liberty of any man, who is caused to be taken into custody, even if we think he has committed a breach of the privileges of this House. The hon. gentleman says that, before we discharge Mr. Macdonell, we should cause him to apologise to the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington). He is now not in custody; he does not require to be discharged; he has been summoned here, and he is not in the custody of the Sergeant at Arms.

Mr. HOLFON: Do not let us discuss the technical question as to whether he is in custody or not. Of course he is within call, and can be ordered to the Bar of the House to receive any sentence that this House may decide upon.

Mr. McCARTHY: I do not desire to discuss any technical question. My hon. friend is sometimes exceedingly technical himself, and keeps us strictly to the Rules of this House, if we do not know all the Rules which he has imbibed in the course of many years Parliamentary experience. Having said so much with regard to that question, I refer my hon. friend to the case of Landers and Woodsworth, which of course he has read, where that principle is clearly laid down. Let us pass now to the other branch of the question. My hon. friend, perhaps, is the only member on the other side of the House who has properly drawn attention to this point, that we are all agreed as to what, of that imputed, constitutes a breach of privilege. A twofold complaint was made. One was that Mr. Macdonell, while occupying a seat upon the floor of this House, used the language which has been referred to; the other is that he had written the note to a member sitting in his place in this House. The hon. gentleman who spoke from the other side said he was desirous that we should not overstep our limits. We have already said that this was a breach of privilege, and I take it that the only breach is in the words that were uttered on the floor of the House. It is too late for us to be going back now to enquire whether the sending of this letter was or was not a breach of privilege. In my humble opinion, it was not a breach of privilege, for this reason: that it was addressed to a member sitting in the House. If my hon. friend will look at May, he will find that a libel committed against a member of the House, is only a breach of privilege when it reflects upon him in his capacity as a member of this House. Libels on members have always been punished, and constitute a breach of privilege. They must, however, concern the character or conduct of members in that capacity. Now, the charge in this letter did not concern the conduct of the hon. member for Shefford in his capacity as a member of the House. We are to determine that the utterance on the floor of this House was a breach of privilege, and I think we have made it equally clear what is meant by the words "breach of privilege." Well, having got to that point, what are we to do now? We ought not to allow political feelings to actuate us in the discharge of our duties. We ought not to allow ourselves to swerve from the position of a quasi judicial character which we occupy, but I must say that the speech made by the leader of the Opposition had a tendency to do that. The hon. gentleman stated that Mr. Macdonell was the manipulator of the Tory party. I would ask him whether his aim is to make political capital, because the gentleman who committed this offence against our privileges happened to be a prominent member of the Conservative Party? I think that now, that gentleman having come forward and apologised to this House for the breach of privilege, having made the most ample apology in his power, an apology as complete as any gentleman could make, I would ask whether he ought not to be relieved from further penalty. My hon. friend will reflect that this language complained of was not made to the hon. member for Shefford. It is only a breach of privilege of the House, and nothing more. Now let us, if we can recal for a moment the position we occupy. We are not merely here to assert our privileges. We are here also as the representatives of the people, and we must take good care that, sitting here as prosecutors and judges, without appeal, we do not go beyond what the law has declared to be the privileges of Parliament. I think that, as the gentleman has made that apology, we ought to accept it, and to say that the matter should there rest. If not, what are we to do? Will hon. members on the other side move any amendment embodying their opinions of what we ought to do? The privileges of this House are as much in the keeping of every member as of the leader of the House. What, then, is the alternative of the proposition I have made? What does the hon. gentleman want us to do? Is it to commit the offender, as a penalty? Then why not place an amendment in the Speaker's hands to that effect? Is it to admonish? Is it to reprimand? What is proposed to be done with Mr. Macdonell? Do hon. gentlemen want him to go upon his knees, as in the olden time? I think, if the House will reflect calmly for a moment, they will see that perhaps we will best discharge our duties, and assert our privileges, in accepting the manly apology made in a manly form to this House. We know that the offence was not an intentional one, we know quite well that that happened when a very excited debate took place, when words were banded across the floor of the House which were perhaps just as strong as those used by Mr. Macdonell, and for which we ought to be ashamed also. Now, nine months afterwards, this gentleman is summoned to our Bar, and I think we will best discharge our duties if we accept that apology and let this be the end of the matter.

MR. BLAKE: It had not been my intention to trouble the House with any observations during the discussion of this painful matter, which occurred when I was not a member of this House, but the argument of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) as to our position as a Parliament, is so extraordinary, that I think it well to direct the attention of the House to the facts. If the hon. member would permit me to make a suggestion, it would be that he should for the future take care that he is, himself, quite right before he charges any other members, and particularly my friend from Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) with error in his statements. The hon. gentlemen affirmed that Parliament had not defined its privileges. Now, Sir, I would refer him to the Canadian Act of 1868, 31 Vict., cap. 23, which enacts as follows:—

“The Senate and the House of Commons respectively, and the members thereof respectively, shall hold, enjoy and exercise such and the like privileges, immunities and powers as at the time of the passing of the B. N. A. Act, 1867, were held, enjoyed and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and by the members thereof, so far as the same are consistent with, and not repugnant to the said Act.”

The second section provides that “Such privileges, immunities and powers shall.” (although the hon. member did not know it) “be deemed to be and shall be part of the General and Public Law of Canada; and it shall not be necessary to plead the same, but the same shall in all Courts in Canada and by, and before, all Judges, be taken notice of judicially.”

Therefore, Sir, we need not be alarmed as to our competence to do anything that the Imperial House of Commons might do under like circumstances. Nor have we been so neglectful in the exercise of the powers we possess as representatives of the people, as the hon. member for North Simcoe supposed, when he charged us with having allowed thirteen years to pass without defining our rights and privileges.

MR. CASGRAIN: I am glad the hon. member who has just spoken on this subject has made exactly the remark I was about to make when I rose. I am extremely sorry at the tone with which this debate is being conducted at the present moment. As the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has said, we are sitting here, in respect to this matter, more in the character of a Judicial Committee than otherwise, and I am sorry to see that the hon. the Premier, as well as the other leaders of opinion in this House, do not take a more prominent part in this discussion.

MR. BUNSTER: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has already addressed the House two or three times.

MR. SPEAKER: He spoke on a previous motion, but not on this.

MR. CASGRAIN: I was about to remark that I regret that the apology which has been made by Mr. Macdonell is insufficient, in my opinion. In one sense, it is no apology at all, but rather an aggravation of the first offence. The words used were retracted, but not the writing. More than that, I see a lie in that apology. Why, Sir, when coolly and deliberately, he goes and writes, to repeat that the words he used were true, and when in that apology he comes in and says, “I did not say that to the hon. member for Shefford, I said it to a friend, my neighbour,” I say there is a downright lie in that apology, and no one can look at it as anything else. For my part I do not accept it as an apology. And, since the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has taunted the members on this side with not daring to propose an amendment, and as I have vainly waited for some other hon. gentleman to do so, I now beg leave, according to precedents and practice of Parliament to move the following amendment:—

That all the words after "that" in the main motion be struck out and that the following words be substituted:—"This House considers that an apology is due by Mr. Macdonell to the hon. member for Shefford, as well as to this House."

And I have discharged my duty and je m'en lave les mains.

MR. MACDONELL (North Lanark): Probably no one regrets more than myself the occasion on which I rise to address this House for the first time. But, when I hear such harsh language used against my friend and relative, I feel it my duty to say something in his defence. Mr. Macdonell states in his apology that he used the words unguardedly to a friend of his on his right, and that he did not address them personally to the hon. gentleman referred to in the motion before the House. I believe that his statement is true. I cannot believe that he stated a deliberate lie, as has been broadly affirmed on the floor of this House, because, knowing the gentleman as I do, having been brought up with him—and the blood which flows through his veins and through mine comes from a near ancestor—it is impossible for me to believe that what he has stated in his apology is not the truth. When he was ignominiously expelled from this House, he, doubtless, felt injured at such treatment, and, then and there, whether within the walls of this House or not I do not know, he wrote the letter which it complained of. I do not think this matter should be looked at from a political standpoint. When I consider how grossly I have been slandered in the contest which I have lately passed through, I am, nevertheless, glad to think that the people of this country do not always believe what is said against political opponents, and I do not think the hon. gentleman to whom this letter was addressed feels that it was meant as a personal insult to himself. I think we have nothing to do with the letter, for we have no evidence that it was written within the precincts of this House. If we decline to accept as sufficient the apology he has made to this House, and to exact another apology from him to the hon. member for Shefford, it will have no value under the circumstances, for he may at once go out and publish in the newspapers that it was a forced apology, and did not express his real sentiments. Looking at this matter as I do, I think it my duty to vote for the original motion, and I would therefore ask my hon. friend who last spoke to withdraw his amendment.

MR. RYMAL: I rise reluctantly to say a word or two in reference to this matter. From the position where my seat is I was able to hear a great deal of what was passing when Mr. Macdonell abused the courtesy of this House. The hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington) was making a speech in reply to the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), and a very bitter discussion was going on. Whether Macdonell meant the language for Mr. Huntington, or whether he did not, it reached my ear very plainly. It also reached the hon. member for Shefford, while he was standing on his feet and addressing this House, for you must recollect very well, Mr. Speaker, that he called your attention to the fact that he could not answer two of those assailants at the same time—one of them being a stranger on the floor of the House by permission. He does not deserve the name of gentleman credited to him, as he has abused the confidence of Parliament, and, if treated by it as I think he should be, he should be excluded for this Parliament from the precincts of the House. I do not think that the words used by him in his apology were the only ones employed in attacking the hon. member for Shefford. They were repeated, however, in tones loud enough for me to hear. I regret this offence should have been committed, or that anyone should have been admitted to the House capable of abusing its privileges. You may say there is no political feeling in the treatment of this offence, but you would have to say so a good many times, and in tones louder than thunder, to make me believe it.

MR. BOULTBEE: While giving all attention and care to the protection of the privileges of Parliament, I think that we ought not to attach too much importance to this matter. After all, I do not know whether the country feels as keenly about it as we do. Naturally, we all feel very proud of being members of Parliament. It is a very important position, and we do not want outsiders to cheapen us in any shape; we keep up our privileges as we best may, which is quite proper. But it is a matter of grave consideration whether we are adding to the dignity of this House, by attaching too much importance to this matter, by a lengthy debate, and showing over much feeling in discussing this resolution. It appears to me there is a very grave question as to how far the privileges of Parliament were invaded by the remarks made by John A. Macdonell, whom I have known for many years, and of whom I can satisfactorily say—and I am not ashamed, but I am glad to be able to say—that he is most decidedly what the member for South Wentworth (Mr. Rymal) says he is not, a gentleman. I think I am as good a judge as he is of what constitutes a gentleman. Rash and impetuous Mr. Macdonell is sometimes, with the hot blood of his race flowing through his veins, and feeling on this occasion that terms and accusations had been used in the debate, in regard to a gentleman here with whom he has peculiar relations, and for whom he has great respect, he gave expression to the language complained of; but there was nothing premeditated in it. It was only the utterance of a youth who thought his best friend was being insulted and aggrieved. It is not as to him, altogether, that we ought to be ashamed, but partly of those who, on that occasion, led him in the wrong direction, by using language they should have avoided. But I maintain he was in his rights, sitting at your left, and, I think that, when a man is in his rights sitting there, admitted by you, although he is on the floor of the House, his tongue is not altogether tied, so that he cannot talk quietly to any gentleman who may be sitting with him. Now, he did not address, and does not state he addressed those words to the member for Shefford. He was, unfortunately, overheard by some gentlemen who sat near, and who, probably, communicated the matter to the member for Shefford. Had he only spoken those words in a tone one or two degrees, or notes, lower, so as not to have been overheard, there would have been no breach of privilege. So, after all, the offence lay in the tone of the voice at the moment. At any rate, Mr. Macdonell, summoned to the Bar, comes here and makes a fair, square, and, I think, ample apology to this House, whose dignity has been trenched upon, and we have passed a resolution to that effect. Surely it is not to our own dignity to pursue the matter further, and try to cover this gentleman with disgrace to his injury. It is not manly for us to attempt to use our power in that way. It is not advisable to exercise our great powers too stringently and harshly, and, after a young man like Mr. Macdonell has made a prompt and ample apology, to endeavour to humiliate him further is neither manly nor prudent.

MR. ANGLIN: I think it must be clear to every hon. gentleman that the House has not been insulted nor its privileges violated, unless the member for Shefford has been insulted. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down thinks we are dealing harshly or wish to deal harshly with Mr. Macdonell in urging this amendment. I think in passing the first resolution we all showed a disposition to deal very leniently with that gentleman. So long ago as 1733, the British House of Commons unanimously passed a resolution to the following effect:—

“That the assaulting, insulting, or menacing any member of this House, in his coming to or going from the House, or upon the account of his behaviour in Parliament, is an high infringement of the privilege of this House, a most outrageous and dangerous violation of the right of Parliament, and an high crime and misdemeanour.”

Now, if to insult a member on the way to or from the House, is as grave an offence as is here described, how much more grave and serious an offence is it to insult a member while in his place and addressing you, and, through you, the House, in the discharge of his duty as a member? A more serious offence it is scarcely possible to imagine. My own feeling is that, if Mr. Macdonell, instead of uttering those words, had risen and struck the member for Shefford a violent blow, he would not have committed a more serious violation of the privileges of Parliament. I think he is correct in saying that he did not address those words directly to that hon. member, but I think, from what I heard at the time, that there would be no difficulty in proving they were used for the purpose of their being heard by that hon. gentleman. I believe Mr. Macdonell was labouring under excitement at the time. As I have said before, I have none but the kindest feeling towards him; he is an old acquaintance; but, as a member of the House, I have a duty to discharge which I cannot shirk. I am satisfied that Mr. Macdonell used those words repeatedly, with the intention that they should reach the ears of the member for Shefford. That is a very grave offence. I believe that the hon. member for Shefford does not attach much importance to the offence against himself, and I do not know why he should. But it is of very great importance that we should take such a course in this instance as, while dealing most leniently and tenderly with the offender, should fully and amply vindicate the rights and privileges of the House, and leave no doubt on the public mind as to what those rights and privileges are. It is our duty, without any regard to party feeling, to maintain the privileges and the dignity of this House. I did not expect that the motion made by the member for L'Islet would be made, but, as it has been made, it should be carried. The member for Shefford, I presume, neither expects nor desires that any apology should be made to himself directly. But, as the question has been raised, we should deal with it as the law of Parliament plainly requires. Similar cases have arisen in the Imperial Parliament where an apology offered the House was rejected, until accompanied by an ample apology to the member insulted. One of the latest cases, I think, is that of Wilks, who, in 1857 or 1858, having published a libel on a member, was arrested for the libel and detained in custody, the House refusing to accept his apology to itself until he apologised to the individual member insulted. Then he was liberated. This case is thoroughly in point. If the member for L'Islet presses his motion, I shall vote for it. I hope the leaders on both sides will combine to put this case on such a footing as will render it a sound and wholesome precedent for all time.

MR. ORTON: I may be allowed to say that, whatever object hon. gentlemen had in urging this question with such earnestness, they at least have given us some pleasure in their exhibition of unusual cleverness in performing that delicate operation of hair-splitting. But the country is expecting somewhat more profitable work at our hands, and I hardly think it is willing to listen to the opinions of hon. gentlemen on this question at such great length.

Motion made and question proposed:

That the following words be added at the end of the main motion:—"That this House considers that an apology is due by Mr. John A. Macdonell to the hon. member for Shefford, as well as to this House."—(Mr. Caspary.)

Motion in amendment negatived, on a division.

Motion made and question proposed:

That Mr. Speaker do communicate the said resolution to Mr. John A. Macdonell, and do further inform him that, under all the circumstances of this case, this House taking into consideration the regret and apology made by him, at the Bar of this House, does not feel itself called upon to proceed further in the said matter.

Motion agreed to, on a division.

Mr. John A. Macdonell was again called in.

MR. SPEAKER: I have been ordered by the House to communicate to you the following resolution:—

"That having, as he admits, used the offensive words towards the hon. member for Shefford, complainant of by the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, member for Lambton, in his place on the 12th of May last, was, by his said conduct, guilty of a breach of the privileges of this House, but that under all the circumstances of this case, the House, taking into consideration the regret and apology made by him at the Bar of the House, does not feel itself called upon to proceed further in this matter."

Mr. John A. Macdonell was then directed to withdraw, and discharged from further attendance.

INSOLVENCY ACTS REPEAL BILL.—
[BILL 2.]

(Mr. Colby.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee.

MR. COLBY: There is a continuing clause in this Bill with reference to pending causes. I would draw the attention of the Committee to the phraseology of the clause. It continues any cases where an assignee has been appointed before the passing of the Act. That may, perhaps, make a little ambiguity and doubt as to whether the assignee referred to is the official assignee or the creditors, assignee. In compliance with a suggestion made to me, I desire to have that clause amended by the changing of the phraseology "assignee has been appointed" in the 14th and 15th lines, to "the estate of an insolvent has been invested in an official assignee."

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, 25th February, 1880.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

CONTROVERTED ELECTION.

JUDGE'S CERTIFICATE.

MR. SPEAKER informed the House, that he had received from the Hon. Mr. Justice Caron, one of the Judges selected for the trial of Election Petitions, pursuant to the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, 1874, a certificate in the matter of the Controverted Election for the Electoral District of Portneuf, declaring the sitting member duly elected.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time :—

Bill (No. 29) To amend the Act intitled an Act to incorporate the Anchor Marine Insurance Company.—(Mr. Cameron, South Huron.)

MR. COLBY.

Bill (No. 30) To legalise marriage with the sister of a deceased wife.—(Mr. Girouard, Jacques Cartier.)

PRIVILEGE—THE MEMBER FOR LENNOX.

MOTION TO REFER PETITION.

MR. CASEY: I rise to discharge a painful duty connected with the privileges of this House. I rise to move:

That the petition of Thomas Henderson and others, praying that Edmund Hooper, Esq., member for the Electoral Division of Lennox, be declared an unfit and improper person to represent that Electoral Division in this House, and for other and further relief, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, with instructions to that Committee to enquire into the allegations contained in the said petition, and report thereon to this House.

In making this motion, I think I am not only following the best precedents which I could find, but also the course best calculated to insure a fair and judicial consideration of the charges made in the petition. The gravamen of the charge is that this gentleman, Mr. Hooper, who was the Treasurer of the United Counties of Lennox and Addington, misapplied certain sums belonging to the United Counties, and afterwards sums belonging to the county of Lennox. The petition goes on to state, in support of these charges, that a Commission was issued by the Government of Ontario under the Statute in that case provided, to examine into the Treasurer's accounts and report to the Provincial Government. That Commission reported that Mr. Hooper had misapplied certain sums of money, amounting in all to over $32,000—that in fact he was a defaulter to that extent, and had defrauded the county to the extent of those $32,000. I mention these facts, not with any intention of prejudicing the case, or of arguing whether these grounds are sufficient cause for his expulsion, or any thing of that sort, but simply to show that there is a prima facie case against this member who is attacked such as will require further examination before a Committee of the House. In alleging that the report of certain Commissioners is prima facie evidence, I may refer to a case that took place in England, where one James Hunt, a member of the English House of Commons, was charged with financial misbehaviour in the Ordnance Department, on the report of a Commission which had been appointed to enquire into the matter, and Mr. Hunt was summoned to attend in his place in the House. He did not, however, respond to the summons, and the case was proceeded with. A letter was put in by him in which he made a defence, and notwithstanding this defence, and without further enquiry, the House decided to expel the member in question. Now, I am not arguing for the immediate expulsion of this member at present. I am only arguing for an enquiry, and basing my request on the report of this Commission. We have a precedent nearer home for referring cases, which seem to require examination, to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I allude to the case which came up in the Session of 1877, in which the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), then Speaker of this House, was charged with having taken contracts that a member of Parliament should not have taken. This charge was made on the basis of certain documents before the House; and, on my own motion, it was agreed that these documents should be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, with instructions to enquire into the case. The enquiry was made and the Committee reported accordingly. The Commission in the present case was regularly constituted, and had power to compel the attendance of witnesses, and take evidence on oath. It sat for two months, compelled the attendance of witnesses, took evidence on oath, and made this report in due form. I hold that the report of that Commission furnishes a good prima facie case, and one which will require further investigation before this House can allow the matter to pass. I submit my motion now, without further amendment.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I was not aware that the hon. gentleman was going to make this motion to-day, or to move in the matter at all; therefore, I would ask him to allow the matter to stand over until a future day, in order to give us an opportunity of considering it.

MR. CASEY: Well, will the hon. gentleman fix a day on which he would be willing to go on with this matter, which is one of some urgency.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I do not see the urgency. I have not read the petition itself, but I have seen the petition that was published in the newspapers.

MR. CASEY: That is the same petition.

MR. BLAKE: I think it will be extremely inconvenient that the debate should proceed now. I think, as on former occasions, that the petition should be printed in the Votes and Proceedings, for the use of the House, in order that we may know what we are called upon to deal with.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Then I will move that the debate be adjourned, and that the petition mentioned be printed in the Votes and Proceedings.

Motion agreed to, and Debate adjourned.

DRAWBACK ON INDIAN CORN.

QUESTION.

MR. CASEY enquired, Whether the Government intend to allow a drawback on Indian corn, imported for feeding cattle, equal to that allowed on Indian corn imported for the manufacture of starch.

MR. BOWELL: I can inform the hon. gentleman that, so soon as the hon. member, or anyone else, can prove to the Government that the residue left over for fertilising or other purposes amounts to $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the value of the duty paid on the corn, that being the proportion allowed on that imported into the country which goes into the manufacture of corn starch, the Government will consider the question.

SHELburne HARBOUR -- LIGHT AT SAND POINT.

QUESTION.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to accept any of the tenders submitted to the Department of Marine and Fisheries, for the erection of the Harbour Light upon the spit at Sand Point, Shelburne Harbour, and if the building is to be commenced and completed during the coming season.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P. E. I.): It is the intention of the Government to accept one of the tenders for the erection of a lighthouse at Sand Point, Shelburne Harbour.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—CONNECTION AT QUEBEC.

QUESTION.

Mr. VALLÉE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to construct, during the coming summer, a branch of the Intercolonial Railway between St. Michel and St. Joseph de Lévis, and to connect the Intercolonial Railway with the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway, by means of a ferry running regularly between St. Joseph de Lévis and Quebec.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The subject is now engaging the attention of the Government.

LUNENBURG COUNTY—BREAKWATER AT CHERRY POINT.

QUESTION.

Mr. KAULBACH enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to provide a breakwater at Cherry Point, Petit Rivière, County Lunenburg, and if so, whether they intend proceeding with the work the coming summer.

Mr. LANGEVIN: A survey has been made at another point on that coast, but we have not yet made up our mind whether that is the proper point or not; therefore, an additional survey will be required, in order to determine whether the point at which the survey was made last year is the proper point, or whether this one is.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY—UNIFORM FREIGHT RATES.

QUESTION.

Mr. MERNER enquired, Whether the Government have it in their power to compel the Grand Trunk Railway Company to charge one uniform rate for conveying freight over their entire line, be the distance short or long.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I believe the Government has not the power.

RED RIVER—DREDGING AT THE MOUTH.

QUESTION.

Mr. SCHULTZ enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to dredge the bar at the principal mouth of the Red River.

Mr. LANGEVIN: This matter is engaging the attention of my Department, but I am not yet in a position to give a positive answer to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. VALLÉE.

SCOTT'S BAY HARBOUR WORKS.

QUESTION.

Mr. BORDEN enquired, Whether the Government will provide in the Estimates for the construction of a small additional breakwater, to complete the Harbour Works at Scott's Bay, and render useful the expenditure already made thereon.

Mr. LANGEVIN: The matter has been looked into, but I am under the impression, after looking into the whole case, that the works at present existing may be considered sufficient, at all events for the present; therefore I cannot make any additional promise.

NEW BRUNSWICK—CLAIMS AGAINST THE DOMINION.

QUESTION.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury) enquired, Whether the Government have decided to pay the several claims, or any one of the claims, made by the Government of New Brunswick against the Government of this Dominion; if so, the amounts allowed on each such claim.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: An Order in Council has recently been passed dealing with the various claims that have been presented by the Government of New Brunswick; and I would suggest to the hon. gentleman, if he would allow me to do so, that he should move for the Order in Council to be brought down. He would find it would be more complete.

NEW BRUNSWICK CONVICTS FOR DORCHESTER PENITENTIARY.

QUESTION.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH enquired, Whether the Government have fixed the time for sending the convicts to the Penitentiary, Dorchester, N. B., and if so, what is the time.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou): The time has not yet come for the removal of the convicts to the Penitentiary, but I trust in a few weeks to be able to give the information to my hon. friend.

PROHIBITION OF THE LANDING OF EMIGRANTS.

MOTION FOR ORDER IN COUNCIL.

Mr. FLEMING moved for an Address for a copy of the Order in Council prohibiting the landing of emigrants at the port of Halifax, who are not possessed of the sum of twenty dollars. He said: in making the motion, I may say that the Order in Council, respecting emigrants seems to me to be at variance with the practice heretofore pursued. In the old Province of Canada, as well as in the Dominion since Confederation, it has always been the policy, or at least the professed policy of those at the head of the Emigration Department to aid and assist the poor emigrant when he came to our shores. No stipulation was made that they should have 20 many dollars in their possession. If he did not belong to the class whose labour was required in this country, no inducement was held out to him to come; but when he did so come he was not turned back, he was at least kindly treated and a chance given him to better his position. There is one class of emigrants, namely, agricultural labourers, whose services always have been in demand; and I do not think any evil has resulted from the admission of this class up to last year. In the hon. the Minister of Agriculture's Report for last year, we have the testimony of several of the Emigration Agents on that point. Mr. Donaldson, Toronto Agent, reports: "Notwithstanding all reports to the contrary, all emigrants seeking employment were readily placed immediately on arrival." Mr. Smith, Hamilton Agent, states that "he had no difficulty in obtaining work for all classes of both farm and common labourers." Mr. Smyth, the London, Ont., Agent, reports that "he had no difficulty in providing employment for agricultural labourers, and that in many cases the demand of farmers could not be supplied." I am aware that by the Immigration Act of 1869 power is given to the Governor in Council, when deemed necessary, to issue a Proclamation prohibiting the landing of pauper or destitute immigrants until a sum of money sufficient for their support and transport to their places of destination was provided; but this power was not exercised, it remained in abeyance, and only last month was put in force. The question may be asked, what necessity is there for it now? It is said that last season there was a much larger emigration than usual by way of the St. Lawrence, that the persons who came were not of the proper class, that there was no employment for them, that the emigrants are a burden upon the St. George's, St.

Patrick's, St. Andrew's and other charitable Societies in the large cities, and that a stop should be put to them coming into the country unless they have the means to pay for their support. In reply to this, I would say that the proper course to pursue is to check the evil at the commencement, at the places of embarkation. Grant no passenger warrants at reduced rates unless to parties who are really wanted in the country. The form of passenger warrants in use last year left the door open for the admission of a class of persons to whom no encouragement should be given to come to the country. Any one could obtain a warrant who could say "he intended to follow the occupation of a farmer." Of course almost every one could say that without any great compunction of conscience, and the result had been just as has been described; and now, by this Order in Council, we fly to the other extreme; we prohibit everybody from coming into the country, be he agricultural labourer or not, unless he is able to show that he has $20 in his pocket. The effect of this policy will be to drive away many an excellent man from the Dominion. We must remember that if we are indifferent about emigrants there are other countries who are ready to receive them. Out of the eight millions of emigrants who have gone to the United States, six millions have landed at the port of New York. A considerable portion of these have been in indigent circumstances, but the Commissioners of Emigration of that State see that their wants are attended to, work provided for them, or they are forwarded into the country. In some cases the money expended is, by the emigrant, refunded when he has secured work; in others it is taken out of a fund kept for that purpose, supported by a tax on each emigrant of two dollars per head.—a tax similar to what we ourselves impose. The Australian Colonies are also our competitors in the demand for emigrants. They have all contributed very liberally of their means to encourage emigration. In 1876, 38,628 landed in New South Wales;—6,018 of these were assorted; 22,596 entered Queensland, aid was given to 5,785; 14,161 went to South Australia, 4,947 were helped. In the same year, New Zealand received 12,987; out of these 5,344 received aid from the Government of the Colony.

New Zealand with a territory less than half the size of Quebec, and with less than a fourth of the population of the Dominion, appropriated in the year named no less a sum than $595,500 for the introduction and location of emigrants. The question of emigration, so far as it relates to agricultural labour, is a very important one from a farmer's point of view. The farmers in the older portions of Ontario, such as those in the constituency I have the honour to represent, cannot shut their eyes to the prospect before them, as presented by the opening up of the Great North-West. They are contributing their share of the taxes necessary to develop that country, and build a railway to carry its produce to market; at the same time it is plain and obvious that that great territory will soon be their most powerful rival. In order that the farmers of Ontario may be able to compete with any degree of success two things are necessary—1st, better cultivation of the soil; 2nd, a more liberal application of manure. With regard to the latter the farmers in my neighbourhood have turned their attention to feeding cattle in winter in order to get manure to enrich the ground. The demand for beef cattle in the Old Country has added an additional stimulus; however, I cannot help noticing that the duty imposed upon corn forms a very obnoxious tax, and greatly diminishes the farmer's profit. With regard to the better cultivation of the soil, the question of Emigration has an important bearing. Labour of the right kind at a reasonable rate is just what is required and here the agricultural labourer willing to work, no matter how poor, is the man in the right place. I have here a letter received from one of my constituents the other day, in which the writer says, alluding to this subject: "I have a man working for me now who came from the North of Ireland last fall. When he landed at Quebec all he had was half a crown (60c.) I got him from the Emigration Agent in Toronto. He is a good farm hand, and likes the country." Had the Order in Council been passed at the time this emigrant came, he would not have been allowed to come into the country, and the farmer would have been deprived of a good hand. This is a fair illustration of how this prohibitory enactment will work. It is generally acknowledged that poverty is a misfortune, but it does not follow that it is a crime; but to prohibit a poor man from coming into the country is to treat him as a criminal. Indeed, looking at the action of the Government in this matter, he is considered a more dangerous person than a criminal. By the Immigration Amendment Act of 1872, power is given to the Governor in Council, by Proclamation, when deemed necessary, to prohibit the landing in Canada of any criminal or other vicious class of emigrants. Yet, no such proclamation has ever been issued; so that in reality the poor emigrant is put in a worse condition than the criminal. Surely the able-bodied emigrant, whose capital consists of a willing hand and a strong arm, who asks only for leave to earn his bread by the sweat of his brow, is entitled to better treatment. I do not say that we ought to admit, indiscriminately, all persons. There ought to be some discrimination, certainly; but surely some scheme can be devised that will do away with the necessity for this indiscriminate prohibition of suitable and unsuitable emigrants. We must not decline to accept the wheat because there is some chaff in it. It is better to devise some innuring process by which what is good may be retained, and what is worthless rejected.

MR. POPE (Compton): I am sorry that I could not hear exactly what the hon. gentleman said. I did, however, catch a little at the end of his remarks. I think he said there should be a discrimination with regard to the emigrants coming here. He is ready to admit that all classes should not be allowed to come in. But who is to discriminate if there is to be a discrimination? He says this should be done at the port where the emigrants are embarked. Let me tell my hon. friend, that before the month of December, I had tried in every way I could to stop the emigration of people that were without means, and could not be supplied with work. The answers I received from the emigration agents at the ports of embarkation were, that they had warned unsuitable emigrants not to come, that they had told them that during the winter there were labourers running around the streets here without work; and that the emigrants had replied that they could not be any worse off than they were in the Old Country, and that they would run their chance of coming, whether they could find work or not. Undoubtedly there has been a larger emigration this winter than there has ever been before at this time of the year. But the cause of this is easily explained. The tenant farmers who had come to this country had told of the increased prosperity of Canada, and had placed Canada in a more favourable light in Great Britain than she had ever been before, one evidence of which is the enhanced value of all Canadian securities in the British money market. Seeing this state of feeling, I recommended the passing of this Order, because when complaints were made of our having people landed at Halifax who had been sent west, and were walking the streets in Ontario and Quebec, as well as in the Lower Provinces, and who could not be provided with work, I had no other course to pursue. The hon. gentleman's organ, the Toronto Globe, said that we were allowing our cities to be flooded with poor people, who, for their support, must be a burden on the country; and from London, St. Catharines, and other towns, we found the same cry coming. I thought it my duty, when I found the agents on the other side could not stop these emigrants, to stop their being admitted here, and for that reason the Order in Council was passed. For the month of November and up to the middle of December, when the Order in Council was passed, the expenses of bringing these people west amounted to $12,000—much more than we were willing to pay. We could not find employment for these new arrivals, and it was my bounden duty, in the interests of the country and of the emigrants themselves, as well as in the interest of our own workmen, of whom there are many out of employment and unable to obtain it, not to allow men to make the situation worse of those who were here already. In 1872, at the urgent request of the Government of Ontario, we made arrangements, which have been carried out ever since, that the Government of the Dominion should pay one-third of the whole of the cost of providing passages for emigrants coming to Ontario; the Government of Ontario paying the remainder, if I recollect aright. I have seen some discussion intended to show that the Dominion Government had forced this upon the people of Ontario, who, let me say, had their agent in Quebec, who does the same thing to every man who goes to Toronto, that is, issues a ticket which entitles him to receive a passage west from our agent. We are not at all responsible for the Ontario agent. That gentleman himself asks for a free pass for each emigrant and gets it. I will read one or two extracts from the Toronto Globe in reference to this question:—

“Canada has been suffering for months past, is suffering keenly just now, and will continue to suffer for months to come, from the disastrous emigration policy of the present Dominion Government. From all quarters—Halifax, St. John, Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa, Kingston, Port Hope, Hamilton, St. Catharines and many other places—comes the wail of the poor people who have been brought out on the false representations of agents, at a time of year when even the emigrants the country requires and can absorb, should cease to seek our shores. For years past the regulations guiding and restraining agents have been beneficially stringent, but under the pressure of steamship owners, whose wish in the matter the Government dared not ignore, these regulations were relaxed, the result being the granting of assisted passages to thousands who should never have been brought out here at all. * * * Even in the case of those whose passages were not assisted, steps should have been taken to put a stop to the operations of steamboat agents in Europe, who have undoubtedly been guilty of circulating misrepresentations in their own and their employers' interest.”

So far from the regulations being relaxed they were made much more stringent. At the time I first assumed office, I inaugurated the policy of aiding emigration, there being then a scarcity of men in the country; and in proof of that, I would cite the Act then passed, enabling emigration aid societies to be formed, and these contributed thousands of dollars to bring labourers here. Although that Act has been on the Statute-book ever since, not one of these societies is now in operation. I did employ passenger brokers to induce labouring men to come to this country. But when I resumed office in 1878, what did I find? I found the labour market depressed and overstocked; I found that we could not fully employ the men we already had in this country, and consequently I told these shipowners that we could no longer give their agents any commission whatever, and that no assistance could continue to be given to emigrants coming to this country other than those following agricultural pursuits. It is folly for the Globe or anybody else to maintain the contrary, but here is what the Globe says of it :—

“The Mail and Montreal Gazette both attempt to remove from the Dominion Government all responsibility for the recent influx of undesirable emigrants. It is worthy of notice that neither of them has a word to say, either of denial or defence, of the change made in the specification of the class of persons invited to come over on assisted passages. If, as the Mail and Gazette say, no money has been paid to the steamship companies, except for such emigrants as have actually settled on land, and are engaged in its cultivation, so much the better. It will be interesting to hear from the local agents, who are expected to certify to the settlement, what steps they have taken to guarantee the country against frauds, and whether they pretend to be able to trace to their destination all the emigrants who pass through their hands.”

Now, as I said before, the Toronto Government paid two-thirds of the expense of passengers from Quebec to Ontario, the balance being paid by this Government. And if the Globe found, at that time, that from every city the cry went up that they were being filled with people of the class of which it complained, it was not due to the changed system. But to show more clearly how the Globe felt, I will read an article written a little later :

“A new Order in Council of the Dominion Government prohibits the landing of any emigrant who has not twenty dollars in his pocket on reaching a Canadian port. The steamship companies are required to pay to the emigration agent twenty dollars for the transport of each immigrant to his place of destination. That the order is well intended we do not doubt. But it proceeds from a total misconception of the object sought. No one wants to keep poor men out of the country. If good men have nothing at the beginning they will not long be penniless.”

Now, we find the organ of these gentlemen, within ten days from the time of its declaring that no more poor people should be brought into this country, when, as it alleged, the streets of all the principal cities of Canada were already filled with them, and when they were a burden upon this country—we find it declaring that these are the very men we want, whether they have any money or not, whether they were penniless or not. How are you going to meet these gentlemen? How are you going to satisfy people that will be satisfied with nothing? I admit that this cry of dissatisfaction had an influence upon the Government since the public press has an influence upon every public man, and like representations were made by other journals supporting the Administration. We ought not to stop emigration to this country. But people are now coming here who can support themselves through the winter that are not going to be a burden upon the people of this country, and these are the kind of people that we want. My hon. friend said there never was a tax before. Well, I have this to say: Previous to 1872 there was always a tax; every emigrant that came to the country, whether he stopped here or whether he passed through, paid a tax of two dollars.

MR. MACKENZIE: This is not a tax; it is a fine.

MR. POPE (Compton): It is not a fine, it is a precaution during a time of the year when we cannot employ our own people, against those coming into this country who have no means; in order that our own people may not be taxed to pay their expenses from the port where they land to their destination and support them afterwards. It is meant to protect the labouring men of this country from outside labour, which would be brought here to add to the glut of the labour market during the winter months. When spring opens, and the steamers begin to arrive in Quebec, this regulation will cease. It was to meet the demands of the country, and to meet the emergency which was upon us. This Order in Council; the Government will not repeal but it will expire of itself about the 1st of April next. We feel that it has worked well. We know that we are going to get a considerable amount of emigration next month, and we believe that this arrangement will not keep a single man away whom it is desirable to have in this country. But that is not the only thing which is complained of. We are told that we are asking people to come to this country who are not farmers, who were only intending to become so. Well, Sir, I admit we did ask them to come to this country, because we had many examples before us of men who had never been farmers, coming here and becoming most successful farmers. Perth and its neighbourhood, for instance, are settled by that class, and there are many other places in which blacksmiths and other mechanics have settled and have become the best farmers in the country. Those are some of the classes of people that we want, and I hope we shall get them in the future. The interests of the country require that we should encourage the emigration of such men in every possible way, but not to pay large sums for that purpose. The Governments of Australia and New Zealand pay very large sums on that account. In the latter colony, I find that emigrants cost the Government $65 a head to bring them there. But we are prepared to give such encouragement to emigrants as we believe the circumstances of this country require; and when we think that we are better without them, and that the people themselves are better off not to come here, we will not shrink from taking the responsibility of saying so.

MR. MILLS: The hon. gentleman has informed us that the National Policy has not produced those great advantages which the Government expected of it. He informs us that there are poor people scattered abroad over the country, that in every town and city there is a large number of people out of employment. I believe that is a fact. I have no doubt whatever, that many of these people have left the country. I have been informed that in the City of Ottawa, there are 732 vacant dwellings, representing with the lodgers, a population of between 4,000 and 5,000, who have withdrawn from the city, and who have gone to the neighbouring Republic to seek the means of sustenance which they could not obtain here. One would suppose that this large removal of the poorer classes would leave those behind in better circumstances, but this does not seem to be the case. The day before yesterday a large number of people out of employment voluntarily came to the doors of this House, and asked the Government to fulfil those pledges which it had made to the workingmen on the eve of the last Dominion elections; when the gentlemen now in power promised the workingmen, that if they succeeded in regaining possession of the Treasury Benches, every labouring man should have work. This promise reminds me much of the prospectus of the Land Sale in the story of Martin Chuzzlewit. We are all aware, from the description given in that story, of the place called Eden, on the Missouri River. We know the difficulties that Martin Chuzzlewit and Mark Topley encountered, after they got there. The promises of the hon. gentlemen upon the Treasury Benches during the late election, were very much of the same class. They said: "We are not flies on the wheel. We are not incapable men. We do not belong to the class of incapable politicians to which the hon. gentlemen belong, who occupy the Treasury Benches. We are statesmen. Permit us to get into power and get hold of the Government, and then we will show you what statesmen can do. There will not be one labourer out of employment; people will everywhere have plenty to subsist upon. The labourer will get a good day's pay for a good day's work." These were, in effect, the words used by the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government. These predictions have been realised precisely as were those made to Martin Chuzzlewit about the advantages of Eden. Now, Sir, the hon. the Minister of Agriculture has told the House that we have poor enough at home, that we do not wish our market to be crowded with people from abroad; why then invite any person to come here? The hon. gentleman has been acting on the principle of protection to home manufacture. He feels that, in order to have the poor in this country and to give them a fair chance to subsist upon the charity of the rest of the population, it is absolutely necessary that those who come here from abroad and without means shall be compelled to return to the country whence they came. Now, Sir, we see how helpless the hon. gentlemen are to remove the depression which exists in this country; how helpless they are to take the first step towards restoring that prosperity which they predicted would meet them on their return to power, and which they led the people to expect would instantly revive if they came back to the Treasury Benches. These gentlemen have practically advertised that this shop is closed to the poor; that those who wish to leave their native land in Europe, must seek a home somewhere else, and that if they come to this country without a certain sum of money, it will be impossible for them to subsist, even if permitted to land, and that the Government will require to put forth all its efforts, and to call into play all the resources that exist in the fertile brain of the First Minister and of the gentlemen with whom he has surrounded himself to prevent all classes from rapidly reaching the conclusion that the elections were won by false pretences.

Mr. THOMPSON (Cariboo) : The hon. gentleman has been speaking much about the surplus population of Europe coming here without sufficient means to enable them to subsist after their arrival. That is all very well; but this is a matter affecting not only that portion of the Dominion bordering upon the Atlantic, but that portion bordering upon the Pacific. When we are talking of this matter, we must consider, not only emigrants landing at Halifax without twenty dollars in their pockets, but we must also take into account the emigration into British Columbia of the overflowing pauper population of China. If we should look at the resources of emigrants landing at Halifax, in order to prevent them from becoming a burden upon the people of this country, we should also look into the resources of emigrants landing upon the Pacific coast, for the same reason. The flood of Chinese emigration is constantly increasing, imposing a heavy burden upon the people of British Columbia, filling our prisons, our hospitals, and our asylums. In every one, they are a serious burden upon public resources. Regulations even more stringent than those at present existing, if possible, should be enacted, in order to protect the people of the Pacific coast from the evils attendant on the emigration of Chinese paupers.

Mr. BAIN : The hon. the Minister of Agriculture is under a debt of gratitude to the hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Fleming) for moving in this matter to enable him to make these explanations to the House which he has given. These explanations indicate that a class of emigrants that have become a burden on the cities, were not receiving aid in the shape of reduced passenger warrants through our Government or were in any way facilitated by the Government agents in coming here from the Old Country. I think that this must go a long way to exonerate the hon. the Minister of Agriculture for the steps he has taken. But I listened with considerable amusement to his statement, as indicating that that prosperity we were promised under the National Policy, certainly, had not reached our shores, or else the influx of a few destitute emigrants certainly would not have been placed in the position of having to seek aid where they should have found remunerative employment, if the manufacturing "hum" had its advent. If there is one thing more than another of a nature to convince us that all the talk we have had about reviving prosperity is nothing but talk, it is the statements that have been made to-day by the hon. the Minister of Agriculture and the member for Cariboo, who has just sat down. They proved that after all the "boom" we have heard so much about exists chiefly in their imagination. It has been my lot to take a good deal of interest in this emigration question, and, notwithstanding that the Minister of Agriculture feels so sensitive with respect to the attacks of the Globe upon his policy, I beg to assure him that the Globe does not represent the whole sentiment of Ontario, but the annoyance he feels at the attack of that journal goes to indicate that it wields a strong influence, and that people attach a good deal of credence to statements made by that paper, and that is more than I can say with reference to some other newspapers published in Ontario that supports the hon. gentleman's policy. What we particularly need for the future prosperity of our country is an increase of population. If they come to our country with money, so much the better, but if they come with strong hands and a determined resolution to pull their way through, we are very glad to welcome them. We have heard much about the American system of emigration, and the economy with which they expend the public funds for this object, but I find, in looking over their reports, that the State of New York alone has, for several years, voted $150,000 per annum, which is expended for the care of emigrants after reaching their shores. As the member for North Brant correctly remarked, seven out of every eight emigrants reaching the shores of the United States for many years back have landed at the port of New York. They have seen fit to impose certain restrictions, and I think

I may say that there is not a member within the hearing of my voice who will not say that they are just and proper restrictions. They object to receiving the pauper or the criminal population of other countries, or those who are idiotic or imbecile, or likely to be a burden upon the people of the country, unless accompanied by friends able and willing to maintain them. I think that one reason why this difficulty has occurred in our own emigration policy has been that the hon. the Minister of Agriculture has joined with his friends in the cry that was made when they were so anxious to get back into power at the last General Elections, and bitterly attacked the emigration policy of their predecessors, that everything was going to ruin and decay, and that we had no need or employment for emigrants; and one result of that policy was to reduce the number of the agents of the Government in the Mother Country, who were charged with the duty of promoting and directing emigration. I remember that, in the Emigration Committee of 1878, such a cry as is now complained of was raised against the Government of that day by the Conservative press of this city, and the Government and their agents were charged with bringing masses of people from the Old Country that were a burden upon our resources, and were crowding our cities with idlers during the winters. The emigration agent of this city took the matter in hand, and announced in the public prints of this city that he would receive applications from labourers who were out of employment, and who were either willing to go to work, or wished aid to remove to other parts of the Dominion, where they could help themselves. After this notice had been out several days, what was the result? Simply this: that, out of the whole of that exaggerated statement of the great numbers who were out of employment at that time, there were less than sixty applicants, and some of them were born in the country, and not one of them but had been a resident of this country for the five years previous. That was the most convincing proof that could be offered that the emigration system of the present Opposition, who were then in power, had been a successful one, and that it did not fill our cities with a population that was a burden to them during the winter months. My experience is that there are a certain class that are everywhere found lingering about the cities, and are unwilling to go into the country among the farmers to earn an honest livelihood. I think that the system which has been in existence for some years, under the former Government, has been found to work well, where the Government Agents in the Old Country have exercised proper care not to grant certificates for reduced rate passenger warrants, except to those that were bonâ fide agricultural labourers, or likely to make useful settlers, instead of as now, only asking them to sign a declaration to that effect, under inducements from steamship agents, who thus secure a bonus on each one they induce to emigrate. In the Province of Ontario, it has been found that a successful agricultural labourer, after a few years' employment with a farmer, becomes anxious to secure a piece of land for himself, and, with a reasonable amount of success, he is in a position to work on to a free-grant section or to go to the prairies of the North-West. The consequence is that the farmers in Ontario are placed in that position; that the very men they desire to keep are just the men that move off into the new settlements, and become, in a few years, employers of labour in their turn. Under these circumstances, and aside from any question of party politics, I hope that the hon. the Minister of Agriculture will not relax his efforts to secure for us, during the coming season, that class of agricultural labourers. If we are ever to build up our Dominion and make it a success, and to develop the great North-West, it is necessary that we should have a sufficient number of strong and willing hands for the purpose; and if we do not get a large influx of population to aid in building up our country and creating a consuming population for those great manufactures that the National Policy is going to establish, as we have been promised by the hon. the Finance Minister, our public burdens will become intolerable, and in a few years we shall find ourselves seriously encumbered with our liabilities; and I think the thanks of the House are due to the member for North Brant (Mr. Fleming) for his present motion, since he has given the hon. the Minister of Agriculture an opportunity of squaring accounts with the Globe and furnishing the House with additional information, respecting an Order in Council that certainly should not have been issued without the gravest reasons for so doing.

MR. SPROULE; I think that it is of the utmost importance that the Minister in charge of this Department should ascertain carefully what class of emigrants is most suited to this country, and then direct expenditure in the line calculated to attract those best fitted to advance the interests of Canada. It was generally conceded, for several years past, that the Emigration Department was spending large amounts to attract emigrants, while we had large numbers of our own people out of employment; that people were being brought here not likely to find employment. The history of emigration in the past showed that something like twenty-seven dollars a head was paid for emigrants, a sum out of all proportion to the benefits derived from that class. Four years ago, emigrants could not find work in Canada; but, through the change since brought about, there has been employment for all the emigrants, and at much higher wages than were paid a year ago. Only last summer, I had applications from several farmers in my constituency to apply to the emigration agent in Toronto for extra hands, when I found it impossible to procure as many as were wanted. In his answer to me, the agent said that it was essentially necessary, before inviting those hands, to have situations awaiting them, and that they should get remunerative wages, if they remained through the summer—for good hands at least eighteen dollars a month. I wrote back that I understood, the summer before, emigrants were being sent out for twelve dollars a month. He replied that the increased demand for that class of labour had raised the wages much higher, and that now they had applications for a larger number of hands than could be supplied. I believe that the change is due to the policy of the hon. gentlemen who now wield the destinies of the country of discouraging the unsuitable class of emigrants. He intimated that it would be well, as there was a considerable number of idle people in the towns and cities, to communicate with them in order to send as many of them as would be useful to the country. Unfortunately, a large number were unfit for farm work. I consider it the duty of the Government on finding a surplus of labour in the country, in any particular line, to try, if possible, to find work for them. I believe this is the object and tendency of the National Policy. It is generally found that, in small villages, towns and cities, manufacturers, artisans and labourers are out of employment, but not farm labourers, generally, in the country. If we cannot induce the idle in the towns and cities to settle upon farms, then it should be the object of the Government to build up establishments where they may find steady employment. I think, by all means, that the Order in Council passed by the Government ran in the very line the country would feel inclined to endorse, with the object of bringing into the country only such classes as it requires, and then, in time, as the National Policy builds up the industries of the country, and good times return, should there be an opening for all classes of emigrants, the order might be abolished. One of the strangest confirmations of the National Policy is the readiness with which emigrants now find employment in almost every part of the country, contrasted with their difficulty in 1878. Not only that, but thousands out of work two years ago are now employed at remunerative prices, and are able to support themselves and families.

MR. MACKENZIE: I desire to say a few words in connection with this matter before it closes. Hon. gentlemen opposite have not acted as the gentleman who spoke last believes. He seems to think that this Order in Council was passed a year ago; it was only passed a few weeks ago, and had no influence whatever on the emigration of the past season. Hon. gentlemen opposite affected to believe that their policy would procure an abundance of employment for all classes; but now it is admitted that in this city there is an amount of idleness never before witnessed. I know that in Toronto very large numbers are out of work—that the charity of the public was called upon frequently during the last few months to supplement the action of the charitable societies, in order to sustain those not able to find employment. There has been nothing like it that I remember in my time. But let us look at the prospects the hon. the Minister of Railways held out to the suffering millions of Europe, in his speech in this House last Session. A year ago, in a debate in this House, speeches were made by the hon. gentlemen opposite, which must have led all the suffering poor, not only in Great Britain, but throughout Europe, to look to this country as a land of promise. The Minister of Railways used the following language, in discussing his resolutions regarding the Pacific Railway:—

“With these new and increased facilities, and with the cooperation of the Imperial Government, we may rapidly fill up the country with an industrious population, which will prove a source of wealth, and provide a substantial basis for the construction of the railway. I have adverted in these resolutions to the national character of the work, and the ground Canada has for asking further substantial aid from the Imperial Government in regard to it. I have pointed to the fact that it will open up the nearest means of access between Great Britain and her dependencies in the Pacific. It will bring the Imperial authorities 1,200 miles nearer to China and Japan than by any other route across this continent, and it will provide comfortable and happy homes for the suffering millions of the United Kingdom in our North-West Territories. Hon. gentlemen are aware of the fact that, on a comparatively recent occasion, a large deputation brought before the attention of Lord Derby the unprecedented extent of distress existing among the working classes, whereupon that eminent nobleman, who has devoted much attention to the improvement of the condition of the labouring people, stated that he looked forward to a well devised and systematic system of emigration from the British Isles is the only substantial means of affording relief to that over-peopled and suffering country. I believe, when we present this policy, and say that, while thousands of people in the United Kingdom are in a state of forced idleness, the construction of the Pacific Railway would afford them immediate employment, and, at the same time, develop on this continent a great British power, we will present a scheme which will not be regarded with disfavour. It has long been the pride of every British subject that, whenever a slave touches British soil, in any part of the world, his shackles fall away. So I say we in Canada have greater pride in knowing that the moment the feet of the most discontented British subjects touch Canadian soil, that discontent disappears, and no sooner do they realise the fact that they are in possession of the fullest freedom and the means of successful employment, than they become truly loyal to the British Crown.

“It cannot be an object of indifference to Great Britain that this country presents an opportunity, not only of thinning the over-populated districts of the British Islands, but of attracting Frenchmen from France, Germans from Germany, and, in fact, people of all nationalities from the over-crowded population of Europe, to settle on British soil, and become loyal and devoted supporters of the British Crown and of British institutions.”

When those British subjects referred to landed on our shores lately, instead of meeting with the fullest freedom and the means of successful employment, they were met by the bailiff on the wharf, warning them off from our shores, and told that they must possess twenty dollars in cash to be permitted to put a foot on this land which was to furnish an asylum to the suffering millions of Great Britain and Ireland. After holding out these magnificent prospects, we have now the pitiable spectacle of the Government declaring that no person is fit to land who does not possess twenty dollars. The leader of the Government also indulged in the same style of speech. He said:

“But I believe that, when the scheme is presented to Her Majesty’s Government, and they have seen the Imperial importance of this work—when they see the enormous advantage it will be to relieve the over-crowded portions of the Mother Country, by removing the surplus population into the new Britain in the far West, they will grant a guarantee where they have granted it before, with this additional security which, without obliging England to pay a single sixpence, will enable us to push on the work and obtain all the money required for this great work on as advantageous terms as if it were a direct liability of her own.”

Now the suffering thousands and over-crowded population of Great Britain and Ireland are now, only one year after those glowing speeches were made, and those magnificent prospects held out, warned off, by authority, from touching our shores for fear that in any way their poverty might infringe upon our means. The late Administration advertised in the English papers, in 1874-5, that ordinary artisans and clerical classes were already too numerous in this country, and warned them from emigrating to it, while we held out that there was abundant room for the agricultural labourer and agriculturists of every class—they alone were to obtain assisted passages. The very publication of such an Order as that passed a few weeks ago has a tendency to prevent any class coming to Canada; it is eagerly grasped at by the agents of foreign and competing countries, to show that such is the disastrous condition of commercial, manufacturing and mercantile life in Canada that its Government was obliged to put up a fence at its main seaports to prevent any people coming into the country, paralysed already by the natural disasters occasioned by the commercial policy of the Government.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell): The question of emigration, as introduced by the hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Fleming), appears to have widened into a general discussion of the questions of National Policy and the Pacific Railway. If the argument upon which the original motion is based be the correct one—that there should be no objection to all classes of Her Majesty's subjects coming into this country at all times,—I cannot understand how it lies in the mouths of gentlemen who take that ground to declare that the people of Canada are so impoverished that, in our large cities and towns, the numbers who have nothing to eat and no work to perform are so great as to severely tax the resources of their more fortunate fellow-citizens. Either the people of those centres are well off or ill off. If they are well off, there might be serious objection to the Government's Order in Council; but in that case it does not become hon. gentlemen opposite to taunt us with the failure of that policy which is bringing in a better state of things. If we are ill-off—if there are paupers in our cities as, unfortunately, there always will be, whatever policy be adopted—then I think the people ought to thank the hon. the Minister of Agriculture and the Government for having adopted a plan for excluding persons during a season when they could not find work, unless they have means to enable them to proceed to where employment may be found for them. That, it seems to me, is the only question at issue in this motion. No one will pretend that it is desirable to bring agricultural labourers into Canada in mid-winter, or that our farmers could then employ fresh hands. The hon. the Minister of Agriculture in adopting this policy has simply declared that the farmers at this season do not need labourers, that our cities and towns are already sufficiently supplied with citizens, and that emigrants should not come here unless they have the means of proceeding to places where employment is available. The policy of the late Government was to advertise in the British papers, warning all but agricultural labourers from coming to Canada at all, while the present Order simply warns them against coming unless they had some small means in their pocket on landing to keep them while they looked for work, or to convey them to where it could be found. This Order expires in the spring, when the agricultural labourer can find work in this country, and therefore it in no way affects the question of the introduction of this class into Canada at suitable times. We have had not only now, but since the Session commenced, upon almost every question that has come up, statements by hon. gentlemen opposite of the utter failure of the National Policy. Do they seriously mean what they say? Did they really expect the mere passage of an Act of Parliament was going to restore prosperity and improve a sad state of things, brought about by their laxity and indifference to the commercial interests of the country? What was the leading issue between the two parties? It was the declaration of the hon. gentlemen opposite, when they occupied this side of the House, that they had no power and no will to improve the commercial and industrial interests of the country, while the position of the hon. gentlemen now on the Treasury Benches was that they believed that, in many respects, legislation might promote those important interests—that an honest and fair effort should be made with that object, and they pledged themselves that they would make that effort, and they fulfilled that pledge during the last Session of Parliament. What has been the result? Commerce is not built up in an hour. The astonishment is that anyone invested a dollar on the strength of the National Policy, in view of the efforts of hon. gentlemen opposite to prevent its being done. No sooner had the Policy been adopted than a gentleman, described in an English newspaper as a prominent member of the Opposition—who I think I am not wrong in describing as the leader of the Opposition—wrote to an English journal to warn people against investing money in this country on the strength of the National Policy, because, as he alleged, it would be impossible for that policy to be in existence for any length of time. The writer of that letter referred to the election which took place in June last for the Ontario Legislature, and he specially referred to that in the city of Toronto, to prove that the feeling of reaction against the National Policy was not confined to the rural population, but was participated in by the urban population as well.

MR. MACKENZIE: Hear, hear. So it is.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell): The hon. gentleman says "Hear, hear." I wonder he is not ashamed to repeat the statement in the presence of gentlemen who know differently. Both the nominator of Mr. Mowat and his seconder at the Local election in Toronto declared that, if the National Policy was in issue, if it was a question of Dominion politics and not of Local politics, they would be supporting Mr. Morris with as much energy as they were then devoting to the support of Mr. Mowat. In the face of that statement, the hon. gentleman, and I presume it was he who wrote to the Manchester Examiner, declared that the urban, as well as the rural population, were participants in the reaction of feeling against the National Policy that he declared had taken place.

MR. MACKENZIE: So say we all.

MR. WHITE: The hon. gentleman acknowledges he wrote the letter.

MR. MACKENZIE: I acknowledge nothing.

MR. WHITE: It was not at least a patriotic thing for a Canadian, in regard to a policy the success of which largely depends on the confidence of the people as to its permanence, it is not patriotic for a public man to endeavour to undermine the success of that policy, by creating a want of confidence in its permanence, through letters addressed to English newspapers, warning capitalists against investing money in, or coming to the country, as they might be induced to do in consequence of that policy. But, Sir, have we not benefitted since that time? There is hardly a merchant to-day, there is not a commercial traveller who has returned to his house within the last few months, who does not speak of the increased confidence which prevails in Canada to-day, as compared with the feeling which has existed for the last five or six years. I do not refer to manufacturers, who might be supposed to be specially benefitted by the operation of the present Tariff. I refer to the importers of the city of Montreal, to the ordinary merchants. There is not one of them who will not admit that a greater confidence has prevailed in the country during the last six months than has existed during five or six years previously. That is the position in which the commerce of this country is to-day.

MR. ANGLIN: Montreal is not Canada.

MR. WHITE: The hon. gentleman probably refers to St. John. What is the fact with regard to St. John? After the terrible fire which destroyed that city, a few years ago, an abnormal condition of things sprang up. In the rebuilding of that large city, a number of men were employed, and, when their labour was accomplished, there was no more work for all those who had emigrated there. Apart from this, the position of St. John has become materially changed. It is suffering to-day from changes from which many cities have suffered. Everywhere are to be found cities which were formerly prominent as commercial centres, to-day occupying a minor position, the business having been transferred, through the construction of railways, or other changes, to other centres. Many of my Toronto friends are inclined to believe, though I do not share in the opinion, that Montreal has seen its best days; that, owing to the construction of railways, and general changes in the commerce of the country, business is becoming centred in Toronto instead of Montreal. Quebec, some few years ago, was the great commercial metropolis of Canada; what is it to-day? Its decadence is not due to any question of policy, but to the changed relations in commerce. St. John is suffering in the same way as Quebec, and as some of my hon. friends, though I do not share in their opinion, say Montreal is suffering also. The hon. member for Lambton has quoted two passages from the speeches delivered from the Treasury Benches of last Session in relation to the Pacific Railway, to the effect that our great North-West, traversed as it will be in the future by railways, will offer a home for countless millions from the Mother Country. Is that hon. gentleman, who is equally responsible with gentlemen on this side for imposing on this country the burdens entailed by the assumption of the North-West, prepared to say such will not be the result? Does he mean to say that that country, when opened up by the Pacific Railway, will not offer homes to countless millions of our fellow-subjects in other parts of the world? If that was his pretension, how could he justify the imposition of the burden for the maintenance of that large territory, and the construction of the Pacific Railway, for which latter, as far as expenditure has already taken place, he is certainly as responsible as hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. The statements made in those speeches are every one true; and it requires a confidence in the gullibility of human nature and of the public at large simply astonishing to induce the hon. gentleman to tell us that, because within one year after these statements were made, the results predicted had not been accomplished, they were therefore unfounded. This is the kind of argument with which the House is insulted by the leader of the Opposition. Every statement quoted by the hon. member for Lambton from these speeches will be realised. But, unfortunately, hon. gentlemen opposite will not say a kind word for their country unless bribed by office. From one end to the other, to believe them, this country is in a state of hopeless depression, bankruptcy, and commercial ruin, with no confidence in the present, with no hope for the future. It is thus that those gentlemen appeal to the patriotic feeling of the country to sustain them. They appealed before and they got their answer. They have been pursuing the same policy since the Session opened. They are determined not to see the silver lining in the cloud which has for so long overhung our commerce and industries, but prefer to present this country as one in a hopeless condition. It is their gloomy forebodings which has decided the people that they shall not come back to power, and has caused every constituency which has been opened since 1878, and which then supported the Conservatives, to renew that support.

MR. PATERSON (South Brant): I intend only to offer a few remarks on this subject. I do not intend going into the question properly before the House. The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat, has invited us to look at the beneficial results that have followed from the policy inaugurated by the hon. gentlemen opposite, and there is no doubt that, if what the hon. gentleman has said, in reference to the city of which he is a citizen, with reference to its prosperity, with reference to the extraordinary manner in which that city is amassing wealth under the beneficial influence of this Policy, be correct, we, as patriotic Canadians, should rejoice; but one city does not constitute the Dominion. The hon. gentleman, however, is candid enough to admit that there are other cities in this Dominion, and that they have not been benefitted in a like manner. The hon. gentleman was almost candid enough to admit that there were other cities that could not be benefitted as much by this Policy as the city of Montreal. The hon. gentleman points to the distress of St. John, and states that it was not because the National Policy had operated disastrously. He states that it was because of the immense destruction of property during the fire that took place there. Can that be true, Sir? Can the hon. gentleman from Cardwell, as a citizen of Montreal, whose interests lie there, who wields the influence of a mighty paper there and gloats over his gains and the gains of his fellow-citizens admit that they never ventured to pay their contribution towards that distress, which was almost a famine? Would not that be the proper thing to do? It seems to me that, if the hon. gentleman cannot induce the citizens of that city to furnish relief to St. John, he could, at any rate, forward his individual subscription in order to alleviate their wants. I do not intend to enter into the question generally, because I anticipate that, when the hon. the Minister of Finance introduces his proposed amendments to the Tariff foreshadowed in the Speech from the Throne, we may have a discussion at that time, but I cannot hide from myself the fact that while there is a good deal of misery in the country, and while there will be a great deal of misery on the part of some of the members opposite, when their speeches are criticised by their constituents, we may anticipate some little pleasure in seeing how our worthy friend from Cardwell, who has alluded to this National Policy, and declared it is the thing the country demanded, will receive the amendments that are proposed to this Tariff, which he says, has worked so admirably. Until then I will say no more on this subject.

Mr. PLUMB: My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture is, undoubtedly, under great obligation to the mover of the resolution now under discussion, and my hon. friend is also largely the debtor of my hon. friend the member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver) for the resolution he introduced into the House a few days ago—but upon which no debate took place—in regard to the expenses which were incurred for the tenant farmers' deputation, who were invited into this country to examine into its capabilities. I was very much surprised at the position taken by my hon. friend from North Wentworth (Mr. Bain), upon the motion of the hon. member for North Brant. He seemed desirous to impress upon us the great liberality of the State of New York in making a yearly grant of $150,000 for the benefit of emigrants landing upon its shore. My hon. friend neglected to say that the State of New York has a population of about 4,750,000, a larger population than the Dominion of Canada. He neglected to say that the city of New York was the great port at which nearly all the emigrants who came into the United States landed. He might have stated that Castle Garden in that city is the property of the State, and is kept up at a large expense for the purpose of receiving emigrants and providing them with quarters while they remain in the city and having neglected to say that: he gave the House, undoubtedly unintentionally on his part, a false impression in respect to the liberality and the purposes of that grant. He also neglected to state that a per capita tax, as a further means of defraying those expenses, was levied upon the emigrant when he landed there, which everybody knows who knows anything about the question at all. My hon. friend was also pleased to speak of the National Policy in connection with the subject which has been under discussion to-day. These gentlemen would seem to have imagined that we promised that the National Policy would have its fruition upon the next morning after the election, that took place in 1878, and which the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have good reason to remember. I took some little part in the discussions which were held in public meetings in respect to the National Policy, during the campaign in Ontario and Quebec. At any rate, whatever I myself may have said on the subject, I had the honour of hearing a great number of speeches that were made by the leaders of the party to which I belong, in respect to that policy, and what they claimed for it. It was stated by us that—whereas gentlemen on the opposite side of the House had said that they were only “flies upon the wheel”; that they were entirely incompetent to do anything by legislation for the advantage of the country; that no Government could, by any possibility, relieve or palliate the prevailing distress, or ought to attempt to sustain or encourage the struggling industries of the country—we at least would try to do something in that direction. We never undertook to promise that there would be an immediate increase in the prosperity of the country; but we pledged ourselves to do something, in case we secured a majority here, which would make the despondent people hopeful, and to hold out to those who had been struggling for years a helping hand. We were scouted by the leading organ of Ontario, because, in the very week after this Government came into power, it did not increase the Tariff. We were told that there was no excuse for delay, that it was so simple a matter that one of the Government clerks could easily make up the schedule and fix the rates; that it did not need careful examination and great discussion or consideration. It would certainly not have required any great discussion or consideration on our part, if this Government had been content to make out a horizontal scale, adding 2½ per cent. on everything included in the fifteen per cent. list, in imitation of the late Minister of Finance. But we had a very great and difficult duty to perform, and that duty has been performed thoroughly and successfully, and I cannot believe that gentlemen on the opposite side of the House are sincere when they taunt us with want of success in a policy, the development and effect of which cannot be seen in a month, or six months, or a year. These gentlemen had left the country in a slough of despond, from which it would take years to escape. We endeavoured to rescue a struggling people from the abyss into which the preceding Government had plunged us, and from the fatal results of the growing deficits which no attempts had been made on the other side to make good. We have never heard what these gentleman proposed to do to meet the growing and extravagant expenditures in every Department, and the draft upon the Treasury for great undertakings in railway building. They did nothing to cut down the expenditure of the country, and nothing to increase its revenues. Upon every question that has come up we have been treated to a rehash of the stale arguments of last year against the National Policy. I had been in hopes that I would hear something new when I heard that the leader of the Opposition had been indulging in light literature. When the hon. member for Lambton condescended to allude to light literature, and my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) began to quote from Martin Chuzzlewit, I hoped the hon. gentlemen had been passing the Recess in the kind of study which would enable them to bring forward something new and original, amusing or instructive. But they tell us the same old story, which is neither new nor amusing nor instructive. They have harped on a single string till tired of the monotonous performance. They are like Sterne's caged starling, which could only repeat, "I can't get out."

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: "Can't get in."

MR. PLUMB: Amendment accepted. I am very glad that the late First Minister thought fit to take part in the discussion, because it reminded me of a little incident that took place in the debate of last year upon the railway policy and the sale of land in the North-West, upon which I thought, at the time, I should have an opportunity of saying something more upon a suitable occasion. That hon. gentleman, notwithstanding the fact that he had, by a measure hurried through at 3 o'clock in the morning, in the first Session in which I had the honour of sitting in this House, proposed to make public lands to a large extent subsidiary to the construction of the Pacific Railway, whilst speaking last year said:

"Does the hon. gentleman imagine that settlers will go to the North-West to take up land at $2 an acre when there are millions of acres to be had for nothing in the United States?"

I ventured to ask where they gave

land in the United States for nothing. He promptly replied that there could be no question about it. I ventured to say that there was room for question. The hon. gentleman then retorted thus:—

"My hon. friend may be very wise, but if he will examine the conditions upon which land is settled upon in Texas, he will find that that State will furnish any quantity of land free."

MR. MACKENZIE: Will the hon. gentleman read on? I ask him in fairness to read on.

MR. PLUMB: The hon. gentleman has the right of reply if he likes.

MR. MACKENZIE: Then I say that I never made such a statement.

MR. PLUMB: The hon. gentleman has a bad habit of constantly interpolating a speech, whenever I have the floor, and he thinks proper to contradict my statements. With his old majority to back him, he could do so without check, but I do not intend to allow him to do so on this occasion, unless the House insists that I must give way. Well, then, not quite convinced by the ready assertion of the hon. member for Lambton, I was led to make further enquiry as to lands which settlers could obtain by free grant in the State of Texas. I entered into correspondence with my friend, Mr. Seward, then Assistant Secretary of State in Washington, and received from him the circular of the General Land Office, containing the laws and regulations relative to the grant or sale of public lands to settlers, and the list of States and Territories in which such lands were situated. The State of Texas was not upon the list. Upon further enquiry, I learned that there were no lands in Texas belonging to the United States Government. I wrote then to the Commissioner of the Land Office of Texas, at Austin, the capital of the State, and I have his reply in my hand, which, with the permission of the House, I will read, in order to show how easy it is to make off-hand statements, and for gentlemen, in making such statements, to be mistaken, notwithstanding that they arrogate to themselves an amount of wisdom and information which they imagine warrants them in lecturing members who venture to question their absolute infallibility. The letter, in answer to my enquiries, is dated the 14th of February, 1880, and reads as follows:—

" 1. There are about ten million acres of vacant unappropriated public domain, subject to location by valid certificates issued by the State of Texas, and to pre-emption.

" 2. Actual settlers upon vacant domain can acquire title to 160 acres, if the settler is the head of a family, and to 80 acres if a single person, by a residence upon and cultivation of the land for three consecutive years.

" 3. There is very little vacant land lying upon lines of railways, or upon projected lines. Nearly all the land in the State that is subject to location or pre-emption is far out upon the frontier of the State."

" 4. There are about ten or fifteen millions of acres, which lie in the organised parts of the State, for sale, at prices ranging from one dollar to three dollars per acre—one dollar being the minimum price fixed by law. Some of these lands are valuable, and may be purchased in quantities of 160 acres up to 1,920 acres, upon ten years credit, by yearly instalments, with ten per cent interest."

Mr. Walsh also sends me a copy of a printed letter, which he addressed to the Hon. O. M. Roberts, the Governor of the State, on the 16th of September last, in which he makes a succinct statement of the classes of lands subject to sale, the price fixed by law, the quantity which can be bought by one person, the region of country in which each class can be found, and to whom a purchaser must apply. He says :

" There are 12,800,000 acres of school lands, minimum price, a dollar an acre—(prices range from one to three dollars); 219,906 acres, minimum price a dollar and fifty cents an acre ; 407,615 acres, minimum same as above. 3,050,000 will be offered in January of this year. They are for sale an acre in such quantities as may be desired. All vacant lands in the territory bounded north by the Indian Territory, on the east by the hundredth degree of longitude, on the south by the thirty-second degree of latitude, on the west by the hundred and third degree of longitude, are for sale, in 640 acre tracts, or less, at fifty cents an acre. The purchaser must apply to the Surveyor of the county or district in which the land is situated. He will survey the land, return field notes to the General Land Office, at the expense of the purchaser. Within sixty days from the filing of the field notes to the General Land Office, the purchaser must pay into the State Treasurer fifty cents per acre, or forfeit all right to the land."

It will be seen that the low-priced lands are in the unorganised districts of a vast and unprotected country, and that the regulation in respect to surveys and field notes, practically renders them unavailable for emigrants. The counties in which they are situated are not named on the latest map of Texas, which I have been able to find, but form a part of the extensive plains lying far west of the settled portions of the State, and not upon lines of railway or projected railway communication. It is difficult to see how they are preferable, either in cost or availability, to ours in the North-West. There, on the map, is marked Young Territory, and I note that it contains "extensive table lands, elevated some 2,400 feet above the sea, destitute of both wood and water," and "sand country, with coarse grass, but no water." If this land is not free for settlers, who have courage enough to take it, it is not probable that the State has any better tracts to grant without purchase. I notice that in the general regulations, both of the United States and Texas, there are large fees to be paid before settlers can enter upon the land, and most of the regulations require that the intending settler shall become a citizen of the United States. If there were any lands of the United States open for cheaper settlement on or near railway lines, the railway companies could not get the high prices for which they are selling their lands. All the most available lands of the United States Government have been either granted to railways, or are held by the Government in alternate sections with the railways, and the Government are bound not to sell below a certain minimum price. I have shown that there are no free lands in Texas, except in the unorganised districts, where the amiable Comanche still wields his scalping knife, and where the settler must take with him, in the shape of a revolver, the only law that is recognised. The hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) has seized the occasion also as one on which to give us his generous views on the National Policy, views with which all those who have listened to his oratory here, or at the hustings, during the past three or four years, are extremely familiar. But he, perhaps, has forgotten, indeed he always forgets, but we remember, that, not many years ago, he stood up here and begged, in plaintive tones, that efficient protective measures should be brought forward by the then Finance Minister, who, if I am not mistaken, at present sits before me; and; although he has complied on the first opportunity with the hon. gentleman's request, is the object of his especial denunciation. Perhaps it would not be using unparliamentary language if one were to characterise the speech of our consistent and critical friend as "full of sound and fury, signifying nothing." However, to return to the resolution, it may truly be said that our congratulations are due to my good friend the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, for the manner in which he met the attack intended to be made upon him by this resolution. It must commend itself to the mind of everyone in this House, and convince him that he is, and has been, the right man in the right place in directing a Department, which had been so badly managed during the time that he was not in office. It is not long—only about three or four years—since both the Premier of Ontario and Mr. Jenkins issued circulars and warnings to emigrants coming to our shores. They were not at that time condemned by the great organ which, it may be admitted, does not, as my hon. friend from North Wentworth very frankly acknowledges, represent public opinion in Ontario, because everything has gone entirely contrary to the desires and views of that great newspaper. It has converted Ontario from its own faith to ours. Anyone taking up the arguments of the Globe, for the last five years, cannot fail to see that the policy which it has advocated so persistently has been directly opposite to that adopted, not only by the Liberal Conservatives, but by thousands of its former friends; and that, through its utter inability to meet the wants of the hour, and through that of its principal followers, it cannot be denied a great party has been hopelessly wrecked, and that those who have wrecked it have determined to learn nothing by their misfortune. I hope and I know that the National Policy will vindicate itself, and that, under the able management of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, we shall see a great and rising tide of emigration sweeping into Canada. The most thoughtful minds in England to-day are carefully and anxiously considering what is to be the future of the condition of the population of the United Kingdom, which, last year, produced only one-half the food necessary to support its people. In a country which has a constantly growing manufacturing population, and a constantly decreasing agricultural population, emigration is not a question for the Colonies alone to deal with, but it will be forced upon the Mother Country to consider most seriously how best to provide homes for its people, homes for them in its grand and fertile Colonies, rather than allow them to go into foreign lands, and form connections antagonistic to the Mother Country. I have in my possession elaborate statistics, showing the annual production and importation for Great Britain of food and its cost, and proving that at present the exports of the Kingdom fall far short of the amount necessary to pay for the produce which it imports, notwithstanding the contention of hon. gentlemen opposite that the imports must necessarily be paid for by the exports, year by year, and that our arguments drawn from the balance of trade are fallacious. I have statistics to show that the balance of trade has been against England for several years past, and, notwithstanding the contention of gentlemen opposite, that the balance of trade is not the balance of trade, the people of England have been drawing largely upon the hoarded savings of more prosperous times. There has been some allusion, in this discussion, to the starving population here at Ottawa, and the poor men who were assembling the other day at the entrance of this building, but does not the hon. gentleman who referred to it (Mr. Mackenzie) remember that, when he was at the head of the Government, there were ten times as many gathered here in the purlieus of the capital as were here yesterday or the day before, and that they forced their way into the building itself, and compelled him, in rather an undignified manner, to retreat by a basement exit in order to avoid them. We have all the sincerest sympathy for these poor men; we have endeavoured to afford them help, and, I have no doubt, we shall. Their numbers continue rapidly to decrease under better times, which will give them employment, as we have seen them already decrease during the past year. I am told by my hon. friend the member for Carleton (Mr. Rochester) that last year three soup kitchens were required here to relieve those who were suffering for food, whilst now none are found necessary. That is a striking fact, in contradiction of the argument of the hon. member for Lambton. A few men came here quietly the other day—I do not know under what circumstances—and they dispersed as quietly. I did not see amongst them any haggard faces or any traces of want or suffering. If it was intended to get up a demonstration for the purpose of portraying the distress in Ottawa, and, by implication, to attack the Government and its policy—which I do not assert—the effort was a failure. I hope upon another opportunity to be permitted to produce some of the exhaustive statistical tables to which I have referred. I will only now say that I am very well pleased that this discussion has taken so wide a range, and that we have discovered by it that our friends on the other side, while they have not learned anything in the interim between last Session and this, have certainly not forgotten anything.

MR. MACKENZIE: I do not rise for the purpose of making an explanation. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down refused me that privilege at the time when he was speaking. The hon. gentleman proceeded to speak of my remarks in regard to the State of Texas, first quoting some words of my speech, and then asserting that I then proceeded to praise Texas as a country for emigrants; and I called upon him to read any passage in any speech of mine which would warrant his statement, and he declined to do so. I here state that it is utterly untrue. I also notice that the Government organ, in this city, asserted, a few days ago, that I had passed glowing eulogiums on the State of Texas as a field for emigration, and I call upon that journal either to produce that eulogium or to make a suitable apology.

MR. GAULT: During the present winter some ten emigrants arrived at Halifax without means. They were forwarded from thence by the Government to Montreal, where they remained some three or four days. In the course of that time, there was found employment for every one of them. They were artisans from the manufacturing districts of England, who had worked in the mills of Lancashire and Yorkshire. They were men of great respectability and intelligence, who had characters from the Mayor of the place they left. One of these men stated to me that he bitterly felt how deeply he had been deceived in being sent to Canada, but, after a short time, he said he had written to friends, to inform them that it was a happy day for him when he left England. I have kept track of him since, and I am glad to say that he is doing well. I am satisfied that it was chiefly on account of the National Policy that we were enabled to find employment for those men.

MR. ANGLIN: In reference to the statement made by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), in regard to the State of Texas, I think it my duty, as I remember distinctly what took place on that occasion, to say there is no justification whatever, no foundation whatever, for the allegations made to-day by the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb), and made so repeatedly throughout the Dominion, by gentlemen who addressed public meetings in the interests of the party on the other side of the House, and in the organs of that party. The hon. member for Lambton, (Mr. Mackenzie), I remember, took exception to the manner in which the present Administration were managing the lands in the North-West, and one of the reasons why he regarded that management as injudicious and likely to be injurious to the country was that persons could not be induced to go into or to remain in the country north of the boundary line, where they were required to pay prices for lands and submit to regulations which they had not to pay nor submit to in other parts of the continent. That statement was challenged, and he asked where lands could be had upon more reasonable terms than in the Canadian North-West. He merely said in the State of Texas. Not another word did he say with regard to the State of Texas. The hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) has taken pains to show that there is very little land to be obtained on Free Grants in the State of Texas. That does not affect the question. The charge made against the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), and I have seen it published fifty times, if I have seen it once, was that he had eulogised the State of Texas and pointed to it as a place to which emigrants should go rather than go to the North-West. I do think that it is not only a mistake on the part of the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, and their organs, to make and repeat so entirely unfounded a charge as that made against the

hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), but that it must, by-and-bye, prove injurious to their party. I believe there is a spirit of fair play in the country which will not allow ideas to be attributed to any public man which he never entertained, or words which he never uttered. With regard to the question before the House, I may, perhaps, briefly say that I think the Order in Council was, for many reasons, exceedingly injudicious. I think it was the first time the Government of Canada proclaimed to the world at large that they did not want emigrants who, over and above the cost of their passage, did not possess the sum of $20 each. My impression is that, if this House were canvassed to-day, and we were to state honestly what we ourselves, our fathers, or our grandfathers had in their pockets when they landed in Canada, I doubt whether we would find many hon. members who could say that they or their ancestors had for each member of their family the sum of $20. Some of the best and most valued inhabitants of this country were—aye—and are men who landed here with less in their pockets than $20. The number excluded by that Order, so far, has not been very large. I think that there were only two or three steamers that had half a dozen emigrants each who were not permitted to land at Halifax. We should not encourage the emigration of paupers, but only of those who are likely to render some service in developing the resources of this country. Everything should be done on the other side of the Atlantic to deter those from coming to this country for whom we cannot find employment. But things have come to a dreadful pass, indeed, when any subject of Her Majesty, coming from any part of the Empire, is to be prevented from entering into this Dominion, when the doors of this country are to be shut in his face, if he cannot prove that he is in possession of a few dollars. It does look hard, and, if it becomes known in Europe that such an Order has been issued, it will inflict a serious injury on this country. It will be difficult to satisfy “the suffering millions,” or the more comfortable thousands, in the old world, who learn that such a ukase has been issued, that Canada is a desirable place to emigrate to, that Canada offers abundant employment to all who are willing to work. I do not care to follow the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) in the extraordinary assertions which he made; no doubt he believes in their accuracy. But this very proclamation itself, and the speech of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture are the strongest evidence possible that, to-day, there is a large number of people unemployed in the cities and towns of the Dominion, and that we are not in want, to-day, of any more agricultural labourers. The hon. gentleman says trade has greatly improved in Montreal. I have been in the habit of watching the Customs returns closely, and my impression is that, on a fair calculation, it will be found that the value of the goods imported into Montreal, during the year ending 31st December last, was very much smaller than the value of goods imported during the year ending 31st December, 1877.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell): Surely the hon. gentleman does not estimate the prosperity of the merchants by the extent of their imports?

MR. ANGLIN: I do, to a very great extent; our whole trade is a trade in imports, exports and domestic manufactures. If the hon. member could show that we have produced in this country a larger quantity of manufactures, and that those we have produced at home are taking the place of those that formerly were imported, and that the reduction of imports is only a consequence of that charge, then he might establish his case. I will, however, venture to assert that the number of men employed in manufactures, during the year 1879, was smaller—that the number of days' work done by those employed was smaller than the number of days' work done in 1877, and that, consequently, the production of manufactures must have been much less in 1879 than in the previous year. I speak now from the result of careful observations that I have made, and particularly made in the city from which I come, and from such accounts as I have read in the newspapers of the different cities and towns of this Dominion. I allege, further, that the wages paid to mechanics and to persons employed in manufactures throughout Canada, during the year 1877, was from ten to twenty-five per cent. less than the wages paid to the same classes of people during 1879. And, speaking of my own city of St.

John, I say that the wages paid the year before the great fire amounted to twice as much as the wages paid in 1879. The hon. gentleman says that the decline in the trade of St. John is entirely due to the disastrous effects of the fire.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell): The hon. gentleman has misconstrued what I said. It was this: that the present depression is due, to a large extent, to the fact that large numbers of mechanics engaged in rebuilding the city are now out of employment and cannot leave it.

MR. ANGLIN: That is another part of the case stated by the hon. member, and I shall come to that. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that it was to the effects of the fire he attributed the depression. But he spoke also as if the decline in our population was merely owing to the outgo of the mechanics and labourers who came to the city to help to build it up again. I admit that thousands came for that purpose, and, when the work was done, went away again, but, over and above those, thousands of other people, who were residents of St. John for years and years, have gone away and permanently abandoned this country, because they could no longer obtain a living in it. In some cases, they could not earn food to put into the mouths of their children, and they left their children dependent upon the charity of their neighbours, and went to seek employment in another land, and then, when they had scraped together a few dollars in the United States, they sent for their families. Several thousands must have left St. John in that way, and the population of that city is to-day less by many thousands than it was at the time of the fire. The want of employment arises from the general impoverishment of the country, and from the increasing depression in the trade of the country. We may be told that the National Policy has nothing to do with this, that it did not bring down the price of deals, nor prevent our population from successfully carrying on shipbuilding. But, before the National Policy passed, the people were told a different story. Wherever business was unremunerative, the National Policy was to make it profitable; wherever men were in want of work, it was to provide abundant employment at good wages. Then we were told that the sun of prosperity was to burst forth the very morning after the triumph of this Policy at the polls. But a different tale is told now. Now, they deny, on the other side, that they ever made such a promise. They made such promises, and did persuade all whom they were able to dupe—and I am sorry to say that the number of such was much too large, that it was so large as to convert their minorities in many constituencies into majorities—that the National Policy would bring prosperity to all classes of the people, and to every branch of business. We are now told that we must wait. Wait how long? Last Session we were told that the National Policy was not in operation yet, but that, as soon as it came into force, business would be restored, money would be invested, industries would revive, manufactories would commence at once to go up, and that the “hum” would be heard all over the land. But the “hum” was not heard all over the land when the change of Government took place, and then we were told by the hon. the Finance Minister that we must give him time to frame his policy. He had to hunt for information from one end of the Dominion to the other, not such information as a man of great intelligence and extensive knowledge might be supposed to require, in regard to a delicate subject, but the merest elementary information. And so he went to the shoemaker, to see what he wanted, then to the tailor, to see what he wanted, and then to the manufacturer and the farmer, and thus the process of readjustment went on for month after month, until, finally, the Policy was launched. Then we were told we would soon hear the “hum;” but, though a year has passed, we have heard nothing of it yet. Since that, we have been told that it was unreasonable to suppose that prosperity could be created in a day, and latterly, by way of change, it has been frequently declared that the delay is all the fault of the late Government, who had plunged the country into a slough of despond, from which, even all the talents and abilities and patriotism of the great Tory party could not raise it up in a day, in a week, in a month, or in a year.

PRIVATE BILLS.

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were severally read the second time :—

Bill (No. 16) To authorise and provide for the winding up of the Stadacona Bank—(Mr. Vallee.)

Bill (No. 27) To incorporate the Baptist Union of Canada.—(Mr. Mackenzie.)

[BILL 2.]

(Mr. Colby.)

FURTHER CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House again resolved itself into Committee to consider the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

MR. COLBY: The Committee has now under consideration the amendment proposed by myself, last evening, which provides that all proceedings under the Insolvent Act of 1875 and the amending Acts, in any case where the estate of an insolvent has been vested in an official assignee before the present Act, may be continued, changing the phraseology so as to leave no doubt as to whether the assignee intended is the official assignee or the creditors' assignee. It provides that, where the estate has reached that stage, and is vested in the official assignee, it shall be carried on under the provisions of the Act, which are in all other respects prevailing.

MR. HOLTON: Leaving, of course, the same freedom to creditors to appoint an assignee that they enjoy now.

MR. COLBY.

MR. COLBY: Precisely; the Act is intended to be undisturbed in its operation for that class of cases which have reached the official assignee.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): It reserves any powers of the Act for all cases where the inception of the proceedings in Insolvency takes place before the Act becomes law.

MR. ANGERS: I do not believe that the amendment proposed is sufficiently explicit to cover all cases. It might lead to misunderstanding, because proceedings under the Act may be commenced, although the assignee is not appointed. As it reads, the law would remain in force only in cases where the official assignee would have been appointed.

MR. HOLTON: Where the assignment has been made.

MR. ANGERS: But suppose the case of an insolvent refusing to make an assignment, you have to issue the writ, and, after the writ is issued, the insolvent has so many days to present a petition to have that writ quashed. If the law should come into force between the date of the issuing of the writ and the delay to present the petition, I think the amendment would not cover that case. There fore, I would suggest that the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) should adopt an amendment to meet such a case as I have mentioned.

MR. COLBY: If this Bill passes at all, it will be because this Parliament deems it undesirable that the Insolvent Law should continue longer upon the Statute-book; that it is an evil, and, consequently, we should make the Bill cover all the cases that can be properly brought under it. Now, after an estate has reached an official assignee, there are great difficulties in getting it out of his hands. I do not know that Parliament has power enough to wrest it from his hands. If we should attempt to do that, if all that has been said of an official assignee be true, it is doubtful if even an Act of Parliament could wrest the estate from him, once he has got hold of it. But, at any stage prior to its being in his possession, I think the proceedings may properly be interrupted, and ought to be, if the principle of this Bill is correct. I think it logically follows that we should stop the procedure, under this Act, at as early a stage as we can do it, without serious inconvenience. Another reason, which should incline us not to stretch this point too far, is this: many have grave apprehensions, which seem to be warranted by intelligence which has come to us through the newspapers, that there is likely to be an extraordinary rush into insolvency of persons desirous of placing themselves under the operation of the law. If it is desirable to repeal the Act, we should not encourage that condition of things, and make the evil greater than it is likely to be. I have consulted the hon. the Minister of Justice, and other leading members of the House, and the feeling is, that all estates actually vested in an official assignee should be wound up according to the provisions of the law as it now is, but that the Act should be totally repealed as regards those estates which have not become vested in an official assignee, and that will be the effect of the amendment which I have proposed.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria): I do not know whether the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) proposes to accept the amendment offered by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Angers).

MR. COLBY: No, I was explaining my own amendment.

MR. CAMERON: I understand neither the force nor the object of the hon. member's amendment. It appears to me that the amendment of the hon. member for Stanstead covers every imaginable and possible case that could arise. As I understand the amendment of the hon. member for Stanstead, it is this: that the repeal shall not apply to any case in which the estate has passed into the hands of the official assignee, whether by virtue of a writ of attachment, or by virtue of a demand of assignment; and an assignment made in pursuance of that demand, or by reason of the issue of an attachment, because the debtor has not assigned in pursuance of such demand. Now, it is manifest under the Statute that the very moment the assignment is made, or the process comes into the hands of the official assignee, that moment the estate becomes vested by him. Such is the law, and, if it is vested in the assignee in either of these cases, then it is of no kind of consequence whether or not an application is made within the five days allowed by law, to evade any such proceedings. If such an application is made, and it is successful, of course the estate will revert to the debtor, and will in no way be subject to the provisions of the Act. The amendment of the hon. member, therefore, covers every possible case, and I would recommend the hon. member for Montmorency to withdraw his amendment, as it is wholly useless. The Bill, as it stands, makes ample provision for the difficulties he suggests.

MR. BURPEE (St. John): I would like to call the attention of the House to the position of New Brunswick with regard to this Bill. They have an Attachment and Garnishee Act there now, which, if this law comes into force before the Local Legislature has had time to legislate, will place the business part of the community there in a very awkward position. I would suggest, therefore, that the hon. mover should fix a delay of, say, several weeks, before this comes into force, to give the Local Legislature time to legislate in this matter.

MR. COLBY: Since the Local Legislature of New Brunswick is to meet to-morrow, there will be, undoubtedly, ample time for them to dispose of any objectionable law that may be upon their Statute-book, and that might be revived. Of course, I think it is in the interest of the country that this Bill should go through its stages as rapidly as possible. It is not the custom, except in rare instances, I believe, for His Excellency to come down to sanction laws before the close of the Session, so, unless the public interest should imperatively require it, it is not to be presumed, I suppose, that this law will come into force before a couple of months hence. Consequently, the wish of my hon. friend (Mr. Burpee) will, in the nature of things, quite naturally be carried out. I do not see the necessity of introducing any extraordinary clause to meet a condition of affairs which I do not think likely to arise.

MR. DOMVILLE: What the hon. gentleman from St. John says may be true, but we have no guarantee that the New Brunswick Legislature will repeal their Attachment and Garnishee law. If, as the hon. member for Stanstead says, they wish to do so, they can in three days. That Legislature meets to-morrow, and, if disposed, can take that course.

MR. WELDON: I think the proposed legislation could hardly pass in three days. The attachment and garnishee laws have to be modified if not entirely repealed. The dissolution of attachments depends on proceedings in bankruptcy against a party. The Provincial Legislature may not entirely do away with those laws, but may merely modify them to meet the changes in the Dominion legislation. In regard to a Bill involving such changes, a time affording a reasonable season for preparation should be fixed before its coming into operation. When Congress repealed the Bankruptcy Act, a considerable time was allowed to elapse before it took effect. It is objected that parties might rush into bankruptcy; but, under the present law, a man cannot go in voluntarily, but can only assign on demand made. The amendment of the member for Montmorency (Mr. Angers) would prevent voluntary assignments. I suggest whether it would not be better to fix a day, say May 1st next, for the commencement of the operation of the Act. If parties intended rushing into bankruptcy in consequence of the Bill, after it passed this House, they would enter as fast as they could. I do not think the delay of a couple of months would materially alter the position of parties, and meantime New Brunswick would have time to legislate to meet the exigencies of the case. With the complicated law of Ontario it might be some time before that Province, either, could legislate to meet the altered circumstances of the case.

MR. COLBY: It must be obvious to the hon. members for St. John (Mr. Burpee and Mr. Weldon) that, even if the law passed, it would not take effect before the 1st of May next; should it take effect earlier, it would be only on account of the apprehension of some great abuse, flowing from the continuance of the actual law. My hon. friends ask that Parliament should tie its hands, and put it out of its own power to bring the Act into operation before a certain period; that, no matter what might be the dishonest rush into insolvency, Parliament should have no power to check it. They are asking too much. I am certain the new Act will not come into effect immediately, unless there be excellent reasons for it.

MR. HOLTON: There can be nothing clearer than that, if the House is of the opinion it is expedient to repeal the law, it is expedient to repeal it at the earliest possible moment. The repeal is only founded on the assumption that the Act is working injuriously to the interests of the country, and, therefore, ought to cease as speedily as possible. I think that the fixation of the date would be exceedingly unwise. For myself, I remain of the opinion that it is unwise to repeal the law at all, and the best possible proof of its un wisdom comes from the mover of the Bill. He admits that we must have Provincial legislation to take the place of this in respect of insolvency, thus substituting a series of Provincial jurisprudences, differing from each other in many respects, for a uniform jurisprudence, co-extensive with the boundaries of the Dominion. This proposed new system must prove very unintelligible and inconvenient to the whole trading class throughout the country. A strong current of public opinion has set in so strongly in favour of the present law that I do not propose to endeavour to resist it, and I do not blame the Government for yielding to it. I venture to predict, however, that within a very few years—not more than two or three—the clamour among the trading community will be as strong as it was, first, in 1864, for an Act applicable to the old Province of Canada, and, in 1869, for its extension to the Provinces that joined it at Confederation. I lay down the proposition broadly, that the policy that urges us to repeal the law should lead us to give effect to the repeal at the earliest possible moment.

MR. COLBY: The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has not only expressed his own opinion, and that of the merchants of Montreal, but that of a very influential petition sent here from Toronto. If the Board of Trade of that city, as well as that of Montreal, suggests, as the member for Chateauguay suggests, that the present law should be repealed, until a uniform law is enacted for the division of estates, applicable to the whole Dominion, there must be good reason for such a course. Those influential bodies say, with that hon. gentleman, that, if this law is to be enacted, the sooner the better. The mercantile feeling of the country has expressed itself in favour of the immediate enactment of the proposed law, if the old law is to be repealed at all.

MR. BURPEE (St. John): The position of New Brunswick in regard to this matter is somewhat exceptional, this Province being unprepared for the proposed change of the law. My only desire is that repeal shall not take effect until New Brunswick has had time to legislate too, in a manner to meet the exigencies of the case.

MR. ANGLIN: If the majority of the House is decided that the Bill shall become law as early as possible, it would be well to know it. But, if there is anything in the reasons for delay put forth by the members for St. John, they should receive due consideration. I do not think we should be tying our hands by fixing a time for the coming into operation of this Act. But I think we should be delivering ourselves, hand and foot, into the hands of the Administration, if we left the time at their discretion. We should have a distinct understanding on this point, and probably, also, the opinion or pledge of the leader of the Government. If we do not ask his opinion, we divest ourselves, in case we pass the Bill, of all further power of interference in the matter.

MR. GAULT: I regret very much, as a representative of the commercial community of Montreal, to see this Bill for the repeal of the Insolvent Act pushed through the House with so much haste, and that is the feeling of all merchants, not only in Montreal, but throughout the Dominion. The merchants of Toronto have taken the same stand, and pronounced in favour of the existing law, because no other has been introduced to supersede it: if another had been brought in that would have proposed an equal distribution of the assets of an insolvent, the merchants of Montreal would have been satisfied. I have presented a very strong petition to this House, signed by seventy-five leading merchants, and all the banks in Montreal, against the repeal of this Act, and I hope the hon. members of this House will consider seriously their duty before voting for its repeal.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I do not think it is a proper course—I might say not a constitutional course—for the Government to enter into any arrangement across the floor of the House with regard to the time, after a Bill passes, when the Crown should give its assent to it. If the House desires, it can be postponed. There is only one way of securing such a delay—inserting a clause in the Bill providing it should take effect only after such a time.

MR. WELDON: My only desire is that New Brunswick shall have time to amend her laws before this Bill goes into force, so as to meet the altered state of affairs, in the interests of the commercial community. The member for Stanstead says it will not come into operation for two months; but we could avoid all danger by declaring the law shall not have force till after the present Session.

MR. COLBY: I would like, while this subject is before the House, to report what is said by the merchants of Toronto. The petition is as follows:—

“If, however, it is decided by your Executive that it is expedient and desirable the existing Act should be repealed, your petitioners pray no notice of such repeal be given, but that it may be brought into force forthwith, otherwise the effect must be most disastrous to the whole community.”

Here are fifty leading merchants in one of the most influential cities of this Dominion, who prefer that the law should remain as it is, but they ask, if it is to be repealed, that it should be brought into operation forthwith. I have been approached by many influential persons, asking that a clause be introduced to bring the whole Act into operation from the commencement of the Session, or from the day of the introduction of the Bill. Here are two requests made to this House from influential sources, one asking that the repeal of the Act may take effect immediately; the other, that the repeal shall not take effect for a period of two months. I do not believe that the House can do better than allow the measure to take its legitimate course, by doing nothing exceptional in the case.

MR. BRECKEN: I voted against the repeal of the Bill last Session, but, I must admit that, between that time and the present, my opinion has undergone a change. It is my intention now to support the Bill of my hon. friend from Stanstead. In Prince Edward Island, however, we have no law which provides for the equitable distribution of the estates of insolvents, and, while I feel that, if the time at which this Bill is to come into operation is to be postponed, there will be a great rush into the Insolvent Courts, I feel that it is due to the Lower Provinces that this point should be taken into consideration. I hope my hon. friend from Stanstead will see his way clear to adopt the suggestion of my hon. friend from St. John, and name a time for this Bill to come into operation. In Prince Edward Island, if this law is repealed, the creditor who is successful in obtaining the first judgment can issue an execution against the property of the debtor, and he may sweep it all away. That is exactly how we stand. To use a common phrase, it will be a game of grab. Our Legislature meets on the fourth of next month, and, I have no doubt they will see the necessity of following the example of the other Provinces, and making some provision for the equitable distribution of an insolvent's estate. I agree with the remarks that have fallen from the hon. member for Chateaugay that it is a misfortune that we do not possess a uniform law on the subject. I also think it is a matter of regret that the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Stanstead did not receive the attention of the House until late last Session. I am satisfied that not more than two or three years will transpire before the merchants of the Dominion will be asking for a law to regulate the affairs of insolvent debtors, and I doubt whether such a law, when it is placed before the House, will be found to differ much, either in principle or in detail, from that submitted last year. It is a difficult question to deal with. No subject has come before the Legislature of this country more frequently than that of insolvency, and no subject has more puzzled statesmen in various countries. In consideration of the peculiar position in which the Lower Provinces stand, I hope the hon. gentleman will see his way clear to suspend the operation of this measure for a definite time. If there is a rush into the Insolvent Court, the affairs of insolvents will still be regulated and controlled by the provisions of the law.

MR. ROSS (Dundas): This subject is one of so great importance that I think we ought to very carefully consider the matter before taking action in regard to it. We have plenty of time, and I, for one, am prepared to sustain that course.

