MARINE NEWS

The British torpedo gunboat Hazard, 1,070 tons, was sunk in the English Channel on Jan. 28, as the result of a collision. Three men were lost. Outlook: It may not be generally known that clams from the Clements shore contain pearls, but quite a nice specimen was found in one the other day by a Middleton lady. Yarmouth Telegram: Dr. T. H. Macdonald, of Meteghan, was in Yarmouth, on Wednesday and returned home yesterday morning. Weather permitting he will launch his large schr., Rebecca Macdonald, just completed, on Feb. 11. Another three-masted schooner is to be built on the bay shore of Annapolis county, this time at Hillsburn, and Capt. Read Longmire, of that place, is to have command of the vessel, which will be managed by a St. John firm. Yarmouth Telegram: Capt. Hilaire LeBlanc, of Wedgeport, and Capt. C. W. Collins, of Granville, Annapolis Co., were in town this week on business in connection with the steamer being built at Wedgeport. [Capt. Collins returned to Annapolis via Thursday's express.] Judge Grieron was in Yarmouth again Thursday and held another hearing in the case of the Sanford fish dealers vs. Rodney Bros. & Co., of Boston. Owing to the absence of one of the witnesses from the Boston end of the case, it was again adjourned until Friday, Feb. 6.

Yarmouth Telegram: The tug Hugh D., which went to Salmon River on Tuesday, to bring the new schr. Industrial to Yarmouth, on route for Lunenburg, returned late in the afternoon without her tow. The vessel, as previously stated, was successfully launched, but owing to the ice conditions, the power boats were unable to get down the river to the breakwater, where the Hugh D. was waiting for her.

THE WRONG KEY

"Talking of ciphers," said the inspector, as we sat drinking our coffee after dinner on the broad, cool stoop of the house, "that wagon down there reminds me of a rather amusing case of how I was once nearly taken in by a cipher, so simple that a child might have invented it. If I hadn't happened to sprain my thumb in a row a day or two before, I'd never have spotted it, and there would have been the deuce to pay in this district."

"He broke off to watch a heavily loaded wool wagon, drawn by a fine team of 16 oxen, treading slowly down the dusty street in charge of a grinning hotentot voorlooper."

"That wagon of Van Zyl's looks innocent enough, doesn't it?" the inspector went on. "But it's had its noxious youth—a regular night prowler it used to be once, a real bad lot."

"It was in the early part of the Boer war, when we were all wondering whether the Boers from over the border would invade the Colony, and whether the Cape Dutch would rise and join in with them if they did, that I was sent here to Keurstad, to be a sort of all round assistant to the Resident Magistrate in the administration of martial law."

"We hadn't enough troops to spare just then for the patrolling of the dissected districts, and most of the work had to be left to the civil authorities. Here in Keurstad it was a long time before we had even a military commandant, and the magistrate had to take his place, with me and my four policemen as an intelligence department."

"Part of my work was the censoring of the mails, a thing that had to be done all over the colony under martial law. It's better to prevent people from making fools of themselves than to punish them for it afterward; and there were a lot of hot-headed Dutch Colonists who wanted to make trouble. We used to find signs of it in their letters and quietly deport them before any harm was done."

"One afternoon I went into the chief's office, and found him looking worried."

"Look at this, Stewart," he said, handing me an official telegram. "It was a code message from one of the farm post offices on the outskirts of the district, and underneath it, in pencil, was the chief's translation: 'Rifles and ammunition in large quantities found at Klein Spruit. Stop further importations at all costs.'"

"I whistled. It was a serious matter, for we were trusting entirely to the unarmed state of the district to prevent a rising just at present. A sharp watch had been kept on all wagons coming into the town by way of the pass through the mountains, and they had all been searched, either by myself or by one of my four policemen, for we knew that if the farmers once began to get hold of rifles again, they wouldn't be disarmed this time without bloodshed, and in all probability a general rising."

"Now look here, Stewart," says the chief very gravely; "this won't do. It must have been going on for weeks, and the only way those rifles could have got in must have been by the mountain road from the south, the one that leads through the town."

"That's rather rough on my men, sir, I said, but the fact is—though it's a nasty thing to say—I don't think much of them. Three out of the four have got relations fighting on the other side, and can't be expected to be over loyal, and the other one is a pretty soft market at the best."

"I saw that things must be getting pretty serious. But in the evening, when the bugle of the post-cart sounded down the street, I saw my way to begin the work, at any rate."

"I told young Bartman, the magistrate's clerk, to bring me the mail bags as soon as they were received by the post office, so that I could go over them before they were delivered."

"He came back from the post office about half an hour later with the bags, and as he laid them down on the table he asked casually whether I wanted any assistance."

"No," I said shortly. "I don't. This is a confidential job, so just get out and leave me to get on with it."

"All right, Mr. Stewart," says he, turning a bit red, "but I suppose I may have my own mail before I go. I am expecting one from a store in Vrijstad that has to be answered tonight. Besides, you won't want to read any of them, will you?"

"No, you can't," I told him; though you needn't think I want to read all your turtle dove cooings, you young ass! But, for all I know, your correspondence in Vrijstad may be in Cronje's confidence, so I am going to search the letter for seditious matter."

"I was surprised to see him turn quite white at my silly joke, though he recovered himself in a moment. "It's not from her, confound it!" he said, with a blush this time; it's the whole row of figures had been typed out in this way I had: VANXZYLS QWAGENHUIS QWOENS DAGQAVONDX ELFQ UURXNE EMQS TEWAETXWEG.

"I stared at this, and scratched my head again. It didn't seem to be much use after all, until I saw, near the end of the message, the letters of my name—you know how they will always catch your eye anywhere."

