Let me give my hon. friend the Minister of Finance another instance that will appeal more to him. As I said a moment ago, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance is a business man first and foremost, and moreover, he is a good business man when he is left alone—a first-class business man. Formerly, he was always able to conduct his business in a good and prosperous way, never making his expenditures greater than his revenue. It is only when he is Minister of Finance in the company in which he finds himself that he is reduced to borrowing.

Mr. GRAHAM: Inefficient.

Mr. TURRIFF: Supposing my hon. friend the Minister of Finance was the president of a company that for years past had been earning 8 per cent on its capital and had been paying an annual dividend of 6 per cent. As the years went on it gathered a nice rest account to give stability to the company to tide over any difficult time. When hard times come along, such as we are now experiencing, and the earnings of that company are reduced from 8 per cent to 5 per cent per annum, what would my hon. friend do? Would he continue to pay a dividend of 6 per cent if he saw hard times looming ahead with no prospect of better times for years to come, drawing out of the reserve account for it, and then, when the reserve account was eaten up, going to the banks and mortgaging the securities of his company to get money to continue paying that 6 per cent? Would he keep up the expenditure? Not for one moment. Would my hon. friend the Minister of Finance countenance such a procedure; and if his board of directors insisted upon keeping up the expenditure he would resign the presidency of that company, just as any sensible man would do. If that is good business for an individual, industrial or financial company, why should it not be good business for the Dominion of Canada? The ministers of this Government are simply directors and the people of Canada shareholders, and the ministers should be actuated by the same principles and standards of honour and honesty in expenditure and revenue as the president and directors of any financial or industrial company. But have they been actuated by such priciples? No. We find the country brought to a state of depression by the extravagance of this Government to a large extent; and instead of curtailing expenditure, my hon. friend says: No, clap on full sail; spend all the money you like on public works; spend all the money you like on all the other departments; and, although we have to mortgage the resources of this country, we will expend all the money that is wanted. Is that a common-sense business view to take? Is that a common-sense way in which to handle the finances of this country? It is the very worst kind of financing that has ever been attempted in this country from Confederation down to the present time. If this proposition of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance is made law in its present state, it will be the heaviest blow that has been given to the development and prosperity of Canada since Confederation, and it will take Canada many a long year to recover from the effects of it.

9 p.m.

Mr. WILCOX: Cheer up.

Mr. TURRIFF: I am usually of a somewhat optimistic nature. I generally look at the bright side of things, and I would particularly like to be able to look at the bright side of this question to-night; but I certainly see that we are to be in for a long period of depression. It cannot be helped. Our main customers on the continent of Europe will not be in a good position to buy from us when this war is over. We shall not be able to produce so as to sell to those countries as cheaply as in the past. Why? Because of the act of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance in heaping burdens upon the backs of the farmers.

Mr. WILCOX: Terrible!

Mr. TURRIFF: My hon. friend is right. He does not strike the nail on the head very often, but he has hit it right this time.

Mr. WILCOX: I want to correct my hon. friend. I did not say "tariff"; I said "terrible."

Mr. TURRIFF: All right. The Minister of Finance tells the House and the country that a part of this taxation that he proposes to put on is a war tax—that it is a tax to help out the war. I say this Government is deliberately making an attempt to get money from the people under false pretenses. Not a dollar of what the minister proposes to raise by direct taxation or by the increased tariff duties is for the purposes of the war. I give the Minister of Finance and the members of the Government generally credit for this—that they have made the people of Canada to a certain extent believe that this money is for the war. But I can tell them that, when the people of Canada realize that there is not a word of truth in the representations that they have made on this subject, when they realize that the Minister of Finance is borrowing all the money for the war and that all he has collected by taxation is to enable the Government to continue its course of reckless extravagance, the Government will not last five minutes after that question has been fairly submitted to a vote of the people. It takes a good deal of work, a good deal of explanation by the newspapers and public men to get the facts home to the people. But they will learn it. They will learn that the increased taxation is raising the cost of living, and God knows it was high enough. But it is going to be higher because this Government taxes practically everything the poor man eats or wears. The people will understand that before long, because each man will feel it in his pocket. Every time a postcard is mailed there is a special tax of one cent—the cost is doubled. Every time a letter is mailed, a stamp printed "war tax" must be put on at the cost of an additional cent. I wonder at the Government having the nerve to call this a war tax when they know it is nothing of the kind. If the Minister of Finance wanted to be exactly fair with the people of Canada, if he wanted the people to understand the reason for putting on the stamp marked "war tax" on each letter posted, he would proceed in a different way; in each post office there should be a little box, and when any person wished to mail a letter, instead of putting on the additional stamp, he would drop one cent in the box and on that box would be the inscription: "For two poor men: subscription for Mackenzie and Mann." How long would the people of Canada stand for a tax of that kind? And the same should be done in the case of every railway ticket or steamship ticket bought, every cheque going through a bank, every bill of exchange drawn—"For two poor men: Bill and Dan."

The Minister of Finance made the statement that he expected to get $8,000,000 or $10,000,000 out of the war taxes. What does he want it for? He wants it for the general revenue purposes of the country to pay back the money that the Government has given, during the past year, illegally to Mackenzie and Mann. Because we, a year ago in this Parliament, guaranteed $45,000,000 in bonds in the interest of these people, did that give the Government the right to hand over twelve and a half millions to Mackenzie and Mann? Why, the Minister of Finance had no more right to hand over that money to Mackenzie and Mann than he had to give it to me or to give it to the first man he may meet on leaving this House. If the directors of a financial corporation had done such a thing, it would not be long before they would be cross-eyed looking out through iron bars. My information is that every minister in the Government is liable to impeachment for that very thing. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance will have to come down to this House and get remedial legislation to legalize that illegal transaction of handing over the money of the people of Canada to Mackenzie and Mann and the Grand Trunk Pacific. That is the exact state of the case—I am not overstating it by a hair's breadth; and no one knows that better than the Minister of Finance.

So that this, instead of being a direct tax for the war as the Government is trying dishonestly to make out, is a tax that Mackenzie and Mann have more interest in than anybody else, because they will get the greatest share of it—in fact, they have it already. The Government have the glad hand and the warm heart for the big railway corporations and the big manufacturers, because there are fat election subscriptions to be secured. But for the workingman and the farmer there is the cold hand: "What do you want? We will give you a seven and a half per cent increased duty. That is good enough for you. Go back to your work, and produce more. Patriotism and production."

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman kindly let us know what he thinks of the argument of his friend the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) that we should not have taxed bituminous coal because that tax is too hard on the railways?

Mr. TURRIFF: I will say to my hon. and hair-splitting friend that if he will wait for a few minutes and, when I get through the few remarks I have to make, will ask me that question or any other, I will endeavour, to the best of my poor ability, to give him an answer—and I have no doubt that I shall be able to give him an answer that will not be satisfactory to him.

There is the position that we are in. The Minister of Finance comes to the people of Canada, and says: We want you to give us some twenty-two to twenty-five millions of extra taxes, and so we propose to raise the duties. It was well pointed out by my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) last night—and the idea had not occurred to me, I am free to confess, and had not occurred to a good many members on either side of the House—that last August, in the extra session, the Minister of Finance put on extra taxes. I do not remember at what he estimated them, but I think it was about $15,000,000 a year. I would ask the Finance Minister whether that estimate has been borne out. I imagine it would be much better borne out than his expectations of revenue from the tariff he is now putting on, simply because so much of it came from sugar, whisky and tobacco.

Mr. W. T. WHITE: I stated in the Budget speech that the effect of the increase of August last had been to counteract the decrease which would otherwise have taken place in excise, but that until the end of the year it is impossible to state with any degree of accuracy what the precise effect of the changes of last August will be. The amount received will, in my judgment, owing to the very great interruption of general business last fall on account of the war, be less than I estimated.

Mr. TURRIFF: I thank the minister for the information; it is about as I would expect. Trade has not been good and it was to be expected that the revenue received would be somewhat less than any man would have been justified in estimating at that time. If that has occurred in connection with the taxes that were imposed last August then I am afraid that the Minister of Finance will fall very much short in his estimate of extra revenue from the taxes he is about to impose. There is a certain limit to which you can go in the raising of revenue from taxes by tariff. That limit, I think, has been reached and more than reached by the extra taxes now being imposed. If any judgment had been used in selecting certain articles which might bear the taxes, probably some extra revenue would have been received; but when you put on a horizontal tax, raising the tariff on everything without rhyme or reason, you are bound in many cases to put the tariff so high that instead of increasing the revenue you are bound to decrease it. I remember very well the discussion that took place a year or two ago, when the Minister of Finance cut the duty on cement. It was pointed out that the duty on cement was approximately 60 per cent ad valorem. Afterwards my hon. friend put the duty on cement back where it was and it has remained there ever since. Now my hon. friend comes forward and puts an extra duty of 7½ per cent on cement. Does any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House think for one moment that we are going to continue importing cement under these circumstances? This extra duty practically cuts out the importation of cement into Canada. How much revenue will it put into the treasury? The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) last night pointed out how much revenue had been received for duty on cement. The minister in putting extra duties on cement is not going to receive even the amount of revenue that is now being derived from that source. He is cutting off the revenue from cement altogether, and to whom has he given it? Is he saving it to the farmer or to the town or villages that are using cement for paving, or to the business man who uses cement in putting up buildings? Is he saving it to any user of cement? No, Mr. Speaker, he is not, he is handing over a bonus of thousands and hundreds of of thousands of dollars to the greatest combine and merger that we have in Canada to-day. Not a dollar of increased revenue, but thousands of dollars of increased cost for the user of cement and increased profits for the cement merger. Will my hon. friend or the hon. member from South Toronto (Mr. Macdonell), who said last night that those who are able to pay are being taxed, that the big interests are being taxed, tell me how much the cement merger is paying of this tax? I do not think anybody will attempt to answer that question.

Mr. MACDONELL: You had better guess it, you have been guessing a lot.

Mr. TURRIFF: My hon. friend was guessing all last night. He sat down guessing. My hon. friend was speaking for the manufacturers. He said he was a—

Mr. MACDONELL: No my hon. friend is quite mistaken, and I do not think it is fair that he should say that. I did not say that or anything to that effect. I said I was a staunch protectionist.

Mr. TURRIFF: A strong protectionist, yes. If that does not mean the same thing I do not know what it means. However, I take back the expression I used as I certainly would not wish to put wrong words in the mouth of my hon. friend; but I would ask my hon. friend the minister or my hon. friend from South Toronto how much the cement merger is being taxed in this direct tax. Every poor man who sends $5 home to his wife in the Old Country has to put a stamp on his cheque and another on the envelope which carries it. The poor man has to pay. But does the cement merger pay? The man who sends a $5 cheque home to his mother in the Old Country pays exactly the same to carry that cheque and the same amount on that cheque as the cement merger or any other merger pays on a cheque for $250,000 for raw material or for anything else they purchase. That is treating everybody alike in a sense, but it is not making the man who has the money pay in proportion, it is putting the burden on the poor man and letting the rich man go free. As I said a moment ago, let the thing once come home to the people of Canada, let them once realize the position, and they will take care of my hon. friends across the floor of the House.

Mr. MACDONELL: Hear, hear; they will.

Mr. TURRIFF: I have spoken of decreasing the public expenditure. I said that public works could be cut down. What about the officials in Canada? My hon. friend from South Toronto last night asked my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) if he would be willing to cut down the civil service. Well, speaking for myself, I am prepared to answer that question, and I would say by all means cut down the Civil Service.

Mr. MACDONELL: What percentage?

Mr. TURRIFF: I was a civil servant myself a good many years here in Ottawa—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. TURRIFF:—and I know something about the Civil Service. I know that when this Government came into power and when the old Government went out of power, the Civil Service was not undermanned to any extent. The Civil Service has never been undermanned in Canada, no matter which party was in power. Since my hon. friends opposite came into power they have dismissed some 2,000 odd, and they have taken on 10,500 up to a year ago, practically a difference of 8,000; and if the figures were brought up to date, the difference would probably be about 10,000. Are we doing any more work than we were three and a half years ago? The extra civil servants are not the only matter of expense. The other day I moved for a return as to the number of buildings rented by this Government since it came into power. The figures for Ottawa alone show that some $202,000 has been spent in rent for offices to house these extra civil servants who were not required and are not required to-day. You cannot put on civil servants for less than $1,000 apiece per annum; and 10,000 civil servants at that rate mean $10,000,000 per annum. I say that the Civil Service could be cut down to what it was three and a half years ago, or even a great deal less than that, and the public service of Canada would not suffer to the extent of a five cent piece. So that if my hon. friend had wanted to cut down expenses, there was one way in which it could have been done. Take the public buildings being erected all over the country. I have looked through the Estimates, and I see that building after building costing $10,000, $20,000, $30,000 or $35,000 is being erected in places with less than 300 inhabitants.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Where?

Mr. TURRIFF: All through Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Whereabouts in Prince Edward Island?

Mr. TURRIFF: Let my hon. friend look at the Estimates; no doubt he has them in his desk. He will find the figures there. I say that a saving of $10,000,000 could be made in this direction without the public suffering in the slightest degree. I do not say that the present Government is much more to blame than the old one. Time after time, when our own party was in power, I endeavoured to shut off these expenditures on public buildings in different places.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not in Parliament.

Mr. TURRIFF: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Have you your "Hansard" with you?

Mr. TURRIFF: My hon. friend can find it in "Hansard" I advocated it both in the House and out of it. Take the Post Office Department for example. A small town wants a public building, and the Government puts one up at a cost for lot and building of say $25,000. When the building is up, you have to pay interest on that money for all time to come; you have to heat the building and put in a caretaker, and you have a continual stream of repairs, as any one can see by looking at the Estimates. The building has to be kept in repair even from the time it is built, and will cost altogether about $3,000 a year. I have in my own constituency two post offices which are not in public buildings, but the accommodation given to the public is equal to that provided in the city of Ottawa, or in Montreal or Toronto or in any other place in the Dominion. The buildings are of solid brick, of first-class workmanship, perfectly heated, and have tables and chairs and pens and ink for the use of the public. A farmer can come in five miles and get his letter, sit down in the post office and answer it, and I will venture to say that the rent does not amount to $600 a year—not $2,000 or $3,000. Does any one suggest that either of those towns are suffering because they have not a public building for a post office? Not for a moment. The time has come when this Dominion—I do not mean this as a reflection on hon. gentlemen opposite more than on ourselves—but I say the time has come when we have got to get down to brass tacks in the matter of expenditure. We cannot go on as we have been doing for the last twenty-five years. It simply cannot be done. The Finance Minister stated the other day that the fixed charges for interest next year would be $21,500,000, if I remember correctly. When my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition came into power in 1896, the fixed charges for interest were some $10,000,000. When he went out of power in 1911 the fixed interest charges were in round figures $12,000,000, representing an increase of $2,000,000 in about sixteen years. When my hon. friends came into power three and a half years ago the fixed interest charges were $12,000,000, and next year the Finance Minister tells us that they will be $20,500,000, or an increase of $8,500,000. The Finance Minister of course is not responsible for the increase caused by our borrowings on account of the war. He is not to blame for that any more than we are. But the interest on our borrowings on account of the war will not make up that $8,500,000, and to that extent the Finance Minister is responsible.

I say we have come to a time when there must be retrenchment. When is it going to begin? Should it not begin now? Does my hon. friend the Minister of Finance think he is going to make prosperity by taxing the people of Canada? It is absurd to think that he can bring about prosperity by simply putting his hands in the pockets of the people and taking out the money, and the sooner the Government realize the position that Canada is in, the better it will be for the people of this country. We must make a change. We must live more economically. We must spend less money. How can we spend less money and do the least injury to the public service? We could reduce the number of officials, reduce them largely, and not interfere with the public service. We could cut the cost of public works in two and not interfere with the public service. My hon. friend from South Toronto (Mr. Macdonell) was very anxious last night to know whether my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) was willing to see the expenditure on Halifax cut down. I understand that they are spending some $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 in Halifax. I venture the assertion that if the money was properly expended you could do all that is necessary for the development of trade in the city of Halifax for $5,000,000 instead of $20,000,000, and I venture the further assertion that the city of Halifax under the present circumstances would be perfectly willing to accept their share of reduction until conditions are better and the people of this country have more money and until there is not so great a discrepancy as exists at present between the expenditure and the revenue of Canada. I do not suppose it is necessary for me to emphasize that this so-called war tax is not a war tax, or that not one dollar of it is going to be spent in conducting the war. I have the "Hansard" report of the Minister's Budget speech here, in which he says half a dozen times that every dollar that is to be spent on the war will be borrowed. I have no fault to find with that.

Mr. W. T. WHITE: How will the interest be met upon the $150,000,000 that will have been borrowed since the outbreak of war until the end of the fiscal year 1915-16? It amounts to about $7,000,000, and is in consolidated revenue expenditure. I should like to point out that according to my estimate the special taxes will raise an amount slightly in excess of that which will be required to pay the interest upon the amount that will be borrowed for our war expenditure.

Mr. TURRIFF: That is exactly what I have been trying to make clear to my hon. friend all along. I am saying that this money that my hon. friend is proposing to raise by taxes and by the increased tariff is for the ordinary consolidated expenditure, and that interest on the public debt is part of the consolidated expenditure.

Mr. W. T. WHITE: And for war.

Mr. TURRIFF: Interest on our public debt will be paid out of consolidated revenue. But granted that my hon. friend is correct in the suggestion he makes that it would take about $7,000,000, let me point out that he is asking for from between $8,000,000 and $10,000,000 direct taxes and between $22,000,000 and $25,000,000 indirect taxes. That is not all for interest, even taking my hon. friend's own statement.

Mr. W. T. WHITE: How is the pension list to be taken care of?

Mr. TURRIFF: Has my hon. friend paid any pension list?

Mr. WHITE: No, but I am afraid we will have to.

Mr. TURRIFF: What I object to is that my hon. friend tries to make the people believe that these taxes are for the war, whereas they are not for the war at all.

Mr. WHITE: They are.

Mr. TURRIFF: I did not want to take the time of the House to read my hon. friend's remarks, but I am afraid that I shall be obliged to. He is reported to have said—

Mr. MACDONELL: What about the war tax legislation of the United States? There is no war at all.

Mr. TURRIFF: I am delighted that the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Macdonell) has asked me that question, because it is a matter I had in my mind and I perhaps would have forgotten it if he had not mentioned it. My hon. friend brought that matter up last night. Did the United States put on an extra duty to raise that tax?

Mr. MACDONELL: They did.

Mr. TURRIFF: What on?

Mr. MACDONELL: They put it on a very great number of articles. The list is quite as comprehensive as the list in the resolution before this House, and it contains additional matters, but the items that are taxed in our resolution are almost all included in the American Bill.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Not tariff taxation at all.

Mr. MACDONELL: Yes.

Mr. TURRIFF: No, my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonell) is mistaken in that. The United States, on account of the falling revenue, put direct taxes largely on the line of the direct taxes suggested by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. MACDONELL: And a stamp tax, too.

Mr. TURRIFF: A stamp tax, certainly, but they did not raise the tariff.

Mr. MACDONELL: I did not say that they did raise the tariff.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes.

Mr. MACDONELL: No, I never said so and do not intend to say so to-night.

Mr. TURRIFF: That is just exactly what I wanted to tell my hon. friend—that the United States put on direct taxes, a stamp tax, a tax on railway and steamship tickets, just along the line followed by the Minister of Finance, but every dollar that the United States levies goes direct into the treasury, whereas, as a result of what my hon. friend is doing in making a horizontal increase in the tariff, $1 goes into the treasury and from $4 to $5 into the pockets of the manufacturers. That suits the hon. member for South Toronto. He represents a constituency where they are all manufacturers and where there are no farmers. I do not object to him being pleased; I think he has got his way. The manufacturers have made this tariff or they might have made it. They could not have made it any better for themselves. I doubt if they made it, because if they had made it they never would have raised it as high.

An hon. MEMBER: They would not have had the nerve.

Mr. TURRIFF: The manufacturers have considerable nerve, but I do not think that they would have had that much nerve. If my hon. friend had followed the example of the United States he would not have proposed to have increased the tariff at this time.

Mr. W. T. WHITE: But they are not at war.

Mr. TURRIFF: No, but there was a depression just the same as there is here, and it was before the war just as it was here before the war. My hon. friends opposite at least do not need to take the word of any hon. gentleman on this side of the House. Let them read the statement of Sir Edmund Osler, president of the Dominion Bank, and the statement of the general manager of the Bank of Nova Scotia, and see what they say. They say that the war might in some degree have aggravated it, but that the depression was here, that it had been coming, that they had foreseen it, that they had warned the people about it, and that it was not caused by the war. As far as we are concerned, speaking for the province I come from, and I know it applies to Manitoba and Alberta in the same way, from the money point of view, the war is a godsend. Nothing finer from a financial point of view ever happened the West.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is what Sir Edmund Osler says, too.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is that the member for Toronto?

Mr. TURRIFF: Yes, that is the same Sir Edmund Osler. Nothing better ever happened us. We had thousands and thousands of unemployed men in our cities there that we did not know what to do with. They have gone to the war, and they are earning good wages. If we want to sell wheat, oats, barley, horses, cattle, sheep or hogs we can sell them at good prices. Except in that portion of the country where they had no crop at all, where they suffered from drouth, the farmers were better off last year than the year before. This Government cannot put the blame of the hard times on the war. The war has been a godsend to them in many ways. This raising of the tariff that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance is proposing is just simply carrying out the promise made by gentlemen on that side of the House to the manufacturers prior to the election of 1911 for the support and subscriptions that they then received. They are carrying out and fulfilling a promise that up to the present time they did not dare to carry out, they did not dare to fulfil, and if it had not been for the war they would not have dared to fulfil it now. If there were no war, and if the Finance Minister came down with such a precious proposition as that which he has before the House today, why, they would be wiped out of existence. The Minister, notwithstanding the unfortunate position of Canada, has brought forward this measure to add burdens to the backs of the people in order to fulfil a promise made to the manufacturers in 1911.

I have been dealing with this question in a general way; now, I want to deal in a more concrete manner with one or two items. The hon. member for South Toronto said last night in his speech:

> The proposed taxation does not fall on the farmer or on the working man, and both these classes are thoroughly satisfied with the Budget as it stands at present. They ought to be satisfied.

Mr. MACDONELL: Just read the next paragraph.

Mr. TURRIFF (reading):

> Hon. members who came from rural committees can speak as to the farmers; but I can speak as to the men in the cities and they are thoroughly satisfied.

I give my hon. friend credit for being able to speak for his constituency, which is a city constituency. On the other hand, my hon. friend undertook to speak for my constituency. I propose in this House on this occasion, and on all occasions, to speak for my own constituency. I believe I can represent my people reasonably well. I certainly know the views of my people and I can tell the House that the views of the farmers of the West are absolutely opposed to the views expressed by the hon. member from South Toronto (Mr. Macdonell). I shall give to the House a list of articles on which the duty has been raised, to show the effect the increase will have on the people of the West. Rough lumber was formerly free, and it is now 7½ per cent. I do not think that even the British Columbia mill men are going to make money out of that. If I remember aright, and in this I am subject to correction because I have not looked into the matter recently, the United States reduced lumber to $1.15 per thousand feet on the 6th of October, 1913, and made lumber free to those countries that allowed American lumber in free. A year ago last October I was on the Pacific coast when the American tariff came into force, some of the mill men stated that the opening of the American market to them saved them from going into bankruptcy. If the mill men of British Columbia now lose the American market through this tariff, then the Canadian farmer will be taxed extra and the British Columbia mill men will be punished in the United States, so that both sides will suffer, and the country will not get any increased revenue. Oranges and lemons were formerly free, but now there is a duty of 7½ per cent on them; canned meats, formerly 27½ per cent, now 35 per cent; automobiles formerly 35 per cent, now 42½ per cent; blankets 35 per cent, now 42½ per cent; woollen goods 35 per cent, now 42½ per cent; boots and shoes 30 per cent now 37½ per cent; clothing 35 per cent, now 42½ per cent; bituminous coal 53 cents per ton now 53 cents specific and 7½ per cent ad valorem; cotton goods 25 per cent, now 32½ per cent; linen goods, formerly 32½ per cent, now 40 per cent; furniture, 30 per cent, now 37½ per cent; garden seeds, 25 per cent, now 32½ per cent; harness, 15 per cent, now 22½ per cent; ploughs, 20 per cent, now 27½ per cent; pumps, 30 per cent, now 37½ per cent; shovels, 32½ per cent, now 40 per cent; stoves, 35 per cent, now 42½ per cent; threshing machines, 20 per cent, now 27½ per cent; wagons 25 per cent, now 32½ per cent; windmills 20 per cent, now 27½ per cent; drills, harrows, cultivators, rakes, 20 per cent, now 27½ per cent; grain-cutters and straw-cutters, 27½ per cent, now 35 per cent.

I wonder if hon. gentlemen opposite realize what all this means to the farmer. I see by statements in the western newspapers that this extra duty of 7½ per cent on threshing machines means $175 extra duty on a threshing machine outfit over and above what it was when the duty on threshing machines was only 20 per cent. Imagine what it means to the farmer to have to pay an increase of $175 on a threshing machine outfit. Let us see where the manufacturer comes in there and whether he has to pay any of this so-called war tax. I say, Sir, that the manufacturer does not pay to the extent of one dollar but on the other hand he gets a great big bonus. Nowadays, a threshing machine is made practically altogether of iron and steel. I do not suppose there are more than four tons of material that go into a threshing machine and engine. But supposing there were five tons, that material would not cost raw, in steel ingots and iron bars, more than $30 per ton on an average and 7½ per cent on five tons would be about ten or eleven dollars. The finished machine, when it leaves the shops, retails for from $3,000 to $4,000 and at the factory it should be worth $2,000, so that the manufacturer gets 7½ per cent on $2,000, and he only pays 7½ per cent on the raw material which is value for $150. That is the difference and that is where the manufacturer comes in. And yet, the hon. member for South Toronto says that everybody pays the tax. I say the manufacturer does not pay the tax and not only does he not pay anything but he gets a great big bonus. I repeat, that for every dollar the Minister of Finance will get from the farmer in the way of increased duties, the manufacturer will get three, or four, or five dollars more in his own pocket. But the farmer pays it all. The hon. member from South Toronto argued that this increase of the duty was favourable to Great Britain, in that it made the preference to Great Britain comparatively greater than it was before. I have taken the trouble to look through the tariff to see just how this increase of 5 per cent against Great Britain, and 7½ per cent against the rest of the world affects a lot of articles. I hold in my hand a list covering two sheets of foolscap, which shows the percentage of increase against Great Britain is a good deal greater than the percentage of increase against the United States. I shall put this statement before the House.

On axle grease, for example, the percentage increase against Great Britain is 40 per cent. A man buying a case of axle grease under the new duty, which is increased 5 per cent under the British preference, will pay 40 per cent more than he paid under the former duty. The duty from the United States was 20 per cent and the increase of 7½ per cent is only a percentage increase of 37½ per cent.

Mr. BLAIN: Cannot all axle grease be made in Canada?

Mr. TURRIFF: It is possible that in my hon. friend's part of the country they may make their butter poor enough so that it can be put into axle grease, and therefore it can be made in Canada.

Mr. BLAIN: What about the real question: cannot the axle grease be made in Canada? Axle grease is largely used in nearly every part of the country, and is it not nearly all made in Canada now?

Mr. TURRIFF: If my hon. friend is correct in that, why does the Minister of Finance put an extra 5 per cent duty on for the benefit of the manufacturer. If all the axle grease is made in Canada now, is the increased duty going to give him any more revenue? But the farmer pays it all the same.

The following table which I have prepared will show the former British preference duty on articles largely used; the percentage of increase in the British preference under the proposal now made by the Finance Minister, as well as the former general tariff duty on these articles and the percentage of increase now proposed, and in every item it will be seen that the British preference gets the worst of it.

This table proves that the percentage increase against British goods is larger than the percentage increase against United States goods. Can these be the same people who three and a half years ago said: "No truck or traffic with the United States"?

Mr PUGSLEY: They do not look the same; they look more depressed.

Mr. WILCOX: Not as depressed as my hon. friend.

Mr. GRAHAM: Their salaries are better.

Mr. TURRIFF: This table shows what my hon. friend the Minister of Finance is doing to encourage trade with Great Britain. We had an example this afternoon from my hon. friend the member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham). He told us what hon. gentlemen on the other side think of the preference to Great Britain. He had no use for it. My hon. friend the member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) made the same statement a few years ago. "Give us," he said, "a majority in the House, and we will show you what we will do with the British preference." My hon. friends opposite now have a majority and they have shown us what they propose to do with the British preference. This Government could have got along perfectly well without increasing the tariff; but not satisfied with increasing the general tariff, they have undertaken to increase the tariff on the goods that we are bringing in from Great Britain. My hon. friend the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) stated yesterday that there was a great deal of difficulty in bringing in goods from Great Britain, owing to the extra freight and shortage of boats.

My hon. friends opposite now propose an extra tax on British goods for the purpose of shutting off trade with Great Britain. The tax is put on for no other reason. If my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has to have more money, if the Government will not shut off expenditure, if it is bound to have an extra $30,000,000, impose the taxes on the outside world; and if you cannot do it in that way, impose a direct tax and take your $10,000,000; tax the banks and the trust companies and the insurance companies; tax every one, make them pay what money you want; but for Heaven's sake keep your unholy and disloyal hands off the British preference.

Three or four years ago we were told throughout the West that because we advocated a free market in the United States in which to sell our goods, we were hardly loyal.

Mr. OLIVER: Disloyal.

Mr. TURRIFF: That we were absolutely disloyal, as my hon. friend has remarked. Let us see what the position is now. I do not want to draw invidious comparisons between one part of the country and the other; but many people down East called us disloyal because we wanted to sell our crops in the best market. I think I am justified in pointing out what has taken place in the last six months. Have our friends in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, the three provinces that were picked out as holding many disloyal people because they wanted to sell their crops in the best markets—have they shown themselves less loyal than others? Have they been less ready to volunteer for service on the firing line than people in any other part of Canada?

Mr. AMES: Many of those who voted against reciprocity have gone to the front.

Mr. TURRIFF: I do not doubt that. I have said, time and again, in this House that I have never met a disloyal Conservative nor a disloyal Liberal, so far as I know, in my life. I should be sorry to think that there were many disloyal people in Canada. There are many kinds of loyalty. One kind consists in supplying good goods for the use of the army.

Let me point out another thing that has taken place in the West. The Grain Growers' Association of Manitoba, the Grain Growers' Association of Saskatchewan, the United Farmers of Alberta have all, at their conventions, held during the past few months, carried unanimously resolutions calling on this Government to do away with the duties against Great Britain and to make up any lack of revenue that may follow by a direct tax on the land—on the farmers' land. And, remember, there is no politics in these organizations; they are composed of Liberals and Conservatives alike. And these are the people who a few years ago were accused of disloyalty by the very men who, now that Great Britain is in trouble, now that she is fighting the fight of her life, fighting for her national existence and ours, and when her success depends upon her commerce, come forward and say: We will help you by sending some men, but with the other hand we will try to cut your throat by preventing your goods from coming into Canada. And I say again, once let the people of Canada realize the position—

An hon. MEMBER: Louder.

Mr. TURRIFF: Oh, I will speak loud enough for the people in the West to hear; don't you fear. I say, let the people of Canada realize the position, and my hon. friend the Solicitor General will be piping lower instead of louder than he is now.

I have another list here, a long one also, in which the increases against Great Britain and against the United States are exactly the same. I have another list in which the percentage of increase is somewhat larger against the United States and the rest of the world than it is against Great Britain. I have selected these items from the tariff because they particularly affect the settlers of the West.

There has been a good deal of talk in the last month or two about greater production. Our friends the manufacturers sent a delegation to Winnipeg to meet with the grain growers. They proposed that an extra million acres of wheat should be sown next spring—that new lands should be broken to the extent of a million acres and wheat sown. No farmer would ever have suggested that. Any one who knows anything about farming in the West knows that you might just as well throw your seed away as sow it on the sod. You would not get a crop worth harvesting. The farmers showed that this was not practicable. Then it was proposed that $50,000,000 should be borrowed by this Government to place people on the land. The cry was "Back to the land." Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary to borrow $50,000,000 to get people to go on the land. Nor is it necessary to tell the farmers to put in a million acres extra of wheat. The farmer is not a fool altogether. He will put in an extra crop if that crop is going to pay him. All you have to do to get the farmer to put in all the land possible, all you have to do in order to get the people back to the land, is to make the conditions such that they can make a good living out of the land. But what is the Government doing? It is putting a load on the back of the farmer. The Grain Growers' Guide put it very well a month or so ago when it said: Just let the manufacturers get off the farmer's back and there will be no trouble about oack to the land and no trouble about production.

Just one word further about the effect of these extra taxes on the farmers. As soon as this war is over and the price of wheat goes down to normal again, and while this added burden remains, hundreds and thousands on the western plains will leave the land. Why? Because they cannot make a living on the land under the circumstances. The Minister of Finance is putting on these extra duties. But will he take off these duties and put the tariff back where it was as soon as the war is over? He will do nothing of the kind. Those taxes are there to stay, as long as the hon. gentlemen opposite can keep them there. When the war is over the argument will be: We have created vested interests; you cannot now take off this protection, for it would mean failure among the manufacturers. So these burdens are added to the burdens of the farmers and artisans; living is made more expensive; conditions will be worse for workingman and farmer. And what are the compensating advantages? Practically there are none.

My hon. friend from West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham)—and I do not intend to follow him back for five thousand years and all over the face of the earth—said that unemployment was an issue at the present time. Yes, and it was an issue prior to 1896. But it was not an issue from 1896 to 1911. But hon. gentlemen opposite are back in power, and unemployment is once more an issue. The hon. gentleman stated also that two days' work a week, at eight hours a day, should be sufficient, if everybody worked, to produce all that is being produced at this time. I do not blame my hon. friend for trying to bring the labouring classes to that point of view, because under this Government and under the tariff they have enacted, two days' work a week is about all that the working people are going to be able to get in the near future. So my hon. friend, I think, is quite right in bringing that forward. My hon. friend also stated that Great Britain had not been able to get one follower in the line of free trade; but he forgot to mention that to-day free trade Great Britain is financing the world. Where are all the protective nations getting their money to carry on the war? From Great Britain. Were it not for being able to get money in Great Britain we could not take part in the war, because the minister has to borrow every dollar to send our forces there—and $30,000,000 more. My hon. friend said that when British preference was introduced it came very near putting the pottery works at St. Johns right out of business. The preferential duty against Great Britain on pottery ware was 20 per cent. Now it is going to be 25 per cent. I say if the potteries in St. Johns, with a protection of 20 per cent and with high rates of transportation on that class of goods, cannot live, in the name of common sense let them shut up business and go into something that can get on with 20 per cent protection and allow some revenue to come into the treasury of Canada. The business that cannot live under these circumstances is not worth preserving in Canada. It is out of place in Canada, where there are many factories that we are bolstering up with new protection, the money invested in which would be far better invested in something that would pay a reasonable return—and there are in Canada many opportunities for the investing of money.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend has not answered the question as to his opinion of the argument of my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) that the tax on bituminous coal should not go on because it will be too hard on the railways that consume the coal.

Mr. TURRIFF: I agree that the tax on bituminous coal should not go on. I do not believe that one of the taxes imposed should go on. An additional objection is that it will put an argument into the hands of the railway companies for an increase in freight rates when they have to pay 10 cents a ton more for coal. Is my hon. friend satisfied to put on an extra 10 cents on coal for the railroads and have every one of the farmers he represents pay extra freight rates to make up the additional cost of coal to the railway companies?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not said so. We are taxing the consumers of coal, but the hon. member for Halifax objects to that because the railways have to pay and argues that they cannot stand it. I am asking the opinion of my hon. friend who now has the Floor upon this point.

Mr. TURRIFF: If you are asking for the opinion of the hon. member for Halifax, he is able to express his own opinions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Your opinion.

Mr. TURRIFF: I am against the extra taxes on coal and on everything else the minister is taxing. I would say not to put on any of the taxes, and then you would suit me and my hon. friend to the right (Mr. A. K. Maclean).

My hon. friend from South Toronto (Mr. Macdonell) yesterday said that it was necessary for the Government to pay those cash subsidies to Mackenzie and Mann in order that the bonds guaranteed by this Government and by many of the provincial governments might not become a charge on the respective Governments that guaranteed them. If the Government are running away with the idea that by giving the cash subsidy they have given to the Canadian Northern railway they are going to relieve this Government or any other Provincial Government from the guarantees of bonds that they have made, they are making a great mistake. They are only putting off the evil day for a few years, and the day will come before very long when this Government, after having done what they did a year ago, will have to take over the Canadian Northern railway and will have to expend another $50,000,000 in making it fit to compete, and they will add another $300,000,000 to the debt of Canada. They are not obviating any of those results, they are simply putting off the evil day for a very few years.

I only trust that the Minister of Finance may think better of some of these proposals that he has made and that he will give a little consideration to the view of the farmer and of the poor man; that he will, if he has to raise money, so arrange his taxes that they will fall not evenly per capita of the population, but evenly according to the ability of the men to pay. My hon. friend does not care to take up the matter of taxing incomes, or land; but I see by the press that the local government in his own province of Ontario to-day has come forward with a proposition to put a direct tax on all lands in the different municipalities, to raise $1,800,000. Could not the Minister of Finance adopt something on that line? Such a tax would have this advantage, that the man who has property worth $1,000 would only pay one-tenth as much as the man with $10,000 worth, whereas all I can say in favour of the proposition of the Minister of Finance is that he is following out one of the biblical rules that to him that hath shall be given and from him that hath not shall be taken even that which he hath.

Mr. WM. WRIGHT (Muskoka): There are many matters that come before this House which receive a measure of consideration, are dealt with by Parliament, are recorded in the statute-book, or pass into oblivion, and we hear no more of them in this House. But that hardy annual, the Budget speech, buds and blossoms and sheds its fragrance over this House once a year, and gentlemen on the Government side seem to be quite satisfied with the perfume; but gentlemen on the opposite side, for some reason, seem to become irritated. It is very peculiar how we differ with regard to these matters.

The Budget brings before us many matters for our consideration, among others the trade policy. How shall we raise the revenue? The people have come to be divided into three schools. We have those who believe that free trade should be the dominant consideration in any tariff. Then there are those who believe that protection should be kept to the front, and there are those who believe that we should attach more importance to a tariff for revenue. The Budget now before us is known as the war Budget, and as far as I have been able to put my finger upon the pulse of public opinion I have found that the general opinion of this country favours the proposals of the Finance Minister. So far as I have been able to learn very little objection has been raised in the country. It is generally conceded that the tax has been laid upon the public in such a manner as to fall upon those best able to bear it. It is true the non. gentleman who has just taken his seat, and who usually sheds a lot of briny tears over the farmers of the West, objects strenuously, as he always has done since I have had the pleasure of hearing his voice in this House. I hope the farmers of the West have better friends in this House than the hon. gentleman, for it is well within my recollection that when a move was made by some of us on this side of the House, then in Opposition, to lower the duties on farm implements, a boon we will suppose to the farmers of the West, we met with objections from the hon. gentleman and others associated with him, who were quite satisfied with the tariff as it was; and as long as his friends were in power, he did not care how high the tariff was against the farmers of the West. I am just reminded by an hon. member that he even spoke against the proposal to lower the duties.

It must be conceded that there is room for honest difference of opinion with regard to the exigencies of tariff. Under the proposals before the House the duties generally are being raised 7½ per cent, and the duties against Great Britain only 5 per cent. It is true that the hon. gentleman who preceded me, by figuring out on percentages, tried to show that the people of Great Britain were not favoured under the present proposals to the same extent as the manufacturers of the United States. I want to unqualifiedly deny that. The people of Great Britain have the advantage of a 5 per cent increase against a 7½ per cent increase against the United States and other countries. An effort is being made, and no doubt will be made, if we are to judge by what has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite and the press who support them, to fasten a charge of disloyalty upon the Conservative party for having slightly increased the duty on goods coming from Great Britain. I do not believe that any charge of disloyalty can be laid against the Conservative party on that score. The people of Great Britain have a tariff that we will suppose suits themselves; they adjust it with a view to the needs of Great Britain, and the colonies have no preference whatever, not a particle, in the tariff arrangements of Great Britain. In fact when we look into the figures we find exactly the opposite. While a great country like Germany is able to send practically all she produces into Great Britain duty free, some of the colonies are taxed and taxed very heavily on their goods going into Great Britain. One would naturally think from listening to the discussion on free trade that Great Britain allows all goods to enter free of customs duty, but such is far indeed from being the case. Let me read some of the duties that are collected at the ports of Great Britain annually on various articles:

Tobacco	$86,270,625
Tea	30,759,395
Rum	11,940,605
Brandy	5,551,460
Other spirits	3,341,910
Wine	5,549,785
Currants	609,080
Raisins	1,190,795
Coffee	852,050
Cocoa and chocolate	1,658,455
Sugar and glucose	15,258,930
Motor spirit	3,609,755
Other articles	994,630
Total	$167,587,475

These figures do not include what is collected by the Isle of Man, the figures for which were $466,690. I would point out that that sum is vastly in excess of the whole customs duties of the Dominion of Canada. By way of illustration, I will just refer to the item of tea. As I pointed out a moment ago, Germany has free access to Britain on practically every thing she produces, while a country that lives under the British flag and whose people recognize the King of England as their King is taxed $25,000,000 out of the $30,000,000 collected by Great Britain on tea. I am only pointing that out to show that the colonies get no favours from Great Britain with regard to tariff. In fact, it is just the opposite, but I am not charging Great Britain with disloyalty on that account. She makes her tariff to suit herself, and while the peculiar brand of free trade that prevails there may suit the British people, I do not believe that it would as well suit the people of Canada.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have listened with much interest to the list which my hon. friend has just read. Let me ask him whether a single product of Canada pays a dollar of duty when it enters Great Britain?

Mr. WRIGHT: I should not like to say, because I am not familiar with everything that is produced in Canada. I should imagine we produce some sugar and other articles in this country, but I do not know whether they are exported to Great Britain. What I was saying was that some of the articles in this list are produced in British colonies.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am speaking of Canada.

Mr. WRIGHT: Let me point out that while this may suit the people of Great Britain—it is absolutely unsuited to the people of Canada. Taking up for a moment that item of tea, I want to show how the duty is levied and the unfairness of it. Let us take some poor person in Great Britain, some washerwoman, or some people in poor circumstances, who wish to go and have their tea. They buy tea worth 20 cents a pound, but they pay five pence, or ten cents, a pound duty; so that the washerwoman pays a 100 per cent duty on her tea. The rich chocolate manufacturer, who is protected up to the hilt, the iron manufacturer, the lord of the manor, or the wealthy gentleman who uses tea that costs $4 or $5 a pound pays ten cents a pound duty; in other words, he pays ten per cent duty while the very poor pay a 100 per cent duty. That may be good enough for the people of Great Britain, but it is not good enough for the people of this country. I have no objection to this tariff so long as it is confined within the borders of Great Britain.

Are we in a position to follow the example of Great Britain in regard to trade matters? When Great Britain adopted the present policy she was then the greatest manufacturing nation on earth; she had become so under a very strong protective tariff which had been kept upon the statute books for centuries. After they had become the greatest manufacturing nation upon earth, after they had found that they could not raise enough food to feed themselves, and after they found that they had to import immense quantities of raw material, they said: We are the greatest trading nation on earth; we have to buy and sell abroad and we believe that free trade would work out to our advantage. Are we in that position to-day? Have we ever been in that position? Have we ever been in such a position that we can call ourselves the greatest manufacturing nation on earth? Have we ever been in a position where we had to import nearly all of the food we consumed, or have we ever been in a position where we had to import all our raw materials from across the sea? We have never been in that position and I look over the pages of history and look in vain to see the name of a single country that ever started and became the biggest and foremost manufacturing nation and did it under free trade. It is true that Great Britain has a very great trade to-day, much greater than it had when she took up the policy of free trade. It is true that the trade of Canada is much greater than when we first adopted the policy of protection, it is true that the United States have a much greater trade than they had when they first adopted protection, and it is true that Germany and France are greater to-day than ever they were before. The thing is true of all the prominent nations of the earth; so that the fact that Great Britain's trade is greater than it was proves absolutely nothing in favour of free trade.

I think it is manifest to every man that the nation beginning at the bottom which wishes to build up its industries must from the very nature of things give a certain measure of protection to its industries for a time at least, and that is just what we are doing in Canada. That has been the policy followed by the Conservative party and that has been the policy followed by the Reform party. The only difference between us is that we practise what we preach and hon. gentlemen opposite preach one thing and when they get on the treasury benches they practise the very opposite. I fancy the people of this country have come to look upon the gentlemen who now occupy the benches opposite as being absolutely unreliable in regard to any trade policy. They cannot fail to remember the claims that were made during the years they were in opposition, they cannot fail to remember how the manufacturers were described as robbers and thieves, they lacked adjectives to adequately describe the people who happened to be engaged in manufacturing. We can remember that old knight of blue ruin who used to go up and down the concessions and side roads and picture to the farmers the awful conditions under which they lived. These hon. gentlemen said: Just let us into power and we will do away with every vestige of protection. The right hon. gentleman who now leads the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), on the platform in Winnipeg, when looking out on those vast prairies of the West, said: Put us in power and we will give you free trade as they have it in Britain. At that very time, Mr. Speaker, they had a hard-and-fast bargain with the big manufacturers that they should keep the protection that they had if they only helped them to get into power. On the strength of that bargain these big manufacturers stood behind them and helped them into power, and they got the advantage when these hon. gentlemen got into office. They put the duties into such shape as to help the large manufacturers. When it was pointed out that in raising these duties they were hurting the farmers of the country, they said: So much the worse for the farmers; the manufacturers are something tangible, we can keep hold of them and we propose to keep them. Then they made an effort to hoodoo the farmers into the belief that they were doing something for them. The present Government has done more to reduce the duties in two or three years than was done by these hon. gentlemen during the fifteen years that they were in power.

A great deal has been said as to the assistance that was given to Great Britain by what is termed the British preference. I am willing to concede everything to hon. gentlemen opposite that they are entitled to, and to admit that they did put a British preference upon the statute books, which before the introduction of the present Budget amounted to 33⅓ per cent. Let us give hon. gentlemen opposite credit for whatever they did in that regard. But, before they adopted the preference, they raised the duties on a large number of articles we import from Britain, and they lowered the duties upon, or made free, a large number of articles coming from the United States, so that when the preference went into effect people in Great Britain who wanted to get into our markets were in as bad a position as before the preference went on. Looking it over and figuring it out, Mr. Speaker, you will find that for every $100 worth of goods that came in from Great Britain, $25 worth came in free under the Tariff Act. You will find that under that beautiful arrangement 45 per cent of goods from the United States were brought into this country free. This is what these hon. gentlemen were doing for England. In the two or three years since the present Government came into power, the percentage has remained about the same, namely, about 25 per cent coming in free from Great Britain; but there are only 37 per cent of goods coming in free from the United States. Britain has received an advantage equivalent to 8 per cent in her favour since the present Government came into power in respect to the free list. That is something we have done for the people of Great Britain or for the people of this country, because I have always been at a loss to follow the reasoning of our free trade friends. They tell us that the consumer always pays the duty, and yet they said they were doing a great deal for Great Britain, they lowered the duty to some extent on goods coming from there. How the preference could be of any particular advantage to Great Britain, if the people of Canada got the whole benefit of it, is one of these things that it is very difficult to understand, but hon. gentlemen opposite are always arguing on both sides of the question.

I will follow the hon. member (Mr. Turriff) for a few minutes in some of the claims he has put forward. He told us that he would lower the expenditure so that it would equal the revenue, but what he means by that I do not quite understand. The present Government takes the ground that it would not be in the interests of the people of Canada to cut down the expenditure to a very large extent suddenly. They have cut down all the controllable expenditure that they could, and they have taken what I consider fair and just means to increase the revenue. I think we can safely leave it to the people of Canada as to whether the proposition advanced by the hon. member or the policy of the Government is the wiser. The hon. gentleman told us that the Government had been paying huge sums to Mackenzie and Mann and to the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, but I would remind him that the present Government is not responsible for either of these great enterprises, both of which were carried forward to such an advanced stage by the late Government that it would have been against the interests of the country to stop them now. The hon. gentlemen opposite are responsible for the initiation of these two transcontinental enterprises which were designed to be completed about the same time. When they are completed there will be two transcontinental roads in competition with the Canadian Pacific railway, or three transcontinental roads competing for the business that had up to the present time been done by one road. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the Liberal Government ought not to have given the assistance they gave to either one of these roads, or that they should have forced the two to amalgamate, and thus give us one great trunk transcontinental line in competition with the Canadian Pacific railway, which, I think, would be sufficient. I believe an arrangement could have been entered into, between the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern railway, by which one of these lines would have answered every purpose. At all events the present Government is not responsible for the undertaking of these two railroads. The hon. gentleman told us that a large number of buildings had been erected during the last year in little villages and town all over Canada, but my information is that there were only two or three public buildings erected during the whole course of last summer in comparatively small places, and none of these were erected in places of 300 population as the hon. gentleman said. If there is such a case it certainly has never come to my knowledge and it does not exist, as the hon. gentleman said it did, in the province of Ontario. As the hour is late, Mr. Speaker, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Hon. W. T. White, the House adjourned at 10.53 p.m.

Thursday, February 25, 1915.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

QUESTIONS.

[Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.]

EXPENDITURE, 1912, 1913 and 1914.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. What was the total expenditure of Canada, for ordinary expenditure, capital expenditure, and statutory expenditure, respectively, for each month of the calendar year 1912?

2. What was the total expenditure of Canada, for ordinary expenditure, capital expenditure and statutory expenditure, respectively, for each month of the calendar year 1913?

3. What was the total expenditure of Canada, for ordinary expenditure, capital expenditure, and statutory expenditure, respectively, for each month of the calendar year 1914?

The above represents the payments which passed through the books of the Finance Department up to the last day of the month.

MAJOR W. S. HUGHES.

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. When was Major W. S. Hughes appointed inspector of penitentiaries?

2. What salary does he receive as such?

3. Does Inspector Hughes hold any other office or position from which he receives pay from the Federal Government? If so, when was he appointed to such office or position, and what is the amount of his remuneration?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. March 4, 1913.

2. $3,700 per annum.

3. Major Hughes is the officer commanding the 21st Battalion, Canadian Expeditionary Force. He was appointed October 20, 1914, and receives the pay of a lieutenant colonel commanding a regiment, viz.: $5 per diem with $1.25 field allowance per diem and $1 command pay per diem; in all $7.25 per diem.

AMHERST POST OFFICE SITE.

Mr. LAW:

1. What amount did the Government pay for the site of the proposed new post office at Amherst, N.S., and when?
2. What is the size of the site?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. On 21st October, 1914, the Exchequer Court awarded the sum of $30,000. A cheque for $20,000 was paid at Amherst on or about the 12th November, 1913, and another cheque for $10,000, balance due, was paid on 23rd December, 1914.

2. 95 by 93 feet, with the use of a right of way 12 feet wide.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY.

Mr. GRAHAM:

1. How many miles of the Hudson Bay railway are completed?
2. How many miles of steel have been laid?
3. When will the railway be completed?
4. When is it anticipated that the harbours and terminals will be completed, including the elevator??

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. The road bed is completed and fully ballasted to mile 56, and partially ballasted to mile 175.

2. 214 miles of main line.

3. Autumn of 1917.

4. It is anticipated that works will be in position to ship grain before close of 1917; but a couple of years further work will be required before terminals can be regarded as completed.

Mr. LANCTOT:

What has been the expenditure on the Hudson Bay Railway construction since 1912?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. Expenditure on Hudson Bay Railway construction since 1912:

1912-13	$1,009,063.15

[Mr. Edwards.]

THE MARRIAGE LAWS.

Mr. MURPHY:

1. Has the Government, or any member thereof, communicated with any provincial government with regard to revising or amending the Marriage Laws?
2. If not, is it the intention of the Government to do so?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. No.
2. No.

DISMISSALS.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE:

1. Is Mr. L. O Vallée, of Rimouski employed by the Federal Government at the present time? If not, has he resigned or been dismissed, and for what reason?
2 Who is his successor, and what is his salary.
3. What salary did Mr. L. O. Vallée receive?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. No. Services dispensed with on account of absenting himself from duty without leave.

2. J. A. Tremblay. $400.

3. $400.

Mr. THOMSON:

1. Has W. M. Thomson been dismissed from the postmastership at Fort Qu'Appelle?
2 If so, what was the reason for his dismissal?
3. Who has been appointed in his stead, and on whose recommendation has such appointment been made?

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Yes.

2. For distributing his private correspondence and accounts through the post office without prepayment of postage, thus defrauding the public revenue.

3. Mr. John R. Hamilton, on recommendation of Mr. A. B. Gillis.

Mr. THOMSON:

What are the names of the postmasters dismissed from office since 10th October, 1911, in the constituency of Qu'Appelle and what are the names of the respective post offices in which they acted?

Mr. CASGRAIN:

The names of the postmasters removed from office since the 10th October, 1911, in the electoral district of Qu'Appelle, and the names of the post offices, are as follows:

Broadview, A. L. Brown; Fleming, R. C. Chappell; Fort Qu'Appelle, W. M. Thomson; Golden Plain, Thomas Kivell; Grenfell, Harvey Coy; Kipling Station, P. M. Dermody; Montmartre, J. A. Gouin; Qu'Appelle, Chas. L. Bailey; Red Jacket, Charles Wilkins.

MONTREAL DISTRICT PUBLIC WORKS ENGINEER.

Mr. LANCTOT:

1. Has Mr. L. Michaud, Public Works engineer for the Montreal district, been dismissed? If so, has a successor been appointed, and what is his name?

2. If dismissed, does the said L. Michaud receive a pension allowance?

Mr. ROGERS:

1 and 2. No; on the 16th ultimo Mr. Michaud was appointed consulting engineer for the Montreal district at the same salary he received as district engineer; on the same date Mr. J. L. Dansereau was appointed as acting district engineer.

WAR SUPPLIES—SHOVEL-SHIELDS.

Mr. BOIVIN:

1. Were any combination shovels and shields ordered by the Government at the time of the mobilization of the first Canadian contingent? If so, how many?

2. What was the price paid for each shovel?

3. By whom were these shovels manufactured, and where?

4. To whom did the manufacturer ship them, and to what point?

5. How were they brought into Canada?

6. Who is the patentee of this combination shovel?

7. Does the patentee hold any position in the Department of Militia and Defence? If so, what position?

8. Did the patentee receive any royalty as the inventor of this combination shovel?

9. Were samples or specifications of this combination shovel submitted to the British war office for report as to its suitability for war purposes?

10. If so, did the war office make a report, and was it favourable or unfavourable?

Major-General HUGHES:

1. Yes, 25,000.

2. $1.35 each.

3. Midvale Steel Company, Philadelphia, Pa.

4. William Price, Quebec.

5. Via Grand Trunk railway system.

6. Miss Ena MacAdam.

7. Yes; private secretary to minister.

8. No.

9. No; such submission is not necessary, but all the other nations engaged in the war are now adopting similar devices.

10. Answered by No. 9.

Mr. BOIVIN:

1. Was there a Canadian patent issued on or about the 25th of August, 1914, for a combination shovel and shield?

2. If so, who is the patentee?

3. On what date was the application for this patent filed?

4. Were any special instructions given the examiner in charge in regard to expediting the issuance of this patent?

5. If so, at whose request was this special rush order given?

6. Did the Minister of Militia write the Minister of Agriculture in regard to this patent for a combination shovel, requesting that it be given special consideration?

7. Is there a provision in the Patent Act giving the Government permission to use, without paying compensation, any patent or invention?

Mr. J. D. REID:

1. Yes.

2. Ena MacAdam.

3. 17th August, 1914.

4. Yes, as the invention was required for use in connection with the war.

5. The examiner in charge of the application was instructed to expedite its examination by the Deputy Minister of Agriculture.

6. No.

7. No.

THE QUEBEC BRIDGE.

Mr. LANCTOT:

What has been the expenditure for the Quebec bridge since 1912?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. Expenditure on Quebec bridge since March 31, 1912:

1912-13	$1,512,825.96

" 1913-14	23,990,160.64
" 1914-15	16,726,213.36
Total	$68,888,065.24

LAPRAIRIE RETAINING WALL.

Mr. LANCTOT:

1. How much money has been paid to Messrs. Duranceau and Poupart, to this date, for the construction of the retaining wall at Laprairie?

2. What amount is required to complete the said construction?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. $49,300.

2. About $27,379, exclusive of cost of inspection.

DEPUTY MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE.

*Mr. TURRIFF:

1. At the time of his appointment in the Inland Revenue Department was Mr. J. U. Vincent, now Deputy Minister of Inland Revenue, a shareholder in the Ottawa Wine Vault Company?

2. Does Deputy Minister Vincent still hold shares in his own name in the said company?

3. If not, are any shares of the said company held for him in the name of some other person or persons, in trust?

4. Has the Ottawa Wine Vault Company a bonded warehouse?

5. Are there any official or business relations between the Ottawa Wine Vault Company and the Department of Inland Revenue? If so, what are they?

Mr. BLONDIN:

1. No, and was never a shareholder, directly or indirectly.

2. No.

3. No.

4. Yes.

5. Yes. Hold license as bonding warehousemen and purchase of Tally-Ho spring water.

DREDGING AT LONGUEUIL.

*Mr. TURRIFF:

1. Has the attention of the Government been drawn to the reports published in the Montreal Gazette and the Montreal Star of December 14, 1914, of the proceedings at the opening of the new plant at Longueuil of the Armstrong-Whitworth Company of Canada, in which the following paragraph appears:

"The function was also notable for an announcement from J. H. Rainville, M.P., for Chambly-Verchères, that before a month borings would be commenced for extensive dredging on the south shore to provide better transportation facilites for the huge new industry. This dredging work would be started in the spring and would involve an expenditure of $1,250,000."

2. What authority had Mr. J. H. Rainville for making the announcement mentioned?

3. Has the Government any interest, direct or indirect, in the Armstrong-Whitworth Company of Canada?

4. If not, is it the policy of the Government to do dredging at the public expense for the private benefit of such a company as the Armstrong-Whitworth Company?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. This matter has not been brought to the attention of the Government.

2, 3 and 4. Answered by No. 1.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

Mr. Turriff: For a return showing the cost of furnishing the Government offices in each of the said buildings referred to in the answer to question No. 6 of February 9, and answered February 15, as per page 161 of unrevised "Hansard."

Mr. German: For a return showing:

1. Whether the Government purchased from the Canada Cycle and Motor Company tires for motor trucks for the first Canadian contingent; if so, at what price per set such tires were purchased, and how many.

2. Whether prices have been obtained by the Government for tires for motor trucks for the second contingent, and if so, what price per set has been so obtained.

Mr. Michaud: For a return showing:

1. How much money was collected by subcollectors of customs at Edmundston, N.B., at Clair, N.B., at St. Leonards, N.B., and at Green River, N.B., each and every year for the last five fiscal years.

2. What salaries are paid in connection with each of said ports each year.

PROGRESS OF RECRUITING.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM: Reports are printed in the newspapers as to the recruiting not being satisfactory. I have been assured privately that the recruiting is satisfactory to the Government. Does the Government care to make a statement to the House and to the country as to whether the recruiting at present is satisfactory to them?

Major-General HUGHES (Minister of Militia): So far as my department is concerned, and that is the one chiefly interested, I shall reply to the hon. gentleman's question by giving a number of instances. A few weeks ago, in six hours, 650 men were raised for a cavalry regiment. In some towns in Eastern Ontario, within 24 hours after the call of the third contingent, we had far more men than the quota desired. In places where the men have not responded it has been due to the fact that the corps have not been encouraged, or that we have not had accommodation wherein to place the men just at the time. We have now every regiment in Canada up to full strength. Edmonton recruited in twelve days up to full strength. The Nova Scotia cavalry regiment is over strength to-day. I could raise a regiment in Cape Breton in four hours if I wanted to. I am now speaking from returns that I have received. In short, at the present moment, according to the returns we have got, I could raise three more contingents inside of three weeks, if necessary.

WAR SUPPLIES AT SALISBURY PLAINS.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Major-General HUGHES: In answer to some questions asked by the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) a day or so ago regarding the "discarding in great quantities at Salisbury Plains of wagons, harness, Ross rifles, etc.," inquiry reveals that the wagons and harness have been subjected to four months of extremely hard usage, very bad weather, hauling very heavy loads over very rough roads and through deep mud. Naturally, the wear and tear was great. New wagons from Canada were not available, therefore it was deemed wise and proper to outfit the Canadians on going into the field in this great struggle with the best wagons on hand. Accordingly, they were supplied with the new wagons from the British stores. Regarding the harness the same holds good. The harness had been in use all winter and it was not deemed advisable to send the boys to the front with the old harness so they were equipped when leaving for France with the best harness available at the time. In so far as the rumour concerning the discarding of the Ross rifle is concerned, immediately after the hon. gentleman brought up the matter, the following cablegram was sent:

Ottawa, Ont., February 22, 1915.

Earl Kitchener, War Office,
London.

Rumour that Canadian cavalry are to discard Long Ross and use short rifle. We are preparing a new rifle carrier which is most perfect and removes any inconvenience to rider in carrying a long rifle. I respectfully request that Long Ross rifle should not be discarded.

Sam. Hughes.

In reply to this I received the following cablegram:

London, February 23, 1915.

Major General Hughes,
Ottawa.

Your telegram about Canadian cavalry rifles. There is no such intention.

Kitchener.

Further comment is unnecessary.

THE MINISTER OF MILITIA.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY: I would ask the Minister of Militia if there is anything in the rumour that he intends to accompany one of the contingents to the other side.

Major-General HUGHES: I hope the hon. gentleman will not hold me down to answer all the rumours that are in circulation. Much as I might have in my own heart the desire to go, there are other duties to which I have to attend, and possibly other men can attend to going with the contingent just as well as I could.

STATUS OF OVERSEAS DOMINIONS.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY: In the absence of the Prime Minister, I wish to bring to the attention of the minister who is leading the House a paragraph in a cabled report of a speech delivered by Sir George Perley before the Victorian League in London, two days ago, in which he is reported to have said:

> Canada and the other dominions were fighting, he pointed out, because they were part and parcel of the empire. The time had now arrived when something more than autonomy must be given the dominions. They must be given a voice not only in the foreign policy but in issues of war and peace and all matters vitally affecting the Empire as a whole.

In view of the information given to the House on this subject a few weeks ago by the Prime Minister, I desire to know whether in making the statement I have just quoted Sir George Perley was voicing merely his own opinions or was acting under instructions from or with the authority of the Government.

Hon. ROBERT ROGERS: The Government do not take any notice of newspaper reports such as the one just read by my hon. friend. The statement made by the Prime Minister a short time ago in this House still stands.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT AMENDMENT.

MEMBERS ON ACTIVE SERVICE.

On motion of Hon. C. J. Doherty (Minister of Justice), Bill No. 57, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act, was read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Sevigny in the Chair.

On section 1—Persons on active service in military forces during war not inelligible for members:

Mr. GRAHAM: I desire to ask a question relating to the representation in this House, which may or may not come within the scope of the amendment now proposed. Of course we are all anxious that the war should be over before there is an election, or rather that there should be no election until the war is over. But in case the Government changes its mind would the present law enable a man at the front to be a candidate in his absence from this country?

Mr. DOHERTY: There may be doubt whether the receipt of his pay as an officer in the expeditionary force would disqualify him from being elected, but when this Bill is passed there can be no question based on the fact that he receives such pay, and I do not know of any other ground on which he could be disqualified. In the Election Act as it now stands, I think there are provisions whereby a man absent from the country may be nominated without his express consent being obtained. I do not remember the exact provisions, but I am satisfied that that is covered by the present Act. It might be that under the Act sought to be amended by this Bill, a man with the expeditionary forces would be ineligible for election by the fact of his receiving pay, but this Bill will remedy that. In the law as it now stands there is a provision to exempt militia officers, but the men with the expeditionary forces are not serving with the capacity of officers of the militia of Canada.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: I have not the statute here, but I think it is necessary for the candidate to sign on the day of his nomination.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is what I wanted made clear.

Mr. OLIVER: Does it apply only to officers on service overseas, or to any officers who have enlisted for service whether they are on this side of the water or not?

Mr. DOHERTY: The proposal would cover both. The first section of the Act makes that quite clear:

> Nothing shall render ineligible, as aforesaid, any person serving in the naval or military forces of Canada, or in any other of the naval or military forces of the Crown, while such forces are on active service in consequence of any war, and receiving salary, pay or allowance as a member of such forces while on such active service.

I think that would cover anybody on active service in the war. Section 19 of the present Act covers the case of militia officers on active service. It says that the Act shall not disqualify:

> (d) An officer of the militia, or militiaman, not receiving any salary or emolument out of the public money of Canada, except his daily pay when called out for drill or active service, or annual or other allowances of any kind prescribed by the Militia Act—

So that any man receiving pay or an allowance under the Militia Act is protected by the present law. But the purpose of this Act is to protect those who would not otherwise be protected; those for instance, who might be rendering military or naval service to the State in a capacity other than as officers or men of the Canadian militia.

Mr. GRAHAM: But this point might arise. As I understand the present statute, any person out of the country can be eligible as a candidate without having to formally accept nomination. But supposing a man serving in the militia had not yet gone out of the country, but could not possibly get to his constituency to accept nomination as prescribed by the Act, a man who might be at Halifax, for instance, en route to Europe, would it not be possible to provide that any soldier on active service could be eligible as a candidate, and be excused from coming to accept nomination.

Mr. DOHERTY: If it should be found that the difficulty which the hon. member apprehends might arise, I think it would be more proper to amend the Elections Act in that regard. The present Bill amends the Senate and House of Commons Act. I will look into the matter, and if such a case might arise, I think we ought to provide for it.

Mr. MURPHY: The amendment my hon. friend suggests to the Elections Act would certainly be necessary, because by the present Act the candidate is required to do a number of things which he could not possibly do if he was out of the country.

Mr. PROULX: Would the case of the hon. member of Beauce (Mr. Beland) be covered by this Bill? He is serving in the cause of the Allies, but not with the British forces; so it could not be said that he is serving under the Crown.

Mr. DOHERTY: The Act apparently applies to persons serving in the naval or military forces of Canada. But I might point out that the purpose of the Act is only to relieve a person who is receiving pay for serving in the naval or military forces of Canada, from any disability that might arise from the fact of his receiving such pay. The absence of the hon. member for Beauce under the present circumstances does not affect his eligibity in any way. If he is serving in the forces of any of the Allied nations, and even receiving remuneration therefor, which as I understand he is not, there can be no possible suggestion that that would affect his right to be elected and to sit in this House.

Mr. PROULX: I was thinking of his right to draw his indemnity.

Mr. DOHERTY: We shall be glad to consider any amendment the hon. member may suggest to enable the hon. member for Beauce to draw his indemnity.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: We are making provision to maintain the rights of members of Parliament who may be abroad. Is any provision to be made to maintain the rights of a voter of this country who is serving abroad?

Mr. DOHERTY: A committee of this House has been constituted to consider possible amendments to the Elections Act or to the Controverted Elections Act, and of that committee I have the honour to be chairman. The point the hon. member raises has already been brought to my attention; in fact we had a discussion on it the other evening on the motion of the hon. member for the city of Ottawa (Mr. Fripp). We have been considering possible methods for enabling a man who is out of the country on active service to register his vote, but a satisfactory method is not an absolutely easy thing to find. I have asked the Parliamentary counsel to draft a tentative measure for submission to the committee, and we shall deal with that when it comes before us and report the result of our deliberations to the House.

Mr. MACDONALD: I see by the Act that a person can be nominated in his absence from the province. Section 96 of the Dominion Elections Act says:

> No nomination paper shall be valid or acted upon by the returning officer unless it is accompanied by,— > (a) the consent in writing of the person therein nominated, except where such person is absent from the province in which the election is to be held, when such absence shall be stated in the nomination paper;

Mr. GRAHAM: He might be absent on active service.

Mr. MACDONALD: That would make no difference so long as, under the law, it was absence from the province. That has always been the practice. You may recall numerous cases where men have been elected in their absence, and the law provides for simply stating that fact in the document and dispenses with the necessity of legal consent.

On section 3—no deduction from indemnity for absence on active service during war:

Mr. DOHERTY: I would be glad to move an amendment to meet the suggestion of the hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Proulx). I beg to move that the section be amended by adding, after the word "Crown" in the second last line, the words "or in any forces of any allied nation."

Mr. MARCIL: That would not apply to the case of the hon. member for Beauce. He was not actually serving in the Belgian forces and he is now a prisoner of war.

Mr. DOHERTY: These are exceptional circumstances. Perhaps I might suggest that the House could proceed to deal with the case of the hon. member for Beauce as it has dealt with other cases where there have been satisfactory reasons to explain absence. It is a little difficult to find proper words to apply to all cases.

Mr. MACDONALD: At no time was the hon. member for Beauce serving in any of the allied forces. He attached himself, by consent of the Red Cross Society to the Red Cross service in Antwerp, and his assistance in the war was rendered by virtue of his being a part of the Red Cross organization. He had been appointed by the hon. the Minister of Militia of Canada to be a major in the Army Service Corps of Canada, but he was never able to leave Belgium in order to take up that position. His services therefore were of that character, but I think the proposition of the Minister of Justice to deal with the case by special resolution at the conclusion of the session is an ample and sufficient way of dealing with the matter.

Sesction as amended agreed to.

Mr. DOHERTY: I desire to move to amend the Bill by adding a section. It occurred to me after the Bill was drafted that there are officers actually in the service at present who have been there for a number of months and that the Bill as now drafted coming into force would not cover their cases. I beg to move:

> That the Bill be amended by adding thereto the following section: "This Act shall be construed as having come into force the 4th day of August, 1914."

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

THE BUDGET.

PROPOSED WAR TAXATION.

Consideration of the proposed motion of Hon. W. T. White (Minister of Finance), for Committee of Ways and Means, resumed from February 24.