MR. GIGAULT: I understand that the great majority of our merchants are against the repeal of the Act. They are of opinion that it should be amended, but not repealed, and I think we should comply with their wishes if, by doing so, we do not encroach on the rights of the other classes of the community. The Bill presented last year by the hon. member for Stanstead would have done full justice to both traders and non-traders. We do not know that the Senate will not reject the measure, as it did last year, and, if it does, we shall have to keep the Insolvent Act of 1875, with all its defects, on the Statute-book. If we cannot do away with the defects of the law of 1875, I will vote for its repeal.

MR. McCUAIG: I am free to admit that dissatisfaction prevails with many of the clauses of the Insolvency Act. First, it is alleged that a discharge is too easily obtained, and reckless trading is the result, producing, by the sacrifice of the stock of the insolvent, often by the insolvent himself selling far below cost before failure, and through the assignee, selling en bloc after entering into possession, thus creating a ruinous competition with the honest merchant, endeavouring by economy, and careful and prudent management, to pay his purchases in full. Again, instances of great hardship can be cited where farmers, from a kind and generous motive, have endorsed bills for merchants or traders; before the maturity of the bill, the drawer, a merchant or trader, from some unforeseen disaster, is forced into insolvency by his creditors; in a few months, at most, he obtains his discharge under the Insolvent Act; and the farmer, even after his home and his property are sold by the sheriff to satisfy the demand, if it proves insufficient to discharge the debt in full with costs, is left with the balance hanging over him, which a lifetime of his industry and small savings would not pay. Such a state of things, which the present Insolvent Act permits, is repugnant to public policy, and all clauses of the Act upholding it should certainly be repealed or amended, so as to place the farmer and the merchant, in all such cases, on an equal footing. The unconditional repeal of the law places the trader and the farmer on an equality, certainly, though it opens the door for preferential judgments, securing thereby priority to one creditor over all the others. It will not be contended by hon. members of this House that such a state of things is desirable, which an unconditional repeal would bring about; and, if it be admitted that, in all cases where a debtor is unable to meet his engagements in full, his estate should be divided equally with all his creditors, then it follows that only those objectionable clauses, relating more particularly to the conduct of assignees and discharges, to which I have already called the attention of the House, should be repealed, and those clauses preserved of the present Bill that secure a proper division of the estate of an insolvent, share and share alike, or fairly and equitably with all the creditors. I am informed a Bill is now before the Ontario Legislature which would secure this most desirable object. I have now before me the Bill introduced by the Attorney-General of that Province, and, for the information of hon. members, I will read the clauses bearing on those points. Clause five reads:

“In case a sheriff levies any money upon an execution against the property of a debtor, he shall forthwith post up in his office, and until such money is distributed shall keep so posted, a notice stating that such levy has been made, and the amount thereof; and such money shall thereafter be distributed, ratably, amongst all execution creditors and other creditors whose writs, or certificates, given under this Act, were in the sheriff's hands at the time of such levy, or who shall deliver their writs or certificates to the said sheriff within one calendar month from the first posting of such notice.”

Then clause seven is as follows:—

“No creditor shall be entitled to share in the distribution of money levied out of the property of a debtor unless either by the delivery of a writ of execution, or otherwise, under this Act, such creditor has established a claim against such debtor either alone or jointly with some other person or persons.”

The latter clause it will be observed, makes it imperative for a creditor, before he can demand from the Sheriff a proportion of his claim, to institute proceedings, through the Courts of Law of that Province, to establish it, and finally obtain judgment and execution against the debtor. It requires but little examination of this proposed Bill to be convinced that the results of such proceedings, practically, will not divide the estate with the creditors, but with the members of the legal profession; in short, a small estate would certainly be all absorbed in law costs. Aside from this objectionable feature in this proposed Bill of the Legislature of Ontario, I am of opinion that Ontario, with the other Provinces of the Dominion, by the British North America Act, was deprived of all authority to deal with insolvency; and, as long as this doubt exists, appeals to the Supreme Court will unavoidably follow, and, of necessity, thereby lessen, still more, the assets of the insolvent. I have received a petition, this morning, from the principal Banks of the Dominion, and from the most influential of the merchants of the city of Montreal, and I have also noticed that the Boards of Trade, of nearly all the cities, are opposed to the unconditional repeal of the Insolvency Law, introduced by the hon. member for Stanstead. I am of opinion that representations from such influential sources, should receive at the hands of the hon. members of this House every consideration to which they are fairly entitled, before accepting so sweeping a measure as this, which, among many other objections to it, would do away also with that uniformity of commercial law extending over the whole Dominion, which it is certainly in the interests of the country to preserve. I would say to the hon. member for Stanstead, that it is not for him to speak of inconsistency. Last Session, that hon. gentleman proposed to save the country by an amended Act, which, being unceremoniously rejected by the House, this season he proposes to accomplish the same object by the exactly opposite course, of repealing the Bill altogether.

MR. COLBY: With reference to the law introduced by the Ontario Government, if there are any defects in it, I have no doubt they will be carefully considered, and remedied by the Local Legislature. It is not for us to take that measure into consideration. With regard to the hon. gentleman's proposition, I think he comes rather late in the day to expect the House will entertain it favourably.

Section agreed to.

MR. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier), moved the amendment of which he gave notice on Friday last. [Vide p. 104.] He said: I think that, while on the one hand we are going to repeal the Insolvency Laws, we ought to free honest debtors from their liabilities. Those debtors, who have given up the whole of their estates, and who have not been guilty of any fraud or fraudulent preferences, within the meaning of the Act, should be able to receive their discharge. No doubt, some fraudulent debtors will take advantage of such a provision, but the great principle of the British Constitution, which is also a Christian principle, is, that it is better that ninety-nine guilty persons should escape than that one innocent person should be improperly punished. I have no feeling at all in the matter. I believe that the amendment I propose is a fair one, and I therefore submit it to the consideration of the House.

Motion negatived.

MR. LANE: I voted against the repeal of this Act last Session, and, I think that, although the House was in favour of a repeal at that time, it is not so strongly in favour of a repeal at the present time. I think it would be rather unfortunate, if we were to repeal this Act, as it is proposed to do now. We have very strong petitions from mercantile men opposing the repeal of the Act. Hon. gentlemen representing farming constituencies have not the same interest as hon. gentlemen representing large cities. It would seem that this measure would involve a great deal of difficulty and loss to the commercial community. Therefore, I will move that the Committee rise.

Motion negatived.

MR. ROCHESTER: I desire to move an amendment which is intended to remedy that part of the law which renders it necessary for insolvents to pay fifty cents on each dollar of their liabilities before a Judge has power to grant them a discharge. There are, doubtless, many instances in which insolvents cannot pay fifty cents in the dollar—often through no fault of their own—and, in many cases, their inability to do so must be ascribed to the assignees who wind up their estates. This amendment is, therefore, simply to give an honest insolvent a claim to his discharge after giving up all he is possessed of.

MR. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier): Allow me to say one word in answer to the hon. gentleman who has just sat down. No discretion is left with the Judge now to grant the discharge of the debtor who has not paid fifty cents in the dollar. Formerly, there was a certain discretion left to the Judge to grant the discharge; but, by the law of 1877, it was not made a matter of discretion with the Judge; it was the imperative duty of the Judge, where a debtor's estate did not realise the fifty cents, to refuse it, and any creditor had a right to object. In a recent case at Montreal His Honour Mr. Justice Jetté expressed much regret that there was such a provision in our Insolvent Laws. He stated that, if there had not been such a provision, he should certainly have granted the debtor, in this particular case, his discharge. The amendment now proposed by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Rochester) is absolutely necessary in order to grant relief to unfortunate insolvents, who have been guilty of no fraud, and have given up their estates to their creditors.

MR. BLAKE: Why should we repeal the Insolvent Law at all, if any honest man, whose whole estate has gone to his creditors, should be discharged? Why did the hon. gentleman (Mr. Girouard) second this Bill to repeal the Insolvent Law? We have, from time to time, in accordance with public opinion, been increasing the difficulty of obtaining a discharge without consent. It was thought to be wrong that debtors should so easily get their discharge. It is true, as the hon. gentleman has said, that the Judge has not now the absolute discretion he had under the former law. It was found that the restriction, under the former law, was practically inoperative. The kindly feeling or weakness of the Judge, when he had such a discretion, resulted in almost universal discharge. But the insolvent is not in the difficulty that the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Rochester) supposes. Although the clause referred to by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) prevents the Judge from exercising the unlimited discretion he formerly had, the demand for a payment of fifty cents is not inexorable; it does not apply to those cases in which the estate would have produced fifty cents in the dollar, but for default, after the estate passes out of the hands of the insolvent. The section is this:—

“ Provided always, that the Judge shall not grant any discharge under this section in any case, unless some one of the following conditions be established by proof, that is to say:—

“1. That a dividend of not less than fifty cents in the dollar on the unsecured claims has been, or will be, paid out of the insolvent's property; or,

“2. That such a dividend might have been paid but for the negligence or fraud of the assignee or inspectors.”

So that, if, as the hon. member for Carleton says, there are many whose estates would have produced fifty cents in the dollar but for the negligence of the assignee, these are entitled to their discharge under the law, as it stands.

MR. ROCHESTER: The attempt to make assignees responsible for cases in which estates do not realise anything like their value would be a very unnecessary and useless task; since it is well known that assignees, in nine cases out of ten, wind the greater part of the proceeds of insolvent estates into their own pockets. I am certainly in favour of repealing the present Insolvent Laws; but, at the same time, would wish to see every insolvent to whose charge nothing dishonest can be laid entitled to a discharge, even should his estate not realise fifty cents in the dollar; and my amendment is simply to give to such a claim to a discharge.

MR. STEPHENSON: I agree with the hon. member who has just spoken. I have a case in point. A person was thrown into insolvency, in consequence of his saw-mill being burnt down, and his lumber being destroyed by fire. His estate would have paid a good deal more than fifty cents in the dollar, but for this loss. The assignee did not eat up his estate, but the fire did; and he could not get his discharge.

MR. BLAKE: Suppose the loss had taken place after the passing of this Bill; how would he get his discharge?

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew): Until I heard the discussion to-night, I thought there was a wish to repeal the Insolvent Laws; but, when I hear hon. gentlemen discussing the effect of affording relief to insolvent debtors, it seems to me that the growth of opinion in favour of the repeal of Insolvent Laws, which prevailed in this House, and which prevails throughout the country, instead of strengthening, is waning. The House ought, therefore, to consider whether we should not go back a step, and think seriously whether, after all, the Insolvent Law ought to be repealed.

It seems inconsistent that those who are in favour of repealing the Insolvent Laws should now be anxious to incorporate a clause giving relief to insolvent debtors.

MR. ROCHESTER: If the hon. gentleman alludes to me, I may say that, if he paid attention to what I said, he would find I declared in favour of repeal of the Insolvent Law; but that I wished that those who are now in insolvency should get their discharge.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell): That means that a number of persons are going to be better off in consequence of the passing of this Act than if the Act were not passed. The great objection to the Insolvent Act is the too great facility it affords debtors of obtaining their discharge. Notwithstanding that clause in the Act providing that unless a debtor pays fifty cents in the dollar he shall not be discharged, the average paid has been about twenty-seven cents in the dollar, compositions being made by voluntary arrangement. So that, in reality, the clause has not operated very seriously in the past. There has been too great a facility for insolvent debtors to receive their discharge, and we ought to be careful not to increase that facility. We should not grant discharges in opposition to the law now in the Statute-book.

MR. MACDONNELL (Inverness): When the clause of the Act of 1877, which provides that the estate should pay fifty cents in the dollar, was before the House, it had a great deal of opposition. The House was pretty evenly divided, and several members now present, among them myself, took objections to that clause. It was most tyrannical to give power to the creditors to put a man into insolvency, and yet have the power to withhold his discharge. I consider it a most tyrannical clause, and I do not see what ends it can serve. I cannot see why insolvents who are honest, not even charged with fraud, and who are not blameable for having become insolvent, should be prevented from getting their discharge and re-entering trade.

MR. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier): It has been said that it is inconsistent for gentlemen in favour of repealing the Insolvent Laws to support this amendment. I am in favour of repealing those laws entirely ; but this amendment of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Rochester) deals with debtors in the past, who have been dispossessed of their estates under previous laws, and who should be entitled to their discharge, when it is proved, to the satisfaction of the Judge, that they have given up everything, and done nothing wrong. This is nothing but the consequence of the repeal of the Act pure and simple.

MR. WALLACE (South Norfolk) : In answer to the charge of inconsistency, I may say that I voted for the repeal of the Insolvent Law last year, with the distinct understanding, and on the assurance of one of the members of this House, that a law would be introduced, providing for the winding-up of insolvent estates; and, when I found that such a Bill was not to be introduced, I refused to vote a second time.

MR. MACKENZIE : Who gave the promise ?

MR. WALLACE : The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard).

MR. BLAKE : I wish to point out that the present law, referring to the debtor's discharge, is not so tyrannical as has been contended. The third sub-section of the clause, from which I have already read, adds this other condition :—

“3. That the insolvent had, on some day prior to the institution of the proceedings in insolvency, mailed, prepared and registered, to the address of each of his creditors, so far as known to him, a declaration acknowledging his insolvency, and that no proceedings in insolvency had been instituted against the insolvent for more than one month after the mailing of such notices, and that such a dividend would have been paid, but for the circumstances for which the insolvent cannot justly be held responsible arising more than one month after the mailing of such declaration.”

So that, if any man sees his estate so diminished that it will not pay much more than fifty cents, he can inform his creditors; and, if they do not take speedy steps to put him into insolvency, and during their delay the estate has got worse, he can obtain his discharge, even though it does not realise five cents. With reference to the suggestion of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) as to there being no inconsistency between this amendment and the Bill, it seems to me the proposal is only like one other bit of legislation that I remember, a law of the Imperial Parliament, on a subject to which the hon. member is to direct the attention of the House at some future day. I refer to the vexed question of marriage with a deceased wife's sister. It is well known that, up to a certain point, in England, marriage with a deceased wife's sister was voidable during the life of both the parties, but was not void; but at a certain period Parliament changed the law. First of all, it declared that marriage with a deceased wife's sister for the time to come should be not merely voidable, but absolutely null and void; secondly, it declared that, for the time past, all such marriages should be, not merely voidable, but absolutely good.

Amendment negatived.

Bill ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

(In the House.)

Bill reported.

Motion made and question proposed :

That the amendment made to the said Bill in Committee of the Whole be now read the second time and concurred in.—(Mr. Colby.)

MR. HOLTON : We ought not to hasten this Bill unduly. We have two remaining stages—receiving the report of Committee and the third reading. My impression is that the report of the Committee should be received on the first Private Bill day of next week, say Monday, and the third reading should be set down for the Wednesday following, which will give hon. gentlemen an opportunity of formulating their opinions in the shape of amendments, on which the sense of the House, no doubt, will be taken.

MR. COLBY : I have no desire to push this with undue haste, but I think it would be well if the opinion of the House with regard to this Bill should be declared at an early day, and that the whole question should be settled, so that the business men of the country may understand what their position is. But I do not propose to urge the third reading of this Bill to-night, but my impression now is that no disadvantage could result if we are permitted to take concurrence to-night, and then, at some future day, the whole question may be decided upon the third reading.

MR. GIROUARD.

MR. HOLTON : I think I have accurately interpreted the feeling of many members who sit round me in desiring that the two opportunities of offering amendments should be given. Therefore, I repeat the suggestion, to fix the reception of the report for Monday next.

MR. COLBY : We will receive the report of the Committee to-morrow.

MR. BLAKE : I observe that an hon. member has given notice of some amendments to continue the Insolvency Law so far as it affects the privileges of Banks and Insurance Companies, but no motions hitherto have been proposed on that subject.

MR. COLBY : The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), who had given that notice, does not now intend to press these amendments to this Bill, but to propose a substantive Bill, of which he has given notice.

MR. BLAKE : That, of course, renders it all the more necessary that those hon. members who are disposed to believe that the Insolvent Act should not be repealed, and trust to the fate of some other measure for reviving it, with reference to Banks and Insurance, should have a sufficient opportunity for formulating their views on this subject.

Ordered, That the Bill, as amended, be taken into consideration on Friday next.—(Mr. Colby.)

[BILL 6.]

(Mr. Bolduc.)

SECOND READING NEGATIVED.

Order for second reading read.

MR. BOLDUC : The object of this measure is to alter the amount of the deposit required from each candidate at an election, so as to prevent, as far as possible, the practice often resorted to in constituencies, of putting up bogus candidates, with a view of preventing an election by acclamation. The real property qualification having been abolished by the Act of 1874, any person, however poor he may be, who enjoys the confidence of his fellow-citizens, may be a candidate at an election, but the author of that law required from the candidate a compliance with certain formalities. Thus, before being nominated, he must furnish to the Returning Officer himself, or through some other person on his behalf, a nomination paper signed by at least twenty-five electors, and deposit at the same time a sum of fifty dollars in the hands of the said officer, the object of such formalities being, undoubtedly, to prevent useless contests. But is the deposit of fifty dollars sufficient to prevent certain persons from raising factious opposition to a bonâ fide candidate in a constituency, in order to give him trouble and compel him to undergo the expense of an election contest? I do not believe it, Mr. Speaker, and I am convinced that, without the adoption of the measure now submitted to the consideration of the House, it will be impossible to do away with the abuses. An examination of the report of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, in relation to the last elections, will soon convince anyone of the importance of this matter. I may mention, amongst other counties, Dorchester, Champlain and the county I have the honour to represent. In those counties there would have been no contest, if the deposit had been higher. By the Bill now submitted, I propose that the deposit to be made by a candidate shall be $300 in place of $50, and that such deposit be returned to the candidate elected, as well as to the other candidates who shall have obtained at least one-half the number of votes polled in favour of the candidate elected. I think this amendment will have the effect of doing away with useless contests; for a candidate who cannot secure the support of a respectable number of electors will stay at home, rather than run the risk of forfeiting his deposit. On the other hand, the bonâ fide candidate will not hesitate to deposit that amount, being convinced, beforehand, that he will be in a position to recover it after the election. A similar law already exists in the Province of Quebec, and gives universal satisfaction, and I trust that hon. members of this House will feel bound to support this measure.

MR. LANDRY : The object aimed at by my hon. friend the member for Beauce (Mr. Bolduc) is one which will naturally meet with the approval of all the members of this House. The proposition which is now before us calls for two things: first, the abolition of the absurd tax to which the present law subjects every candidate; and secondly, the creation of a sufficient deposit to prevent candida-

tures which are not seriously meant. As the law now stands, no one can be a candidate, no one can solicit the votes of the people, no one can be nominated unless he deposits with the Returning Officer the sum of fifty dollars. That amount, let the result of the election contest be what it may, is not returned to the candidate; it is, therefore, a tax and a direct tax on every candidate who desires to present himself, and he who wishes to labour for his country's good, he who wishes to assume the responsibility, always an onerous one, of working for his country and representing in this House the many and multitudinous interests of his constituents, is mulcted in a certain sum. There is no reason for the existence of that tax, and I congratulate my hon. friend upon his calling upon this Parliament to do away with it, and I rely upon the practical disposition of all the hon. members of this House, when I express the hope that that proposition will meet with their warmest support. And let it not be said that, in future, if this proposition be adopted, trifling candidatures will arise on the day of nomination. No such apprehension need be entertained in view of the second provision of my hon. friend's Bill, which requires that a deposit of $300 be made with the Returning Officer, such deposit to be returned to the candidate elected, and to the defeated candidates, provided the latter have polled in each case at least one half the number of votes given for the elected candidate. These are the provisions which are now law in the Province of Quebec, except that the sum in that Province is $200. That provision of our Provincial law works well, in no way interferes with the liberty of the subject, and assists greatly in preventing trifling candidatures. I should gladly see it adopted by the House, and for these reasons shall feel it to be my duty to support the measure suggested by the mover of the Bill.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I approve of this Bill, to a certain extent, but I think it would be better to reduce the sum to $200, and to provide that, in the case of a party succeeding in polling one-half the votes of the successful candidate, he should have $150 back. I am strongly in favour of keeping off bogus candidates, who desire to have their names appear in the newspapers as candidates, and who, for the sake of a little notoriety, force a contest on a constituency. Fifty dollars is a small sum, which, I think, most candidates would be willing to pay. That was the general feeling at the time this matter was discussed before. I am inclined to think, however, that fifty dollars is not sufficient for the purpose. Those hon. members who were in Parliament at the time this principle was adopted may remember that there was a strong pressure to increase the amount. It has been tried in Quebec, where $200 is exacted, and it has been found to succeed in that Province. That sum would not prevent any candidate from coming forward who has any reasonable hope of success, while it would prevent the worry and demoralisation resulting from a score of unnecessary contests.

MR. HOLTON: In Quebec, $200 must be deposited, but, I think, the whole amount is returned.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I am in favour of $150 being returned,

MR. HOLTON: The whole amount is returned in Quebec, in the event of the losing candidate getting one-third the votes polled, when there are only two candidates; but I think the exaction of any deposit involves a restriction upon the freedom of choice among the electors. I regard it, therefore, as objectionable in principle. I remember well the discussions we had, when the Election Act was before the House. It was proposed, if I remember rightly, by the gentleman in charge of the Bill, now Chief Justice Dorion, to make the deposit larger, but, after a good deal of discussion, it was fixed at fifty dollars. Perhaps a provision for a small deposit of that kind, as evidence of good faith to prevent merely bogus candidates, may be acquiesced in. It is hardly worth while, perhaps, to move for its repeal, but the thing itself I regard as very objectionable indeed. The old doctrine was, and I think it was sound doctrine, that it was for the electors to determine whom they would put in nomination. It was not necessary for a candidate to solicit the suffrages of a county. It ought to be competent for the electors, twenty-five or fifty in number, to fix upon and nominate such candidate. There are cases in which the deposit of $200 might really tend to defeat the freedom of choice among the electors. I think it is hardly worth while making any change. Perhaps, before another general election comes around, the whole Election Law may come under review. There may be other changes, perhaps more important than these, called for during the lifetime of this Parliament.

MR. BLAKE: I recollect the motives which induced this change. It was consequent on the novel provision with reference to putting men in nomination. We were adopting the new principle of the ballot, and a new principle of avoiding public nominations, and it was suggested that, while under the old system the manifest sense of the electors assembled at the public nominations tended to prevent abortive or vexatious nominations, the new proposal, that a candidate should be put in nomination without any public meeting whatever, would give greater facilities for abortive or absurd nominations, and useless contests. It was thought that some check on this should be created, in place of that effected by the presence of the electors at the nomination. Two things were proposed: first of all, that the nomination papers should be signed by a substantial number of electors, and that was agreed to; secondly, that a certain sum should be paid in as a deposit. There was talk of a larger sum, and there was serious objection, by some persons, to the exaction of any sum as the price of putting a man in nomination. But the smaller sum was agreed upon, as one that would not seriously affect the freedom of election, and which might, at the same time, have the desired effect of checking frivolous nominations. I think, if there be any change in the law at all, it should be a change not to increase the amount paid in, but as to the application of the payment. I think it would be reasonable to provide that the successful candidate should receive his fifty dollars back, and that the unsuccessful candidate, who has proved, by the vote, that there was even the smallest chance for a reasonable contest, should receive back his; but the sum itself is, perhaps, so unimportant as to render a Bill for that purpose unnecessary. I agree with the hon. gentleman from Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) that there are serious objections to the exacting of an important sum as the condition of nomination. The election might go on suddenly. There might be some difficulty about raising a fund in a remote part of the country, there might be some miscarriage of a money letter, a sum of $300 might not be available at the place of nomination, and the electors might thus be deprived of the opportunity of taking the sense of the constituency, by reason of this money qualification. Therefore, while I should agree to all that part of the hon. gentleman's Bill which proposes to remove, as far as may be, the pecuniary loss consequent on the demand of a deposit of any amount, I, for my part, differ from his view when he proposes to increase to such a large figure as $300 the amount of the deposit.

MR. DESJARDINS: The working of the existing law in relation to Local elections in the Province of Quebec has not resulted as pointed out by the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton). The sum of $200, which that law requires to be deposited, has not, in any way, prevented candidates from presenting themselves in the several counties in that Province. A proof of this presents itself at the present moment. In the county of Rimouski, three or four candidates are presenting themselves at the same time, notwithstanding that each of them is compelled to deposit $200 on the day of nomination; and this proves that the deposit of such a sum in no way prevents candidates from entering into the contest.

MR. HOLTON: The nomination has not taken place as yet.

MR. DESJARDINS: My information is that it took place to-day, and, as four or five candidates were nominated, we see that the deposit of $200 does not prevent any serious candidate from coming forward, at least in that Province. It is a false principle to impose a tax on a candidature, as the Federal Law now in force does. That a deposit should be required for the prevention of factitious candidatures, on the part of certain individuals, whose only object is to cause trouble and embarrassment to boni fide candidates, and that that deposit should be forfeited if the person by whom it is made does not receive at the poll a reasonable proportion of votes, is right; but that the impost should remain as a tax upon the candidature itself is, in my opinion, opposed to all proper ideas in relation to the Election Law, and to the standing of a man called upon to enter into political life. I therefore hope that the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Bolduc), will receive from the House the consideration which it deserves, and that it will become law.

MR. LANGEVIN: I do not see that there can be any objection to the increase of the deposit to $200. As has just been stated by my hon. friend, $200 are required to be deposited by candidates in Quebec, and yet there is no difficulty in finding bonâ fide candidates to come forward. More than that, I will cite the case of the county of Chicoutimi, where the candidate for whom the people were most generally in favour was absent from the Province, but, nevertheless, they contributed readily of themselves the sum of $200, and deposited it in his name in order that the electors themselves might put him in nomination. Therefore, when the people themselves are desirous of putting forward any man as a candidate, they can find $200 just as easily as $50. But the real object of the measure, as I understand it, is to prevent a man coming forward simply that he may be bought by the opposing candidates in order to clear the way for an election by acclamation. Men of that class are sometimes brought forward by those interested in having a contest in the county. If such men were obliged to deposit $200 as a condition of their candidature, and knew that they would lose it unless they polled one-third of the whole vote, we would find very few bogus candidatures. In the county of Rimouski, four candidates have been nominated for the Local Legislature, and each one of them must have deposited his $200. That does not, therefore, prevent candidates, or all the candidates, from coming forward. The object of the measure, thus being only to prevent bogus candidatures, I will vote for the Bill, because I approve of its principle. I hope, however, the hon. mover will reduce the amount to $200. I agree, also, with the First Minister, as to the amount to be returned, because I think it a fair provision that the successful candidate should have three-fourths of his deposit returned to him.

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Return the whole.

MR. DESJARDINS.

MR. LANGEVIN: I think the successful candidate should contribute something towards the cost of the elections. The fifty dollars are now retained; why should they not continue to be paid into the Public Treasury?

MR. MILLS: I do not think the principle of the Bill is one we should support. I think that such legislation tends to restrict the electors' freedom of choice. The proposed deposit might prevent the candidature of a person absent. If any person becomes a candidate, with the expectation of compelling some other candidate to buy him out of the way, the $200 mentioned would not stand in his way. He would be selling himself very cheap if $200 would deter him from being a candidate. The law already is sufficient to prevent bribery. A candidate with a fair chance of election is not likely to bribe anybody to quit the field. The requiring a nomination paper at all is scarcely consistent with the principle of the ballot, which is the principle of secrecy. Nomination papers may proclaim the preferences of large numbers of electors. We should, if we do anything, diminish the number required to sign nomination papers, and, as to deposits, abolish them altogether.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex): We have had only one election since the law was passed requiring a deposit of $50. I think the mover of this Bill has not represented that, under its provisions, a plurality or superabundance of candidates was found in any constituency. If it appeared there were more candidates than usual, a larger deposit than $50 might seem desirable. It does not appear that the present arrangement is at all unsuitable to the general interests of the country, so I see no necessity for this proposed change. It seems in the opposite direction to the existing law, as regards the qualifications of members of this House. The property qualification was abolished in 1874. I think that the freedom of choice on the part of the electors should be left as wide as possible. For that reason, the Bill appears retrograde and undesirable, and should not, in my opinion, receive the support of the House. The Government that at one time vaunted itself on being the poor man's friend has not given us a very strong illustration of that policy lately.

We have had an Order in Council imposing a tax of twenty dollars on the emigrant coming into the country, or requiring he should possess that sum before being allowed to place his foot on our favoured soil, and now the same Government favours a Bill, interfering with the electors' freedom of choice of members to this House, furnishing another indication of its abandonment of that policy, beneficial to the poor man, by Ministers who have pretended to be the poor man's friend. I hope we shall live to see the abandonment of all its policy, in a similar way. I enter my protest against this proposed retrograde movement, and more especially as we have not had a superabundance of candidates in Ontario.

MR. THOMPSON (Cariboo): I think the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), in his eloquent speech, took a retrograde step in opposing this Bill, which the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Bolduc) is entitled to credit for bringing forward. I opposed the imposition of the tax of fifty dollars, placed on all of us, which is more unfair than requiring twenty dollars to be possessed by an emigrant. I think the member for West Middlesex might be glad to see the return of $200 to the person elected, instead of a tax of fifty dollars upon him to go permanently into the public exchequer. I should be willing to see a deposit of $1,000 by each of four or five candidates, and the successful man to receive the whole. If that principle, in accordance with the National Policy, be advocated, I shall cheerfully vote for an amendment to that effect.

MR. ORTON: I can hardly see why the choice of the people should be taxed fifty dollars, or any sum. There seems to be a favourable law on the subject in the Province of Quebec. If anything further were needed to prevent bogus candidates from running, it might, perhaps, be wise to increase the number, and, instead of one-half, make it necessary for the unsuccessful candidate to poll two-thirds of the votes polled by the successful candidate, in order to secure the return of his deposit.

MR. HOUDE: Do the hon. members who have pronounced themselves against the Bill of my hon. friend from Beauce appreciate their country to the extent of pretending that those seeking for the honour of becoming the representatives of the people in this House cannot find money enough to make a deposit of $200 or $300, which they will recover back if they obtain a reasonable number of votes? I suppose a candidate who could not afford to make such a small deposit would be only a candidate expecting to make money in becoming a member of Parliament, a business not much paying, however, as we all know by experience. If he cannot, at least, have that moderate amount advanced by the constituents whose votes he solicits, it is clear he does not enjoy much their confidence, and that he has no chance of being elected. I think, nevertheless, that the sum of $200 would be a sufficient deposit to prevent futile candidatures. It seems to have given general satisfaction for the Local elections in the Province of Quebec.

MR. BOULTBEE: The feeling of the mover of the Bill seems to arise from the fact that, in Quebec, they have had, or contemplate, much difficulty from bogus candidates. We have not had the same difficulty in Ontario, so far as I am aware, and it does not seem to be necessary with us that this deposit should be made. The principle of our representative institutions is that the people select a candidate to represent them, and it does not seem exactly right that the candidate should be practically bound to pay $200 or $300 for having had the honour of being their choice. Our hon. friends from Quebec talk very lightly about putting up $200 or $300. They are wealthier than we, I dare say. I can assure them I know one instance of an Ontario candidate finding a great deal of trouble to get the necessary fifty dollars, and where the demand of $200 would have caused serious financial annoyance. With our lack of capital in Ontario, it would not be convenient to lock up $200 or $300. We prefer to use our capital to the best advantage. That large sum required would check many ambitious candidates, in the burning desire we experience to serve our country at $1,000 a year. It would, I say, nip that ambition frequently in the bud, because, especially with the hard-headed and cautious Anglo-Saxon, there is a theory strongly prevalent that, when a man pay out his money, he does not get it back. And, moreover, as has been suggested by a gentleman on a different side of the House from the one I referred to just now, it will take money out of a man's pocket at a crisis when it is eminently necessary in an election. Altogether, I am sure, despite the opinion of our leader, and various other heavy men, that it will be an unpopular measure in Ontario.

Motion made and question proposed :

That the said Bill be now read the second time.—(Mr. Bolduc.)

Question resolved in the negative.

House adjourned at

Twenty minutes before
Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, 26th February, 1880.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PRIVATE BILLS—RECEPTION.

TIME EXTENDED.

MR. ROBINSON moved that the time for receiving Private Bills be extended ten days.

MR. HOLTON : Does not that require the concurrence of another Committee ?

MR. SPEAKER : Yes ; according to the Rules.

MR. HOLTON : I believe it would require the recommendation of one of the other Committees.

MR. ROBINSON : The Clerk assured me that this is the practice of the House.

MR. SPEAKER : The Rule says :

“ Except in cases of urgent and pressing necessity, no motion for the suspension or modification of any rule applying to Private Bills or petitions for Private Bills, shall be entertained by the House until after reference is made to the several Standing Committees charged with the consideration of Private Bills, and a report made thereon by one or more of such Committees.”

MR. HOLTON: That is, one Committee in addition to the Standing Orders Committee. I do not wish to press this. I merely desire to call attention to the fact that we are again extending the time, and practically ignoring the rule adopted a few years ago by a Committee of the House, of which the leader of the House was a member—a rule providing that all Private Bills should be introduced within the first ten days of the Session. The extension the other day was necessary, but I think now we ought to understand whether we should ignore—in effect repeal—this rule, and fall back into the practice of extending the time to the end of the Session, or whether the rules are to be observed. I do not wish it to be understood that I object to the motion of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Robinson), but we seem to be drifting into the old practice which obtained before the adoption of the rule made with so much care some three years ago. I have no objection to the motion going to-day, but ten days hence I may invoke the rule.

MR. LANGEVIN: The extension has been made with regard to the receiving of petitions, and, therefore, it should extend to the receiving of Bills.

MR. HOLTON: I thought this was the second extension. I thought this was the same motion as was made the other day.

MR. ROBINSON: It is not the second extension.

Motion agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced, and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 31) To incorporate the St. Clair and Lake Erie Navigation Company.—(Mr. Stephenson.)

Bill (No. 32) Respecting the Montreal Assurance Company.—(Mr. Girouard, Jacques Cartier.)

Bill (No. 33) To amend and consolidate the Act incorporating the Dominion Grange of the Patrons of Husbandry of Canada.—(Mr. McCullum.)

Bill (No. 34) To incorporate the Farmers and Real Property Bank of Canada.—(Mr. Cameron, North Victoria.)

Bill (No. 35) Respecting the Niagara Grand Island Bridge Company.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

Bill (No. 36) To authorise the Corporation of Emerson, in the Province of Manitoba, to construct a Free Traffic Bridge across the River at Emerson.—(Mr. Royal.)

Bill (No. 38) To amend the Act respecting Procedure in Criminal Cases, and other matters relating to Criminal Law.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

PARLIAMENTARY PRINTING CONTRACT.

INSTRUCTION TO ENQUIRE.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That the Select Standing Committee of this House on the Printing be instructed to urge on the Joint Committee of both Houses on that subject, the necessity of making rigid enquiry into all the circumstances connected with the opening of tenders for the Parliamentary Printing, and the withdrawal of any tenders; and, also, with the award of the contract for such Printing, made during last Session.

MR. BLAKE: When I made the enquiries, sometime ago, the hon. gentleman stated that the Government was about to urge upon the Committee, not merely to make the enquiries, which, I presume, are intended to be of an extensive character, and not be confined to the formal words of this motion, but, also, to urge upon it to consider and report to the House what steps would be necessary to prevent a repetition of those practices.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: No, the developments.

MR. BLAKE: Yes.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I beg to move, in amendment, that the following words be added to the motion:—

With instructions also to enquire and report on the best means of preventing any irregular or improper practices, with respect to the granting of such contracts.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURTS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. McCarthy.)

FIRST READING.

MR. MCCARTHY introduced a Bill (No. 37) Further to amend the Supreme and Exchequer Court Act. He said: The Bill has but three sections in it, and is for the purpose of giving to the Supreme Court the power of amendment which it does not possess now. At present, if there happens to be, in the judgment of that Court, any error in the proceedings, they must necessarily be quashed; whereas, if they had the power of amendment, they might amend, as is done now in the Ontario Court of Appeal, which would further the ends of justice, and prevent the necessity of the whole case being recommenced in the lower courts. It further provides that if, in the, judgment of that Court, it be thought advisable that evidence be taken—any hon. and learned friends from Ontario will understand me when I say that it is just proposing to give the power to the Supreme Court which the Court of Appeal in Ontario now possess—the Court may take such evidence. There have already been two cases, one certainly, where the whole proceedings had to be commenced de novo, because the Supreme Court had not this power to amend.

Bill read the first time.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—BREAKWATER AT BAY FORTUNE.

QUESTION.

MR. MUTTART enquired, Whether, in compliance with a petition, presented last Session, it is the intention of the Government to construct a breakwater at Bay Fortune, in Prince Edward Island.

MR. LANGEVIN : That petition has been received, asking for the building of a breakwater at Fortune Bay, in Prince Edward Island, but the Department of Public Works has not as yet obtained the information required to enable it to decide whether the breakwater should be built there or not. The intention is to have an examination made next season.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—WORKS AT SOURIS.

QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to rebuild the breastwork on the east side of Souris River, and construct the breakwater at Lobster Point, Souris West, Prince Edward Island.

MR. LANGEVIN : There has been a breakwater undertaken on the other side of the bay, and that is not yet completed. The breakwater mentioned in this question would be at about 4,000 feet from the first, but on the other side of the bay. It would cost a very large sum of money, and the Government is not in a position to promise to undertake the work. To build the breastworks on the same side of the bay would cost $20,000, and the Government do not see their way, just now, to undertake such a work.

PROHIBITION OF THE LANDING OF EMIGRANTS.

MOTION FOR ORDER IN COUNCIL.

for a copy of the Order in Council prohibiting the landing of emigrants at the port of Halifax who are not possessed of the sum of twenty dollars.

Motion agreed to.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURTS ACTS REPEAL BILL.—[BILL 13.]

(Mr. Keeler.)

SECOND READING PROPOSED.

Order for second reading read.

MR. KEELER : About this time last year, I introduced a Bill for the repeal of the Supreme and Exchequer Court Act of Canada. I met, on that occasion, with the determined opposition of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, of course, and it was attempted to prevent my Bill going to the second reading on that occasion. After the discussion on the matter, however, I was granted the courtesy of a second reading, although at the end of the Session, it was slaughtered with other innocents. Some of the members on this side of the House, among others the hon. the Minister of Justice, saw fit to accuse me of endeavouring to waste uselessly the time of the House. I beg now, however, to assure that hon. gentleman, that I did not intend to take up any of the valuable time of this House for the mere purpose of amusement. I never have done that, and never intend to do it. I brought up that measure, on the last occasion, with the sincere desire to promote economy and retrenchment in this country. I believe that great necessity for retrenchment exists in every Department, and, if any hon. gentleman sees any way by which economy can be exercised, it is his duty to endeavour to secure economy in that particular. I believe, myself, that we are expending a large amount of money every year unnecessarily. Anyone who goes through the annual Estimates, must be convinced that there are a great number of items which might well be dispensed with, and an immense amount of money might be saved in this Dominion, each year, if we were all disposed to endeavour heartily to cut down useless and unnecessary expenditures. My constituents, of course, sent me here to represent their views. In doing so, I think it is my duty—I think I am only doing a small portion of my duty—at the same time, to endeavour, in my humble way, to promote economy. I think this Supreme Court was established, in the first place, without any public opinion in its favour. It seems to me that it is quite soon enough for any Government in this Dominion to undertake so very expensive an affair as the Supreme Court, when it is evident that there is some desire on the part of the public for such a course. I fail to discover that there was any demand, from any quarter of the Dominion, in favour of this Court being established at the time it was. I cannot say that I have ever seen, anywhere, either in print or otherwise, any opinion in favour of the establishment of that Court. I do not think it was established in obedience to public opinion. I stated, on the last occasion, that I thought it had been established for the purpose of affording a refuge for political supporters of the late Administration. Perhaps I said it without sufficient reason. If I did, I am sorry for it; still, I only expressed the general opinion prevailing in my part of the country. It looked very much as if comfortable berths had been established, at high salaries, for the friends of the late Administration. I hope, however, that they did not establish the Court for that purpose. I did not say they did; however, I say that that was the opinion of the country. The next objection I urged, on the last occasion, was that this Court was accessible only to the rich. I do not think anyone can say that the poor man is anxious of obtaining justice inside of that Court. The costs are so immense, that I do think the poor man would soon find that there was no chance for him, if once he took his case into that Court. It has been charged against me that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have instructed me to move on the subject. I introduced this measure simply because I believed I had a right, as a humble representative of the people in this House, to ask for anything that I thought in the interests of the country. On that occasion, I thought it was my duty to take the sense of the House on that measure, and the large vote on the first reading which the measure then secured flatters me that I may receive the same number in favour of the second reading, on this occasion. I know well, of course, that many hon. gentlemen voted on that occasion, because they thought the Bill would never pass to the next stage. I hope that, on this occasion, I may receive the votes of all hon. gentlemen who really have the good of the country at heart. I do not wish this to be regarded as a class measure, and that, because some of the members here are lawyers, and others are laymen, it should be regarded as an attack upon the former class. Before this Court was established, we did very well without it. I can find nothing to show that we are better off now than we were before. I believe that the Court, so far as its proceedings are understood, in the country, is very unpopular. In the Province of Quebec, in particular, I believe this Court is extremely unpopular. From the conversation I have had with gentlemen from that Province, they consider it an invasion of the rights secured to the Province of Quebec; and, I believe, that in the other Provinces, it is looked upon much in the same way, and as a useless expense, that we might very well do without. On the last occasion, a great many remarks were made on both sides of the House, that I believe I may properly take a little notice of. The hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) for whom I have the very highest personal respect, I think, said in his remarks, that it was very demoralising to the Court itself to have such a motion brought up. My ideas may be wrong, but I cannot see where there can be any demoralisation from this matter being investigated. It seems to me that, if there are any institutions in the Dominion that cannot bear scrutiny of the closest character, there must be something wrong about them, and it is quite time that such should be investigated. There are many other hon. members, also, who lashed me severely for what I have said. One hon. gentleman said we might as well abolish this Parliament as the Supreme Court. Probably that hon. gentleman can see further than I can, but I can see no connection between abolishing that Court and abolishing this Parliament. Another hon. gentleman, I think it was the hon. gentleman from Shefford (Mr. Huntington), said that I was opposed to this Court because the late Government had established it. I beg to assure that hon. gentleman, and this House, that I had not the remotest idea of the sort. I was aware, all the while, of course, that my hon.

friend was in favour of that Court. Seeing no necessity for this Court, I think that my right hon. friend the leader of the Government, would not, except for the settlement of the constitutional question, have favoured its establishment. I think this High Court of Parliament is quite sufficient for all purposes, without the Supreme Court. As to the history of the Court, and its decisions, I do not believe it has rendered any decisions that command the respect of the Provinces at large. I will only refer to one case in support of this view—that of Berlinguet et al. versus the Queen. It is said that the costs of the suppliants were $35,000, and the costs of the Government were $16,000, which had also to be paid, making a total of $51,000, for the trial of a simple case. There is no reason for a Court so expensive. With reference to the cases of railway contractors, I believe they would be more honestly and righteously settled by arbitration. I believe that one such has been referred to Mr. Shanly or Mr. Keefer, as sole arbitrator—Murray versus the Queen—and that judgment has been rendered for $100,000 against the Government. I have not the slightest doubt that that case was much more honestly and righteously judged, and more correctly, too, than it could have been by gentlemen simply learned in the law, and not civil engineers. I believe that all cases of breach of contract would have been much better settled by arbitration. I have no feeling in the matter, but raise this question in the interest of the country. If we are to prosper, we should all put our shoulders to the wheel, and economise in every possible way. If we have a useless Court, we ought to abolish it, putting our prejudices aside, in the interest of the country, and to further its advancement. It seems to be the disposition of legal gentlemen in the House to introduce measures for the establishment of too many Courts, while we have several we could do without. This tendency to legislation increasing our expenses should be repressed. My Bill being passed would save the country, I believe, about $60,000 a year. On calling upon the Government for the construction of certain most necessary public works, such as the Murray Canal, which would benefit the country, the answer has been—we cannot spare the funds. The saving practicable by the abolition of this Court would permit of the construction of works of more consequence to the country than such Courts. I have taken from the Public Accounts the figures for Administration of Justice for the period since 1872, and find the increase something astonishing. In 1872, it was $318,259; in 1873, $398,966; in 1874, $459,037; in 1875, $497,405; in 1876, $544,091; in 1877, $565,597; in 1878, $564,920; and in 1879, $577,896, besides the amounts spent by the Provincial Governments for the Administration of Justice. I have not the amount for each Province, but, in the Estimates for Ontario for this year, I find $287,000. These figures are quite enough to set us all thinking, at any rate. The cost of justice, in a country of only four millions, is altogether disproportionate. As to the actual expenses of this Supreme Court, I had a return sent down last year giving them up to 1879, and, adding the same amount for the current year as last, I make the total cost of this useless, but expensive luxury, to be $243,927. In addition, the cost of fitting up Chambers, etc., would not amount to less than $10,000, making a total of over a quarter of a million of dollars thrown away, or wasted, in this useless Court, for four and a half years. So far as the Dominion is concerned, I think there is only a small party that has any interest in the continuance of the existence of this Court. It is said that over $250,000 per annum are spent in Ottawa by suitors, witnesses and others, brought here in connection with cases in this Court, and suppose, therefore, the people who are benefitted so much may think it a good thing. And I heard it stated the hon. the Minister of Public Works had been appealed to with regard to erecting buildings for the Supreme Court, but I sincerely hope that not another penny will be expended in Ottawa or elsewhere on this piece of folly. I endeavoured to get returns of the number of cases tried, and the cost of each, but they have not come down. Perhaps the hon. the Minister of Justice can tell us when they will be produced. I conclude by moving the second reading of the Bill.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): I wish, personally, to express my regret that, on the introduction of this Bill last Session, I made use of an observation which appears to have given offence to my hon. friend the mover of this measure. I regret extremely that I should have, even unintentionally, given cause of offence to a gentleman for whom I entertain both personally and politically, so high respect. I assure him that the observation was made under the impression that a gentleman of the experience and high intelligence of my hon. friend would not have hastily attempted to disturb so essential a feature of our Constitution as the Supreme Court by proposing its abolition. However, I am quite sure he will accept this expression of regret at having unintentionally used any words at which he could reasonably take umbrage. I am also glad to observe that, in moving his Bill to-day, my hon. friend has not given expression to his dissatisfaction with this Court in language quite so strong as he thought it his duty to make use of last Session. I think it a great pity—I am obliged to say, now, it is to be regretted extremely—that my hon. friend should think it his duty, even by the introduction of this Bill, to cause any discussion with reference to the stability of so important an institution, and with regard to the position it occupies in the public mind of this country. I need not tell him, or the House, that the most essential characteristic of a Court, and more particularly, of a great Court like the Supreme Court of the Dominion, is that it should rest firmly and securely in the confidence of the people; and, if that, or any other Court, fails, after due experiment and trial, to obtain that confidence, then, of course, we should come to the conclusion that its usefulness was gone, and, therefore, that a Bill like that of my hon. friend should be the legitimate result of that conviction in the public mind. But I entirely dissent from his view, which, I hear, is entertained by many of my hon. friends on both sides of the House, with reference to that Court. In the first place, it was one of the requirements of the Constitution under which the several Provinces were united into this Dominion. It was an obligation which the Parliament owed to the smaller Provinces, that surrendered their own rights, to some extent, and their control over their Judiciary. It was an obligation made incumbent on the Dominion Parliament, to those Provinces, to establish that General Court of Appeal, and was an obligation Parliament was bound to fulfil. It was, also, an obligation paramountly pressing on Parliament to provide a Court, which, irrespective entirely of Courts more particularly concerned with Provincial interests and leanings, should have power to give effect and executive force to the laws of Canada. So, that, on every ground, whether of obligation or of convenience, for the interests and rights of the people of Canada, the establishment of this Court was desirable if not essential. Its continuance is essential, as I think, to the interests and welfare of this people. Therefore, on that ground, I shall have to differ strongly with my hon. friend the mover of this Bill. I go further, and say that the personnel of the Court, and the character of its decisions since its creation, have not been such as to warrant the aspersions we sometimes hear with regard to it. Of course, it would be very improper for me to refer, even incidentally, to the personnel of the Court. I do not desire to do so; but, in view of the discussions that have taken place in this House, and, partially outside, I may be permitted to say, that even in that respect the Court appears to me to challenge the confidence of the people of this country. In that Court sit to-day, Judges who, when they were elevated to the Bench of the Supreme Court, had for a long period of years, performed high judicial functions in the several Provinces from which they were called, and, of the six Judges now in that Court, two only have not been Judges in their respective Provinces before their appointment. These gentlemen not only sat as Judges in their several Provinces, but, I am informed, acquired in an eminent degree, in their respective Provinces, the confidence of their profession and of the public; therefore, it does appear to me, that the learning and capacity of these eminent Judges is not to be lightly challenged in this House. In reference to one gentleman, who occupies the highest seat in that Court, he was selected to fill a seat on the Bench by a gentleman so eminent in his profession as the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), and, when the vacancy of Chief Justice occurred, the wisdom of the selection of my hon. friend opposite was endorsed by my right hon. friend the leader of the Government elevating that gentleman to the highest seat in that Court. Therefore, as far as the selection of the Judges of the Court is concerned, it is not open to the strictures we sometimes hear inside and outside of this House. But I go further; I think, without at all pressing my argument beyond the ground of fair consideration of that Court as a public body, I may say that, under all the difficulties which are naturally incident to the formation of any new Court, and which difficulties are very greatly enhanced in this particular instance, that Court has performed its functions, and has discharged its duty, in a manner which, at any rate, entitles it to the fair consideration of the country. It must be remembered that this Court was created to review the decisions of Courts of long standing in the several Provinces—Courts eminent for the character of their Judges, distinguished for the character of the men practising before those Judges, and, therefore, naturally sensitive and jealous as to the decisions of the Court appointed to review their judgments. My hon. friend says that in the Province of Quebec the Court is unpopular. Now, I regret that extremely, but I quite understand that it arises from causes entirely beyond our control. Perhaps it is a natural feeling that the members of the Bar from that Province, should not entertain so strong a feeling of confidence in the decisions of this Court, on questions of law arising under a system of jurisprudence different from that of the other Provinces, and in which they are only represented by two Judges. I cannot appreciate the objection, because I think two able lawyers, sitting as Judges on that Bench, would completely and fully meet all requirements, and protect, in every particular, the rights and interests of litigants and suitors coming from that Province. But, so far as other Provinces are concerned, this particular ground of complaint cannot prevail. I can speak for my own Province, and, I think, for the adjoining Provinces of the lower part of the Dominion. I think that I can say that the Bar and the people of these Provinces, as well, I think, as the Bench—and every Judge who appreciates the responsibilities of his position is always pleased to know that any unintentional or accidental error may be rectified by an appeal from his judgment—I say the Bench and the Bar, as well as the people of the Lower Provinces, would consider it a great calamity, were they deprived of the right of appeal to this Court. My hon. friend says the Court is expensive. I do not think that, taking into consideration the mode of procedure, and the necessity for having before the Court the fullest possible information, the expense can be called large. I think, so far as my limited experience is concerned, that it is the cheapest Court of Appeal that we can hope for in the Dominion—certainly, less expensive than an appeal to the Privy Council, the only Court of Appeal we had in the Lower Provinces before the establishment of this Court. As I pass along, I may refer to the case mentioned by my hon. friend which came from Quebec. I do not know what the expenses of that case were, but, at any rate, the expenses must have been those incidental to the trial of the cause. Where the Judge sat for a great length of time, and where a great number of witnesses were examined, I can easily understand that a large amount of costs were incurred; but the question of costs is a matter of detail, for which, by rule of Court or by amendments to the Act, an easy remedy can be found. That, however, does not touch, in the slightest degree, the main question, as to whether the Court has so far performed its functions, perhaps with the highest degree of perfection, perhaps they have made mistakes, perhaps there are reasons for some little discontent, but, in my experience of a good many years, I never knew of a Court that satisfied everybody who appeared before it as either suitor or counsel. Somebody must lose and be disappointed; somebody must be mistaken, but I am quite sure there is not a lawyer from the Province of Ontario that, taking into consideration the requirements of this Court, as a Dominion Court, and the necessity which arises, sometimes, for referring to it great questions, which cannot in any other way be aptly and opportunely settled—I do not believe there is a lawyer or layman from that Province, or from the Province of Quebec, that would like to lay his hand on the Court hastily or recklessly and destroy an institution which, in the opinion of a great many people, is essential in the interests of the country.

I state, Sir, that, in my opinion, it has not only performed material service to the country, but, in every way, it is essential to retain the services of that Court. I may, in this regard, refer to the question of the Election Law. The construction of the Statutes relating to contested elections, was, we all know, as various as the several Provincial Courts before whom the question arose throughout the Dominion. By the appeal to the Supreme Court, one uniform rule of construction was obtained, and by the judgment of that Court, the decisions of some of the Provincial Courts were not sustained. Of course there was a good deal of dissatisfaction, so great, indeed, in one Province, that an appeal was taken from the judgment of this Court to the Privy Council. I was very glad, indeed, to hear it, because it is most desirable that every opportunity should be granted with reference to this High Court that may tend to illustrate to the people the fact that we have men on the Bench whose judicial ability is unquestionable. In the case I refer to, the question was raised in the only way in which it could be done, by application to the Privy Council for leave to appeal. The result was that the Privy Council, on a full, though ex parte argument, sustained the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada as sound law. That is a certificate of the highest character, and of much consequence in this discussion. I have just one more observation to make. Questions are constantly arising under our Constitution, and in connection with the administration of affairs between the Dominion and the Provinces, that are referred most conveniently, as they ought to be, to the decision of this Court. It does appear to me that, upon that ground alone—the keeping of the machinery of Government running, as between the Dominion and the respective Provinces—it would be very ill-advised to lay unholy hands upon this institution. I trust, therefore, the House will not read the Bill of my hon. friend a second time, and that the vote may be of such a decisive character as to assure the people of this country, at any rate so far as this House is concerned, that the Supreme Court deserves the confidence of the country.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: After what has been said by the hon. the Minister of Justice, I do not intend to occupy the time of the House upon the principles of the Bill. I agree with my hon. friend in his opposition to the abolition of the Court. I think it is a retrograde step. I think it is going back very considerably in our onward progress, and I should be sorry to see that step taken. I must admit that I do not think there is any advantage to be gained in shutting our eyes to the fact that the Court, by some accident or misfortune, has not obtained that confidence which such a tribunal ought to have succeeded in obtaining. What may be the causes of this it is bootless just now to discuss. But it is a new Court—a Court established early in our history as a Dominion. I do not say that it was established so early as a similar Court was established in the United States, when they were severed from Great Britain; but still, it was established very early in our history. I have no doubt that, as the Court grows older, the people of the country will become more accustomed to consider it as one of the tribunals of which they should be proud, and of which they would not willingly be deprived. The hon. gentleman has expressed himself very strongly on the question of expense. The expense of the maintenance of the Court is principally made up, I suppose, by the salaries of the Judges and officers, and the cost of the maintenance of the Court itself, and the building in which they meet. The costs of the suitors in litigation is a different affair. I fancy, if the Supreme Court were abolished, that the number of suits appealed would still be the same, but they would go to England instead of being brought before the Supreme Court here. As regards the salaries of the Judges, there would be no immediate saving if the Bill were passed and the Court abolished to-morrow. The abolition of the Court will not deprive the Judges of the vested right they have possessed from the moment they received their commissions. They must either draw their full salaries or receive full compensation by the capitalisation of their salaries at once. But, that some dissatisfaction exists, I cannot ignore, and I am aware that the greatest amount of dissatisfaction arises from the Province of Quebec. That is easily to be understood, when you consider that the Courts in the Province of Quebec are composed of Judges learned in the special law of Lower Canada, and specially fitted to adjudicate on all questions under that law; and the feeling is that they have more confidence in the judgments of the ordinary Superior Courts than in the Court of Appeal from the judgments of these Courts. The Court here is principally composed of Judges who have been educated under the system based on the laws of England, and the majority of these Judges are not specially trained in the system of law which forms the basis of Lower Canada jurisprudence. Of the six Judges, only two are from Lower Canada. We do not know what mode is adopted by the Judges among themselves, in discussing their judgments, or in what mode they approach the examination of the cases submitted to them, but it is alleged that the Judges, coming from the other Provinces, leave very much to the two Judges coming from Quebec the appeals from that Province. Hence, it is argued, that to these two Judges is left substantially the decision of the cases from Quebec. It is felt that the decisions of the Courts below have greater weight than the opinion of the two Judges, who may reverse the judgment of the Courts below. The consideration of this difficulty is not a new one to any member of the last Parliament, or of this Parliament. The difficulties connected with establishing a Court satisfactory to the Province of Quebec was one of the great reasons that made me hesitate so long in presenting a measure for the establishment of the Supreme Court, which I twice submitted to the Parliament of Canada, and that hesitation induced me to postpone pressing the measure while I held the office of Minister of Justice. But we now have it, and, I think, we ought to try to make the best of it as a Dominion Court. We have given it very considerable powers as a Court of Exchequer, and very large powers as a Court of Appeal. My hon. friend who introduced the Bill must have misapprehended some remark of mine, when he understood that I had said that this was not a Court fitted to settle constitutional questions. I certainly did not mean to convey that impression in any opinion I may have enunciated. It is a Court calculated to decide all questions within its jurisdiction coming before it, whether it may be in regard to the construction of the Constitution, as to what the Constitution is, or in regard to any other matter arising out of constitutional questions. I may have said in some discussion, though I do not remember having done so, that a summary reference, at the instance of the Crown, of any particular question would have weight as a judicial decision. I may have said something of that kind. I think we ought not to repeal this Court. We ought not to wipe it out of existence. We ought to face the question, however, and enquire into the cause of the dissatisfaction which is so prevalent. It seems to me there must be a remedy. There must be some means of meeting the objections which experience has verified. The Government desires to press this seriously to that extent, and, individually, I may say that I am disappointed that a more enlarged discussion has not been entered upon on this occasion by members of the Bar, in order that the House and the country may, from their lips, know what the strong objections are to this Court. I have no doubt that there are very many gentlemen in this House who, if they would, would not only be able to state the objections that have arisen, but state their own opinions as to the best means to remove these objections. I had hoped this discussion would have brought out a great many of the points to which I have alluded; however, the Government desire to address themselves earnestly to this matter, and to make a full and exhaustive enquiry into the best means to remove the objections, and into the best means of making the Court, in every sense, efficient and satisfactory. If the House will be satisfied with a statement of this kind, and will not wipe out of existence this Court, I think the country will be satisfied, and that this Parliament will be able to remove the objections which have taken possession of the public mind, and make it a satisfactory and efficiently working Court.

MR. KAULBACH: With all due deference to the remarks of our right hon. friend the leader of the Government, in opposition to the Bill now before the House, for the repeal of the Supreme and Exchequer Courts Act, I feel bound, in justice to the county and Province I have the honour to represent, to support my hon. friend from East Northumberland (Mr. Keeler) and endorse the sentiments by him expressed. I feel that there was no necessity for the late Administration establishing a Court of this description; that it would have been prudence and economy on their part, had the creation of this Court been deferred till a time when the country was in a better position to meet the expenditure. We are living in an age of economy, and have a right to exercise prudence, economy and discretion in every possible way. The cost to this country, at present, for the Administration of Justice, is enormous, and is increasing every year, as will appear by the figures in detail, advanced by our hon. friend the mover of this Bill, except for the year ending June, 1878, and then it was, as our hon. friend stated, $51,277, which was not their fault that it was less, but was owing to a casualty by death of one of the Judges, who did not receive his full year's salary, and the vacancy for a time not having been filled up. I feel satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that the late Administration did wrong in creating this Court, and now is the time to redress the error by a repeal of the Act. I feel it is a luxury we can very well dispense with, and thus save so much to the country. Our hon. friend the Minister of Justice congratulated the country on our having this Court of Appeal, but, Mr. Speaker, I have a stronger, and, I consider, a better cause for congratulation, and that is, that we have a higher Court of Appeal, without a superior in the world, which costs the country nothing, and why should we not enjoy it, if need be. We have in the Province from whence I come, and have the honour to represent, seven Judges, men of ability, of deep research, and well able to cope with the knotty questions of the day, and why should we have, I ask, this useless appendage, when we can so readily dispense with it entirely? My objection is that we have too many Courts. When, perchance, a poor suitor is driven, by an unscrupulous opponent, to the Court of Queen's Bench, in any of the Provinces, and an appeal is made to this Appeal Court of Canada, is it final? No, he has the chance of still being driven by another appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England, so that, if the suitor wins the suit, he is ruined in the process by the enormous costs of merciless attorneys. In my opinion, the remedy is worse than the disease. Considering this Court, therefore, injurious as well as useless, and expensive to the Dominion, I have much pleasure in supporting this Bill for a repeal of the Act.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron): I was very glad to hear the speech of the hon. the Minister of Justice on the proposal of the hon. member for East Northumberland. I was glad to hear his observations, last year, and still better pleased to hear them this Session, because the tone and manner were quite unexceptionable. There were no attacks on either the merit or constitution of the Court. I believe, of all the hon. gentlemen, on the other side of the House, who addressed the House on this subject, he was the only gentleman who addressed it in a fair and proper spirit, and the only one who did not take occasion, when the question was before the House, last Session, to attack, in a violent manner, the constitution of this Court. I am glad to find that, the hon. the Minister of Justice has discharged his duty, as in fact it was his duty to do as the leader of the profession in the Dominion, of upholding, as far as possible, the constitution and the usefulness of the Supreme Court of Canada. I am not quite sure but that the manner in which he treated the question last Session was the most effective, both in the House and in the country. On that occasion, the hon. gentleman treated the proposition to repeal the Act creating a Supreme Court as a huge practical joke on the part of the mover of this Bill, and especially so, in view of the fact that the Court has only been in existence three or four years. If the confidence of litigants and the people of the country in the decisions of the Supreme Court, and in its usefulness as our highest Appellate Court in the Dominion is to be established, clearly, the best way to deal with such propositions as that now before the House, is the course pursued by the hon. gentleman on a former occasion, rather than in a grave and argumentative way. No man can naturally desire, at this period of our history, to lay violent hands on a Court calculated to be of essential service to the country. The mover of the present Bill, so far as I could hear his observations and understand his propositions, for his voice was very indistinct on this side of the House, based his proposition for the repeal of the Act upon the ground of the extreme expensiveness of the Supreme Court; and, in order to support his proposition, he quoted a case, in which the expenses were $6,000 on one side, and some $16,000 on the other side, and referred to one or two other cases where the costs appeared to him to be high. From what I know of the case to which I believe the hon. gentleman refers, I am satisfied that the Supreme Court saved the country, in that case alone, over a million dollars. Before the establishment of the Supreme Court, such a case would necessarily have been disposed of before the Dominion Arbitrators. I am not going to say anything now of these Arbitrators or of their honesty and integrity. For all I know, they may be able and competent enough to decide many questions, and the ordinary class of cases that come before them, involving questions of account and questions of fact but, I think the Judges of the Supreme Court much more competent to decide cases in which many complicated and important legal questions necessarily arise. We all know, as a matter of fact that, in nearly all cases that came before these Arbitrators in days gone by, damages were awarded against the Crown. On the other hand, since the creation of this Court, in cases in which the interests of the Dominion were involved and determined by the Exchequer Court—in nearly every case—the judgment of the Court has been pronounced in favour of the Dominion Government, and, in this respect alone, I believe the Court has saved to the country one hundred times as much as the cost of supporting and maintaining this Court. For that reason alone, therefore, and that is the lowest ground on which the mover's proposition may be resisted, it would be unwise and injudicious to repeal the Supreme and Exchequer Court Act. The hon. the Minister of Justice stated that the usefulness of a Court like this largely depended upon the confidence reposed in it by suitors and the public, and to that proposition I readily assent. His leader, who sits before him, laid down a proposition to which I am not prepared to assent—that there was a general feeling of discontent and dissatisfaction in the public mind in regard to the Supreme Court. I have not heard anything of that kind out of the precincts of this Chamber, but I have heard it over and over again here, and that from the hon. gentleman's hon. friends and supporters. If dissatisfaction and a want of confidence does prevail, the hon. gentleman and his friends are alone responsible for that feeling, and then, singularly enough, the hon. gentleman wishes to know why such discontent prevailed throughout the length and breadth of the country with respect to the working and usefulness of the Supreme Court. I think the hon. gentleman's curiosity and enquiry can readily be answered, and that with very little difficulty. If the hon. gentleman will only carry his memory back to what took place in this Chamber one year ago, when discussing a similar question to that now before the House, and analyse the speeches then made by several members of the Government on the subject, he will find a cogent and sufficient answer to the enquiry he has suggested, namely, why there should be dissatisfaction with the Supreme Court so very soon after its creation. When this question was under discussion last year, one member after another on the other side of the House, and on the other side alone, in clear, distinct, and unmistakable language pronounced against the usefulness, as well as the constitution of this Court. And yet the hon. gentleman wants to know why there is discontent, and why the Court is unpopular in the country. If the hon. gentleman's supporters will rise in their place from day to day, whenever this question is before the House, without any justification, and declare the Court useless, its judgment unattractive, and its constitution defective, is it any wonder that, to some extent, throughout the length and breadth of the country, there should be a feeling of discontent with that Court. The only wonder is that the Court has stood the test of these continual and reiterated attacks so well, and that to-day, it is as popular as it undoubtedly is. If hon. gentlemen will persist in this wholesale system of attack against the constitution and personnel of the Court, there will certainly be a feeling of uneasiness in the country with respect to it. The people, to a large extent, draw their inspirations from the proceedings in Parliament, and, when the voice of the people's representatives is decidedly antagonistic to any institution, that voice will be echoed in the country. If hon. gentlemen desire to make the Court popular in the country, they must cease attacking it in the House. To my mind, it is the most unpatriotic course hon. gentlemen can take—abusing and belittling this Court. It is only four or five years since this Court was established, but, so far as it has been tried, it has given general satisfaction. Of course, everyone is not satisfied with the Court or its judgments; it would be a miracle if they were. People who are engaged in litigation, and who lose their suit, will be dissatisfied. Both litigants cannot succeed, and the loser is sure to put the blame somewhere, and that somewhere is never the weakness of his own case; he is sure to attribute the loss to some blunder or mistake, and, as the lawyers never blunder, of course the blame is shifted to the shoulders of the Judges, or to the incompetency and inefficiency of the Court. I believe the alleged dissatisfaction is confined to this class, and this alone. I regret the tone of the discussions last year. I regret that there should be any discussion of the kind to which I have referred this Session. It will accomplish nothing, and serve no good purpose. It will only tend to create dissatisfaction and promote discontent. Still, I have no doubt the Court and its Judges will stand any amount of discussion, and any fair and honest criticism. The Supreme Court Act may require amendment in matters of detail; that is to be expected in creating a new Court, with new powers and new jurisdictions; but the ground on which the Court was established is wholly unassailable, and, the sooner the gentlemen opposite cease assailing this Court, the better for the Court and the better for the country. I deny that the Court is not serving the purpose for which it was created. I deny that it is unpopular, or that its constitution is substantially defective; and I say that, in the necessary details, the people and the profession are a unit in favour of the Court.

MR. PLUMB: As this Bill has been introduced by a layman, and as many of the members of this House, also laymen, must judge of it, and vote upon it, if it comes to a vote, it is quite in order for one who is not a lawyer to speak on the subject. As a non-professional, I approach it with some diffidence. It will be unwise, I think, to adopt the Bill introduced. It was contemplated by the promoters of Confederation, that there should be a Supreme Court to adjust differences that might arise between the Provinces united in Confederation. It was felt that questions of that kind would arise, and such questions have arisen, requiring to be adjudicated upon somewhere, either within our own Dominion or in England. It has been said that the Court has not fulfilled the expectations of the country. That may or may not be. We have had an earnest appeal in its favour from a gentleman on the other side, who has just sat down, the member for Centre Huron (Mr. Cameron), and who exhibited a strong party feeling, as is usual with him whenever he discusses any question; but I do not think such argument as he has used will have any weight in leading to a discussion of this important question. I believe that, in a matter like this, much deference should be given to the deliberate opinion, clearly and forcibly expressed by the right hon. the leader of the Government, who, considering his connection with the passing of the Confederation Act, is more competent probably than any other gentleman on the floor of this House to advise and instruct its members. I would prefer to follow his advice on such a matter as this, whether I were supporting or in opposition to him, politically, rather than to follow the lead of those who, however entitled to respect and consideration, cannot be nearly so well qualified to advise upon it. I have listened attentively to the arguments, pro and con. There are, certainly, reasons for dissatisfaction with the working of the Court; but, as has been fairly urged, it is a new Court; it is not in three or five years that we can judge of the proper working of a Court like this. We must not come to a hasty conclusion adverse to it, and, although there may be reason for criticism, I wish to say that I feel the utmost respect for the gentlemen sitting on that Bench, and they ought to receive the utmost consideration from the people of Canada. I do not think it is desirable, under any circumstances, except those of the very gravest character, to bring up for discussion the personal or the official acts of our Judiciary; one that, I am proud to say, for learning, ability, dignity, and purity, may challenge comparison with any in the world. Having heard all the arguments, pro and con, I feel entirely confident that the honour of the right hon. the Premier will be sustained by a vast majority of this House on both sides, for it is not, and cannot be, a party question. If I were in any doubt—and I am not—I would deem it safe to defer my judgment to his, as I would in all cases except where strong personal convictions might compel me to differ with him. I trust my hon. friend from East Northumberland (Mr. Keeler), whose sincerity and earnestness in moving this Bill entitles him to the highest consideration, will not decide to press it to a vote, but if he does so, I have full confidence that the Court will be upheld, and that on this occasion the Conservative members of this House will show themselves truly conservative, both in name and principle, by setting their judgment against an attack upon a valuable and necessary institution, which, no matter by whom established, no matter by what party established, should be protected against the violent and revolutionary measure now under consideration.

MR. MACDONNELL: I merely rise to answer some of the remarks of the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach). I was not able to hear all he said, but I understood him to say that the people of the Province of Nova Scotia were dissatisfied with the Supreme and Exchequer Courts. My opportunity of knowing the feelings of the people of the Province of Nova Scotia in regard to that Court, is as large as his, and certainly I am not aware of any feeling in that Province adverse to this Court. On the contrary I say that the existence of this Court has given a great deal of satisfaction to the people in that Province. I believe the manner in which it has discharged its duties has also given great satisfaction. I know that there have been many appeals from the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, and, I am sorry to say, that many of those appeals have resulted in a reversal of the decision given in the local Court. I feel satisfied that the Supreme Court has had the effect of making the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia much more careful, and that already there is an improvement in that Court, and its decisions are now giving more satisfaction, and commanding more respect than formerly. I rose to repudiate the assertion that there is a feeling of dissatisfaction in Nova Scotia with this Court. I say there is no such feeling, but, on the contrary, one of strong approbation and satisfaction.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria): I only rise for the purpose of denying the statement made in the House to-day by my hon. friend and namesake from South Huron (Mr. Cameron), who stated that I attacked the constitution of the Court last year, in common with other Conservative lawyers. For my part, I say most decidedly that that is not a correct statement of my remarks last year. I stated then, what I state now, that in my opinion the existence of the Supreme Court is necessary for the completion of our system of Confederation, and that it is as necessary that we should have a Supreme Court as that we should have a Parliament. I am not prepared to say that the Court is, in all respects, perfect, or that it has given entire satisfaction in Ontario, but that there is any general widespread dissatisfaction with it in Ontario I deny. Every Court has its opponents, of course. There are always a certain number of disappointed suitors, who complain of the Court, and no doubt it has not worked with the freedom, harmony, and promptitude that is desirable in Courts. There may have been delays, perhaps inexcusable in some instances, in giving judgments. I am not prepared to say that the Court gives entire satisfaction, or that it is popular in Ontario; but I do certainly deny that it is open to the wholesale denunciation that has been uttered in respect to it. But, while I depreciate this discussion, repeated year after year in Parliament, I feel that it is, perhaps, not unaccompanied by some little good, in tending to produce the removal of some of those defects which, to some extent, mar the harmony and usefulness of Court. But I do not wish it to go abroad to the country that, in the words of the hon. gentleman for South Huron, we, on this side of the House, have indulged in a wholesale denunciation of the Court. We did nothing of the kind, and, while we have not given unqualified praise to the Court or its workings, I certainly deny, for my part, as far as I recollect the observations made in the House, that we indulged in a universal denunciation of it. It is perfectly true that the Court has been objected to as not giving satisfaction to some people in Ontario. There have been some complaints, but I think the general foundation of the complaints has rather been delay in giving judgment, which may be remedied. In some cases the judgment has not given satisfaction. We think that, perhaps, to some extent, the Supreme Court has been a little too ready to overrule the decisions of the Judges in Ontario, especially those in the Court of Chancery. But, for my part, I feel the necessity of this Court, and regret that there should be any faults or defects in the manner in which justice is administered there. I think the attacks upon it are calculated to impair its usefulness, and I trust that the Bill of the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Keeler), will meet with the condemnation of this House.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron) : I rise to explain a remark that I made in regard to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. I find, in the Debates of last year, as a portion of the remarks of Mr. Cameron, of North Victoria, the following words :—

“ That among the public and the profession there was a good deal of dissatisfaction in regard to the constitution of the Court. It was absolutely necessary that the constitution of the Court should be altered and greater strength given to it.”

That was the language the hon. gentleman then made use of, and it very clearly sustains my contention that the supporters of the Government did attack, in a violent manner, the usefulness and constitution of the Court.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria) : In reply, I say that I repeat the observation I then made. I think the constitution of the Court, using the words in that sense, might be improved. I have always felt that it was necessary to strengthen the Supreme Court, and thereby, perhaps, render unnecessary intermediate Courts of Appeal in the Provinces. I have thought that, if the Supreme Court had been composed of the Chief Justices in the several Provinces, with, perhaps, a certain number of other permanent Judges, it would have been a much stronger Court than it is to-day ; but to say that I made a general attack upon its constitution is an error.

MR. BRECKEN : I agree with the remarks that have fallen from the hon. the Minister of Justice with respect to this Court. I think it is much to be regretted that year after year this Bill should be introduced, and that remarks should be made with respect to the personnel of this Court and its constitution, which would tend, in any way, to lessen its usefulness. There is no doubt that the chief cause of dissatisfaction with this Court is owing to the circumstances that there are two different systems of law prevailing in the Dominion. No doubt this difficulty presented itself to the Government who promoted and passed this Act. The existence of these two systems of law must have rendered it a difficult task to constitute this Court in such a way as to give entire satisfaction to all parts of the Dominion. I listened, last year, to the views expressed on this subject in this House, and I must say that I did not agree with the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. M. C. Cameron) in his strictures upon the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. H. Cameron). I did not understand that the latter gentleman in any way attacked the personnel of the Court, but only spoke of its constitution ; but, from the circumstance that one portion of the Bench represented one system of law, and another portion represented the other system, it is not strange that some difficulties have arisen. Speaking for my little Province, I have never heard of any dissatisfaction. We hold it as a matter of congratulation that this Court was constituted. The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach), in addressing the House, took up the question of expense. Why, the expense of appealing to this Court is but a bagatelle as compared with the expense of going to the other side of the Atlantic, to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. While agreeing with the remark that this latter is one of the most learned Benches in the world, we must not lose sight of the fact that, in appealing to that Court, we appeal to Judges who have been taken from the Bar of England, who are acquainted with the English law chiefly. You have very learned lawyers there, but you have no member of the Judicial Committee who is learned in the system of law which prevails in Quebec, although I have no doubt that, when that Court is called upon to decide a case from any Province, its members endeavour to make themselves acquainted with the system of law prevailing there. We must bear in mind that in England the legal profession is differently dealt with than it is here. Here, we are "Jacks of all Trades;" we do a little in every branch of law. In England there is a division of labour, and, perhaps, that is one reason why practitioners there rise to such eminence in particular branches of the law. When these gentlemen find themselves on the Bench, and a case comes before them, from Quebec for instance, they undoubtedly endeavour to acquaint themselves with the system of law in that Province. I think that our Supreme Court is a necessary institution, now that we have been confederated, and we have learned men, both in Quebec and Ontario, capable of conducting that Court worthily. I have been given to understand, and I believe it is true, that the legal lore attained by the Bench and the legal practitioners in these two Provinces, particularly in Ontario, as far as the English law is concerned, will compare favourably with the Bench and Bar of England. Therefore, I do not see why we should be obliged to go to the other side of the Atlantic to find a Court of ultimate appeal, when we have the material for it here. Owing to these two systems of law, the Court may require some modification, but, in any case, the members of the Bar in the Dominion will find a greater necessity now to make themselves acquainted with both systems of law. I think it is a matter of regret that hon. members of this House should attempt to depreciate the value of that Court, and lessen the confidence of the people of this Dominion in its efficiency. I have not heard one word said about the integrity of the gentlemen composing this Court, and I think they are above reproach. For myself, I have never had more than one case before the Court, but I believe justice is there fairly administered, and at a comparatively small cost. I think it is an admission that we are not called upon to make that one cannot, in this Dominion, find the material to constitute a Court that will command the respect, not only of litigants, but of the people throughout the country. I hope the Bill introduced by the hon. mover will meet with very little support in this House.

MR. HAGGART: I think the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Keeler) deserves the thanks of this House for the introduction of this matter. I believe, however, that the dissatisfaction with this Court is not so much against its personnel as against the multitude of Courts which exist throughout the country. There is a feeling that it requires a person with a very long purse to conduct a law-suit at present. The costs of litigation are so heavy that it requires a very large expenditure before a person can obtain anything like justice. The feeling is that the Courts are too numerous in this country—not so much against the Supreme Court, the success of which is doubtful. I beg to differ from the opinion of the hon. the Minister of Justice that the British North America Act made that Court obligatory on the country. I think the clause under which the Court has been constituted is a permissive clause only, allowing us to constitute such a Court. I am far from thinking that the usefulness of a Court is interfered with at all by a public discussion like this in the House. I think a discussion of this kind tends to improve the Court. Now, why is it that the feeling is so general against the large expenditure for judicial purposes throughout the country? In 1873, the expenditure was $318,000; it is now about $577,000, which is a most extraordinary increase in the expenditure for judicial purposes in this country. We are told that the costs of an appeal to the Supreme Court are far less than to the Privy Council of England. But we must remember that we can carry an appeal from the Supreme Court to England, and, in that, I beg to differ from the view of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken. As to the usefulness of this Court, let us look at the number of cases adjudicated upon. By the returns which have just been brought down, we find that seventy-nine cases have been appealed to the Supreme Court of the Dominion, and that they have cost suitors $2,000 for each case which the Court has passed an opinion upon. I believe I am correct in stating that the feeling which is almost universal throughout the country is not particularly against the Supreme Court or the Judges. I believe they command the respect of the country as much as the Judges of any other Court, but the feeling is against the multitude of tribunals that a person has to pass through before his case is finally adjudicated upon. I think the hon. member for East Northumberland is merely doing his duty to his constituents in bringing that fact before the House; nevertheless, I do not feel that I should be justified in voting at present for the second reading of the Bill for doing away with the Court, but I simply desire to draw the attention of the House to the fact that there is great dissatisfaction against the multitude of Courts at present existing.

MR. Fiset: I feel, Mr. Speaker, that I am bound to offer some explanations before voting on the question which is now engaging our attention. When the Bill for establishing the Supreme Court was submitted to us, I voted for that measure, in the belief that it would prove useful and acceptable to the electors; since then, elections have taken place, the question has been submitted to the people, and, although I was elected by my friends, they, nevertheless, reproached me for having voted for that measure. One hon. Minister, in view of the position assumed by the Government of which he forms part, must feel very uncomfortable, for he it was who, in the county which I have the honour to represent, spoke most strongly against the establishment of the Supreme Court. On the hustings, he incessantly attacked me for having voted for the Bill for its establishment. According to him, it had been established fifty years too soon; it entailed enormous expense; the people had no need of such a Court; in a word, it was one of the extravagances of the Mackenzie Government. After such protestations, his vote on the question will be watched with interest. For my part, Sir, as I am here to represent the feeling of my electors, and as that feeling was openly manifested at the last election, I consider that I must vote for the Bill of the hon. member for East Northumberland. If the vote be a bad one, the responsibility must rest on the hon. member who influenced my electors against the important measure in question, and who is now absent from this House. The hon. the Minister of Public Works, having declared in the course of his observations 'that he was or had been always ready to meet me, I replied to him: "No, you got out of the way more than once."

MR. MASSON: The hon. member must know that it was much easier to establish the Supreme Court than to abolish it when once established.

MR. LANGEVIN: I am told that the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Fiset) spoke of me a short time ago, and said that I had escaped from the House; the fact is that I was engaged in writing a telegram, and, therefore, could not have the honour of listening to him at the time. Further, it is not my habit to escape from the Chamber, either on this occasion or when voting is going on. The hon. member is well aware of that; he is well aware that, when I have occasion to meet him, I do not get out of the way. In relation to the Supreme Court, I shall not recommence the discussion with the hon. member. The discussion was too agreeable in the county of Rimouski for us to recommence it. But, in any case, so far as this important question is concerned, I am now a Minister of the Crown, and, as such, have my responsibility, as the hon. member has his. As the policy of the Government in relation to this measure has been announced by the hon. the Prime Minister, it is unnecessary for me to speak on the subject at any greater length at present.

After Recess.

MR. MOUSSEAU: The question now before the House is a very momentous one, and should be approached with a deep sense of its gravity. We have to deal with the Judiciary. A pure Judiciary has always been considered to be the bulwark of English liberties. So, when we are dealing with Courts and Judges we must always be respectful. The measure which is now before the House I second with a great deal of pleasure. I deny that it is a revolutionary measure, as has been stated by one of the hon. members opposed to the Bill. It is only a demand made by a respectable portion of this House, and by the greater portion of the whole public, for the repeal of a law which, at the time it was passed, had a majority of the people against it. The experiment has been tried, the Court has been in existence five years, and now we find that many of those who were formerly in favour of it have to confess that, so far, it has been productive of no good. Now, I will not deal with this question as a lawyer; I am not here as an advocate, or as a professional man; but I am here as a public man, representing the mass of the people, and being bound thereby to work for the welfare of the the greatest number. I do not speak of the Supreme Court as a party man, not even as a Conservative. An evidence that I shall attempt to deal impartially with this question is the fact, and a painful fact it is, that I am compelled to differ from my illustrious leader. When I was in Opposition, in 1875, I strongly opposed the Bill establishing that Court, from beginning to end. In every election since, wherever I have spoken—and I have spoken in many rural constituencies—I have always spoken against that Act, and reproached the Liberal party for having imposed upon the people that costly and entirely useless measure. Now my friends have come into power, and I pursue the same course. I think that the hon. the leader of the Government has set me a good example of consistency; he has always been in favour of a Supreme Court, and I have always been opposed to it. I still maintain my own ground, as he still maintains his. Now, I wish to repeat what has already been said by many hon. members, that I have the greatest respect, if not the highest admiration, for the personnel of the Court. Everybody admits that the learned Judges who sit in that Court have given general satisfaction, with respect to the manner in which they have performed their duties. I now beg to read a short quotation from a speech I made in 1875, in order to show that I was correct in the views I then took:—

“It was always an important matter to create a new tribunal, but it was a still more so to establish a Court under circumstances so peculiar as the present. The first question which every member—he might say every citizen of this country—would naturally put to himself, would be—whether is the law necessary or otherwise? It is asked for by British Columbia, a Province which has but, recently entered the Confederation. He did not think so. Was it asked for by Ontario, which prided itself upon the constitution of its Courts, and the general administration of justice within its jurisdiction? Certainly not. Was it asked for by Quebec? On the contrary, it was because Quebec always strongly opposed the creation of a course of this nature that it had not been consummated before. It was not from the Maritime Provinces the request came. The press, moreover had never urged that this course was necessary. Public opinion did not ask for it, nor did it give expressions to any desire in that direction, through the usual channels. To him it appeared that public men and statesmen, before entering upon a great enterprise, before spending many thousands of dollars, in short before passing any important law, ought always first to study whether such a law was wanted by the country. Public men and statesmen usually watched very closely and very attentively what was called the tide of public opinion, before imposing upon the country such an expenditure as this, for it was, after all, a very doubtful boon. It seemed to him that the members of the Government should have enquired, when bringing this measure down, whether it was demanded by the country. If such an enquiry had been made, he felt certain that the proposition to pass this Bill would never have been laid before the House.”

Those, Mr. Speaker, were my opinions in 1875, and everything which has since taken place has only tended to confirm me in those views, and in the belief that nobody has asked for that Court, and no one desires it now. It has been seen, since the beginning of this debate, that the usefulness of the Supreme Court was gone, since so many persons have lost confidence in it. I contend that its usefulness has not gone, because it never existed. It was always a useless institution, which no Province, no constituency, and no portion of the press have ever demanded. Many hon. gentlemen then, as now, have spoken of the necessity of the Court. On what ground do they proclaim that necessity? They say it was necessary to complete Confederation, to put the keystone to the arch of Confederation. We all recollect that in 1875, after the organisation of that Court, there was a grand demonstration and banquet at Rideau Hall, where those worthy gentlemen, the Judges of the Court, were dressed in red, where fine speeches were delivered upon the necessity of that Court, in order to complete Confederation, and place the crown upon the work. People say that, without that Court, the keystone would be wanting to the arch. But, where can we find the evidence of that necessity? I can see but one section in the Federal Act of 1867 which may be invoked for the creation of that Court, or for its maintenance now. By this Act, Canada "might, notwithstanding this Act, from time to time, provide for the constitution, maintenance and organisation of a General Court of Appeal for Canada, and for the establishment of any additional Courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada." There are two distinct provisions in that clause. This Parliament may, whenever it likes, establish a General Court of Appeal for Canada, to which appeal may be brought from all the Provinces. The second clause gives another power to establish additional Courts for the better administration of the law of Canada, that is, the Courts of original jurisdiction. Now, when hon. gentlemen state that the Supreme Court was necessary to crown the work of Confederation, they can base their assertions on no other ground than this very section. When was ever demonstrated the necessity of a Court of Appeal from the judgments of all the Provincial Judges? Nobody ever asked for it—never did any Provincial constituency, or newspaper, demonstrate that the Provinces wanted their Judges improved upon by a Supreme Court; nor did anybody ask for a better administration of the laws of Canada. But, if no reasons whatever were given to prove the necessity of this Court, a great many were given to show its utter uselessness. I understand the necessity for a Supreme Court that arose in the United States after they established their independence. Federal laws were administered in that country by State Judges, who, sometimes, might be hostile to the Federal Government. But, in Canada, there is only one State for judicial purposes. We established a General Supreme Court, and took precautions to render it useless for fifty years or a century. Because our Provincial Courts are virtually Federal Courts; the Judges are appointed and paid by us, and on misbehaving are impeachable by the House. So, in reality, there are no grounds whatever for the maintenance of the Supreme Court, as our Provincial Courts are Federal Courts, and our Provincial Judges Federal officers. That Court entails a useless heavy expense.

My view is supported by the brightest and most respected of all our judicial authorities—I mean the Supreme Court itself. You recollect some of the late decisions in election trials. In some cases the respondents, the sitting members, including the member for Richelieu (Mr. Massue), pleaded want of jurisdiction. They pleaded that the Provincial Judges have no right to take cognisance of an Act passed by the Federal Parliament, because it has no right whatever to impose a new jurisdiction, with new duties, on the Provincial Judges, and, instead of having constituted our Provincial Judges Federal officers, the Bill of 1874 delegated election trials to the Judges of the Superior Courts, as Judges of the Superior Courts, and not as Federal Courts. Some of the Provincial Judges said the objection held good; others that it did not. The question came before the Supreme Court, whose Judges declared that the Judges of the Provincial Courts were appointed by the Federal Government and paid by it, and were impeachable before the Federal Parliament, and they overruled all objections to this view, the Judges of the Supreme Court deciding unanimously that the Provincial Courts and Judges were Federal so far as the laws of this Parliament were concerned. Some of the hon. gentlemen who preceded me tried to change the field of the debate, stating that the greatest dissatisfaction came from Quebec. That is not a correct assertion. As for myself, I have come only once to that Court, when I gained my case. I know other Quebec lawyers who have appeared before it, who have been generally satisfied with its judgments. But there is something worse than the erroneous character of that statement. Though we are not dissatisfied with the Court, we have a deep-rooted feeling against it, on the belief that it is useless. We have in Quebec a complete organisation of Judges, in whom we have full confidence. Were we not satisfied, we should prefer going to England to coming to Ottawa. Quebec lawyers very seldom come here. The right hon. leader of the Government says that to render this Court more acceptable more Judges should be appointed—it ought to be more costly. I go farther, and say it ought to be put in a more dignified position; but it should not be held in these Parliament buildings, because that exposes it to the suspicion, with some, of acting at the bidding of Parliament and the Government, so the Court ought to have a new building or Court-house. So this is a new ground of opposition to the maintenance of that Court. There is no dissatisfaction with our Provincial Courts in Quebec, and, I think, none in Ontario with its Courts. But there is the same admission on all sides. You hear hon. members opposing the repeal of this law, saying, as I say, that they have the highest respect for the Court and its Judges; however, the public opinion of five years is unanimous on the point, including that of the leader of the Government, that, so far, it gives no satisfaction. This seems a strange and illogical position; the Court is not bad after all, since the Judges were so good, and so people ought to say nothing against it. But how is it then that it gives no satisfaction whatever? If the fault is not with the Judges, it must be with the system. We saw by the speeches of the Ontario members who took part in the long debate on this Bill last year that the feeling in that Province towards the Supreme Court was not better than that of Quebec—perhaps it was more adverse. There is no bad feeling in Quebec, but a conviction that the Court is useless—that is the whole case explained. The member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) said, in the debate on the motion in favor of this Bill: “I am in favour of the motion, and my feeling is nothing but an echo of the feeling of a large portion of the population of Ontario, who are strongly opposed to having a great multiplication of tribunals. That opinion has been manifested everywhere, and we regard, in Ontario, the Supreme Court as entirely useless, and too costly.” Members of influence, in Ontario, such as the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) did not say they were against that Court, but, four years after its establishment, he says that, so far, in Ontario, it gives no satisfaction. This language has come from nearly all the speakers on this subject; first, that, so far, it gives no satisfaction, after which come great eulogiums on the Judges. Let us call things by their proper names. It is better to say the Judges are respectable—up to the mark—but they are not wanted. The member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron) had spoken to the same effect. Another

Ontario member declared the Supreme Court is the most unpopular Court in that Province. Representatives of Ontario have gone much further than Quebec men in this respect. The remarks of the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach) show a similar feeling in Nova Scotia—all parties agreeing that, however clever and respectable the Judges of the Supreme Court, it is not popular—not wanted. We are driven to the conclusion, therefore, that the Court is useless. The objection that, without this Court, we could not have the Exchequer Court, is unfounded. We have, in all our Provinces, Courts for the execution of the Federal Laws—the Supreme Court itself so decided—and for the establishment of any additional Courts for the administration of the laws of Canada. If the Government had felt the necessity of adding special Courts for the carrying out of some of its laws, especially the revenue laws, and the difficulties which may arise between private citizens and the Government, it could find a very proper remedy by establishing a special Court, with one or two Judges. But from 1867 to 1875 we were without any such Courts, we were without the Supreme or Exchequer Courts, and I ask anybody in this House if ever any complaint was sent to the Government of this country, or if any petition was presented to this Parliament complaining that either the revenue laws, or any other Federal laws were not well executed, were not well carried out by the Judges of our Provincial Court. No; during eight years, no complaint was made to this Parliament against the Provincial Courts, or to say that the establishment of a Supreme or Exchequer Court was necessary. As I said, when I opened my remarks, the duty which I fulfil now is a painful one for me to perform. It is a painful thing for me to differ from my leader, but there is something in what we call political honour and political dignity. In 1875, I was strongly against that law. I was strongly against the establishment of the Supreme Court, but that Court has been established, that Court has had its test, and, after five years of existence, we find everybody and every Province saying that, while the Judges are worthy men, fulfilling their duties splendidly, the Court gives no satisfaction whatever. The conclusion is that my hon. friend the mover of this Bill before the House is correct, and I hope the repeal of this law will be carried out by this House.

MR. BLAKE: To one of the propositions advanced by the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart), the House, I think, will not be disposed to assent. The hon. gentleman states that the objection which the people of Ontario have to this Court is not due to its constitution, or to the mode in which justice is administered in it, but to the circumstance that it is so difficult and expensive to reach the end of litigation, in consequence of the very great number of appellate tribunals through which the suitor is dragged before the case is closed. Now, that observation is theoretically applicable with greater force to the Province of Ontario, and to the Province of Quebec, than it is to the other Provinces of the Dominion, because, in these two Provinces, there is a possibility of resorting to an intermediate appellate tribunal, always in Ontario, and sometimes in Quebec, before the Supreme Court is reached. The observation does not at all apply to the Maritime Provinces, to British Columbia or to Manitoba, where they have but their Supreme Courts, from which alone appeals can be taken to the Supreme Court. With reference to these two Provinces, I quite agree, situated as the Supreme Court is, geographically, to both of them, that we may hope for the arrival of the day when Local Legislatures shall abolish their intermediate Courts of Appeal. But I wish to point out that, in the meantime, the objection taken by the hon. member is not one of practical or general consequence, as the existing system is, in fact, worked. I will refer to the general scope of the transactions of that great Court in Ontario with whose business I happen to be most familiar—the Court of Equity. In that Court, the number of decisions for the last five years has averaged 1,500 a year. As to the number of appeals to the Ontario Court of Appeal, I am not able to give the figures accurately, but I think I am within the mark when I say that there are from twenty-five to thirty in the year. The number of appeals from the Ontario Court to the Supreme Court will, I dare say—and again I have not ascertained the exact figures, but speak from general information—run from seven to ten. The practical result is that only about one and two-thirds of one per cent. of the decisions are appealed, at all, to any Court, and only about one-half of one per cent. of the decisions are appealed to the Supreme Court. The extent to which the mass of suitors throughout Ontario suffer, from delay or expense, by reason of the existence of the appellate tribunals, is as shown conclusively by these figures, infinitesimal. Almost the whole of the litigation is disposed of finally by the Court of first instance. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron) will be able to speak with authority with reference to the number and disposition of the cases in the other Superior Courts of first instance. I have no reason, however, to suppose the result will vary materially from that which I have already stated. Whether this result arises from the circumstance that our suitors and lawyers are not unduly litigious, or because they are thoroughly satisfied with the Courts of first instance, or from both causes, is immaterial. Practically, almost everything is settled by the first Court. It is, as a rule, only very important, or very doubtful, cases that come to the Courts of Appeal. Thus the general grievance alleged is dissipated, but I do not conceive that this circumstance detracts from the importance of an Appellate Court. On the contrary, my opinion is that no small part of the efficiency of Courts of first instance is due to the fact that their decisions are subject to supervision and appeal. Men are apt, in all positions, to be arbitrary. Men are apt, in all positions, to grow careless and indolent; and a Judge, who sits as the sole and final arbiter of a cause, is less likely to be satisfactory, than one who knows that his decisions are subject to review. The efficient working of a Court of first instance is thus increased by the consideration that its judgments are subject to review, and thus the very existence of an Appellate Court renders less essential the resort to that tribunal. I am quite sure that my hon. friends from the Maritime Provinces, who have laboured under the serious disadvantage of having, within their Provinces, only a Court of first instance, and of having only a Court which was practically the final, as well as the original.

tribunal, will agree in the view I take; they will agree with me—I do not speak from knowledge, or from experience in their Courts, but I speak from what I know of my own Province and of human nature—that the working of their Provincial Courts has been more satisfactory since the establishment of the Supreme Court than it was before their decisions were subject to review. I have said that the Provincial Courts were practically, for the mass of suitors, the final Courts. To establish that proposition, I desire to refer to figures which I gave in 1878, in this House, upon the discussion of the Supreme Court. I shall not trouble the House with the details by which I proved to the satisfaction of the House—for my figures were not controverted that the average cost, on both sides, of an appeal to the Privy Council was no less a sum than $5,000. It is urged that the costs of an appeal to the Supreme Court are too great. This may be so, but no one will pretend that the average cost of an appeal to the Supreme Court is to be mentioned in the same breath with the sum I have named. That is not all. There is the question of delay. I believe that the judgments of the Supreme Court have not been given as expeditiously as they might have been given, but, if you calculate the time from which you commence an appeal, until you receive judgment in the Supreme Court, infinitely less time is involved than in an appeal to the Privy Council, which is practically beyond the suitor's reach. This I also proved in detail in the speech to which I have alluded, so that in regard to economy of time, and to economy of money, as it stands to reason, so also it stands the test of experience that an appellate tribunal within the country must be more satisfactory to suitors than an appeal to the Privy Council. If the expenses of an appeal are higher than they ought to be, Parliament has power to discuss that subject, and to take steps for their diminution. There are some points, in regard to which discussion has been had formerly in this House, in which the expense might be reduced. I believe, for example, that it would be a proper thing to provide, in all cases in which the procedure of the Court below requires that the proceedings should be printed, that the Supreme Court should accept the books and printed papers of the Court below, without requiring any reprinting at all. That would involve a very considerable saving. I regret that the Court has not been as responsive to public opinion, and to the opinion of the profession on several points of convenience, as I think it ought to have been. For instance, the suggestion was made, long ago, that there should be separate lists of the cases to be heard from the different Provinces, so that the convenience and economy of the profession, which means the convenience and economy of the suitor, in point of attendance here might be secured. The suggestion fell to the ground, and you had to pass an Act of Parliament to effect an obvious improvement, which might have been accomplished long before by a rule of Court. So again with regard to the terms. It was perfectly obvious that an additional term was in the public interest. But no step was taken, although the Court had power to fix such a term, and the action of Parliament was invoked for this purpose. These are instances in which I think it may be fairly said that the Court has not been sufficiently responsive, as I have said, to public opinion and to the opinion of the profession, in regard to what the interests of justice required, and it is this defect which has given rise to a good deal of the dissatisfaction among the profession to which the First Minister alluded this evening. But, while you may rightly call for improvement in such particulars, you must remember that the Court was constituted and proceeded to exercise its functions under circumstances of some difficulty. We thought it was highly important that the Judges should reside at the seat of the Court, because we believed it to be of the essence of the efficient working of such a tribunal concerned with the laws of the different Provinces, and with at least two systems of jurisprudence, that the Judges should have constant opportunities of consultation and mutual debilitation. It is obvious that the domestication here of gentlemen drawn from different Provinces must take some time. It did take some time, and, during that period, it was quite clear that the view of Parliament could not be fully carried out. But that difficulty, I understand, has been entirely settled. I believe it would be of very great advantage to adopt, to a large extent, the rule of the Privy Council, as the mode of delivering judgment. The opinion of an Appellate Court which is practically a Court of Final Appeal, should be confined to the precise matter in hand, and any judicial divergence of opinion, or subject not necessary to be decided, should be absolutely eliminated. The course pursued in the Privy Council is well known, I presume, to all lawyers. The Judges, after hearing argument, deliberate at the earliest moment, and, having come to general conclusions, it is arranged that some one of them shall prepare and deliver the judgment in the particular case. This Judge prepares a draft, conveying, as well as he can, the arguments which have led to the agreed conclusion. The draft is printed and laid before each of the other Judges, who note on it any remarks which occur to them. If necessary, there is another meeting for deliberation, and the judgment in the end is the general finding of all delivered by one. Thus, instead of uncertainty and confusion in matters which are not necessary for decision being raised by obiter dicta, the judgment is confined to the real question in issue; and upon that question it presents the views which are common to the event. I believe such a mode of delivering judgments would have conduced largely to the confidence which should be reposed in the Supreme Court. But you must not mix up any suggested defects in the early working of an institution by those who are charged with its management, even were the defects much graver than they are, with the question of the merits and the principle of the institution itself. I believe the establishment of a Supreme Court rests upon an impregnable foundation. I say that we cannot work our Federal Constitution, unless we have, within our bounds, a Court available for the authoritative settlement of the various questions which will always be arising under a Federal Constitution. There are conflicting opinions as to the character of the Constitution, as to the absolute or relative range of Provincial and Federal powers, and as to the interpretation of the laws. Are we to say that these divergencies of opinion, formulated by judicial decisions in the various Courts of the various Provinces, from Vancouver Island to Halifax, are to remain unsettled until some suitor shall be found rich enough, bold enough, and venturesome enough, to take the litigation across the water, to the Queen in Council, at the average expense to which I have referred. And are we to determine that there and there alone can be obtained a satisfactory adjustment of these questions. I altogether deny it, Sir. I maintain that, if you are not able, within the limits of Canada, to find Judges competent to expound your Constitution and to declare the meaning of your laws, you are not fit to make the laws. I want to know by what rule it is that you, who so jealously hold to your exclusive power of making laws, who so loudly proclaim that you are not merely the best fitted, but the only ones fitted to judge by what laws you shall be governed, come to the conclusion that you cannot find among yourselves men competent to interpret satisfactorily the laws you make. You are condemning us as unfit to be a self-governing people, you are denouncing us as persons who ought to be in a state of dependence, minority and tutelage, when you declare that one should look abroad for persons to decide the meaning of the laws we made. But, looking abroad, where do you look? You look to Judges whose lives have been passed, whose modes of thought, and feeling, and action, have been formed, in a wholly different constitutional atmosphere from this. The whole British system is in contradiction to the Federal system. Their system is one of legislative union; it is based upon the omnipotence of the sole and central Parliament. The question never arose, never could arise, to British statesmen or a British Judge, whether an Act of the British Parliament, affecting British subjects, is within the competence of that Parliament or not. Such a notion is to them preposterous. It is to them incredible that such a question could be raised. Now, a Constitution like ours, complicated and delicate in its adjustments, requires for its interpretation that measure of learning, experience and practice which those who live under it, who work it, and who are practically engaged in its operation all their lives acquiring. The British North America Act is a skeleton. The true form and proportions, the true spirit of our Constitution, can be made manifest only to the men of the soil. I deny that it can be well expounded by men whose whole lives have been passed, not merely in another, but in an opposite sphere of practice; and these men must come to the consideration of these topics, at the greatest disadvantage and from the wrong point of view. Therefore, I maintain that, freely granting the correctness of the views of hon. gentlemen who maintain that we cannot find, within our bounds, as able men as those sitting in the Judicial Committee, still the atmosphere in which our inferior men have lived, their general local knowledge, learning, training, and experience, give them a much greater capacity for the proper apprehension of these important subjects than can be obtained by even the most eminent jurists, sitting as close as you please to Westminster Hall, who, for a few hours, bestow their best attention on the discussion of such subjects, as a general rule, by counsel equally uninformed, equally unimbued with the federal spirit. Yes, Sir, I maintain that, in theory and principle, the Supreme Court rests upon an unpregnable foundation, and that we shall be unworthy of ourselves; we shall be writing down our own condemnation if we declare that that tribunal established to secure a satisfactory and uniform interpretation of our laws and Constitution, situated at a convenient point, as far as the two greater Provinces are concerned, and at a point as convenient as is practicable with regard to the other Provinces—is a useless institution. The hon. member for Bagot says that with the decisions of the Court of Queen's Bench the people of Quebec are satisfied. I believe that Court is now worthy of their confidence, but I remember the day when it was far otherwise. I remember the day, not long ago, when there were loud and well-founded complaints against that Court, and this I know, whether they be satisfied or not, Quebec has always had an unhappy pre-eminence as to the number of appeals to the Queen in Council. The curious mode in which they have always signified their satisfaction with the decision of the Local Courts has been to bring more appeals than any other Province. The hon. gentleman said, when they were dissatisfied they knew where to go, to "the old shop across the water." I once had a conversation with an eminent member of the Quebec Bar, who told me: "We generally manage to have our appeals tried during the summer vacation. It is a very pleasant trip across the Atlantic, and we get it not at our own expense. I do not see any particular reason why we should favour the Supreme Court." I do not know whether the hon. member shares these views, and thus prefers the old shop. His clients may have long purses, and, although perfectly satisfied, as the hon. member says, with the Judges and the decisions of the Supreme Court, they may prefer three or four years' delay and $5,000 costs, to a few months' delay and a few hundred dollars costs. If so, I can only congratulate the hon. gentleman on his clientèle. I trust, for his sake, they may be long-enduring, and that he may be often sent across the water on such pleasant terms. For us who believed, and still believe, that the people of Quebec have recognised, and will more fully recognise, the ability of this Court, we take another view. Montreal and Ottawa being within four hours' journey, they have an opportunity of litigating their causes here before a tribunal competent to determine them—not by the Privy Council, whose only knowledge of the Quebec laws is based on their general agreement with the Civil or Roman Law, but a tribunal composed, as to one-third of their number, of men who, hailing from the Province of Quebec, having practised in the Courts there, having sat upon the Bench there, are well versed in the peculiar laws of Quebec; a tribunal not composed—as is the case of the Privy Council—of men who, as I know, in some cases, have sent to Paris, to a French jurist, to find out what the old French law was, and who have then decided, according to that opinion, Quebec appeals. The people of Quebec can have these questions promptly, and comparatively inexpensively brought up here and argued, not by foreign counsel, but by their own best lawyers, who have had the conduct of the cases in the Courts below. I have a confident belief that the people of Quebec must realise the advantage of having such a Court of Appeal as the Supreme Court at their own doors, placed as it is in so favourable a position, geographically, for that Province. Its situation, in that respect, is the most favourable of any Province in the Dominion. The other Provinces will also find a great advantage from having such a Court of Appeal within the Dominion. I do not know what the recent statistics are. The statistics, up to 1878, show that the greatest number of appeals came from the Province of Quebec—twenty-three from Quebec as against nineteen from Ontario—although Ontario has a larger amount of litigation than Quebec. The abuse, from party motives, heaped upon this Court, in the press and from the hustings, has created a considerable amount of feeling and of prejudice. It is very easy to deery and hound down an institution of this kind. The gentlemen who sit on these Benches of Justice cannot be heard here. There is no one to speak for them. They cannot appeal to the public through the press. The Court is in a very difficult position, having regard to the settled system of attack made upon it. But I believe it will survive. But, Sir, there is another function for which, in my opinion, this Court is essential. I refer to the final decision of controverted elections. In this respect, we have a law which is susceptible, as we know, of various interpretation, and there is nothing more important than that we should reach the true interpretation of that law, in order to its uniform interpretation in each of the Provinces, and by the various Judges in every Province. There is nothing more calculated to promote discontent and uneasiness, both in the minds of the candidates and in the minds of the constituents, than to have such questions decided one way by one Judge, and another way by another Judge, or to have them decided one way in one Province, and another way in another Province. But, in the Supreme Court, we have a machinery for the correction of these discrepancies of opinion. We have a machinery by which we shall know the true interpretation of the law, and, when once that high tribunal has pronounced, it is the bounden duty of all the Provincial Judges to follow their interpretation; and, if the law as thus expounded does not meet with the views of Parliament, Parliament has the power in its own hands to correct any error by altering the law until it be conformable to the views of the Legislature. But it is essentially necessary that there should be some one power for coordinating these various Provincial decisions, and determining, finally, the meaning of the Election Law. The services which the Supreme Court has rendered to the country in this particular are surely of the last importance. There is a decision on this subject which is familiar to all of us. I need not particularise the case. But I will say that this case alone is sufficient to enlist the support of all true lovers of liberty throughout Canada in the maintenance of this Court, even if it had no other title to our respect and esteem. But it has yet as an Exchequer Court, in its capacity another important function. It has been called upon to deal with those numerous cases—numerous and very important in a pecuniary sense—in which claims are made against the Crown. I recollect when this additional jurisdiction was given to the Exchequer Court that hon. gentlemen opposite took a very earnest part in maintaining the propriety of introducing machinery of this description; and they wanted us then and there to abolish the institution of the Dominion Arbitrators, to whom certain demands made against the Crown might be referred. The Government suggested that it would be well to look first at the various Acts under which references might be made to the Arbitrators, to put the new jurisdiction into operation, and see how the Court worked for a year, before proposing the abolition of the Arbitrators. But they did not pronounce against their abolition. Provision was made in the constitution of the Court for referring to Registrars, to experts, and others, all questions which might be referred to them. It is, however, true, that lately one or more cases which were before the Exchequer Court have been sent or transferred to the Dominion Arbitrators. This is a remarkable change of policy. Something was said by the hon. member for East Northumberland with reference to referring cases to engineers. He said he was an engineer, and he knew all about it. Well, I am a lawyer, and I know all about it. What decision can an engineer give upon the legal construction of a contract, and the different nice questions of an exclusively legal nature arising? An engineer is competent to determine matters of measurement, or calculation involved in a contract; but the knowledge required to decide the meaning of a contract is another matter altogether; and it would be found that the course the hon. gentleman suggests would involve the country in a loss, in one year, which would be sufficient to support the Supreme Court for years to come. It is of the first consequence that we should preserve a tribunal of this description to dispose of these cases—where the legal rights and liabilities of the parties can be decided by the proper legal machinery, which can refer to the proper persons—Registrars, Engineers, etc.—matters involving the amount of damages sustained, it there is a case for damages. There were, I believe, from three to three and a half millions of money claimed against the Crown in the Exchequer, up to 1878, and only a trifle was recovered, instead of the large sums which would have been recovered under other circumstances. The saving to the country would maintain the Court forever. Now, Sir, I say that this institution was established only a few years ago, by the common consent of the leaders of public opinion in this House and in the country. It is not to be forgotten that a Supreme Court Bill was introduced twice in two different Sessions of the first Parliament. It received the support of the hon. the leader of this House, on one side of politics, and of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), on the other side of politics. It was a third time introduced by the Government of the hon. member for Lambton; and it then received the most earnest support of the hon. the First Minister, at that time leader of the Opposition; to one clause alone, introduced during the progress of the Bill, did he object; as to the rest, he facilitated the progress, and improved the machinery, of the Bill as much as possible. It is not to be forgotten that this is an institution contemplated by the Act of Confederation, an institution, the necessity for which had been proved, and was recognised by both political parties for years, against, as I admit, the remonstrances of the hon. member for Bagot, but with the unanimous consent of the weightiest men in the Chamber. The hon. member for East Northumberland said the sense of the people had not been taken upon it

MR. BLAKE.

