

Fishermen Slay Sea Serpents

Japanese Kill Sea Monsters When Fishing in the Tosa Sea.

Carcases Were Taken to Osaka—Human Skeleton Found Inside One.

News was received by the steamer Empress of India of the killing of two sea serpents—a male and a female—on the 4th inst. and the other measuring 39 feet, by the intrepid fishermen of the Japanese coast.

The capturers of the sea-serpents live in the Japanese fishing village of Saka Muri, and were engaged in catching herring for the markets in the coast ports, when their nets became entangled with a large and heavy object which proved to be a sea serpent.

Unable to move the net shoreward, the fishermen made every effort to cut the sea serpent into pieces, and finally succeeded in pulling the monster ashore.

The sea-serpent belched with rage as it gained strength in the meshes of the nets. Its big eyes, with the whites glaring, were enough to frighten the fishermen.

Shortly after the monster had been killed, another serpent—apparently the female companion of the other—came swimming through the water towards the fishermen.

Osaka papers say it is believed that the serpents were carried to the Tosa sea by the Kuroshio, which appears to have temporarily incapacitated both the male and female.