Mr. WILLIAM WRIGHT (Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned last night, I was dealing with some criticisms of the Government made by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff). A few minutes before the adjournment I was dealing with the charge that he had made that the Government had advanced large sums of money, many millions of dollars, to Mackenzie and Mann. I think the hon. gentleman could not help but know that this Government have advanced no money to Mackenzie and Mann, nor have they advanced money to either Mackenzie or Mann. It is true they made a loan to the Canadian Northern railway system, a loan amply secured by mortgages intended to pay off certain liabilities and complete the work of that transcontinental railway. But the charge is made that the company will be unable to complete their work and that the whole railway system will be thrown on the hands of the Government. If it is, if the worst comes to the worst, and that should unfortunately happen, the Gove n-ment has amply secured the people of this country by seeing that the amount of money they have loaned shall go into the paying off of the liabilities of the railway as a system and for the completion of the road so that if they ever have to take it over as an entity it will represent not only the value of the road when they made the loan but the added value after the expenditure of that money upon it. Mackenzie and Mann did not benefit personally or as a corporation by the amount of money advanced by this Government. Under the peculiar circumstances that have arisen it was absolutely impossible for the Government to allow this work to go by default. It was near completion, it served a large stretch of country; to have allowed it to go by default would have damaged our interests in the monetary markets of the world, and there was no other course open to the Government than to see that the work was completed. I want to say again, that the Canadian Northern matter and the Grand Trunk Pacific matter were twins that were left destitute upon the Conservative doorstep and the Conservative party had to take charge of them, although they deny parentage.

I want now to deal with a few of the points raised by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff). He seems to have a vast fund of sympathy for the western farmer. I am a farmer myself, but not one of those farmers who derive their information in regard to farming conditions in some lawyer's office or in some doctor's studio or in the sanctum of some printing office. I derive my knowledge of farming conditions out on the farm itself, where I go and throw off my coat and get to work just the same as the other men upon the farm.

Let me look at the representation from the West. I look at the representative for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), and I see the ex-Minister of the Interior, who derives his information with regard to farming conditions in the sanctum of his printing office. Then I go down to Medicine Hat and I find that the representative for that constituency (Mr. Buchanan) also gets his knowledge of farming operations in his printing office. I now come to Moosejaw and I see that horny-handed son of the soil, the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles), whose knowledge of farming conditions enables him to conduct his business successfully as a lawyer. He issues writs against the farmers, occasionally charging them $5 per case for making out the papers. Then we have the genial member for Regina (Mr. Martin), another farmer from the West, who also derives his information with regard to farming matters and his sympathy for the farmers in his lawyer's office. I go south a little to Assiniboia, and I see the hon. member for that constituency (Mr. Turriff), another robust farmer—ex-civil servant and retired wealthy gentleman. I come next to Qu'Appelle and there we have a gentleman (Mr. Thomson) who also occupies a lawyer's office; but I believe he has a farm and he has probably a little knowledge of actual farming conditions. I now go across to Humboldt, the hon. member for which (Mr. Neely) derives his knowledge and inspirations in regard to farming conditions in the West by feeling the pulses of his patients and looking at their tongues occasionally, and charging them so much in each case. I next go to Saskatoon where we have another farmer (Mr. McCraney) entering suits and collecting bills in the interest of the farmers of that section—another lawyer. It is quite right to have a proper criticism of the Government, to have many farmers sitting in Opposition and keeping the Government straight and bringing the case of the farmer to its attention from time to time; but seriously, some time I would like to see some seat on the Opposition side occupied by a real farmer, one of those men who are actually suffering from the conditions that prevail in the West at the present time.

It will be conceded by those familiar with farming conditions in the West that the farmer has not everything that he would wish; that he has difficulties in his way. He has not those large centres of population that have been created in the East by large manufactories and institutions of that nature, and practically all the product of his toil must find a market a long distance away from the source of production. That is a handicap which ought to be taken into consideration by any Government. It is the duty of the Government to do everything possible to help out the western farmer. There are matters of transportation, assistance to railways, the making free or the cheapening as far as possible of these articles that must be purchased by the western as well as by the eastern farmer, but especially by the western farmer. There is also the providing of elevator facilities where they are lacking and for a proper inspection of the grain, and the ensuring that the farmer gets a just return for his produce and proper grading. These are matters that have engaged the attention of the present Government since it came into power, and it has done a great deal towards assisting the western farmer.

The principal product of the western soil, as we all know, is wheat; and from time to time hon gentlemen opposite, since they have occupied the seats of the Opposition, have bewailed the position of the farmers in the West with regard to their great standard cereal. They say that we ought to have opened the markets of the United States; that we ought to have accepted the offer they made, by the acceptance of which they say we would have provided a wonderful market for the western farmer. I have given this matter a great deal of attention. For two years I have watched the markets of the United States and the markets of Canada as far as they have been reported in the press and during those two years there have not been more than two or three days on which the market price of wheat at Winnipeg has not been greater than the market price for the same grade of wheat at Minneapolis. The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) and other hon. gentlemen who usually follow his lead with regard to this matter, have from time to time stated in this House that the price received by the western farmer for his wheat has been reduced by the amount of duty charged on it when it goes into the United States, and they have figured out tables to show the tremendous loss sustained by the western farmers in that way. Therefore, when the proposition was made in the fall of 1913 by the American Government to reduce the duty upon wheat, a proposition which finally carried reducing the duty by fifteen cents per bushel, naturally the western farmer, if he believed the teaching of the hon. member for Edmonton, would expect that the price of his wheat would be increased by fifteen cents per bushel. As a farmer in the West and at that time having wheat in my granary and being busily engaged in teaming it to the elevator in town, and believing that this reduction would not make a cent of difference in the price of the wheat that the farmers of the West had to sell, I went right on disposing of my wheat, knowing that in one or two or three weeks the Bill before the United States Congress would pass and become law.

I expected no advantage from the reduction in the duty. In course of time the Bill providing for that reduction was put on the statute book of the United States. I still had wheat to sell, and I went on selling it. And I am here to say that the farmers of the West do not benefit by the fraction of a cent by that reduction of fifteen cents in the duty on wheat.

As I have said, the price of wheat in Minneapolis has been almost steadily lower than the price in Winnipeg. I speak especially of No. 1 Northern which is the grade that is quoted in the press daily. Let me read the report as given in the Citizen of this morning, showing the market conditions in Minneapolis and Winnipeg. In Winnipeg, No. 1 Northern is quoted at $1.53\frac{1}{4}$; in Minneapolis, No. 1 Northern is quoted at from $1.47\frac{1}{2}$ to $1.51\frac{1}{8}$, an average of $1.49, or a fraction over four cents higher in Winnipeg than in Minneapolis.

But my hon. friend may meet me with the statement that the grading under the State Grading Act in Minnesota is lower than on our side. True, the standard is not so high. But let me point out that the cash price of wheat as quoted in Minneapolis has very little to do with the State grade. In only four of the States of the American Union have they a State Grain Inspection Act, and even in those States the inspection is not compulsory. Let us suppose that a farmer in the West, finding all obstacles removed to his shipping grain to Minneapolis, sends down a car and follows it to put it on the market. It is graded No. 1 Northern under the State Grain Inspection Act. He goes to a dealer, tells him what he has to sell and asks for an offer. The dealer says he cannot make a bid as he has not seen the wheat. "But," says the owner, "you do not need to see it; it is No. 1 Northern." But the dealer insists that he must see it; and the owner finds that he cannot get a bid until the would-be purchaser has seen the wheat. A great deal of the wheat sent to Minneapolis is sold to the millers, for they have there the largest milling concerns perhaps in the world, and certainly the largest on the American continent. So, our friend the western farmer, goes down to the miller who is buying many carloads of wheat daily. The miller says, "I never buy wheat on state grades; I will send my man up and look over your wheat and will make you an offer for it." The man goes up and looks over our friend's car and over the cars offered by his neighbours. He may buy them all; and there may be a difference of as much as five cents a bushel in the price offered for the several cars, though all are graded No. 1 Northern. So, there is very little reliance to be placed on the figures given as to the cash prices of wheat in Minneapolis. But in any event, grade for grade, quality for quality, the price in Winnipeg for the last two years during which I have been looking into the matter has been better than the price in Minneapolis. To my personal knowledge wheat has been taken across the line and sold to Canadian elevators within that time. I have no doubt that under certain conditions and at certain times wheat may be teamed across from Canada to the other side and sold. A great deal of the wheat as disposed of in Minneapolis is sold on its quality and not on its grade under the State Grain Inspection Act. Over the rest of the United States they have all kinds of inspection—complete lack of uniformity. There has been an effort in the United States Congress for the last twenty-five years to get the Government of the United States to adopt a law enforceable throughout the Union. Those who favour that measure point out that there has been a great deal of complaint in England, Germany, France, the Netherlands and other wheat-buying countries in Europe about the lack of uniform grading in the United States. In the case of grain from the United States, the grade is not enforceable, and if the wheat does not come up to grade the buyer has no redress. On at least two occasions, as pointed out by Senator McCumber on the introduction of his Bill last year, the grain-importing countries of Europe have met and, after a thorough discussion of this matter, have passed resolutions appealing to the Government of the United States to have a law enacted that shall apply to that whole country. And Senator McCumber in his various addresses touching this matter when it was up for discussion last year, dealt exhaustively with the subject, and pointed out numberless resolutions passed by farmers' institutes and associations and by boards of trade in many localities, urging the United States to follow the example of Canada and have a uniform grade that would apply to the whole country. And it has been declared in many of the petitions sent in that the condition of the farmer in the Canadian west is vastly superior to that of the farmer of the western states in regard to the disposal of his wheat. Whether they are right in that or not I am not in a position to say. But I should think, taking the country over, there would be little difference in the condition of the western farmers on either side of the line. Both have the same disabilities arising out of the long haul to the seaboard. This great vexed question of transportation affects them as it affects us. The charges by the elevator men, by the insurance companies, by the transportation companies for ocean freights—all these things stand in their way as they stand in the way of the farmer of our West.

So that the adoption of any policy that would allow the free exchange of wheat between the two countries would fail to provide any remedy for the farmers of Western Canada. I am quite satisfied in regard to that matter. And the farmer in the Canadian west would lose the advantage he has to-day in the guarantees that go with his wheat by reason of the official inspection at Winnipeg as it passes through on its way to the ocean.

If American wheat could come across to Winnipeg, become merged with our wheat and find its way further east, our wheat would lose its individuality; it would practically become American wheat, and we would lose all the advantages that we now derive from our present system of grain inspection.

Permit me to call attention to another consideration that would militate against the farmer of the West. When a good farmer happens to need money, he hurries his grain into the cars when the new crop comes in, in order that he may be among the first shippers, for if he succeeds in getting his wheat out early, he will get a better price than he would receive later. I am not now referring to present conditions, which have been so seriously affected by the war during the last few months; I am speaking of conditions as they have prevailed in the West, and as they will again prevail when the war is over. If we remove all obstacles to free interchange of wheat, and the people of the Western States put their grain upon the market a week, two weeks or three weeks earlier than our farmers do, they will at once swamp the Winnipeg market with their wheat and our farmers will lose the advantage which they have enjoyed in past years in that respect. But we are told that there will be a large demand for our wheat; that we grow better wheat than they grow in the United States; that our friends to the south want Canadian wheat to grind with their softer wheat and are willing to pay a large price for it. In that way, our friends say, the farmers of the West will benefit to a large extent. I want to point out that our American friends have a much larger surplus of wheat than we have in Canada and, just as we have to find a market for our surplus wheat, they have to find a market for theirs. Any wheat, therefore, going into American channels from Canada would increase that surplus, and that surplus must find its way to some foreign country. I have not the shadow of a doubt, viewing the whole situation generally, that under a system of free exchange we would purchase just as much American wheat as the people of the United States would purchase from us.

But, our friends say, freight conditions would be better. Let us look at that phase of the question for a moment. They say that there would be additional competition, and that the American railways, bidding for the carrying trade of the West, would reduce the price the farmers now have to pay in order to get their wheat to the head of the lakes or to the seaboard. I have given a little attention to the subject of freight rates in the Western States and to the seaboard, and I find, according to the commission which governs freight rates in the United States, that the rates are much the same as those prevailing in Canada. I would remind hon. gentlemen also that if any farmer in the West wishes to send his wheat through American channels to the seaboard and across the ocean, there is absolutely nothing to prevent his doing so, and he has been doing so for years. Nothing hinders his using any railway in the United States for the shipment of his wheat. There is practically no duty on grain going through the United States to other countries. As I have said, the United States has a much larger surplus of wheat than we have; that surplus must find its way across the ocean—and they might just as well export Canadian wheat as any other kind of wheat. Another reason why they wish to handle Canadian wheat is in order to keep their vessels busy. If the Canadian shipper can get a reduction in rates of one-sixteenth of a cent by sending his wheat through the United States, naturally he will take advantage of the reduction by routing his wheat southwards. There is nothing in the statute books either of this country or of the United States to prevent our wheat going through United States channels.

The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) said that during the last two years there has been no increase in the acreage sown in the great western country. I have an intimate knowledge of conditions prevailing in the West, as I have travelled over it a good deal, and I take issue with the hon. member in that regard. Any one who is conversant with conditions prevailing in the West knows that when a farmer breaks the prairie he has to keep it under cultivation; otherwise it will lapse back into a condition worse than its original state, and he will be the loser to the extent of a very large amount of money. The farmer is forced, therefore, to keep under cultivation such areas as have been broken and cultivated. I know by personal investigation that large areas have been brought under cultivation in the last few years. I believe that the acreage in 1914 was considerably larger than that of 1913, and that the acreage in 1913 was greater than that of 1912; the same is true, I think, of every year since the great western country was first opened up. It is true that the amount of wheat grown in the West last year was less than that grown in previous years, but a great drouth had prevailed, with the result that the farmers suffered severely. In many sections of the western country the farmers had only a short crop, and in some portions of it they had no crop at all. This accounts for the fact that on the last day of December, 1914, the amount of wheat shipped through Winnipeg was not half as large as it was on the same day of the previous year. The conditions for getting wheat out were infinitely better in 1914 than they were in 1913, inasmuch as threshing commenced much earlier, and the weather was favourable for cutting and threshing and for getting the grain to market.

Some people in the East, in discussing the subject of farming conditions in the West, are disposed to belittle the difficulties of the western farmer. They say that he does not deserve any special consideration; that he gets his land for nothing; that it is all ready to be worked, and that he is doing better than the farmer of any other section of the country. My experience in the West, however, is that the western farmer has a pretty hard row to hoe. As a rule he goes out there as a poor man, without any money. He takes up his homestead, and in order to provide an equipment to work that 160 acres he is at the expense of approximately $2,000. Having no money he has to work for his neighbours. He finally succeeds in getting a little breakng done, he gets up a little shanty and works along as best he can under exceedingly great difficulties, because before he can plough a furrow or buy an outfit of his own, he must have at least four horses which would cost approximately $1,000. He has to have the harness and other attachments, he must have a plough, a spread harrow, a disc harrow, a seeder, and if he takes off his crop he must have a binder. He may succeed in purchasing some of these things on credit and finally, at the end of three years, he may be enabled to take out his patent. Usually he then rushes off to some mortgage company and borrows a large sum of money to pay off some of his debts and perhaps secure a few more implements; and this mortgage is for many years a heavy burden on him. That is a condition of affairs which no legislation that can be passed by either party in this House can remedy. That is a natural condition with men going into a country like that without capital, and our first duty should be to make it as easy as possible for them to secure some capital with which to go on. I think the Government of the country might well direct their energies in that direction. If they could find a solution of that difficulty they would do a great deal more for the farmer of the West than by finding markets for him that are already full, because finding a market for him across the border would be like finding a market with his next neighbour who has 20,000 bushels of wheat himself and says: I do not need your wheat, I have wheat of my own and I will only buy your wheat in order that I may sell it again at an advance. That will be exactly the condition if our farmers try to find a market in the United States. I believe the Government have done something towards providing elevators in the West. I think they might well work along in that direction in order that the farmer may be able to get his grain graded and raise money on it without having to dispose of it in a great hurry immediately after harvest, because it must be evident that every farmer there who has had to run nearly twelve months without money, finds that he must dispose of his grain as quickly as he can; his creditors are crowding him, he has to pay off his bills for machinery, he has to give something to the blacksmith, the grocer, the harness-maker and many others, and he simply must have the cash. As time goes on and men get into better circumstances in the West, they are able to hold their grain. That would adequately describe the position of a number of people in the West to-day, perhaps more particularly in Manitoba and the older settled sections of Saskatchewan; but there are large areas in Saskatchewan and Alberta where there are still many poor homesteaders struggling very hard to get a foothold in the country. There are many other ways in which we might be able to assist the settler in the West. My sympathies naturally go out to him because I have been there and I know something of his difficulties. When I am there, actually living out on the farm side by side with these men, going into their shanties, talking with them, working with them, exchanging work with them, attending their threshings and having them attend mine, knowing all about what they are doing, I feel that they deserve the very greatest consideration that can possibly be given them by the Government of this country. I do not know whether anything could be done in the way of rearranging our banking system so as to assist these people to get money when they need it, but I say this matter should be considered and I have no doubt it will receive consideration at the hands of the Government.

Referring to the charge that has been made that the Government has been letting the trade of this country go to the bow wows, I believe the Toronto Globe, or some neighbour of the Globe politically, has made the charge that the whole trade policy of the Government has gone to smash. That is the irresponsible utterance of the irresponsible editor of an irresponsible newspaper. Hon. gentlemen opposite have always been disposed in the past to measure up the prosperity of the country by the total of its exports and imports, and I want, just for a moment, to make a little comparison with regard to that matter. In 1910 we had imports coming into this country of $241,961,556, of dutiable goods; and of free goods, $143,873,547 or a total, dutiable and free, of $385,835,103. In 1914 we had an importation of dutiable goods of $425,324,576 and of free goods of $210,186,916, a total dutiable and free, of $635,511,492 or an increase of $249,676,389. The same would be measurably true with regard to our exports. I find that they also have increased by a very large amount. The total exports in 1910 were $279,247,551. In 1914 they were $431,588,439, or a balance in favour of the present Government of $152,340,888. I do not believe that the total amount of our exports and the total amount of our imports is an infallible barometer giving an unfailing index of the prosperity of a country, but that is the favourite argument of the hon. gentlemen opposite, and if there is anything in it the comparison is certainly largely in favour of the Government now occupying the Treasury Benches. Personally I think we might very largely decrease both our imports and exports, and yet be just as well off as we are to-day.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: A great deal better off.

Mr. WRIGHT: Perhaps a great deal better off. My idea would be to bring the consumer and producer as closely together as possible, and looking at it from that standpoint I think we made a mistake in pushing as fast as we did some years ago the settlement of that great western country. But it was a case of " Cox could not wait." Those gentlemen in the West were making money out of land values and they said, Oh, you must not stop for a moment; rush the settlers in and let them produce wheat, and you will thereby be producing prosperity. But the only prosperity that has been produced is that we are getting money from abroad from the people going in there —prosperity of a temporary nature and of a kind that could not last for any great length of time.

I believe the Government should direct its energies towards developing industry in that great western country, industries suitable to the conditions that prevail there. I know of no reason why Winnipeg should not be a second Birmingham; Saskatoon, a second Manchester; Brandon, a second Leeds. I know of no reason why other cities and towns, such as Regina, Moosejaw, Medicine Hat, Calgary, Edmonton, and many other centres should not be great hives of industry They would be consuming the products of the farmers of the West, and consuming it at home, which avoids a tremendous loss in transportation charges, in railway and steamship hauls, in ocean-freight and insurance rates, in loss and shrinkage, and in the many other ways through which money is lost and will continue to be lost so long as we look to the other side of the world for a market for our surplus products. I know that a large number of people in this country think that Canada should be a purely agricultural country, that we ought to confine ourselves to growing wheat, potatoes, etc. But when I consider the fact that a beneficent Providence has stored immense bodies of coal in the great coal areas of this country, and immense quantities of iron, lead, copper, zinc, gold, silver, nickel, and other minerals, I do not believe that it was His purpose that these should lie for all time hidden in the bowels of the earth, or that they should be dug out by the hardest kind of labour by people in Canada to be sent abroad to be manufactured into something by the skilled artisans of some other country. I believe it was the intention that these great resources and the great water-powers of this country should be developed, and that we should be not only a great agricultural country, but one of the greatest manufacturing centres on the face of the globe, and that from the prairies of the West and other fertile portions of this Dominion we should provide food for a vast number of people engaged in other enterprises. I believe it was the intention that the needs of the farmers of the West and of the East should be supplied with products of the factories of this Dominion, dotted all over this country as they are in Great Britain. Looking at it from that standpoint, I have never been able to give my adherence to the free trade principle. I believe that it would be impossible for us to develop this country under that principle, and when I look out over those prairies of the West and consider the condition of its farmers, I ask myself how much has free trade done for the farmer of Great Britain. Has it made him prosperous? No. He has left his farm. There is not more than half as many on the farms of Great Britain to-day as fifty years ago. Agriculture has declined, and declined enormously in Great Britain. They find that they cannot exist under the free trade conditions of that country. The farmer in Great Britain has all the advantages of great manufacturing centres right at his door. He can hitch up his team on the farm and find a market for everything he produces in the nearest market town, which will not be more than two or three miles away. If he wishes to buy, he can buy at his very door, where the goods are manufactured. He can buy and sell at first hand. There are no transportation charges in either case. If farming can be benefited by free trade, surely under those conditions the farmers of Great Britain would be the wealthiest people in the face of the earth. But we find the agricultural industry there has declined and declined enormously. Would not free trade have an immeasurably worse effect in this country? I think it would.

Let us suppose we adopted the principle laid down by some hon. gentlemen opposite and did away with our customs duties in large measure, or altogether. That would have the effect of shutting up our factories and of throwing a large number of men out of work. These men would naturally have to crowd out to the farms, or go to some other country. If they crowded out into the rural sections and became farmers, the production of the farms would largely increase; but there would be a much less number of people to consume those products, and a vastly larger percentage of those products would have to find its way across the ocean to a foreign market, under all the disabilities I outlined a moment ago. The result would inevitably be that they would have to take less money for their products, and what advantage would that be? Then for manufactured articles, as there would be no competition in Canada, they would have to pay to foreign countries whatever they asked. They would certainly pay a larger sum than they pay to-day. I ask myself would the agriculturist be better off under such conditions? I say no, most emphatically no. For these reasons I feel that a reasonable measure of protection is absolutely indispensable to this country in its present condition. I believe we should have a protective tariff, not a tariff as high as Haman's gallows, but one giving a reasonable measure of protection. We in Canada to-day under our tariff policy recognize to some extent, the principle of free trade; we recognize the principle of tariff for revenue, and the principle of protection. That is as true of the parties who occupied the treasury benches in years gone by as it is of the parties that occupies them to-day. Perhaps the only difference between us is as to the importance we attach to each of these various phases of policy. I think that tariff matters ought to be taken out of the political arena.

I believe there should be no party feeling in regard to it. We ought to have a tariff board which would deal with this matter independently of those who may be occupying the treasury benches. When such a proposition was laid before this House, discussed and carried in this House, the popular chamber which voices public opinion in this Dominion, the Bill was thrown out by the irresponsible body on the other side of this building.

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. gentleman that such a remark is not permissible when referring to the other branch of this Parliament.

Mr. WRIGHT: It has been said by way of criticism by hon. gentlemen opposite that such a tariff board might under certain circumstances show favouritism. The tariff board should be outside of political control or at least should be devoid of party politics. The Government of the country, or Parliament, should be allowed to name one member of that board and the Opposition might be allowed to name a member to see that no injustice was done to any manufacturer who might have his affairs investigated by the board. A representative of the great agricultural interests should be placed upon that board; the great manufacturing and mercantile interests might very well claim a representative upon that board, and the mining, lumbering and fishing industries might also very properly be represented upon it. The very best men in Canada, such as we have on the railway board, should find a place upon the board which should have authority to look into all complaints that might be laid before it, such as overcharging the public, or in one way or another taking advantage of the people. Such a board as that would be essential to the proper investigation of all such charges, and I do not know any good reason why the leaders on the Government side and the leaders on the Opposition side could not get together and agree upon such a board. I do not believe that the power should be placed in the hands of any board to go right into a man's office, take his books and make known all his private affairs to his competitors and to the world generally. All investigations of that nature should be private, and a man's business should not be disclosed, but I would have the board of such a nature that there would be absolute confidence that fair play would be done. It would be a deterrent upon individuals here and there who might take advantage of certain conditions to overcharge the public.

Yet, when we come to deal, as we must, with trade treaties with other lands we should put up a united front. We should not in this House be fighting proposals pro and con and assisting those who are our competitors for the trade of the world by giving them information in that way that they would not otherwise get. We should put up an undivided front to them, and I believe that in the near future we shall have such a board as that which I have suggested to deal with matters that affect us as far as our foreign trade is concerned. In our domestic affairs this does not matter so much. We can meet together here and discuss, I hope in a friendly spirit, all these questions of domestic concern, we can present our views to the public in general elections as they come around and whatever policy seems to suit the public best will prevail because representatives will be returned to support that policy. But I say again, in regard to our dealing with foreign matters, that we ought to stand shoulder to shoulder on both sides of the House and we ought not to be engaged in unseemly squabbles in regard to matters of very great concern to the people of this country.

I have taken up the time of the House at much greater length than I had intended, and I have always laid down the doctrine that no individual member should occupy the time of the House at any very great length. I have criticised speeches of four, five, six, seven and eight hours' length that have been delivered in this House, and I hope that I will never be a sinner in that regard.

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Richmond, N.S.): Mr. Speaker, while I am succeeding the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. Wright) in this debate, I trust he will pardon me if I do not follow him in all the subjects he has discussed during the course of his speech. I merely desire to refer to one criticism which he has directed against the representatives of the West on this side of the House. What he said would seem to indicate that he regarded it as a complaint that the farmers of the West have sent to the House lawyers or other professional men to represent them. I remember very well the record of the late Conservative Government from 1878 to 1896, and during all that time the portfolio of Agriculture was held by a brewer, a lawyer, or a doctor. If our friends in the Conservative party think there is no person qualified to represent the farmers in Canada but farmers—and I recognize that farmers are well able to represent themselves and other interests in the country—and if our Conservative friends think it is a reflection upon the farmers of Canada that they should be represented by professional men, I want to know how it was that a Conservative Government during all these years did not find any farmers in Canada to take the portfolio of Agriculture, but, as I stated a moment ago, placed at the head of the Agricultural Department a brewer, a doctor and a lawyer. These men were all very good in their way, but if the argument of my hon. friend from Muskoka should prevail, then I think he would be able to express the same opinion of his own party in the House. It remained for the Liberal Government from 1896 to 1911 to place the first farmer in Canada in charge of the portfolio of Agriculture. As I said, I do not propose to follow my hon. friend any further.

For the second time in a period covering a little over six months we are called together for the purpose of discussing matters pertaining to the greatest war known in history and to provide for Canada's participation in support of British arms. At the extraordinary meeting of Parliament in August last, which continued for the short period of five days, by unanimous vote, we supplied this Government with a war credit of $50,000,000 besides passing other legislation incidental thereto. Since that date we have witnessed the splendid response made by Canadians to the call of Lord Kitchener for "men and more men." From every city, town and hamlet, from the far North to the American boundary, from Cape Breton to Prince Rupert, there have been gathered companies, brigades, battalions and contingents of which it was our pleasure the other day to view the very climax and culmination in the magnificent body of men contributed by British Columbia to the overseas forces.

At this time we are asked for a further sum of $100,000,000 to pay the cost of Canada's undertaking in regard to this war. The unanimity that was displayed in respect of the vote of $50,000,000 will be repeated here. I believe that there is no division of opinion amongst Canadians, whether in this House or out of it, whether they be Conservatives or Liberals, as to what Canada ought to do for Great Britain in this crisis, and there is only one opinion as to our supreme confidence in the ultimate triumph of Great Britain and her Allies over the powerful foes that are arrayed against them. Should any further demands be made upon the resources of Canada for the purpose of achieving the end which we all have in view, I am sure they will be met with the same liberality and promptitude.

I desire now to pass on to other questions in which we are concerned. While we are discussing measures pertaining to the war, there are other matters of domestic concern with which we have to deal at the present session of Parliament. We are called upon to vote a Budget which the hon. Minister of Finance has brought down and for which he has asked the support of this House. At the opening of Parliament in the month of January, 1914, the following words were placed in the mouth of His Royal Highness the Governor General:

> Canada has been favoured by a long series of prosperous years, and, although at the present moment business is slightly restricted by the financial stringency which prevails throughout the world, I feel convinced that this condition will be merely temporary, and that the boundless resources of this Dominion, which are so fully and universally known and recognized, give us the fullest assurance of continued material prosperity and progress.

Therefore, as early as the month of January, 1914, there were signs that the prosperous conditions which had existed in Canada for so many years were about to be disturbed. In that month the Minister of Finance addressed a meeting of commercial travellers in the city of Montreal, and in the course of his remarks he made the following statement:

> Our country has experienced its time of stress and will come through it well. I believe the crisis has been reached, and passed in Canada, as in other countries of the world.

Every person in Canada shared the hope that the crisis had been passed, and that the prosperous condition which had existed formerly would be continued in the future. Our experience since then has justified us in coming to the conclusion that the Minister of Finance and his colleagues in the Government did not properly estimate the exact conditions that prevailed at that time, and that were about to come upon us to a greater degree.

The Government has now been in office for a period of some three years. If we may judge the administration of public affairs by the supreme test of results, I am sure that the hon. gentlemen occupying the Treasury benches will themselves be among the first to admit that they possess no superiority over their predecessors either in talent or virtue. We are told that the tariff changes which have been brought down by the Minister of Finance have been occasioned by the war which is in progress in Europe. It has been pointed out by hon. gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate, and it has been admitted by the Minister of Finance himself, that the war is not responsible for the conditions that prevail at the present time. I have here a statement of the revenues in Canada for the past three years, which discloses the fact that long before war was declared, the condition of affairs that prevailed in Canada reduced enormously the revenues of the Government. The statement is as follows:

Year.	Revenue for the first seven months.
1912	$ 89,682,581 24
1913	101,192,451 70
1914	81,784,646 31

Therefore for the seven months preceding the war, the revenue in 1914 declined by $7,297,937.93 as compared with the year 1912, and declined by $19,407,805.39 as compared with the year 1913. If you take these figures and carry out the calculations for the last six months of the present fiscal year, you will find that the decline in the revenue since war was declared last August has not been any greater than the decline in the revenue for the seven months preceding the outbreak of the war.

We have, moreover, other evidences to show that before war broke out there were unmistakable signs of the catastrophe which is now upon us. In an article in a newspaper published at Ottawa under date of June 20, I find the following:

> The Labour Department reports that as a result of the industrial quiet and the ample supply of labour for all work that is in progress, the general level of wages in the less skilled branches is somewhat lower than this time last year. In manufacturing there has been a downward tendency with reductions at 5 to 10 per cent in wages paid by some of the large business establishments. In the first quarter of 1913 there were 56 increases in the wage scales, this year there were only 17.

This year to date 11,000 employees belonging to unions have benefited by wage increases, while last year these benefiting numbered 16,000.

In an interview given by Mr. J. C. Watters, President of the Trades Congress of Canada, I find the following statement:

The industrial conditions all over Canada are in a deplorable condition, many are starving because they cannot get a chance to earn even the bare necessities to sustain life, and never in the history of Canada did things look so bad for the workers.

I have had many letters from different organizations throughout the country urging that an order in council should be issued to prevent all classes of workers from landing in Canada until conditions assume a normal aspect. The Congress strenuously opposed any bonus being paid on immigrants as it leaves the door open to unscrupulous agents to send all classes of labour into Canada as agriculturists.

"How is the situation to be met and conditions improved," asked the reporter, and Mr. Watters replied that conditions have reached such a stage that the Provincial and Dominion Governments must do something to provide work. They must co-operate in this respect and find work that requires to be done or create employment that will relieve the situation.

That discloses the condition of affairs prior to the outbreak of war on the 4th of August, 1914. There are other indications which suggest that the threatening condition of affairs should have been anticipated by the Government, and steps should have been taken to prevent the unfortunate shortage in our revenue as compared with our expenditure at the end of the present fiscal year. In the month of January, Mr. H. A. Richardson, General Manager of the Bank of Nova Scotia, made this statement at the annual meeting of the shareholders:

Canada with respect to her finances has for the present to depend more largely on herself, and I entirely agree with the views expressed by bankers whose annual meetings have preceded ours, that we should apply ourselves more diligently at home, to produce the money we have hitherto obtained so easily abroad. To be quite frank, those who blame the present depression on the war are hugging a delusion, for the reaction from speculation, extravagance and over-expansion was inevitable, however much it may be aggravated by war conditions.

We know that in the month of July 500 of the wage-earners of Ottawa, under the very shadow of the House of Commons, within sight of the Government offices, marched to the city hall asking to be fed. That is a condition of affairs that has not prevailed in Canada for many years. It was reported by newspapers in the month of July, 1914, that 44,000 people had returned from the Canadian Northwest to the United States. Hon. gentlemen opposite shelter themselves behind the allegation that the conditions existing in Canada arose under circumstances over which they had no control.

I shall endeavour to point out one or two respects in which, I think, the policy of the Government, if not absolutely the cause of the existing condition of affiairs, has tended to very greatly aggravate that condition. It will be remembered that in January, 1914, a delegation of western grain-growers came to Ottawa to ask this Government to place American wheat on the free list so as to enable them to take advantage of the reciprocal tariff with respect to Canadian wheat, which a few months before, had been put in force by the Wilson administration. Before this delegation came to Ottawa a delegation of grain-growers visited Winnipeg and were able to get a resolution through the Legislature of Manitoba in favour of their demands, and this notwithstanding the fact that the vast majority in that legislature at that time were Conservatives, men who had vigorously opposed any attempt on the part of the Liberal party to bring about a reciprocal treaty which would have opened the American market to the grain of Western Canada. With that resolution the delegates came to Ottawa. But hard upon the heels of the grain-growers came a delegation of the Millers' Association, and as a consequence the prayer of the petition of the grain-growers of the West was not granted; the Government held out no hope that they would facilitate or encourage the sending of Canadian wheat into the United States, and so the grain-growers went home disappointed. A few months afterwards the statement appeared in a western newspaper that no less than forty-four thousand settlers in the West had pulled up stakes and trekked back into the United States, whence they came. Evidently these people felt that, as they were not going to get the advantage of American prices while they remained in Canada, the best thing for them to do was to cross the line and settle in places where that market would be open to them. A question was asked the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche) a few days ago as to the number of farmers who had left Canada and returned to the United States last year, and the hon. gentleman answered that there were no records in his department showing the number of immigrants from the United States who had returned to that country. Therefore I am bound to assume that the statement that forty-four thousand settlers in Canada had returned to the United States is correct.

One other instance I desire to refer to, and that is the conduct of the Government in relation to the reduction of the cement duties in 1912. During the session of 1913, the right hon. leader of the Opposition called the attention of the Government to the correspondence which had appeared in the newspapers some months before in which a gentleman in the city of Toronto, a supporter of the Government, had bitterly complained, that, notwithstanding that the Government had given him, or the interest in which he was concerned,

5 p.m. a distinct and specific promise that the cement duty would not be interfered with, that duty had actually been reduced fifty per cent, leaving the manufacturers of cement for the moment in an embarrassed position. An election took place in Saskatchewan about the time of this reduction and the question of cheaper cement, as well as cheaper goods of all kinds necessary for the settlers of the West, was a question which specially occupied the minds of the electors at that time. It was thought that by cutting the duty on cement some advantage might be gained by the Conservative party in that election, and notwithstanding that the Prime Minister a few weeks before, had given his solemn assurance to this cement manufacturer that the cement duty would not be interfered with, this cut of fifty per cent was made. This friend and supporter of the Government wrote a letter in which he protested against that conduct. He said: When I received your letter on the subject of the cement duty, I got the authority of my directors to spend a considerable sum in enlarging our plant and increasing our output, but we have been so embarrassed by the situation arising that we have lost our money and our shareholders will not hereafter have the confidence in the Government with respect to trade matters that they would otherwise have had.

During all the years when the Liberal party was in power, I believe, there never was an interference with the tariff by Order in Council except in one instance. When the late Minister of Finance intended to change the tariff, he made his announcements first in the House of Commons, and they were accepted only after full and thorough debate, and in this way the public was kept informed of what was likely to take place in respect of tariff changes. But in this instance there was no discussion in Parliament, no notice of the action to be taken by the Government; the stroke came like a bolt from the blue; with the result that the confidence of business men in this Government received a shock from which it has not recovered.

So, if we have bad times in Canada, if there has not been in some respects as great an output of production or as much employment as we might have expected, the condition may be attributable to the fact that the business community in Canada have not the confidence in this Government that they had in its predecessor.

I would like to discuss another matter which relates to the Civil Service situation. A statement was brought down in the House a few days ago in which it was disclosed that between the time the present Government came into power and March, 1914, something like two thousand civil servants had been dismissed and their places taken by something over ten thousand. The Prime Minister in the course of a speech delivered in Halifax before the election of 1911, made this statement:

> A government holds the power of patronage for the benefit of the public, and it is entitled to fill public offices solely in the public interest. The duties of those officials are for the public benefit and are fixed by the laws of the country; their salaries are paid out of the people's money. To use the power of filling such positions as a reward for party service and without regard to the character and capacity of the individual selected is a gross breach of a solemn public trust. A private trustee so dishonouring his office would be subject to punishment by the criminal law, but the one punishment which can be meted out for such abuse of a public trust is dismissal by the electorate.

We have had a revelation made within the last few days which is very startling in view of the source from which it comes; I have before me a statement by Professor Shortt, the chairman of the Civil Service Commission, dealing with this matter. In an address which he recently delivered in the city of Ottawa he said:

> "Patronage is entirely and absolutely in control of the lower grade appointments in the Civil Service," declared Professor Adam Shortt, Chairman of the Civil Service Commission, addressing the People's Forum last night. "Seven out of every nine appointments have patronage behind them."
> "There have been many promotions in salary even where there were no vacancies in the upper ranks," he said. "The Civil Service is therefore in the same condition of an army with too many officers. The British expert, Sir George Murray, was shocked when he noticed this condition, and I am sick and tired of asking the Government to remedy this state of affairs.
> "It is no use arguing that the high cost of living makes these salary promotions necessary; everybody has to pay for the necessaries of life, but not all get promotions... I have met men in the Canadian Civil Service," he said, "who, though they held positions under the Government, were quite ready to admit that the Civil Service system was rotten."

Now, when this Government came into power they made loud professions as to the manner in which they would deal with the Civil Service. We have heard a great deal during the last few months on the subject of "Patriotism and Production." I believe that a distinguished philosopher once said that the greatest patriot was he who caused two blades of grass to grow where only one flourished before.

That principle is applied by the present Government in a somewhat different manner. Their patriotism consists in patriotism for their party alone, their production consists in producing five government officials where only one flourished before. We have many instances of this kind of patriotism and production. We have the instance, brought up in the House of Commons a few days ago, where a customs official in my county was dismissed by the Minister of Customs because it was alleged that there was nothing for him to do; thereupon the minister appointed another official to do that nothing, at a salary of $250, being $150 more than his predecessor had received.

Mr. J. D. REID: The man we appointed has been doing something since his appointment; the other man did not do anything.

Mr. KYTE: I would like to get the record from the department of what the man is doing at the present time, and I take this opportunity of requesting the hon. minister to lay a report to that effect on the table of the House.

In the province of Nova Scotia a man was appointed in the Department of the Interior to discharge certain duties, his jurisdiction extending over the maritime provinces. For five or six years he discharged his duties to the satisfaction of the department and its officials. But there was in the city of Halifax a young man, secretary of the Conservative Association of that city, who desired to obtain employment in the public service. For some time he was not given a position, and he became very insistent. It was necessary to provide a position for him, and in the month of October last the officials of the Department of the Interior appointed him at a salary of $1,800 a year—with expenses and office allowance, amounting to $2,500—to assist the other officer to discharge the duties which he himself was quite capable of performing. Whatever extenuation there may have been in the past, when times were good, revenues bounteous and surpluses large, for the Government is indulging in extravagances of that kind, there is surely no excuse at a time when it is necessary, owing to financial conditions, for a Minister of Finance to issue phoney money from the printing machines in the form of Dominion notes issued without authority and without the necessary gold reserve.

Permit me to cite another instance which occurred in the county of Richmond, and which was dealt with in this House a few years ago. It was necessary for the Department of Railways and Canals to expropriate lands for the improvement of the St. Peter's canal. The owner of the land, a friend of this Government, was a defeated candidate on several occasions in that county. The Department of Railways and Canals paid him about $1,000 an acre for the land that was required from him. It appeared in evidence in this House that the land had been purchased by him a few years before for $10.50 an acre, and that subsequent to that his property had been assessed at $75 an acre. He moved in the Supreme Court to have the assessment quashed on the ground that the valuation was excessive. In evidence read before the court he proved that the property was not worth $75 an acre, and in this evidence he was supported by certain leading citizens of the town in which I live. That was about three years before he sold the land to the Government. When the property was expropriated by the Department of Railways and Canals, they appointed three commissioners, resident in the town, to value that property. Two of these commissioners were two of the gentlemen who swore three years before that the property was not worth $75 an acre, and the third was the campaign manager of the defeated candidate in the previous election. These three men awarded the owner of the property a valuation of $1,000 an acre, notwithstanding the fact that that valuation was far above and beyond any value which attached to the property. This was an instance where over $3,000 was given to a party friend for the purpose of discharging a party obligation. It does appear to me that the whole resources of this Government are being exploited for party advantage, and for party advantage only.

I could give other reasons why we have a deficit of some $60,000,000 at the present time. When the Minister of Finance delivered his speech before the Commercial Travellers' Association in the city of Montreal, perhaps he might be excused if he did not fully appreciate the indications of the far-reaching depression which was about to become prevalent throughout the Dominion of Canada. The Finance Minister's mature years were co-incident with that happy period in Canada from 1896 to 1911 when the Liberal party was in power and when there were no such things as hard times, scarcity of money, deficits, or trade depression. But his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce well knew what these signs portended. During all the years that he was Finance Minister in the Conservative Government which was defeated in 1896, hard times and unemployment supped, dined and lodged with him. He was never free from the glowering shadows of those unwelcome spectres; they were unbidden guests at every cabinet council and at every party caucus. The Minister of Trade and Commerce well knew what these things forebode, and if the hon. Minister of Finance was not in a position properly to appreciate the conditions which were upon us, it is unfortunate that he did not consult his colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

At the session of Parliament of 1913 the minister brought down certain proposals with regard to the supplies for that year. No attempt was made during that session to meet the stringency which was about to bear upon our commercial conditions. There was a period between 1896 and 1911 when there were evidences that the great expansion and prosperity which Canada had theretofore enjoyed were about to be checked for a period. In the Budget speech delivered on March 17, 1908, by the Hon. W. S. Fielding, then Finance Minister, he said:

> Business has received a check, but do not look for a continued period of depression. On the part of the Government it is a time for caution. Large new enterprises which would call for great outlay will be laid aside for a little while.

That was the position Mr. Fielding took in 1908, and in 1909, when he was bringing down the Estimates for that fiscal year, he gave further proof of his preparation for the expected depression. Referring to his Budget speech delivered in that year, he said:

> With this condition of revenue and with the very many demands made upon us, it would almost seem unavoidable that we should meet the difficulties by an increase in taxation. In some other countries that seems to be the remedy for the financial conditions that have there arisen. In our judgment, however, there is no need here of increased taxation. We think the truer and sounder method is to meet the situation by a substantial reduction in our expenditure, and that is the method we have adopted. Unquestionably if we were to continue the same rate of expenditure as that which has prevailed in recent years, we should be obliged to add to the burdens of taxation; but we have come to the conclusion that the part of wisdom is to ask all concerned to be patient with us for the time while we put the brakes severely on expenditure.

That is the attitude taken by Hon. Mr. Fielding at a time when no person in a position to judge of the financial conditions then existing thought that anything like such a severe depression was upon us as was upon the present Finance Minister during the session of 1914. Further on Mr. Fielding said:

> We know that in many parts of the country great works are projected, railways, canals, and other enterprises, which might in themselves be worthy enough, some of which will have to be undertaken at a later date and will figure largely in the development of Canada; but it is much more important that we should, in the present condition of affairs, await an improved financial condition. Therefore we say to the promoters of all these enterprises, no matter how worthy they may be, that they must be content to let them stand aside for the present.

What was the condition of affairs in 1914? In 1914 there was every appearance of distress at the time that Parliament was opened for the session of that year. Words were placed in the mouth of His Royal Highness the Governor General, which I read a few moments ago, and which indicated that the Government was not unaware that a serious condition of affairs threatened this whole country. But the present Finance Minister did not take the steps followed by his predecessor in the year of which I spoke. In 1909-10 Mr. Fielding reduced the expenditure upon consolidated fund account by $9,334,243. He reduced it upon capital account by $13,247,215, making a total reduction of his Estimates from the preceding year of $22,581,458. It is quite true that at the end of the fiscal year it was found that he had not maintained that decrease; but why? Because the equilibrium of the revenue had been established in the meantime, and there was every indication that a revenue almost equal to that of the preceding year, would be enjoyed by the treasury during the years 1909 and 1910, but, notwithstanding the expenditure, that year was in fact $5,000,000 less than that of the preceding year, but Mr. Fielding still had a surplus that year of $22,091,963. The hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Macdonell) endeavoured to take some credit for the Government because in the Estimates for the present year it is proposed to reduce them by a considerable sum of money. In giving a list of reductions in the expenditures for 1915-16, as compared with those for 1914-15, he read items to the House which aggregated the sum of $17,780,320. This, you will remember, is for the year 1915-16, but these reductions did not apply to the last year. In answer to my hon. friend from South Toronto, all I can say is that if the foresight of the Government was only equal to its hindsight, the Finance Minister would not have a deficit of $60,000,000 by a blooming sight. But it is not in 1915-16 that they should have reduced their expenditure, it was in 1914-15. If the Finance Minister had done so, then we would not now be met with the condition of affairs which was disclosed by his Budget statement.

I have here a statement which has been brought down to the House to-day showing the expenditures from month to month during the years 1912, 1913 and 1914. I shall take the expenditure for the last three months of 1913 and the last three months of 1914 and see to what extent the Finance Minister was preparing to meet the financial obligations which were maturing and which have been disclosed in the Budget speech. In September 1913, the expenditure on consolidated revenue account amounted to $9,268,518.33. For the corresponding month in 1914, when the war was on and with every sign of the financial depression and the scarcity of money apparent on all sides, he increased that expenditure to $12,962,824.66. The capital expenditure for September, 1913, amounted to $3,892,564.02 and in September 1914 to $4,581,282.73. Special expenditure in September 1913 amounted to $80,145.02. In September 1914 it amounted to $687,201.81.

In October 1913, the expenditure on consolidated fund account amounted to $8,749,737.11. In October 1914 it amounted to $9,696,064.71. The capital expenditure in October 1913 was $3,343,026.36 and in October 1914 it was $4,479,119.80. Special expenditure for October 1913, amounted to $3,673,060.02 and for October 1914 $84,057.76.

In November, 1913, the consolidated fund expenditure was $9,232,141.30 and in November, 1914, it was $10,496,923.83. The capital expenditure in November, 1913, was $4,231,379.18 and in November, 1914, it was $4,250,385.75. Special expenditure for November, 1913, was $2,068,074.11 and for November, 1914, $350,245.68.

In December, 1913, the consolidated fund expenditure was $9,308,955.66 and in December 1914, it was $9,942,985.96. The capital expenditure in December, 1913, was $3,407,611.33 and in December, 1914, it was $2,910,167.25. The special expenditure in December, 1913, was $797,683.49 and in December, 1914, it was $1,532,807.78.

We have here a record which certainly does not indicate care and forethought on the part of the Finance Minister. The total increase during the four months, September, October, November and December, 1914, as compared with the same months of 1913 amounted to $3,686,188. We have certainly no indication in these figures that the Finance Minister, even as late as December 1914, realized that there was reason for economy. But how is it proposed that the deficit shall be met? It is proposed that this deficit on ordinary expenditure and on capital account, apart from the war, shall be met by certain special taxes as well as by increases in the tariff rates. For the extravagance that I have pointed out—and I have only pointed out a few isolated cases—the people of Canada will be compelled, while the present Government is in power, to pay an extra cost on nearly every necessity of life as well as special taxes on other things which will add materially to the burden of the cost of living. We have increased duty on bananas, against which a very loud protest has been raised throughout this country, wearing apparel, boots and shoes, many kinds of foodstuffs, drugs and many other products which enter into the daily consumption and the ordinary business of almost every consumer in the Dominion of Canada. Some few years ago, and after the present Government came into office, the fishermen of the maritime provinces demanded a change in the interpretation of the tariff with respect to the duty on cotton twine used in the manufacture of lobster traps. The interpretation which had been placed upon it previous to the change of Government was regarded as too liberal for the fishermen, inasmuch as the actual commodity used in the construction of lobster traps was not described in the tariff. The result of the new interpretation put upon that item by the present Minister of Customs was to place upon the tax list an item which for many years under the old Government had been free, with the result that the fishermen of the maritime provinces have had to pay a higher price for that commodity ever since. In the session of 1912, I called the attention of the Minister of Finance to this unfairness, and he was good enough to say that at the next revision of the tariff he would look into the matter. The next amendment to the tariff was made in the session of 1913, and while several articles heretofore taxed were placed on the free list by the tariff amendment of that year, notably coarse thread which is used by manufacturers of thread in certain cities in the province of Ontario, the Finance Minister did not see his way clear to reduce the duty upon this twine used by the fishermen, and as a consequence they have had to pay the duty ever since. So that in addition to the duty of 25 per cent heretofore collected by the present Government upon this kind of twine, there is to be an additional duty of 7½ per cent, and the fishermen of the maritime provinces will be obliged to pay that additional tax to make up for the deficit of the Minister of Finance —a deficit which is due to the wanton and unjustifiable extravagance of the several departments of this Government.

There is another item in which the fishermen of the maritime provinces are interested, and that is corkwood. Ever since 1897, corkwood has been on the free list. By the revision of the tariff made in 1897 by the Minister of Customs of that day and his associates, corkwood and many other things necessary in the prosecution of the fisheries were put on the free list. I notice that in the list made by the Minister of Finance of articles which will not be affected by the proposed increase of 7½ per cent, there is no mention of corkwood; so that necessarily this important item, hitherto free, will be taxed. If it is not too late, I most earnestly request the Minister of Finance to look into this matter, and inasmuch as nearly all the other articles used by fishermen in the prosecution of their industry are upon the free list perhaps the Minister of Finance might see his way to put corkwood on the free list, as it was before.

What is to be the consequence of the increase in the tariff? Is it to be a temporary or a permanent increase? For my part I think there are signs and indications that the present increases are to be regarded as a permanent institution. The interests that have been able to get this advantage over the consumers of Canada are not likely to yield it up very readily. We know the history of the United States with respect to tariff. We know that the American Civil War was the excuse for imposing high protective duties in that country. Large obligations were incurred by the United States Government during the Civil War, and as a consequence the duties had to be very largely increased. We know how the consumers of that country have struggled ever since to get the tariff reduced. We know that from 1865 up to the year 1913 they did not succeed in securing any decrease whatever. The interests that had grown up under the new tariff came forward year after year urging that the tariff be retained, and the consequence was that in a few years the United States had the highest tariff that has ever been imposed in any country. A writer of that day said of this tariff:

> A system of taxation more comprehensive, more burdensome and more confused than it has ever been the lot of any other civilized community to bear.

Further on he says:

> The tariff of 1864 is the real war tariff, and the basis of the present tariff. While the main reasons of its passage were without doubt the need of increased revenue for the Government and the desire to compensate the various interests for the burdens imposed on them by the internal revenue, it is undeniable that its final shape was largely owing to the endeavours of the protected manufacturers to gain each for himself the greatest possible advantage irrespective of the other's interests. Above all, the habits engendered during this period of comprehensive protection to every thing led to a crystallization of the sentiment in favour of national exclusion and isolation. The commercial policy of the United States for many decades was moulded by the dealings and habits generated during the period of the civil war. Henceforth the movement in favour of high protection, which still in great part dominates the American people, was to become the leading feature in the commercial and political life of the country. What was in its origin a mere temporary expedient called forth by the exigencies of a great military struggle was to become a permanent institution.

We have had our first war tariff in Canada. We had the first instalment of it in August, 1914, and we are now getting the second instalment. There would be some excuse for asking the people of Canada to bear the burden of an increased tariff if these were actually war taxes, but in view of the facts that are well known throughout of the country at the present time and of the facts that have been made known in this House since this debate began, it is inconceivable and incomprehensible how the Minister of Finance can bring down a tariff for the purpose of raising ordinary revenue and call it a war tariff, and blame the war for the necessity of bringing it on. The Minister of Finance is largely interested in important financial corporations in Canada, and he is certainly not without familiarity with corporation law. Let me ask him what would happen if the president or general manager or board of directors of a corporation in Canada were to put shares upon the market and ask for subscriptions to funds to be applied on capital account or for the purpose of increasing the capital outlay of that corporation, and who then, notwithstanding the statement in the prospectus, applied those funds for the purpose of paying salaries. I am quite sure that a board of directors that would do such a thing would very soon be brought into intimate relationship with the crown attorney and with the judge presiding over the criminal court. In any other walk of life that would not be tolerated. I am bound to say it is absolutely improper and indefensible to couple a demand for war revenue with increased taxes which are required only for the purpose of paying the ordinary expenditure of the country.

There is another tax imposed upon the people by this tariff which will be extremely irksome and annoying. I refer to the postage tax. Now, if it is necessary for the Government to resort to this mode of taxation, why do they not as a matter of principle raise the postage on letters to three cents and on postal cards to two cents? That would have been very much better, and much less annoying than the present scheme. I am familiar with conditions existing in the country. We know that the owner of a farm, for instance, does not waste his time running to and from the post office. Neither do the grown-up members of his family, for they are employed in more important and serious work. The duty of carrying letters to and from the post office devolves upon the younger members of the family. Heretofore, when a farmer wanted to post a letter, he gave his child two cents, and he went to the post office, bought the stamp, placed it on the envelope and posted the letter, which then went on to its destination. What is the reason for the complicated system the Finance Minister proposes? There are going to be difficulties and irritations without end.

The child going to the post office after the new tariff is in force will have to ask not only for a two cent stamp, but in addition the one cent tax stamp which will also have to be attached to the letter, and if, through the ignorance or illiteracy of the postmaster, an ordinary one cent stamp is placed upon the letter instead of the tax stamp, the letter will find its way into the dead letter office, or the receiver of the letter will be penalized to the extent of double the deficiency in postage. I intimated that there was such a thing as illiterate and incompetent postmasters in this country. Perhaps it will come as a surprise to you, Mr. Speaker, to know that the term "illiteracy" could be properly applied to functionaries occupying the responsible office of postmaster, but it is a fact that under the present Government there have been appointed postmasters who are absolutely illiterate, and are unable to read the directions upon the letters coming into their charge, or to know the denominations of the ordinary postage stamps. There is a case in my own county where a postmaster was dismissed. He was competent, and he had discharged his duties as such for a good many years. There was no fault to be found with him. After the change of Government a complaint was made that he was a Liberal, and his office was removed to a neighbouring house. He received his notice of dismissal, and he was directed to hand over the property of the Postoffice Department to his successor. His successor came to the postoffice, a list was made out of the articles belonging to the Postoffice Department, and the retiring postmaster passed his successor over a receipt for those articles and asked him to sign it. The successor said: I can not sign it. The retiring postmaster said: Why can you not sign it? And his successor replied: Because I am not able to read or write. The postmaster stated: You will not get the property until you sign for it. The new postmaster had to go to the nearest village and get into communication with the postmaster there. The postmaster there telegraphed the postoffice inspector at Halifax, and the inspector at Halifax instructed the postmaster at the neighbouring village to go to the postmaster who had been dismissed and sign the receipt for the new postmaster. That is not a fanciful tale, but it is in line with many of the appointments which are being made by this Government. We have food inspectors appointed who can not tell the difference between a porterhouse steak and a gad of smelts, and we have fruit inspectors appointed who do not know the difference between a Gravenstein apple and a Brussels sprout. These are conditions which have grown up under the present Government, notwithstanding the fact that these hon. gentlemen, while in opposition, decried long and loud the system of patronage as it had developed during that period.

But we have other things which we are interested in and which we will continue to think about from time to time as a result of this new tariff. Upon the delivery by the Finance Minister of his Budget we had a deputation of two hundred tobacco growers from Ontario and Quebec asking to have more protection upon their tobacco. If every industry in Canada is to be protected I would like to know why the tobacco growers are not to be able to enter the swim as well as others. If they do not get what they ask for it must be because they are not organized and are not an adjunct of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. The Budget of the Finance Minister is an announcement that this is a protectionist Government and that protection not only for revenue but protection to prohibit the importation of foreign goods of any description is to be their policy. The amount of revenue that we will derive from the new Budget proposals of the Finance Minister remains to be seen when the tariff proposals are taken up in Committee of the Whole House. It would, I am sure, be interesting to inquire what amount of revenue can be derived under the proposals of the Government in respect to many of these tariff increases; but apart from the additional burdens which are to be placed upon the people by this increase of the tariff, there are annoyances and disagreeable features that ought to be remedied and which, if not remedied, will lead to the utmost confusion.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a good deal of interest to several addresses which have been delivered on this Budget, although I did not have the opportunity of being present when the main Opposition critic (Mr. A. K. Maclean) delivered his speech. I have read his speech quite carefully, and notwithstanding the criticisms made by the hon. gentleman and those who have followed him on that side of the House, I can sincerely offer my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) my hearty congratulations on the presentation of his Budget. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Kyte) found some fault with the present Administration for not having appointed, as he said, a farmer as Minister of Argriculture; and he took some credit to the previous Administration for having appointed the Hon. Sydney Fisher, a farmer, as Minister of Agriculture. Well, Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Sydney Fisher may have been a farmer, but I venture to say that no man ever occupied the position of Minister of Agriculture who had a smaller regard for the farmers of Canada than had the Hon. Sydney Fisher. The Hon. Sydney Fisher, from his place in this House, stated as a reason why the farmers preferred to raise hogs rather than sheep was that the obstinacy of the hog induced the farmer to engage in the production of pork rather than in the production of mutton. He also stated from his place in this House that the farmers were a slip-shod, lazy and indifferent class of people. He is on "Hansard" as having made such a statement, and yet the hon. member for Richmond gives credit to the Liberal Administration for having appointed as Minister of Agriculture a person of that kind.

I was very much amused by some of the arguments advanced by the hon. gentleman, particularly his argument in regard to the extra stamp to be placed on post cards and letters. The hon. gentleman was hard up for an argument when he said that the placing of an extra war stamp on a post card or letter would make the system a very embarrassing one. He said that children who now were sent to the post office by their parents with two cents to buy a postage stamp to put on a letter down in his constituency would hardly be able to handle the extra financing of one cent entailed by putting another stamp on the letter. If we take that as an illustration of the people generally in the county of Richmond we can readily understand how it is that they have their present representative in the House of Commons at Ottawa, but I think the hon. gentleman in making that statement has cast an unwarranted reflection on the intelligence of the people of Richmond.

Mr. KYTE: The intelligence of the Tory postmasters.

Mr. EDWARDS: I think that, notwithstanding what he says, the people in Richmond will be able to handle this large financial problem and work it out successfully so that letters will not go to the dead letter office. The hon. gentleman has said that during the year 1914 there had been considerable depression and that there were men out of work. That is undoubtedly true. Let us ask why that is the case. The Canadian Pacific Railway Lake Shore line, the Canadian Northern Railway, Ontario division, the Canadian Northern Railway Ottawa-Toronto branch and several other lines of railway have been completed lately, throwing out of work men engaged in their construction. I take issue with the hon. member when he argues that at such a time we should put on the brakes at once and stop our public works. It is no time to do that when men are out of employment.

Is it a fact that we on this side of the House are entirely responsible for conditions in Canada at the present time, or is it not the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite should bear the blame? The hon. member said that this new tariff was imposed simply to meet the extravagance of the present Administration. Will the hon. gentleman declare that his party has no responsibility for any of the public works which were started when the Liberals were in power and which had to be completed by the present Government since it came into power? It is a fact that during the last four years ending March, 1915, the Minister of Finance has had to finance some $56,000,000 for the National Transcontinental railway, some $10,000,000 for the Quebec bridge, some $38,000,000 in connection with the extravagant implementing clause of the Grand Trunk Pacific bond issue, for which this Government is not responsible, and some $15,000,000 loaned to the Grand Trunk Pacific. That makes a total of about $120,000,000, for which the Minister of Finance has had to finance. If hon. gentlemen opposite want to be fair, they will not and cannot claim that the present Government is responsible in the main for these necessary expenditures.

Allow me to refer for a moment to some statements made by previous speakers in regard to Government dismissals. They allege that in the various departments officials of the Government have been dismissed and others have been put in their places. If I have any fault to find with the present Government along that line, it will be because it has not dismissed enough of them. There are a great many more who still retain their positions who should have been dismissed. What is the record of the Liberal party when it came into power in 1896? The axe fell, and it fell frequently. In the first nine months of the Laurier Administration, 466 Government officials were dismissed without the shadow of an investigation. I am not going to follow all the arguments advanced by the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) with regard to this, but I will refer to one or two departments to which he has alluded. Take for instance the Customs Department. The revenue from customs for 1911 was about two and a half times as much as it was in 1896. The cost of collection advanced by 162 per cent in that time. In 1913, the revenue had increased from $73,000,000 to $115,000,000, or an increase of 57 per cent, while the cost of collection had increased by about 47 per cent. The inward entries in the Customs Department in 1896 amounted to only 528,489, and the outward entries to 104,660. The business had grown enormously during the Laurier regime and continued to grow after the Borden Government took office until in 1913 the inward entries amounted to 1,902,155, and the outward entries to 466,122. It is unreasonable for hon. gentlemen to expect that a department, in which the work was growing at the rate which these figures indicate, could go ahead with its work without any increase in the cost or in the number of officials. It is true the number of officials was increased. In 1911, there were 198 officials in the inside service, and in 1915 there were 232—not a very large increase. In the outside service the increase from Otcober, 1911, to January, 1915, was from 2,273 to 3,144. The salaries paid to these officials indicate just the opposite of what has been charged against the Minister of Customs. They indicate that the utmost care has been used by the minister in that regard. It is true that the cost of living has increased and the salaries of these officials had to increase; but the increase is not so very great, and the average increase throughout has been more than warranted by the increased cost of living.

Let us take the cost of collection for the ten years from October 1, 1904 to October 1, 1914, because taking the figures year by year will best prove my argument. The figures are as follows:

Year.	Cost to collect. Per cent.
1905-06	3.31
1906-07	3.04
1907-08	3.30
1908-09	4.15
1909-10	3.32

or an average for those years of Liberal Government of 3.37.

These figures answer the statement made by the hon. junior member for Halifax and prove that he was not right in his statement charging extravagance to this department. In 1913-14, the cost of collection was 3.59 per cent.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What are the figures for 1914-15?

Mr. EDWARDS: I have not the figures. Since October, 1911, a number of new offices have been opened. Three chief ports have been opened, three outports have been made chief ports, and 54 new outports and five preventive and collecting stations have been opened. It is all right to refer to the number of officials in a department, but there are places throughout the country where men are doing preventive officer's work and getting possibly $100 or $150 a year, and they are included in the number of customs officials. Therefore the number bulks very large, and it is most unfair to place the figures before the House and the country as the hon. member has done.

The Post Office Department also came in for some censure from the hon. junior member from Halifax (Mr. Maclean), and it has not escaped the attention of the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte). The figures presented to the House by the hon. junior member for Halifax show that the revenue from the Post Office Department has each year exceeded the expenditure. But the hon. gentleman looks forward very dolefully to the future and predicts a deficit in that department. Suppose there were a deficit in the Post Office Department. I have maintained before in this House, and have no hesitation in stating now that if there is any department of Government that would be justified in having a deficit it is the post office. The money which makes up the revenue of that department is obtained from the people as payment for postage and should be given back to the people in the form of increased postal facilities. In my county, since this administration took office, the people have obtained postal facilities the like of which they never had before. I have in my county over seven hundred miles of rural mail routes, and many other counties have more than that. I estimate that about one-quarter of the population of the county I have the honour to represent are able to get their mails at their very doors. What was the situation before this Government came into power? The situation was this: The Administration of that day seized upon a suggestion made by the right hon. gentleman who leads the present Government in favour of rural free mail delivery, and just before the election of 1908 they established one or two rural routes in the province of Ontario. But from 1908 down to 1911, where were rural routes established? I cannot speak for the other provinces, but I know that in my own province of Ontario the rural routes were established only where there was sufficient political pull to get them. That is the fact and no hon. gentleman on the other side can deny it. A member who supported the Government of that day could get a few rural routes established in his county, but a county that was not represented by a Government supporter got no consideration whatever. Under the present Administration rural routes have been extended, and are being extended, regardless of the political complexion of the representative of the constituencies. That is an indication of fairness on the part of this Government which the Liberal Government never displayed.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. EDWARDS (resuming): Before six o'clock I was calling attention to the expenditures in connection with the Post Office Department, which have been criticised by the hon. member for Halifax. I was pointing out that if in the Post Office Department the expenditure for the last fiscal year was greater than that of 1911, there was ample justification for that expenditure in the improved postal facilities which this Government has given the people of the country districts in various parts of the Dominion.

I had also called attention to the cost of collecting the custom revenue. The hon. member for Halifax asked as to the cost of collection for the present fiscal year. I do not see how the hon. gentleman can reasonably expect to make any point in that regard. I gave the cost of collection for ten years, and showed that in 1911-12 and 1912-13 the cost of collecting the customs revenue under the present Administration was considerably less than the average cost of collecting during the previous seven or eight years under the Liberal Administration. Undoubtedly during the present year, and possibly during the coming year, there will be an increase in the cost of collecting, because of a loss of revenue, which is inevitable. But I scarcely think that hon. gentlemen opposite would argue that the moment your revenue begins to fall you should immediately dismiss your officials right and left, in order to keep the cost of collecting down to the average cost of previous years. That would be imposing an unnecessary and very unjust hardship upon many officials.

The hon. member for Halifax, in the course of his remarks, made use of this expression:

> I realize it to be too true that in Canada the public sense respecting Government expenditures is not so delicately and correctly adjusted as it should be, and it frequently appears like the voice of one crying in the wilderness to protest.

When did the hon. gentleman's political conscience become troubled in that respect? Can the hon. gentleman point to any places in "Hansard" wherein he is reported as objecting to any of these expenditures in the past? If the expenditures of the various departments have been open to censure the hon. gentleman stands condemned out of his own mouth for sitting here in silence when he should have called attention to unnecessary and extravagant expenditure. But he said not a single word. Nor does he get up in his place in the House to-day and tell the Government that they should cut out any expenditures that they intend to make in the city of Halifax. It is all right to say in general terms that the expenditure is too great. But the way to show a true desire to have it reduced is to point to specific instances in which reductions can reasonably be made. When I read that sentence of the hon. member for Halifax with regard to the public sense being not very delicately adjusted, I wondered what the Liberal party had done in the past in the way of adjusting that public sense. I wondered if it would be out of place to call to their attention some of the things which they did to put the machinery out of adjustment and to dull the public sense of appreciation of expenditure. Let me read to the House the words of a former Liberal member of this House in regard to one matter of expenditure for which the country holds the Liberal party responsible. I quote from the Winnipeg Tribune, the editor of which is Mr. R. L. Richardson, a former Liberal member of this Parliament. The article, which is headed "Graft and Loot," deals with the Transcontinental Railway scandal, and this is what that gentleman says:

> The entire report is such a record of incompetence, and dishonesty, and graft and loot that it ought to be sufficient to sink the country. Just what men like Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Mr. Fielding, Mr. Sifton, Mr. Graham, the then Minister of Railways, must think of the situation, would be interesting to know. Some of these men are still in public life, and others have retired, but they have certainly bequeathed a legacy to their country which should stand as a monument to their disgrace for the next century or two, until their names shall have rotted in oblivion. The appalling corruption and mismanagement in connection with this undertaking practically destroys it for all time as an asset to the Dominion. So enormously has the cost been enhanced, and so frightful will be the interest charges that it will be impossible to pay operating expenses, interest on capital, and wear and tear, afford to the settlers passenger and freight rates that are not prohibitory, and that could afford any relief to the burdened taxpayer. The whole enterprise has been so bungled that it would probably have been better if the Government had taken $100,000,000 of the country's money and thrown it into the furnace for utter destruction.

That is the opinion of a former Liberal member of the Government which went out of power when this Government took office—and a Liberal candidate for election since that time—in regard to graft, loot and extravagance. I respectfully commend his words to hon. gentlemen opposite when they feel disposed to talk about the graft and extravagance of this Administration.

It has been stated by the Finance Minister and by the junior member for Halifax—and not denied—that there will inevitably be an increase in the public debt of Canada. Let us look at the question of the national debt just for a moment. In 1896, the year the Liberal party came into power, the net debt of Canada was $258,497,432. In 1911, when they left office, the net debt was $340,042,052. So that they had succeeded in increasing the debt of Canada by over $81,500,000. The Borden Government took office in October, 1911, and at the end of the last fiscal year, March 31, 1914, they had decreased the net debt by something over $6,000,000. The present fiscal year will see an addition to the debt of Canada, due to Canada's participation in the defence of the Empire we love and of liberties that we hold sacred.

A decline in revenue and an increase in expenditure means, of course, an addition to the national debt; and no matter what party had been in power at the present time, I maintain that an increase in our national debt for this year was inevitable under the circumstances. In that, of course, I am assuming that if the Liberal party had been in power they would have gone on and participated in the present war as we have done. The Finance Minister puts the loss of revenue for the present year at $33,000,000. I would like hon. gentlemen opposite, in criticising the Budget, as they have a perfect right to do, to state how they would have altered or changed the policy of the Dominion of Canada so as to have avoided a declining revenue at the present time. Surely no hon. member in this House will to-day stand up and express the opinion that the adoption of the reciprocity pact would have prevented the loss in revenue which has taken place. Surely no political party in this or any other country ever had its folly fully brought home as the folly of the Liberal party has been brought home to it in the last twelve months. For the years 1911-12, 1912-13, 1913-14 the surplusses are the largest in the financial history of the Dominion of Canada. We have had heavy expenditures on public works that had to be completed—the National Transcontinental railway, the Quebec bridge, the Hudson Bay railway, the Welland canal—and which of these would the hon. gentlemen opposite have stopped? If I mistake not, the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition not only favoured the construction of the Welland canal, but also favoured entering on the construction of the Georgian Bay canal, and that within the last twelve months. Special taxes are required at the present time to meet special conditions. Will anybody question the correctness of that statement? To meet the necessities of our war expenditures and our pension list, special taxation is necessary. If no war existed these special taxes would not be necessary, and the situation would have been met without difficulty. In regard to expenditure, what has been the record of the Liberal party? I remember that previous to 1896, before they came to power, the Liberal party pledged itself to reduce the expenditure which at the time was $38,000,000 or $40,000,000 a year. This amount they declared to be outrageous; in fact, from one end of the country to the other they declared that the then Conservative party was grinding the people between the upper and the nether millstone of taxation; and that if they were returned to power they would reduce that expenditure by at least several millions. That statement, of course, at that time was just as bad as the statements they are making from their seats on the other side of the House to-day. What was their record when in power? Instead of reducing the expenditure, in the first five years the average ran, not from $38,000,000 to $40,000,000, but over $50,000,000; in the next five years it averaged over $72,000,000, and in the next five years it averaged over $113,500,000, reaching more than $133,000,000 in 1909. They declared they would lessen the taxes of the people. Did they fulfil that pledge? The taxes represented by customs and excise in 1896 amounted to $5.46 per head of the population. In 1906 they amounted to $10 per head of population, and in 1911, still under Liberal rule, to $12 per head of population. That is how they kept their pledge to reduce taxation. But Canada's national debt is not to be measured merely in dollars, and while I submit that the Liberal party in this country is responsible for a very large part of Canada's national debt as represented in dollars, the Liberal party in this country is responsible, I believe I might say entirely responsible, for that part of Canada's national debt which is not measured in dollars, because there is a debt that this country owes, and which under Liberal administration was allowed to accumulate and increase from year to year, a debt of gratitude to the Mother Country, which they never seemed disposed to pay, and which was allowed to accumulate under their administration.