Why, the election of 1874, took place after an express declaration of the Ministry that they contemplated the erection of a Supreme Court of Appeal. Upon that they went to the country. The electors were aware that that was part of the Ministerial programme. It is not to be forgotten that in this sort was the Supreme Court established. Whatever defects of administration have existed, or may exist, exaggerated as they have been, they are not such as are inherent in the constitution of the Court, or such as to justify its demolition. I think we do it a great injustice. I agree that this is the place in which the weaknesses and defects of public institutions and their management should be discussed, but we prevent the Court from exercising that authority and influence, which are such essential elements to its success, as the highest tribunal in the Dominion, by even seriously discussing the proposal for its abolition, especially so soon after its establishment. We are like children, who plant seeds in their garden in the morning, and pluck them up in the evening, to see if they are growing, when we pluck up an institution which has hardly had time to germinate. It would be extremely unwise to shake the confidence of the people in the stability of this Court, by the vote to-night. I implore Parliament to accept the view of the hon. the Minister of Justice that there should be no vote calculated in the slightest degree to show that this Court is not to remain an essential and important constituent part of our settled system, but by decisive and overwhelming numbers to regret the proposal. And I therefore move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Motion made and question proposed:

That the said Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read the second time this day six months.—(Mr. Blake.)

MR. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier): I did not intend to speak on this important question; but it is my duty, as a member of the Bar, of the Province of Quebec, to state why I shall vote against the Bill for the repeal of the Supreme Court. I do not entirely agree with the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, nor with the remarks of the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau). I believe that it is true that some good can be obtained from the Supreme Court. I believe that this Court is a necessity, for the decision of constitutional questions, and that the Exchequer Court is an essential Court for deciding questions between the Crown and the citizens of this country. I believe, also, that the said Court is a useful tribunal, as a Court of Appeal from the decisions of the Dominion Arbitrators, but I doubt if that Court is not a source of ruination in election cases. When we look at the two contested election cases of Charlevoix and Jacques Cartier; when we consider the two enormous volumes of printed evidence, containing some 400 or 500 pages each, and the enormous expense connected with these election appeals, amounting to from $3,000 to $5,000, I say it is very doubtful indeed whether that Court, sitting as an Appeal Court in election cases, is a useful one. It appears to me that in these cases the law being the same throughout the whole Dominion, we can obtain the desired uniformity of jurisprudence by taking the law reports of the various Provinces. It is not, to-day, as it was twenty years ago, when it was impossible to consult the decisions of other Provinces. Now, we have every day reports reaching us from other Provinces, no matter where situated; we have reports bringing within our reach decisions of the whole world, and it is just as easy a matter for provisional Judges to establish a uniformity of jurisprudence in regard to Election Acts as it is for the Supreme Court. I will now go to another point, which concerns the Province of Quebec in particular. Speaking of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, I must say, as a member of the legal profession in the Province of Quebec, that that Court has not given satisfaction in that respect, and for a very obvious reason. I do not wish to make ungenerous remarks of the Judges of the Supreme Court. I believe that some of them, very likely the majority of them, are very able men. But we all know that the Province of Quebec occupies a very exceptional position, as far as her system of Local jurisprudence is concerned. We all know that it is the only Province which is governed by the principles of the Civil Law, as amended in old

France, while all the other Provinces are governed by the principles of the English Common Law. Let us look at the personnel of the six Judges composing the Supreme Court. Four of them are Judges of the English Common Law, and only two of them are conversant with the principles of the Civil Law, which rule the Province of Quebec; only three know the French language, in which all or nearly all our law are written, and so one half of the Court cannot even learn our laws. I ask is it possible that, under these circumstances, the people of that Province can be satisfied to see the decisions of their Superior Court, presided over by a Judge generally of long experience, revised as they are often by the Court of Review, composed of three Judges, and finally examined by the Court of Appeal, composed of five Judges, everyone of them being lawyers of several years' standing, and familiar with the principles of our own peculiar system of jurisprudence—I say is it to be expected that the people of Quebec would be satisfied to see this Supreme Court, where only two Judges are supposed to know anything of our Local laws and customs, reverse the decisions of all these Courts? I say it is impossible that our people should be satisfied with this state of things, and that is the reason our suitors prefer the Privy Council, notwithstanding the remarks made by the hon. member for West Durham, and more particularly the fact that in one or two cases of extreme difficulty the opinion of eminent French jurists has been obtained. The members of the Privy Council are all men versed in French law, they speak fluently the language of the French jurists, and can consult and study their opinions, without being reduced to the painful necessity of having translations made for them, as has often been done for the Judges of the Supreme Court. The Privy Council is almost in the daily habit of hearing what I may term French cases, not only from Quebec, but also from St. Lucia, the British Channel Islands and other Colonies where the same system of laws prevail. I believe it would be almost impossible to remodel the constitution of that Court, so as to satisfy Quebec in ordinary appeal cases. I believe, myself, that the Supreme Court should be preserved for the purpose of dealing with constitutional questions and difficulties arising between the Crown and the people—cases which now come before the Exchequer Court. I believe the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court ought to be repealed, at least in so far as the Province of Quebec it concerned, in ordinary civil cases. However, considering that the hon. the leader of the Government has given us, this evening, the assurance that he intends during the vacation to remodel the constitution of the Supreme Court, so as to give satisfaction, not only to the Provinces governed by the principles of the English Common Law but also, and especially, to the Province of Quebec, it seems to me that it would be very hasty on our part to refuse to give the Government the time it requires maturely to consider this grave question. For that reason I shall vote for the six months' hoist.

MR. WELDON: After the very able argument of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), I do not feel called upon to make any remarks, except as regards New Brunswick, where the work of this Court has afforded great satisfaction. As stated by the hon. member for West Durham, we had previously only a Court of first instance, and all the members of the legal profession know how essential it is to have a Court of Revision to correct the errors of the inferior Courts of first instance, and render them more careful in their judgments. In all circumstances of legal procedure, where the Court of first instance is the only Court, it is likely to become careless in its judgments; and we have found, from experience, that a Court of Revision is absolutely necessary. So far as New Brunswick is concerned, we had, at the time of the establishment of the Supreme Court, only the right of appeal to the Privy Council, at an expense, as I have known from my own experience, of £1,000 or £1,200 sterling. The consequence was that, practically, appeal was denied to the Province; and during my experience at the Bar not over three cases were carried to the Privy Council from New Brunswick. Since the establishment of the Supreme Court, we have had some fifteen or twenty appeals from that Province. Some have been confirmed, and others have been reversed, but I think, as a general rule, they have given satisfaction.

MR. GIROUARD.

We feel that this Court has been a great boon to us. Although the number of appeals might seem to be a reflection upon the soundness of the decisions of our Judges, yet, when we look at the number of appeals and reversals of judgment in the Mother Country, we cannot say that it is any reflection upon our Judges. If we look to the experience in England, we find that, out of ninety-two appeals taken from the Chancery Division to the Court of Appeal, no less than forty-eight were reversed. Yet, no one can doubt for a moment the very high legal attainments of the Master of the Rolls and the Vice-Chancellor, from whose decisions the appeals were taken. Another important advantage obtained is the uniformity of decisions secured in the different Provinces, as has been already pointed out in the case of Election Acts, and we know that the same advantage will ultimately accrue in respect to Insolvent Laws. At present, in the Provinces having jurisdiction in this matter, we find the Courts in Ontario giving one interpretation, and the Courts in the Lower Provinces, perhaps, giving another interpretation of the provisions of the Insolvent Act. By having some tribunal to which all these conflicting decisions may be referred, we shall ultimately arrive at uniformity in the jurisprudence. With regard to the objections made on behalf of the Province of Quebec, it seems to me that the people of that Province having the benefit of being represented by two out of the six Judges in that Court, have sufficient guarantees of obtaining justice under the provisions of their code. They must remember that, in taking their cases across the water, they will find no Judges learned in French Law. In going to the English Privy Council, they are going to English Common Law Judges, who have never made a special study of the doctrines of the Code Civile. I observed the other day, in one of the Lower Canada Law Journals, a very hostile criticism, delivered by Mr. Justice Ramsay, of a decision of the Privy Council, in which he stated that the English Court was entirely mistaken in its view of the law in the Province of Quebec. We ought rather to devise means of strengthening our Supreme Court by, as has been already remarked, composing it of men who have been trained under our Constitution, who are members of our own Bar, and who have made a special study of our Constitution and jurisprudence, and then I have no doubt that all objections to this Court will disappear.

MR. MCCARTHY: I listened with great pleasure to the observations which fell from my hon. friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake), in many of which I entirely concur. I think he furnished, perhaps, a sufficient justification, if any were wanted, for the course, the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Keeler) has taken in introducing this Bill, in the very ample and full manner with which he exposed some weaknesses, which, in my humble judgment, that Court possesses. The question of the Supreme Court, unfortunately for its existence, has been looked upon in a double aspect. Some hon. gentlemen, perhaps, on both sides of the House, have looked at it from a political point of view. I remember, when I first had the honour of a seat in this House, one of the questions upon which the party opposite to me plumed themselves was the establishment of this Supreme Court. I remember well that, from every hustings, and on every possible opportunity, it was urged as a reason why the Administration of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) should be sustained that he had successfully introduced and passed the Bill which constituted the Supreme Court. The answer that was made then was the same which has been re-echoed to-night by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), that that Bill had received the assent of all shades of opinion in this House, and had been matured and made as perfect as possible by the assistance of the hon. gentleman who now leads this House. Now, the hon. member for West Durham confirms that answer in the fullest way. But still the old leaven exists. My hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. Cameron) rose in his place, and, while he attempted to make a defence for this Court, his object was apparently to have a slap at the gentlemen on this side of the Chamber. It was not so much that the hon. gentleman appeared to be desirous to say anything in favour of the Court. He gave no reasons why we should desire the existence of that Court or why we should not desire its abolition; but he pointed out what had taken place last Session in this Chamber, when the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Keeler) introduced his Bill. I think he made an allusion to some observations which fell from me, and I think it is only fair to my hon. friends on this side, as well as to those on the other, to remark that what we did say we said as a justification for giving the hon. gentleman's Bill the Order for a second reading. The Bill, it will be remembered, had been already read once, and it was moved in the ordinary way that it should be set down for a second reading. It was upon that motion the discussion arose, and it was because we thought the hon. member had a right to secure for his Bill a place upon the paper for a second reading that we spoke in that sense, and it was on that occasion the hon. gentleman from North Victoria made the remarks to which allusion has been made. I do not desire to withdraw anything I said then, and I now repeat that, if we had to establish a Supreme Court at present, judging by the light of the past, I think we should hesitate before we put the country to the enormous expense which that Court has imposed upon it, and postpone to a future occasion the establishment of that great tribunal, as great tribunal it ought to be. I cordially agree with what my hon. friend from West Durham said with regard to its importance in deciding constitutional questions and settling the Election Law, and in regard to its improvement in other respects, but, after this Court has been in existence for upwards of five years, we find, so far as I recollect at the moment, that there have been but three constitutional questions in the strict sense of the term which have been decided by that Court. One of these questions was in regard to the Election Law, and, though it was very desirable that it should be settled, it was not finally settled until the matter was carried to the Privy Council, and there it was finally determined in favour of the constitutionality of the measure which was passed in this House in 1874. Another question was as to the right of the Provincial Government to issue licenses for brewers; and a third question was with regard to the right of gentlemen of the profession to which I have the honour to belong to wear silk robes after the honour of Queen's Counsel had been conferred by a Provincial Government. But, strange as it may appear, in not one of these constitutional questions that the Supreme Court has passed upon have the people of this country been satisfied with their decision. I have already pointed out that the decision with regard to the Controverted Elections Act, was carried to the foot of the Throne, and now it is well known that the Attorney-General of Ontario is taking measures to test the validity of the decision in the Supreme Court with reference to the question of Provincial Queen's Counsel. I think it is known to the public men in this country that it was with great difficulty indeed that this same Attorney-General of the Province of Ontario, submitted to the judgment of that Court, deciding that the Provincial Government had no power to issue licenses to brewers; so that, on these three Constitutional questions, I think I am able to say that one of them has been already carried to the Privy Council; in the second, an appeal is threatened; and, in the third, the decision gave great dissatisfaction. It was said, after the great Reform Party of the Dominion established this Court, that it was a great measure of reform; and yet we find the Reform Government in Ontario preparing an appeal against its very first decision upon a Constitutional question. That may, perhaps, not be the case, yet I think it is generally understood to have been the reason why that appeal was not pressed. I think, therefore, that these facts afford ample justification for the ground I took that the measure establishing this Court was premature, although I am free to confess, as well as the hon. gentlemen opposite, that I could have concurred in the passage of that measure. With regard to the other point of my hon. friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake), I have this to say: the establishment of the Supreme Court has facilitated the right of appeal, and encouraged appeal, while, in many years in the old Province of Canada, and in Ontario, until the establishment of the Supreme Court, but very few cases were carried to the Privy Council—I believe but one, successfully. Yet we find the Supreme Court does not only give rise to what the member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) observed—the delay and increase of expense in the ultimate decision of cases; it produces delay before the case is finally adjudicated upon, and entails on the suitor in Ontario very heavy additional costs. Although we cannot remedy the evil here, and though the repeal of the Bill would not wholly remedy it, the remarks of the member for South Lanark are quite justified. How do we stand in Ontario? A case is brought before a Judge of first instance; then there is an appeal to a Court of three Judges, of which he is one; then comes an appeal to a Court of four Judges, our Court of Appeal. One would think there was here enough of law to decide any ordinary case: it has been decided, at that time, by eight Judges; when an appeal is still available to this fourth Court at Ottawa, and we know that, notwithstanding the legislation of this Parliament, that appeal is not final, and that, if the case merits it, or the pocket of the litigant is sufficiently long, the litigation is still further protracted by an appeal to the Privy Council. It certainly does not diminish the profits of our legal profession to have a Supreme Court at Ottawa. I am, however, prepared to say that, the Court being an accomplished fact, it is our duty to make the best of it. I trust this is the last time the question of its maintenance will come up. We are bound to point out, to the best of our ability, in what way it is not giving satisfaction—as I think it is not—and to show how it may be improved and made more satisfactory. A great deal has been said by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron), and echoed by the hon. member for West Durham, as to this Court dealing with very large sums, and saving the country from the excessive claims of contractors. I think they are confounding the Supreme and Exchequer Courts, which are not necessarily united. It is in the Exchequer Court, presided over by one Judge, not by six, that those cases we tried, and this Court might continue altogether independent of the Supreme Court. It has been said the people owe this Court a debt of gratitude for its services, in preventing the public contractors from being overpaid. But it ought to be said what cases are meant; the statement is not complete until that information is given. But, coming back to the real grievances connected with this Court, I have only, personally, to re-echo the remarks of the hon. member for West Durham to a very great extent; the delay of that Court is extraordinary, considering the amount of business it transacts. Speaking of the Court with which he is most familiar, the hon. gentleman stated that in the course of the year it disposed of no less than 1,500 cases. A story equally creditable, I believe, can be told of the Common Law Courts of that Province; and I know that, in the terms, when questions of law are debated, they dispose, one year with another, of fully 100 cases, and generally within thirty days of their argument. Let us contrast that with the business the Judges of the Supreme Court perform. A return showing its business for, I think, the first three or four years gives seventy-nine cases, of which fifty-three had been argued and decided, twenty-six standing for judgment, or the enormous percentage of thirty-three. I am happy to say that state of things is improved, possibly owing to the discussions in the House last Session and in the press, and that there are now but seven or eight standing for judgment, irrespective of those argued eight or ten days ago. Delay in those cases has been to the suitors a very great grievance. I may re-echo the remarks of my hon. friend the member for West Durham, on another point—the number of judgments of this Court, which are delivered, produce confusion, as well as delay. If the course suggested by the hon. gentleman were followed—and, I suppose, we have the power to require it—that is, if the decision was pronounced in one judgment—we should be now saved the necessity of having to wade through thirty or forty pages of judgments, which, instead of settling, rather confuse the law. On the question of Queen's Counsel, we know there were two opinions proclaimed. I have read in one paper, in Toronto, that it had been conclusively determined that it does not reside with the Local Government to create Queen's Counsel, while another Judge read the law through another set of spectacles, showing it had not been so determined at all. That is a matter which I think may be remedied in this House. I would suggest, to make the settlement of this question more easy, that the Exchequer Court be divided from the Supreme Court; that one of the Judges be appointed specially to the Exchequer Court, leaving five for the Supreme Court, with appeal left to it still. The five Judges would be ample to dispose of all such business, and their attention would not be distracted by having to go on circuit, and hear and try cases in the Exchequer Court. This would, perhaps, solve some difficulties, and remove some dissatisfaction, with regard to a Court in which we all ought to take a pride as the highest in the land, possessing Judges to whom we all should look with confidence. We should all be able to say we respect the Supreme Court and it ought to be maintained. Another objection I have to make may not be very acceptable to my Lower Province friends, who have no Court of Appeal as we have in Ontario and Quebec, but who, as the hon. member for West Durham says, possess in the appeal to the Supreme Court all the moral advantage to be derived of Judges knowing that their decisions may be appealed from. But how is it with us? We suffer from the fact that cases of the most trifling character are brought to the Supreme Court from the smaller Provinces, cases for sums no larger, I believe, in some instances, than fifty dollars. If we want to respect that Court, we ought to provide that cases involving small amounts shall not be appealed to it. That was the old law in Ontario, and is the law in Quebec, where the smallest amount is $2,000. But the Lower Provinces have no such law, and their lawyers come to Ottawa, at great expense to litigants, in cases of the most trifling import, and, instead of determining weighty matters, the six Judges are detained deciding cases of utter indifference except to the parties litigating. My object in speaking was more to make another suggestion than to criticise anything said on either side of the Chamber. A great deal of litigation arises, and heavy costs are entailed on the people, by questions of the constitutionality of Provincial Acts. I suggest that the hon. the Minister of Justice should not be asked to decide as to the character of those Acts, and if they are unconstitutional, to disallow them. We know that every disallowance, if by a party not in unison with that reigning in the Province, is looked upon with great disfavour, and that there are sometimes very grave doubts as to whether an Act is or is not constitutional. Now, the Supreme Court ought to be called upon to determine, before expense is incurred, whether such Acts come within the powers and rights of the Provincial Legislatures. It does not seem fair that unfortunate litigants, as in certain insurance cases now before the Supreme Court, should be compelled to bear the whole expense of determining—not as to the construction of a Statute—but whether it is constitutional. If laws are open to doubt, they ought to be determined before any steps are taken under them, or capital invested on the faith of them. The cost of such decisions should fall on the Provincial Governments interested in them, and not upon private litigants. I do not regret this discussion, which, I trust, may be beneficial to the Court and the public interest. I think, with the hon. member for West Durham and the mover of the Bill, that there is no grievance the people suffer under and feel about but that ought to be discussed openly. The most complete justification is afforded to my hon. friend who introduced this Bill, and to those who assisted him by the manner in which the discussion has proceeded, and by the able, eloquent and learned address which we have heard here to-night from the hon. member for West Durham.

MR. MILLS: I cannot concur in the views expressed by the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat, with regard to an improvement of the Supreme Court, by the entire separation of the work of the Exchequer Court from the work performed in the Appeal division. In my opinion, there would be no advantage in such a division. I think that the views expressed by Daniel Webster, one of the greatest men of his day, and one who stood very high at the Bar in the United States, may possess considerable value on this subject. Discussing the Judicial Act, constituting the United States Supreme Court, he said that it was of the utmost consequence that its members should go on circuit; that they would thus be brought into contact with the people, and learn the manner in which the business of the country is discharged, and that they would read the law through the eyes of the people, which would be of no inconsiderable consequence to them in the discharge of their duties. The views of Webster are so pertinent that I will read a few extracts from his speech in the discussion of this subject. He said:

“In the first place, it appears to me that such an intercourse as the Judges of the Supreme Court are enabled to have with the profession and with the people, in their respective circuits, is itself an object of no inconsiderable importance. It naturally inspires respect and confidence, and it produces a reciprocal communication of information through all the branches of the judicial department. This leads to a harmony of opinion and action. The Supreme Court, by itself, is in some measure insulated; it has not frequent occasions of contact with the community. The Bar that attends it is neither numerous nor regular in its attendance. The gentlemen who appear before it, in the character of counsel, come for the occasion and depart with the occasion. The profession is occupied mainly in the objects which engage it in its own domestic form; it belongs to the States, and their tribunals furnish its constant and principal theatre. If the Judges of the Supreme Court, therefore, are wholly withdrawn from the circuit, it appears to me there is danger of leaving them without the means of useful intercourse with other judicial characters, with the profession of which they are members, and with the public.

“These observations are strictly in point here, and they indicate one of the dangers to be avoided here, and which would be greatly increased where the suggestion of the hon. member for North Simcoe acted upon.”

These observations are strictly in point here, and they indicate one of the dangers to be avoided here, and which would be greatly increased where the suggestion of the hon. member for North Simcoe acted upon. Mr. Webster further observes:

“I think it useful that Judges should see in practice the operation of their own decisions. This will prevent theory from running too far, or refining too much.”

Also further on he says:

“But I must take the liberty of saying, that in regard to the judicial office, constancy of employment is of itself, in my judgment a good and a great good. I appeal to the conviction of the whole profession, if, as a general rule, they do not find that those Judges who decide most causes decide them best. Exercise strengthens and sharpens the faculties in this more than in almost any other employment. I would have the judicial office filled by him who is wholly a Judge, always a Judge, and nothing but a Judge.

And, in a later speech, Mr. Webster goes more fully into a discussion of this question, and points out that it is not only important that the Judges should be so employed, but that they should be subject, by their intercourse with the community, to opinions which prevailed in the popular mind, and that they should prevent themselves from becoming rusty by the frequency of the application of the principles of the law they were called upon to administer. The hon. gentleman has said he would reduce the Supreme Court to five Judges. That means that there may be a judicial decision reversing the decisions of the various Provincial Courts by a majority of three to two. At the present time, by the constitution of the Court, you have four to two. The judgment of the Court, as at present constituted, is the same as if it were composed of seven Judges.

MR. MCCARTHY: But five constitute a quorum.

MR. MILLS: That is true; but it is not likely that a simple majority of the quorum is going to decide a very important question. It is barely possible, but it will be absolutely certain, if the hon. gentleman's views were carried out. I think that is a strong objection to the views stated by the hon. gentleman when this Act was under consideration in this House. I was, myself, strongly of the opinion that we had given to this Court an appellate jurisdiction beyond our powers. I think so still. When you look at the 107th Section of the British North America Act, you will find it provides as follows:—

“The Parliament of Canada may, notwithstanding anything in this Act, from time to time provide for the Constitution, Maintenance and Organisation of a General Court of Appeal for Canada, and for the establishment of any additional Courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada.”

I never could understand how hon. gentlemen, reading this Act, could assume that the “General Court of Appeal for Canada” meant a general Court of Appeal for the Provinces. It is important that the laws of Canada should receive a uniform interpretation throughout the country, but the Act does not show that a New Brunswick Statute should be interpreted in the same way as a similar Statute in Ontario, nor is it necessarily of consequence that it should. It would, I think, be a great advantage if the highest Court of each Province were the last Court of resort for the decision of all Provincial causes and of all questions, such as questions relating to real property, ejection and civil rights, growing up under Provincial legislation. It seems to me a rule of common sense that the Judicial Department of the Province should be as competent to interpret the law as a Legislative Department is to pass the law. I think we have heard the same principle laid down by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), with regard to the importance of having a Supreme Court as the final interpreter of the laws of Canada, without going to the other side of the Atlantic.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Then my hon. friend must vote for the repeal, if it is unconstitutional.

MR. MILLS: No; that question may be settled by the Court itself, when it is raised before the Court, or by an amendment to the Act. Apart from the question of the constitutionality of this Provincial appellate power, as a question of political expediency, it is important that the ultimate tribunal for the decision of Provincial questions, in order to prevent unnecessary litigation and useless expense, should be within the Province. It is important that the highest Court of each Province should be the last Court of resort for the administration of the laws of that Province. The system pursued in the United States would, I think, be a safe and proper rule to adopt here. I think, Sir, it will be a very great mistake to deprive the Judges from obtaining the experience they are constantly acquiring, by the decisions they are required to give as a Court of Exchequer. I do not think that they are likely to be overworked for some time to come, and it will, no doubt, be a very great advantage to the public to have a judicial interpretation of contracts by this tribunal, rather than have them interpreted by Boards of Arbitration, which will be always more or less subject to political pressure. I have no doubt the public have already largely gained by the existence of this Court as a Court of original jurisdiction. I have no doubt, also, that the country has largely gained by the establishment of this Court as the last Court to resort to for the interpretation of the laws of Canada, and I believe that experience will point out the expediency of confining the appellate jurisdiction to its jurisdiction as a General Court of Appeal for Canada, as the words of the Statute imply, and not a general Court of Appeal for the Provinces, with which it has no immediate connection. We are told, in this Constitution, under which the Government of this country is being carried on, that it is established on a Federal principle. Now, the very idea of federation is the Government in which all the Departments of the Government are connected with each other; and that one Department shall not be made broader or more comprehensive than another, except by express words in the Constitution, too clear to admit of being questioned. Judicial decisions upon Provincial matters, in so far as they construe and interpret the Local law, must be taken as a part of the Provincial Statute law, and the Parliament of Canada can no more create a Court to alter that construction than it can legislate upon the subjects assigned to the Local Legislatures.

Mr. BOULTBEE: I had early in this debate a conviction that I had for a long while pressed upon me by my constituents, that this Court does not serve a purpose sufficiently useful to counterbalance the expense incurred. But anyone who has sat here this evening, and heard able members of the Bar defend it, and listened to the arguments of hon. gentlemen who wish to support the Court, must have become convinced that it ought to be abolished at once. All the hon. gentlemen who have spoken in favour of the Court, have found new cases of complaint against it, and, if we were to entertain all the arguments of the supporters of the Court, we should be committing a crime in not abolishing it to-night. We ought not to allow it to continue if it is as great an evil as it is said to be. It is difficult to understand the arguments of these hon. gentlemen who support the Court. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) thinks it is full of evils, yet he regards it as a better Court than the Court of last resort in England, which we have been taught to believe is a pure fountain of the highest law. Yet the hon. member for West Durham has got a low opinion of the legal talent of England. Notwithstanding, I think that in certain cases of great importance it is worth while to go to the expense of getting the best decisions that can be got in the world. What the particular views of the last gentleman that spoke, the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), were, I cannot exactly divine. They were too subtle for my understanding. He expressed a desire to keep the Judges in training, and he read from some American author to show that a Judge should always be a Judge. But, at the same time, he wants to deprive the Court of three-fourths of its work. He desires to eliminate from it a jurisdiction over matters pertaining to the various Provinces. If the Court is of any use, it is to decide these matters. But, perhaps, I do not understand the hon. gentleman clearly. His argument seemed to be, in a measure, involved. But this I do understand, and the House will have to understand it, and the present Government, and any Government that follows the present Government will have to understand, that the people of this country, and especially the people of Ontario, have a fixed conviction, which is gaining strength every day, that, in seeking to redress a wrong or enforce a right, our system is needlessly cumbersome, tedious and expensive. We are depriving the poor man from getting what every man under our system ought to get, that is, justice. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) makes use of the argument that but a small number of cases are carried into these Courts of Appeal. That, however, is not the only matter to be considered in this connection. In a country like this, where the amount involved is generally small, and where the litigants are generally of small means, when a man is in litigation with a railway or an insurance company, or a rich mercantile house, he is obliged to give up half his rights and come to terms of compromise for fear of being taken from one of these Courts to another. So a greater evil permeates our whole business system than is observable from the actual number carried to the Courts of Appeal. I take issue with the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), when he says that the fact of having this Supreme Court makes our Judges more careful in the administration of the law in their own Courts. My experience is to the contrary. It is not an uncommon thing to hear in our Courts, when a case of more than ordinary interest is argued, one of the Judges in the Court say : " Oh, we suppose this case will be carried to appeal ; it is not worth while troubling more about it, and going to the labour of looking into the matter. It will be taken to the Supreme Court, and there argued in extenso." To my mind, no matter whether there are the advantages which these gentlemen say there are attached to the fact of having a Supreme Court—and no man can deny that there are these advantages—yet, if the people of the country arrive at a fixed opinion that this higher Court of Appeal does not serve a useful object, it will be the duty of the Government to give effect to the wishes of the people. It will be their duty either to abolish the Court, or make such a change in it as will suit the views of their constituents. Though in favour of doing away with this Court, I do not think it could be usefully done away with, or properly dealt with, by the present Bill, which provides no means, after the Court is abolished, for deciding questions which must be left to some Court to decide, nor even of carrying on the cases now before the Court, and being fully satisfied that when such a measure is brought in, the Government must assume the responsibility of it, I shall vote in favour of the amendment of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake).

MR. LANGEVIN : I do not wish to prolong the debate, but I desire that the position of the Government in relation to this question should be well understood. I fear that, when my hon. friend the Prime Minister explained the views of the Administration, his voice was not strong enough to be heard throughout the House. I would say, therefore, that it is the intention of the Government, during the Recess, to examine this question with special reference to the Province of Quebec, so as to ascertain what steps must be taken in order to meet the objections which have been raised, and the inconveniences resulting from the working of this Court. The House must understand that I, myself, have never had reason to entertain great love for the Supreme Court, and that, consequently, the position I take this evening, in relation to that Court, is taken, not in the interest of the Court as personally composed, but with a view to the general interests of the Dominion of Canada. I am quite aware that, when there is an appeal from the Courts of the Province of Quebec to the Supreme Court, we find ourselves in this position : that often a judgment rendered by a large majority of the Court of Queen's Bench may be reversed by the Supreme Court ; that is to say, that a judgment may be rendered by four or five Judges of the Court of Appeal of the Province of Quebec, and yet that judgment may be appealed to the Supreme Court, and there reversed by two Judges called from the Province of Quebec. Two-thirds of the Judges of the Supreme Court do not understand the laws of the Province of Quebec, and they are, therefore, liable to err in cases coming before the Court from that Province. Now, Mr. Speaker, is was to those inconveniences the hon. the Prime Minister referred when he stated that the Government would make it their business, during the Recess, to endeavour to find a remedy. The House must understand that, when the Government take that position, and make so solemn a promise, it is their intention to meet the objections which have been raised, and to come down next Session with a measure calculated to meet the just complaints of hon. members from the Province of Quebec, and to remove the grievances enumerated by them this evening. I trust, therefore, under these circumstances, that hon. members will feel that they must give the Government time for mature deliberation on the measure they intend to prepare, in order to meet their views, and I feel sure they will not then have the same grounds for voting against the measure which will be presented to them, that but for that promised measure, they would, this evening, have for voting against the Supreme Court Act.

MR. DESJARDINS : It was my intention to vote in favour of the Bill of the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Keeler), for the reasons which I expressed on the subject in the course of last Session. The Supreme Court, as now constituted, in no way meets the views of the population of the Province of Quebec as a Court of Appeal in civil matters. As has been remarked by the hon. Minister who has just spoken, that Court, as now constituted, does not afford all the guarantees which we are entitled to expect from a Supreme Court. The Court of Queen's Bench (Appeal Side) which we have in that Province is greatly superior to it, and commands greater confidence among suitors, because the five Judges who compose that Court are thoroughly conversant with our laws; wherein, the majority of the six Judges of which the Supreme Court is composed do not possess the qualifications of our Court of Appeal and of our Superior Court. Thus, as I pointed out, last year, in order to be qualified for a seat on the Bench in the Province of Quebec, the aspirant must first have studied our Civil Law for four years, and then have practised as an advocate for ten years; and, until those two periods have elapsed, no advocate can be called to a seat on the Bench. In the Supreme Court, which has the right either to reverse or to confirm the judgments rendered by our Courts in the Province of Quebec, only two of the six Judges possess the qualifications required by our Judges in civic jurisdiction. Still, Sir, after the assurance which the hon. the Prime Minister gave us this afternoon, and which has just been repeated by the hon. the Minister of Public Works, I am of opinion that members of this House from the Province of Quebec should be satisfied, and we have every reason to believe that the Government, in response to our expectation, will, next Session, bring forward such a modification of the constitution of the Supreme Court as will meet the wishes of our constituents. If, therefore, Sir, the hon. mover of the Bill now under consideration, not contented with the assurances of the Government, continues to urge its adoption, it will be my duty to vote against the motion for the second reading and to await the presentation of the Government measure before taking action.

MR. BÉCHARD: Before voting this evening on the measure now under discussion by the House, I desire to offer a few words in explanation of my motives for the vote I shall give. When the Bill organising the Supreme Court was adopted by the Parliament of Canada, I voted against the measure, not because I was opposed to the establishment of a Supreme Court cases in appeal which had dination whatever to support that provision of the Bill which submitted to the supreme Court cases in appeal which had been adjudicated upon in the Courts of first instance, in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Code in the Province of Quebec. That was my reason for voting against the Bill when it was submitted to the House. I would have voted for a Supreme Court, taking cognisance only of cases resulting from the operation of Dominion Laws, and of cases involving constitutional questions. Last year, I voted for the first reading of the Bill introduced by the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Keeler), but I must say, after the explanations just given by the hon. the Minister of Public Works, who promises a reform in the organisation of the Supreme Court, of such a nature as to satisfy public opinion in the Province of Quebec, I am disposed to adopt the position taken by the Ministry—following the lead of my hon. friend from West Durham—and vote against the second reading of the Bill introduced by the hon. member for East Northumberland. The hon. member's Bill is a radical measure, calculated to overthrow one of the established institutions of the country. I am not a Radical, but a Liberal of the English School, and I am strongly opposed to his measure.

MR. LANDRY: The hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard) does not surprise me when he says that the measure brought forward for the abolition of the Supreme Court is a radical one. I think he recognises in it one of his progeny, politically speaking; but what does surprise me is that, after such a declaration, the hon. member has not the courage to record his vote in favour of the abolition of the Court. But, after all, in this world we are liable every day to great surprises, and, if the hon. member for Iberville prepares one for us by saying that he will to-day vote for the Government, although the Government is not concerned in the question, you will not be surprised, Sir, to see that I shall, to-night, record an opposite vote. I must say, and this is an explanation of the vote I am about to record, that, when the general elections took place—I allude especially to the county of Montmagny—we had to undergo a violent struggle with the speakers of the Liberal party, and, in that struggle, as in those which took place at the time in all the other counties, we raised our voices strongly against the Supreme Court. We made promises to the electors, telling them that we would vote against the Supreme Court, and I think that, under existing circumstances, it is our duty to keep our word. The Government, through the hon. the Minister of Public Works, has just told us that they will, during the Recess, consider as to the steps to be adopted to ameliorate the position of the Province of Quebec in relation to that Court. Well, Sir, we wish to make the Government work more easy in that respect, and I think that, if we were all now to vote for the abolition of the Supreme Court, the Government, having elbow-room, would be in a position to inaugurate magnificent reforms. I think, from that point of view, that we shall quite as well assist the Government as those who are about to vote for the amendment proposed by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake). We have no wish to impute blame to the Government for the position which it has assumed in respect of this measure. On the contrary, we merely wish to assist them, and to contribute—in a negative way, it is true, but in one not the less efficacious—to the re-organisation of the Supreme Court, so that the Province of Quebec, and the whole Dominion, may experience the best results. I had not the pleasure of being present in the House when the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) delivered his speech, His Excellency having required my presence at Rideau Hall. I have no doubt that the hon. member adduced in favour of the abolition of the Supreme Court all the arguments which I could myself have done, had I spoken in his stead. For these reasons, it is not necessary for me to make a long speech, and I shall confine myself to saying that it is my intention to vote for the Bill brought in by the hon. member for East Northumberland, and, that I may do so, I must vote against the amendment proposed by the hon. member for West Durham.

Motion made and question proposed :

That the said Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read the second time this day six months.—(Mr. Blake.)

SUPPLY—THE ESTIMATES.

QUESTION.

MR. MACKENZIE: I would like to enquire when it is expected that the Budget Speech will be made, and when the Estimates will be brought down.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: It is not possible, at the present moment, to state when the Budget Speech will be made. Very much depends upon the returns asked for by hon. members. As far as the Budget Speech is concerned, it is very important that both sides of the House should have them before entering into any discussion. They are being prepared with all expedition. The Estimates will not be before the House until the middle of next week.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: We would dispense with the returns in order to get the Budget. During the four or five years that we had the administration of affairs, on no occasion was the Budget delayed beyond the present stage of the Session. There is no possibility of doing any real business until we get the Estimates and the Budget. Expenses will be unnecessarily increased by keeping us in Session longer than we otherwise might be, or the time for doing the real work of the Session will be less, for no real business can be done until we get the Budget.

PRAYERS.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 39) To incorporate the Montreal and Province Line Railway Company.—(Mr. Sriver.)

Bill (No. 40) To incorporate the Mail Printing Company.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

COMMON ASSAULTS DEFENDANTS

WITNESSES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. McCarthy.)

FIRST READING.

MR. MCCARTHY introduced a Bill (No. 41) To amend an Act to provide that persons charged with common assault shall be competent as witnesses. He said: Two years ago, an Act was passed permitting defendants to be examined as witnesses in cases of common assault, no matter whether tried on information in a summary manner or on indictment. So long as the charge was one of common assault, the parties to the proceeding were entitled to be called as witnesses either by the Crown or on their own behalf. By some means or other, a proviso seems to have slipped into the third clause of the Act, to the effect that, where an indictment includes a charge of a graver nature, such as an aggravated assault, the defendant may not be called as a witness, even if the Judge, at the close of the case for the Crown, thinks there is no graver charge made out than one of common assault. The first part of the clause indicates that where the charge, in the opinion of the Judge, is nothing more than one of common assault, the defendant may be called as a witness; but the proviso says that this provision shall not be applied to a case where a jury is empanelled. I am unable to understand how that proviso ever came to be a part of the section. I cannot understand the reason therefor, and I know of one case at least in which it worked a very great hardship. The practice is that, if a case is being tried before a County

MR. MACKENZIE.

Court Judge under the provisions for the speedy trial of offences, and at the end of the case for the Crown the Judge thinks no greater charge can be sustained than that of common assault, the defendant may be called as a witness; but, if the case is tried at the Sessions or Assizes before a jury, and the Judge is of that opinion, the defendant's mouth is closed, and he cannot be called as a witness in his own behalf. I am unable to understand the meaning of this difference. I think it is unfair to the defendant, and I therefore desire to repeal the proviso.

MR. BLAKE: I cannot say, at the moment, that I remember the ground that was given in the House for the introduction of that proviso. The Bill was in the hands of a private member, and it was referred to a Select Committee, composed almost exclusively of lawyers. They reported it with that proviso, and I have no doubt they had some good reason for it. I think we had better, as far as we can, re-appoint the Committee and let them find out what that reason was.

MR. McCARTHY: I think it was a technical reason, probably that, while the Judge trying the matter might make up his mind, at the close of the case, that there was no graver charge, still the jury might not arrive at that conclusion. But I do not think we ought any longer to allow that proviso to remain.

STOCK BROKERS REGULATION BILL.

(Mr. Girouard, Jacques Cartier.)

FIRST READING.

MR. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier) introduced a Bill (No. 42) To regulate stock brokers and suppress gambling in stocks. He said: I propose, by this Bill, to introduce the same provisions which are contained in the Bill which I had the honour to introduce last Session. It is well known that in this country very few limitations exist regarding the transactions of stock-brokers. It is well known, also, that, for a couple of centuries at least, in Great Britain, limitations have been in existence, obliging stock-brokers to give the names of their clients, when they either sell or purchase stock. At the same time, regulations were made providing that stock-brokers were to be licensed by the city corporation of London. The same regulation exists all through Europe, and among other places at the Stock Exchange both at Paris and Berlin. I propose, therefore, to introduce in this Bill the same provisions which are contained in the Bill of last Session.

Bill read the first time.

"PUBLIC SERVICE REFORM BILL.

(Mr. Casey.)

FIRST READING.

MR. CASEY introduced a Bill (No. 43) To ensure the better qualification of public servants, and the greater efficiency and economy of the Public Service. He said: I had not intended to introduce this Bill this Session, in view of the fact that the measure deals with the same subject which was promised to be dealt with by the Government; but the other night we were informed by the leader of the Government that he had no objection to seeing measures that were mentioned in the Speech from the Throne introduced by private members on either side of the House, so long as they were in general agreement with those the Government intended to introduce. As the hon. gentleman who moved the Address gave us to understand that the Government measure would be in the direction of remodelling our service upon that of England, in regard to the introduction of competitive examinations, and, as that is the tendency of the Bill I have introduced, I am sure the Government will have no objection to my bringing in that Bill. Of course, I do not ask those gentlemen to take up the Bill exactly as it stands, or authorise me to put it through, but it may be useful for comparison with any other they may choose to bring down. On asking the right hon. gentleman the leader of the Government, on Thursday, when their measure might be expected to come down, I received the answer that it would be "ere long." We hope to be away from this capital "ere long," and it is quite possible that the Government measure might not be down until a late period in the Session, as Government measures are sometimes apt to be delayed in making their appearance. I thought it better, therefore, to secure the correctness of the prediction made by the right hon. the Premier in the Speech from the Throne, to the effect that there would be a discussion on this subject during the Session. Thinking it better to have that discussion at an early period in the Session, I have concluded to introduce this Bill.

BRITISH COLUMBIA SUPREME COURT JUDGES BILL.

(Mr. McDonald, Pictou.)

FIRST READING.

Order for receiving report of Committee of the Whole on resolutions respecting the better Administration of Justice Act, 1878, of British Columbia, and to make provision for the salaries of two additional Judges of the Supreme Court of British Columbia, read.

MR. BLAKE: My hon. friend the Minister of Justice has been good enough to supply me with the statements promised at the last stage, and I propose to make a few further observations on the measure, founded chiefly upon the considerations which are to be derived from these documents. It will be recollected that the First Minister, while admitting the correctness in a general sense of the views that were expressed from this side of the House, pointed out that there was nothing but a general statement, that there were no details from which the House could satisfactorily form an impression adverse to the proposal, and he asked that almost conclusive weight should be given to the view of the Legislature. Since then some additional evidence of the mischievous tendency of the view which has been repeatedly expressed by that hon. gentleman, as to the supreme weight to be given to the opinions of Local authorities upon these subjects, has come into my possession. I observe that, in Nova Scotia, with whose judicial system the hon. the Minister of Justice must be familiar, a Province which has received considerable accessions within a short space of time to the number of its Judges, the Bar Society has passed a resolution declaring that the interests of the Province demand the further addition of two members to the Supreme Court. I have little doubt that, so long as we lay down the principle that this Government is to be guided by whatever the Local Legislature decides to be necessary in the matter of the creation of Judgeships, so long we will find them making extremely liberal appropriations of our moneys. It is probable, at any rate possible, that the Legislature of Nova Scotia may follow the views of the Bar in that Province, and that you may soon be called upon to meet this question, weakened in your position by the reiteration of the doctrine to which I have referred. Now, the case of British Columbia has always been regarded as exceptional, in considering the various proposals which have been made during the last few years past to remodel that Judiciary. They have all been based upon the preliminary assumption that the existing County Court Judges must be pensioned off and replaced by professional men. I am not, I think, asking the Government to take any extreme unprecedented course when I ask them to consider that circumstance as very exceptional and therefore demanding exceptional treatment. It is to be remembered that no less, I think, than four, certainly three, Local Acts proposing changes in the judicial system, embracing the retirement on pensions of the existing County Court Judges, have been disallowed by the Canadian Executive. We have decided, year after year, without adverse comment upon our course in Parliament, that, where the proposal of the Local Legislature was so extreme as to require us, in order to increase the Judiciary, to pension off those whom they themselves, in their capacity as an independent Province, had placed upon the Bench, we should decline the proposal. Now, from the papers, you will find that the Bar Society of Nova Scotia has not been singular in passing resolutions upon such subjects. In 1875, the Bar Society of British Columbia decided "that the proposal to fill up vacancies in the Bench of the County Court by appointees from any Bar other than the Bar of British Columbia is not in accordance with the opinions of this meeting, it being considered that such appointments should be made from the Local Bar; and further, that the British North America Act contemplates that the judicial department should be so filled up." That was part of the proceedings of a meeting favouring the superannuation of the County Court Judges, and their replacement by some disinterested members of the society which passed this disinterested resolution. A report from the Department of Justice, approved in Council in October, 1876, in answer to a remonstrance from British Columbia, with reference to not filling up the vacancy occasioned by the decease of Mr. Justice Bushby, says :

“There are living on Vancouver’s Island three Supreme Court Judges and three County Court Judges, while there are residing on the mainland only two County Court Judges.”

And adds, that it is the opinion of the Government that the present judicial staff might be reduced, and suggestions are now made as to a modification of the arrangements which would enable the County Court Judges to carry on the business. Well, Sir, in 1877, a further important correspondence ensued. A proposal was made by the Government of British Columbia to that of Canada that, a Bill having been introduced in the Local Legislature, having for its object the creation of County Court judicial districts, and the appointment of four professional men as Judges in the County Courts in place of the non-professional incumbents, the Canadian Government should make provision for the salaries of the new appointees, and for the superannuation of the retiring officers. The whole subject was discussed in a report, approved in Council, which concluded thus:—

“Considering the enormous cost of the administration of justice in British Columbia, I think it would not be right to propose to Parliament to pension the present Judges, with a view to making new appointments; and it appears to me that the plan of the Local Government should embrace two main propositions : (1) the continued utilisation of the existing staff; (2) such changes in the system as may increase the utility of that staff. I cannot but think that even less than five County Court Judges and three Supreme Court Judges would, under a proper system, reasonably supply the wants of British Columbia.”

Now, Sir, there was a correspondence which took place with the learned Judges of the Supreme Court, with a view to obtain some suggestions which might result in concerted action between the Governments of Canada and British Columbia, by which the judicial staff might be more satisfactorily arranged, without involving the enormous relative expense to which I have referred. In the course of that correspondence, statements were made by some of the Judges which are not immaterial, I think, to the present consideration. One of them points out that the Executive of the Province had been charged, for a long period, with the duty of fixing the time when circuits should be held, and it was not unreasonable that British Columbia, having a very migratory and transitory population, which distributed itself in different localities, as the mining interests might be prosperous or dull, there should be some elasticity in the system. The check upon the Executive used to be that they had to obtain from the Local Legislature the supplies for the circuit which they ordered to be held, but it is obvious that after Confederation, when it was for the Local Executive to order the Circuit, and for this Parliament to pay the cost, that wholesome check disappeared, and the natural results followed. The letter says :

“Since Confederation, however, other considerations than those which would operate on the mind of a Judge have occasionally offered themselves to the Executive, and two or three Circuits have been held which the Judges would certainly not have undertaken of their own accord, at least not at the times which seemed good to the Executive.”

The Judges were asked to advise with reference to the County Court system, and competency of those Judges, and they expressed opinions on that subject which seem to be extremely important in considering the propriety of superannuating those gentlemen in the prime of life, and in the fulness of their vigour, for the purpose of replacing them with new men to be paid for out of the moneys of the Canadian people. One Judge says :

“The County Court Judges have been acting, all of them since 1867, and, though not legally trained, are all men of sound intelligence, good common sense, and strict integrity. They have always given satisfaction and no word of complaint was heard till after the death of Mr. Bushby.”

And he proceeds to explain how easily a re-arrangement would have obviated this complaint. He goes on to say :

“As to utilising the present staff, a more excellent set of men, non-professional, could not be found. No doubt it would be better to have able professional men, but, if the question is directly put, do the necessities of the administration of justice require that these men should be pensioned and removed, it must be answered in the negative.”

Another Judge says :

“I think that the present body of men better command public respect, and do their work more efficiently, than any set of men you are likely to be able to procure for the same salaries, or nearly the same salaries; and, certainly, are far better than any set of men you can procure here. * * * All the present men have had many years' schooling on the Bench, though none of them were trained to the law in their youth; they have been the main stay of the colony from very early years up to 1871. They are all men of about forty or forty-five years of age, highly honourable, of good sense and experience. Their decisions are very seldom appealed."

And the third Supreme Court Judge expressed similar opinions as to the County Court Judges. There is also in this correspondence a statement which I repeat from memory, pointing out the different condition of things in the interior of the mainland as compared with Victoria. This is of extreme importance, because, in view of the Act of the last Session by the Local Legislature, I see, and my hon. friend, on consideration will see, that it will be impossible for him practically to carry out his plan. The fact that is, in the remoter parts, the inconveniences of situation, the absence of accommodation, the distance from all civilised society, the climate, and the enormously enhanced expense of living, will always render it necessary that the Judge assigned to the inland district should receive an extra allowance of at least one thousand dollars a year. The reasonableness of that view is proved by experience. The Judge who now resides in the Cariboo district, is now, as that Judge always has been, in the receipt of that extra allowance. Now, you are called upon to provide for the residence of several Judges, in various parts of British Columbia, of whom three are to be on the mainland, and of these two in the interior. I call my hon. friend's attention to this, because it is obvious that British Columbia will not be satisfied, unless the provisions of the last Act are executed. The added responsibility which will thus devolve on Canada is of no small importance. While my hon. friend was justified, last year, by the Local legislation which had then taken place, in proposing to this House, as a measure which would meet the demands of British Columbia, to grant $4,000 a year each, for the salary of two Judges, the late Act makes all the difference in the world. You have three Supreme Court Judges now residing in Victoria, the capital city. The correspondence shows the advantages of residing there, as compared with any other place in the Province, and particularly with the far interior of the mainland. You will now be called upon to take at least one of the existing Judges from Victoria and station him on the mainland. If you remove him to the least inconvenient place, perhaps to New Westminster, you cannot justly do so without adding to his salary. You have to find two other Judges to reside inland, one of them in the remote district of Cariboo at Barkerville. For this you must pay the extra allowance which has always been considered necessary, in order to enable a man to live there. Therefore, what the British Columbia Legislature now proposes to us is a thing that cannot be accomplished under the terms of my hon. friend's Bill, and he will probably find it necessary, if the resolutions become law, to come down to us very soon, saying: We are unable to work out the plan; we must pay more in order to carry it out to the satisfaction of British Columbia. My hon. friend must, sooner or later, take authority to remove one of the Judges, and to pay more money than he now proposes for the service. I quite agree that there should be some local administration of justice in the remotest parts of that country, so far as, under its peculiar circumstances, this can be secured. If you to-day establish, with this Local law before you, a Supreme Court, on the theory that you are going to leave them all in Victoria, your theory will fail. If you substitute only two for the five existing Judges you remove, you are lessening the means of supplying Local Courts throughout the Province, and you will soon be required to make more Judges in order to give the benefits of a local administration of justice, to the extent possible with the present staff. The Kootenay and Cassiar circuits, the most distant of all, are, by the late Local Act, properly assigned to the Victoria district, to be served by the two Judges who reside there. As to that, I have a remark of a serious character to make. Hon. gentlemen have taken exception to the infrequency of Assizes in that country, but it will be found, from the figures with which I am about to trouble the House, that not much injustice has been suffered by the people of British Columbia in that regard. But there is a real difficulty with regard to the transaction of business involving the transport of prisoners from Cassiar and Kootenay. To-day it is practically impossible to transport prisoners from that part of the interior to Victoria, the only place where they can be imprisoned for any length of time, there being no suitable jails or facilities in Cassiar or Kootenay. These are places in which the climate is rigorous, and the population fluctuating. In winter, these mountain places are deserted, except by forty or fifty persons who remain to guard the store-houses and watch some of the mining claims. So long as you are fortunate enough to have a case that may be disposed of summarily, you may arrange it on the spot; but, if you have a serious case, it is impossible there to dispose of it. There is, therefore, less reason for holding Assizes in Cassiar and Kootenay, until some means are provided by the Local Government for the carrying out of sentences of imprisonment, since it is now impossible to transport prisoners to Victoria, over the Stickeen and through United States Territory. When we reflect that the cost of an Assize is from $2,000 to $3,000, we shall see that this, under the circumstances I have stated, is a comparatively large expense to incur for a comparatively small object. I shall trouble the House with some figures to enable it to judge how far the judicial business of British Columbia demands the establishment of the proposed plan. The amount of business performed on circuits by the Supreme Court Judges is embraced in the returns furnished by the Minister of Justice. The Victoria business is not given. In 1870-71 the Supreme Court in British Columbia held on circuit twelve Courts; at those twelve Courts there were tried thirty-three matters, at an expense for travelling of the Judge only of $2,514.03, or $76 for every case tried. In 1871-2 thirteen Courts were held, at which thirty-nine cases were tried, or three for each, at a travelling expense of $3,394.74, or $87 a case. In 1872-3 there were fifteen Courts, which tried fifty-one cases, at an expense of $2,565.18. In 1873-4: Courts, eighteen; cases, forty-eight; expenses, $8,417.92. This gives less than three cases a Court, and $179 a case. The new régime had produced its fruits. In 1874-5 there were: Courts, fifteen; cases, thirty-two; expenses, $7,250.77—just over two cases a Court, and $226 a case, for the travelling expenses. In 1875-6 the Courts numbered sixteen; cases, twenty-nine—less than two a Court, with a total expense of $5,578.60, or $192 a case. Thus, while the business was diminishing, the expenses were increasing. For 1876-7, and subsequent years, the returns are not complete, but such as they are they furnish no indication that the amount of business had increased in those years. But in 1876-7 we called attention to the frightful increase, and managed by stringent measures to pull them up a bit, and the expenses, I am glad to say, were very considerably reduced. For 1876-7 it was $4,569; for 1877-8, $2,956; and for 1878-9, $3,954. This reform was accomplished by very considerable reductions in the cost of travelling, and by not holding some circuits, which the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos) says was a great calamity, which he insists shall never recur, so that, if your proposed plan is to be adopted, you must expect this travelling system to continue to run up to a large amount. Let me give you a statement of the travelling expenses of the two Courts, the Supreme and County Courts. In 1870-71, their total expenses for travelling were $5,428; in 1871-2, the return is imperfect; 1873-4 $10,472; 1874-5, $11,781; 1875-6, $10,938; 1876-7, $7,278; 1877-8, $5,672; 1878-9, $7,034. These figures are given by the Deputy-Auditor of British Columbia in the return the hon. the Minister of Justice has furnished. If I have given the amounts as they appear in the Public Accounts, they would stand thus: 1871-2, $2,972; 1872-3, $6,720.61; 1873-4, $11,722.30; 1874-5, $12,400; 1875-6, $11,826. With reference to the amount of business done by those Courts, we have not got a detailed return for the later years. I have given you the gross amount of circuit business transacted by the Supreme Court in the earlier years. The partial returns for the later years show that in Nanaimo two Courts were held in 1877, but there was no civil business. There were but four criminal cases, besides two indictments against one of the parties not prosecuted. In 1878, two Courts were held in Nanaimo, there being no business at all at one of them, and no civil business at the other, and five criminal cases, all against Chinese; and four for an offence which the member for Vancouver (Mr. Bunster) may not deem very heinous—gaming. The travelling expense was eighty-one dollars and fifty cents per Court. Thus in two years, in Nanaimo, there were four Courts, with no civil business at any, and criminal business of an extremely trifling character. In New Westminster there were two Courts, at one no civil case and but six criminal cases. Another Court was held for Clinton and New Westminster, at which there were no civil and but six criminal cases, five against Indians and Chinamen. In Cassiar, a Court was held in 1879, at a cost of over $1,000 for travelling. It tried eight County Court inferior cases, the total value of the subject matter in dispute being $940, and two criminal cases were tried and one postponed. In the Cariboo Circuit, the Court held in August, 1878, cost $1,601.25; no civil cases were tried, one appeal went off; one action on account was referred; there were six probate cases and sixteen criminal cases. Those figures indicate that the civil business on the mainland in these circuits is nil, that there is no Superior Court civil business at all; and one of the Judges explains that by a circumstance which, I admit, renders the mainland of British Columbia a happy land indeed—though it may not be complimentary to my profession to say so—he says there are no lawyers on the whole mainland. How are you to expect me, he asks, in a voice of complaint, to provide you with cases when I have not a lawyer? He adds, there is not business enough on which a lawyer could live.

AN HON. MEMBER: There are two.

MR. BLAKE: I do not know. I am only repeating the Judge's statement. With reference to the County Courts for Yale and New Westminster, in the circuits from May, 1877, to July, 1878, the expense for travelling was $2,168. The Judge tried 128 cases, the total amount involved being $15,352, or an average of less than $120 a case. There were but twelve criminal appeals in the whole of those Courts. From August, 1878, to August, 1879, the travelling expense was $2,378; cases tried, 181; amount in-involved, $20,008, or an average of less than $111 a case; there were only seven appeals. I wish to call special attention to Lillooet. For 1878, there were ten circuits. The Judge travelled up ten times, and held Court there at an expense of $410. He tried thirty-two cases, or on an average, three cases a Court, the amount being under $148 a case. There were but two criminal appeals. Now to provide, practically, a monthly Court in order to try in a whole year thirty-two cases of this trifling value, is wanton extravagance. Lillooet was, as one of the Judges says, once a very important place, containing many people. It was quite reasonable then, I dare say, to hold there a monthly Court; but the place has dwindled to almost nothing. There are few transactions there, but yet the system of monthly Courts is maintained. But Comox caps the climax. The County Court system there entails a residence of the Judge during each Court for fourteen days; the steamer touches only every alternate week, and the Judge must remain there for the whole period. In March, 1877, he went to Comox, and charged six dollars and fifty cents for the steamer fare, and eighty dollars for travelling allowance, being five dollars a day for the sixteen days. He opened his Court, and, thirteen days afterwards, closed it with all due solemnity, and how much business did he do? Just nothing at all. In July, 1877, animated by a stern sense of duty, and in obedience to the orders of the Executive, he held his next Court for fourteen days, during which the business was nil; in September, 1877, the like. In December, 1877, there were two cases to try, involving, in the aggregate, the sum of $250. In March, 1878, things returned to their normal condition; one fortnight was expended, and so were $86.50; the Court was, as usual, opened and closed, but the business was nil. In June, and again in September, 1878, there were similar results. In December, 1878, and again in March, 1879, the same experience. In June, 1879, appeared one case, involving $98.25, to try which the usual sum of $86.50 was expended. In September, 1879, nothing; but in December, 1879—a remarkable event for Comox—there were two cases of the aggregate value of $410. The practical result is that twelve Courts were held, for a fortnight each, at a cost of $86.50 each, or $1,038 in all. In nine Courts out of the twelve, no business was done, and the five cases tried in the other three Courts involved only $758.55. It would have been better for the Government to have paid the claims out of the public funds than to have tried those cases; we should have saved by it nearly $300, besides the Judge's trips to and from Comox. When you find the Local Legislature and the Executive making such use of its powers, as these figures indicate, we have a right to call on those authorities to retrench still further, and to call on this Government, now proposing to enlarge those expenses, by diminishing the number and increasing the rank of the Judges, for some better reasons. I do not blame the Government seriously for introducing this Bill, in ignorance of those facts, as it took me a good while to ferret them out of the papers. But here are the facts before us, and the Local Act of last Session involves the necessity, if a new system is to be created, of a still increased expenditure. I ask the hon. the Minister of Justice to consider the advisability of still recommending to British Columbia what the preceding Government recommended: to say to it that—with a staff of three Supreme Court Judges of whom the Province does not complain, and five County Court Judges, who are shown to be able, honest, capable, intelligent men, who have had a long training, with a condition of things which involves but little important work at any one place, and great difficulty of communication—the true plan is that the large staff of existing Judges should be used, instead of being superannuated and replaced by a smaller number. What I suggested is the true view, and I have seen no ground for departing from it. It is impossible to justify the additional expense, an expense not to be measured by the figures the hon. the Minister gives for the proposed purpose. I maintain, that diminishing the number of judicial officers as proposed will not really increase judicial facilities, will not add to the efficiency of the administration of justice, but rather diminish it, and will obviously add to the present burdens on the people, with the prospect, ere long, of a very much greater increase.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou): I have listened, as I always do, with great pleasure and interest to the observations made by the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat, but on this occasion, unlike some other occasions, he has failed entirely to show me in what way he has effectually assailed the resolutions before the House, or on what grounds he suggests I should withdraw them. If I understand the argument of the hon. gentleman, it is that, in view of the condition of British Columbia, it is not reasonable or proper to increase the expenses of the administration of justice in that country. If the hon. gentleman will recollect, I am quite sure the House will recollect, that when I introduced the resolutions, I stated, as a matter of fact, that the expenditure under the new arrangement would not be materially larger than the expenditure under the existing system. He will also remember that I put it to the House that, inasmuch as the probable expenditure was not as much as the current expenditure for judicial purposes, it was only becoming to assume that the Local Legislature was better acquainted with the circumstances of the country, and with the best mode of distributing their administrative power and judicial functions throughout the country. It was on that ground that I laid the resolutions before the House, and I take the liberty to assert that the hon. gentleman, in the long and laboured address which he has just made, has entirely failed to shake that argument in the slightest degree. I am willing to admit that, had the hon. gentleman succeeded in proving that the proposed change would impose large additional expense on the Dominion Treasury, I should not have felt so anxious to press forward the measure. It appears that, if we were to attach any value whatever to the argument of the hon. gentleman, it is this, that, British Columbia being a poor country, and the people scattered over hills and in valleys, and secluded from civilisation, they must be deprived of the ordinary administration of justice.

Mr. BLAKE: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I did not say that British Columbia was a poor country.

Mr. McDONALD: The hon. gentleman said it was poor in everything that conduces to the material comfort and happiness of the people.

MR. BLAKE: Not at all.

MR. McDONALD: The hon. gentleman said they were apart from civilisation and its comforts. I have always understood that the district of Cariboo was one of the most prosperous ones outside of Victoria. If I understood the hon. gentleman aright, he deplored the condition of a Judge who had to reside in Cariboo, on the ground that he was outside the pale of civilisation, but that his expenses would be so great as to demand an additional income. Now, supposing that to be true, that in Comox, Cassiar, Cariboo and Clinton, throughout all that sea of mountains, as I believe the hon. gentleman at one time characterised it, the condition is as the hon. gentleman has stated it, then there is the strongest reason why it is incumbent on this Parliament to provide for them the ordinary administration of justice, to see that, in their solitude, in their seclusion from society, in their inability to obtain the ordinary comforts of social life, at any rate life and property shall be safe so far as the administration of the law is concerned. In my opinion, on account of our inability to compare the modes of travelling in British Columbia with the comparatively luxurious mode of travelling in Ontario, the hon. gentleman's argument with regard to expense was entirely thrown away, and an unfair deduction from the premises which he himself advanced. The main point on which I asked this House to support this Bill was that it does not materially increase the actual expense. I desire again to refer to the figures I submitted to the House on a former occasion, and, in doing so, let me observe that the hon. gentleman who has just sat down misapprehended my argument on that occasion. I will read the figures again for his satisfaction. The salaries of the Stipendiary Magistrates, as I read them, were as follows: Victoria, $2,250; New Westminster, $2,425; Cariboo, $3,400; Lillooet, $2,400; Nanaimo, $2,250; making in all $15,725. I am informed, on the best possible authority which I can get from that country, the first law officer of the Crown of that country, that, in the event of this measure failing, it would be absolutely necessary to re-appoint the magistrate at New Westminster. I do not intend to base my argument on that at present, but I have this observation to make in reference to some of the correspondence read by the hon. gentleman. I do not think it desirable, nor do I think it will conduce to the interests of British Columbia, to put the Judiciary of the country in antagonism with the legislative power of that Province. Therefore, I did not refer in any sense, during this discussion, to the opinions of the Judges of that Province. I must say that some of the Judges, if not all of them, are opposed to this measure, and very naturally so. I will undertake to say that the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), were he in their position, would be opposed to it, because it interferes with their comfort and convenience. The Bill proposes that, instead of the Supreme Court Judges residing at Victoria and taking their usual summer trip, surrounded with pack-horses and servants, away into the interior of the country, only two of them hereafter shall reside in that delightful capital, and three of them shall retire to the seclusion of the wilds, so graphically described by the hon. member for West Durham. Without saying that the objections of these learned Judges are not worthy of consideration, I can only say, in dealing with the matter officially, that I am bound to accept the voice of the legislative power of the country, when that legislative power expresses itself so clearly. This Bill, on which this resolution is founded, is not a Bill hastily passed. It was passed in 1878, and the Legislature, since that time, in 1879, passed another Bill, extending and enforcing the provisions of the first measure, requesting the appointment of additional Judges. But to return to the figures again. I have stated that the total amount of the salaries paid to the Stipendiary Magistrates, whom it is proposed to pension, is $15,725. Now, let me just say that it appears to me that the hon. gentleman has most conclusively sustained my argument. In dealing with this question, he referred to these men as very able men. I have no reason to believe that they are not men of very high character, and no doubt they have been able to perform good service for the Province; but my hon. friend states that, while they did their duty, there is no doubt that it would be better to have able professional men. Now I propose to appoint able professional men to do professional work, at an expense not greater than that now incurred in connection with non-professional men. The amount of the salaries of the five Judges, including the vacancy, would be $15,725. The amount now paid to the five Stipendiary Magistrates is $13,200. The cost of the two Supreme Court circuits at about $2,600 increases the cost to $18,325. Under the proposed resolutions the salaries would be: Two Judges, $4,000 each, $8,000; pensions to Stipendiary Magistrates whom we retire, $8,083, or a saving to the country of $2,242. But I will make a present of the ghost of New Westminster to my hon. friend, and we have only then an addition to the ordinary expenditure at this moment of $400 a year, and I will ask my hon. friend if, with only an increased expenditure of $400 a year, it is not desirable, particularly in the interest of British Columbia, and in the interest of public justice, that we should have professional men, and, as I hope they will be, men of good character and standing. I have no doubt that we will be able to find young, ambitious, and able men who will undertake to undergo the discomforts which my hon. friend has so vividly described, for the sake of the future lying before them. Is it not better, I would ask, that we should have the Judiciary properly constituted of professional men, and distributed, as these will be, throughout the country. By this means we will have centres of civilisation, around which the uncivilised inhabitants of British Columbia can gather and receive faint rays of light. I do not propose to follow my hon. friend through the array of figures with which he regaled the House in his address. They were very interesting as historical sketches, delivered in a very agreeable manner, but it does not appear to me, for the reasons I have given, that they at all bear on this subject. But my hon. friend went further, and he gave us a very painful description of the decrease of the population in that country, or some parts of it. It is very natural that in a mining country—where the population depends largely upon the success of the discovery of the precious metal, gold—Lillooet, for instance, may to-day be a place of great importance and large population, and in a year or two another part of British Columbia may be blessed with the same population, and Lillooet may be left comparatively unpopulated, but my hon. friend has, it appears to me, forgotten one element of his calculations, which, it appears to me, ought to have presented itself to his mind. The hon. gentleman must know that that country has taken a start for the better. My hon. friend will appreciate the importance of the fact that 125 miles of the Canadian Pacific Railway have been laid within the confines of that country, and that in the construction of that work a large expenditure has been incurred, and that, certainly, the result will be not only a large accession of population, but a large accession to the enterprise and to the business activity, not only in the neighbourhood of the railway itself, but throughout the whole country. Therefore, another additional reason exists why men capable of rendering decisions on difficult questions of contract and otherwise should constantly reside in the region of the enterprise to which I have referred. I will now leave the matter to the House. I trust I have made it clear that we do not ask to add to the power of the Judiciary, or increase the expense of administering justice in British Columbia, but to authorise such a re-distribution of the judicial power and expenditure as will make that power and expenditure more effective. As has been very properly said, the fact of these Judges being on the mainland, within their own districts, must largely reduce the travelling expenses of these Judges in the discharge of their duties; and then we shall have, instead of one circuit, several, and instead of a man—not a criminal perhaps, as the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Thompson) has remarked, but an innocent man—being kept in jail awaiting his trial for many months, justice will be promptly and effectively administered, and that by competent persons. We shall have the expenditure lessened by the fact that the Judges, instead of having to travel with a large retinue long distances, will be resident at the door of the Court-house, where they have to administer justice, both in the district of Cariboo and in every other district.

MR. BLAKE: The hon. gentleman, I presume, is making this assertion in a comparative sense.

MR. McDONALD: Of course you must speak comparatively in reference to a country stretching over such a large extent of territory. I have just one word to say upon the alarm expressed with respect to poor Nova Scotia. The solicitude expressed, on behalf of that ancient and very desirable Colony and Province, is unfounded. The hon. gentleman who expressed that solicitude need not be alarmed. I had no knowledge that an increase of the judiciary of that Province is required. I saw in a newspaper a statement that a number of gentlemen composing the Bar in the city of Halifax had, for some reason which did not appear from the newspaper in question, represented that it would be desirable to appoint two more Judges. It would not be for selfish purposes, perhaps, but I suppose it would not be more injurious there to some of those who wanted Judgeships, than it would be in British Columbia. I do not attribute any selfish motive to British Columbia in seeking the passage of a Bill to increase its Judiciary, nor do I think any such motive actuates Nova Scotia. I have had no proposal during the Session to add to the Judiciary of Nova Scotia.

MR. THOMPSON (Cariboo): Having already stated my approval of the proposition now before the House, I should not have spoken again on the subject had it not been for the many arguments used against it by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake). I am not prepared to dispute the statistics brought forward by that hon. gentleman. I presume they are correct; but I do not admit that these expenses which he has alluded to will be increased by the measure now proposed. The hon. the Minister of Justice has just read the statement of the Attorney-General for British Columbia, showing the reduction that will be made in travelling expenses by the appointment of the new Judges. I am sorry the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Bunster) is not here to retract his assertion that the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) was opposed to this measure for the increase of the Judiciary of British Columbia because he could not obtain a Judgeship in that Province. Nothing, I believe, could be further from the mind of the hon. member for West Durham. From his contemptuous description of the country to-night, he would evidently consider it a hardship to be sent out there as a Judge, even at ten times the salary proposed, to bury himself among those icebergs and glaciers which he has told us about. The hon. gentleman has given us an appalling picture of the country. We have been told, that we British Columbians are a lawless and disreputable people, guilty of many violations of the law. I say that we are the most peaceable and law-abiding people in the Dominion of Canada. Most of the criminal cases are against Chinese. When he came to the expenses of County Court Judges, he brought forward an instance of a Judge in the Lillooet district, and said there were ten circuits held, in which thirty-two small cases were decided, and the expenses of the Judge for travelling forty-seven miles, and going ten times each way, were $410. It is quite true that Lillooet has fallen, but in the early times, in the old palmy gold-mining days, it was a place of great importance. It is owing to the presence of lawless Indians and Chinese that there is a necessity for so many sessions being held. The hon. gentleman shakes his head; but I say it is so; the place is a portion of the electoral district which I represent, and, if it has fallen off of late, it is owing to the lawless conduct of the Indians and Chinese.

MR. BLAKE: Will the hon. gentleman permit me to say that, in the year referred to, 1878, the whole of the thirty-two cases were civil cases. Besides these, there were only two criminal appeals.

MR. THOMPSON (Cariboo): I can answer that. The criminal cases were tried at Clinton, in the Lillooet district and the jail at Clinton was filled with Chinese and Indians upon charges of murder and robbery. The fact has been brought forward by the hon. the Minister of Justice that the building of the Pacific Railway, which will pass probably within twenty or thirty miles of the southern boundary of that district, will increase the population largely. It is time we had facilities for making a market for our cattle, by being enabled, as we will be when the Pacific Railway becomes a reality, to remove them to the seaboard. The district is teeming with cattle. That railroad will increase the population rapidly and give full employment for a Judge. In the district last year an atrocious crime was committed, far away from any place where there were any officers, a crime which has been equalled in this very Province of Ontario, a crime where arson and murder were combined, and a crime which, in both instances, — both in Ontario and in British Columbia — has not yet been brought to light, but which might have been traced in British Columbia if we had a better administration of justice there. I consider that the Legislature of British Columbia is best competent to judge what Judges there should be in the Province. If the proposal now before the House would, if carried out, be an advantage to us in British Columbia — as I am sure it would — if the Province itself would be a gainer then the Dominion would, in proportion, be also a gainer; and I think it has been conclusively shown that there can be no real increase of expenditure involved.

MR. BARNARD: I would prefer not to give a silent vote on a Bill proposing so complete an alteration of the system of trying cases in British Columbia. Were I inclined to oppose this Bill, I should not do so after the circumstances which have come under my notice, namely, the recommendation of the entire Bar of British Columbia. If there are a number of men in the Dominion who are in a position to decide on the best means of administering justice in that Province, it ought to be the men whose whole time has been devoted to the question. We have the sympathy and support of the men who compose the Bar of British Columbia, on a question which has been before the Local Legislature on two or three occasions; and the Government of British Columbia comes before this House to have the appointment of two more Supreme Court Judges sanctioned, who shall replace five gentlemen who hitherto have acted as County Court Judges, they being laymen. As to the question of economy, I may say that the expense of travelling in that Province is somewhat excessive, and, I think, any measure which would have the effect of reducing it would be to the interest of the country.

The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), who appears to fear additional expense, will remember a case of mail robbery which occurred while he held the office of Minister of Justice, in which the prisoner was brought to Victoria for trial, and in which a bill of $1,800 was incurred in moving the witnesses to and from a point near Cariboo, and we have no guarantee that such cases will not occur again. One reason why we are a law-abiding people is that the law has been so well administered by the Judiciary we possess. In the early settlement of the country, when a large number of people were flying to and from British Columbia — men, in many cases, of the rougher class — it was admitted by them that the law was well administered, and when difficulties arose they used to say that, were it not for the excellent administration of justice, they would have taken the law in their own hands. The very fact of there being so little crime shows that the people who administer the law know and understand thoroughly the requirements and peculiar circumstances of the country. I have no hesitation in voting for this Bill; although there is one thing that I would like to call the attention of the Government to. I desire that they should not do anything to give effect to the Act of the British Columbia Legislature, which, as I understand, gives the Government of that Province extraordinary control over the Judges. It is a source of complaint on the part of the Judges that clause 25 provides that the rules of the Court shall be made by the Local Ministry. The Judges object to this, and I think they have good ground for doing so. They wish to have the making of their own rules of procedure, and not to leave them to be made by a Ministry supported by the majority of a body of legislators numbering twenty-five, among whom there is only one legal gentleman. They do think that a House elected as ours is, by universal suffrage, should not assume the responsibility of regulating the procedure of the Court in any way whatever. There is, moreover, a certain want of harmony between the present Court and the Bar. It is complained that very frequently the members of the Bar are not accorded that degree of courtesy which should be extended by the Judges. As I understand it, the members of the Bar take the ground that changes are required in the personnel of the Bench, as well as in other respects. They contend that there should be sent from here two Judges well versed in the law, but who must be compelled to reside at the seat of Government, where the libraries are and where the lawyers reside. It seems the desire is that the Judges that now occupy the Bench in Victoria shall be moved to the interior, and that the gentlemen sent from here should occupy their places in Victoria. The present Judges, however, may object to this change, and the gentlemen of the Bar may find themselves disappointed in their desire of a change in the personnel of the Bench, for, if travelling expenses are to be saved, the Judges from Cariboo and Clinton cannot be expected to visit Victoria. Now with regard to the gentlemen who are to be superannuated, I contend that their services in the past ought to be regarded. They have undergone a great deal of hardship; they have been compelled to undergo privations which very few gentlemen seated in this House have any knowledge of, and now that they have surrounded themselves with families, it would be an injustice to remove them; as was suggested by the hon. gentleman from Victoria (Mr. De Cosmos), who said, in effect, that one gentleman, at least, might have been sent out to the North-West Territory in place of the gentleman sent to take charge of the Indian tribes there. That would be but a poor way of repaying the faithful public services of men of who have not only performed the duties allotted to them with credit, but who have undertaken the performance of every other duty required of them, and these have not been few. If the Government should find employment for these gentleman, it would be a great advantage to the country and a great advantage to them as well. If they are pensioned, the amount to be paid to them will be large, whereas, I believe their services could be utilised in the Province in positions equal in importance to those they now occupy, and it would effect a saving instead of involving a loss.

MR. DECOSMOS: With respect to some remarks that fell from the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, with relation to the Law Society being anxious that two gentlemen shall be sent from this country to take their seats upon the Bench of that Province, it appears to me that he must be in error. I am tolerably well posted as to the views of the members of the Law Society in British Columbia, and I believe they are anxious that two more Judges should be added to those already in the Province; but they would prefer that they should be taken from the Bar of the Province, although, in case the Government should decide upon taking them from any other Province, the Law Society will not complain. The hon. gentleman also made a remark about universal suffrage, and also in relation to the orderly character of the population, which he believed was due to the Judges. I am persuaded that the Judges of the Supreme Court and the Stipendiary Magistrates have exercised a wholesome influence throughout the Province, but I am prepared to state this: that the good order observed in that Province is due to the character of the people who have found their way to that Province, to the intelligent class of men that are to be found in the mines, on the farms, and in the various pursuits followed in that Province. It is to that fact that we must attribute the smallness of the criminal calendar. I saw 40,000 men land in Victoria within three months; we have had the whole route from Victoria to Cariboo, 600 miles, lined with them, and yet order prevailed everywhere. Now, when we find that such is the case, I think my hon. friend is not right in deprecating universal suffrage, and saying that a Legislature elected by universal suffrage cannot be relied upon. I am one of those who believe in universal suffrage for the entire Dominion, and I hope to live long enough to see universal suffrage prevailing in this country, so that the man who is bound to bear arms, and who pays taxes, shall have the right to vote as well as the man who merely owns or rents an acre of ground. With regard to the speech of my hon. friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake), I do not wish to refer to it, except so far as it refers to the expenses of the Courts in British Columbia. All day yesterday, until late in the evening, this House was occupied with a discussion on the Supreme Court of the Dominion, and an overwhelming vote was cast in favour of that Court, which was created by the hon. gentleman when he was Minister of Justice.

MR. BLAKE : No.

MR. DECOSMOS : He had certainly a large part in its creation.

MR. BLAKE : No.

MR. DECOSMOS : He certainly, as a member of this House, sanctioned it.

MR. BLAKE : Yes.

MR. DECOSMOS : I take it then that he helped in creating that Court. Now, what do we find has been the cost of the Supreme Court of the Dominion of Canada. According to the returns, it has cost, up to the present time, $164,038. The total number of judgments rendered by that Court is fifty-three, and the average cost of each has been $3,094. I think we must admit that the sum of money expended in the cost of that Court is utterly beyond all reason, and must astonish the people of this country. But the question of the Judiciary in British Columbia is not a question of a few thousand dollars here and there ; it is a question of the proper administration of justice in civil and criminal cases. That is really the point. If we expend a few thousand dollars more than at present, we can get regularly trained men to occupy the Bench and administer all laws, civil, criminal and ecclesiastical. The hon. member for Yale (Mr. Barnard) alluded to the great consideration due to the Stipendiary Magistrates. I am not one of those who wish to withhold the measure of praise that is due them, but I did state that I believe most of those gentlemen are in the full vigour of life, and that they are to-day as well able to discharge their duties as they were at any former period of their life, perhaps better, since they have had a larger experience. If those gentlemen, who will draw in the aggregate $8,083 in pensions, were employed by the Government in the discharge of duties with which they are familiar, such as that of Indian agents, that sum of money would be saved to the Dominion, and any excess in the charge over and above what is now paid would be so small that it would amount to very little. I therefore ask the Government to press the Bill, because I believe it will meet the views of the legal fraternity in British Columbia, as well as the views of the entire population.

(Sir Samuel L. Tilley.)

SECOND READING.

Bill read the second time.

PRIVILEGE—THE MEMBER FOR LENNOX.

REMARKS.

MR. KIRKPATRICK : What has become of the motion made a few days ago with reference to the petition against the hon. member for Lennox? When is it to be brought up again?

MR. MACKENZIE : It is adjourned at the request of the Premier.

MR. KIRKPATRICK : I do not think it is right that this matter should remain hanging over the head of the hon. member. I have a statement here which was handed to me by Mr. Hooper, which I should like to read to the House, and have the matter disposed of.

MR. MACKENZIE : I think it is a very irregular mode of procedure, after the hon. the First Minister has asked that it should be adjourned until such time as he should find convenient.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : I said I had not seen the petition. I had seen a petition printed in the Globe, but I did not know whether that was the petition before the House or not. I said, of course, that we could not proceed to discuss it until we had seen the petition, and therefore it was suggested by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) that it should be put in the Votes and Proceedings, that every member might see it.

MR. BLAKE : When the First Minister moved that the debate should be adjourned, the debate was ordered to be adjourned, and it was published in the Votes and Proceedings. But it has not appeared on the Notice Paper, as it ought to have appeared, in its proper place. I noticed that it was not on the Votes and Proceedings, and spoke to some of my friends about it yesterday.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : It will appear on the Orders of the Day for Monday.

MR. MACKENZIE : It is probable it will not be reached on Monday.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : It is a matter of privilege, I suppose.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not after the notice is given. If the debate is adjourned, it must take its proper place.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It has been suggested to me that that matter, being a matter of privilege, notwithstanding the notice, ought to have precedence, and ought to go on.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It was not a notice. The question was put and the debate adjourned.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It was a debate on the question of privilege.

Mr. MACKENZIE: But you answered the hon. member for North Norfolk that it was a question of privilege, and you cannot take action on a question of privilege in an adjourned debate.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It has been brought up as a matter of privilege, and hereafter must be continued as a matter of privilege.

Mr. BOWELL: The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) brought the matter before the House as a question of privilege. Then, if the debate was adjourned, it stands in precisely the same position as it did before.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I will read from May:

“When debates have been adjourned upon urgent questions of privilege, similar precedence has been given to the adjourned debates. Thus, on the 8th June, 1837, the adjourned debate on the petitions of the printers of the House, relating to Stockdale's action, was resumed before all other business; and in 1840 adjourned debates upon the same important question of privilege were repeatedly renewed at the commencement of public business.”

Mr. MACKENZIE: As a question of urgency.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Not as being a question of urgency, but as a question of privilege. The debates spread over many weeks. Sir Robert Peel fought everybody in favour of the privileges of the House of Commons, and therefore the question of urgency could not have arisen there.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I do not wish to be understood as objecting at all, but the hon. gentleman who presented the petition and made the motion is not in the House. I have had no conversation with him on the subject, but it is quite clear the matter must stand on that account.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think I am bound to read the whole passage, because it will bear out the hon. gentleman's statements:—

“So, also, on Tuesday, 27th February, 1838, the adjourned debate on the question of privilege, arising out of Mr. O'Connell's case, was taken first, before all the notices which had precedence on that day. And again on Tuesday, 9th May, 1865, the adjourned debate on the consideration of the report of the Committee, on the forgery of signatures, and the petitions in favour of the claims of Azeem Jah, which stood as the third Order of the Day, was resumed before all the notices, and other Orders of the Day. So also in Mr. Plimsoll's case, on the 29th July, 1875.”

Mr. BLAKE: My hon. friend said the other day it was not urgent, and he did not see any reason why it should not be placed on the Notice Paper.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I am much of that opinion now. It is for the House to say whether it is of urgency.

Mr. ANGLIN: Some time or other it will be well to come to some understanding when this shall be disposed of. It is a matter affecting seriously the character of a member of this House. His right to sit here is seriously impugned, and we ought to deal with it as soon as possible.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: We will take it up early on Monday.

BANKING AND CURRENCY.

QUESTION.

Mr. MACKENZIE: When is it likely we will have the banking measure promised to be brought down? We are now over a fortnight in Session, and no measure from the Government has yet made its appearance, except that had one concerning the Judges in British Columbia. We ought to have some of those very important Bills before us at as early a day as possible.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: From my own experience of eight years in this House, I have never known so much business transacted in the first fortnight, and the members sitting here so steadily, as in the present Session. The public interests have not suffered, and certainly, if my memory serves me aright, I do not think the Estimates were before the House within the first fortnight, for the last three or four years. In reference to the Banking measure, I purpose, in the first place, to have the Estimates before the House and deal with the question of the Tariff, and then to submit, at the earliest day possible, the propositions with reference to Currency and Banking.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT : It gives me great pleasure to inform the hon. gentleman that the bad precedent which, no doubt, was set during the seven or eight years he was in the House was not followed in 1875, 1876, 1877, or 1878. In 1875, we met on the 4th of February, and the Budget Speech was delivered on the 16th of February. In 1876, we met on the 10th of February, and the Budget Speech was delivered on the 25th. In 1877, we met on the 11th February, and the Budget Speech was delivered on the 20th. In 1878, we met on the 7th of February, and the Budget Speech was delivered on the 22nd. The hon. gentleman will see that, in all these cases, within a fortnight after the House met—and we have been here more than a fortnight now—the Budget Speech was delivered, the Estimates had been brought down, and the information for which we asked and which the hon. member for Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper) in former days used to ask for from the place I now occupy, was laid upon the Table and everything was ready. I repeat what I said last night, that, though it is perfectly fair and right that a certain number of days should be given at the commencement of the Session to enable the House to make itself acquainted with those facts which it can only learn after the reports come down, further delay than that means two things : first of all, it occasions considerable unnecessary expense, which, as I judge, is much to be avoided by the hon. the Minister of Finance at present. In the next place, it means that important measures like that to which he has alluded, and than which no more important measure can be brought before the consideration of the House, must be inevitably thrown over to a late period of the Session, and will inevitably be indifferently discussed. Every man who has had any experience of the working of this House knows perfectly well that no business is attempted until the financial statement is made, and the longer that is put off so much the more difficult will it be to give proper attention to the important measures the Government may have to bring down. It is for that reason that in 1874 the Rules of this House were amended in conformity with those of the English House of Commons, and a very simple form of bringing in the Budget was introduced ; and it was for that reason that, while my hon. friend beside me presided over the Government, we deemed it our duty never to allow more than a fortnight to elapse before giving the House an opportunity of knowing, at any rate, our financial policy and discussing the measures we had to produce. The Estimates have always been down two or three days before the Budget Speech was delivered.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY : I think I may safely say that, in the experience of the Dominion Parliament, there never have been so many returns called for by the leading members on both sides of the House as in the present Session. But I can quite understand why those hon. gentlemen are anxious to have those returns. It is impossible for us intelligently to enter upon the discussion of the effect of the recent Tariff unless they have these returns, and, had I now been sitting in the place now occupied by my predecessor, I would also have asked for them. It was but right for the late Minister of Customs to ask for certain returns. But these returns must necessarily be very voluminous ; some of them, for instance, ask for a comparative statement of the imports for the first six months of this year, compared with the first six months of last year. It requires not only some time for these returns to reach the Customs Department from various parts of the Dominion, but they have to be tabulated. It required two months in that Department to prepare the returns for the first quarter of this year, to lay before the Government, in order to compare the effects of the Tariff with the first quarter of last year ; therefore, it is utterly impossible for the staff in that Department to do the work of months in the short time in which they are asked to do it. If I had submitted the Estimates, and asked the House to go into a consideration of the Tariff without those figures, my hon. friend would have been the first to object. We are as anxious as they are to have these returns, because we feel that they will be the vindication of the policy of the Government, whenever they are submitted to this House.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman is suddenly very careful of the interests of the Opposition. He makes the complaint on our behalf that the returns are not down, saying that it is impossible for the Opposition to consider the Estimates before they come down. We do not complain; we are ready to go at the work. The hon. gentleman need not be concerned on our account. But, if, as he says, it is impossible to have those returns yet, and that they were necessary, he surely knew that before Parliament met, and should have made the necessary preparation. It would have been fair and ingenuous in the hon. gentleman simply to have admitted that the Government is not ready. This is no new subject I have brought up. We had the subject of banking discussed some years ago, when no very material change was then made in the Banking Laws. At that time there was an understanding arrived at across the floor of the House that the debate which was then entered upon should be carefully reported. It was carefully reported, but was never published. It could not be found by myself, when I went into office, nor by any of my colleagues. It was not even in that famous pigeon-hole marked M. I., for Masterly Inactivity. If this debate were published for the sake of giving us something to consider, we might have subjects before us for a few days, without feeling very seriously the want of some Government matters to work upon.

MR. BLAKE: I desire to join in the protest against the reiterated statements of the Financial Minister, because this is the second time that he has given the same excuses for delay in bringing down public business for the consideration of the House. For the second time he has said that certain information was essential to the preparation of his Budget speech; but I hold it was the hon. gentleman's duty to have prepared for these things in advance of the meeting of Parliament. He should have used his staff in the gathering of all necessary information, and been in a position to furnish a great deal at this moment, without waiting for the Opposition to move for returns. He ought not to try and let himself down, as if he were powerless to act till pushed by the Opposition.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I have no desire to let myself down in any shape; nor could any hon. member have got any information that I have not produced. I can inform my hon. friends opposite that, anticipating this matter, instructions were given to the Department to have the information prepared and tabulated in the form asked for by the late Finance Minister, but it was utterly impossible to have the second return ready, although the officers have been engaged on it since the returns came in. That is the explanation and not any desire to be urged by hon. gentlemen opposite. Certain information as to the imports in the six months has been ordered without reference to any call from the House; but other matter asked for by the late Minister of Customs, with regard to the different Provinces, required labour and will cause delay. But the papers deemed absolutely necessary for an intelligent consideration of this subject were ordered two months ago, in order that they might facilitate comparisons as regards the experience of the six months. The preparation of the further returns could only be commenced in the latter part of January.

MR. BLAKE: When will these be ready?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I do not know. The officers are working on them to have them ready without the least delay.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: It is quite clear that the hon. gentleman will have reason for granting my request that it be a Standing Order to have these returns ready as soon as possible. I join my petition to that of the hon. member for Lambton that the speech made by the the Finance Minister, who was then Minister of Customs, on the Banking Law introduced by Sir John Rose, should be reprinted for the use of members. It attracted great interest and attention at the time, and it would be pleasant to have it now.

(Mr. Colby.)

FURTHER CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.
Order for consideration of the said Bill, as amended, read.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY.

MR. BLAKE : It is highly important to make provision for two classes of cases not included in the present Bill,—the winding up of Insolvent Banks and Insolvent Fire and Marine Insurance Companies. The objection which applies to the Insolvent Law,—the debtor's discharge,—does not apply to the provisions for winding up such companies. If I am not misinformed, there is an instance of each class, at this moment, being wound up under the Act. At any rate, there may be cases which would require some means of winding up. My only purpose that, is if the Act does pass, the application of the Act to these corporations, through laws on the Statute-book of a later date than the Act, shall not be affected; and with that object I move :

That the Bill be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to amend the said Bill by inserting after the word "same" in line 5 of clause 1, the following words :—"Save in so far as any of the said Acts do, by virtue of any Act of Canada, apply to insolvent incorporated Banks or insolvent incorporated Life, Fire or Marine Insurance Companies."

Experience, and the general opinion manifested in the debates for some years past, demonstrate that it is important to provide for the winding up of those institutions. My proposition is not in any sense hostile to the general principle of the hon. gentleman's Bill.

MR. COLBY : I am not aware that the operation of the Insolvent Law respecting the winding up of Banks and Insurance Companies has been complained of, nor am I aware that it is satisfactory. Personally, however, I have not the slightest objection, if it be the sense of the House, that the suggestion of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) be adopted.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) : I may say to the member for West Durham that I have settled with the member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) upon a clause similar in substance to the clause just read; that was the clause of which that hon. gentleman gave notice. He was under the impression, however, that he could more readily give the facilities needed for the winding up of those corporations by an amended Act. Therefore, I fancy, so far as I have learned, the desire of the whole House is that those companies should be left in their present position. I do not see why the amendment suggested by my hon. friend from West Durham should not be admitted, because I do not see how it would affect in any degree any measure my hon. friend from Richmond and Wolfe is desirous to introduce.

MR. BLAKE : Precisely; the hon. gentleman could amend the law.

MR. BURPEE (St. John, N. B.) : Has the Government or the hon. mover considered the propriety of fixing a time for the coming into operation of the Bill?

MR. COLBY : I see no reason to change my views on this point. On the contrary, I have received a message from the mercantile interest in Quebec urging the immediate operation as well as the immediate passage of the Bill.