"Then I remembered that the letters X and Q are never used in Dutch—that is, in pure Dutch; and the whole thing was plain. I wrote it out again, leaving a space wherever there was an X or a Q. This gave me (when it was touched up a bit: 'Van Zyl's wagenhuit, Woensdag avond, elf uur, Neem Stewart weg.' Translated into English, this meant: "Van Zyl's wagon, Wednesday evening, 11 o'clock. Take Stewart away."

"So some one was going to 'take Stewart away,' was he? I doubted it! Then I remembered that I had been 'taken away' several times, without my having known it at the moment. There had been false alarms of various kinds—and in each case there had been evidence to back up the report when I arrived at the spot—a handful of Mauser cartridges split on the road; a stripped farmhouse and crying women; or a gang of excited armed Kaffirs."

"The meaning of this message was plain enough; the agent in Vrijstad—and the Trades Directory showed that there was a storekeeper called P. J. Bosman in that town—had arranged that a consignment of arms should reach Keurstad at about 11 o'clock that evening, and wanted me taken out of the way while it was being unloaded in Van Zyl's big wagonshed, where he kept his wool bales."

"It was as plain as daylight now that my own four policemen must have been in the game all along, or the rifles could never get through. Good Heavens! there wasn't a soul that I didn't suspect now. I was in a pretty ugly temper. I can tell you, by the time I'd made up my mind what to do."

"I went into my own office and took out of my desk a long Mauser pistol that I kept for my own use. It was a lovely thing, any amount better than the regulation revolver that I kept hanging from a peg in the other office; but of course I wasn't supposed to have it. As I was stowing it away in my coat, there came a sound of feet running along the road outside. Then I heard Bartman's voice explaining to the sentry that he wanted to see me urgently."

"Mr. Stewart. Mr. Stewart—where are you? You're wanted."

"Here I am!" I called back, going into the room, quietly. "What is it this time?"

"He was standing in the corner of the room near the door, next to the table where I had been using the typewriter; and on a peg just behind him hung my revolver in a holster."

"By Jove, sir, he began, breathlessly. "I'm glad I managed to find you before you'd left the office. There's been the most awful trouble out at Klansel's farm. Three of the—of the—"

"He stuck fast in the middle of the sentence, and then I saw that he wasn't looking at me, but at the paper lying on the table—my copy of his cipher. He suddenly let out a yelp like a strangled puppy, and made a grab for the revolver behind me."

"Hands up!" he called out in a very shaky voice that wouldn't have scared a rabbit. "If you don't let me leave this room, and swear not to say anything about that letter, I'll shoot you on the spot!"

"Do it, then you rat!" I cried and ran at him. He yelled with fright and dropped the gun, but it was too late to prevent my fist smashing into his jaw."

"I called the sentry outside, and told him to see that Bartman didn't get away until I came back. I was in a murderous sort of temper by this time, but I hated the idea of having a row with Van Zyl. He was a decent old chap and rather a pal of mine."

"It was a little after 11 by the time I reached the shed, as far as I could see without striking a light; and against the sky that showed between the black masses of the trees on each side of the street I could make out the top of a big wool wagon showing over the line of the mountain. Several men were talking as they stood round the wagon, and not with any air of secrecy either; they evidently felt quite secure, confound them!"

"It wasn't easy to decide what to do. It was just in my mind to rush the door and loose off into the thick of them, when an idea struck me. I'd pay them out in kind, and at the same time do something better for the old Colony than any scrap in the dark could be."

"I waited there in the darkness under the trees until I was certain that they had all gone into the shed, and then I crept up to the door, with my pistols handy and loose in my pockets."

"Good evening, kerels!" I called out cheerfully from just outside, with both

Teaching The Children To Farm

MUCH is being added to the attractiveness of life on farms, especially to children, by the children's competitions which have become a feature of the fairs and exhibitions in Western Canada during the past year. At every place at which these competitions were held they were the centre of interest, not only to the children themselves but also to adult visitors. In fact, many of the older exhibitors displayed a greater interest in the exhibits of the children than in their own.

One of the most successful of the competitions was the baby beef competition held at the Calgary Winter Fair in December. The competition was for heifers, pure bred or graded, born in 1916, and fed between November 1st and the date of the show, by boys or girls between nine and seventeen years of age. Fourteen prizes from $25 to $100 were awarded. Altogether there were fifty-three exhibitors in the competition, including fifteen girls. The first prize was won by Samuel Heal, of Brandon, Manitoba. In the class of calves shown by girls the first prize was taken by Isabelle Stewart, of Forestburg, Alberta, and the second by Florence Elva Boggs, of Daysland, Alberta. Both these girls were near the front in the open competition.

Canadian Pacific Railway. Rutherford has been largely responsible for making known to the farmers of Alberta the advantages of raising baby beef, some of which are greater gains made on the same amount of feed by the youngest calves than those of more aged, older cattle. On the Demonstration Farm at Strathmore, Alberta, under the direction of Dr. Rutherford, demonstrations in the raising of baby beef have been conducted for some years with results that are entirely satisfactory from a profit-making point of view. The future of the baby beef industry in Alberta, and, in fact, throughout Western Canada, where conditions are extremely favorable to its success is very bright.

SAVE FOOD
In a time needing food economy many people are not getting all the nourishment they might from their food. It is not how much you eat, but much you assimilate, that does you good.
The addition of a small teaspoonful of Bovril to the diet as a peptogenic before meals leads to more thorough digestion and assimilation and thus saves food, for you need less.

The Rex Beach story shows that an iniquitous scheme was plotted and hatched in Washington by which the semblance of law was placed in power, and it shows in most convincing fashion that men's sense of elemental justice won out against it. This sense of elemental justice is one of our forces as men and women, led by Glenister, rather than that of McNamara, the worst political crook in Washington.