Allow me to call attention for a few moments to our trade. Canada's imports for the year ending March 31, 1914, amounted to $635,511,492, which was $31,000,000 less than our imports for the previous year, but notwithstanding that falling off, was $173,500,000 more than our imports in 1911. In 1914 our exports of Canadian produce amounted to $431,500,000, which was $75,800,000 more than in 1913 and $157,272,000 more than in 1911. Canada's total trade in 1914 showed an increase over 1913 of $34,500,000, and an increase over 1911, the last year of Liberal rule, of $460,300,000. Our trade with France shows a decrease in our imports of a little over $1,000,000 and an increase in our exports to that country of about a like amount. Our trade with Germany for 1914 shows a slight increase in our imports from that country, less than one-quarter of a million, and an increase of over $1,000,000 in our exports to that country. Our imports from the United Kingdom were $6,800,000 less than in 1913, but our exports to the United Kingdom in 1914 were $44,340,000 more than in 1913. To the United States our exports in 1914 were $25,900,000 more than in 1913, and our imports from that country were $39,300,000 less than in the preceding year. Of Canada's exports of animals and their products, 69 per cent go to the British Empire and 31 per cent to other countries. Of Canada's exports of agricultural products, 56 per cent go to the British Empire and 34 per cent to all other countries. Seventy-two per cent of our surplus farm products for which we have to find a market go to the United Kingdom, 12½ per cent to the United States, and 15½ per cent to other countries. In other words 87½ per cent of those surplus products goes across the ocean, and is absolutely dependent upon Britain's supremacy on the seas for its safe conduct to the markets of the world. Let me give an example to illustrate the importance of this. In the first week after the war, salesmen representing various cheese factories in Eastern Ontario and Western Quebec attended their regular cheese board meetings, but were informed by the buyers of big exporting firms in Montreal, that they had had instructions not to buy any cheese that week. The reason given was that the exporting firms of Montreal did not feel that the trade routes were absolutely safe on account of the war. This was a serious matter for many of the farmers of Eastern Ontario, where dairying is carried on very extensively. The incident directed the attention of farmers from one end of the country to the other to the possibility of serious loss on account of the war. If we could not export our cheese, neither could we export our apples or our wheat. The next week, however, it was cabled to Canada from England that the trade routes were perfectly safe, and that the people of this country could export their produce as usual. What was it that made the trade routes safe? The British fleet. For years, every other overseas dominion had been contributing to the upkeep of that fleet. But the supremacy of Britain on the seas meant more to Canada, and particularly to the farmers of Canada, than it did to the people of any, or perhaps all, of the other overseas dominions; and yet this country, because of the action of the hon. gentlemen opposite, was in the position of being the only one of the overseas dominions that had never contributed a cent towards maintaining the supremacy of the British navy.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have often said in the past that the United States is Canada's natural market for wheat, and pretty nearly everything else. I feel that it is incumbent on me to give a few figures to demonstrate, as I think they will, that that argument is absolutely fallacious. Our wheat production in 1913 was something over 231,000,000 bushels. In 1914, it dropped to 158,223,000 bushels. To what was that falling off due? It was due to these three causes: unfavourable weather, less acreage under crop, and a smaller yield per acre. The United States in 1913 produced 763,000,000 bushels, and in 1914, 891,950,000 bushels. Their production last year was very great, and was due to the opposites of the three causes I have just mentioned. Their increase was due to favourable weather, greater acreage under crop, and a larger yield per acre. Let us look at the exports of wheat. The United States exported in 1912, 61,654,000 bushels; in 1913, 99,500,000 bushels, and in 1914, 173,861,000 bushels. Their exports of wheat flour were 10,621,000 barrels in 1912; 12,278,000 barrels in 1913, and 12,708,000 barrels in 1914. In the face of figures like that, can hon. gentlemen opposite still contend that Canada's natural market for wheat is the United States? It is just as reasonable to say that the natural market for Nova Scotia coal is Newcastle-on-Tyne, and hon. gentlemen opposite must surely admit that. We have a good market for wheat in England, but the market for our western wheat in our eastern provinces of Canada is almost as good. While we send to England 38,000,000 to 40,000,000 bushels of wheat a year, we send to Ontario, Quebec, the maritime provinces and British Columbia, over 32,000,000 bushels; so that these provinces alone furnish us with no small market.

Is the United States a market for our barley? The United States export figures do not indicate it. Last year they exported over 17,000,000 bushels; and as regards oats, while they import a lot, their exports of oats amounted to 25,500,000 bushels more than their imports. Is the United States a market for our horses? Last year Canada sold to the United States 4,618 horses, for which we received $583,000. The same year, the United States sold to Canada 33,718 horses, for which we paid $4,877,000. These figures do not convince me that the United States is a natural market for our horses, as hon. gentlemen opposite have frequently said. Take other products. The United States exports over 21,000,000 dozen of eggs and we import over 15,000,000 dozen; yet hon. gentlemen opposite argue that the United States is the natural market for Canada's eggs. Our exports of butter have dropped down to the vanishing point; we import over 8,000,000 pounds a year, and a large portion of that comes from the United States In this connection, let me say that one of the greatest butter-exporting countries in the world is Denmark, which annually exports over 200,000,000 pounds. When considering the tariff I would ask hon. gentlemen opposite to bear in mind this fact: that butter brought from Denmark or Liverpool can be laid down in the Montreal market for less than one cent a pound for carriage. It has been claimed that the United States is also the market for Canadian meats. The United States' exports of beef run to over 36,000,000 pounds a year, and of hog products, to over one billion pounds a year. The United States invaded our home markets last year by sending to us 1,339,000 pounds of beef, nearly 9,000,000 pounds of bacon, 1,500,000 pounds of hams and shoulders, over 9,000,000 pounds of lard, and nearly ten million pounds of pickled pork; or a total of over 31,000,000 pounds of meats, to the value of four million dollars and upwards.

Last session I quoted from the United States official bulletin, to show that the prices of foodstuffs in the United States had not been materially affected by the Wilson-Underwood tariff. Why were the prices not materially affected? Because the importations were not sufficient to potentially affect the large supply in that country. But we must remember that a comparatively small quantity of foodstuffs imported into Canada would materially affect the supply here, and have a very strong effect upon prices. What would be a negligible quantity to the United States in comparison with the vast amount of foodstuffs in that country, would not be a negligible quantity if it were brought into Canada, and as I say, would seriously affect prices. That suggests to me another justification besides those already given by the Minister of Finance for the present increase in our tariff, and it is this. Since war broke out, large quantities of foodstuffs produced in the United States have been shut out of the markets to which they formerly went. For instance, the United States had an export trade of farm products to Germany of over $200,000,000 a year; but the war has stopped that, and, on account of the blockade, unsafe trade routes, and for other reasons, these products have also been shut out from other markets they formerly enjoyed. With these products on their hands, the United States would naturally look to selling them to their nearest neighbours, or wherever they could be most easily disposed of. In other words, they would try to dispose of them in this country. And I maintain that, if there were no other justification for this tariff, there is justification for it in order to prevent the dumping into Canada of the surplus productions of countries which through the war have lost the markets they formerly enjoyed. I am speaking as a protectionist when I make that statement. I make no apology for being a protectionist; I am a protectionist because I believe in the policy of protection. I talk in favour of protection, and in that respect I am unlike some hon. gentlemen opposite, who, believing in protection just as strongly as I do, for political reasons talk the other way; it all depending on which side of the House they are sitting.

Let us look for a moment at the British preference, about which hon. gentlemen opposite seem to be terribly worked up. They frequently talk as if the idea of the British preference originated in the minds of the Liberal party, and as if it were their child. But they can not demonstrate that, for it is not true. It is a borrowed idea, just as thousands of the ideas that they claim as their own are borrowed or stolen from somebody else. The Toronto Globe of June 13, 1896, in its report of a speech delivered by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in that city, quotes him as saying:

> I agree with him (Sir Charles Tupper) in regard to preferential trade. This is a new idea and one which in itself is fraught with greatness, not only for the Canadian people but for the British Empire at large. And now the principle is proclaimed that there shall be preferential trade within the Empire at large.

That idea of Sir Charles Tupper's was, then, a new one to the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The Globe goes on:

> That is to say that England and her colonies should trade upon a footing of preference over other nations. Imagine what would be the consequences if the products of Canada, the wheat, the barley, the oats, the butter, the cheese, which we are sending to England were to be accepted in the British markets on terms of preference over the products of the United States, of Russia, and all other countries which are competing with us in the market. The advantages are obvious, so obvious that the moment I saw the idea I jumped at it, and immediately declared myself in favour of it.

These are the words of the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier: that when the idea which originated in the mind of Sir Charles Tupper first appeared to the vision of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, he jumped at it. But hon. gentlemen opposite have forgotten the jump, and now claim the idea as their own. Shortly after this, Sir Wilfrid Laurier publicly announced, when he was in England, that he did not want any preference for Canadian farm products in the English market, but that he had given the preference to England without asking for any return. Hon. gentlemen opposite harp a good deal on that, but let us follow this British preference a little further. The intention of the Liberal party was to apply the preference, not merely to Great Britain—they did not intend to follow Sir Charles Tupper's idea along that line— but they intended to offer a preference to other countries besides England and the British Empire. In 1897 they passed what they now call the British Preference Act. I will read the section of the Act that bears upon this:

An Act to consolidate and amend the Acts respecting the duties of customs; assented to 29th June, 1897.

Section 17 is in these words:

When the custom tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the reciprocal tariff herein referred to are to the countries to which it may apply, articles which are the growth, produce or manufacture of such country, when imported direct therefrom, may then be entered for duty, or taken out of warehouse for consumption in Canada, at the reduced rates of duty provided in the reciprocal tariff set forth in schedule D to this Act.

Let us see what the Finance Minister of that time said. The Finance Minister took pride in the fact that the preference was open to all countries and that we were not doing anything in particular for Great Britain. Here is what he said about the custom tariff of 1897, as quoted in Hansard of that year:

We do not by our resolution offer anything to Great Britain alone. We make our offer, not to Great Britain, but to every nation that is prepared to accept it. We make it to every country which is willing to establish fair and reasonable trade relations with Canada.

These are the words of Finance Minister Fielding on that tariff. The idea put forth by Sir Charles Tupper had undergone some modification. They introduced their tariff changes along the lines of section 17, but no sooner was the Act passed and put in operation than they found themselves in difficulties with other countries on account of existing treaties. They amended the Act in these words:

On and after the 1st day of August, 1898, section 17 of the said Act shall be repealed and the following shall be substituted therefor:

Articles which are the growth, produce or manufacture of any of the following countries may, when imported directly into Canada from any such country, be entered for duty or taken out of warehouse for consumption in Canada at the reduced rate of duty provided in the British preferential tariff set forth in schedule D to this Act.

I want to give hon. gentlemen opposite a few more figures in regard to this British preference which I thought perhaps would be interesting to them and certainly to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff). I do not see him present but I hope he will be here in a few minutes. Of Canada's total imports in 1896, 31 per cent were from Great Britain; in 1908, under Liberal Government, only 27 per cent of our total imports were from Great Britain. In 1896, of the imports coming into Canada free of duty 22 per cent came from Great Britain. In 1908, under Liberal Government, notwithstanding all their talk about the preference, only 17 per cent of the goods coming into Canada free came from England. From the United States the proportion rose from 64 per cent free of duty in 1896 to 70 per cent in 1908.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have been endeavouring to make capital out of the fact that under the Finance Minister's arrangement of the tariff he is not only increasing the general tariff 7½ per cent but he is also increasing the British preferential tariff 5 per cent. Hon. gentlemen do not seem to realize that it is possible to increase the rate of duty and yet at the same time increase the degree of preference and that is precisely what is being done here. The Budget of the Finance Minister increases the British preference by 2½ per cent relatively to other countries. Let us take a case to illustrate that statement. An article worth $100 comes into Canada from England. A similar article worth $100 comes into Canada from the United States. The duty on the article coming from the United States is 30 per cent, we will say. This 30 per cent on $100 is $30 that has to be paid on that article. The duty on the article coming from England is 20 per cent and 20 per cent on $100 is $20. The British merchant in that case gets his article worth $100 into Canada for $10 less than it costs the United States merchant. Take the tariff as changed by the Finance Minister. The duty on the article coming from the United States is 37½ per cent while the British tax is 25 per cent. The tariff of 37½ per cent on the article worth $100 amounts to $37.50 and 25 per cent on the $100 article coming from England is $25. If you subtract one from the other you will find that the preference to the British merchant is $12.50, whereas it was formerly $10.

I want to refer to a statement made by the hon. member for Assiniboia and I am sorry he is not here. In discussing the British preference last night the hon. member for Assiniboia got very tragic. He said: My hon. friend opposite now proposes to put an extra tax on British goods for the purpose of shutting off trade with Great Britain; the tax is put on for no other reason; the Finance Minister has to have more money; if the Government will not shut off expenditures, if it is bound to have an extra $30,000,000, impose the taxes on the outside world, and if you cannot do it in any other way, impose a direct tax and take your $10,000,000 out of the banks, the trust companies and the insurance companies, tax every one of them, make them pay what money you want, but for heaven's sake keep your unholy and disloyal hands off the British preference. So spoke the hon. member for Assiniboia. Keep your unholy hands—

An hon. MEMBER: Disloyal.

Mr. EDWARDS: Yes, he said: keep your unholy and disloyal hands off the British preference. Let us see what his own party did in regard to the British preference and to what extent they kept their hands off the British preference in times past. In 1897, the Liberal party in this House made a cut of ⅛ or 12½ per cent from the general tariff in favour of Great Britain. Then in 1898, that was increased to 25 per cent, and in 1900 a further increase to 33⅓ per cent was made. Here is a list of a few articles to show how well the Liberals kept their hands off the preference between 1900 and 1907:

Comparison of British Preferential Tariffs.

Article.	Year 1900. Per cent.	Year 1907. Per cent.
*Dry white lead	3⅓	20
*White lead in oil	16⅔	30

Varnishes, 13⅓ cts. per gallon and 13⅓ per cent, 20 cts. per gallon and 15 per cent.

* In 1904, the preferential rate on wool cloth and wool clothing was increased from 23⅓ per cent to 30 per cent.

* In 1905, the preferential rate on dry white lead was increased from 3⅓ per cent to 20 per cent, and on white lead , in oil, from 16⅔ per cent to 23⅓ per cent, and again in 1907 to 30 per cent.

This table shows that in the year 1907 the Liberal party imposed a heavier duty on all these goods coming into Canada than had formerly obtained. They took away from Great Britain the preference which they had formerly given and taxed British goods in some cases a good deal more than double the former tax. Was the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) a member of the House in 1907?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS: Is it possible that he is the same gentleman who the other night, with tears coursing down his cheeks, begged that our unholy and profane hands would be kept off the British preference? Is it possible that that gentleman sat in this House supporting his party when they laid their unholy hands—surely no person will object to my using that language, because my hon. friends applied it wholesale to hon. gentlemen on this side—on the British preference, as I have shown that they did in 1907.

There is another remark which the hon. member for Assiniboia made and which I, as a member of this House, do not feel like letting pass. He begged us to keep our unholy and profane hands off the British preference; but the hon. gentleman in the course of his remarks saw fit to throw the taunt of disloyalty at members on this side of the House, mainly in regard to the change in the preferential tariff. Under those circumstances I am justified in inquiring as to who this hon. gentleman is and as to the record of his party so far as loyalty is concerned. If the Liberal party want a discussion or a comparison of records along that line, we will give it to them. If they get it, they will have themselves to blame for having invited it.

What was their loyalty in 1891, and how did they manifest it? They manifested their loyalty by showing a willingness to barter Canada and Canada's honour for Yankee dollars. The hon. member for Assiniboia supported his party in that course at that time.

What was their record during the Boer war in 1899? The Conservative party and public sentiment actually forced the Liberal Government to send what troops they did send to South Africa. Let me tell the hon. member for Assiniboia and those sitting near him who applauded his taunt of disloyalty that, when they sent that party of less than 3,000 men—yes, less than 2,500 men, if we leave out the Strathcona contribution—they sent them C.O.D. When that contingent went to South Africa every dollar of the cost was paid by Great Britain during the whole time they were there; yet five times as much money came from Great Britain into the hands of the Liberal Government to purchase supplies for the war as the Liberal party expended in sending that contingent of men to South Africa. That is their record so far as their loyalty in that regard is concerned.

What about their loyalty in 1911? What was their position as manifested then by their trade policy? They were perfectly willing at that time to make Canada an adjunct of the United States. I do not impugn their party loyalty not for a moment. They have manifested their party loyalty time and again in the past by a willing obedience to the crack of the party whip, to back up sawdust wharf transactions, which I commend especially to the attention of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley); McAvity steals, the Aylesworth ditch, the Saskatchewan land deal, which probably the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) could tell us a good deal about; and if there is anything that he would miss, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) who has had some knowledge as to transactions regarding timber, will probably be able to tell us something. In all of these matters they have manifested a party loyalty which no one will impugn.

Mr. PROULX: The hon. gentleman should not forget the Prince Albert deal.

Mr. EDWARDS: I did not know you had a deal in Prince Albert, too. I know there are mighty few places you missed, and it would be rather surprising if you had overlooked Prince Albert. I am very certain that if my hon. friend had been there it would not have been overlooked.

Now, hon. gentlemen opposite argue as if it were possible to raise the general tariff without raising or changing the British preferential tariff. That is absolutely ridiculous. The hon. member for Assiniboia spoke as if it would be possible to add 7½ per cent and still leave the British preferential tariff alone. Surely, if hon. members will consider that matter for a little while they will see the fallacy of that. What would be the effect of such a course? You would simply invite disaster to every concern in Canada. Why? Because you would be forcing your Canadian manufacturer to pay an increase of 7½ per cent on his raw material while the raw material would still go into Britain free and their goods would be shipped in here at the old rate. That would give to the British manufacturer an advantage which would simply mean the destruction of every industry in the Dominion of Canada. Hon. gentlemen may talk about this 5 per cent addition to the British preference being disloyal or unfair to England, but they would not get any English statesman or politician to say that, because—and I do not wish to be discourteous—they would have more sense.

Let us consider another matter connected with the record of the party of hon. gentlemen opposite. They have shed tears—or have got ready to do so; they have gone through all the motions of weeping—about agricultural implements. Let us follow their course on agricultural implements and one or two other things, for it is an interesting course and one worth following. The tariff of 1894 reduced the duty on agricultural implements from 35 per cent to 20 per cent. We all remember, of course, how the Liberal party and their organs up and down the country declared that if only they had the chance to get their hands on the throats of the manufacturers they would utterly destroy them. Occasionally they talk along that line to-day, at least one or two of them do, forgetting that their own leader has said that the manufacturer was the farmer's best and warmest friend. In 1907, the Liberal party did pluck up courage to take off 2½ per cent from the duty on agricultural implements, cutting it down from 20 per cent to 17½ per cent. When the matter came up in the House in that year, the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner) proposed this resolution:

> That the committee reconsider item 445, and that it be amended by striking out the figures 17½ per cent in the general tariff and inserting in lieu therof the figures 10 per cent.

That was voted down by 56 to 22. Every Liberal member in the House at that time forgot the farmer entirely and voted against the resolution. There was a discussion in regard to this resolution. The hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) is reported at page 5597 of Hansard of that year as follows:

> I shall give the Government hearty support for I believe the policy of the Government is in the interests of the country.

You have heard him speak rather differently since then. In the same discussion, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) took part. At page 5624 of Hansard the hon. gentleman who now rages and raves about no duty on agricultural implements, said:

> The Tariff Commission got information all over the country. I do not think the farmers of the West at all events, asked for a great reduction such as is proposed by this resolution on agricultural implements. They asked that the duties be left alone. I shall give the Government hearty support on this question.

Do you notice any difference in the attitude of the hon. gentleman now from what it was in 1907? Hon. William Paterson, who previous to 1896 had declared for free trade in everything except biscuits, said as reported at page 5582:

I do not disguise the fact that we propose to give these people—

That is, the manufacturers.

—nearly the amount of reduction in duty that has been made. For it must be remembered that 17½ per cent is no more than a revenue tariff.

I have looked in Hansard and have not seen that the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) expressed a different opinion, so I suppose I am right in concluding that he was of the same mind. But we have a still greater authority than any of these I have quoted—and I suppose some hon. members think he would not have to be very great to come up to that. Hon. Mr. Fielding, the Minister of Finance of the late Administration, said, as reported at page 5621 of Hansard:

By a careful calculation we are advised that the drawbacks we allow are somewhat less than the disadvantage under which the manufacturer is placed by the reduction of the tariff. Even suppose for a moment that he got everything free and had a duty of 17½ per cent on the implements, would that be an extravagant duty as things go in this country? I believe this proposal of the hon. member for Souris, if adopted, would do an injustice to an established industry.

My belief is that if this motion were passed we would strike a severe blow at one of the great industries of the country. I believe the International Harvester Company would find it to its interests to close up its business in Hamilton, at least so much of it as is devoted to mowers and binders and have them made at the American branch and bring them from the United States. The factory in Hamilton is an American concern. With a moderate duty we have induced American capital to come into Canada and to establish that great industry and after we have brought it in and established it in Canada I believe that if we were to pass this resolution the company operating that industry would find it profitable to close the Hamilton factory and bring in the goods which they make in the United States.

That was Hon. Mr. Fielding, then Finance Minister. You do not want any sounder protectionist than this speech shows him to be, do you? Now, follow the history a little further. Under the reciprocity pact the Liberals proposed a reduction from 17½ per cent to 15 per cent. At that time the hon. member for Dundas asked the then Finance Minister, Mr. Fielding, if there was to be any change in the valuation for duty. This was Mr. Fielding's answer:

Our negotiations have not touched the question of valuation; that must be left to the operation of the customs authorities of the two countries.

Why was that question asked by the hon. member for Dundas? The Liberal party had gone up and down this country preaching against the manufacturers and declaring their intention of taking the duty off agricultural implements. They did make a reduction in 1907 from 20 per cent to 17½ per cent; then they turned to the manufacturers and said: Do not be alarmed, we will fix this up so that it will not hurt you a bit. We will show the farmers that we have made a reduction from 20 per cent to 17½ per cent; we will make them believe that we are going to take further steps along that line, but we will simply change the value of a binder for duty purposes from $80 to $100. That is exactly what they did. When the rate of duty under the Conservative Government was 20 per cent the duty on a binder was $16; after the Liberal party got through tinkering with it, the duty on the same binder was $17.50.

Last year the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) moved this resolution:

That in the opinion of this House the time has arrived when in the interests of the farmers, and consequently in the interests of the whole of Canada, the duties on agricultural implements should be forthwith removed.

Why was it that the "time had arrived?" Just the difference between here and there; just the difference between the right of Mr. Speaker and the left. So far as the arrival of the time is concerned, that makes all the difference in the world. When hon. gentlemen are on this side of the House the time does not arrive, and they proceed to manipulate the tariff in the way that I have indicated. But when they get on the other side of the House the "time arrives" for them to endeavour to hoodwink the people. If hon. gentlemen opposite were sincere in their contention that to take the duty off agricultural implements would benefit the farmer, why did they not accept the standing offer from the United States to make farming implements free? It was on the statute books of the United States for years; why did they not accept the proposal? They knew perfectly well that not one per cent of the people of Canada knew of the existence of that provision; consequently they took the course they did.

During the period from 1909 to 1913 Canada imported from the United States over 21,000 mowers, binders and reapers, valued at nearly $1,500,000. I do not hesitate to say that I would rather see those mowers, binders and reapers manufactured in Canada, giving employment to our Canadian artisans.

Hon. gentlemen on the other side have called attention to the matter of cement. I do not think there is a quality of cement made that would hold together the conflicting ideas of hon. gentlemen opposite. In 1910 the price of cement in Canada jumped up 40 or 50 cents a barrel. The Liberal party was in power at that time. What did they do? Absolutely nothing; they did not attempt to relieve the situation so far as the farmers were concerned, nor did they shed any tears over the farmer because he had to pay 40 or 50 cents a barrel more for his cement. I suppose the time "had not arrived" for a change of ideas. Then they brought up the reciprocity pact, under which they proposed a reduction of 1½ cents a hundred pounds on cement, or 4½ cents a barrel. If the reciprocity pact had been carried into effect, the duty on cement coming into Canada from the United States, even after the reduction, would still have been three cents a hundred pounds, or nine cents a barrel higher than the United States duty on cement going into that country from Canada. If they had the interests of the farmers at heart, they might at least have proposed to bring the Canadian duty on cement down as low as the corresponding duty on the other side of the line—but they made no such proposal. They were on the Government benches at the time, and they did not look at the matter of cement as they look at it now. When it became apparent to this Government after they came into power that there was an apparent combine or merger in the matter of cement, they brought the members of that merger to time by a reduction of the duty on cement, thus showing a practical interests in the farmers of Canada. The hon. member for Assiniboia, in referring to this cement merger, implied, it seemed to me, that the men composing that merger were friends of the Conservative party. If I am not mistaken, the head of that company was and is Senator Edwards, a member of the Liberal party. If that combine is in existence at the present time, I have no doubt that the free trade ideas which are floating about on the other side of the House may reach the Senate and have such an effect upon hon. gentlemen of the Senate that the price of cement may be reduced.

But that is not the only evidence of the inconsistency of hon. gentlemen opposite. They made a reduction in the duty on coal oil, and in less than three years they handed back to the coal oil men subsidies to the extent of nearly a million dollars. So that while on the one hand they were apparently giving the people some benefit, on the other they were turning round and soaking them, so to speak, by the payment of these bounties.

We are face to face with a crisis not only in the history of the Empire but of this country as forming a part of the Empire. It has been found necessary to increase the rate of duty in order to produce a revenue to meet the conditions caused by the war. Hon. gentlemen opposite may argue until doomsday, but I am convinced that they cannot get the people to see with them in this matter. I am convinced that they cannot impose upon the people of this country their idea that this is not a war tax. This is a war tax due to our falling revenues, which revenues have fallen away because of interference with trade, caused by the war. Across the line the United States, which is not engaged in war, has been seriously affected by the war and has been obliged to take unusual steps to make good its loss in revenue, admittedly due to the war. Our revenue has gone down undoubtedly because of this war, prices have gone up, the consumption of products has decreased and so on. This has all had its effect in bringing about abnormal conditions. These conditions must be met, and are being met by the Government by means of these taxes. I want to be fair to hon. gentlemen opposite and at the same time to say what I honestly think. Hon. gentlemen opposite in one breadth say that they wholeheartedly support the Government in voting $50,000,000 or $100,000,000 to carry on the war; but in the very next sentence they do their utmost to oppose the only means at the disposal of the Government to raise money for prosecuting the war. It is in my judgment a roundabout way of showing opposition to the Government in their conduct of this war, a roundabout way and therefore not a very creditable way to hon. gentlemen opposite. They cannot make the people of this country believe that this tax is not made necessary by this war. Not only do the people of Canada believe that, but they will turn with disgust from men who think to make party capital out of this increased taxation, because the people of Canada are patriotic and loyal and will pay these increased taxes and pay them without murmur. Hon. gentlemen may think they are taking a right course; but from Confederation down to the present time hon. gentlemen have never been known to take the right course on tariff matters, never once. That is the undeniable history of this country, that whenever a tariff issue has come up in Canada the Liberal party has always been on the wrong side, at least the people of this country said they were on the wrong side, they have never seemed to be able to grasp tariff matters. Let me beg of them to consider this past record of theirs and to see if that record should not teach them the lesson to beware of themselves when it comes to the consideration of tariff matters.

I heartily concur in the Budget which the Finance Minister has presented to this House. I believe it will benefit this country in more ways than one. Already evidences of that are apparent. To-day the Montreal Gazette contains this little item:

> New Plant at Hamilton—$150,000 to be expended by Horse Shoe Concern.
> Hamilton, Ont., February 24.—The United States Horse Shoe Company, of Erie, Pa., it was announced to-day, has selected Hamilton for its Canadian headquarters. The company is said to be the largest manufacturer of horse and mule shoes in the world. It will spend $150,000 on a plant here to start with and employ 100 men. Construction work starts at once.

I shall place that beside the quotation I gave a short time ago from the speech of the Hon. Mr. Fielding when discussing the duty on agricultural implements. The two taken together seem to me to indicate that this Government, like other Conservative Governments in the past, is following the proper course in this matter.

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY (St. John): Mr. Speaker, I trust my hon. friend and my respected friend from Kingston, because I do respect him with all his faults and idiosyncracies—

Mr. EDWARDS: May I correct my hon. friend, not Kingston but Frontenac.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Frontenac? I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. My hon. friend has been finding so much fault and making so much criticism with reference to affairs at Kingston that naturally I associated his name with the constituency which contains the institution which is so much in the public eye whenever my hon. friend deals with penitentiary matters. I trust my hon. friend will pardon me if I do not follow him very closely along the lines which he has trodden this afternoon and evening. I trust, too, that my hon. friend will not be offended if I say that a gentleman must have a very lobsided brain who can, in the discussion of an important question like this, take up the time of the House even for a moment in referring to a matter involving the expenditure of some $5,000 when I was Minister of Public Works, and at the same time not deplore the action of this Government which gave away for $10 a piece of land within the town limits of Prince Albert worth some $200,000. My hon. friend has referred, I think somewhat improperly, to the attitude of the Liberal party in reference to the Budget, and to the taxation which is proposed to be placed on the people of Canada. He says that while with one voice we declare that we shall willingly grant the $100,000,000 of money which the Government requires to borrow in order to carry on the war, and any further amount which may be required, yet at the same time, by discussing the Budget, by discussing the mode in which it is proposed to raise the money, we are pursuing an improper course. Let it be remembered that this money is to be raised, not for war purposes, for the Minister of Finance has made it abundantly clear that he intends to borrow, and he has arranged to borrow, the whole $100,000,000 which will be necessary to prosecute the war during the fiscal year. Yet in spite of that my hon. friend says that because we here, as the representatives of the people, venture to criticise the Budget, venture to criticise the mode in which it is proposed to make good the deficiency between the revenue and the expenditure, we are in some way obstructing the Government in the prosecution of the war in which the people of Canada are engaged for the defence of the Empire and the defence of Canada as one of the most important parts of the Empire. In that my hon. friend, to say nothing more, discloses that peculiar method of discussion which so often distinguishes him when he ventures to address this House.

When these hon. gentlemen can get no other defence for the iniquitous taxation that is proposed, it is said: Oh, well, it is a war tax, and when the Empire is at war, in this day of trial and stress you should not embarrass the Government, you should not criticise it, but you should vote it through no matter what your judgment may be upon it, and justify your conscience with the reflection that this is a war tax and nothing else. Now, Mr. Speaker, is it a war tax? What is it for? The Minister of Finance says we are proposing to spend out of consolidated revenue the large sum of $140,000,000, not one dollar of which is for the prosecution of the war. It is true that he says some $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 will be required to pay interest on the money which the Government propose to borrow for the prosecution of the war, but outside of that there is nothing in any way connected with the war. It is all for the Civil Service, it is all for carrying on civil government, it is all for the departments of Railways and Canals, Fisheries, Agriculture, and for all the different departments of Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What about pensions?

Mr. PUGSLEY: We have no Bill before the House providing for pensions. If any Bill is brought before the House I presume it will take effect next year when ample provision can be made for any pensions. The Government has no idea of what will be required for pensions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has the hon. gentleman never seen on the statute books an Act providing for pensions?

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is no Bill yet at all events.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, not during this session. There is no amount estimated for pensions. Parliament has not been asked to make any provision for pensions and I sincerely trust it will not be called upon to make any large provision for pensions. I trust that better luck than that will attend our young men who have gone to the front. If the time should come when any large amount must be voted for pensions hon. gentlemen will find members on this side of the House standing side by side with them in voting whatever amount may be necessary. I think it has been demonstrated beyond the possibilities of contradiction that if this Government, since it came into power, had exercised even ordinary prudence with reference to the appointment of officials there would have been saved enough money to pay the interest upon this $100,000,000 which it is proposed to borrow for at least a year and a half.

I have not that familiarity with the Civil Service that Professor Shortt, chairman of the Civil Service Commission, necessarily has. He is a gentleman who is in the employ of the Government; he occupies, I presume, a quasi independent position as chairman of that commission; he has made the statement, made it publicly, made it with deliberation that under this Government the appointments to the Civil Service in the lower grades are entirely a matter of patronage and he says that, whereas there have been something like 2,000 dismissals from the Civil Service, there have been some 10,000 appointments, making a difference of some 8,000.

Mr. ROGERS: I would like to say that this is a statement that has been repeated so often in this House that hon. gentlemen opposite will possibly be beginning to believe it. No more dishonourable, no more dishonest, no more unfair—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROGERS—statement was ever made by any man than that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the hon. gentleman repeat that?

Mr. ROGERS: I want to say that no more dishonourable, no more dishonest, no more—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

An hon. MEMBER: Untrue.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROGERS:—statement was ever made by any man—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the minister repeat it? I could not hear him.

Mr. ROGERS: I have repeated it twice, but I shall be glad to stay here and go on repeating it if it will be any benefit to my hon. friend. I was referring not to my hon. friend but to Professor Shortt and in that connection I want to say here and now that no more dishonourable, no more dishonest, no more unfair statement was ever made by any man than that made by Professor Shortt, Chairman of the Civil Service Commission. It is an absolutely untrue statement.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am sure my hon. friend could hardly hear his own voice when he got to the last sentence and it is delightful to see the way in which hon. gentlemen applaud the minister without hearing him. There is a sort of telepathic communication between the supporters of the Government and my hon. friend and they take it for granted that whatever he says will be right. That is a very delightful position for the minister to occupy with reference to his party. It is more creditable to the hon. gentleman than it is to the party. Ordinarily one would suppose that a party of intelligent gentlemen, and very excellent gentlemen, would like to hear what the minister has to say and then decide whether it was something that should be applauded. The matter becomes a question at issue between the Minister of Public Works and Professor Shortt. Of course, we have to leave that to be settled between them, but unfortunately for my hon. friend's statement, when he makes this terrible imputation against a man of the high standing and independent position of Professor Shortt, the returns which have been brought down to this House by the Government would seem to justify the statement which Professor Shortt makes.

Mr. ROGERS: I am sure my hon. friend does not wish to make an unfair statement. He has surely not read the return himself or he would not venture to make that statement. The return shows nothing of the kind. Take the return of my own department for instance; in it 507 dismissals are credited and there are 700 odd resignations which Professor Shortt never takes into account. The same is true of every department of the Government which makes the fact absolutely clear as against Professor Shortt's statement.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We will find out more about that another day.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be very glad to make my statement good.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am glad to accept the statement of my hon. friend so far as that matter comes within his own knowledge, but I would suppose that a gentleman of Professor Shortt's standing would not make such a statement without very good foundation.

Mr. MURPHY: It is only a partial return.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I base the statement which I have made, namely, that this is not a war tax, upon the Estimates presented to the House, and I find that one of the necessities for imposing that tax is the very large amount required for the Department of Public Works and for the Department of Railways. I make this assertion, which the Estimates confirm, namely, that some $18,000,000, which was voted last year for these two purposes, was not required and was not expended; and that notwithstanding the war, notwithstanding the necessity which ought to influence every prudent man in dealing with expenditures, in these two departments alone the Government is asking Parliament to vote $1,000,000 more than was expended during the year 1914-15. That could be justified only upon the ground that they are public works of such an urgent character that there can be neither a postponement nor a reduction in regard to them. That would be an extraordinary condition so far as Government works are concerned, when we know that all the cities and towns in Canada have found it necessary to reduce public works, works on street improvements, work of installation or enlargement of water systems, work in connection with the improvement of the fire department and of the various civic services. Those who govern those cities all feel that in view of the depression, in view of the fact that every man, woman, boy, and girl in this country is doing what he or she can, and is giving his or her mite, little though it may be, towards the various charities which have been organized in connection with the war, some for the Red Cross, some for the Belgian fund, some for the patriotic fund, some for the hospitals, all doing their part, this is not the time to impose further burdens upon the tax-payers, and that these services ought to be carried over for another year at all events to see whether or not the war is over and whether times may not become better. Notwithstanding that this is the example which has been set by all the municipalities throughout this vast Dominion, we find this Government asking Parliament for an appropriation for these two services, public works and railways, of $1,000,000 more than it found it possible to expend during the year about to close. I prove that by taking the Estimates which have been laid before Parliament. The re-votes are given in every case so far as the railways and public works are concerned. In the columns giving the votes for 1914-15, the items include not only the main estimates but the supplementary estimates as well, that is, the whole expenses for the current year which will expire on March 31. If we go over these Estimates, item by item, we shall find that a very large number of them are re-votes for harbours and railways; and taking out the re-votes, we shall find that the Government are asking Parliament to vote $1,000,000 more than it was able to expend during the current year. There are scores of Estimates in these items, some for public works, some for harbour works, in regard to which no contracts have been let and for which it is not intended by the minister to let the contracts during the coming year. They are put in here—I shall not say to pad the Estimates, but in order to keep these amounts before Parliament and the people of the country, so that when the appropriate time arrives, the minister may engage upon the work and ask for tenders and let the contracts.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Did you ever do that?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes. I have often done that, and every minister who has ever been in a government in Canada has done it, and there is no harm in it when conditions are normal. I always kept such items in, because, Parliament being committed to the work, even though it were postponed for two or three years, there was less difficulty in getting the amount voted when it was really necessary to carry on the work. That has been done over and over again. But if my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works will take us into his confidence and go through these large items, he will agree with me that it will be impossible for him to expend within $10,000,000 or $20,000,000 of the amount which the Government has put into the Estimates and for which it has asked the approval of Parliament. To meet that ostensible deficiency of $18,000,000 to $20,000,000, the Government is imposing this war tax upon the people of this country. That is absolutely unreasonable and unfair, and it is a course which will not commend itself to the good judgment of the people of Canada.

My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works says: Well, what will you do with regard to the public works at St. John? Would you be willing to permit a reduction in the amount to be expended there? I would not be worthy of my position as a member of this House if I did not answer "Yes" to that question. I would not be worthy of the confidence of the people of my constituency if I were so cowardly that I would not dare to stand up in my place and give an answer to that question in the affirmative. Therefore I say that in these times of stress and trouble the amount proposed for St. John harbour of $1,500,000 might very well be cut down during this year to $750,000. The work could go on, and a great deal of work could be done for that money.

With regard to Halifax there is an appropriation of $3,000,000. If that were reduced to $1,500,000, a magnificent amount of work could be done there. When we come to the Hudson Bay railway and the terminals at Port Nelson, while I have always been in favour of the construction of that railway, yet we ought to pause, and instead of proposing to expend, as the Government is doing, $5,000,000 during this year on that railway and terminals, the Government ought, in fairness to the people of Canada cut that amount down to the sum of not more than $1,000,000.

There is $4,000,000 which they propose raising by putting a tax upon all people so far as they can reach them and which they propose to spend on this railway away to the north, going through a country where there are no people, going to a harbour where there are no people, and intended to develop a trade which under the conditions now existing is not likely to come for a number of years; and proposing to do it at a time when two of the great transcontinental railways which have been built for the purpose of carrying the traffic between the East and the West, between the interior and the seaboard are almost—and I am speaking now only of what is well known—are almost on the eve of bankruptcy. They propose to construct that railway and those terminals immediately, though there is no traffic in sight for the railway and no work for the terminals. Would it not be the part of wisdom to suspend work on the terminals and go ahead at reasonable speed with the building of the railway; and would it not be reasonable, instead of taking the material by steamer to Port Nelson, to construct the line first, and so bring in material for the harbour works by rail, and in the meantime operating the line by giving a reasonable service sufficient to carry the traffic that can be developed? Instead of that, in order to build this road and these terminals, you propose to tax every one who mails a letter. The poor woman who mails a letter, it may be to her son fighting in the trenches, is asked to contribute this extra alleged war stamp. And why? To build the Hudson Bay railway and create the terminals there. I contend that no work should be carried on during the present year unless it is of an urgent character, one the failure to prosecute which would cause the interests of the country inevitably to suffer.

Then, take the Quebec harbour. We are asked for $1,200,000 for a dry-dock there.

Well, they have a very fair dry-dock at Quebec. I recognize the importance of building a dry-dock there, but is it necessary to spend the whole $1,200,000? If $600,000 were expended there during the coming year it would do a great deal of work and would give employment to a large number of people. Then there is $450,000 for the French river waterway improvement for which last year $500,000 was voted and only $50,000 of which was expended. That being so, could not you reasonably postpone the expenditure of at least a part of this $450,000 until the war is over and the condition of the people improved?

Mr. BRADBURY: The time to spend money is when times are hard, so as to provide work for the people.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is right, if you have the money in the treasury. But is this the time to tax the people of this country, when, as I have said every dollar, every cent they can spare is being given to charity? The same remarks would apply to other harbours—Toronto, where you propose to spend $1,000,000; Vancouver, $1,000,000; Victoria, $1,400,000. Take these items on page 57 of the Estimates, to some of which I have referred, and you will find that where the minister last year asked for $12,780,000, he did not expend within $3,159,200 of it. Yet the amount is being carried forward as a re-vote and forms part of what is to be voted this year.

Mr. J. D. REID: The total vote is $9,000,000 less.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The total vote for railways, canals and public works, including the harbours and public buildings, is $1,000,000 more than the amount expended last year.

Mr. REID: I was referring to the amounts on page 57.

Mr. PUGSLEY: On those items the minister asks the same amount as he expended last year.

Mr. REID: Last year the minister asked, for these items on page 57 which are chargeable to capital, $12,780,500, and this year he is asking for $9,459,200, or more than $3,000,000 less—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Less than what?

Mr. REID: Less than he asked for last year.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But what did he expend?

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Mr. REID: He spent $9,000,000. But that does not say that he will spend that amount this year.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is exactly the argument.

Mr. REID: And the amount asked for this year is $3,000,000 less than it was last year. So, the amount for both departments is many millions less than last year.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Exactly what I said; I thank the hon. minister for corroborating my statement. I said these departments spent last year $18,000,000 less than they asked for under the Main Estimates and Supplementary Estimates combined. Today the two ministers are asking for $1,000,000 more than they actually expended last year. My argument is that with prudence, with the exercise of a little judgment, they could get along with $18,000,000 or $20,000,000 less than they are asking for in the Estimates. Now, take Harbours and Rivers, chargeable to income. I cannot speak of other places, but I will speak of my own constituency. The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) knows that he has an amount—$100,000, I think—to extend the breakwater to Partridge Island. But he has announced publicly that he is not going to commence that work this year. Why, then, is it in the Estimates, except for the reason I suggested—that the minister thinks it proper to keep it there because it will be easier to get it voted when he wishes to go ahead. But why raise a war tax—

Mr. ROGERS: I do not remember having made the public statement that I do not intend to go on with the breakwater to Partridge Island.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Let me ask, then, if the hon. minister intends to go on with it?

Mr. ROGERS: We have called for tenders, and I am hopeful that we shall be able to go on, because that is one of the most important works in the Dominion I believe.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The statement has been made publicly that the new works will not be gone on with during the present year.

Mr. ROGERS: That is not a new work.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Entirely new. The present breakwater has been completed for thirty years.

Mr. ROGERS: It is part of the harbour.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, but still it is a new work. Then again the Department of Railways asks for $112,000 to build the spur line to Courtenay Bay.

Parliament granted that money at least three years ago, and not a blow has been struck, although we voted and revoted the money, and it is put in again this year. I venture to say that there is no intention of going ahead with that work this year. I am sorry that by reason of the bungling and humbugging and the mistakes that have been made in connection with the Valley railway and the carrying of the Transcontinental to the port of St. John, it is not very likely that anything will be done on that spur line during the present year. The Provincial Government and the Minister of Railways do not know how they are going to bring the Valley railway into the harbour of St. John. They have reached Gagetown, they commenced at Centreville in Carleton county—the road begins nowhere and ends nowhere. The only thing which they have is an agreement—which, fortunately, I was able to negotiate with my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals—that the Dominion Government should undertake operation as each 40 miles were completed. But our scheme was to build from the city of St. John to Grand Falls, there to connect with the Transcontinental railway so that the Valley line might be utilized as part of the Transcontinental system. I say the matter has been humbugged and trifled with, mistakes have been made, grades have been altered between Fredericton and the country to the north, and there does not seem to be any reasonable probability that the line can be used with success as a part of the Transcontinental system. While the Provincial Government and this Government do not say publicly that the road is not to go to St. John, I am told that the Minister of Railways is pretty sure that it is not going to St. John, and that he is going to carry it over to Westfield to connect with the Canadian Pacific railway. It may be that that is the reason why this spur line to Courtenay bay has not been built. At all events, if it is not to be built this year, I decidedly object to the people being taxed to build it—the tax being called a war tax—when it is not proposed to go ahead with it at all during the coming year. The same applies to hundreds of other items in these Estimates.

With regard to public buildings. In the item for Ontario there are 106 or more public buildings, and in respect of nearly every one there is a revote. The total vote for Ontario is $3,905,100. The amount voted last year in both main and supplementary Estimates was $4,771,200.56; yet there is a revote of the enormous sum of $2,282.100. In other words, practically 50 per cent of the amount which my hon. friend had placed in the Estimates for public buildings in Ontario last year has not been expended, and is being carried forward as a re-vote. Did my hon. friend seriously intend to go ahead with those public buildings at that time, or did he, upon the persistent request of his friends from Ontario, put them there in order to obviate the danger of any question arising as to whether public buildings were or were not to be erected? The blue book is always authoritative; it counts for so much more than the mere statement of the member. While $3,354,750 was voted last year for public buildings in Quebec, in respect of nearly every one of them a very large amount is carried over as a re-vote, showing that no contracts have been entered into, that no work has been done; and that in respect of many of these buildings there is no urgency except political urgency.

Mr. ROGERS: There is no political urgency at all. There may have been urgency in my hon. friend's day, but there is none in mine.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am sure that my hon. friend is not altogether unaware of the fact that constituencies are to a certain extent influenced by the consideration as to whether or not they are to get public buildings.

Mr. ROGERS: Not those represented on this side of the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Of course, it may be that my hon. friend would prefer to exercise other influences than the mere production of the blue book to the electors. I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Rogers, the House adjourned at 10.07 p.m.

Friday, February 26, 1915.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

Gédéon Rochon, Esq., for the electoral district of Terrebonne, introduced by Hon. C. J. Doherty and Hon. Louis Coderre.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENTS.

SELECT COMMITTEE APPOINTED.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved:

That a Select Committee, composed of Messrs. Meighen, Fowler, McCraney, Gauthier, Sinclair, Guthrie, Fripp, Morphy and the mover, be appointed to consider and report upon amendments to the Criminal Code which have been or may be suggested at the present session of Parliament, with power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath, and to report from time to time.

Mr. SPEAKER: I might point out that it is not necessary to ask for power to examine witnesses, for Select Committees already have that power.

Mr. DOHERTY: Two Bills have been introduced, one by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) and the other by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. McCraney), seeking to amend the Criminal Code. When these Bills came up for their second reading it was agreed that they should be referred to a Select Committee such as is now proposed, and which would consider these and any other amendments to the Criminal Code that might be suggested. The reason why we take this course is that the Government did not contemplate introducing this session any legislation looking to the amendment of the Criminal Code, it being thought that under the present circumstances legislation should be limited to such as was necessitated by the war, or in some way connected with the present state of war. Having reached this conclusion, I myself, and I think some of my colleagues, pointed out this intention to the persons suggesting amendments to the Criminal Code, who then naturally did not press for legislation. It seemed to us fair that if these suggestions were to be dealt with, an opportunity should be given to others having different suggestions to put forward. The purpose of this committee would be to consider the two Bills I have mentioned, and such other amendments as might be suggested—there was a suggested amendment by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) with regard to copyright—and to embody all the suggestions that are approved in one Bill, which could then be introduced and passed through this House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There can be no objection to the granting of this motion and the organization of this committee; but the hon. gentleman will be opening the door very widely if he goes outside the two or three Bills which have been introduced this session. Not that I have any objection myself; but there are merits in the Bills which have been introduced, and if the hon. gentleman goes beyond these I am afraid we shall not get a Bill through this session.

Mr. DOHERTY: I would expect the committee to take action only on such suggestions as might be shown to be really imperative, and I hope we shall be able to keep within that limit.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DOHERTY: With the consent of the House I beg to move that Public Bills and Orders be taken up so that we may refer the two Bills I have mentioned to the Select Committee, and so avoid delay. I therefore beg to move:

That the order for the House to go into committee on Bill No. 19 (Mr. McCraney) be discharged, and that the said Bill be referred to the Select Committee appointed this day.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MURPHY: My hon. friend also mentioned the motion standing in the name of my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux). Is it intended to refer that to the committee as well?

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. member for Rouville did not give notice of a Bill, but he made a motion in the course of which he suggested an amendment to the Criminal Code. I shall see that the suggestion is put before the committee. I beg also to move:

That the order for the House to go into committee on Bill No. 40 (Mr. Sinclair) be discharged, and that the said Bill be referred to the Select Committee appointed this day.

Motion agreed to.

FINANCE ACT, 1914.

Hon. W. T. WHITE (Minister of Finance) moved:

That it is expedient, in pursuance of the provisions of section 4 of the Act assented to on the twenty-second day of August, 1914, intituled: "An Act to conserve the Commercial and Financial Interests of Canada," to continue in force the proclamation in the form following published on the fifth day of September, 1914, in the Canada Gazette:

Arthur.

Canada.

George the Fifth, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, Defender of the Faith, Emperor of India.

To all to whom these presents shall come, or whom the same may in any wise concern, —Greeting:

A Proclamation.

E. L. Newcombe,
Deputy Minister of Justice, Canada.

Whereas in and by section 4 of an Act of the Parliament of Canada passed in the fifth year of Our Reign and intituled: "An Act to conserve the Commercial and Financial Interests of Canada," it was provided amongst other things that in case of war, invasion, riot or insurrection, real or apprehended, and in case of any real or apprehended financial crisis, our Governor in Council might by proclamation published in the Canada Gazette:

(a) authorize the making of advances to the chartered banks and to the savings banks to which the Quebec Savings Banks Act, 1913, applies, by the issue of Dominion notes upon the pledge of securities, deposited with our said minister, of such kind and amount as may be approved by the Treasury Board; such advances to be repayable at such tmes as the Board may determine with interest at a rate likewise determined by the Board of not less than five per cent per annum;

(b) authorize the chartered banks to make payments in the bank notes issued by such banks instead of in gold or Dominion notes, but the total amount of the notes of any chartered bank in circulation nootes, but the total amount of the amount of its notes issuable under the provisions of the Bank Act and of the next clause (c);

(c) authorize the several chartered banks to issue excess circulation, from and including the first day of March in any year, to and including the last day of August next ensuing, or during any part of such period, to amounts not exceeding fifteen per cent of the combined unimpaired capital and rest or reserve fund of the respective banks, as stated in their respective statutory monthly returns to our said minister for the month immediately preceding that in which the additional amount is issued;

(d) suspend the redemption in gold of Dominion notes,—

Now know ye that by and with the advice of our Privy Council for Canada we do by these presents proclaim and direct that by and on the date of the publication of this our proclamation in the Canada Gazette, the said orders in council shall be revoked; and we do further by these presents declare and proclaim as follows, that:

(a) the making of advances to the chartered banks, and to the savings banks to which the Quebec Savings Banks Act, 1913, applies, by the issue of Dominion notes upon the pledge of securities as provided in the said Act, be authorized;

(b) the chartered banks be authorized, subject to the provisions and limitations set forth in the said Act to make payments in the bank notes issued by such banks instead of in gold or Dominion notes;

(c) the several chartered banks be authorized to issue excess circulation as in the said Act defined from and including the first day of March, 1915, to and including the last day of August, 1915; and

(d) the redemption in gold of Dominion notes by the Receiver General of Canada be suspended subject to the provisions of the said Act from the date of the publication of this our proclamation in the Canada Gazette.

Of all which our loving subjects and all others whom these presents may concern, are hereby required to take notice and to govern themselves accordingly.

In testimony whereof, we have caused these Our Letters to be made Patent, and the Great Seal of Canada to be hereunto affixed. Witness, Our Most Dear and Entirely Beloved Uncle and Most Faithful Counsellor Field Marshal His Royal Highness Prince Arthur William Patrick Albert, Duke of Connaught and of Strathearn, Earl of Sussex (in the Peerage of the United Kingdom), Prince of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Duke of Saxony, Prince of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha; Knight of Our Most Noble Order of the Garter; Knight of Our Most Ancient and Most Noble Order of the Thistle; Knight of Our Most Illustrious Order of Saint Patrick; one of Our Most Honourable Privy Council; Great Master of Our Most Honourable Order of the Bath; Knight Grand Commander of Our Most Exalted Order of the Star of India; Knight Grand Cross of Our Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George; Knight Grand Commander of Our Most Eminent Order of the Indian Empire; Knight Grand Cross of Our Royal Victorian Order; Our Personal Aide-de-Camp; Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Our Dominion of Canada.

At Our Government House, in Our City of Ottawa, this third day of September, in the year of Our Lord one thousand nine hundred and fourteen, and in the fifth year of Our Reign.

By command,

P. Pelletier,
Acting Under-Secretary of State.

He said: Mr. Speaker, under the Finance Act, 1914, which was passed at the August session, authority was given to the Governor in Council, in case of war or any financial crisis, by proclamation published in the Canada Gazette, to authorize the making of advances in Dominion notes to banks upon securities approved by the Treasury Board; to authorize the chartered banks to make payments in bank notes instead of in Dominion notes or gold; to authorize the chartered banks to issue excess circulation during that period of the year in which previously to the passing of this legislation they had not had that power and to suspend the redemption in gold of Dominion notes. The object of the Act was to give additional volume and flexibility to the currency and to conserve the gold supply of the Dominion. I draw the attention of the House to subsection 5 of section 4 of this Act, which reads as follows:

> No proclamation issued under the provisions of this section shall continue in force for more than thirty days after the beginning of the first session of Parlament held after the issue thereof, unless it is approved by resolution passed by both Houses of Parliament.

In September last the Government, in pursuance of the authority conferred upon it by the Act, issued a proclamation authorizing the doing of the several things which I have just mentioned, and it becomes necessary now, if this proclamation is to continue in effect, as the Government thinks it should, that a resolution should be passed by the House of Commons and by the Senate continuing it in force. While no such financial conditions exist as prevailed at the time this legislation was passed in August last, it is deemed prudent by the Government and by the financial and business community that the proclamation should be continued. It is quite impossible to forecast what effect the vicissitudes of the war may have upon international finance or monetary conditions in the great credit centres of the world, such as London and New York. Parliament having met on February 4, it is desirable that this legislation should be passed without further delay. The Budget debate is proceeding next week and, we should hope, without interruption. I would therefore ask the House to facilitate the adoption of this resolution. I have already brought down, in answer to a question, information as to the amount of advances which have been made to the chartered banks in Dominion notes under he authority of this legislation. To refresh the memory of the House, I may say that the total amount issued to January 31, 1915, was $14,400,000, and the total amount outstanding of indebtedness by the banks to the Dominion Government was $7,900,000, which indicates that there has been repaid to the Government $6,500,000.

I might say to the House that the amount of the advances made to the banks is by no means the measure of the advantage which has been conferred by this legislation. It has enabled the banks, among other things, to meet treasury bills of governments, municipalities and corporations maturing in London, it has enabled them to make advances to governments, municipalities, corporations and other customers, and it has assisted them, better than they otherwise would have been in a position to do, to finance the crop movement of last fall. The banks were required to make payments on behalf of their clients of treasury bills maturing due, to make advances to provinces, municipalities and other customers, and they did so the more readily by reason of the fact that they knew—and in many cases they had arranged in advance for it—that if it should become necessary, they could obtain advances of Dominion notes from the Government upon the pledge of the securities which they had taken, and which would be approved by the treasury board. The principle of the Bill was fully discussed and unanimously concurred in last August. I do not think, therefore, that it is necessary that I should discuss the substance of the legislation at this time. It may be a satisfaction to the House, which, as I have stated, unanimously approved the legislation, to know that it was instantaneously efficacious for the purpose of meeting the object we had in view when it was enacted, namely, to add to the volume of our currency and enable the financial institutions of the country, in the public interest, better to withstand the strain, stress and exigency of the trying conditions which prevailed as a result of the sudden outbreak of war. If at any subsequent stage of the session the House should desire to discuss more fully either the principle of the Act or our action under it, it is unnecessary for me to say that we shall be glad to afford an opportunity for such discussion, but in the meantime, unless this resolution is adopted, the proclamation will lapse, and I, therefore, hope that the House will facilitate its adoption.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The principle involved in this resolution was approved by Parliament at its August session. In order to make that legislation effective, the Minister of Finance states that after this House has been in session for thirty days, it is necessary to authorize, by resolution, a similar proclamation by order in council, and I do not think there is any objection to Parliament granting this power to the Government. It is quite possible that this power might be of great value to the country in certain circumstances. While it is quite true the financial condition of the banks of Canada to-day is such that they can, I think, reasonably meet all demands upon them, still, as the minister has suggested, the situation might change very quickly. I would also point out that there is not any very great danger of the abuse of this privilege by prospective borrowers, which in this case must be chartered banks, owing to the fact that they must pay 5 per cent interest upon any loans, and if their own position is strong they are not likely to make application for loans from the Government. I think, however, we should have from the Minister of Finance a statement showing the financial result of these operations to the Treasury Department, whether it has been financially profitable or whether it has covered its cost. I presume that in all loans we have received the statutory interest rate of 5 per cent, and that the transaction has netted some little profit to the treasury. The Minister of Finance objects to giving detailed information as to the amounts advanced to the respective banks, and I will not press for that to-day, knowing that on a future occasion we shall have opportunity to make further inquiry and to discuss the matter fully, if we so desire.

Mr. W. T. WHITE: I place upon the table the form of application under the Finance Act, which is signed by the banks, and the pledge agreement executed by the banks in connection with advances made. Loans were made to some seven banks, to the total amount of $14,400,000, and of that $6,500,000 has been repaid. I am quite satisfied that any amount outstanding would be repaid tomorrow morning if we desired it. It is unnecessary to say to the House that in addition to the pledge of particular securities approved by the Treasury Board, under the Bank Act, the Dominion Government has a lien next after the note circulation, upon all assets of banks for any claims it may have against them, so that no question as to security could possibly arise. I have already explained why I consider it undesirable that I should bring down information showing what individual banks had availed themselves of the privilege of the Act. With the object of inducing the banks more readily to make applications for loans, in order to put them in a better position to meet the requirements of their customers throughout the country, I stated in a letter to them that their applications would be regarded as confidential. It did not occur to me then that the information would be asked for in Parliament, because in the fall of 1907, when advances were made in Dominion notes to banks, through the Bank of Montreal, no particulars were obtained, so far as I am aware, even by the department; the Bank of Montreal making the loans as the agent of the Government. I do not know that the matter is of very great importance, but certainly I would be the last to deny any information to Parliament that it might desire to have. Having promised the banks that I would not make public their applications, I feel reluctant to do so, and I trust this will be satisfactory to the House. I should be pleased to give to my right hon. friend, as leader of the Opposition, details as to the loans to the banks, but I hesitate for the reason I have given, to make the information public.

Mr. MACDONALD: Were these advances to the banks made out of the Dominion notes which the Minister of Finance had the power to issue under the special right Parliament gave him last August?

Mr. WHITE: Yes, all these advances were made in Dominion notes, under the authority of the Finance Act, 1914, passed at the August session.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I understood the Minister of Finance to say that he was introducing a measure to ratify the overdrawing of these notes, and when that measure is introduced we shall have full opportunity to discuss the whole question.

Mr. WHITE: It is my intention to introduce a Bill validating and confirming the action of the Governor in Council, in making issues of Dominion notes to the amount of $26,000,000, outside of and in addition to the $15,000,000 additional Dominion note circulation which was authorized by the Dominion Notes Act passed at the August session of Parliament. The Bill will be introduced within a few days and of course it will be subject to discussion.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What was the amount?

Mr. WHITE: The Dominion issued, in November last, ten million dollars for its own general purposes. There were advances in Dominion notes to the Canadian Northern Railway Company, during September, October, November, and December aggregating $10,000,000 upon the security of $12,500,000 of the debentures of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, guaranteed as to principal and interest by the Dominion of Canada, that is to say, we made advances at the rate of 80. We made an advance of $6,000,000 to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company over the same period of time and for the same purposes, namely to enable it to continue construction and effectuate the intention of Parliament in giving a guarantee of its securities. This sum of $6,000,000 was advanced upon the security of $7,500,000 of Grand Trunk Pacific debentures guaranteed as to principal and interest by the Dominion Government; that is, at the rate of 80. It is my intention to introduce a Bill, as I have said, to confirm the action of the Governor in Council in issuing these Dominion notes.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister says that $26,000,000 more of Dominion notes were issued than he was authorized last August to issue?

Mr. WHITE: Dominion notes were issued to the amount of $26,000,000 in excess of the amount which the Government would have been authorized to issue under the Dominion Notes Act of last session and under the Finance Act. But—though I do not propose to argue the matter now or to depend upon the Act—I am quite satisfied that the Governor in Council had under the War Measures Act, if we desired to rest upon it, the necessary authority for this action.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is not so sure as the hon. gentleman seems to think.

Mr. WHITE: I am expressing my own opinion; no doubt the right hon. gentleman has his. But I am satisfied I should have the sanction of very high legal authority, authority which my right hon. friend would respect, for such an argument.

Mr. MACDONALD: Z. A. Lash?

Mr. WHITE: No, not Mr. Lash. By reason of the fact that we introduced at the August session the Dominion Notes Act and the Finance Act dealing specially with this matter of note issue, I think it only proper that the Government should introduce legislation confirmatory of its action.

Mr. SPEAKER: It seems to me the discussion is rather irregular, as it does not refer to this resolution, but to another matter entirely. It would be better to deal with the resolution before the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker. But referring to one observation of my hon. friend, I never knew a case so desperate but that you could find legal authority of high character to support it. I am not expressing an unwarranted opinion when I say to my hon. friend that he has beside him and behind him, I doubt not, very respectable opinion that will justify what he has done. Bowing to your ruling, we will not take up the question. Confining myself to the resolution before the House, we have certainly no objection to the renewal of the provisions which would enable my hon. friend to continue in force the proclamation he has issued. For my part I am gratified to know that the power given to the Government to make advances to the banks was so limited in its application as events have shown. It is almost evident that there might have been no necessity for such legislation. The amount of $14,000,000 which was advanced to the banks under the Act is so insignificant as to show that the financial position of the banks was so strong that they did not want the legislation. In that case, the Act was granted from an abundance of caution, and it is renewed for the same reason, I suppose. I have only one point to take issue with my hon. friend upon, and that is his reluctance or diffidence, in giving information as to the banks that applied to him for advances. He tells us that only a little more than $7,000,000 is due now to the Government. That is so small an amount as not to be worth making an issue of in this House. I respect the precaution taken by my hon. friend, though I think it was not needed. I think he would do well to take the power to bring down to Parliament in future the information which, under the circumstances, we will not press for.

Resolution agreed to.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. In yesterday's issue of the Evening Telegram of Toronto there is a report of the Budget debate of the previous day as follows:

> J. G. Turriff came next with a speech wherewith he probably intends to spread his riding of Assiniboia—although the month is but February. He castigated the Government for extravagance and said that if the people had a chance to mark their ballots few would vote for the high expenditures now in vogue.
> "Let us go to the country and find out," was Mr. Bradbury's bold retort to that.
> "You can't go too quickly for us," returned Mr. Turriff, and the Liberals slapped their desks as lustily as the Tories had a moment before. The westerner loudly proclaimed that the Government dare not go to the country yet, though the members were busy sending out campaign literature.
> "So are you," interrupted Mr. Bradbury.
> "Well, I'm not saying anything about that," confessed the western liberal.

What I object to in that report is this: Mr. Bradbury may have made the remark attributed to him, but if so, I did not hear it; and certainly I never made any such remark as, "Well, I am not saying anything about that." I had not any such thing in mind and could not possibly have said it, because as a matter of fact there has been no campaign or party literature sent out by the Liberal party since last August. But this reply attributed to me would give the impression that such literature had been sent out and that I knew about it but did not care to discuss it. Had Mr. Bradbury made the remark and had I heard it, I would have contradicted it there and then. The remark does not appear in Hansard, and I do not know whether the hon. gentleman made it or not. But I am taking this opportunity to state that I did not make the remark attributed to me and also that no campaign or party literature has been sent out by the Liberal party since last August.

17th BATTALION NOVA SCOTIAN HIGHLANDERS.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. KYTE: I desire to call the attention of the Government to the following press despatch that is going the rounds of the Canadian newspapers:

London, Feb. 12.—The 17th Battalion, Nova Scotian Highlanders is no more. This battalion, one of the best trained and disciplined of the Canadian overseas contingent, has been broken up, the men requisitioned and sent to make up deficiencies caused by sickness, death and desertion in the ranks of the Canadian Highland Brigade. Colonel Struan Robertson was relieved of his command on the 28th of January, and the only satisfaction which he has been able to obtain from the General Officer Commanding is "that the authorities were down on him."

The despatch contains many other matters affecting the standing of the Nova Scotia contingent at the front. I desire to ask the Government if they have information to verify or contradict this despatch.

Hon. W. T. WHITE: The despatch, so far as I know, has not been drawn to the attention of the Government, and we have no information with respect to the matter referred to.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Sevigny in the Chair.

Civil Government—Department of Labour—Salaries. $33,112.50.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Any resignations in the Department of Labour?

Hon. W. T. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): Yes, we have had twenty-four resignations. But the newspapers did not mention these at all.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The newspapers cannot mention what they do not know. We have never heard of this until this moment.

Mr. CROTHERS: It was all in the return that was brought down, but the newspapers left out the resignations. Nearly all these resignations were of correspondents of the Labour Gazette. As hon. members know, we have about sixty-six correspondents in the principal localities in Canada.

Mr. NESBITT: They are not paid anything.

Mr. CROTHERS: They are paid from $125 to $300 a year. A resignation among them may be due to the fact that a person removes from one city to another.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: These are not members of the Civil Service?

Mr. CROTHERS: But they are included in the return of dismissals, resignations and appointments.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It has been stated in the debate that in one department alone seven hundred members of the Civil Service had resigned. I was for some years connected with the Government and I never knew there was such a virtue of resignation in human nature as I have found out since hon. gentlemen opposite came into office. But the people to whom the Minister of Labour refers were not members of the Civil Service, but temporary employees to gather information for the minister.

Mr. CROTHERS: Perhaps the right hon. gentleman has not noticed the exact wording of this order for a return: "How many employees of the Federal Government of Canada"—it is not confined to the Civil Service—"including all services and all departments." So it includes all employees.

Mr. MACDONALD: Has the Minister of Labour pursued the policy of the former Postmaster General, who has now gone to what we may call a higher sphere? When that gentleman wished to get rid of anybody in his department, he sent him a letter telling him he had better resign, and enclosing a form of resignation. Did the Minister of Labour follow that interesting and original method?

Mr. CROTHERS: In what we call the inside service, not a single man or woman who was in the service of the department when I took charge of it has been dismissed. There was one whom I appointed, and with whom I took the course my hon. friend has spoken of—I intimated to him that unless he resigned we would dismiss him.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Dismissed by invitation?

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes, appointed by me by mistake.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What was the mistake? Was he a Grit?

Mr. CROTHERS: No, I would not have appointed him if he had been a Grit.

Mr. CARROLL: How many correspondents of the Labour Gazette have resigned since the minister took charge of the department?

Mr. CROTHERS: Twenty out of the twenty-four resignations were of correspondents.

Mr. CARROLL: And does the number of new employees appointed set forth in the return include appointments to replace these people?

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes. The return showed 60 appointed, 21 dismissed, and 24 resigned—a total of 45 dismissed and resigned, 15 less than the number appointed. Of these 15 we appointed three additional fair wage officers, one at Vancouver, one at Winnipeg and one in Ontario. I have been urged to appoint another, and am considering the advisability of doing so. There is not so much work now, however, for the fair wage officers, and it is likely that no additional appointment will be made until the public works are somewhat revived. I have accounted for three of the fifteen; four of them were female correspondents of the Labour Gazette. There was a demand for female correspondents, whose duty would be especially to look after the interests of women and children, and as an experiment I appointed four in the four larger cities of Canada. They have proved a great success, and as soon as conditions are normal I intend to appoint female correspondents in other places as well. When we came into power there were five vacancies among the correspondents of the Labour Gazette. This accounts for twelve out of the fifteen, and we have appointed three additional officers in the statistical branch, which has expanded a great deal during the last three years. That accounts for the additional fifteen officers, the total of 60 being made up of 21 dismissals, 24 resignations and 15 new appointments.

[Mr. Crothers.]

Mr. CARROLL: At what dates did the 20 correspondents resign, and were their resignations voluntary?

Mr. CROTHERS: I could not give my hon. friend the dates, which would be spread over a period of three years, but I can get the information for him.

Mr. CARROLL: In a return brought down March 4, 1914, this question was asked:

> How many employees of the Federal Government of Canada, including all services and all departments, have been dismissed from October 10, 1911, to the present date?

That would cover a period of three years and some months. The next question was:

> How many have resigned, including employees of the Federal Government of Canada in all services and in all departments?