MR. BURPEE : My previous reasons for a delay are much stronger now, as the Legislature of New Brunswick has postponed its meeting until the 9th of March, and there will be the lapse of a month or more between the passing of this Act and any possible legislation in that Province to meet the changes created by it.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell) : I have great diffidence in offering a suggestion with regard to this clause, but I think it would be a misfortune to adopt it. At this moment there are in Montreal two banks in difficulties; one has gone into insolvency under the Act, and is now in the hands of an official assignee, and the other has, I think, escaped that calamity by arrangement with the creditors, and is likely to be ultimately wound up in the hands of its directors, probably by a special Act of the Legislature. Another Montreal Bank, the Ville Marie, is about applying to Parliament for an Act to enable it to wind up its affairs. I consider it a great misfortune when a bank gets into the hands of an official assignee. Those deeply interested in the Consolidated Bank have felt that, had they gone into the hands of the official assignee, not only would all the stock have been wiped out, but every shareholder would have had to pay something under the double liability provision, whereas, wound up in the ordinary way, the bank will ultimately save or pay something to the shareholders instead of inflicting further loss upon them. As to Insurance Companies, we should have special legislation for the winding up of them. They always come here for, and get special Acts. The general belief in regard to those large institutions is that they lose more heavily by going into the hands of an official assignee than if wound up by those more immediately interested. I think it would be a great misfortune if we passed this amendment.

MR. BLAKE: It would not be right to act under the impression that the ordinary provisions of the Insolvent Act apply to those large institutions. On the contrary, each of the special Acts passed gave a very extensive power to the Judges, upon the representation of what the true interest of all parties might require, to postpone, for a very long period, the issue of an attachment, and to appoint an inspector, under whom the business might be carried on. The real difficulty, with reference to banks is that the directors are, of course, interested in postponing, to the utmost, the enforcement of the double liability. But it was considered by the Legislature that the directors, under the spur of the possible issue of an attachment, within a limited period, might act so promptly and energetically in the winding up as to obviate that proceeding; and I think that, for twelve months after the application, it is competent for the Judge to postpone the attachment; that is as long as is necessary, under ordinary circumstances, as proved by actual experience.

House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Bill, as amended, ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

(In the House.)

Bill, as amended, reported.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

PRIVATE BILLS.

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were severally read the second time:—

Bill (No. 29) To amend the Act intitled an Act to incorporate the Anchor Marine Insurance Company.—(Mr. Cameron, South Huron.)

Bill (No. 31) To incorporate the St. Clair and Lake Erie Navigation Company.—(Mr. Stephenson.)

MR. WHITE (Cardwell.)

Bill (No. 33) To amend and consolidate the Act incorporating the Dominion Grange of the Patrons of Husbandry of Canada.—(Mr. McCallum.)

Bill (No. 34) To incorporate the Farmers and Real Property Bank of Canada.—(Mr. Cameron, North Victoria.)

Bill (No. 35) Respecting the Niagara Grand Island Bridge Company.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

Bill (No. 36) To authorise the Corporation of Emerson, in the Province of Manitoba, to construct a Free Traffic Bridge across the Red River, at Emerson.—(Mr. Royal.)

INSOLVENCY ACTS REPEAL BILL.— [BILL 2.]

FURTHER CONSIDERED.

House resumed the consideration of the amendment made this day in Committee of the Whole on the said

MR. BLAKE: The House will recollect that there is a certain class of corporations, which has always been embraced in the operation of the existing Insolvent Law, I mean incorporated trading companies. My desire is to preserve the law as applicable to incorporated trading companies. I would therefore move:

That the said Bill be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to amend it by inserting after the word "Companies," in clause 1, the following words:—"And also in so far as any of the said Acts apply to incorporated Trading Companies."

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: At the time that the last motion was before the Committee, it struck me, after hearing the remarks of hon. gentlemen, that there were no objections to it. I did not see any objection at the time; but since then I find that there is an impression in the minds of some of my hon. friends that the matter has not received full consideration, and that it would come up more properly as a measure like that of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives). We had better, therefore, leave the Bill as it was yesterday, before the amendment of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) and the resolution can stand for concurrence. It is too important a matter to be hurried as it has been.

MR. MILLS: There is one thing to be considered. If this measure is carried repealing the Insolvency Laws, the House will not be in a position to deal with the Bill of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives). That question being once decided by this House, whether in the affirmative or the negative, it must stand as the judgment of the House for this Session.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: No such difficulty can arise as that suggested by the hon. gentleman.

MR. MILLS: It must arise, if this Bill is carried at the third reading. If the Bill is carried without the amendment of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), the whole question will have been dealt with in one particular manner, by this Bill, and the House will not be at liberty to deal with the same question in another manner, by another Bill, during the same Session.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: We can repeal or otherwise deal with any Bill passed in the same Session. That is provided for by the Interpretation Act.

MR. HOLTON: I think the suggestion of the right hon. the leader of the House that this should stand over will be a proper one to act upon. Before the final judgment of the House is taken upon one Bill or the other, the point raised by my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) can be considered. We can guard against falling into any trap of that kind. Meanwhile, the repeal of the Insolvency Laws, as connected with these corporations, should stand over for more consideration.

MR. BLAKE: I understand the suggestion of the hon. the First Minister to be that the House, before deciding whether it should accept the amendment now under discussion or not, should first see the alternative proposal of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe. I think it a highly reasonable suggestion that the House should see the proposal before passing upon my amendment. I will accede to that view, and let the whole question stand.

Several HON. MEMBERS: No, no.

MR. BLAKE: I do not care which mode is adopted. Let the third reading of this Bill stand, until we have seen the Bill of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives).

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I have no objection to that; and I may say that there will be no delay. I am quite aware of the importance of avoiding delay in the matter. Persons are rushing into the Courts so as to get white-washed before the Act passes; but there shall be no delay in getting the Bill of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) in print. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) can withdraw his motion and renew it afterwards.

MR. BLAKE: I am not particular about the form; I only care for the substance.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell): If the Bill is allowed to stand as now before the House on this motion, we may probably not reach it again for a week to come; and the effect will be that the whole question will be postponed for an indefinite time. People are rushing into insolvency, and the injury being done to the country at this moment, by the impression that this Bill is going to pass is incalculable. We ought to determine at once whether this Bill is to be passed or not. If we could refuse concurrence in the amendment moved by the hon. member for West Durham, we could proceed with the third reading of the Bill without any delay.

MR. SHAW: The Bill of the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Ives) will not interfere with the Act at all. The Insolvent Act does not apply to Insurance Companies.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the consideration of the Bill, as amended, be referred to Tuesday next, and stand as the first Order of the Day.

MR. COLBY: I presume the arrangement arrived at the other day with the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) for the third reading of the Bill on Wednesday will be carried out.

MR. HOLTON: Provided always, that the House put the Bill in a condition to be ratified.

MR. ANGLIN: I have some doubts as to whether that motion will put the Bill in a proper condition. The Bill was, as amended, taken into consideration. Then, on the amendment of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), it was referred back to the Committee, who reported the Bill as amended. Therefore, the motion should be that the Bill, as amended, stand for consideration.

An HON. MEMBER: Of course, the Bill as amended.

MR. BLAKE: Of course, I am to be in a position to renew my motion, having withdrawn it on that understanding.

Motion (Mr. Blake), with leave of the House, withdrawn.

Resolved, That the consideration of the said Bill, as amended, be postponed until Tuesday next, to be then the first item on the Orders of the Day.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

FINANCIAL RETURNS.

MOTION FOR STANDING ORDER.

House resumed the adjourned debate on Mr. Mackenzie's proposed motion. [Vide p. 136.]

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I wish to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Finance, and the hon. the Minister of Customs to the fact that, under the present mode of publishing our Customs returns, the information given is insufficient. Under the old system, the rates of duty were clearly marked; all the items were probably not much more numerous than as now published. They gave a good deal more information. It would be very desirable, and a great convenience to the House, to have the additional information brought down at as early a date as possible. I do not particularly care in what mode the Ministry may choose to furnish the House with this information. As the motion shows, it is proposed only that it should be an Order of the House in case this information was not previously printed in the Canada Gazette. The first item it is desired to have is a statement of the receipts and expenditures of the Dominion of Canada from the commencement of the fiscal year to the first day of January in each year, or to some other day, not being more than six weeks previous to the opening of the House. That is a matter, of course, that there can be no sort of difficulty in laying on the Table of the House whenever we meet. The second item asks for a return showing the several rates of duty paid—and, in the case of free goods, the several classes of goods—on all articles exported from or imported into the Dominion of Canada during the same period with the same proviso. Now, to this, I understand that the hon. gentleman, though admitting that it would be very desirable, takes exception on the ground of the voluminous character of the return, and the same objection would hold still more strongly to clause 3, which asks for the same information by Provinces. I am not aware exactly in what state the Customs returns are now prepared, but, I would say that, if the hon. the Ministers of Finance and Customs think that these returns, as asked for, will be too voluminous, almost all the information which is really of importance would be furnished to us provided there were laid on the Table of the House, or printed in advance of the meeting of the House, copies of the monthly statements, supposing that these are all made out in the same manner that they were made out during the time of my incumbency of office, and during the time of the incumbency of office of the hon. the Minister of Finance when he was Minister of Customs. I made the enquiry of the hon. the Minister of Customs, the other day, as to whether that practice still prevailed of having monthly returns furnished to the Departments of Finance and Customs, and I think two other branches of the Government, showing, in considerably more detail than the statements published in the Gazette showed, what particular classes of articles were brought in. Of course the hon. gentleman will understand that the main point is to ascertain what classes of goods, what quantity of goods, and the values, come in under the several new duties which he has imposed. Now I am quite aware that there is always a certain amount of delay attending the working of so complicated a system as that the hon. gentleman has introduced. But I may remind him that in the United States all these returns are published quarterly, and a great deal more besides. In England, if my memory serves me aright, they are published, either monthly or weekly, in great detail; and, although a reasonable time, of course must elapse before these can be furnished, it does appear to me that as we rarely meet before the middle of February, at any rate, all that I ask for here, at least a reasonable summary, showing the amount and classes of articles, might be prepared. Of course, it may make a little difference whether the articles, say under $5,000 worth are detailed, or whether they are placed as usual under the head of articles not elsewhere enumerated. But I think, after the expression of opinion from the hon. gentleman himself, as to the importance—in fact he said the indispensability—of having information of this character furnished to the House, he will himself, without any further solicitation on my part, see the importance of making an arrangement, either for the publication in the Gazette, which I think would be the better mode, or by a rule of the House laying on the Table of the House information substantially such as here asked for. Of course this is a matter which rests entirely with the heads of the Departments. My intention is merely to call to their notice this matter, mainly from the fact that, during the first few days we are here, this information can be better examined and better digested than it is likely to be if it is laid on the Table of the House at a later period.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : I do not rise at all in reference to the details that are called for in the resolution, but I rise to express a strong opinion against summarily altering our Standing Rules. These matters are surrounded with great difficulty and are not to be altered without the gravest consideration. The mere convenience of having this return early in the Session is not sufficient ground for altering our Standing Orders. That is a matter that can be taken up and arranged from time to time.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY : So far as the first proposition is concerned, very little delay will necessarily arise in reference to the returns of Receipts and Expenditure. That can be given in a day or two. I may remind the hon. gentleman that one of the regulations of the Customs Department is to have a monthly return sent in by the Collectors in the various ports of the Dominion, stating the amount of imports and exports of certain leading articles ; while there is a quarterly return giving the particulars of the revenue collected, the goods that are free, and the various articles paying different rates of duty, and the countries whence they are imported. An abstract of these monthly returns could be prepared and submitted to Parliament at a short notice, but the closing part of this motion asks for returns by Provinces, showing also the countries whence and to which said exports and imports were received or exported. That is, the returns, for instance, of last quarter up to the first day of January. But these quarterly returns have to be prepared by the Collectors of Customs and sent in, and then it requires a good deal of time in order that they may enter the different articles that were imported under the different heads at the different rates of duty, and the countries whence imported. It is that portion of the return that must cause a great deal of delay, but abstracts, not as complete, could be submitted without much delay.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT : If the hon. gentleman would agree to the plan, it would be a great public convenience, not merely to the members of this House, but to the mercantile community at large, if all official returns in the Gazette were made, under our changed Tariff, a good deal more extensive than they have hitherto been. Under the old system, the rates of duty were always discriminated, and, substantially, all this information was obtained. If he would agree to publish in the Canada Gazette, which I think the preferable mode, the six monthly returns, not showing the countries whence the goods are imported, and not showing those details which occupy too long a period in obtaining ; that, together with the statement of receipts and expenditure, would meet all my purpose, and there would be no occasion for pushing the matter further.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY : If the hon. gentleman required this to be given, under any circumstances, it would increase the size of the Gazette very largely. Do I understand my hon. friend to ask that the rates of duties levied as well should be published ?

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT : Yes. Special heads are wanted, showing what quantities of goods are imported under twenty, thirty or forty per cent.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY : That would require a volume as large as the Gazette itself.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT : There is force, I am aware, in the objection to the alteration of the Standing Orders. The motion was put in that shape mainly to elicit an expression of opinion in the House as to the desirability of having this information laid on the table, which desirability was very strongly confirmed by the remarks of the hon. the Minister of Finance himself, who pleaded that he was obliged to delay his Budget Speech until he could furnish the information.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Oh, no; I did not say that.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: The difficulty of obtaining that information prevented him from explaining to us the results of his National Policy. Although there may be difficulty even in complying with the very moderate request I made as to the classes of goods, there can be no difficulty in giving the monthly returns in the more extended shape in which I presume they are furnished the hon. the Minister of Finance and the hon. the Minister of Customs. That would be a great improvement on the present classification published in the Canada Gazette, which is most meagre, and affords, except as to the item of sugar, no information of much value.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman is evidently spoiling for a fight. He has got his speech ready on the National Policy, and he thinks that everything else must be set aside, that the business of Parliament in both the Upper and the Lower Houses should be set aside—the legislation introduced by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) evidently must be set aside, in order that the hon. gentleman may deliver himself and free his conscience and his mind of this speech. We have listened to similar speeches in days of old, and we have listened to them with equal instruction and pleasure. But sometimes the pleasure is not decreased by being deferred. I think we can allow the general business of the country to go on. I do not think the country is going to suffer, or that there will be any failure in any of the public enterprises which the National Policy has been promoting—there will be no serious suffering, either in the House or out of it, by the House going on with its business as it has done. After being thirty-four years in Parliament, I have never in my life seen a Session in which every member of the House seems to have addressed himself at once to his duties as a legislator to the same extent as in the present Session. The Speech from the Throne was answered the day after it was delivered. The House has been fully and profitably occupied in the discussion of matters of great public interest, and we have not had any long or profitless debates. The debates have been full, concise, truthful, and to the point, and we have worked as hard, and harder, than I have ever known at the beginning of the Session. You must know, from your Parliamentary experience, Mr. Speaker, that it is not well for the House to rush to work early in the Session, and have too late sittings, otherwise, the members of the House will find that when the real heavy business of the Session comes on, they have lost their energy, and exhausted their physical systems. I will assure the hon. gentleman, if he will take the assurance from me, that he will find that the business of this House, as far as the Government is concerned, will be pressed with all convenient speed, all the speed that is consistent with a full and fair discussion of the subjects; and this country will not be put to the additional expense of an unnecessary delay in the Session. I am sure that, if the House continues to be animated by the same spirit as it has commenced with, by an earnest desire to go to work at once, and not do as perhaps we did last Session, when we were all coming fresh from our constituencies, and were full of the discussions that had taken place outside the House. We have all got rid of that, and, if we will continue to do as we have commenced, and keep ourselves earnestly on the same course, this Session will be a profitable Session, and not an expensive or tedious one.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman compliments the House on the readiness with which it has taken to its proper business. I join with him in that compliment. The private members have been compelled to attend to the business of the country, so far as they are able, without the aid of the Government. The only unanimated portions of the House are the eleven gentlemen who sit on the row of seats opposite. Private members have had some business before the House, and the Government have been content, in their want of enterprise, to take the credit of a Private Bill introduced by an hon. member on that side, and to say that that was the Bill foreshadowed in the Speech. They had no Bill of their own on that subject, and Heaven only knows if they have a Bill upon any subject. We have been here for over two weeks now, and the hon. gentleman quarrels with us because we are anxious to have the measures, in order to give them that full consideration they ought to have. I have asked for some of the more prominent measures, some that affect the country most seriously, and the reply is that they will be down by-and-bye. Now, the hon. gentleman thinks that the best plan is, according to his speech, to allow private members to proceed helter-skelter as they like with the business, without putting in an oar, and, when the House is wearied out with long discussions about other subjects, then the Government expects its own measures will be rushed through in a hurry. The most experienced members of Parliament present have never before experienced such a long delay in the bringing down of measures that were promised in the Speech from the Throne.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I do not think that at the end of the Session we shall ask the House to give us six days out of the seven.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER LEGALISATION BILL—[BILL 30.]

(Mr. Girouard, Jacques Cartier.)

Order for second reading read.

MR. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier): Some nine or ten months ago, a lady came to me, and stated that she had married the husband of her deceased sister, according to the rites of the Catholic Church. There were children from both marriages. The father, although having no property of his own, was in possession of a considerable estate, which had been entailed by his father in favour of his legitimate children. The lady wished to know whether the children of the second marriage were excluded from this succession. Her marriage being absolutely null under our Civil Code, you may, Mr. Speaker, easily imagine the effect which the communication of this fact produced on this lady, who had committed no wrong before her God and her friends, but who was, however, guilty before the law of the land. I then conceived the idea of presenting to this House a Bill, to come to the relief of that class of people, situated as this lady was. The last Session having been a long and arduous one, and being far advanced, I thought it would be better to defer the consideration of such an important subject till the present Session, and hence the present Bill. This Bill, although brought for the first time before this Parliament, is not new to the Canadian public. A Bill to the same effect received its first reading in 1860, before the Legislative Council of the late Province of Canada. Eight times it received the sanction of the popular branch of the British Parliament, and eight times was rejected by its Upper House. It has been passed by several of the Colonial Legislatures; it forms part of the laws of the greatest portion not only of America, but also of the Continent of Europe. Its subject matter is of the greatest social importance, marriage with the sister of a deceased wife being almost of daily occurrence among all classes of our community, irrespective of creed or nationality. Therefore, this grave question should be considered, not only apart from all party motives, but also from all prejudices and ill-feeling, religious or otherwise; it should be regarded almost as a national question affecting the mass of the people of this Dominion. Before the Reformation, as at present, in the Catholic Church, the validity of the marriage with a deceased wife's sister depended upon the dispensation of the ecclesiastical authorities. In 1533 it was forbidden by Henry VIII. However, until the year 1835, it was not void de jure, but merely voidable by a legal process taken before the Ecclesiastical Court. In 1835, Lord Lyndhurst's Act made past marriages of affinity valid, but a prohibitory clause, declaring all similar marriages in the future "void," was consented to by the Commons, with the understanding that this limitation should be removed in the ensuing Session, but it is still in force. In 1841, the first effort was made in the Lords by Lord Wharnccliffe to repeal the prohibitory clause, but his Bill was lost without a division. In 1842, the question was taken up by the Commons, the Bill being, however, lost by 123 to 100. Five years later, in 1847, a Royal Commission was appointed to examine the Marriage Laws, and the result was the bringing in of a Bill in the Commons by Mr. Stuart Wortley. The second reading was carried on the 20th June, 1849, by 177 to 143, but the Bill did not reach the third reading. In 1850, Mr. Stuart Wortley's Bill was again brought before the Commons and passed by 144 to 134. In 1851, the question was raised in the Lords by Lord St. Germans, but his Bill was lost by 50 to 16. In 1855, the same Bill was presented to the Commons, where it reached the second reading by 164 to 157; but in the following year it was again rejected by the Lords, 43 to 19. In 1858, Lord Bury introduced the Bill before the Commons, where it was passed by 100 to 70, but the Lords rejected it, 46 to 22. In 1859, the same result was obtained. During the years 1861, 1862, 1866 and 1869, the Commons sided with the Lords, and in every instance rejected the Bill. Public opinion, however, did not support the action of the Parliament. Petitions from the people, boroughs and corporations poured in, and finally, in 1870, Mr. Chambers's Bill, which had been withdrawn in 1869, was carried unopposed, and in Committee was adopted by 184 to 114. The Lords rejected it, 77 to 73. In 1872 and 1873, the same course was followed with the same result. But in 1875, Sir T. Chambers's Bill received a check in the Commons. The second reading was negatived by 171 to 142. Finally, in 1879, the Bill was again introduced in the Lords by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, and was rejected by 101 to 81. The laws in England, therefore, stand as they were laid down by William IV in 1835, the marriage with the sister of a deceased wife being not only voidable, but void, and such is the law in all the British Colonies settled since that time. I believe Manitoba and British Columbia are among these. The Statutes of Henry VIII which declares such marriages only voidable, applied to the Colonies settled before, as the Provinces of Ontario, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, etc.

"It cannot be doubted," said Vice-Chancellor Esten in the Ontario Case of Hodgins vs. McNeil, "that the marriage in question in this case was unlawful, and void at the time of its celebration, and could have been annulled by the sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court at any time during the lifetime of both parties."

We were told last Session during the debate on the Campbell Relief Bill that no Ecclesiastical Court exists in Ontario. However, this would only involve a difficulty of procedure, which can be solved by an Ontario attorney, and it remains certain that under the laws of Ontario the validity of the marriage with the sister of a deceased wife may be questioned and set aside during the lifetime of the parties; and it may be a doubtful point, not to say more, whether in British Columbia and Manitoba such validity may not be questioned even after death. In the Province of Quebec, until the promulgation of the Civil Code, in 1866, these marriages were tolerated, and among Catholics they were altogether left to the discretion of the Church, which, as in England before the Reformation, grants dispensation from the impediment of affinity. But article 125 of the Code says:

"In the collateral line, marriage is prohibited between brother and sister, legitimate or natural, and between those connected in the same degree by alliance, whether they are legitimate or natural."

It is not, therefore, surprising that the question under consideration should have attracted public attention, as well in the Colonies as in the Mother Country. South Australia, Victoria, Tasmania, New South Wales, Queensland, and Western Australia have passed Acts legalising these marriages. A Bill of the same nature has passed the Lower House of New Zealand, and twice that of Natal. At the Cape of Good Hope such marriages are valid if celebrated under dispensation from the Governor. When the Bill was moved in the House of Lords last year by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, the progress it had made was reviewed. One of its ablest advocates, Lord Houghton, said:

"At home the question has made great progress, especially in Scotland and Ireland. I remember the time when only three representatives from Scotland could be counted in support of the Bill, but now you have the important petitions from the Convention of Royal Burghs, representing sixty municipalities, which I present to-night, as well as many representative petitions from other municipalities not included in the Convention. The Magistrates and Town Council of Edinburgh recently agreed by a majority of 24 to 12 to petition in support of the measure, and the United Presbyterian Church have, through their Kirk Sessions and Presbyteries, arrived at the conclusion that marriages of the nature with which this Bill deals, ought not to be a bar to Church membership. As to Ireland, I may state that the corporation of Dublin have five times sent petitions to this House, and that forty other corporations in Ireland have petitioned in the same sense. I may also mention that the late respected Cardinal Cullen authorised me to say that he had no difficulty in acceding privately to the opinion expressed by Cardinal Wiseman and other dignitaries of that Church, although he declined to sign any petition because of the difference of views existing among his clergy. In England, the most important corporations, that of the city of London being at the head of them, have repeated their adhesions, and this evening the petitions presented by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, and by the Prime Minister, as well as that by myself from three Bishops, and upwards of two hundred Roman Catholic clergy, including the superiors of the chief religious orders, confirm our opinion.

"It should not be forgotten that all the Non-conformist bodies, without the exception of a single sect, are in favour of the Bill, and what is the immense proportion they bear in the Christian community of this country.

"And now, my Lords," continued Lord Houghton, "I pray you to give a second reading to this Bill. If you do so, you will relieve thousands of your fellow-citizens, honest men and honest women, from a deep sense of partial legislation and cruel injustice; if you reject this Bill, you will force on them the conviction that they might, like yourselves, enjoy the great happiness of family life with those they love best, without discomfort to themselves or dishonour to their offspring, were it not for the intolerance of the Church of England, and the social prejudices of the House of Lords."

I do not intend to consider the religious aspect of the question. It cannot be denied, however, that the law as it stands at present hurts the conscience of the majority of the people of this Dominion, whose religion and faith do not forbid them to marry the sister of a deceased wife. Again, it is equally certain that a large number of spiritual peers of the Church of England have declared their conviction of the spiritual lawfulness of such marriages. More than 400 of the metropolitan clergy have petitioned the British Parliament for their legalisation. I hold a long list of most eminent Protestant divines, and among them such names as Dr. Whately, Dr. Cumming, Canon Dale, Dr. Dodd, Dr. Eadie, George Gilfillan, Dr. Norman McLeod, Dr. Chalmers, Dr. Hook, Dr. Musgrave, Dr. Fair, who are always high authorities on religious questions, and who strongly advocate the passing of the Bill so often rejected by the House of Lords. However, I cannot shut my eyes to the persistent, and almost systematic opposition of the majority of the prelates of the Episcopal Church. I cannot either ignore the restrictions imposed by the Church of Rome, and the Bill I have the honour to submit to the consideration of the House, is so framed as to meet the views of all, and respect the prejudices, scruples, and sentiments of everyone. In a mixed community like ours, it is important that the conscience of no one should be disturbed or hurt. In the preparation of the Bill, I have been guided to a great extent by the remarks made by Mr. Gladstone, in 1869, when Mr. Chambers's Bill was under consideration. This eminent statesman said:

"Some twelve or fourteen years ago, I formed the opinion that the fairest course would be to legalise the marriage contracts in question, and legitimise their issue, leaving to each religious community the question of attaching to such marriages a religious character."

This religious character will be kept by making such marriages dependent upon the regulations of the Church celebrating the marriage. My bill reads as follows:—

"1. Marriage between a man and the sister of his deceased wife, or the widow of his deceased brother, shall be legal and valid; provided always, that if in any church or religious body whose ministers are authorised to celebrate marriages any previous dispensation, by reason of such affinity between the parties, be required to give validity to such marriage, the said dispensation shall be first obtained according to the rules and customs of the said church or religious body: Provided also, that it shall not be compulsory for any officiating minister to celebrate such marriage.

"2. All such marriages heretofore contracted as aforesaid are hereby declared valid cases (if any) pending in courts of justice alone excepted."

The Bill has no reference to the celebration of the marriage. We all know that under the Constitutional Act that subject is left to Provincial Legislatures exclusively. You will permit me to close these remarks, more lengthy than I anticipated, but not too long if we consider the importance of the subject, by making a few quotations. The Royal Commissioners, appointed June 28th, 1847, to enquire into the state of the law relating to marriages of affinity say:

"Some persons contend that these marriages are forbidden expressly, or inferentially, by Scripture. If this opinion be admitted cadit questio. But it does not appear from the evidence that this opinion is generally entertained. * * * We do not find that the persons who contract these marriages, and the relations and friends approve them, have a less strong sense than others of religious and moral obligation, or are marked by laxity of conduct. These marriages will take place when a concurrence of circumstances gives rise to mutual attachment; they are not dependant on legislation."

The report is signed by the Bishop of Lichfield, Mr. Stewart Wortley, D. Lashington, Mr. Blake, Mr. Justice Williams and Lord Advocate Rutherford. Lord Palmerston says :

"It seems to me to be established and admitted, that the moral feeling of the community at large is not with this law; that the law, in fact, is not obeyed, and that a great number of persons, not considering themselves to commit any moral offence, do contract marriages which the law prohibits."

Earl Russell says :

"I must say that I have satisfied myself that there is not any religious prohibition of these marriages."

Mr. John Bright, during the debate on Mr. Chambers's Bill, in 1869, said :

"Apart from the consideration of the freedom of the man and woman who propose to marry, this matter is of the greatest importance to the motherless children who are left, and it is notorious beyond dispute, that there have numbers of cases—and there might have been multitudes more if this law had not existed—where a dying mother has hoped that her sister might become, in a nearer sense than as their aunt, the protector and friend of the children whom she was about to leave behind her. Is it not a common thing—I know it is cruel and brutal—to represent in stories and on the stage that step-mothers are not kind to the children they come to take care of. I believe that in the vast majority of cases no statement can be more slanderous than that; but if there be anything in it, surely the woman who comes as an aunt to take charge of the household, and take those children to her bosom, may be free from any charge of the kind, and the husband may look to her with the utmost confidence to discharge the offices of a parent to those who have been bereft of their mother.

"I know men, I know women, married in violation of the existing law, who are looking forward to the result of this debate with an interest which it is utterly impossible that all the debates of this Session can exceed, or even approach, on a question so grave to them, and by your own showing admitting of so much doubt. I think I may entreat this House to give, by an emphatic vote, their sanction to this principle—for it is all I ask—that the common liberty of men and women in this country, in the chief concern of their lives, shall not be interfered with by a law of Parliament which has no foundation in nature, and which, while pretending to sanction from revelation, is, in fact, contrary to its dictates."

I move that the Bill be read the second time.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria) : In seconding the motion, I desire to say a few words in support of the principle of the Bill. There may be matters of detail connected with its phraseology which can better be disposed of elsewhere. But I presume that what we shall have to determine at present is whether the principle of the Bill ought to be favoured by Parliament. I take it for granted that, where a restriction upon marriage or any other right is sought to be maintained the onus of proving a foundation for that restriction rests upon those who are in favour of it. Now, upon what ground is a restriction upon marriage justified? There are two classes of arguments advanced against the Bill—one the religious, and the other the social. The religious argument originally rested upon what is now well settled on indisputable authority to be an entire misconception and misreading of a passage in the Book of Leviticus. That, no doubt, originally formed the foundation upon which the restriction was inserted in the Table of Consanguinity in the Prayer-book of the Church of England. But it is well settled now that that passage, instead of being a prohibition, is no authority, no justification for the restriction. In support of this position, I do not know that it is necessary to do more than refer to the authority of two or three most eminent Hebrew scholars of modern times. The first I shall quote, is Dr. Alexander McCaul, formerly Professor of Hebrew in King's College, London, under whom I had the honour of being a student, and who was recognised in his time as the very highest authority on the Jewish language and the construction of the Bible in Hebrew, of any person except a Jew. He was a brother of Dr. McCaul, of Toronto. Dr. McCaul, of King's College, said :

"Having again carefully examined the question, and consulted some of the highest authorities in Hebrew literature, as to the meaning of the Scripture passages, I am confirmed in the opinion formerly expressed—1st. That marriage with a deceased wife's sister is not only not prohibited, 'either expressly or by implication,' but that, according to Leviticus xviii. 18 (concerning the translation of which there is not the least uncertainty), such marriage is plainly allowed. 2ndly. That this has been the opinion of the Jewish people, from the days of the Septuagint translators, nearly three hundred years before the Christian era, to the present time, as is testified by their greatest authorities, as Onkelos, probably contemporary with our Lord, Rashi, Maimonides, &c.; and, in our own time, those distinguished scholars, Zunz, Furst, Arnheim, Sachs, &c. This conclusion is much strengthened by the fact that in the New Testament there is nothing against it. Our Lord, who strongly condemned the Jews, where their tradition or practice was opposed to the law of God, as in the matter of divorce, has left no trace of disapproval of marriages of this kind. Neither has St. Paul, who, being brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, was intimately acquainted with the laws and practices of his brethren."

It must be admitted, that is very high authority in favour of the position that marriages of this kind are not prohibited by the language of the Old Testament, and that the passage in Leviticus has been misinterpreted. I would also refer, in support of that, to the opinion of Dr. Adler, Chief Rabbi of the Jews, a very eminent Hebrew scholar, who, speaking of marriages of this kind, says :

"It is not only not considered as prohibited, but it is distinctly understood to be permitted, and on this point neither the Divine law, nor the Rabbis, nor historical Judaism, leave room for the least doubt;" and "according to Rabbinical authorities, such marriage is considered proper and even laudable; and where young children are left by the deceased wife, such marriage is allowed to take place within a shorter period from the wife's death than would otherwise be permitted."

Another authority I would refer to, is Professor Max Muller, a distinguished Oriental scholar, who said it was a puzzle to him, how any critic could have supposed the passage in question to prohibit marriage with a deceased wife's sister. I think, therefore, Sir, that we may fairly assume that it is not prohibited by the Old Testament Scriptures, and that the whole prohibition to it is contained in the Prayer-book of the Church of England, or founded upon a misconception that prevailed at the time the Prayer-book was written, in regard to the proper interpretation of that passage. But there is even the very highest authority amongst the Bishops of the Church of England in favour of that same position which I have advanced. No less than twenty-six Bishops of the Church of England, including two Archbishops, have expressly declared that in their opinion marriages of this kind are not prohibited by Scripture. I think, therefore, that it would be idle to further argue the question that there is not any Scriptural prohibition against such marriages. If, then, there is no Scriptural prohibition, upon what other grounds can objection possibly be raised? The only other argument that I have heard of as being advanced against it is that there is some social reason why marriages of this kind are not to be favoured. When the opponents of this Bill are compelled to fall back upon social reasons of that kind, they must be of an overwhelming character in order to be entitled to any weight. They must not be reasons as to which there is a strong difference of opinion. When we remember the numerous authorities in favour of the abolition of this restriction in England; when we find on the roll of names men distinguished for their high sense of morality, and their high position in public opinion, we may fairly assume that there is not that strong social reason against it which ought to sustain us in retaining a prohibition or restriction of this kind. My hon. friend who has moved the second reading of this Bill has dis-somewhat the question of its social expediency. It would be idle perhaps, at this period, after the discussion has proceeded in England for thirty or forty years, to review the arguments upon that point. I am content to rest the case in favour of this Bill on the common sense of the members of this House, who, I am quite sure, in their own experience of life, in their knowledge of human affairs, will not come to the conclusion that there are those overwhelming social reasons against marriages of this kind which ought to justify them in maintaining the restriction which is not founded upon Scripture authority. My hon. friend who has moved this Bill has referred to the state of the law in this country upon it. We have only had one case fore the Courts of Ontario, as far as I am aware, in which the subject has been considered. It was the case of Hodgins vs. McNeil, decided by Vice-Chancellor Esten, in the year 1863, and shows the position of the law as it stood, and still stands, in Ontario. In that case it was decided that the Act of Lord Lyndhurst did not apply to the Colonies, and that, consequently, marriages of this kind were only voidable, and not void, and, unless rendered void during lifetime, the children were legitimate. Inasmuch as the only tribunal by which they could be voided was an Ecclesiastical Court, and as we have no Ecclesiastical Court in Ontario, after death such marriages were lawful and their issue legitimate. Still, that is not the proper position in which the matter, I submit, ought to be placed. If they are only voidable, if there is no Scriptural or moral law against them, I submit the prohibition which rests on no other authority than the Prayer-book of the Church of England ought to be removed, and marriages of this kind ought to be legalised. I understand that objections will be taken by some hon. members in this House to the terms of the Bill, inasmuch as it contains a clause referring to the necessity of obtaining a dispensation in any church in which a dispensation is necessary to the validity of such a marriage. If, by the rules of any particular Church, marriages of any particular kind require a dispensation in order to make them valid according to the laws of the Church, I confess I see no reason why we should interfere and prevent that state of facts continuing. I understand that some objection will be taken to the form of the Bill on the ground that there is, in fact, only one Church in which a dispensation for marriage is known and practised: namely, the Roman Catholic Church, and that it will be placing Roman Catholics in a different position to what the rest of the community are in, and making their marriages subject to the will of higher authorities. I do not know that there is any reason why we should interfere, in any way, with the particular religious or ecclesiastical regulations of the Roman Catholic Church in reference to the question of marriages. Protestant as I am, I confess I have no fear of any harm resulting from the passage of the Bill in its present form. But, inasmuch as I believe my hon. friend who has introduced the Bill intends to move that it be referred to a Select Committee, in order that its provisions may be deliberately considered and made acceptable to the various religious communities in the Dominion, and to the various Provinces and their different marriage laws, any matter of that kind is, I think, a matter of detail, which can more properly be determined upon in a Select Committee than it can be in the House. I take it that we have at present to decide whether the principle of the Bill is one that ought to be accepted or not. In voting in favour of the second reading, we determine nothing more than the principle of the Bill; unless there is something in the Bill which is manifestly wrong, and then it should be rejected in toto. I have, therefore, much pleasure in seconding the motion of my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), for the second reading of this Bill, and I trust that, if any objection of the kind I have referred to is raised, it will be disposed of elsewhere, and that this House will follow the example set by the House of Commons of England, in seven or eight different divisions, which has by large majorities, usually of about 100, voted in favour of the removal of the prohibition in England, which is contrary, I submit, to the enlightenment of the present age.

MR. THOMPSON (Haldiamand): Every day, Mr. Speaker, when you open this House, you invoke the Divine blessing upon our deliberations, and I propose tonight to follow that course which to me seems most in accord with the Divine will. I oppose this Bill from a Scriptural point, on the Divine Law as laid down in Leviticus, chapter 20, verse 21. We are told in the Great Book that we are neither to take away from nor add to one word of it. Notwithstanding the able arguments of the hon. members for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) and North Victoria (Mr. Cameron), I beg to move that this Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read the second time this day six months.

MR. MILLS: I desire to make a few observations on the merits of the Bill before the motion is put. I am rather inclined to support the Bill than the amendment. I confess I do not see the Scriptural objection that presents itself so formidably to the mind of my hon. friend from Haldiamand (Mr. Thompson). I will just say a word or two on what appears to be the popular Scriptural objection. I have a very great deal of respect for those who entertain that view, and who profess to be guided by what they believe to be the law of Moses in this particular. I would just make an observation or two in regard to what the Mosaic Law upon this subject is, as a question of jurisprudence rather than a question of theology. I have examined the subject with some care, and it seems to me that very mistaken notions arise by undertaking to apply particular words and phrases to the conceptions of modern society. If we were to examine with care the construction of ancient society in Palestine, I think we would find that some of the arguments that have been founded on analogy have no applicability in this case. The popular idea seems to be this: because the law of Moses forbids, except in certain cases, marriage with a deceased brother's wife, the deceased brother's wife stands in exactly the same relation as a deceased wife's sister; and that therefore the prohibition which applies to the one case must also apply to the other. Those who have given attention to the early conditions of society know right well that, if you look at society as it exists to-day in some parts of India, or as it existed formerly in Palestine, or in ancient Rome, there were other customs existing and recognised by law than those we recognise at this moment. There was the house and the tribe interposed between what we now call the family and the State. The policy of the law was to save them from obliteration. There were gens or houses in Palestine just as there were in Rome. The woman was a member of the house to which her father belonged, until she married. When two members of particular families were married, the woman was transferred to the house of her husband, and, being so transferred, she was considered a sister to all his brothers. Therefore, upon his death she was not allowed to marry those who by law were her own brothers, members of the house of her deceased husband. This was not at all the case with the deceased wife's sister. If the man belonged to the house of A, and the woman to the house of B, the moment she married she became a member of the house of A, and was excluded upon her husband's death from marrying anyone belonging to the house of A. But her sister remained in the house of B, she was no relation to the house of her deceased sister, and therefore the husband could marry her without legal impediment, there being no legal objection. Now, gentlemen who will pay any attention to the origin of the prohibition that existed under the English Common Law in regard to the exclusion of half-bloods by the rules of inheritance, will find the law was founded on this ancient distinction. Half-brothers by the same mother were no relation to each other under the laws of primitive society, while paternal half-brothers were counted as full brothers as in the case of Jacob's children, whether of wives or servants. For further illustration, let me take the case of a woman in the house of A, who married into the house of B her first husband; her children by this marriage would be of the house of B. For heritable purposes, their kinship is confined to this house. She subsequently marries into the house of C. The children born in the house of C were by law no relation to the house of A, or to the half-bloods of the house of B. These half-brothers were no relation to each other, and one could not inherit from the other. But, where they had a common father, they were recognised as standing in exactly the same relation as whole bloods. It was on this ground that the prohibition applied to the deceased brother's wife, but it had no application to the deceased wife's sister. As long as that condition of society existed, as long as these houses were kept up, as long as property could not pass from one house to another house, or from one tribe to another tribe, either in ancient Rome or in Palestine, the inhibitions continued in force, as in the case of the restrictions upon the marriage of Zelophahad's daughter. They were founded on grounds of public policy, and, when these tribal distinctions ceased to be a matter of public policy, the prohibition ceased along with them. It is therefore perfectly clear that the prohibition which applied to a deceased brother's wife never at any time applied to a deceased wife's sister. The prohibition as to the brother's wife was not based on moral grounds, but on the law of property. It is expressly stated that the man is not to marry the sister of his wife so long as his wife is living, but a brother was absolutely forbidden to marry a deceased brother's wife, unless there were no children born of the marriage. Then the marriage was a matter of obligation, whether the party had a wife of his own or not; and the children born of the marriage were accounted in law the children of their uncle; they inherited the property of their imputed father, and not of their real father. The whole theory of the Mosaic Law, and, indeed, all ancient law of which we have any knowledge, is founded upon conceptions of society to which we, under our western civilisation, are total strangers; and therefore it is absurd, it seems to me, to undertake to make quotations from an ancient system of jurisprudence, relating to a condition of society that has, at this day, no existence, and make them a ground for objecting to a marriage which is perfectly right and proper. If there be any objection to the principle of the Bill, it is that it might throw doubts upon marriages practically valid at this moment. There is no Court in Ontario in which objection can be taken to such marriages as are now under consideration, and they are practically valid; but to remove the possibility of any doubt, I am prepared to support the Bill. There are some provisions in it, however, which do not wholly meet my views. One clause runs thus:

"Provided there be no impediment by affinity between them, according to the rules and customs of the Church, congregation, priest, minister, or officer, celebrating such marriage."

The form in which marriages are to be solemnised is beyond our authority, and therefore a question with which we ought not to deal; but, as to the principle of the measure, I think it is founded in reason and common sense, and so far as the religious objection is concerned, it is one founded on a total misapprehension of ancient law and the policy of the law, a misconception which has arisen from—a failure to study the structure of that society upon which the law operated.

MR. ABBOTT: It is not my intention to discuss marriages of this description from the point of view taken this evening. The Church of England has taken a decided stand against marriages of this kind. The Church of England has taken one side on this question, and the Nonconformists take the other, for the latter do not raise any objection to marriage with a deceased wife's sister. Similar differences of opinion exist here in regard to the religious view of the subject. But no such considerations should move us. As I see no physical objection, and in fact no objection but one derived from a religious source, I think it is better in a mixed community, such as ours, that people should be left to the free exercise of their opinions. The laws should deal with it only as it concerns public policy. It is impossible to assert that there is any question of public policy opposed to the marriage of a man with his deceased wife's sister. Physically, there can be no objection. Socially, objections have been made; but these have been rather of a character appealing to good taste than to any important principle. In that respect also, therefore, the question whether a man may marry the sister of his deceased wife should be left to himself, and the question should be decided according to his conscience and his good taste. And, there being no reason of public policy against it, I would be disposed to make such a marriage free, and vote for the Bill. At the same time, though I understand this Bill is to be left to a Committee, which will settle the details—it is not inappropriate to draw attention to some of its provisions which appear to be inconsistent with the general principle of the measure, and the arguments made use of in support of that principle by my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard). If it be right and proper that marriage with a deceased wife's sister should be free, then why place it under the control of any Church to say whether or not, in any particular case, a member of that Church shall be allowed to have the benefit of the proposed Bill? In the Church of England it is absolutely prohibited, and in the Catholic Church, although I do not know what rule they have regarding it, I think it is illegal as well as in the English Church. The obvious effect of the clause will be that the right to marry a deceased wife's sister will not be free but left to the decision of a Church or clergyman, and from the way in which the Bill is framed it would not only be impossible for a member of a Church whose clergy were opposed to a marriage of that kind to marry without a dispensation, but it would be impossible for a man belonging to such a Church to go to some other minister or clergyman to be married. A man who belongs to a Church which regards it as an absolute impediment will, by the wording of the Bill, be debarred altogether from contracting such a marriage. It is inconsistent with the arguments in favour of the principle of the Bill that the right should be restricted by any authority. The marriage should either be legal or illegal; and this House should pronounce whether these marriages should or should not be permitted in future. There is another detail to which it is important to call the attention of the House or the Committee: the second clause makes all such marriages, in the past valid. That is an objectionable provision; the principle involved—the retroactive operation of the clause—is objectionable. I do not think there should be retroactive legislation in matters of this kind or in fact in matters of any other description. The hon. gentleman has cited the English Act of 1835 as a kind of precedent, but that Act does not seem to me to establish any precedent for the retroactive clause introduced into the present Bill. Previously to 1835, as I understand, the marriage of a man with his deceased wife's sister was voidable only during the lives of both parties; but after the death of either party it could not be declared void; and the Act of 1835 simply rendered such marriages valid, or rather confirmed the validity of such marriages, they being actually valid at the time. The marriages affected by this particular clause of the Act of 1835 being merely voidable, my hon. friend will perceive that that provision could do no harm; it could take away no vested rights; but the clause now proposed by my hon. friend might take away vested rights. It might take away from the children of the first wife some of the rights which had become vested in them, and give them to the children of the second wife. Up to the time of the passage of this Bill, any rights that have vested in, or accrued to the children of a deceased wife, by reason of their legitimacy, should not be taken away by retroactive legislation; and any such retroaction should at least be restricted to the cases where both the parties are alive. I presume these subjects will receive the attention of the Committee. I shall vote for the second reading of the Bill, and, when the report of the Committee comes up, these details can be fully discussed.

Mr. BLAKE: I coincide with the view that the Scriptural argument is based on a misconception of that passage in the Bible which has given rise to it, and to a mistaken application of the rule supposed to be laid down to the modern states and conditions of society, which are different from those of that ancient date. I do not think any weight is to be attached to that argument. The existence of such an argument, however, seems to have had some weight with the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) who thinks that consideration renders it proper that we should create some restrictions upon the right to marry in these cases. To the social argument I attach more importance. I do not think it is reduced merely, as the member for Argenteuil says, to a question of taste. There is to my mind a much more serious question growing out of the relations between the husband and his wife's sister domiciled in his family during the lifetime of his wife. But, though I have hesitated on this, I have come to the conclusion that there is not enough to render it right for us to forbid such marriages. Therefore, had this Bill been simply a Bill to authorise marriage between a man and the sister of his deceased wife, I should feel disposed to give it my support. But I could not support it beyond this stage in its present shape; and I think it not inopportune that a discussion is raised at this time by some hon. gentlemen, not, perhaps, to the principle of the Bill, but to some of the provisions. We do not know whether or not there will be a Select Committee upon it. We do not know what may be the report of such a Committee, or whether there will be a fair opportunity of discussion here at the late date at which the measure may return to us; and, at any rate, there should be, in a matter of this kind, discussion on at least two separate stages. I may say that I concur in the objection of the hon. member from Argenteuil (Mr. Abbott) to the conditions proposed to be attached to this Bill, on the ground he stated, and for the additional reason that it is not within the scope of the authority of this Parliament to deal with the solemnisation of marriage as is in effect proposed. We have within the British North America Act two provisions upon the subject of marriage. "Marriage and Divorce" are left exclusively to the Canadian Parliament; the solemnisation of marriage is left exclusively to the Provincial Legislatures. When the Confederation Resolutions were under discussion, in the old Canadian Parliament, the language was not the same; there was no grant of power to the Local Legislatures in reference to the solemnisation of marriage. Some anxiety being felt in reference to this subject, enquiries were made of the Government, and the hon. the Minister of Public Works, then Solicitor-General, gave, on behalf of the Government, the following explanations :—

“The word ‘Marriage’ has been placed in the draft of the proposed Constitution, to invest the Federal Parliament with the right of declaring what marriages shall be held and deemed to be valid throughout the whole extent of the Confederacy, without, however, interfering in any particular with the doctrines or rights of the religious creeds to which the contracting parties may belong.”

He proceeded to declare that the whole effect of the clause was to give power to decide that marriages contracted in any one Province, according to the laws of that Province, should be valid in the other Provinces, though their laws might be different, in case the parties came to reside there; and again he stated that when a marriage is contracted in any Province, contrary to its laws, though in conformity with the laws of another Province, it will not be considered valid. He subsequently assured the House that the resolutions contained only the principle of the Bill to be carried in the Imperial Parliament, which would be drawn up in accordance with the interpretation he had already put upon the clause. Mr. Dorion asked :

“Will a Local Legislature have the right of declaring a marriage between parties not professing the same religious belief invalid?”

Attorney-General Cartier replied :

“Has not the Legislature of Canada now the power of legislating in that matter, and yet has it ever thought of legislating in that way?”

Such was the explanation at that time given, from which it is obvious that a very limited power was intended to be conferred on this Parliament. The British North America Act passed, and subsequently, in the year 1869, with reference to a Bill of one of the Local Legislatures, for conferring upon the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province the power to issue marriage licenses, in his report upon that Bill, the then Minister of Justice pointed out that two questions arose. The first question is not very material; as to the second he says :

“The second question as to where the power of legislation on the subject rests has excited much interest in Canada, and conflicting opinions exist with respect to it. The power given to the Local Legislatures to legislate on the solemnisation of marriage was, it is understood, inserted in the Act at the instance of the representatives of Lower Canada, who, as Roman Catholics, desired to guard against the passage of an Act legalising civil marriages without the intervention of a clergyman and the performance of the religious rite. They therefore desired that the Legislature of each Province should deal with this portion of the law of marriage. The Act must, however, of course, be construed according to its terms, and not according to the assumed intention of its framers. The undersigned is of opinion that the right to legislate respecting the authority to marry, whether by publication of banns, by license, or by episcopal dispensation, is part of the general law of marriage, respecting which the Parliament of Canada has exclusive jurisdiction. The publication of banns, or the license, as the case may be, is no part of the solemnisation, it is merely the authority to solemnise. The solemnisation is not commenced by the issue of the license or the publication of the banns; all the English Marriage Acts treat the authority, and the solemnisation, under the authority, as quite different matters. Thus, it is provided, in Geo. IV. chap. 76, sections 9 and 19, that ‘Whenever a marriage shall not be had within three months after publication of banns, or the granting of license, no minister shall proceed to the solemnisation of such marriage until a new license shall have been obtained, or a new publication of banns had,’ and, by the 21st section, the solemnisation of marriages without due publication of banns, or license of marriage, is made a felony. In order to convict a person under this clause, it must be alleged and proved that the solemnisation was not only commenced, but completed, and, if the license or banns were a necessary portion of the solemnisation, the offence would never be completed without them. The subsequent Marriage Acts seem to draw the same distinction between the authority and the solemnisation. The undersigned is therefore of opinion that this reserved Act is beyond the jurisdiction of the Local Legislature, and should not receive the assent of Your Excellency. As this subject is one of the very greatest importance, affecting the validity of marriages, past and future, the undersigned would suggest that the Colonial Minister be requested to submit the two questions above raised to the Law Officers of the Crown for their opinion.”

"The Law Officers are disposed to concur with the Minister in his views of the first question stated by him, but they are unable to concur in his opinion that the authority to grant marriage licenses is now vested in the Governor-General of Canada, and that the power of legislating on the subject of marriage licenses is solely in the Parliament of the Dominion. It appears to them that the power of legislating upon the subject is conferred on the Provincial Legislatures by 31 and 32 Vic., cap. 3, section 92, under the words 'the solemnisation of marriage in the Province.' The phrase 'the laws respecting the solemnisation of marriages in England' occurs in the preamble of the Marriage Act, 4 Geo. IV, cap. 76, an Act which is very largely concerned with matters relating to banns and licenses, and this is therefore a strong authority to show that the same words used in the British North America Act, 1867, were intended to have the same meaning. 'Marriage and Divorce' which by the 91st section of the same Act are reserved to the Parliament of the Dominion, signify, in their opinion, all matters relating to the status of marriage, between what persons, and under what circumstances it shall be created, and (if at all) destroyed. There are many reasons of convenience and sense, why one law as to the status of marriage shall exist throughout the Dominion, which have no application as regards the uniformity of the procedure whereby that status is created or evidenced. Convenience, indeed, and reason would seem alike in favour of a difference of procedure being allowable in Provinces differing so widely in external and internal circumstances, as those of which the Dominion is composed, and of permitting the Provinces to settle their own procedure for themselves; and they are of opinion that this permission has been granted to the Provinces by the Imperial Parliament, and that the New Brunswick Legislature was competent to pass the Bill in question."

That opinion was acted upon, the Act was not disallowed, and other similar Acts have since been permitted to go into operation. Now it appears to me that the view taken by the law officers was correct. I do not see any other intelligible line. I do not see that we are invested with anything more than the power to decide the status of marriage, and between what persons and under what circumstances the contract of marriage may be created. I presume that the hon. the Minister of Public Works will agree that this view of our powers, though broader than what he indicated at Quebec, is nearer to his view, and more reasonable than that of the former Minister of Justice. As I read the passages to which I have alluded, it was in contemplation at Quebec that the Local Legislatures should have authority to deal with the bulk of the matters here mentioned, and it was simply reserved to this Parliament to determine whether marriages good in one Province should be good in all the Provinces. More is given by the British North America Act, more, much more is given by the opinion of the law officers to this Parliament, than the hon. the Minister of Public Works expected, but not so much as his colleague claimed. I believe, however, that the true line has been found. Now, it is entirely inconsistent with the existence of any such line to insert in this Bill some of the provisions it contains. We cannot provide as to banns, dispensations, or licenses, preliminaries to the solemnisation of marriage. Contrary to the contention of the hon. the Minister of Justice, the right to legislate on these subjects was held in 1869 to reside in the Local Legislatures, and that view has been accepted for eleven or twelve years. We are now called upon to deal with the question, because the question of expediency is another and a subsequent point. If we have not the power to legislate as the hon. gentleman proposes, then the question of expediency will not arise. I believe we have not the power, and that it belongs to the Local Legislature to decide by what means marriage between those persons between whom marriage may, under the general law, be lawfully contracted, shall be contracted. Now, a serious question may arise, should a Local Legislature thwart the provisions of a general law, by declining to provide means for the solemnisation of marriages between particular classes of persons who are lawfully entitled to marry. It is obvious that, if we have not, as in fact we have not, any power to prescribe how marriages shall be solemnised, we have no power to give effect to our declaration that it shall be lawful to contract marriages between any two classes of persons. It is for the Local Legislature, in some shape, to render that possible which the Federal Parliament has declared to be lawful. And there may be a defect in our system which may lead to serious difficulties. But it is unnecessary, perhaps, to deal with such a possibility before the occasion arises. We are at present concerned only with the question as to where the power rests, and I maintain that it is an infringement on the powers of the Local Legislatures to attempt to make any provision connected with the solemnisation of the marriage, whether it be preliminary to or whether it accompanies the act. Now there is one of these provisos that is clearly wrong, that which provides that it shall not be compulsory on any officiating minister to celebrate such a marriage. If the Local Legislature alone is to determine who is to celebrate marriage, it may determine that marriage may be celebrated civilly; it may not give power to any minister of any church to celebrate any marriage; it may determine that marriages should be celebrated by one class of ministers alone; it may declare that all marriages may be celebrated, no matter what the religion of the contracting parties be, by any lawful minister of any Christian denomination; it may decide that it shall not be compulsory on any minister of any faith to celebrate any marriage; it may make it obligatory on all authorised persons to celebrate all marriages. It may make all sorts of provisions. It is able to meet the difficulty raised by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, as to the objections of a minister to celebrate marriage between these classes. I believe, as he has said, that such objections are largely shared by my spiritual pastors and masters. Now the Local Legislature may, if it deems fit, respect this scruple by such a clause as I am discussing. But we have no such right, and it would be eminently imprudent for us, in my opinion, to attempt to interfere with the solemnisation of marriage. If I have established that it belongs to the Local Legislature to say who shall solemnise marriage, I have established also that it belongs to the Local Legislature to say whether that shall be a duty or a power, imperative or obligatory, compulsory or optional. Therefore I think we have no power to pass this proviso, which declares that, if, in any Church or religious body, whose minister is authorised to celebrate marriages, any dispensation be required, for such a marriage, the dispensation shall be first obtained. I concur cordially in the view of the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Abbott). For my part I believe nothing is of greater consequence with respect to this contract, which is the foundation of law, of society, and of the whole social fabric—nothing is of greater consequence, than certainty. I am wholly indisposed to any provision of law which may make of doubtful validity a marriage which the Parliament of Canada has declared may be lawfully contracted. But we are not called upon, in my opinion, to do so, and I think this subject is improperly intruded upon our notice; because, I say again, we should be trenching, in passing this provision on Local powers; though I agree that the simple right to declare whether the marriage shall be good may embrace a power in us to declare that it should be good between some and bad between others of the same class. But how inexpedient is this. What a degree of uncertainty we would be introducing into the law? To require in the case of every marriage a decision what is the religion of the parties; whether or not the law or custom of the Church requires a dispensation; and, if so, whether the dispensation has been properly obtained, and to require proof of all these things in order to make the marriages valid. I agree also with the view that this clause is obscure. I cannot clearly construe it. We know the questions that have arisen under the Quebec Code; we know the hon. gentleman's opinion of the meaning of the Code; we know that the view entertained by many in the Province of Quebec is that, where the parties are of one faith, it is lawful only for a minister of the Church to which those parties belong to celebrate their marriage. Nay, more, that this is lawful only for the curé of one or other of the parties where both are Roman Catholics. In the case of mixed marriages, from the necessity of the case, a more liberal interpretation has been given, and it is admitted that the marriage may be celebrated by a minister of the Church to which either of the parties belongs, but it is contended that the marriage, for example, of two Roman Catholics by a minister of the Presbyterian, or of the Anglican Church, is, according to the law of Lower Canada, invalid. Then with reference to this particular Bill, as affecting the Roman Catholics, we know that the Code has placed upon them in this particular a disability to which the hon. gentleman very much objects. There is no doubt, I think, at all, that, under the Code, those prohibitions, which are subject to dispensations, do not include this particular prohibition, which is absolute. I think, therefore, according to the laws of Quebec, at this moment, notwithstanding a Papal dispensation, which is, under the rules of the Roman Catholic Church, essential to the validity of such a marriage, such a marriage is absolutely void. We know also that the law of Quebec, as it has been interpreted in some cases, and as it is contended for now, is of a character which I think it would be very difficult to persuade this House, or any other Legislature, to adopt. We know that it has been decided in one case, at any rate, in Quebec, that, upon any question as to the validity of a marriage, there must be a reference to the episcopal authority; that, unless and until the episcopal authority shall pronounce the marriage to be void, the Civil Court cannot do so; but it can act only after the decision, and according to the decision, of the episcopal authority. So that, according to the law of that Province, as it has been interpreted in one case, and as it is contended for to-day, the question whether a marriage celebrated by a Presbyterian clergyman between two Roman Catholics is valid is to be referred to and decided by the Roman Catholic Bishop, whose decree is to be necessarily followed and effectuated by the Civil Court. It is contended that the decision of the Civil Court on the construction of the Statute with reference to the validity of the marriage is dependent upon the decision of the Bishop. Now, that is a state of things which it is not at all likely will be introduced by Parliament throughout Canada. It is not easy to maintain that all these questions should be raised, that all these difficulties should be created by the introduction of these provisos, when an easy mode of relieving the Legislature from their consideration is to be found in eliminating them from this Act, and leaving the Local Legislatures to deal, so far as they can, with the subject, by making laws as to the solemnisation of marriage. I do not well understand the meaning of this proviso. I do not know whether it means that the parties are to be married only by a minister of the Church to which they may belong; I do not know whether it means that a dispensation is to be required where the faith of the parties themselves requires it, or where the faith of the minister who celebrates the marriage requires it. I do not know what is to be done when the faith of one party requires, while that of the other does not require, a dispensation. Supposing it were determined by the Anglican Church, in any Province, that such marriages were not permissible at all, no dispensations being obtainable in that Church; consequently, would it be possible for members of that Church to marry? I think that these and other questions are best got rid of here by eliminating these clauses. Else these difficulties will, I venture to say, defeat the hon. gentleman's attempt to procure this legislation. Then the hon. gentleman proposes that all such marriages heretofore contracted are to be declared valid, although these marriages may be absolutely void in the Province in which they have been contracted. Now, under such circumstances, either or both of the parties may have contracted another marriage. What is to be done in that case? Supposing a legal marriage has been contracted by the so-called husband or the so-called wife, what is their position after the passage of the hon. gentleman's Bill? Why, by the law proposed by the hon. gentleman, the void marriage being validated, the subsequent nuptials are made void, of course, and the parties who had formed new ties find these broken and the old ones joined again. What is to be the course in a case which is not pending, but has already been disposed of, such as that to which I refer, one with which the hon. gentleman is familiar, that of Vallaincourt and Lafontaine, in which the marriage was adjudged to be void some years ago? Is that marriage to be revived again? It seems to me that these considerations are to be added to those which the hon. member for Argenteuil suggested with reference to the rights of property. I think it is a different thing to declare these marriages valid, in cases in which they are only voidable, from declaring them valid in cases in which, by the law as in Quebec, they are absolutely void. I am then of the opinion that these provisos are in large measure beyond our powers, and so far as they may be within our powers are highly inexpedient, and on both these grounds I contend that this Bill should pass with only the first part of the first clause, and that all the rest of it should be struck out, body composed as this is, of Protestants and Catholics, to deal satisfactorily with question of marriage. The principles upon which Protestant opinions rest with regard to this question, differ in many respects very widely indeed from the principles by which Catholics are governed. That very dispensing power which some hon. gentlemen seem to regard with so much disfavour is the great protection which Catholics have in matters of this kind. The social feelings are offended by such marriages as those of a man with his deceased wife's sister, or a woman with the brother of a deceased husband. It cannot be denied that the feeling is strong that such marriages should be discountenanced as much as possible, that possibly great social evils would arise, were the impression to go abroad that such marriages were not merely tolerated, but were, under all circumstances, unobjectionable. The Catholic Church regards them as highly objectionable, and forbids them, but not absolutely, reserving to its highest authority, and to that alone—I believe, in most instances, to the Pope himself—the power to issue a dispensation in such cases, and such a dispensation is issued only where circumstances seem absolutely to require it. As a matter of fact, I suppose it is known to all hon. members in this House that, though such a dispensing power does exist, it has been but rarely exercised in this country, and it is not very frequently exercised in any other country. Now, Protestants of the various Churches having no such balancing power, so to speak, as this, are compelled to find in the Statute Law of the country that protection against social disorders which they apprehend from the frequency of such marriages. It therefore becomes an exceedingly difficult question, one of the most difficult it is possible to deal with. The hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Abbott) seemed to think that no such dispensing power does exist in the Catholic Church, and that Catholics do not regard the Church as having any such power, or think that it should not be exercised. In that he is mistaken. The power exists and has existed from the first, but it is exercised only under highly exceptional circumstances. My impressions are that the hon. member for West Durham (Mr.

Blake) is mistaken in his views of the law relating to marriage, when he argues that it is for the Local Legislatures to say whether this proviso with regard to dispensation should or should not become the law of the land; he misunderstands, I think, what is meant by dispensation in the cases to which he referred. He quoted to us the opinion of a former Minister of Justice, and the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown with regard to the rights of the Dominion Parliament and Local Legislatures in this matter. To summarise that opinion, as I understood him, it amounts to this: that we have here, and that we alone, according to the British North America Act, have the right to declare what persons may be married one to the other; but in all that relates to the mode and manner of the solemnisation of marriage, and the conditions under which it shall be solemnised, the Local Legislatures alone have the power to legislate. Well, Sir, taking that to be perfectly correct, as I believe it is, we find that, in speaking of dispensation, the hon. gentleman does not seem quite to understand it. There the license issued by a Bishop in the Catholic Church, by the proctors or agents of Bishops of the Church of England in the Old Country, and by the officers appointed under the power of the Local Legislatures in this country, is spoken of and regarded as a dispensation, but it is a dispensation which relieves the parties from one of the requirements of the law, with regard to the solemnisation of marriage, that of the publication of banns, and, therefore, such dispensation can only be granted and regulated by the Local Legislatures. It is a dispensation with regard to the mode and manner of solemnisation. On the other hand, the dispensation mentioned in this Bill is a dispensation which affects the position of the individuals one towards the other. We claim the right of saying what persons shall be married one to another, such a dispensation as that which permits the brother of a deceased husband to be married to the widow, etc. we only can authorise or grant according to law. There is a wide distinction between these two forms of dispensation, which, I think, the hon. member for West Durham has not perceived. I was rather surprised that, being always so clear and perspicuous, he didnot perceive this distinction. Perhaps he does not yet agree with me, and then I am mistaken. My impression is clear that the dispensation which affects merely the relation of one person to the other, which removes any objection as to the one person marrying the other, is a dispensation with which we have a legal right to deal ; while any dispensation as to the mode of solemnisation, a dispensation, for instance, from the jurisdiction of Courts, is a dispensation with which the Local Legislatures have got to deal. I think it is well that we have had this discussion to-night, and it would be well to have further discussion on this important matter before it is finally disposed of. Some suggestions have been made that this Bill should be referred to a Special Committee to deal with. But I think it would be better for the hon. mover of the Bill, with the consent of the House, to move the adjournment of the debate, and let us, when convenient, take it up for further consideration. Some hon. members on both sides of the House seem to think that there is no social objection whatever to the passage of such a measure. I am satisfied that a great many other hon. members differ widely from that view ; that even those who do not think the religious objection to be valid are, notwithstanding, strongly of opinion on other grounds that it is not desirable to encourage the formation of alliances of this kind. The learned discussions respecting the meaning of that particular passage in the Scriptures I think the Catholics are willing to leave entirely to the hon. gentlemen belonging to the Church of England, and to others, to settle among themselves. For us, all that is simply a matter of literary curiosity. We hear now that, for centuries, there has been a great mistake as to the meaning of that particular passage ; that later commentators, men who have acquired a more profound knowledge of the Hebrew, or the Syriac, to-day declare that the old translation, and consequently the interpretation of that particular passage of the Holy Scriptures, was founded on an erroneous idea of the meaning of the words used in the original. That may be quite correct, but that does not at all affect us in arriving at a decision upon this subject. I speak, of course, of the Catholic members of the House. The whole matter is an exceedingly difficult one to deal with. I am satisfied many hon. gentlemen in this House feel a strong objection to passing any Act of Parliament, the operation of which will be made dependent on the decision of ecclesiastics of any particular Church or denomination. We quite understand how strong an objection they may have to that, and I think that we ought to discuss the matter in every point of view in this House. The Bill is a very short one, but it is one of the most important in its character and consequences that has been submitted to this Parliament since its creation.

MR. HOUDE moved the adjournment of the debate.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : I think the hon. gentleman is quite right in moving the adjournment of the debate. It is a matter of great importance, and our attention has been called to so many interesting considerations that it is well to take time to think them over and consider them on another occasion.

Motion agreed to and Debate adjourned.

House adjourned at Thirty-five minutes after

Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, 1st March, 1880.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time :—

Bill (No. 45) To incorporate the Great Western Telegraph Company of Canada.—(Mr. Ryan, Marquette.)

Bill (No. 46) To incorporate the Winnipeg and Hudson's Bay Railroad and Steamship Company.—(Mr. Bannerman.)

Bill (No. 47) Respecting the Great Western and Lake Ontario Shore Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Carling.)

PRIVATE BILLS.

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were severally read the second time :—

Bill (No. 39) To incorporate the Montreal and Province Line Railway Company.—(Mr. Scriver)

Bill (No. 40) To incorporate the Mail Printing Company.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

INSPECTION OF SMOKED HERRING.

QUESTION.

MR. LONGLEY enquired, Whether the inspection of smoked herring is compulsory; and, if so, whether it is the intention of the Government to enforce the law; what is the actual inspection fee to be charged per box; what proportion of the boxes are required to be inspected?

MR. BABY: It is compulsory wherever there is an inspector. The party aggrieved can make complaint if he is not satisfied. There is no inspection fee by the box, but only by the barrel and half barrel.

NOVA SCOTIA—WEIGHTS AND MEASURES INSPECTORS.

QUESTION.

MR. MACDONNELL (Inverness) enquired, Whether Inspectors of Weights and Measures have been appointed for the different districts in the Province of Nova Scotia, and who the inspectors for the said districts respectively are?

MR. BABY: The Province of Nova Scotia has been divided into four districts, Halifax, Pictou, Yarmouth, and Cape Breton. The following gentlemen have been appointed:—R. M. King, inspector for Halifax, and P. Tompkins as his assistant; Charles Allison, for Yarmouth; L. E. Lemain, for Cape Breton. The inspector for Pictou has not yet been appointed.

NEW BRUNSWICK—MILITIA DRILL CAMPS.

QUESTION.

MR. CONNELL enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to establish Drill Camps this year, in New Brunswick, for the Militia.

MR. MASSON: It is not the intention of the Government to establish Brigade Camps this year. The Government, however, will encourage the formation of Battalion Camps, as they did last year.

SHELBURNE—HARBOUR AT STONY ISLAND.

QUESTION.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make any appropriation towards the erection of a breakwater, or the making of a harbour at Stony Island, Shelburne county, during the present year.

MR. LANGEVIN: There is no intention on the part of the Government to expend any money at present for that purpose.

ROCHE BAY PIER.

QUESTION.

MR. ROGERS enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to expend a sum of money this year to complete the building of the pier in Roche Bay, at Anderson's Hollow.

MR. LANGEVIN: This matter had the attention of the Government last year, but we were not in a position to do anything then. The matter is still under the consideration of the Government.

L'ASSOMPTION RIVER NAVIGATION.

QUESTION.

MR. HURTEAU enquired, Whether the Government intend to complete, during the course of next summer, the work remaining to be done on the River L'Assomption, so as to render it navigable as far as the village of L'Assomption.

MR. LANGEVIN: The Government intend to continue the work.

CODIFICATION OF CRIMINAL LAWS.

QUESTION.

MR. PERRAULT enquired, Whether the Government intends to introduce, during the present Session, measures respecting the codification of the Laws and of the procedure in criminal matters.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): It is not the intention of the Government to introduce any such measure this Session.

PORT CREDIT HARBOUR REPAIR.

QUESTION.

MR. ELLIOTT enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place a sum in the Estimates, this Session, to repair the Port Credit Harbour.

MR. LANGEVIN: It does not appear that this harbour is Government property, and the Government do not see their way clear to undertake the work at present.

HALIFAX SUGAR REFINERY—FREE ADMISSION OF MATERIAL.

QUESTION.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) enquired, Whether the Government have made any promise to admit materials and machinery for the construction of any sugar refinery at Halifax free of duty; and if so, whether such advantage will be open to all similar establishments.

MR. BOWELL: The Government has not made any promise to admit material and machinery for the construction of a sugar refinery at Halifax free of duty, and consequently no such advantage will be open to others. Duty will have to be paid upon all machinery imported for such enterprises.

QUEBEC—NEW STATION HOUSES.

QUESTION

MR. LANDRY enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to cause to be erected, next spring, railway station-houses at St. François, Rivière du Sud; St. Pierre, Rivière du Sud; and Cap St. Ignace, and to repair the station at St. Thomas.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I have made enquiry in reference to this matter, and as soon as the information is received I will inform the hon. gentleman what is intended to be done.

RELIEF OF THE DISTRESS IN IRELAND.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A Message was received from the Senate, acquainting this House that they have agreed to the Address to His Excellency the Governor-General on the subject of the relief of the present great distress in Ireland, by filling up the blank with the words "Senate and."

THE LATE ACCIDENT TO THE VICE- REGAL PARTY.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A Message was received from the Senate, acquainting this House that they have passed an Address to His Excellency the Governor-General of congratulation on the escape of Her Royal Highness the Princess Louise and of His Excellency from the serious danger occasioned by the untoward accident which happened to them on the evening of Saturday, the 14th of February last.

Ordered, That the said Message and Address be taken into consideration to-morrow.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—BRANCH RAILWAY TO CAMPBELLTON.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. HACKETT moved for an Order of the House for all petitions and other correspondence from the people of Campbellton, Prince County, Prince Edward Island, asking for the construction of a branch line of railway to that place. He said: About one year ago, the people of Campbellton forwarded a petition to the hon. the Minister of Railways asking for increased railway accommodation. Persons acquainted with the locality know that Campbellton is situated on the west side of the Island, and the people living in that section are subject to great loss, owing to their not possessing proper facilities for getting the product of their labour to market. There is not a harbour on that coast for a distance of thirty or forty miles, and farmers and others are compelled to haul their produce to market, a distance of ten or fifteen miles. This is due to the fact that the railway did not afford them the accommodation that it should. The railway was constructed at the proper cost of the people of Prince Edward Island, the inhabitants of Campbellton contributing their share, but up to the present time it is of little or no benefit to them. The proposed branch would only require to be about three miles in length. It would traverse a level country and could be built very cheaply. The old iron rails taken from other parts of the line would do for this branch, and no additional rolling stock would be required. The proper material for ballasting can be had on the spot, so that the only expense will be grading and track laying. I hope the hon. the Minister of Railways will attend to the prayer of this petition, and give the required accommodation to these people. I can congratulate the hon. the Minister of Railways upon the success that attended the working of the Island Railway during the past year, under the able superintendence of Mr. MacNab, who is a diligent and painstaking official. The road is progressing most favourably, and, at the present time, is giving more and better accommodation to the public than it ever did before. I believe there will be a large reduction in the expenditure this year, and I hope that, in a short time, with good management and proper economy, the large deficit we have had for the last few years, in connection with the Prince Edward Island Railway, will entirely disappear. It is my opinion that, if the rates for freight and passengers were reduced, the receipts from the road would be much larger than they are at present. Many of the Island products are bulky and heavy, and cannot be moved over the railway under the present Tariff. I trust that some action will be taken with regard to this branch, and that the people of Campbellton will have justice done them.

MR. YEO: I agree with what my hon. colleague from Prince County has said about the branch line to Campbellton. The harbour accommodation of that part of the coast of the Island is very insufficient and capable of improvement. A railway is the only convenience that can be extended to the farmers and fishermen of that part of Prince Edward Island. At present, they are at a considerable distance from the railway, and at the shipping seasons the highroads are so greatly cut up with the traffic upon them as to be almost impassable. Much is lost every year by those engaged in the fisheries for want of greater facilities of conveying their fish to market. A branch road could be easily and cheaply built to Campbellton. It need not be longer than three miles, and the country is so level that it offers no engineering difficulties whatever. The branch would also be useful in supplying the main line of railway with ballast, as it would lead to one of the very few gravel beds to be found on the Island. There is plenty of good building stone in the neighbourhood required for railroad construction and repairs, and timber for sleepers, which is getting scarce in many parts of the Province, is still to be had in abundance in the district through which the road would run. For that and other reasons I believe that the Campbellton branch line would be a good feeder to the main line, and would be such an advantage to it in other ways that in a short time it would repay the expense of construction. I hope that the Government will give the matter their serious consideration, and see their way clear to commence the work at an early day.

INDIAN TREATIES FOUR AND SIX— PAYMENT OF ANNUITIES.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

MR. MILLS moved for an Order of the House for a statement of the times fixed for payment of annuities under Treaties Nos. 4 and 6, during the current year; when payment was actually made; amount paid for freighting; amount claimed by freighters still unpaid; the amount expended in feeding the Indians at the various places of payment; and the amount paid for supplies purchased from the Hudson's Bay Company to feed the Indians, before the arrival of the supplies tendered for; and the amount paid for supplies since, in consequence of famine among the Indians. He said: I make this motion because I observed that the hon. gentleman, not many months before the meeting of Parliament, attributed to me an attitude of "meddlesome oversight" in regard to this matter, and that he had conducted the business much more wisely and efficiently since his accession to power. I am informed on what I believe to be good authority—but at any rate the returns will show whether or not I am misinformed—that the hon. gentleman exercised that "meddlesome oversight" which he attributed to me. At any rate, there appears to have been a case of mistaken identity in the statement the hon. gentleman made. The returns I believe will show that he interfered with the letting of the contracts for supplies and freighting; that the supplies did not arrive in time; that the Indians assembled and had to be fed for days and weeks; that supplies were bought in the meantime at the Hudson's Bay Company's posts and that this was the main cause of expense attributed to famine. But the returns will show who exercised the "meddlesome oversight."

Motion agreed to.

PARLIAMENT GROUNDS—CLAIM OF CALVERT VAUX.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. DOMVILLE: I desire to get before the House certain plans and correspondence in connection with the claim of Calvert Vaux, who designed the grounds in front of the public buildings, and from which it will be seen that his ideas have been carried out to the letter. Although his claims were presented in 1873, by some mistake or difficulty nothing has come of them yet. I move for an Order of the House for all plans, correspondence, papers, and telegrams in connection with the unpaid claim of Calvert Vaux for services rendered in respect to the grounds in front of the Parliament Buildings.

MR. MACKENZIE: The term "unpaid claims" is not quite correct. Mr. Vaux gave a sketch of the plan upon which he would lay out the grounds in front of the Parliament House to Mr. Scott, the chief architect, who was not authorised to enter into any arrangement with him. But, having adopted the general plan—not the whole of it and no details—it was decided to pay him what it was worth, and he was paid the rather large sum of $500, which I consider a liberal compensation. We declined to pay him $1,500 on the ground that no such amount was earned.

MR. DOMVILLE: I regret that in the opinion of the hon. member for Lambton my statements should always be incorrect; but I believe they are correct on this occasion also. In May, 1874, Calvert Vaux received a letter from the Department, stating his plans were received, and enclosing him a cheque for $500, and stating the Government did not intend to carry out his design. He was paid that sum for his trouble, on the understanding that his plans should not be carried out, and had they not been, I might perhaps agree with the hon. member for Lambton that Mr. Vaux had been well paid. Later, Mr. Vaux addressed a letter to the Public Work's Department, stating he learned that his plans had been carried out in every detail, and that he should be paid in full for his services, according to the correspondence that had taken place, his claims and plans having been sent to the Department with a schedule of prices attached. The papers will prove my assertions correct, notwithstanding the contradiction of the hon. member for Lambton. Mr. Vaux has a right to fair remuneration for his services.

MR. MACKENZIE: I have simply stated the facts as they occurred. It was not I but my predecessor in the office who had the communications with Mr. Vaux. His so-called plan was a mere sketch for approval, and nothing further was ever asked from this New York architect, whom we deemed it inadvisable to employ when we had an able architect here in the Department.

MR. LANGEVIN: I do not remember having had anything to do with Mr. Vaux. By allowing the motion to pass, we shall not bind the Government, or say the claim is good or bad. I know nothing of the merits of the case, but think it only fair to investigate the case, should such be desired.

Motion agreed to.

LOBSTER CANNING—DRAWBACKS ON EXPORTED TIN PLATE.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. OGDEN, in moving for an Order of the House for a return of all correspondence between Isaac H. Mathers, of Halifax, N.S., and the Government, upon the subject of drawbacks on tin-plate used in the canning of lobsters, and exported from Canada, together with a statement showing the amount claimed and the amount paid, said: There has been, for some cause, a great deal of delay and difficulty in obtaining the drawback on those exportations, and, as there is a large quantity of tin-plates imported into the Dominion, and used in the canning of fish, having to pay a duty of ten per cent, it is necessary, in order that this business may be successful, and be allowed to compete fairly with the same business in the United States, that the drawback should be promptly paid. I know one or two persons entitled to from $300 to $400, who have not received this year one cent. I have been informed by the Department that it is necessary to produce the original bills of lading to receive the drawback. There is a difficulty in regard to this matter, as many engaged in this business are obliged to draw very heavily against their exports through the banks, which require the bills of lading to be delivered to them before they will advance. I think that until last year it was necessary to produce a landing certificate for European or foreign countries, when landed; but the Government have thought it more desirable to settle matters by demanding the original bills of lading, which, however, the banks require. When I speak of canned goods being admitted into the Dominion from the United States free of duty, under the Washington Treaty, I mean that, if I wish to ship such goods to the Upper Provinces, all I have to do is to ship them to Portland or Boston, getting some friend to send them here in bond, where they enter free. If I wish to ship directly from Nova Scotia to the Upper Provinces, I have to pay ten per cent. duty on the tin-plates and about twenty-five per cent. duty on other materials. But in order to compete fairly with our neighbours, we must export to the United States in bond, and have the goods come back again free of duty. I hope the Government will seriously consider and rectify this wrong. Mr. Mathers is a gentleman of extensive business capacity, who stands high in the estimation of all business men, and, when such a man fails to obtain the proper amount of drawback, owing to some irregularity in the Customs Department, men of lesser ability would find it very difficult to obtain anything at all.

MR. BOWELL: There can be no objection to bring down the papers referred to, but I think that, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ogden) were acquainted with all the facts connected with the payment of these drawbacks, the House would have been spared the remarks just made. His first complaint is as to the difficulty of obtaining those drawbacks. Under the old system, no drawbacks were paid to parties exporting canned lobsters until they had obtained a certificate from the consul in the foreign country to which they were consigned. The result was that it required very often from a year to two years before they could possibly obtain the drawback to which they were entitled. After looking into this matter very carefully, the Department adopted a system somewhat similar to that in operation in the United States, of paying the drawback on one of the original bills of lading being presented to the Department. Objection has been taken to this on the ground that the banks which make advances require all the original bills of lading. Our answer to that is that the Government desire the same protection as that required by the banks, and it does seem to me that, if it were represented to the banks by parties exporting lobsters that one of these original bills was required for the purpose of obtaining the drawback, if it were written across the face of the bill by the bank or the party making the advance, that it was for that purpose alone, no difficulty would be experienced in getting it back, provided the claims were correct. The House will readily understand how easy it would be to manufacture copies of bills of lading, if such were accepted by the Department; of course I do not lay that to the charge of the gentleman referred to by my hon. friend; but, when I inform the House some of the gentlemen who are claiming drawbacks made demands on a larger quantity of tin than they imported, my hon. friend and the House will see the necessity of the Department adopting such rules as will protect the revenue of the country. I think the explanation I have given will show that the system which prevails at present is much more liberal; and that the result will be that the drawbacks will be obtained at an earlier day than was possible under the old system. With reference to the complaints of Mr. Mathers, of Halifax, difficulties have arisen in the payment of his drawbacks. This gentleman has made claims for drawbacks on tin, representing 200 boxes, when the import entry upon which the demand was made was for 100 boxes only. In another instance, the import entry shows an importation of 200 boxes, and the demand for drawback upon the same entry was for 241 boxes, being forty-one boxes in excess of that which the entry represented. On another entry of 150 boxes, the same gentleman claimed a drawback for 207½ boxes, being fifty-seven and a half boxes more than the entry represented. When such claims are presented to the accountant, he has, upon his finding of these discrepancies, to write to the party making the claims, and point out the fact that he in making a claim for drawback on more tin than represented in the entries made. So, if delays have occurred, under these circumstances, it will be seen it is not the fault of the Department, but rather that of those who attempt to get more than they are entitled to. There is also another difficulty which presents itself, and which shows the necessity of our exercising a close surveillance over the payment of these drawbacks. Another instance is that of a gentleman, in one of the Lower Provinces, claiming drawback on tin, no which he represented he paid six dollars and twenty cents per box, while the entry in the Department showed that he only paid four dollars and sixty-two cents and a half. I suppose the gentleman in this instance would complain bitterly of the great delay which took place. I do not see how an exporter could cheat the revenue by shipping lobsters to the United States, and having them reshipped to the Dominion without violating the oath he had taken, that the fish should not go into consumption in the Dominion. The only way that could be done would be by shipping them to Boston, and then having them reshipped to this country, under the Washington Treaty, without the knowledge of the party in the Dominion who had shipped them to Boston. The question of duty upon the tin cans containing lobsters is one that must be considered when the Tariff comes up, and in this connection. I think this explanation will show to the satisfaction of the hon. gentleman and the House that there has been no unnecessary delay in the matter. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that Mr. Mathers had stated that he had received no drawbacks. I hold in my hand a memorandum which shows that the following sums have been paid to that gentleman as drawbacks since January 1st, 1879:—February 5th, $303.30; April 14th, $280.40; June 18th, $510.87; September 11th, $157.53; December 13th, $222.87. Total, $1,474.95. I can assure the hon. gentleman that the Department, in the payment of drawbacks has, in every instance, paid them as soon as they could obtain the papers in such a position as would justify their payment.

MR. OGDEN: I think there must be some mistake in reference to the drawbacks claimed by Mr. Mathers, and the amounts showed by the entries of the plates imported. I can assure the House Mr. Mathers would not intentionally defraud the revenue. The hon. gentleman has alluded to another claim made by a gentleman in the Lower Provinces, which was not in accord with the entry. I am sorry that these claims have been made, but I think he will understand that these gentlemen did not intentionally claim a drawback twice on the same shipment.

MR. BOWELL: I did not say in-tionally. I stated a fact, and gave two or three instances.

MR. SNOWBALL: In reference to the statement of the hon. the Minister of Customs that certain parties have claimed more drawback than was represented by their own Customs entry of tin imported, I think that can be easily explained. It is a common thing for a person in this business to import a quantity of tin, which it is thought will be adequate for the business they intend doing. During the season they find that they have not sufficient, and, consequently, they are compelled to obtain from other sources the additional tin they require to carry on their business. I have no doubt that Mr. Mathers did export this increased quantity of tin, and, if the duty was not paid by him, it was paid by some other party, and he was entitled to the drawback. Many cases of this kind have occurred in the Lower Provinces. In fact, I have myself been compelled to increase my purchase of tin to the extent of 500 boxes in a season, and on which I claim I am entitled to the drawback. If the money was actually paid into the Treasury, the exporter of the fish is entitled to the refund, and some reasonable mode should be adopted for his procuring it. I think I can also satisfactorily explain how the party referred to claimed a drawback on $6.50 as the value of the tin, whereas the entry only showed that duty had been paid on $4.50. It not unfrequently happens that a portion of our manufactured tins have to lay over from year to year, extending perhaps to four or five years. Eventually we have a good packing season and fill all up. We may, under these circumstances, ask for a drawback on $8, the value of the tin at the time it was imported, whereas duty may not have been paid on more than $4.50 for the tin imported the year the tin were filled. I think the exporter should be entitled to the amount of duty actually paid on the tin used, not the amount of duty on value at the time of exportation. The amount of drawback allowed last season was not an adequate return for the duty paid into the Treasury. The system adopted was entirely different to that which prevailed previously. The Department fixed the rate we should receive on each box of tin exported. In some cases we received back one-half and in others three-quarters, but in no case did we receive anything like the amount we paid into the Treasury. If it is to be a drawback, I do not see why we should not receive the full amount paid into the Customs, and not a portion of it only.

MR. DALY: There is one point referred to by the last speaker to which I desire to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Customs. I allude to the inadequacy of the drawbacks allowed to exporters of tinned lobsters. During the last season the amount returned was thirty-four cents, whereas the duty collected on the tin plates used in the canning of lobsters amounted at times to seventy-four cents, which, with soldering, would make the whole duty about seventy-seven cents. That amount, it is considered by those engaged in the business, should be fairly returned. I have no doubt that the hon. the Minister of Customs will take the steps necessary to remedy this grievance, and give the whole subject that consideration which its importance deserves.

MR. DECOSMOS: I agree with the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, that the actual duty paid on tin ought to be returned to the exporters of canned fish. I hold in my hand a resolution recently passed by the Board of Trade of British Columbia, which is as follows:—

“That, in the opinion of the British Columbia Board of Trade, it is desirable to foster the industry of canning and preserving salmon now carried on in this Province, and with that view the Dominion Government be urged to amend by Orders in Council the existing regulations authorising the payment of drawback on all sheet tin, or tin plates, and other material used in the manufacture of the articles exported; and in lieu thereof to substitute Orders authorising the payment of drawback for the actual duties paid on tin, tin plates, and all other materials (i. e. raw materials) used in the manufacture of salmon cans exported, or an allowance equivalent thereto.”

During the last season some 60,000 cans were exported, and it is a matter of complaint amongst the canners that they did not receive more than one-half of the duties actually paid. One ground of objection by the Customs Department is the price at which the tin is entered at the Custom-house. It is claimed in Victoria, however, that it is entered at the actual cost in London. This, however, is a matter that can be better attended to in a departmental way. I, however, congratulate my hon. friend from Halifax upon bringing the matter to the attention of the Government.

MR. BOWELL: The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Snowball) is mistaken when he says it makes no difference how the claims are made out. I wish to inform the hon. gentleman that at present, as in the past, the person making a claim for drawback is required to make it out based upon some entry which has been previously made. In the Department, a record is kept of all entries, somewhat as follows: “Entry No. 14517, Feb. 12th, 1879, 200 boxes, $— per box, duty paid $—.” Hence, when a demand is made for a drawback on forty-one boxes more than the entry represents, is it not of importance how the demand is made? I ask also whether this is not a matter that should receive the earnest and careful attention of the Government. The hon. gentleman says it makes no difference. How can the Government tell how much drawback is to be allowed or where the tin came from? It makes no difference whether the person is the purchaser or importer of the tin, so long as it is represented by a proper entry. It is the duty of the party claiming the drawback to show what the tin cost, and the amount of duty paid upon that upon which he claims the drawback. There seems to be some force in the objection taken at the present moment as to the amount paid as drawback on the tin exported. All that the Department asks is that the claim should represent the sum paid when the tin was imported, though it might have been imported years ago. The person claiming the drawback would surely not expect to be paid upon the price of tin at the present time. It was imported when tin was much cheaper. If the tin cost six dollars and twenty cents, the drawback could be claimed upon that, but, if the drawback be made on that amount as the present price when it was imported some time since, costing only four dollars and some cents, under such circumstances he could not demand the drawback on the larger amount. I will only add that every facility has been made for the payment of these drawbacks, and the full amount will be allowed, less a small fraction to cover expenses.

Motion agreed to.

TIMBER TRANSMISSION—TARIFF OF TOLLS.

RESOLUTION TO BE COMMITTED.

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew) moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to substitute for the proportional Tariff of Tolls fixed by section 59 of chapter 68 of the Consolidated Statutes of the late Province of Canada, respecting Joint Stock Companies to construct works to facilitate the transmission of timber down rivers and streams, the following proportional Tariff:—

Red and white pine, square or flatted, per piece.....	1 c.
Oak, elm and other hard wood, square or flatted, per piece.....	1½
Spars, per piece.....	3
Masts, per piece.....	5
Sawlogs, 17ft. and under, in length per piece.....	½
Sawlogs over 17 ft. and under 25 feet long, per piece.....	¾
Sawlogs, over 25 feet long, per piece....	1
Sawed lumber, per 1,000 ft. board measure.....	3
Staves, per 1,000.....	15
Firewood, shingle bolts, and other lumber, per cord.....	2

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I would suggest that the hon. gentleman should explain to the House the object of making an alteration in the Tariff of Tolls referred to by him, and, after his explanation, that the motion should be put down to be discussed to-morrow.

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew): The reason why I ask that the House should go into a Committee of the Whole on the question of these Tolls, is that the Tariff, as it stands upon the Statute-book under the Joint Stock Companies Act, appears to be unfairly proportioned. The charge upon timber is one cent, and on sawn logs one-twelfth of a cent. What I propose, if this resolution passes the House, is to substitute a rate which will bear upon different kinds of timber in more equitable proportions. I have no objection to allow the motion, as the hon. the leader of the Government suggests, to stand over for discussion tomorrow if it be deemed desirable. I have communications from gentlemen engaged in the trade, and who are likely to be affected by the proposed change, and they have agreed to a certain proportional tariff to be substituted for that fixed by the Statute referred to in the motion I have put into your hands.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

INSPECTORS OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. CASEY moved for an Order of the House for a return showing the names of all Inspectors and Assistant Inspectors of Weights and Measures, appointed under the existing Weights and Measures Act, who have been subjected to examination previous to or since their appointment, noting those who have passed and those who have failed, and showing whether failure to submit to examination, or to pass such examination, has led to dismissal in the case of the parties concerned; also, for such papers as will show the nature of any such examinations as have been held. He said: My reason for moving for this return is simply because there has been such a tremendous change in this Department, experienced officers appointed under that Act having been dismissed and new ones put in their place. I want to give the Government an opportunity of showing how careful they have been to make those who have been placed in the position from which the old officers have been dismissed make up in acquirements for what they lack in experience.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I would like to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue to one point. If I am correctly informed, these officers all paid certain sums into the superannuation allowance, and nevertheless, did not receive any gratuity of any kind at the time of their dismissal. I am aware that this is in the discretion of the Government, but, without entering into the propriety or impropriety of it, I consider that it is a great grievance and a hardship upon these men, if they have paid into the superannuation allowance, and have received no gratuity at the time of their dismissal.

MR. BABY: In answer to the hon. gentleman, I would state that it is the intention of the Government to reimburse in the manner stated by me, a few days ago, in answer to a question put by an hon. member, those officers who have not been continued in the service the money they have paid into the Superannuation Fund. As to granting them a gratuity, it is not the intention of the Government to do so. Under the old law, a very large number of officers existed, and the number has been reduced under the new system adopted. Among those also have been found incompetent men, who in one way or the other will have to be disposed of. As all could not be retained, we chose the best men among the number.

MR. MILLS: May I ask did the hon. gentleman choose the best west of Hamilton?

MR. BABY: Yes, one.

MR. MILLS: How many new ones were appointed?

MR. BABY: Four were appointed.

MR. MILLS: It seems very remarkable that out of those who were required, they only found one competent to be retained.

MR. BABY: In that section.

MR. MILLS: And the rest were all dispensed with on the ground of incompetency, were they?

MR. BABY: If the hon. gentleman will put his question on the paper, it will be attended to.

MR. MILLS: I am discussing a question before the House, and of course as it relates to the hon. member's Department, I have a right to put a question in reference to the subject. The hon. gentleman has seen proper under the authority of an Act of Parliament to dispense with a large number of officials, engaged as Inspectors of Weights and Measures, against whom no charge has been brought. We were assured, last year, that the only reason for introducing the Bill was to diminish the expenses of this particular branch of the Public Service. At that time, I stated that it was my impression that it was designed to get rid of a large number of persons whom they had made up their minds to dismiss. The hon. the First Minister thought it was an unfair allegation to make, and the result which would ensue in giving effect to the Act would show that my suspicions were unfounded. We have now a state of affairs showing how well-founded those suspicions were, that the real object was to put these men out of office in order to make room for others who were their own friends.

MR. MACKENZIE: Will the hon.

gentleman name the one retained west of Hamilton?

MR. BABY: Mr. Young.

MR. MACKENZIE: And he would have been dismissed if the Conservative members for Waterloo had felt safe in recommending his dismissal. Half the population of Ontario is west of Hamilton, and one man was retained in that half. It was not for incompetency that the others were dismissed, for no charge was ever brought against them. It was a cruel dismissal. The whole proceeding was one of the most infamous that any Government could be guilty of.

MR. BURPEE (St. John): I would call the attention of the Minister of Inland Revenue to a case of dismissal in the city of St. John. I think the Inspector, Mr. McFarland, there was sufficiently competent. He had the reputation of being a thoroughly efficient officer, and had given great attention to the carrying out of the details of the Weights and Measures Act. I think in his case the charge of incompetency is entirely unfounded.

MR. ANGLIN: The statement of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue has taken me completely by surprise and must have taken many gentlemen by surprise. If the cause of dismissal was incompetency, then we in New Brunswick must be very incompetent people, for not one has been retained there. Mr. McFarland, who was amongst those who were dismissed, was perhaps as competent an officer as could be found. I think it would be impossible to find one more competent. He made it his business, whenever I passed, to ask me to examine what he was doing, and he showed a considerable amount of zeal. No fault could be found with him; his competency was entirely beyond question. As far as competency goes, I may speak of some other inspectors who, under the late Government, and up to the time of their dismissal, never did much service and never had an opportunity of doing a great deal, because of the want of standards, or something of that kind. One of those gentlemen, Mr. Cutler, was a former member of this House, and thoroughly competent to discharge any duty of that kind. He had been a member of the New Brunswick Legislature for a great many years; and yet he was dismissed because of incompetency. I recommended another gentleman, who was also at the time a member of the Local Legislature, and he was appointed. He never got much to do, but he was quite competent. It is well that these things should be brought before the country. I stated last year when the Bill was introduced that its main purpose was not so much to economise as to sweep out of existence a number of officials appointed under the Liberal Administration for the purpose of replacing them with Tories bearing the standard mark. As far as the city of St. John is concerned, there is not so much work done as there was before. I have sometimes enquired as to what the principal officers were doing, and I could not learn that they were doing much, if anything. The general impression is that, if less money is spent in that part of the Dominion, at any rate less service is rendered. The returns made by those officials in various parts of the Dominion do not indicate that there has been a large amount of work done in any part of the country. I never did approve of this Weights and Measures Act. I approve of it less and less every day since it has gone into operation, and less of it now when it is proved that it has been enacted for the purpose of creating patronage. I do not think it is worth the cost it involves to the country. It is a great hardship that those men who were turned out of office were dismissed without any reason from the Public Service, and that they did not receive the miserable gratuities usually paid to persons dismissed of office. The hon. the Minister of Railways objects to the word dismissed; he says their services were dispensed with. In this case the services of the inspectors were dispensed with by force of special legislation. They were not dismissed, their services were not dispensed with in the ordinary way, but they were legislated out of office. They were led to regard the office as permanent when they were appointed. It was the greatest injustice to these men to turn them out of office, and that injustice was aggravated much by the refusal to pay them this miserable gratuity. To this day some of them have not been paid even the amount that was deducted from their pay as their contribution towards the Superannuation Fund. I think the

hon. the Minister, if he intends to pay that amount, should refund it as soon as possible, and so relieve himself and his colleagues from the odium that must, for all time, attach to this extraordinary, and I had almost said disgraceful, series of proceedings.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex): I think it ungenerous on the part of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, after dismissing these Inspectors of Weights and Measures, to insult them with the charge of incompetency.

MR. BABY: I did not say that. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) tried unsuccessfully to get those words out of my mouth. I stated I had selected those I thought most competent, and that, out of the forty officers whom I appointed in place of the one hundred and twenty-five, I selected twelve whom I found most competent.

MR. ROSS: The hon. gentleman says he selected those who were the most competent, and the inevitable conclusion is that the others were incompetent. I know as a matter of fact that some of the men he has appointed to do the work of those who had had three or four years training are not, in my opinion, as competent as many of those he had discharged. I can speak for the inspector of the district I represent, who held the rank of a second class teacher and a diploma from a commercial college, and who had filled the position of returning officer in the adjoining county, and who was nevertheless unceremoniously dismissed and deprived of the means of earning his livelihood. Not only was that done, but the annuity he had paid into the Superannuation Fund has been retained likewise, so that the Government retains money that does not belong to them. Now if the hon. gentleman had wished to deal fairly with those whose services he dispensed with, the least he could do was to have stated to them the reason why he dismissed them. It is unfortunate that those men who now have to look to some other calling should be branded before the country as incompetent. The only conclusion that can be drawn from their dismissal, as well as the effect upon the public mind, will be that they were incapable in their former positions, and consequently much cannot be expected of them in positions elsewhere. I hope my hon. friend will take the earliest opportunity to put this matter right, so that the large number of men who rendered public service, and that not at a high salary, will not remain under this stigma which has been cast upon them to-day. Besides, I think my hon. friend will find that the charges he has made in the Weights and Measures Act will be as great a charge upon the revenue as the Act was originally. I notice that in six months the revenue was only $3,000, while the expenses connected with this Department were $17,450. Where is the economy going to be? Under the old system there was certainly a large expenditure, but there was also a large revenue, and I fancy the hon. gentleman will find, when he compares accounts at the end of the year, that the charges under the new system are equal to, if not greater than, under the old system, while the inspection is practically nil. Under the new system I fancy that there is not a county in Ontario that would be thoroughly visited once in two years. The inspection is a mere sham, and the country is going to pay for this system, for this palpable sham, some $30,000 or $40,000 with a comparatively small revenue. Under the old system there was an inspection; under the new system there will be a heavy expense and no inspection. I would recommend to the hon. gentleman, since amendment of the measures of the old Government is the order of the day, that he should go on with the good work, and either amend this Bill out of existence or give us something substantial and not a mere shadow.

MR. VALLÉE: The Inspection of Weights and Measures Law is a law which, in itself, is very unpopular, although it was created for the protection of the great body of consumers. The putting it into operation by the late inspectors excited great discontent among the people, and even greatly contributed to the defeat of the Liberal Government in the last Dominion Elections of 1878. The putting of this law into execution was quite unpopular, and certainly, if the Liberal party had remained in power, they would themselves have been constrained to admit that a great number of the Inspectors of Weights and Measures, appointed by the preceding Government, were incapable of fulfilling the duties they were expected to perform. The present Government has slightly modified this law in such a way as to render its working more satisfactory. As regards the newly appointed Inspectors of Weights and Measures, I must congratulate the present Minister of Inland Revenue upon the appointments which he has made in the district of Quebec and in the surrounding districts. From the position I hold, I am enabled to state that the information which I have received from the neighbouring districts establishes the fact that the public is satisfied, not only with the working of the law, but also with the Inspectors of Weights and Measures who perform their duties in an obliging and decorous manner. Those who were formerly charged with the execution of this law—a law which in certain respects restrains the liberty of sellers—did not perform their duties in the considerate manner called for by the public. I may at this point be permitted to make another remark. In the month of May next, the Inspection of Measures Law will come into force, that is to say, the substitution of measures will then become obligatory. I hope the Government will in this case give the same instructions which it issued respecting the inspection of weights, and that it will take precautions to prevent as much as possible the inconveniences which such a radical change in the usages of the people may give rise to. If the employés entrusted with the execution of this law will endeavour to lessen its severity while carrying out their duty, before long this law will work to the great satisfaction of both sellers and buyers.

