Mr. Morris nodded his assent. There was no need this time for his daughter to warn him not to speak, for he couldn't have said a when the rainy day has not only when the rainy day has not only word had he tried.

when the rainy day has not only put in its appearance, but has rendered the head of the house forever unfit for labor, the outlook is far from pleasant. The Morris family were fortunate in having their little home all paid for, and enough money to help them through the first weeks of their great trouble; but, in the eyes of their neighbors, they were unfortunate in having no boys in the family. The Aftermath.

Staunton's mansion were not, as they seemed to be, fixed on the last falling snow. Ethel Matherson's thoughts were far away. She was dreaming of the days before her father's death, when, in her distant former home, Col. Matherson's idolated only child, she had been so zealously guarded from life's sharp edges. But in the prime of life her father had been snatched from her by death.

Staunton's mansion were not, as the dream of the storm that was raging in the breast of the outwardly smiling widow.

How Ethel had enjoyed the drive! How kind the major had been, and how interestingly he had talked. How handsome he was, with his strong, noble face, his graceful, well-knit figure, and his finely-turned head, with its irongray hair. Poor Ethel! It had indeed been a red-letter day in her dream of the storm that was raging in the breast of the outwardly smiling widow.

So little remained for her of her father's once large fortune, when all his debts had been paid and she had so signally failed in giving lessons in music and fancy work, despite her own proficiency in these arts, that this little had soon disappeared.

It was at this juncture that her wealthy cousin, Julia Staunton, widowed and childless, had dawned on her horizon as a possible helper with an offer of making her a companion. Ethel had gone to her with misgivings for the letter in

"Yes, Mary," Ethel replied, as she sank into a chair. "Mrs. Staunton has not returned yet?"

She did not hear a step bening her, and it was not until a gentle hand was laid upon her bowed head that she started up and saw Maj. Horton, whose eyes, bright with

"No, Miss, but I think she will soon be here. "Tis getting late."

The girl withdrew, closing the door after her. Presently Ethel heard a carriage stop in the street below, followed by the clang of the hall doors. She heard the rustle of her cousin's garments as that lady came up the stairs and to her door.

Horton, whose eyes, bright with tears, were bent upon her.

"My dear child," he said, taking her hand and drawing her gently to him, "what is troubling you? There is something wrong, I am sure. I have noticed your sadness before. Tell me, have I guessed aright that your life here is unhappy.?"

She stood at his side in silence, a delicate flush upon her cheeks, the tears shining on her long lashes.

She did not hear a step behind the step of the first to enjoy at present, nothing to look forward to in the future.

She entered with a smile which, when Ethel was the object on which her eyes rested, she was in so happy a mood that she even failed to note that her companion's hands were, for once, idle.

"Such a delightful time as I have had!" she cried, with vivacity. "I met him down town and we had a very pleasant lunch together—Maj. Horton, you know."

With a sudden movement she hid her face on his shoulder, the tears falling unrestraintedly, and told him all—all the trouble, the unhappiness, the grieving for her dead father.