The answer was:

> One resigned and one transferred to another department.

Mr. CROTHERS: I think that is a mistake on my hon. friend's part. I have before me the answers to the questions so far as the Labour Department is concerned. The answer to the first question is 21, and to the second, 24.

Mr. CARROLL: The question which I have read applies to all departments.

Mr. CROTHERS: I am not responsible for that; I never saw the return except so far as it was connected with the Labour Department. I have given the answers which were made to the questions so far as they apply to the Labour Department; if in the hon. gentleman's return the answer is given as one, there must be an error somewhere.

Mr. CARROLL: How many officers are there in the Department of Labour at the present time, including correspondents and outside employees?

Mr. CROTHERS: I think the exact number including correspondents, is 109.

Mr. MARCIL: Were any correspondents of the Labour Gazette dismissed for political reasons, or is the paper a non-political publication?

Mr. CROTHERS: When I was placed in charge of the department I asked an officer to report on the efficiency of the labour correspondents throughout Canada. The officer, who was a Liberal, reported that in many cases the work was not efficient or satisfactory, and we dispensed with the services of those to whom this applied. Three were relieved of their duties because of political partisanship.

Mr. MARCIL: With respect to the large number of unemployed in Montreal and in other Canadian cities, has the minister information as to whether matters are improving, remaining stationary or getting worse, or whether there is any probability of an improvement within the next few months? So far as Montreal is concerned, the matter is getting to be very serious.

Mr. CROTHERS: Part of the duties of the Labour Gazette correspondents is to report monthly as to the conditions of employment in their various localities. Before the war broke out in July last I circularized these correspondents and requested them to answer certain questions with regard to unemployment, prices, wages, etc., and since that time they have been sending in weekly reports. In addition to that, the fair wage officers, of whom we have five, have covered their respective territories three times and have sent in three special reports checking up the reports made by the correspondents of the Labour Gazette. As the number of unemployed varies from day to day and from week to week, we have not been able to take anything like a census, but we have had an estimate made, based on information received from relief officers, heads of labour organizations and others specially interested in these subjects in the various localities. A great deal has been done to relieve unemployment. The Immigration Department has 163 special officers engaged all over Canada, who strive to have men placed upon the farms. They have also 30 regular agents whose offices 4 p.m. since the war broke out have virtually been turned into labour exchange bureaux; these officers have located a great many men on the farms. Private labour exchanges have also located a great many. Then the war has given employment to many. About 100,000 have enlisted with our troops and many thousands are engaged at the present time in making bodies for shells for the British Government. There are about a hundred factories engaged in that work in Canada at the present time. Since the 1st August last many thousands have been employed in manufacturing supplies for the Militia Department. Our reports, which are right up to date, show that conditions are not nearly so bad as they were a few months ago. Now let us see what the provinces are doing. The Government of British Columbia early undertook to look after the unemployed in that province by providing road work and making loans to municipalities to enable them to carry on public works. The Government of Alberta is also advancing large sums of money to several municipalities to enable them to find work for the unemployed and to provide relief work. For instance, it is giving some seven thousand dollars a month to Calgary, and about the same amount to Edmonton, fifteen hundred dollars a month to Medicine Hat and Lethbridge, and a small amount to Taber, a small place south of Lethbridge. In Manitoba there is very little unemployment. The Immigration Department has distributed amongst the farmers of Manitoba some four or five thousand men from the city of Winnipeg. As regards the East, there is very little complaint from the maritime provinces. Montreal and Toronto have more grounds for complaint as regards unemployment than any other cities in the Dominion. There have been a large number out of work in Montreal and Toronto, and I believe a considerable number still are out of work in those two cities. But outside of these two places there is not much to complain about at the present time. The Agricultural Department has relieved the situation in Toronto by sending many men out to the farms. Altogether things are getting better. Several thousand men have also been interned by the Justice Department. Shortly after the war began I wrote to all the provincial premiers making suggestions on these lines, and I got satisfactory replies from all except from the Premier of Quebec. The others said they would look after their own unemployed. The only reply I got to my letter to the Premier of the province of Quebec was an assurance that he would place my communication before his colleagues; that was all. I think the province of Quebec is the only one where nothing has been done by the Provincial Government towards relieving the unemployed.

Mr. MARCIL: It is mostly mechanics or labourers who make up the unemployed in the city of Montreal?

Mr. CROTHERS: Mostly unskilled labourers. I have a detailed statement here from one of my fair wage officers, and it shows that a good many engaged in the building trades in Montreal are out of work. I understand that the Montreal Builders' Exchange proposed last fall to continue building operations as far as possible, provided the mechanics would accept a certain rate of wages. The mechanics, however, would not agree and the members of the Builders' Exchange said they could not afford to go on erecting buildings at any other rate, and so work was stopped.

Mr. MARCIL: Can the minister tell us whether the Dominion proposes to do anything in the near future towards relieving the unemployed in Montreal and Toronto?

Mr. CROTHERS: Last week I sent to Montreal Mr. DuBreuil, who has charge of that sort of work in the province of Quebec, to make a thorough investigation in a good many directions. He is to give me a detailed report, but I have not got it yet. I will be pleased to show it to my hon. friend when it comes.

Mr. MARCIL: I know the minister is cognizant of the condition of affairs in Montreal, for he reads our papers. Only last week the Archbishop called on the Board of Control to ask that money should be distributed amongst the needy. The oldest residents say that things have never been so bad, and I am glad to know that the minister is following the situation, and will do all he can to relieve the very serious conditions existing in Montreal at the present time.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The minister has not told us how he proposes to relieve conditions in Montreal and Toronto. Investigations are all right, but conditions have been bad for a long time now, and while the investigation is being carried on people are going about hungry. I saw in a Toronto paper the other day that a large procession of labour men paraded the streets of that city with this device on their flags: 'British subjects we were born, and British subjects we will soon be dead.' The minister no doubt has been thinking over the matter, and I think the House is entitled to hear what solution he proposes for this serious state of affairs.

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend knows as well as I do that unemployment can be relieved to a greater or less extent in many ways. The Dominion Government for instance, can go on with public works if it has plenty of money, and in that way give work to the unemployed. The provincial Governments and municipalities, if they have money, can also do the same thing. My hon. friend, perhaps could set half a dozen men to work. I wonder if he has done it. If he has not, perhaps he has not fully done his duty. In a time of depression such as this, the Federal Government, Provincial Governments, municipalities and individuals should all join together and help the unemployed. Each one should do his part; that is the only remedy I know of.

Mr. SINCLAIR: That is a very indefinite remedy.

Mr. CARROLL: When the minister came back from his famous trip to England last year to learn how labour matters were conducted there, he made the statement, which appeared in the Ottawa Journal I believe, that he was going to revolutionize the existing labour legislation of Canada, and take steps to have introduced throughout this country a chain of labour bureaux. He stated that legislation for that purpose would be introduced at this session of Parliament. The minister has had the matter brought to his attention at various times, and by various labour organizations in this country. During the minister's unavoidable absence on account of sickness last year, this matter was taken up with the then acting Minister of Labour, the present Minister of Justice; and I understand that the Government gave some undertaking to at least introduce legislation at the present session of Parliament with a view to the formation of a central labour bureau with branch offices throughout Canada. This session, I understand, is going to be short, and yet nothing has been done so far as we know by the Minister of Labour with the view of introducing these labour bureaux into Canada. Any one who is more or less conversant with the labour situation knows that labour bureaux in Europe have been a wonderful success. They have actually surpassed the expectations of the labour people of the countries where they have been introduced. The Minister of Labour is not overburdened in his department, yet, after having given this interview to the Journal last year and intimating that this matter would be taken up in a forcible way at this session of Parliament, he has until this time shown no inclination to bring down a Bill for the establishment of labour bureaux. He has agreed with the representatives of labour organizations throughout the country that labour bureaux are excellent things and that they have worked out admirably in other countries where they have been established. He did say at the time that perhaps the Government would not undertake to pay the travelling expenses that would be incurred in connection with the labour bureaux but that they would undertake to establish them. I have had letters from various labour organizations throughout the country asking me to bring this matter to the attention of Parliament and of the Government, and particularly to the attention of the minister, and I wish to ask him the reasons why he has not fulfilled the promise he made last year that he would introduce legislation at this session to establish labour bureaux, whether it is his intention to bring this legislation down and if not, why?

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not think I ever made any statement to the effect that it was my definite intention to establish labour bureaux in Canada. I have often said that I had considered it, and I have considered it. My hon. friend (Mr. Carroll) refers to a trip to England. I did go to England. I am not the first minister who has gone to England. I went to England especially to look into this question of labour bureaux and I put in four weeks at this sort of work. When the labour bureaux were first introduced in England about five years ago, and for some time afterwards, they were not looked upon with favour either by the employer or the employee. After they had been in operation for two or three years they seemed to be more in favour with both classes. At the present time I am told that they are very much in disfavour especially by the working people of England. It is very often contended that these bureaux should be established now especially by reason of the depression that exists. Every economist who has written on this subject has pointed out that labour bureaux should never be established in times of depression, that the proper time to establish them, if you expect them to work out successfully, is when conditions are prosperous. They are sure to turn out a failure if you attempt to establish them in times of depression. Another mistake is that a great many people think that the object of labour bureaux is to create employment. They never were intended for anything of the kind and they are not used for that purpose in England, Germany or anywhere else. They have had labour bureaux in Germany for many years and still they have hundreds of thousands of unemployed people to feed every winter. It is a mistake to suppose that labour bureaux create employment; they do not. They are not for the purpose of relief or for the purpose of giving work. The only thing they claim for them is that they will assist in distributing labour. One can understand that in a time such as this where there is a surplus of labour everywhere they would not be of very much use. Suppose there is a surplus of carpenters in every town and city in Canada, a surplus of a hundred or more, and you have a surplus of 200 or 500 in the city of Montreal; what would the labour bureau do towards relieving their positions? Send them to Vancouver where they already have a surplus of carpenters? That would not be of any use in a time of depression. The principal party who is interested in the establishing of these labour bureaux is one who has been harassing not only this Government but previous Governments during the last five or six years and that person seems to be more especially interested than anybody else. That person has gone so far as to prepare a Bill, send it all around the country and say that it is a Bill that I prepared and proposed to introduce this session. I have never prepared a Bill and I have never authorized anybody else to do so. What are the facts in regard to the labour organizations? The Trades and Labour Congress, at their meeting at St. John, New Brunswick, last September, passed a resolution substantially opposed to the establishing of exchanges in Canada. At a meeting of the Trades and Labour Council in Winnipeg last week they were unanimously opposed to the suggestion, and they arrived at that conclusion after quite a long discussion. I have received from some local Trades and Labour Councils a resolution passed at the request of this party who is so much interested, a person who wants to be appointed to inaugurate this system at a big salary—

Mr. CARROLL: Who is the gentleman?

Mr. CROTHERS: It does not happen to be a gentleman; it is a lady. I have received from some local Trades and Labour Councils copies of a resolution passed in favour of the establishment of labour bureaux on the assumption that they would do something to provide labour for people who are out of work. That is not the object of them at all; they never pretend to do anything of the kind. The Trades and Labour Congress, composed of representatives from all over Canada, at their annual meeting at St. John, N.B., passed a resolution in substance opposed to it; and a very strong resolution in opposition to such a system was passed at a meeting in Winnipeg one night last week. Many of their leading men present at that meeting opposed it, and they gave particulars why they did not want it. A great many individual men, mechanics and others, are opposed to it, because, for instance if there is a scarcity of carpenters in Ottawa, they say that tends to increase their wages, and they do not want us to send in a number of men from Toronto to compete with them and reduce their wages. That is one of the lines they take in opposition to these bureaux. It is a matter that requires a great deal of consideration. In addition to what I have said, it would be a very expensive thing to undertake. Gentlemen who have had anything to do with Governments—this or any other Government—know that you cannot rent a building in a place like Montreal, Winnipeg or Vancouver, put a staff of people in that building, and do likewise in every town and city of Canada, without an immense expenditure. We have made a calculation upon that, and that is a matter that has to be considered in the present circumstances. The general feeling, I believe, amongst the workingmen is unfavourable to the establishment of national labour exchanges in Canada.

Mr. CARROLL: I have asked the Minister of Labour some questions which he has not deigned to answer. There is no person in this country who will for one moment contend that the establishment of a national labour bureau, with local offices throughout the country would create employment, whether it is established in times of depression or of prosperity. The minister says that there being so much depression at present in the country, it is not the time for the inauguration of a labour bureau, but I hold a contrary opinion. A year ago to-day there was as much if not more unemployment in Canada as there is now, and then the Minister of Labour was loud in his praise of the idea of establishing labour bureaux throughout Canada. The fact, as stated by the minister, that two organizations in this country have passed resolutions against the inauguration of such a bureau, is not complete evidence that the great bulk of the labouring people in this country are against the establishment of such a bureau, nor does it gainsay the fact that labour bureaux have been a great success wherever they have been established, and that they would be a success were they established in Canada. I asked the minister whether last year on his return from England he promised delegations, which waited on him, that he would introduce at this session of Parliament legislation to create labour bureaux in Canada, and whether or not it is his intention to introduce that Bill in accordance with the promise so given.

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend has been before the public long enough to know that he should not place entire reliance upon everything he sees in the public press. I do not think I ever made a definite statement that I would introduce a Bill of that kind this session, and even if I did conditions have changed during the past year. The Poor Law Commission was appointed by the Imperial Government in 1905, and in their report they say, with regard to these labour exchanges:

> They were nearly all started in times of depression, exactly the wrong time to start a labour exchange. The time to start it is when trade is going up, because then the people whom you casualize have the best chance of finding other places for themselves.

I may add that the conditions in Canada are very different from the conditions in England. In England, if a carpenter in Liverpool goes to a labour exchange and asks if there is any employment for a carpenter, the United Kingdom being a small place territorially as compared with Canada, they are able to telephone around and in a few minutes they discover that carpenters are wanted in Manchester. The man says, I can not get to Manchester because I have no money, and the Government in that case supplies him with a warrant upon the railway to get to Manchester, and the employer is notified to deduct the amount from the first wages the man earns, and to send it back. I was told a year ago, when I was in England, that they had received in return 96 per cent of the money so advanced, which speaks very highly for the high sense of honour which actuates the mechanics and labouring people of old England. In Canada we could not, for instance, undertake to supply a dozen men, idle in Halifax, for work in Vancouver. I do not think from that point of view it would be practicable for the Government of Canada to undertake to do for people seeking employment here what is done for them in England. When I was in England I was satisfied that the system was working fairly well, but I am told that within the last year the working people have become very much dissatisfied with it. Something, however, has been done in this country already towards establishing these labour exchanges. The legislatures of Ontario and Quebec have established provincial exchanges, and I think those in Quebec are working more satisfactorily than those in Ontario. Manitoba is also adopting the system; there are many municipalities throughout the country that have established labour bureaux, and of course there are many private exchanges. The experience is that men prefer to deal with these private exchanges rather than with exchanges established by the provinces or by the municipalities. The necessity for labour exchanges in large centres like Montreal resulted from the large number of immigrants that were coming into the country—there are very few coming at the present time—and it is complained that some of these private agencies swindled these men. I sent an officer to Montreal to investigate, and he found out that one firm had swindled immigrants out of ten thousand dollars in a few years.

Mr. MARCIL: They exacted as high as fifteen dollars from a labourer.

Mr. CROTHERS: That was our information.

Mr. NESBITT: I thought you were prosecuting them.

Mr. CROTHERS: We had no power to prosecute them that being the duty of the province. But the Interior Department, under section 66 of the Immigration Act, did pass rules and regulations for the governance of any one who had any dealings with immigrants, limiting the sum that they could charge any individual to one dollar, requiring them to take out a license from the department, and providing heavy penalties for infringement. A great number of prosecutions have been had under these rules and regulations for the protection of immigrants, but of course they only apply to immigrants. In some cases, however, it has not worked out very well, because the immigrant desiring work will go in and tell one of these agents, when he gets to know the ropes, that he has been in the country over three years, and therefore he is not an immigrant any longer, and they proceed to fleece him, outside of the rules and regulations which we have made. It is for the province to look after these things; we have no jurisdiction. The provinces are trying to do something in the direction of getting good results out of labour bureaux and so also are many of the municipalities. There are also a number of private agencies.

Mr. MARCIL: The Minister of Labour unintentionally said that the province of Quebec had done nothing for the unemployed in Montreal, but now he says that an important bureau of labour, established in that city by the provincial Government, has done good work.

Mr. CROTHERS: It was established some years ago.

Mr. CARROLL: The Minister of Labour has not yet answered my question as to whether or not this Government intends to bring down legislation at this session of Parliament for the organization, creation and maintenance, to some extent at least, of a national labour bureau for Canada. I base my arguments on the fact that the Minister of Labour, in an interview which he gave to the Ottawa Evening Journal, under date of May 20, 1914, said that he was going to introduce legislation at this session of Parliament. The article reads as follows:

Drastic Legislation to be Introduced dealing with Employment Matter.

Drastic Legislation to deal with the employment question will be introduced by the Government next session of Parliament. Action will be taken by the Canadian Government along the lines by which the Imperial Government has solved the difficulty in Great Britain. It was for the purpose of studying the methods pursued in England that Hon. T. W. Crothers, Minister of Labour, visited the old country last year. Since his return he has been in consultation with representative men in the various portions of Canada, and he is convinced, he said in conversation to-day, that he has evolved a scheme adapted to the needs of this country, and which will be a great boon to employers and workmen alike.

Incidentally, Mr. Crothers stated that there would be no labour legislation this year. He has just recovered from a serious illness, and the session is now so near a close that it is impossible to get time for adequate consideration of the legislation he has in view.

In Great Britain the Government has established a number of labour bureaux, with a central office in London. All expenses are borne by the Government, and Mr. Crothers found that they were most excellently managed and had been a godsend. These bureaux supply workers for employers and work for those out of employment. There is a perfect system of information kept regarding the needs in the various parts of the country, and the unemployed are, therefore, not subjected to the more or less misrepresentation of employment agents.

Travelling expenses are advanced to those who have to travel a distance to obtain work, and the experience is that 96 per cent of these have kept faith in refunding the expenses.

Mr. Crothers states that the distances in Canada render it impossible for the Government to advance travelling expenses, but he believes that he has arrived at a solution of the difficulty by getting employers to advance the money.

The Minister of Labour has found that to allow persons out of work, especially immigrants, to get into the hands of employment agents, has not been in the best interests of workmen. He found, after going carefully into the matter, that one employment agent in Montreal had made $10,000 in three months out of immigrants alone, charging them as high as $15 and $16 to get them a job. He has stopped this extortion by compelling agents to take out a Government license, and there is now a regular system of inspection.

Mr. Crothers intends to go still further, and will establish Government bureaux at a number of centres of population. Accurate information regarding labour conditions in the various parts of the country will be available at each office, and to these offices those who desire employment will go. Employers also will be able to secure information as to the ability and record of those whom the bureau will recommend to them.

I agree with the Minister of Labour in everything that the Evening Journal reports him as saying. I agree with him also that it would be a great hardship for any Government to pay the travelling expenses of persons going long distances in Canada to secure work. He has told us also, however, that he has solved this problem in this way, namely, that he will get the employers to advance the travelling expenses of workmen, and they will deduct those expenses from the workmen's wages. That is all very excellent; but the trouble is that the Minister of Labour apparently is not doing anything to bring into effect this fine scheme which he evolved, and has no notion of bringing it into effect. I should not like to say that he is getting cold feet, because that is not a nice thing to say; but he has backed down from the position which he took last year when he was fresh from a country where labour bureaux had been an eminent success. I have here a long list of organizations throughout the country which have endorsed this idea of the establishment of a national labour bureau, and I will read some of the names to show that the people and the organizations of Canada everywhere have endorsed it.

Mr. CROTHERS: Has my hon. friend got his information from the individual to whom I referred, who was seeking an interview?

Mr. CARROLL: The hon. minister has not deigned to tell me who the person is.

Mr. CROTHERS: We both understand who it is.

Mr. CARROLL: This petition is signed by N. J. Garland, Ottawa Board of Trade; C. G. Pepper, Canadian Federation of Labour, of Ottawa; J. S. Adamson, Ottawa Builders' Exchange; Auguste Lemieux, C. W. Bullock, and E. St. John Wileman.

Mr. CROTHERS: The last is the most important of the lot.

Mr. CARROLL: Perhaps the hon. gentleman can gather from those names the one he has in view.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Are they all ladies?

Mr. CROTHERS: Did you get it from the last-named one?

Mr. CARROLL: No, I did not. I have not been so fortunate as to have had the acquaintance of the lady. The minister has told us that at the Labour Congress at St. John and at a local meeting at Winnipeg, the establishment of a national labour bureau was not endorsed.

Mr. CROTHERS: That Labour Congress was for the whole of Canada.

Mr. CARROLL: I understand that. There are some of the people and institutions throughout Canada who have endorsed and still endorse the establishment of such a bureau: Provincial Premiers; Alberta Legislature in Committee; Ontario Cabinet; Associated Boards of Trade for Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Manitoba; Affiliated Boards of Trade for British Columbia; Union of Alberta Municipalities; Union of Saskatchewan Municipalities; Canadian Lumbermen's Association; Mountain Lumbermerchants' Association; Social Service Congress; Retail Clerks' Association; Canadian Federation of Labour; Dominion Trades and Labour Congress President; Guelph Civic Authorities; Guelph Trades and Labour Council; Montreal Builders' Exchange; President Montreal Civic Improvement League; Associated Boards of Trade for Ontario—2 endorsements; Ontario Provincial Builders' Exchange; Prince Rupert Board of Trade; Victoria Builders' Exchange; Vancouver Builders' Exchange; Revelstoke Trades and Labour Council and other labour bodies; Medicine Hat Builders' Exchange; Lethbridge Civic Authorities; Saskatoon Civic Authorities; Minnedosa Civic Authorities; Brandon Board of Trade; Winnipeg Builders' Exchange; Haileybury Board of Trade; Hamilton Trades and Labour Council; Moncton Board of Trade; Halifax Constructive Mechanical Trades Exchange; Calgary Board of Trade; Calgary Builders' Exchange; Toronto Board of Trade; Toronto Builders' Exchange; Ottawa Civic Authorities; Ottawa Board of Trade; Ottawa Builders' Exchange; The Sons of England; Orangemen; St. Jean Baptiste Society; St. George's Society; Y.M.C.A.; Devonian Society; Old Countrymen's Club; Overseas Club; The presidents of McGill and Toronto Universities. Although the hon. minister's name is not on this list, he endorsed this idea on the 20th of May, 1914.

Mr. CROTHERS: I never did.

Mr. CARROLL: Will the minister say that he did not give this interview which is credited to him in the Evening Journal of Wednesday, May 20, 1914?

Mr. CROTHERS: I am very glad to find that my hon. friend occasionally reads such a reliable paper as the Ottawa Evening Journal. I hope he reads it every day.

Mr. CARROLL: Always.

Mr. CROTHERS: If he does, his information will be better than it sometimes is. I am not responsible, however, for what appears in the Evening Journal, and it is not at all likely that I have ever made such a definite promise. Ministers do not do such things, as those who have had some experience know very well. We say that we will consider the matter, and if we arrive at a conclusion that in our opinion is in the best interest of the country, we do something. We do not say we will introduce a Bill next year. I do not remember the occasion at all, but I do not think I made any definite promise that this would be done. Even if I did so, conditions have changed since then. We are at present in a period of exceedingly severe depression and money is scarce. The Government has determined to introduce during this session no measures that can be avoided, that have no relation to the war. There may be some exception. Such a measure would arouse a great deal of controversy; the Government would have delegates of both shades of politics coming from various parts of Canada, and it is not considered desirable that such legislation should be introduced at this session. It would also be very expensive to inaugurate such a system. My hon. friend referred to a delegation. The particular individual to whom I have already referred was here during the Liberal régime and interviewed the then Minister of Labour on innumerable occasions. The same person has brought before me five delegations in regard to the matter, and she wants another interview next week. She wants special legislation to be brought down.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: The minister might as well be in the trenches.

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes. I received from several boards of trade and other organizations—I do not remember any of those to which my hon. friend has referred—letters formally endorsing the whole scheme. In several cases I wrote back asking where they had got the idea that I intended to introduce legislation, and they referred me to this one source. I believe every one of those signatures which my hon. friend has read has been secured in that way. We all understand that if a lady, especially if she is young and charming, comes and asks us, we would sign a petition of that kind at once. I believe that the majority of those signatures are attributable to the charming influence she exerts, and I have no doubt that she has exerted it on my hon. friend.

Mr. CARROLL: I have not been so fortunate.

Mr. CROTHERS: I have no doubt that the material which he has read to-day has been supplied by that individual.

Mr. NESBITT: You miss your guess.

Mr. CARROLL: I dare say that if I had had the pleasure of the acquaintance of this estimable young lady whom the minister knows so well, and who calls on him so often, I would have made a much better presentation of the case which I am trying to lay before the committee than I have done. I am not, however, as fortunate as the Minister of Labour in knowing the young lady. I am sorry to learn that the minister is not going to introduce this legislation this year. He says that he has no recollection of having given this interview to the Evening Journal, and he also says that the Evening Journal is a very reliable paper. As it is a very reliable paper and as this article contains almost every word regarding this bureau that the Minister of Labour has uttered here to-day, I would infer, since the minister says that he does not remember, that he must certainly have given this interview to the Evening Journal. Be that as it may, there is not much use in my discussing the question much further in view of the fact that it is not the intention of the Minister of Labour to introduce legislation at the present session for the establishment of a national labour bureau in Canada. This information will be received with deep regret by the people of this country. I hope the time will come when we shall have in this country a Minister of Labour who will take this question up with a more lively interest than has been shown by my hon. friend who now holds the position. I do not care whether he be a Conservative or a Liberal; I hope he will fill the need that we have had in this country for a long time.

Mr. CROTHERS: Some of the representatives of the Trades and Labour Congress which met at St. John in September last were from my hon. friend's own town, and they voted in favour of the resolution to which I have referred.

Mr. CARROLL: I am willing to wager the hon. minister that there is not a member of the Dominion Trades and Labour Congress in the city of Sydney or in the town of Glace Bay who would not vote for the establishment of a national labour bureau in Canada.

Mr. CROTHERS: The resolution was carried unanimously, and representatives from my hon. friend's town were there and I understood voted for the resolution, although I do not undertake to say definitely that such is the case.

Mr. NESBITT: I just want to suggest to the minister that either his department or the Immigration Department could do some good if they had a means of placing with the farmers men who have worked on farms. The spring is coming on and a great many men could be placed in the riding from which I come, and, I believe, in the riding from which the minister comes. There are a great many mechanics who are accustomed to farm labour.

Mr. CROTHERS: Have you not in your town an agent appointed by the Immigration Department? There is one at St. Thomas.

Mr. NESBITT: There may be one, but I have not heard of him.

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend had better look him up and ask him for farm help.

Mr. NESBITT: Personally I have never had any difficulty in getting help. I have a number of applications for help at the present time, but there are a number of men in my section of the country who I know are willing to hire men now.

Mr. CROTHERS: I am told by my deputy that these agents last year distributed amongst the farmers 20,000 men. That is the report from the Immigration office.

Mr. MACDONALD: In the debate on the Address I asked whether or not the fair-wage clause had been put into force in connection with the contracts let in Canada for the supply of various articles for war purposes, and I pointed out that, as there is an English fair-wage clause similar to the one we have in Canada, it was the duty of the Department of Labour, in letting these contracts, to see that this provision was carried out. I understand that representations were made to the department from my section, where some of the shells are being made. Has a fair-wage officer gone to New Glasgow or that vicinity, or has anything been done in the way of looking into and adjusting this matter in regard to not merely to wages, but to the working hours of the men employed in some of these industries?

Mr. CROTHERS: The same company is running a plant at Amherst, is it not?

Mr. MACDONALD: No, a different company. You might tell us also about the company at Amherst.

Mr. CROTHERS: There are about a hundred factories in Canada making bodies for shells for the British Government. Our fair-wage clause does not apply to any of these contracts.

I think the right hon. Prime Minister, in answering a question put by my hon. friend a few days ago, told him that these contracts are being let by a board appointed by the Minister of Militia, the chairman of which is Colonel Bertram, of Montreal. We received complaints from three different places to the effect that fair wages were not being paid and that the men were obliged to work long hours. We replied at once saying that we had not the power to enforce any fair-wage clause, but that we would take the matter up with the chairman of that board, Colonel Bertram. That gentleman has taken a great interest in this matter, and has a very strong sympathy for the working people, mechanics in particular. He went to Toronto to go into the factories the men working in which were strongest in their complaints; he also went into those in the Montreal district. He said that he entirely sympathized with the complaints made by these men; that the manufacturers of these bodies were receiving fair profit and there was no reason why they should not pay the men fair wages. He said he would see to it that fair-wage clauses were put in future contracts, and that no contract would be awarded unless this grievance was at once remedied. The superintendent of one of the Toronto companies came here; I saw him, and he understood before he left that he would have to deal fairly with the men; otherwise he would make no more shells. I understand that he has proceeded to put things in proper shape so far as the men are concerned. I find Colonel Bertram exceedingly anxious to do everything he can to adjust matters in this respect. The complaint that came from the firm to which my hon. friend refers was handed over to Colonel Bertram. He is a very busy man, but I have no doubt he will see to it that the men in my hon. friend's constituency will get a fair deal.

Mr. MACDONALD: I agree with what the hon. minister says respecting Colonel Bertram; I know him personally and regard him as a very high-class man. While the situation may be remedied temporarily in some quarters, I think the minister ought in some way to assert control over his fair-wage officers in regard to these matters. I do not think that the minister, simply because Colonel Bertram says he will look into the matter, should refrain from any further attempt to have his fair-wage officers take action.

Mr. CROTHERS: I neglected to tell my hon. friend that I sent officers to London, Toronto and Hamilton. They went into the factories, and I have full reports from them. I should be glad, however, if my hon. friend would suggest anything that I can do, apart from Col. Bertram, to remedy these grievances.

Mr. MACDONALD: In England they have a fair-wage provision for Government contracts, just as we have in Canada. These contracts for supplies are important contracts, let through a committee appointed by the Government of Canada, so that although the money is not paid directly by the Government of Canada, it is paid through a body created for the purpose of carrying out the wishes of the Imperial Government. While it is well that Col. Bertram should undertake to look into these matters, I think the minister ought to send his fair-wage officers into localities from which complaints may come, in order to ascertain the nature of the grievances existing with respect to wages and labour. I am referring particularly to a communication which I understand was sent to the Minister of Labour from New Glasgow on behalf of a large number of men who are employed there, asking that a fair-wage officer be sent to that district. The minister has intimated that he sent men to London and elsewhere, and if he has not already sent one to Nova Scotia, I would ask him to do so in order that the necessary inquiries may be made.

5 p.m.

Mr. CROTHERS: I may say further that we had communication on this subject with the British War Office, through Sir George Perley, and the British War Office said in substance that they did not want the men in Canada to work under anything but fair conditions. My deputy informs me that a copy of the correspondence touching that matter was sent to Col. Bertram. It is not always practicable to send a fair-wage officer unless definite complaints are received.

Mr. MACDONALD: I understood that my hon. friend had received a letter from the labour people of that district.

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes, and the letter was referred to Colonel Bertram. In many cases we sent men to districts thousands of miles distant to investigate complaints of a general character, with the result that no real grievance was found to exist. Consequently we insist upon receiving definite particulars with regard to wages, hours of labour, etc. I think we have done everything we can do in the matter. Colonel Bertram and his colleagues act, in a sense, under our authority through the Minister of Militia. I am satisfied with what he is doing, and I am glad my hon. friend knows him and corroborates what I have said in regard to his activities. I believe that he is very much in earnest about this matter, and that he will remedy conditions so far as it is possible to do so, even going to the extent of withholding further contracts if necessary.

Mr. MACDONALD: Who is the fair-wage officer supervising these matters in the maritime provinces.

Mr. CROTHERS: Mr. Dubreuil. My deputy informs me that the communication received from New Glasgow referred to some condition that might be brought about, not to anything at present existing.

Mr. GERMAN: Has the minister's attention been called to a letter sent to his department in November last from the International Brotherhood of Steam Shovel and Dredge Men at Thorold, in the county of Welland? I have a copy of a letter, which is addressed to the Department of Labour, Ottawa, from this body, pointing out the minimum and maximum scale of wages paid to that class of men. The suggestion is made that something be done in the direction of fixing a definite scale of wages for these men, not only on regular days but on holidays and for overtime as well. Has anything been done?

Mr. CROTHERS: As my hon. friend is aware, five different contractors are working on the Welland canal. I think that during the last eight or ten months, one of our fair wage officers has been there practically half the time. I do not remember having seen the complaint my hon. friend refers to.

Mr. GERMAN: This is not really in the nature of a complaint; it is suggesting what should be done by the department.

Mr. CROTHERS: Do you think that letter indicates that there is no schedule of wages?

Mr. GERMAN: I understand that there is not a schedule, and they want one fixed.

Mr. CROTHERS: The matter has not been brought to my attention before, but I will look into it. I understand that there is a fixed schedule for all classes of labour employed on the canal.

Mr. GERMAN: If my hon. friend has not seen this letter, I will hand it to him so that he can look over it.

Mr. CROTHERS: All right. We insist on the contractors adhering strictly to the schedules, and we have succeeded in getting large sums of money for men who have worked on the canal in different capacities. But it is a herculean task to keep track of it. I shall be very glad to look into this matter.

Mr. W. A. BUCHANAN (Medicine Hat): The minister has referred to what the Government of Alberta is doing in the way of assisting the unemployed in some of the cities of that province. We can understand the cause of a good deal of the unemployment that exists; but there is a peculiar class of unemployment in a certain section of my constituency. I have taken this matter up with the minister by correspondence and in interviews, and I wish to deal with it on the floor of the House merely to bring about if possible an effort on the part of the Government to look into this particular condition. The coal mines on the prairies of Alberta have been practically without work all this winter. I should, however, except the Galt mine in the city of Lethbridge. The Galt mine is the oldest domestic coal mine in Southern Alberta. It has an established market as far east as the city of Winnipeg, and on that account has been able to keep up a good business. But the other mines adjacent to Lethbridge have been working less than half time. East of there is the mining camp of Taber a very extensive camp. I would say that there are eight to ten coal mines, large and small. I have satisfied myself that the mines of Taber from the beginning of 1914 up to the present time have not furnished work to the miners in that camp to the extent of a day and a half a week. That information was given to me, and I have investigated it and found it to be corroborated by the statements of others. There must be some reason for this condition. We may have a period of depression in the country during which we may do without certain things; but there is one thing the people of western Canada cannot do without, and that is fuel. The winter in Southern Alberta this year commenced the latter part of November and has continued up to the present time, and it was not the open winter we usually have in that part of the country, but a real winter which made fuel absolutely necessary. No doubt economy has been practised; people may have used less coal than they did in other years. There has also been a development of the natural gas area and in a great many communities in Alberta natural gas has supplanted coal as a fuel. But I cannot believe that it is for these reasons that the time of the workingmen at Taber camp has been reduced on an average to a day and a half a week during the year. I have mentioned to the minister the establishment of a new and extensive camp at Drumheller, northwest of Calgary, and there is no question that it has been cutting into the business of the Southern Alberta mines in Central Saskatchewan and Central Alberta. But the condition at Taber is an economic matter to a large extent, and I think requires an investigation. Charges have been made that some of the transportation companies are not assisting the mines at Taber, that they are operating against them, that in bringing back their empties this year the railways have filled them with a good deal of coal from the East which has come into competition with Western Canada coal. I do not know whether that is correct. But I know that in the camp at Taber the miners have been practically without work for a year, that there has been a great deal of distress and poverty, that there is no hope of employment ahead or that the situation will brighten. I think this matter is worthy of the attention of the Department of Labour, and that an investigation should be made by some person who is acquainted with mining, and who will be impartial in his investigation. I have had in mind that it might be possible for even the Railway Commission to look into this matter of alleged discrimination, and ascertain whether there is any truth in the charges. The prevailing opinion among the miners in that district is that the railways are discriminating against them.

I will anticipate a question that might be asked. It might be stated that the duty on coal should be increased; that American coal is supplanting our Alberta coal. I take no stock in that argument, because the duty has not been changed, except at the present session, and American coal has always had the same opportunity to come into western Canada as at present, and in past years this condition did not exist in the Taber and other western camps. Again there has been no labour trouble in the mining camps of Alberta during the past year. Things have been running smoothly between the union and the operators, due largely to the fact that there was not very much work for the men to do and it was not to their advantage to have any difficulty with the operators.

Mr. CROTHERS: They have been quiet for three years.

Mr. BUCHANAN: The situation, nevertheless, is very severe, and I am bringing it to the attention of the House with the hope that an effort will be made by the Government to bring about a solution of the situation particularly at Taber. My opinion is that there is something economically wrong; for they had a market before, but now for two winters conditions have been extremely bad, and there is no improvement in site. I think it is worth while for the country to investigate this charge of discrimination on the part of the railways, and if discrimination is found to exist to remove it if possible. I know that officials of the Labour Department have looked into conditions at Taber camp. I believe that if the minister paid a visit to Taber and saw the conditions there he would appreciate the need of some immediate action.

Mr. CROTHERS: I regret very much that there has been so little work at Taber for so many months. Early in the fall I sent a fair wage officer from Vancouver to inquire into conditions there and later I wrote to my hon. friend (Mr. Buchanan) about it. He was kind enough to answer my letter and to give me all the information he had at his disposal. I have talked the matter over with him since the beginning of the session. Neither he nor I so far have been able to devise any means for relieving the situation there. He mentioned that perhaps the principal cause of the difficulty at Taber was the opening of another mine at Drumheller where they can get coal and supply the wants of many people in the province with a shorter haul than if they were to take it from Taber. I do not know that any one is to blame for that. I suppose that if a man buying coal finds he can get it at Drumheller cheaper than he can at Taber he will get it at Drumheller and that will lessen the work for the miners at Taber. I am told that the coal produced at Taber is not of as good quality as that produced in some other parts of the province and that is given as a reason why coal is imported and brought from other places. I understand that the Canadian Pacific railway is interested in the mines at Lethbridge, which my hon. friend has referred to, and that the miners are very busy there. The miners at Taber wrote me asking me to make a personal visit to Taber and my hon. friend desired me to do that too. Taber is in his constituency and if he will give me the assurance from his experience of the people there that if I go everything will be all right, I will make an extra effort to go.

Mr. MACDONALD: Do you think you can do that?

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend (Mr. Buchanan) succeeds with the people at Taber and suggests that I should go. I do not claim to know anything about mining, but I will speak to the Chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners and also to my colleagues and see if it would be possible to have the matter investigated by the Board. I cannot understand what good I could do these people by going out there personally, although they insist on my going.

Mr. BUCHANAN: They would like to see you.

Mr. CROTHERS: If that would please them and settle the difficulty I would be delighted to go, but I do not see wherein I could do very much more for them personally. It may be that an investigation will be held.

Mr. BUCHANAN: This is what is called domestic coal. With regard to the steam coal mines in the Crowsnest pass, there might be some reason for the slackness of work on account of the fact that the railways are not operating as they formerly were and some other industries are closed down and therefore are not using as much coal. Domestic coal ought to be in general use from year to year.

Mr. WRIGHT: I know that in certain sections of the West they much prefer Galt coal, and that they do not buy Taber coal if they can get the other. They are willing to pay as much as fifty cents extra for the Galt coal in preference to the Taber coal. I presume it is fairly good coal, but the Galt coal is preferred.

Mr. MACDONALD: With regard to the question of coal in the west, coming as I do from a coal section in the East, the information I have about the situation there —and the figures verify it—is that during the last two or three years there has been a tremendous displacement of coal in the western field, more in British Columbia than in Alberta, by reason of the fact that the use of fuel oil on locomotives on the different railways there has greatly increased. This would have its resultant effect upon domestic coal. I fancy the characteristics of the two kinds of coal are not defined in such a marked way that parties who produce coal, which they sold to the railways, would not, when they were driven from the railway supply; naturally seek a market in a great many places where the people who had been purchasing domestic coal, such as Taber coal, which people would be looked upon as affording a natural market for this domestic coal. There have been complaints coming from those who have gone from the East to the West as to the conditions which exist in a business way there, which conditions, of course, affect labour and these conditions are no doubt largely due to the tremendous importation of fuel oil displacing coal in the business of the country. I mention this as being one of the causes which the minister will have to consider in regard to the request made by my hon. friend from Medicine Hat (Mr. Buchanan), because I have no doubt that he has had the same problem submitted to him from the coal people on the other side of the mountain.

Mr. CARROLL: How many labour disputes have been settled through the intervention of the minister's department during the past year?

Mr. CROTHERS: At the time of the outbreak of the war I publicly requested all employers and employees to avoid as far as possible any labour disturbances pointing out that we required our united strength to fight the enemy and that it would be unwise to dissipate that in any way by disputes between employers and employees. There were two or three disputes at that time approaching the appointment of a board of conciliation, but I was very much pleased to find that employers and employees got together and settled their trouble as I had suggested. We have not had a board of conciliation since although I think there are three at Edmonton in process of formation now. They are not large questions and I am in hopes that they will be able to settle them so that they may not require a board at all. Apart from that there have been about eighteen boards of conciliation during the past year. We have not had any serious trouble with any matter that has been dealt with under the Industrial Disputes Act.

Mr. CARROLL: Were the 17 or 18 boards that were appointed successful in bringing disputes to a satisfactory termination?

Mr. CROTHERS: I think they succeeded. I think both parties, with one or two slight exceptions, accepted the awards made by the board.

Mr. CARROLL: The Act appears to be working pretty well for both parties concerned. Is it the intention of the minister to bring in any amendment, or has he been asked by any parties or organizations, to prepare a Bill in amendment of the existing Act?

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes, I have been asked, and I have prepared a Bill, but it would be unwise to bring it up at this time. Some suggestions I have to make would not meet the wishes of all classes of working people, and as there would be a controversy no doubt I have determined not to bring that legislation in this year. Speaking generally, I want to testify to the fairly satisfactory working of the Industrial Disputes Act, so far as my experience goes. As no doubt my hon. friend (Mr. Carroll) knows, his native province is entitled to the credit for the main features of the Industrial Disputes Act. Credit is sometimes given to other places, but it was the legislature of Nova Scotia that, in the year 1890, adopted the chief features of that legislation. I think the Industrial Disputes Act operates fairly well. I desire to make some improvements to it and then I believe it will be as satisfactory as any similar legislation in any part of the world.

Mr. CARROLL: Has the commission on the high cost of living made a report?

Mr. CROTHERS: They promised me a couple of weeks ago that their report would be ready before the end of the month. I think it is about ready now, and I think my hon. friend and other hon. gentlemen will find it a very able report and a very satisfactory one, especially the work in connection with it which was done in my department, and of which I am very proud.

Mr. MACDONALD: The question of technical education is, of course, a very large one, and in our province, in which we have a very large industrial population developing our various resources, there is a very satisfactory technical school, which has been started by the Provincial Government. The results so far produced by that school have been of such beneficial character that we all have become greatly interested in the subject and we look forward to the extension of technical schools with a good deal of hope. There are four or five constituencies in Nova Scotia which seem to have led the way, so far as the country east of Quebec is concerned, in industrial development. Nova Scotia was the scene of the inception of the iron and steel industries of the Dominion, the initiation and progress of which have been due entirely to latent Nova Scotian talent. The Nova Scotia Government has established a technical school under the direction of Professor Sexton.

Mr. CROTHERS: One of the best in Canada.

Mr. MACDONALD: One of the best in Canada, and the beneficial results obtained from that school have attracted the attention of our people. One does not need to elaborate upon the desirability of extending the operation of the technical schools system among the working people of Canada. The report of the Commission on Technical Education has been before the minister for some time, and I would like to have him make a frank statement as to what his views in regard to that question are, and what his idea is at to what can be done in the future.

Mr. CROTHERS: When the Commission on Technical Education was appointed, the question of jurisdiction as between the Dominion and the provinces was raised, and so that there might be no misunderstanding the Prime Ministers of the various provinces were told that the object of this commission would be only to collect information and report that information to the various provincial governments. They were asked whether they in any way objected to the appointment of such commission. The Prime Ministers of all the provinces replied, saying that they had no objection, but Prime Ministers of Quebec and Ontario drew special attention to the fact that under the British North America Act education was within the purview of the provinces. The report was completed in February last, and on the 12th of March it was sent to the Prime Minister of each province with the accompanying letter:

Ottawa, March 12, 1914.

My Dear Sir,—You will, perhaps, recall communications exchanged in December, 1909, between my predecessor as Minister of Labour and yourself, with reference to the advisability of the appointment by the Dominion Government of a Royal Commission "to inquire into the needs and present equipment of the Dominion as respects industrial training and technical education," etc., my predecessor going on to remark, "It is intended that the commission shall be solely for the purpose of gathering information, the information, when obtained, to be published in a suitable report to be at the disposal of the provinces and available for general distribution." Letters were similarly exchanged on this subject with the Prime Ministers of the other provinces of Canada. None of the replies received objected to the appointment of the commission, and several contained expressions of cordial approval of the proposed course of action.

The Dominion Government appointed a Royal Commission in June, 1910, and the commission in due course reported. I deemed it well, before bringing the report formally to your attention, to await receipt of the concluding section (Part IV), in view particularly of the fact that this part contains a report of the inquiry of the commission in Canada itself. Copies of this part having been received, the four volumes comprising the report are now sent you, and I should be pleased to receive, as soon as may be possible, an expression of your views as to the general nature of the report, and especially concerning the recommendations contained therein. Any suggestion you may be pleased to make will be submitted to my colleagues, and will receive, you may rest assured, careful consideration.

The earlier volumes of the report have been already forwarded to each member of your Government and to many of your leading officers.

Yours faithfully,
T. W. Crothers.

I received a reply from all of the prime ministers, acknowledging the receipt of this report, but there was no indication that the Provincial Governments would take the matter up seriously, nor did they make any suggestions as to whether they were in favour of the report of the commission or not. The communication from Premier Murray, of Nova Scotia, was an exception, in that as he takes a special interest in the subject, he did go more fully into the question than did the others. The question of technical education, as hon. members who have considered the matter will know, is a difficult one to deal with. As I have said, there was an intimation from the late Sir James Whitney, and from Sir Lomer Gouin, as to what they thought about the Federal Government taking any action in such a matter, beyond, of course, advancing money, and they are all quite ready to receive any sum of money we might give. But it is not thought that the Federal treasury could pay out money unless the Federal Government had something to say as to how it should be appropriated. The matter has remained there since. Even if we had a conference with the provinces, and had come to a conclusion as to what should be done, I do not think we could very well now undertake to spend the money, some $3,350,000 a year, which would be involved in carrying out that report. While I quite agree with my hon. friend the member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) that technical education in any line of work is of advantage to any one, and while I am willing to render any assistance in my power, yet at the present time the demands in other directions upon the treasury of this country are more immediately pressing, and we must see to it that our strength is used in the direction of bringing this great struggle to a victorious conclusion.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend has not indicated what his aspirations are in regard to this matter, but has confined himself to the simple statement that on account of the financial condition of the country he is unable to propose anything at all.

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend will remember that I did not confine myself to that one point.

Mr. MACDONALD: Beyond showing a pious sympathy, my hon. friend intimated that, as there was no money at hand to spend, he would not say what should be done. My hon. friend ought to take the initiative. I have no doubt the Premier of Nova Scotia has suggested to him that he should follow the line adopted by the hon. Minister of Agriculture in connection with the special vote made for the purpose of assisting agriculture in this country. When I say that I do not know what the Hon. Mr. Murray has said, I am only supposing that he may have suggested this course to the Minister of Labour. Where in any province of the Dominion there is a well-established technical school, it would be desirable to supplement and extend its operations by assistance from the federal treasury along the same lines as assistance was granted to agriculture. The minister should not wait for the provincial ministers to tell him what he should do on this question. That is where I find fault with him. We admit that the financial condition of the country to-day is such that the Minister of Finance has to be very cautious when his brother ministers come to him with proposals involving inroads upon the treasury. We all know that he is bound to exercise the strictest economy in every quarter in order to maintain the financial status of Canada. He would be liable to criticism if he failed to take that position. I am sure that we on this side of the House will support him in that wise and cautious policy, if he follows it, endeavouring to keep things on an even keel. But assuming that he does so and that our business is to continue this war until it is brought to a successful conclusion, that ought not to prevent the Minister of Labour from having upon this question some policy, some views, which he may desire to carry into effect when the smoke of battle has cleared away and the Empire is sailing upon a level sea and Canada is following her usual course. My hon. friend the Minister of Labour apparently has no views on this question at all. Because the premiers of the different provinces have not suggested to him what he should do, he does not do anything and does not even propose to think about the matter. I entreat my hon. friend to get into a different frame of mind upon this question. Not only do we want to see this country great agriculturally, but where we have the facilities and the natural resources we want to see it great industrially. We cannot see it great industrially, unless we lay the foundation for that condition by a system of technical education. One of the things that has made Germany such a wonderful nation as she is in the way of providing modern devices relating to war, has been her system of technical education, which she has pursued with the greatest care for the last 20 or 25 years. In this new country of ours, where we are but laying the foundations, we should, at the earliest possible date, not merely provincially but federally, deal with this problem, so that we may lay a permanent basis of conditions upon which Canada may build an industrial structure which will give her a foremost place among the new nations of the world. I beseech my hon. friend to adopt some policy upon this question; for apparently he has not any policy. I would like to know what he would do if he had the money. If he will frame a policy I am sure the people of Canada will supply the necessary money when the skies are clear.

Mr. CARROLL: This matter of technical education is very important in the province of Nova Scotia. Has there been under the advisement of the Department of Labour or of the Government any scheme whereby the provinces might be assisted in the matter of technical education along the lines of the report of the commission appointed for that purpose?

Mr. CROTHERS: The matter has been under consideration along the lines suggested by the members of the commission as well as along some other lines. Some of the provinces do not agree at all with the suggestions made by the commissioners. The report comprises four large volumes, which were sent out only last March. It would take a man a long time to read them, and a longer time to consider them. It is the intention of the Government, when the skies are clear, as my hon. friend the member for Pictou says, if we can make saisfactory arrangements with the provinces, to render material assistance in respect to technical education.

Conciliation and Labour Act, including publication, printing, binding and distribution of the Labour Gazette, and allowance to correspondents and for clerical assistance in preparing tables on statistics, $35,000.

Mr. NESBITT: What is the situation in regard to the British Columbia labour question?

Mr. CROTHERS: A short time ago I asked my fair wage officer at Vancouver to go over to Vancouver Island and give me a detailed report as to conditions of mines there, and he did so, giving the number of white people and the number of Orientals working in each mine. What my hon. friend no doubt refers to particularly is the labour trouble which has existed on Vancouver Island for a long time. The strike was called off some months ago and a great many of the men have returned to work, and some of them have moved out, but everything is quiet there now.

Mr. CARROLL: A recent issue of the Labour Gazette reported that the United Mine Workers paid out a million and a half dollars of their funds in conducting that strike. Is that correct?

Mr. CROTHERS: I understand that that is about the amount they paid out.

Mr. CARROLL: An article in a recent issue of the Labour Gazette, dealing with coal mining and, I think, not contributed by the regular correspondent, contained a statement which would lead people to believe that Sydney is a coal mining city. There is not a coal mining town within ten miles of the city of Sydney. The town of Glace Bay is the centre of the coal mining operations, and Sydney is the centre of the steel industry. The matter was brought to my attention by a gentleman who thinks that the article is unfair to the city of Sydney; I merely call the minister's attention to it.

Mr. CROTHERS: The correspondent of the Labour Gazette in that district, Mr. John Moffat, is one of the best men we have in Canada.

Mr. CARROLL: This article was not contributed by the correspondent.

Mr. CROTHERS: It was not contributed by Mr. Moffatt, but I fancy the editor based his article on information obtained from him. However, I shall look into the matter and see that it is remedied.

Mr. MACDONALD: The correspondent in my county, Mr. Mackenzie, has gone to the war. Who is performing his duties during his absence?

Mr. CROTHERS: We have had several cases of that kind. During the absence of the correspondent we pay him his salary, and pay a man to take his place, on the understanding that when the regular correspondent returns, he will resume his position.

Mr. MACDONALD: Who is substituting in this case?

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not remember the name; I will let my hon. friend know.

Mr. MACDONALD: As my hon. friend is aware, the coal situation in Eastern Canada is in a very bad way. Has the hon. member had any representations from that section of the country with reference to slackness of work or other difficulties of a like nature?

Mr. CROTHERS: I think we have had no complaints of that kind from the eastern provinces.

Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, $20,000.

Mr. CROTHERS: We reduced that vote by $5,000, as we did not expect as many boards of conciliation this year as we had last year.

Mr. COPP: Has the minister received a resolution passed by the Moncton Trades and Labour Council with regard to the payment of wages bi-monthly instead of monthly?

Mr. CROTHERS: I think I did receive a communication of that kind.

Mr. COPP: Has the minister received a action in the matter?

Mr. CROTHERS: This matter would more properly come within the scope of the Department of Railways. It has been proposed that there should be an amendment to the Railways Act requiring all railway companies to pay wages twice instead of once a month. I myself suggested an amendment of that kind last year; when the Railway Act is revised I have no doubt that that matter will be discussed.

Mr. COPP: It seems to me that this is a matter which concerns more particularly the Trades and Labour Council of the city of Moncton than the different Railway unions. By these resolutions they have sought the good offices of the Minister of Labour; they believe that he is a friend of labour, I suppose, and hope that he will work out these matters in their interest. I should like to know from the minister whether he has taken any action in the matter, so that I may be in a position to advise those who have communicated with me in that regard.

Mr. CROTHERS: I acknowledged receipt of the communication and promised, I think, to give the matter my favourable consideration and to consult the Minister of Railways about it. I have spoken to the Minister of Railways; I do not know what will be done.

Mr. COPP: With regard to boards of arbitration and conciliation under the Industrial Disputes Act, I have received a long resolution, passed by System Federation No. 11 of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways, complaining that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway officials will not recognize the decision of the arbitration board in regard to difficulties between the railway and the employees. I will read the resolution; it is as follows:

Whereas the workers are from time to time urged and are expected to live up to the spirit of conciliation and arbitration and award of the board appointed under the Industrial Disputes Act;

[Mr. Crothers.]

And whereas we expect as workers that in accepting that spirit of the law, the employers should accept it in the same spirit, and when agreeing to the creation of such a board, they should accept such a decision;

And whereas the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, in view of certain considerations guaranteed by the Dominion Government, agreed to accept and be bound by an award of a board appointed to consider the condition of workers on that road;

And whereas up to the present time the management of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway have refused to put into operation the award of the said board, and such refusal being a serious violation of the spirit and intent of the Industrial Disputes Act:

And whereas many millions of the public money have been spent by the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, and as said company has frequently received valuable concessions from the Dominion Government, and therefore they should be compelled to respect the Industrial Disputes Act:

Therefore, be it resolved that this System Federation of the Canadian Government railways co-operate with the workers on other railroads in Canada and the Trades and Labour Congress in entering our protest against the Dominion Government granting any more assistance to the said railroad until such a time as they live up to the award of the late Board of Arbitration dealing with the conditions of the employees on said road.

Has the minister taken any action in this matter?

Mr. CROTHERS: I fancy this refers to the Board of Conciliation which dealt with a dispute between the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and their machinists at Winnipeg. A board was appointed in connection with this matter before I took charge of the Department of Labour, and an award was made. The Industrial Disputes Act provides that there shall be a board of investigation before there is a strike or lockout, and once the board has sat, heard evidence and made an award, any party to the dispute is at liberty to strike or to lockout, as they may see fit; there is no law against it. In the case to which, no doubt, they have reference, the machinists went on strike before the board sat; that was prior to October, 1911. An award was afterwards made and the company refused to carry that award out. An arrangement was made about a year and a half afterwards between the men and the company whereby the men were to go back and receive certain wages. Most of them went back to work at Transcona, near Winnipeg. The men contended that the company had not, as agreed, asked for a board, so they themselves asked for one. That was in the fall of 1913. Another board was appointed and another award made in favour of the men, which the company refused to recognize, contending that the men had agreed that when they returned to work they would not ask for a board unless a majority of the employees in certain crafts were dissatisfied. The question at once arose whether there was a majority dissatisfied or a majority satisfied. The company said the majority of the men were satisfied; the men said that the majority were dissatisfied. The award of the board, however, was in favour of the men, and the company steadfastly refused to carry it out. The men have since continued to work.

At six o'clock the House resumed, and then took recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

The House in Committee on Private Bills, Mr. Sevigny in the Chair.

Bill No. 9, respecting the Essex Terminal Railway Company—Mr. Wilcox—in committee.

On section 1—annual meeting:

Mr. NESBITT: Why has this section been changed?

Mr. LANCASTER: By the original charter of this company the annual meeting of the shareholders was to be held on the first Monday of September which is Labour Day, a holiday. This simply alters the date to the third Tuesday in September.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—extension of time for completion:

Mr. NESBITT: Have they started the road yet?

Mr. LANCASTER: It is partly under construction, I believe. The road runs from Walkerville through Sandwich East and Sandwich West to Windsor, through the town and townships of Sandwich and Anderdon. We are adding what are called the three standard sections for the safeguarding of water-powers and for the protection of municipalities. The first clause is to prevent water-powers being acquired by expropriation, and the other two are for the protection of municipalities as to poles on highways or building on highways without the consent of the municipality.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

Bill No. 13, respecting the Montreal and Southern Counties Railway Company—Mr. Bickerdike—in committee.

On section 1—extension of time for completion:

Mr. LANCASTER: This company has water-powers, and we have incorporated a section in this Bill to subject those water-powers to what is known as our standard policy in that regard. The other two sections prevent the construction of poles on highways and the building on highways without the consent of the municipality.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

Bill No. 21, respecting the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company—Mr. Blain—in committee.

On section 2—extension of time for the construction of certain authorized lines:

Mr. MACDONALD: Are these the lines that were referred to in the legislation of last year which provided for security being taken or are they entirely other lines on which no work has been done?

Mr. LANCASTER: I understand that no work has been done on these lines yet. The amendments are to strike out the words "or near" in various places, so as to make it definite where the railways are to go.

Mr. MACDONALD: Nothing here would affect the legislation of last year?

Mr. LANCASTER: I should think not.

Bill reported read the third time, and passed.

Bill No. 24, respecting the Ottawa and New York Railway Company—Mr. Fripp—in committee.

On section 1—lease of railway authorized:

Mr. LANCASTER: The committee probably would like to know why we amended this Bill. The Railway Committee thought it was not well to pass that section without limiting the power to lease to a certain length of time and they therefore required the company to make the lease for not more than ten years at a time. They also thought it was not well to enact that they could renew the lease from time to time; therefore, the Committee has amended the Bill so as to compel them to come forward every time they desire to renew the lease and ask for a special sanction as a safeguard to the public interest.

Mr. MACDONALD: The effect of the legislation is to divest a Canadian company of control over the railway and to put the railway under the control of an American company.

Mr. LANCASTER: To a certain extent. It is like the Michigan Central and Canada Southern.

Mr. MACDONALD: To what extent has the committee reserved control over the New York Central operating this railway in Canada under our statutes. Does the chairman think that our laws are fully operative as against a foreign corporation?

Mr. LANCASTER: Yes, under the Railway Act the operating company is under the control of the railway commission. The New York Central becomes the operating company. We were careful to see that they could only operate for ten years at a time without getting a new arrangement and we refused to give them the latter part of their section which provided that they could renew from time to time.

Mr. MACDONALD: Were the terms of the lease submitted to the committee?

Mr. LANCASTER: No, I have not seen the lease; I do not know whether the department have. The gentleman who appeared in support of the Bill before the committee, Mr. Scott of this city, said that the lease had not actually been executed yet and that they could not get it executed until they got this sanction.

Mr. MACDONALD: Did the wisdom of providing that the terms of the lease shall be subect to the approval of the Railway Commission occur to the chairman?

Mr. LANCASTER: Yes, we say that this is to be subject to the provisions of sections 361, 362 and 363 of the Railway Act, which are very wide and all-embracing in regard to the protection that the hon. gentleman has in mind. They must take it before the Railway Commission.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

The following Bills were also considered in committee, reported, read the third time, and passed, without discussion:

[Mr. Lancaster.]

Bill No. 4, respecting the Alberta Central Railway Company.—Mr. Michael Clark.

Bill No. 5, respecting the Athabasca and Grande Prairie Railway Company.—Mr. Green.

Bill No. 6, respecting the Brantford and Hamilton Electric Railway Company.—Mr. Barker.

Bill No. 7, respecting the British Columbia and White River Railway Company.—Mr. Clements.

Bill No. 23, respecting the James Bay and Eastern Railway Company.—Mr. Girard.

Bill No. 25, respecting the South Ontario Pacific Railway Company.—Mr. Wm. Smith.

Bill No. 26, respecting the Southern Central Pacific Railway Company.—Mr. Green.

Bill No. 22, respecting the Canadian Northern Railway, Ontario.—Mr. Guilbault.

Bill No. 10, respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada.—Mr. Macdonald.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill No. 59, respecting the Empire Life Insurance Company of Canada.—Mr. Macdonell.

Bill No. 60, to incorporate Entwhistle and Alberta Southern Railway Company.—Mr. R. B. Bennett.

Bill No. 61, respecting the Simcoe, Grey and Bruce Railway Company.—Mr. Middlebro.

SUPPLY.

The House resumed in Committee of Supply, Mr. Sevigny in the Chair.

Labour—Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, $20,000.

Mr. M. MARTIN (Montreal, St. Mary's) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to take up much of the time of the Committee but it seems to me that in my capacity of mayor of Montreal, it is incumbent on me to criticise the Government and specially the honourable Minister of Labour for neglecting to provide in the estimates an item of a few million dollars towards assisting the unemployed in the great industrial centres.

Of course, we were called upon to vote $150,000,000 to be spent in Great Britain for war purposes; but no provision whatever was made towards helping the workingman in the manufacturing centres of the Dominion. We have reached such a stage of misery that unless the Government realize what is going on and try to remedy matters, large numbers of our fellow-people are bound to starve.

In Montreal there are 45,000 of our people unemployed. The same state of things exists in all large cities of Ontario, and particularly Toronto. I deeply regret that this Government, and specially the Minister of Labour, should have overlooked the desirability of taking a vote towards helping out the destitute during this period of stress.

This morning, more than 800 unemployed called at my office at the City Hall; they included men in all class of society, accountants and clerks as well as laborers; for all our factories have closed down.

Therefore, I say that this Government should have been content with asking for a somewhat smaller amount to be forwarded to Great Britain. We are bound to borrow $150,000,000, that will be handed over to England; that money will not even cross the Atlantic, though we will have to pay interest on the loan and make good for it later on. We are willing to send men over there, but we should not send money, and I regret that no provision has been made for the destitute in this country, while millions are being sent to England.

Unless the Government make haste to assist our destitute, we shall presently be threatened with a revolution. I say then that we should at once provide in the Estimates, either of the Public Works or of the Labour Department, an amount sufficient to give work to our unemployed. Why not start forthwith the building of the Georgian Bay Canal? Why not carry out immediately the great work of improvement of the Montreal Harbour?

Times are hard, but the worst is yet to come.

The Minister of Labour need not laugh. It is a time to cry, not to laugh. It is very funny to see the Minister of Labour laughing when we are discussing questions of importance.

Mr. CROTHERS: You did not see him laughing at all. You are making that up.

Mr. MARTIN: You were laughing. It is not a time to laugh.

Mr. CROTHERS: I was not laughing.

Mr. MARTIN: I know you always laugh when you see citizens without bread in their house; but you will see, when the next election comes, that the shame will be on you.

(Translation) Mr. Chairman, I say that the Minister of Labour has been remiss in his duty in neglecting to provide in his Estimates an amount sufficient to assist urban municipalities. Rural municipalities, whose inhabitants undergo no hardship and are in a position to sell their produce at a large profit, need no help on our part. In cities, however, conditions are vastly different from those existing in the country, workingmen cannot find employment and charitable associations, among them St. Vincent de Paul find themselves unable to cope with the numerous demands made upon resources.

The city of Montreal has provided $75,000 to supply bread and soup to these unfortunate people. In my view, municipalities are not alone responsible for the maintenance of these dependents. I think the Minister of Labour should pay a visit to the poorer sections of our city, that might induce him to alter his views.

Mr. PAQUET (Translation): They should change the mayor.

Mr. MARTIN (Translation): I think rather we should change the government. At all events, I challenge the honourable member for l'Islet (Mr. Paquet) to try and have the people of Montreal change their mayor.

Labour—Combines Investigation Act, $5,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: Has there been an expenditure under this head during the past year?

Mr. CROTHERS: No.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister is asking for $500 less than last year?

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes.

Labour—Industrial Training and Technical Education, $2,500.

Mr. NESBITT: What part does the department take in industrial training and technical education? What is this money for?

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend will recollect that the Commission of Technical Education was launched from the Labour Department. Its report was completed only last February. Had my hon. friend been in his place before six o'clock he would have heard a letter read that I sent to the Prime Ministers of the various provinces with this report requesting that they should give expression to their views as to its contents and recommendations. We may have inquiries made, or may have inquiries to make, and we put in this small sum to meet any expenses that may arise in connection with this matter.

Mr. NESBITT: You have not taken any action on the Commission's report?

Mr. CROTHERS: The commission was appointed only to collect information and submit it to the various provinces, and this we have done. It does not follow that we are not to do any more. As my hon. friend knows, the subject of education is, according to the British North America Act, entirely within the jurisdiction of the provinces. Unless some arrangement can be made with the provinces such as was made by the Minister of Agriculture in the matter of assisting agriculture, there will be nothing done. The commission recommended, as my hon. friend knows, that we should supply the provinces with $3,500,000 a year. But we thought that other matters were more immediately pressing and made a first demand upon the treasury and that we were not justified in making such an expenditure now.

Labour—Inspection of railway construction, etc., $10,000.

Mr. CARROLL: How is this money to be expended?

Mr. CROTHERS: Up to a few years ago the Labour Department did not undertake to do any work of this kind; but complaints came to us from the construction camps on the Grand Trunk Pacific and other railways that sanitary and hospital provisions were not being carefully looked after. We undertook an inspection. One of the fair-wage officers of my department made two trips from Edmonton to Prince Rupert. On the first trip, he found things in a horrible condition. By reason of his inspection and the action he took on it the principal complaints were remedied within two or three weeks after his report was made. He has been over that whole line a second time. We have inspected the construction camps on the other railways of Canada, and we expect to expend this sum, or a portion of it in the same way. We cannot know in advance how much we shall be required to spend. That will depend on the complaints that come in.

Mr. MACDONALD: Who are the people employed in this work?

Mr. CROTHERS: The fair-wage officers. That is one of the reasons why we found it expedient to appoint more of them. There were only two when we came into office, and there are five now.

Mr. NESBITT: I understand that the fair-wage officers are employed to go round the various public works to see that fair wages are being paid.

Mr. CROTHERS: That is part of their work. The principal work they did originally was to fix fair wages, according to the current rates being paid in the district, on any public work that might be going on. If a public building, for instance, is to be put up by the Public Works Department, they send a request for us to make a schedule giving minimum rates of wages that should be paid to the various trades, such as stone-cutters, bricklayers, carpenters and plumbers, that are to be engaged in the construction. One of the fair-wage officers goes to the district where the work is to be carried on and ascertains what the current rate of wages is and what are the hours of labour for similar work in that district. He then makes a report. Those who are to tender on the job see exactly what they will have to pay the different craftsmen in the execution of their work. These officers do not go about inspecting these works unless complaint is made. But if complaint is made, for instance, against a contractor on the Welland canal or the contractors for public buildings, that they are not paying the wages, the fair-wage officer is sent to inquire into the circumstances and report, and we here try to see to it that the contractor pays what he should pay under the schedules contained in the contract. These officers are sent out when a labour dispute arises even between two individuals. They are looking into the wages paid in the manufacture of shells now being supplied to the British Government. Anything of the nature of a dispute between employer and employed of either a private or a public character is investigated by one of these fair-wage officers.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is the total amount of the minister's estimates as compared with last year's?

Mr. CROTHERS: There are total reductions of about $12,800. The amount of money spent in the Labour Department last year was nearly $9,000 less than was expended in 1910-11, the last year of our predecessors.

9 p.m.

Mr. MACDONALD: And the hon. minister proposes still further to economize?

Mr. CROTHERS: I propose to cut it down quite a bit within the present year.

Mr. MACDONALD: It is good to find one minister economizing.

Civil Government—Department of Inland Revenue—salaries, $142,812.50.

Mr. MACDONALD: There is an increase of $13,175. Why the increase?

Mr. BLONDIN: It is due mostly to statutory increases. But there are some new appointments. If hon. members will turn to the details of this estimate at page 18, they will be able to follow my explanation. There is one more officer in the first division, subdivision A. This is due to the appointment of a translator. There is provision for a translator in the Department, but such an officer was not appointed before. Then, there is a new appointment in the second division, subdivision A. This is for the appointment of an analyst required for new laboratories opened in Winnipeg, Vancouver and Halifax. In the Electrical Branch there are to be two employees instead of one. This is to provide for the appointment of an assistant to the Chief Electrical Engineer in Ottawa. In the Weights and Measures Branch, in the lower grade, there are to be two instead of one. This is to provide for an assistant to the chief in Ottawa.

Mr. MACDONALD: There is another increase—second division, subdivision A.

Mr. BLONDIN: I was mistaken. This change in the second division, subdivision A, is to provide for an assistant to the chief. There is a small increase in contingencies also. That is due to an increase in business.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why is an assistant to be appointed to the chief of the Weights and Measures Branch?

Mr. BLONDIN: Both these appointments as assistants to the chiefs of these branches are made that there may be some one to take the place of the chief of the branch when he is absent.

Mr. MACDONALD: Has that need been recognized under the hon. minister's predecessors?

Mr. BLONDIN: I could not say. I rely only on the necessity for the appointment. I understand that this is a long-felt want in the department, and I feel we badly need these appointments.

Mr. NESBITT: We have just learned from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) that he is doing without many things, even to technical training, on account of the stringency of the times. Does not the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue think that by a little effort he could have done without these new appointees? He ought to employ men who do not get sick. No doubt there are a lot of men who could run the branch even if the chief is away for a day or two.

Mr. BLONDIN: I understand this man is sick, and we have to get some one else.

Mr. NESBITT: Who is he?

Mr. BLONDIN: Mr. Way. Hon. gentlemen must not forget that this is a department of collection, and I believe it is good economy to have a proper organization to collect the money and manage the department.