MR. KILLAM: I desire to ask the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue if he can allege any cause for leaving the inspector of the county of Yarmouth out in the cold. I understand that gentleman, who I consider was an efficient inspector, was about the only one in Nova Scotia who did anything at all to earn his salary. I believe he collected half the revenues collected in the Province, and that, while the other gentlemen drew their salaries, they did very little towards providing a revenue. So far as I know, the business was efficiently done in that county. In going out of the county to appoint a person who had apparently no experience in the business the hon. gentleman pursued a course for which I can see no reason, unless he wanted to reward a political supporter.

Mr. KRANZ: Reference having been made to the appointment of Mr. Young as Assistant Inspector of Weights and Measures, I beg to state that this appointment gives general satisfaction, and was not made for political reasons. Mr. Young is an old Reformer, but has been appointed by the present Government because he is a most efficient officer, and had given full satisfaction to everyone in the district, both to Liberals and Conservatives. He has been a teacher—the Head Master of the Berlin Central School—for many years, and holds a first-class certificate from the County Board. I received a letter the other day from a business man, who said that, if the Weights and Measures Act was carried out by all officers as it was done by Mr. Young, and some others newly appointed, there would be very little fault to be found with the Act. It is not so much the Act itself that gives dissatisfaction as the way in which it has been carried out by some officers.

Mr. PLUMB: One can readily see that there was an intention on the part of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) to impute language to the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue which that gentleman had not the slightest idea of using. I think, if, during this discussion, some persons have been stigmatised as incompetent, they may thank the hon. gentleman from Bothwell and the hon. gentleman from West Middlesex (Mr. Ross). I think no one would have deemed that any such imputation had been made had it not been thrust upon our attention by the course of those hon. gentlemen. I understand that, when the present Government came into power there was a very large staff in this Department, that the Government reduced this staff, and it must be remembered, in this connection, that the Weights and Measures Act was put into operation by the late Government. It was not something which they had inherited from their predecessors, who, they would lead us to believe, had been guilty of all the crimes in the catalogue. They chose to adopt with this Act machinery which was cumbrous and which was often made irritating. It has been in some degree modified, and a great number of officers thereby rendered unnecessary have been dismissed. The Act afforded the hon. gentlemen on the other side the opportunity of appointing 120 of their friends, whose clamours for office they could not resist. But, when the new Government came into power, instead of extending that patronage, they had the courage to reduce it, and there has been a saving in that respect of about $40,000, a saving which I suppose hon. gentlemen on the other side will scout and criticise in the same way that they scout and criticise all the doings of the present Government. But we do not expect that anything that can be done on this side will please those hon. gentlemen, and they are very hard to please. When we extend the patronage we are blamed, and when we reduce it we are blamed. They are very much like the soldier who was being flogged, and first cried to the man who was flogging him to strike a little higher, and then strike a little lower, and at last he who wielded the whip grumbled: "There is no pleasing you anyway." I congratulate my hon. friend (Mr. Baby) upon having made the reduction which he has made. I believe I am safe in saying that the service is as efficient now as it was before that enormous reduction, notwithstanding the great saving that has been secured. The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), whose views are probably somewhat narrowed by his estimation of the position that he holds as a paid official of the Ontario Government, cannot see any merit in an appointee, who does not hold a second class certificate from the Board of Ontario School Examiners, with which I am told he has an intimate connection. He thinks all such persons have a sort of exclusive right to appointment under the Weights and Measures Act. I trust he is satisfied with the statement just given by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Kranz), namely: that the inspector of his district, which includes that of the hon. member for West Middlesex, who has been appointed by the Conservative Minister, holds a first-class certificate, is a most efficient officer, and, not least of all I doubt not in the hon. gentleman's opinion, is a sound, thorough and consistent Reformer. I am perfectly willing that any discussion of this kind shall be pressed to its utmost. I know that this Government must expect to receive the closest scrutiny. I think they will be able to bear it, and I think, moreover, that, the closer their acts are examined, the better they will appear before the country.

MR. MACDONNELL (Inverness) : I think there was a great deal of useless expenditure in connection with this Act. In the large county of Pictou, which has within it the second town of the Province of Nova Scotia, there has been no officer appointed. I infer from that that the employment of such an officer is a needless expenditure, and is so considered by the Government.

MR. ALLISON : I may repeat what I said on this subject last Session that, to the best of my knowledge and belief after careful enquiry, the Inspector who lived in King's County, and had charge also of the county I represent, never entered that county in his official capacity. I therefore consider the Government justified in discharging that officer on the ground of neglect of duty, and I do not deny that they may have been influenced by political considerations in the appointment of his successor. The hon. member for West Middlesex appears to think that it was a case of great hardship that the officials whose services were dispensed with were not notified of the cause of their dismissal. If it will be any gratification to the hon. gentleman to have a satisfactory precedent, I can give him the names of half a dozen officials in the county I represent who were dismissed by the Government he so cordially supported, without an hour's notice, and with no cause assigned for their dismissal.

MR. BOURBEAU : I cannot coincide with the views of hon. gentlemen opposite, who declare their dissatisfaction with the change effected by the Government in relation to the Inspectors of Weights and Measures. The large number of complaints formulated in this House during the last two Sessions are sufficient to justify the action of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue. In the county I have the honour to represent, we had a Deputy-Inspector of Weights and Measures, who received a larger salary than the Inspector we now have, and yet the latter has a larger district to attend to. But a strong ground of complaint in our division during the term of office of the former Inspector was the fact that he often failed to act in accordance with the law requiring him, on each inspection, to give a certificate setting out that such and such weights and measures have been duly inspected, and to attach thereto stamps for an amount equal to that charged by the Inspector for fees levied. Now, I have received from all parts of our division complaints as to the non-delivery of such certificates, and I should be glad to learn why and for what reason the certificates were not given. When I had occasion to speak on this subject during last Session, I mentioned complaints made against the mode of inspection under the Administration of the hon. gentlemen who now sit on the left hand of the Speaker; it is therefore unnecessary to repeat those charges, but I think we may well rejoice at the improvement granted us by the present Government in the new law for the Inspection of Weights and Measures.

MR. RYMAL : I have no doubt in my mind that this is part of the policy of Protection. One of the great principles attached to that policy is that "to the victors belong the spoils." I believe in that doctrine, and I made up my mind that, when this Bill was repealed and a new one enacted, it would be carried out. I am not going to speak of the qualifications of those officials who were dismissed or appointed, but I believe that the dismissals were made more for the purpose of placing friends of the Administration into positions than to promote any great economy in the Public Service. That is a lesson which politicians should ponder over, and I believe it would be well if it were understood from one end of the Dominion to the other, that, in the case of a change of Government, there should be a change from the top to the bottom in the Public Departments. It has been said that we should not have politicians in the Public Service, and we then deny those men their political rights. I believe the officers in that Department carefully abstained from taking part in political affairs, but it was on account of their political leanings that they were dismissed. In other words, they were robbed of their political rights because they were in public offices, and then turned out of their offices because they were appointed by a former Government, and for no other cause. I think it would be well if the principle "to the victors belong the spoils" were understood to be the rule throughout the Dominion, and that all should govern themselves accordingly. It looks very much as if the bread had been taken from the children and given to the dogs.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I do not know whether the hon. member for South Wentworth (Mr. Rymal) seriously intended that we should believe that he endorses the doctrine that "to the victors belong the spoils." If I had as much confidence in him as he has in me, perhaps I would take his advice in that respect. But, although we have great confidence in his judgment, I do not think we will take his advice; and I can assure the hon. gentleman that it is not for the want of pressure on the part of some of our friends. We have been obliged to resist the pressure of some of our friends who are Conservative in their leanings.

MR. MACKENZIE: How?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman knows what the pressure was on his side of the House, and he can judge of the somewhat similar pressure that has been brought to bear on us. The present Government have tried as much as possible to carry out the principle of not removing any man for his political leanings. We have tried to avoid the imputation even of removing a man without cause. When there are vacancies in the Departments, I take it that the Government have a right to fill them from among their friends, providing that they select persons who are capable to fulfil those positions. Indeed, that was the principle on which the late Government acted. It is the one on which the present Government acts, and that which must actuate all Governments. Before Confederation, when the American principle prevailed, one of the most continuous charges brought against the Government was that Conservatives were turned out of office body and bones, and that they were not replaced when we came in. So particular are the present Government on this point that, although the last Administration occasionally removed men who ought not to have been removed, and who looked to us to replace them, we have refused to do so. Of course the late Administration will not admit having removed persons except for good cause, but it is our firm impression that such was the case. We think every Government is responsible for their appointments and dismissals, and that no one should be removed except for good cause. That is the principle on which we have endeavoured to act; and I will say distinctly that, should any given case be brought up—it is easy to deal in generalities and make charges of that kind,—we will be quite ready to defend and justify our actions both to the House and country. I may say that I believe the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Mackenzie), when he was leader of the Government, resisted as strongly as he well could the pressure brought to bear upon him in regard to the appointments and dismissals. He may have yielded sometimes when he ought not to have done so—and perhaps I have done the same thing, but I am not aware of any case at this moment—but he undoubtedly tried to resist the undue pressure, and carried out the British principle, except on one point. I think he frequently brought in outsiders and placed them over the heads of men already in the Service, and who were fully competent for promotion. That was the worst kind of action in the way of appointments, inasmuch as it tended to demoralise the Department.

MR. MACKENZIE: I suppose that is the reason the hon. gentleman took an outsider in making a late appointment in the Privy Council?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: In that case, we simply transferred a man from one Department to another. I think the hon. gentleman, for very many reasons that we need not discuss, will fully sympathise with the reason which induced the Government to promote a man of the name of McGee. With regard to the Weights and Measures Act, the hon. gentlemen opposite are not responsible for it. We passed that Act when we were in before. They might have repealed it if they chose. They did not choose to do so, but they put it in operation, and, without wishing to impute any blame to the hon. gentlemen opposite, they must admit that the Act has worked great dissatisfaction. Perhaps the provisions were too rigidly enforced by the Department, and perhaps the system, in its newness, operated hardly and to the great inconvenience of the retail traders. At all events there was a howl of dis-approbation against the Bill, and it has proved expensive in operation. The present Government upheld the necessity of having such an Act—the necessity for having a just balance and just weight for every man in the country. By the introduction of the amended Act, and grouping the counties, a great saving has been effected; and, moreover, I am glad to be able to inform the House that the causes of irritation throughout the country have been so greatly removed that, even in the city of Hamilton, which was the great centre of dissatisfaction, the traders and manufacturers are now quite satisfied with the Act. There were no dismissals; the services of men were dispensed with by the grouping of the different counties, because not so many officers were wanted, and therefore, as the Government had to dispense with a certain number, it had to use its discretion as to the dismissals. I am satisfied that very great care was taken by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue and his deputy that the officers retained were the best found under the circumstances in the different localities. Sometimes efficient men were dispensed with, because they could not all be employed. Sometimes counties were grouped, the principal man having to be near the centre, and occasionally a competent man, in a remote portion of the district, would have to be dispensed with as between the others, and one equally competent, or perhaps more competent, living near the centre, would be preferred. The whole system was carefully carried out, and with a good deal of pains and trouble and to the satisfaction of the country, a great saving having been effected without impairing the efficiency of the Department.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I should like to ask the hon. the First Minister why he has departed from the usual custom of giving a gratuity to officers whose services have been dispensed with.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue can answer that question. The original Act was brought into force only a short time before. The gratuity claimable, therefore, could not be very large—it must be insignificant.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: A gratuity would mitigate the hardship of those dismissed.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

MR. BABY: But very few applied for reimbursement from the Superannuation Fund—I think no more than three or four. Very few had been in office more than one, two or three years, and they were told six months in advance that their services, after the passage of the new Act, would not be required. In answer to the complaints made by the Opposition, I would say that, when I came to office, above 100 officers were employed under the Weight and Measures Act, and out of these about twelve were selected and reappointed under the new law. The selections were made among the old and most efficient officers. The different divisions were formed of different counties grouped together, Government having to select an officer for each division. Many dismissals were therefore imperative. I did not expect from any hon. member of the Opposition the accusation of dismissals on account of political proclivities. I tell the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that in my place he would not have acted as I did. I retained in my Department two officers, employed temporarily, one of whom for years in my county gave me determined opposition. I do not think that hon. gentleman would have been so generous. My intention was not thus to thank those officers for their political proclivities. I acted for the good of the service. The member for East Middlesex (Mr. Ross) said that the law was a dead letter; that the expenses for the last six months of 1879 reached $17,000, while the receipts were only $2,000. Now, the law was a new one, the officers being appointed only in August and September last, and he must see, from the return laid on the Table of the House, a few days ago, that the revenue was increasing monthly, and it will continue so, no doubt, now that the Act is in full operation through a staff of most efficient officers. There is no doubt that, by the carrying out of the law, it will be, if not quite a success, very nearly so. I have not heard one hon. member on the opposite side say they are not perfectly satisfied with the working of the law. The best testimony rendered as to the proper action of the Department was manifested in Montreal, Toronto and Hamilton, where I had the honour of meeting bodies of manufacturers and merchants, all of whom told me they were perfectly satisfied with the rules now in force. I could not expect, of course, the approval of the hon. gentlemen opposite. Probably, now that we have effected these economies, they will say the law is not carried out, just as was said of the savings made by the hon. member for Cumberland on the Intercolonial Railway; they were not worth having, according to the gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) complained that in his county a very efficient officer had been dismissed, like many of those whose services have been dispensed with. That officer had never, however, performed any duty except the drawing of his salary; he had absolutely nothing to do. I hope this time twelvemonth I shall be able to put before the hon. gentleman statements that, if not entirely satisfactory, will be as satisfactory as possible.

MR. BRECKEN: If I understand the charge preferred by hon. members opposite against the Minister of Inland Revenue, it is [this: that] the former Act respecting Weights and Measures was repealed, and last Session substantially re-enacted, not with the object of improving the law, but simply of giving the Government an opportunity of getting rid of officials politically opposed to them and putting their friends in their places. I am not aware of the manner in which appointments under the new Act were made, and therefore I cannot speak to them, but the explanations in this respect made by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue appear satisfactory. I think I heard the hon. member from Gloucester characterise the Act, and the way in which the appointments are made under it, as infamous.

MR. ANGLIN: I said disgraceful.

MR. BRECKEN: There is not much difference between the terms; what is politically disgraceful is next door to being politically infamous. But, Sir, speaking for Prince Edward Island and the contiguous portions of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, I venture to say that the feeling of the Liberal Conservative party in that part of the Dominion is that the right hon. the leader of the Government and his colleagues have been much too magnanimous in their treatment of political opponents. It would look as though the present Government are neglecting the claims of their friends and supporters and propitiating their enemies. If there is any defection from the ranks of the Liberal Conservatives in the Maritime Provinces, it is chiefly, and I may say entirely, owing to the fact that violent and energetic opponents of the present party have been retained in office, and the claims of our friends overlooked. I agree with the right hon. the leader that the interests of the country require that the Civil Service should be permanent, but contend that officials who are politically opposed to the Government who retained them should at least have some decency about them, and at any rate abstain from attempting to undermine the Government that gives them bread. With us in Prince Edward Island, many of these Grit officials, feeling that they are secure under the magnanimous and over-generous rule of the present Government, do not take the trouble to conceal their animosity towards their political opponents, but throw the taunt in their faces that at the time of the elections the Conservative candidates assured them that, if returned, and in a majority, their claims would not be overlooked, and that, though returned and in a majority, they are powerless to do anything for their friends or redeem their pledges in this respect—that to get office they should turn Grits. I am ashamed to admit that, when the late Government, lead by the hon. member for Lambton, was in power, one or two active supporters of his party, who were not in the positions of representatives, could do more to have opponents dismissed from office, and to have his friends appointed, than all the present representation of the Island can bring about. This ought not so to be. I do not believe that this policy will wear. Under the former Government the chief qualification for an officer was to be a supporter of that Government, and the incurable disqualification was to be a Liberal Conservative. When I heard the charge of political partiality hinted against the present Administration from the other side of the House, I thought of the many instances of dismissal of old, well-tried and efficient officers in my Province, at the time the hon. member for Lambton came into office, simply to make way for his political friends. There are many instances—one or two just now occur to me. There was the case of the Surveyor of Shipping; he was removed from office without any charge being preferred against him; the head and front of his offending was that he was a Conservative. Another instance was that of an old and tried public servant, one of the political pioneers of the country, who filled the office of Provincial Treasurer, and had charge of the Savings Bank Department before Confederation, when Prince Edward Island entered the Union. Had the spirit and intention of the British North America Act been respected, that officer should have been retained in charge of the Savings Bank; but he, although no charge was attempted to be brought against him, was also dismissed. There are many other cases, but I instance these two because they were not among the appointments made by my right hon. friend on the eve of his retirement from office, in 1873. On the other hand, no Grit official with us has suffered for his political opinions. I have no doubt that, if the political wheel should turn, a prospect which I believe is at present very remote, you will not find the Grits following the very generous policy of the present Government. They will be true to their friends, and let their opponents look after themselves. It is rather trying to hear hon. members on the Opposition Benches accusing the Government of cruel and disgraceful conduct in dismissing men from office to the detriment of the Public Service, simply on account of their politics. From my experience there is no foundation for the charge; on the contrary, every obstacle has been thrown in the way of removals by the Government. I wish, so far as the Lower Provinces are concerned, that there was some truth in the charge. I do not wish to be vindictive or punish any man for his political opinions; this is a free country; but at the same time I do not think it either well or just to foster opponents who spend their leisure time in endeavouring to weaken and destroy the influence of the party who keep them in office. I hope the right hon. the leader of the Government will modify his too generous and magnanimous policy, and not forget the claims of his old friends and supporters. I believe in looking after one's friends, and letting your opponents look after themselves.

MR. ANGLIN: When the hon. the

MR. BRECKEN.

Minister of Inland Revenue stated there were only forty persons employed, did he mean inspectors or sub-inspectors?

MR. BABY: The forty officers comprise all inspectors and assistant inspectors. In Ontario there are only four inspectors; in Quebec, four; two in Nova Scotia and three in New Brunswick; one in Prince Edward Island; one in Manitoba and one in British Columbia.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

MR. YEO said that he had never been an admirer of the Weights and Measures Act, and had therefore nothing to say in its favour, but, when that Act was applied to his Province, he considered that the county he represented might as well have an inspector as not. Three inspectors were appointed, one for each of the counties of the Island. They were all respectable and intelligent men, and had gone to considerable pains and expense to qualify themselves for the position. As one of the three late inspectors was not re-appointed when the new law came into force, it is evident that the appointment that was made was a political one. In reference to what the members for Queen's had said regarding the dismissals that had taken place in Prince Edward Island, he could not agree with him. He (Mr. Yeo) was well satisfied that the dismissals were made on purely political grounds. The late superintendent engineer and storekeeper on the Island Railway were good men, who had done their duty faithfully. Mr. McKechnie had taken charge of the road when it was only half built; he organised it and put it in excellent working order; no accident had happened on the road. Just as he had got the road in good running order, and would have reduced his staff, he was summarily dismissed, without a single charge being made against him. The Government had sent an inspector to investigate the books and everything in connection with the road. His report had not been made public but not a single charge had been made against any officer of the road. I have seen a letter written by the hon. the Minister of Railways, commending in the highest terms the superintendent whom he dismissed. I am not surprised at these dismissals, or at the position in which hon. members now find themselves, on account of the disappointment of those who have applied for offices. It is what was to be expected, as they in their canvass promised to make a clean sweep of the employés of the road, from the pen to the shovel. I have been credibly informed by supporters of hon. members that some of the offices were promised to as many as twenty different applicants. Complaint has been made about the dismissals in Prince Edward Island by the late Government, but I consider that those dismissals were justifiable. Nearly the whole staff of Dominion officials, from the highest to the lowest, in that Province, were appointed by Sir John A. Macdonald's Government, in 1873, when it was going out of power, when in fact its members had their resignations in their pockets. These offices were all filled by Conservatives, in direct violation of an agreement previously made between two members of the Cabinet and the leading men of both parties in the Island. After the change of Government, the Liberals insisted on this arrangement being carried out, and this patronage fairly divided between Conservatives and Liberals. This necessitated the dismissal of some of the officials appointed by the dying Government. The Liberals, even then, did not get their fair share of the patronage, and the only fault I have to find with the Liberal Government is that they did not make more dismissals. The "old gentleman," so pathetically alluded to by the hon. member for Queen's, as being forty years in the Public Service, could not be considered a civil servant for that length of time. He, no doubt, held high positions in the Local Legislature for a number of years, and managed to be in office for the greater part of the time. He found it convenient to leave the Island, and went to reside to England, where he remained some seventeen or eighteen years. He returned to the Province shortly before the Island entered the Confederation. After that event took place, he, by the influence of his Conservative friends, was appointed Dominion Auditor, a position to which he had no right, and was properly dismissed when the Liberals came into power. Not long after, he was appointed by the Local Government to one of the best offices in its gift, which he still holds.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne): I think I may say in reference to the statement made by the hon. member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Brecken), this afternoon, that the reason the Government have not made more removals of Liberals in Nova Scotia is because of the judicious selections made by the late Government. I confess I hardly find in the statement of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue any excuse for turning out nine Deputy-Inspectors in Nova Scotia, and the selection of only one of the old officers, amongst whom there were men as capable of efficiently performing their duties as those selected by the present Government. We are told that there have been no dismissals for political purposes in Nova Scotia. The first thing the Government did was to dismiss Mr. Elliott, Dominion Arbitrator, and appoint in his stead Mr. William Compton. It is true that they gave as an excuse that this was a re-appointment, but the reason of his dismissal by the late Government was that, after the resignation of the Conservative Government, he conducted a newspaper in direct opposition to the Mackenzie Administration, and of course he took his office in his hand when he did so. No such charge, however, could be made against Mr. Elliott, who was simply discharged because of his political predilections. Then they took another plan to provide for their friends. They superannuated the Post Office Inspector of Nova Scotia, and put in his place a man without any experience in Post Office work, and whose only recommendation was that he was a political supporter of the present Administration. Charges were made against Capt. Purdy of the S.S. Newfield, and Capt. O'Brien was put in his place. The chief Fishery Warden of the county of Shelburne, Mr. Muir, was dismissed, and Mr. McGill appointed in his stead, because he was a solid supporter of the present Government. The only charge against Mr. Muir was that he was a Liberal. Then in the case of Mr. G. P. Black, they created an office never heard of before for him upon the Intercolonial Railway. I think that the less said about dismissals in Nova Scotia by the supporters of the present Government the better.

The history of the Civil Service of Nova Scotia, since Confederation, is that four-fifths of the service was made up of strong Conservatives; and, prior to the passage of the present election law in Nova Scotia, a very large number of officials were used as engines to keep the Conservatives in power.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I did not intend to take any part in this debate, as my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue has, I think, very fairly stated to the House the grounds of the changes that have been made in the Department of Weights and Measures, and amply justified the course he has taken. The desire was to endeavour to lessen the large expenditure that was incurred in putting the Weights and Measures Act into operation. I desire, however, to refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Prince County (Mr. Yeo), who stated that certain dismissals had been made in connection with the Prince Edward Island Railway. So far as I am aware, not a single officer connected with the Intercolonial or the Prince Edward Island Railway has been removed on political grounds. I am prepared to have the subject investigated in the closest manner in relation to that point, and to justify, irrespective of any political question, any removal or change that has taken place. The hon. gentleman says the engineer of the Prince Edward Island Railway was dismissed on political grounds. That officer was not dismissed on political grounds, but the offices of superintendent and engineer were consolidated into one, with the view of effecting a saving of public money. I am happy to say that the change has justified itself without in the slightest degree impairing the efficiency of the road or the rolling stock. I shall, by this change in the management, be able to effect a saving of at least $40,000 a year in the administration of the Prince Edward Island Railway, for the maintenance of which the people of this country have been taxed to the extent of nearly $100,000 annually for many years in succession. The hon. gentleman could not have been aware of the fact that, when I dispensed with the services of the Engineer of this road, I offered him a position of equal emolument on the Canadian Pacific Railway.

MR. MACKENZIE: A temporary position.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: No, not

any more temporary than the one he held.

MR. MACKENZIE: The one he held was not a temporary one.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The hon. gentleman does not mean to say that he was a member of the Civil Service?

MR. MACKENZIE: No, but the hon. gentleman must see that the Engineer of the Prince Edward Island Railway is in a different position to a man sent out on the Pacific Railroad in the spring and dismissed in the autumn.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I intended the position to be a permanent one. I felt that it was due to an officer who had discharged his duty faithfully, and whose services I felt it necessary in the public interest to dispense with, that I should offer him a position of equal emolument to that from which he had been removed. I think the hon. gentleman will see that this is hardly a case upon which to base a great grievance. With reference to the restoration of Mr. Compton to the position of Dominion Arbitrator, I would say that Mr. Compton was appointed to that position when the present Government was in power before. He discharged his duties with great fidelity and ability, and, when the change of Government took place, he was restored to the office he had been discharged from by the late Government, without their assigning any such reason as that which was assigned by the hon. member for Shelburne (Mr. Robertson). I need not detain the House in dealing with the question of Capt. Purdy, whose services were not dispensed with until he knocked the bottom out of the ship he commanded, and until he exhibited his incompetency and unfitness for the position. In regard to the appointment of Post Office Inspector, the gentleman who filled that office was at too advanced an age to enable him to perform the duties thoroughly, which were of a laborious character. Therefore he was superannuated, and a gentleman who then represented the city and county of Halifax in the Local Legislature, and who was a man of great ability, was appointed to discharge the duties of that office. I think it will require a rather laboured effort to make a grievance out of that. As to the appointment of Mr. Black, I would say that, for some time, an effort has been made to make Halifax a winter grain port, and it attracted the attention of the late Government and the country to a large degree. We felt that it would conduce to the prosperity of the country if we could possibly make Halifax a winter grain port, if it were possible to do so. A grain rate was offered much lower than our predecessors were willing to offer, and a gentleman was selected as travelling agent who was held in high repute by the Chamber of Commerce, being selected by them on two different occasions to deal specially with this question. He had also been employed as agent of the Grand Trunk Railway, and his selection was looked upon by all parties as a good one. He was thought to be the proper man to further our efforts in finding out thoroughly and effectually whether Halifax could be made a winter grain port. These efforts have not resulted so favourably as we had hoped, but we felt it our duty to use every effort in that direction. Mr. Black was a gentleman of highest character in the City of Halifax, widely known in connection with commercial matters, and had received the endorsement of the Chamber of Commerce on more than one occasion; and therefore the fact of our efforts being unsuccessful did not detract from the propriety of the appointment. I do not remember any other reference that the hon. gentleman made, but, so far as the Department connected with the Intercolonial Railway is concerned, I am prepared to state again that one of the strongest censures I have had to encounter was on account of the tender regard that seemed to be given to our strongest and most obnoxious political opponents. I thought it was not right that political considerations should enter into these matters, and there is not one instance of our having dispensed with these officers for political reasons.

MR. MACKENZIE: Perhaps you will allow me one word, although I have spoken on this question before. I think it is perfectly clear that some of these gentlemen have been dismissed for political reasons. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue says not, but his statements go to show that they were dismissed in order that others might be appointed in their places.

Some HON. GENTLEMEN: No, no.

MR. MACKENZIE: Mr. McKechnie

was treated in a most infamous manner. His books were taken from him and he was dealt with as if he had been a common criminal; and, after such steps had been taken with a view to criminate him, the combination broke down, and they were obliged to give him a certificate that there was no charge against him. Two men were dismissed without any charge against their competency or otherwise; one of them ought to have had the opportunity to take the position to which Mr. MacNab was appointed. The hon. gentleman stands convicted on his own showing of dismissing two meritorious officers to put friends in their place.

MR. BABY: That is another way of stating it.

MR. MACKENZIE: It is the way the hon. gentleman ought to have stated it if he meant to give a fair statement of the case. I have stated exactly what happened, as I always do. Now the hon. the Minister of Railways also led the House to believe—although not in exact terms—that Mr. Black, of Halifax, was appointed to the position he held by the recommendation of the Chamber of Commerce. The Chamber of Commerce never recommended him for that position or any other position, but Mr. Black was introduced in a traitorous manner, immediately after the elections; and, after circulating direct falsehoods against the existing Government regarding its traffic, placed in this position, although not competent to fulfil the duties of it. I only rise at the present moment to call attention to these facts, as they were not exactly stated by the hon. gentleman.

MR. HACKETT: It appears to me that, with regard to these Inspectors of Weights and Measures, they are quite unnecessary, more especially in the rural districts. In the centres of trade it is possible that they may be required, but I believe that the enactment of so stringent a law was not called for. The present Government, however, found the law in operation, and, as it would be very difficult to totally repeal it, they did the next best thing in the public interest, and that was to reduce the expenditure as much as possible. In doing this, a number of gentlemen, who were provided for by the late Government at the public expense, had to be dismissed, and their friends in this House, as a matter of course, raise a great cry about dismissals for political reasons, and charged the Government with having introduced the American system of "to the victors belong the spoils." I am quite surprised at the views expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite. If they look back on their own course of proceeding during their own tenure of office they will find no room to blame the present Administration on the score of making dismissals for political reasons. In Prince Edward Island their conduct is well known in connection with this matter. When the late Government came into power, in 1873, they dismissed almost every official in the Civil Service in that Island without cause, and for no reason other than that they were known to be friends of the then Opposition. All were served alike; no distinction was made, from the chief Collector of Customs down to the country postmaster, and, in the face of all this, we find these gentlemen rise in this House and charge the present Administration with having introduced the American system. I know they have said, in extenuation of their misconduct, that these officials were not regularly appointed and had not their commissions. But I hold in my hand the commission of one of those gentlemen who was dismissed in the Island, who was regularly and properly appointed by the Dominion Government, a gentleman against whom not one word can be said, and a most efficient officer. Still, he was dismissed for no other reason than that he was known to be a Liberal Conservative. I refer to Mr. John Costin, late Preventive Officer for the port of Summerside. This man was regularly appointed; his commission, as can be seen, is signed by Lord Dufferin; he held the same position for five years under the Local Government, before Confederation, discharged his duties honourably and well; but all would not do; he was sacrificed to make room for one of their political partisans, and still they talk of dismissals for political reasons. This, however, is only one case out of dozens which can be shown in Prince Edward Island. With regard to the Prince Edward Island Railway, a great deal has been said by my hon. colleague (Mr. Yeo) about the removal of Messrs McKechnie and Cunningham, and the appointing of Mr. McNab to take their places. This was done on the score of economy. But he says, why not have appointed Mr. Cunningham. Now I say it would be inconsistent for Mr. Cunningham to take this position, as it would imply that for the five years he had been there he had little or nothing to do. It is a well known fact that Mr. McNab now performs duties that occupied the whole time and attention of five men under the late Administration. In those good old days the Prince Edward Island Railway was a happy retreat for political favourites from all parts of the Dominion. No road of its length on the continent had such a staff of officials—a Superintendent, an Engineer, an assistant engineer, a deputy assistant engineer, a sub-deputy assistant engineer—all men cleaned out, and now Mr. McNab performs the duties of the whole lot. These men were all paid large salaries out of the revenues of the road, and it was utterly impossible that we could have anything else but deficits with regard to it. I know the road is now worked with much less expense than it was under the late management, while its efficiency has not been in the least impaired; in fact it is affording more accommodation to the general public than it ever did before. I am aware that Mr. McNab is very hard-worked, that his duties are both onerous and responsible, and I trust that the hon. the Minister of Railways will shortly be in a position to increase his salary, as at present the amount he receives is not at all adequate to the duties he is called upon to perform. I approve of the action of the Government in dismissing all superfluous and unnecessary officials; but it is only fair and just that the men who are retained and have to do the work should receive salaries upon which they can live. There are other officials on the Island Railway who are not sufficiently paid for the duties they have to perform, notably the paymaster and auditor, who have to perform very responsible duties, and whose salary is very small. I hope that another readjustment will take place shortly, and that all the officials who are now underpaid will have their salaries increased. The hon. gentleman from Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) has stated that Mr. Cunningham had to take charge of the harbour works on the Island in addition to his duties on the railway. This is a fact, but it was an unfortunate arrangement, as Mr. Cunningham was incompetent or neglected this part of his duties. I know, in one instance at least, the country has suffered severe loss owing to the manner in which Mr. Cunningham failed to perform his duties properly as a harbour engineer. At Miminigosh, Prince Edward Island, he laid off the work for the construction of a break-water, and, owing to the careless and slovenly manner in which it was done, the fall storm swept it almost wholly away, and it will now take $2,000 to repair it. In referring again to this question of dismissals, I may say I have great fault to find with the present Government for the way they have used their friends. I believe in the permanency of the Civil Service, but, if we are to have our Civil Service permanent, if we are to have it able and efficient, and if we wish to have it hold the confidence of the country, the servants of the people should not take part in politics. When we see our civil servants, as was the case in Prince Edward Island during the last campaign, leave their offices, neglect their duties, and travel through the country, making political speeches, and mixing up in the turmoil and squabbles of party politics, reform becomes necessary, and those parties should be dismissed. I was told that, when parties neglected their duties, they would be dismissed. I have proved charges against several parties for neglect of duty, but I still find that the Government retain them in their positions, and will not discharge them, being, I presume, afraid that the Opposition will say they have been dismissed for political reasons. This is not the way the friends of the present Government were used by the Opposition when they were in power in 1873? They dismissed almost all our friends who were appointed by the Government of the right hon. gentleman who leads the present Government, and I would ask my right hon. friend were not those appointments made in good faith in 1873? I am sure he will say they were, and that they were unjustly and improperly cancelled. This being the case, I hope that he will now consider the claims of those that were dismissed, and have justice done them either by reinstating them in their former positions or by compensating them in some other way.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron): I think the hon. the Minister of Railways and the hon. the First Minister are responsible to a large extent for the divergence which has been made from the real subject matter of the motion before the House. The hon. the First Minister stated, in his usual calm, collected, and emphatic manner, that the Government had dismissed no person from the Public Service for political reasons; and he went further—he defied any person to show that anyone had been dismissed for political reasons. The hon. the Minister of Railways, however, was more moderate and not so emphatic in the language he made use of. He denied that anyone had been dismissed from the service for political reasons, but he admitted that the Government had dispensed with the services of some persons, and he did not venture on the assertion that no one's services had been dispensed with for political reasons. The hon. gentleman could not, in face of the facts, venture on that denial. Now I have the very best reason to believe that many person's services have been dispensed with, without any apparent reason, except a political one. There was George Brown, whose services as postmaster of Baltimore were dispensed with without any reason; if there was any reason I do not know of it; certainly no information was given the House that would warrant his removal; and there was James Maclean.

MR. LANGEVIN: Perhaps the hon. gentleman would not go so fast, and then we should have an opportunity of getting these names.

MR. CAMERON: I mentioned George Brown, of Baltimore, who was dismissed for no reason, except that he was a Liberal and also Mr. James Maclean the postmaster at Mount Pleasant. I hold in my hand a letter from him, in which he says he was dismissed solely because he had been a Liberal. Another person, whose name I do not know, was the postmaster at Hillside. This person's services were dispensed with for no other reason than that he was unfriendly to the hon. gentlemen opposite. The postmaster of Molesworth was dismissed, and, if for other than a purely political reason, no one ever heard of the reason. It is singular that all these men were Liberals. That, however, is not all. I am aware that the person for some time in the service of the Government as captain of the Government dredge on Lake Huron was dismissed. There never was any charge preferred against this man, and there was no ground of complaint against him. He was dismissed by the present Government without a single notice, and solely because he was a political opponent of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. No charge was made against him, no complaint was laid with the Government. He was summarily and without cause removed, and the first intimation he had of it was that his services were no longer required by the Government. And who was appointed in his place? A violent political partisan and supporter of the hon. gentlemen now in power; a man who was formerly in the service of the Government, but who had been dismissed by the late Government for wilfully and persistently disobeying the orders of the Department. In addition to this, his habits were not such as would make it perfectly safe to entrust him with Government property. Captain Fraser had always been a Liberal, but after he became an employé of the Government he took no active part in politics. He was dismissed without cause, and in defiance of the strong remonstrances from the leading men in that section of the country of all shades of politics, who asked that he should be retained in his position; but a pressure was brought to bear upon the Government. The Government weakly yielded to the measure, and the result was that Captain Fraser was dismissed and this other man appointed in his place. Still another case. I am credibly informed that the postmaster of the village of Hillsborough was dismissed without complaint and with no other intimation except that his services were no longer required by the Government. Yes, the unfortunate postmaster of Hillsborough had another notice—a very explicit and very emphatic intimation of what was in store for him. One day after the general elections, there was found posted up on the door of the post-office a notice in these words:—"Poor old man, your Government is dead; prepare to meet your doom." And the poor old man, who had been twenty years in the Government service, in pursuance of the intimation thus promptly given him, did meet his doom. Very shortly after the elections, he got a letter from the Post Office Inspector, as follows:—

"Wednesday, 4th inst. — My assistant will be at Hillsborough for the purpose of transferring the post-office to the charge of Wm. Donaldson. Please, as far as you can, have things in proper shape for removal."

That was the first official intimation he got that his services were no longer required—curt notice and scandalous treatment for a man twenty years in the service. Still another instance of the treatment received by Liberal employés at the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite. For once the gallant gentleman who then presided over the Post Office Department forgot the national characteristic of his race, chivalry, and what did he do? He undertook to lay violent hands politically upon an unfortunate postmistress in the village of Lefroy, and dismissed her, for no reason that she ever heard of. The husband of this lady, Mrs. Fraser, had been postmaster for many years. At his death she was appointed, and held the position formerly held by her husband, and gave general satisfaction to the public. She had the misfortune, according to gentlemen opposite, of being the widow of a Reformer, and so she had to go. I had a letter last year, complaining in the strongest possible language of the manner in which she had been treated by the Post Office Department. There may have been some other reasons for the dismissal, but, if so, they have not been submitted to Parliament. I am only speaking of what was communicated to me. But it is perfect nonsense for hon. gentlemen to say that they have not dismissed, or, using the milder language of the hon. the Minister of Canals and Railways, dispensed with the services of, a great many public employés of Liberal proclivities, and appointed their own political friends in their places. Of the latter I do not complain; of the first I do complain. If there is a vacancy properly created, I do not expect them to appoint their opponents to the office. I believe it is the worst thing that can happen to the country, and to the Public Service of the country, to have those who are in the Public Service dismissed with every change of Government. I do not believe, with my hon. friend from South Wentworth (Mr. Rymal), that such a rule should prevail in this country.

MR. CAMERON.

"To the victors belong the spoils" may do well under other forms of Government, but it will not do under this. But hon. gentlemen may rest assured that, if they go on dispensing with the services of Government officials without reason, except political ones, the American system will ultimately prevail. If our friends are to be dismissed from office because they happen to be our friends, when our friends come into power, as undoubtedly they will ere long, the same measure they mete to us shall be meted out to them again.

MR. McCALLUM: The hon. gentlemen on the other side appointed so many men to office that they sent three men to do two men's work, and sometimes to do one man's work. It was in the interests of the country that some of these men should be discharged. The hon. gentleman from South Huron (Mr. Cameron) brings the charge against the Government that it discharged the captain of a steam dredge. Well, it is not a very important office to be captain of a steam dredge. I know that, as regards the part of the country I come from, there are some men that ought to be dismissed in the interests of the country. I know that this Government is so generous that it will not remove good public servants until their service is required in some other part of the country in the public service. I hope they will continue to do that, but not to dismiss any deserving men without just cause. So far as I know they have not done so. The only charge that has yet been made against the Government is that they have dismissed the occupants of a few paltry post-offices and a steam dredge captain.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I repeat what I said already, that I am very glad to receive the names of any persons who are said to have been removed political causes, and we will pledge ourselves to give an answer to the House. I do not say it will be satisfactory to the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron). I do not believe that any answer will be satisfactory to him. He is a desperate unbeliever, and, no matter what we say, he thinks there is some secret reason which induces us to remove a man; that the complaints are false and the reasons miserable. If the hon. gentleman is a believer of that kind we cannot help it. But we desire to address ourselves in the statements we make to the candid consideration of the House, who, we hope, will view our statements with some degree of consideration, and not be led altogether by political prejudices, which evidently cloud my hon. friend's usually clear judgment.

MR. ANGLIN: You will, I hope, look into the case of the postmaster, for instance.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: We will be glad to take that up.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P. E. I.): I should not have taken part in this discussion were it not that reference has been made to dismissals in Prince Edward Island. Our people in Prince Edward Island are not unreasonable and are quite willing to recognise the principle of permanency in the Civil Service, but what they do complain of, however, is this: When that Province entered into the Confederation under the British North America Act, all persons then holding office became as much officers of the Civil Service of the Dominion as if they were appointed twenty years before. When the change of Government took place in 1873, almost every man who had assisted in carrying Confederation, was turned out of office and thus faith was broken with them since they supposed themselves secure in their positions under the arrangements made at the time of Confederation. That is the way these men were rewarded for their loyal services in bringing about Confederation. It is true that many of them were appointed by Order in Council before the preceding Government went out, but they were appointed for the purpose of fixing the salaries under the separate Government of the Province. Before Confederation the salaries were necessarily small, and it was to fix their salaries under the new order of things and to confirm them in their appointments that the Orders in Council were passed. The dismissal of these officers, then, was not only a breach of faith but it was a violation of the British North America Act. What our people say is this: We do not want to interfere in the permanency of the Civil Service, but we ask that, whenever one of our friends, who was in office at the time of Confederation, and performed his duties well, was yet dismissed in 1873 he should be reinstated in this office. That is the principle they have recognised and contended for. As to the dismissals in Prince Edward Island by the present Government, there have been none that I am aware of. In the Department over which I have the honour to preside, instructions were given everywhere by me to the Fishery Inspectors that no man should be discharged without good cause and none for political reasons alone, although I have had scores of persons coming to me and asking for the appointment of their friends. But instructions were given to examine and report on the service, and, wherever a man would not attend to the duties of his office properly, he was to be dismissed. I challenge any member of the House to show that any dismissal has taken place in that Department for political reasons. Last year, a great outcry was made in this House about the dismissal of the master of a steamer. I said then that any master of a steamer who knocks the bottom out of his ship should be dismissed. The dismissal of Captain Purdy has saved thousands of dollars to this country. The steamer this year has done much more work at a much less cost. I say it is necessary to the Public Service that efficient officers should be appointed, and, if they perform their duties properly, they should be kept in their positions and rewarded. As regards the dismissal of Mr. McKechnie, on the Prince Edward Island Railway, the hon. the Minister of Railways, after a careful examination, conceived that a large amount of money might be saved by dispensing with his services. But he was not the Chief Engineer; he was the Superintendent of the road. Mr. Cunningham was sent there as engineer, and there was not work for both of them. However, we do not deny that, when appointments are to be made, we do not usually choose them from among our political opponents. A large amount of money has been saved in salaries on that road, and its working now gives general satisfaction. The hon. member for Prince County (Mr. Yeo) has referred to some officials that were dismissed, to which I do not think necessary to reply. But there was another dismissal that took place in his own county, of a gentleman filling the position of Customs Collector. He wanted to enter the Local Legislature, and ran contrary to law, for under the Local Act a man cannot occupy a seat in the House of Commons and hold an official position in the Province. He did not send in his letter of resignation, but the hon. member for Prince County carried it to the head of the Customs Department and said: "Here is Mr. White's resignation; he is running for the Local Legislature. But I intend to keep it, only I want you to take notice that I have shown it to you." If he were elected, his resignation would be in the hands of the Department, but in the event of defeat it was to be handed back to him.

MR. YEO: I deny that in toto. I can take an oath that I never saw his resignation up to this day. It was told me that he sent his resignation in, and that he saw the hon. the Minister of Customs last summer, at Summerside, and that hon. gentleman rebuked him for running for the Local Legislature. The former said he had sent in his resignation, and asked why someone had not been appointed in his place. For my part, I deny that I ever saw the resignation. I think it is wrong for the hon. gentleman to get up in this House and state that without having some proof. I do not see where he can get his proof.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P. E. I.): I call upon the hon. the Minister of Customs to state what occurred.

MR. BOWELL: I was in Summerside last summer, and had an interview with the gentleman to whom reference has been made. He had positively denied to the Inspector of Customs in Nova Scotia, who was then on an inspecting tour through Prince Edward Island, that he had run an election at all. Then I met him in presence of the Inspector, and asked him how he expected to perform his duties as Collector if he was elected to the Legislature of Prince Edward Island. I may say also that there were charges against that gentleman which it is unnecessary to refer to now. The hon. gentleman knows that his accounts were in such a state as to justify his non-retention in office. When asked how he expected to perform his duties while running an election, particularly if elected, he replied that he had sent in his resignation, entrusting it to the hon. gentleman from Prince County, who has demanded this explanation. I told him I had heard nothing of it, but would enquire. I asked Mr. Johnson, the Commissioner, about it, and I think his word is to be relied upon as well as that of any man in the country, and he told me distinctly that the hon. gentleman from Prince County (Mr. Yeo) brought the resignation into the office. The Commissioner asked that the resignation be left with him, but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Yeo) said "No," but wished him to take note of the fact that he had been in the office and showed it to him. That is the authority upon which my hon. colleague made the statement. I leave it to my predecessor in office, or to any gentleman who has had any transaction with the Commissioner of Customs, to judge of the correctness of any statement he would make.

MR. CASEY: I rise to a point of order. It is against the Rules of the House to dispute the credibility of any hon. member.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think the hon. member for Prince County invited this and insisted on the proof.

MR. CASEY: I press my point of order. It is not right for any member to state that he will leave it to the House whether or not the word of Commissioner Johnson is not as good as that of any hon. member.

MR. BOWELL: The hon. member for Prince County challenged my hon. friend for his authority, and the demand was acceded to.

MR. MILLS: The hon. gentleman went further than that. He impeached the word of the hon. member for Prince County. He said the word of Commissioner Johnson should be preferred.

MR. BOWELL: I did not. I said that anyone who knew Commissioner Johnson would not dispute his veracity.

MR. MILLS: And the hon. gentleman appealed to his predecessor in office to substantiate his statement, that the word of Mr. Johnson should be taken and that of the hon. member for Prince County should be rejected.

MR. YEO: I did not see the Deputy Minister last winter, and I have no recollection of being in the office since the late Minister went out. I will go before a magistrate to-morrow and testify to that effect. I do not dispute Mr. Johnson's word, but let him do the same, and we will have the matter properly before the House.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.): Whether the hon. gentleman doubts the word of the Commissioner of Customs or not, I was correct in the statement I made.

MR. CASEY: I ask for the ruling of the Speaker on my point of order.

MR. SPEAKER: I think the whole discussion is out of order.

MR. CASEY: The point is, whether any hon. member, who has made a statement with regard to his personal conduct, can be impeached by any other gentleman.

MR. SPEAKER: Not at all. When a member states a fact, or gives an opinion in the House, his word ought to be believed.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.): I have been challenged myself during the course of this debate. Reference has been made to the dismissals in Prince Edward Island, and it was stated that they were made in violation of the law. I will go a great deal further, and show how far the late Government went. Two or three of those dismissed by Order in Council were re-appointed. Our friends were dismissed and paid off. Those men who were reinstated on account of the support they gave to the Government were paid at the salary fixed; but our men were paid at the salary which they were in the habit of receiving before Confederation. I went one day every week to try and get justice done, but failed. I was told the men had never been paid. The amount stands charged to-day against Collector Currie, who is dead, while our men were turned out and paid a smaller salary than they were in the habit of receiving. Those who were guilty of that conduct are the same persons who charge the Government with wrongful dismissals.

MR. COCKBURN: Late in 1878 the post-office in Hillside was closed and the postmaster dismissed. The man was doing well, and I am sure that, if the case had been investigated, justice would have been done to the locality. There is no doubt but that some rival, actuated by malice, sent in an adverse report and the office was closed. I think if the hon. the Postmaster-General investigated the matter the office would be reopened.

MR. CASEY: Before the motion is put, I wish to say a few words to recall the debate to the point at which it started. We began by discussing how the Government could justify the placing of inexperienced men in office and the discharge of competent officials. I find from the discussion that my motion was fully justified. The remarks of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue gave an entirely new aspect to the question. His statement, which was backed up by the right hon. the leader of the Government, was that the Weights and Measures Act was intended chiefly to secure economy. They reduced the number of men employed from 125 to 40 and the question arose as to who should be retained. The hon. gentleman, it appears, did his best to secure the retention of all who were efficient, and the reason why he only retained twelve of the old men was that the rest was not fit for the duties to be entrusted to them.

MR. BABY: I never said anything of the kind.

MR. CASEY: The hon. gentleman stated distinctly that he wished to secure efficiency, and that he only retained twelve, and the inference was that the twenty-eight were dismissed on account of inefficiency. If not, why were they turned out?

MR. BABY: Somebody had to be turned out.

MR. CASEY: That is what I thought. They were turned out to make room for friends of the Administration. The hon. gentleman takes another ground now. He says they were not discharged on political grounds or on account of inefficiency, but because "somebody had to be turned out." But I take the most favourable view to the Government, namely, that the men were dismissed because it was thought better men could be got in their stead. The burden of proof, therefore, rests with the Government, to shew by this return that the men they appointed are more efficient than those they suspended. If that cannot be done, it stands confessed that the men were turned out for political reasons, pure and simple. In my own county (Elgin), it would be considered ridiculous by all who know the parties to assert that the reason for making the change was the greater efficiency of the new officer. But another reason has been given for the changes. The hon.

gentleman opposite stated that the grouping of the counties necessitated the choice of men in central places, so that they could cover the whole group. In the town of St. Thomas, however, the gentleman dismissed and the one appointed both lived in the same town. That change certainly could not be on account of the grouping system. I am also informed by the hon. member who sits behind me that the new Inspector at Brantford was sent up from Quebec. That can scarcely be the effect of centralisation. We have, it appears, got done with the word "dismissed," which is too rough and vigorous. It is something like the Captain of H. M. S. Pinafore, who was not allowed to use the "big, big D." I suppose the word "dispensed" "a particularly gentlemanly tone implants" in the minds of those who have the disagreeable duty of turning out Reformers and putting Conservatives in their places. Many of the men were turned out without having returned to them the sums paid to the Superannuation Fund. The right hon. the leader of the Government has told us that it was his principle not to dismiss anyone for political reasons. I believe he has really resisted a great deal of pressure. The hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) explained how the resistance was made, and he took credit for the patriotism of the Conservative party. He said: "When we came into power, we did not set to work to make appointments for the mass of offices; in the Weights and Measures Department in the hands of the Government we reduced the number of officials to forty." That is all very nice. It means that, instead of filling an occasional vacancy, they cleared the field and created forty new vacancies. I wish to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue to what appears to be a mistake, perhaps on my part, however, in regard to the number of inspectors. I think the hon. gentleman gave the number as 125. I have by me the report for the fiscal year 1878-9, and I can only find that ninety-seven inspectors received pay. The right hon. the leader of the Government says that all cause of dissatisfaction has been removed under the present administration of the law. He states that Hamilton has become pleased with the working of the Act. It does not appear, however, that Montreal is satisfied.

MR. GAULT: The traders are quite satisfied now.

MR. CASEY: A great part of the official report I have in hand is taken up with the argument against the dissatisfaction expressed by the manufacturers. The head of the Department said the manufacturers would object to anything like official supervision. If this is a correct official report—that this dissatisfaction is groundless—I must now infer, from the statements of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, that all checks upon the makers of weighing machines have ceased. That is the point of difference between them.

Motion agreed to.

SHELBURNE HARBOUR—EXPENDITURE ON LIGHTHOUSES.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) moved for an Order of the House for a detailed statement of expenditure incurred during the years 1878 and 1879 in repairing lighthouse, and erection of new buildings at the light station, McNutt's Island, Shelburne Harbour, Nova Scotia, and a similar statement of expense incurred during the same years at Cape Sable light station, in the same county. He said that a large portion of the lumber and other materials used for those works, and the carpenters required, were brought from Halifax by steamer, when they could have been more cheaply procured in Shelburne itself, where there was a large number of mechanics out of employment. In future the residents of the county or locality chiefly interested in such works should receive the preference.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.): I have no objection to send down the papers asked for. The old building had to be torn down, and others repaired, but a steamer was not specially sent from Halifax with materials and carpenters as represented. The Government steamer had to be sent to all the the stations at regular periods, and on this occasion we found it better and safer to send to our agent at Halifax, and have the matter put in his hands with instructions to adopt the best and cheapest means of performing the work. It was well done, which justifies the course followed. I do not think any extravagance was permitted, the whole expenditure on the Island being only $900.

Motion agreed to.

DRAWBACK ON INDIAN CORN.

MOTION FOR ORDER IN COUNCIL.

MR. CASEY moved for an Address for a copy of Order in Council authorising a drawback of five cents per bushel on Indian corn imported for the manufacture of starch; also copy of any Minute of Council or other document which explains the grounds on which this Order was issued. He said: The operation of the duty on Indian corn has been watched with the greatest care by the farmers, because it is one of those taxes supposed to compensate them for the burdens laid on them in order to encourage home manufactures. However doubtful a boon this protective tax might appear to the farmers, even if it accomplished all claimed for it, namely, the raising of the price of corn, it appears in a different light when the discrimination appears in favour of the manufacturers as against the farmers who import this corn, and that is what they complain of in the Order in Council to which my motion has reference. That Order provides that a drawback of five cents per bushel on corn be allowed when imported for the manufacture of starch to be exported. A large number of farmers import corn for the manufacture of beef, to be exported to England, and rightly complain of being charged $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on it, while the starch-makers pay but $2\frac{1}{2}$ c. per bushel. The hon. the Minister of Customs stated that he calculated the refuse from corn used in starch-making as worth $2\frac{1}{2}$ c. per bushel for fertilising purposes, and that, if it could be shown the refuse after the feeding of cattle with corn was worth as much, he would consent to the same drawback. We all know that the land is greatly fertilised by the manure from corn-fed cattle—that their manure is richer than any guano. This manure is left in the country, though the cattle are exported, making, with the profit realised on the beef, a double gain. Stock-raising is a necessary accompaniment of good farming, the presence of cattle being necessary to the maintenance of the fertility of the land; and cattle cannot be profitably fed here on a large scale without American corn. Injury is done to the large cattle raising and exporting interest, while a preference is shown to the small starch manufacture. Such a discrimination amounts to an insult to the larger interest. I desire to obtain by my motion the real reasons of the drawback in question. If the argument for a drawback on account of the good feeding properties of the refuse of corn from starch be sound, it is stronger still as regards the refuse from whiskey, though, of course, the favour will be shown to that interest by the hon. the Finance Minister; but I am concerned only with our farmers, who are placed at a disadvantage compared with the English farmers, who can have American corn laid down in Britain as cheaply as in Canada, the ocean freight only equaling the discriminating duty against Canadians. Yet this discriminating duty is defended as a tax in the Canadian farmer's interest. It will be the duty of the hon. the Minister of Finance and the hon. the Minister of Customs, hereafter, to explain how they have overlooked this point.

Motion, agreed to.

EXCHEQUER COURT—PETITIONS OF RIGHT.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. GUTHRIE moved for an Address for a statement showing :

1. The names of all suppliants who have filed Petitions of Right in the Exchequer Court, and whose claims have afterwards been compromised or submitted to arbitration, or in any way withdrawn from the Court or disposed of otherwise than by the Judges.
2. The stage the proceedings had reached before such compromise or submission.
3. The terms of compromise or submission.
4. The results of any such arbitration.
5. Also for copies of any report or statement in writing made at the time, showing the reasons for withdrawing such cases from the Court.
6. Also for copies of the petition, answer and other proceedings, and the judgment on demurrer in the case, in the Exchequer Court, of Marshall Wood versus the Queen.

He said: In asking for this Address, I do so for the purpose of ascertaining the extent to which this system of arbitration has been adopted by the Government in dealing with claims against the Crown—claims that have been first preferred in the Exchequer Court. It will be remembered that that Court was established some four years ago, and it was clothed with jurisdiction to try issues both of law and of fact, and to try legal and equitable issues without a jury, to hold trial in any part of the Dominion, and to hold trial partly in one place and partly in another, as might be convenient. The Court had also ample powers to refer any question of damages to the Registrar or a referee, and so completely possessed was the Court of jurisdiction to try thoroughly all sorts of claims against the Crown, that I find the present leader of the Government on that occasion actually advocated very strenuously the abolition of the official Board of Arbitrators. I find it is reported that Sir John A. Macdonald said :

“As the hon. gentleman had restricted the right of petitioners with regard to tribunals before which their cases should be tried, he might as well go still further and abolish the official Arbitrators altogether.”

And again :

“He therefore thoroughly approved of the limitation proposed by this Bill, under which the Court should judge of fact as well as of law, and if this were provided, what was the use of a reference to a Court of Arbitrators?”

And then, after explaining and approving of the system in operation in the United States, that is, the trial of claims against the Government by trained Judges, the right hon. gentleman proceeded :

“Under the circumstances, he would press on the Government the advisability of doing away with the official Arbitrators, and leaving all these matters to be tried by the Supreme Court and the Court of Exchequer.”

Mr. Cameron, then member for Cardwell, also took very strong ground in favour of doing away with Arbitrators and leaving the whole matter to be tried by the Exchequer Court, and the present Minister of Railways took the same ground. It is a matter of surprise, therefore, these being the views of the gentlemen now composing the Government, to find, as it is reported, that several very important claims have been referred to arbitrators, have been taken out of Court, as we understand it, where they could be dealt with in a thoroughly efficient manner, where justice would be done and where the interests of the Crown and suppliants would equally be well guarded, and placed under the control of gentlemen whose functions, in the opinion of the leader of the Government, ought to cease. I think, therefore, the House and the country are entitled to the information this Address asks for.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman is mistaken in supposing that there are a number of cases of the kind mentioned which have been withdrawn from the Court and left to arbitration. However we will not discuss that until the return comes down. It will speak for itself. The hon. gentleman quotes the remarks I made when the Supreme and Exchequer Court Bill was before the House. I then thought it would be quite as well to have given the Court of Exchequer complete jurisdiction over such matters, and that the Official Arbitrators need not be any longer employed. We were, however, overborne by the wisdom of hon. gentlemen opposite, and I have no doubt the hon. gentleman who has just spoken was as strongly in favour of retaining the services of these Official Arbitrators as those with whom he acts. The suggestion, however, was not assented to by gentleman opposite, and the Official Arbitrators were retained; and, if I am not much mistaken, they were employed systematically and continuously by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) during the time he was at the head of the Department of Public Works and at the head of the Government. It does not lie well with the hon. gentleman who thwarted us in our praiseworthy attempt, as it would appear from his remarks, to invest the sole jurisdiction in the Court of Exchequer, to cross the floor now.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman at the head of the Government has a very short memory when he says no case has been withdrawn. I objected very strongly last Session to the withdrawal of the case of Murray.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That was not withdrawn.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes; there was an interlocutory judgment delivered, and the case was then referred to the Registrar of the Court, to take evidence on certain points and report to the Court. The result of this, I believe, was a loss of over $100,000. There was another case, which one of the Arbitrators told me had been submitted to him for enquiry and report.

I do not know what the result has been, although it is stated in the papers that he has given his decision. The hon. gentleman will search in vain for any act of mine that looked in the direction of submitting a case to arbitrators that had been submitted to the Court of Exchequer or any other judicial tribunal. My idea was, and now is, that no case of magnitude should be settled by any arbitrator, but should be sent to the Court of Exchequer. It was with that view that the Petition of Rights Act was passed. It was a gross outrage to submit such a case as that to one man, whose capacity was not such as to justify any reference of such an important case. I am very glad my hon. friend has brought the matter up, in order that I may discover the exact facts as to the other cases.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I am astonished by the statements that have been made by the leader of the Opposition. The case he refers to of Murray vs. the Queen was tried before Mr. Justice Fournier, in June, 1877. He took a year to consider the question, and in June, 1878, he gave judgment on all the legal points raised by the defence against the Government, and he declared that an examination should be taken by the Registrar into the measurements, which he stated was necessary in order to establish the position of the case. It was obvious that the Registrar would not be as well qualified as an expert for the purpose of taking measurements, and that the interests of the Government could not be protected by this evidence being taken before a person who was not a professional engineer. The services of Mr. Keefer were obtained for the purpose of discharging the duty assigned to the Registrar. Mr. Justice Fournier decided the case against the Government, who were bound to appeal if they thought the judgment wrong. They did not do so. The plaintiff, who had obtained judgment in his favour, called upon the then Minister of Public Works, who has now brought this question up. In his letter he says:

"About the 1st of August last, I called on the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie in reference to the matter, when he told me that if it could be arranged in any way speedier than by the tedious process of taking on account before the Registrar, he would be happy to do so, and he requested me to have the Hon. John O'Connor, one of my counsel, come and see him on the subject. Mr. O'Connor and I went before him, when after some consultation together, Mr. Mackenzie said he would procure a copy of the judgment, and would let us hear from him in a few days. Nothing has since been heard from Mr. Mackenzie on the subject, nor has anything further been done."

I suppose the hon. gentleman was otherwise engaged. He never let them hear from him. That was the position in which the matter came before us. The application was referred to Mr. Lash, Deputy Minister of Justice. Mr. Lash says in his reply :

"Mr. Justice Fournier held that, as a matter of fact, changes had taken place in the grades and lines of location, which entitled the contractor to a decision by the Commissioners (or the Ministers as representing them) as to whether such changes subjected the contractor to a deduction for diminution of work, or entitled him to an allowance for increased work. He held further that, as a matter of fact, such decision had never been come to by the Commissioners or by the Minister. That, therefore, it was impossible to say what amount (if any) the contractor was entitled to on account of these changes, and he referred it to the Registrar of the Court, to obtain such legal evidence as could be adduced by the parties for the purpose of getting the number and quantity of alterations of the location, and of the grades which either increased or diminished (as the case might be) the work under contract, and of ascertaining the value of such increase or diminution, and the balance which might be due to either party after these calculations were made. The Registrar has not yet taken any proceedings under this order, and Mr. Oakes now asks that the Department of Public Works should do what the learned Judge has referred to be done by the Registrar of the Court. I see no legal objection to the Department undertaking to settle the matter, and to make the necessary measurements and calculations, etc.; but it should be done by the Department only upon the parties entering into an agreement to abide by the decision which may be come to, leaving nothing for the Court to do in the case, except to make the necessary order or decree to carry out such agreement, and to decide upon the question of the costs of the legal proceedings."

So that, under Judge Fournier's judgment, Mr. Lash declared that the only thing to do was to have the measurement ascertained as directed. It was decided to substitute Mr. Keefer, a professional man, for the purpose of protecting the interests of the Government in relation to this question, which it would be impossible for the Registrar to do. Mr. Lash was called upon to prepare an agreement. He did so, and enclosed it in these terms :—

SIR CHARLES TUPPER.

"MURRAY vs. THE QUEEN.

"MY DEAR SIR,—The enclosed agreement, referring to the award of Mr. S. Keefer, the claim in this case is correct in form. The effect is as follows :—

"1. The petitioner's whole claim is referred.

"2. The Crown abandons any claim for penalties on account of delay in prosecuting the work.

"3. The costs of the proceedings in Court are to abide the event; that is, the successful party gets them, and the costs of the reference are to be fixed by the Arbitrator. If Council approves of the agreement, an Order should be passed in the form of report enclosed.

"Yours truly,

"(Signed)" Z. A. LASH.

"The Hon. C. TUPPER."

The testimony was taken. The gentleman who was appointed by the leader of the Opposition, then Minister of Public Works, was familiar with the whole case, and had tried it in the Court before Judge Fournier.

MR. MACKENZIE: Who was that?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Mr. McIntyre; he was employed by the Government as the most competent person to protect the interests of the Government, and I believe that gentleman has very efficiently discharged his duty. After the evidence had been taken and the award made, I referred the matter to Mr. Lash, to know if we had power to appeal against that award. Here is his answer :

"OTTAWA, 3rd May, 1879.

"MURRAY vs. REGINA.

"SIR,—You have asked my opinion as to the correctness of the award made by the Arbitrator in this case.

"The evidence, which was reported in shorthand, is exceedingly lengthy. I have found it impossible in the time at my disposal to peruse and consider it. I doubt my ability to properly understand it, or to form an opinion from it as to the correctness, or otherwise, of the Arbitrator's finding, as from the nature of the case, no one but an Engineer, or person having the knowledge of an Engineer, could properly deal with it.

"I have, however, read Mr. Keefer's statement, giving the particulars, etc., of his award. I think he has dealt with the case upon proper principles, and with the exception of one item referred to below, the amount he has allowed to or deducted from the petitioners claim are, he states, found to be the result of changes of grade or location, or had been admitted by the Government Engineer to be extras. This is exactly what the Court ordered the Registrar to do, and what I fear the Registrar, not having the necessary technical knowledge, could not himself have properly done without being assisted by an Engineer.

"As Mr. McIntyre, the counsel employed by the Crown, had attended both the trial before Judge Fournier and the reference before the Arbitrator, and was therefore familiar with all the evidence, I wrote him the letter, of which copy is enclosed, asking his opinion on the award. I enclose copy of his reply, by which you will see that he thinks the evidence fully warranted the finding.

"The item I referred to above is No. 36 in Mr. Keefer's statement, consisting of $1,000 allowed for loss sustained by the contractor in not getting a borrow-pit for nearly a year after he should have got it. This item does not, of course, depend on change of grade or location, and so would not have come within the reference to the Registrar made by the Judge. The Court, however, on receiving the Registrar's report on the other items, could have dealt with this, and I am not prepared to say that the contractors are not entitled to an allowance for the loss sustained.

"On the whole, I think substantial justice to all parties has been done by the award, and that it would be useless to move against it.

"I have the honour to be, Sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"(Signed) Z. A. LASH,
"D.M.J."

"The Hon. C. TUPPER,

"Minister of Public Works."

"DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,

"OTTAWA, 15th April, 1879.

"MURRAY vs. REGINA.

"SIR,—I find it laid down in Morse on Arbitration and Award, that 'An agreement, simply that the award shall be final and conclusive, is powerless to take away the right to assail its validity in the ordinary way and upon the ordinary grounds.'

"The awards are commonly used to express the intention of the parties to be bound by the award; but they are not of greater force.

"The submission in this case contains the usual clause that the award is to be final and nothing more; therefore, the case comes within the rule above defined.

"As you acted as counsel for the Crown in the case, and are familiar with the proceedings before the Arbitrator and the evidence, I have the honour to request your opinion upon the award, and whether it could be successfully moved against,

"I am, Sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"(Signed) Z. A. LASH,
"D. M. J."

"A. F. McINTYRE, Esq.,

"Ottawa."

"OTTAWA, 26th April, 1879.

"MURRAY vs. REGINA.

"DEAR SIR,—In reply to your letter requesting my opinion upon the award of Mr. Samuel Keefer in this matter, and whether it could be successfully moved against.

"I beg to say, that without considering any technical difficulties in consequence of the matter referred being a claim against Her Majesty, but considering the award as if it had been in the case of a claim between a subject and a subject, I am of opinion that any application to set aside the award would be unsuccessful.

"The proceedings before the Arbitrator were regularly conducted, the award regularly made, and the evidence before him, in my opinion, fully warranted his finding.

"I have the honour to be, Sir,

"Your obedient servant.

"(Signed) A. F. McINTYRE.

"Z. A. LASH, Esq.,

"Deputy Minister Justice,

"Ottawa."

This is Mr. McIntyre's reply, and, after this statement of the gentleman whom the hon. the leader of the Opposition selected, I think the hon. gentleman will not venture upon a repetition of the statement he has made here to-night.

MR. MACKENZIE : Yes, he will.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER : Then he will discredit his own counsel. He will stand in the position of having failed in his duty to the Crown by having failed to appoint a person competent to protect the interests of the Crown. Here is the statement made by a gentleman appointed by the hon. the Minister of Public Works at that time to protect the interests of the Crown, and that statement was one of a gentleman who had before him all the evidence. There is the opinion of Mr. McIntyre himself, that the finding of Mr. Keefer was correct. Mr. McIntyre sustains the finding of the award as being supported by the evidence. If anything would induce the hon. gentleman to withdraw the statement he has made, it would be this. I have read the opinion of his counsel, and now what Mr. Lash said, both of whom did own that the evidence warranted the finding and that justice has been done. Now, I am sure the hon. gentleman could not have read this, or if he has read it he must have forgotten it, or he would not have made the statement he has made against the authority of his own trusted officers, who have justified, to the fullest extent, the award in that case, and have stated distinctly that it would be useless to move against it.

MR. MACKENZIE : The hon. gentleman was in the habit, during our Administration, of accusing me of shielding myself behind some officer, but now he does it systematically. He has referred to the opinion of the Deputy-Minister of Justice and the attorney for the Crown. But, Sir, the Deputy-Minister of Justice was not responsible for the case. I contend that the case should not have been withdrawn from the Court. It is the withdrawal of the case from the Court that I charge the hon. gentleman with. There was no difficulty whatever in the way of the District Registrar taking the evidence with the assistance of Messrs. Fleming and Schreiber; but it was taken wholly out of the Court by the Government, who relegated it to one gentleman, long ago removed from the Public Service, and they left it to him to say what the evidence would justify; and whatever his interpretation of the evidence was. It was the sole ground upon which the verdict was given. It should not have been taken out of the Court at all; the taking of the evidence required by the Judge, before giving his final decision, has been done there properly by the Registrar, with the assistance of the Engineers of the Department. I did not see the printed paper until the hon. gentleman was reading it.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: It was in the Sessional Papers.

MR. MACKENZIE: Well, I was not aware of it. If I recollect aright, neither Mr. Fleming nor Mr. Schreiber were before the Arbitrators to give evidence or direct the taking of evidence. I think not. That is my recollection, and they were not called upon to make special reports to the Arbitrator on the matter. Everything seems to have been arranged in the loosest fashion. I do not accuse the Government of having purposely put the case in the worst possible light, but if they had purposely done so, it could not have been done more loosely. As to bringing up the opinion of a young lawyer, Mr. McIntyre, he is not responsible for withdrawing the case. As to his opinion, that the case was not appealable, his judgment on that point may be right; I leave that to legal gentlemen understanding the technicalities of the law.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): I just have one word to say with reference to this matter. I am glad to do so and to find that I am free to do so. I was engaged in many of these cases at the Bar before I took office, and during the Session I was under the impression that I was engaged in this one, but on enquiry I find that I was under a wrong impression, and therefore I feel at liberty to make an observation or two to the House. The reason why I did not take part during the progress of the investigation before the Arbitrator was in consequence, of course, of being under the impression that I was the counsel in the case, and that, therefore, I had no right to act. I am now able to discuss the point which the hon. the leader of the Opposition has raised. If I understand the hon. gentleman, he says that wrong was done only in one particular, namely, taking the case out of Court and leaving it to the Engineer.

MR. MACKENZIE: No; the hon. gentleman misinterprets me if he says I said that was the only point. What I say is that the great blunder was in withdrawing it from the Court.

MR. McDONALD: It was the same thing. The only withdrawal was the substitution of Mr. Keefer for the Registrar.

MR. MACKENZIE: It should have been left to the Registrar, who could have taken Mr. Fleming, or Mr. Schreiber, or other experts, and made the examination; and from him an appeal would lie, but that was not only not done, but the whole thing was left to Mr. Keefer, as sole Arbitrator, without any appeal whatever. It was so arranged that there could be no appeal.

MR. McDONALD: Practically there is no misunderstanding between us. The hon. gentleman says the wrong was done in making Mr. Keefer the Arbitrator instead of the Registrar, and, by so doing, depriving the parties of any appeal. In reality, the argument does not apply in the slightest particular, as a very short summary of the proceeding will show. The action was brought in the usual course, by Petition of Right. Judgment was given by Judge Fournier, in which he states that the claim for compensation for change of grade and the change of location was well founded, and, further, that, by the action of the hon. the Minister of Public Works, any objection arising from the clause in the Statute had been waived. He held on the evidence of Fleming and Schreiber—on the evidence of engineers engaged on the work—that in point of law and in point of fact it was clear that a great wrong had been done to these contractors, and that that wrong ought to be redressed. Against that judgment, there was an appeal in the Supreme Court, because he had decided by that judgment every point of a legal character raised on the record, every legal objection that could be taken, and that the only point that was to be determined was ascertaining the amount due, if any. It was clear that a gross wrong had been done these people. The manner in which the surveys were taken was of a character simply disgraceful to the men who performed the work. If my hon. friend will refresh his memory, he will see that the District Engineer, who made the surveys, and the assistant engineers by whom reports were made were guilty, according to their own admission, of conduct which was not only careless but disgraceful to them as professional men. My hon. friend will see that it is proved that the mode of management was this: a young lad incompetent for his work, instead of measuring the work in the ordinary way, went, as he admits, to the side of a hill and guessed a whole month's work, without attempting measurements except by the eye; and it is in evidence that he did not on some occasions even take that trouble; he guessed the amount of work that ought to be done by a certain number of men, and gave these worthless returns to the Engineers upon such a basis. Can it be wondered at that such a decision should be arrived at by the Department, founded on the certificate of the Chief Engineer, who in turn was misled by the incompetency and recklessness of the men who made the reports, on which the right of these individuals were to be determined. The judgment of the Court, which could be appealed from, having thus found that the surveys were unreliable, and of a character rendering it impossible that justice could be done, and that these surveys could not be accepted as the basis of calculation—Judge Fournier having found, in fact, that an investigation should be made by the Registrar of the Court, or some other person, as to whether, on a re-measurement, on a strict and careful re-measurement and investigation, there was anything due to these people, for change of location or grade—it was thought more proper to withdraw it from the Registrar, Mr. Cassels, and put it in the hands of a competent engineer. I have never heard Mr. Keefer's ability or integrity doubted. In selecting him the Government thought they were putting it into the hands of a man highly competent to perform such a duty. I need not ask any gentleman of candour in this House whether it was possible that a gentleman of no technical knowledge, of no engineering skill, could take the evidence as well as it could be taken before a competent engineer, upon points involving technical matters of this kind, and give satisfaction to the public or to the Government, or whether it would be possible, on any analysis of evidence taken before the Registrar, to ascertain the amount of work done and the amount due. My hon. friend says the evidence should have been taken by the Registrar with the assistance of Mr. Schreiber and Mr. Fleming. I am surprised to hear the hon. gentleman put forward such a theory as that parties in a case should select their opponents to take the evidence and help to decide their case. I am surprised to hear my hon. friend take exception that Mr. Fleming had been examined as a witness before Judge Fournier. It was his duty to protect the public interests; he relied upon these sub-engineers for the information which guided him; and my hon. friend, I presume, relied upon him for the information by which he was guided, and therefore it was that the whole question got back to the competency of the District Engineer and his assistants, and the character of their work. Very well, my hon. friend would not ask surely that the rights of these contractors should be determined, not by the Court, but by Mr. Cassels, with the assistance of Mr. Fleming and Mr. Schreiber. If Mr. Cassels was competent, he did not want Mr. Fleming's assistance; if not competent, then undoubtedly he was not the man that my hon. friend ought to desire to sit down and arbitrate, or determine, or calculate the amount which was due to those contractors, if any amount was due. My hon. friend asks why was not Mr. Fleming called and examined? That I do not know. Mr. Fleming was here in his office; the Court was held by Mr. Keefer in Ottawa, in the same building, for aught I know, in which Mr. Fleming's office is. If the counsel for the Crown desired Mr. Fleming's evidence, instructed as they were, it was easily forthcoming. But the reason is plain, they did not desire it because he had been examined—not before Mr. Keefer or Mr. Cassels, but before Judge Fournier himself; and it was on the evidence of Mr. Fleming, together with that of the engineers, that Judge Fournier had arrived at the conclusion that in a legal and equitable point of view these people should not be precluded from the investigation they sought. The only argument my hon. friend can put forth is that Mr. Cassels should have done it instead of Mr. Keefer. Now, why should that be so? Why is Mr. Cassels more competent to deal with a question like this? Mr. Keefer is an engineer of high standing and entirely competent to detect inaccuracies, if any were committed by the engineers on both sides. It must be remembered that these men sought to establish their claims, not by their personal testimony, but by competent engineers employed by them to make a careful survey of the work done and a careful investigation into the allegations of the contractors as well as into those of the Government Engineers, and, therefore, the Arbitrator, whoever he may be, or the examiner, whoever he may be, not only must be competent to take and transcribe testimony, but also be able to report, if his report was to be of any value, upon the character and nature of the testimony given before him. Now, we will take it in another point of view. Supposing Mr. Cassels had transcribed the testimony; supposing that, adopting the suggestion of my hon. friend, he had got Mr. Fleming and Mr. Schreiber to assist him in taking the testimony, and that it had gone before Judge Fournier. My impression is that the first step of Judge Fournier would have been a reference to a competent technical authority, a professional authority, to determine the allegations of the respective engineers examined on both sides. This testimony was submitted to Mr. Keefer, not only the testimony taken before himself, but the testimony taken at full length before the Judge charged with the investigation and I hold, that he was the most competent judge to decide this question. The award was of such a character, as my hon. friend has just stated, as not only to approve itself to a professional man of the standing of the Deputy Minister of Justice, but to the counsel acting for the Crown, who had been appointed to conduct the case from its inception before the Exchequer Court, and, who was I believe, entirely competent to deal with that matter. It appears to me, therefore, from these facts, both as to the law and to the evidence adjudicated upon, that only simple justice was done to these people, and I believe that this House and this country desire that, while we protect carefully and scrupulously the public interest in dealing with matters of this kind, and in every way observe those guards and checks which the law imposes at the same time when a case appears as clear as the sun at mid-day, men who have spent their substance in the public interest should not be deprived of their rights by a mere technicality.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron): The hon. gentleman who has just sat down has not in any way touched upon or answered the complaint made by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) as to the way in which the case of Murray versus the Queen was disposed of. The House must remember that we are not discussing whether the engineers in charge of these works were competent or otherwise. It is of no consequence, so far as my hon. friend's complaint is concerned, whether they were skilled engineers or not—understood their business or not—sat, as the hon. the Minister of Justice says they did, on the hill sides or on the mountain tops, or for that matter, upon a tree top and took their observations therefrom. That is not the question we are now discussing. The hon. gentleman has sought to lead the House away from the real complaint made by the hon. member for Lambton and others on this side of the House. What we complained of last Session, and what we now complain of, is that the Government did wrong and were not justified in removing the case from the Courts at all and handing it over to the judgment of a sole Arbitrator. The ground the hon. member for Lambton put it on was perfectly clear. In the first place, by removing the case from the jurisdiction of the Court and placing it in the hands of an Arbitrator, and making the Arbitrator a judge of the law and of the facts, you have deprived yourselves of the right of appeal. do not say whether the award was right or wrong; that is not an element that should enter into the consideration of this question. What I do say is that, by your interference with the ordinary proceedings of the case in Court, you effectually cut yourselves out from an appeal altogether. In making Mr. Keefer sole Arbitrator in the case, you have constituted him a judge of the law and of the fact, and you cannot appeal from his judgment, and the only way you can get rid of the award is that the Arbitrator was guilty of fraud, and that fraud you would require to establish clearly before the Courts would interfere. No ground of that kind is suggested by anyone. If my memory serves me right, that is the only ground upon which the counsel for the Crown based his opinions, as appears by the papers brought down last Session, that no appeal would lie from this award and that the Government had no redress unless it could be shown that the Arbitrator had been guilty of fraud.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Mr. Lash's opinion was that an appeal would lie.

MR. CAMERON: But upon what ground? You cannot appeal from the award. You move the Courts to set it aside, but the application to set it aside must be upon some ground, and the only grounds upon which such an application would succeed would be either that the Arbitrator exceeded his authority or was guilty of fraud. A reference to the papers submitted to Parliament will show that Judge Fournier decided certain legal propositions submitted to him in favour of the suppliants. But that by no means disposed of the case. In the subsequent investigation, other and more complicated questions of law and of fact must necessarily arise before the Arbitrator, in the construction of the contract, and in dealing with the question of extras under the contract. And with this position of affairs staring you in the face, you withdraw the case from the proper tribunal and hand it over to an irresponsible person, a man who is not a lawyer. You not only make him the judge of the law and of the facts, but, in the event of the award being clearly, in your own judgment, wrong, you effectually deprive yourselves of the right of appeal on either the law or the facts, and this is what we properly complain of. The ground taken by the hon. the Minister of Justice and the hon. the Minister of Public Works is that the Registrar was not competent to deal with the case, because it involved some matters which could only properly be dealt with by an expert. The hon. the Minister of Justice says that, if the matter had gone back to Judge Fournier, he would have referred it to experts, because there were questions involved in it that do not usually come before the Courts, and that could be more satisfactorily dispensed with by an expert. The hon. gentlemen know well that every day in the Courts Judges dispose of cases involving professional and scientific questions of the most complicated kind with the help of the evidence of men skilled in such questions. There was no reason why the Registrar of the Court should not take the whole of the evidence—professional and otherwise—and then with the aid of such professional evidence dispose of the whole case himself, or, as contemplated by Judge Fournier's judgment, submit the evidence to the Court for final adjudication. But by the improper conduct of the Government the right of the Crown to obtain the judgment of the Court of last resort is gone. The Registrar is a professional man of standing and quite competent to decide any legal questions that might arise in this case, and no one knows better than the hon. the Minister of Justice that legal questions would necessarily arise, such as the construction of the contract; the meaning of it as read by the surrounding circumstances; the question as to whether the extras claimed by the suppliants should be allowed to them under the peculiar wording of the contracts sued on; and the restrictions and conditions set up in the contracts. The right of the suppliants depended upon the construction you put upon the contract and upon the evidence admissible under the contract, as read by Judge Fournier. Now, all these questions were withdrawn, without reason, from the jurisdiction of the Court, and placed in the hands of a man utterly incapable of dealing with them. It does seem to me that the hon. member for Lambton has well-founded ground of complaint, and that it has been in no way answered by gentlemen opposite. I do not know whether the award was right or wrong. I do not care to enquire whether the facts and the law justify the award—that is not the ground of complaint. The evidence and the law may justify the award or they may not—but nothing that has been said to-night would justify the Government in withdrawing this case from the Courts—cutting off the right of appeal and depriving yourselves of the power of obtaining the judgment of the Court of last resort; and this is what we complain of, and what has not been answered in the slightest degree. There is one point in the motion my hon. friend has made that I think scarcely covers the whole of the ground, and I dare say the hon. the Minister of Public Works would have no objection to its being amended; it ought to ask, not only for the returns of cases already submitted to arbitration, but of cases that have been withdrawn from the Court and submitted to Arbitrators, or referred to experts or others. I would suggest that the motion be made to embrace those cases.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: The hon. gentleman who has just spoken seems to think it a small matter to come here and speak upon a question before this House involving a large sum of money. He says he does not care whether the award made was right or wrong. He is here to guard the public interests, to see that the public money is not misspent or misapplied, yet he says, although these papers were brought down a year ago, although he has had time to read them, yet he does not care whether the award is right or wrong.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron): I did not say any such thing.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: That is the way I understood him, and I believe that is the way his speech will read. The hon. gentleman has been trying to make the country believe that the award of upwards of $100,000 has been made to the suppliant in this case, when there was nothing due him, and that the Government ought to be made responsible for that sum. But if the hon. members will study the award that has been made, and will read the judgment of Mr. Justice Fournier, they will find that the hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken, when he affirms that there were legal points that might arise which Mr. Keefer could not decide; for instance, as to whether the extras should be allowed, or whether the suppliant had any rights at all in the case or not. He ought to have told the House that all those points had been decided by Mr. Justice Fournier; that the case had not been referred to arbitration until it had gone before the Supreme Court, and a learned Judge of that Court had decided that the Government had no defence upon legal grounds; that the contractor had claims against the Government, and that these extras should be paid for. Time was given to appeal from the judgment, and the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), who was then Minister of Public Works, did not appeal from it; and does it now lie in his mouth to upbraid this Government for having likewise submitted to that judgment? The Judge said the officer most available for the purpose of making the investigation into the details was the Registrar of the Court. Now, with all due deference to the Registrar of the Court, I submit that he was not the person to take the evidence, and to decide technical points as to the proper measurements and the proper quantities of the work which this contractor had done, and for which he should be paid. The Government, it seems to me, took a wise and proper course, in appointing one of the most eminent civil engineers in the country for that purpose. Notwithstanding the insinuations of the hon. member for Lambton about his capacity, I say that Mr. Keefer stands pre-eminent in this country as one of the first engineers in it, one whose integrity and capacity alike are above reproach. He took this evidence in a skilful and painstaking manner, and made a report which even the counsel for the Crown, appointed by the hon. member for Lambton, characterised as fully warranted by the evidence and facts of the case. What more can be said to justify the reference and the award? The hon. member for South Huron, speaking from the standpoint of a lawyer, has, no doubt, made out a case. He speaks as a lawyer when he says no Government should withdraw such cases from the Courts, because they prevent appeals. Speaking as a lawyer simply, I commend him, because it diminishes our work and our fees. The hon. gentleman says a thousand legal points might have arisen. Of course they might; hundreds of legal points were bristling up all around, points that bring fees to the lawyers. That is what we want. We must live as well as the rest of the country, and the Government is a good fat client to have. But the hon. gentleman's leader does not agree with him, because he did not ask for an appeal from Mr. Justice Fournier's judgment. But now, as soon as the case is taken where it can be decided on its merits, up rises my hon. friend and says: O, you Government, you are not fit to be entrusted with the affairs of this country, because you removed this case from the Courts. You removed it from the place where we lawyers can make money, and if you do not please the lawyers you cannot please the people of this country.

MR. GUTHRIE: The hon. gentleman from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) has succeeded in making a speech that tends to draw off the attention of the House from the points at issue. He indulges in what people outside the House call a little cheap popularity talk against the legal profession, of which he is one of the ornaments.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: One in favour of it.

MR. GUTHRIE: I supposed my hon. friend was joking. Nothing at all in the course of the discussion has justified the slightest reference to lawyers' fees. The real point is that here was a case in the hands of the Court which had given a decision on certain legal principles, and that case is taken out of the hands of the Court in such a way that the Court afterwards cannot touch it in any shape or way. Now, let us see what the judgment of Justice Fournier really says:

"Being persuaded, after a careful perusal of the evidence, that it is impossible to render justice to the parties without this measurement, I consider it my duty, reserving to myself the right of adjudging afterwards on the merits of the case, to order that this case be referred to the Registrar of this Court."

He says further what was to be referred to the Registrar of the Court:

"To obtain such legal evidence as can be adduced by the parties, for the purpose of getting the number and quantity of alterations of the location."

The Government, then, instead of leaving it in the hands of the Registrar and the Court to judge of the merits of the case, transferred it to an Arbitrator and left themselves practically helpless, no matter what the decision might be. When a case of this kind is referred by the Court of Chancery, the reference is to the Master in Chancery. Sometimes a dozen important questions come up before the Master on different points, and sometimes it is necessary to have the Court pass on the findings of the Master, on questions of law as well as of fact. The Judge here expected the case to come back to him to be decided on its merits, and he left it to the Registrar, who is a lawyer, to hear the evidence and report. This case was, however, transferred to a gentleman who is not a lawyer, and is, consequently, not as capable of taking the evidence and deciding on the merits of the case. My hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. Cameron) did not say that he did not care for the interests of the country in this matter. He did care, and it is because he feels a great wrong has been done to the country that he speaks so warmly on the subject. He might well say that perhaps, by accident or good luck the decision is according to the evidence; but that does not affect the point that these gentlemen who had insisted on the abolition of Arbitrators turned round and put an enormous claim into the hands of an Arbitrator, taking the matter out of the hands of the Court altogether. The Deputy Minister of Justice does not say that he recommends leaving the case to Mr. Keefer, or the Arbitrator; he says that may be done if the Government see fit, and that is the extent of the opinion he gives on the subject. In answer to what I said in making the motion, the hon. the leader of the Government remarked that the late Government did not accept the suggestion of himself and the hon. member for Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper) and the then member for Cardwell (Mr. Cameron) to abolish all arbitrations and leave the claims in the Court. The Government of that day said: We will not abolish them at once; we will see how the new system works, and we will abolish them if we find it unsatisfactory. I will undertake to show that in no instance did the late Government do what the present Administration has done, take a case partially adjudicated and put it in the hands of a layman. The country had a right to expect that these gentlemen, who insisted, when in Opposition, that cases should not be given into the hands of Arbitrators who were not competent, would, when they had the opportunity, put in practice their opinions instead of doing violence to them.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: I must say that I am at a loss to discover the real reason for taking those cases from the Court and leaving them to the decision of one Arbitrator. We are told that Mr. Cassels is not competent to deal with the cases. Judge Fournier thought him perfectly competent, since he was frequently delegated to take sworn testimony in a case, and report back to the Court. If the Government thought Mr. Cassels was not competent to deal with the case, they should have applied to the Court to appoint another person to take the evidence. There was nothing to prevent the appointment of another man to take evidence precisely in the same manner as the Registrar of the Court would take it, and report back to the Judge. Why was it necessary that this matter should be taken entirely out of the hands of the Court and left to the decision of one man? In referring to such cases, many important points of law will arise as to the admission of evidence. Why give Mr. Keefer more power than Mr. Cassels would have? Is it to be understood that in all cases—and there have been a great many pending in the Court, and there may be some now, involving hundreds of thousands of dollars—if the Judge decides the party has a claim and refers that claim to the Registrar, to enable him to decide the case on its merits, an engineer has to be appointed with the power of deciding without any appeal being allowed. Mr. Keefer might have been appointed instead of Mr. Cassels, and he would then have been an officer of the Court, and subject to its supervision and direction. It seems to me to be laying down a dangerous precedent, that any man who has a claim against the Crown, the Judge refers which to the Registrar may have it taken out of the hands of the Court, and referred to some Arbitrator. It was done in the case of Mr. Murray, and may be done again. I think that this case, in which a large amount was involved, should have gone to the Court. The country would have been better satisfied if the decision had come from the Judge instead of Mr. Keefer.

MR. O'CONNOR: I had not intended to take any part in this present discussion, and I would not now had I not been pointedly alluded to by the last speaker. I was counsel for the suppliant in the case now under discussion, but when I became a member of the Government I relinquished my association with the case. With regard to the reference of the case, I had nothing to say or do. I cannot but feel somewhat astonished, or to use the classic language one sometimes hears from the other side of the House, amazed at the learning and wisdom displayed by hon. members on this subject. The hon. gentleman who last addressed the House said the Judge chose to refer this matter to the Registrar of the Court. I presume to tell the hon. member that the Judge in the exercise of his judicial discretion could do nothing else, if he made a reference at all. The Judge could refer to none but the Registrar of the Court. Then we are told that removing the case from the jurisdiction of the Registrar and referring it to an Arbitrator deprived the Crown of all its rights of appeal. I must say that that is a piece of rhodomontade of a similar character to another piece which has been expressed in this case. Every lawyer knows, and I presume several hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House know, that on many points there can be a reference back to the Court. It is only on points of law that the report of the Registrar or the award of an Arbitrator can be appealed against, or rather the report of the one or the award of the other can be brought before the Court on legal grounds. The award of an Arbitrator may be attacked in more ways than the report of the Registrar of the Court, because the Court is disposed in all cases to sustain the report of its officers. The Courts are, on the other hand, extremely watchful of the proceedings of Arbitrators, and they will upset an award on points of law in arbitrated cases which they will not apply to the report of one of their officers. In the case under discussion there was nothing to prevent the counsel for the Crown watching the points of law and raising any point before the Arbitrator, and, if he decided wrongly, they had the right to take exception. But it was because the gentleman who was chosen by the late Minister of Public Works to conduct cases on behalf of the Crown saw no legal grounds of objection in this instance that they submitted there was no cause to apply to the Court to set aside the award. I cannot see why there should be so much astonishment about the matter. In a portion of his remarks, my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) said he was astonished that Mr. Fleming and Mr. Schreiber had not been examined. I presume that he knows they were examined to a great extent before the Court, and on the reference of the case by agreement between the attorneys on both sides—for neither my hon. friend who was Minister of Justice at the time nor myself took any part in the proceedings—it was agreed that the Arbitrator should read the evidence taken before the Court; and all the parties mentioned had been examined. But what does the evidence of Messrs. Fleming and Schreiber amount to? Simply this. That they, in succession, passed their reports to the head of the Department upon the reports of the division engineer, who showed, on his examination, that he had paid no proper attention to the work in his division; that he had not made measurements from time to time in a proper manner, and that he had never made a final measurement. Therefore, the other parties, Messrs. Schreiber, Fleming and Brydges, who based their reports on his reports, and who were all examined, were misled, and reported erroneously. This was all admitted and brought out clearly. It was admitted by my hon. friend from Lambton, in his letter of December, 1875, when he directed a re-measurement of the whole work.

MR. MACKENZIE: No, no.

MR. O'CONNOR: I beg pardon; such a re-measurement was ordered in that letter. The Judge held that to be a waiver of the claim of the Crown, based upon a report purporting to be a final settlement of the contract. It is clear there had never been a final measurement of the work, and therefore there could not have been a final settlement. The letter admitted that.

MR. MACKENZIE: It was not my letter; it was a departmental letter in which directions were given that the work should be re-measured, wherever deviations were made—not the whole work, as he says. I am sure the hon. gentleman cannot have read the letter, or he would not have made that statement. In that letter I said:

“I am to state that Mr. S. Fleming has been instructed to have a re-measurement made of the work done on the portions of the railway where lines or gradients originally contracted for have been deviated from.”

MR. O'CONNOR: Not your letter, but a letter written by your direction. Very well, I accept the correction.

MR. MACKENZIE: That was not a re-measurement of the whole work, but of a very small portion.

MR. O'CONNOR: It was of all that was in dispute.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman should not let his zeal as an advocate carry him away. Let him forget that he was the advocate, and become the legislator. His responsibility at present is not to his client, but to the Crown, the Legislature and people of this country, and it is in that capacity I desire him to address me and myself him. The letter from the Department of Public Works was with reference to the portion of land where the division had taken place. Now, the real weakness in the point with the hon. gentlemen opposite is this: they forgot all the time the ground that Mr. Sandford Fleming took with regard to the deviation. On contracts on the Pacific Railway and the Canals the work is done by schedule prices, and measurement is the only way of obtaining the price of the contract. It was not so on the Intercolonial. A lump sum was wanted, for which the work was to be finished, no matter whether the measurements given were right or wrong, the contractor being bound to finish, whether the section was right or wrong. Mr. Sandford Fleming denied there was any deviation from the contract line. Much as was said, I think by the hon. the Minister of Justice, about rough measurements, they were of no practical account except that they might give more or less at the moment on the progress estimates. The engineer was only required to give the results as closely as he could to keep the Crown safe. The measurement was for those places where any deviation had been made from the original line; but in all others it was proximate, for the purpose of giving the contractor the ninety per cent. to which he was entitled, and so soon as the entire work was completed the total amount was to be paid him. Now this man could have got the entire amount, but he refused, saying he had done a good deal of extra work. My engineer denied that extra work was done; and the Arbitrator to whom was referred the whole question—matter of law as well as fact—taking it out of the Court and placing it in the hands of laymen—never asked any evidence on the point, whether there was extra work done or not. The contractors had an Engineer, one Odell, who measured the work for them, and I said to Mr. Murray. If you give me his measurements I will submit them to the Engineer of the Department; but they refused. They insisted on keeping them themselves on the advice of their counsel, and Odell was examined at length before the Arbitrator, and his evidence taken as conclusive. Mr. Fleming, Mr. Schreiber, and other authorities who could have given evidence as regards any alleged deviation from the original line were never called, and a decision is given upon such proceedings adverse to the Government. The case is first taken out of the hands of the Court improperly, forming a dangerous precedent; then evidence is taken improperly, and the decision is made so binding that there can be no appeal from the award. It is one series of blunders from first to last, which may have the effect, by the evidence of the Engineer-in-Chief, of causing the country to lose $100,000.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): The hon. member for Lambton has spoken of the measurements. The claim was for work done caused by a change in the location or in the grade; and Judge Fournier found the difficulty was that, under the contract, they could recover for nothing unless they had the certificate of the Chief Engineer; the Judge, however, held that the letter of my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie), admitting in writing that new surveys ought to be made, was a waiver of this objection by the Government. It would be disgraceful to the Judiciary and the public service, if men could fairly and properly go before the people and declare that, after having proved their case in Court, they could get no redress. This is why my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie) wrote the letter authorising a re-survey, not of the whole road, but the portion meeting the two points raised by the Judge. He said to Mr. Fleming or Mr. Schreiber: Make a survey, and tell me what the character of the road is; are these men entitled to anything for the alterations in the grade or in the line of location? That survey was never made; these men came before Judge Fournier, and the Arbitrator, and said: Under the authority granted, we ask that competent engineers verify the survey we have made; we have obtained competent men; they have made the survey admitted to be necessary by the Judge and the hon. the Minister of Public Works, and we challenge an investigation of the survey made by these men, and ask for an opportunity to introduce the proof that the survey is correct. And my hon. friend accepted the challenge, and wrote a letter authorising his engineers to make the survey. If the engineer had obeyed my hon. friend's instructions, and sent competent engineers to the ground, we should not have had this investigation. I am quite satisfied that the moment his Chief Engineer had made the surveys, he would have said: Pay the money, because it is justly due. But my hon. friends opposite did not do their own duty as recognised by the member for Lambton himself. Weeks and months went by, the contractors asserting they possessed proof of the justice of their claims, not being able to get even an attempt on the part of the Government to ascertain whether those claims were well founded or not.

MR. BLAKE: I simply rise to correct a misapprehension into which the Postmaster-General has fallen in this question. He said it was imperative on the Court of Exchequer to refer this matter to the Registrar of the Court; that they had no power to refer it to any other person, and that, consequently, no inference could be drawn from the fact of its reference to the Registrar. If the learned gentleman would refer to the Act of 1876, he would find the clause.

MR. O'CONNOR: Will the hon. gentleman give the meaning of the phrase—"or any other referee."

MR. BLAKE: Yes—or any other will do.

MR. ANGLIN: There are some very important considerations involved in this question. I think by this time that the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals must have come to the conclusion that the case, as stated on this side of the House, has a second leg to stand on; whether that is sound or not, it will be for the House to say. It certainly seems now to stand on two good, substantial legs. The charge is that a case submitted to the highest tribunal in the country—created expressly for the trial of just such cases as this, and clothed with all the powers necessary to the determination of the law and the fact—after having reached a certain stage, was withdrawn from the control of the Court, the whole power of deciding upon the merits of the case, finally and conclusively, being placed in the hands of a gentleman, described by the hon. member for Lambton as an engineer dismissed from the Public Service, although it is said on the other side Mr. Keefer is a gentleman of great respectability and high standing in the profession, and of undoubted fitness for the position in which he was so placed. That is a very serious charge to make against the present Administration. But we are told that, after the legal points had been determined by the Judge, it was highly proper, instead of allowing the Registrar to take the evidence, to refer the whole matter to a person competent to understand the evidence and judge of its value, and who was not merely to discharge the duty assigned by the Judge to the Registrar, but in fact to become himself Judge and jury, Engineer and expert Arbitrator, and final disposer of the whole affair. To clothe any man, under those circumstances, with such powers, would have been highly objectionable, but to declare, as the hon. the Minister of Justice has declared, that that was the proper, prudent, wise course, the course which the interests of the Crown and the people required the Government to take, is still more extraordinary. It amounts to this declaration: that the Exchequer Court is improperly constituted, and that we ought, forthwith, to alter its constitution and provide that, in all suits of this importance hereafter, that Court should only determine the legal questions raised, all questions of fact to be submitted to the decision of some such person as Mr. Keefer. This would be very convenient in dealing with the cases of friendly contractors, but the people in this case would have much preferred its being left to the Court. Much has been said of the right of appeal from the award, but there can be no doubt that, if these special proceedings were otherwise entirely unobjectionable, no Government could have refused, on merely legal and technical grounds, to pay the amount of any award of Mr. Keefer's—such a refusal would have been regarded as a great injustice to the suppliants. There is an entire misapprehension on the part of some hon. gentlemen opposite of the facts of the case. It has been stated that two of the Ministers who spoke on the question were at one time employed as counsel for the suppliants.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): It is not said I was employed as counsel. I said that, being engaged in several railway cases in my own Province, before I took office, I was under the impression I was engaged in this one, but afterwards found I was mistaken.

MR. ANGLIN: A most extraordinary statement—that the hon. gentleman did not know, when this question came up, that he was not employed in the case. Yet I entirely accept it.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): I really do not care whether the hon. gentleman accepts it or not.

