From Chambers' Journal RUSSIA AND THE CZAR. SECOND ARTICLE.

As to the personal appearance of the Czar, we exhibit the portrait furnished by Henningsen: 'He is of commanding stature and presents not only the most imposing aspect of any living sovereign, but as perfect as he is colosed in the proportions of his form, he may really be ranked among the handsomest men in Europe. When the whole of his Guard, consisting of 60,000 of the picked men of his empire, is reviewed by him in the Champ de Mars, the eye of the spectator may vainly wander over its ranks to find any one worthy of comparison with him for figure, for manly beauty, or for majesty of mien. When he gives the word of command the deep and sonorous tones of his voice thrill, distinctly audible over the vast plain where an army is manœuvring or a crowd looking on, as different from the voices of his numerous commanders as the notes of an organ from the treble of a child. He is seen, however, to more advantage on foot than on whom his character as a clergyman renders such expressions indecent from any man on earth.

Domestic and moderate in his habits, few princes have borne a more unblemished private character than the present emparer long has done. A strict lover of justice, when not interfering with his own pretensions or interests, he has, for the first time since the reign of Peter I., endacording to law, with how little success will be shown hereafter. posing in mien, and endowed with uncommon beauty of face, he has what is called to plusique de son rote—the figure for his part. He is truly the monarch in his appearance. His gait, which is heavy and rather stiff, certainly is wanting in grace, but denotes strength and power. His smile is winning, his voice sonorous and pleasant. His features are regular, and combine to form a face a model of beauty of the German type. His eyes alone, which are large and prominent, have something sinister in their expression; and when one looks full and steadily into them, all the charm of his beauty disappears. Sober in his tastes, moderate in his passions, and desirous of enforcing military discipline by the power of his own example, he alseps upon a camp-bed; eats moderately, with no regard to choice of food; drinks but little wine, and that mixed with water; rises early, and labours hard, though unfortunately with little discernment. The minute details of military constume, parades, and reviews, absorb much more of his time than the weighty affairs and material necessities of the empire. Upon the former he bestows hours; moments only he devotes to elled one having apparently method away in the hands of the courtiers.

Such examples illustrate forcibly my assertion, that uncontrolled power tends powerfully to evil. An energetic character and strong will may attempt to check the current, but in vain. But there can be no barrier set to the eradual development of corruption and iniquity, for these are necessarily the instruments of despotism.

The Emperor Nicholas is destined to become a leason to the world, that the unity of all the material forces of a nation, the concentration of all political power in one hand, combined with the energy of all inherent in a character carved from the living rock, are not sufficient to preserve and save from destruction a principle subversive of liberty, morality, and the dignity of humanity; that a nation evan, still in its infancy, must be ruled in accordance with the laws of gradual emancipation and development; that it is impossible to force a people into a retrograde course; and that no man can have power sufficient to stay the laws of Providence in their steady and infallible progress.

At the present moment, after a long reign of thirty years, we see the emperor of Russis forced to risk all his chances for the future upon a single card, with all the interests of morality, human progress, material improvement, and civilisation against him. Let him suffer one serious defeat, and he is lost? What has placed him in this position? Is it skill? Is it greatness?'

Company, but here to cover the colors of the plants he matter of the colors of the c sures of the table; but the attentive observer is soon struck by the utter shallowness of the society. serious thought is tolerated among wellbred men; and whoever has the misfortune to be a thinker, must conceal the fact by recklessness in his conduct.

The dissipation and prodigality of society have a most pernicious influence on the morals of the people. The pay of the efficials is small, not commensurate to their wants it is now as it was regulated by the Empress Catherine seventy five years ago.
But whilst the necessaries of life have become more expensive the value of the Russian currency has been deteriorated, and the officials are paid in paper, not is cash.
It is utterly impossible for them to keep up appearances and to live respectably on their small pay; and they are, therefore, the most corrupt hody in the world. Bribery has increased, until it is become one of the national institutions—the guarantee against imperial despatism.

THE ARCTIC SEARCH.

THE ARCTIC SEARCH,

The intelligence brought to Europe by Dr. Rea respecting the fate of the Arctic expedition under Sir John Franklin has, not unnaturally, given rise not only to many painful feelings in the minds of the friends and crews, but to a good deal of discussion and conjecture. The question is asked, what has become of the rest of the expedi tion, seeing that the party stated to have been seen be the Esquimaux, and to have been found dead afterwards under the me column the column that the party stated to have been seen be the Esquimaux, and to have been found dead afterwards under the mehacholy circumstance reported, were not quite one-third of the complement of the Erebus and Terror. To this question Dr. Rac's information furnishes he answer

Rae's information furnishes ho answer whitever, beyond the great apparent improbability of any of the comrades of the unhappy men who so miserably perishes, having escaped with their lives. That improbability is, we fear, in exact proportion to the credibility of the story told to Dr. Rea by the Esquimaux. If it be true that the ships were crushed in the ice, the portion of their crews as yet wholly unaccounted for, either perished in the catastrophe, or if they were enabled like the rest to affect their percent and to reach the main land, they must have been heard of before, and they been more successful in procuring subsistence than their companions in misfortunes. This conclusion, almost irresisting the lack crape Collare, white shire, Seeves, white at lack crape Collare, white shire, Seeves, white & black crape Collare, white shires, Perist, Glusses, Prints, Delaines and Closking, & Coffin Mounting, &c. had they been more successful in procuring subsistence than their companions in missing situates. This conclusion, almost irresistible. If we believe the story told by the Esquimaux, is so distressing, and the details of the account given of those whose bodies are stated to have been discovered, are of his barrowing a nature, that we cannot worder if sorrowing friends and relatives cling with desperate pertinacity to the hope that the intelligence brought by Dr. Rae may after all prove incorrect. The Esquimaux are, as other stories formerly told by them abundantly prove, considerably given to lying, as well as theving. Hence the suggestion that the articles which furnish trefragable evidence of their lawing belonged to the missing ships, may have come into their possession by the plunder of the veneral, appoint ghem to have been wrecked or abandoned; or if the atticles were removed from the veneral should be abundanced; or if the atticles were removed from the veneral should be abundanced; or if the atticles were removed from the veneral should be a supposed to the missing ships, may have come into their possession by the plunder of the veneral should be appointed to the missing ships, may have come by a violent data at the hands of the natives, who have invented the tale told to Dr. Rae in order to account for their possession of the property. In support of the last-named supposition, more especially, it is saked whether it is likely that our countrymen, well supplied as they evidently were with ammunition, could have perished from lunger on a coset on which the Saguimaux are enabled to snaintain themsives by the produce of the chase. To this question Dr. Rae observes that the mass of procuring animal food in those regimes is the chase of sails and of reindeer.

The Warder of the story of the search of the sail of the saintain the sail of the sa deer, are so only during the abundance of deer, are so only during the autumn migrations, and that even then it is turd work for experienced sportsmen in full training to kill a sufficiency for laying up a winter stock. He adds that the particular portion of the coust where, according to the account given by the Esquimaux, a party from the missing vessels was seen, happens to be a fract more than usually barren of snimal, life in the spring season, and that the few deer which may occasionally be seast, are generally very shy. Then spring season, and that the few dear which may occasionally be seen, are generally very shy, from having been hunted during the winter by the Judians on the borders of the woodlands.