Mr. NESBITT: Does the Weights and Measures branch collect as much money as it pays out?

Mr. BLONDIN: No. That is a branch more for the protection of the public.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is it for the same reason you are putting in an assistant in the Electrical branch?

Mr. BLONDIN: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD: Have both these men taken ill at the same time?

Mr. BLONDIN: The chief electrical engineer is not ill, but his duties often call him away from the office here, and we need somebody to take his place when he is away.

Mr. MACDONALD: The Minister of Labour, whose estimates we have just finished, congratulated himself on the fact that he was going to administer his department at a saving of something like $12,800. My hon. friend (Mr. Blondin) has just assumed control of his department, and he proposes to start out with an increased expenditure. I do not know where he will land in a year or two, if the fates permit him to retain his office.

For what the Minister of Finance thinks will be a bad year my hon. friend is certainly starting off at a pretty fast clip, and I think he should explain why he is running into this unnecessary expenditure. These officials who have occupied their positions for a number of years under different ministers have never asked for assistants before, and I think my hon. friend is starting at the wrong end in appointing new assistants now. The Minister of Finance has intimated to the Minister of Labour that, although technical education and the interests of labour throughout the country are very important, he must practise economy in his department owing to the present condition; and yet the Minister of Finance permits my hon friend to appoint half a dozen extra assistants to sit in the office when the head man is a little unwell or wants to go out for a while. I am afraid the Minister of Finance is disposed to be too generous with his new colleague from Quebec. If these new assistants are really needed, I do not see why the gentleman who is now gracefully occupying the position of Railway Commissioner was allowed by the Minister of Finance to struggle along without this extra help. What a state of mind that gentleman must have been in when on going to his office in the morning he found that the chief of the electrical branch, we will say, was not feeling very well, but could not get away because there was no one to relieve him. In these times, when one looks at his purse twice before spending money, I think the Minister of Finance should admonish his new colleague to practise economy, and warn him against increasing his expenditures in this spendthrift fashion.

Mr. BLONDIN: We are making only two new appointments.

Mr. MACDONALD: Six.

Mr. BLONDIN: Not as assistants to the chief. My officers inform me these men have been badly needed for a long time.

[Mr. Blondin.]

Mr. MACDONALD: Mr. Nantel got along without them.

Mr. MARCIL: Has the translator mentioned here been appointed?

Mr. BLONDIN: Not yet.

Mr. MARCIL: I was amazed when a messenger brought into my office this morning copies of the Auditor General's Report. There were three volumes in English for 1914, but only one volume in French, and that was for 1913. As the minister is asking for a translator, I think he might explain why only one volume for 1913 is out.

Mr. BLONDIN: That would concern the general staff of blue-book translators. I regret I have not with me Mr. Desaulniers' report, but if I remember rightly the translating staff lost four of its members by death last year, and their places were not filled for months and months. When these new men have had a little experience, things will get in better shape, and no doubt they will catch up with the work. When Mr. Desaulniers took charge of the translating staff, there was a great deal of work on hand to be done, and that accounts for the delay in getting out the French reports.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the minister have the translation done in his own department?

Mr. BLONDIN: In the past the translation has been done outside, but it is our intention to have a translator in the department to translate purely departmental affairs. The blue-books of course are translated by the blue-book translation staff.

Mr. MARCIL: The practice of the departments varies. I understand that there is a translator in the Department of Agriculture, in the Post Office Department, and in the Department of Trade and Commerce. Only last week we appointed four translators for what is called the House branch. Personally, I think the proper way is to have the translation done in the department. From what I have said about the Auditor General's Report the House will see under what a serious disadvantage the French population labours. Only one volume of the Auditor General's Report for 1913 has yet appeared in French, and yet we have translators for Hansard, translators for the Law Branch, translators for the House, and translators in the various departments. At present we have on the pay-list about 50 translators, whose salaries range from $1,500 to $2,000. We probably spend about $100,000 on translation alone. My hon. friend will see how useless it would be to send out one volume of the Auditor General's Report for 1913 in French, when he could send the whole report for 1914 in English. I think the minister is taking the proper step in appointing a translator to his own department. I must congratulate the Postmaster General upon the fact that the French report of his department was out ten days after the English report was published. There is some sense in that. The Marine Department, although short in one section, if I remember correctly, was only a few months behind with its French report. I do not know who is to blame for the delay in translating the Auditor General's Report. The correspondence at the beginning is the only thing that would have to be translated, for the rest is made up of names and figures. But certainly there has been omission somewhere. Can the minister tell us whether each department is to have a translator hereafter? That system has this advantage: Translators in the department could go ahead with the manuscript, whereas when the translators are clubbed together they have to wait for the whole bound volume before they can start work, and they are bound to be behind time.

Mr. BLONDIN: I do not think it was the intention of the Government when they appointed translators to have one in each department translating blue-books. I understand that that is the work of the blue-book translation staff. This question of translators is a most interesting one, and I hope we shall have an opportunity of discussing it more fully later on, when I shall have on hand a report of the work done in the last two years.

Mr. NESBITT: My hon. friend said just now that he was increasing his clerical staff because the duties were heavier, but if my memory serves me right the Minister of Finance told us that on the eight or nine months previous to the Budget speech the Inland Revenue Department was $200,000 behind the previous year. If that is so, where does the extra work come in?

Mr. W. T. WHITE: I think my hon. friend will find that the Inland Revenue returns will increase, and are increasing.

Mr. MACDONALD: From weights and measures or whisky? It is not in the weights and measures that he wants the extra men; it is at the whisky end of the department.

Mr. BLONDIN: The Department of Weights and Measures has to be completely reorganized.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why?

Mr. BLONDIN: Because it is not giving the satisfaction that the public has a right to expect.

Mr. MACDONALD: We have heard nothing of this.

Mr. BLONDIN: I am a new minister in the department and I have to rely upon the reports of my officers.

Mr. MACDONALD: I have been looking through the book to find one or two things. Take the Minister of Militia and Defence; he is very much in the limelight, has been for some months and probably will be for some time longer unless something happens. One cannot tell what may happen. That hon. gentleman, with all the responsibilities that have been put upon him and his department, actually comes before Parliament and says that he is prepared to run his department for $5,000 less than last year. The Minister of Railways and Canals has a very important department with vast interests to preside over. The Finance Minister is optimistic in regard to the amount of whisky that is going to be consumed. I would be rather inclined to take the other view. With Russia dispensing with vodka and the temperance movement spreading probably owing to the war, I think there is going to be less whisky consumed since the duty has gone up.

Mr. W. T. WHITE: I think my hon. friend's opinion on that subject is very much better than my own. I bow to his superior judgment.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am very glad to find the Minister of Finance is willing to give some one else the right to express an opinion that is perhaps better than his own.

Mr. WHITE: I defer to an expert.

Mr. MACDONALD: That does not affect the point of my argument. I was coming to the Department of Railways and Canals. The Intercolonial, I understand, is showing a surplus. In addition to his running the Intercolonial railway, my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals has very great and important interests from one end of the Dominion to the other under his charge. Yet he says that he is willing to struggle along this year with only $812.50 more than he had last year. We find that our versatile and interesting friend the Minister of Public Works, who is supposed to be a gentleman who spends very freely in his department, only wants $8,000 more this year to run his department than he had last year. Our distinguished friend, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is not here, has been planning great things for the trade of Canada. Not only are we having a propaganda throughout the country on behalf of the slogan "Made in Canada" but we are told on all sides that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has said that now is the time, foreign nations being engaged in war, for Canada to increase her export trade. With all these added duties and undertakings of the Department of Trade and Commerce, all that the minister asks Parliament to give him more than he had last year is $5,900. Perhaps there may be an explanation on account of the increased vote for the naval service, but the Minister of Marine and Fisheries says that he is willing to try and run his department for $51,000 less than he had last year. When you go through all these departments you find that my hon. friend (Mr. Blondin), who occupied the office of deputy speaker for a year or two until his predecessor in the department was translated to a happier sphere, comes in and says that everything is out of joint in the department, that his department has not been run right and that he has to reorganize the Weights and Measures Department. In this year of grace when everybody else is economizing, when everybody else must economize, my hon. friend comes before Parliament and says: I want $15,000 more to run my department. He has put in six additional officials and the average cost of each is $2,196. The minister should give some very much better explanation than he has given as to why he should have that unusual increase when administering the affairs of his department in the first year of his incumbency. He is hardly in his seat squarely yet and he is rushing in with this extraordinary expenditure in this unique and difficult year. The minister should take up each one of these items of increase and tell us what the duties of the positions are, how they are fulfilled, the necessity of putting these men on and who they are.

Mr. BLONDIN: My hon. friend is right when he says that there is an increase of $13,175 in my department, but he is wrong when he says that that increase is due to new appointments. Most of this sum is due to statutory increases.

[Mr. Macdonald.]

Mr. McCRANEY: How much is due to statutory increases?

Mr. BLONDIN: There are five or six new appointments.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is new appointments?

Mr. BLONDIN: That is new appointments—the balance is all due to statutory increases.

Mr. MACDONALD: Take the first one in the Department of Inland Revenue.

Mr. BLONDIN: There is one at $2,800.

Mr. MACDONALD: You are putting a man into the department at $2,800. Why do you need him?

Mr. BLONDIN: This is a promotion, I am informed, from the second division.

Mr. MACDONALD: You put somebody else in the second division? Why do you promote him? What is he going to do?

Mr. BLONDIN: This is a promotion by order in council, but let us proceed. My hon. friend will not make any reproach to me for the appointment of a translator?

Mr. MACDONALD: I am speaking of this additional officer to whom you give $2,800. I want to know what his duties are and what his name is.

Mr. BLONDIN: That man was in the $2,800 class. This is simply a promotion. I understand there is no change in his salary.

Mr. MACDONALD: You put somebody else in his place?

Mr. BLONDIN: I lack the information with respect to this man, but if my hon. friend will permit me to proceed I will supply the information later on.

Mr. MACDONALD: This man has a pretty big salary and we want to know what he is going to do for it.

Mr. BLONDIN: This man is getting $2,800 now.

Mr. MACDONALD: What do you give the man that takes his place?

Mr. BLONDIN: The other man starts at $2,100. He was in the department before, so that the increase is simply a promotion.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is the name of this $2,800 man?

Mr. BLONDIN: Mr. Doyon.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is he going to do?

Mr. BLONDIN: He is in the statistical branch.

Mr. MACDONALD: We will pass that one; we have not got much information about him; who is the next one?

Mr. BLONDIN: The next one is the translator.

Mr. MARCIL: Has he been appointed?

Mr. BLONDIN: No.

Mr. MARCIL: Will he be appointed by the minister or by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. BLONDIN: I hope he will be appointed by the minister.

Mr. MARCIL: Will there be an age limit fixed in the case of this new translator?

Mr. BLONDIN: It is technical work, and I have always contended that there should not be an age limit.

Mr. MARCIL: But an age limit was fixed when the translators were appointed in the House of Commons.

Mr. BLONDIN: That is another question.

Mr. PROULX: Why should there be any difference made; it is the same class of work?

Mr. BLONDIN: It is not in my department and I cannot discuss matters pertaining to the House of Commons staff.

Mr. PROULX: Last year there was a translator appointed by the House and the Civil Service Commission fixed an age limit; why should not the same thing be done in this case?

Mr. BLONDIN: I would be the last man in the House of Commons to take up the defence of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. WILLIAM CHISHOLM: There is an increased expenditure in this department and we should not allow the vote to pass without recording our protest. Notwithstanding the falling off in business there seems to be no attempt made at economy in this department, although some of the other departments have made a pretence at it. At a time when the poor people of the country have to pay extra for every drop of patent medicine they buy, when a poor country-woman cannot post a postcard without having to pay extra postage, when there are increased duties on boots and shoes and everything else, and when business is going to the dogs generally, one would think that the Minister of Inland Revenue would show some evidence of a desire to economize. The minister told us that some of this was represented by statutory increases of salaries to the officials, and when a man gets a statutory increase it is evidence of his ability to do his work satisfactorily, and there ought not to be any necessity for increasing the number of employees. It is true that the deputy minister of this department was a well-known lawyer in the city, without any qualification for a position in a department of this kind, and being appointed, and enjoying a high salary, I suppose all the others in the department felt that they having some knowledge of the business of the department should get more pay. Another explanation may be that the ministers wanted to be kind to their new colleague in the Department of Inland Revenue, and there may have been reasons why they did not venture to suggest any interference with him, he being a man to be reckoned with. Perhaps the Minister of Finance and others of the ministers were afraid to discipline the new Minister of Inland Revenue, as he should have been disciplined, and hence they allowed him to increase the expenditure of his department. It might be all right if the country could afford it and if the Government were not piling on the taxes and bleeding the poor people white. If ever there was a time for economy surely it is now. Has the Minister of Inland Revenue increased his outside staff such as the preventive officers? If the minister has found that he has a preventive officer looking after the manufacture of illicit whisky in a district where illicit whisky has not been made for the last quarter of a century, is he still keeping that officer employed so as to give him some little reward for political services? There was a preventive officer in my country who had not instituted a prosecution for eight or nine years, and when the Conservatives came to power, there being nothing for him to do, they decided to dispense with his services. It was discovered that for the first few years he held office he had reported on two prosecutions and for the next nine years there was nothing to be done, and so the office was an honorary one, but the officer being an old man they didn't discharge him. But he was finally discharged, and immediately after the change of government the then Minister of Inland Revenue employed another man, notwithstanding that there was a report to the department that the services of such an officer were not required. In order to help him they made this new appointee food inspector and gave him $350 a year, but there was no food for him to inspect. I refer to an officer, in my own county, and I ask the minister now if there have been any prosecutions in that county since this officer was appointed. I do not believe that officer ever wrote a report because I know he has no duty to discharge. As a matter of fact, did this officer ever make a report to the minister?

Mr. BLONDIN: What is his name?

Mr. CHISHOLM: Moses Delorey. He is preventive officer and food inspector and he lives in a part of the county where there is no food exposed for sale. If he lived in a town or visited a town, there might be some reason for his going to the grocery stores and inspecting the food, but as a matter of fact he never did anything and never had anything to do. I am not saying anything against him personally because he is all right as a citizen of the community, and he is a loyal Conservative and he ought to have got a reward, but the Government ought to have rewarded him without doing anything so brazen as they have done and outraging public opinion and public morality. The people in that district, when they go to town have to pay an extra fare on the train; and they have to pay extra for everything they buy when they get to town, and probably they receive nothing more for the produce they have to sell, and in view of these conditions these supernumerary and unnecessary offices ought to be abolished.

I wish to refer to a matter that has not direct reference to this department. Some eight or nine immigration officers who were appointed for the province of Nova Scotia were given a three months' trip to the Old Country. Their salaries were $700 or $800 or $900. Separately the amounts are small, but collectively they are large. These agents have nothing to do. The one appointed for my county was a discharged railway sectionman. For some reason or another it was not convenient to replace him, and so he was made an immigration agent. There is on file in the department a report costing the country $800 or $900, and all the information contained in it is that up in the highlands of Scotland, whence this man's forefathers came, he met people who spoke Gaelic. We could get that information without paying $800 or $900 and without sending a man all the way to the Old Country. The other officers who were appointed were men of the same class. With some two exceptions, they were illiterate and did not possess sufficient education to deliver public lectures describing the country whence they had come. I have nothing to say against them personally, but they were not fit for a position of that nature. They were appointed to these positions simply and solely as a reward for political service. My hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue has a number of the same class of men in his department. When he is trying to justify the increases in the inside service, he will see the necessity of lopping off these officials to whom I refer, who are neither ornamental nor useful.

Mr. BLONDIN: I will give my best attention to the remarks of my hon. friend concerning Mr. Moses Delorey. The department has to have officers even in places where there is not much work to do, in order to prevent infractions of the law. The case of my hon. friend, of course, may be quite different.

Mr. WM. CHISHOLM: There is a report on file showing that this man's predecessor had nothing at all to do, and that the office could be abolished. In the face of that report my hon. friend is appointing another man and making him food inspector as well.

Mr. BLONDIN: My hon. friend will admit that I am not responsible for his appointment as food inspector. I will inquire into the matter. The salaries in cases such as the one my hon. friend has mentioned are not much over $100 or at most $200. The reason that my hon. friend is giving, namely, the extra tax on the people, to induce me to be more economical in the management of my department, is the same reason which imposes more work upon my officers than they had in the past, as I am sure my hon. friend will realize.

Mr. NESBITT: The Tilbury Gas Company supplies gas to many places in my section, and I am sure the minister has received a number of communications complaining that the gas is not purified. The town of Brantford, I understand, is taking the matter up with my hon. friend. Last year Mr. Nantel, my hon. friend's predecessor, sent a man to that district to inspect the gas and to report. He reported that the gas contained sulphur, and that it was not fit to be supplied to the people without being purified. The company made arrangements with the various corporations to purify the gas; but when it came to operating and it had got the gas into the people's houses for cooking, in some cases for lighting and in other cases for heating, the company immediately turned on the unpurified gas. I wrote to my hon. friend since he came into the department, pointing out that in the case of Woodstock, as soon as the cold weather started and an additional amount of gas was required, the company turned on the unpurified gas, which was dangerous to the health of the people. We were placed in a peculiar position. We had an agreement with the company that they were to supply purified gas; but if we enforced the agreement and made them cut off the gas, the consequence would be that the people would have nothing with which to cook and some of them nothing with which to heat their houses. We were between the devil and the deep sea, and we had therefore to take the unpurified gas. I know a great deal about the matter, as I had to suffer from the effects of this unpurified gas. The department should be able to cancel the company's right to operate if it does not carry out its agreement, as I understand the law gives the department the right to force the company to supply purified gas. Hon. members could not stand the unpurified gas in this chamber for half an hour. Their heads would ache so much that they could not see, and unpurified gas is certainly not fit for use in houses. Has the minister taken any steps to force this company to supply purified gas to the various municipalities?

Mr. BLONDIN: I have received several letters in regard to the matter and some delegations have come to Ottawa. I have taken a great deal of interest in the question. My attention, however, was drawn to the fact that the particular section of the British North America Act mentioned as defining the scope of the powers of the Federal Government referred only to weights and measures, apparently leaving the quality of the gas to be dealt with by the provinces. My officers informed me that section 31 of the Gas Inspection Act, relating to the quality and purity of gas, was contested by some eminent lawyers as being beyond the powers of the federal authority. Therefore, I thought it best to refer the matter to the Department of Justice for its opinion as to the powers of my department, and I am expecting to receive their report at an early date.

Mr. NESBITT: Will you let me see the report when you receive it?

Mr. BLONDIN: Yes.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: Are there any preventive officers in the county of Inverness at present?

Mr. BLONDIN: I do not see that there is any.

Mr. CHISHOLM: The hon. minister in replying to the hon. member for Antigonish justified the appointment of Mr. Delorey on the ground that his duty was to prevent the manufacture of whisky. And that is a good reason. There was a similar officer in Inverness, Mr. McDonald, who was dismissed, because evidently, the minister did not see very much for him to do. But if he will look up the history of his department he will find that, having regard to the past history of Antigonish and of Inverness, there will be more need for an officer in Inverness.

Mr. CROTHERS: Because they made whisky there?

Mr. CHISHOLM: They used to charge them with making some liquor there. I do not think they do it now. But if an officer were appointed it would make sure that they did not fall into the sins of former days. The hon. minister's predecessor dismissed Mr. McDonald because there was nothing for him to do, and appointed the man in Antigonish; and there is nothing for him to do. The same reason that would justify the appointment in Antigonish would justify an appointment in Inverness. The man who was dismissed was a supporter of mine. But, as I am a believer in a measure that "To the victors belong the spoils" there may have been some justification for their action. But I understand that the difficulty about the appointment is that there are too many men who think that they ought to be appointed. I will try to influence my opponents to agree upon one man, and then I will suggest that he be appointed. Of course, he will be recommended by my defeated opponent, and then I hope he will be appointed.

Mr. MACDONALD: With nothing to do.

Mr. CHISHOLM: No, nothing to do, but that does not make any difference.

Mr. BOULAY: The dismissal may have been with a view to saving money, as in my own county. When we came into power in 1911, there was one preventive officer in Rimouski who had been appointed by the Liberals about ten years before, to do nothing. And when we came into power we found by the books that this man had actually been dismissed by the Liberal Government before they left office. They found that this man was doing so much nothing that they dismissed him themselves. We did not replace him because there was nothing for such an officer to do. My hon. friend from Antigonish should not be too much scandalized over the case he has referred to. If it is bad to appoint a man to do nothing, it must have been bad for his friends to appoint this man to do nothing and keep him in office for ten years.

Mr. MACDONALD: If the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Boulay) did not get a man appointed in the Inland Revenue, he has been getting them appointed in the Railways and Canals Department all along the line from Moncton to Rivière du Loup. He is regarded with envy and admiration by other public men of that region, and with suspicion by his colleagues here because he is known as the greatest patronage hunter in the province of Quebec. We find the work of his hand as far down as Westmorland, and in western New Brunswick along the borders of the United States. His speech this evening is a real case of Satan rebuking sin. The minister stopped in his explanation at the translator. I wish he would go on with his explanation with regard to these other officers.

Mr. BLONDIN: In the Second Division, Subdivision A, there is an additional officer. This is a new analyst required for the new laboratories opened in Winnipeg, Vancouver, and Halifax.

Mr. MACDONALD: You are giving him $1,600. Has he been appointed?

Mr BLONDIN: This is to provide for his appointment.

Mr. MACDONALD: You have no additions to the staff in the Methylated Spirits branch. You get along there without additional men?

Mr. BLONDIN: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD: In the Electrical branch, you need some assistance. Why?

Mr. BLONDIN: Because the chief must often be away on official duties.

Mr. MACDONALD: You have two chiefs, one man in the First Division of Subdivision A, to whom you pay $3,400, and another in the same division and subdivision to whom you pay $2,700.

[Mr. Boulay.]

Mr. BLONDIN: My deputy tells me that there must be an error in the account there. It ought to be $2,100. I will ask that this item stand for further explanation.

Mr. MACDONALD: I do not think the minister has given us a very lucid explanation as to why he is going to spend this extra $15,000.

Mr. WILLIAM CHISHOLM: I would ask the minister to lay on the table of the House a report showing what Moses Delorey has done since he was appointed. I should like him to say also whether he is able to give any reasons for believing that there will not be anything for this gentleman to do in the future. If he cannot, I presume he will agree that any officials who are under similar circumstances should be dispensed with, in the interests of the country.

Mr. BLONDIN: I will have much pleasure in laying a report on the table of the House.

Mr. MACDONALD: We are willing to let this item pass if the minister, when he comes to deal with the outside branch, will give us an explanation with regard to the $2,700 to which I have referred.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the scope of the duties of the inspectors of weights and measures?

Mr. BLONDIN: It is their duty to inspect and certify all scales in their district upon the request of any interested party and according to the regulations of the department. As scales are sold they are certified and stamped by officers of the department.

Mr. MARCIL: Measures as well as scales?

Mr. BLONDIN: Yes.

Mr. LAW: How often are inspections of scales made?

Mr. BLONDIN: The inspectors must make an inspection in the same place every two years.

Mr. MARCIL: Is there any double system of measures in use at the present time: for instance, the imperial gallon and the old-style gallon? When buying maple syrup in Montreal recently, I found that there was a difference of 40 cents between the prices of the different measures; one is a larger gallon than the other.

Mr. BLONDIN: The imperial gallon is the only gallon measure recognized in this country.

Mr. MARCIL: Is it an infraction of the law to use the old measure?

Mr. BLONDIN: Yes.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Inspectors of weights charge a fee for inspection. What is the system of checking the money received for inspections; how is it known that the money is properly accounted for?

Mr. BLONDIN: When the officer makes an inspection of a scale he has to place a stamp on the machine; this stamp comes from the department at Ottawa.

Mr. OLIVER: At one time I was under the impression that the inspectors of weights and measures were on duty for the protection of the public, but that appears to be a misapprehension. As I understand their duty—what the minister has said confirms this, and I think the public should know it—it is the protection of the dealer who owns the weight and measure, and not the protection of the public. The inspection is to guarantee that the dealer is not using a weight that is too heavy or a measure that is too large; it is no guarantee to the public that they are getting a full measure or a full weight. The point I want to make is that the inspector does not make his inspection in such ways or at such times as to give the public any assurance of protection. A dealer has a scale which is inspected and stamped by the inspector. That scale is in evidence when the inspector is there, and some other scale is in use when he is not there. I am not criticising the administration of my hon. friend; I am merely making the general criticism that so far as I am aware, the Department of Inland Revenue does not take steps, through the operations of their weights and measures officials, to protect the public interests and to see that honest weights are given and honest measures used.

Mr. BLONDIN: I am afraid I did not make myself clear in answering the question of the hon. gentleman. Every merchant is compelled by law to have his 10 p.m. scale inspected at least every two years, but the inspectors are on duty all the time, looking over the scales that have been inspected, seeing that no other scales are used, and that no method is adopted whereby the merchant or anybody else may rob the public.

Mr. M. MARTIN (Montreal, St. Mary's): (Translation): Mr. Chairman, in Montreal complaints are made not only as regards the inspection of scales, but as regards the inspection of measures, such as pints, quarts, etc. The public believe that they are not sufficiently protected in that respect, and I would like the honourable gentleman to inform the House as to the measures taken towards meeting such complaints.

Mr. BLONDIN: The officers of the Department are at all times available to the public free of charge. They play as it were the part of detectives and make every inquiry in that connection. It is their duty to give their services for the protection of the public.

Mr. MARTIN: In that case, the minister might give still stricter orders.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: What is the standing of D. Campbell, an official of the weights and measures branch at Strathlorne? Is he an assistant, or the chief officer?

Mr. BLONDIN: I have not the information here.

Mr. CHISHOLM: To begin with, let me tell the minister that I have a good deal of confidence in his sense of honesty and fairness. I am going to make one request of him. I am going to ask him to muzzle this man Daniel Campbell. He is the most active and I would say the most unscrupulous politician in the county of Inverness—and we have some of them there. It is seldom I have been heard to find fault in this House with any of my opponents in Inverness county, and I would not do so in this case if this man were not a paid officer of the Government. His business makes it necessary for him to go and see men of all shades of politics. There is not a convention, or a meeting or assemblage of Conservatives in the county of Inverness but he must be there and be head and tail of everything. He would have a perfect right to do that if he were not a paid officer of this Government, but if he is, I do not think it is fair or right. I will go further and say that I would not be very confident that a man would properly discharge his duties who is so influenced as this man is. He is a good officer, I believe, and does his duty all right when his political leanings do not carry him away. It is nothing to him to go to a meeting of the municipal council and stay there for a week at a time, when I am sure he has something else to do. At all events, he is paid for doing something else, and he attends the council for nothing else than to further the political interests of his party. I ask the minister to take these few remarks to heart and correct this man, who is the only man in the county of Inverness that I have a word to say against.

Mr. BLONDIN: I will certainly see that this man keeps quiet.

Mr. M. MARTIN (Montreal, St. Mary's): (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I wish to draw the attention of the Honourable Minister of Inland Revenue to what is going on in the country in regard to cut tobacco. I may state that the Department is losing heavily as a result of frauds committed, I am satisfied, at its expense. Many farmers cut their tobacco by passing it through a straw-cutter, without holding any license from the department. That is being done constantly, and more especially during snowstorms or bad weather, when such farmers shut themselves up in their barns and proceed to cut their tobacco. That is unfair competition on their part, and the Government is made to lose heavily thereby. I think that the department should have watchful inspectors, so as to put an end to such frauds.

Mr. BLONDIN: (Translation): In answer to the honourable gentleman, I may say that our officers, though numerous, are kept busy going around and enforcing the law in that respect. The department is aware that frauds are being committed, detrimental to the revenue. Rigid measures have been taken to prevent and put a stop to such abuses. I thank the honourable member and shall be glad if he will suggest to the department any means that he may deem advisable for the better enforcement of the Act.

Mr. M. MARTIN (Translation): I would like to point out to the honourable gentleman that, in the same way that there are dishonest farmers, there are unscrupulous grocers who sell cut tobacco in bags labelled thus: "Black Tea," "Green Tea," "Japan Tea," etc.

Mr. BLONDIN: I shall be glad if the honourable gentleman will forward to the officers of the Inland Revenue Department, in Montreal, any information in his possession. They have strict orders for the enforcement of the Act.

Mr. OLIVER: Referring once more to the inspection of weights and measures, I am to understand that it is a part of the duty of the officer, and the responsibility of the department, to protect the public. But I have not been given to understand that by inspectors of weights and measures whom I have met. They have told me that they were purely officials; that is to say, that they were simply to test the accuracy of the weight or the measure and that beyond that they did not have any responsibility for what I have called the protection of the public. That might be considered to be in the interest of the dealer rather than of the buyer. Now if it is the duty of the inspector to protect the public, I suggest to the minister that he pass the word to his inspectors all along the line to use greater diligence on that side of their duties than they have hitherto done; and that they recognize that they have a responsibility in the protection of the public in the actual use of those weights and measures, and that they take due means to discover—and in some cases it would not require very much effort—whether short measures or light weight was being given to the public.

Mr. EDWARDS: Have not the inspectors power to confiscate inaccurate scales and measures?

Mr. OLIVER: Oh, yes.

Mr. EDWARDS: It seems to me then, they have the power which the hon. gentleman thinks they lack. While it may be true that inspectors of weights and measures are supposed to protect the man who owns the scale, it is undoubtedly true that they make their inspections at unexpected times. They are liable to drop in at any moment to inspect the scales, and I would take that as an indication that inspectors are intended to protect the general public from improper weights and measures. I wish to call the minister's attention to one thing which I think worthy of his consideration. At the time the investigation was held at Montreal, in regard to the weighing of cheese, I visited that city and went over one of the factories where scales are manufactured. They told me that they manufactured a scale which was in general demand in the cheese factories throughout eastern Ontario and western Quebec, and they demonstrated to me that that particular kind of scale could not be relied on for any length of time. It might be tested to-day and prove correct, but after being in use for only a short time the scale would become defective.

I may say that there was a scale generally called for by the trade because it sold at a smaller price than a better scale. On account of that defective scale being in pretty general use in cheese factories throughout eastern Ontario and western Quebec, there were discrepancies in the weights as given by the factories and the weights as recorded in Montreal, this leading to disputes and possibly a good deal of sore feeling because each party thought that his weight was right. The factory no doubt thought that they were weighing their stuff properly and the people in Montreal claimed differently. Is not the advisability of getting out a standard scale in cheese factories, a scale which will stand the test of time and use, worthy of the consideration of the Minister? I would, in addition to that, express the view that the scales in cheese factories in particular should be inspected more frequently than they are. They should be inspected not merely once but twice or three times in a season. That would make for a better understanding between the producer of the cheese and the big exporter in Montreal and not only that but it would have a tendency to give us a better name in the English markets if our cheese went over there without any reflection being cast upon the people as to their giving full weight. I would like the minister to give his atttention to these suggestions.

Mr. BLONDIN: I shall certainly take note of the remarks of my hon. friend and give them consideration.

Mr. BOYER (Translation): Mr. Chairman, as regards the inspection of scales in cheese factories, I may point out to the hon. gentleman that we have, in the province of Quebec, inspectors appointed specially by the provincial Department of Agriculture and under the control of the Dairymen's Association, whose duty it is to inspect at frequent intervals cheese factories and creameries. If only we were in a position to enable such inspectors to inspect scales, a work which is now under the control of the hon. gentleman, that department would find such inspectors to be very capable officers whose services would be precious to the public. The Minister of Agriculture was favourable to such a proposal, and the dairy industry in our province would be largely benefited by the granting of such powers to the aforesaid inspectors. Such inspection of the scales would entail no extra expense on the Government and would prove entirely satisfactory to the public.

Mr. BLONDIN (Translation): My attention has already been drawn to the matter, and it is being considered. I am confident that we shall be able to devise a means of inspecting scales in cheese factories and creameries that will be entirely satisfactory to the public.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What does the department do when a man is discovered using a defective scale and defrauding the public? Is there any action taken by the department to punish him or prosecute him?

Mr. BLONDIN: The scale is confiscated and the party is subjected to a fine and the payment of the costs of the prosecutions.

Mr. BOYER (Translation): Before passing on to another matter, the hon. gentleman will allow me to say that last year—I mean during the session preceding that held in August—we amended the Act so as to protect maple syrup and sugar makers against adulteration of the products they sell. That enactment affords ample protection to producers, but if there be no inspection made, such protection is quite inadequate. For instance, the Act prohibits the use of labels which falsely state that such products are either maple sugar or maple syrup. However, it has been ascertained in the meantime that in many instances adulterated goods are sold labelled as maple syrup or maple sugar. The Co-operative Association of Maple Sugar Producers sent to the department a resolution stating the facts and protesting against what was going on. I have been requested to meet the officers of that association in the near future, and I should be glad if the hon. gentleman would kindly take me into his confidence and enable me to enlighten these people as to his intentions in that regard. Has he made up his mind to appoint inspectors for the purpose of ascertaining how the Act works? The enactment in itself is a good one, and his predecessor's intentions were excellent; but its enforcement should be looked after by inspectors. While there is no inspection, abuses persist, and the farmer is left without any protection whatever. I would like to know whether the hon. gentleman's intention is to fully apply the law?

Mr. BLONDIN (Translation): The matter is now under consideration; the department will likely introduce an amendment to the Act so as to increase its efficiency, and I trust the hon. gentleman will be ready to assist me when it comes to increasing the number of inspectors.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I understand that in cases where defective scales are discovered they are confiscated and the users are fined. Does the minister know if any fines are remitted or not imposed?

Mr. BLONDIN: No, I do not.

Mr. HUGHES: In no case is that done?

Mr. BLONDIN: I am informed that it might happen that a man has received a scale which was not correct and used it in good faith. Then the scale is confiscated, but no fine is imposed, or if imposed, is remitted.

Mr. HUGHES: If the minister will look at the records he will find that excuses which were not valid were put in certain cases and the fines remitted, and that influence had something to do with the remission of the fine.

Civil Government—Post Office Department, $932,710.

Mr. MARCIL: Is there any increase?

Mr. CASGRAIN: There is an increase of $14,000. The statutory increases amount to $27,050. There is a difference in the salaries of clerks who died, left the service, or were promoted, and the salaries of clerks who filled the vacancies, amounting to $25,250, which if you deduct from the $27,050 leaves an increase of $1,800 in the salaries.

Progress reported.

On motion of Hon. W. T. White, the House adjourned at 10.35 p.m.

Monday, March 1, 1915.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill No. 62, respecting the Bank of Alberta.—Mr. Douglas.

Bill No. 63, to incorporate the Catholic Truth Society of Canada.—Mr. Macdonell.

Bill No. 64, respecting a certain patent of the Mills Equipment Company, Limited. —Mr. Northrup.

Bill No. 65, respecting the Toronto Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company.—Mr. T. J. Stewart.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

COMPENSATION TO WORKMEN.

Mr. H. B. MORPHY (North Perth) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 66, to amend the Railway Act. He said:

The purpose of the Bill is to amend paragraph (e) of clause 34 of section 2 of the Railway Act, Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter 37. The Act as it stands includes, under the head of "working expenditure" of railways "(e) all rates, taxes, insurance and compensation for accident or losses." The Bill which I ask leave to introduce extends the language of paragraph (e) to make it read in this way:

[Mr. J. J. Hughes.]

(e) all rates, taxes, insurance and compensation for accident or losses, including any such compensation payable under the provisions of any Act of the Parliament of Canada or of any provincial legislature providing for the payment of compensation to workingmen for injuries or in respect of industrial diseases.

The object of the Bill is to extend to the workingman who is injured the privilege of having his claim come under section 141 of the Railway Act in the same way as rates, taxes, insurance and compensation for accident or losses. It will give the claim of a workman who may suffer accident and loss priority as against a mortgage or bonding deed covering the railway's assets in the same way as rates, taxes and insurance now have a prior claim. This will bring the Railway Act into line with the new legislation of the province of Ontario dealing with compensation to workmen for injuries sustained. It is merely to extend the law as it stands, and it seems to be an amendment that is necessary in the case of a railway company which may be insolvent and unable to pay claims for losses. In such a case the workman's claim will have priority over a mortgage deed the same as the other elements now in the law have priority.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

YUKON PLACER MINING ACT AMENDMENT.

SOLDIERS' MINING RIGHTS.

Hon. W. J. ROCHE (Minister of Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 67, to amend the Yukon Placer Mining Act. He said: An Order in Council was passed on the 28th October by which all those who had enlisted for service in the war had their mining rights protected until six months after the proclamation of peace. Inasmuch as this did not apply to those acquiring rights under the Placer Mining Act in the Yukon, the Commissioner of the Yukon was instructed by the department shortly after the passing of the Order in Council that it was the intention of the department to have the same privileges extended to those who had acquired rights of a similar character in the Yukon under the Placer Mining Act. As the Placer Mining Act could not be amended to this effect by Order in Council, this amendment is introduced.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS.

[Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.]

PORTSMOUTH PENITENTIARY.

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. What quantity of potatoes was produced on the Portsmouth penitentiary farm in each of the years 1912, 1913 and 1914?

2. Were any of such potatoes sold? If so, to whom and at what price?

4. What quantity of pork has been produced at said penitentiary farm during the years 1912, 1913 and 1914?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. In 1911-12, 517 bushels; 1912-13, 500 bushels; 1913-14, 366 bushels.

2. No potatoes were sold in 1912 or 1914. In 1913 the following sales were made, which (with the exception of 1½ bushels) were culls—too small for table use and purchased for seed: W. Holland, 9 bushels; F. Montgomery, 7½ bushels; J. Berrigan, 2 bushels; H. Powell, 4½ bushels; R. McGeein, 3 bushels; W. Tatton, 1 bushel; F. Doyle, 1½ bushels; J. M. Platt, 1½ bushels; Total, 30 bushels at 85c. per bushel.

3. Potatoes were purchased in 1912, 1913, 1914 and 1915, as follows:

4. Fiscal year 1911-12, 43,777 lb; fiscal year 1912-13, 38,233 lb; fiscal year 1913-14, 30,115 lb.

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. When was Mr. Creighton appointed as warden of Portsmouth penitentiary?

2. In what institutions had Mr. Creighton performed the duties of warden previous to his present appointment, and what are the dates of his service in each case?

3. Who is the warden of Prince Albert penitentiary and when was he appointed?

4. What previous experience had he to fit him for the position?

5. On whose recommendation was he appointed?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. August 1, 1914.

2. Kingston penitentiary, June 26, 1913, to August 8, 1913; Alberta penitentiary, December 10, 1913, to April 6, 1914; Kingston penitentiary, July 11, 1914, to August 1, 1914.

3. W. J. Macleod, appointed March 25, 1914.

4. Continuous employment in the penitentiary service since January 1, 1896, in various capacities, clerical, administrative and disciplinary.

5. The Minister of Justice.

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. By whose order or direction would the act of tubbing insane convicts be carried out?

2. Are there any guards or other officials at Portsmouth penitentiary who have assisted in or ordered the tubbing of insane convicts?

3. Was a specially constructed cell prepared for the hosing of convicts at Portsmouth penitentiary?

4. By whose order was said cell specially prepared for that purpose?

5. Have convicts at Portsmouth penitentiary been hosed by Inspector Stewart, Inspector Hughes and Deputy Warden O'Leary?

6. Has hosing and tubbing of convicts been discontinued? If so, when and for what reason?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. Bathing (by use of ordinary bath tubs) is imperative as a sanitary regulation of the prison and is carried out weekly by the officer in charge of the ward as a matter of routine, without special orders from anyone. If the officer neglected the duty, he would be reported by his superior officer to the warden. Except in very rare cases, the convicts comply willingly and appreciate the opportunity. Occasionally, however, a refractory lunatic refuses to comply, in which case the bath is enforced by the officers—due care and precautions being taken to prevent the convict from injuring himself or the officers in charge.

2. The warden is unable to find any one on the staff of the penitentiary who has any knowledge of tubbing having been used except as before described. The following are the statutory declarations of officers who are still on the staff of the prison and who have been, from time to time, in charge of the insane ward:

Dominion of Canada, province of Ontario, county of Frontenac, to wit:

In the matter of the inquiry regarding the alleged "tubbing" of the insane at the insane ward of Kingston penitentiary.

I, Patrick J. Madden, of the city of Kingston, in the county of Frontenac, guard, do solemnly declare that I was in charge of the insane ward from September 3, 1907, to August 31, 1911, and from September 13, 1911, to September 26, 1911.

During that time there were filthy prisoners who refused to bathe. There was a strap placed round the body of the prisoner and two for the hands and one for the feet. This strap was used for the protection of the convict and the officers. These straps were only used for refractory convicts while bathing and for no other purpose. The water used was ordinary bath water.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of "The Canada Evidence Act, 1893."

(Sgd.) P. J. Madden.

Declared before me at the Kingston penitentiary in the county of Frontenac this 23rd day of February, A.D. 1915.

(Sgd.) J. Russell Foster.
A Commissioner in H.C.J.

Dominion of Canada, province of Ontario, county of Frontenac, to wit:

In the matter of the inquiry regarding the alleged "tubbing" of the insane at the insane ward of Kingston Penitentiary.

I, Arthur McConville, of the city of Kingston, in the county of Frontenac, guard, do solemnly declare that I was in charge of the insane ward from July 3, 1911, till September 12, 1911, and from September 27, 1911, till March 30, 1912.

During my time the bath was never used as a punishment. The straps were used on a prisoner who was filthy and refused to bathe voluntarily. There was no violence used toward any prisoner. The straps being used for his protection and ours. The water was luke warm, as used for bathing.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of "The Canada Evidence Act, 1893."

(Sgd.) A. McConville,

Declared before me at the Kingston penitentiary in the county of Frontenac this 23rd day of February, A.D. 1915.

(Sgd.) Chas. F. Smith.
A Commissioner in H.C.J.

Dominion of Canada, province of Ontario, county of Frontenac, to wit:

In the matter of the inquiry regarding the alleged "tubbing" of the insane at the insane ward of Kingston Penitentiary.

I, William Ryan, of the city of Kingston, in the county of Frontenac, guard, do solemnly declare that I was in charge of the asylum from July 1, 1912, to September 8, 1913. That during that time one or two prisoners had to be strapped for the bath. The bath was never used as a punishment—the straps being used for their protection and that of the officers. The water was not too cold for bathing.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of "The Canada Evidence Act, 1893."

(Sgd.) W. Ryan.

Declared before me at the Kingston penitentiary in the county of Frontenac this 23rd day of February, A.D. 1915.

(Sgd.) Chas. F. Smith.

Dominion of Canada, province of Ontario, county of Frontenac, to wit:

In the matter of the inquiry regarding the alleged "tubbing" of the insane at the insane ward, Kingston penitentiary.

I, Charles H. Gray, of the city of Kingston, in the county of Frontenac, guard, do solemnly declare that I was on duty in the insane ward from April 1, 1912, to May 25, 1912.

During that time there was a convict of filthy habits who had to be given a forced bath. Straps consisting of a waistband and two side straps for the hands and one for the feet were used. No unnecessary force was used. The water was tepid, such as used in a bath. This restraint was simply used for his and our protection.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of "The Canada Evidence Act, 1893."

(Sgd.) C. H. Gray.

Declared before me at the Kingston penitentiary in the county of Frontenac this 23rd day of February, A.D. 1915.

(Sgd.) Chas. F. Smith.

Dominion of Canada, province of Ontario, county of Frontenac, to wit:

In the matter of the inquiry regarding the alleged "tubbing" of the insane at the insane ward of Kingston Penitentiary.

I, Robert E. Aiken, of the city of Kingston, in the county of Frontenac, guard, do solemnly declare that I have been in charge of the insane ward since November 11, 1913.

Weekly bathing is compulsory in the ward, and sometimes—three times to my knowledge—one or two have resisted. The straps are placed round the waist and on the hands and feet. The prisoner is then placed in the bath and washed clean. No undue force is used. The water is never cold. Strapping is never used as punishment. The same straps are used when a prisoner refuses to have his hair clipped.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of "The Canada Evidence Act, 1893."

(Sgd.) Robert Aiken.

Declared before me at the Kingston penitentiary in the county of Frontenac this 23rd day of February, A.D. 1915.

(Sgd.) Chas. F. Smith.
A Commissioner in H.C.J. Ontario.

3. A cell in the isolated ward was set apart for the purpose and provided with an exit for water, etc.

4. By Inspector Stewart after an outbreak of several incorrigible criminals, in which several officers were rendered unconscious and dangerously injured.

5. Twelve convicts in Kingston penitentiary have been hosed—seven by Inspector Stewart and five by Deputy Warden O'Leary, when in charge of the prison. This was done under authority of No. 179 of the Penitentiary Regulations, drafted with the concurrence and approval of Sir Oliver Mowat when Minister of Justice and adopted on the recommendation of Hon. David Mills, his successor as Minister of Justice, by the Governor General in Council, on November 26, 1898. This form of punishment for defiant and incorrigible convicts was substituted for the "triangle and the lash" previously authorized.

As regards Inspector Hughes. No. He was never in charge of the penitentiary.

6. The hose has not been used since May 11, 1913.—Since the report of the Investigating Commissioners (April 15, 1914) the regulation authorizing its use has not been acted on, pending final decision as to modification of regulations now under consideration.

COLE HARBOUR WHARF.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Why has the Government not built a public wharf at Cole Harbour, Guysborough county, N.S.?

2. When was the money for the construction of this wharf first voted by Parliament?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Difficulty in obtaining a title to the site on which to construct the wharf.

2. In the fiscal year 1911-12.

NEW GLASGOW MAIL ROUTE.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. Who is the mail contractor for rural mail route No. 3, New Glasgow, Pictou county?

2. What is the amount paid him per annum?

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Danford McDougall.

2. $600 per annum.

CAPTAIN E. FISHER.

* Mr. TURRIFF:

1. Is E. Fisher, registrar of the Supreme and County Courts at Kamloops, B.C., drawing pay from the Militia Department as an officer in the R.M.R?

2. What is his rank?

3. What is the rate of pay per day?

4. How long has he been drawing pay?

5. Is he still under pay by the Militia Department?

6. Is it the intention of the Militia Department to continue Mr. Fisher under pay?

Major General HUGHES:

1. There is a Captain E. Fisher, 102nd Regiment, doing mobilization duties at Kamloops, and drawing pay from the Militia Department. The department has no information regarding his civil employment.

2. Captain Adjutant of the 102nd Regiment.

3. $4.25 per diem.

4. Since August 10, 1914.

5. Yes.

6. Yes, while he is on active service.

MIDDLESEX COUNTY INDIANS.

Mr. ROSS:

1. What salary does Dr. Woods receive as physician for the Indians on Middlesex county reserve?
2. Is he entitled to any fees beyond his regular salary?
3. If so, on what basis?
4. What has he been paid since March 31, 1914?
5. How many Indians were in the reserve in 1910, and how many in 1914?
6. What was the Indian Agent's salary and allowances in 1910?
7. What are the Indian Agent's salary and allowances now?

Mr. ROCHE:

1. $650 per annum.
2. Yes.
3. He is allowed remuneration for special calls at the Mount Elgin Institute to attend pupils other than those belonging to the agency, and for medicines supplied them.
4. $829.50.
5. In 1910, 1,366; in 1914, 1,371.
6. Salary, $600; allowance, $450.
7. Salary, $1,200; no allowances. The Order in Council appointing the agent states that he has to give his whole time to the agency.

BAIE DES CHALEURS RAILWAY.

Mr. MARCIL:

Has any action been taken by the Government on the report of Mr. Plante, Commissioner appointed to report on claims against the Baie des Chaleurs railway, the Atlantic and Lake Superior railway, and the Quebec Oriental railway and what was such action?

Mr. COCHRANE: Report still under consideration.

QUEBEC ORIENTAL RAILWAY.

Mr. MARCIL:

Have any steps been taken since the last session of Parliament for the acquiring of the Quebec Oriental railway and the Atlantic, Quebec and Western railway by lease or purchase, by the Department of Railways and Canals, and what are they?

Mr. COCHRANE: No.

ATLANTIC AND LAKE SUPERIOR RAILWAY.

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Has the Government paid the balance remaining unpaid of the subsidy for the last twenty miles of the Atlantic and Lake Superior railway, from Caplin to Paspebiac?
2. If so, to whom has the amount been paid, what was the amount, when was the payment made, and on whose recommendation?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. $18,449.17 of a balance of $20,765.98 has been paid.

[Mr. Sam. Hughes.]

2. C. R. Scoles; $18,449.17; 6th July, 1914; on the recommendation of the Financial Comptroller.

ST. ROMUALD POST OFFICE.

Mr. BOURASSA:

1. Why was the post office of St. Romuald, county of Lévis, not erected out of the sum of $13,000 for which provision was made in last year's vote in the Estimates?
2. To what other purpose was the said sum of $13,000 used, what portion of it was expended, and to whom was it paid?

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Instead of constructing a new building immediately, the department is considering the advisability of repairing the building located on the site lately purchased.
2. For no other purpose than the purchase of site and building thereon: H. Lagueux, $6,000; Adjutor Roy, legal services, $30.40; survey and examination of site, Gustave Gagnon, $6; Xavier Carrier, $6; Donat Carrier, $1.50; I. Lacasse, 70c.; total, $6,044.60.

NATIONIAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY—QUEBEC TERMINALS.

Mr. BOURASSA:

1. Have any errors been discovered in the plans or specifications of the Champlain Market Railway Station at Quebec?
2. For what reason was it necessary to pull down some of the basement work of the said station?
3. What was the cost of such pulling down of the work and reconstruction, and what was the total loss as a result of the error discovered?
4. Who was accountable for such error?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. No.
2. None pulled down.
3. Answered by No. 2.
4. Answered by No. 2.

Mr. LACHANCE:

1. Has the Government purchased a railway from the Canadian Northern Railway Company or from any other company, for the use of the National Transcontinental, in the river St. Charles valley, Quebec? If so, when, and for what amount?
2. What is the length of the railway so purchased?
3. Did such railway, at the time of its purchase, connect at both ends of said line with the National Transcontinental railway? If not, how many miles had to be constructed in order to effect such connection, and in what localities or parishes was such connection effected?
4. Did the company from which such railway was purchased reserve any rights on such railway, and if so, what are such rights or privileges?
5. What are the gradients of such railway, including its curves and slopes?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. Yes, on June 5, 1914; for $175,000.
2. Five and one-half miles.
3. It connected only at the east and near Cape Rouge, and, in order to facilitate operation, an additional "Y" connection is being constructed at the Cap Rouge end. This "Y" connection is 2,481 feet long. At the west end a connection 2·3 miles long has been constructed, in order to effect connection with the Leonard Shops. The east end is in the parish of Cap Rouge. The west end is in the parish of St. Malo.
4. The company did not reserve any rights.
5. The grade is 0·5 per cent. The curves are 4 degrees and less.

GUYSBOROUGH AND CANSO MAILS.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Has the contract for carrying the mails between Guysborough and Canso expired? If so, when?
2. Have tenders been asked for? If not, is it the intention of the Government to open this contract for public tender?
3. Has the contract been awarded? If so, to whom and at what rate?
4. Has the Department been requested by letters to have this service put up for public tender?
5. What was the rate payable in the case of the former contract?
6. If a new contract has not been entered into, what rate is being paid for the service at present, and to whom?

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. No.
2. (a) No. (b) The department has authorized a renewal of the present contract which was entered into on the 1st of April, 1911, after public tenders had been invited, for a further period of four years from the 1st of April next.
3. Answered by No. 2.
4. Yes, but they were not received until after the renewal had been authorized.
5. $2,270 per annum.
6. $2,270 to William McDougall, present contractor.

DOMINION TRUST COMPANY.

Mr. MURPHY:

1. Has the Government appointed any person to investigate the affairs and management of The Dominion Trust Company, as provided for under section 70 of the Trust Company Act, 4-5 Geo. V, Chap. 55?
2. If so, what is the date of the appointment, the name of the person appointed and the scope of the proposed investigation?

Mr. W. T. WHITE:

1. No. The Dominion Trust Company is in liquidation, and its affairs are under the jurisdiction and control of the Courts.
2. Answered by answer to No. 1.

COLLINGWOOD SHIP BUILDING COMPANY.

*Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Has the Government awarded the contract for building a barge to the Collingwood Ship Building Company?
2. If so, is the schedule of wages to be paid the workmen attached to said contract according to what is known as Fair-wage clause in the statutes?
3. What rates are prescribed by this schedule?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Yes.
2. The contract and specification both contain a clause providing that the wages paid in the execution of the contract shall be those generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen in the district where the work is carried on.
3. No special schedule included in contract.

EAST ERINVILLE POST OFFICE.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Has an application been made for a money order office at East Erinville, Guysborough county, N.S.?
2. If so, has the application been granted?
3. If it has not been granted, why not?

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Yes.
2. No.
3. The revenue of the office, which only amounted to $71.75 during the fiscal year ended 31st March, 1914, did not indicate that sufficient business would be done at East Erinville Post Office to warrant the establishment of money order business, but the postmaster was furnished with a credit supply of $100 in postal notes in May last, which serves the same purpose.

GUYSBOROUGH BRANCH RAILWAY.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

Does the Government intend at the present session to make provision for the construction of a branch railway in Guysborough county, N.S.?

Mr. COCHRANE: It is under consideration.

LEVIS SHELL FACTORY.

Mr. BOYER:

1. Who are the shareholders of the new shell manufacturing establishment at Levis, Quebec?
2. Has any contract been awarded by the Imperial authorities to the company in charge of such establishment?

Major General HUGHES: The Government has no information at its disposal on this subject.

SASKATCHEWAN AND ALBERTA COAL ROYALTIES.

Mr. W. M. MARTIN:

1. What amount of royalty has the Government collected on coal in the province of Saskatchewan in each of the years from 1906 to 1914, inclusive?

2. What amount of royalty has the Government collected on coal in the province of Alberta in each of the years from 1906 to 1914, inclusive?

Mr. ROCHE:

1. 1906, $249.90; 1907, $428.90; 1908, $358.11; 1909, $1,273.13; 1910, $2,172.65; 1911, $2,858.81; 1912, $3,128.22; 1913, $2,341.91; 1914, $1,639.72; total, $14,451.35.

2. 1906, $4,206.90; 1907, $8,740.45; 1908, $5,322.39; 1909, $115,151.24; 1910, $202,473.68; 1911, $133,367.55; 1912, $133,461.74; 1913, $146,195.46; 1914, $122,608.43; total, $871,527.84.

WAR SUPPLIES—HORSES.

*Mr. MURPHY:

1. Have any horses been bought by or for the Government during the last eight months in the United States?

2. If so, how many were bought and what was the price per head?

3. From whom were they bought?

4. For what purpose were they used after they were purchased?

5. What are the names and addresses of the parties who made the purchases?

Major General HUGHES: No, none.

Mr. COPP:

1. Have any horses been purchased in the county of Westmorland, N.B., by the Militia Department since the outbreak of war?

2. If so, from whom were such horses purchased, and what prices were paid for same?

3. Who was the purchasing agent for said horses?

Major General HUGHES:

1. Yes.

2. R. W. Wood, 4 horses, $890; P. Heineisey, 1, $185; F. Milton, 1, $220; T. Ryan, 1, $200; H. Ross, 1, $185; D. Boyce, 9, $2,250; H. H. Warman, 2, $485; W. D. Allanche, 1, $225; C. F. Gross, 6, $1,500; T. B. Reade, 6, $1,350; J. Black, 1, $200; Geo. McKinnon, 1, $190; A. Humphrey, 1, $200; W. A. Humphrey, 2, $500; A. McConnell, 1, $198; C. F. Gross, 2, $460; W. H. Anderson, 18, $3,945; J. Coffee, 1, $220; W. H. Copp, 3, $565; W. McWilliams, 1, $200; N. Sleeve, 2, $460; W. B. McNeil, 54, $12,154; W. D. Hopper, 1, $150; E. Hogan, 21, $4,705; C. 3. Major S. B. Anderson, Moncton, N.B.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. Who were the parties from whom horses were purchased for military purposes in Pictou county in the year 1914, and the amount paid for each?

2. Who were the parties from whom horses were purchased for military purposes in Pictou county in the year 1915, and the amount paid for each?

Major General HUGHES:

1. T. C. Woodworth, 40 horses, $6,766.

2. George Bailey, 1 horse, $160; S. W. Stevenson, 1, $185; H. H. Fillers, 1, $150; F. McGinnis, 1, $200; J. F. Harris, 1, $190; T. Carroll, 1, $180; A. McDonald, 1, $155; W. A. McLean, 1, $170; H. I. Mr. DELISLE:

1. Is the Minister of Militia or the Department of Militia aware that it is reported a certain number of horses, bought for the overseas contingent at Valcartier, had to be drowned in River Jacques Cartier, having been found entirely unsuitable for service?

2. How many horses died at Valcartier during the mobilization period of the overseas contingent?

3. What was done with such dead horses?

Major General HUGHES: I have no objection to answering this question, but I think courtesy requires that it be put in a different form. I shall have the answer ready for next question day, and I hope the hon. member will change the form of the question.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What change is required?

Major General HUGHES: The question brings in newspaper gossip. The first part reads: "Is the Minister of Militia or the Department of Militia aware that it is reported."

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I do not see what is to be eliminated in that question. If my hon. friend will tell me, I will inform the hon. member (Mr. Delisle), who is absent at present.

Major General HUGHES: The answer to the first question is "no."

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is all right. That is answered without elimination.

Major General HUGHES:

2. 12 to 15. I am not sure as to the exact number until I get the complete returns.

3. Some were taken to the glue factory; the others were buried.

Mr. SPEAKER: The latter part of the first part of the question is entirely out of order. It is an allegation of fact.

WAR SUPPLIES—SADDLES.

Mr. BOYER:

1. Has Mr. J. N. Ducharme of Montreal been awarded a contract to supply saddles to the Department of Militia? If so, for what amount, and what is the date of such contract?

Major General HUGHES: No.

WAR SUPPLIES—CLINIC THERMOMETERS.

Mr. WM. CHISHOLM:

1. How many clinic thermometers were purchased from Mr. T. A. Brownlee, druggist of Ottawa?
2. On what date did Mr. Brownlee deliver these clinic thermometers to the Government?
3. On what date did the Government pay Mr. Brownlee for them?
4. On what date did Mr. Brownlee refund to the Government half of the purchase price?
5. What are the names of the private individuals from whom the Government received offers for clinic thermometers?
6. On what date did the Government receive these offers from private individuals for clinic thermometers?
7. What was the price quoted by these private individuals?

Major General HUGHES:

1. 1,062.

2. 108, August 11, 1914; 594, August 17, 1914; 360, October 1, 1914.

3. August 31, 1914, for 702; October 29, 1914, for 360.

4. February 11, 1915.

5, 6 and 7. Chandler & Fisher, Ltd., Winnipeg, October 9, 1914, at $10 per doz.; W. B. MacDonald Co., Ottawa, November 5, 1914, at $8.50 per doz.

LETHBRIDGE CUSTOMS STAFF.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. When were W. A. Gibbons and A. B. Pipes appointed to the customs service at Lethbridge?
2. When were they removed, and for what reason?
3. What members of the staff still holding their positions, were appointed after Messrs. Gibbons and Pipes had entered the service?
4. Why were Messrs. Gibbons and Pipes removed from the service and more recently appointed officials retained?

Mr. J. D. REID:

1. W. A. Gibbons and A. S. Pipes were not appointed permanently by Order in Council. They were employed as temporary officers on November 7, 1910, and November 29, 1909, respectively, their services being subject to be dispensed with at the discretion of the Minister of Customs.

2. September 15, 1914, as it was deemed necessary to reduce the customs staff in view of the decrease in revenue.

3. H. Bentley, W. B. Burnett, jr., W. V. Hessey, T. D. Kevin, Wm. Scott.

4. In the interests of the service.

COAL IMPORTS FROM THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

How much bituminous and anthracite coal was received from the United States through the ports of Fort William and Port Arthur during the years 1912, 1913 and 1914 respectively?

Mr. J. D. REID: Entered for consumption during the fiscal years ending in 1912, 1913, and 1914, respectively:

Fort William—	Tons.	Valued at Bituminous.
1912	1,831,349	$3,920,519

EMPLOYMENT OF CHAS. NAPOLEON DORION.

Mr. DELISLE:

Is the Government aware that Mr. Chas. Napoléon Dorion, a practising lawyer of the city of Quebec, is said to receive a Government salary as an employee of the post office of said city?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Charles Napoleon Dorion, third class clerk, grade "A"; salary, $900 a year, since the 1st July, 1914.

Mr. Dorion has tendered his resignation to take effect as from the 1st of May, and the department has consented to his services being retained until that time, provided he works the regular hours.

EMPLOYMENT OF L. H. FOURNIER.

Mr. MOLLOY:

1. Is L. H. Fournier, of Winnipeg, in the employ of the Government?
2. If so, when was he appointed, what is his salary, and what are his duties?
3. By whom was he recommended?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If the hon. gentleman will tell us what particular department is alluded to, it will assist us in answering the question at an earlier date.

Question stands.

PHILADELPHIA IMMIGRATION AGENT.

Mr. PARDEE:

Is James P. Jaffray now employed as a Government Immigration Agent at Philadelphia, U.S.? If so, at what salary and what are his duties?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes. Salary $2,000 per annum. His duties are to encourage emigration to Canada of desirable settlers and to examine Canadian bound passengers arriving by vessels at Philadelphia.

THE HOME MILITIA.

Mr. EDMOND PROULX moved:

For a return showing the names of all the Dominion Civil Service employees and Provincial Service Employees serving in the Home Militia as guards on bridges, canals or otherwise, and holding the rank of officers and non-commissioned officers; the salaries they receive from their respective governments as Civil Service employees and the remuneration allowed to them by the Department of Militia.

Major General HUGHES: I shall be glad to bring down the return in so far as the Dominion Civil Service is concerned. As regards the Provincial Civil Service, I shall be glad to bring down the return so far as the information is available.

Motion agreed to.

LOANS FROM IMPERIAL TREASURY.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN moved:

For a copy of all correspondence of the Imperial authorities on the subject of loans from the Imperial Treasury to the Canadian Government.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am informed by the Minister of Finance that the larger portion of this correspondence is of a confidential character. There may, however, be something to be brought down, and there is no objection to the motion passing.

Motion agreed to.

VALCARTIER LAND CLAIMS.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved:

1. For a full statement and description of all lands taken possession of by the Government for the camp at Valcartier.

2. For copies of all titles of the Government to the same, whether by expropriation, purchase or otherwise.

3. For a specified statement of all amounts claimed and still unpaid whether for land or damages.

4. For a specified account of all amounts paid up to date either for land or damages.

He said: My object in presenting this motion is not to ask for information as to why there was a camp at Valcartier for the first contingent. The necessity for having a camp there has not been made clear to me nor, I believe, to the general public. If a camp was needed, Petawawa was available for the purpose, but the contingent which is now in course of preparation is being assembled neither at Valcartier nor at Petawawa; more properly, perhaps, the men are being assembled at the different stations throughout the Dominion where recruiting is going on. I believe it would have been better if the same policy had been adopted in respect of the first contingent. But what I wish particularly to bring to the attention of the Minister of Militia to-day is that many of the owners of land who were dispossessed for the establishment of Valcartier camp have not yet been paid. I understand that the camp comprises nearly ten thousand acres, and that between forty and fifty men were dispossessed. These men, practically all farmers, were not in circumstances of affluence, and each one needed the crop which he was then expecting to raise, and, of course, the price of his land upon expropriation. On August 28, the following notice was served upon one of the men so dispossessed —I understand that a similar notice was served on all.

From Lt.-Col. Wm. McBain,
Quebec, Que.,
To Mr. Michael Holton.
Dear Sir:

I have been instructed by the Department of Militia and Defence to notify you herewith that it is their intention to expropriate the land held by you in Valcartier and described as parts of Cad. Nos 54, 66, 67, 68 and list Cad. No. 71, on the official plan for the parish of St. Gabriel de Valcartier containing in all 240 acres.

I have been further instructed to notify you that it is the intention of the department to take immediate possession of the above described land and to offer you in full and complete settlement therefor the sum of $4,800. If this offer is not accepted by you within thirty days of the date of this notice, proceedings in expropriation will be commenced.

Kindly take notice of the above and govern yourself accordingly.

Yours truly,
(Sgd) Wm. McBain,
Authorized agent of the Department of Militia and Defence.

Who was Mr. McBain? For my part I do not know, nor did any of those to whom these letters were addressed. He was not connected with the Department of Militia. He styled himself colonel; I understand that he suddenly rose from a rank of obscurity to be a full-fledged colonel of the first rank. The management of the camp at Valcartier had been placed at first in the hands of Sir William Price, a well-known business man of the city of Quebec and a former member of this House, a man holding the highest reputation for business ability and integrity of his character. Why Sir William Price was not continued in the agency of the Department of Militia is not known to me, but I believe that the change does not conduce to the public interest. I think there would have been less complaint than there has been if Sir William Price had been continued as agent of the department instead of Colonel McBain. I do not wish to reflect on Mr. McBain; I do not know him; but I do know Sir William Price very well, and, not knowing Mr. McBain and knowing Sir William Price as I do, and as everybody in this House does, I believe the change was not calculated to promote the public service. Be this as it may, the one fact I make complaint of is this: I have been informed—I have no special information except that which I received by correspondence—that though these men were dispossessed of their lands in the month of August last, yet, with the exception of one or two, these owners, some forty or fifty in number, have not yet received the money to which they were entitled. There may have been some dispute as to price. This was not unnatural. But I desire to represent to my hon. friend that in view of the circumstances an extra effort should have been made to give these people ample satisfaction. These men had their property invaded just at the time when their crop was ready. Some of them could not gather anything of their crop, and some of them are reduced, I will not say to penury, but certainly to stringent circumstances, in consequence of the delay. And, so far as I know, no effort has been made to have these men paid. I understand that the matter has been referred to the Department of Justice. That is to say, all these men have to go to law in order to get their money. If their claim has been put into the hands of the Department of Justice, that department cannot proceed except by due course of law; these forty or fifty owners, suddenly despoiled of their property, will have to go to the court to get the value of their land and also of their crop. I make this motion simply to have the information from the minister. Charges have been made as to the management of the camp. I make no charge; I simply ask for information.

Major General HUGHES: The leader of the Opposition has dwelt upon the necessity of Valcartier camp; but he says he will discuss that at some other time. I am willing to oblige him and will reply to his criticism of the camp at Valcartier at some other time. But, inasmuch as he went out of his way to discuss it a little, I may point out that the camp at Valcartier stands unique in the history of the world as having produced the best shooting regiment that ever wore a uniform. The object in getting the force assembled at Valcartier—war being a game of shooting—was to give the boys an opportunity to learn practically how to hit the bull's eye. They succeeded; and let me say, without disrespect to the second contingent, which is made up of a lot of as fine boys as ever gathered in any part of the world, that it will take them six or eight weeks' actual practice at the targets before they will be in the same class —I refer to rifle shooting alone—with the boys who sailed on the 1st of October.

The right hon. leader of the Opposition asks, who is Colonel McBain? May I tell him?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Certainly.

Major General HUGHES : Col. McBain is a descendant, a great-grandson, of an officer who stood beside Wolfe on the Plains of Abraham. Colonel McBain's ancestors ever since 1759—nearly as long as the ancestors of the leader of the Opposition—have lived at Valcartier, on the very spot where this camp was erected. Col. McBain is a gentleman of whom the city of Quebec and his home district are very proud. Col. McBain is a gentleman who struck out into western Canada years ago and who by honest business industry has amassed a fortune. Col. McBain is a gentleman who, when the call to arms came, volunteered for any position to go to the front. Col. McBain is a gentleman who has given his time and his services freely to the Canadian Government, I believe without any remuneration—I am not aware that he has accepted any; and in some ways I know he has refused it—in order to perfect the boys for service at the front.

The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) wants to know why Sir William Price was not given the position. Sir William Price is another distinguished gentleman of whom the people of Quebec and the people of Canada are proud. He also volunteered his services and refused to accept a cent of remuneration. But he had nothing to do with the work which Col. McBain had in hand. Of five places that we selected as best suited for this purpose, this site at Valcartier was the one most convenient to railway facilities. To reach the others we should have had to build roads for eight or ten miles. It was Col. McBain who, with the committee, first selected the site, and it was he who was put in charge of it. He carried on negotiations with the people, a splendid lot of people, who lived on these ranges, and, as the records will show he carried on these negotiations most fairly. He had the matter settled to the entire satisfaction of all, with the exception of two or three men, until—no, do not shake the head—some designing gentlemen came along and told these people: "Hold higher; don't settle." Sir William Price had charge of the laying of water mains and getting in the water at Valcartier and other work of that kind. And, let me say, Sir William Price was in no sense discontinued in his work. He continued in his work until it was completed. Mr. McCarthy continued in his work until it was completed. Col. McBain continued in his work until it was completed. And so did Col. Low. Each of these stood to his guns like a man.

Now we come down to the settlement. I personally, feeling that these people were put to considerable inconvenience, went over every item. Valuations were made of each property, a fair valuation was taken, and to this was added a percentage as compensation for damages and for being forced to move out. Our instructions were that compensation for damages was not to depend upon the value of a man's property, because it may cost a poor man as much to move as a rich man. The matter was fairly and equitably arranged so far as we could do it. When it seemed that some people were not content with that, after consultation, Col. McBain was told to give the highest valuation made by any of the valuators. All except four owners, I think, were agreeable to accepting this settlement, until these emissaries got amongst them; I do not know whence they came, nor why, nor who sent them. Perhaps we can get that information. (Reading):

1. An Order in Council was passed on June 20, 1914, authorizing the acquisition of 4,391 acres in the parishes of St. Gabriel de Valcartier and St. Ambroise, in the county of Quebec, valued at $82,775, as a site for a central training area for the province of Quebec. On August 27, 1914, an Order in Council was passed authorizing the acquisition of an additional area of 10,116 acres in the parishes of St. Gabriel de Valcartier and St. Ambroise, county of Quebec, and St. Catherine, county of Portneuf, valued at $140,000. These two areas comprise: Lots 1-43; 54-115; 116-126; 128 and 129; 132; 134-154, St. Gabriel de Valcartier; 329-342 and 885-888, St. Ambroise, and 276-287 and 413-420, St. Catherine.

2. In September, 1913, and January and August, 1914, plans were filed under the Expropriation Act, thereby vesting title in the Crown, of the area authorized to be acquired by the Orders in Council above referred to.