MR. ANGLIN: The hon. gentleman may not care what I accept, but he ought to care about what the public accepts. We expect our voices to echo through this country, and, if the hon. gentleman possessed the feeling that ought to actuate members of this House and of the Government, he would care much how the people regard his conduct and that of his colleagues in this important matter. It is alleged that the late Minister of Public Works, by his letter, destroyed the effect of that provision in the contract, which would have excluded the suppliants from making any claim under any circumstances. I do not think anybody would approve of refusing the suppliants all they were justly entitled to. The hon. the Minister of Justice states that, this waiver having been made, they were entitled, under the contract, to any additional expenditure caused by a deviation from the location, or by a change of grade. This is correct, but then the question comes up—was there any change of location or of grade? That was the first point to be determined. How could it be determined? Was it to be determined solely by the evidence of the engineer employed by the suppliants? When the question came before the Arbitrator, what position did he hold? Was he to hold the balance evenly between the parties in the case, or was he to rely solely on the evidence of the parties in whose favour the judgment was to be given? And yet it seems that the Arbitrator heard little or no evidence on the part of the Government. Why were not Mr. Fleming and Mr. Schreiber examined before the Arbitrator? The hon. the Minister of Railways said it was for the counsel acting on behalf of the Crown to say what witnesses it was necessary to call. But the Ministers thus sought to divest themselves of all responsibility in this case, as far as the evidence submitted was concerned. Should it not have occurred to the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals that it was due to the public interests that the Chief Engineer should have gone before the Arbitrator, and, by his evidence, helped him to determine whether there was any deviation from the line as originally laid down, or any change of grade. We are told that Judge Fournier settled that point. I think he did not settle it at all. I think, if his judgment is read carefully, it will be seen that this was one of the points to be settled by the evidence to be taken before the Registrar, and that question should not have been settled by the Arbitrator without hearing the evidence of the engineers employed by the Government. Much stress has been laid upon the manner in which some engineers made their progress estimates. As the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) said, that does not affect the case now under consideration in the slightest degree. The contractors were to be paid a lump sum for building the road according to plan and specification, from a certain point to a certain point, and when the work was properly completed no more money than that specified in the contract could be paid. So far, the public interest was sufficiently guarded. It would appear that the Chief Engineer of Railways is regarded by the hon. the Minister of Justice as the opponent of any contractor who chooses to make an extravagant claim and demands the payment of it. Is that to be the position of the Chief Engineer? If it is, where is the security to the public and what protection have the public, against the rapacious contractors of whom we have heard so much lately? As a public officer, the Chief Engineer is bound to faithfully protect the interests of the public on the one hand, and to do ample justice on the other to all contractors and others under his supervision. I cannot imagine where the difficulty existed in regard to the taking of this evidence. Any man of ordinary intelligence could easily determine from sufficient evidence whether the line or plan had been departed from or not, in regard to the line or the grade. Contradictory evidence no doubt might be given with regard to that question. One engineer might have measured it in one way and another in another, but the rules for making such measurements are by no means so difficult of comprehension that a gentleman fit to be the Registrar of the Supreme Court of this Dominion could not have taken down that evidence intelligently, and that a Judge of the unquestionable ability and acumen of Judge Fournier could not have given a decision in the case. There was no difficulty in the case that any intelligent man could not easily surmount. At all events, the fact that this case was taken away from the Court and put into the hands of Mr. Keefer, to be settled by him on his sole responsibility, was one which has caused, as it ought to have caused, a strong feeling from one end of the Dominion to the other.

PRAYERS.

PRIVILEGE—MR. SPROULE'S SEAT IN THE HOUSE.

REMARKS.

MR. SPROULE: Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to say a few words with reference to an item that appears in one of the newspapers, and from which may be drawn an unfair inference. It appears in the Hamilton Evening Times, of Feb. 17, as follows:—

"Last Session Mr. Sproule, the very windy member for East Grey, occupied a seat right in the midst of the Opposition, and directly behind our old friend, Mr. Rymal. The position was a decidedly uncomfortable one, and Mr. Sproule was generally regarded as a spy. He was frequently given plain hints that he had better move, but he failed to budge. This Session Mr. Rymal told him (Mr. Sproule) that one of them would have to move, and that one would not be him (Mr. Rymal). The result was that Mr. Sproule effected an exchange of seats, and harmony has been once more restored in the camp."

Now, I have only to say that the inference that might be drawn from this item is entirely misleading. When I came here last Session, I found the seat allotted to me was in the back row on this side of the House, which I did not wish to take if I could better myself. I was informed by one of the messengers that seat 130 was taken and had been occupied by a member now a supporter of the Government, who would not be likely to occupy it this Session. I was advised to accept that seat that Session, as, being in a favourable locality, I could make a favourable exchange with some member of the Opposition. On this account I accepted it, and shortly afterwards intimated to an Opposition member, and one of the whips, that I would like to make an exchange with some member of that party. One offer was made me which I did not feel inclined to accept, it being no more favourable than the first seat. I was unable to make an exchange, therefore, the first Session. Early this Session, I attempted to make an exchange again, thinking that my presence might be embarrassing to Opposition members. I finally succeeded in doing so; but, I was not, as might be inferred from the paragraph, intimidated into this course by the member for South Wentworth (Mr. Rymal). If we bring before the Bar of this House parties guilty of impropriety or breaches of etiquette, and punish them according to the deserts of the crime, why should we allow men, whom we give the privilege of sitting in the gallery of the House, to report its proceedings, to disseminate through the press such trash as I have read, and go unpunished. Any remarks between the hon. member for South Wentworth and myself were courteous and pleasant. If it was through him that this item was published, he must feel compelled to resort to that kind of procedure to strengthen his claims on his constituency, and he must draw on the gullibility of his constituents very largely. If he desires to indicate to them that he is entitled to be dubbed the bruiser of the House, as well as the joker, or exchange the one for the other capacity, I am willing to allow him the credit of it. But, if he wishes to create the impression that I acted through intimidation by him, I can assure him that, if he undertook such a task he would find on his hands a contract of much larger proportions, more difficult to execute, and less remunerative than some that his party and the late Government indulged in during the last five years.

MR. PLUMB: I am well pleased that my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has brought this matter before the House. He has made his statement in a very clear, calm and dignified manner. He certainly has been very grossly insulted in the paragraph in question, in an affair in which he has been entirely innocent. The newspaper item quoted shows that we are again to be subjected to the kind of espionage we have often complained of, by those who are permitted by the courtesy of the House to sit in the Reporters' Gallery. It is not the first time we have been misrepresented by persons in the Reporters' Gallery. I certainly, for one, have as little care about what is put into the Grit newspapers as anybody who sits in this House. I have been so accustomed to see myself misrepresented and lampooned in those prints, that I have long since ceased to regard it, and, if it pleases the writers, and is in accordance with the policy and good taste of those who control those papers, it makes very little difference to me. But it is perfectly absurd to notice the way in which those intelligent gentlemen who look down upon us catch up trifling things, which they serve out to their readers, doubtlessly because they think to please them by the petty, dirty little gossips which they daily retain; and I do not now speak of the press upon one side, but particularly refer to the character of three or four well known newspapers which have taken the lead and initiative in this mean and dirty work. I do not know whether we are bound to sit here and allow ourselves to be lampooned by those gentlemen. If, however, the House and those members subject to it may like it, I care nothing about it. I was amused the other day when a certain leading newspaper published an article upon my humble self, extolling me very highly. I always suspect I must be doing something wrong when I become the object of even the faint praise of the Opposition press, but, after saying I was very courteous, intelligent, agreeable, etc., out of the House, the article recommended me not to say anything in it, as I was not capable of doing so acceptably, adding, that I flounced out of the House a day or two ago in the debate on Mr. Fleming's resolution in a rage, because my hon. friend who has just spoken took the floor when I wanted to speak. It is not difficult for any member to find a suitable opportunity to speak, and I am sure that nobody in the House would accuse me of ever attempting to displace any other hon. gentleman. I am always willing to wait my turn. On this occasion certainly I had not the slightest idea of taking the floor, but I got up and walked across the House, when my hon. friend rose, in order to meet in the Library somebody who had sent for me, and, not finding him at the moment, I stepped in outside the Bar and listened to the very able remarks of the hon. member (Mr. Sproule). We did not come in to collision at all. But this report, trifling as it is, is the most innocent and truthful kind of information which those ingenious gentlemen, permitted to sit in the Gallery by our courtesy and kindness, sent off for the amusement or instruction of their readers; it is about on a par with the slip-slop dished up by them in the leading Grit papers of this country. The silly gobe-mouches who take the rôle of special correspondents here for the leading Grit press are so notorious for the credulous avidity with which they swallow any story, however improbable, about the doings of the Government, that they are constantly made the butts of mischievous and unmerciful wags, who fool them to the top of their bent, and laugh to see their hoaxes duly paraded and greatly commented upon. I think my hon. friend was quite right in saying what we have listened to, and I was surprised to see the temper with which it was received on the other side of the House. He had no desire to hear or see anything private going on among hon. gentlemen opposite, among whom he had his seat, and for this reason wished to change it as soon as he could get a reasonably eligible one in exchange. One of the insinuations thrown out was that the hon. gentleman wished to sit with the Opposition to hear their counsels. Well, there is nothing very mysterious or valuable in those counsels that he could desire to know, and their projects are plain enough; and it is not necessary to sit among those hon. gentlemen to learn their nature. The hon. member for East Grey got out of the position as soon as he could, and I congratulate him on finding a more comfortable place, where he will not have unpleasant and uncongenial surroundings, and not be subject to gross imputations and unmanly threats.

MR. RYMAL: After the opening of last Session, in the course of a few days, I found that my neighbour from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) was a very prominent member of the opposite party, when I intimated to him, in a joking way, as he says I am a joker, but still with a certain degree of earnestness, notwithstanding, that I thought his place was not very comfortable, as his presence was not very comfortable for us, opposed to his policy. I said that, I think, two or three times during the Session, suggesting that if he approved of it, he could procure a seat among his political friends. As to the newspaper remarks he has read, I knew nothing about them till printed. I can appeal to hon. members of this House, who have known me twenty years to say if it is my practice to play the bully. I wish to have no dispute or misunderstanding with any hon. member. What would have been thought of me if I had persisted in retaining the seat on the Ministerial side which I occupied in days gone by, and against the wishes of members of that party? What would Ministers have thought had I kept my seat behind them in a position to overhear their remarks? I would have been stigmatised as a scoundrel, and the whole power of the House would have been exerted to remove me from that place. I would have taken the most distant seat in the House sooner than rest under the imputation of sitting among my political opponents for the purpose of overhearing their remarks. That notion did not suit the hon. member for East Grey, who was too big a man, too important a personage, to take anything but a prominent seat. He must have a seat among his political opponents, for what cause I leave the House to judge. As to the imputation that I had the article disseminated throughout my county, to show the people how powerful I was in the House, I scorn it. My constituents know me too well for that course. I tell the hon. gentleman I have not the name of a bully there, but of a fair, manly, outspoken person; and I said to him before exactly what I told him the other day, that I thought one or other of us would have to leave this particular locality, and it should not be me. He took the hint, and succeeded in getting another seat, which he might have had last Session if he had wished. I do not wish to have any dispute with him or submit to any of his sneers either. As to my hon. and poetical friend from Niagara (Mr. Plumb), who talks contemptuously about the society surrounding the hon. member for East Grey—if he refers to me, I may tell him I have as much contempt for him as he has for me. While I am not a Chesterfield in my manners, nor a Beau Brummell in my appearance, I am just as good as the next man as long as I behave myself as well. When anyone can fairly accuse me of improper conduct on the floor of the House, or of any insult towards my fellow members, I shall rest under the imputations of the hon. member for East Grey, but not till then.

(Mr. Colby.)

FURTHER CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

Order for the consideration of the said Bill, as amended in Committee of the Whole, read.

Motion made and question proposed:

That the amendments be now read the second time and concurred in.—(Mr. Colby.)

MR. BLAKE moved in amendment:

That the said Bill be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to add after the word "Companies," in clause 1, the following words:—"and save also in so far as the said Acts apply to any incorporated Trading Company."

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): I entirely recognise the importance of the subject to which the amendment of the hon. gentleman relates, and the desirability of having the incorporated companies referred to, as well as banks and insurance companies, so placed as to enable them to wind up their affairs under a provision similar to that in the Insolvent Act now before the House. The Government recognise the importance of submitting such a resolution as this to the House, and it would have, perhaps, engaged the intention of the Government or the hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill had not the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) intimated that he had an amendment similar to the one moved by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake).

MR. BLAKE: Not on this subject.

MR. McDONALD: He intended it to embrace generally the whole subject, but he informed me that it seemed desirable that he should withdraw the amendment and embrace the whole subject in different Bills, relating to the several subjects. I see the hon. gentleman has introduced a Bill relating to insurance companies, and he assured me he proposed to introduce a Bill also in relation to Banks and Banking. I think it would be more convenient if the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) would allow that subject to be dealt with separately. It will remove any tendency to confusion, and I can state that I will see that the matter is dealt with in the sense of his amendment.

MR. BLAKE: On that statement I withdraw my amendment.

Amendment (Mr. Blake), with leave of the House, withdrawn.

MR. COLBY: I suppose my hon. friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake) will have no objection to have the Bill sent back to the Committee, with instructions to strike out the other amendment, which was added a few evenings ago.

MR. BLAKE: I shall have no objection if the undertaking of the hon. the Minister is also to apply to the class of subjects included in that amendment.

MR. McDONALD (Pietou): That will be dealt with. In the Insolvent Law there are several sections providing for the payment of money into the bank by assignees, and after retaining it for a specified time, and the amount not being called for, its being paid into the Consolidated Fund. I think a provision should be made to compel the rendering of an account from the assignee after the Act is repealed. I therefore move:

That the Bill be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of making further amendments thereto.

Motion agreed to.

MR. McDONALD.

CANADIAN OFFICERS SECURITY ACT AMENDMENT BILL. — [BILL 28.]

(Sir Samuel L. Tilley.)

THIRD READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: This Bill is for the purpose of providing that all bonds, sureties, etc., instead of being scattered throughout the different Departments, some of which have not sufficient means of protecting them against fire and loss shall be duly attested and recorded at full length in the Department of the Secretary of State, as the proper custodian of such documents, and one who has the means of properly protecting them from fire, etc.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

THE LATE ACCIDENT TO THE VICE-REGAL PARTY.

ADDRESS TO HIS EXCELLENCY.

House proceeded to the consideration of a Message from the Senate, acquainting this House that their Honours have passed an Address to His Excellency the Governor-General of congratulation on the escape of Her Royal Highness the Princess Louise and of His Excellency, from the serious danger threatened by the untoward accident which happened to them on the evening of Saturday, the 14th of February.

The said Address was read, and it is as follows:—

“To His Excellency the Right Honourable Sir John Douglas Sutherland Campbell, (commonly called the Marquis of Lorne), Knight of the Most Ancient and Most Noble Order of the Thistle, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, Governor-General of Canada, and Vice-Admiral of the same, &c., &c.

“MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY:

“We, Her Majesty's faithful subjects, the Senate of Canada, in Parliament assembled, desire to approach you with our hearty congratutulation; on the escape of Her Royal Highness the Princess Louise and yourself, from the serious danger threatened by the untoward accident which happened on the evening of Saturday, the 14th instant.

"Unwilling to increase the general alarm occasioned by the news of the injuries received by Her Royal Highness, we have forborne to address Your Excellency until, in the Providence of God, we are happily permitted to do so in language of congratulation.

"Her Royal Highness' life and health are dear to the Canadian people, and the intelligence of the danger in which she has been placed, and of her narrow escape, was everywhere received with profound interest and sympathy.

"We but give utterance to the feeling of the country, when we assure Your Excellency of the deep gratitude with which the intelligence of her gradual recovery is day by day received, and we earnestly trust that her Royal Highness may shortly be restored to her wonted health and strength, and will, hereafter, only suffer the memory of the accident to recall to her the universal joy which hails her recovery."

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I rise for the purpose of asking the House to concur in the Address just read, and which has been passed unanimously in the Senate. The Address expresses the feelings of that body, and, I am sure, of this body, in such apt and fitting terms that it is not requisite for me to dwell at any length upon the feelings aroused in the country by the sad accident which happened to His Excellency the Governor-General and Her Royal Highness the Princess Louise, on the evening of the 14th of February last, and the necessity and expediency of expressing our regret at the accident, and our hearty congratulations at the escape of His Excellency the Governor-General and his Royal Consort from the serious danger to which they were exposed. Those who were present here on the evening of that day, assembled for the purpose of paying their respectful duty to His Excellency and Her Royal Highness, will remember the shock given to all present on the receipt of intelligence of the accident, and the serious danger to which his Excellency and Her Royal Highness were exposed. At first it was naturally imagined that they had escaped from an accident of not unfrequent occurrence in this climate at that season of the year; but, next day it was found, to our deep regret—to our horror—that the Vice-Regal party had been exposed to the very greatest danger, and that it was only by God's Providence that the accident had not ended fatally. We were alarmed by the suddenness and fatal nature of the accident, and had a dread that the serious injuries under which Her Royal Highness had suffered might have had most disastrous consequences. The injury sustained by Her Royal Highness was of the gravest character, and the consequences are not yet altogether removed. I have reason to believe that Her Royal Highness's life was, for a time, in great danger, and the injuries she has sustained were at one time thought to be of a lasting nature. Happily, the imminent danger has passed away; and I hope and believe that the recovery of Her Royal Highness will be complete. While the feeling of regret was general throughout the country, the relief that has been felt by the representatives of the people in both branches of the Legislature at the recovery of the Vice-Regal party has been responded to by the whole Dominion, every part of which will unite with the two bodies in congratulations on the escape of Her Royal Highness the Princess Louise and His Excellency the Governor-General. It is to be hoped that the consequences of the accident will not be serious or of a lasting nature. It would be a matter of great sorrow to us all if Her Royal Highness the Princess Louise, who has already by her demeanour won the hearts of all those with whom she has come in contact, should leave this country with any result from injuries received while our guest in Canada. I trust that this will not be the case, and that, long after the consequences of the accident have passed away, she will, in the words of the Address, have forgotten the injury, and only remember the sincere sympathy of the people of Canada and their congratulations on her recovery. With these remarks, I shall move that this House concur in the Address.

MR. MACKENZIE: I have very great pleasure in seconding the motion which the hon. the First Minister has made, to concur in the Address to His Excellency the Governor-General and Her Royal Highness the Princess Louise. It is most fitting that both Houses should send such an Address to these illustrious personages. This is the first time that a Royal Princess has been sent to act the part that a Governor-General's wife has to act in a Colony, and I am sure she has favourably impressed all with the admirable manner in which she has discharged the duties that have devolved upon her in that capacity. It is not the first time that members of the Royal Family have been received in this Colony, and I know personally how much Her Majesty was gratified by their reception; and I have no doubt that Her Majesty, in committing her dear daughter to our care, felt that she might entrust her, with confidence, to the care of a people whose affections would cluster around her and her Royal Mother; and it becomes us as Canadian subjects of Her Majesty, as well as the special guardians of her daughter, to remember the duty cast upon us in that respect. It is only a very short time since Her Majesty lost another daughter by death, and it would have been a very sad thing if this accident should have resulted fatally in Canada to this one. Nothing could better express the feelings of this House than the words of the Address, when it gives utterance to the hope that Her Royal Highness will only have, as the memory of the accident, the sympathy of the people of Canada in her sufferings and the congratulations that surrounded her on her happy escape from injuries which might have fallen with more serious effect on her and her husband. I believe Her Majesty will appreciate the views expressed in the Address. Anything respecting the person of Her Majesty and the members of the Royal Family will always be of deep interest to the people of this country as aiding in maintaining the relations which happily exist between the Colony and Great Britain. And I trust that Her Majesty will believe she did not err in committing her daughter to our care, and that she will find that everything will be done that Canadian affection can do to surround Her Royal Highness the Princess Louise and His Excellency the Governor-General with everything that is calculated to make them happy and comfortable in this country. I beg to second the motion of the hon. gentleman.

MR. LANGEVIN: I trust, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend the Prime Minister will not take it ill that I address this hon. House in the language spoken by a million and a half of French Canadians, for the purpose of declaring that they fully concur in the observations which have just fallen from him. French Canadians have ever been distinguished for their loyalty and for their respect for their Sovereign, and never has that feeling been more frequently expressed than it has been with regard to our Most Gracious Sovereign for whom they feel especial affection. That feeling of affection has, if an increase of it be possible, perceptibly increased since Her Majesty sent to us one of her family, Her Royal Highness the Princess Louise, and, to add strength to our great affection for the Royal Family, we had but to see her, we had but to listen to her voice. And, Sir, I do not exaggerate when I say that, from the moment when it was known that an accident had happened to His Excellency the Governor-General and to Her Royal Highness, there reigned throughout the land mourning, and a dread lest fatal consequences might be the result. But, on the other hand, from the instant that it became known that no evil consequences would follow the accident, and that knowledge was assured by authoritative announcement, rejoicing throughout the country was universal. And I am certain that the Address which has been proposed by the hon. the Prime Minister, and seconded by the leader of the Opposition, will meet with the full approval of the whole people and especially of that portion of it in whose name, with the consent of my French Canadian colleagues in this House, I am now, Sir, addressing you. We should have greatly preferred that Her Royal Highness's stay among us should have been constantly a pleasant one, and free from inconvenience on her part. But we trust that the pain to which she has been recently subjected will be rapidly followed by complete restoration to health, and that the affection which is felt for her in every part of the country will repay her for the suffering she has undergone, and cause her to forget it, leaving behind only a recollection of our loyalty to Her Majesty and of our affectionate feeling toward herself.

MR. CASGRAIN: I listened with pleasure to the hon. the Minister of Public Works when he rose and expressed in the French language the feelings of hon. members on both sides of the House in relation to the serious accident which recently befel Her Royal Highness and His Excellency the Governor-General. I willingly concur in the expressions which have fallen from the hon. Minister in regard to the lamentable consequences which might have resulted from the accident, and in so doing I feel that I am expressing the views of my French Canadian colleagues on this side of the House. I thank the hon. the Prime Minister for moving, and the leader of the Opposition for seconding this Address, and I entirely concur in the expressions of sympathy uttered by them in the English language.

Resolved, That this House do concur in the Address of the Senate to His Excellency the Governor-General of congratulation on the escape of Her Royal Highness the Princess Louise and His Excellency, from the serious danger threatened by the untoward accident which happened to them on the evening of Saturday, the 14th of February, last, by filling up the blank with the words "and Commons."
—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

Ordered, That a Message be sent to the Senate to acquaint them that this House hath agreed to their said Address,—that they have filled up the blank with the words "and Commons,"—and also that the said Address will be presented to His Excellency the Governor-General, on the part of this House, by such Members of this House as are of the Honourable the Privy Council.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE LAW AMENDMENT BILL.—(BILL 14.)

(Mr. Robertson, Hamilton.)

Order for second reading read.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton): In moving the second reading of the Bill, I think I need not take up the time of the House in explaining its object, inasmuch as I have already, in introducing the Bill, explained the purport of it; but, as it may be that some hon. members have not considered the Bill, I will ask the House to indulge me while I make a few further remarks with reference to it. According to the laws of England, a person accused of crime may, after the examination of witnesses by the magistrate, on behalf of the Crown, and after the magistrate has made up his mind that there is sufficient evidence to commit, or to bind the accused over to stand his trial, require the magistrate to call any witness that he may have, take down his evidence, and bind such witness over to give evidence on the part of the accused at the trial, the magistrate being satisfied that the accused, by reason of poverty, is not able to secure the attendance of such witness at his trial. This law was introduced by Mr. Russell Gurney, for a long time Recorder of London, and it became the law of England in 1867. It was after years of experience as Recorder that Mr. Gurney became satisfied that there was a defect in the administration of the Criminal Law; and through his exertions the defect was removed by the Parliament of England. That law has been found to work beneficially in England, and I submit that there is reason for making it the law of this country, and I therefore propose in this Bill which is now before the House for a second reading, to extend it to this Dominion. The Bill also seeks to amend the 30th section of the Act 32 and 33 Vic., cap. 30, by striking out the words "is absent from Canada," in the seventh and eighth lines. That clause enables the evidence taken on the examination before a magistrate, against a person charged with any crime, to be read at the trial, if the witness is dead, too ill to travel, or has left Canada. It is proposed by this Bill to strike out that part of the clause which refers to the witness being absent from Canada. It has been found that that portion of the clause has operated most unjustly towards persons accused, for parties have been charged with crime, witnesses have given their evidence before a magistrate, and then found it convenient afterwards to leave the country. As a matter of principle, this statutory provision is bad—it is contrary to the first principles of the Criminal Law, namely, that a man has a right to be brought face to face with his accusers; that the Court and jury have the right to see the witness, and hear him give his evidence, so that they can judge of his truthfulness and credibility, not only by the words uttered, but by his manner and demeanour in the witness-box; and, most important of all, that he should be subject to a rigid cross-examination by counsel for the prisoner, or by the prisoner himself. It is well known that nine out of every ten magistrates in this country are but indifferently qualified to take down evidence, and a great deal depends upon that. Then again, the accused is often placed in a position, at the preliminary examination, not to have counsel present, and a proper cross-examination of the witness is therefore not had. Now, if this perpetuation of testimony is an infringement, as

I contend it is, of the law, and it must be in some cases, why should we go further in this country than they go in England? It is just as easy for a witness to leave Great Britain and go to a foreign country as it is for him to leave Canada. I therefore submit, that in this respect we should go back to the law as it was under the Consolidated Statutes of Canada, section 31 of cap. 102, which enacted the law as it is in England. The 4th section of the Bill proposes to add a proviso to the 35th section of the last mentioned Act, which enables the magistrate, if he thinks it in the interest of justice to do so, to clear the room in which a preliminary examination of a person accused of crime is taking place. This proviso is in these words:—

“Provided always that nothing herein contained shall be construed to empower the Justice or Justices to exclude from such room or building any counsel or attorney who is employed by or appears for, or asks permission to appear for or on behalf of the person accused; and the accused person shall as of right be allowed to retain one or more counsel learned in the law, or attorney or attorneys, to be present at such examination, to watch the case on his or her behalf, to cross-examine the witnesses adduced on behalf of the prosecution, and to examine and re-examine the witnesses called on behalf of the accused.”

This I consider a most necessary amendment of the law, as no person should, in this enlightened, intelligent country, be liable to be deprived of the aid and assistance of counsel, at the will and caprice of a magistrate, who may be induced, because of his “little brief authority,” to exercise a power which is now given him by the law. I propose, therefore, to add the proviso set out in the Bill, which gives accused persons the right to have their counsel present on all occasions, not only to examine witnesses for the defence, but to cross-examine the witnesses brought forward against the prisoner, it being still left in the power of the magistrates to clear the room, so far as the general public are concerned. I think it will be conceded that that amendment should be now made and that it should be made clear that every person has a right to have counsel present at the hearing of any charge that is being made against him. Then the next clause proposes to make it quite clear that the Judge on the occasion of the trial shall have the power to exclude witnesses from the Court-room.

MR. ROBERTSON.

It is the practice in England now that either party can request the Judge to require the witnesses to be withdrawn, and the Judge almost invariably does exclude the witnesses if requested; but there is a question as to whether a prisoner has that right, even in England. The request has been refused in this country—when objected to by the Crown Prosecutor—because the Judge has felt that he has not the power to do so, unless by consent. I propose that it should be made the law of the land in this respect; it is the law in civil cases, and I cannot see why it should not be so in criminal cases. The last section of my Bill proposes to amend the law with reference to the right of reply by counsel who are prosecuting persons accused of crime. Sub-section 2 of section 45 of chap. 26, 32 and 33 Vict., regulates the reply of counsel, and under that section there is a proviso that “the right of reply shall be always allowed to the attorney or solicitor or to any Queen’s counsel acting on behalf of the Crown.” I propose to amend the law so as to apply it in Ontario to the County Judges of Criminal Courts. Hon. gentlemen know that we have in Ontario a Criminal Court, for the purpose of trying persons accused of crime, who may elect to be tried by the County Judge, without the intervention of a jury. In that case the Statute, as it now is, does not appear to apply. I propose to amend or extend it in that particular, and to limit the right of reply in all cases to the Attorney or Solicitor-General when he is prosecuting, but not otherwise. I do so because I think it is not a fair thing to persons who are accused, and who give no evidence on their own behalf, and who are disqualified from entering into the witness-box and giving their statement upon oath in reference to the charge made against them. If the Crown was always represented by counsel of experience and judgment, by gentlemen who well understood and appreciated the position which they occupied, as standing between the people and the prisoner, it would be perfectly safe to leave the right of reply in their hands; but, when the fact is that Crown prosecutors are often young members of the Bar, who, it is true, of late years have been appointed to be of Her Majesty’s Counsel, but who seem to think in the prosecution of criminal charges that their reputation is somewhat compromised if they do not succeed in convicting every prisoner against whom they appear, I think it very desirable that a change should take place. In England the right of reply is not conceded to any one unless the Attorney-General, and in criminal cases he has been refused the right; and there is no reason, in my humble judgment, why it should be extended beyond that in Canada. I therefore propose to repeal the clause of the Act above referred to, and to substitute the following therefor:—

“And upon any trial the addresses to the jury, or, a in case the trial is before the County Judge's Criminal Court in Ontario, to the Court, shall be regulated as follows:—The counsel for the prosecution, in the event of the defendant or his counsel not announcing, at the close of the case for the prosecution, his intention to adduce evidence, shall be allowed to address the jury or Court a second time at the close of such case for the purpose of summing up the evidence; and the accused or his counsel shall then be allowed to open his case, and also to sum up the evidence if any be adduced for the defence, and the right of reply shall be according to the practice of the Courts of England; provided always, that the right of reply shall be always allowed to the Attorney or Solicitor-General in person, but not otherwise.”

MR. CAMERON (South Huron): I think it is much to be regretted that Bills of this character, dealing with the Criminal Law and proposing amendments to the law as it stands, should be left in the hands of private members. I think that where amendments are required to the Criminal Law such amendments should be made on the motion of the Crown, and the responsibility should rest upon the Minister of Justice. I do not know whether the hon. mover of this Bill has the sanction of the hon. the Minister of Justice for the amendments he proposes to make by this Bill. I doubt very much if he has, because I cannot see, from the statements just made by the hon. mover of the Bill, any substantial reason whatever for the proposed changes. Only two or three of the amendments he proposes are at all material. The first of these propositions is to deprive the Crown of the right to use at the trial the depositions of a witness legally and properly taken under the Act before a magistrate in the presence of the prisoner, and after he has had an opportunity through his counsel of cross-examining a witness, when the witness is absent from the country. In the case of the death of the witness, or where the witness is too ill to attend the Court, he still retains, by this Bill, the right of using the depositions of any witness properly taken under the Statute, and subject to the limitations in the law as it now stands. But, where the witness has left the country, voluntarily or otherwise, or where in the interest of the prisoner he has been spirited out of the country, the hon. gentleman's Bill proposes to deprive the Crown of the right of reading the depositions, and that proposition I entirely object to. The second proposition of the hon. gentleman's Bill deals with the right of reply and desires to prevent the Crown, when represented by counsel other than the Attorney or Solicitor-General, from having the right of a general reply. I am entirely opposed to these proposed amendments. I think neither of them is in the interests of justice, or should become law. As to the first section of the hon. gentleman's Bill, I make no special objection to it, though in this country I do not see the necessity or the utility of the amendments suggested. No practical difficulty has arisen under the law as it stands. The magistrate, as a matter of strict law, has no right to allow witnesses for the defence to be called. His powers are restricted to the enquiry as to whether a prima facie case has been made out, and if so, he is bound to commit; but I know that in many cases the magistrate before whom the preliminary investigation is taken allows the right to the prisoner of calling witnesses in his own behalf. I know in practice that this rule prevails, and I am not aware that the exercise of this power has been abused or that injury to the Crown or the accused has resulted. The first clause of the Bill is now word for word a transfer from the Imperial Statute, 21 Vict., chap. 35. But the hon. gentleman must remember that the circumstances of England are very different from those of Canada. England has the first men in the land in the Commission of the Peace, men of property, intelligence, education, in fact trained men. I fear we cannot say that for the magistracy of Canada; so that a system that would work well in England might not suit us at all. The hon. gentleman proposes to have the depositions returned to the Court of trial. What does he mean by that? Does he mean that the depositions shall be returned by the "Court of trial" to the Judge of Assize or the Clerk of Assize. The mover of the Bill has adopted the English form of expression without at all considering our system of administration. We know that these cases of a grave character are tried before the Judge of Assize. We know that the depositions could not well be returned to him. He is in no way the guardian of such papers, and in no sense their custodian. By our Ontario law, depositions of this kind are returned by the committing Magistrate to the Clerk of the Peace, deposited with such officer, and are obtained from him by the prosecuting counsel when required, and are used at the trial when the circumstances of the case warrant it. It appears to me, therefore, that the first clause of the Bill is inartistically framed, and is open to objection on both the grounds I have suggested. Sub-section 2 of Section No. 6 proposes to abolish the right of reply by the Crown and of this I shall speak hereafter. Now I submit to the hon. the Minister of Justice that the mover of this Bill has made out no case for the interference of Parliament, and that there is no reason in the world why the depositions of witnesses taken at the preliminary investigation before a magistrate, where the witness has left the country subsequently, and before the day fixed for the trial of the prisoner, should not be read at the trial. We know well, at all events those of us who have had any experience in the administration of the Criminal Law, that as a general rule, it is a difficult matter to obtain the conviction of accused parties now, and we should not, by experimental legislation, enhance the difficulties of obtaining convictions. The sympathy of the jury is usually in favour of the accused. We know that in most cases the jury is impanelled from the county in which the prisoner lives, and their sympathy is intensified by that fact. We know that he has an almost unlimited right of challenge, and that the clearest possible testimony must be adduced by the Crown in order to establish the guilt of the prisoner. We know that a different rule prevails in respect to evidence in criminal cases to that in civil cases. In the latter case it is a simple question: in whose favour does the weight of evidence preponderate? and the verdict is given as the balance preponderates in favour of one side or the other; while in the former case, the testimony must be so clear as to bring the guilt home to the prisoner beyond a reasonable doubt. In addition to this, criminals are generally defended by the ablest counsel at the Bar, and they have, in fact, everything in their favour. Now, if this provision of the hon. gentleman's Bill is adopted, it will have this effect, that where a material witness is called and examined before a magistrate, and gives important testimony against the accused—testimony without which a conviction could not be obtained—if the prisoner happens to be wealthy, or has influential friends, all he has to do in order to deprive the Crown of this evidence is to spirit that witness out of the country before the day of trial, and the Crown is deprived of his evidence, and the prisoner escapes. In fact this Bill is one that, if passed, will aid the escape of prisoners. It should not become law. In my own experience as counsel for the Crown in criminal cases, I know two cases where the witnesses for the Crown were spirited out of the country; the depositions were not taken in strict compliance with the Act, and could not be used, and of course the case had to be traversed until the next term. Now, if this provision of the Bill is carried, in any case where the Crown relies for a conviction on the evidence of a witness who has been examined before a magistrate, all the prisoner will have to do is to spirit the witness out of the country before the day of trial, and of course the prisoner escapes. I ask the hon. the Minister of Justice if it is desirable that facilities should be afforded criminals to escape the consequences of their crimes. There does not appear to me to be any reason advanced why that clause in our Statute, 32 and 33 Vict., proposed to be amended by this Bill, should be struck out; no more reason than to prevent the Crown from using the depositions of a man who has died after his examination and before the trial, and not so much reason for striking out that clause as there is for striking out the clause allowing the use of the deposition of a witness who is too ill to attend the trial. The hon. mover of the Bill might have introduced a provision such as there is in the English

Act, enabling the prisoner or the Crown to examine a witness too ill to attend Court either before or pending the trial. If you can use the deposition of a sick witness examined before a magistrate, there is no reason why you should exclude or deprive the Crown of the right of using the deposition of a witness who, perhaps, through the instrumentality of the prisoner, has been spirited out of the country before the trial. I hope that the hon. the Minister of Justice will take care that that provision does not become law. The next provision to which I object is that which deprives the Crown of the right to reply. In civil cases, the general rule is that, if the defendant calls no witnesses, the defendant's counsel has the right to reply; but, whether the defendant calls witnesses or not, the Crown has the right to reply when represented by the Attorney or Solicitor-General or any Queen's Counsel. That right the hon. gentleman proposes to abolish, but I do not think that provision should be changed unless for good and substantial reasons. In my opinion it is impossible to show a case in which real injury has been done to the prisoner on account of the Crown's right to reply; and I think we ought not to amend the Criminal Law in that direction, unless there is serious objection to the present practice, unless a grievance of some serious character has arisen on this point in the administration of Criminal Law. I submit that not a single case has arisen to justify the hon. the Minister of Justice in lending the sanction of his authority to an alteration of that kind. In England, although there is no legislation on the subject, a doubt exists as to whether the Crown has the right to reply in any case where it is prosecutor and is not represented by the Attorney-General. In two cases, at all events, the criminal prosecutor, who was not the Attorney-General, was refused the right to reply because the right is said to be only vested in the Attorney-General. It is a moot point, however, whether the Crown has the right to reply unless represented by the Attorney-General or not, but the question has been put beyond peradventure in this country by the Statute. That Statute gives the right to reply to the Crown in certain cases. No reason has been assigned for the abolition of that right, and it seems to me that if any exists the argument is a great deal more in favour of abolishing the right of the Attorney-General to reply. The hon. mover of this Bill claims that the prosecutors for the Crown are not actuated by the same motives as the Attorney-General; that his object would simply be to stand between the Crown and the people, and see that right and justice was done, and not to press unnecessarily the case against the criminal, but to state the facts fairly to the jury. I do not think the hon. gentleman can point out in his own practice any case in which a Crown counsel has not taken that course. If any such officer has done so, he ought not to be Crown Prosecutor any longer. It is no part of his duty to press unnecessarily the charge against the prisoner. It is as much his duty to endeavour to establish the innocence of the innocent as to bring home guilt to the guilty. The observations that I made with respect to the right of the Crown to use the deposition of a witness who has gone out of the country, voluntarily or otherwise, will apply equally well to the right of the Crown to reply. It is well known to the practitioners in Criminal Courts, that the chances are all in favour of the prisoner, and that for one innocent man convicted nine hundred and ninety-nine guilty men escape. As a general thing, the prisoner is tried by his peers, and he has the advantage of every technicality of the law that is open to him. He has the advantage of being zealously defended by the ablest men of the Bar. He has the right of challenge, and he almost always has the sympathy of the people. If you do not give the right of reply to the Crown, the case goes to the jury on the statement of the prisoner's counsel; and, after the usually able and impassioned appeals that are made to juries by prisoner's counsel on behalf of their client, it is only fair that the Crown should have a chance of calmly, deliberately, fairly and honestly stating the facts and of analysing the testimony submitted to the jury—that the Crown should have the opportunity of shortly and simply answering the argument made by the prisoner's counsel. I, therefore, see no reason for the amendment the hon. mover of the Bill has introduced. If any change is made, I should say it should be that the Attorney-General should not have the right to reply. The hon. gentleman objects to the right of a Queen's Counsel to reply, because his position and abilities might unfairly influence the jury against the prisoner; but, if there is anything in that view of the case, it applies with greater force against the right reserved by the Bill to the Attorney-General. It is quite natural that the appearance of a man of the abilities and standing of the Attorney-General, appearing in the conduct of a case, would have more weight with the jury than the efforts of any ordinary counsel practising at the Bar; and it might be argued that it would unfairly prejudice the mind of the jury. As applied to Queen's Counsel, the argument has no force whatever. The hon. gentleman bases his proposition to abolish the right of Crown Counsel to reply on another ground and I must say an extraordinary one. The hon. gentleman wants to settle the constitutional question that has arisen respecting the right to appoint Queen's Counsel by this Bill. That, however, is no reason for the change proposed, and I think the hon. gentleman would fail in accomplishing his object even if the Bill did pass. The difference of opinion that does exist among the Judges and members of the Bar, as to the appointing of Queen's Counsel, should not be made the foundation for the repeal of a useful clause in the Criminal Law. If any difference of opinion exists as to the right of the Government of Ontario to appoint Queen's Counsel, it is not desirable that that right should be settled through the instrumentality of the Criminal Law, but in some more open and satisfactory way. The Bill appears to me to be a retrograde step, a step in the wrong direction, and not in the interests of justice. I have no objection to one or two provisions of the Bill, but in my judgment the unobjectionable clauses are useless, and will serve no good purpose, and changes in the law should not be made unless to right some wrong, or unless it can be shown to be in the interests of justice. Upon the whole, I submit that the two provisions to which I have directed the attention of the House should, in no case, be repealed, and that the mover of the Bill has made out no case on any interference with the law as it stands, and that his Bill should not become law.

MR. CAMERON.

MR. SHAW: I think there are several objections to the Bill that have not been referred to. If we commit ourselves to the principle of taking evidence for the defence, the administration of justice in criminal cases will become much more expensive. The first section makes provision for the taking of depositions that may be favourable to the prisoner or the party accused. If that were done, the magistrate who has taken the deposition will be placed somewhat in the position of a Judge, and it is questionable if magistrates, selected as they are throughout the Dominion, ought to be placed in that position—whether it would be of advantage to the public and to the proper administration of justice that they should possess the power indicated by that section. In my opinion, there is considerable objection to this section of the Bill. In remote sections of the country, I can see that a large amount of expense would be imposed on the Crown in obtaining the attendance of witnesses. In fact, an accused party would take good care that the evidence which he intended to use on his trial was given before the magistrates, so that afterwards his witnesses might be produced at the expense of the Crown. We ought to be careful in adopting a principle of a character that would be followed by such results, and these results would necessarily follow the adoption of this Bill. With our scattered population, and the great distances which witnesses have to travel in order to attend Court, I think the expenses of criminal trials would be vastly increased. I can scarcely see that the fifth clause, regarding the exclusion of witnesses from Court in cases of felony and misdemeanor, is necessary, because, if it is, I do not understand why it should not be extended to other criminal charges. There may be some question in regard to the amendment proposed by the sixth section, with respect to reserving the right of reply only to the Attorney or Solicitor-General in person. Difficulties appear to have arisen in several Courts on this question, and I have no doubt that the proviso introduced by the hon. member for Hamilton has the object in view of settling those differences. I would suggest that it might be, perhaps, in the interest of justice, if that section were preserved. I agree with the hon. member for South Huron (Mr.

Cameron) that in the case of parties having left the country it would be important that their depositions should be made evidence in Court. Persons might leave the country and prevent a conviction, and return shortly after the sittings of the Court. I think the section of the Act sought to be amended should remain on the Statute-book, since the amendment is convenient for persons wishing to remove to the United States. Until some case arises in which evil has resulted from that section it ought to be preserved. It no doubt was placed there with the object of preserving evidence in case the witness absented himself from the country, and it is in the public interest it should remain.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou): I am sorry that I cannot agree with my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) in the view he takes on the desirability of the amendment proposed to the House. I listened with great attention to the observations the hon. member made in moving the second reading of the Bill, but I fail to see the pressing necessity for its adoption. It is not proposed to object to read the Bill a second time, should my hon. friend desire to press it, as there may be one or two points the House may desire to consider in Committee; and therefore if, after the few observations I have to make, the hon. gentleman should think it necessary or advisable that his Bill should go as far as the Committee, I would be sorry to ask the House to refuse to attend to that request. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) made an observation which I cannot assent to in its entirety—that a private member should not propose an amendment to the Criminal Law, but that such should come from the hon. the Minister of Justice. To some extent that view is reasonable; but that rule could not be insisted upon under all circumstances. Because every member has a right to propose to the House and country any amendment of any law which he judges would be beneficial to the country. I am sorry I cannot concur with the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) that his amendment is desirable. It is true the Bill is merely a transcript of an English Statute, but it is not necessarily a recommendation of a law that it has worked well in England, or that we should adopt it on that account. So far as my own experience goes, and that of my hon. friends in the House, no injury or inconvenience whatever has arisen in this country under the present law. I can fancy very many inconveniences arising from the amendment proposed by my hon. friend from Hamilton. The law at present contemplates that a man accused of a crime should appear before a magistrate, and should not be committed for trial or suffer further imprisonment unless the Crown be able to establish against him a prima facie case. I concur with the hon. member for South Huron that in most cases, if not always, the accused obtains the benefit of any doubt arising under the testimony; and therefore, as a rule, we may be sure that, in the early stages at any rate, an accused party is not likely to be committed unless the evidence be of such a character as to make it almost compulsory upon the conscience of the magistrate to put him on his trial. Therefore it appears to me that the present system meets in every way all the requirements of justice, and affords every aid and protection to a person charged with crime. It is not the policy of the law that the magistrate should try the question of guilt or innocence. Such would be an infringement of the authority of the higher Courts. It is because the proposed amendment of my hon. friend the member for Hamilton goes to a certain extent in that direction that I think its adoption undesirable; it is undesirable even in the interest of the party on his trial. The duty proposed to be laid upon the magistrate is somewhat arduous; he has not only to take the evidence of the witnesses in a way to bring home to his mind a conviction of the probable guilt of the accused, but go further, and at the request of the prisoner to admit his witnesses, take down their evidence, cross-examine them on the part of the Crown, in order that the accused may have the benefit of their evidence on his trial—in other words, it is asking the Crown to provide at the expense of the country all the testimony the accused may think he requires on his trial. I do not think that is desirable, nor do I see that the amendment proposed would give any additional protection whatever to the accused. In Crown cases, the Crown is properly expected to produce its own witnesses; but I do not see how, on any principle of justice, the Crown should produce witnesses on the part of the defence. With reference to some of the other amendments—I entirely agree with the hon. member for South Huron, touching that in the third clause, with regard to the reading of depositions. In this country, as that hon. gentleman has observed, situated as we are, if a party was either himself desirous of escaping the responsibility of giving testimony, or was a man who could be tampered with, the facility for such a process is so great that I think it very desirable that, where the testimony of such a person is taken, if he should leave the country either through accident or design, and be absent at the time of trial, the deposition should be read. I do not think the last clause of very much importance, whether the reply be left with a Queen's Counsel or not. There is no reason why it should not be. The distinction of a silk gown is generally supposed to be conferred on members of the profession, who have distinguished themselves as men of superior ability and learning; and therefore, as a matter of professional etiquette as well as a matter of special interest, I would prefer the right should remain. But my learned friend from Hamilton gives another reason for doing away with that precedence which would rather incline me to retain it—he says there is a difficulty about the Queen's Counsel in Ontario. It appears to me this presents an admirable opportunity for the solution of that difficulty. If the recent judgments of the highest Court of the land have left any doubts as to the status of Queen's Counsel, the question can be settled at once by a simple proceeding before the Courts of Ontario on a question which can easily be raised at the first Criminal Term where a Queen's Counsel is engaged. I do not see that the amendment could be of any service whatever in the matter; I do not know that it would do any harm either. I can easily conceive the provision in the first clause having a result not at all desirable, and therefore I hope that my learned friend, if he finds the opinion of the profession in the House adverse to his views, will reconsider the advisability of pushing his Bill any further.

MR. MOUSSEAU: I congratulate the Government upon having, through the Minister of Justice, opposed the Bill submitted for our consideration. The measure is simply one calculated to effect a revolution in some of the essential parts of our criminal legislation. In the first place, I object to the first section. It is there proposed that, at the preliminary examination before one or two Justices of the Peace, who often in country parts barely know how to read, and do not comprehend a single word of Criminal Law, witnesses should be called, not only to prove what they know of the facts, but also to prove the innocence and to testify to the good character of the person accused. Now the theory, the doctrine which is the basis of the Criminal Law, springs from sacred principles. It is the place of the Sovereign authority, the Queen, to protect the property, the person, and the life of the subject. It is understood that in order to watch over these precious rights there is, first of all, the right of preliminary enquiry, either before a Justice of the Peace in a county, or a Police Magistrate in a city. The complaint may be made by one witness. In cases of felony, no confirmation is necessary; in the case of forgery or perjury, confirmation is necessary. The law requires that, in the first case, there shall be at least one witness, and that in the other case there shall be more. What is required is purely and simply a preliminary examination before a Justice of the Peace or before a Police Magistrate; and then, if the prisoner appears to have broken the law of the land, in respect of either the person or property of Her Majesty's subjects, and if the evidence is sufficiently strong against him, prima facie, to send him for trial to another and higher tribunal, where he will be tried before his peers, he is imprisoned or admitted to bail. He will then be brought before the grand jury, and subsequently before a petit jury if a true Bill be found. Now, if the section in question were in force, we would have two full trials; the first would be an investigation before the magistrate, a preliminary examination at which the accused would undergo his trial as before a petit jury; there is the strange anomaly, the monstrous anomaly, of an individual who has been fully tried before a Police Magistrate in a city, and who has subsequently to go before the grand jury. It appears to me that the first result of the Bill of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) will be to abolish both the grand and petit jury. In fact that first section implies that there should be but one trial, and that that should take place before a magistrate. Another most important objection to this section is that, at the preliminary examination, an accused person, who has but the slightest grounds of defence, may easily escape. Complaint is made that only the witnesses for the prosecution are called to appear at the preliminary examination to support the complaint and information against the person accused. That is true, but the accused person still has a good means of protection. There is a most wise rule, a sacred principle of Criminal Law, which provides that, if the evidence on behalf of the Crown reveals new facts, or facts that show the examining magistrate that persons other than those who have given evidence might be called to throw light on the case, the magistrate himself, of his own accord, or at the instance of the advocate for the defence, may call those witnesses. In this country, as in England, we have a certain guarantee and perfect security that no injustice will be done us before the Police Magistrate in a city or before a Justice of the Peace in the country parts. There recently appeared in the leading London papers some correspondence on this subject, tending to show that in England—it may be added in this country—preliminary examinations before Police Magistrates in cities, or before Justices of the Peace in the country, are really actual trials. It is well known that the accused person can always command the assistance of an advocate, if he has the means of paying him, to defend him at these preliminary examinations. Now that advocate cross-examines the witnesses to the best of his ability to prove the innocence of his client, or to unearth extenuating circumstances, or it may be to extract from the witnesses for the Crown the names of other witnesses who might depose to facts in favour of the person accused or in mitigation of his offence. It was stated in England that these proceedings before the magistrate at the preliminary examinations have now become actual trials, which are almost as important and are carried on almost as much for and against as trials before petit jurors. I therefore consider that this first section is perfectly useless, and not only useless, but that it tends to an upsetting of the Criminal Law, and that ultimately it will lay an enormous burden upon the people by allowing the defence to call, not once only, but twice, witnesses who are generally paid by the Crown. For let it not be imagined that before a petit jury the defendant is without resources and without means. It is sufficient for the accused to make oath, supported by one or two other persons, to the effect that he has not the means of summoning his witnesses and paying them, and thereupon the Crown meets his wishes. It very frequently happens that those witnesses, if summoned, are paid by the Crown at the public cost. Thus, from every point of view, this first section is perfectly useless. The third section reads as follows:—

“The thirtieth section of the said Act of the third-second and thirty-third Victoria, chapter thirty, is hereby amended by striking out the words ‘or is absent from Canada’ in the seventh and eighth lines thereof.”

I really cannot see the object of the mover of the Bill in wishing to strike out the words “or is absent from Canada.” Section 30, cap. 30, 32 and 33 Vic., is as follows:—

“The Justice or Justices shall, before any witness is examined, administer to such witness the usual oath or affirmation, which such Justice or Justices are empowered to do; and upon the trial of the person accused, it be proved upon the oath or affirmation of any credible witness, that any person whose deposition has been taken as aforesaid, is dead, or is so ill as not to be able to travel, or is absent from Canada, and if it be also proved that such deposition was taken in presence of the person accused, and that he, his counsel or attorney, had a full opportunity of cross-examining the witness, then if the deposition purports to be signed by the Justice by or before whom the same purports to have been taken, it shall be read as evidence in such prosecution without further proof thereof, unless it be proved that such deposition was not in fact signed by the Justice purporting to have signed the same.”

This provision is borrowed from the English Criminal Law, and has the effect of preventing the defendant from occasionally sending the Crown witnesses on a journey to the four principal points of the compass, to the end that they may not be produced at the trial. This has happened in my own practice, when entrusted with the conducting of the Crown business in the judicial district of Montreal; it was a serious case, involving a charge of perjury, and the defendant, who had means, sent the principal witness for the Crown on a trip to the United States. Fortunately, his deposition had been previously taken, and he had been regularly cross-examined before a Police Magistrate, who testified to it; so that the spiriting away of that principal witness did not prevent the Crown from obtaining a conviction of perjury against the prisoner. Now, if the House should adopt this section, striking out the words "or is absent from Canada," the result will be to interfere with trials before petit juries, and the reading of the depositions of witnesses for the Crown summoned to appear against the prisoner, and whom he may have sent on a trip to the United States. Thus we have a graver and more important reason for rejecting this section of the Bill, which, in the manner I have pointed out, will prove prejudicial to the most sacred interests of society. With reference to the fourth section, I have not had time to examine it in all its bearings. I am really not aware that there exists in this country any law which prevents a defendant from being represented by an attorney. I know that in England, as in this country, persons accused, let the case be what it may, let the accusation be what it may, have always a right at the preliminary examination to be assisted by counsel. The thirtieth section, which I have just read, in reality corroborates this provision of the Criminal Law, because it says that a deposition which is read at the trial before the petit jury shall be evidence if the accused or his attorney has had an opportunity of cross-examining the witness. We have therefore in our Canadian legislation a recognition of the absolute right which the accused has of being represented at the preliminary examination. This fourth section is therefore perfectly useless. As to the provisions of the fifth section, it is already admitted in certain civil cases, in which the presence of a witness during the examination of other witnesses may entitle the opposite party to prevent that witness from giving evidence. But in criminal cases the principle requires that, at the instance of either party, all the witnesses must retire. And this is in accordance with law. I now come to the last section of the Bill of my hon. friend, which reads as follows:—

"Sub-section two of section forty-five of chapter twenty-nine, of thirty-second and thirty-third Victoria is hereby repealed, and the following substituted therefor:—

"2. And upon any trial the addresses to the jury, or in case the trial is before the County Judge's Criminal Court in Ontario, to the Court, shall be regulated as follows: The counsel for the prosecution, in the event of the defendant or his counsel not announcing, at the close of the case for the prosecution, his intention to adduce evidence, shall be allowed to address the jury or Court a second time at the close of such case for the purpose of summing up the evidence; and the accused or his counsel shall then be allowed to open his case, and also to sum up the evidence, if any be adduced, for the defence, and the right of reply shall be according to the practice of the Courts of England; Provided always, that the right of reply shall be always allowed to the Attorney or Solicitor-General in person, but not otherwise."

I hardly like to say it, but is not this a subterfuge to prevent the Crown from having the last word? For it is not necessary to say that the Attorney or Solicitor-General in person only shall have the right of reply; for it is well known that generally in this country, as in England, those gentlemen have seldom, if ever, an opportunity of conducting the business of the Crown in Criminal Courts. Therefore, I am opposed to the Bill, and request my hon. friend to withdraw it; otherwise, I will be obliged to move the six months' hoist. In my opinion, the Bill trenches upon all the most sacred and fundamental principles of English Criminal Law. It is subversive of our legislation, and introduces provisions which are contrary to the spirit and to the admirable principles of English Criminal Law, which have gained for it so great renown throughout the world. In a word, the Bill introduces provisions which are most dangerous to society, such as that which I have just pointed out in section three, by which the Crown is prevented from obtaining the evidence of witnesses whom a rich defendant may have bought up and sent to foreign parts. I therefore move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Motion made and question proposed.

That the said Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read the second time this day six months.—(Mr. Mousseau.)

MR. MCCARTHY moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and Debate adjourned.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

TIMBER TRANSMISSION COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 48.]

(Mr. White, North Renfrew.)

FIRST READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider a certain proposed resolution to alter the proportional tariff of tolls, fixed by Section 59 of Chapter 68 of the Consolidated Statutes of the late Province of Canada.—[Vide p. 313.]

(In the Committee.)

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew): I have been actuated by a desire to make the proportion of tolls for the particular articles referred to in the resolution, bear a more equitable ratio than they do under the Act as it stands at present on the Statute-book. My own idea is embodied in the resolution before you, but, after consultation with parties interested, I have to propose amendments to the tariff which have been agreed upon, and will meet the views of those interested.

MR. MACKENZIE: But who are interested?

MR. WHITE: Those who are interested in the Bill are, 1st, those who are proprietors in joint stock companies of such works as are referred to in the resolution; and, 2nd, those who are interested in the passage of timber through these works.

MR. MACKENZIE: Was there any notice given of intention to apply for this. Are the public aware of it, except through our Minutes?

MR. WHITE: I believe not; it is a Public Bill, and I think the hon. gentleman does not understand the motion I am making. This does not refer to any company organised under a special Act; it refers to the Joint Stock Companies Act generally. It does not refer to any particular association of individuals except that it will affect generally such as may have associated themselves under the Joint Stock Companies Act.

MR. MACKENZIE: Oh, yes, I see. How does the present tariff compare with that proposed?

MR. WHITE: The companies incorporated under special Acts submit their own tariff to the Governor in Council for revision and adjustment, and there is a great discrepancy in the tariff of tolls enforced by the Upper and Lower Ottawa Boom Companies on timber as compared with saw-logs, and the reply that these companies make in answer to objections to the existing tariff is that they are unable to alter it, because the Governor refuses to agree to any tariff except one based on the provisions laid down in the Joint Stock Companies Act, although they see the injustice of the present tariff. Negotiations have been entered into with a view to agreeing upon a tariff more equitable than the one laid down by the Joint Stock Companies Act, and the different Boom Companies have agreed upon a tariff, which I propose to substitute for the tariff referred to in the resolution.

Resolution ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

(In the House.)

Resolution reported, read the second time, and agreed to.

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew) introduced a Bill (No. 48) To amend the Act respecting Joint Stock Companies to construct works to facilitate the transmission of timber down rivers and streams.

Bill read the first time.

STRATFORD POST-OFFICE.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. HESSON moved for an Address for copies of all correspondence and papers between the Government and the corporation of the town of Stratford, respecting the proposal of said corporation to donate a site for the purpose of erecting a post-office thereon. He said: In connection with this matter I desire to say that a proposition has been made by the Council of the town of Stratford to the Government to donate a site, worth something like $6,000, for a post-office. A plot very desirably situated is generously offered to the Government for the purpose. I need not say how much such a public building is required in the town of Stratford. I have had my attention called to the erection of post-offices and Custom-houses in different towns in Ontario, and in looking over them I find that the late Government adopted a system, which I am not disposed to condemn but rather to approve, that of erecting post-offices in large towns and cities. I think this course is in the interest of the country. I have looked over the Post Office and Customs revenue returns for Guelph and Windsor, and find that these two places, to which such large grants were made by the late Government for public buildings, do not stand in a better position with regard to these revenues than Stratford. I shall have to draw the attention of the Government to the fact that the city of Guelph does not give a larger revenue than Stratford. It produces $45,526.85 nett, including Post Office and Customs revenue for the past year, according to the Public Accounts; the late Government erected a post-office in that city at a cost of $13,900, including the cost of land—$4,000. Now, if the revenues of towns are to be taken into consideration in matters of this kind, then I submit that the town of Stratford is well entitled to be taken into consideration. The town of Windsor has also had a post-office erected under the late Government. Now, the nett revenue of that town is only $40,425.52. The city of Belleville, I am told, has also a claim for a post-office and Customhouse. Well, I find that their revenue for Post Office and Customs is $50,137.01 for the past year, whilst the town of Stratford, for which I prefer this claim, although not so widely known, perhaps, as these older places, has, nevertheless, made rapid advances during the last few years, and I find it provided a revenue of $47,815.74. Now the arrangements in Stratford, with respect to Customs and Post Office, are very inadequate. The amount granted by the Government for rent of a post-office is the insignificant sum of $240 (and this includes light and fuel). This sum cannot secure respectable accommodation for Her Majesty's post-office, in a large and prosperous town, when a decent store rents for $600 per year. Its revenue exceeds that of either Windsor or Guelph, one a town, and the other a city, being $2,278.69 in excess of the city of Guelph, and $7,390.22 in excess of Windsor. I am dealing with the nett revenue. I might also point to the city of St. Catharines, with a revenue of $52,076.37, where, I am told, the Government intend to erect similar buildings; also the town of

MR. HESSON.

St. Thomas, with its revenue of $33,586.54, and other thriving towns of Canada, where, no doubt, it is the intention of the Government to erect such buildings; but I have yet to learn that any other town or city has made such a grant as that now proposed to be made by the corporation of Stratford, as a site worth, I repeat, $6,000. The land offered is surrounded by streets on all sides, and is now used as a public park, in the centre of the town, and altogether most conveniently situated for the erection of Government buildings. I have no fault to find with the commencement of this noble work by the late Administration, only that they should have begun these erections in Stratford in advance of Guelph or Windsor. If the Government omit to accept this proposition now, they may find themselves obliged to pay a large sum for a site in future; but I have reason to hope and believe that they will continue the policy of erecting buildings in the large towns and cities for the accommodation of the public. I may draw the attention of the Government to another fact: that in Guelph it costs 13 per cent. to collect their revenue, in Windsor 25 per cent., and Stratford only 10 per cent., I presume because the officials there are paid a starving salary. I could give other points on this subject, but I do not desire to occupy the time of the House. I am aware that other communities have made similar demands on the Government, but I would remind them, if they wish to succeed, that they should make as liberal a grant as the corporation of Stratford has proposed to make.

MR. ARKELL: If the Government takes into consideration the claim of Stratford, I trust they will also pay attention to the requirements of another town in the West, which is a great railway centre, St. Thomas. I doubt whether the authorities there would give anything towards the erection of a building, but I think it will be recognised before long that a building should be erected. We only ask, however, that the Government should have a sufficient amount of funds in the Treasury before commencing such work, and I have no doubt that under the National Policy it will not be long before that result is reached. When that time does arrive, I think all towns, like St.

Thomas and Stratford, will be attended to in respect to public buildings.

MR. FARROW: I am glad that the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) has brought this question before the House. I have looked carefully over the reports, and I find several subjects worthy of being brought before the notice of the House. I should have no objections to a new post-office building being erected in Stratford, but in our part of the country some of the people have such good salaries that they are enabled to erect such buildings at their own expense, in which to keep the post office. I would advise Stratford and St. Thomas to do likewise until the Government can get a sufficient quantity of money on hand to undertake such works. I find that there is something wrong about paying the officials connected with the post-office in Ontario. In a little incorporated village in Huron County, called Plym, the revenue is $1,120 a year, and the postmaster is only paid $180. At Bobcaygeon, the revenue is $1,090, and the postmaster is paid $404, besides forty-eight dollars for forwarding, and forty dollars for rent, light and fuel; now why this great difference? It is wrong. Take the post-office of Moore, the revenue is only $281, and the postmaster is paid $192, while Moorefield post-office yields a revenue of $600 a year, and the postmaster is paid the sum of $136. The Wroxeter post-office yields a revenue of $691, and the postmaster gets $282, besides fifty dollars for forwarding. Gorrie post-office yields a revenue of $450, and the postmaster gets only $118. Were he paid in proportion to Wroxeter, his salary ought to be over $200. It is a good study to go over the Postmaster-General's Report, for it is full of such inequalities of payment such as mentioned. I am sorry to notice that the revenue of the Post Office does not come up to the expenditure. But where is the loss? Our friends from the Lower Provinces claim that they have not got their rights. The Prince Edward Islanders want a part of the Fishery Award; the Nova Scotians want an extra subsidy; and the New Brunswickers want better terms. Now let us look at the Post Office Returns, compared with Ontario. The postal revenue of Ontario, compared with its expenditure, is 90 per cent.; it only jacks 10 per cent. of paying its way.

Quebec lacks 40 per cent.; Nova Scotia lacks 46 per cent.; New Brunswick lacks 47 per cent., and Prince Edward Island lacks 59 per cent. Then we come to this "great sea of mountains," as it is called, British Columbia, and we find that it only figures at 26, lacking 74 per cent. of paying expenses. Our new territory, the North-West, makes a better showing, its Post Office revenue being 60 per cent. Another complaint that I wish to make is, that the Ontario postmasters are not paid equal to those of Quebec or the Lower Provinces. I think if the salaries in these Provinces were clipped down on a par with the Ontario salaries, in a few years the revenue would be brought more on a level with the expenditure. I would also suggest another improvement. We now pay two cents for registering letters. What is the use of that? It is simply throwing money away. If a registered letter is lost the postmaster tries to hunt it up. Some scoundrel may have stolen the money, and he is sent to jail; but what good is that to the poor man who lost the money? I think the registration fee should be regulated according to the amount of money placed in the letter, and the Government responsible for the money sent. It might be as well to charge two cents for a letter containing ten dollars; four cents for one containing twenty-five dollars, and so on in proportion up to $100. One year's experience on such a plan would not only augment the revenue, but would be of great benefit to the public. Then there is another matter to which I wish to call attention. The Post Office now performs a very good service by carrying small parcels. Would it not be well for the Department to undertake the express business of the country. The express companies charge enormously, and are making thousands and tens of thousands of dollars. As the Post Office now carries small parcels, I do not see why it should not undertake the whole business and so swell the revenue.

MR. FITZSIMMONS: It is very true that the late Government built a great many public buildings, and I think that they took a step in the right direction. I wish to call attention to the requirements of Brockville. I find that the Post Office and Customs receipts in that town amounted to $59,109.33, leaving a balance of $52,242 in favour of the Departments, exceeding Belleville by $2,105; Stratford by $4,426; Guelph, $6,715; Chatham, $28,022; and the town of St. Thomas by $8,656. Under those considerations, I think the town of Brockville is entitled to some consideration. The receipts from Inland Revenue for the year ending June 30, 1878, was $14,597.42; for the year ending June 30, 1879, $15,627.95; and for the half year ending December 31, 1879, $9,796. This shows a considerable increase each year, and there is no doubt, from all the indications, that there will be a more rapid increase in future. I would suggest that Brockville be separated from the Prescott division for Excise purposes, and placed, as it formerly was, in the Leeds division. That would include Gananoque, which is in the same county, as an outpost. For the division the collections would then amount to nearly $25,000, which would be considerably larger than the collections of several of the revenue divisions in Ontario. Brockville frequently suffers inconveniences by being an outpost. For instance, when goods come in bond, the removal papers are invariably sent to Prescott, and the goods cannot be obtained until the papers are returned from that place, sometimes causing great detriment to business. All the entries for warehouse and ex-warehouse, and all returns, have to be made in triplicate, whereas if business was done directly with the Department in Ottawa, the returns would be made in duplicate, and be a great convenience to traders. I think that the requirements of Brockville should not be overlooked when the Government takes this question under consideration.

MR. BUNSTER: While the motion of the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) is before the House, I may say that I think his remarks disparaging to British Columbia were uncalled for. The language uttered by the member for West Durham, a few days ago, in regard to British Columbia, was also unnecessary and derogatory. Our Province does not deserve such treatment. It would have been far better for British Columbia had she not entered Confederation; our people would feel far more confidence in working out their own destiny, than depending upon the false promises of Canada. I consider it unstatesmanlike to characterise our Province as an inhospitable one. It is as false as false can be. If hon. gentlemen would only visit that Province, and live in it as I have done, they would render a different verdict. Can there be anything gained by vilifying the Province as some members have done? Even the gallant knight at the head of the Government, speaking of it the other day, copied the language of the hon. member for West Durham, ungenerous and uncalled for. I was astonished to hear him use it. Before we united with Canada we had our emigration agents in San Francisco, Australia and England, to direct attention and emigrants to our shores; but we have no agents now, and the Province is cried down, though it produces more and does better than all the rest of the Dominion. They talk about our "sea of mountains." This same "sea of mountains" turns out more gold than all the mountains of the other Provinces. We beat them also in exporting more than we import. I would ask, once for all, in behalf of British Columbia, that hon. gentlemen would leave off abusing her, and try to carry out the promises made at the Union, which, so far, have been left unfulfilled.

MR. HESSON: I have listened to hon. gentlemen who have spoken all round, but none of them could say their towns had made as liberal a proposition as the hon. member for North Perth had made for Stratford. I ask the attention of the Government to another matter, and it deserves careful consideration at their hands. Stratford post-office yields a larger revenue to the Government than Ottawa, by 300 per cent. I find a most remarkable decline in the Post Office revenue of Ottawa City. I know the present Postmaster-General has not had time yet to deal with this question, and it will take long to clean out the horde of useless officials maintained here at the expense of the country towns throughout Canada. Appeals to Ministers here are no doubt hard to resist, but in the interest of other places in Canada they must be resisted. I find no less than forty able-bodied men and boys employed in the Post Office Department at Ottawa, exclusive of those in the post-office about these buildings. The revenue in 1874 was $20,988; in 1875, $24,498; in 1876, $14,297.14, or a decline of $10,000 or more; in 1877, $6,947.47; 1878, $4,489.99; and, I am sorry to say, the revenue for 1879 declined to $1,531.36. Just fancy, Mr. Speaker, the sum of $1,531.36 as the nett revenue from the city of Ottawa, the capital of Canada, the total cost of running the city post-office is no less a sum than $26,493.82, and I find that this decline is to be traced throughout the period of the late Administration in office. At this rate, another year would leave the Ottawa post-office unable to meet its expenditure. Thirteen well-paid letter-carriers are employed in this city, and one well-paid superintendent letter-carrier receiving $600 a year. The whole force of letter-carriers get over $7,000 to deliver letters in this city. For what are the other twenty-three well-paid clerks and officials employed; is it to draw their salaries? This state of things is not creditable to the management of the post-office of the city of Ottawa, and I hope the Postmaster-General will see to it, in order to the cutting down of the expenses here as soon as possible.

MR. KRANZ: With regard to North Waterloo, I will draw the attention of the Government to the advisability of erecting public buildings in every country town needing a Customs and Internal Revenue, and post-office. Forty per cent. of the Customs collected in the Guelph district is got from Berlin. That amount is received in a room six feet by twelve feet. I hope that as soon as the Government can make the revenue and expenditure meet it will not forget Berlin, but erect a good building in it. We want a Customs and post-office. It is not necessary that a large sum, $20,000 or $30,00, should be spent.

MR. WRIGHT: I sympathise sincerely with the sorrows of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this subject. The truth is that the large cities have managed to swallow up the grand appropriations, while the small towns and small cities and rural sections have been comparatively neglected. I sympathise with the statements made by the hon. gentlemen who have preceded me, with regard to their own grievances and sorrows in other regions, but I tell them that I have suffered too—that my constituency has been sadly overlooked. While this city of Ottawa, alluded to in such touching and feeling terms by the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson), can boast of a magnificent post-office and postal service, my own county, so near, has been comparatively neglected. On the opposite side of the river there is a large city, which compares favourably with other cities of the Dominion, and yet it is without a post-office at all. I call the attention of the Postmaster-General to his laches in that direction. I hope he will see to our wants in this respect, and that hon. members will enforce on the Government the propriety of giving to the rural constituencies their rights in this matter, and that they will receive due attention when the Estimates come down.

MR. ALLISON: As I have been endeavouring to impress upon some hon. members of the Government the importance of erecting a public building in the shire town of the county I represent, I take the opportunity of impressing its importance upon the Government as a whole. It would be difficult, I think, to find in the Dominion a town in which the post-office work is so large, and the accommodation so limited. Until this discussion arose, I hoped that I stood almost alone in my application, but as the applications for such buildings appear to be so general, I think the only satisfactory solution will be for the Government to erect such buildings in all the important towns where they are required. If this cannot be done at once, I particularly commend to the favourable consideration of the Government the urgent claims of the town of Windsor in the county I represent.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There seems to be quite a consensus of opinion, almost amounting to enthusiasm, on the part of hon. members from cities and towns in favour of the erection of handsome public buildings in their constituencies for post-offices and other purposes. I do not see that the same enthusiasm exists among the representatives of the rural constituencies; and I think that the Government, which is an economical Government, will have to throw itself upon its rural friends to resist this great pressure from the towns. Seriously, it is of importance in the Administration of the affairs of the Government, and in the transaction of its business, such as Inland Revenue, Post Office, and so forth, that there should be a respectable building for such in every important district ; and I believe that if such buildings were made suitable, and erected economically, they would effect a very considerable saving in interest, and exempt us from the payment of high rent in many places. This improvement can only proceed by degrees. The late Government very properly erected several post-offices and other public buildings, and the present will imitate it in putting up such structures where they are clearly wanted. But of course, with so many demands on the Exchequer, Government has to think twice before incurring a large expenditure in this way ; we can only go on gradually. Perhaps not in my time but in the time of some of the younger members of this House, all the towns will have suitable buildings erected for the convenience of the public.

MR. McCUAIG: The policy of the Government of the Dominion hitherto has been to create post-offices at the public expense in cities only, and I am opposed to any grant of money being made in the present state of our finances, in violation to this excellent and well-established rule. It might be worthy the consideration of the Government, in cases where rentals are paid by them for Customs, Inland Revenue and post-offices in towns, amounting to a sum not less than $300 per annum, whether it would not be advisable to capitalise this amount, which, at six per cent., would pay the interest on a loan of nearly $5,000, buy a site and build a substantial suitable building for the post-office, Customs and Inland Revenue offices. This policy, if adopted, would add no additional expense to the Government on what they at present pay, and would, without doubt, enable them to secure the land at a much cheaper rate at present than after the town has assumed the importance of a city. On the general question of the management of the Post Office Department, I have pleasure in bearing a willing testimony to the care and efficiency with which it has been administered. It is quite true, through the urgency of the inhabitants of many localities, and the influence of members in connection with a desire on behalf of the officers of the Department, to give every possible accommodation within their power, many country offices have been opened throughout the whole Dominion, and to such an extent has this liberal and considerate policy been carried that the expenditure over receipts has reached so large a sum that Government may be constrained in the future to curtail. There is no Department of the Public Service brought more in daily contact with the people, and it is a fact that cannot be disputed that its management commands the confidence of the country. I notice with surprise the remarks of an hon. gentleman in the direction of fault-finding with the expenses of the post-offices of this city. I beg to remind him and hon. members of this House of the enormous increase of work imposed on this office during the Session of Parliament, and I have every confidence, if the matter is carefully examined by him, he will find the same economy, care and prudence in the conducting of this office that distinguishes the management of the Post Office Department generally.

MR. VALLÉE: As the Province of Ontario has this evening united with British Columbia in asking money from the Government, I cannot abstain from claiming on behalf of my own Province a very small share in the generous concessions which the Government may be induced to make, after such warm and eloquent appeals. I consider that, if our friends on the other side of the House are entitled to claim anything for the Province of Ontario, on this side we have a right to claim something for the Province of Quebec. We have in that Province several important towns, which have so far received nothing from the Government for the construction of Post-offices. A few moments ago, an hon. member from Ontario, in order to arouse the generosity of the Postmaster-General in favour of his Province, stated that it was entitled to concessions, as it contributed so large a share to the revenue of the Dominion. I desire to point out to my friends from Ontario that, according to the report of the Customs Department for this year, the Province of Quebec contributed to the Customs Revenue at the rate of $3.97 per soul, while the Province of Ontario only contributed $3.06 per soul. Consequently, if our claims are to be based on the proportion of the revenue contributed by each Province, I consider that the towns of the Province of Quebec, and especially the town of Lévis, on whose behalf I make this application, are entitled to receive assistance from the Government. I admit, however, that this question should not rest upon so narrow a basis; we ask grants from the Government in the general interest of the Dominion of Canada. The good name of the country requires that the Government should, as far as possible, build a suitable post-office in each important town in the Dominion; I hope, therefore, that, when the present Government takes this question into consideration, it will not forget the town of Lévis, nor those of St. Hyacinthe and Sorel, which have no post-offices built at the cost of the state.

MR. MÉTHOT: As I observe hon. members from the different Provinces of the Dominion rise one after another, to point out in turn the merits of the towns which they represent, respectively, I feel that I should be truly deserving of blame if I did not raise my voice to call upon the Government not to forget, in the distribution of the favours which, so far as I can see, it is disposed to grant to the different towns in the Province, to grant a share of those favours to the town of Three Rivers. It is one of the oldest towns, the second in age in the country, and the third in population. At Three Rivers, we suffer considerable inconvenience from the fact that we are unprovided with a suitable post-office. The Government has indeed put up a sort of a building, which is buried in a sand bank, for use as a Custom-house. But I do not consider that a separate building would be asked for as a post-office, but only that an addition should be built to the Custom-house, so as to provide a suitable building for the accommodation of all the public offices. It would then be unnecessary to hire a special building for post-office purposes, a course which places us at the mercy of a private individual. I trust then that the Government will kindly bear the town of Three Rivers in mind, and grant us a small share of the public money, so as to provide us, if not with a separate post-office, at least with a suitable building for the accommodation of the post-office, the Custom-house and the other public offices.

MR. McINNES: I desire the indulgence of the House for a few moments, while referring to a statement made by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron). The hon. gentleman, in giving the amount of revenue derived from the mail service of each Province, as compared with the expenditure, stated that British Columbia stood the lowest; that she only contributed twenty-six per cent. of the amount spent; and then he went on to laud the Province of Manitoba for the large revenue she yielded to the Department of the Postmaster-General. Well, I am not surprised that Manitoba yielded a large, and British Columbia a small revenue to that Department. I would like to know what amount the prairie Province yielded prior to railway construction being commenced. I have not the figures at hand, but venture the opinion that it was a very small one indeed. Now, it must be taken into consideration that British Columbia has been kept for the last six years in a constant state of uncertainty with respect to the location of the Canadian Pacific Railway in that Province, and the lack of faith engendered by the vacillating policy of the late Administration had anything but a tendency to inspire confidence in the country, and to attract capitalists and immigration to the Province. It therefore cannot be wondered at that we have a small population, and yielded only a small revenue to the Post Office Department. The late Government being more favourably disposed to Manitoba than British Columbia, began railway construction in that Province some four or five years ago, and as a natural consequence attracted capitalists and thousands of immigrants annually. I contend the same happy result would have been attained in British Columbia had an equally liberal and just policy been pursued by the late Administration. It has been left to the present Government, and I am happy that it has been left to them, to carry out the terms of Union with British Columbia. This considerate and just policy has been adopted by the Government who, on coming into power, resolved to give British Columbia that measure of justice to which she was entitled, and so long desired by the hon. member for West

Durham and his associates. A contract of 127 miles of railway has been awarded, and construction will be begun next month, and I will only mention one of the many immediate benefits to be derived from railway construction. Since British Columbia became part of the Dominion, the Government has been paying a steam-boat company an annual subsidy of no less than $54,000 for carrying the mails between Victoria and San Francisco. Now in view of railway construction in British Columbia, a contract for the same mail service has been awarded a few days ago for a considerable sum less than one-third the original amount. By the influx of population, the impetus that thus will be given to every industry now in the Province, and the new ones that will spring into existence, I have no hesitation in predicting a bright future for British Columbia, and that she will contribute as large a percentage on the money expended in postal service as any Province in the Dominion.

MR. MOUSSEAU: I have had occasion to witness a splendid proof of the anxiety of the Government to practice economy. I have in my county a tolerably large village which asks, not for a post-office, but simply for a box at the railway station. Now, these boxes cost a large sum of money. Some of them cost three dollars and fifty cents, others four, five and even ten dollars. But our people are not extravagant—we are country people—and we only ask for a box of the cheapest kind. After a most humble and moderate petition, addressed by me as member for the county to the Post Office Department, then controlled by Sir Alexander Campbell, I received a reply, covering four pages of foolscap, informing me that I was altogether wrong; that I wanted to waste the public money; that four dollars for a small village in Quebec was too great an outlay. But $50,000 can be spent in a single large city in Ontario. I was shown as clearly as that two and two makes four that, in my little village, the distance from the post-office to the railway station was but fifty yards, whereas, in the villages of Ontario and of the eastern townships of the Province of Quebec, the distance was from 100 to 200 yards between the railway stations and the post-offices. It is quite clear, therefore, that I have good reason to stand by the policy of the Government as regards economy in the matter of post-offices, since they have refused to grant me for my county a box worth three dollars and fifty cents.

MR. DESJARDINS: I avail myself of this opportunity to say a word or two in relation to the administration of the Post Office. In the county of Hochelaga, we have also several towns whose interests deserve the attention of the Postmaster-General. I shall not go so far as to ask for post-office buildings, such as those required for a certain number of other towns, but I desire that the service, in the municipalities of my county should be such as to meet the requirements of the public, and proportioned to the amount of business transacted between them and great central point, Montreal. The principle suggested by the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Farrow), that the question of postal service should be treated solely as a matter of direct revenue, is not a principle which can be adopted generally, especially in this country. If, as he maintains, the Government should consider the organisation as a matter of pure speculation, it were better to leave the service to private enterprise. But it is evident that, in a country such as ours, where the distances are so great and where the service cannot be carried out without great expense, we should be left in a very backward condition if the postal facilities were to be limited in proportion to the amount of revenue each locality is capable of yielding. The wants of the people would in no way be met, and the development of the country would be greatly retarded. We all know quite well that since the Government of this country has adopted the policy of rendering the postal service as complete as possible, and endeavoured to combine cheapness with an effectual mail service, the revenue derived has been comparatively greater than when the postage on letters and newspapers was very much higher. In my county complaint is justly made that in important centres, such as St. Henri, with a population of 15,000 to 20,000 souls, St. Jean Baptiste, St. Cunegonde, St. Gabriel and others, the service is not such as to meet the requirements of the population. To refuse to those important localities a suitable service, in order to effect a saving, is false economy. If those municipalities were afforded all the benefits of a cheap, more regular and more frequent service, the revenue derived from them would certainly suffice to indemnify the Government for the increased expenditure required. I would therefore ask the hon. the Postmaster-General to grant favourable consideration to the petitions I have recently presented to him in relation to this matter.

MR. STEPHENSON: A number of years ago—about the year 1873—I was given to understand that the Government proposed to erect post-offices in the five leading towns of Ontario, namely: Belleville, Brantford, Guelph, St. Catharines and Chatham. Four of those towns have since then been incorporated as cities, and Chatham, I believe, stands on the list as the next to be incorporated, and application with that end in view will probably be made to the Local Legislature at its next Session. Not only is the revenue from the Post Office Department in Chatham as much as, if not more than, that of any other town in Ontario, but the revenue derived from the Customs Department, and the Inland Revenue Department is also very large. Taking the revenue from these three sources—Customs, Post Office and Inland Revenue—Chatham, I believe, pays into the Treasury something like $64,000 in round figures, for the collection of which the Government pay out something like $8,000 or $9,000. Therefore I think it will be seen that Chatham should receive the first consideration at the hands of the Government in making these appropriations.

MR. HESSON: I did not intend to refer to the town of Chatham or its revenue, though I had the figures before me, but the hon. member from Kent (Mr. Stevenson) has made an unfair comparison against Stratford, he having included the Inland Revenue receipts, and not having deducted the charges for collection. The figures, as taken from the Public Accounts are these: Post-office and Customs returns from Chatham gave a nett revenue of $24,219.22, and from the town of Stratford $47,815.74, or nearly two dollars to one. I claim that Stratford stands only second to the town of Brockville in its revenue from these two sources.

MR. STEVENSON: I think if the hon. gentleman will look at the returns that he will find that they are about as follows: Post Office, about $8,000 or $9,000, and Customs from $25,000 to $30,000; Inland revenue about $25,000.

MR. O'CONNOR: I am very thankful for the many suggestions that have been thrown out by hon. members. Many of them are very valuable suggestions which will not be lost sight of when the proper time comes to take them into consideration. Perhaps one of the most valuable suggestions is that which advises the Government not to proceed with these improvements until the revenue of the country warrants it. That I fear will have to be attended to for some time, although in some places I have no doubt we shall be able, from time to time, to do something towards meeting the wishes of hon. gentlemen who have spoken upon this question. But there is no doubt that in the present state of affairs but little can be done for a while in that way, and I trust that hon. members will so instruct their constituents that they will not expect much at the hands of the Government until the finances of the country are in a better condition than they are at the present time. There is, however, no objection in the meantime to the motion passing.

MR. MACKENZIE: I am very sorry to hear from the hon. the Postmaster-General that the country is in such a deplorable state. We were led to believe, two years ago, that, as soon as he and his colleagues obtained office, everything would at once be flourishing, and there would be prosperity on every hand. Now, one member after another rises up on the Ministerial Benches and deprecates the want of funds to build even a small country post-office.

MR. O'CONNOR: Not a post-office but a series of post-offices.

MR. MACKENZIE: A series of post-offices; very well, we will take it that way, though what a series of post-offices is I really do not know.

MR. O'CONNOR: A number then.

MR. MACKENZIE: I was about to say, with regard to the buildings that have been erected, that it was not solely for the purpose of affording post-office accommodation that buildings were erected by the late Administration in Windsor, Brantford and Guelph.

These were three great centres of revenue collection. I am not quite certain about the amount received at present in Windsor. It is about $650,000, I believe, within the last year, like everything else under hon. gentlemen opposite. Formerly it was about $750,000. In Guelph, about the time that we commenced to build there, the collections of the Inland Revenue Department was somewhere about $300,000. It has now gone down to $125,000. In Brantford—the revenue district itself is named Paris, although the real revenue collection is done in Brantford—between the Customs and Excise the revenue collected is about $231,000. The ground I took myself in regard to such buildings was this: it is a mistake to imagine that in ordinary towns of a few thousand people it would be cheaper to build than to rent. You will rent one in almost all these cases cheaper than you can build. But, where there is a large number of officers—as in Windsor—and the collections of Windsor are not much over half that collected in Sarnia, but owing to the large amount of travel to and from the United States, a large number of officers are required—a building is absolutely indispensable. The ground we took was, that wherever it became necessary to have larger accommodation than could be procured at a reasonable rent, we should build. We therefore selected these three towns to erect buildings in, with the intention of proceeding as events developed themselves in other quarters, and not with the view some hon. gentlemen have suggested, not with the view of distributing the revenue in building paltry structures in little towns here and there over the country. The expenditure of $10,000 to $20,000 in a place like Stratford, would be of comparatively small importance compared with the expenditures made by private persons in the construction of buildings. The expense to the Government would be large, while the benefits to the localities would be very small. The true plan is to endeavour to do as a Government as a private individual would do for himself. When it is best to rent, when it is best to build, but avoid building as long as you can possibly rent on fair terms.

MR. BOURBEAU: The Government cannot be charged with having failed to practice economy to a sufficient extent in the division to which I belong, as regards the Post Office Department. In the Three Rivers division, as it is well-known, the population is almost exclusively French Canadian, and most of the postmasters do not understand the English language. It is very desirable that the notifications for postmasters who are French Canadians should be printed in their language. They complain of receiving circulars printed only in English, and the postmasters cannot understand the purport of such circulars. The same complaint is made as to the headings of accounts, which are printed for the most part in English. I would therefore request the Postmaster-General to direct that circulars, headings of accounts, and other matters relating to post-offices, be printed also in French. It is asserted that the expenditure in the Province of Quebec does not bear so satisfactory a proportion to the revenue as in the Province of Ontario, and this leads me to mention the difference in salary between the Post Office Inspectors. I think that in the Three Rivers division the Inspector receives a much smaller salary than that paid in the other divisions. His salary, if I am not mistaken, is $1,200, while the salaries of the other Inspectors amount to $2,000 and even $2,400. Now, I am not one of those who desire to increase the cost of the Public Service; on the contrary, I shall always strive to reduce it as much as possible. What I want is that there should be less difference between the salaries of the Inspectors. Now, if $1,200 is enough for one Inspector, $2,400 must be too much for another. If the latter sum is not too much, the first cannot be enough. It cannot be said that, in the county I have the honour to represent, the carrying of the mails costs too much. I have ascertained that most of those who carry the mails perform the service very cheaply. Thanks to the late Postmaster-General, we have effected every possible saving in our county. We had in that county two mail conductors on the railway from Three Rivers to Arthabaska. These two conductors having been dispensed with, a saving of about $3,000 has been effected. I desire also to call the attention of the Postmaster-General to the fact that one of the mail conductors was placed on the retired list, without having asked for it. He had done his duty well during fourteen years, and was fully capable of continuing to do so. That worthy officer, Mr. Beaudet, had reached the position of a first-class clerk in the Public Service. After he was placed on the retired list, he applied again for work, and was given employment, but I regret to state, for the sake of my friend Mr. Beaudet, that he has been placed in the position of a second-class clerk. Now, inasmuch as no complaint was ever made or filed against him in the Department, I think it is the duty of the hon. the Postmaster-General to reinstate that gentleman to the position of a first-class clerk previously held by him.

MR. ROYAL: Several hon. gentlemen have addressed the House asking to have public buildings erected in their localities for use as post-offices. We in the North-West do not demand any such thing. Our people would be well pleased with shanties, provided the emigrants received their letters as soon as possible. It has been said that the revenue derived from Manitoba is not to be compared with some of the other Provinces. Well, Sir, I am informed that proportionately Manitoba contributes more than many of her elder sisters to the revenue of the Department. Besides, in my humble opinion, the North-West is the place for investment for the Dominion, and from that point of view I think that by increasing the postal facilities in Manitoba as well as the North-West Territories, they will be creating a large number of emigration agents. Emigrants, as soon as they are settled in their new home, write to their friends telling them of what they have seen in Manitoba and the North-West. They therefore are the most disinterested and faithful emigration agents. There is no doubt that a great deal of energy has been displayed by the Postmaster-General in spreading postal facilities all over Manitoba, and establishing and maintaining a trunk line in the North-West. Further efforts, however, in this direction may be made with advantage. For instance, it has recently been made known that the Turtle Mountain district, is one of the best districts in Manitoba, and it is urged that by extending the line of the post-offices, from a certain point near Mountain City, once a week, that very material benefit would result in the promotion of the emigration likely to take that course in the spring and next season, and the cost would be trifling. Just now, there is only a fortnightly mail between Winnipeg and Battleford. I am of opinion that deviations should be made from the main line to such settlements as Qu'Appelle, Wood Mountain and St. Laurent and other ports, where there are already very large and flourishing settlements. Mr. Speaker, while I give just credit to the hon. the Postmaster-General, for the energy and unceasing attention given by his officers to the establishment of post-offices in Manitoba, yet something more is to be done. A fit and competent person should be appointed Inspector for the Province and the North-West Territories, who could, no doubt, keep pace with the rapid settlement of the country, in the increase of postal facilities.

SHELburne HARBOUR—LIGHT AT SURF POINT.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) moved for an Order of the House for a return of all tenders forwarded to the Department of Marine and Fisheries for the erection of a lighthouse at Surf Point, Shelburne Harbour; names of successful contractors and their bondsmen; moneys paid for advertising for tenders; amount paid contractors and workmen, and for what purpose; when construction of said lighthouse was postponed; also, the report of Inspector or Arbitrator upon which said moneys were paid, and amount of salary awarded him. He said: The light at the harbour of Shelburne was destroyed by fire two years ago this month. Almost immediately afterwards the Mackenzie Administration appropriated the sum of $2,000 towards the re-building of the light. The site of the old light was Sand Point, and petitions were presented to the Government asking that the light should be placed at Surf Point. The matter was brought to the attention of the Government last Session, and the answer given was that the light would be erected at Surf Point. I believe the decision the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries arrived at last year was based upon the advice of his officers in Nova Scotia, whom he consulted. The work was proceeded with and a certain sum of money expended. Subsequently the work was postponed, and I am credibly informed that a considerable sum of money has been paid to contractors because of their discontinuance of the contract. The object I have in making this motion is to ascertain the actual amount paid up to the present time in connection with the work.

MR. POPE (Queen's P. E. I.): There is no objection to furnish the information asked for. The statement of facts made by the hon. gentleman is entirely correct. I endeavoured to obtain the best information I could upon the subject, and the reports from our officers were in favour of having the light constructed at Sand Point. The contract was let for the building of the light there. Subsequently, petition after petition came in, signed by masters of coasting steamers and vessels, asking that the construction might be stopped and the work erected at Sand Point, not at the same place it was before but at the spit at Sand Point. After this I referred again to our own officers in Halifax, and they, after making enquiries, reported in favour of the spit at Sand Point. So far as I myself am concerned, I have never been at Shelburne, and I had to trust to the petitions received and the information I obtained from our own officers and others. I think I am safe in saying that the greater portion of the vessels trading there are small coasting vessels and traders, and for these vessels Sand Point is very much to be preferred to the other. Of course when the Government undertakes to stop public works it must pay for the work. A valuation of the work and material was made, and the contractor was paid accordingly. Tenders were then asked for the construction of a light on the spit at Sand Point. These tenders have been received, and there the matter stands. I think the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals, who comes from Nova Scotia, is perhaps personally acquainted with the locality, and can better satisfy the House as to the reasons which actuated the Department of Marine and Fisheries in stopping the works. So far as the Department is concerned, we have only one desire, to put the light in the best place possible to suit the convenience of the vessels trading there.

MR. ROBERTSON.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne): I rise to correct a wrong impression under which the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries seems to be labouring. He says that only a small class of coasting vessels frequent Shelburne Harbour. I can assure him, however, that Shelburne is one of the most important ports in Nova Scotia, and in 1878 nearly 100,000 tons of shipping made use of it as a port of call. I think the tonnage last year showed an increase over the year 1878. Again, from the remarks of the hon. Minister, it would be supposed that the petitions received asked simply for the erection of the light at Sand Point. Petitions were also forwarded to the Department, signed by between 700 and 1,000 electors of that county, asking that the light should be erected at Surf Point, on the western side of the harbour.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I was induced to take a very deep interest in this subject, by the representations of a large number of persons who were in the habit of frequenting the harbour of Shelburne. It is quite true that the officers of the Marine and Fisheries Department reported in the first place in favour of Surf Point; but upon investigation it was found that the strong representations in favour of Surf Point were based upon a misapprehension, owing to the fact that it was supposed that the question was as between Sand Point, the site of the former lighthouse, and Surf Point, whereas it was not intended nor desired by any person to build it on the old site, but to bring it down to the spit of land at the remote end, where the greatest danger is encountered in going in or out of the harbour. When this matter came to be considered it was found that the spit at Sand Point would best subserve the interests of all of those who had occasion to frequent the port. It is well known to this House that the former member for Shelburne (Captain Coffin) always bore the reputation of being an able sea captain. Captain Coffin, who was for some years Receiver-General of this Government, Captain Coffin who was a ship-builder, Captain Coffin who was a ship-owner, and Captain Coffin who had been personally engaged for years going in and out of the harbour as a navigator, took the warmest interest in this question, and insisted that a greater mistake could not be made than to re-build this light house at Surf Point instead of Sand Point. Although I did not on all questions agree with the hon. gentleman in the course he took in this House, I may say that on that question I feel his opinion is of the greatest possible weight, as the sound opinion of a practical man who had the best means of forming an accurate judgment on that point. The captains of the Cunard Company, a large number of captains belonging to the ports of Shelburne and Yarmouth, as well as Captain Doan, who had occasion to go into that harbour every week of his life, were strongly of opinion that a very great mistake was being made, and one that would be attended with the greatest possible danger if the lighthouse were built on Surf Point instead of Sand Point. I had occasion to visit the town of Shelburne a short time ago, and in returning to the city of Halifax on board the steamer, we were in a state of considerable anxiety as to where we were. The night was very foggy, and my experiences on that occasion induced me to take a lively interest in the subject. Had the light been on the spit at Sand Point we should not have experienced any danger. The matter is one of great importance, and I offer these observations with a view of showing to the House the reasons which induced me to represent strongly to my hon. colleagues the propriety of re-building at Sand Point.

NOVA SCOTIA—PROPOSED BREAK-WATER AT PETIT RIVIÈRE.

MOTION FOR REPORT.

MR. KAULBACH, in moving for an Order of the House for a return of all reports and plans of surveys made at Petit Rivière, County of Lunenburg, Nova Scotia, in view of the proposed construction of a breakwater there, said: The necessity for the construction of a breakwater in this locality does not admit of a doubt, and will not be disputed by anyone who will undertake to inform himself of the locality, and the unfortunate position the inhabitants of Petit Rivière have been subjected to for many years, from the want of a harbour of safety for their vessels and the convenience of a market and place of shipment for their produce. Petit Rivière forms a noble section or part of the county of Lunenburg, which I have the honour to represent, with a soil the uplands of which are quite equal to any in the Province, abounding in timber of the most valuable description, stretching from the interior of the Province to the location of this contemplated breakwater, interspersed with farms and forests in every direction. The village or settlement of Petit Rivière is situated at the head of a large open bay, exposed to the violence of the storms the Atlantic Ocean, without any protection from easterly or southerly storms; the northern side and head of the said bay having shallow water with flats and sandbanks, the western side only offering chances for anchorage for shipping and the construction of a breakwater. At the western side of this bay several sites have been chosen, but none offering the advantages for cheapness of construction and advisability as a harbour of safety, equal that of "Cherry Point," this point being a promontory jutting out from the direct line of coast and forming, in part, a breakwater in itself. Application has been made on previous occasions, for a breakwater on the western side of this bay, but private prejudices and sectional interests combined, interposing each time, have offered delays and prevented a survey being made in the most desirable location, hence the delay in the construction of the work up to the present moment. Quite a number of vessels engaged in the coasting trade and fisheries are owned in Petit Rivière, the owners of which have been for many years, and still are, subjected to the risk of the loss of their vessels and lives by remaining in the bay when the wind is in from the sea, all being compelled to weigh anchor and seek refuge in the nearest harbour, which means at times to run to sea and make a harbour miles distant. The exports of fish, lumber and farm produce from this place form a very considerable item, which, in consequence of the want of a place of shipment for these commodities, the inhabitants have been compelled, in many instances, to sell at a sacrifice to the merchants and traders of the place. Most of the shipments in seagoing vessels are made in lighters which are not only dangerous and inconvenient, but expensive, and must necessarily be borne by the poor yeomanry and fishermen of the place.

This contemplated breakwater will not only be a harbour of refuge and convenience for vessels, but to fishingboats as well, which now must be drawn up on the bank or suffer the risk of being driven to pieces by the sea. A great additional inconvenience has existed, and still exists, to fishermen engaged in boat fishing for the want of a harbour of shelter for their boats, they being compelled after a severe storm to remain days together deprived of fishing, in consequence of the surf on the shore and their inability to launch their boats, although the water in the bay may be smooth and offering at the time good fishing. Now that the National Policy is beginning to show beneficial results in this country, and the Province of Nova Scotia generally, I am very desirous that this particular section of my county shall suffer no longer for the want of a harbour for the exports of their manufactures and products, but that this long expected, much desired and necessary public structure may be built, and that an engineer may be sent as early as practicable the coming summer to make the survey of this particular point and report the same as early as convenient.

Motion agreed to.

KINGSTON DRY DOCK.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. KIRKPATRICK, in moving for an Order of the House for a return of all reports made by Government Engineers, and all letters and correspondence relating to the construction of a dry dock at Kingston, and as to the necessity for the same, consequent upon the enlargement of the Welland Canal, said: In making this motion, perhaps I may be allowed to state the reasons why I ask for this report, which I believe has been made. For some years we have been expending large sums of money in enlarging the canals, and especially the Welland Canal, so as to pass vessels of large capacity—up to 60,000 bushels of grain—through it, and going down into Lake Ontario, thus making Lake Ontario the foot of lake navigation. As the means for repairing vessels, in vogue for some time past, will be utterly incapable of accommodating vessels of this capacity, it is necessary to provide some better means of repairing them, if these repairs are to be done in Canada. In the last few years the average number of vessels for repairs, for dockage, was fifty or sixty a year. These vessels were too large to be hauled up; and it has been usual for such vessels to go down to Ogdensburg, to be docked and have the necessary repairs done, Canada thus losing the hundreds and thousands of dollars spent upon such repairs, because we had no dockage in a Canadian port. It is of the utmost consequence, now that Lake Ontario is to be made the foot of lake navigation, that there should be some place to take in vessels of this class. It is just as necessary as that there should be one at Quebec for ocean-going vessels. We are expending large sums of money to encourage the carrying of grain down the River St. Lawrence, and in order to do so, we must give owners and captains of vessels, if they come down these Lakes, the means to do any repairs that may be necessary; if not they will not come to Canadian ports, they will prefer to go to American ports—even at a lower rate—where they know their repairs can be made. A report has been made to the Government; they sent an Engineer to inspect the place and report as to the construction of such a dock, and the country ought to see that report. I do not believe that this dry dock will in the end cost the Government anything at all, but will pay for itself. Either the Government should construct the dock and lease it—and in such a case they will get an ample amount to pay them interest on any outlay—or they may lend a sum of money to a company of persons interested in shipping and marine. There are persons ready to undertake the construction of the dock and pay four per cent interest on the money lent to them. It is a necessary work consequent on the large sum of money invested in the Welland Canal; at the same time it will be an encouragement to shipping, and further, it can be done without costing the country any money beyond a well secured loan. If these three reasons exist, the Government ought to undertake this work.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. MACKENZIE moved for an Address for a copy of all correspondence between the Government and the Quebec Government concerning the purchase by the Dominion Government of the Quebec Provincial Railway, known as the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway.

MR. MASSON: There is no such correspondence in existence. I think therefore the hon. gentleman had better withdraw the motion.

MR. MACKENZIE: Then I withdraw it; but will there be any such correspondence?

MR. MASSON: It will perhaps be as well to ask the Local Government about that.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

The following Motions for Returns were severally agreed to :—

Order of the House—Return of all correspondence and petitions asking for the erection of the harbour light at Surf Point, and also at Sand Point, Shelburne Harbour, and any reports made during the past two years by the officers of the Government in Nova Scotia as to the proper position of said light.—(Mr. Robertson, Shelburne.)

Order of the House—Return of all Deputy-Inspectors of Weights and Measures removed since the 1st of July, 1879; of all persons appointed as Inspectors and Deputy-Inspectors of Weights and Measures since the same date.—(Mr. Mackenzie)

Order of the House—Copies of correspondence and the report of the Engineer employed by the Government to examine into, and report upon a petition for the opening of a channel from Porter's Lake to the sea.—(Mr. Kaulbach.)

Order of the House—Copies of correspondence and the reports of the Engineer employed by the Government to examine into and report upon a petition for the extension of a breakwater commenced in the year 1878 at Three Pathon Harbour.—(Mr. Kaulbach.)

Order of the House—Copies of correspondence and the report of the Engineer employed by the Government to examine into and report upon a petition for the dredging of a channel in the harbour of Jeddore, in the county of Halifax.—(Mr. Kaulbach.)

PRAYERS.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time :—

Bill (No. 49) To incorporate the Red River and Assiniboine Bridge Company.—(Mr. White, Cardwell.)

Bill (No. 50) To amend the Act to incorporate the Ontario and Pacific Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Williams.)

Bill (No. 51) To amend the Act 36 Vic., chap. 108, intituled an Act to grant additional powers to the Quebec and Gulf Ports Steamship Company.—(Mr. McGreevy.)

MARITIME JURISDICTION ACT AMENDMENT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Shaw.)

FIRST READING.

Mr. SHAW introduced a Bill (No. 52) To repeal section 2 of a certain Act, intituled an Act to amend the Maritime Jurisdiction Act, 1877. He said: There was an Act passed by this Parliament in 1877 to establish a Court of Maritime Jurisdiction in the Province of Ontario. That Act provided, by the first section, that:

“Save as by this Act excepted, all persons shall, after this Act shall come into force, have in the Province of Ontario, the like rights and remedies in all matters (including cases of contracts and tort, and proceedings in rem and in personam) arising out of or connected with navigation, shipping, trade or commerce on any river, lake, canal or in land water, of which the whole or part is in the Province of Ontario, as such persons would have in any existing British Vice Admiralty Court, if the process of such Court extended to the said Province.”

The following section of the Act provided for the establishment of a Maritime Court. By the fourth Sub-section of the second section, it is provided:

“That no right or remedy in rem given by this Act only shall be enforced as against any subsequent bona fide purchaser or mortgagee of a ship, unless the proceedings for the enforcement thereof be begun within ninety days from the time when the same accrued.”

During the last Session of this House a Bill was passed entitled an Act to amend the Maritime Jurisdiction Act of 1877. In the second section of that Act it was provided that:

"No right or remedy in rem given by the said Act in respect of claims for tonnage, or claims for damage done by collisions by any ship, shall be enforced as against any bonâ fide mortgagee, whose mortgage is duly executed and registered at a port of either of the Provinces of Ontario or Quebec."

This Bill asks for the repeal of that section. I am of opinion that no greater remedy should be given to the mortgagee than is given to the bonâ fide purchaser. The mortgagee should not be placed in a better position than a person who owned the ship. The object of this Bill is to place them on a par.

Bill read the first time.

PORT STANLEY LIGHTHOUSE.

QUESTION.

MR. ARKELL enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place a sum in the Estimates, this Session, to build a new lighthouse at Port Stanley.

MR. POPE (Queen's P. E. I.): It is the intention to place such a sum in the Estimates.

TORONTO HARBOUR IMPROVEMENT.

QUESTION.

MR. HAY enquired, Whether the Government have considered the petition of the citizens, captains and vessel-owners of Toronto, presented last Session, in reference to the Toronto Harbour, and what measures they intend to adopt, if any, for its improvement and preservation.

MR. LANGEVIN: This question of the harbour of Toronto has occupied the attention of the Government for some years. My predecessor in the Public Works Department, not my immediate predecessor, but the previous one, proposed to obtain from Parliament votes of money for dredging the harbour. However, it appears from the engineers and others that the work so performed, though intended to relieve the harbour to a great extent, does not entirely meet the expectations. Under these circumstances the matter is now receiving the most serious attention of the Government. At a future day most likely I will be able to give a more definite answer to the hon. gentleman.

MISSISQUOI—PHILIPSBURGH BREAK-WATER.

QUESTION.

MR. BAKER enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place in the Estimates, this Session, an appropriation for the construction of a breakwater at Philipsburgh, in the County of Missisquoi.

MR. LANGEVIN: It is not the intention of the Government to ask for an appropriation for the construction of a breakwater at Philipsburgh, but it is their intention to have an examination of this locality made.

PRIVILEGE—THE MEMBER FOR LENNOX.

REMARKS.

MR. CASEY: I presented a second petition, yesterday, referring to the case of the hon. member for Lennox, and I thought it would serve the purpose of convenience if that petition were allowed to be read and received now, so that both petitions might be considered during the same debate, otherwise it will involve a second debate and a considerable loss of time.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think it is too serious a matter to be dealt with in that way. We have taken the grave responsibility of receiving the first petition, and we must deal with that before we take up another.

MR. CASEY: I merely made the suggestion, and I do not desire to make a motion.

PACIFIC RAILWAY CONTRACTS.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

MR. McLENNAN moved for an Order of the House for a statement of each contract let up to the 31st December, 1879, on the Pacific Railway, showing the estimated cost of the work on such contract according to the tender accepted, the amount paid to the contractor or contractors in respect thereof, and the amount yet required to complete the contract, so far as the same is known or approximately estimated; also, a statement of the decision, if any, arrived at by the Government as to the bridging of Red River, and the junction of the line west of Red River with the part of the road under construction from Thunder Bay and with the city of Winnipeg. He said: Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House and the Government to these matters connected with the expenditure on the Pacific Railway, at this stage of the Session for two reasons. In the first place, it appears to me that it has become a habit of the Government to bring down the statement on this important question at a very late period of the Session, when it becomes difficult to discuss fully the matters involved, questions that are of the first importance in respect to every interest in this country. Again, it is well known that the Public Accounts Committee sat last year upon the items of expenditure upon the Pacific Railway, and the questions involved in that expenditure. The report of the Committee was published after Parliament had risen, and I think that gentlemen who have read the report and looked with any care into it must admit that it contains matter altogether too important to be consigned to the oblivion of the Blue-book. I shall endeavour to show to the House and the Government that there are results brought out in that investigation that prove great laxity in the method of carrying on this expenditure, and chiefly in connection with the engineering service by which it is accomplished. In the statement that was made, in 1877, to this House—I may state first, however, in connection with this whole question, that it is a question of so much importance that it was the cause of overturning the Government, under whose auspices the undertaking was first presented to the country, I do not think by their fault, because I think a great mistake was made in obstructing and overturning the first project leading to subsidy of money and public lands, and that we shall never be able to retrieve the loss caused by that obstruction. The effect, however, was to overturn the Government. I believe, and think the House agrees with me, that the late Government would have come to its end by the same means, had it not done so by a more rapid disease, that of bad finance. I believe that the system inaugurated by that Government is, as I think I shall be able to show, not one consistent with a proper method of conducting the work. I think that so far as these same methods are continued by the present Government, an entire mistake is made, and my chief object is to call the attention of the House and the Government to those methods that ought to be corrected. In the statement made in 1877, we were told that the entire cost of the 228 miles of railway then under contract—the cost of that portion of the road when completed, including the cost of survey, erection of stations, and supplying it with rolling-stock for a heavy traffic—would be about $24,521 per mile. Some credit was taken by the Government that that portion of the road was to be built for half the cost of the Intercolonial Railway. It was considered that to complete the link from Thunder Bay to Red River—a length of 183 miles, it being remote and difficult of access—would cost more; as thirty or forty miles of that road would be found to be of a very heavy character to construct. No estimate was given then of the probable cost of the 183 miles, but the statements made in the following year appeared to give a little nearer estimate for the entire length of four hundred and some odd miles. It was said that this portion of the road could be fairly estimated not to exceed from $30,000 to $32,000 per mile. I must add that the hon. Minister stated that this was his own estimate and not that of the engineer. It was his estimate that the country had to deal with. The estimate, made at the close of another year (1879), came to this: that the cost of that section of the road would amount to about eighteen millions of dollars—within a little of $44,000 per mile. This is getting up very fast in our expenditure, and I think we shall require the assistance of this report to explain the methods by which this great increase of cost was reached. I believe that that Sub-Committee of Public Accounts is entitled to a great deal of credit for the pains it devoted to the investigation of this subject, and I regret exceedingly to find that a great many Members of the House have not read that report. I commend it to the Members of the House as very instructive reading, as it is very important to know how that expenditure is carried on; and as I can only give, briefly, such facts from the report as may confirm the statements I make, I would repeat that it is necessary to read the report in full in order to fully appreciate it. Members of the Engineering Staff were brought before the Committee, and some of the results are here illustrated. On contract 25 the quantity of money expended in excess of the estimate reached 32 per cent., or a difference of $347,578. On No. 14 the increase over the schedule was 80 per cent., amounting to $319,724 ; but the most extraordinary addition was in contract No. 15, reaching 40 per cent. of an increase, and amounting to the large sum of $930,915. But the curious part of this case is the fact, stated by the District Engineer in charge of the work, that this increase was carried on and resulted from a change in the character of the work, for which he had no authority from the Department, nor from his Chief. Now it seems almost incredible, but I repeat that it is shown, that the increase on this expenditure, amounting to nearly a million of dollars, resulted from a change in the character of the work, to make which the District Engineer had no authority from his Department or his Chief. It would be tedious to read here the questions and answers illustrating this point. The report brings out some other very strange features. The Chief Engineer of this work appears to have taken a very long holiday during the year that this expenditure was carried on, and there seems to have been a singular want of harmony between the Chief and the subordinates who were entrusted with carrying out this great work. The report brings out the fact that whilst this work was going on the Chief Engineer in charge of it left the country for several months, without the slightest communication with the next officer who was to take charge in his absence. It also reveals the fact that the next officer in charge left for the field of operations without any communication with his Chief, even after the return of that gentleman. The Assistant Engineer visited the field where this great amount of money was expended, and the result comes out that nobody is responsible for the increased expenditure.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER : Perhaps the hon. gentleman would allow me to explain that I think he is labouring under a misapprehension in reference to the Chief having left the country without any communication with the Assistant Engineer, who left for the field of operations. The fact is that Mr. Marcus Smith went to the field of operations before the return of the Chief Engineer from England.

Mr. McLENNAN : It would take up too much time to look up these questions and answers, but gentlemen can read them for themselves. They are to be found in the report in Volume No. 13 of the Journals of the House ; and I think it will be found that the facts are substantially what I have stated. There is no disputing the particular fact that this expenditure was made without authority, and that the Chief Engineer was absent for a great part of the time without giving instructions to the engineer in charge under him. There is another feature to which I would wish to call attention, and I think all the facts brought out in this report will confirm what I am about to state, that there appears to be no responsibility, but on the contrary a great deal of insubordination, and the most reckless extravagance in the Engineering Staff to whom such important trusts were left. The Engineer in Chief, among other facts brought out in this report, states that he is not under a salary ; and the Committee was left to judge for themselves what his relations to the Government were, beyond this fact that he expected to be rewarded for the work he performed. Now he must have occupied one of two positions. The natural and proper position, I think this House would say, should be that of a paid servant of the Government. I can hardly conceive any other position that a Chief Engineer could occupy with advantage to the country. The Chief Engineer states he had drawn no salary, that no salary was fixed, but that he expected to be rewarded for his work. This, I think, may be assumed to indicate a want of control. I can hardly conceive how a Government could control an engineer, who was merely an amateur at his work. The only other position that could be assumed is that he occupied the position which an architect occupies and with which I dare say many hon. members of this House are familiar, the position which an architect occupies who leads one on in an expenditure, beginning very moderately and going higher and higher.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : Led on by a towering ambition.

Mr. McLENNAN : By a towering ambition, as my hon. friend says, by a far spreading ambition I should think, ending in a commission to be paid by the unfortunate victim upon the ultimate expenditure. There was a simpler method in vogue in former times, when a monarch or some potentate commanded a man of genius to build a palace or a tower, or a cathedral, and rewarded the builder at his own sweet will, but we are past that method of doing things now, and the only alternative that I can see is the one to which I have referred. I think the House will agree with me that if the expenditure goes on in the manner it has been conducted so far, that the victim will have a grim vengeance over the architect in this instance; there will be no funds out of which to pay his commission. I hope we are not coming to that, however. We were told last year, and I gave great credit for it to my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, that we were to adopt a wiser method of proceeding in the extension of this railway. I do not know that it will be possible to reduce the expenditure upon the 400 miles from Thunder Bay to Red River. It is very near completion, but I fear there are yet some mythical figures of expenditure, even upon that portion of the road, that may result in serious realities; because there seems to be little control over it. The estimate of last year of $18,000,000 may, for ought we know, grow to any further number of millions, and we can see no end to it. In this connection I would only state that the country has made a great mistake in undertaking to build what engineers call a first-class road, when the object was to reach, by the most rapid route, the country that it was so desirable should be occupied and turned to account. There can be no doubt at all that a wise beginning of this work would have taken us to Red River for a very much smaller sum than the amount that is now estimated, and that that would have been the true policy. But I think there are some features in this method of engineering and the manner in which this work is placed beyond the control of the Government that require a little more consideration. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), in his last statement under this head, stated as follows, which I find in the Hansard of 1878:

“It is a gratification for me to be able to say that every step almost that we have taken in this gigantic enterprise has been taken with the concurrence of the Chief Engineer. We have so seldom differed in our opinions, even upon matters of policy, upon any course to be pursued, that I may fairly claim to have acted in harmony with his office throughout.”

Now, for a gentleman in the position of the hon. member for Lambton, these are very mild words. He rather claims the honour of having succumbed to this great power behind the Throne. He claims to have acted in harmony with him, even upon questions of policy. Did the hon. member for Lambton invoke this great spirit into yonder tower of his building to settle questions of policy with him? We have to deal with another Government to-day, and I think this House will agree with me that the proper adviser of the Government upon all questions of policy in connection with that undertaking is not the Chief Engineer, or any body of engineers, but this House. This, I hope, will be conceded by the present Government, otherwise I could hardly support them. But a new departure was announced last year by my hon. friend the Minister of Railways—a change with which I concurred in common with the majority of this House. His statement reads:

“I think we must deviate from our original plan, and, in order to secure the rapid construction of this work, combine to a greater extent than originally intended, our progress across the great prairie country of the North-West, with a system of colonisation; and though that may add a few miles here or there to the length of the line to be constructed, it will carry it through the districts that will best afford a basis for rapid colonisation, upon which we can rest, and to which I look as the only means by which successfully, in our time at all events, one may be able to achieve the construction of this railway.”

Now, Sir, we have from the Chief Engineer some curious comments upon this new policy, and I think this House should read and ponder them in connection with the report to which I have referred. In a report dated 6th January, 1880, appended to the report to the hon. the Minister of Railways, we read:

“The Government having determined to change the location of the railway, west of Red River, so as to run south of Lake Manitoba, surveys were commenced early in the summer, starting from the western end of contract No. 14, at Selkirk; the line was run in a south-westerly direction, until it reached the fourth base line near to the penitentiary, thence along the fourth base line to the western boundary of the Province.”

Again, in a supplementary report of the 31st January, we have this information:

“An Order in Council has been passed (22nd January) adopting the line surveys from the western end of the 100-mile section now under contract (No. 48), and running in a north-westerly direction to a point in the neighbourhood of Bird-tail Creek. This completes the adoption of the line of railway for a distance of two hundred miles west of Red River."

Now, I would like much to know if we are going back to cross the Red River at Selkirk. The policy of carrying the road in a direct line westward from Rat Portage to reach the narrows of Lake Manitoba by crossing at Selkirk, has been discussed exhaustively, and I think this House was given to understand last year that project was to be abandoned; but I find a portion of it is cropping up here, and it is in the form of still crossing at Selkirk, and deflecting a little further south. Now, gentlemen who are familiar with this subject know the points involved in crossing at Selkirk. It involves an expenditure which has never been well defined, but has been spoken of as possibly from $300,000 to $500,000. It involves crossing Red River at one of the most difficult points at which it could be crossed, in the great breadth of the river and in the character of the ground. If it were necessary to cross the Red River at that point this might do. But the fact is that twenty miles of railway are now constructed from that point to the city of Winnipeg (part of the Pembia branch). The city of Winnipeg has set to work to build a railway bridge. In all the schemes of the Government, I believe there has been no idea of abandoning connection with Winnipeg, and the question now arises whether the Government is to undertake now this large expenditure of crossing at Selkirk, in order to make a straight line of a few miles of that road when it already has a road constructed to Winnipeg; and the city of Winnipeg has set about the construction of a bridge, I believe under the direction of the Government. The question is whether it is meant, as one reads it between the lines of the Engineer's Report, to return back to this system of taking a much increased time for the construction of an enormous bridge and a few miles of road, instead of adopting the more speedy method of going into the North-West and connecting with Winnipeg at the same time. I met some people in the North-West who are acquainted with this section of the country and I saw part of it myself. I met but one man in the North-West who advocated the crossing at Selkirk. The same engineer who is responsible for the expenditure of $930,915 without authority, is the only individual whom I met who advocated crossing at that place, and that gentleman still maintains that the true course for the Pacific Railway is by the Narrows of Lake Manitoba. Another passage in this report of 6th January, 1880, challenges our attention:

"Tenders were received on the 1st of August for the construction of 100 miles west from Winnipeg, and the contract (No. 48) was signed on the 19th of August. By the terms of the contract, fifty miles of the line are to be completed by the end of April, and the whole distance by the 19th of August next. The grading over this section will be very light, and the work will, for the most part, consist of track-laying and ballasting."

This report is dated 6th January. I know that that contract was let in August. I heard it was let before I returned from that country, and I heard afterwards that the contractor had gone up there to commence work. I was sorry to hear, however, that the Chief Engineer was sent after him to prevent him from going to work until after he had made a survey. The work stopped accordingly, and we are presented with this report of the Chief Engineer, under date of 6th January, and I am told that not a sod has yet been turned on that portion of the road. Now, it may have been necessary to stop this work, but I do not believe it. Some gentlemen who had not been upon the ground might think it necessary that the Chief Engineer should make a survey of this portion of the road before the work was finally let. I think it would have been an act of courtesy towards this House to have said in presenting this report that no work was done upon that road, and no work could be done before the end of April. Now, there was a little incident presented itself to me in going further westward. I stopped, as many other people do, at Portage La Prairie, which is a thriving little town on the Assiniboine, about sixty miles beyond Winnipeg. The Assiniboine has been navigated by steamers up to that point, and, for a portion of the season, for 200 miles beyond that, to Fort Ellice, connection is made by the river with a very extensive country southwards from the Assiniboine. A little town like the Portage, the second town in the North-West, does not grow up in a day anywhere. It has grown up there with infinite toil and labour, and is very favourably situated for growth, and there is not the least doubt that in the future it will become a place of considerable importance. The neck of land lying between the Portage and Lake Manitoba is about twelve miles in breadth. There is no doubt that at some future day Lake Manitoba will be navigated, and a railway running between the Assiniboine and Lake Manitoba will have to make connections with both these systems of navigation. In the meantime, one of these systems is established; that at the Portage, for the Assiniboine is now navigated, and if the connection must ultimately be formed with these two systems of navigation it would appear to the mind of a practical man who is no engineer that it would be a wise thing to run a railway as near as possible to one side of this neck of the land, that it might obviate the necessity of two branches. I was told there that a survey had been made, and that it would add two miles to the length of the road to make a deflection to the Portage. I think there were some concessions offered by the people of the Portage, but whether that was so or not it seems to me that true wisdom would decide at once that it would be wise to add two miles to the length of the railway and five minutes to the time of express trains, and thus deflect to this growing town and not put the inhabitants to the inconvenience of having to reach the railway six miles off, and ultimately the people of that section of country to the expense and continued inconvenience of keeping up two branches, one from each side, to connect with this railway. Now, as a question of engineering, of course the matter is very simple. Given these twelve miles between these two systems of navigation and it is a simple thing for an engineer to build this railway midway between these two bodies of water. It is a very easy thing. No great skill in engineering is required in making a straight line, with six miles on each side, to run over a perfect plain. The general question of a deflection (which is not a question of engineering) was settled by the hon. Minister last year, when he told us he would get into that country by the most rapid method possible, for the purpose of colonisation. The hon. Minister did not lay too much stress on that point.

Persons who have visited that country know that settlers going to the North-West are beset by many hindrances. Often they are stopped in their progress by the want of railroad facilities, and turned aside into Minnesota or Dakota. But, after the settler has been depleted in pocket on his way over the roads, if he succeeds in getting into Winnipeg, he finds himself in a wet country, and he is beset with great difficulties if he wants to go further. I know of one case in which an intelligent farmer from my own county, who, having fought through all the obstructions, found himself lodged in the mud in Winnipeg, and then turned back in despair to Minnesota. The hon. Minister did not overstate the case in the policy laid down last year. It is necessary to assist colonisation by the most rapid means possible. When the poor emigrant is inextricably plunged in the mud, and like the waggoner in the fable, appealing for help to get out, is he to wait while the engineer indulges in theories about the quickest route across the continent and the construction of a first-class railway. What the settler wants is to get into the country by any railway. It is much the same as if the starving population of Ireland were asked to endure hunger patiently until some gastronomic artist invented some dish to tickle the palate. But, with a difference, we may smile at the pedantry of the kitchen, but the pedantry of the theodolite and the drawing-board should make us tremble. I have no acquaintance with the engineers. I met one last summer, who told me that he considered the route up the Narrows of Lake Manitoba the best, the same whose extravagance and want of judgment is accountable for the outlay on Section 15. I do not want to say a word against a respectable profession, but I think that a false position has been given to the engineers in connection with this work. I will venture to make one suggestion to the Government. We are, I think, agreed that no strength of arm or power of brain will enable four millions of people to build that road and utilise the country, and that the object can only be accomplished by some means that will help to introduce a great number of people into the territory. The hon. the Minister of Agriculture appears to recognise his duty in this connection. He believes that those great fields of the West are something more than a fabled elysium, and he adopted the course of asking farmers from the old country to come out and judge of their fertility. A number responded to the invitation; they came and went, and spoke well of the country. I think, and I hope the Government will excuse me if I suggest, that it would be a wise thing if the hon. the Ministers of Agriculture and Railways, who are responsible for the enormous expenditure necessary in connection with the system of getting into that country, would put themselves on a footing with those tenant farmers, by visiting the country themselves. It would not be all a work of pleasure. I dare say that they could take many summer trips more agreeable and convenient. They would have to travel over the roads traversed by the settlers, and they will hear a great deal that they cannot learn at home. They may hear mutterings of discontent that are never heard here. I am sorry that I cannot ask the right hon. the Minister of the Interior to accompany them, but if he did he would learn of a great deal of dissatisfaction. But those things are perhaps inevitable where officers of the Government are so far removed from control. I believe, however, that a great many faults could be remedied by the suggested visits of responsible Ministers of the Crown, who would be able to grapple with the difficulties which present themselves. Besides they would have their reward; for when the hon. gentlemen got beyond the mud of Red River Valley they would find not only a country of great wealth, but one of surpassing beauty, possessing every feature to make it a desirable residence for intending settlers of whatever degree or class. And I think that one result would be that, in carrying out this great undertaking of the Pacific Railway, we should no longer find engineers in the character of erratic advisers. I think we should find, if the practical observation of the hon. the Minister of Railways was brought to bear on this subject, those gentlemen would not be the advisers of the Government, but its useful servants.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: No person can be surprised that in relation to a question of such importance as the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, involving, as it does, under any circumstances, the expenditure of an enormous amount of public money, gentlemen who are interested in the progress and prosperity of the country should at all times evince the most lively interest in the mode in which that work is being carried on, and the character of the expenditure being made upon it. I am extremely glad to find that an hon. gentleman so well qualified to bring a dispassionate judgment to bear on any public question, has had his attention drawn to this very important subject. My own practice, when sitting on the other side of the House, as hon. members will remember, has been to avoid raising, as far as I could, a number of questions upon the same subject, and I think the practice of the House has been to postpone the discussion of questions connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway until the Estimates were brought down, and the time of the House could be thus economised. I anticipated that that course would be followed this Session, and of course I would have been prepared, when the Estimates came before the House, to present a full statement of the views and intentions of the Government. But I am not at all surprised that the hon. gentleman felt it judicious, as it is undoubtedly his right, to anticipate the production of the Estimates by favouring the Government with his criticisms in advance. I may say that we will at all times be ready to receive suggestions on this question from any side of the House, so that we may be enabled to deal with it in the best manner for the general interests of the country. But I cannot go as far as the hon. gentleman has gone in intimating that the hon. Minister should accept the advice of any hon. gentleman in this Chamber as more entitled to consideration on this subject than that of the Chief Engineer. If that were done I am afraid we would not make rapid progress with the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

MR. McLENNAN: I referred to the fact that the hon. Minister had been guided by the Engineer on questions of policy.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Then I am entirely in accord with the hon. member. The policy of the Government should rest on the mature judgment of the majority of the members of Parliament. I think, however, that the statement made by my hon. predecessor must be understood, not in regard to the policy of the work itself, but with respect to the mode in which it should be carried forward.

MR. MACKENZIE : That was with reference to the policy of the routes.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER : In the absence of a gentleman who has been so severely censured by the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. McLennan), perhaps the House will allow me to make a few observations in reference to the position of the Chief Engineer. The employment of that officer, I believe, arose in this way. In 1862, if I remember right, a delegation, representing the Governments of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, recommended to the Imperial Government a mode for the construction of the Intercolonial Railway, and also arranged that the survey should be made by an engineer appointed by the Imperial Government, assisted by one appointed by the Government of Canada, and one appointed by the Province of New Brunswick. Under that arrangement it became my duty as leader of the Government of Nova Scotia to resist the Government of Canada with my present colleague, the hon. the Minister of Finance, who was Prime Minister of the Province. At that time the Government of the late John Sandfield Macdonald was in power; and Mr. Tilley and myself were to confer with the Government of Canada in reference to the appointment of engineers for the survey. Mr. Macdonald told us he would name Mr. Sandford Fleming as his engineer. Being much better acquainted with the leader of the Opposition at that time (Sir Alexander Galt) and the late Sir George E. Cartier, Mr. Tilley and I consulted with them in regard to the efficiency of the gentleman named by the Government of Canada to preside over this important work; and the answer that we received from them was that if they had been in power they would have named the same gentleman. Mr. Tilley and myself, under those circumstances, decided that we would appoint Mr. Fleming ourselves, he being so highly recommended by both the great parties as a gentleman possessing their confidence to so great an extent. That resolution was communicated by Lord

Monk to the Imperial Government, with the request that they should name an engineer to act with Mr. Fleming, representing the Governments of Canada, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. The answer of the Secretary of State was, that as those Provinces had selected a gentleman of such high attainments, and possessing so largely the confidence of the Imperial Government, they were quite willing to entrust their interests to his hands. Mr. Fleming was therefore engaged to conduct the survey and the work of the Intercolonial Railway. After Confederation, the construction of that railway was taken up, when the Government naturally selected Mr. Fleming, who had been engaged in making the survey and location of the road, as the Chief Engineer. When the question of entering upon the construction of the Canada Pacific Railway arose, my hon. colleague, the present Minister of Public Works, then Minister of Public Works, with the assent of the Government, asked Mr. Fleming to undertake the duties of Chief Engineer of that Railway as well. The question of salary then naturally arose. Mr. Fleming, as Chief Engineer of the Intercolonial, was receiving $4,800 a year, the salaries of the Ministers then being only $5,000; and it was not thought appropriate that a salary largely in excess of what the Premier was receiving should be given to a subordinate officer, whereupon Mr. Fleming undertook the additional duties, besides those connected with the Intercolonial, without any increase of salary. He continued to receive the salary of $4,800 down to 1876, when that road was opened for traffic, and when, if my memory serves me, he resigned the office of its Chief Engineer. Reference has not unnaturally been made by my hon. friend the member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) to the fact that a gentleman dealing with such vital and important questions should have been a long time absent from the scene of his duties. I believe that under the weight of his duties, as Chief Engineer of the Intercolonial and Canada Pacific Railways, Mr. Fleming's health had broken down, when he asked from the then Minister of Public Works leave of absence for a year, which was granted, and the question of salary was in that way postponed. It would have entailed on this gentleman a great deal of mental anxiety, had he continued during his absence to charge himself with those important questions connected with those railways. He therefore left in his place as his representative a gentleman with whom he had been associated and in whom he had confidence, admitted to be a good engineer, Mr. Marcus Smith, who practically became Chief Engineer while Mr. Fleming remained absent. Mr. Fleming was recalled once or twice by the then Minister of Public Works, (the hon. member for Lambton) in connection with questions requiring solution at his hands; but he did not return and resume the duties connected with his office until about the time I became Minister of Public Works. That is the reason why the question of salary remained in abeyance, and it had become somewhat complicated by the question—how much of the period of his absence was to be deducted from the time for which he should receive salary. The hon. member for Glengarry has taken up the question of great extravagance. Well, I have no doubt there has been great extravagance. I believe that any gentleman familiar with the expenditures in the North-West Territory, reaching away from the Rocky Mountains, and the enormous breadth of country and distances from Fort Simpson to Victoria that required to be covered, and the years of toil and labour involved in the decision of that most difficult of questions, the proper route for the railway through the Rocky Mountains and the other regions to be traversed. Any gentleman acquainted with the surveys and explorations, absolutely indispensable through 3,000 miles of country previously a terra incognita, and extending over a great breadth as well as length of country, will understand the enormous amount of expenditure absolutely necessary under these circumstances. It has been just that class of expenditure which every gentleman familiar with such expenditure knows to be almost beyond the control of the Minister or Chief Engineer. Necessarily a good deal of expenditure has taken place that it has been extremely difficult to check or follow; but considering the enormous distances dealt with, including that between Thunder Bay and Red River, the difficulty of finding a route at all through one of the most forbidding and impracticable regions, it will be understood that a vast expenditure had to be incurred—it could not well have been avoided. But the hon. member for Glengarry has referred to a matter for which the Chief Engineer seems responsible, the great disparity between the estimates and expenditures actually incurred. I do not myself understand, and do not think my predecessor the hon. member for Lambton understands Mr. Fleming to be responsible for the statements made by that hon. gentleman to the House, in relation to the estimated cost of the railway for the 228 miles under contract when those estimates were framed. As I understand it, the decision to push forward the work, and the difficulty of getting careful and reliable surveys through that country, rendered it hard to form an approximate estimate of the expenditure. Immediately after I succeeded to office, I called upon Mr. Fleming for a full and careful estimate of the outside expenditure for the construction of the road from Thunder Bay to Red River. A good deal of additional information was obtained. I was obliged twice to postpone the time for the reception of tenders, because we had not sufficient information to warrant us in making a close and careful estimate of the amount of work that might be necessary. I state this fact as relieving Mr. Fleming from the responsibility of ever having committed himself to the statements which the Minister of Public Works of that day made to the House as to what he believed and hoped those 228 miles of railway would be accomplished for, and also the 105 intervening miles. If the hon. gentleman had an estimate from Mr. Fleming in relation to the probable cost, I am not aware of it; I state the matter as I found it. I may say now that I think I have some reason to complain of the somewhat severe strictures of the hon. member for Glengarry in reference to the administration of the Department, since I have had the honour of acting as Minister of Railways. I did flatter myself, that having devoted myself with the utmost assiduity to my work—having struggled since the first hour I entered office to accomplish everything in my power in the interest of the country in the most expeditious and economical manner—and I did hope that the work till the present achieved would have exempted me from such strictures on this occasion. But I will first deal with the question of the great increase of expenditure on Section 15, of which the hon. member spoke as an indication of evident want of ability on the part of the Chief Engineer. As I understand it, my predecessor the hon. member for Lambton, long ago perceiving the importance, if this work was undertaken at all, of pushing it rapidly to completion, asked for contracts. I believe the returns he obtained showed the road would be of a character somewhat similar to that now under construction; and that the responsibility as to this application for tenders was so enormous, the amount asked for the work being so great, that he was reluctantly compelled to abandon it, and modify very largely the terms on which it was proposed to construct that section. While I agree with the mover of this resolution, that we should not undertake to construct the road with any view to the construction of a monument of engineering skill, or unnecessarily increasing the cost of the Pacific Railway, while that is the policy of the Government, I believe that the true interest of the country and the economy of the public money was properly aimed at by making the road from Thunder Bay to Red River, if not a first-class road, a thoroughly substantial one, and with grades of a very easy character, and for this reason it was to be an outlet to the whole North-West region for a great many years, the greater portion of it for ever, and the channel for all the traffic and travel between the North-West and the east; and in order that the work should be cheaply done, and a line of railway through one of the most intractable railway lines in the world—that between Red River and Thunder Bay secured—it was deemed true economy to construct the road of easy grades of a substantial character. Mr. Rowan is, I presume, the gentleman to whom the mover referred to as the engineer who had gibbeted himself as insubordinate, and recklessly extravagant in the discharge of his duty. I do not intend, or think it necessary to defend him; but I do not think it fair to place a larger amount of responsibility on his shoulders than appears just. Whatever his qualifications, he was appointed by the late Government in charge of the work extending from Red River to Cross Lake,

Mr. MACKENZIE: He was appointed before our time.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: He was appointed Engineer of the Department by the former Minister of Public Works, my hon. colleague; and was subsequently transferred from it, I have no doubt, under the advice of Mr. Fleming, and placed in charge of that part of the road. As to Mr. Rowan's course, he made a report to the Minister of Public Works, or to Mr. Marcus Smith, recommending that certain trestle-work provided in the contract should be abandoned and solid embankments substituted, giving as a reason the very inferior character of the wood in that section, which would soon become rotten—stating that by the time the road was fairly completed the trestle-work would have to be renewed, if not burned up by the fires to which it would be exposed. My hon. predecessor the member for Lambton himself entertained the opinion that it would be sound economy to have that change accomplished. Mr. Fleming, who was here at the time entirely concurred in the opinion of Mr. Rowan as to the advantage of the change recommended, and the then Minister of Public Works received Mr. Fleming's Report. Mr. Rowan went back to the service on the road and Mr. Fleming went to England under the impression that the proposal commended itself to the Minister as was to be carried out. The Minister of Public Works reported it to the Council, but no action was taken on it. But down to the hour of my assuming charge of the Department, all the officers supposed the suggestion had been adopted, and Mr. Rowan assumed he was carrying out a policy authorised by the Department, and therefore he is not responsible to the extent the member for Glengarry supposes for this increased expenditure. When I took up this question during the past season, I found that not only the engineer but the contractor had been led to believe that this change had to be carried out. We ourselves were satisfied to believe that the opinion of the Chief Engineer was right, that it was a desirable improvement, and an order was passed that it should be carried out; and although there would be a large increase of the expenditure, I believe the change is in the public interest, and that it will mean economy and not extravagance in the end. I feel it my duty to say in relief of this subordinate officer, Mr. Rowan, that he supposed he was carrying out the instructions of those in authority over him. I may state that before the return of Mr. Fleming from England, Mr. Marcus Smith was sent out by my predecessor to go over the whole of this work. He went over it with Mr. Rowan, and they both assumed that embankment was to be substituted for trestle-work. Now I came to a point on which I think my hon. friend has hardly done justice to myself. I was under the impression that if this Government was able to boast of anything that would entitle them to favourable consideration not only on the part of their friends in this House, but to both sides of the House and the people of the country, it was the energy with which they had pushed forward the most important work in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway. We believed that it was of the most vital importance to the public interest that not an hour should be lost in filling up this gap of 185 miles between English River and Keewatin. Without this, the money expended upon this road was entirely thrown away. We did not expect our estimates to be exceeded. I may state that I believe that in the progress of the work we shall be able to make larger reductions, and that both the contracts will be completed within the specified time, and largely within the amounts at which the contracts have been taken. The hon. gentleman severely criticises Mr. Rowan for his want of judgment in still adhering to the declaration that the location of the road to the Narrows of Lake Manitoba was the most judicious one. I think the hon. gentleman can hardly deal so severely with an officer in Mr. Rowan's position when he knows that my predecessor holds that opinion now. The hon. gentleman, I suppose, felt pleased that this Government, in the public interest, determined to bring the line of railway south of Lake Manitoba, instead of carrying it out according to the original line. There was a great deal of reason why the original line should be preferred. It was stated to be thirty miles shorter than any line we could obtain by coming south of Lake Manitoba. I hope, however, to be able to shorten that to twenty instead of thirty miles. We believed it to be necessary in the public interest to push forward this work rapidly to completion for the purpose of accomplishing the end

my hon. friend has mentioned, that of building up this great North-West Territory with a great body of enterprising and industrious people, who can assist the four millions in the other sections of the Dominion in the payment for the construction of this great work. It would be madness and folly for the present population of Canada, in addition to the burdens it is compelled to bear, to undertake such an enormous expenditure unless we believed that by that expenditure we could obtain an accession of population that would help to remove the liability so incurred; and, in the second place, that, by the construction of that road, we could throw an enormous body of industrious people into that country for the purpose of building it up and developing the great resources of the Great North-West. If my hon. friend understood me to commit myself to the policy of bringing the Canadian Pacific Railway twenty miles from Selkirk to Winnipeg, and seventeen miles back to the main line, I must tell my hon. friend that he entirely misunderstood me. We never proposed to bring the line round by Winnipeg. The proposal I made to the House was utterly inconsistent with such a view. If that had been our object, we would not have had a branch line to Winnipeg. It would have been the main line there, and we would have gone off in a north-westerly direction from Winnipeg. It is only necessary to glance at the map in order to show that such a project could not have been entertained. Winnipeg offered, if we would give them a branch line, that they would find means of bridging the river at Winnipeg. The terms of the agreement to use that bridge for the purpose of the Canadian Pacific Railway will enable us to postpone for some time, not indefinitely, the expenditure that will be involved by building a bridge on the Canadian Pacific Railway at Selkirk, or at whatever point may be considered best. I do not agree with the view the hon. gentleman takes as to the unwisdom of bridging the river at Selkirk. I have gone into this question very exhaustively, and it is very doubtful whether it would not be in the interest of the country to run across there and take the line some sixteen miles, running a little southerly from that point to connect with the main line. It is a very convenient point for the connection with the navigation with the lakes and it is a point at which no question can arise as to any obstruction which can be given to the river. The Government possess at that point 1,000 acres of land which we believe would become very valuable if we were to cross the river there. It would be of much less value if we were to cross it at a point higher up; at the same time we may say this is an open question. The stone required for the construction of a bridge at Winnipeg is to be found on the land owned by the Government at this point, and therefore a great expense would be saved in finding the material required for the construction of the bridge on the spot. It is an open question as to where the Red River shall be bridged, and we feel that we may postpone for a time the construction of the bridge and expend our resources in constructing the road where the expenditure required would be the smallest, and where the greatest amount of good would be done in opening up the North-West Territory. I did plume myself upon the belief that for a Government that had only been a few months in power to have changed the policy of the late Government in respect to the location of the Canada Pacific Railway by the Narrows of Lake Manitoba; to have received the assent of this House to that policy; to have a hundred miles of this road now under contract, and which we have every reason to believe will be completed and in running order before twelve months are over; to have another hundred miles surveyed and tenders wanted for its construction; to have had all this done, not at the enormous figures which alarmed the hon. gentleman, but at a cost of a little over $10,000 a mile for the first 100 miles, a sum not greatly in excess of that for the additional 100 miles—I did hope we should have received the plaudits and encouragement of my hon. friend instead of having it intimated that we have been laggards in our duty. My hon. friend has pointed out that in regard to the contract let to Mr. Ryan, west of Red River, the first sod has not been turned. That is not the fault of the Government; Mr. Ryan has never been delayed one hour by the want of a location or a survey of that route. The first moment that he came upon the ground he had the place pointed out where we proposed to commence the construction of the branch. He was instructed where to commence, but he was not prepared to do so. My hon. friend's remarks would give the House an impression that nothing has been done; but a great deal has been accomplished. The Red River has been bridged on the ice for the purpose of getting locomotives over. That is one of the first necessities in the construction of the road. Then Mr. Ryan could not obtain any ties, but the Government furnished what were necessary. There was not only no detention as far as the Government was concerned, but we assisted him in every way in our power. We have reason to believe that, if we accomplish what we think we can accomplish, we will be able to make a very fair contrast with anything that has been done by our predecessors; and, as to his complaint that the information is not brought down earlier, I may state that it is unavoidable. In the system we proposed to the House, we asked for an appropriation of 100,000,000 acres of land to this work. One of the most important features connected with that was to obtain as rapidly as possible information, which information was not in the possession of the Government or any man in this country, information in reference to the character of those railway lands in the North-West. Parties were sent out for the purpose of exploration. They have returned, and are now making up their reports in a shape to be submitted to the House. I believe that information will be found to be of a very satisfactory and assuring character. It will be found that, instead of having overrated the character of the country, the most sanguine views in relation to the fertility of the Great North-West will be more than borne out by the positive information we will be able to lay before the House on the subject. I do not intend to detain the House further than to thank my hon. friend for his friendly criticism, and to invite suggestions from hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, although they may not be offered in the same kindly spirit as those that have been offered; and, if any suggestions are made by which we can more rapidly execute this work or perform it with a greater economy of public money, I can only say, as one member of the Government and as Minister of the Department, that I shall be exceedingly gratified.

MR. MACKENZIE: I desire to refer for a few minutes to some matters mentioned by the hon. gentleman who moved for these papers. I concur with that hon. gentleman in speaking as he did of the result of the engineering, and in regard to the expense in carrying out the works. No one was more disappointed than I was to find that the estimates of the engineers, upon which contracts were let, were so far from an approximation to the truth. No one in my position could have doubted that the estimates presented of the quantities would approximate to the truth. It was as likely that the ultimate quantities reached in some cases should be over the estimated amount as that some should be under the amount; and, in making the estimate, I assumed that the quantities given by the engineer would not, on the average, be exceeded; and, if not exceeded, the expenses would be exactly what I stated in that speech to which the hon. gentleman refers. I need not say anything further with regard to this. He thinks every Minister ought to have strong suspicions of the character and ability of the engineers he employs. I am not an engineer myself, and I felt constrained to confine myself to the advice of those to whom the Government had entrusted their interests in that capacity, with this reservation always that, if I found any such engineers unreliable from careless habits, or something worse, no time should be lost in dispensing with their services. Sometimes engineers' services were dispensed with, and they were immediately re-employed by our successors when they took office. With regard to Mr. Fleming's position, I have personally very little to add to what has been stated by the hon. gentleman opposite. I felt that it was an erroneous position for him to serve the Government without a fixed salary. I believe I fixed his salary at the rate he had on the Intercolonial Railway. It was then stated, as a reason for fixing it at $4,800, that the Premier had said that to give more would be making it higher than the Premier's salary ($5,000); but, knowing Mr. Fleming's ability as an engineer, I wished to fix it at what I conceived to be a reasonable amount in view of that ability.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: But the difficulty was removed before; for the salary of the Prime Minister was increased.

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes, that is quite true. I did not feel myself capable of gauging the capacity of Mr. Fleming as a civil engineer; he was possessed of the qualities of an author as well as those of an engineer, and there was a great degree of importance to be attached to the ability, which as an author he possessed, in preparing and presenting reports, so as to make his views sufficiently known to the Government and the public. Looking back on my five years' term of office, I would be prepared at this moment to endorse nearly all that was done under Mr. Fleming's direction, making allowance for difficulties which could not be foreseen. I am bound to say that during all these five years there was very rarely, if ever, any serious difference of opinion between us. I judged as far as a layman could judge on engineering points; matters of policy referred to by the hon. member for Glengarry had, no reference to the manner of building the road, or the question of completing it within a specified time, but solely to the selection of a route. It was long a matter of controversy whether that road should pass south of Lake Manitoba and thence towards Fort Ellice or Fort Pelly, or whether it should take a more northerly route; and upon that I discussed the policy freely with Mr. Fleming and all the other engineers who had been there. Now my own views have never changed in that matter since our decision was made. I was at first prepossessed in favour of passing through that part of the country most likely to be settled first. Many arguments could be used that it would be difficult to controvert in reference to that course. We were building a great National highway, not expecting it to be completed for many years, but exercising a great influence on that country through which it was to pass as well as on Canada generally; and I thought it best that a direction should be taken consistent with its passing through the largest amount of arable land, and with the view of its ultimately reaching the Pacific Ocean in the best place. The route chosen by Mr. Sandford Fleming passed by the Narrows of Lake Manitoba and on to Livingston, and thence by the shortest route towards the pass in the Rocky Mountains. It was the best route; I have no doubt about that now. The hon. the Minister of Public Works referred to a statement in one of my speeches, that if we went south of Lake Manitoba we would have to expend about a million dollars more, while the road would be thirty miles longer. The hon. gentleman expects to find a route only twenty miles longer. Mr. Fleming gives various figures, according to the particular route to be adopted, on the south of Lake Manitoba, varying from twenty to forty miles; but if the most direct route were chosen, it would only be about twenty miles longer.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: And it has been adopted.

MR. MACKENZIE: It has been adopted the hon. gentleman says; but it has been adopted without very exact measurements having been taken. It is impossible that during the last season exact measurements can have been taken, for the purpose of getting the exact distances ascending and descending declivities, which in this particular part are of such a nature as will necessarily lengthen the line to a considerable extent—how much I do not know—but this induced Mr. Marcus Smith, in the original survey in that quarter, in 1877, to report its impracticability. That line crossed one deep valley at such an angle as resulted in lengthening the line nine miles in order to reach reasonable grades. In order to determine the results that the hon. gentleman refers to as probable, there must be a minute survey of at least thirty-three or thirty-five miles of land abounding with curves, and with grades averaging from thirty-two to fifty-three feet to the mile. An engine going over it will be ascending and descending the whole of the distance. If built upon this plan of having steep grades, it will prove a great obstacle to the traffic, the great bulk of which is towards the east. We may presume that an engine will easily carry as much traffic as can be found going west, as can be carried on cars fully loaded going eastward; but if we attempt, for the sake of cheapness, to take this route with grades from forty to fifty-three feet to the mile—there is one coming eastward of fifty-three—I look upon it as a very serious matter, and I think it would be better to lengthen the road even thirty miles so to avoid such steep grades. If it should go in that direction, the grades will operate seriously against every part of the road, making the traffic dearer to the Government or to the people sending freight over it. Take an illustration. You will observe by a careful analysis of the Government reports that the Intercolonial Railway engines take fifteen or sixteen cars to the train; sometimes when the road was in its best condition they took twenty. The Canada Southern Railway, on the other hand, has no grade exceeding fifteen or eighteen feet to the mile, and that a very short one, and the engines are able to take forty to forty-five cars to the load. Last summer I took the trouble to count the cars on three trains; I counted on one forty-one cars, on another forty-four, and on a third forty-three. Now, if we have steep grades such as those I have referred to on the Pacific Railway, it would cost nearly twice as much as it would with more favourable grades. The late Government adopted Mr. Fleming's views, because as the route he recommended from Lake Superior to Lake Manitoba there were no grades exceeding twenty-six feet to the mile coming eastward, and forty feet going westward. So far as policy is concerned, I do not think I need say anything further. The country is committed to the southern route, for weal or for woe; and, whether wise or unwise, the thing appears to be fixed upon. I was struck with a remark in Mr. Fleming's last report on this part of the line, which seems to indicate that this road is to be a temporary one—a colonization road—and shadows out the idea that it is only a loop line, and that the original line is not entirely abandoned. Mr. Fleming says:

"I would advise that the latter line be located as a cheap service line; that deep excavations, high embankments and heavy work with the view of securing low gradients, be avoided. That the great aim be to have the rails laid through the district with any reasonable gradients and curves that can be worked by light trains—of course taking care that the best alignment and gradients, which the peculiar features of the country will admit of, be secured without unnecessarily increasing the expense. I would aim at having as useful a line as can be had, and as cheap as it is possible to make it."

It is simply impossible to make a good line a cheap line in a rough country. Mr. Fleming proceeds:

"The length of this line would be somewhat increased by taking the course suggested. This would be a disadvantage more than compensated, it is considered, by the greater breadth of fine country rendered available for successful settlement. The line, besides answering colonisation purposes, would connect west of Livingston with the line located to Yellowhead Pass, and would afford facilities for construction and settlement, in the direction of Edmonton, and as far as the prairie region extends."

If this is simply intended as a colonisation line; if building it with these high grades and sharp curves is to be carried out, then a great mistake has been made, unless the Government have determined to build two lines, to which I would take very serious objections. In regard to the Pacific Railway, what hampered the late Administration was a determination not to expend the money of the great mass of the people in the east simply to secure a compliance with a foolish engagement with a few people in the west. This caused a hesitancy in many things. The hon. gentleman opposite, the present Minister of Public Works, has very properly relieved me in regard to the matter of extra expenditure on Contract 15. The facts are simply these: On the 22nd of May, Mr. Fleming sent in a report—he left for England next morning—recommending that Mr. Whitehead's proposal for replacing the trestle-work with solid embankments should be adopted, at an extra expense of about $260,000. That was considered by myself and colleagues informal. We had some discussion on the subject, and I decided at last to refer the matter formally to counsel. So I signed the following submission:—

"The undersigned submits the accompanying Report of the Engineer-in-Chief of the Canadian Pacific Railway, upon the proposal of the contractor for Section No. 15 of that Railway, to complete the roadway with permanent rock and earth embankments throughout, in lieu of the wooden trestle-work originally proposed for portions of the line."

The counsel did fully consider the matter, and determined to adhere to the original plan for the works. I was quite surprised when I heard of the work being proceeded with on the new plan. It may be the best, as the hon. gentleman says, but our object was to build the road as cheaply as possible in that extremely difficult part of the country, and to use the timber for the structures which would be sufficient to carry the traffic for ten or twelve years at all events, and fill it up with earth afterwards. One strong reason why Mr.

Fleming recommended a change was the great danger of fire, and that was a very serious consideration no doubt. A very large proportion of the expenditure incurred recently was in filling up the lake at the west end on Contract No. 15, and at the east end on Contract No. 14. I have been informed by parties on the spot that it would have been quite easy to have obtained a passage round the side of the lake at a small cost. I may, however, be misinformed. Circumstances have arisen in the course of the construction making it impossible to avoid certain heavy expenses. For instance, in crossing one of the swamps or muskegs on Section No. 14, it was not foreseen that it would spread out a great deal, and was besides subject to the action of water and frost. This caused an enormous expense in the filling up of the roadway on Section 14. Now, with regard to the statement as to the quality of the road. It will be observed in the speech which the hon. gentleman has quoted, I think it is in other speeches of mine, that I never stated that the road was equal to the Intercolonial Railway. I stated that it was equal to the Intercolonial Railway in all but bridge structures; that in the Pacific Railway, in order to obtain the construction as cheaply as possible, in the first instance, I thought it advisable, and the engineers concurred in that opinion, that we should make the bridges of wood, to be renewed gradually after they had served the original purpose. But the quantity of bridging is so very small compared with the length of the road, that, after all, it will not be a serious matter in the future. The bridge across the Winnipeg River it was always my own intention, and I presume it is the intention of the present Administration, to have it constructed of iron. The hon. the Minister of Public Works says that he took good care not to let the 185 miles in the centre district, between Thunder Bay and Selkirk, until he had caused an exhaustive survey to be made.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I did not say exhaustive.

MR. MACKENZIE: I was about to say that there is some misapprehension about that, as the hon. gentleman came into office about 1st November, and tenders were received in January, and it was quite impossible for him even to send the directions and get the answer back, much less to get any surveys made.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER : I said I postponed it twice for the purpose of having the most accurate statement of work to be done.

MR. MACKENZIE : I have no doubt that is quite correct. I was about to call the attention of the House to the fact that in addition to the original location survey of this portion of the line from English River to Rat Portage, Keewatin as it is now called, I caused four parties, if I recollect right, to be sent out in order to make another more careful and more accurate survey, with a view at once of shortening the line, lessening the work as much as possible and correcting quantities. We know that in passing through a woody country like that it is extremely difficult for engineers in one season or two seasons to examine the country so as to obtain at once the best line. One can have no idea of a country like that, it being almost impossible to see anything of it except what one walks over. I have been in parts of these woods myself and know the difficulty. There are no eminences to climb and the view is so obstructed by trees and shrubbery that it is a matter of the greatest difficulty to obtain a careful and accurate view of the country. Parties were sent out early in 1878 in order to re-survey the line which had previously been located. Reports were made by these parties and the hon. the Minister of Public Works before letting the contract in the January following. I have no doubt but what these reports were comparatively much more accurate than any that had been previously received. We have even reason to believe that the work on the eastern prairie part of the country would be exceedingly light, that it would be exceedingly light in most places in the western part. By the route originally determined, the work would be remarkably light to the crossing of the Saskatchewan. It will not be so when the southern line is adopted; and no doubt other difficulties would arise between Selkirk and the Narrows, and the portion of the country near Carnarvon, west of the Narrows, as we found that there were conflicting accounts about the depth of certain morasses which existed on that part of the line. That was one part that would have to be re-examined before it was let out for contract, to obtaining the most accurate information on the subject. The late Government did not contemplate proceeding further with that or any other portion of the line west of Red River until Parliament had been consulted about the policy of rapid extension at the expense of the Government. They were rather disposed to consider the propriety of rigidly adhering to the policy of building at such a rate as the resources of the country would afford, at the same time affording facilities for the formation of colonisation roads in other directions, which would be undertaken to a great extent by the inhabitants who were passing into the country.

PRIVATE BILLS.

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were severally read the second time :—

Bill (No. 45) To incorporate the Great Western Telegraph Company of Canada.—(Mr. Ryan, Marquette.)

Bill (No. 46) To incorporate the Winnipeg and Hudson's Bay Railroad and Steamship Company.—(Mr. Bannerman.)

PRIVILEGE—THE MEMBER FOR LENNOX.

House resumed the adjourned Debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Casey :

"That the petition of Thomas Anderson and others, praying that Edmund Hooper, Esq., member for the Electoral Division of Lennox, be declared an unfit and improper person to represent that Electoral Division in this House, and for other and further relief, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, with instructions to that Committee to enquire into the allegations contained in the said petition, and report thereon to this House."

MR. HOCOPER : Before anything is said in reference to this, I beg leave to read to the House the following statement :—

1. A Commission was issued, under the Statute of Ontario, to investigate the financial affairs of the County of Lennox and Addington, of which I was then the Treasurer, and had been since 1863. Said Commission commenced its labour on 20th Oct., 1879. The petition purported to be signed by thirty-two rate-payers, as provided by Statute of Ontario.

2. A copy of said petition was obtained by the Warden of the County. The Warden and Council having been totally ignorant, prior to this, of anything as regards the Commission having taken place. On enquiry it was found that several of the parties whose names were on the petition stated that they had never heard of said petition, nor had they signed it, and six or seven of them made their solemn declaration under the Statute to that effect. Those declarations were, by the Warden, sent to the Attorney-General, with a notice that the County would refuse to pay the costs of said Commission.

3. I am satisfied that the report of the Commission is untrue in point of fact. The Commissioners also made quarterly "rests" on yearly balances and compounded the interest on balances (and on all other items they report upon) at the rate of fourteen per cent. per annum, over $20,000 of the sum mentioned in the report being interest.

4. I am personally not aware of any deficiency in my accounts, they having been duly audited every year by competent auditors appointed by the County Council and accepted by said Council.

5. The said report was rejected by the County Council by a vote of fifteen to six, and a resolution was passed giving my sureties and myself time to make a thorough and complete investigation of the whole of the accounts from 1863 to December, 1879. Again, the Commissioners did not investigate all my accounts, leaving over $20,000 of receipts and expenditures out of the report, so that it was impossible for them to report correctly.

The above investigation, as authorised by the Council, is now in progress and progressing, and it is unfair to make this charge until the investigation is accepted or refused by the County Council.

6. The County cannot under any circumstances incur any loss, as it is amply secured, and further my sureties were present at the last meeting of the Council, and notified them that if, on the final investigation, there was any deficiency, that they would at once pay it; in short, that the County would not be at any loss. This was accepted by the Council.

7. This being a local affair, and still being an open account, I cannot understand what this Parliament has to do with it, or how it can be within its jurisdiction.

8. I am satisfied this attack on me had its origin in political malice, and from the date of my nomination as a candidate to the present I have been persistently and ruthlessly persecuted, not only as a business man, but also as a private individual. In short, the whole affair is purely and simply political spite.

Mr. Hooper then withdrew from the House.

MR. CASEY: As the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government does not seem inclined to proceed and to make the elaborate defence, which I am aware the Government, or some other friends, have prepared in this case, I may be permitted to add some remarks to those I made on a former occasion. I have not had time to carefully study the document which has just been read to the House, as it has just been put in my hands; but so far as I can see there is nothing in it to affect the charges made. I must first recapitulate briefly my former statements of the case.

It was to this effect: That the hon. member for Lennox was sometime Treasurer of the county he represents, and that suspicions having arisen as to whether his accounts were exactly straight, a Commission was applied for under the Statute of Ontario applicable to the case, to examine into his accounts. That Commission was appointed, and had the authority to compel the attendance of witnesses, and examine them under oath. The Commissioners appointed a time for the enquiry. Mr. Hooper asked for an adjournment, in order to prepare for his case. An adjournment for a month was granted; but when the Commission sat, Mr. Hooper refused to attend its sittings, and challenged its legality. For two months the Commission was in session. They were furnished with such books and papers as the Treasurer saw fit to lay before them. Many books, which a County Treasurer ought to have, were found missing, and he could not supply them. The auditors who should have examined the books, and other witnesses, were called. Mr. Hooper was requested to explain certain matters, but he refused. The Commissioner deduced from the evidence that Mr. Hooper had misapplied the funds of the county to the extent of over $32,000. The balance against him was $50,000, but the Commission thought the difference might be accounted for by circumstances in Mr. Hooper's favour, which were probable, but were not proved. The Commission reported this to the Government which appointed them. In order to show what credit the report received, I may note the fact that one at least of the sureties of Mr. Hooper, as I am informed, offered to pay up the amount of his suretyship in full to the county. Mr. Hooper, however, applied to the County Council for the opportunity to go over the books again, and to have the matter re-opened before themselves. Having refused to appear before the Commission, he asked to be examined by a friendly tribunal, composed chiefly of his own friends, who could not send for witnesses or examine them under oath. I understand that this permission has been granted, and we are now asked to pause on the ground that the question is still sub judice. I think, however, that the majority of the House, in view of the fact that the Commission made its report after the proper examination of witnesses, will be inclined to think that the matter was sub judice while the Commission was in session, and that that was the time for him to make his defence. I do not contend that Mr. Hooper is in the same position as if he had been convicted before a Court, but I contend that the report of the Commission makes a strong prima facie case against him—sufficient, at all events, to warrant the Committee on Privileges and Elections enquiring into the law, and deciding what proceedings should be taken in the case. Such an enquiry does not involve the expulsion of the hon. member for Lennox. The Committee might report that the charge was not made out, and that such and such a course should be taken. That, Sir, is the charge. If anything else is advanced by hon. gentlemen opposite, I will have the opportunity to reply, but it would be rather unfair to expect me to reply to this statement without having read it. During the brief time I have had to examine it, however, I noticed several inaccuracies, or statements contrary to facts. The hon. member opens his statement by a reiteration of his contention, that the Commission was not legally appointed. I believe he made that protest to the Attorney-General, and I think that the report of the Attorney-General as to the legality of the Commission, would be worth more than that of the late Treasurer of the County of Lennox. The hon. member also states that some of the signers of the petition disallow their signatures. How true that may be, of course, we cannot decide here. He states, further, that he is satisfied the report of the Commission is untrue in point of fact. That is a strange statement for a man who refused to appear before it, and who expects the House to believe such a charge on his own ex parte statement. He says that he is personally not aware of there being any deficiency in the accounts, since they were duly audited by the proper officials every year. One point of the report virtually contradicts this.

It declares that the accounts were not duly audited each year; that the auditors did not take the books and compare them with the vouchers. The statement that the "report was rejected by the County Council" has nothing to do with its truth or correctness. "The investigation, as authorised by the County Council, is now in progress, and it would be unfair to make this charge until the investigation is accepted or refused by the County Council." That is to say while the friends of the gentleman are conducting an ex parte investigation, we must pay no attention to the report of a quasi judicial tribunal which has already sat on the case. There is one point here which I must notice. The statement says: "This being a local affair, I cannot understand what this Parliament has to do with it." That is perhaps the only point of any consequence. It implies what may be called a constitutional heresy. The right of this House rests on the inherent right of the Parliament of Great Britain, all of whose privileges we possess, to expel any person whom they consider unfit to sit amongst them. There need not have been any formal conviction of the member; they expel him on moral and not on legal grounds. It does not matter whether the gentleman has sinned against the County Council or against an individual. If he is found guilty of fraud, it is the duty of Parliament to cleanse its skirts by expelling him if they are satisfied that he has so sinned. All that Parliament requires is some satisfactory proof that the crime has been committed. I do not pretend that in laying this motion before the House I am submitting any crushing proof of the hon. member's guilt, but I think I am presenting such a prima facie case as the House, if it has any respect for its own dignity, cannot disregard.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: The hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) is taking a course which affects most seriously the standing of an hon. member, and it becomes us to consider very carefully the proceeding we are asked to take. Whatever we do to-night we must remember that we are acting in a judicial capacity and creating a precedent one way or the other. It behooves us to consider carefully whether the evidence will warrant us in sending this case to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for investigation, and whether it is a proper case to be so referred. The hon. member has said he would not send a case for enquiry unless on sworn testimony.

MR. CASEY : I said that when a case was backed up by sworn testimony I would send it.

MR. KIRKPATRICK : Oh, then the hon. member would not send it unless it were backed up by sworn testimony. The present case affects an hon. gentleman voting with the majority, and the majority ought to be careful to act in a calm, impartial, judicial way, and to remember whatever is done, if we act harshly or in a manner inconsistent with Parliamentary principles, we establish a precedent which might sometimes act against a member of the minority. The petition is a very simple one, and one that might almost be presented against any member of this House. It states that until lately Mr. Hooper was Treasurer of the County of Lennox. There is no harm in that. That is not a cause for reference.

AN HON. MEMBER : It is the cause of dispute.

MR. KIRKPATRICK : An hon. gentleman says it is. It is not because he was treasurer but because, perhaps, he is member for Lennox, and defeated a prominent member of the Opposition, that there is such an anxiety to proceed in this matter. The petition does not say that Mr. Hooper has been guilty of any criminal offence, or of any fraud or misconduct, but simply that he is indebted to the county in the sum of $32,000 and upwards; and subsequently, it is stated, he has become an insolvent. That is not a case for the expulsion of a member, because the Statute requires no property qualification in a member; and so long as a man is sent here by his constituents, bears an honourable character, and is not found guilty by any tribunal of fraud or misconduct, he is a fit and proper person to represent it. The mere fact of his being an insolvent, or has been forced into the Insolvent Court, is no reason for referring his case to a Committee with a view of expelling him from this House. Taking the people of this country generally, a man who fails to pay a debt is usually described by his creditor as having defrauded him. I have no doubt there are hon. gentlemen in this House against whom a petition might be presented, perhaps by thirty persons, alleging that they are indebted, and claiming that they have defrauded their creditors. Are we going to put the whole of the machinery of this House into motion in this case, to enquire into the financial condition of the counties of Lennox and Addington simply on the allegation that these people have been advised and believe what they assert. If we do that, we shall be exercising the great power committed to us in the most tyrannical manner. Let us remember that "It is a great thing to have a giant's power, but it is tyrannous to use it like a giant." We must be careful that we do not strain our powers to render more uncomfortable the position of any hon. member against whom such charges have been made. Let Mr. Hooper's accusers present an indictment against him in the Courts, and if he does not appear for trial, let the indictment be brought to this House; and I do not think there is any hon. member on this side, any more than the opposite, who will defend him or say he should retain his seat. What is the course pursued in England? We are not without precedents. Many years ago there was a case against Lord Cochrane, and a motion made to expel him. Lord Castlereagh said it never had been held that an expulsion could rest on any other ground than that the member accused had not delivered himself legally from the legal charge, and that, therefore, he was not a fit person to remain. In the present case no complaint has been brought into Court. Mr. Hooper has not fled from justice; he is here in the House. I come now to the English case of Hunt, against whom, in 1811, a Commission connected with the Ordinance had reported he was indebted to His Majesty. He wrote a letter, partially admitting his guilt, did not attend in his place, and was expelled. He had not been found guilty, but confessed his guilt. In the present case there is no such confession. The case of Sadlier, in 1856, was one in which he was charged with fraud and misconduct and breach of trust, which rendered him liable to criminal prosecution. An indictment was found against him at the Clonmel Assises. He did not attend to take his trial, and a motion was made in the Commons by Mr. Roebuck to expel him, on the ground that they wished to free themselves from the companionship of a man who had disgraced himself in the eye of the nation. A Judge had, moreover, declared him guilty of gigantic frauds; it had been stated in a judicial judgment that those frauds had resulted from a conspiracy; that the charge had been embodied in information; that warrants had been issued; that indictments had been found by the Grand Jury which Sadlier did not appear to answer; and he had neglected to attend in his place in the House when ordered to do so. Did the House of Commons of England act on that occasion? No, they even then said they were taking a grave proceeding, and notwithstanding that the indictment was on the Table and before the House, they said they should allow him ample time to appear and answer the charges, and the motion was actually laid over until the next Session. No proceedings were taken; the House refused to expel him, and by an unanimous vote left the matter over. In the next Session, the case was again brought up, evidence was given to show that Sadlier had been served with an order to attend in his place and make answer, and that he was a fugitive from justice; and he was expelled on the ground that an indictment had been found against him, and that he had fled from justice. Was there any such feature in this case? Why then try to prejudice this case at this time? The member for East Elgin (Mr. Casey) read some documents not on the Table, and which we know nothing about. We have no sworn testimony in this petition.

MR. CASEY: The paper is here.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: The hon. gentleman knows we cannot take notice of it in that form. We are acting in a judicial capacity, and should proceed in a calm, dispassionate manner.

MR. CASEY: Here is the paper.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria): The hon. gentleman knows we can take no notice of it in that form.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: A week has elapsed since this proceeding commenced, and yet we have not seen this report, and know nothing about it. I ask the House to pause before ordering an enquiry. What would it result in? Suppose in Committee we found the allegations true—"that we are advised and believe that Mr. Hooper is guilty of fraud"—that would not enable us to act as proposed. We should have to enquire into the whole financial affairs of Lennox and Addington. It would be a nice state of things were the affairs of every hon. gentleman similarly accused liable to investigation by a Parliamentary Committee. Some bank might allege that an hon. member had defrauded it, because he had not paid his note, when there would be an enquiry into its affairs. What would be the consequence? Should a constituency with this charge hanging over its member remain quite unrepresented? Mr. Hooper would require to be represented by counsel before the Committee. The Assizes might be sitting in his own town, where some of the signers of the petition might present a Bill against him to the Grand Jury. He would have to defend himself in both places. Is that a fair position to put an accused member in? I say no. We ought not to go further until we have on the Table of the House some better information that there actually is just ground for believing Mr. Hooper has been guilty of fraud or embezzlement. We have no evidence of that kind before us now, and I ask the House to reject the motion now before it.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron): There are no facts before the House that I am aware of in regard to this motion, and on which the House can base any proceedings, except those set forth in the petition, assuming the statements therein contained can be dealt with as facts, and therefore I do not propose entering upon any discussion of the merits of the case in that sense, except such as may fairly be drawn from the petition. In dealing with this matter we have a very important point to consider. I think this is the first case in the history of the Canadian Parliament where a petition of this kind has been presented to Parliament asking for an investigation on the grounds set out in this petition, and now that we are asked to lay down a precedent, it is of the first consequence that it should be correct, and based on reason, common sense, and on the precedents of countries of larger experience than our own. In fact we must be guided by the action of the Mother Parliament when dealing with questions of a similar character to this. I think, as the hon. gentleman who last spoke has said, that we should discuss the question with calm and judicial minds, wholly irrespective of politics. I fear, however, the hon. gentleman did not exactly set us an example in this respect worthy of imitation, and I shall not follow his example. On the rule laid down by him and in the principle thus invoked, there was no necessity for reminding the House that the hon member for Lennox votes with the majority, and had defeated a prominent statesman, who sits on this side of the House. That observation was unworthy of the hon. gentleman, and does not indicate the possession of "a calm and judicial mind" in dealing with the question. To my mind it is of no kind of consequence, in so far as the honour of Parliament and the duty of Parliament is concerned, whether the hon. member implicated sits on the Ministerial or on the Opposition side of the House; that is not the point we are asked to dispose of. We should deal with it irrespective of parties and irrespective of position in the House. What to-day concerns a member of the majority may to-morrow concern a member of the minority. Hence the necessity for deliberation and calm consideration. Now, the member implicated supports the Government. On some future occasion the member whose conduct is complained of may be occupying a place on the left of the Speaker. If the majority in Parliament, resting on their numerical power, should, without just cause, enter upon an improper investigation touching the conduct of a member of this House, then the rights of a member who sits with the minority would never be safe. In support of this argument the member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) has cited several precedents now under consideration, but it will be found on examination that these precedents have no application whatever to the case. I do not mean to say that this is a proper case for reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, or to a Committee of this House. At present I pronounce no opinion on that point; that is a matter for future consideration and that I may deal with before I am done. The petitioners do not ask for Mr. Hooper's expulsion, all they ask for is that the matter be referred to a Committee of the House for investigation. Clearly there is nothing before the House that would justify such an extreme course as a motion for the expulsion of the hon. member implicated. The petitioners do not ask for that on the facts set out in the petition, that course could not be taken. The petition, I admit, is vague, but not sufficiently strong and clear for extreme action. It may be conceded that the allegations and its statements do no more than bring the case within the Parliamentary rule, for a reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, if they go far enough for even that action. It may well be argued on English precedents that paragraph six would justify the House in dealing with the case in the sense and way I have indicated. That paragraph states as follows:—

"That your petitioners are advised and believe that the said County of Lennox and Addington, and the ratepayers and electors thereof, have been defrauded of a large sum of money by the said Edmund Hooper."

The first five clauses of the petition have no practical bearing on the point I am discussing, except as introductory to the sixth, and the allegations in that paragraph would seem to justify the reference asked for. In discussing this painful case, we are not without English precedents to guide us, and if I refer to these precedents at length, it is not with a view of pressing on the House the necessity of referring this petition, but rather to lay down a rule for future guidance in dealing with questions of this kind, a rule by which in similar cases the Imperial Parliament has been guided. It may be conceded at once that Mr. Hooper's financial position has nothing to do with the case. He may be insolvent or he may not, that is no concern of ours; what we have to deal with is the point whether or not the allegations made by the petitioners, in the sixth paragraph of their petition, that Mr. Hooper has defrauded the electors and county of Lennox of large sums of money, is sufficient to justify Parliament referring the matter to a Committee for an investigation, whether or not a direct and express allegation of fraud against a member of Parliament warrants an enquiry before a Committee of the House. You will find by reference to the Parliamentary practice, that in almost every case of a similar character that has arisen in England, that the course taken by the hon. member implicated was the course taken by the hon. member, except that the hon. member for Lennox resists any enquiry and denies the competency of Parliament to deal with such a case. In England, the petition complaining of the conduct of a member is presented, read, and laid on the Table of the House, and the member implicated, on a day agreed upon, makes his statement from his place in Parliament and then retires. You will find still further, that in every case that has arisen in England, especially in the more modern times, the member whose conduct is complained of, after making his statement and before retiring, courts the strictest investigation into the charges made against him. In this respect the conduct of the hon. member for Lennox is not in accordance with the English rule. Mr. Hooper has not courted an investigation. In fact he resists it, and denies our power to deal with the charges preferred. The hon. member who justifies his conduct takes the same ground, and he also resists an investigation.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: No, I have not. I have courted the utmost enquiry; I asked them to present their bill of indictment.

MR. CAMERON: I am not talking about a Bill of indictment. I know it is open to the County Council or any elector of the county to file his bill in Chancery or commence a criminal prosecution against the hon. member for Lennox on any charge that would bring him within the scope and purview of the Criminal Law. That is not the point. What I say is that in almost every case in England the member implicated, the moment he concluded his statement, at once promptly courted the strictest investigation into his conduct, not through the machinery of the law of the land, but by a Select Committee of the House, or by the Parliament itself, or by the Committee on Privileges and Elections. In no single case was anything else done, and I regret that in this respect the conduct of the hon. member for Lennox is in marked contrast to the practice elsewhere. In the case against Mr. Lever, Parliament did nothing, but that was for other and entirely different reasons, not because the hon. member concerned did not court an investigation, but because Parliament in that case saw no ground for an investigation, and the petitioner was a convict and therefore incompetent to set the proceedings of Parliament in motion. I regret that Mr. Hooper has not taken what would have been the more open and manly course, and have said, from his place in Parliament: "If I am guilty of fraud, if I have defrauded my fellow-electors, I am not fit to sit in Parliament. I deny the charge in toto, and court the strictest investigation and scrutiny into my conduct either before I became a member of Parliament, or since I became a member of Parliament, and I submit myself to the judgment of my fellow-representatives." But Mr. Hooper has not been advised to take this course, and he has seen fit not to take it. Mr. Hooper, however, is of age, and he knows his own business, and must therefore take his own course, and we must deal with the complaint entirely on its merits. Had the hon. member taken what appears to me to be the open and manly course, and sought the investigation himself, it would have saved the House the disagreeable necessity of dealing with the points any further. My hon. friend who has just taken his seat, appears to attach some importance to what he calls the uncertain statement contained in the petition, namely, that the petitioners only allege that they are "advised and believed" that Mr. Hooper has been guilty of fraud. There is nothing in this objection. If the hon. gentleman will take the trouble to refer to the Journals of the Imperial Parliament or to any work on Parliamentary practice, he will find that in several cases that came before the Imperial Parliament the language made use of in the petition was no stronger than the language made use of in the petition with which we are now dealing. The general allegations are made by the petitioners on their advice and belief. He will find this form of expression in the petitions against Mr. Lever in 1861, and against Daniel O'Connell in 1836; and in fact no stronger or different language could be made in a petition. All the petitioners against Mr. Hooper could say was, that from the information they had obtained they were advised and believed that Mr. Hooper was guilty of some misconduct that would render him unfit to occupy a seat on the floor of Parliament—conduct that called for an investigation by Parliament. In so far as this petition is concerned, and relying on the authorities in the Imperial Parliament there is nothing in which the hon. gentleman has stated or in the objection on that point that he has raised. The hon. gentleman has, in resisting this motion, relied on a case of Lord Cochrane, in the English House of Commons, and has quoted the opinion of some of those who took part in the discussion that took place on the motion to expel Lord Cochrane. But this precedent and these quotations have no bearing on this case; that was a motion for the expulsion of Lord Cochrane, and not for an investigation into the conduct of the member implicated. Besides, in that case the House did resort to the extreme measure of expulsion. The hon. member has also referred to the case of Mr. Hunt, the Treasurer of the Imperial Ordnance, but that also was a motion to expel the member implicated, and not for an investigation, and therefore has no bearing on this case. While Mr. Hunt was Treasurer of the Imperial Ordnance, complaints were made against him that he had embezzled a large portion of the Imperial funds entrusted to his care as Treasurer of the Ordnance. A Commission was issued by Government to examine into the state of his accounts. There was no trial by jury; there was no conviction before the Courts; there was no investigation before Parliament; there was simply a Commission issued by the Crown to investigate the condition of Mr. Hunt's accounts. Upon that investigation it turned out that he was a defaulter to the extent of £83,000 sterling, and upon the report of that Commission a motion was made to expel Mr. Hunt, and he was accordingly expelled. Now, this precedent does not in the slightest sustain the position taken by Mr. Hooper nor the argument of the hon. member for Frontenac; on the contrary, it seems to me to fully sustain the position taken by the mover of the motion before the Chair, asking for an investigation. That was an application to expel Mr. Hunt, because, after an investigation before a Commission of Enquiry issued by the Government, he was a defaulter to the extent of £83,000, and upon the report of that Commission alone, a motion was made to expel him, and he was expelled from Parliament. This is simply an application for an investigation and not for expulsion. When Mr. Hunt's case is thoroughly investigated, instead of it being an authority in favour of the position taken by Mr. Hooper, it will be found a direct authority against him. In that case Parliament did what Parliament should do only in the clearest possible case—expel a member of Parliament on the report of a Commission. Here, on the report of a Commission, an investigation only is sought. The Sadlier case was also relied on by the hon. member for Frontenac, but on investigation that case will also be found not to sustain the position taken by Mr. Hooper; there also the motion was to expel. Mr. Sadlier was a fugitive from justice. He fled to a foreign land. A motion was made to expel him for several frauds that he had committed. When a motion was first made, several members of Parliament objected to proceeding with the motion, as sufficient notice had not been given to the member implicated, and accordingly the motion was allowed to stand over until he was served with a notice of the motion to expel. The notice was given to Sadlier, but he did not attend in his place in Parliament. In fact he had absconded from the justice of his country. He was outlawed, and at the next Session of Parliament he was accordingly expelled. My hon. friend has clearly not examined with any degree of care the precedents he has cited, as they in no sense fortify his argument; on the contrary they are authorities for the investigation sought for at the hands of Parliament. I now propose drawing the attention of the House to a few of the cases that have arisen in the English House of Commons, and which appear to me to fully warrant this investigation. In July, 1836, a petition from the electors of Carlow was presented to the House of Commons complaining of the conduct of Daniel O'Connell in certain transactions alleged to have taken place between himself and Alexander Raphael respecting the representation of the County Carlow. The petition complained of the conduct of Daniel O'Connell in certain transactions alleged to have taken place between him and Raphael for procuring the return of the latter as the member for the county. How was that petition couched, in almost identical language with that now before this House, dealt with, and what did Mr. O'Connell do? Did he do as Mr.

Hooper has done here? Did he say to the Imperial House of Commons as Mr. Hooper has said to the Canadian House of Commons: I do not want an investigation; you have no power to investigate the charge levelled against me; it is none of your concern whether I am guilty or not guilty; you can't try me. On the contrary, Daniel O'Connell stood up in his place in Parliament and denied in the strongest possible way the charges made against him from beginning to end, and courted the strictest investigation on the floor of Parliament or by a Committee of Parliament. A Select Committee was appointed, the strictest investigation took place before the Committee, and the Committee reported that Daniel O'Connell had committed no offence contrary to the law of the land or the strictest rules of Parliamentary honour, and Daniel O'Connell escaped without a stain on his high character. Hon. gentlemen will find in the Journals and the Debates of Parliament another case in which a petition was presented against another eminent Irishman, Mr. Butt. In that case the petitioner complained that Isaac Butt had agreed with the Rajahpoor of Scinde, an Indian Prince, to prosecute a claim that he had against the English Government before the House of Commons, and that in that respect his conduct was unbecoming a member of Parliament, a man of honour and a gentleman. What did Isaac Butt do under the circumstance—resist an investigation and deny the competency of Parliament to deal with him? Nothing of the kind. Mr. Butt got up in his place and denied with all the emphasis he possibly could that he was not guilty of the charges laid against him, and he courted the strictest investigation. A Select Committee was appointed; that Committee enquired into the charges alleged in the petition, and, after the most thorough investigation, reported that Mr Butt was guilty of no offence contrary to the law of the land or to the honour of Parliament. I now beg to draw the attention of the House to still another case—a case the hon. member has not referred to, and which is, perhaps, more on all fours with this case than any other case I have been able to lay my hands on. I refer to what is known in Parliamentary Law as the "Lever Case." Mr. Lever who, while he represented an Irish constituency, was also the President and Manager of the Royal Atlantic Mail Steamship Company. The petition against him was presented by Edward O'Malley Irwin, and complained of his conduct in respect to his dealings with the company, and charged him with certain fraudulent practices as President of the Company and in his dealings with the company. He was not charged with any misconduct as a member of Parliament. The charge was made against him in his private and individual capacity, and not as a member of the House. The charge was based by Irwin—the petitioner—on Lever's alleged fraudulent dealings with the rest of the shareholders of the Company and against the interests of the shareholders. The petition was presented, read and laid on the Table of the House, and on a motion that it be printed, Mr. Lever denied the charge in the most emphatic language. A debate took place on the subject of the motion—the mode of dealing with such petitions, and the course Parliament should take. After a long discussion the matter was allowed to drop and no further action was taken—not because Parliament had no power to deal with it or because Parliament should not deal with charges against a member of Parliament in his private capacity, but for two other reasons. One reason was that the charge against Mr. Lever and complained of by the petitioner, took place when Mr. Lever was not a member of the Imperial Parliament. The other ground was that the petitioner was an infamous person, that he had been convicted of forgery and perjury, and according to the Rules of Parliament, no convict or infamous person could present a petition to Parliament. After the discussion that I have referred to took place the petition was allowed to drop; but in the discussion which took place on the motion to print the petition, we find the opinion of able and experienced Parliamentarians as to the proper course to pursue—not all unanimous—but all agreeing as to what was the proper course and the facts in that and kindred cases. But the general current of opinion was that where grave criminal charges were levelled against a member of the House, Parliament, if it saw fit could and should direct an enquiry without the formality of a bill of indictment or without any proceedings having been taken before the Criminal Courts. And in the Lever case, which was a complaint based on frauds alleged to have taken place before he became a member of Parliament and solely in his private capacity. Some of the oldest and most experienced members of the Imperial Parliament were of opinion that it was a proper subject for enquiry. I will read you what Sir George Grey said on the subject. He says:

“I find that charges made against a member of this House, whether in his capacity of member or in his individual capacity, have, as a general rule, been received by the House; but not until after the member accused has been afforded an opportunity of reading the petition and of knowing distinctly what the charges contained in it against him are, and until he has had an opportunity of being in his place and of replying to them.”

This appears to be a very distinct enunciation of the rule that appears to have guided the Imperial Parliament, and according to that rule the investigation is not limited to charges affecting the member implicated in his character as a member of Parliament. A still higher authority than Sir George Grey was of the opinion that, although the matter complained of related to the member's private affairs, or rather, although the charges made do not concern him as a member of Parliament, that still Parliament could properly investigate the complaint. And the Speaker of the Imperial House of Commons says in reference to this case, on a point of order raised pending the discussion:

“In this case the allegation of the petition appears to reflect upon the conduct of Mr. Lever as manager and director of a certain public company before he was a member of the House; but the petition makes no charge, as I read it, against his conduct since he became a member of this House or in his character as a member.”

The rule thus laid down clearly implies that if the charge is made against a member of Parliament for something that has taken place since he became a member of the House, whether as a member of Parliament or in his private and individual capacity, Parliament may direct an investigation, and that is precisely the case now under consideration. Now all these observations go to show that when petitions of this kind are presented, such petitions are always received by the Imperial House of Commons, they are read at the Table of the House, and, after the member implicated has had an opportunity of answering, they are referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, or to a Select Committee of the House, or are investigated by the House itself. The House will find this view confirmed by another case that arose in the English House of Commons. In the year 1826, a petition was presented on the part of the shareholders of a Coal and Mining Company, containing charges of misconduct against certain persons, one of whom at that time occupied the position of Chairman of Committees of the House. The House did then appoint a Committee to enquire into the management of that Company, with a special direction that they should report on the conduct of certain members of the House in reference to that Company. Now the course thus taken in the Imperial Parliament is exactly the course which the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) asks this House to take in this case, and his motion is clearly sustained by Imperial authority. This is not all. There are other cases which fully bear out the position I have laid down. I now refer to what I consider a still clearer and a still stronger precedent. It also occurred in 1826. It is the case of Mr. Kenrick, who was then a member of the Imperial Parliament, and a Magistrate of Wales and the County of Surrey, and Recorder of Dover. A person of the name of Franks caused a petition to be presented to the English House of Commons against Mr. Kenrick, complaining that Mr. Kenrick had preferred before a Justice of the Peace a charge of felony against Franks, without any proof of the same, and without reasonable grounds for so doing. On that charge Franks was tried and acquitted. During the term of his imprisonment, Kenrick made several offers to him, that if he would plead guilty he (Kenrick) would procure a light sentence. These offers were rejected, and the man was acquitted. After Franks was acquitted, and after some public animadversions in Kenrick's conduct in reference to this case, Kenrick published a libellous letter on Franks, imputing to him crimes of which he was not guilty, and Franks claimed an investigation of Kenrick's conduct before the High Court of Parliament. Now, this was a matter purely private and personal, as between Franks and Kenrick. The charge had nothing to do with Kenrick's position as a member of Parliament. The Courts of Law were open to Franks. He could have had ample redress there had he invoked their aid. Kenrick improperly laid an information against the man; he was tried and acquitted. Kenrick then wrote a letter to the public journals, after the man was acquitted, charging him with criminal conduct. Although the Courts were open to him, he was not denied his right of enquiry before Parliament. The matter was submitted to the House, and the House dealt with it; and nobody thought of questioning the power and the right of Parliament to do so, and no one thought of avoiding the fullest and freest investigation. The complaint was referred to a Select Committee, and that Committee dealt with it, and that is all the mover of the motion I am now discussing asks for. In all cases of a similar character brought before the Imperial Parliament, I find, in examining such cases, that the implicated member has himself courted the enquiry, and the investigation has hardly ever been denied—in fact, never, except under very exceptional circumstances. Another proposition is laid down by the hon. member for Frontenac. He contends that before an investigation of this kind is sought in Parliament there should be a foundation laid for the enquiry, that in fact there should first be a trial before a jury and a conviction of the implicated member, and that such conviction and trial alone should form the basis for an enquiry here. That is the very reverse of the rule acted on in the Imperial Parliament in many cases. There Parliament first investigates the charges preferred against a member, and if he is found to be guilty of the charges laid against him he is dealt with by Parliament and then handed over to the Criminal Courts to be dealt with by them. I do not say that the hon. member for Lennox is guilty in this case—far from it—I trust he is not, and from my short acquaintance with him I can hardly believe that he is guilty of the criminal offence mentioned in the petition; but with that I have nothing to do. That is not a point that we are called on to discuss at this stage of the proceedings; I am simply trying to lay down what I believe to be the Law of Parliament, and what I think should be done in cases of this kind, if we are to be guided by Imperial precedents. It is the duty of Parliament—if Parliament is satisfied that an investigation is in the interests of Parliament—if the honour, the honesty, or the integrity of a member of Parliament is challenged by petition, if his conduct is alleged to be infamous so far as to render him unfit to sit in a deliberative assembly of this kind, to at once cause an investigation; and it is equally the duty of any member implicated, and against whom any charge of the kind suggested is made, to seek at the earliest moment an investigation of the strictest kind; and after the investigation, if the charge is substantiated, he should be dealt with by the House, and then be handed over to the civil authorities. In confirmation of this view, I beg to quote from an eminent authority, Lord Colthurst, in his Diary, at page 373, writing upon a matter of this kind, says:

“The principle of the expulsion, the facts incontrovertibly proved of his having plotted and practiced a gross and infamous breach of trust in a money transaction to his own emolument, and the precedent (by which that principle had already been extended to transactions respecting not only public but also private property in the case of individuals), applied and relied upon was that of the charitable corporation in 1722, when, for indirect and fraudulent practices, three members were expelled; and the legal conviction of any indictable offense in those practices was held to be so little necessary to precede the expulsion, that they were expelled first, and the legal prosecutions were ordered afterwards, as is commonly the practice of Parliament, where it first vindicates its own honour, and then consigns the individual to legal prosecution, which may, or may not be able to fix the legal guilt and punishment on the delinquent.”

The hon. member who has undertaken to defend Mr. Hooper has laid down the very reverse rule. I prefer to follow Lord Colthurst. That rule, shortly, is this: If a petition is presented against a member of Parliament, complaining of his conduct, or that reflects gravely and seriously on his character as a member or otherwise, then it is the duty of Parliament to cause an investigation, and it is equally the duty of the member complained against to court at the earliest opportunity the fullest investigation. These observations are entirely apart from the merits of the case now before the House, of which I know nothing except what has been stated by the mover of the resolution and what is contained in the sixth paragraph of the petition. The question of the truth or falsity of the charge is quite aside from the point we have now to deal with. The guilt or innocence of the member complained of is not now before us, and we are not asked to pronounce on it; that is for the Committee to inquire into. The gentleman, it appears to me, should court a full investigation; he should have an opportunity to clear his character and reputation of charges levelled against him before a Committee of the House. And if this investigation is now stifled and this enquiry stopped, it will go abroad throughout the country that there is something wrong, that the member for Lennox is guilty, and that the petitioners have good ground for seeking an enquiry into his conduct, and that the gentleman has screened himself from the enquiry under the protection of a majority in Parliament, a majority, as the hon. member for Frontenac reminded us of, with which the member implicated always votes.

MR. IVES: I have not had an opportunity of consulting the authorities upon this question, and am therefore unable to follow the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat, but it seems to me that this House might settle this question for itself, without reference to any authorities. There are several undisputed facts before the House; others are disputed. If we take the undisputed ones, they are these: Mr. Hooper has been the treasurer of the counties of Lennox and Addington; Mr. Hooper is charged with having embezzled the funds of the counties of Lennox and Addington; Mr. Hooper denies the charge; and, as I understand it, a Commissioner has made a report, which asserts that Mr. Hooper is indebted to those counties. Mr. Hooper denies this; and now a motion is made that the question whether he is indebted to the counties of Lennox and Addington or not should be left to be decided by the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections—I suppose that is the question really to be referred to the Committee—and, if he is so indebted, whether he is or is not guilty of embezzlement of the funds of those counties. The first question that arises is as to whether this report is evidence, conclusive evidence, which this House should receive. Of course, if it is, the matter to be left to the Committee will be a simple one; they should take that report and examine it, taking it as conclusive evidence, and, upon that examination, report to this House whether Mr. Hooper is guilty of embezzling the funds of the Counties of Lennox and Addington. But, if this Commission and the report of that Commission should be considered not conclusive evidence, then it is no evidence at all; and, if this matter is referred to a Committee, that Committee will have to go into the whole of the financial affairs of the counties of Lennox and Addington for a series of years during which Mr. Hooper has held office. This matter looks to me to be one entirely independent of English authorities, and one over which this House has entire control. The House can delegate to a Committee the power to settle the question between the counties of Lennox and Addington and Mr. Hooper, if it is thought to be fair to Mr. Hooper, or fair to that Committee to impose upon it such a labour. But, if the House thinks it unfair to bring Mr. Hooper before that Committee, with his books, papers, and accounts, or to impose such an amount of labour upon the members of this House who serve on that Committee, then this House should refuse to refer the matter to a Committee. One thing is quite certain, namely, that this House is not bound to refer any charge to a Committee, merely because the charge is made, and because it is of a serious character. If that were a fact, we should have plenty of work to do after every election, for it would be only necessary to make a charge against any member of the party opposed in politics to the majority, and the House would refer the matter to a Committee to be selected from that majority. Therefore it must be held that this House does not necessarily refer every case of this kind to a Committee. But is this case one which ought to be referred to such a Committee? I can easily understand a case where a charge is made, for instance, of assault—where one member makes the charge and the other denies it—such a case is susceptible of proof before a Committee. Then the House might refer it to a Committee to ascertain whether such an assault had been committed, and report the result of the enquiry; but it is not beyond the duties of this House to refuse to impose upon a Committee the immense labour that is involved in the reference now proposed. Now it is said that Mr. Hooper expresses his willingness to have this charge investigated. He denied the charge and then quietly withdrew from the House, stating that he left it in the hands of the House to deal with. He has no objection to an investigation. He says: Such a charge is made against me; my reply is a denial; do what you like with it; I leave the Chamber; let the House decide for itself. Now, if the matter was one easy of proof, and involving but little labour, it might properly be referred to a Committee, because it is a most serious charge; but in such a case as this it appears to me that it would be an enormous labour to impose upon any Committee, and a piece of unfairness to send Mr. Hooper before such a Committee, and I shall vote against it.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria): This House is asked to establish a precedent of a very serious nature, an evil precedent, in referring this case to the Committee of Privileges and Elections. I did expect that the hon. gentleman who moved for this reference would favour the House with precedents in favour of that course, but he failed to do so. He referred to Mr. Hunt's case, and to the case of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), when he was Speaker of this House, neither of which, however, had the slightest bearing on the case now before the House; but this lack of authorities has been compensated for by my hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. Cameron), who has cited certain authorities to show that the proposed reference is a proper one to be made in such a case as this. I have given some little consideration to the authorities. I have looked over them as carefully as time would allow, but I have failed to find one case in which a reference was made to a Committee of Privileges and Elections on materials such as we have before us. It is conceded that there is no such authority to be found in this country, and none of the cases cited by my hon. friend from South Huron establish that any such course has been followed in England. My hon. friend admitted that, if there were any material before the House, it was just about all there was, for making this reference, and yet he endeavoured to show that in certain cases references of this kind had been made in England. I will not go through the cases, some of which I have looked at, but I venture to say that in every one of them the facts are different to those before the House, and that no precedent can be established on them. Let us consider for a moment the materials on which we are asked to refer this matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. We are asked, in fact, as my hon. friend from South Huron has candidly admitted, to say that, whenever a petitioner who presents a petition alleges that any hon. member has defrauded someone, the House is bound to refer the matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. That was the position assumed by the hon. gentleman, and I join issue with him in his conclusion. I say that to establish such a rule would be to lay down a monstrous doctrine in this House, resulting in the most serious and disastrous consequences to harmony and good feeling, without which it would be impossible to carry on our proceedings in this House. Any proceeding of that kind would be followed by recriminations. Hon. gentlemen will recollect that, if we establish this precedent—we will be, I was going to say, pestered, I think it would be the proper term—by petitions from everyone having grievances against any hon. gentleman in this House, which such person would bring before Parliament, and make either a subject of persecution out of political or personal spite, against that member, or the means of levying blackmail. Hon. gentlemen will recollect that there are other members in this House against whom charges far more serious than those contained in this petition have been made in this House and published in the Press. Hon. gentlemen in this House have been charged, in print, in newspapers, in quotations from legal proceedings, of criminal offences of the gravest kind, of fraud of the grossest character. In some cases even, some of those gentlemen who have been so charged, when they have commenced proceedings for vindicating their character, have not prosecuted those proceedings to a successful termination. I should therefore like to ask hon. gentlemen here whether, if we establish the precedent that is sought to be established in the motion of the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), it will not inevitably be followed by some petition against other members of this House, and whether the Committee on Privileges and Elections will not be occupied in profitless and most annoying investigations into the private affairs of hon. members sitting in this House. But my hon. friend who moved this petition the other day sought to sustain it on the ground that it rested upon the authority of a quasi-judicial proceeding of a properly appointed Commission. He stated that from what he had read in the text-books of the authorities in England, Parliament had never acted in a matter of this kind against any member in the House, unless upon an established conviction for some crime, or upon the report of some Committee appointed by the House, or by other statutory authorities, which proved him to be guilty of the offence laid to his charge. My hon. friend sought to give to the proceedings of this Commission, appointed under the authority of the Statute of Ontario, the legal and binding effect which has been given by the House of Commons in England occasionally to the reports of Committees of that House. In the case of Mr. Hunt, to which reference was made by the hon. member for West Elgin, a Special Commission was appointed to investigate his accounts as Treasurer of the Ordnance, when he was found to be indebted to the Crown in the large sum of, I think, £90,000 sterling. He was summoned on three different occasions to be present in his place in the House, in order that the report of this Commission might be read and the matter discussed there. But he refused to appear and fled the country, and the report was laid on the Table of the House, with the statement that the officers had been unable to serve him in consequence of his having fled the country. The House was satisfied then that no denial could be made of the charge of criminally appropriating public funds, and he was expelled. In the present case, the authority of the Commission rests upon the Statute of Ontario. In this case, the question was the state of the accounts between the County Council of Lennox and Mr. Hooper, their Treasurer. That

MR. CAMERON.

Commission was appointed upon a petition signed by thirty-two so-called ratepayers, asking that the accounts be enquired into. We find, however, by the document Mr. Hooper has just read to the House, that the only authority for issuing a Commission of this kind is a petition signed by thirty-two ratepayers, and we find that six or seven of those whose names were on the petition made a solemn declaration that they had never signed any such petition; consequently, the very foundation for that Commission was knocked from under it. This petition was sent to the Attorney-General of Ontario, but at the same time there was sent a positive formal notice from the County Council that they should repudiate the authority of the Commission, and would not pay the expenses which were likely to be saddled upon them, because the whole thing was illegal. Then the hon. member for West Elgin talks about Mr. Hooper appearing before the Commission and denying its authority. It was not Mr. Hooper who did that, but the County Council, the formal and official body of the electors of the county, who came before the Commissioner and told him! You have no right here; you are here under false pretences, on a petition purporting to be signed by thirty-two ratepayers, and we have furnished you with the evidence that this petition was a fraud, and consequently you have no authority to come here. But the Commissioner chose to proceed, notwithstanding that notice. I will say nothing disrespectful of that Commissioner, a lawyer in Ontario, of strong political leanings, who once ran unsuccessfully for the Local Legislature. His ambition being much greater than his popularity, certainly he was open beyond all question to the animadversions which the hon. member for West Elgin indulged in when he spoke of the political partisanship of members on the Ministerial side of this House. If there ever was a tribunal appointed by a partisan Government at the request of political partisans, for a partisan purpose, that is the one we are now considering. The whole proceeding was based upon political spite, in order that its promoters might avenge themselves upon Mr. Hooper for having successfully carried the county in the last general elections. This Commission goes on and makes a report, and how does the Commissioner proceed? This answer Mr. Hooper has given, and I think the statement made by a member of this House, on his responsibility, on the floor of this House, is entitled to at least as much credit as the statements of twenty-five signatories to a petition obtained in such a manner and for such a purpose as the one we are now dealing with. In the face of the statement which Mr. Hooper makes, of the way this Commissioner made up the accounts, my hon. friend talks about Mr. Hooper being a defaulter to the extent of $32,000. Nearly $20,000 of it was made up by usurious interest, compounded quarterly, at the rate of 14 per cent. per annum. This is the kind of treatment this immaculate Commissioner dealt out to a member of this House. Mr. Hooper goes on to give an additional statement that he is not indebted at all. He also says that the Commissioner did not carry the investigation to the period at which the accounts were closed, but he stopped at the date of his appointment, and said he could go no further than that. How could he tell how the account stood by confining himself to a particular period? There might have been a large amount then required to be in Mr. Hooper's hands to be paid over for some particular purpose. He should have carried his investigation down to the time Mr. Hooper ceased to be Treasurer, or closed his account, in order to give a fair statement of the manner in which the accounts stood. This report came before the County Council. Now, those hon. gentlemen of this House who come from Ontario, know, what a shrewd and intelligent class of men those composing the County Councils generally are. They are as careful and as prudent in their management of the public business as any class of men that could be selected. But my hon. friend says this was a partisan County Council. I never heard before that politics in the county council of Lennox ran so much in one way that the respective parties stood in the relation of fifteen to six, for such was the majority by which the Council declared that this report was unfounded, that they would not accept it, stating that they were themselves having an investigation into the accounts. Now, I do not think there can be any stronger justification of Mr.

Hooper than the fact that the County Council, composed of reeves and deputy reeves, by a vote of fifteen to six declared that this report was not trustworthy and that they would have a separate investigation of their own. That investigation is now proceeding, and we are asked here to do Mr. Hooper the gross injustice of opening up an enquiry in this House, by Committee, into a matter which is now undergoing enquiry by a competent tribunal, by the parties who are themselves directly interested in the matter. We are also asked to do that in face of the fact stated in the statement read to the House, that his sureties, who are amply responsible, came before the County Council and said: "If, after a fair examination of Mr. Hooper's accounts, you find a deficiency, and that anything is due by him, we undertake to pay the same." The Council was satisfied with that statement and content with the responsibility of his sureties, believing that whatever balance of debt, if any, Mr. Hooper owed, would be paid to the county and to the rate-payers. So there is no truth in the statement contained in the petition of these ratepayers, that, if Mr. Hooper was declared a defaulter, the county would lose a large sum of money. My hon. friend who spoke just before me, pointed out to the House a matter of very grave importance as affecting this question when he advocated referring this entire matter to the Committee of this House, which, he stated, was competent and fully qualified to deal with it. Now, I would ask the hon. gentlemen on the Committee of Privileges and Elections whether they think themselves competent to sit as a Board of Auditors to ascertain the state of the accounts of a County Treasurer, extending over a period of eight or ten years? Are we competent to settle and decide that question; for what else should we have to decide? We are asked to investigate the question whether Mr. Hooper has defrauded his county, or whether, at the date of our investigation, there was a balance due by him to the county. Mr. Hooper says there was not; this Commissioner apparently did not know whether there was or not, as, being a lawyer, perhaps he is not acquainted with figures. This House is asked to refer the matter to another body of lawyers, for I believe that, with the exception of the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton), every member of that Committee is a lawyer. Now, is this Committee to undertake an enquiry of that kind; or is this a matter for this House to entertain? The petition makes another statement, that Mr. Hooper has become insolvent. This, I believe, is so, and it is much to be regretted. But why is he insolvent? Why, because of the persecution of political friends of hon. gentlemen opposite. They were not content with destroying the position he held in the county of Lennox and trying to destroy his political influence there. He being a merchant and in business with his sons, his credit was necessarily impaired, all his creditors pressed him, and the result was he was driven into insolvency by the persecution undertaken by his political opponents. It has come from the political hatred of his opponents in Napanoe, who have been at the bottom of this persecution, who have presented this petition to the House now. It is these who have driven him into insolvency and are trying to destroy his reputation now. Being strongly opposed to the investigation asked for by this petition becoming a precedent, I think it better to move in amendment:

That all the words after "That" in the said proposed motion be left out, and the following be inserted instead thereof:—"Having heard the statement of Edmund Hooper, Esq., member of this House for the Electoral District of the County of Lennox and inasmuch as the petition of certain electors of the Electoral District of the County of Lennox does not disclose facts which affect the right of the said Edmund Hooper to represent the said Electoral Division in this House, the said petition be not referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections."