3. The following properties, within the area of the camp site, which had been purchased by Lt.-Colonel Wm. McBain, representing the Department of Militia and Defence, have been conveyed to the Crown by that officer, at the price for which he paid for them:

Lieutenant-Colonel McBain having reported that he had come to terms with the undermentioned owners for the purchase of their respective properties for the prices named, cheques have accordingly been issued and forwarded to the Department of Justice for payment to the vendors and we are awaiting the receipt of the deeds of conveyance:

[Mr. Sam. Hughes.]

Four of the above vendors have refused to accept the amounts tendered to them, viz.: Messrs. J. Fogerty, Thomas Knox, Curtis Billings, Hopper Brown, claiming that the cheques were not in accordance with their agreement with Lieut.-Colonel McBain. The case of these people will be taken up with Lieut.-Colonel McBain upon his return to this country, which is expected shortly.

4. As regards the balance of the properties within the camp site:

(a) Lieutenant-Colonel McBain has reported that he has come to terms with the following, and the Department of Justice has 4 p.m. been asked to examine title. No cheques, however, have, as yet, been issued, pending a report from the Department of Justice that the titles are clear:

Parish'	Lot No.	Area.	Vendor.	Price to be paid.

(b) With the owners of the remaining properties—some 75—we are still endeavouring to come to terms, and, if possible, obviate expropriation proceedings. The properties in question comprise an area of approximately 9,400 acres.

5. Twenty-seven of the owners within the area of the camp site have received compensation totalling $13,625 for damage to crops, as follows:

6. To sum up:

(a) Deeds of conveyance to the Crown have been executed and received at the Department in the case of eight (8) properties—area 1,379 acres; price paid $18,625.

(b) Cheques aggregating $28,050 have been issued to close the purchase of eighteen (18) properties (comprising an area of approximately 1,645 acres). This does not include the cheques, amounting to $15,600 issued to Messrs. Fogerty, Knox, Billings and Brown, who have refused to accept same.

Note.—It is understood that in case of the majority of the properties the money has been paid over to the vendor and the deeds executed. The deeds, however, have not yet been received at the department.

(c) The purchase of eight (8) properties will be consummated as soon as the owners prove their title—area approximately 1,260 acres, price to be paid $24,800.

(d) Some seventy-nine owners have still to be settled with either by expropriation or negotiation, the area of whose properties comprises, approximately, 10,000 acres. (This total includes the properties of Fogerty, Knox, Billings, and Brown).

(e) Twenty-seven (27) owners have received compensation for damage to crops, totalling $13,625.

Note.—It is not clear from the correspondence whether the area should be quoted in "arpents" or in "acres," as at one time the word "arpents" is used and at another time the word "acres." For the purposes of this memorandum it is assumed that the area is in acres.

Lieut.-Colonel McBain returned to Canada to-day. This memorandum is signed by Mr. E. F. Jarvis, Assistant Deputy Minister.

[Mr. Sam. Hughes.]

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is the date of the memorandum?

Major General HUGHES: It was given to me to-day; I do not know when it was prepared. Every effort has been made to bring about a settlement, and, more than that, we instructed each of the valuators to give a fair valuation. My right hon. friend may not know this locality well, but the McBain family is one of the oldest in Quebec. Every effort was made to induce these people to accept the fairest possible valuation, and instructions were given to give compensation because the people were being turned out. When some of the people demurred at taking what was considered a good, fair valuation, we used every effort to bring about a settlement, and I understood that in every instance the offer had been accepted until, through some manoeuvring, the spirit got abroad among them to hold for higher prices.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT CONTROL OF FOOD EXPORTS.

Mr. W. F. COCKSHUTT (Brantford) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the circumstances arising out of the present war are such as to justify the Government of Canada in exercising supreme control over the quantity and destiny of our food exports, thereby regulating the prices at which bread, meat and other food products shall be sold for home consumption, while at the same time directing that our surplus food exports should only reach British or friendly countries.

He said: The resolution standing in my name is one which I deem of great importance at the present time. It has no political significance, so far as I am concerned. It has appeared to me that for some months past it was the duty of those in charge of the Government of the country to keep a very good eye upon the food supply of the Dominion of Canada, and also to assist in every way possible the Mother Country in the tremendous struggle in which she is now engaged. I am aware that the principle contained in the resolution upsets to a certain extent what has been deemed proper economic law, that is, that the law of supply and demand regulates the prices of all commodities.

At the same time this war has upset a great many business axioms, has upset the calculations of many political economists and has brought to our attention the fact that a world-wide war is not dealt with by ordinary means nor controlled by ordinary circumstances. Supply and demand as a rule is a safe criterion for the fixing of prices of commodities. As far as I have been able to judge, Canada is the only country at present at war that has not given more or less consideration to this very important question. Very early in the war the Government of the sister dominion of Australia, that great Commonwealth, which is also a large producer of food, took possession of all supplies of wheat and arbitrarily fixed the price at $1.25 per bushel. That was done in one of the leanest years that Australia has seen in a long time. Their wheat crop was comparatively a failure. The supplies for home consumption were away below the requirements of that great country. New Zealand is in very much the same position and has been obliged to appeal to Canada for its supplies.

Wheat, of course, is not the only item to be considered in a resolution such as this. I have purposely drawn the resolution as broadly as possible. You will notice that the wording used only asks that the House concur in the opinion that the Government is justified in controlling both the quantity and destination of food exports. There may be those, and no doubt there are a number, who disagree with the first proposition but I believe that in this House it will be found that no one will disagree with the second proposition in regard to the destination of our food supplies. Surely the people of Canada who are the holders of greater or lesser quantities of food products can have no doubt in their minds that the exportation of these food supplies should be directed towards the Mother Country, friendly peoples and allies who are fighting with her to-day for the great principles that we believe are involved in the present war. Therefore, I assume that there will be no exception taken by any hon. member of the House to the proposition that the export of food supplies from Canada should be entirely to British and friendly countries. I have put in the word "friendly" out of deference to the opinions of some who may not agree with me, but for my part I would have preferred to have confined the resolution to British countries entirely because I believe that in the present crisis all our available food supplies are required by the Mother Country and the sister dominions.

Moreover, those who have studied the condition of this question and have followed it fairly closely, as I have for the past few months, must be forced to the conclusion that we are in rather a critical position at the present time, and in asking the House to give some attention to this very important question I am only asking it to do what has been done in the government circles of the various countries that are engaged in the war at the present time. Only this morning you will notice by the press that Mr. Lloyd George has been dealing with the matter and I shall have occasion to refer to that a little later on and also that there was held in Trafalgar Square yesterday a large gathering of the labouring element protesting against the high prices of food and pointing out that it was necessary in the interests of the workingman that the food supply should be immediately regulated and that prices, if necessary, should be set by the Government. That is a proposition that it may be difficult to carry out in such a country as the motherland. On the 11th of February the British House of Commons passed an entire day in discussing this very important question and further, at the close of the debate, after an amendment had been moved by one of the labour leaders, another day was set for the continuation of the debate. Mr. Asquith, it is true, stated that food prices could not be regulated in the United Kingdom with beneficial results. Let me point out that the conditions in Great Britain are exactly the opposite of the conditions that we have in Canada. Great Britain is a food-importing country; even in normal times the food supply has to be almost entirely brought from outside sources. Britain's problem is to get enough food to come into the country. Canada's problem is to prevent too much food going out of the country. One perhaps is uncontrollable, but there is no one who can say that the other is uncontrollable, and it appears to me that the crisis at which we have about arrived, and I think more than arrived, is such as to demand that the subject should receive the very best thought and attention of the Government. The wheat supply, particularly of Canada, is in very narrow compass. Probably not 10 per cent of the wheat grown is at present in the hands of the farmers. Far be it from me to propound any proposition that is going to rob the farmer of his legitimate profits. The farmer has had to take too low prices for many years past for his wheat—there is not a bit of doubt about that. Personally if the farmer can get $1.50 or $2 for his wheat in so far as the matter of trade is concerned I am perfectly satisfied, but coming from an industrial constituency where there are 7,000 employed in the ordinary way, and where, owing to an industrial stagnation the like of which we have never found before in my time, 2,000 or more have been out of work almost the entire winter, with wheat, bread, oatmeal, meats and various products of the farm bringing prices that have rarely been experienced in the years gone by—

Mr. SCHAFFNER: When you speak of 10 per cent being in the hands of farmers, do you include seed wheat or only the quantity for sale?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I estimate that there is not more than 10 per cent in the hands of farmers for sale. I shall deal with the seed question a little later on, because that is an important factor to be considered at this particular time.

Sir JAMES AIKINS: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that he would reduce the price of wheat to the farmer for the purpose of benefiting his own constituency?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I have not made any such statement, and if my hon. friend will wait until my argument is finished I think he will not arrive at that conclusion. I am quite aware that some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House may not agree with my proposition, but at the same time I have the courage of my convictions, and I believe that not only in Canada but in every one of the countries at war this is a real live question that has to be dealt with on its merits. And, while my hon. friend from Brandon (Sir James Aikins) may think that the farmer is justified in getting $2 or $2.50 per bushel for his wheat, under war conditions, I am not going to say whether or not that should be the price fixed; I have not in my resolution named any price, nor do I propose naming any price to which wheat, and meat, and the food products consumed by the working men should be limited. I point out that while the price of securities of every kind, industrial transportation, insurance, railways, has been going down, and down, and down, in the last six months, on the other hand we have seen the necessaries of life of the workingman rising steadily and rapidly. I have a mass of statistics here, a part of which I can only place before the House, which show that the present condition of the wheat supply of Canada wants very careful watching. I believe that in the next six weeks we shall see a squeeze greater than anything we have yet seen. The visible supply of wheat in Canada is shrinking rapidly day by day, until it is estimated that the visible supply, as I am informed by responsible authority, is down to about 18,000,000 bushels, and that is disappearing at a very rapid rate. That has come about in Canada on top of a world shortage. The United States is the only country in the world which had a good crop last year, the world supply being about four hundred million bushels short of the crop of the previous year. We all heard the discussion that took place about two weeks ago, in reference to the seed grain proposition, in the interests of the West, and on that occasion we were told by some hon. gentlemen that thousands of farmers in the West have not even the seed with which to plant their land this spring, so that, if this statement be correct, the bulk of the farmers are now buyers rather than sellers, of wheat. I am glad to know that this Government has had the foresight to place aside a large sum of money for this purpose, and that they have already made purchases of a considerable quantity of wheat to supply this seed shortage. The great squeeze, as I see it, will come in seeding time this year. Canadians are now the greatest wheat-consuming people in the world, bar none, for while the people of the United States consume annually about five bushels per head of the population, Canada consumes between six and seven bushels. Taking our population at from 7,000,000 to 7,500,000, in round figures, our requirements for the bread of the people of this country are between 45,000,000 and 50,000,000 bushels of wheat per annum, and in addition to that we will have, in the very near future, to supply seed wheat for a very large area. It may be said that should a shortage take place we can import from outside, but from what countries can we hope to get the supply we need? The United States is to-day practically the only country that has a large visible supply that is available. The world's supply has been cornered and speculators, in Chicago largely, have been setting the price of wheat for the world during the last few months. The United States surplus, and it was a very large surplus, has been disappearing at the rate of eight million bushels per week. Great Britain, France and Italy have been compelled to purchase immense supplies from the United States. Italy is not even yet at war, but the Italian Government has taken the precaution to buy 40,000,000 bushels of wheat from the United States, as the following despatch shows:

Rome, February 28,—Provisions made by the Government to supply Italy with wheat pending the next harvest were defended by the Minister of Agriculture, Signor Cavasola, in a speech yesterday before the Chamber of Deputies. He declared special missions representing the military commissariat had made enormous purchases in the United States and Argentina, although the largest quantities had been made in New York and Chicago. The total contracted for abroad, Signor Cavasola said, was 13,500,000 quintals, (40,500,000 bushels), which will be divided between several of the largest cities as distributing stations.

About one-third of the amount contracted for already has arrived in Italy. The Minister of Agriculture declared that in view of the precautions taken by the Government a wheat famine would be impossible, because the supply provided for would be ample to last until after the Italian harvest.

After the speech of Signor Cavasola, the Socialists provoked a political test vote and were defeated, 314 to 44.

This proves that even these countries which are outside of the war zone are compelled to take extraordinary measures for the preservation of their food supply. I think you will agree with me, Mr. Speaker, that nothing could be more deplorable, than to see the success which has attended the efforts of the Allies thus far set at naught by a food shortage which may cause very serious trouble in the Motherland. I quote from a speech delivered by Lloyd George in Bangor, Wales, on the 28th instant:

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, David Lloyd George, made a pointed reference to the United States in a speech here today.

"If Germany is triumphant over this country," he said, "she would be practically dictator of the world, and where," he asked, "could we then look to a chivalrous country to protect us—to America?"

If countries like France and Russia, with huge armies, and we, with the most powerful navy in the world, could not face this terrible machine, how could America step in? It would be more than America could do to defend herself in her own continent. America is unready more than we were."

The chancellor then took up the liquor industrial questions.

"The Government has wide powers to deal with the drink question, and it means to use them," he declared. He said a small minority of the workmen employed in the armament factories had refused to work a full week because of the lure of drink.

"The government would use its powers discreetly and in a spirit of moderation, Mr. Lloyd George asserted, but "fearlessly." He was sure the public would support whatever action was taken and allow no indulgence of this kind to interfere with the country's prospects in the war.

"The war," he said, "is to be won or lost by the engineers. We need men but we need arms more than men and every day of delay is full of peril to the country. For one reason or another we do not get the assistance we have a right to expect from our workshops. Industrial differences are inevitable, but we cannot afford them now.

"It is intolerable that the lives of Britons should be imperilled for the sake of a farthing an hour. During war, governments should have the power of settling differences so that work shall go on. If men are entitled to more money the government should give it. I do not believe the parties involved will refuse to comply with the urgent command of the government that there should be no delay."

Expressing confidence in the outcome of the war, the chancellor said the people of the country hardly realized yet the importance of the struggle in which they were engaged and warned them that victory could not be won without a long struggle. He declared that while England had enrolled the largest volunteer army ever gathered in any country or in any century it ought to be larger still.

There is also in this paper an article headed: "'Protest the food prices." In it the socialists draw attention to the fact that the Government has not done everything possible to safeguard the food supply of the workingman. There is danger to-day in the Motherland in regard to the food supply. I appeal to the House and to the people of Canada: Is it right or wise for any set of men to endanger the success of the allied forces for the sake of some monetary advantage to the individual citizen? The question simmers down practically to that. We are to-day facing a crisis such as has never before been experienced by the British Empire or by the world. If by a restrictive policy on the prices of our food products we cause any delay in turning out munitions of war and other army supplies, which are just as important in their way as are the men at the front, would it not be to the detriment of our cause, which I am sure every hon. gentleman, whether he fully agrees with me or not, has just as much at heart as I have? This crisis has to be met by extraordinary precaution. I do not presume to suggest to the Government the course that should be taken. I want only to point out the condition of our supplies at present.

If you turn to the Weekly Trade Report issued by Sir George Foster, Minister of Trade and Commerce, you will find on page 375 that for the months of September, October, November and December we received at the various terminals 54,478,949 bushels of wheat, as against 104,451,593 bushels during the same period of 1913, or only about one-half for the four best shipping months of the year. It was a short crop, and the farmer deserved a high price for his grain. Unfortunately for him, he had parted with a very large portion of it before the high price came, and as a result the speculator largely made what we would like to see go into the farmer's pocket.

In the same report, on page 325, you will find a report of the Dutch Vice-Consul, sent out from Winnipeg on December 10, 1914, in which he gives the totals of the crops for the two years as follows:

186,000,000 bu. of wheat at $0.70. ..	$ 1,302,000
210,000,000 bu. of oats at $0.28.. ..	58,800,000
25,000,000 bu. of barley at $0.30 ..	10,500,000
15,000,000 bu. of linseed at $1.10..	16,500,000
Total..	$216,000,000
1914.
150,000,000 bu. of wheat at $0.95..	$142,500,000
175,000,000 bu. of oats at $0.42..	73,500,000
25,000,000 bu. of barley at $0.52..	13,000,000
6,000,000 bu. of linseed at $1.25..	7,500,000
Total..	$236,500,000

Therefore, for the short crop of 1914, even at the comparatively low prices at which that crop left the farmers' hands, $20,000,000 more were obtained than for the crop of 1913. That is fairly satisfactory; but every one will notice that the price of 95 cents for wheat and the price of 42 cents for oats are far below the prices at present current, which are in the neighbourhood of $1.50 for wheat and 60 cents or 70 cents for oats. All the arguments that I have applied to wheat apply with equal force to oats, and even more so to peas. Canada does not, of course, produce a large quantity of peas, although it is interesting to note that the price of peas to-day is considerably higher than the price of wheat, being in the neighbourhood of $1.90 for a 60 lb. bushel, a price never before reached in this country. I emphasize this only to show that the present prices of these food products are high.

I instance also the fact that there is in the elevators at the present time a very limited quantity, even for this season of the year, of the vast crops that Canada has produced, that is available for the millers, for the farmers for seed, and for the food supply of the people. In the same report, on page 377, you will get an idea of what we have in the various elevators. Without wearying the House by naming the various elevators, I might condense the report as follows: At Fort William and Port Arthur in the week ending January 29, there were 5,186,293 bushels; at Saskatoon and Moosejaw, 1,728,267 bushels; and in the various eastern ports, such as Midland, Collingwood, Goderich, Quebec, Kingston, Port Colborne, Prescott, Montreal, and so on, there were 5,733,651 bushels; or a total at the end of January of 12,648,211 bushels. The supply of oats was considerably less than this. There were only 1,860,000 bushels at Fort William and Port Arthur, 959,483 at Saskatoon and Moosejaw, and 3,729,777 bushels in all the elevators of the East, making a total of 6,549,524 bushels. Therefore the supply of wheat and oats in the Dominion of Canada was in very narrow compass. There is also the present large demand for home consumption, which, as I have already pointed out, requires about 45,000,000 bushels per annum; or, for the half year between now and the time that our next crop is available, there will be wanted, for the food of the people alone, in round figures 23,000,000 bushels of wheat. In addition to that, the people will require 10,000,000 or 12,000,000 or even 15,000,000 bushels, according to the increased acreage that the West may sow this spring, for the seed supply of the farmers of the West. I cannot conceive of any greater disaster happening to them than to be short of seed wheat in the coming season. If we are allowed to export with a free hand and so pull down our reserves to the very last notch, is there not a possibility that when the final squeeze comes in the middle of April next we may find lands in the West actually unseeded because the farmers could not find sufficient seed wheat to plant these acres? This will be a disaster not only for Canada but for the Empire. I appeal to this House to look into this question, which, I believe, the more it is looked into the more those who look into it will be convinced that it is wise for the Government to have in their hands power that will prevent that which would be a disaster to Canada, to Britain and the overseas dominions. Some may say, that is all rot.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: My hon. friend from Brandon (Sir James Aikins,) who is an expert lawyer, though I do not know that he knows much more about wheat than I do, says, so it is, or something to that effect. But I have sufficient confidence in my own opinions to tell the hon. member that though he objects I still hold my opinions as strongly as he holds his, and I think I have just as much right to hold them. I believe, even though the hon. member may not agree with me, that the people of this country have a very keen eye on the situation as it now exists, and it is a situation that, I think, cannot be given too much consideration at the present moment. It would be a thousand pities if Canada, the granary of the British Empire, as we have called it, should fail at this critical moment. There is danger of its failing to do what is expected of it in the food supply. The resolution I have placed on the Order Paper is drawn broadly and lays down in very general terms the possibilities that may arise, and asks this House if it does not justify the Government in taking into its hands this position that may require dealing with. I do not ask my hon. friend to subscribe to any particular price for wheat. I do not set any price; I do not think it is in my province to do that. If it is thought that $1.50 a bushel is a proper price for wheat, all right; if $2 a bushel even is thought better, all right. I can remember as a boy when wheat was as high as $2.50 a bushel, and it may go to that again. But what I would point out is that there are many workingmen in this country who cannot afford to pay this price for their bread unless they have a corresponding increase in their wages. Now, the workman has been up against two propositions—first that his wages are dropping at the present time and that he has been very short of work in all the industrial centres; and second he has been asked higher prices for bread and for the products of the farm that go upon his table than at any time for years past. It may be said that I represent a few manufacturers. I repudiate that before it is said. While I may get ten or fifteen manufacturers to vote for me, I am here by the votes of the workingmen of the city of Brantford. I am here to represent the interests of these men and not the miller or the speculator, or the man who endeavours to corner the food of the people.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: With permission, I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he has made any calculation of the amount of wheat which has gone out of the hands of the farmer into the hands of the miller?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I have some figures here dealing with that subject, but not of very recent date. The quantity in the farmers' hands, according to my figures, is about 8,000,000 bushels at present.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: How much in the hands of the millers?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I have shown that the millers and speculators have bought about ninety per cent of the crop, which was put at 158,000,000 bushels. That would leave about 15,000,000 bushels in the hands of the farmers according to that calculation.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but the point I wish to make is this: Undoubtedly the millers bought a great deal of this wheat during the months of December and January for somewhere about a dollar a bushel. Now, the way in which this question affects the workingman is through the price of flour. What I want to find out, if possible, is what proportion of the wheat of the three Prairie Provinces was bought from the farmer at a price of $1 a bushel or less, and whether there is good reason for flour going to the price to which it has gone.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I am afraid I could not give authentic figures on that point. I have stated that I believe that ninety per cent of the wheat of the country has passed from the hands of the farmer into the hands of the miller, who is more or less of a speculator. I do not think the price the millers have paid for wheat justifies the present prices of flour. I think the miller has made a very large amount. Judging by the figure at which milling stocks are selling and the profits the millers are said to be making, it looks to me as if the millers have the big end of the stick. I do not think it would be wise to endeavour to curtail the operations of the millers in the interests of the people, but I think it reasonable to point out that the millers, being a very small percentage of the people of Canada, should not expect to make out of a world-wide disaster a large personal profit, amounting in some cases almost to a fortune. I have here a clipping from the Ottawa Free Press, a journal which I do not often quote with approval. I may be excused for quoting it now inasmuch as this article comes from a Conservative paper, the Montreal Star, something which deals with the question my hon. friend has asked:

> With the conditions indicating that the larger milling companies in Canada are likely to have one of the biggest years they have ever known, many local interests are already figuring on the bonuses the companies will be able to pay over and above regular dividends.
> The principal companies have only gone five months of their regular fiscal year, but it is admitted that whether peace comes eo-morrow or in a year from now, conditions are going to favour the Canadian companies for a couple of years at least, and on this account the companies are bound to make a very good showing, even though profits are not anything as large as some people have been figuring.
> In the case of one of the local companies, it is stated that earnings this year may run not far from 50 per cent on the common stock, while in the case of some of the still larger concerns, it would not be surprising to see earnings of from 20 to 25 per cent, even when the statements have been worked out on a conservative basis.

From this it will be seen that the millers have struck a very prosperous time, though most of the country is suffering in a financial way. As I have said, we have seen all our securities sinking. Every industrial company, every transportation company, every joint stock company of any kind has seen its stock go down, and down, and perhaps has found that stock unsaleable even at a fraction of the original price. Exchanges all over the world were closed on account of the war for several months, and those that did business did it on a limited scale and at prices almost unheard of in the history of the companies affected. Even Canadian Pacific railway stocks fell from 280 to 155. Almost all industrial companies, except, perhaps, the milling companies, have felt the pressure of the disastrous conditions which are the result of the war.

In the face of all these circumstances, the prices of food supplies have risen. Wheat at $1.50 a bushel in ordinary times would not hit anybody so very hard. I have said more than once in this House and throughout the country that wheat should never sell at less than $1 a bushel. I believe that the farmer either of the West or of the East can not afford to raise it at less than that price, and if the Government should think it wise to establish the price of wheat at $1.50 or $1.75 a bushel, I would make no protest. But what I want the House to decide is this: has the time come when the export of the staff of life produced in Canada should be controlled? Is the amount of the visible supply a justification for the Government's saying that when a certain price is reached they will step in? I propound this question in all seriousness. I have shown that the visible supply is lower than it has been for a long time, and, in the face of the most extraordinary demands from all parts of the world, is rapidly passing away. On the other hand, sources of wheat supply that were formerly available are now entirely shut off. Great Britain has always looked to Russia for a large supply of the staff of life, and the conditions to-day are such that not a boat has been able to get away from Russia, either to the north or to the south, for many months. Hon. gentlemen may say that the Dardanelles are very soon to be open, but Mr. Asquith himself anticipates that liberal supplies will not come from that source before June—and before June a great squeeze will come in this country. It is true that the allied fleets of Britain and France are operating upon the forts of the Dardanelles, and we are told by the press that they have succeeded in silencing three or four of the outer fortifications. But it is yet a long way to Constantinople, and it is a still longer way to Odessa. For my part I think that those who are anticipating a food supply from Odessa will be pretty hungry if they have not substantial reserves nearer at hand and more easily available. These fortifications may fall, but other difficulties will then present themselves. If the hostile shores are held by the enemy, there will be difficulties of mines in narrow channels, and of torpedo boats; under these conditions is it reasonable to expect that merchant ships will be passing from Odessa to Great Britain in the very near future? I may be pessimistic, but I think not. Then where is Great Britain to obtain her food supply in the future, and particularly during the next few months? Argentina, so far as I know, is the only source of supply outside of the United States, and I have told you that the United States is shipping at the rate of 8,000,000 or 9,000,000 bushels a week. Practically the world supply of this important cereal, the staff of life for nearly all peoples, must come from the United States and Canada. We hoped that in time of stress we in Canada would be able to turn out from 150,000,000 to 200,000,000 bushels of wheat; unfortunately this year we did not do anything like as well as we did in 1913. This we all deplore. While I do not wish to be unduly pessimistic, I say in all seriousness that the present crisis may soon require action by some department of government, probably the Department of Trade and Commerce. I am glad to know that we have at the head of that department a shrewd man of business, a man upon whom we may depend to do the right thing at the right time. I think it would be reassuring for him to know that this House has provided legislation which he may put into force when it is necessary to take definite steps to conserve our food supply before it is too late. I cannot conceive of any greater calamity to the people of Canada than that of over-exportation of food products at this serious time. The Allies need those exportations.

I have before me a report with regard to the American wheat supply which I think I should place upon Hansard. For this report I am indebted to Mr. John Bunnell of the Chicago Board of Trade, an ex-Canadian. He is an expert in such matters, and is a recognized authority in that great centre of wheat production and distribution. This is the report:

The 1914 wheat crop of the United States was estimated to be 891,000,000 bushels. The estimated surplus carried over from the 1913 crop was about 76,000,000 bushels. There was, therefore, a total available supply of 967,000,000 bushels, and as the normal per capita consumption of wheat in the United States is about 5.3 bushels, 520,000,000 bushels should meet our normal domestic requirements for food. In addition, 90,000,000 bushels are required annually for seeding; 610,000,000 bushels, therefore, should supply the normal domestic demand.

It will be noted that 90,000,000 bushels are required for seeding purposes only in the United States; therefore the figures which I gave some time ago are quite in accord with the assumption that we would require in this country 20 or 25 per cent of that amount. The report goes on:

This would leave a surplus of 357,000,000 bushels. Of this surplus about 210,000,000 bushels were exported by January 30.

About two-thirds of the amount they had to spare.

This left 147,000,000 bushels, or 40,000,000 bushels more than our average annual export for the past five years, for export between February 1 and the appearance of the new crop, or for carrying over into the next crop year. The amount is sufficient to permit the exportation of nearly 1,000,000 bushels a day until July 1, before which time the new crop will begin to be available. This is about the average recent exportation.

I have already said that they are exceeding the export of 1,000,000 bushels a day; if they continue to export at that rate they will entirely consume their surplus before July, which is a time entirely unfavourable to the securing of wheat in large quantities.

The large demand for our wheat arises from the fact that there was an estimated world's shortage of over 400,000,000 bushels, outside of the United States;

A shortage of 400,000,000 bushels in the world's supply, coming on top of a world war!

—from the fact that the Russian exportable surplus of 100,000,000 bushels is not available generally and from the fact that the belligerent nations are eager to secure food supplies. If it were not for these things we would be discussing ways and means of disposing of our surplus food products. As has been stated, the new American crop will begin to appear before July. The Argentine crop is now coming on the market. It is estimated that from that source there will be available 100,000,000 bushels. A surplus of 75,000,000 bushels or more from India will be available in May and June. The increase in the fall sown wheat acreage of the United States in 1914 was 11.1 per cent, or over 4,000,000 acres; in the northern hemisphere generally the increase in the wheat zone shows an increase of from three to thirty-three per cent, as follows:

	Per cent.
Denmark	3
Italy	5
Switzerland	10
United Kingdom	10
United States	11
India	22
Canada	33

Canada tops the list with an increase in winter wheat of 33 per cent. That is one of the very interesting items with regard to the outlook for the Canadian crop.

But suppose a shortage in wheat should develop in the next three months, what would be the situation? There is a great surplus in other food crops in the United States, a number of which can be used as substitutes. Wheat does not constitute more than 12 per cent of the normal diet, about the same as poultry and eggs.

This corroborates what I have said, that there is a very large shortage in the world's supply, and the demands are of such an unusual character that all calculations of the past may be upset by the facts of the present that the warring nations are more or less nervous, day by day, as to the requirements of their people and as to the food supply. It is not necessary for me to recount to you the horrors which at present exist in some of these countries in order that you may realize what a shortage of food would mean to vast numbers of people. In Belgium we have to-day practically 7,000,000 people who are dependent on the outside world for their entire food supply. We are told that it requires 80,000 tons per week of food to keep 7,000,000 people of Belgium from starvation. They know what war is. We in Canada fortunately, up to the present time, have scarcely realized what war is and we have not realized that we are personally called upon to make the sacrifices necessary for our cause to triumph. I think that every one of us should be prepared to make all necessary sacrifices for the success of the cause. It may be that some of us will be called upon to sacrifice flesh and blood. That is the highest sacrifice that man can make for man, and I am glad to say that there has been a spontaneity of response throughout the Dominion of Canada where the call has gone forth: "Your King and country need you." But that is only part of the battle. We have to send the men to the front, we have to send them equipped, and then we have to supply them with the munitions of war and with the food required to carry on the war satisfactorily. To-day the greatest problem in Britain is to maintain the supply of armaments, shot and shell and rifles and cannons and all those engines of destruction that are required to meet an enemy whose every man is equipped from head to heel, in a way that no army in the world has ever before been equipped, ready, the moment the war bugle sounded, to march forward in the ranks of war to meet any enemy in the gate.

Lloyd George has said, in the speech from which I have quoted, that they are fighting in such a way as no war machine has ever fought in the history of the world, and we are called upon to make all necessary sacrifices in order that our cause may triumph. I want to put it to the members of this House, I want to appeal to their patriotism if not to their pockets, is it not the part of Canadians, is it not the part of any Britishers to be ready to sacrifice not only their flesh and blood if necessary, but also what is far less of a pang, some of the profits which might go into our pockets as the result of a squeeze which would mean tremendous pressure on others. My hon. friend only laughs. I am afraid that all my shafts are lost on him, but I feel that, whether he agrees with me or not, he as a patriotic man must say that we are called upon to make some personal sacrifice. Is that not right? He will not agree with me to that extent. I know that my friend from Brandon (Sir James Aikins) is a highly philanthropic citizen and that he has sometimes, if not converted souls, made a good attempt to appear on religious platforms as a man who was attempting to save souls, and I appeal to him now,

I appeal to his Christian charity, I appeal to him as a man who draws out his soul to the hungry and is ready to satisfy the afflicted soul. These are not my words, and I think he will know where they come from. I ask him if he will not draw out the bowels of his compassion and say that $1.50 or $1.75 or even $2 is enough for wheat to sell at. He is still dumb. However, without asking my hon. friend to subscribe to the proposition I am making, I think I can fairly ask the members of this House to let their bowels of compassion be moved for souls who are in want, that those who need the food of which we have, to limited extent, a surplus, may get the benefit of our surplus. But we cannot afford to feed even those who are worse off than ourselves if it is done to the detriment of our own people. While charity begins at home, we want to exercise just as much of it as we can to those of our kith and kin over the seas; and while I say that the resolution which I have moved may not appeal to all in one respect, that is, in the desire to limit our exports, I believe I can appeal to all that the exporting of those food supplies should be limited to British and friendly countries. I would prefer that it should go only to British countries, because I think it is the duty of a man to look after his own household first, to see that his own wife and children are fed; in other words to care for the people of his own nation, his own kith and kin, to whom he is bound by all that is Christian and all that is charitable, to provide for the wants of those who are suffering within the borders of his own country. I believe I shall carry the House with me in that respect, that our food supplies which do go abroad should go only to British and not foreign countries.

A return is in my hand, sessional paper No. 120, showing the countries to which food supplies have been exported since the month of August last; and while I shall not weary you with the fish and the cheese and apples and minor articles that go to replenishing the table of the workingman, I am going to draw your attention to the fact that in regard to wheat and flour and some other cereals we are in the humiliating position, to a certain extent, of having fed the enemy while many of our own people were not receiving food in a quantity or at a price that is desirable. That, I think, is something that should be rectified. I find in a return I asked for that we exported wheat to several non-British countries. The order was for a return showing whether any exportations of foodstuffs have been made since August last to European countries other than the United Kingdom, France and Belgium. In response to that order I have a statement showing that 167,626 bushels went to Gibraltar, and 40,000 bushels to Denmark. It may be said that as far as Gibraltar is concerned, we were feeding the British garrison, and very likely we were; but as far as Denmark is concerned that cannot be said. But it is to the matter of flour more particularly that I want to draw the attention of the House. Since August last we exported flour to the following countries:

	Barrels.
Gilbraltar	4,171
Malta	2,030
Denmark	34,327
Germany	356
Greece	12,382
Holland	58,338
Norway	120,954
Sweden	3,089

We should not have sold one barrel to Germany while our own people needed it. I do not know what Greece wanted with all that flour. I am afraid that she did not use it herself. What did Norway do with 120,954 barrels of flour? I fear that some of this flour has been sent to furnish the sinews of war to our enemies. We have made mistakes up to date with regard to the exports of flour, but oats is just as important a commodity as flour, as far as the success of our arms is concerned, because there is a tremendous demand for the oats of this country to feed the war horses that are at present fighting our battles in northern France and Belgium. The position of the oat market is just as important as that of the wheat market in that respect, and we must be just as careful in regard to it. We want to see to it that no further mistakes be made in sending food supplies to the enemy or in sending them to those countries that may be friendly with the enemy and which allow these supplies to be sent from their borders into the country that is fighting against the armies of the Allies. I think that has been done; I am afraid it has been done.

I know that there is a disposition to blame the bakers of Canada for the inordinate rise in the price of bread. I am not familiar with the baking industry, but I have had a document sent to me by the bakers who repudiate the assertion entirely and who make the statement that they have gone on furnishing bread at a price that the present price of flour does not at all justify, that now they are practically at the end of their resources so far as flour that was laid in early in the war is concerned, and that very material advances must be made in all kinds of bread, cake and other things which the bakers furnish from day to day to the houses of workingmen. If that is the case it is a very serious matter, and it is certainly deserving of the consideration of this House because, after all is said and done, fully half of the population of the Dominion is resident in cities. We have close upon 700,000 men at the present time working in the industries of Canada. All of these are dependent for the staff of life pretty much on the bakers' product and I therefore appeal to this House to see that no injustice is done to any of those concerned in debating this question. I am making no imputation against the good faith of all our citizens. Far be it from me. I have the very highest respect for all classes of our citizens. I believe we have a splendid citizenship in Canada. I am endeavouring to direct the attention of the House to what I conceive to be one of the most important resolutions that will come before it at this session of Parliament. I am asking hon. gentlemen to say that in the judgment of this House the Government would be justified in controlling the amount of foodstuffs to be exported and the destination to which they should go. I am asking you to place no particular price on any product but I believe that when the resources are held in this country that of itself will be a regulator of the prices and that it will result in maintaining a constant supply of our breadstuffs and all those items that go upon the table of the workingman.

What I have said in regard to breadstuffs applies in a smaller measure to all kinds of products, to cereals and all those items of daily use that go upon the table of the workingman. They all require consideration at the present time and I ask you, as a fair proposition, to see to it that we in Canada, largely a food-producing country, shall not allow ourselves to be impoverished by over-exportation until we have taken care of the food requirements of our own people and of the supply of seed grain to those who are presently to go upon the land to sow the crops for the coming year. I am in entire accord with the Government in furnishing seed grain to the farmers. I think it was a wise move, but that of itself may affect the the situation at present existing somewhat acutely. I therefore have much pleasure in moving the resolution which stands in my name. I thought it was the intention of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Sharpe) not the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Barnard) to second the resolution, although I do not think it makes very much difference. I offer the resolution believing that in doing so I am bringing to the attention of the House and the country a question that demands their very best consideration, and whether hon. gentlemen agree with me or not, I ask them to discuss the question free from any political bias or anything of that kind because I have no thought of that in my own mind at the present time and it has no bearing whatever upon the introduction of this resolution. I ask simply that this question be viewed upon its merits and I can only say again that I make this proposition believing that it is a wise and just one and that its adoption is in the best interests of the people of Canada and of the British Empire whose cause we have so very much at heart.

Mr. J. J. MERNER (South Huron): Being a farmer and representing a farming community, I desire to say a few words upon this very important question. I would like to have a little more information on the resolution that has been laid on the table. I would like to know if the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) is trying to get after the farmer or who it is he trying to hit. I believe that if the adoption of this proposition should affect the farmer it would inflict a great injustice upon him. I admit that at the present time the farmer is receiving a fair price for his product, but at the same time I do not believe that the price that he is receiving represents more than a good living profit. I wonder if the hon. member for Brantford lost much sleep when the farmer was receiving a starvation price for his butter, eggs and other products. I am a farmer and I know that the farmer at the present time is selling his cattle and his hogs at a price that does not pay him, considering the high cost of everything he is using. I believe that the consumer is paying too high a price for his foodstuffs, over and above the price the farmer gets. I know that in August and September last buyers paid $9.75 per cwt. for hogs, and $9.00 per cwt. for cattle, while to-day they are only paying $7.25 for hogs on the Toronto market and a correspondingly less price for cattle than they paid in August, and yet they are asking exactly the same price for their beef and pork as they did last fall, when they were paying two cents per pound more for live stock. There is something wrong there, and if the Government wants to obtain power to get after those fellows. I for one shall approve of their doing so. If the farmer alone is to be detrimentally affected by such action as is now proposed by my hon. friend (Mr. Cockshutt) I believe it would be most unjust. For the last few months there have been people going around the country advocating patriotism and increased production, but if you are going to adopt any legislation in this Parliament which will be injurious to the farmer, how are you going to get increased production. For my part I believe that the farmer requires protection just as well as the manufacturer. I wonder how the hon. member for Brantford would like it if the Government brought in a Bill to stop the shipping of ploughs to the other side. I think he would object to that most strongly. I believe we should not be selfish; I believe we should co-operate, one with the other; I believe we should allow the farmer to live. The farmer is the backbone of this country, and we must have protection for him. A great deal is said nowadays about the high cost of living, and I might perhaps give my experience in that respect. I am a farmer, but I am also a merchant, and I think I am able to deny the statement that the cost of living has greatly increased of recent years. I worked behind the counter in my store for thirty-seven years, and I know from personal experience that thirty-five years ago, with a few exceptions, the cost of the necessaries of life was higher then than it is to-day. Thirty-five years ago I sold tea at seventy-five cents a pound, and I am selling as good tea to-day at forty cents a pound; thirty-five years ago I sold coffee at thirty cents a pound, and I am selling as good coffee to-day at twenty-five cents a pound. I believe that as a whole the price of drygoods is lower now than it was say thirty years ago. That, of course, depends on whether the people are willing to use the same class of drygoods to-day that they did then. If people were willing to use the same drygoods to-day as they did thirty years ago, they could buy them just as cheaply; but nowadays they want style, and they have to pay for it. Thirty years ago the mothers on the farm would spin the yarn and the home weaver would weave the cloth; I wore these goods myself and I was content with them; but to-day the boys and girls are not satisfied with that. It is the way the people live to-day that makes the cost mount up. About thirty-five years ago I remember selling six pounds of granulated sugar for a dollar, while to-day I am selling twelve and fourteen pounds for a dollar. Of course, the cost of living, especially in large cities, is high, and that is brought about largely by the high rents, which are the result of the good times we have been having. In the good times in the past, speculation ran high and rents ran up. Where twenty-five years ago an ordinary man could rent a house for ten or fifteen or twenty dollars a month, to-day he is paying thirty or forty or fifty dollars. We must place the responsibility for that on speculation. I did not expect this resolution to be brought up to-day, and I was not prepared to speak upon it; but it having come before the House, I felt that it was my duty to say a few words on behalf of the farmers. Those who live in the cities imagine that the farmer has an easy time of it, but I am in a position to know about that, and I feel satisfied that the farmer, even in view of the high price he is rceiving to-day, has the short end of it, and that he is not making the money he ought to make to recompense him for his hard work.

Sir JAMES AIKINS (Brandon): It was not my intention to have spoken on this resolution, nor did I think I would until after I suggested a question which perhaps to my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) was somewhat unfortunate. He drew particular attention to the hon. member for Brandon, when that member felt carried away by that inspired patriotic peroration of the hon. gentleman, pointing out how the people of this country should sacrifice themselves for their homes and for the Empire. He apparently misunderstood my disposition and turned his particular laudations to myself. While he was thus considering the member for Brandon, my thought was turned to see how his enthusiastic patriotism was given effect to by the resolution he placed before the House and now being considered, limiting the market and price of agricultural products. By this resolution he asked that some portion of this community should make sacrifices, and that portion of the community which he selects to make the sacrifice is the farmer. I can tell my hon. friend that the farmers of this country, and particularly the West, are willing to make and have made splendid sacrifices for Canada and the Empire. Thousands of the best men, sons of farmers, and farmers themselves, young, vigorous, intelligent and industrious, having ample opportunity for the development of their life at home, have sacrificed their peaceful pursuits and comforts and are now manning the trenches in a foreign land fighting our Empire's enemy.

But that is not the sacrifice which the hon. member for Brantford desires the farmers of this country for the love of it to make. When we consider this resolution we find that the sacrifice he demands of them is a sacrifice for the benefit of other people in this land, and particularly for the benefit of the manufacturers and the benefit of the employees of those manufacturers. In my view, Mr. Speaker, if sacrifices are to be made, they surely should be made by those who hitherto have had the benefit of the services of their workmen, and who have received advantages from them. If any one is called upon to make sacrifices, it should not be those who have constantly paid tribute to the manufacturers of my hon. friend's constituency and the eastern part of Canada. As I understand this resolution its purpose is that the price may be reduced to the agricultural producer so that the consumer may receive the benefit of that reduction. Therefore the sacrifice that the farmers are being asked to make is for the benefit of other classes in Canada.

There are two great producing classes in our country—the agriculturists and the manufacturers. Who should receive particular attention? Certainly those whose production is the natural and not the artificial production of a country. If we look at the returns for the year 1913, we shall find that the value of the agricultural exports was either three or four times greater than the value of the manufacturers' exports. As Canada is primarily an agricultural country, the agriculturists, if any protection of the people is given, should first receive that protection. I presume that any economic policy that is wise and sane for one class of producers should be wise and sane for the other class of producers. We have very frequently seen pamphlets sent out by the Department of Trade and Commerce—the minister for which deserves all the commendation which the hon. member for Brantford has given him—setting forth the wider market that the Government is attempting to create. For whom in particular? For the manufacturers. Seldom do we see any such pamphlet for wider markets for the farmer. When that subject was before the House, instead of giving wider markets for wheat, which were in a limited way available and for considerations required, the House did not support that idea, which might occasion disadvantage to the miller and manufacturer. If, then, an economic policy is found good in the one case of the manufacturer, it should be found good in the other of the farmer. Does the hon. member for Brantford consider his economic policy as propounded in this resolution a sane and wise one in respect of the farmer? He, in fact, says: Do not give the farmer wider markets; do not give him even the natural market; do not obey the law of supply and demand, but control and limit his market for the benefit of the consumer, for the benefit of the other class of producers. Let us now reverse that resolution and make it apply, say, to agricultural implements. The resolution would then be that the Government of Canada would be justified in exercising supreme control over the quantity of agricultural implements produced for export purposes. In other words, the export of agricultural implements should be limited, so that the farmer who is obliged to use them might get the benefit of a lower price for them. Is that my hon. friend's policy? The farmers of the country require those agricultural implements just as much as the other people require food. If those implements are made cheaper to the farmer, his production will cost less. My hon. friend's policy is in the one case that because people require food, therefore, the export of wheat should be limited. Why not also because a farmer requires agricultural implements, therefore the export of agricultural implements should be reduced in order to reduce the price to the farmers. Moreover the reduction in the price of grain paid to the farmer in Canada would put him at a disadvantage in competing with the producers of the same class of material in other parts of the world. If we cannot get the same price for our agricultural products as the Americans do, our eyes will naturally turn to the policy of the United States. There we shall see that they have free agricultural implements in addition to a higher price for grain. Why should we not have a similar policy in Canada? asks the Canadian farmer. Why should not the hon. member for Brantford carry out his policy and give us free agricultural implements also, or give them at lower price?

I do not intend to speak further only to say that the intention of the hon. gentleman has not been for the benefit of our men who are fighting in the trenches or for the benefit of the Allies, but it has been for the benefit of a limited class in Canada and my hon. friend's sole thought is not how we can benefit the fighting cohorts of the Empire, but how we can benefit a few at home at the expense of others. I have no objections to those at home receiving kindly treatment, but there should be no sacrifice on the part of any portion of the community to the advantage of any other particular class. I do not think the food supply of the Allies is short. I read in a despatch from Liverpool in the Ottawa Evening Journal of this date the following:

> Never in the history of this port has the congestion of shipping been so great; nor have the Liverpool warehouses ever been so crammed with foodstuffs as at present. It is the consensus of opinion of importers here that even should the German submarine blockade prove effective, there is enough food now stored here to feed the country for a year.

There should be no limitation of the market for agricultural products, and the Government of our country should do everything in its power to increase the markets and the price of his produce to the farmer; for by the exports of agricultural production mainly may we be expected to receive that return which will meet the large amounts borrowed from abroad, and pay for our imports. I am very sorry to have taken up so much of the time of the House, because I believe this resolution in itself is so lacking in vitality, so anæmic that it must soon die quietly without any opinion by the House concerning its weakness.

Mr. W. M. MARTIN (Regina): I must first of all congratulate the hon. member for Brandon (Sir James Aikins) on at length having arrived at a very sane idea of the doctrine of protection in so far as the agriculturists of this country are concerned. If my hon. friend had been of the same view with respect to markets for the farmers of this country last session, and the session before, and, in fact, for the past three or four years, we might have had free wheat to-day for the farmers of western Canada. I do not wish to impugn the motives of the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) in bringing this resolution to the attention of the House. I have heard the hon. member on previous occasions get very close to the same doctrine as he has promulgated here to-day, namely, the fixing of the price of foodstuffs. It is quite true that he would not venture to suggest what the value of a bushel of wheat would be. I believe on one occasion, some two or three years ago, he said that wheat should never sell for more than $1 a bushel.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I never made that statement.

Mr. MARTIN: You got very close to it to-day.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Your imagination is carrying you away.

Mr. MARTIN: The sole purpose of his resolution is to control the price of wheat, which the hon. member himself has said, produces the staff of life which feeds all the people of this country. This is a most peculiar time in the history of Canada for a man to advocate in this House the control of the price of the main product of our farmers. During the past few years I have heard gentlemen of the type of my hon. friend advocating that the farmers of this country should go into mixed farming. When the farmer had about come to the conclusion that mixed farming was a good thing, the war came in August last, and immediately my hon. friend and his friends advocate that people should produce more. And now, I suppose, we have the climax of this campaign of " Patriotism and Production " in the speech of my hon. friend, advocating that the farmer should not be paid more than a certain price per bushel for his wheat. I submit that the hon. gentleman has started at the wrong end of this question. I am informed and believe—and perhaps my hon. friend has the information—that the millers of Canada are manufacturing flour out of wheat bought three or four months ago at prices not exceeding a dollar a bushel at Fort William. I know, and hon. members of this House know, that during October and even September—because our harvest was early last year—and during November, there was no dollar wheat in western Canada. It was the exception if the man got 98 cents or 99 cents a bushel, and from that were deducted transportation charges to Fort William. The farmer got for his wheat on an average from 80 cents to 90 cents a bushel. And I am informed that the millers fortified themselves with a large supply of wheat which did not cost them $1.25 a bushel or anything like it. And yet flour is selling at $8.75 a barrel.

There is another reason why the hon. gentleman has started at the wrong end of the question. He knows, as does every other member of this House, that for many years past the Canadian miller has been selling his flour in the markets of the world at a less price than that at which he sold it to the consumer in Canada. What is going to be the result of raising a question of this kind? I agree with the hon. member for Brandon (Sir James Aikins) that the agricultural business is the main industry in Canada. To increase the prosperity of this country, to get men on the land in the East and in the West, and to get larger acreage in crops and to get more agriculturists on the land, a campaign of " Patriotism and Production " is undertaken. I saw some figures the other day with respect to the population centering in the cities. While the rural population increased from 1900 to 1910 by half a million people, the population of the cities increased by almost a million and a quarter—or almost two and a half times the increase of the rural population. Of course, the cities are always attractive to a large number of people, but the main attraction has been the comparatively high wages that were paid there, especially by the manufacturers. The manufacturers did not raise wages for philanthropic reasons. They have acted in this matter the same as they have in relation to the doctrine of protection; it was an absolutely selfish proposition. They were forced to raise the wages of their employees because the cost of living has so greatly increased within the last fifteen years. The effect, of course, was to increase the wages of all city employees. The farmer could not compete with these prices, and so the farmer's hired men and the farmer's son went to the city. And now my hon. friend proposes that the price of the farmer's principal product should be curtailed. I would suggest to him, as the hon. member for Brandon said, that he might consider advantageously some reduction in the cost of agricultural implements in western Canada. Let me give an instance that came under my own notice a short time ago, one the facts of which I am ready to substantiate at any time the hon. gentleman wishes. A certain man bought an engine gang plough. I ascertained these facts at Carnduff. I learned that the machine was quoted there at a certain figure. But this man crossed the line into Sherwood, in North Dakota, and bought the plough there at such a price that though he paid about $100 duty on bringing it across the line, he saved $80 or $90 on the transaction. Does the hon. gentleman dispute that? That was a Canadian-made plough, one that had paid duty on going into the United States. Yet, though it had paid that duty and though it had to pay another duty on being brought back into Canada, the purchaser saved the amount that I have named. It was one of the agricultural implements manufactured by those philanthropic gentlemen of Ontario, manufactured and sold abroad at 20 per cent less than they charge for it in Canada.

The hon. gentleman wishes to control the price of the product of the farmer, but at the same time he is arranging that his friends the Government of the day should increase the duty on the implements that the farmer uses, and on everything that the farmer consumes. That is the policy of my hon. friend. I would like to know what the Government think of that policy. Is it in favour of the policy of curtailing the price of all the foodstuff that the farmer produces and to enhance the price of all that the farmer uses?

As I have said, what we most of all require in western Canada, and I believe in the whole of Canada, is to get men on the land. Canada is primarily an agricultural country. We have prided ourselves on that for many years past. But immigration has practically ceased during the last six months, and it has been declining, like our revenue, for eighteen months past. If we are to get the farmers on the land to carry out the "patriotism and production" policy that we have heard so much about, how can any reasonable man defend the position that the price of the main product of the farmer's labour shall be fixed? I say, I believe that the majority of the House will agree that the farmer should be allowed the price for his products fixed by the open competition of the world.

Mr. ALPHONSE VERVILLE (Maisonneuve): My hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) has said a good deal in former years on questions similar to this, but formerly he argued on the other side. To-day he is very anxious to protect the workingman, not only of his own constituency, but of the whole of Canada. From what the hon. gentleman says, one would suppose that the workingmen of Canada ate bread and nothing else. I am prepared to favour the proposition of the hon. gentleman if he will ask the Government to regulate also the prices of everything that comes on the workingman's table. But I suppose he will not accept that, for otherwise he might be blackballed by the association of which he is a member. I am surprised that the hon. gentleman has changed from the position which he occupied in former years in this argument. For my part, I have always said that the farmers did not get enough for the goods they grow, yet the consumers always had to pay too much. The hon. gentleman can hardly deny that. There is a middleman somewhere—there are many of them, and my hon. friend is one. I would ask him in two words also to make some sacrifice, and would ask the trust of which, I assume, he is a member, to make some sacrifices. And I would say to the trust of the millers, which is really one of the biggest in Canada, and which has paid dividends on watered stocks of so many million dollars, that surely they also could do something for the country at the present time. My hon. friend may say that they are not paying any dividends this year. They are very sorry that they cannot pay any dividends, but I may remind hon. gentlemen that when I brought this question up in the House on a previous occasion it was plainly stated that these people were paying no dividends except on common stock. I may tell my hon. friend that I will second his proposition on the condition that the regulation or restriction of prices shall apply to every article of foodstuffs that goes on the workman's table. I may say, too, that I shall be willing to make some sacrifice if the interests with which my hon. friend is connected are willing to make one also.

Mr. W. A. BUCHANAN (Medicine Hat): The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) spoke of Canada as being the granary of the Empire; I think it will be admitted that western Canada is really the granary of the British Empire. The hon. gentleman proposes to make provision for the regulation of prices of foodstuffs, which would include the larger number of the products of western Canada. Farming in western Canada has not been profitable; that was established only last year by the report of the commission appointed by the government of the province of Saskatchewan to inquire into farming conditions. That was due largely to the prices received for the grain which the farmers produced. This year, when exceptional conditions prevail and there is a prospect of the farmer obtaining a good price for his wheat, the hon. member for Brantford comes along with a proposition to restrict the prices within certain limits and practically to wipe out the first opportunity for making a profit that the western farmer has had for a great many years.

What will be the effect of the proposed changes in the tariff upon the farmers of western Canada? The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) argues that the price of the protected article goes up just to the extent to which the tariff is increased.

I have before me substantial proof that since the Government increased the protection afforded to certain agricultural implements, the price of agricultural implements has been raised, and the new prices are now in effect. I will quote the statement, not of a politician, but of a gentleman who is engaged in the implement business in the city of Winnipeg. I have here a clipping from the Winnipeg Free Press of Tuesday, February 23, containing the report of an interview with Mr. H. W. Hutchinson, vice-president and managing director of the John Deere Plough Company. Mr. Hutchinson argues that the entire tariff, in so far as it affects tillage implements used upon the farms, imposes a burden upon the farmer of western Canada. We have been advocating, as Mr. Hutchinson points out, increased production, but production can only be brought about by utilizing tillage implements, and upon these the Government, under its proposed tariff arrangements, is putting an extra tax. Let me read what Mr. Hutchinson says in that regard:

> The prairie farmers will, of course, be called on to pay the duty. We have been already notified by Canadian manufacturers that prices will be increased to us and we have already begun to prepare a new price list for the sale of our commodities. On every walking plough there will be an increase in the price paid of from $1 to $2; on every sulky plough an increase of $4; on every drill an increase of $5.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Do these increases apply to ploughs made in the United States or to ploughs made in Canada?

Mr. BUCHANAN: Mr. Hutchinson says, "We have already been notified by Canadian manufacturers."

Mr. COCKSHUTT: So far as our firm is concerned, there is no truth in that report of an increase. It has been decided by the firm that prices shall remain just as they have been.

Mr. BUCHANAN: I presume that the hon. gentleman, who has dissociated himself from the agricultural implement business within the last couple of years, is probably more familiar with these conditions than I am, but I shall wait until I receive word from some of the farmers in western Canada who are buying the implements before assuming that Mr. Hutchinson's statement is incorrect. Mr. Hutchinson proceeds to enumerate the increases:

> On every gang plough an increase of $6; on every wagon an increase of $7, and on every disc plough a nincrease of $8, with similar advances in the prices to the farmer of all kindred tools.

Then there follows a lengthy interview with Mr. Hutchinson, in which he says that the tariff increases are discouraging to the farmers of western Canada. In view of the fact that the prices of these articles are to be increased, I submit that even if the prices of grain in eastern Canada to-day rise higher than they ever have been in the past, the additional prices which the farmer will have to pay for the articles which are given additional protection under the tariff changes introduced at this session of Parliament, will reduce his profit and take away from the benefit of the increased price he receives for his products.

The hon. member for Brantford takes a patriotic view of the situation. I wish to tell my hon. friend—not as a boast, but as a statement of fact—that there is no more patriotic part of Canada than the West; that there is no more patriotic citizenship in this country than that which is found in the farmers of western Canada. I have had the pleasure of attending a great many patriotic meetings in my own constituency, a constituency largely populated by men and women who come from the republic to the south. Those men and women have been interesting themselves in the promotion of every patriotic object, and are prepared to make sacrifices on behalf of Canada until the war is over and victory is proclaimed on behalf of the Allies. They are prepared to make sacrifices on behalf of patriotic enterprises, and they are prepared, if need be, to sacrifice their sons to the Empire. In my constituency a squadron of mounted rifles has just been raised to go to the front with the third contingent, and in that squadron there are six officers, each one of them a native born American citizen who has only recently become a naturalized citizen of Canada. Any one who is under the impression that our new citizens are not true Canadians has been entertaining mistaken ideas.

I believe that this war itself has developed a stronger Canadian citizenship than we have ever had in the past. It has proven the metal, it has proven and established the loyalty, of the people who have gone into western Canada; and they are prepared to make their contributions, but they are not prepared to be limited in the price which may be offered to them for the products of the soil, and then have to pay increased prices for the articles which they use. My hon. friend in his resolution says:

> While at the same time directing that our surplus food exports should only reach British or friendly countries.

My hon. friend surely has kept in touch with Britain's attitude during this war. He knows that to-day it has been declared that no food of any kind will be allowed to go into Germany or any other country opposed to the Allies on account of the attitude of Germany and the countries allied with her. Why is that? We can get food products to the Allies and the friendly countries because of the existence of a great power within the British Empire, and this resolution, I maintain, is not necessary in that regard, because all our surplus products are more than likely to go to the countries to which we want them to go—to Great Britain and to the allied nations.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia): My hon. friend the member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt), has brought forward a resolution that I do not think he can expect this House to approve of. At the present time my hon. friend is engaged in supporting a measure before this House which is to add very heavy burdens, not only to the farmers in the West, but to the farmers all over Canada. It is bad enough when you hit any class of the people one blow, but in this resolution that my hon. friend presents to the House he proposes to give the farmer the double-cross and hit him at both ends. He adds to the price of his machinery, adds to the price of everything that goes to produce wheat and if, on one particular occasion or in one particular year out of a great many years, the products of the farm are high in price my hon. friend wants the Government to step in and fix the price. I acknowledge that farmers are getting good, high prices for their products at the present time.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Some of them.

Mr. TURRIFF: Well, most of them.

Mr. CLARK: Pork is very low.

Mr. TURRIFF: Some of the farmers have got good prices and because they happened to have got good prices my hon. friend comes forward and wants to have the prices fixed by the Government. I think the hon. member for Brantford is beginning to learn something, and that is that high protection does not always protect or benefit the interests that he is so anxious to have benefited. Surely the proposition of the Government to increase the price of manufactured goods should be sufficient for my hon. friend who represents a manufacturing constituency—a constituency composed nearly altogether of manufacturers and artisans. If that proposition worked out as they would lead us to believe, the artisans of that constituency should be benefited, but according to the hon. member for Brantford they are not being benefited, he finds the prices of products too high and he comes to this Government and wants to have them regulated.

We have heard a great deal of late years about getting the people back to the land. What I am particularly concerned about is endeavouring to keep the people on the land that we have on the land at the present time. People have been leaving the land steadily and now, when you are placing heavier burdens than ever before on the backs of the men who are trying to make a living on the land, how does any one expect, how does the hon. member for Brantford expect, that we will be able to get more people back to the land or even that we will be able to keep the men on the land who are there now? My hon. friend, with a show of patriotic fervour, declared that we should make sacrifices. What sacrifices are his constituents making? What sacrifices are the manufacturers making under the legislation that is before Parliament to-day? I heard one manufacturer from Montreal make the statement—and he made it knowing what he was talking about—that the added duties that are proposed at the present session would mean 5 per cent additional profit to the manufacturers. These are not my words, these are the words of a practical manufacturer. If these added duties, of which the farmer will have to bear the biggest part, will enable the manufacturer to made an additional 5 per cent profit, I would like to ask my hon. friend where the sacrifice comes in. I have never been able to see any sacrifice that the manufacturer has ever made. The vice-president of the Manufacturers' Association said that they would have to grin and bear the extra taxes, but I notice that the Ottawa Citizen said chiefly grin, and it is a case of grin on the part of the manufacturer if he can make five per cent extra money.

I hope the hon. member for Brantford will not succeed in having his resolution carried into effect, because it would mean that the farmer, in addition to the extra burden that he is going to be called upon to bear, would be precluded from taking advantage of good prices for his wheat, or his cattle, or anything else in the way of food that he produces, at any time that it happened that the prices were extra heavy. I would like to ask my hon. friend if Great Britain has asked for any such action on the part of the Government of this country. I do not believe she has. The hon. member for Brandon (Sir James Aikins) has pointed out the statement, in a despatch to the press to-night, that Great Britain had food enough on hand for the next twelve months. I do not think there is much suffering from the lack of food, and I think it would be a step in the wrong direction absolutely if the Government were to place any restrictions whatever in the way of the farmer getting the very best prices he can. My hon. friend from Brantford, only a year or two ago, supported very heartily a proposition in this House to prevent the farmer from selling his wheat on the other part of the line if he could get a better price for it. He could not see that there would be any advantage in that whatever, but if my hon. friend from Brantford refused to allow the farmer to sell his wheat in the best market that happened to be available, and that best market was across the line, and if he is supporting the policy of added burdens to the farmer in producing that wheat, surely he does not want to give him a third welt and to say: We must prevent the farmer from getting the market value of his wheat because that is going to make the cost of living too high for my constituents. That is exactly what he says—the cost of living is going to be too high. My hon. friend will find out that when he undertakes to legislate upon all these matters he just gets them going from bad to worse, and that it would be far more in the interests of his constituents, as well as in the interests of the whole Dominion, if they would leave matters as they are and not add any greater burdens to the farmer and not give any greater concessions to the manufacturers. He would then find that the cost of living for his constituents would not go up nearly as fast, and that they would be in a much better position than if the Government were to accede to their request and put a limit on the prices that the farmer could get for his product. If anything were going to be done in that line, now is not the time to do it. I can hardly think that the Government would entertain this idea for a moment; but if it were going to be done at all, the time would be before the grain has largely passed out of the farmers' hands—it is not altogether out of their hands, but a very considerable portion of it is—and into the hands of the great milling concerns. However, I am not at all alarmed that the Prime Minister will do anything of the kind asked for by this resolution. It does not seem to me it is a motion in the right direction and I do not think the members on his own side of the House will accord the hon. member very much support.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (Queens, P.E.I.): One of the ideas of the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) in proposing his motion appears to be that most of the wheat in Canada has been secured by the millers and other speculators at a low price, and that these men are taking advantage of the war conditions to charge consumers an inordinate profit, and he seems to think that in some way or other this resolution if carried would regulate the price to the consumer. I do not think it would have that effect. The motion says:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the circumstances arising out of the present war are such as to justify the Government of Canada in exercising supreme control over the quantity and destiny of our food exports, thereby regulating the prices at which bread, meat and other food products shall be sold for home consumption, while at the same time directing that our surplus food exports should only reach British or friendly countries.

According to the proclamation issued by Great Britain and the Allies, the surplus products that Canada has to ship will only reach Great Britain and other friendly countries, and, therefore, that part of the resolution is not necessary. And if, by reason of that fact, you control the price of the home grain then there is no part of the resolution that is necessary. There is no doubt that the millers and other speculators are charging a very high price for flour at the present time, and if they have bought this wheat at a low figure before the price advanced, there is no doubt whatever but they are taking advantage of present conditions, and whether they should be allowed to do that is a point worthy of consideration. This is a combine-ridden country—

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Say that again.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: My hon. friend wishes me to repeat that, but everybody knows it who wishes to know it, and therefore it is not necessary for me to repeat. We have combines to raise the price of food and other products, and if they can be smashed, it would be a good thing for Canada. There are men in this country—we all know it—who are taking advantage of the war conditions to make fortunes of thousands and tens of thousands of dollars out of the food and other products they are selling to the people of this country, and to the Government of this country, which is another name for the people. If the hon. member for Brantford had moved a resolution asking for a parliamentary committee to find out who the guilty parties are, and to try to prevent these practices, I for one would support him. The resolution of the hon. member in its present form would be innocuous and useless were it adopted. Something should be done to prevent the people from being fleeced, and to prevent the designs of the cormorants who are trying to fatten upon the people at this particular time, by taking advantage of the patriotism and loyalty and devotion of the people. These men think that perhaps their raids upon the treasury and upon the people of Canada may pass unnoticed, but we know them and they should be brought to book. Action in this direction taken as speedily as possible and before Parliament prorogues would be in the best interests of the country and of the Empire. If my hon. friend (Mr. Cockshutt) had proceeded along that line, I am sure he would have got support in this House, from independent members at all events, and perhaps some one may yet move in that direction. That is the view I take of this resolution.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (York, South): I am only going to detain the House for a moment to look on this question from the point of view of increasing production throughout Canada, especially farm production, both in the East and in the West. Having regard to the present situation, if I were asked to suggest something to improve the condition of the farmer of the West in the matter of increased production of foodstuffs, I would suggest the adoption of a policy by the Government to valorize or stabilize the price of the forthcoming wheat crop. I would be quite willing to see the Government make a price for the first and second grades of the coming year's wheat crop, somewhere in the neighbourhood of $1.40 or $1.50 per bushel. That would enable the farmer to hold the wheat until they got at least that price for it. If a better price were obtainable they would get the benefit. By the Government valorizing and stabilizing the price of wheat, the farmer would get what he does not get to-day, namely, the large amount which the miller takes away from him. The bulk of the wheat that has been raised by the farmers of our western country has gone into flour, and that flour has been sold, as nearly as I can make out, at a price which should have netted the farmer from $1.30 to $1.50 a bushel. There are always new ideas in economics, and the suggestion has been made, and I think it is worthy of consideration having regard to the present conditions, that the Government of Canada could well afford to stabilize the price of the coming crop at least at $1.30 a bushel. If we cannot do that, there are other things we can do to help the farmer. There are two things that could be done in that direction and the Government is doing one of them now in increasing the storage capacity in the West so that the farmer can keep his wheat until such time as the miller wants it, and thus secure a better price. A widespread system of storage throughout the West will no doubt help in that direction. Then we should have a banking system in this country that would enable the farmer to carry his wheat, so that he would not be compelled to sell it as soon as the crop is reaped. If the farmer could store his wheat and if he could have a banking accommodation that would help him to carry his wheat, we would accomplish what ought to be accomplished, namely, not a reduction in the price of wheat in this country, but the increasing of the price in every possible way, or at least the enabling of the farmer to get the price which he is entitled to get for his wheat. The Government should enter upon a policy of valorizing the price of wheat, especially of the higher grades; but we certainly can at least provide storage for the wheat and furnish a banking system that will enable the farmer to carry his crop until such time as he can sell it at a fair price. If we had those facilities to offer to the western farmers, farmers would flock to the West and settle there, and we would see the West thrive as it has never thrived before.

Freight rates also have a bearing upon this question, and there may be relief in that direction. Parliament should find a way to improve the condition of the western farmer and to enable him to get the best possible price for his wheat. If we do that, we shall increase our production in a most surprising way; we shall bring prosperity again to the West, and we shall see a new and greater West in the near future.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): I have followed with a great deal of interest the speech of the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt). I am sure, whatever any one else may have said about the speech of my hon. friend, that he has at least brought a good deal of live information and reliable statistics to the notice of the House. The subject to which he has drawn our attention is certainly one of the greatest possible importance. During this discussion the hon. member for Brantford has been criticised for propounding a policy. It certainly cannot be said that the hon. gentleman has been propounding any policy. As I understood him, he was propounding a way in which to deal with an urgent condition of things brought about by the extraordinary state of the country at the present time. The resolution is perhaps not as well drafted as it might have been. As I read it, there is only one categorical assertion in it, namely:

That, in the opinion of this House, the circumstances arising out of the present war are such as to justify the Government of Canada in exercising supreme control over the quantity and destiny of our food exports.

There cannot be any objection to the resolution laid down to that point. It may be said that it calls for a great deal of work and that it imposes an unnecessary burden upon the Government; but it is a wise and sane statement to make, that the Government of the country, or any other country situated as we are, should have the greatest possible knowledge of the food supply of the country and that then it should know where it is going. The other phases which follow in the resolution are not necessarily the consequences of the first positive assertion, although they seem to be taken by the mover of the resolution as necessary consequences of it. I do not think that because the Government knows what quantity of foodstuffs there is in the country and their destination, the prices of foodstuffs will be regulated. I do not know much about the movement of wheat; but as far as I understand commercial conditions in this country, I know of nothing that would prevent a combine of speculators from buying up all the wheat that we have for sale in Canada, taking it to the United States and sending it to our enemies in the old land. This may be an absurd statement to make; but I know of nothing to prevent German money from coming into the United States, with which an American company may be formed for the purpose of buying our wheat and shipping it to Germany, if it can be got in there.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Germany has no money.

Mr. McKENZIE: My hon. friend is an authority on most things, but I would not care to change my mind with regard to voting for this resolution, because, as he says, there is no money in Germany. I would not care to take the risk of leaving our wheat within easy reach of Germany, even supposing that country has no money.

It is a fair and reasonable proposition that any country that is at war—and we are at war—should have absolute knowledge of the sinews of war within its bounds, and that it should have absolute control of where they shall go and how they shall go.

During the session of 1914, when we were only talking about war, which we then deemed to be far distant, legislation was passed giving control over the export of petroleum oil, because if war broke out, we should have absolute control of the oil so that it should not go out of the country except where thought advisable. If it were right to do that—and the legislation was passed without any controversy—surely it cannot be said that it would be wrong for the Government to have enabling legislation passed at this session to give it power to deal with this wheat question, if it were necessary to do so.

I do not quite understand that it is using very extraordinary powers for the Government of any country to take control of the food supply in time of war. It would be a species of expropriation of property. Wheat is property and land is property, and I do not think it would be any more drastic to expropiate wheat than to expropriate land.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman not recognize the fact that in so far as the House can give that power, the legislation is already on the statute book?