MR. CASEY: The position of this debate has been considerably altered by what has been said since I last spoke, and also by the statement put in by the hon. member for Lennox, which I had not, up to then, had time carefully to look into, and which I have not yet had time to compare with the report of the Commissioner. There is one thing Mr. Hooper has not done, which his advocates on the other side of the House have done for him. He has not fairly and squarely denied the charges made against him. Instead of doing so, he begins by complaining that the tribunal was not a properly constituted one. That is not a matter for this House to deal with, either on his statement or the statement of the petitioners. It is purely a question for the Committee. He states that several signers of the petition denied their signatures, and that the Attorney-General was notified of this fact by the Warden. It would perhaps be sufficient, in answer to that, to state that the Attorney-General does not appear to have taken any notice of it, but I am informed that the Warden was compelled to retract that statement, and apologise to the party who witnessed the signatures to the petition. We have here a direct conflict of evidence, which this House is not in a position as a body to enquire into, but which the Committee on Privileges and Elections may properly investigate. We are also told that the report of the Commission is untrue in point of fact. Of course when a statement is made across the floor of the House by a member on his word, you are bound to accept it unless you are proposing to enquire into the statement in some way. If we were to take a simple denial in such cases, there would be an end to enquiries of this kind. Indeed, the statement of this hon. gentleman is simply a challenge to investigate whether the Commission was properly constituted and whether its findings were true, and I think the House would be wanting in consideration for the hon. member for Lennox, as well as for its own dignity, if it allows that conflict to go on any longer. I find it stated that interest was calculated by the Commission at the rate of 14 per cent., so that $20,000 of the deficiency is made up on account of improper compound interest. On looking at the report, I find that the interest is charged, not at 14 per cent., but for fourteen years. I suppose the hon. member for Lennox has been misled by a hurried glance at the report. One sum of $4,681, mentioned by the Commission, had amounted to something over $8,000 in the fourteen years. It seems to me that a sum of $4,681 compounded every quarter for fourteen years, at 14 per cent., would more than double in that time.

MR. PLUMB: What is the rate of interest?

MR. CASEY: The hon. member for Niagara can find that out by an easy calculation. I have not the time now to do so while speaking. It certainly could not be 14 per cent., as stated by the hon. member for Lennox. That hon. gentleman does not say that he is not indebted to the county—that he has not embezzled, or defrauded the county. He says: "I am personally not aware of any deficiency in my accounts, because they were duly audited every year by competent auditors appointed by the County Council." The Commissioners tell a different story. They say that the auditors relied chiefly on statements presented by the Treasurer. They say:

"It is clear, from the testimony of the auditors who were examined, that they relied chiefly, if not altogether, upon the statements submitted to them by the Treasurer. * * In point of fact, these so-called auditors' statements were not prepared by the auditors, but by Mr. Hooper, the Treasurer, and accepted by the auditors without any proper examination of the books and other necessary sources of information, and, as a result, the books were in no case actually audited."

We therefore find a direct conflict of evidence on this point, but we must remember that the Commission examined those auditors on oath, and learned what was their custom. Surely, if the hon. member knew there was a clear case in his favour, he would have stated clearly that he owed the county nothing. I am not arguing that he is guilty, but that this statement does not say he is not guilty. The hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron) made a great point out of the statement that the County Council cannot suffer any loss, because the sureties of the Treasurer are good, and that, therefore, we should not make any fuss about the matter. That, however, is a contention that very few hon. members would care to make. It amounts to this: That, if the late Treasurer is guilty, and can manage to settle with the county authorities, it does not concern the House whether he is an embezzler or not. I must notice the closing paragraph, which states: "I am satisfied that the attack made on me originated from political malice." I am informed by a gentleman who forwarded the petition to me that several of the signers were supporters of the hon. member for Lennox at the last election, and it cannot be charged that they were actuated by political malice. All this discussion of details may seem irrelevant, but, in addressing the House, I have merely wished to clear away some of the mist cast around the subject by hon. gentlemen opposite and by the statement of the hon. member for Lennox. We have been told that, whatever the facts may be, this is a matter we have no right to inquire into. The hon. gentleman who sits besides me (Mr. Cameron, South Huron) has shown that on some similar occasions in England the House not only took cognisance of the matter but proceeded to expel the member. Now, if the House over there took such action, I think this House is competent to take cognisance of this matter, so far at least as to enquire into it. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) lays stress on the words in the petition to the effect that the petitioners "were advised and believed" that the county was defrauded. I do not know that the statement could be made in any other way. The hon. member (Mr. Kirkpatrick) also said that the report was not before the House. Well, as far as I am aware, it cannot be brought before the House unless we choose to enquire further into the matter. If the House will take the word of a member, that such report is in existence, and that it seems to bear out the allegations of the petition, then the report can be brought before us. It seems as if the hon. gentleman was afraid that the report should come before the House. I think the Committee on Privileges and Elections should enquire into the constitution of the Commission, ascertain whether it examined witnesses on oath, and what conclusion was arrived at. Such an enquiry would determine whether or not there are strong grounds for the expulsion of the hon. member for Lennox; it would place us in a position to decide on the merits of the case. If the House refuses to look into the matter, it shuts its eyes to the facts, and we will never be in a position to find out whether the hon. member is guilty or not. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) made a strong point of the statement that the enquiry before the Committee would be tedious and intricate, and go too much into details. The trouble an enquiry would cause is no reason why it should not take place. Then the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron) reiterated that, if this precedent was set, charges might be made every day through the press and otherwise, and the Committee would be overrun with investigations of this character. I deny that this would establish a precedent for enquiries based upon charges made in the press. This charge is based upon the report of a Commission, acting under the Statute, and it is the most infrequent occurrence in the world for a member to be charged in this way and on such proof with defrauding a county of $32,000. It is desirable, of course, to protect the interests of the minority, and, as we are in a comparatively small minority here, we do not want a precedent established that would enable the majority to sweep down upon us whenever they desired. But I do not think anything of the sort would happen if this enquiry were granted. I suppose the House has pretty thoroughly made up its mind what it will do in the case. I presume the hon. the leader of the Government has made up his mind whether he will take any stand in the matter. I did suppose, when the right hon. gentleman moved the adjournment of the debate, the other evening, that he intended to say something on the subject, and I naturally supposed he would state the grounds on which this reference should or should not be made. Whether he sees fit to do that or not, he will no doubt indicate what his opinion is. If he thinks the reference should not be made, it is useless to take any division. If the right hon. gentleman states his intention to oppose the reference, I shall, therefore, not insist upon dividing the House. In consequence of the right hon. gentleman refusing to allow the other petition to be received and read to-day, it will come up to-morrow in the natural course of events, and there may be further occasion for debate on this subject, or possibly for a division. That, however, will depend upon the view the House takes. If the reference is not made, the entire responsibility will rest with the right hon. gentleman and his Government; and I have no doubt they are willing to assume that responsibility—at least three years before the general elections.

MR. BUNSTER: I am sorry to intrude upon the time of the House, because I think its time has been wasted in the discussion of this question. It leaked out during the discussion that the charge was pressed against this hon. member because he was voting with the majority. That should not be an offence, and I do not see any reason for all this talk about a little deficit in this county of deficits. How was it that the late Finance Minister of the Dominion who was a member for this county was not called to account? He had a deficit of $2,900,000 in 1876; another of $3,000,000 in 1877; and another of $2,000,000 in 1878. And here we are wasting the time of this country over a paltry sum of $32,000. If the hon. member for Lennox is guilty, why not call in a Justice of the Peace to pass his judgment upon the matter according to the law of the land? Valuable time is taken up in this way, when we ought to be considering the development of the North-West, or the construction of the Pacific Railway, is ridiculous. We should have been at that work instead of fooling away two hours' time this way. You, Sir—pardon me for the remark—are partly to blame for this conduct. I for one feel it hard to have to come 4,000 miles from home to witness all this washing of dirty linen. It is an unprofitable and a reprehensible way of spending the money of the people we are sent here to represent, and I most decidedly will not be a party to it.

MR. ANGLIN: I think the House has already decided that the argument used by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Bunster) in support of the amendment is the strongest offered on that side of the question. If a late Minister of Finance has not been prosecuted for a deficit, why should a Treasurer of a municipality of Ontario be prosecuted and criminally convicted because of a deficit? If, as the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) said, we are merely called on to enquire whether Mr. Hooper, as Treasurer, is indebted to his municipality, we of course should refuse to make any such enquiry. However, there is something more serious than that in the case; for, although the petition does not in very strong terms make a direct charge against Mr. Hooper, it does in the closing passage declare that the petitioners are advised and have reason to believe that he has defrauded them. The question is entirely based on the charge of fraud. If no charge of fraud is sufficiently made, the whole case ought to fall through. If we choose to say that the allegation is not sufficiently direct and distinct, we should simply rest the case there, and for that reason refuse to proceed further. If, however, this charge of fraud is clearly made, and we have heard an hon. member state that he is in possession of evidence which he believes would sustain it, it becomes a serious question whether we should accept as sufficient the statement of Mr. Hooper, which has been read, or refer the matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The possible tediousness and intricacy of the investigation affords no reason why it should not be held. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe said that the House ought not to be guided by the precedents of the Imperial Parliament, cited by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron), but the House, I trust, will always attach to such precedents the weight and importance to which they are entitled. We are told that the allegation of "fraud" in the petition, is contradicted by the hon. member for Lennox and Ad-dington, and we are asked by the amendment to declare that this denial is equivalent to disproof; but the mere contradiction, by himself, of such a serious charge, cannot be held to be a sufficient reason for refusing to refer the matter to a Committee. It is too much to ask the House to pass the amendment in that shape—it would be injudicious to do so. Naturally, any hon. member would deny the truth of such an accusation, and more than that, may proceed to argue, as Mr. Hooper does in his case, that certain other allegations made, or likely to be made, were untrue. I would suggest that that part of the amendment be struck out and the hon. member for North Victoria rest his case on the assertion that the petition does not disclose facts to warrant the course proposed in the original motion.

Mr. HOLTON: I think the concluding portion of the amendment ought to be struck out. I am clearly of opinion that no case has been made out for the reference proposed. But I have very grave doubts as to whether we ought to put in our Journals, as a reason for not making the reference, the plea of Not Guilty, of the gentleman who has been attacked. I should like very much that the decision and judgment of the House should be taken on the sufficiency or insufficiency of the case made out by my hon. friend the member for Elgin.

Mr. CAMERON (North Victoria): I have no objection to strike out the latter part of the second reason, and rest the motion on the first—"that the petition does not disclose facts," etc. I think it better that the rule on which the House rests should be stated on unquestionable grounds.

Mr. MILLS: The rule is that the denial of an hon. member should be taken with regard to any fact alleged in the discussion; but, if there is a charge formally made, on which the action of the House is asked, his denial cannot be put in opposition to that allegation; and that is the objection in this matter—that we are asked to put the hon. member's denial against the allegations in the petition, upon which a member had invited the action of the House. The House, if it did so, would commit itself to a wholly untenable position.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) goes too far, and that this is the principle prevailing: if in the discussion anything is said respecting an hon. member, and he in his place denies it, his denial is accepted; but, if there be a distinct charge, his allegation does not go for nothing. It is for the House, however, to weigh his statement against the direct charge, and it may give more weight to the denial than to the charge. But once a specific charge has been made, the House does not accept as a matter of course the member's denial as such, but may give such weight as it pleases to the denial.

Mr. MILLS: The right hon. gentleman will find this is not the case when the action of the House is asked for on a petition. The allegation is made in the motion that the denial of the member is to be taken as a ground for refusing the action proposed.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I do not rise to prolong the discussion, which seems near its natural termination; but, having been invited by a large number of the electors of the county which the accused member represent to assist him in his canvass and in his election, I had the pleasure of making the acquaintance of very many of them, and, for the first time of meeting Mr. Hooper. I found him a man standing very high in the estimation of the people of that constituency. No one ventured to say in my presence that he was not an honourable and reputable citizen. The result of the election proved, considering the political forces he encountered, the high position he occupied in their esteem; and, in consequence, he has a seat in this House. I do not believe the statements made in the petition that sufficient grounds were disclosed for an application to this House to constitute itself a criminal tribunal—a Court of Appeal from the Commissioner sent down under the Statute of the Local Legislature to enquire into the municipal irregularities referred to. I think it would be degrading our position as the highest tribunal in the country to enter into an investigation of the conduct of a member who has not been found guilty of any offence by a Court of Justice which disqualifies him to sit among gentlemen or to represent a constituency. This Commission of enquiry into the Treasurer's accounts is merely a preliminary proceeding or enquiry. The report is not final. It is also ex parte. The charges are denied by the hon. member in his place in this House. He, of all others, is the man who has the best opportunity of knowing whether there is any foundation for them, and he solemnly denies that he has been guilty of any criminal offence. Moreover, we know that political partisanship has been disclosed in this matter. We know that, on the very face of the case as presented to us, the large deficiency could only have been arrived at by a mode of calculation inspired by the strongest political and partisan feeling. The plan was to assume—for they have not yet been established by proof—that certain deficits have occurred from year to year in the Treasurer's accounts. The Commissioner then proceeded to multiply and compute the interest so as to make up an enormous sum—so large that no official, unless through fraud, misappropriation or embezzlement, could have incurred such a deficit; but it has been discovered from the report of the Commissioner himself that the deficiencies only amount to a few thousand dollars altogether. And, when we know that Mr. Hooper gave sureties and that they are solvent, and that the amount that they guaranteed is enough to pay the whole deficit, we must admit that his friends have good right to complain that a very unfair advantage has been taken of the hon. member by bringing a local dispute into this House to damage and discredit his conduct and character, and, as far as possible to discredit also the political party to which he belongs. I very much regret that my hon. friend from East Elgin (Mr. Casey) has allowed himself to be made use of for the purpose of gratifying the personal enmity and political hostility of some parties who, I hope, are outside of this House. I think we ought to consider ourselves as honourable men till proved guilty by our own admission, or by a competent tribunal of some criminal offence. I do say that the statement of the hon. member for Lennox and Addington, in his place here, that he is not guilty of the offence with which he is charged in this informal manner, ought to be sufficient until he is found guilty by some Court of Justice. I shall oppose the reference of the petition.

PRIVATE BILLS PETITIONS.

EXTENSION OF TIME PROPOSED.

MR. ROBINSON: I beg leave to move, in accordance with the report of the Committee on Standing Orders, that the time of receiving petitions for Private Bills be extended twelve days. I may add that, judging from the sentiments expressed by members of the Committee, this will be the last application for extension.

MR. BLAKE: I do not know whether this requires the assent of more than one Standing Committee; but it appears to me that it is a breach of the system established two or three Sessions ago. If these petitions for Private Bills, which should have been presented long ago, are to be presented twelve days from to-day, the Bills cannot be efficiently considered in Committee at a time when the other business of the House must occupy the whole attention of members.

MR. ROBINSON: There is no doubt a great deal in what the hon. member for West Durham says; but I bring in this motion at the request of the Committee, who gave the matter due consideration. The rule is partly a dead letter as far as the public is concerned. Formerly it was the custom to print the rules of the House, and to notify the public in the different newspapers, such as the Mail and the Globe, in Ontario, and the Gazette and Herald, in the Province of Quebec. No such notice is now given by these or other newspapers; but the public have to learn the rules of this House through the Government Gazette, which, it is notorious, is not read by the public. The Committee were very loth, indeed, to ask for an extension of time, but they do so upon the very best consideration they could give to the question, and at the request of members of the House outside of the Committee.

MR. LANGEVIN: I think my hon. friend would do better to wait until tomorrow, and have a report from the Private Bills Committee, because this request should be made on the recommendation of the Committee.

MR. ROBINSON: It is recommended by the Committee of Standing Orders.

MR. ANGLIN: There is something more to consider. The Bills should be printed before the Session commences; and it would be necessary, if we extend the time further to present petitions at this late period, to extend also the time for printing Bills. The whole policy of the House, adopted very deliberately a few years ago, must be reversed.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria): That rule has been more honoured in the breach than in the observance. Practically the rule has undoubtedly become a dead letter. Bills have been received after the time fixed by that rule, commonly enough.

MR. BLAKE: I do not know by whose authority they have been received then.

MR. HOLTON: It will be in the memory of members of the last House that very great inconvenience arose from the practice of introducing Private Bills at a late period of the Session, under a suspension of the rules, and a Committee composed of some of the more experienced members of the House, familiar with the practice of the House, was struck to revise the rules. The hon. the leader of the present Government was on that Committee; and the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) was on that Committee. It was a strong Committee with reference to the subject with which they were charged. Well, Sir, that Committee reported, and certain changes in the rules were made with respect to Private Bills. For a year or two the argument was, "Let us have a little more time to educate the people into these rules. If we are too rigorous in enforcing them at first, public inconvenience may arise." Instead of becoming more rigorous with the lapse of time we regard these rules less and less, from year to year, until now they may be regarded as a dead letter, and we are remitted to the old state of things with the great inconvenience of having rules which are disregarded, and having to keep some people to the rules and exclude them from taking advantage of these delays, while others get the rules dispensed with and have their Bills introduced late in the Session. The whole evil of this is, that during the late days of the Session we are delayed by the consideration of Private Bills which might be received at an earlier part of the Session. Under the old system I was often astonished to find in the Statutes clauses in Private Bills seriously affecting public laws, to which our attention was not directed in their passage through the House. It was to prevent this that the new rules were adopted, and I very much regret that we are falling back to that loose practice, and perhaps to a worse state of things than ever. The leaders of the House ought to consider it their duty to see that these rules are either repealed or enforced. The evils are very great arising from the lax administration of these rules. I do not wish to object to this motion. It is an unamiable thing to thwart one's colleagues in their endeavour to get on with the Bills committed to their charge. I know that from experience. I do not desire to put these gen-tlomen to unnecessary trouble, but it is only by determining to enforce the rules of the House, which are conceived in the public interest, that we can get rid of the inconvenience. The Chairman of the Committee on Standing Orders would do well to get the concurrence of the Committee on Private Bills or the Committee on Banking. I think so much is required by the Rules of the House.

MR. LANGEVIN: Yes, the concurrence of one or more.

MR. ROBINSON: The Committee on Private Bills will meet to-morrow.

MR. HOLTON: Let it stand then until to-morrow.

MR. BLAKE: Would the hon. gentleman see whether it would not be possible to propose a more limited extension of time?

MR. ROBINSON: I will propose it to the Committee.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 53) Respecting the Credit Valley Railway Company.—(Mr. Haggart.)

Bill (No. 54) To incorporate the Canadiana Telegraph Company.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

Bill (No. 55) To amend the Act 40 Vic., cap. 72, intituled an Act respecting the Beaver and Toronto Mutual Fire Insurance Company.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

PUBLIC FUNCTIONARIES SALARIES REDUCTION BILL.

(Mr. Béchard.)

FIRST READING.

MR. BECHARD introduced a Bill to reduce the salaries and allowances of certain public functionaries and officers, and the indemnity to members of the Senate and House of Commons. He said: The object of this Bill is to secure economy in the Public Service. It proposes to reduce the Governor-General's salary to $35,000, but not to affect the salary of the present Governor-General. It will, if it becomes law, effect a reduction in the salaries of Ministers of the Crown, and a large number of other public officers. On the second reading of the Bill I will explain it more fully.

Bill read the first time.

HURON AND ONTARIO SHIP CANAL.

QUESTION.

MR. STRANGE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to recognise the importance to the Dominion of the construction of the Huron and Ontario Ship Canal; and if so, to what extent are they prepared to promote this public work.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The Government fully recognises the importance of the Huron and Ontario Ship Canal, but it is a work of such magnitude as to render it quite impossible for the Government to offer any aid to it at present.

MANITOBA PROVINCIAL BUILDINGS.

QUESTION.

MR. ROYAL enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to commence the Provincial Buildings this year in Manitoba, as promised in 1879 to the Ministerial delegation from that Province.

MR. LANGEVIN: It is the intention of the Government to ask for a vote of money for that purpose this year.

MANITOBA—EXTENSION OF LIMITS.

QUESTION.

MR. ROYAL enquired, Whether the Dominion Government proposes this year to extend the present limits of the Province of Manitoba, so as to include westward the establishment of the Little Saskatchewan, and eastward the undisputed belt of territory between the pretended western limit of Ontario and the existing eastern limit of Manitoba.

MR. LANGEVIN: It is not the intention of the Government to extend, this year, the present limits of the Province of Manitoba, and no action will be taken before the presentation of the report of the Committee now investigating the subject of the boundaries between the Province of Ontario and the Territories of the Dominion.

MANITOBA—EMIGRATION AGENT AT ST. BONIFACE.

QUESTION.

MR. ROYAL enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to appoint an Emigration Agent at St. Boniface to receive the emigrants and to give them the necessary information and assistance which the Provincial Government and private citizens had to afford during the last season.

MR. POPE (Compton): It is not the intention of the Government to have an agent at St. Boniface, but it is our intention immediately to erect a temporary bridge across the river so as to use the present sheds on the other side, and to erect an hospital there as soon as possible to give such accommodation as is needed. Heretofore, people sick with scarlet fever, measles and other contagious diseases, had to occupy the same sheds as the healthy. We hope to avoid this state of things in the future, and avoid the necessity for having them landed on the St. Boniface side of Red River.

RAILWAY STATISTICS.

REMARKS.

MR. FLEMING: I desire to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Railways to an Order of the House, which was issued last Session, asking for a return showing the number of persons employed on the 21st of December then preceding on the respective railways in the Dominion; also a return of all accidents which had occurred on the railways of the Dominion during the year 1878. Now, the return which has been brought down gives only the number of accidents which had occurred on the Intercolonial Railway and the Prince Edward Island Railways; no account whatever is given of the accidents which have occurred on the other railways of the Dominion, and no notice at all has been taken of that part of the order calling for the number of persons employed. It is very important to have these returns, in order that a comparison may be made between the number of persons employed in a particular service and the number of accidents that may have occurred in the prosecution of that work. I hope that the hon. Minister will see that complete returns are brought down.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I will make an enquiry and ascertain why the return has not been made as complete as was asked for.

MR. MACKENZIE: I would also like to ask whether the Government have determined to discontinue the Annual Railway Report, that was begun in 1876, and was issued for two or three years.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I think it will be found that it was issued last year. I know it was prepared, and I think I am safe in saying it was issued. It is in course of preparation for this year, and I expect to be able to lay it before the House at a not distant date. It is not quite complete for the present year, but it is complete for the last year. It is intended to continue it just as it was begun.

MR. MACKENZIE: It seems to me extremely important that we should have very careful statistics of the railway system, with a view to aiding in legislation in the future. I would much rather see the hon. gentleman extend the statistics than to curtail them. It will be of much benefit also to have a map accompanying the report. I think there was no map when the first one was issued. The map should show all the changes that have been made in the railway legislation of the Provinces as well as here.

(Mr. Colby.)

THIRD READING.

Bill read the third time and passed, on a division.

PREVENTION OF CRIME BILL.—[BILL 19.]

(Mr. Blake.)

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

Order for second reading read.

MR. BAKER: Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to offer any reflections upon the propriety or impropriety of permitting important legislation affecting the Criminal Law of the land to drift into the hands of private members of this House, however eminent they may be for intellectual power, for professional attainment, or Parliamentary experience. I merely propose, Sir, to offer a few remarks upon the merits of the Bill which is now presented for our consideration, and to assign one or two of the many reasons which, in my opinion, may be urged against its adoption, at all events in its present form. The Bill is based on the Imperial Statute 34 and 35 Vic., cap. 112. That Act was the natural outcome of the system which had been engrafted upon the Criminal Law of England under what were known as the Penal Servitude Acts. And whatever may be said about the wisdom of its adoption in England, it is certain that public opinion is very much divided there as to the efficacy of the Act in the prevention of crime. In this country it is to be remembered that a totally different state of society prevails. We fortunately know little of some of the worst evils engendered by an overcrowded population, and it may fairly be doubted whether the public mind is prepared for the introduction of the system of police supervision which forms one of the essential features of the Bill. It is a system which has the effect of closing the door against those who, having committed crimes, are disposed to return to a life of honesty. It is true that facilities for the detection of crime are powerful factors in its repression; but the certainty of punishment once imposed, is a factor far more important. It is essential that men who have committed grave crimes should know that punishment will follow conviction—that their sentence will be carried out, and that except under very exceptional circumstances it will not be in any wise relaxed. Now, looking at the returns accompanying the Reports of the Prison Inspectors, submitted to Parliament by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) while he was Minister of Justice, we find the startling fact that during the three years ending on the 31st of December, 1876, the Executive clemency was exercised no less than forty-five times. In five and forty instances a free pardon was granted to persons who had been convicted of grave crimes, and who had been sentenced to various terms of imprisonment in the penitentiary. The offences for which these persons were convicted and subsequently pardoned were as follows: Rape, fifteen; murder, three; manslaughter, seven; robbery, eight; burglary, twelve. This catalogue embraces most of the grave crimes, for the suppression and punishment of which the aid of Parliament is from time to time invoked. And yet we find, Sir, that during this period forty-five of these criminals, desperate in their character—if that character can be estimated from the nature of the offences for which they had been convicted—by the exercise of the Executive clemency, for which the hon. member (Mr. Blake) was himself largely responsible, were turned loose upon society. And this list, it is to be remembered, does not embrace the long line of cases in which, during the same period, the punishment of offences was relaxed by Executive interference, and the sentence of death commuted to imprisonment in the penitentiary for longer or shorter periods of time. By these Executive acts—by this Executive interference, if I may so speak, with the natural course of justice and its administration in Canada fresh courage was afforded to the criminal class, and a new impulse given to the commission of crime. Is it possible, Sir, that the hon. member (Mr. Blake) sees in the increase of crime to which he referred in introducing his Bill (and which curiously enough, embraces the period immediately following the events to which I have alluded, is it possible that he sees in this increase the natural if not the necessary result of this meddling Executive clemency, and that he now offers the present Bill as a propitiatory sacrifice to an outraged public opinion? If so, Sir, the offering is utterly inadequate. It purports to be a copy of the English Act, but it is simply a caricature. The worst features have been exaggerated and intensified to such a degree that I hope, and I believe, that this House will either reject the Bill altogether, or so modify and restrict its provisions in Committee as to make it in some degree tolerable, which, in its present form, it certainly is not. The first section provides for the registration of convicts, and the appointment of a Registrar; but there is no provision for the payment of such an official. The second provides for taking photographs of criminals; and here, too, no provision is found in the Bill for meeting the expense to be incurred. By the third section it is proposed to subject an offender, twice convicted of a crime (as defined by sec. 6), to imprisonment with or without hard labour, for a period not exceeding one year, if it appears to the Court that there are reasonable grounds for believing that he is getting his livelihood by "dishonest" means. This is certainly a very large and exceptional power, and it represents a principle hitherto unknown to our law. It proposes to arrest a man upon mere suspicion, and to place him at the mercy of the magistrate's caprice. It practically places every suspected man in the power of the constable and magistrates, who are left to determine, according to their own peculiar views of morality, what may be a dishonest means of living. Many a man of irreproachable honesty has been convicted twice of crime within the meaning of this Bill (for common assaults are included), without forfeiting in any degree the respect of his fellow-men. And to say that such men are to be subject to imprisonment upon suspicion, at the whim of the justices, is so absurd that I trust the House will not entertain the proposition for one moment. It is a power entirely too great and too arbitrary to be entrusted to the tribunals proposed to be invested with jurisdiction under the provisions of this Bill. Section 4 relates to the supervision by the police. I said that this Bill was a caricature of the English Act. So it is. The definition of the word crime, in the 6th section, creates a departure from the English Statute, and changes the whole scope and intent of the measure. It enlarges and extends its operation to the most trivial offences. There the measure was proposed and carried as an extension of the ticket-of-leave system, which required the licensee to report himself to the authorities as a matter of precaution and necessity. But it was limited to certain of the graver offences mentioned in the Statute—indictable offences—and the party to be subjected to supervision must be convicted “on indictment.” Here, however, it is insisted with all the solemnity which properly appertains to proceedings in Parliament, that a man, twice convicted of a common assault shall be liable to be placed under the supervision of the police for seven years. This would be an interference with the liberty of the subject, which seems intolerable, and to which, it is to be hoped, the House will not lend its sanction. We shall be told, and it is obvious, that this Bill is not promoted on behalf of criminals, but on behalf of the law-abiding portion of the community. Even so, it is an extension of our system which does not appear to me to be at this time called for. And I therefore move that this Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read the second time this day six months.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): The Bill introduced by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) contemplates a very serious change in the law of the country. It is a subject which I have reason to know the hon. gentleman has had ample opportunity to study, and I presume that the Bill he has laid before the House is the result of that great deliberation which so important a change in the law would require. In 1876, when he was Minister of Justice, a report was made to him by the Inspector of Penitentiaries for the Dominion, in which the main elements of the Bill before the House were suggested, though not in the exact form now presented. The hon. gentleman, therefore, had the ample opportunity of giving the subject his deliberate consideration, and it is to be regretted that in this Bill the results have not been more satisfactory. I do not say that, under certain circumstances, some of its provisions might not be beneficial in the administration of criminal justice in this country and I do not preclude myself, in the position I shall assume at present, from the consideration of the subjects at a future time. Until the hon. gentleman introduced his Bill, the expediency of introducing that element or feature of criminal procedure had not engaged my attention. Therefore, I am not in a position to speak as positively as to the probable operation of the measure as I otherwise should be. But, from the consideration I have been able to give to the subject, and from the reports made to me by those more directly connected with our Penitentiaries, the subordinate officials, who are more intimate with the operation of the law, I regret that I shall be obliged to ask the House to concur in the opinion of the hon. member for Missisquoi (Mr. Baker). I regret this extremely, because there is no man in the House disposed to entertain greater respect for the legal knowledge and the sound judgment of the hon. member who introduced this measure than I am; but I differ with him as to the propriety of its introduction at present. There are at least one or two features of it which should not be adopted without ample consideration; and there are many features that, while they might promote in some degree, if carefully considered, the objects in view, still might contribute very largely to the annoyance of the people and a partial administration of criminal justice without resulting in any benefit whatever to the general public. I will take up the provisions of the Bill seriatim, and state the reasons why I think it would be more prudent not to read it a second time, and why, instead of allowing it to go to a Committee, it would be better to leave it over until next Session before which the subject could be considered by the Government and hon. members, who would be able to take it up next Session better informed, not only as to the principles and details, but the probable operation of the Bill. I have some doubts as to the necessity of the clause requiring photographs of prisoners, inasmuch as it would appear, by virtue of the Act of 1875, 9th clause, that the Inspector of Penitentiaries might have it in his power, did he consider it necessary in the public interest and for the promotion of the due administration of justice to obtain that object. The following is the clause to which I refer:—

“9. The Inspector shall have power, and it shall be his duty to make rules and regulations for the management, discipline and police of the Penitentiaries, and for the duties and conduct of the Wardens thereof, and of every other officer or class of officers or servants employed therein; and for the diet, clothing, maintenance employment, instruction, discipline, correction, punishment and reward of convicts imprisoned therein, and to annul, alter or amend the same from time to time, subject to the approval of the Governor in Council, which rules and regulations so approved, the Wardens of the Penitentiaries, and every other officer and servant employed in or about the same, shall be bound to obey.”

Now, those words give very extensive powers to the Inspector of Penitentiaries, with respect to all rules he may consider desirable relative to the police and general management of our Penitentiaries, and therefore I think, if the powers already embraced in that clause are possessed, it is unnecessary. At any rate, I think that we should be very careful in giving the Governor in Council a power almost amounting to the crucifixion of those persons. The photograph of a person stamps him for ever throughout the world, wherever the likeness is sent, as a man to be regarded with distrust, and puts it out of his power at any time, even if he desires it, to restore himself to the position in society he has lost by his crime. We all know that not only occasionally, but in a great many instances, men by accident or irresistible temptation, or, at any rate, without the intention or desire to live criminal lives, fall into the category which would be embraced under this Bill; and, while habitual criminals should be particularly guarded against and repressed and punished, and every facility afforded for the detection of fresh crime, still the reclaimable class should not, by the operation of such laws as this, be driven to desperation and into courses which, under other treatment, they would not adopt. The registry of criminals may be desirable; but, in all prisons and Penitentiaries, a registry is now kept from which information with reference to the crime, its character and nature, the residence of the offenders and statistics of that kind can be obtained. This description of the criminals, their physical appearance, character, etc., is taken with the object of affording every facility for their detection. Now the main difficulty of the Bill is the stringency of its provisions with reference to police supervision. Our position is very different from that of the English people, or the inhabitants of any Continental country. In the large cities abroad, criminals gather in large numbers, and form, from long association, a distinct class, and, as soon as they are discharged from prison, they resort to their old haunts, and resume their criminal courses. Though this evil may to some extent exist here also, from the nature of our country and social circumstances, it can but exist to a limited extent. The Bill would extend the police supervision over the rural districts also. The Superintendent of Penitentiaries, in the report I have in my hands, gives it as his opinion that its extension to the rural districts would be very inhuman, and would largely prevent persons convicted of less aggravated offences from rehabilitating themselves in the eyes of the community and returning to moral and honest lives. From the 3rd section and sub-section of the Bill, the House will see what a sweeping measure it is, and how comprehensively it embraces not only the hardened criminals but those even whom the Judges characterise as persons only deserving of imprisonment in the common jail. I desire the careful attention of the House to the latitude given to the constables, a class not in all cases to be trusted with such power, even over the class to which the Act would apply. I do not say that, in so far as the habitually criminal class are affected, some provision, carefully guarded, would not be beneficial; but under this Bill any person convicted of crime, on being charged by a constable with getting his livelihood by dishonest means, or appearing to do so, would be brought within the scope of the law. The language, besides, is vague. Who is to try him—an ordinary Magistrate, or the Court that convicted him, or a Court of Inferior Jurisdiction? To give a mere constable of an ordinary municipality on the pretence of a suspicion, who may desire to blast the prospects of a man whom he dislikes, the power prescribed in the Bill appears perilous and unwise. In England, Ireland or on the Continent, where the police force is thoroughly organised and closely superintended by the Government or Commissioners, great authority might perhaps be entrusted to a member of the body in the way here proposed; but matters are very different in this country. The Act could be abused in the most serious way. A constable, meeting a man in a country lane, might say: "I suspect you of being a convicted felon; you are subject to this Act, and I will take you before the Court;" and, if the person refused to give his address, there would be no way of his escaping the punishment prescribed. An innocent man might have his name published as having been arrested by a constable, charged with being a criminal, and be obliged to be at the trouble and expense to prove his innocence. The 2nd clause would give a jurisdiction so large as to make it worth while to consider gravely the result or the effect of the law before passing it. The observations I have already made apply to that. If it were made applicable only to classes in the cities living habitually in crime, and we had the means of carrying the law into execution, I do not know that the provision might not be acceptable. But, as the Bill stands now, I do not think it would be acceptable to the general public, and, so far as I have been able to learn the sentiments of this House, it is not acceptable to this House. Therefore, I would have preferred to ask the hon. gentleman to let the Bill stand, but, as it is in the discharge of the duty I owe to this House, I shall have to ask the House to concur in the motion of the hon. member for Missisquoi.

MR. BLAKE: I cannot quite understand the hon. the Minister of Justice entertaining the views he expresses upon the motion of the hon. member for Missisquoi (Mr. Baker). I do not propose to enter upon a discussion of the mode in which the Executive clemency was exercised under my advice, while I was responsible for that difficult and delicate branch of the administration of justice. I shall only say, that in advising the exercise of the prerogative, I acted to the best of my ability upon the principles upon which my predecessors had acted; and my belief is that it would be found on examination that that prerogative was exercised upon those principles and with much the same results. The hon. member for Missisquoi asserts that the Bill is intolerable, and that it is out of the question that we should create any such infringement of the liberty of the subject as here proposed. I am free to admit that there is a certain class of the population, too numerous I regret to say, to whom this Bill is very obnoxious, and I am sorry to think that they have so large a number of supporters and admirers in this House, as is indicated by its present temper. In moving the introduction of the Bill, I confined myself to the statistics then available, namely, the Penitentiary Statistics. My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture has been good enough to send me an advance copy of the General Criminal Statistics, to which I then referred, and I find that the increase of crime throughout the community is even more startling than I supposed. In 1876, there were no less than 28,000 convictions; in 1877, there were 30,000; and in 1878, the last year embraced in the returns, the number of convictions reached 33,000. A very large proportion, of course, of these convictions is for minor offences. It will be found that the number of persons who were proved to have been convicted in these years, twice or oftener, is so ridiculously small that the importance of providing some further machinery for recognition of old convicts, anterior to their trial for a second offence, would be demonstrated by looking at these figures. The objection taken to the operation of the Bill on persons who have been once, or more than once, convicted, I do not regard as very cogent. The hon. member says that persons of irreproachable moral character may come under the operations of this Bill, inasmuch as such persons may retain their character in the community although they have been twice convicted and sentenced to the jail. I do not propose to speak for Missisquoi, but in that portion of the country which I represent a person would suffer under no inconsiderable stigma in the community from having been even once, and still more from having been twice convicted, even of such a crime as assault. With reference to the remarks of the hon. the Minister of Justice, he does not commit himself against the principle of the Bill. He says he holds himself entirely free to agree with many of its important provisions at some future time. His objections are not such as should prevent the measure from receiving a further stage, because they are objections wholly to the details. He objects that some of the clauses are too wide and insufficiently guarded in reference to the class of persons to whom they are to apply. In some of these objections there is some force, though I do not agree with the criticism, but if desirable the clauses can easily be changed and improved in Committee in the direction indicated, without at all interfering with the principles of the Bill. Now the first provision of the Bill is a very important one. It secures a better identification of criminals. He takes exception to these clauses on the ground that the Penitentiary Act and rules sufficiently provide for the case. But he has not sufficiently considered the question. These clauses might be applied to a very large proportion of the 30,000 odd convictions that occurred last year, out of which there will not have been more than a few scores or hundreds of convictions to the penitentiary. This Bill is not confined to penitentiaries. Its object is to obtain means of recognising, not merely those who have been sentenced to a penitentiary, but those who have commenced a career of crime; to obtain, at the earliest possible moment, a register of the particulars of those who shall have been convicted and sentenced to the common jails as well as the penitentiaries. What we want is that there should be material for knowing whether a person coming up for trial is one who has fallen for the first time from the path of virtue, or whether he has been convicted before. We all know that hardened criminals take care to be tried, as a rule, by the Judge, under the Summary Jurisdiction Act; because but a short time elapses before their trial; because the trial takes place without the publicity that would attend an assize, and because they come up and are sentenced under an alias. By this means they are able to escape the severer punishment which Judges should give, and which the interests of society demand should be given to habitual criminals. The observations I have made with reference to registers apply to photographs. The second clause of the Bill provides for photographing, under the directions of the Governor in Council, of persons sentenced to the jails or penitentiaries, or of any class of persons he chooses to be ordered to be photographed. If it is thought that every person sentenced to jail should not be photographed, it is quite competent for the Governor in Council, or the Parliament, to provide that only those sentenced for the more serious classes of crime be taken. The hon. gentleman suggests that photographing would prevent the criminal who has once fallen from going back to the path of virtue. But this photograph is not for publication in a comic paper. It is not for publication in any way or sense. It is simply and solely for the use of those whose business it is to protect society against the habitual criminal, in order that if he comes again within the hands of the officers of the law they may be able to ascertain whether he is an old hand or one fresh at the business. I have received two letters since the Bill was introduced, one from a gentleman who has had a large experience on the Bench and at the Bar. He says that for twenty years he has been wishing for a movement of this kind. He says old and hardened criminals object to being photographed more than any other thing, not because of its degradation, but because it gives greater facility than anything else to the recognition of old criminals coming again under the operation of the law. I do not know that we ought, at the expense of honest men, to consider the finer feelings of this class of society and to subject ourselves to their depredations because, forsooth, they do not like to be placed in the rogues gallery. The hon. gentleman objects to clause 3, on the ground that it creates a new crime. He says that the result of sub-section A, is that an innocent person charged by a constable would have to prove his innocence. This section applies only to persons who have been once convicted; but if it is thought that it should only apply to prior convictions for certain classes of crime, nothing can be easier than to make the amendment.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) : I think the hon. gentleman has misapprehended me. He has stated that I said a new class of crime was created by the third clause. What I said was that it was creating a new crime without giving the person charged an adequate opportunity of protecting himself.

MR. BLAKE : I do not know what the hon. gentleman calls "an adequate opportunity of protecting himself." Are we to wait until our persons are assaulted, our purses stolen, or our houses robbed, before we deal with individuals who have been already proved to belong to the criminal classes? The hon. gentleman has made a general observation with regard to the Court that is to try these cases, but that is a matter of detail I think satisfactorily disposed of, but at any rate perfectly easy of settlement. Under sub-section A of clause 3, when you find a man who has been already proved to be guilty of crime, and you have reasonable grounds for believing that he is getting his livelihood by dishonest means, you do not want to wait until he can be proved to have actually repeated the crime. If there are reasonable grounds for believing he is getting his livelihood by dishonest means he should be liable to judgment. So with reference to giving a false name and address by a person who has been once convicted. I confess I can see no reason for this excessive tenderness towards the criminal classes of the population. The statistics indicate that the tide of crime is on the rise. We have no ground for congratulating ourselves in reference to the moral condition of the country, and some repressive step is required to prevent the further increase of the evil, growing so rapidly as it is, in the large cities more particularly. To the third clause, as to police supervision, the hon. gentleman took his chief objection; but even as to that he said that if it were applied more prudently with reference to persons living in the cities who had been committed for the graver classes of crime, it would not be objectionable. If so it is extremely easy to amend that clause. This provision is not a provision that follows a first conviction. It is not a provision that follows even upon a second conviction. It is discretionary with the Court, after one conviction has been followed by a second conviction, to add a sentence of police supervision, for such term as the Court thinks proper. The man must have been subjected to imprisonment on two prior convictions, and after that he must be, in the opinion of the Court, a fit subject for police supervision before he can be subjected to it. Police supervision may be for a year, or for any term not exceeding seven years. Those who live in the larger cities of this country, and know something of the mode in which police business is carried on, will recognise the importance of this provision. It is said that it would not do for the country places. I think it would; but it is easy to modify the clauses to meet the views of the Minister of Justice in that particular; and I cannot see why the Bill should not be allowed to be read a second time and referred to a Select Committee. I understood the hon. Minister, when a Bill was introduced the other day by my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), to say that he disapproved of every one of the provisions of that Bill, but still he said it might go to a second reading and be referred to a Select Committee. Now he approves of some of the chief provisions of this Bill, and yet he thinks it should not be read or referred to a Select Committee. In introducing the Bill I stated that the proposed reforms ought, in my opinion, to take place, and I am still strongly impressed with the wisdom of that view. I added that while I did not think any member should be debarred from introducing and submitting for discussion any reforms in the Criminal Law of this country, I was persuaded of the importance of the responsibility of the Government being engaged for changes extending over so large an area, so many different Civil Laws and social customs; and while I think the hon. gentleman might well have permitted this Bill to go further, if he adheres to his view that it must receive a different and more summary treatment than was accorded to the Bill of the hon. member for Hamilton the other day, I shall certainly not trouble this House, constituted as it now is, with a division.

Mr. PLUMB: I was not at all surprised to see the feeling manifested in this House in regard to this Bill; and I do not think the hon. gentleman who has brought in this Bill has quite the right to say, in a sarcastic manner, that there are so many friends and sympathisers with the criminal classes on this side of the House. I heard, once in my life, that there was a certain solicitor who was so uncertain of himself that he did not dare to make out a bill of costs, for fear of overcharging, but always gave the items and got the taxing-master to put in the figures, for, if he attempted to make the charges himself, his avidity was sure to lead him into trouble. My hon. friend has introduced a Bill containing many acceptable clauses, if he had not overriden them with the severity which has characterised all the criminal legislation that he has brought before the House. He says that there are convictions to the number of 30,000, of which about 1,200 only are penitentiary cases. Yet he wishes to make the Bill under consideration so stringent as to apply, not only to convicts who are sentenced to the penitentiary, but to any unfortunate person who may, by accident or temptation, happen to fall into crime. He proposes that the accidental misdemeanant shall be treated like an habitual criminal. Nothing could be more conducive to the increase of crime than this unchristian severity. He says these offenders are on the way to become habitual criminals, and this Bill is intended to stop them on the threshold. It would not be conducive to the public good to adopt such a system as has been adopted lately in the Biddulph tragedy, where we see the most atrocious representations of persons supposed to be connected with the murder and arson, paraded under sensational headings in the daily newspapers; but who, after the whole matter has been made the subject of an inquest, have not been held to trial. I object very strongly to that clause—which places in the hands of the village constable the power to lay hands on any person he pleases in his wisdom to suspect.

MR. BLAKE.

I say that is a kind of discretion similar to what we read of as having been given to the watchman by the immortal Dogberry and his intelligent confrere Verges, in Much Ado about Nothing. Dogberry asks: "Who think you the most desertless man to be constable," and charges him thus:

"You are thought to be the most senseless and fit man to be constable of the watch. This is your charge: you shall comprehend all vagrom men; you are to bid any man stand in the Prince's name.

"How if he will not stand?"

"Dogberry—Why, then, take no note of him, but let him go; and presently call the rest of the watch together, and thank God you are rid of a knave.

"Verges—If he will not stand when he is bidden, he is none of the Prince's subjects.

"Dogberry—True, and they are to meddle with none but the Prince's subjects. If you meet a thief you may suspect him, by virtue of your office, to be no true man; and, for such kind of men, the less you meddle or make with them, why, the more is for your honesty.

"Watch—If we know him to be a thief, shall we not lay hands on him?"

"Dogberry—Truly, by your office, you may; but I think they that touch pitch will be defiled. The most peaceable way for you, if you do take a thief, is to let him show himself what he is, and to steal out of your company."

The constables make an arrest, of course, and honest Dogberry and Verges and the Sexton examine the prisoners:

"Dogberry—Is our whole dissembly appeared?"

"Sexton—Which be the malefactors?"

"Dogberry—Marry, that am I and my partner."

The same sort of intelligence will still be found among some of the magistracy and constabulary of our rural districts, and I should be sorry for any person who, after such legislation as this, should happen to fall into the hands of the ordinary village constable. Why, it is not long since it was stated in the London papers that the Metropolitan Police—a picked body of men, supposed to be of superior intelligence—arrested an unfortunate man attacked by apoplexy, which was supposed to be something attributable to alcoholic stimulants, locked him up through the night without medical attendance, and the gravest consequences ensued. My hon. friend proposes to leave the operation of the law to the discretion of the humblest official known to the law except the Court-crier. It will operate against any man whom a constable takes it into his head to bring a charge of "having no visible means of support," provided the rural Dogberry chooses to favour the views of his servitor. I think that clause is one which should warn this House against the whole Bill. Every man is interested in a law of this kind. Every man, whether lawyer or not, is competent to judge upon it; every member is responsible for the laws passed in this House, and is therefore called upon to weigh them carefully, no matter by what high authority introduced, although he may become the object of the bitter sarcasm with which the hon. gentleman from West Durham (Mr. Blake) lashes anyone who ventures to question the infallibility of his judgment. The hon. gentleman asks for the postponement of our final judgment upon the Bill. He condescends to say that he will consent to its very natural modification, but I think a gentleman of such vast legal experience, such great acumen, and such acknowledged skill as is conceded to him in matters of this kind, should not have given us a Bill that could elicit such unfavourable criticism as that with which this Bill has been met. He should have given its clauses mature consideration, determined that they were right, and then should have been fully prepared to stand by them in every particular, and should never have suggested an attempt to reconstruct it. There was no necessity for such hasty legislation. As to photographing criminals, he tells us that the photographs are to be kept in the prison, but they are useless unless they can be published to the world; and publicity may be the means of preventing many a man who has repented of his crime from going back into respectable society. We know how many a man has tried to screen himself somewhere away from the scene of his transgressions under another name. He must not be blamed for the attempt thus to hide his shame; to lead a new life of honest labour. In this Bill it is provided that such a praiseworthy effort is criminal, and that he shall not escape recognition. There was a society in the United States, at the head of which was a gentleman of the most philanthropic views; a society devoted to the procuring of employment for convicts who came out of prison disowned by the world, strangers, friendless and shunned.

This gentleman himself told me many touching stories of those who, in their discharge from confinement, desired to lead honest lives, but who, on account of the stigma fastened upon them, could not escape, but were forced back into their evil ways. They deserve our sympathy as much as the hardened class of criminals deserve severe legislation. I would rather that fifty men should escape than one such unfortunate man should suffer under a law like this, which I can only characterise as evincing almost unchristian severity, although I know it is not the intention of the hon. member who drew it to err on the side of harshness; but I think the hon. gentleman has allowed his intense antipathy to crime to carry him too far. It has carried him to the point which renders it the duty of this House to refuse to deal further with this Bill than to mark its strong disapproval of it as a whole, and I hope the motion of my hon. friend from Missisquoi (Mr. Baker) will be received and accepted by a large majority if it should be deemed necessary to demand a vote upon it.

MR. MOUSSEAU: I must take exception to the views of the hon. member for West Durham. He said it is very important, when a prisoner is under trial, that it should be known to the Court whether it is his first, or his second, or his third offence, and that the only means of securing that knowledge would be the registers of the Court. I think that is a measure which is entirely useless, which would necessitate the providing of new machinery, and entail expenses which the country cannot afford. If these registers were kept, they would, of course, be necessarily public. What would be the result? It would be this: when the trial would take place, a great many jurors would know that the prisoner had been previously convicted of an offence. Now, everybody knows that the Crown has no right to let it be known that a prisoner has been tried or convicted before. The necessity and usefulness of that knowledge comes after the verdict of the jury. The Judge must know if the offence is the first, or the second, or the third, in order to fix the punishment to be dealt out to the hardened criminal. But that knowledge, in the Province of Quebec, is within the reach of all the Courts, so that, when a prisoner is under trial, it is well known whether he is being tried the first, or the second, or the third time, or whether he has been convicted one, two, or three times; and if the prisoner comes from another district, the Courts can get the antecedents of the prisoner from the other district. I contend that this provision, which is the chief matter of the measure, is entirely useless. It involves principles higher than mere procedure, and opens the way to another argument, another branch of reasoning. The practical result of the Bill will be to make all the convicts of this country a special class, designated to public opprobrium. Now, I say that our community is too small to take that view of convicts yet. Our convicts, thank God, do not form, as in Paris and London, that degraded class who offer no hope of a return to virtue, to usefulness, and to the practice of a christian civilisation. We are not far advanced enough in this country to disdain to extend the hand of mercy and charity to our convicts. These are, I think, good and sufficient reasons why we should not let this Bill go to its second reading. I do not reproach the hon. member for West Durham for entertaining those ideas he has embodied in this Bill; they are very lofty, as were the ideas of his Aurora speech and some others. They are like the standard of political morality which was raised by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), so high that we cannot see them.

MR. ROYAL: I believe it is my duty to say a few words in connection with the impracticability of this measure in the unorganised Territories of Keewatin and the North-West and perhaps to a certain extent in Manitoba. There is no doubt that we have unfortunately in that region of country the leading element with which this Bill deals, that is to say: the crime and the criminals, but there are very few photographic establishments and very little police. The registration of criminals, I believe, is a sound principle, and if carried out, even to the extent contemplated by the hon. gentleman's Bill, will certainly do a great deal of good. With respect to photographing criminals, we must take into consideration the possibility of this provision as well as the other intrinsic merits of the Bill. Has the hon. gentleman ever considered the enormous additional expenses that his measure would necessitate in the North-West and British Columbia? In Keewatin, for instance, I am not aware that there is one photographic establishment. There are no Sheriffs in Keewatin. So far as the law is administered in that Territory, it is done by three or four constables. In Manitoba the organisation is more complete, and I suppose that in that respect the provisions might, with a considerable additional expense, be carried out. But there is only one Sheriff for the whole North-West Territory. We have a few police posts in the southern parts of that Territory; but, supposing, as the hon. gentleman says, that it may be discretionary with the Judge to impose police supervision, yet this discretionary power would be of no avail, because it would be impossible for a Judge to establish such a supervision in that Territory. Therefore, though we possess one element of the Bill, the criminals, we are badly wanting in the two other elements, which are generally only to be found in older and more civilised communities. Now, the measure may be very good when applied to a very advanced, civilised community, and to large cities, but, when the hon. gentleman includes Manitoba, Keewatin and the North-West Territories and British Columbia in the scope of his Bill, I think he cannot have taken into consideration the exceptional circumstances of that immense and interesting region. With regard to the punishment to be inflicted on persons convicted of crime, it strikes me that sending a man twice convicted to jail for a year, simply because he is found in suspicious circumstances, is not giving him the benefit of the doubt to which criminals are entitled, and shakes the basis of our Criminal Law. How can you reasonably expect the reformation of the criminal and his restoration to honest life if you stamp him as an outcast, however small may have been his crime? Laws will never make men moral and honest; their object is to protect life and property, and to punish, with a view to the reformation of the convict, in most cases. I do not intend to enter into a criticism of the principle of the Bill. I have tried to show the hon. gentleman that his Bill, as regards a large portion of Canada, is impracticable. If the whole

MR. MOUSSEAU.

Bill was to be applied to Canada, it would be five or six years before we should have in the North-West the necessary machinery for putting it into operation.

MR. HOLTON: I wish only to say a very few words, because I really feel, not only incompetent, but very unwilling to engage in a discussion of a measure of this kind, which has engaged so much of the attention of the legal members of the House. But I must say that I think the proposal to reject the Bill altogether is not a proposal that ought to meet with the favour of this House. I think we must all admit that the object of the Bill is a good one; I think we must all admit that some of its provisions are useful, and would meet with the approval of the House if the Bill were considered in detail by its clauses. But there are clauses in the Bill which I should feel great reluctance in voting for, so great as perhaps to lead me to vote against the Bill on the third reading, if it should come back with those clauses. The 3rd section and sub-sections, for instance, not to go any further, do embody principles which are at variance with those principles which I have been educated in, and have been long accustomed to consider as sacred. I think, therefore, that the Bill ought to receive its second reading, and ought to be sent to a Select Committee, and ought to be carefully considered in its various clauses, and be really disposed of on its merits. It is poor encouragement to distinguished members of the legal profession in coming to occupy positions in this House, who bring to the consideration of measures of this kind the high ability and experience which they possess, in submitting measures of this kind to the House, to have them rejected contumeliously, in point of fact, as the six months' hoist undoubtedly does. I happened to hear the other night, not following these discussions, perhaps, as closely as I might, the hon. the Minister of Justice discuss all the clauses of a Bill proposed by an hon. gentleman sitting on the other side of the House, and condemn most of them, I believe.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): Not all of them.

MR. HOLTON: The essential features of the Bill, at all events, and yet considering it only courteous to the mover of that Bill to keep it alive to receive the further consideration of its details. Now, I think the same courtesy ought to be extended to the mover of this Bill. The object, as I stated before, is unquestionably good; no one will deny that. Some clauses of the Bill are, I am quite sure, acceptable to the majority of the members of this House, and because there are clauses which are objectionable to many, clauses which are objectionable to myself, I have no hesitation in avowing, ought we to reject the Bill altogether and put it out of the power of the House to consider the subject, to amend the Bill in its defective features, if the final judgment of the House should be that these features are defective; I say, is that the course we ought to pursue? I think not. I shall therefore, for myself, feel constrained to vote against the motion to reject the Bill altogether. I believe that that is the fair-minded, I may say the usual, course in relation to Bills of this kind.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell): There is no doubt that the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Chateaugay (Mr. Holton) as a general principle are correct, and that it is not desirable to reject measures on their second reading where there is anything in the principle of the measure which meets with approval; and that measures such as this, introduced by a distinguished member of the House, ought, as a rule, to go to the further stages and be considered as to their details. But it seems to me that the principle of the particular Bill which we are now discussing is essentially a bad principle, as far as I may be permitted to express an opinion upon it as a layman. What is the principle of the Bill? It is simply this: that every man who has been convicted twice shall have the mark of Cain upon him for all his life, as a person unfit to mix in respectable society, be under police supervision, be in fact so stamped as to render his recovery from crime impossible. No amount of modification of the details can alter that principle of the Bill. Therefore it seems to me that, in dealing with this measure as proposed by the hon. gentleman from Missisquoi (Mr. Baker), we are not controverting the principle laid down by the hon. member for Chateaugay, for it is the principle of the Bill itself that we are discussing on the motion for its second reading, and we are rejecting the second reading on the ground that its principle does not meet with the approbation of the House. The hon. member from Chateauguay himself admits there are details in the Bill which he cannot approve. I say nothing in regard to the registration of criminals, or to the photographing of criminals, both of which are provided for sufficiently under the law as it stands to-day. Therefore there is no special necessity for an amendment to the law in that respect. As a matter of fact, it would be a great misfortune for every person who is convicted twice of common assault to be placed, as the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) put it, in the rogues' gallery, and be registered for all time afterwards as a criminal. We all know that gentlemen are sometimes convicted of common assaults under circumstances that ought not certainly to degrade them in any way, or send them to be pilloried as criminals in society. I venture to say that most of the members of this House can recollect cases where men in high position in this very city have only escaped from being brought before the Police Court for common assault by the efforts of friends, who effected an amicable settlement. The other day, in Montreal, what did we see? A man who was engaged in a mercantile agency business, a sort of registration of people who do not pay their debts, went into the place of a respectable business man and asked some question, when the proprietor of the place ordered him out, accompanying the request with an exercise of physical force. He was brought up before the Police Court and was fined, although the Police Magistrate assumed that the agency man was improperly there, but was not allowed sufficient time to leave the premises before the application of force, and therefore the accused was fined eight dollars for common assault. Suppose this person had gone in the next day and had been treated the same way, and this gentleman was brought up and fined again for common assault, is he to have his photograph taken and to be registered as a criminal, his name sent from one end of the Dominion to the other, and wherever he goes to be under police supervision, for this would be the effect of the hon. gentleman's Bill? That is the principle of the Bill there is nothing else in it. Now, I will ask this hon. House whether a Bill of that kind, even though it be introduced by so distinguished a member, is entitled to any other courtesy than that of being accorded a six months' hoist?

MR. ANGLIN: I presume no measure introduced by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) is regarded as entitled to any courtesy by members on the other side of the House. The principle of this Bill has not been correctly stated by the hon. member who has just sat down. The principle is that means shall be taken to render the perversity and obstinacy of criminals less dangerous than at present to the well-disposed and peaceable inhabitants of this country. I think the provisions of the Bill, based upon the assumption that that end may be attained by rendering persons of that class subject to police supervision, under certain circumstances, good in a way. But that is entirely a matter of detail. It would, however, be perfectly absurd that any person, whether called a gentleman or not, who has been guilty of assault once or twice, should have his photograph taken and placed in the rogues' gallery, and be made liable to the penalty of being regarded as a suspicious character. In the city of St John we have in our police law provisions similar to those which really enter into the formation of this Bill. Policemen are authorised to arrest any one of suspicious character found prowling around the streets during the night. This to some extent protects the property, and perhaps the persons, of the peaceably inclined inhabitants. This Bill would perhaps carry the principle much further. But there is ample scope for the discussion of this measure, and if it should pass at all I think it should be in a modified shape, for many persons differ as to the precise point to which a criminal should arrive before he is liable to have his photograph placed in the rogue's gallery. But I simply arose to put this case fairly before the House. Hon. gentlemen on the other side may agree with the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) when he said the Bill should not be treated ignominiously. I see no ignominy in the matter at all. The hon. the Minister of Justice, who is more especially responsible for the state of the Criminal Law in this country, has chosen to say that he has not had time to enquire into the provisions of this measure, or satisfy himself as to the manner in which it would operate—that, in fact, he does not regard it with any great favour, and must ask the House to support the amendment for the reading of the Bill this day six months. The hon. member for West Durham has said he will not ask the House to divide on the question. I think it would be well to allow the whole responsibility in regard to this question to rest on the hon. the Minister of Justice and his colleagues.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): I must express regret that the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) should have thought it desirable to insinuate that the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), in dealing with this Bill, has been treated by the House in any way different from the course adopted towards the Bill of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson). The two Bills stood on different grounds. There was one part of my hon. friend's Bill in amendment of the Act which I thought the House might look at with some favour; and I think I stated what ought to be satisfactory to the hon. member for West Durham himself, that I had not had time to give that attention to this measure which, if it went into Committee, would enable us to meet the sentiments of the House. If I recollect aright, my hon. friend some days ago took the liberty to move the six month's hoist to a measure introduced by a supporter of the Government, and to-day we find a friend of the Government, as he had a perfect right to do as an independent member, adopting the same course towards the hon. member.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex): I am sorry that the Government, instead of disposing of the Bill in a summary way, did not move its reference to a Select Committee, in order that the question might be dealt with in a more comprehensive manner. The House is aware that we have much to do with the criminal legislation of the country, and I understand that the object of the Bill is to do something in the way of legislation to reduce a large amount of the crime of the country. Anyone who has read the statistics of crime must be aware that there has been an alarming increase in crime. The reports show that in 1876

there were 27,000 convictions, and 33,000 in 1878, or an increase of about 20 per cent. in three years. If this matter were relegated to a Special Committee to examine keepers of Penitentiaries and others versed in the subject, I think important information would be elicited. My hon. friend from Cardwell (Mr. White) seems to think that the Bill is aimed particularly at the criminal population. There are two parties to be considered, those criminal in the eyes of the law, and those not criminals, and the object of the Bill is to protect those who are living a virtuous life, as I suppose my hon. friend is. Any legislation that would not necessarily be inhumane in the treatment of criminals and would tend to protect society against the alarming increase of crime would be a boon to the country and one of the most important questions with which this House could deal. I am sorry that the hon. the Minister of Justice did not avail himself of this opportunity to appoint a Committee to consider this whole subject in order that at some future period we might effect some legislation on this important matter. I am sure that a Committee could be found in this House who would give their whole attention to this question, and present their views as to how this alarming increase of crime can be counteracted.

MR. BUNSTER: It was with considerable alarm that I heard the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McInnes) state that crime is on the increase in this country. I can deny the statement as far as the country from which I come is concerned. It is not very creditable to the Dominion that such a statement should go forth to the world. For my part I take a different view of the question. If I had not the Bill before me, I would have been much astonished if any one had told me that the late Minister of Justice had introduced it, especially when I took into consideration the kindness with which he acted towards the criminals convicted before Judge and jury. When my hon. friend was in office, he pardoned a number of criminals who had been convicted of the most outrageous offences. I believe altogether he pardoned twelve persons who had been convicted of the crime of murder. He must have considered the criminals in question unjustly or harshly condemned, or he would not have pardoned them. For him to bring in any such Bill as this is more than I could have believed he would attempt to do. I believe the six months' "hoist" is desirable in the interests of the country. I not think it desirable that we should publish to the world at large that crime is on the increase in this country. We all know that in this part of the Dominion there has been considerable crime, and a newspaper called the Globe has taken the liberty of publishing the photographs of some of the supposed criminals, and that paper may have to stand an action for damages. It is not very creditable for such a flagrant act of injustice to this country that wood-cuts like those in the Globe should be published to the world, exhibiting the features, or supposed features, of persons, all of whom might be entirely innocent of the crime imputed to them. Then the expense this Bill would entail would be immense. The taking of those photographs will add not a little to our taxation. Then again it will be injurious to a son if the portrait of his father goes down to posterity as a criminal. I, for one, would give this Bill the twelve months' "hoist" if I had my way, were I not satisfied that this House will give it as good a "hoist" as the country gave the late Government on the 17th September, 1878.

After Recess.

MR. CASGRAIN: I think that this subject is of such importance as to warrant the sending of it to a Committee, not only on account of its actual merits, but of the amendments that might be made to it. I understand that the hon. the Minister of Justice, not having had time to take the matter into his own hands, feels rather reluctant to assume the responsibility of the Bill this Session, to carry it through properly. But, even should the measure go before a Committee, and remain imperfect, there are so many amendments required by the Criminal Law, some of which could be effected at once, that I have no doubt this Bill could be amended with great advantage to the people. I think the hon. the Minister of Justice ought, between this and next Session, to find time to examine the Criminal Laws, with a view to getting them codified as is being done in England. The subject demands consideration from the need of remedying the delays experienced in the administration of justice. Our laws are hastily made, and lawyers of ability can find technicalities which can be made to impress the minds of the Judges. The law is not clear enough, and a Judge, feeling diffident, often refers an interpretation to a quorum of the whole Bench. The Criminal Law especially ought to be well known and well defined, in which case we should not see, as we so often do now, great miscarriages of the law of justice. If our laws were made perfectly clear and distinct, they would be more useful in preventing crime, which, instead of furnishing it, is their prime object. At present old offenders often escape, whilst they should remain under the surveillance of the police. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) made what he considers, but what I do not, a joke on this subject. Take the case of an attempt to murder, the offender escaping, or even getting a few years' imprisonment; a second attempt is made by him, and let me suppose he is found under my bed at night. I ought to have a right to blow his brains out. Under the Bill of the hon. member for West Durham, a constable could, on his own deposition, have that offender arrested and punished at once. I do not see why that sort of trial would not, in this instance, be as good as a new trial before a jury. I regret that the Bill, with such an important provision, is not allowed to go to Committee, where it might receive valuable amendment, and this, notwithstanding some features that may appear arbitrary at first sight, particularly as we all agree that its principle of bringing old offenders to speedy justice, is sound and desirable. I hope the hon. the Minister of Justice will bring forward a similar measure next Session.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron): I do not care about prolonging this discussion, and would not have said anything at present on the Bill before the House but for some observations that fell from the hon. the Minister of Justice, and some remarks made by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), neither of whom know much about the Bill, to judge from their observations, and especially those of the hon. member for Cardwell. These hon.

gentlemen, judging by their line of criticism, both appear utterly ignorant of the provisions and principles of the measure. The hon. the Minister of Justice had the candour and honesty to admit his ignorance of the Bill. He stated that he had not time to consider its provisions, and that he was not able to say whether, in its present shape, it should become law. He approved of some of its provisions, as he understood them, and objected to others. The hon. member for Cardwell, however, wanted no time to consider the Bill. He had no doubt about its obnoxious provisions. His mind was made up. He, a layman, ignorant of legal principles and of the practice and procedure of Criminal Law, was deterred by his modesty from pronouncing against the Bill. He was not at all afraid to step in where the angel (the hon. the Minister of Justice) feared to tread. The hon. member for Cardwell's criticism of the Bill was not a fair or honest criticism. The provisions of the Bill were distorted, and the principle of the Bill misrepresented. In fact, his whole criticism of the Bill was a perfect caricature, and I am quite sure, from the extraordinary observations made, that he never read the Bill, or if he did read it, that he does not understand a single one of its provisions. The hon. member for Cardwell attempted to illustrate his objections by an incident that occurred in Montreal. He tells us that a gentleman of his acquaintance committed a violent assault on someone some time ago, and was fined for it. Well, I am not aware that gentlemen commit violent assaults; when they do so they cease to be gentlemen. But I do know that some whom the hon. member for Cardwell is pleased to call gentlemen, do commit assaults and indulge in other practices unbecoming a gentleman. According to the hon. gentleman his friend in Montreal, no doubt a model gentleman, did commit a breach of the Criminal Law by assaulting his neighbour. In the eyes of the hon. member for Cardwell, violently assaulting your neighbour is a very trifling affair, especially when done by a gentleman, and the criminal gentleman's sensibilities should not be touched in the slightest, although he does violate the Criminal Law of the land. According to the story, as told us by the hon. member for Cardwell, this gentleman of Montreal, who thought it in keeping with the character of a gentleman to violate the law, was made amenable to the law. He was fined, and, according to the interpretation put upon this Bill by the hon. member for Cardwell, if the gentleman friend had committed a second assault he would have to submit to the degradation of being photographed, and his picture placed in the rogues' gallery. And pray, why not; if the hon. gentleman's friend has become a habitual criminal, and repeating the offense makes him in law an old offender, why should he not be treated as an old and confirmed offender? Although the hon. member for Cardwell may call him a gentleman, in the eye of the law he is only a criminal and should be treated as such. But the Bill contains no such provision; and I repeat, that the hon. member for Cardwell's interpretation of the measure shows that he does not understand what he is talking about. The Bill does not make it imperative that photographs should be taken of all criminals; it simply empowers the Government by Order in Council to make regulations from time to time with regard to the photographing of prisoners incarcerated in the penitentiary, reformatory prisons and common jails. The gentleman mentioned by the hon. member for Cardwell, according to his account of the transaction, was not committed to any of those institutions. Therefore, there is no danger under this Act, even if the hon. member for Cardwell's friend should repeat the offense, that he would be photographed at the public expense, and have his photograph placed in the rogues' gallery; although I think the rogues' gallery is the proper place for the photographs of the hon. gentleman's friend if he should persist in the repetition of a criminal offence. The hon. member for Cardwell's ignorance of the meaning of the Bill shows that he has not read it, and in fact knows no more about what he undertakes to criticise than does a certain long-eared animal know about navigation. The hon. member for Cardwell said that this part of the Bill, which he so strongly objected to, was the only principle of the Bill. And he then proceeds in the most extravagant and absurd manner to criticise and object to the details of the Bill, indicating gross ignorance of the clearest principle and simplest details of the Bill. It is not, as he stated, a fact that on the mere conviction of a person for any offense would necessarily result in taking his photograph and placing it in the rogues' gallery. There must be an Order in Council directing that to be done, and the Act even then only applies to persons incarcerated in the penitentiary, reformatory, prison or common jail. The hon. gentleman also objected to section 3, and its sub-sections, and objects to what he calls its absolute and stringent provisions. They are not absolute, and they are not stringent. No man is liable to the provisions of this section who has not been convicted, and even under that section the prisoner must be charged by the constable, and the Judge of the Court must be satisfied that there is reasonable grounds for believing that the prisoner is getting his livelihood by dishonest means before the provisions of this Act apply. Are hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial side of the House so tender about the feelings of criminals of this class, so careful about their interests, as not to desire that their conduct and habits should be enquired into even after conviction. It must be borne in mind that the object of this section is to keep the criminal classes under the eye of the police, so as to deter them from the commission of other offenses. It must also be understood that a man cannot be convicted under this section, unless the Court before which he is brought is satisfied that he has evaded one of the provisions of sub-section 3. The hon. the Minister of Justice was candid enough to say that, from the cursory glance he gave the provisions of the Bill, he thought some of them might be incorporated with advantage into the Criminal Law of the land. If he thought so, it was his plain duty to recommend the reference of the Bill to a Select Committee, to consider those portions of the Bill that would recommend themselves to the sound judgment of professional men, in order to have them incorporated in the Criminal Law. What earthly objection can he have to the clause that provides for the registration of persons convicted of crime. Practically that clause provides for criminal statistics. The hon. gentleman suggested more; he certainly gave no reasons to the House against that provision? That is the proper way of tracing out, following up and keeping under the eye of the administration of the law, the class to which this provision of the Bill is intended to apply; and it is intended to apply to them, not in the interests of the criminal so much as in the interest of the community. No sound objection can be raised to this provision—none has been suggested. I am free to say, and I do say, that if a similar provision had been put into a Bill introduced by any hon. gentleman on the opposite side of the House, it never would have been dealt with by the Government in the curt and cavalier manner in which this Bill is sought to be dealt with. Such a provision would, in that case, have received the commendation of the Government, and passed into law. What valid objection can be raised to section 4 of the Bill, which provides that authorities of the penitentiary and reformatory prisons and of the common jails shall make returns of the criminals incarcerated under their charge? None that I know of, and none that I heard of. Surely that seems an eminently proper provision, and yet hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House ridicule the idea of such a provision. What objection can there be to the second section of this Act, which provides that criminals incarcerated in the penitentiary, reformatories and common jails, shall have their photographs taken, and that we shall thus have at all times an unfading, and, I may say, an unfading record of the criminal classes. Now, as the hon. the Minister of Justice has suggested, we know that the photographing business has been done, and done with advantage to the administration of justice, elsewhere. Rest assured that there is no more effectual mode of deterring criminals from the further commission of crime, and securing their detection when crime has been committed, than photographing this obnoxious and increasing class in the community. They may and they do disguise themselves in various ways. They may dye their hair or change their clothes to evade the laws they have violated, but cannot disguise so effectually the face that God has given them, when that face is transferred to canvass or paper by the skill of the photographer. The hon. the Minister of Justice may call in his large majority in this House, as he has done, to vote down the provisions of this Bill, but I am satisfied that, had the hon. gentleman studied the Bill carefully, had he thoroughly understood its provisions the scope and object of the Act, he would have allowed it to go to a second reading, be referred to a Committee of the Whole, where a few of its harsher provisions might have been toned down. No innocent man, no gentleman—as the hon. member for Cardwell is disposed to call some of the criminal classes—those who only commit assaults—has anything to fear from the provisions of the Bill. The rowdies, the blackguards, and the criminals generally, who are swarming over the length and breadth of the land (as the Return, at the instance of the hon. member for West Durham abundantly shows), are the men, and the only men, who have reason to fear the enactment of the clauses of this Bill. The innocent have nothing, the criminals alone have something, to fear in case this Bill becomes law. Yet hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are so delicate and tender about the interests and feelings of this class, as to be unwilling to create a machinery that will effectually aid in the detection of crime, and punish the criminal when detected. I am really surprised that a Bill of this character, having in view the aim and object that this Bill has, should be treated in the way hon. gentlemen are disposed to treat this measure. Other Bills, having in view the amendment of the Criminal Law, have not been so treated. The hon. the Minister of Justice, in dealing with the Bill of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) the other night, criticised and objected to every provision of that Bill. There was not a single provision of the Bill that he did not pronounce unwise and injudicious; yet the hon. gentleman did not object to the second reading, and its reference to a Select Committee of the House, with a view of seeing if some of its provisions could not be licked into shape and made suitable to the circumstances of the country. Why should not the Bill of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) be dealt with in the same way? There is greater reason why this Bill should be read a second time than there was for extending that courtesy to the Bill of the hon. member for Hamilton. This Bill can be amended in the Committee so as to be of essential service to the country. The other never could. I know of but one reason why, in the estimation of

hon. gentlemen opposite, this Bill should receive different treatment, and that is, the Bill I am now discussing was introduced by the hon. member for West Durham, the other by a supporter of gentlemen opposite. I regret that such a state of things should exist in this House, and that the provisions of the Bill have not been calmly considered. There is no man in the country, and certainly no man in this House, better able to deal with the questions embraced in this Bill than the hon. member for West Durham. He has given the subject a great deal of care and a great deal of thought; and yet the hon. gentlemen can reconcile it with their duty to the House and the country, without reflection, without condemnation, and, I may say, without examination, to refuse it a second reading. There are many eminently proper provisions in the Bill that should become law, and that will ultimately become law. I venture in this prediction that, although the hon. the Minister of Justice now calls on his majority in the House to reject this Bill, that in his calmer moments he will regret what he is now doing, and that before next Session he will realise the mistake he has made, and will then introduce this or a similar Bill, and that in his responsibility as a Minister of the Crown.

MR. BLAKE: I have just one word to say. I hope it will not be supposed that, because some arguments have not been answered, they were therefore unanswerable. It has been my misfortune, that many arguments, which I could have easily answered—had I been allowed the opportunity—have been left unanswered. I did not rise to reply till you, Sir, were about to put the question, after a long interval, during which no opponent of the Bill would speak. I stated in the opening that I rose only because the discussion seemed about to close; but after I had replied to such arguments as had up to that time been used, several hon. members thought fit, my mouth being closed, to make further attacks on the Bill. I shall not now, after the House has disposed of the Bill, trouble them with arguments. I do not wish to speak after the fair. I do not propose to waste the time of the House or my own breath, but I must frankly admit that besides the easily answered arguments which the hon. the Minister of Justice and his friends have given us by word of mouth, he has about one hundred and fifty more that I am quite unable to answer.

Amendment (Mr. Baker) agreed to on a division.

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER LEGALISATION BILL.

[BILL 30.]

(Mr. Girouard, Jacques Cartier.)

SECOND READING.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the second reading of the Bill and the amendment (Mr. Thompson, Haldimand): "That the said Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read the second time this day six weeks."

MR. HOUDE: Mr. Speaker, if this Parliament was the only legislative body in the country, the only one competent to discuss questions respecting marriage, my position in regard to the proposed law of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier would be slightly different from that which I think myself bound to take on the present occasion. It is not that I am opposed to this measure; on the contrary, I approve of its principle, and will vote for its second reading. My objections have only reference to the details. I recognise the motive which has induced my hon. friend to include in his Bill provisions whose expediency I intend to discuss; he has by their means no doubt desired to allay the fears of the members of certain Churches; but I am of opinion that there is a way of calming these apprehensions without its being necessary to include similar enactments in a law of this nature emanating from the Federal Parliament. This is the proposition which I shall at once endeavour to prove in as brief a manner as possible. In the case I have supposed, when commencing, I would not at all desire to concur in the adoption of a measure proposing to legalise marriage between the brother-in-law and the sister-in-law, or no matter what marriage, without providing at the same time the necessary conditions in order to give recognition to its character as a religious contract, a character essential to its remaining in conformity with the spirit of christianity and to ensure the happiness of families as well as the stability of society. But, since the perfection of Confederation, our new Constitution has placed us in a unique position in this matter, by enacting that the law of marriage shall be under the jurisdiction of the Dominion Parliament while its celebration shall be under the jurisdiction of the Provincial Legislatures. At first sight the distinction would appear somewhat finely drawn, and the division line between these two authorities difficult to follow. Without doubt the letter of the Constitution on this point, as on others, is vague. To comprehend perfectly its spirit, it is necessary to discover what idea was uppermost in the minds of its authors when they established this division of jurisdiction between the Federal Parliament on the one side and the Provincial Legislatures on the other. This is what, on my part, I have humbly endeavoured to find out before forming a settled opinion upon certain details in the law as proposed by my hon. friend. It is a known fact that our present Constitution had its origin in the Quebec Conference, made up of representatives from the greater number of the Provinces which to-day form part of the Confederation. Now, let us see with what intent "marriage" was included among the number of subjects upon which the Federal Parliament might legislate:—

"The word 'marriage' has been placed in the draft of the proposed Constitution to confer upon the Federal Legislature the right of declaring what marriage shall be considered as valid throughout the whole extent of the Confederation, without affecting, however, in the least degree the dogmas or ceremonials of the religious bodies to which the contracting parties belong."

What guarantee would there have been that the Federal Parliament would never touch upon these religious dogmas and rites, if it had not been understood that they would never be called upon to decide upon them. Unless they had recognised and confirmed the principle that to the Provincial Legislatures must be left the exercise of the constitutional right to take cognisance of the dogmas and rites in conformity with which marriage ought to be contracted, the guarantee would be of none effect. While citing these opinions of the Quebec Conference, I may state that, during the debates of Parliament upon the scheme of Confederation, the hon. the Solicitor-General for the Lower Canadian section, whose opinion, I presume, ought still to agree, to some extent, with that of the present hon. Minister of Public Works, inasmuch as it was he himself who then gave utterance to them, commented upon them in the name of the Government of the day, after it had been formally communicated to the House :

“The hon. gentleman has asked the Government what meaning was to be attached to the word ‘marriage,’ where it occurred in the Constitution. He desired to know whether the Government proposed to leave to the Central Government the right of deciding at what age for example, marriage might be contracted. I will now answer the hon. gentleman as categorically as possible, for I am anxious to be understood, not only in this House, but also by all those who may hereafter read the report of our proceedings. And, first of all, I will prove that civil rights form part of those which, by article 43 (paragraph 15) of the resolutions, are guaranteed to Lower Canada. This paragraph reads as follows :—

“15. Property and civil rights, excepting those portions thereof assigned to the General Parliament.”

“Well, among those rights are all the civil laws of Lower Canada, and included in these latter are those which relate to marriages. Now it was of the highest importance that it should be so under the proposed system, and therefore, the hon. members from Lower Canada at the Conference took great care to obtain the reservation to the Local Government of this important right; and in consenting to allow the word ‘marriage’ after the word ‘divorce,’ the delegates have not proposed to take away with one hand from the Local Legislature what they had reserved to it by the other. So that the word ‘marriage,’ placed where it is among the powers of the Central Parliament, has not the extended signification which was sought to be given to it by the hon. member. * * * * The whole may be summed up as follows :—The Central Parliament may decide that any marriage contracted in Upper Canada, or in any other of the Confederated Provinces, in accordance with the laws of the country in which it was contracted, although that law might be different from ours, should be deemed valid in Lower Canada in case the parties should come to reside there, and vice versa.”

At another sitting the same hon. Minister added further :

“This (the words last above cited) was merely a development of what I said. I stated before that the interpretation I had given of the word ‘marriage’ was that of the Government and of the Conference of Quebec, and that we wished the Constitution to be drafted in that sense. * * * * I maintain then that it was absolutely necessary to insert the word ‘marriage’ as it has been inserted, in the resolutions, and that it has no other meaning than the meaning I attributed to it in the name of the Government and of the Conference. Thus the hon. member for Verchères

(Mr. Geoffrion) had no grounds for asserting that the Federal Legislature might change that part of the Civil Code which determines the age at which marriage can be contracted without the consent of parents.”

At another sitting again, and in reply to a request for explanations put to the Government, the hon. Minister said :

“I made the other day, Mr. Speaker, the declaration just mentioned by the hon. member for Montmorency (Hon. Mr. Cauchon), which relates to the question of marriage. The interpretation given by me on that occasion is precisely that given to it at the Quebec Conference. As a matter of course the resolutions submitted to this hon. House embody only the principles on which the Bill or measure of Confederation is to be based; but I can assure the hon. member that the explanations I gave the other evening, as to the question of marriage, are perfectly exact, and that the section of the Imperial Act in relation thereto will be worded in accordance with the explanation I gave.”

It was on the faith of those assurances, Mr. Speaker, that the country, through the medium of the press and of Parliament, accepted the new Constitution. That Constitution is a synallagmatic compact between the Confederated Provinces, and we are bound to adhere scrupulously to its spirit in all the laws we make. Here then we have the authority of the Interprovincial Conference, in which the present Constitution originated, the authority of the Government that proposed it, and the authority of the Parliament that ratified it by a very large majority, declaring that the spirit of that Constitution requires that the Dominion Parliament shall only take cognisance of questions relating to the nature of marriage, and that it shall leave to the Provincial Legislatures the duty of dealing with the conditions under which marriage is to be contracted. I know that, according to the view taken by my co-religionists, the majority of the representatives of the Province of Quebec, which is also my own view, dispensations by reason of relationship or affinity flow from the very nature of marriage. But we must remember, on the other hand, that the privilege of the Church as to exercising the right of granting dispensation in certain cases is secured by Article 127 of the Civil Code, which is as follows :

“The other impediments recognised according to the different religious persuasions, as resulting from the relationship or affinity, or from other causes, remain subject to the rules hitherto followed in the different Churches and religious communities. The right, likewise, of granting dispensations from such impediments appertains, as heretofore, to those who have hitherto enjoyed it."

In the other Provinces, Mr. Speaker, that precaution does not exist, for it is only in the Province of Quebec that the Canon Law forms part of the Civil Law. My hon. friend from Jacques Cartier says: "In the Province of Manitoba also." I rejoice at it. But this is a state of things which we cannot remedy without affecting the autonomy of the Provinces, an alternative which would help us but little towards the end in view in this matter; for, so soon as public opinion in the other Provinces becomes favourable to our views, the chances of success would be as great with the Legislatures of the Provinces as with their representatives, and meantime we should avoid exposing our public law to the danger of being changed for the worse by a majority of legislators, still, for the most part, opposed to our principles in this matter. For those who, like myself, consider marriage to be a religious contract, there is, it seems to me, a tolerably sure means of knowing whether any proposed Act of legislation respects or violates the doctrine of the Church; it is to ask ourselves: will this measure have the effect of legalising marriages which are not permitted by the Canon Law, or of declaring invalid, marriages which that law permits? Applying that rule to the present case, it is clear, in the first place, that the proposed measure does not prohibit any marriage, and therefore does not come within the category of measures, and moreover, that it merely recognises as valid, marriages which are so in any case, naturally and morally speaking, without that legal sanction. Yes, valid, but on one condition, some hon. members of my own religious belief will perhaps say; on condition that the impediments maintained by the Church in order to prevent the too great frequency of such marriages, against which well-grounded objections certainly exist, shall first have been removed. Quite right. But if this Parliament, considering the restricted sphere of its jurisdiction in this matter, simply removes the legal prohibition wrongfully resting against such marriages, without entering into details as to the conditions under which they are to be contracted, leaving the care of such details to the Local Legislatures, it is evident that the religious rules which already apply, in accordance with the Civil Law, to other marriages not legally prohibited, must also apply to these particular marriages so soon as they cease to be legally prohibited. There cannot be any doubt as to this, for it is a strictly logical consequence flowing from undeniable premises. The authors of the Constitution, Mr. Speaker, have placed civil liberty and liberty of conscience under the special protection of the Provincial Legislatures, and I am of opinion that they acted wisely in so doing, so that I am opposed to anything that may tend, directly or indirectly, to diminish the efficacy of that protection, or cause it to change hands. Consequently, I should prefer to strike out the stipulation contained in the first proviso to the 1st section of the Bill, and, in my humble opinion, that clause should read as follows: "Marriage between a man and the sister of his deceased wife, or the widow of his deceased brother, shall be legal and valid." As to the other provision, declaring that those who are authorised to celebrate such marriages shall not be bound to celebrate marriages of the kind, if objections exist under their religious belief, I think it is useless here. Have we the power to compel anyone to celebrate any marriage whatever? It cannot be asserted that we have. It is, therefore, superfluous on our part to grant exemption from an obligation which it is out of our power to impose. Some hon. members have expressed the opinion that the second section should be wholly struck out. I think, on the contrary, that it is better to retain it, with some alteration. If it be desirable to legitimatise in the eyes of the law children the issue of marriages contracted hereafter, between brother-in-law and sister-in-law, is it not wise to legitimatise in the same way children already born of such marriages, provided such marriages have been contracted under the conditions requisite to validity? But I know we must be careful to legislate in such a manner as not to appear to desire to give a retroactive effect to this law, in matters involving rights of inheritance, which belong to the domain of civil rights reserved to the jurisdiction of the Provincial Legislatures. I would suggest that the section be amended to read as follows: "All existing marriages of such nature, celebrated with the required conditions, shall be legal, without prejudice to rights acquired prior to the sanction of this Act." As I stated at the outset, Mr. Speaker, I approve of the greater part of this measure, and I shall vote for its second reading; but, before its final passing, I hope it may be modified in detail in such a way as to remove the objections I have pointed out.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier): I have listened with a great deal of attention to the discussion on this Bill, which took place the other evening and this evening, and I do not doubt much good will result therefrom. I may state at once that I am not pledged to the wording of the Bill as it stands to-day. I am open to any reasonable suggestion for its modification, and, when the Bill reaches Committee, I hope it will be so drafted as to meet the views of those hon. gentlemen who have not been able to agree with some of its details. I take it for granted, at least from the arguments used by the majority of the speakers, that the principle of the Bill will receive the approbation of this House. The objections seem to bear only upon that provision which renders a dispensation necessary from certain Churches to make such marriages valid, and also upon that proviso by which no officiating clergyman shall be bound to celebrate such marriages. I have understood that some objection too was made to that portion of the Bill which renders it retroactive in its operation, or at least to a certain portion of it. I will endeavour to show that these objections are not altogether well-founded. First, as to the constitutionality of the "dispensation" clause, there is no doubt that, under the Constitution of 1867, this Parliament has alone the power to declare who can contract marriage. Generally speaking, we ought to follow the intention of the framers of the law, but that is not sufficient when the letter is evidently inconsistent with the expressed intention. There is no doubt, in my humble opinion, that everything appertaining to marriage and divorce belongs to this Parliament exclusively; we may permit marriage between, not only brother-in-law and sister-in-law, but minors, and we may not only deal with these matters, but also recognise Church dispensation from impediments imposed by the different Churches in these respects. The "dispensation" proviso was introduced to meet a serious objection of the members of the Church of England. Hon. members will recollect that, by the first Bill I had the honour of introducing, the validity of the marriage was to depend on the rules and regulations of the church celebrating the marriage. It was represented, and rightly so, that that law, while giving relief to the Catholic Church and Dissenters, would not relieve members of the Church of England. As the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) said the other evening, the Catholic Church, although not favourable to these marriages, for grave reasons grants dispensation from the impediment of affinity; but in the Church of England there is no such a power. Therefore, under the Bill as first introduced, the members of that Church would have been in a worse position than under the existing laws, as far as some Provinces are concerned where, by the law of the land such marriages are only voidable. The clause was therefore changed so as to limit the condition to the Catholic Church. We all know that that condition or reservation concerns no one else but the Catholic Church. The proviso declares that, if in any Church a dispensation be required, that dispensation shall be first obtained. The clause providing that no minister should be obliged to celebrate such marriages was put in to meet another objection of some clergymen of the Church of England. It is no novel provision; it is no new legislation; the Legislature of Australia has passed a similar law. I come next to the question of jurisdiction. I cannot understand how it is that this House has every other jurisdiction except the power to recognise Church dispensations in regard to marriage, or relieving from the incapacity to contract marriages. As the hon. member for Gloucester rightly remarked, this dispensation has no reference to the celebration of marriage; it is a dispensation from incapacity by reason of affinity. It has no other reference than to the capacity of parties to contract marriage; and for that reason this clause is within the legislative jurisdiction of this Parliament, and not within the jurisdiction of the Local Legislature. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) explained, the other evening, at great length, the law of the Province of Quebec, as far as the solemnisation of marriage is concerned. He referred to the opinions of the Crown law officers as to the power of the Local Legislature to empower the granting of licenses to celebrate marriage; but that was not a dispensation, at least in the sense referred to when the impediment from affinity has to be removed. These licenses had reference only to certain formalities preceeding the celebration of marriage, such as banns, etc.; they do not bear upon any of the essentials to the contract of marriage or the capacity of the parties. Another objection to this clause respecting dispensation was put forward on the ground of its uncertainty. I have read it over and over again, and I cannot understand how that objection can be made. It states that, if any dispensation is required to give validity to the marriage, such dispensation shall be obtained. If there is anything equivocal in that, I cannot see it. It is plain that it only affects the Catholic Church. It has been said also, by the hon. member for West Durham, that the Bill as it is will render the position of the parties very difficult with regard to mixed marriages. It will be the same as to-day; if the marriage is celebrated in the Catholic Church the dispensation must be obtained; but if it is celebrated before a Protestant minister then a dispensation will not be required. That is the rule to-day, and still will be the rule under this Bill. The hon. member for West Durham was astonished that the marriage in Quebec should be solemnised before the curé of the Catholic parties. There is no doubt of the law, but a different rule prevails with regard to Protestants; they may be married before any Protestant minister, provided there is no Church regulation to the contrary. As to the reservation of the right of requiring previous dispensation in favour of the Catholic Church, it seems to me that the whole question turns upon a question of policy, as to whether it would be politic for this House to make such a reservation. I may say that I inserted that clause with a view to meet the views of the Catholic members, who I thought would have some hesitation in voting for the Bill without that clause. I really cannot see why members of the Protestant faith should object to the clause. We claim it with the same spirit of liberty with which we were actuated when we put in the proviso that no minister of the Church of England shall be forced to celebrate such marriages. The clause, moreover, is a necessary consequence of the general law of the Dominion, which requires that marriage shall be celebrated by a priest or minister, and not by civil officers.

MR. HOUDE: But no priest or minister can be compelled to celebrate any marriage that is not legal. I know of no means of doing so.

MR. GIROUARD: I am of opinion that, outside of the Province of Quebec, where an exception is made by the Civil Code, that, if a priest or minister should refuse to celebrate a marriage, there are means of compelling him. A mandamus, and I presume in some Provinces an injunction, will meet such a case. If no reservation be made, a priest or minister could be forced to celebrate this kind of marriage against his conscience. If no regard is to be had to Church regulations, we shall introduce into our marriage laws a character purely civil which we have no power to give them under our Constitution, the celebration of marriage being left entirely to the Provincial Legislature, and from the character of the officiating minister will always depend the character of the marriage. Finally, the "dispensation" proviso will not be a novelty on our Statute-book. Several Statutes in force in this country have recognised the regulations of the various Churches existing within its territory. The Quebec Act of 1774, which may be considered as our Magna Charta, declares that:

"For the more perfect security and ease of the minds of the inhabitants of the said Province of Quebec, His Majesty's subjects, professing the religion of the Church of Rome of and in the said Province of Quebec, may have, hold and enjoy the free exercise of the Church of Rome, subject to the King's supremacy," etc.

The clause objected to is nothing more than the application of this Imperial law; it is then the recognition in favour of Catholics only of an article of faith of the said Church, to wit: that no marriage between brothers and sisters-in-law can be valid except by dispensation from the constituted authorities. Numerous Statutes will be found in the Statutes of Lower Canada where various privileges and immunities of the Catholic Church were sanctioned by Parliament but, to be brief, we will confine ourselves to Article 127 of the Civil Code, which was voted by the Parliament of the late Province of Canada immediately before Confederation. That article says:

"The other impediments recognised according to the different religious persuasions, or resulting from relationship of affinity or from other causes, remain subject to the rules hitherto followed in the different Churches and religious communities. The right, likewise, of granting dispensations from such impediments appertains in heretofore, to those who have hitherto enjoyed it."

This law was passed by the Parliament of the late Province of Canada, a few months before Confederation, and I do not see why this Parliament should be less liberal than the late Parliament of Canada. I could quote several Statutes of the Province of Quebec where the different rules and regulations of various Churches have been recognised. But, to be brief, I come to the Province of Ontario where I find the same policy pursued. In 1793, a Statute was passed legalising all past marriages of persons "not being under any canonical disqualification to contract matrimony." A more express recognition of Church regulations cannot be found. The same provision is contained in another Statute of Upper Canada, passed in 1830, 11 Geo. IV, cap. 36. Among the regulations laid down for the future celebration of marriages, the same Statute provides that the said marriage shall be solemnised "according to the form prescribed by the Church of England." The Catholics never complained of this legislation; it is only in accordance with the principle they invoke. In another Statute, concerning marriages of members of the Church of Scotland, Lutherans or Calvinists, it is stated that said marriages shall be "according to the rites of such Church or religious community." The Marriage Act of Upper Canada, passed in 1857, 20 Vic., cap. 66, declares that marriage shall be solemnised "according to the rites and usages of such Churches or denominations respectively." The same Statute declares valid all past marriages of Quakers solemnised "according to the rites and usages" of their society. With those numerous precedents before us, it seems to me that the proviso as to dispensation should no longer be open to objection. It simply declares that, as far as Catholics are concerned, marriage between brothers and sisters-in-law shall be celebrated according to the rules and usages of their Church; and, as these marriages may be objectionable to some ministers of the Church of England, it declares what will be found in some other Colonial Statutes, and among others Australia, namely, that it shall not be compulsory for any officiating minister to celebrate such marriages. This proviso, also referring only to the impediment of affinity, or the capacity of contracting, is, I believe, constitutional. But, however, if desired, it could be removed. Now, one word as to the retrospective clause of the Bill. We find in England the first instance of such retroactive legislation in Lord Lyndhurst's Act of 1835, and every Bill introduced since that time into the Commons or the Lords contains the same clause. The Statutes passed by most of the British Colonies on the subject matter of this Bill have also a retroactive effect. I will also refer to the following Statutes, of both Upper and Lower Canada, which were found necessary to legalise irregular, voidable, and in fact void marriages:—Statutes of Lower Canada—44 Geo. III cap. 2, 1 Geo. IV cap. 19, 5 Geo. IV. cap. 21, 7 Geo. IV cap. 2, 2 Wm. IV cap. 51; Statutes of Upper Canada—33 Geo. III cap. 5, 11 Geo. IV cap. 36; Statutes of Canada—18 Vic. cap. 245, 20 Vic. cap. 66. I have heard it mentioned that this Bill does not interest Ontario much. I believe that it not only effects Quebec, Manitoba, and British Columbia, but Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, and even Upper Canada. We find that the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of England, which seems to be wanted in Ontario, exists in all those Provinces. In the Province of New Brunswick, a Court of Divorce and Matrimonial Causes has been constituted; in Nova Scotia the same jurisdiction has been vested in her Equity Courts. There is also a Statute in Prince Edward Island which gives similar powers to the Governor and the members of the Privy Council. We may also easily suppose the case of two Upper Canadians moving to Great Britain or any of these Provinces, where they may acquire a new domicile and become amenable to the jurisdiction of their Courts, and therefore see their marriage attacked and set aside. It was intimated that it was my intention to refer this Bill to a Special Committee. I may state that I have changed my mind. I believe now that a measure of this public importance should be considered in a Committee of the Whole. As I have said, I am not pledged to any special wording of the Bill. The essential point is to legalise marriages with a deceased wife's sister or the widow of a deceased brother. It would be open to every member to introduce improvements or strike out provisions, and I would certainly submit to the decision of the Committee. In the meantime, I hope this House will authorise the second reading of the Bill, and reject the six months' "hoist."

MR. HOUDE: I believe my hon. friend did not understand me when I said we could not oblige ministers of any Church to celebrate a marriage. I meant that we could not do so as members of the Federal Parliament. My hon. friend admits that solemnisation of marriage is entirely within the jurisdiction of the Local Legislatures, and at the same time he contends that we can oblige ministers of Churches to celebrate marriage; that is to say, that the very solemnisation of marriage ought to be interfered with by the Federal Parliament. The two propositions seem to be contradictory.

MR. JONES: I do not rise for the purpose of prolonging this debate, but merely to say a few words on the vote I intend to cast. I may state that I intend to support the amendment for the six months' "hoist." At whose request is this Bill brought before the House? Has any petition been presented? I would ask, moreover, if any opportunity has been given to the country to protest against this measure? I can tell the hon. gentleman that, if an opportunity were given, the Church of England, to which I belong, will protest against this Bill, which has been brought forward so hurriedly. In my opinion it should be allowed to stand over. Some hon. gentlemen have stated that the Hebrew translation of the 18th chapter of Leviticus is an error. I should be sorry to make such an assertion on the floor of the House, and I should be sorry to think that the translation of the Scriptures was an error, because, if it were so, it knocks down a portion of the structure, and the whole question of affinity is destroyed. No later than 1877, at the Provincial Synod of the Church of England held in Montreal, the following resolution, brought down by the House of Bishops, was passed:—

"No clergyman of this Ecclesiastical Province shall, knowingly, solemnise a marriage forbidden by the 99th Canon of the year A.D. 1603, which is as follows:—No person shall marry within the degrees prohibited by the Laws of God, and expressed in a table set forth by authority, in the year of our Lord God 1563."

Now, that is the rule regulating the Church of England, and I do not agree with the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, that the jurisdiction for the regulation of marriage in every way resides with this House. I believe it should rest as it has for ages with the Churches to which we belong. I am sure that, if proper time be given for petitions against the Bill, they will come in large numbers from members of the English, the Roman Catholic, Presbyterian and other Churches. The Bill is brought forward in the interest of individuals, the endeavour being made to push it hurriedly through the House; but I shall oppose it with all my powers, and support the six months' "hoist."

MR. WRIGHT: I confess I see few difficulties in the case presented so ably by the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard). He has, I must admit, manifested profound research and a wonderful knowledge of all matters connected with the subject of marriage with a deceased wife's sister, almost from the beginning of the practice till the present. We can imagine this eloquent, graceful advocate seated in the solitude of his studies, probably digesting grave problems of social and moral science, waited upon by this charming lady—for we will assume she is charming, which would give the motive usually looked for in such cases—because, as we see no petition, one cannot otherwise understand why the hon. gentleman brings his forces to bear on this problem. It is the old story, the old irrepressible conflict between the law and the lady, and in the present as in past cases of this kind he will find the lady will be victorious. We can understand all the influence upon the hon. gentleman of this good-looking,