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not saying whether it is on the statute book or not. In reference to wheat, I am not aware that it is. Perhaps the hon. Solicitor-General will tell me where we have such legislation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In section 6 of the War Measures Act of the session of last August.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is quite possible. In that case, it is not necessary to legislate; it is a question as to whether it is a wise policy for the Government to act upon the legislation already on the statute book. It does not change the position that I have taken, which is simply this, that if we exercise the power contained in the 6th section of the statute passed as our War Act of last session, it is a certain species of expropriation: it would be expropriating wheat instead of, as in other cases, expropriating land. I suppose that it was under that War Act that we expropriated the land at Valcartier. We not only expropriated the land there, but also the grain, the potatoes, and I suppose the cattle in the field. We took everything there was. Surely, if we were justified in doing that, if that was a wise and proper policy, I cannot see that it can be over drastic or unwise to give the Government control of the wheat supply of this country, provided that the owner gets a fair and proper price for it. In view of the suggestion that has been made, what strikes me as possible to happen is that the wheat might go out of the country, and go beyond the border and we not have anything to say about it. If that happened, I think we should be sorry that we had not adopted laws and regulations to prevent it. I do not think it at all an unreasonable thing to regulate prices of food if a few people are in command of the food of the country and by reason of that food we find that the prices are going up by leaps and bounds.

Speaking for the part of the country from which I come, the province of Nova Scotia, which is an agricultural country to some extent, also a lumbering, a fishing and perhaps more than anything else, an iron, steel and coal producing country, there are thousands of men there who are dependent for the support of themselves and their families on their day's work. It is a well known fact that for the last eighteen months or more times have been very poor and workmen have not been able to earn the usual amount of money. It is a regrettable fact that it is difficult for these men to feed themselves and their families. It is a startling and discouraging thing for a man who is not earning at all or who is earning but a small wage, and who has seven or eight children to feed, to find that he must pay $9.15 for a barrel of flour. If there is anything the Prime Minister can do to enable that man to pay what is fair and reasonable for flour, and I mention that solely as an example of other things, to see to it that this barrel is sold at a fair profit, so that the farmer will be well paid and everybody handling the business well paid, and yet the poor man who buys it will not be robbed, I do not think that, as guardian of the interests of the people he would be doing anything but what was fair and right. I had the pleasure of hearing the Minister of Finance address a delegation with regard to the price of tobacco. He described the Government on that occasion as the physician of the body politic. I do not find fault with the figure, although I say that the present gang of doctors should never have passed the board and been licensed, still, having been licensed and passed as physicians, they are now in charge of the body politic. And if they now find the body politic suffering with a disease such as hunger, is it not right, from the minister's own definition of his position, that the Government should cause him to take such necessary steps to deal with the disease and reduce such ills as his extraordinary skill in such matters may well bring about? If without injury to the farmer we can keep the somebody who is increasing the prices from doing so, if we can regulate prices so that they should be fair to the poor man, I think that is what this resolution aims at. I do not think that the hon. gentleman is trying to make political capital out of it.

Perhaps I may be pardoned if I go back to somewhat ancient days. My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) is fond of quoting history, and he quotes it well, and his comparisons are not always to the advantage of the present day. If we go far back in history we find an instance of a wise man taking control of the wheat of the country. We find him storing it up and selling it out as it suited him. He sold it at proper prices. On another historic occasion there were in the wilderness a tremendous body of men, women and children—twelve thousand. And there was nothing for them to eat except certain small fishes and few loaves of bread. Here was a grand occasion when one man had a corner in the food supply We do not find that the Master told him: This is your chance, my boy; put up your food for sale and you can make your fortune. No, the Regulator and Governor took charge of the whole business. He disposed of the loaves and fishes, and disposed of them properly. If there is only a little bread and fish to be divided, then those who are responsible for the management of the country should take charge of that food and see to it that it is properly divided so that the country from one end to the other shall be supplied with food so far as that food will go. In my own country, I am sorry to say, the rapid increase in the price of flour is very embarrassing. When the mines are working, when people can readily sell timber, when the farmers are producing, no particular regulation is necessary. The miner, when he is at work, is a fine customer. In fact he is a little too free with his money, and when the hard times come he is up against it in a very short time.

If this resolution will put power into the hands of the Government that will enable them to say to those who grow wheat that they must not go too high in price, or say to the miller that he must not ask too much for flour, I shall be glad to support it. I have not examined the Bill we passed last August, nor am I suggesting the kind of legislation we should pass. I am glad to hear the statement of the Solicitor General that no legislation is necessary because the Government already have the power. That being so, there is no excuse on the part of the Government for not taking action if action is necessary. If this resolution goes to a vote, I shall have no hesitation in voting for it, so far as it goes to carry out the idea that the Government shall know how much food is in the country and where it goes.

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Richmond, N.S.): It was expected that during the past six months the Government would take some steps to prevent the undue enhancement of the price of foodstuffs; it was confidently asserted in the Government press that such action would be taken by the Government. I did think that the legislation which was passed at the August session of Parliament empowered the Government to take such action, and I quite agree that no further legislation is necessary. It is well known that the price of foodstuffs has been enhanced very far beyond the cost of the ingredients that enter into their production. I saw in the press a few weeks ago a statement that the Bakers' Association of Toronto had made representations to the Minister of Trade and Commerce protesting against the undue increase in the price of the materials entering into the manufacture of their products. It was alleged that the price of these articles had increased by 100 per cent within the last twelve months, and that of this increase the farmers had received only one-tenth.

I think that the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) does not necessarily imply that the farmers should not receive the very best price that they can obtain for their products; it is aimed, I think, more particularly, against the middleman, who is taking advantage of existing conditions for the purpose of exacting undue profits. Immediately after war was declared the price of flour in the province of Nova Scotia jumped up $2 a barrel. There was no reason for that increase; the merchants had laid in a stock of flour before war conditions could possibly have affected the price of wheat. Nevertheless, without any justification, they added $2, and in some cases more, to the price of each barrel of flour. I think that is a condition of affairs that ought to be promptly dealt with by the Government. I do not say that the farmers themselves derive too great a profit from their labour and the products of their labour, but I do say that before these products of the farm reach the consumer, the middlemen, through greed and a want of proper appreciation of the unfortunate conditions that confront the labouring men in Canada to-day, unduly increase their profits in respect of these articles. This is applicable to other food products as well as to flour and wheat. I do think that under the circumstances the Government ought not to hesitate to take such steps as would prevent the undue increase in the price of foodstuffs by the middlemen.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE (Lisgar): The matter of handling wheat in Canada has always been a vexed question, but in my opinion the most important consideration with which we are now confronted is that of seeing that the farmers in western Canada particularly those in the drouth-stricken districts, are supplied with seed grain. I understand that the Interior Department, under the arrangements which they have made, can supply only 400 bushels to each farmer, while many farmers in western Canada need 1,000 or 2,000 bushels of wheat for seed purposes. Some arrangement should be made whereby these farmers can be supplied with the necessary amount of seed grain. I think the Government would be justified in amending the banking laws of Canada so that banks would be empowered to take seed grain mortgages—which they can not do under the present law—thus enabling them to help the western farmers to obtain the extra seed grain that they need.

The great difficulty in connection with the wheat question is not the prices the farmers have been getting, but the extent to which the middlemen, or the millers, boost prices after 90 per cent of the wheat leaves the farmers' hands. Ever since I have been in western Canada the dealers and the millers have manipulated the prices and the market so that the producer of the grain receives the very lowest price and the consumer pays the very highest. Every year a special train leaves Winnipeg with millers, grain dealers and reporters; they travel over the prairie, and when they get back they spread abroad reports of the great crop we are going to have in western Canada. In this manner they pound the price down to the very lowest possible point; then the moment the wheat is sold by the farmer they start a cry about the great shortage of crop—that it will not be nearly as large as expected. Up, then, goes the price to the consumer, and the toll is paid to the middlemen.

Some persons say: why do the farmers not hold the wheat? Because the farmers owe money to the loan companies, machinery companies and general stores; these accounts must be paid, and they are compelled to sell their grain to obtain the necessary funds. The crop of 1913 was sold by the farmers at an average price of 65 cents a bushel. It costs over 60 cents to grow a bushel of grain, so hon. gentlemen can see that the farmers of western Canada made no money out of that crop. In the past year 90 per cent of the wheat went out of the farmers' hands at an average price of from 80 cents to $1 a bushel, and to-day it is boosted up to $1.65. I submit that this Government should control the gambling in the food products of Canada. To-day a man can go on the option market and buy wheat on a three cent margin. I think we should pass some law whereby speculators would be obliged to pay a margin of 25 cents on each bushel of wheat they buy. This would do away with a great deal of speculation in wheat. I have no hesitation in saying that in my opinion the middlemen—in this case the millers and the grain-dealers—are the persons who are robbing the people of this country. They rob the farmer, the man who grows the wheat, and they rob the consumer as well. The farmers of western Canada have 13,000,000 acres ready for wheat for next spring. If we have an average crop of 20 bushels to the acre, that will mean 260,000,000 bushels of wheat grown in the prairie provinces for next year. Some 60,000,000 bushels of wheat will be sufficient for bread and seed for the three provinces, which will leave 200,000,000 bushels for export. So that even before we started this great cry of patriotism and production the farmers of western Canada were getting ready to supply the old country markets. I think that it would be a mistake for this Government to try to control the price of wheat, but I do think they should control the gambling in the food products of this country.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I wish to offer a few remarks on this motion. I would not have done so, but apparently there are at least three hon. members in this House who are in sympathy with the resolution. When you allow your imagination to picture the vast extent of this country and our great community of interest, I do not think that you can come to any other conclusion than that this resolution is narrow and provincial in its character. It is an attempt to interfere with legitimate business, and would, as Premier Asquith stated with regard to similar legislation in the old land, cause no end of trouble.

Most of the discussion here to-day has reference to the effect that the resolution would have on the farmers of western Canada. The mover of it, however, comes from the province of Ontario. We do a little farming in the province of Ontario. Of course, the farmers there are not just as up to date as they are in other parts of the country, but this resolution would affect them to some extent at least; and I am sure that when the farmers of Canada read in the papers to-morrow the discussion that took place here on a resolution of this kind, they will be very much amused to think that this House has devoted as much time as it has to a discussion of this nature. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. W. H. Sharpe) thinks that the Government should not limit the amount of seed to be advanced to the western farmer to 400 bushels, that some farmers will require 1,000 or 2,000 bushels. I think that any farmer who has sufficient land to require 2,000 bushels to seed it, that is, 1,000 acres, should be in a position to acquire seed for himself without any assistance from the Government. I do not think it is a good thing for any class in a community to expect the Government to take up every little scheme and to solve all difficulties for them. I do not believe that that is in accordance with the genius of our people, nor do I think it would result in any benefit to them. I quite agree that the homesteader who may have invested every dollar he had in securing funds to work his homestead and who may have land ready for seed, if he is not in a position to procure seed, should have it advanced to him, as the Government in such case has ample security for the money advanced.

I wish to tell the House something about the western farmers. I have heard so much in the House and outside of it about the farmers in Eastern Canada advising the farmers in the West what to do, that I shall not advise them at all, as I do not feel competent to do so; nor am I going to advise the farmers in Ontario; but I want to tell some of the western farmers what some farmers in western Ontario are doing. They are buying stock in the West, shipping it down here to Ontario and buying feed from other parts of the country and from the United States; they are feeding that stock and putting it on the market, and they are doing that year after year. They are not doing that just for the fun of the thing, but they are doing it from a business standpoint. Two feed merchants in the constituency I represent have sold during the present winter nineteen carloads of cotton seed meal to be fed to stock in that county. This is a feature of Ontario farming. In the West farming is supposed to be wheat growing, but this resolution covers a great deal more than the growing of wheat. It has been read a number of times, but I shall read part of it again:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the circumstances arising out of the present war are such as to justify the Government of Canada in exercising supreme control over the quantity and destiny of our food exports, thereby regulating the prices at which bread, meat and other food products shall be sold for home consumption.

I am satisfied that agriculture cannot be carried on in this country, or in any other country, without stock raising being an adjunct of it, or rather, the basis on which it is founded. We found lately a change in the price of cattle in the cattle markets. I quote from the Toronto Globe of February 18:

> The bottom fell yesterday out of the beef cattle market in Toronto, and it may take a little while to restore it. Various causes are given for the almost unprecedented drop in prices, but only one of them seems to have in it any element of permanency: scarcity and consequent dearness of fodder. The combination of this with other causes has produced a situation which is by no means pleasant to pass through, but which is not likely to last very long. It would be a mistake for cattle-owners to hasten to get rid of their stock for fear of a worse thing happening to them; better far hold the animals over even at an undue cost, and take chances of a better market with improved cattle.

We have a solution offered here for the high cost of living in this country. A commission was appointed a year ago to investigate the high cost of living in Canada. The Globe undertakes to solve the beef question, and I shall read its solution:

> If it be said there are no lands fit for cattle-ranching purposes the answer must be that there are such lands in abundance in Northern Ontario. The obstacle to be overcome is not the lack of suitable land, but the unreasoning though apparently invincible skepticism of the beef cattle producers. Wherever the deer can live and thrive in a state of nature cattle can live and thrive with a little factitious assistance, and on a woodland ranch they will cost less and thrive better, even in winter, than if housed up and tended with great labour in the most new-fashioned subterranean stables.

We have not yet had a resolution before the House with regard to the land now occupied by the deer. Possibly something of that nature will develop before very long.

The farmers of Ontario to-day are feeding their livestock at a great loss, yet you never hear a word offered in this House or outside of it in sympathy with them. People are very ready to advise the farmer what to do. We have at the present time a movement on foot throughout Canada called the "patriotism and production campaign." I shall not say very much about that, but personally I believe that if these gentlemen would devote their energies to prayer, they might accomplish just as much as they will accomplish by what they are doing. The farmers of Canada are just as alive to their own interests as any other class in the community, and possibly not any more so. I cannot see any reason why they should be singled out at a time like this, as distinguished from any other time, to be made victims for the benefit of others. We have a community of interests in this country, and if we are going to make of Canada a country such as we hope to make it, there must be times when some sections or communities must suffer while others will be in a position to reap greater benefits. I am sorry that the matter has been taken so seriously by the House. I did not think there was any occasion for it and I am satisfied that the mover of the resolution did not fully consider the matter before bringing it to the attention of the House. As far as the farmers of Ontario are concerned—and they have just as great interests at stake as any other section of Canada—they are not asking for special favours, yet they do not want to be hampered in their legitimate business.

I believe that the greatest difficulty that the farmers have to contend with is the transportation problem and the lack of labour on the farm. These two things have brought about conditions that are detrimental to the whole country. We hear about thousands being out of employment in the towns and cities. No doubt many of them cannot get away from those places; all they have is invested there, they own their houses probably, they are mechanics and they are not accustomed to any other work. In the cities of Ontario there never was a time when it was more difficult to get men to go out and work upon the farm. That has been the case during the whole winter and I repeat that it was never more difficult to get men to work on the farms in Ontario than at the preseent time. That is the position. I went into the immigration office in the city of Toronto on Saturday last and the man in charge there said: Nothing doing here; I just placed one man last week. What do you think of that? Yet the cities are feeding thousands of men who say they cannot get employment in this country. Mind you, this is during the winter months. Some people say: Why does not the farmer build a house on the farm and keep his men the year round? These men will not stay with the farmer more than eight or nine months and then they flock to the cities. If many of the large cities would only exercise proper control over the unemployed they would not find so many people asking for assistance.

The condition that has come about in this country has developed during the last few years. When the farmers got to the stage when protection was of some value to them we found then, and not until then, that the Government of the day were prepared to allow imports of food products into this country free of duty. It was not until then that the conditions of which I am speaking manifested themselves. The farmers turned down that proposition and if you look over the imports into this country during the past few years you will find that we have in Canada a market that is second to none in the world. If we just leave things as they are and do not meddle with them we will find that a greater number will be induced to go back to the land and a greater development will take place in Canada than has been the case for many years past. I do not think that we need worry about this proposition. Let us see if we can improve the transportation facilities of this country, and I must say that I do not look very hopefully on the prospect. I see great obstacles in the way of doing that. We have altogether too many duplications of transportation facilities for what we have to transport and the result is that it will be impossible to give us the rate that we would have had if we did not have so many transcontinental lines.

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (South Cape Breton): If I correctly understand the resolution as proposed by the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt), I am in perfect accord with it. My understanding of it is that the Government should take some steps to prohibit the enormous profit that middlemen are making upon the food products of the country. It is proposed, as I understand it, that the Government should take some steps to control the foodstuffs of the country, especially flour, wheat and the items mentioned in the resolution. I could well understand the sentiment of the last speaker (Mr. Sutherland) if the farmers were making some of the enormous profits which are being made, and have been made, on foodstuffs since June, July and August of last year. My hon. friend says that the resolution is too narrow and provincial. I take a somewhat different view. I believe that this resolution is calculated to bring to the attention of the Government a serious grievance which the consumers have at the present time. He says that the proposal of the resolution is to make the farmers the victims. The farmers are the victims already. That was pointed out by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. W. H. Sharpe). I would not have any hesitation about expressing the wish that the farmers should get the very best prices they could for the products of their farms. I would like to see the fishermen and miners getting the very best prices they could for the products of their labour. When these products are cornered by middlemen and speculators, or when products of the farm are cornered by perhaps half a dozen speculators, who hoard them in their granaries, the products of the western farms, as well as the products of the eastern farms and the farms of Ontario, when they take advantage of the misfortune of Canada, in common with the rest of the Empire, in connection with the struggle which we are waging, to force consumers to pay exorbitant and, I might say, awful prices for their food, it is the duty of the Government, in the interests of the people, to do something that shall prevent these middlemen, these speculators, from making fortunes themselves at the expense of the common people and of the Empire at large.

What is the fact? When we are buying flour in western Canada for $6 a barrel the farmer on the prairie was making as much money as he is to-day. The farmer, three, four and five years ago, when we in the East were paying $6 and sometimes $5.75 a barrel for the very best flour, was making as much money as he is to-day. What are we paying in eastern Canada for flour? We are paying $9.25 for Five Roses flour, a brand which, I understand, is made from hard wheat. I do not think that the farmers in the West are making any more money on account of the excessive rise in the price of flour which has taken place during the past three or four months than they were making before. I have been given to understand by many people from western Canada that the wheat of the farmers of the West was sold to the millers and middlemen at not very much over the ordinary rate and that the middlemen and millers took advantage of the misfortunes of the country. We pride ourselves on being loyal to the Empire, and I think it is a proud boast that we are trying to do everything we can to further the interests of our common Empire in this struggle for existence. To-day the wheat market in Canada and the price of the wheat that we are exporting to the old land are controlled by the Chicago market, a market which is foreign to the British Empire. I can point to several milling industries in this country whose stocks have increased eight points since last Christmas, and of course the farmers who raised the wheat derive no profit from that. We have in the world to-day plenty of wheat and plenty of flour for consumption until the next crop is harvested, but it is not supply and demand which controls the price, but speculators who have hoarded the produce of the world and who are waxing fat at the expense of the Canadian and British taxpayer and consumer. The Government would be doing only its duty if it enforced the legislation passed at the special session of Parliament in August. The hon. gentleman suggested that it is possible that some of our wheat has reached the markets of our enemies, and indeed the public press of this country has made the statement that Canadian wheat has been shipped to the United States and thence to enemies' ports. I have no evidence to corroborate that, but if it be so it is all the more reason why the Government should take control of the flour and wheat remaining in this country.

I would not be so pronounced in favour of the idea set out in the resolution, if the workers in the industrial centres of Canada were living under the same conditions as they were a year ago. In eastern Canada, and that is the only portion of Canada as to which I am thoroughly familiar with the conditions, our operators in the mines and steel plants are working now about half time, and it is an enormous hardship on those who are only earning half the ordinary wages that they should have to pay almost double for the flour, the meat and the bread, which are necessaries of their subsistence. It is not very often I am able to agree with the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt), but in this case I endorse most heartily his suggestion that the Government should exercise control over the price and the export of Canadian foodstuffs. This is not the only parliament in which this question is now being discussed. I have no doubt that in a day or two we shall get a very pronounced idea from the Government and Parliament of Great Britain as to what they intend to do with regard to this question. The last reports I have seen in our newspapers, and also in a newspaper published in Sydney, Australia, was that the Australasian Government intended to take over control of practically all the foodstuffs in that country. If it were that the farmers or producers were being made the victoms in not getting a reasonable price for their products, I would not raise my voice in favour of this resolution, but we know that such is not the fact. The wheat has gone from the farmers and they have only reciived a reasonable price for it, so that the people who are getting these exorbitant profits are the speculators and the middlemen who never ploughed a furrow or garnered an ear of wheat. I believe that the Government will be well advised, should they exercise the power they have and control the prices of foodstuffs, as well as the export of wheat and flour from this country, so that it cannot reach channels where it may become the staff of life of the enemies of the Empire.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: One hon. member on the other side of the House suggested that the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt), in proposing this resolution, desired to cast some reflection upon the patriotism of the farmers of Canada. I am bound to say that I gathered no such idea or meaning from anything said by the hon. member for Brantford. I know that he realizes, as all members of the House realize, the spirit of patriotism which has inspired the farmers of Canada, whether in the East or in the West, and all the people of Canada, in the great crisis which the Empire now faces. I desire to join in the appreciation which has been expressed by an hon. gentleman on the other side, of the spirit of those citizens who have come to us from the south of the line, and who, at the present time, as indeed before the war broke out, are discharging in the most commendable manner all the duties of Canadian citizenship.

An hon. gentleman on the other side of the House suggested that my hon. friend from Brantford and those in his community, should be prepared to make some sacrifice themselves. I would like that hon. gentleman to bear in mind that the hon. member for Brantford is making the greatest of all sacrifices that a man can make, in sending those of his own family and his own flesh and blood to fight for the Empire.

I deeply regret, as every hon. member regrets, that there are workingmen in Brantford, and doubtless in other industrial centres, who at the present time are not able to find employment to the full extent they would desire, but there is the consideration that conditions in Canada are certainly not worse in that respect, and perhaps not so bad, as they are in the neighbouring republic. We know from statements appearing in the press of the United States that this war has brought about conditions there perhaps more depressing than anything to which we can point in this country at the present time; but, as far as those men in Canada who lack work at the moment are concerned, it would be more in the general interest, more in the interest of the men themselves, that we should endeavour to turn our energies, so far as the Government may exercise any power at its command, to find some means of providing work for them rather than to undertake the control of the price of food supplies, except under certain conditions to which I will allude a little later on.

I am very glad indeed to hear my hon. friend the member for Brantford say that a certain manufacturing company with which he is understood to be associated has not increased, and does not intend to increase, the price of its products to the farmers or other persons in this country who may desire to purchase them. The allusion made by one hon. gentleman on the other side of the House as to some increase in price in that regard can not have any relation to that company, or to other companies in a similar line of business who are manufacturing in Canada at the present time.

So far as the general question is concerned, the policy which the Government has endeavoured to follow since the outbreak of war is not to interfere with the business activities of the country, except in so far as this is absolutely and imperatively demanded of it by reason of the war or by reason of conditions arising out of the war. In other words, the less interference by a Government under conditions such as prevail at the present time, the less interference with the business activities of the country, with the sale or the free interchange of products, the better for the country, except in so far as the war itself demands otherwise. If my hon. friend from Brantford had found it convenient to come to myself or to some other member of the Government for information on some points on which he has addressed the House this afternoon, he might have saved himself the trouble of making some points of his speech. He has spoken in the first place of the desirability of regulating the export of food products, particularly wheat. He has spoken in the second place of the desirability of regulating the destination of such food products, particularly wheat, so that they shall not reach an enemy country. In the third place, he has spoken of the desirability of regulating the price at which such food products should be sold in this country.

Let us take, in the first place, the question of export. That presents itself to us in two aspects: firstly, the desirability of preventing any such export as would leave the people of this country destitute, between now and the next harvest, of a sufficient food supply. I would like to point out to my hon. friend that the question of food supply, so far as wheat and wheat products are concerned, is not solely a question of the wheat in this country, but a question of the wheat available for milling and of the flour in the country. I would like to assure him and all other hon. members that this subject has more or less engaged the attention of the Government; that we know something of the supply in that regard, and that we do not think conditions in this country at the present time are such as to make any action by the Government necessary so far as that particular feature of the question is concerned.

In the next place, my hon. friend speaks of wheat leaving this country and reaching an enemy country. In that is involved the question of destination, to which I alluded a moment ago. He has spoken of a return which has been brought down, and he has attached importance to the fact that 368 barrels of flour seem to have reached Germany since the first day of August last.

Every hon. member knows that since the proclamation, which has been validated by Parliament, it is absolutely impossible for any man in this country to have intercourse by way of trade with any citizen of an enemy country, unless he desires to place himself under very severe penalties of the law. Therefore, I would assume that the 368 barrels—which seems a very minor matter to be alarmed about—must have gone between the first and the fourth of August; because my hon. friend asked for a return from the first of August, and there was no declaration of war until the evening of the fourth of August. So far as the exports to Holland and Norway are concerned, they do not seem to be very much greater than those which took place in ordinary years. If my hon. friend had directed his attention to the Canada Gazette, he would have found an important enactment by the Government in that regard, to which I will, in a moment, draw the attention of the House.

With regard to the question of prohibiting export from this country of any article of supply which might be useful to the enemy, we have acted thoroughly in accordance with a committee constituted for that purpose in Great Britain, whose activities commenced almost immediately after the war had begun—a committee which deals almost entirely with the question of prohibiting or not prohibiting the export from Great Britain, or, by co-operation with the Government of any Dominion, from any British possession, of articles which may be of use to the enemy. On occasions when recommendations or suggestions have come to us, we have felt called upon, in the interests of this Dominion, to make certain representations to the committee through the British Government which have always been met in the most friendly spirit, and there has always been friendly co-operation in all such matters between the Government of the United Kingdom and the Government of Canada from the very first. So far as this particular question is concerned, there has never been the slightest difference between the two Governments, and the suggestions of the Government of the United Kingdom have never been called in question by us, nor has our action ever been called in question by it. In accordance with the suggestions of that committee communicated to us, we passed an Order in Council on the 29th day of October last by which we prohibited the exportation from Canada of certain articles to all foreign ports in Europe and on the Mediterranean and Black seas, with the exception of those of France, Russia (except the Baltic ports), Spain and Portugal. Among the articles enumerated, in a long list with which I need not trouble the House, I find feeding stuffs for animals and all foodstuffs and raw materials for the same. Therefore I desire to assure my hon. friend and all hon. members that this subject has been taken into consideration in the first place by the British Government, and especially by the committee to which I have just now alluded, and, in the second place, upon representations and suggestions from the committee through the British Government, by the Government of Canada, with the result which I have just now pointed out.

In the next place, my hon. friend suggests that there should be a regulation of the price of foodstuffs, more particularly of wheat. So far as wheat is concerned, I would be very sorry to attempt anything of the kind, and for the following reasons. In the first place, the price of wheat, as has been recognized in this House and in the country ever since I have been a member of the House, is regulated by the markets of the world, regulated very largely by the prices established in the great markets of the Mother Country. Now, if we undertook to regulate the price, what would be a fair basis for doing so? A fair basis would be to regulate it from time to time in accordance with what would be determined by the markets of the world. For, inasmuch as the farmer, when the price of wheat is low, must be limited in the price which he receives by the markets of the world from time to time, in common justice we can only adopt the same principle when the price has been increased by exceptional conditions, and that would leave the matter where it was in the first place. For us to say to the farmer, when the price of wheat is at the highest by reason of war or other conditions, that we must limit the price which he receives, and that in other years and under other conditions he must accept a price which barely covers what it costs him to grow the wheat, that would seem to me a position which could not be maintained. At all events, it is a position which I would not care to take, nor is it one to which I could give my sanction. Therefore I do not think it would be desirable for the country to attempt any such course as my hon. friend has suggested. We desire in this country that there shall be more production from the land. It would be, I think, a very unfortunate initiative on the part of this Government to undertake at the present time and under present conditions the limitation of the price which the farmer shall receive for his wheat.

That leads to quite another aspect of the situation, and that is, the efforts of people in this country to combine for the purpose of raising the price of foodstuffs after they have left the hands of the first producers. We have not been unmindful of our duty in that regard, and have endeavoured to watch the situation very carefully. A great many representation of a general character have been made to me from time to time, and if any good ground can be established to show that people are combining for the purpose of enhancing unduly the prices of foodstuffs in a general way throughout Canada, I am bound to say that the Government would feel it its duty to give consideration to these representations, and to determine whether or not some action should be taken in the early future.

So far as foodstuffs are concerned, the hon. gentleman has only spoken of wheat, flour and meat. I am not disposed, from the information before me at the present moment, to agree that the prices of meat products have advanced. My information is that not only has there been a reduction in the prices of some of these products there are many food products in Canada as to which there is a difficulty in finding a market. During the past two or three months we have been endeavouring to find markets in the United Kingdom for food products, which may spoil for lack of people to consume them. For example, there is an enormous quantity of canned goods for which there is the greatest difficulty in securing materials even at cost prices. I understand from my colleague from the province of New Brunswick, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), that in that province there is a surplus of potatoes of about a million and a half bushels for which they would be glad to find a market. We know there has been a great abundance of apples. And we know that at one time—though not so much lately—there was considerable difficulty apprehended in finding a market for the surplus fish product of the country. I understand the situation in that regard has been improved in the last few weeks. So that I cannot see that there is any special reason for us to pass the resolution my hon. friend from Brantford has proposed.

I have listened to what my hon. friend from Brantford has said as to the danger to the Mother Country of a lack of food supplies. I can only say that if there is any such danger apprehended in the Mother Country at the present time, I have given ample notice within the last six or eight weeks of very great stores of food supplies which the producers of this country would be very glad to send to the United Kingdom at not more than they have cost them, without any profit. So I do not think we need have much apprehension so far as the Mother Country is concerned. The authorities of the United Kingdom, if there were any danger or difficulty in that regard, would have found occasion to communicate with us in reply to our frequent communications as to available stores in Canada. On the contrary, when we have communicated with them on the subject, they have in almost every case assured us that there were large stores of the particular articles in question available in the United Kingdom. Naturally, they would be glad indeed to assist us, if they could do so, in finding a market in the United Kingdom for the surplus food products of Canada, but they were not needed there at that moment.

Under the circumstances, while I appreciate the motive of my hon. friend from Brantford in bringing the matter to the attention of the Government, I regret that we cannot find it desirable to accept the motion at the moment. If conditions should at a later day so develop as to make anything of the kind necessary, my hon. friend may feel quite sure that we shall endeavour to keep in very close touch with the situation and take such measures as, according to our understanding of the conditions, may be necessary for the purpose he has in mind.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (South Renfrew): I had intended making a few remarks before the Prime Minister spoke. I had not the pleasure of hearing all my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) said on this question. I think the importance of the question entitles it to considerable attention on the part of the House, because people throughout Canada are talking about this matter a good deal. The trouble is that nobody seems to have a real cure for it. I am inclined to agree with the Prime Minister that the great strength of the British Empire at the present time is that she with her Dominions has plenty of foodstuffs. However long this war may last there will be foodstuffs enough to see the Empire through. So far as the products of our Canadian people are concerned, I do not foresee any danger. As to prices and the high cost of living, I had hoped that the report of the commission appointed by the Government would have been down before this, so that we could have seen what was the cause and what should be the cure. The difficulty seems to be with us in Canada, as elsewhere, that cheap prices to the producer do not always mean cheap prices to the consumer. Between the price received by the man behind the plough and the price paid by the man who consumes the product there is too wide a spread to be accounted for by an ordinary profit, it is argued. I would not say we should not have middlemen. "Middleman" is merely another name for a dealer in articles of commerce. Properly conducted, this is as honourable a business as a man can follow. The business of the world could not be systematically conducted if it were not for the operation of specialists who go between, as it were, other individuals or bodies who are not specialists. It may be that in Canada there are too many people who handle the goods between the time they are produced and the time they are consumed; I had hoped that the commission of investigation would look into that phase of the question, and, perhaps, have thrown some light upon it. Again, there may be many middlemen who are anxious to make two or three profits; that is human nature, and you will almost have to remodel man before you altogether eradicate that from his system. The man, however, who will take advantage of the patriotism of the people and their loyal devotion to king and country in order to fill his own pockets is the worst kind of traitor that can be found; he is trading on the best that is in people for his own selfish purposes. As to whether that could be controlled, I am not prepared to say; in any case I am inclined to think that it could not be controlled in the manner suggested by the hon. member for Brantford. It is a big question, and could not be grappled with in a few moments.

The question of unemployment is one that comes very close to those who live in industrial centres, large or small. Although many persons are out of employment at present, I think I am safe in saying that in many of our manufacturing centres men have employment to-day that they would not have had if there had been no war. A great many of our factories—I speak from personal knowledge—are working half-time, some three-quarter time, some full time and some double time, on orders which they have obtained as a result of the war.

I touch now upon a very delicate point: I was severely criticised for referring to this at several patriotic meetings which I addressed throughout Canada. Without going into what I consider to be the duty of the banks at the present time, I submit that it is as important to the British Empire that the whistles should be kept blowing everywhere as it is that men should be kept in the trenches. Anything that does not tend to accomplish this does not tend to the best interests of Canada and the Empire as a whole. I think it is fair to the manufacturing interests to say that they have manufactured goods in many instances to the full capacity of their warehouses. They have no sale for the goods; many of them have stock on hand sufficiently large to last a year or more, and unless they have new capital they are not in a position to engage in further manufactures. I think the banks ought to do all they can to enable the manufacturers to go on manufacturing and putting their goods in the warehouse until such time as they can be sold. That would give employment to the men—if not permanently, at least for a time—and thus remove from the people of Canada and from the Empire as well, one of the greatest difficulties which we now have to face. It has been charged that the banks are not as generous as they should be. I am not sufficiently expert in financial matters to critcise them in that respect, but it does strike me that now is the time, if ever there was a time, when the financial institutions ought to take full advantage of the privileges given them by the Government and to do their utmost to see that the manufacturing establishments of Canada are kept going as near full time as possible. That would reduce the seriousness of the unemployment question to a minimum, at least.

I am fearful lest some of our mineral productions may possibly get into the hands of the enemy; I speak now more particularly of our nickel and copper. It has been said that the British Government is perfectly satisfied that none of it is getting into the hands of the enemy, and I am glad of that assertion. The Dominion of Canada, a part of the Britisn Empire, and France, one of her Allies, control practically the whole nickel output of the world. With the supply from these sources shut off, it is only a matter of mathematical calculation as to how long Germany can find an adequate supply of this material to carry on her warfare. I think it is absolutely important and in the interests of the Allies that we should be perfectly sure that not an ounce of our copper or nickel gets to Germany. She can get her wheat elsewhere, but she cannot get her copper and nickel elsewhere than from the Allies. I hope everything has been done that can be done to this end; if anything can be done by the Government to make it absolutely impossible for our nickel to get into the hands of the enemy, I am prepared to support any steps that they may take to that end. I would not go so far as some hon. gentlemen propose and forbid the export of nickel for all time to come, but I would urge on the Government that all possible precautions be taken to prevent its getting into the hands of the enemy. I am far more concerned about that than I am about the food supply, because I think that under the circumstances, if there are not too many go-betweens operating between the producer and the consumer, supply and demand will usually regulate the prices.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I am disappointed with the spirit in which members of the House have treated this resolution, and feel that they have given the discussion a turn that was not within the scope of the resolution. I endeavoured in a fair and businesslike way to show to the House the statistics of the wheat and food markets of Canada, and I expected that the gentlemen who opposed the proposition I was making would endeavour at least to show that the figures which I had quoted were wrong, and that, therefore, they had led me to erroneous conclusions. But man after man has spoken on the question, and scarcely one han. gentleman has referred to the statistical position of wheat in Canada, in the United States and in the markets of the world. No hon. gentleman has shown that I was wrong in the quotations that I made from Government and other returns. The hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) tells us that we are wasting a good deal of time upon a discussion that the country will be laughing at to-morrow, but I am afraid he will be laughed at himself. This is a question serious enough to engage the attention of all the parliaments of the world, not for a few hours but in some cases for days and which one has led to very drastic action by most governments. I think my hon. friend will see from this that he is not quite right when he says that we are wasting time on a matter of no importance.

My hon. friend comes from the same county as the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), who told us only a session ago, if I remember aright, that in the county of Oxford they grew wheat for the straw only. So if my hon. friend has regard for the straw, he can keep that at home for the benefit of the land to make it more fertile; but, so far as the wheat is concerned, I think I have established the fact that we are facing a crisis. I agree with the Prime Minister that I did not pay the same attention to flour being on hand, but probably the supply of flour is no more than it was a year ago and I have shown that the supply of wheat is a great deal less, I have shown that the statistical position with regard to wheat is that we have less than one-half of what we usually have at this season of the year, that we are facing most enormous demands on the part of the countries at war and in addition to that we have an unprecedented demand for seeding in the West. All these things are going to come within the next two months, and let me point out that my resolution does not attempt to deal with future but with present conditions, not with the crop of 1915 but with what remains of the crop of 1914. There is a big difference there. I said only in my opening remarks that I believed the crisis had not yet been fully reached but probably would be reached within the next sixty or ninety days; but that the wheat supply of Canada and the United States was growing rapidly less, that the position was such as to demand the critical attention of those in authority to see that excessive exportation does not take place. I think that is a proposition that has not been gainsaid by any of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken.

I have received some support from unexpected quarters and a larger amount of opposition from quarters that I thought might have supported the resolution. I have been taunted with being a protectionist when talking about manufactures and a free trader when it comes to farming commodities; but no one who knows me and knows the speeches that I have made both in the campaigns and in the House can reasonably challenge me for having ever gone back on the farmer getting all the protection and all the advantage that can be got out of the tariff, just as the producer in the city. I can say that, without fear of contradiction, I have nothing to hide in that respect, I believe the farmer is entitled to protection of all his products the same as the manufacturer. I say that the farmer is entitled in ordinary times to get all the money he can possibly obtain for his commodities. I made the statement in opening that in my opinion the farmer in this country should never be asked to sell wheat at less than one dollar. I regret that the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Martin) is not in his place. He said he could recall a remark of mine that the farmer should never get above a dollar for his wheat. I challenge the hon. gentleman to produce any statement of that kind; I have never made such a statement to my knowledge. The hon. gentleman made other random statements with equally little foundation. I ask him to produce a case. He charged against the firm which bears my name, and with the management with which I have no connection, that a plough manufactured by them can be bought in the United States at $100 less than the ordinary price in the Dominion of Canada. I want the hon. gentleman to give me the facts, and I shall have them investigated. So far as I know, the statement is without foundation. So far as I know the firm which bears my name, and with which I have only a slight connection as a shareholder, has not exported a plough to the United States for three years. I explained that they tried once to open up a trade with our neighbours, and were met with the most drastic measures that any firm ever met in endeavouring to carry on trade with the United States. Their goods were seized at the border, held up for a long time, and they were fined heavily. Talk about the advantage in the great market of 90,000,000 people! These gentlemen may take all the advantages and profits if they will only take the losses on these transactions. If the hon. member for Regina has evidence of such a case as he speaks of, let him bring it forward and I shall endeavour to show him that the charge he makes is without foundation. I believe I am speaking by the book when I say that no exportation of agricultural implements has taken place from Brantford to the United States during the last three years. Some hon. gentlemen opposite seem to think that every question I have ever raised can be answered by the one parrot cry: What about the price of ploughs and the robbery of the farmer? That seems to be the one retort that some hon. members from the West can make.

I introduced this question, trusting it would be discussed in a statesmanlike way, and not like a peanut politician; but a good many members from the other side have discussed it in the latter spirit. It is a large question, and should be discussed on its merits. It is a question that has some merits, and I am pleased to know that the Prime Minister has said the Government will keep their eyes upon the question, and, if circumstances become more acute and the crisis more extreme, will be ready to interfere at least with the profits of the middleman. I think the Prime Minister went so far as that. I pointed out that the middleman is getting nearly all the advantage of the rise in price now, that only ten per cent of the wheat of the 1914 crop is in the farmers' hands, and that ninety per cent of it is in the hands of the millers or speculators or has left the country. Under those conditions the farmers to-day are buyers of wheat rather than sellers of wheat. I venture to say there are more farmers in the West who will have to buy wheat for their spring planting than have wheat in their barns to sell at the present moment.

With regard to the wheat exportation, what I desired to point out was the danger of over exportation of wheat during the coming sixty or ninety days. I think that that is a possibility and even a probability unless other export markets of the world open up in the meantime. Russia, as I believe, is hoping to furnish 100,000,000 bushels providing the Allies can clear out the Dardanelles and make a passage for wheat carriers from Odessa to Liverpool and London. One hon. gentleman read a quotation from to-night's paper showing that the Liverpool stock of food is greater than was ever known before; but I saw an article in the paper to-night saying that although in Chicago wheat plunged down, they took no notice of the Liverpool market which made an advance. They paid no attention to the fact that the Liverpool market showed an advance instead of a decline. I think that in Liverpool and London they know as much about the chances of the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles being opened as in Chicago; and if Liverpool advances and Chicago goes down it looks as if they thought in England that the food situation demanded attention. Statesmen in Great Britain have discussed this situation seriously. Mr. Asquith did not make fun of the question of the conservation of the nation's wheat supply or of the people's supply of food or of the prices the workingman was being charged for his food. Mr. Lloyd George, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, did not belittle the sufferings of the British people who were crying out for cheaper food. So I might go on and quote the remarks of many statesmen who have given attention to this subject and have thought it well worthy to discuss and give consideration to. Further, I pointed out that Australia, a country quite as democratic as ours, a country ruled by the labour party at the present time, did not wait very long for the action of Parliament. They did not take into consideration all that might happen in the first six months of the war, but in about one month after the war began the Government of Australia took possession of the wheat supply of Australia and arbitrarily fixed the price at $1.25 per bushel. In my judgment they took a wise action. New Zealand is in the same position. Every country in Europe, bar Russia, is short of food. Some are in that position to-day; they have no food at present and no prospects for the future. Belgium, the best tilled country in the world, has been devastated from end to end and no crop is likely to be put in there during the coming season. Seven million people are dependent upon the outside world for their food supply. Eighty thousand tons of food are required weekly to feed the people of Belgium. What is true of Belgium is also true of Poland, what is true of Poland is true of Serbia, and what is true of Serbia is partially true of Austria, Germany and France. Try as we may, we in Canada do not realize what the people of Europe are contending with. They know what the scarcity of food means, they know what it means to go to the cupboard and find no loaf or anything else, with a wife and perishing children in the house. They know the effect of want. They know what it means to lack food and clothing. All these things are denied to many of the people of the nations of Europe who are probably just as much deserving at the hands of Providence as we are in this splendid and comparatively prosperous country.

What I have pointed out in this House I have done in all sincerity, believing that I was justified by the statistics that I have quoted. I believe that the food supply of Canada should be conserved, firstly, for the British people themselves, and then for the Allies, and the countries friendly with the Mother Country in the cause that we have espoused. I have not heard that part of the subject challenged very seriously. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister has said that probably this amount of flour that went to Germany was sent there before war was declared. Possibly that is the explanation, but I think the explanation in regard to Norway and Holland that are closely in touch with Germany and I have no doubt have been feeding the Germans to a greater or less extent, may be open to grave doubt.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not know whether I made myself clear to my hon. friend. On the 29th October last we passed an Order in Council which covered Norway and Holland.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I did not understand my right hon. friend to make that statement. I know there is an Order in Council, but I am not so sure even here to-night that that Order in Council has been quite as effective as it might have been; at least, there is in the mind of some people,, and evidently in that of many newspapers, the idea may be a mistaken one—that some food from Canada has been reaching enemy countries. There is little doubt of that. Only recently seven carloads of flour shipped to Salonika were held up at the border. I give all credit to the head of the department who did it. I do not know who did it but I understand that seven carloads that were just being sent out of Canada three or four weeks ago bound for Salonika, which is part of the enemy's country, were held up. Flour should be consigned to our own Allies if we have any to spare, or should be kept to furnish the sinews of war to our own cause and for our own people and not be diverted into enemy countries.

I have only issued this as a kind of warning. I have been freely criticised. I am ready for criticism in a fair and reasonable way but when I am criticised I would like my hon. friends to show wherein the statistics and figures I have given were contrary to the fact. If they did not vary from the fact then I have made out a case that is worthy of the best consideration of the Government. I have no desire to make what is hard any harder for any of the hon. gentlemen who are on the treasury benches who are controlling the destinies of this country. Nothing was further from my mind than that any further difficulty should be put upon them, any single ounce of burden that they are not at present bearing because they have plenty upon their shoulders to deal with in these war problems. I have every confidence that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) has this matter under very close survellance and that he is prepared to see that everything I have suggested is done. I am sure that the country will feel that the air has been somewhat cleared at least by the reassuring statement of the Prime Minister and others that we in Canada have no cause to worry, that the British Empire has no cause to worry, that food supplies are in abundance and are likely to be and that we are not likely to suffer from any adversity of that kind. I trust that is true, but I feel that I have done nothing short of my duty, and anything beyond my duty, in endeavouring to point out to the House that in my judgment the amount of our exportation and the destination of it should be under the strict supervision of the Government and that there should at all times be available in this country a supply necessary for our own domestic requirements and that if we have anything over it should be kept for Great Britain and the other overseas dominions.

Under the circumstances, I do not desire to press my motion. I have received considerable support and also a good deal of criticism. I presume that the temper of the House is that it would not be wise at the present time to pass this resolution and in view of the promise of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, who has stated that they will keep an eye upon the situation and if it becomes necessary will act in so far as speculation at any rate is concerned, I do not think it would be wise for me to challenge a division of the House. Taking what the Prime Minister has said as being likely to happen, and accepting his promise that they will watch this question in such a manner as to see that no injustice is done to anybody in Canada, I leave the matter and will be quite willing for you, Mr. Speaker, to call the resolution "lost upon division."

Motion negatived on division.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS,

Mr. Marcil: For a copy of the report of the officer in charge of the lobster hatchery at Port Daniel west, and of the report of the inspection thereof for the season 1914.

Chisholm: For a copy of all letters, telegrams, petitions, reports and pay-rolls in any way referring to the expenditure of public money on the repairs to the wharf at Margaree harbour breakwater; repairs to the Grand Etang piers; repairs to the Port Hood wharf; repairs to St. Joseph's piers; repairs to Pleasant Bay wharf, and repairs to Inverness harbour since October 1, 1911, to date, with date of each expenditure.

Mr. A. W. Chisholm: For a return showing the number of miles of telegraph lines, and the locations erected in the county of Inverness, each year since 1896, to the present day, with the cost of each line.

Mr. A. W. Chisholm: For a return showing the amount of dredging done in the county of Inverness since 1896, up to the present; where such dredging was done, the quantity of dredging done in each place, and dates on which such dredging was done, also the cost in each case of such dredging.

Mr. A. W. Chisholm: For a return showing the amount of railway subsidies paid in the county of Inverness since 1896, to date, and the dates on which such subsidies were paid.

Mr. A. W. Chisholm: For a copy of all telegrams, letters, petitions, reports, recommendations and documents of all kinds in any way referring to the purchase of a site for a public building at Port Hawkesbury, and also referring in any way to the erection of a public building thereon.

On the motion of Sir Robert Borden, the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

Tuesday, March 2, 1915.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

DIVISION OF BILL.

Mr. E. A. LANCASTER (Lincoln) moved:

That Bill No. 17, respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, be recommitted to the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, with an instruction to divide the same into two Bills and to eliminate from the present Bill and place in the second Bill all that portion of the present Bill, including the schedule thereto, that relates to a certain agreement between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company, respecting terminals at North Toronto, in accordance with the third report of the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NORTHERN ONTARIO RAILWAY—BILL WITHDRAWN.

Mr. E. A. LANCASTER (Lincoln) moved:

That Bill No. 33, to confirm certain agreements made between the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company, the Georgian Bay and Seaboard Railway Company, and the Campbellford, Lake Ontario and Western Railway Company, be withdrawn, in accordance with the recommendations contained in the third report of the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

Mr. SPEAKER: What about a motion to remit the fees?

Mr. LANCASTER: The fees paid have not been in excess of the cost of printing and translation, and therefore there is nothing to remit.

Mr. GRAHAM: What reasons did the company give for wishing to withdraw the Bill?

Mr. LANCASTER: I do not know that any particular reason was given. When the Bill was called in the committee, the gentleman in charge of the Bill moved that it be withdrawn, and the motion was carried. I believe there was opposition to the Bill, coming from the city of Belleville, but that was not stated in the committee.

Mr. BLAIN: The Bill stood in my name. The companies mentioned in the Bill were unable to come to any satisfactory agreement, and they thought it was better to have further time, and so they requested that the Bill be withdrawn.

Motion agreed to.

17th BATTALION NOVA SCOTIA HIGHLANDERS.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. KYTE: On Friday I called the attention of the Government to a despatch that is going the rounds of the Canadian newspapers concerning the conditions in which the 17th Battalion of Nova Scotia Highlanders find themselves in the old country. It is reported that the commanding officer, Col. Struan Robertson, was relieved of his command on the 28th of January, and that the only satisfaction which he had been able to obtain from the General Officer Commanding was "that the authorities were down on him." The despatch contains many other matters which affect the standing of the Nova Scotia contingent and put it in a rather unenviable condition as compared with the other portions of the overseas contingent. Has the Prime Minister any information on the subject?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The arrangements for the troops on the other side have been entirely in the hands of the War Office, and we have no information from the War Office nor from any other source which would lead us to believe that the statements alluded to are well founded. I understand that the 600 or 700 men who went from Nova Scotia, together with four other battalions, have been set apart as reinforcements for the troops going to the front. I did see in the press, although I have no official information on the subject, that some men from the Nova Scotian regiment were to be sent forward as reinforcements for the Princess Patricia regiment. The Minister of Militia informs me that they were also to provide reinforcements for one of the Highland brigades. So far as Col. Struan Robertson is concerned, we have no information as to his having been relieved of his command. Nothing of that kind has originated or could originate here, and we are not aware that anything of the kind has transpired.

ILLNESS OF COL. LABATT.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. GRAHAM: I note by the press that Col. Labatt has retired on account of illness. Who succeeds him?

Major-General HUGHES: I have no information on this subject, other than what is to be found in the newspapers. Col. Labatt has undergone a very serious operation, and, until he recovers from the effects of it, I presume some one else will be placed in command of his regiment. The information regarding his illness came by wire, and we have not as yet received any official information on the subject.

SERVICE OF MR. CARRICK, M.P.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. GRAHAM: I notice in the papers a despatch stating that one of our colleagues in the House has been appointed as eye-witness with Sir Max Aitkin for the purpose of getting information with regard to the movement of Canadian troops, the furnishing of casualty lists, and so on. I have reference to Mr. Carrick. Has he been appointed by this Government or by the British Government; what rank does he hold, and is information being furnished to this Government by him?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: So far as I am aware, there has been no person appointed as eye-witness by this Government, notwithstanding all statements in the press to the contrary. Sir Max Aitkin was appointed to discharge certain duties in connection with the Recording Office in London. Mr. Carrick, who received the rank of honorary lieutenant colonel of his own regiment, desired to be of service in any capacity for which he might be available, and he was sent forward at his own request to have his services utilized in such manner as the War Office might deem expedient. Neither he nor Sir Max Aitkin has been appointed an eye-witness.

COL. McLEOD'S BATTALION.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. PUGSLEY: Has the Minister of Militia received any complaints with regard to certain dispositions made or proposed to be made in the various units which go to make up the battalion from officers in the battalion commanded by Col. McLeod, a member of this House? If so, what is the nature of those complaints, and has the minister given personal attention to them in consultation with the general staff, and have the complaints been remedied?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I dare say that from time to time communications have come forward to persons in this country with regard to matters such as those to which the hon. member alludes. My own understanding is that any such communications are of a private and confidential character; and, further than that, I would like to remind my hon. friend that these troops, after they leave the country, having enlisted as Imperial troops, are necessarily subject to military dispositions under the control of the War Office, and that we do not make demands nor initiate anything at all in connection with such matters. It would be obviously impossible that there should be a dual control under such circumstances. We might, of course, in any case where the circumstances seemed to make it desirable, do something by way of suggestion. I am sure my hon. friend will be the first to realize that any attempt to establish a dual control over a portion of the troops at the front would probably, and indeed necessarily, have a most unfortunate result.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My idea is exactly the same as that of my right hon. friend, namely, that dual control would be very objectionable; but a copy of the communication to which I have referred was sent to me and was not marked confidential. It was not in the nature of a complaint against the commanding officer; but it referred to certain dispositions in regard to which the Minister of Militia was asked to intervene, and I am sure that my hon. friend the Minister of Militia will not forget that, since the troops went to the Old Country, he has attempted to have certain things done to add to their comfort and to meet the wishes of officers and men generally in the Canadian contingent. That would not be exercising dual control, but would merely be bringing to bear that knowledge of affairs which the Minister of Militia has, and which he might utilize to very great advantage in the interest and for the comfort of the Canadian soldiers. As the House is aware, the Minister of Militia went to England—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member must not forget that it is not permissible to enter into a discussion when asking a question.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Prime Minister rather provoked me to do that when he stated his views as to the course he thought I ought to take as a member of this House in regard to matters of this kind. I see the Minister of Militia is anxious to reply, and so I shall sit down.

Major General HUGHES: The general question of details—the name given to those who are not sent to the front, but who are kept behind to fill up vacancies arising from various causes in the brigades at the front—is left entirely in the hands of the British War Office, as has been explained by the Prime Minister.

I have not the slightest doubt that the officers, non-commissioned officers and men who were left on the details felt it very keenly. Each man is anxious to get to the front, and naturally each man would wish to get to the front with his own corps. But there must be some details. They all knew that. We have nothing to do with the selection of these details, and, whether the men are satisfied or not, these are matters over which we have not attempted to exercise any control, whatever else we may have done.

Mr. MURPHY: In recent press despatches it was stated that a complete list of the officers and men at Salisbury had been prepared and forwarded to the Government. Has that list been received?

Major General HUGHES: That is being prepared, and I hope it will be printed in a very short time.

THE BUDGET.

PROPOSED WAR TAXATION.

Consideration of the proposed motion of Hon. W. T. White (Minister of Finance) for Committee of Ways and Means resumed from February 25.

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY (St. John City): Mr. Speaker, in resuming this debate, let me first express appreciation of the courtesy shown by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) on Thursday evening last in consenting to the adjournment of this debate until to-day. It has been a matter of very considerable convenience to me. I suppose the only way in which I can show my gratitude in a practical way is by shortening my remarks as much as possible, and this I shall endeavour to do.

Before continuing the remarks I was making in reference to the proposed, and I think wholly unnecessary, expenditure provided for in the Estimates, I should like to call attention to an article appearing in the Montreal Gazette, a prominent Conservative paper, under yesterday's date, criticising my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) and other hon. gentlemen who have spoken from this side of the House for the attitude we have taken with regard to the proposed increased taxation and rather expressing the view that we are not discharging our duty to the country when we venture to criticise the Government with respect to these matters. I would like to read this, so that the nature of the criticism may go upon "Hansard." For this criticism is not peculiar to the Gazette; we find the same line taken in many prominent newspapers in many sections of the country. I have not observed that any prominent Liberal or Independent newspaper has criticised our course in this respect. The article to which I refer is not an editorial, but is contained in a parliamentary despatch or letter from Ottawa:

> In one of the most uncompromisingly partisan speeches which the usually moderate junior member for Halifax has ever been heard to deliver, Mr. A. K. Maclean on Tuesday attacked the Government for that decline in revenue, disturbance in trade and unsettling of financial conditions which has been experienced in Canada, as it has in a generally greater degree been experienced universally since the war began. In the course of his utterances he blamed the Government not only for the method of taxation which it proposed to adopt, but for the necessity of that taxation. It was, in many ways, an amazing deliverance, in that it arraigned the Government for a condition of affairs in Canada which has been general throughout the whole world since the first outbreak of hostilities, which in the United States alone has caused a revenue loss of over a hundred million dollars, and which has led even that neutral country to the necessity of imposing extraordinary taxation. In the face of such a fact, Mr. Maclean allowed himself to go on record as declaring that to the war alone could be laid no greater loss of revenue than five millions. It was, too, a singularly provocative utterance in view of the so-called political truce to which the Opposition has lost no opportunity of declaring its intention to adhere while Canada was in the throes of world war. As far as the method of taxation proposed by the Government was concerned, it was purely destructive criticism.

With that remark I entirely agree. It was destructive criticism—criticism of the most destructive character it would be possible for any critic to make of this Government.

> There were appeals not to increase the tariff, not to touch the British preference, not to impose stamp taxes; but in all this no suggestion of any other method of securing the ends at which all these measures aim. And as regards the general question of financing, the only remedy Mr. Maclean had to propose for war conditions was the cessation of all public works and the consequent dismissal of hundreds of civil servants. It was a fighting speech and an indication that, truce or no truce, war or no war, the Pugsley-Clark spirit—

My genial and unwarlike friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) must be astonished to find such a statement as this in a newspaper:

> —in the Liberal party has predominated and the Opposition, with no adequate measures of its own to propose, will fight those introduced by the Government.

Ye Gods! Think of an Opposition that would venture to fight the measures introduced by a Government. That is conduct which this newspaper and other newspapers cannot for a moment tolerate, especially at the present time. Mr. Speaker, I think the fact that a statement of that kind appears in such a prominent Conservative paper as the Montreal Gazette, such a thoroughly respectable and influential paper, calls for some remark from me. With regard to my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax, I think he made a fair and just criticism of the proposed measure of taxation. He argued that it was not necessary at the present time to impose this additional taxation on the people of Canada. He contended that it was very impolitic, very unfair to the people to unduly burden them as proposed by the Minister of Finance. At the same time he showed that this Government, in the three years it has been in power, had increased the ordinary expenditure from $89,000,000 to $140,000,000—or, if you like to put it more accurately, looking at the Estimates of the present year, $147,000,000, the added $7,000,000 or thereabouts being necessary to pay interest on the money which it is proposed to borrow from the Imperial Government for war purposes. The hon. gentleman contended that that increase of expenditure was unjustifiable. He showed that whereas the expenditure on public works chargeable to ordinary revenue when this Government came into power, ranged about eleven or twelve millions, it was proposed this year to expend the enormous sum of twenty-two millions. And he charged, and I think properly charged, that there was nothing in connection with the public works, the immigration or the progress of the country to justify that enormous increase within three short years. He contended that if even now the Government would exercise that ordinary prudence which the average businessman in this country is exercising, and which every city, town and municipality in Canada is exercising; if they would apply the pruning hook and proceed to carry on only those public works the necessity of which is recognized by all; it would not be long before the ordinary revenue would overtake the expenditure of the country, and it would not be necessary to resort to these extraordinary taxes and to impose these extraordinary heavy burdens upon the people of Canada.

It has been asserted that the hon. member for Halifax said that all public works should cease. My hon. friend said nothing of the kind. What he said was that in respect of harbour improvements, the deepening of rivers, the dredging of waterways and the erection of public buildings it would be possible to reduce the expenditure during this year, perhaps by one-half. In that way the public works would go on with reasonable rapidity and the people would be far better satisfied than if these works were carried out at full speed by means of this proposed extra taxation. That was the argument of the hon. junior member for Halifax; that was a part of the criticism which he made of the policy of the Government, and I for one say that the junior member for Halifax was entirely justified in the remarks he made in that respect.

I have had an opportunity of being among my own constituents for a couple of days since I addressed the House last week. When I first arrived I met a number of people who said: You are charged with desiring to stop the public works in St. John; surely that is not a proper thing to do. But I explained that while it was proposed to spend a considerable sum of money at St. John, and while we desired that there should be retrenchment and economy, yet we proposed not that these works should be stopped, but that they should be carried on with all reasonable rapidity, subject to the due exercise of proper economy. When I pointed out that these taxes are going to impose upon the 350,000 people of New Brunswick the payment of the enormous sum of $1,500,000 a year, they realized that I as a representative from that province was justified in standing up with my Liberal friends in the House and appealing to the Government not to resort to these extraordinary measures of taxation, but to proceed to exercise that economy which they might fairly exercise without any detriment to the public interest. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House talk about the necessity for going on with public works. They know—but they conceal it from the people—that public works in any locality benefit but a small portion of the community. During the year which will close March 31, there will have been expended some $3,000,000 upon the harbour of St. John, but out of that total amount there has not been paid for labour more than $300,000. Many thousands of dollars have gone to the southern states to buy southern pine for the construction of wharves; vast sums of money have gone outside of St. John to purchase cement to be used in the making of concrete; vast sums of money have gone to pay contractors' profits and interest on the plant. I would say too, if it would not offend my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that a large amount possibly went towards the nourishment and support of those newspapers in New Brunswick which so violently attack members of the Opposition for venturing to criticise the Government.

At the adjournment last Thursday evening I was endeavouring to show that there are in the Estimates for the coming year items providing for works of various kinds —harbour and river improvements, erection of public buildings—in respect of which I believe the Government does not seriously intend to make any progress during the coming year. In a great majority of cases the amounts voted for next year are simply re-votes; if the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will take the trouble to look at the estimates for New Brunswick, he will find that the items in respect of a large number of public buildings are exactly the same as the amounts voted for the same purposes at the last regular session of Parliament. This shows positively that no work has been done, and I presume that in a large number of cases no contracts have been let and no plans prepared.

As evidence of the fact that unnecessary items of expenditure are placed in the Estimates—I shall not say proposed to be made —in connection with the Department of Public Works, the Department of Railways and Canals and the Department of Marine and Fisheries, let me call attention to the fact that $5,000,000 has been struck out of the Estimates of the Department of Militia and Defence. In other words, the Estimates for the coming year are $5,000,000 and upwards less than they were last year. But that does not mean that the money is not to be spent; it means that the money is to be spent, but it is to be borrowed from the British Government to form part of the war expenditure. My hon. friend (Mr. Hazen) shakes his head, but—

Mr. HAZEN: If my hon. friend will look at the Militia Estimates he will observe that those items which were voted last year and which do not appear in the Estimates this year were expenses of camps of instruction, training of cadets, annual drill, and items of that nature which, in view of the war, were not considered necessary during the present year. Not one dollar for these purposes would be used out of the vote for war expenditure.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I was not calling attention to that at all; what I had in mind was annual drill. Last year $2,000,000 were voted for annual drill; there will be no annual drill this year because the soldiers are being drilled preparatory to their going to the war. Therefore the item is cut out, but it is charged to war expenditure.

Mr. HAZEN: No, annual drill is not charged to war expenditure.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But what takes the place of annual drill is paid for with money borrowed from the British Government. The item for ordnance and arms, amounting to $1,900,000, is also struck out. Ordnance and arms will be required for the militia for the coming year, or would be required if it were not for the war and if the militia men of Canada were not preparing to take part in the defence of the Empire. I do not know just how long my hon. friend was acting Minister of Militia and Defence; one of his organs in New Brunswick said that he was acting Minister of Militia during the absence of the minister, but when the minister returned he referred to the Prime Minister as having been the acting Minister of Militia during his absence. But if my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was acting Minister of Militia and Defence, he ought to know that this Government has ordered vast quantities of ammunition for the militia of Canada. Of course, it is for the purposes of war.

Mr. WILCOX: Did my hon. friend expect us to shoot blank cartridges?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Therefore that whole amount for ordnance, arms and ammunition has been struck out from the Estimates of the Department of Militia; $1,900,000 has been struck out. As I have said, it does not mean that the money is not to be expended, but that it is to be excluded from the Militia Estimates, while an equivalent or a greater amount, perhaps a far greater amount, is to be included in the sums which are to be borrowed from the Imperial Government for the purposes of the war. And there are stores. It will be necessary to have stores just the same, but I presume these stores which are to be purchased now and next year will all be charged to the expenses of the war. All this money taken out of current Militia expenditure, and which is to be included in the money borrowed from England for the purpose of the war should be available for the necessary expenditure of the other Departments of the Government.

Mr. HAZEN: Might I interrupt my hon. friend? He said that the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) did not suggest giving up public works altogether this year. I would ask the hon. gentleman what meaning he attaches to these words of the hon. member for Halifax at page 387:

> I do submit, and in fairness, I think, having in view the circumstances prevailing throughout Canada this year, and throughout the world for that matter, that instead of the Government's asking for an expenditure of $20,000,000 for public works, they might have asked for $10,000,000 or less, and, if need be, they might have wiped out altogether expenditures for public works for the next fiscal year.

The hon. gentleman adds:

> I do not believe that the people of any province of Canada would have objected to the most drastic measures on the part of the Minister of Public Works during the present year and during the next fiscal year in connection with public works expenditure.

I would ask my hon. friend if that does not convey the suggestion that there should be no expenditure for public works during the present fiscal year.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not so read it. Let me read the whole passage:

> I do submit, and in fairness, I think, having in view the circumstances prevailing throughout Canada this year, and throughout the world for that matter, that instead of the Government's asking for an expenditure of $20,000,000 for public works, they might have asked for $10,000,000 less.

It is important to consider this suggestion by itself. I think that my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax was speaking of the ordinary expenditure, not the expenditure upon capital account.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I was.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not the expenditure on national harbors and so on. The hon. member went on:

And if need be, they might have wiped out altogether expenditures for public works for the next fiscal year.

That is, if need be. Where is the objection to that? Suppose the Government had exercised reasonable, fair economy and had found that in order to carry on the public services they would have to curtail the public works which are chargeable to ordinary revenue—the building of the hundred odd buildings throughout Ontario, most of them in small towns where they have very good postal accommodation at the present time; if they had decided that it was absolutely necessary to postpone the construction of these buildings for one year, where would be the harm, more particularly as although this Parliament gave the money to the Government upwards of a year ago they have in many cases not started the work; they have not, I venture to say, in the majority of cases, even had the plans prepared. Where would the public interest have suffered if the construction of these buildings had been posponed for one year? The hon. junior member for Halifax said:

I do not believe that the people of any province of Canada would have objected to the most drastic measures on the part of the Minister of Public Works during the present year and during the next fiscal year in connection with public works expenditure. Many of these projected works were without justification, the necessity for others have at least temporarily passed away by reason of the declining business of the country. Expenditures for these purposes should have been reduced to the minimum this year and next year. And bear in mind that the expenditures to which I have referred do not include votes for dredging and dredging plants nor for other public works of an important or national character, whether proposed to be made under ordinary or capital expenditure. In respect to public works expenditure is it not time to adopt some rational policy?

Who will object to that? Who will say it is not the time to adopt some rational policy in respect to national works? Who will say it is not the time to endeavour to economize to a reasonable and fair extent?

The junior member for Halifax goes on:

Is not this the time to commence? Circumstances will compel us in the near future, and I believe public opinion is condemnatory of the present method of spending money on public works. In this respect the present Government have been great sinners.

The Minister of Marine and Fisheries should not pick out just one part of the hon. member's speech, but should read the whole of it. Having read the hon. gentleman's complete remarks, I ask how any fair-minded man could question the reasonableness of the views set forth by the hon. junior member for Halifax.

In connection with public expenditure. just let me show you for a moment with what ideas this Government came into power. When they came into power in 1911 they found themselves with a buoyant and expanding revenue, with millions of dollars beyond what was necessary to meet the ordinary expenses of the country. In the city of St. John a demonstration was held, which was attended by the Minister of Finance (Mr. White), the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid), and, I think, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen.) Under plans prepared by the late Government it had been proposed to expend there in the development of the great harbour of Courtenay bay about $11,500,000. My hon. friend the Minister of Customs had been taken around, and he had been amazed at the wonderful possibilities of the port of St. John; and at the banquet that night he said to the representative citizens who were there in numbers: "The only fear I have is that you are going ahead on too small a scale." And he said: "In your presence and that of the Minister of Finance, I want to say to the Minister of Public Works that if he wants more money to carry on and enlarge these improvements, let him come to the Department of Customs." These, Sir, were the ideas of extravagance which were being disseminated among the people of Canada. They were taught to believe that in the opinion of this Government the rainy day would never come and that all they had to do was to go ahead, to spend all the money they could possibly spend; that the time would never come when the revenues would decline, but that they might count upon them being enlarged year by year for all time to come.

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. member is mistaken in saying that I was present at the banquet to which he refers. I was in England at the time. I recollect, however, reading the reports in the newspapers, and it seems to me I read a statement by my hon. friend fully approving of what the Minister of Customs had said.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This is only one of the very erroneous ideas my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries received when he was in England. He can well understand that I would not approve of what the Minister of Customs said, because it was a reflection on myself. I wanted the people of St. John to believe that I had been liberal in expenditure, that I had provided plans for these works which would be ample for many years to come, and when the Minister of Customs thought it necessary or desirable to belittle what I had done, to convey the impression that I had been too small in my ideas and that all they had to do was to come to the Government and get many millions more, my hon. friend will well understand that I would not be ardent in expressing my approval of what the Minister of Customs had said.

There is another thing in regard to which I should like to ask a question. I should like to know how it is that of the item of $4,700,000 which was voted last year for the construction, acquisition, leasing or expropriation of terminal elevators, no part has been expended during this year.

Mr. W. T. WHITE: Some has been expended.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, it is marked a revote. It may be a clerical error, of course.

Mr. WHITE: If my hon. friend is referring to the elevators in the West, I may point out that a great deal has been expended in that direction.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then, it is misleading to put that in as a revote.

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend would call it that anyway.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Did I ever miscall anything that my hon. friend has done? I have enough to do to quote correctly what he has done, and enough to find fault with when I state correctly all his acts and statements, as perhaps he will discover before we get through with this discussion.

Mr. HAZEN: The amount voted last year was $4,700,000, and this year we are asking for $3,000,000. I think it would be natural to infer from those figures that $1,700,000 has been spent during the year.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, if it were not for the fact that it was put in as a revote. Mr. Speaker, I was saying that of the $3,905,100 which Parliament is asked to vote for public buildings in Ontario, the enormous sum of $2,282,100 is made up of revotes. In a great many cases not a single dollar has been expended on the buildings for which amounts were provided during the last session of Parliament. Take, for instance, the public building at Berlin, for which a revote of $50,000 is asked. What does that mean, Sir? It means that at the last session of Parliament—not, I am bound to say, in view of the statement of the Minister of Public Works, with any idea of influencing the electors—$50,000 was put in the Estimates in the session of 1913-14 but none of that amount has been spent. Why has none of it been spent? Why was not a contract let? Why was not even the foundation of a building prepared? We have conclusive evidence that not a blow was struck on that building. Yet last year, when no war was on, at all events until August, the building was not considered as urgently required, although provision was made for it in the Estimates. How can they justify the clapping on of this extra tax by saying that this and other buildings are necessary when, although they were so urgently required last year that provision was made for them in the Estimates, not one dollar has been spent on them since. Take the public building at Burk's Falls, for which $20,000 was voted in the session of 1913-14. Not a single dollar of it has been spent, and yet the amount is again put in to swell up the Estimates in the hope of inducing the people of this country to believe that it is absolutely necessary to impose these special taxes upon an already overburdened people. Take the public building at Cobourg. Not one dollar of the $25,000 that was voted for it last session has been spent and the whole amount appears as a revote. And so I might go on down the list. There are scores of buildings in regard to which provision was made in the session of 1913-14, but on which not a single dollar has been spent since the money was voted. The same remark applies to the province of Quebec, to which I have already referred; and to Manitoba, where the amount of $1,008,500 includes a revote of $752,500; that is to say, $750,000 of the amount voted in the session of 1913-14 remains unexpended. Take the Winnipeg barracks, for instance, for which $150,000 was voted in 1913-14; the amount to be voted this session is $150,000. The amount of the revote is $150,000. That shows that, although the Minister of Public Works sought to make Parliament believe that this money was required upwards of a year ago, not one dollar of it has been expended; which proves, I think, that there is no great urgency for these buildings, and that they might very well stand for another year at all events, and that no public interest would suffer thereby. Take Winnipeg postal station "C," for which $75,000 was voted at the previous session, and $73,000 is asked for now. It is true that in that case $2,000 has been spent—not a very large amount. Take Winnipeg postal station "D," for which $75,000 was voted at the previous session; $75,000 is the vote for this year, and the revote is $75,000, showing that not a single dollar of that money has been expended, and refuting in the most positive way the statement that these works are urgently required, and which has been given as one of the reasons for this alleged, and falsely alleged, war tax. In the province of Saskatchewan the cases are even more marked. The vote for 1914-15 was $983,500. The amount asked for this year is $806,500, and the revote is $711,500, showing that of the large amount of $983,500 voted at the previous session, almost all of it is a revote. And there are several other public buildings in regard to which no work has been done, and presumably no contract let. The same remark applies to Alberta, British Columbia, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and indeed to the whole of Canada. In view of that, Mr. Speaker, do you not think that the burden is upon this Government of giving to this Parliament a detailed statement of the public works in regard to which they think there is such urgency that the work on them cannot be delayed, and so justifying the imposition of this special tax? They attempt to justify it on the ground that these public works must go on. Presumably they said the same thing in the session of 1913-14, but I have shown to you and to this House that they asked for millions of dollars which they have not expended even in a time of peace. So it cannot lie in their mouths to say that these works are so urgently required in this time of war as to necessitate the imposition of these special and onerous taxes.

Mr. HAZEN: I might point out to my hon. friend that none of these votes are available for expenditure until the Supply Bill has been passed and assented to, and the House prorogued. The House prorogued last year on the 8th day of June, I think. War was declared on the 4th of August, but it was known a few days before that there would be war. Do I understand my hon. friend to complain because the Government, when war broke out, adopted the policy of proceeding only with those works actually under operation at the time, and does he say that the money that was voted could have been spent between the 8th day of June and the declaration of war?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not complain that the Government did not spend the money,

[Mr. Pugsley.]

I never did complain. I stated it as evidence that there is no emergency with regard to these public buildings. I quite agree with my hon. friend that after the war broke out the Government should have proceeded slowly. But the war is still on, and I greatly fear that the war will be on next year after these amounts have been voted, and if as my hon. friend suggests it was not reasonable to go ahead during these past six months, from the month of June to the month of December, when the building season was on, why does he say it is reasonable to ask Parliament to impose these special taxes in order that these works may now be rushed, the war still being on, and the financial condition of Canada in an alarming condition, due to the reckless administration of affairs by this Government since it came to power? There are in these Estimates items to the extent of millions of dollars in regard to which the action of the Government proves without the shadow of a doubt that there is no emergency, and that the public interest would not suffer if they should stand over for another year. If the Government could go slowly in respect to all these public works, surely that casts upon the Minister of Finance the burden of laying before this House a clear and detailed statement of the public works, the urgency of which is great, the necessity of going on with which is great, and which they purpose going on with, even though the war should continue. The Minister of Finance is asking the people of Canada to take upon themselves a heavy burden, and he should show absolute necessity for his course before he adopts the unusual expedient of raising money, not for war purposes —let that not be too strongly emphasized— but simply in order to restore the equilibrium between the ordinary revenue and the ordinary expenditure. Before he does that, he ought to be able to show to this House and to the people of this country that these public works which the Government say they intend to carry on, are of an urgent character, and that the public interest would suffer if the Government allowed some of them to be postponed until another year.

When you bear in mind that in this $140,000,000, which the Minister of Finance says will be expended and chargeable to consolidated revenue as ordinary expenditure during the coming year, is included seven or eight million dollars of interest upon the money borrowed and to be borrowed from the Imperial Government for war purposes, surely it is not unreasonable to ask this Government to now curtail expenditure, and to bring the total expenditure chargeable against consolidated revenue down to at least one hundred million dollars. When we show that even in times of the greatest prosperity, even with an abounding revenue, even with a surplus of thirty or forty million dollars, the late Government only three years ago was able to get its ordinary expenditure down to less than ninety million dollars, surely in this time of war and trouble and stress, when the people of Canada need every dollar they can spare for contribution to various charitable objects to which they are cheerfully contributing, this Government ought to be able to cut down the expenditure within ten million dollars of what the expenditure on current account by the Liberal Government was only three years ago. It is not fair for hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House to simply say: Oh, if you charge us with extravagance now, you are showing partisan feeling, and, after all, suppose we have been guilty of extravagance, what are you going to do about it? Well, Mr. Speaker, when we show, as we have shown conclusively from the public accounts, that only three years ago, when the whole country was prosperous, and when its revenues were increasing with wonderful rapidity, and when liberal provision was made for the various public works, the total expenditure on current account was only $90,000,000, surely we have the right to ask this Government to curtail the expenditure to at least $100,000,000. If the Government did so now, within a very short time the finances of Canada would be again in a sound position. The Minister of Finance is estimating a revenue upon current account this year of $120,000,000, and if we should cut the ordinary expenditure down to $100,000,000, we would have a surplus of $20,000,000. But, this Government is like the inexperienced mariner who, navigating his ship, hears the roar of the breakers off his bow and gives the order to steam ahead. All we want to do is to stop the ship as soon as possible, turn her so as to get her in a position of safety, guide her with skill and prudence, and in a few years we would be in a financial position which would give satisfaction and joy to the people of Canada. That is all we are asking the Government to do. We are asking them to be prudent; we are asking them to adopt the same prudent course which any business man or any municipality would adopt under the existing circumstances. In answer to that these gentlemen on the other side of the House say to us: Oh, the war is on, many people are out of employment, and now is the time for us to rush ahead and spend all the money we can get, not only from the ordinary revenues, but which we may be able to squeeze out of the people by these exactions in the way of stamp duties and increased customs taxes.

I have criticised in my own humble way the reasons presented by the Government for putting on these taxes, and I assert that in my opinion these taxes cannot be defended from any standpoint. They are so wanting in reason, so inharmonious, so unfair, so unequal in the burdens they impose upon the people that they cannot be defended. Take the question of putting stamps on receipts and cheques, and the poor man who is involved in a transaction of ten dollars pays as much as the wealthy man who is involved in a transaction of twenty or fifty or sixty thousand dollars. The burden upon the poor man in respect to small transactions is exactly the same as it is upon the rich man in respect to large transactions.

Let us consider the burden imposed upon people who travel in sleeping cars. The man who occupies a berth from St. John to Montreal, or from Montreal to Toronto, or from Ottawa to Toronto, pays as much as the man who gets aboard a sleeping car in Montreal and journeys all the way through to the Pacific ocean. The man going the journey of 3,000 miles in a sleeping car pays no more into the Dominion treasury than the man who goes the short journey.

Why is it that the man who, instead of buying his ticket, is furnished with a pass upon the railways, does not also pay a tax? Why is it that the 300 odd members of this Parliament who, by law, are entitled to travel free upon the railways, are not obliged to pay a tax whenever they enter upon a railway journey the same as the man who does not enjoy that privilege and who is obliged to pay for his railway ticket? What reason is there why the gentleman who enjoys the luxury of a private car and who is constantly travelling over the railways of this country, having passes not only for himself and his family, but for his car, is exempt under this extraordinary measure? Why is it that the rich men who enjoy these luxuries are exempt from taxation? An hon. member who preceded me, truly said that this tariff exemplifies the Scriptural statement: "To him that hath, shall be given, and from him that hath not shall be taken away, even that which he hath."

Why is a tax placed upon bituminous coal, which is used by hundreds of thousands of poor people? Surely it is not because my right hon. friend the Prime Minister represents a coal-producing county. I would not suggest that; but what is the reason? Will the hon. Minister of Finance tell us why bituminous coal, $15,000,000 worth of which came into Canada from the United States last year, has the tax upon it increased, while anthracite coal, $22,000,000 worth of which came into Canada from the United States last year, is left absolutely free of taxation? Anthracite coal is used by the wealthy classes, perhaps I should say by the middle classes also but bituminous coal is the coal of the poor man.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. financial critic of the Opposition is on record in Hansard as saying—

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am not discussing the financial critic of the Opposition; I am speaking for myself.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman permit me—

Mr. PUGSLEY: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for St. John has the floor.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I object to my hon. friend interrupting me in order to refer to what other hon. members on this side have said on this question. If my hon. friend wants to ask me anything in regard to what I have said on this question I shall be glad to give him an opportunity to do so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There will be another chance, and I will give my hon. friend all the opportunity he wants.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, that will be a first-rate opportunity.

Mr. BLAIN: Will my hon. friend permit me to ask a question?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Wait a moment. I wish to make a remark to my hon. friend the Solicitor General. I am glad to know that my hon. friend is not always unreasonable. Now what does my hon. friend wish to say?

Mr. BLAIN: As my hon. friend is so conversant with the coal question, will he tell us in what part of the province of Ontario the poor man uses bituminous coal?

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Mr. MACDONALD: What about Quebec and the maritime provinces?

Mr. PUGSLEY: In the form of gas. The poor man uses very little electricity as compared with gas. He is taxed by reason of this tax upon bituminous coal. Every company manufacturing gas in all the little towns throughout the province of Ontario is taxed a certain amount under this new tariff. The poor man also uses bituminous coal in his grate. Bituminous coal is used in that way by the poor man in my province, and I dare say also in the province of Ontario. Anthracite coal is largely used for furnaces, to heat the great office buildings in the various cities of Canada. It is used to heat the scores of buildings which the Government have been renting in vastly increased numbers from its wealthy friends in the city of Ottawa. It would be a shame to impose burdens upon these gentlemen and to make them pay a little more for their coal. But that is one of the inequalities of this tariff.

On behalf of the farmers of this country, I ask the Minister of Finance why he allows anthracite coal to the value of $22,000,000 to come in from the United States, and why he puts this tax upon practically everything the farmers of this country use? Why does he tax the farmers' ploughs, harrows, pitchforks, shovels, spades, hoes, potato-diggers and wagons? It has been pointed out in the very able speech delivered by my hon. friend the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) that amongst the many other things in regard to which there is imposed by this new tariff an increase of duty to the extent of 100 per cent, are fertilizers, the plant food, the life of the farmers' products. Why is that done? Can the Minister of Finance explain it? Can it be explained upon any other ground than to avoid the necessity for care, the necessity of going over the old tariff, taking up the different articles in regard to which in some cases the tariff was low and in some cases high and in some cases at a medium rate and adjusting the rates? Is it because it was easy simply to make an absolutely arbitrary horizontal rise of 5 per cent against Great Britain, 7½ per cent against countries enjoying the intermediate tariff and 7½ per cent against countries enjoying the general tariff? Under this new tariff the fertilizer of the farmer has been taxed by an increase in duty to the extent of 100 per cent against Great Britain, 75 per cent against countries enjoying the intermediate tariff, and 75 per cent against countries enjoying the general tariff.

This was bad enough. But in case of another most important fertilizer, nitrate of soda, which is absolutely essential to the people of eastern Canada, particularly at this time when, by reason of the war, the importation of potash from Germany is shut off—whereas nitrates formerly came into Canada free of duty, this Government has imposed upon that very important fertilizer the high tariff of 7½ per cent against the only country in which nitrates can be obtained. I speak now of a country in regard to which the members of the Government seem ignorant, and more especially my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen)—I refer to the Republic of Chile. Chile has the only natural nitrate beds in the world. Last year there was brought into Canada from Chile some 45,000,000 pounds of nitrates. This was not all used for agricultural purposes; but a good deal, I presume, was used for making powder. Chile is a country with which Canada might have a good deal of trade; it is a country of enormous wealth and of vast possibilities. I hope the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will give attention to that country, because it especially interests his own province, which needs this fertilizer. Last year the export duties upon nitrates collected by the Chilean Government amounted to about $84,000,000 in Chilean money, or $42,000,000 in Canadian money. Under the former tariff nitrates came in absolutely free of duty, but now the Minister of Finance has put upon it a duty of 7½ per cent.

In view of what I have said, what irony it seems for the Minister of Finance to declare that by this tariff a stimulus will be given to agricultural productions and to manufactures. As to manufactures, I do not think there is any doubt, because the very object of the tariff was to give increased protection to the manufacturers. But why the Minister of Finance should venture to say that the new tariff would encourage the farmers of this country I cannot understand, unless the Minister of Finance is becoming impressed with the view which was once put forward by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), that increased taxation is the gateway to prosperity. Certainly, the farmers are getting the increased taxation, and on the reasoning of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, they ought to find themselves at the gateway of prosperity. But I very much doubt it.

There was no excuse for this increased duty. For a considerable time the watchword of this Government has been increased production. The Minister of Finance has said to the farmers: My word to you is Production, Production, Production. Therefore, when he was considering this question of taxation, he ought to have considered how he could make the farmer's burden less onerous rather than more onerous. Where was the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell)? Has he been spending his whole time circulating about San Francisco while the tariff was being prepared? Why is he not on hand to look after the interests of the farmers? Or, if he is not here, where, when this tariff was framed, was my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), who knows how anxious the farmers of his own province, New Brunswick, are to obtain these fertilizers at as low a rate as possible? Surely, he cannot be oblivious to the fact that at the annual convention of the Farmers' and Dairymen's Association of New Brunswick, held in Fredericton in February, 1913, the following resolution was unanimously passed:

> Whereas our farmers, in order to extend their operations, believe that it is necessary to use a considerable amount of commercial fertilizer; and,
> Whereas the cost of such fertilizers is so high that it is about impossible to use them with profit:
> Therefore, resolved, that in the opinion of this convention of agriculturists from every county of New Brunswick, it is desirable that our Government take such steps as are necessary to furnish the farmers with the chemicals for that purpose at first cost.

Sir, that was an important meeting, held in the capital of the province which my hon. friend represents in the Government. It was reported in all the newspapers. Its adoption of this resolution is only an evidence of the fact of which all of us in New Brunswick are aware, that for a number of years past the farmers have been of the opinion that, in order to carry on agriculture successfully they must have resort to chemical fertilizers. Now, when the farmers require these fertilizers, when they are being urged from all quarters to engage in greater production, surely this is not the time to impose these burdens upon them, to put a tax upon every kind of fertilizer, both upon the manufactured chemical fertilizer which comes largely from the United States, and from the natural fertilizer which comes from the great republic of Chile.

What has been the result of imposing these burdens? Since the resolution was passed which I have read, and since the farmers of New Brunswick through their various agricultural societies were induced to take hold of the matter, these societies have given orders for fertilizers. And I am told by my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Copp), whom I am delighted to see in his seat, and whom the House generally is delighted to see, tells me that at least one agricultural society in the county of Westmorland has cancelled its order for a large quantity of fertilizer that it had intended to bring in, in an effort to stimulate agricultural production in that county.

An hon. member on the other side has said that there has been no complaint in regard to this tariff and in regard to the way our farmers are being treated. My information is entirely different. I will read a letter which emphasizes what I have read as taking place in other countries. Germany for a considerable period nas been favouring in the highest degree the introduction of chemical fertilizers into that country. In the Commonwealth of Australia, so anxious is the Government to encourage the use of chemical fertilizers, that not only is no duty imposed upon tnem, but on tne Government railways fertilizers are carried absolutely free—absolutely no freight charges on fertilizers for the use of tne farmers. How different is tneir course, so far as the treatment of the farmers is concerned, from the course pursued by this Government. I have here a copy of a letter which was sent to the Minister of Agriculture and which I will read as it brings out strongly some of the points in favour of keeping fertilizers upon the free list:

February 19, 1915.

Honourable Martin Burrell, Minister of Agriculture,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Sir,—A number of important newspapers published in Canada have recently solicited advertising from fertilizer manufacturers in the United States on the ground that the Dominion Government had entered upon an extensive campaign to encourage a greater production of the staple food crops.

We are also advised that the Canadian Government has increased the duty on fertilizers by 7½ per cent ad valorem, making a total duty of 17½ per cent, or almost double the previous rate.

In view of the increase in the tariff which carries the selling price of fertilizers to a point which will preclude their sale in Canada, we have been obliged to decline to advertise in Canadian newspapers, and in so doing have pointed out that the position of the Dominion Government in increasing the duty on fertilizer seemed almost incomprehensible.

No Governement in the world except Canada places a duty on fertilizers.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Did the Minister of Agriculture bring that to the notice of the Minister of Finance before he framed this tariff? If he did so, surely the Minister of Finance would not place Canada in the invidious position of being the only country in the world which by a high tariff seeks to exclude fertilizers from the country and to deny to the people of Canada an opportunity of obtaining the cheapest possible food plant which can be procured. The letter continues:

Even the United States has always admitted fertilizers duty free and in the last revision of her tariff included sulphate of ammonia, even though it is extensively produced in this country.

According to recent reports in Australian papers, that Government, in order to encourage the use of fertilizers, in growing wheat this year, has offered to finance farmers in the purchase of fertilizers at a rate of interest not exceeding 5½ per cent.

The German government has agents in the United States authorized to buy large quantities of phosphates to be used in making fertilizers. Owing to war conditions she has recently classified fertilizers as preferred freight and offers to furnish free tarpaulins to cover shipments in open cars owing to the scarcity of closed cars. Yet Canada, although wishing to encourage the growth of food crops has placed an additional duty on fertilizers. By a strange coincidence she excepts insecticides and farm implements.

The hon. Minister of Finance has strained a point. He says when you talk about ploughs, wagons and fertilizers being subject to the new tariff which we have imposed, do not forget nicotine sulphate, which we have put on the free list. The writer of this letter is mistaken in saying that "by a strange coincidence the tariff excepts insecticides and farm implements." The only farm implements which are free are steam ploughs, gasoline engines, and those larger implements which are used only by wealthy farmers. The letter proceeds:

Now why should she except these, when fertility is fundamental?

It seems to us that if Canada wants to increase her food crops she would remove the duty entirely on fertilizers,—and why not? How much revenue does she derive from the importation of fertilizers, and to how large an extent are they produced in Canada? Not a pound of raw material except tankage and a little fish waste is produced in Canada, and only a few small concerns, employing probably less than a thousand labourers are protected by her tariff.

We believe that if the matters were properly presented to the farmers they would not only rise up in opposition, to any further tax on fertility in the shape of raw or manufactured fertilizers, but would insist that the duty be entirely removed. If, in times of war, the Cabinet has the right to increase duties, has it not also the right to remove duties on necessities? And certainly fertilizers come within the class.

Free fertility in the hands of your farmers will be the most effective tool they can use to increase the staple crops of the Dominion.

Yours very truly,
W. H. Bowker,
President, Bowker Fertilizer Company.

I have a similar letter from a gentleman in St. John who is engaged in the transportation business. He tells me that on a cargo upon which under the old tariff the duty was $650, the duty under the new tariff will be $500 more, almost double the duty imposed under the previous tariff. I suppose it is too late to appeal to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance and to the Government, but I do on behalf of the farmers of this country make one last appeal before this tariff finally goes into operation. I ask the Minister of Finance not only to restore fertilizer to the tariff which previously existed, but to make it absolutely free, and to take off the duty which has been imposed upon nitrate of soda, which was previously free, thus making the burden of the farmers in respect of the food of the plant—that which gives life to the plant—just as light as possible, encouraging rather than discouraging them in the use of fertilizers.

It is said that the people of Canada generally are accepting these duties without any remonstrance. I do not believe that that is the case. I have here a letter from a gentleman in St. John who is in the wholesale grocery business. It is dated February 17, 1915, and is as follows:

Hon. Wm. Pugsley,
Ottawa, Ont.

My dear Mr. Pugsley:

On behalf of the wholesale grocers of this city, the writer begs to protest against the proposed increased tariff of 7½ per cent on American clear backs pork, and American plate beef, which lines our jobbers in the maritime provinces are forced to import from the United States to supply our lumbermen.

As you may notice, both pork and beef were formerly listed under the specific rate of duty at 2 cents per pound, which at 200 pounds per barrel would amount to $4 duty on each barrel, but if the increased rate is also enforced of 7½ per cent ad valorem on the present value of American clear fat backs, say at $20 per barrel, this would amount to $1.50 extra duty in addition to the $4 specific duty, or equal to a total specic duty of 2¾ cents per pound.

Hoping that you may be able to use your personal influence in this matter on behalf of your loyal constituents in the wholesale grocery trade of this city.

Yours very truly,
(Sgd.) H. S. Daly.

The people had no notice of the proposed imposition of this tariff and of the stamp duties. If they had had some notice I am satisfied that communications would have been received from every portion of Canada protesting in the strongest terms against these impositions. I have among others, a telegram from those engaged in the drug business in the city of St. John, protesting against the imposition of stamp duties. It is as follows:

We, the undersigned retail druggists of St. John, understand that the Government are about to impose stamp tax on proprietary medicines. While being prepared to share the financial burdens imposed by this war, we know this means of raising revenue to be class legislation of the worst kind, as we know positively from past experience that the retail druggists shoulder the entire load. Is this a fair deal? It is impossible for us to add one or two cents to a twenty-five-cent, or fifty-cent, or one-dollar bottle of medicine. Why tax the sick anyway?

Representatives of the Dominion Druggists Association now at Ottawa have our entire endorsement. We look to you to protect our interests.

This telegram is signed by the following gentlemen, many of whom my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries knows very well:

F. W. Munroe, S. M. Wetmore, E. C. Brown, H. J. Dick, G. Bell, S. H. Hawker, G. A. Reicker, Wm H. Hawker, Moore's Drug Store, H. Mowatt, E. R. W. Ingram, E. J. Mahoney, A. Chipman smith & Co., R. Rolston, Ross Drugs Company; R. B. Travis, M. V. Paddock, G. Coups, T. J. Durick.

I have no doubt that other hon. gentlemen have received protests, but, as I have said, time was short, the minister announced that the tariff and the stamp tax on wines went into operation on the very day he made his Budget speech. The ordinary stamp tax was not to go into effect until a day named in a Bill to be introduced. But if the Minister of Finance says that he will listen to protests I venture to say that the moment that announcement is made in the papers there will be 100,000 protests from the Atlantic to the Pacific against various phases of these stamp duties and this tariff. Will he say that he will listen to those protests? No, he will shut his eyes to any letters or telegrams and petitions and close his ears to any protests uttered on the floor of this House or elsewhere. Let me ask my hon. friend, if he was going to raise the tariff at all, how he can justify exempting from the provisions of this tariff all those articles contained in schedule C of the French Convention, so far as other countries are concerned. I know perfectly well that the French Convention, in so far as that schedule is concerned is binding on my hon. friend; and indeed the French Convention binds Canada generally to give intermediate tariff on certain products of France and a specific tariff on other products of France; but why goods from other countries in no way affected by the French Convention should come from those countries, even although those goods are named in the French Convention, at a low rate of tariff, I cannot see. Why does the minister, so far as other countries are concerned, more especially the great country to the south of us, place a higher duty upon cottons and woollens and impose no extra duty upon silks and velvets and embroideries? Why does he do that? Is it because my young and handsome friend the Minister of Finance, the gallant and debonair Minister of Finance, thinks that no lady is well dressed unless she is dressed in silk and velvet? Why then does he tax the girl or the woman who wears cotton, or woollen, or muslin, or linen, and so far as this increase of the tariff is concerned, allow the girl or the woman who wears velvet or silk or embroideries, to go free? How can he justify that?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: He cannot.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is no reason for it, there is no manner in which it can be justified. I can understand that, so far as goods from France are concerned, particularly those named in schedule C, you cannot make a change because it would be in violation of the French Convention. And while I am upon the French Convention, let me ask my hon. friend if he thinks that he is entirely within his powers in imposing an additional stamp tax upon wine which comes from France and upon which, under the French Convention, a specific duty has been imposed. Take wine of the fresh grape, not a strong wine; a specific duty is payable upon that under the French Convention, under schedule C. It does not come under schedule B but under C, and a specific duty is imposed upon it. He has raised the duty upon that by reason of this stamp tax 100 per cent. Has he the right to do it? He will say he has, because he will say that this is an Inland Revenue tax that he is putting on. Well, now, is it within the spirit of the French Convention? Parliament will be asked to say by the statute that these wines, these goods of France, cannot be taken out of the customs warehouse until this extra money is paid and this stamp is placed on them. What difference would it make if you had said that, before an importer could take these goods out of the customs warehouse, in addition to the duty imposed under the French Convention, the importer must give the collector of customs a cheque for 25 cents or 50 cents as the case might be, upon every bottle of wine which he would take out of the customs warehouse? Is it not adding to the duty when this tax is placed upon the wine as a pre-requisite to its passing through the hands of the collector of customs? As to wines from France, containing under 20 per cent proof spirits, provided for in schedule C, the minister has raised the duty by 1,000 per cent. Under the French Convention it is only 15 per cent, and he has raised it to $1.50, increasing the duty which has to be paid upon it before it can be taken out of the customs warehouse to the extent of 1,000 per cent. By stretching the terms of the convention, and by calling it a stamp duty instead of money which is to be paid by cheque to the collector of customs, you may get around the provisions of the French Convention.

The Minister of Finance may, by a lawyer's technicality, perhaps, under the advice of the Solicitor General, who looks so serious that I imagine he feels it is necessary to follow me in order to get the Government out of the difficulties they are in by reason of this iniquitous tax, be able to wriggle out of the spirit of this convention; but let me ask my hon. friend, in dealing with this great country, which is our ally as it is the ally of the Empire, not to give cause to the French Government to feel that Canada is treating this convention as a mere scrap of paper; let them feel that we treat it as a real agreement, a real convention between the Empire and our ally, made through the Canadian Government and the French Government, and one which Canada will live up to in truth and spirit, not live up to according to its mere words. It does seem to me that if the Government had provided that, as to these goods which come in under the French Convention, named by schedule C, in addition to the rates of duty therein provided for, before taking those goods out of the customs warehouse they must pay to the collector of customs an additional amount of duty, it would not have been any more a violation of the provisions of the French Convention than is the tariff which has been imposed and which is exacted by means of these stamps. In both cases they have to go through the customs warehouse before they can actually be considered entered in Canada for the purpose of consumption. A duty imposed in that way does not correspond to an Inland Revenue tax, it does not correspond to the octroi imposed in certain localities in France after goods get into the country, and which are peculiar to certain specified places within the country; but this is an extra duty which you exact as a condition to the goods being passed through the customs house.

I intended before leaving the subject of agriculture and the burdens which are being placed upon the farmers, to refer to one respect in which I think a real benefit might have been conferred upon farmers. They are asked to engage in greater production. You might have encouraged them to go in for greater production with a whole heart if you had shown to the farmers, particularly the farmers of the West, that there would be a market for them after this war is over, when the demand for wheat in Canada and England will decline, as it necessarily will when there will be an opportunity to get wheat through the Baltic from Russia, and from other European countries. But in this tariff the Minister of Finance has gone through the farce of leaving wheat and wheat flour just as it was before, and how grateful the farmer ought to be to this Government because the duties on wheat and flour have not been actually increased. What a boon to such a great wheat-growing country as Canada is, a country which could easily become the granary of the world! Why does the Government not go further? Why do they not place wheat and flour upon the free list? If they had done so, what would have been the result? The farmers of the West would have felt that, while during this war there would be a good market for their wheat but still not good enough probably to pay for the investment of capital which would be necessary to prepare the land for greater production and to get additional horses and implements to cultivate the land, after the war there would have been a great market to the south, that they would then have had a steady and ever-growing market at good prices for their products in the great consuming cities of St. Paul, Minneapolis, Chicago, Spokane, Milwaukee and all the other great cities in the United States with their millions and millions of a consuming population. By refusing to put wheat and flour upon the free list the Government have struck a deadly blow at the development of our great western country. They have discouraged thousands of farmers. Their refusal to take a fair and broad view of the necessities and demands of our western people has been the means, I believe, of sending many American citizens back to the United States, and depriving Canada of the great benefits which they were conferring upon our western country, and indeed upon the whole of Canada.

I read with much interest the other day a statement by the Master of the Dominion Grange. I have not the pleasure of knowing the gentleman who occupies that position, but his statement is certainly one which must commend itself to the judgment of any fair-minded man; and it shows that even in the short time the farmers have had to consider these matters, there is a growing protest against the impositions which are being made against them. Dealing with these tariff increases he says:

> "There is not even the reasonable expectation of materially adding to our revenue," the Master continued, "since many of the recent changes in the customs schedule are practically prohibitive, their net result being to enable domestic producers to tax domestic consumers.
> "I will venture the opinion that for every dollar which the recent change in the tariff will put into the Federal treasury, ten dollars of taxation will be levied upon Canadian industry.
> "The Government might at least have considered the suggestion of the western farmers to adopt a direct tax upon land values in order to meet our requirements. This would have provided with no uncertainty for all our needs, and at the same time have cheapened land and thus have given the much needed stimulus to agriculture and to all production.
> "But, instead of this we find industry subjected to still further exactions; and, most astounding of all, our motherland placed under an additional disability of five per cent, in her trade with us. To knife Great Britain in this way when she is fighting for her existence and our liberties is a sight to make the gods weep."

He goes on:

> "Wild and stupid are mild terms to apply to the recent tariff policy of our Federal Government, doubly wild and stupid at present, when the need for stimulating agriculture is paramount. It is the answer of Rehoboam, and will have its reward."

Every hon. gentleman in this House knows to what distinguished Biblical character the Master of the Grange refers, but as there are a good many Rehoboams in this Government I might offer just a few remarks with respect to this gentleman who has long since passed away. You, Sir, with your Biblical knowledge, unsurpassed I take it by any gentleman in this House, know that Rehoboam succeeded Solomon as the King of Israel. Solomon had imposed many exactions upon his subjects, and when Rehoboam came to the throne the congregation of Israel requested an interview with him. Deputations waited upon him, as deputations have waited upon this Government—the farmers' delegation, for instance, which asked for freedom from taxation and for a wider market for their products. Rehoboam promised the delegation an answer in a few days. But instead of consulting with the older men—like my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce for instance, or the hon. member for Halton—he consulted with the younger men, just as this Government consults with pro-Protectionists like my hon. friend from South Toronto (Mr. Macdonell). Rehoboam was advised by these younger men to tell the deputation that he would not let up upon the exactions imposed by his father, that whereas the yoke imposed by Solomon had been heavy, he would make it heavier still. And so when the delegation came back in a few days Rehoboam acted upon the advice of the younger men and said that he would not yield to their requests, that whereas the yoke upon them had been heavy he would make it heavier. He said: "My little finger shall be heavier than my father's loins. . . . My father hath chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions." And so it is with this Government. Angered, I suppose, because the farmers of our great western country had the temerity to come before them and demand that wheat and flour should be made free, and that the British preference should be increased so that our trade with the Motherland might grow greater year by year, the Government in effect says to these people: Whereas you have been chastised with whips before, we are now going to chastise you with scorpions.

5 p.m.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Don't forget the squid.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Never mind about the squid. The Government says to the farmers of the West: Whereas you have complained that upon your implements, you have been obliged to pay too much into the Government treasury, we are going to put a further duty of seven and a half per cent against you; you folk have had the temerity to come to us and ask us to put wheat and flour on the free list, so that you could sell your wheat to the people of foreign countries so that you could take your wheat away from the millers of this country and send it to the United States; we will show you what we think of your conduct, we not only have refused to do that for you, but we will impose a further tax upon the implements with the exception of comparatively few, which you use in the production of wheat and other farm products.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, you will agree with me, and a good many members besides you in this House will agree with me, that we have a good many Rehoboams in this Government, who are acting towards the farmers of this country in the same spirit which Rehoboam displayed towards the Israelites when they went to him to obtain redress of their grievances.

In conclusion, let me say a word or two with regard to the British preference. To me it has been a matter of the greatest possible surprise that gentlemen on the other side of the House should, at this late date, get up in their places and say, in effect, that they did not value the British preference and that it was of no benefit to Canada. After the experience that Canada has had of the British preference since 1897, it is astonishing that any man should make such a statement on the floor of this Parliament. It seems to me it is un-English, it is un-British, it is un-Imperial. As a result of the British preference, the trade of Canada has progressed until it has reached enormous proportions. We all know that you cannot have in connection with these great transportation systems one-way traffic only; you want traffic both ways to cheapen the cost of transportation to the lowest possible figure. The ships which bring from Great Britain her manufactured goods to be delivered to the people of Canada take back the products of the Canadian people, and they take back these products at a cheaper rate than they could possibly afford to if they did not have traffic from England to Canada. Instead of doing anything to interfere with the British preference, the Government should have increased the preference and given greater encouragement to the trade between Canada and the Mother Country. If there is one thing in this tariff more than another for which this Government ought to be condemned, it is because of the blow they have struck at our trade with the Mother Country. At a time when the Empire has not only given of her money and the life-blood of her children for the defence of the Empire and of Canada as one of her most important parts, Great Britain is also lending to Canada, at a low rate of interest, the money which Canada needs to enable her to take part in the war, and surely that is not a time for Canada to strike this blow against the Motherland and to raise this barrier against her trade with us. I am satisfied that the Government might save the people of this country from these stamp duties and this high tariff. I think that with prudence, there would be no necessity for increased taxes. The Government have got the Dominion into this deplorable state by reason of their want of foresight and prudence. They have told us, that for at least three years they knew there has been danger that war might come on between Great Britain and Germany. If they believed that, then surely three years ago they should have begun husbanding the resources of this country, they should have been saving money and keeping it in the public treasury, to meet the day of trial when it came. The Government told us in August that so long ago as last January they had reason to believe that war was imminent, and that they began to organize the different departments under Sir Joseph Pope, Under Secretary of State, in order to be ready for the war. Notwithstanding that, they acted as if they thought the war would make no difference to the revenues of the country; they acted as if they thought it would not bring hard times; they went on expending money just as before, and as a result of their mismanagement they have got the country into a position of very great difficulty, but out of which, even at this late date, it can be rescued by prudent management of its affairs. Evidently, while the Government have sown the wind the people of this country are reaping the whirlwind, and it is the people of Canada, not the Government, who will suffer for the wild and reckless administration of the affairs of this country by the present Administration.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton): I have listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) and I was surprised to hear him use such language. In his opening remarks the other evening, he dealt largely in personalities. He referred to the hon. member for Frontenac as a man with a lop-sided brain. I was sorry to hear an ex-Minister of the Crown resort to such tactics against the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), who delivered one of the most able speeches in this whole debate.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will my hon. friend pardon me? I spoke of a man who could criticise an expenditure of $5,000 when I was Minister of Public Works, and sustain the action of the present Government in giving away for ten dollars some land which was worth $200,000, and I said a man who would do that must be a man with a lop-sided brain.

Mr. ROGERS: I wish to correct my hon. friend, because when he makes the statement that this Government gave away land for ten dollars which was worth $100,000, he makes a statement that he must himself know to be untrue.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I wish to say a word to my hon. friend—

Mr. ARMSTRONG: I believe I have the floor.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have a right to answer the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: Not at this time.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for East Lambton has the floor.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Very well, I will answer again.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: Not only did the ex-minister (Mr. Pugsley) refer to the hon. member for Frontenac in this way, but he seemed for some reason or other to have a particular spite against the present Minister of Public Works. I merely wish to say that neither in the speech which he has just delivered, nor in any other of his speeches, has he been able to point to one dollar misspent by the Public Works Department under this Government.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman does me a great injustice when he says that I have shown a particular spite against the Minister of Public Works. I have not done so. I have made no personal reference to the Minister of Public Works; and, moreover, I have a kindly feeling towards him. My hon. friend is entirely mistaken. That is my point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The point of order of the hon. member is not very well taken. Throughout this debate hon. members have very largely indulged in a violation of the rule of debate by the way in which they have referred to other hon. members. The use of the personal pronouns, "he," "you" and "they" is not permissible according to the rule of debate. The proper form of address is "the hon. member for" the constituency which he represents, or "the hon. minister of" the portfolio that he holds, or something of that nature.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is not the point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: There was no proper point of order made.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The point of order raised by my hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) was that the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) had stated that my hon. friend beside me had exhibited spite against the Minister of Public Works; that he had imputed motives.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member, if I understood him correctly, denied the statement, and did not raise a point of order.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If you take into consideration the word "spite," a point of order was raised.

Mr. SPEAKER: While I was on my feet to make my statement in regard to the point of order, I thought it well, because of the frequency with which the rule of debate has been violated during this debate, to call attention to that violation.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: Mr. Speaker, I shall endeavour to carry out your wishes in regard to following the rules of debate.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Mr. Speaker, would you give us the rule regarding the use of the personal pronoun? I have always understood that we must in every case address the Chair. That would, of course, preclude the use of the personal pronoun.

Mr. SPEAKER: Hon. members must address the Chair; but in referring to other hon. members they are not permitted to use the personal pronoun.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: I was calling attention to the fact that the ex-Minister of Public Works had criticised unfairly the present Minister of Public Works in the administration of his department. I am justified in making that statement, because time and again the ex-Minister of Public Works has called attention to matters pertaining to the Public Works Department, which he said were most extravagantly managed and were unreasonably and unfairly dealt with. He took up at least half an hour of the time of this House in referring to different revotes that the present Minister of Public Works had put in the Estimates. Let me call the attention of the hon. member for St. John to the fact that in the year 1908, a copy of the Estimates for which I have under my hand, instead of a revote of $3,150,000, the amount of the revote put in the Estimates by the present Minister of Public Works, my hon. friend had a revote of $3,544,000. It was quite right for the ex-Minister of Public Works to have a revote amounting to $3,544,000, but it was a terrible thing for the present Minister of Public Works to have a revote of $3,150,000. Let me call the attention of the hon. member to some of the revotes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What was the expenditure for that year?

Mr. ARMSTRONG: I do not care to take up the time of the House in looking up the expenditure. I do not see what bearing that has upon the question.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is the year in which we curtailed our expenditure, and very properly curtailed it.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: Yes, but the revotes appeared in the Estimates just the same, and this Government is also curtailing its Estimates. Let me give a few of the amounts. The revote for public buildings in Nova Scotia amounted to $143,000; in Prince Edward Island, to $5,000; in New Brunswick, to $11,000; in Quebec, to $314,700; in Ontario, to $386,500; in Manitoba, to $219,000; in Saskatchewan and Alberta, to $117,000, and in British Columbia, $93,000. If we consider public works and harbours, we find that in Nova Scotia the revotes amounted to $225,000; in Prince Edward Island, to $34,000; in New Brunswick, to $124,000; in Quebec, to $418,000; in Ontario, to $748,000; in Manitoba, to $17,000; in Saskatchewan and Alberta, to $31,000; in British Columbia, to $14,500. The revote in the Public Works Department for dredging amounted to $720,000; for roads and bridges to $20,000, and for miscellaneous, to $75,000. This makes a total of $3,544,950. It was all right for the ex-Minister of Public Works in 1908 to have a revote appearing in the Estimates for the department under his administration for that large amount of money; but it was a most serious state of affairs for the present Minister of Public Works, under the trying circumstances which we have to face at the present time, to have a revote of only $3,150,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I rise to correct my hon. friend.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: I feel that the hon. gentleman has been interrupting me quite enough and interfering with my remarks. I allowed the hon. gentleman to proceed with his discussion without interruption, and I do not feel—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. If the hon. member rises to make an absolute correction or denial of a statement, he has a right to do so.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not think my hon. friend would intentionally put a misinterpretation upon what I said. I was not complaining of the revotes. What I was doing was this: I was showing that the large amount of revotes showed that there was no urgency for the works in respect of which the revotes appeared. The same was true in 1908.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: There surely is as much urgency to-day as there was in 1908. The hon. gentleman took up at least half an hour in dealing with this question. It seems to me that hon. gentlemen opposite are quibbling over little things. If they have any definite proposition to offer, let them present it to the House. They want to realize the fact that this Government is facing a tremendous crisis in the affairs of Canada. Our boys are marching to the front; some of them are on the firing line to-day, in the trenches and on the hillsides of France, assisting in the defence of their King and country. This Parliament should do everything possible to assist this Government in the position they occupy.

The ex-Minister of Public Works called attention to the Militia Estimates and complained because they were $7,000,000 less than they were last year. He realizes the fact that our boys are, as I have said, in the firing line; that therefore no camp or annual drill will be necessary, and that $1,900,000 for ordnance and stores and arms should not appear in the Estimates for the present year. He also appreciates the fact that, as far as public works are concerned, the Minister of Finance and a number of other hon. members have already stated that this Government do not intend to carry on public works that were about to be started or were under consideration.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why, then, put the amount in the Estimates?

Mr. ARMSTRONG: They do not intend to carry them on at the present time. But should the war cease before the end of the year and normal conditions obtain, this Government would be quite justified in carrying on these public works. The ex-Minister of Public Works, apparently would like to see half the men in his own district put out of work by a serious cut in the Public Works Estimates for his district. But I venture to say there is not a man behind him, in whose district large public works are carried on who would support the hon. gentleman in that position. What folly it would be for the Government, under the present circumstances, to cut down on these public works and dismiss men, making hard times harder. Hon. gentlemen opposite cry out about hard times and about the country going to smash; and yet they are trying to embarrass the Government and make it much harder for them to conduct public affairs. This country is at war, and hon. gentlemen opposite should be asking what they can do to help at this time of crisis. In England you will see the posters on the walls and billboards bearing the words, "Your King and Country need you." That call has come to the people of Canada, and nearly a hundred thousand of our brave young men have offered their services in defence of their country. These young men are marching to the front, and we ought to be willing to assist them in every way, and, instead of taking up the time of this House in trying to embarrass the Government, we should be doing our utmost to lend assistance to provide these men with every means whereby they can accomplish the glorious object for which they have gone to the front. Hon gentlemen opposite do not seem to appreciate what these men are doing. They do not seem to understand the position of the British Empire under present circumstances. When we realize that the Mother Country is facing the greatest crisis in her history and that every effort is being put forward by her people to bring this great war to a successful issue, surely it must be clear to us that our duty in Parliament is to stop criticising and embarrassing the Government, and to uphold them in the position they have taken.

I understand that some hon. members on the other side, even the hon. member for St. John City, are anxious for a fight. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) gave us to understand that he was anxious to drive the Government to the country on this Budget. If that is the desire of hon. gentlemen on the other side, then I can only say to the Government: The best thing we can do is to pitch our tents right here, and if we can not show these hon. gentlemen that they are wrong and we are right, let us go to the country. I am sure that the people of Canada will see to it that the majority of hon. gentlemen opposite are left at home, and that the Government is returned by an increased majority.

These hon. gentlemen find fault with the manner in which the Minister of Public Works has conducted his department; but they can not point to a dollar wasted. The day has gone by for sawdust wharves and dredging contracts let at double the amount they should have cost. Newmarket canals and other extravagant expenses are things of the past. The Government is trying to economize in every way, and to husband the resources of the country. But these hon. gentlemen tell us to dismiss half the men on our public works, and one gentleman even suggests dismissing half the civil servants, making hard times harder, and placing the workingman in a position where he will have to ask for charity. But we say that the Government is doing right in spending money upon necessary public works and in conducting the public business on reasonable and businesslike lines. What would be the result if the manufacturers of Canada were to dismiss half the men in their employ? Many of these manufacturers within the last seven months have felt this great depression that has come over Canada owing entirely to war conditions. But, instead of dismissing their employees, these men have been keeping those employees on, doing their utmost to carry on their work, to develop their industries, knowing as they do that this war cannot last many months longer and that when it is over their industries will grow as they have grown in the past, and even more than in the past. They know that agricultural production in Canada will increase more rapidly than ever before. They know that there will flock to our shores men from all parts of the world to help in developing our mines, our woodlands and all our other resources. They know that they can look forward to better times. I appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite during this crisis not to resort to such tactics as we have seen displayed within the last few days—quibbling and fault-finding, endeavouring to cripple the Government—when they know that every energy should be used to bring about a satisfactory conclusion of this great war.

Now, just a word about the position we were in in 1907. At that time Canada faced a financial crisis. Did the Conservative party get up in this House and criticise, brow-beat and ridicule the Ministers of the Crown as has been done to-day? The very opposite was the case. I well remember when a number of men went to the leader of the Opposition of that day, now the hon. Prime Minister of Canada, a man whom we all admire and honestly and faithfully try to serve, and told him that this was the time to cry hard times, to make much of the financial crisis and to warn the people that the country was going to smash. And what did he say? He said: In a few years, this financial stringency will pass and our manufacturers and agriculturists will increase their production—which they have done in these latter years.

Hon. gentlemen opposite say that the national debt of this country is increasing by leaps and bounds. Show me a country to-day in which the national debt is not increasing. The Prime Minister of Great Britain said the other day that the Imperial Government would require a sum exceeding $1,800,000,000 from the people of the Motherland to assist in carrying on this great war. Did the Opposition in the Imperial Parliament criticise this addition to the public debt? No. Did they quibble and find fault with little things as hon. gentlemen have done here to-day? No. They are ready and willing to give every possible support to the carrying on of the war to a successful conclusion, and they are doing everything they can to assist the Imperial Government in the present crisis. In all foreign countries enormous debts are being rolled up to the extent of hundreds and thousands of millions of dollars. In the country to the south, not only is the national debt increasing, but the people are being subjected to a direct tax in order that the sum of $125,000,000 may be raised to accomplish objects similar to some of those which we are endeavouring to accomplish. The Finance Minister has told hon. gentlemen that a portion of the money which will be obtained by means of these taxes will go towards the payment of pensions to wives and members of the families of those who are serving their country at the front. In addition to that it will be necessary to use $7,000,000 to pay interest on the $150,000,000 which this country will use for war purposes.

Hon. gentlemen say that the national debt under the Conservative Administration has been greatly increased. Is that assertion based on facts? Let us go back to 1911. For three years previous to that year the debt of this country under the Liberal party was increased over $60,000,000, while during the three years after this Government came into office the debt was decreased

$6,750,000. I commend these facts to the consideration of hon. gentlemen opposite. All honour is due to the Finance Minister who the first year after he came into office was able to reduce the public debt of Canada $25,000,000. We must expect that as long as this war lasts the debt of Canada will increase.

The hon. member for the city of St. John said that the farmers of Canada will find fault with these taxes. I believe the farmers will willingly and gladly pay these taxes; appreciating the position in which the Government is now placed, they will be willing to pay a reasonable amount of the expenditure which is to be made by this country in connection with its participation in the defence of the Empire.

Hon. gentlemen have referred to the cutting down of the Estimates. They know full well that the Estimates have been reduced over $17,000,000 this year, and that the Minister of Public Works has reduced the Estimates in his department over $11,000,000. It is surely not necessary for me to tell hon. gentlemen that before the war money was pouring into this country by hundreds of millions of dollars every year. From $250,000,000 to $300,000,000 per annum came into Canada and was used for the general development of the country. Owing to the war this money has ceased to come in, and so far as public works or the general development of the country is concerned, we have to rely entirely upon funds produced within our own borders.

The hon. member for the city of St. John, in criticising the actions of this Government, said that the Grand Trunk Pacific railway was, to use his own words, going to smash and financial ruin. Whose fault is it that the Grand Trunk Pacific railway is going to smash and financial ruin? In 1904 the present Prime Minister and those who sit behind him urgently pleaded with the Liberal Government to consider the advisability of extending the Intercolonial to the western coast, thus providing a road owned, operated and controlled by the people of Canada. Hon. gentlemen then in Opposition pointed out that the adoption of this plan would secure Government control of freight and passenger rates. But hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in power were determined to carry on that great undertaking, and what is the result? $35,000,000 has been expended on the eastern section; the rails are rusting and the ties rotting, and there is little or nothing for the road to do. Part of the western section terminating at Winnipeg, cost this country nearly $100,000 a mile, showing that it has been built up to a standard in advance of the needs of the district through which it runs. These considerations were time and again brought to the attention of the then Prime Minister and his colleagues in office. Opposite sit the men on whose shoulders rests the responsibility, Mr. Speaker, if this railroad is going to smash these are the men who are responsible for the reckless undertakings of the previous Government.

The hon. member for the city of St. John to-day attempted to hold up to ridicule the legislation which this Government have put on the statute books since they came into office. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that during the last four years more progressive legislation has been placed on the statute books than was enacted by the Liberal Government in all the fifteen years they were in office. Does the hon. gentleman want me to call attention to the extension of the boundaries of the provinces of Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec, a matter that was held in abeyance by the ex-Prime Minister of this country for years? Apparently hon. gentlemen opposite were unable to deal with this question, but when this Government came into office they dealt promptly and efficiently with it, and hardly a complaint can be offered in connection with the adjustment which was made. Does the hon. gentleman want me to call attention to the good roads proposition which was made by the present Government? If the ex-Minister of Public Works were in his seat I would call his attention to this proposed legislation, which hon. gentlemen opposite did their best to vote down and to dispose of in an unsatisfactory manner. Had that proposition been passed by the Senate, as it ought to have been passed, $7,000,000 would have been expended on good roads in Canada, in addition to what has actually been expended. Do hon. gentlemen want me to call attention to the banking laws that have been revised under this Government and to the splendid management of the affairs of the Department of Finance? There has been an increase of $10,000,000 in the expenditure on agriculture—and I was surprised to hear the ex-Minister of Public Works call attention to the fact that the Minister of Agriculture is absent from this House. He ought to know that the Minister of Agriculture is absent through illness. We have to-day the most progressive Minister of Agriculture that Canada has ever had. He has placed on the statute books of Canada more pregressive legislation in favour of the farming interests of this country than has any other Minister of Agriculture. In addition to that what do we find? We find the department of the ex-Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) being criticised by hon. members opposite. Mr. Pelletier has given the most progressive and advanced legislation in connection with the Post Office Department of any man who has occupied that position in Canada. He has established a system of rural free mail delivery whereby the people living in the rural districts have the benefits of a post office at their very doors. The late Government for eight long years were urged to establish that system; but when they finally did undertake it they gave free rural delivery only on existing mail and stage routes instead of in the extensive way that the late Postmaster General has established that system. Mr. Pelletier also gave to the people of Canada a parcel post system which will develop and grow as years go by. The policy of the Post Office Department under the Conservative Government has been progressive, advanced and in the interests of the country.

The hon. member for St. John referred in a very slight way to the reciprocity pact, calling attention to the wheat that would be going into the United States to-day if we had had reciprocity. If that hon. gentleman would read the papers and look at the columns showing the prices which are being paid for wheat in Winnipeg and Minneapolis, he would find that day after day and month after month and year after year the price in Winnipeg exceeds the price paid in Minneapolis. How can he believe that farmers are anxious to send their wheat over there at the present time when they are receiving in Canada a higher price than they could possibly receive on the other side of the line? Does he not realize that the people of the United States last year were able to export to the markets of the world 173,861,000 bushels of wheat and more than 12,000,000 barrels of flour, while this country was able to export only a very small portion of that amount. Which shows that the United States are capable of producing enough wheat and flour to supply not only their own people but the people of other lands.

Our people have been anxious to promote the made-in-Canada campaign. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not seem to appreciate this made-in-Canada proposition. The hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) called attention to it, and tried to lead the members of the House to believe that it was not to their best interests to urge upon the people of Canada to make and to consume as much of the products of their own land as possible. Do not these hon. gentlemen realize that the best market is the home market, and that the made-in-Canada proposition is a live and progressive idea, and that people in Canada should gladly and willingly support it?

Do these gentlemen want us to call attention to the position in which they were placed in 1911 when they voted against the three dreadnoughts that should to-day be in the firing line of the British fleet?

Mr. PUGSLEY: They would not have been completed until next year.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: The ex-Minister of Public Works criticises this Government in its management of the affairs of Canada. Had these two battleships been completed and were to-day in the firing line of the British fleet, how proud the people of Canada would be. Does the hon. member for St. John not appreciate the fact that on the 5th day of August, when war was declared, the people of Canada were humiliated to think that they had done so little to aid the British Empire. Thousands of men in Canada hung their heads in shame to think they were unable to assist the Motherland in her defence. Who was to blame? Day in and day out, night in and night out, this Government did their utmost to carry this proposition through this House, so that assistance would be granted to the Motherland. They were doing just what the British Admiralty asked them to do. Any man who will read the memorandum that was placed before this Government in 1911 will realize that this Government was merely carrying out the wishes of the British Admiralty when they said that the best means whereby the Canadian people could assist the Motherland in the defence of the Empire would be by building three of the largest and best battleships that money could buy or science procure. The is the statement made in the memorandum, and the hon. gentlemen opposite did their ulmost to defeat that proposition.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. gentleman says if these battleships had been completed Canada would have been proud of them. Did not the right hon. the Prime Minister, at the time when it was proposed to build them, say that they would not be completed until after 1916? It would be after the general election; that would take place before they were completed.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: That statement may have been made by the Premier of Canada.

Mr. J. D. REID: No, it was not.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, it was made distinctly and positively.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: But supposing that it was made, under the present circumstances if those two battleships had been in the dockyards of England in process of construction, men could have been put to work on them night and day during the last seven months, we are not so far from the year 1916 that we cannot appreciate the fact that the British Admiralty would have been able to have completed those two battleships, and that to-day they might have been in the firing line of the British fleet.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Why didn't you have the Niobe ready?

Mr. ARMSTRONG: Let me call attention to the fact that the people of Canada have looked on with admiration at the splendid fight put up by the warship furnished to the British Admiralty by the Government of New Zealand in the battle off Heligoland.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What about the Australian Government's boat?

Mr. ARMSTRONG: And more than that, they were able to assist Admiral Beatty in the splendid victory he achieved in the North Sea. The cry with these gentlemen opposite was: "No need; no danger, no emergency; no menace; we know what we are talking about and there is no need for the Government to undertake this proposition." But the Premier had asked the British Admiralty how he could best serve them in that regard, and he is asking them to-day. This Government to-day are carrying out the wishes of the British Admiralty, and we are proud and glad to support them. But hon. gentlemen opposite are doing their utmost to discredit this Government in the eyes of Canada and the world at large, and if possible drive them to the country. We on this side of the House are glad that we have at the head of affairs in Canada such an honest, straight-forward, and business-like Governement, a Government which from time time to time gives to the people of Canada legislation as progressive as could possibly be expected from any Government.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

THE BUDGET.

PROPOSED WAR TAXATION.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (resuming):

When the House rose at six o'clock I was calling attention to the fact that had this Government obeyed the wishes of the British Admiralty in 1911 and, had their policy not been thwarted in this House and defeated in the Senate by the Liberal party, Canada and Great Britain would to-day have been much better prepared for this war. Upon the shoulders of hon. gentlemen opposite, therefore, rests a great responsibility, and when called upon to give an account of their stewardship in the near future, they will cut a sorry figure before the people, when they have to tell them that their policy in this House so far this session has been to embarrass and hinder the Government in promoting the necessary legislation to help the Empire to bring this great struggle to a successful issue. When war broke out we had no great dreadnoughts to place in the firing line, and for that hon. gentlemen opposite are to blame. They do not dare to vote in opposition to the $100,000,000 asked for by the Government now, nor did they dare to vote last summer against the $50,000,000 for war expenditure, but they do dare to try to embarrass and obstruct and criticise necessary legislation. The Government now in power has done its full duty in this crisis. One hundred thousand of our brave soldiers have been armed and equipped and fed, and great credit is due to the men at the head of affairs who have been so successful in this undertaking. Apparently hon. gentlemen opposite are now taking up the time of Parliament with the object of driving the Government to the country, and if that is their wish, and if the Government should appeal to the country, these hon. gentlemen must expect very little sympathy from the electorate. Look at what the colonies are doing in this great war; see the splendid work of Australia!

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: Will hon. gentlemen opposite pound their desks when I remind them of the attitude taken by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, then Prime Minister, in 1902, 1907, and 1909, before the Colonial Conferences. When he was asked at these conferences to subscribe to the assistance of the British navy and the defence of the British Empire the attitude taken by him was in direct opposition to the best interests of the people of Canada at that time. While Australia and New Zealand were willing to subscribe from year to year towards the maintenance of the British navy, and towards assisting in the defence of the Empire, he told the conferences that Canada was not able to assist because she was building the Grand Trunk Pacific railway and establishing wireless telegraph stations. These were weak excuses, indeed, when the British Empire was calling for help from the Colonies, and when Australia and New Zealand responded so nobly to the call. But notwithstanding the delays and embarrassments which hon. gentlemen opposite are trying to bring about, we have no doubt that Great Britain will come out of this war successfully. She has so organized her resources and perfected her army and navy that her defeat is impossible.

When hon. gentlemen opposite refer to the British preference, they should remember that the British preference is extended to thirteen countries as well Great Britain, and that When Mr. Fielding, the Minister of Finance of the day, introduce the preference, he had no intention of making it a preference to be enjoyed by the Motherland alone.

I wish to give a few facts in regard to that preference. Of Canada's total imports, in 1896, previous to the British Preference being granted, 31 per cent came from Great Britain, whereas in 1908, under a Liberal Government, only 27 per cent came from Great Britain. Of the imports coming into Canada free of duty, in 1896, 22 per cent came from Great Britain, whereas in 1908, under a Liberal Government, notwithstanding all the Liberals say about preference, only 17 per cent came from Great Britain. The proportion of imports coming from the United States into Canada free of duty rose from 64 per cent in 1896 to 70 per cent in 1908. The value of the goods produced in the United Kingdom imported free into Canada amounted to $24,129,088 in 1914. Two and a half per cent advantage on that amount would be over $600,000. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite will try to influence this House to believe that the preference granted by the Minister of Finance in his Budget to the Motherland is not of any material assistance to that country, when I have shown that on free goods alone the Motherland will have a preference of over $600,000 over any of the other nations that are importing goods into Canada. The Budget of the Minister of Finance increases the British preference by 2½ per cent relatively to other countries. Take a case to illustrate that statement. An article worth $100 comes into Canada from England and a similar article worth $100 comes into Canada from the United States. The duty on the article from the United States is 30 per cent, or $30, whereas the duty on a similar article coming from England is 20 per cent, or $20. Therefore the British preference on that article would be $10. Under the new tariff the duty on an article coming from the United States is 37½ per cent, while the duty on an article coming from Great Britain is 25 per cent. The duty on an article worth $100 coming from the United States would amount to $37.50, and the duty on an article worth $100 coming from Great Britain would amount to $25. Therefore, the preference to the British merchant would be $12.50, whereas it was formerly $10. The Government is ready and willing to assist the Motherland in every way possible, and it also feels that it is its duty to protect its own industries that are likely to be interfered with by manufacturers in Great Britain.

The Budget of the Minister of Finance will stand for all time to come as a masterful, reasonable, sane, safe, sound business proposition. This Budget stands out in its statesmanlike qualities as the most advanced piece of legislation ever offered to the people of Canada. The tax on bank circulation required a knowledge and grasp of public finance that few men in Canada could have displayed as successfully as did the Minister of Finance. This legislation —I refer to the legislation pertaining to banks—may never disappear from the statute book, and all honour to the man who had the courage to initiate it. The Minister of Finance has kept the increased customs duties separate in order that they may not in any way conflict with the ordinary revenue, and in order that they may be dispensed with at any time. The Minister of Finance has placed a tax on all financial interests for the first time in the history of Canada.

It is an easy matter for critics to tear down and destroy, and we know that new imposts are never popular even amongst people who feel that some tax must be paid. The Minister of Finance, in his Budget, took the country into his confidence. He clearly stated that works that have been commenced, like the National Transcontinental railway, the Welland canal, the Quebec bridge, would be completed, as it would be most impracticable and unwise to suspend them for one year. Suspension would have a bad effect on the labour market; and as labour assists in paying these taxes, why should it not be considered? Very little of this revenue is to be expended on new works.

The new taxes are war taxes rendered necessary by the war. The people of Canada will pay these taxes and pay them gladly. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not seem to recognize the fact that these are war taxes, and that the aim and object of the Budget in this regard is that the Minister of Finance may be able to conduct the affairs of this country in a reasonable and businesslike manner. They are war taxes that are collected from the people for the purpose of conducting the affairs of Canada. While it is true that $150,000,000 is being advanced to the people of Canada from the Motherland, it is also true and absolutely necessary that this Government shall provide sufficient funds to conduct the affairs of Canada without hindrance.

Never again in the history of Canada do I believe an Opposition will oppose a Budget in the manner in which the present Opposition is attempting to oppose the present Budget. The Liberals need to look ahead. Behind the present cloud the sun is still shining, and there are better and brighter days in store for the people of Canada. When this terrible war is ended and our brave boys walk triumphantly through the streets of Berlin, as I believe they will, and our statesmen sit down with the statesmen of England, France and Russia to arrange the terms of peace which they will secure from Germany, we all hope that it will be permanent peace—not a peace that will only last for a generation or for a hundred years, but a peace that will last for a thousand years. Then we shall find that the people will flock to our shores and develop our industries and that Canada will forge ahead.

Before closing, I want to say a few words in regard to a matter which, to my mind, vitally affects an important industry in Canada, namely, the flax industry. We have especially in western Ontario, a great deal of flax-producing territory and a great many flax mills. Practically all of these mills are standing idle to-day. An enormous area in the Northwest that has been producing flax also deserves consideration by the Government. In Ontario forty years ago we had sixty-five flax mills; twenty years ago there were only thirty-five of these in operation. In 1913, there were only twelve in operation, and in 1914 there were only nine. The total acreage of flax taken care of in the nine mills amounted to only 1,400 acres, just about what one large mill could take care of alone. The Department of Agriculture has apparently never taken any interest in this industry, and gradually the mills have been closed. I am referring to flax grown for fibre purposes, which is the only profitable purpose for which to grow flax. In the Northwest large areas have been seeded to flax. In 1910 the area under flax cultivation was 476,877 acres, of which 438,000 acres were in Saskatchewan, 24,577 in Manitoba, and 14,300 in Alberta. This acreage was sown almost entirely for seed-producing purposes.

Had it been sown in fibre-producing flax, and the fibre saved and retted, in this district alone they would have been able to produce a much greater quantity of seed per acre, and the fibre would have amounted to at least 100,000 tons. This sold at 20 cents per lb. would have brought a return to the western provinces amounting to $40,000,000.

Canada in 1911 grew 1,500,000 tons of flax straw. At last year's prices this would have yielded at least $60,000,000; and were it in Canada to-day it would be worth $100,000,000. The straw was burned in our northwest and only the seed sent forward. The seed brought a return of only $11,855,000. It is hoped that the Government will make a close investigation of these statements and figures which appear in the Census and Statistics Monthly for April 1911.

I call your attention to the fact that this war has demoralized the flax industry in Belgium, Russia, Germany and France, and the linen mills in Ireland, Scotland and the United States are in a serious position to-day. They realize that unless some help comes from countries such as Canada to assist them in producing the flax fibre for the purposes of their mills, they are going to be seriously handicapped. Representatives of these concerns have been in Canada during the past few months urging many of us who live in districts where flax grows extensively to try to have these mills started and some of their products sent forward.

This year the whole Belgium export is cancelled, Germany has seized the whole stock of fibre, tow, yarns and linen. Germany having taken possession of the straw of the 1913 crop, held in reserve, and of the 1914 crop, harvested just before the war broke out and not marketed, there will be no flax sown this spring. For these reasons Belgium is out of the flax supply for three years.

This would appear to me to be Canada's opportunity. The improved methods used in handling the flax has made it a very profitable industry for the farmers. Pulling machines have been successful and the latest method of retting and caring for the flax have been the means of reducing the cost of handling to an enormous extent. The cotton industry of the southern States has tried to place the growing of flax in as much disfavour as possible. Canada cannot ever become great in cotton; she can become great in flax. If proper assistance is given I look forward not only to the old mills being operated, but to large mills being established in the Northwest as part of an industry which will add materially to the agricultural wealth of Canada.

I believe that a small commission should be appointed at the earliest possible date, whose duty it should be to send out literature from time to time to men interested in flax. That commission should visit the mills which have not been operated and induce them to reopen, and should see to it that sufficient seed is placed at their disposal at a reasonable price. Other duties of that commission would be: to visit each mill once at seeding time, harvesting, spreading, retting and turning, in order that they might obtain the best results; to see that the best of seed is used for planting purposes; to see to the proper grading of flax fibre for export; to investigate the new means of retting which are being introduced from time to time; to start the flax industry again in the province of Quebec if possible; to keep posted in the new European methods of handling flax; to find out ways and means of disposing of flax and its by-products in Canada; to assist the flax growers to co-operate with others in the importation of flaxseed from Holland; to devise some means whereby flax grown and scutched by the farmers on the farm in small quantities can be marketed to advantage; to devise a plan to settle disputes between the farmer and the flax buyer in regard to prices and to the standardization of flax both as to seed and to fibre. New Canadian strains should be developed; encouragement should be given in the way of baling the crop; lower freight rates should be secured; information concerning tests as to the exhaustiveness of flax on the soil should be disseminated. The farmers should be disabused of any prejudice they may have against flax growing, and if possible the establishment of paper mills in flaxseed centres should be encouraged in centres such as Saskatchewan where coarse straw can be profitably utilized. The United States, Ireland, Holland, France and other countries should be visited to inquire into and study their methods of treating flax. In short, every possible assistance should be rendered toward the development of this industry. I hope the Government will give immediate attention to this matter and that some assistance will be forthcoming.

In conclusion, I wish to congratulate this Government on the Budget and to say that it is a reasonable, fair, businesslike proposition, and that I have every confidence in the good sense and business management of the Prime Minister and his advisers.

Mr. L. J. GAUTHIER (St. Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, it is a good thing that the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) came to his " in conclusion," for up to that point the hon. gentleman had not mentioned the Budget. He took us through the history of the Liberal Administration from 1896; he spoke of dreadnoughts, of flax, of loyalty —of everything except the question which is now an issue between the two parties sitting in this House. I intend first to take up briefly the points that have been raised by my hon. friend. In the first place, he found fault with the hon. member for St. John City (Mr. Pugsley) for his attitude on revotes, and said that when that hon. gentleman was Minister of Public Works in 1908 there were a number of revotes. The hon. member for St. John City did not say that money should not be revoted, but he objects to revotes that involve extra taxation. The revotes of 1908 did not mean extra taxation laid upon the people. The hon. member for Lambton goes on to say that the Opposition is embarrassing the Government while our boys are marching to the front. But the Opposition has declared that it is ready to vote any amount of money asked by this Government to go on with the war. I do not see how we can be charged with embarrassing the Government in the conduct of the war. Being willing to help the Government all along, it is nothing but right that we should criticise what we think is open to criticism. Otherwise, what was the reason for convening Parliament? The Government, having a majority in this House, has the duty of keeping the business of the country going, and they must take the responsibility of their actions. If the Opposition find that the manner in which the Government is fulfilling its duty is not according to what is right, it is their duty to criticise. But we do not want to embarrass the Government on account of the war—not at all; and we shall prove it before the debate is over.

The hon. member for East Lambton raised a question which ought to be settled at once for all. He said to the Opposition: If you are anxious for a fight, if you want to have an election, you may have it immediately. It is just as well that we should understand each other in this regard.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I know that my hon. friend does not intend to misquote what I said. I did not use the word "immediately." I said that if hon. gentlemen wanted an election, it was up to this Government to pitch its tent right here and fight the matter out, and that if we could not convince hon. gentlemen opposite that they are in the wrong and we are in the right, the best thing to do would be to go to the country.

Mr. GAUTHIER: I have no objection to the correction of my hon. friend. He made two allusions to that subject during the course of his speech: first, I understood him to say that if we were anxious for a fight the Government should pitch their tent and fight to a finish. Secondly, he said that if the Liberal party wanted an election, we should go to the country. That is what I understood him to say, and I think the explanation he has made bears that out. We are not over anxious to have an election, but if the Government wants it, it will find us ready to face it.

The hon. member asks what the Government of the day did in 1907, when we were in the midst of a crisis. The Government of the day reduced its expenditure, while the Government of to-day is increasing its expenditure, that is the difference. We are opposed to the Government on this question of taxation, because they are increasing expenditures as well as increasing the burdens which have to be borne by the people.

My hon. friend says that every country is enlarging its public debt. To this assertion we do not object. When the Government at the war session asked us to vote $50,000,000, we voted the amount willingly. This year, when they ask for $100,000,000, we are ready to vote it without objection. We realize that this war in which our country is involved must increase the public debt. We are willing to shoulder part of the responsibility for the expansion of the debt, but we do not wish to be held responsible for the extra taxation that is to be imposed upon the people in a manner to which we take objection.

My hon. friend said that instead of building the Transcontinental the previous Government should have extended the Intercolonial to the coast. Having regard to the statistics concerning the Intercolonial at the present time, I think my hon. friend will realize that if the Intercolonial railway had been extended to the coast, the results would have been much less advantageous than those which will be obtained by the construction of the Transcontinental, which is built by a private corporation.

My hon. friend compares the price of wheat in Winnipeg with the price of wheat in Minneapolis. It is all very well to speak of a home market, but what is the use of having a quotation from the Winnipeg market and not having a consumer for the produce that is put on that market? I would rather have the consumer than the quotation.

The hon. gentleman sought to draw a parallel between the action of the Government in connection with the proposed contribution of $35,000,000 to the British Admiralty and the position of the present Administration in connection with the Budget. He said that the Government acted under the direction of the British Admiralty when they asked Parliament to vote $35,000,000 for the Mother Country. Evidently my hon. friend desires to intimate that this Budget of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has been drawn under the direction of the Admiralty. I think it is not fair that the Admiralty should be held responsible for anything the responsibility for which rests upon the Government.

My hon. friend says that in respect of the $50,000,000 which have been voted, and the $100,000,000 which are being appropriated for war purposes, the Opposition did not and would not dare vote against the Government. I am not a scholar in the English language, and very often when a new word comes up in this House I go to the library and consult dictionaries and lexicons for the purpose of finding out the meaning of the word so employed. I have heard an hon. member in this House read an extract carefully prepared upon the words obsolete and obsolescent, and contend that the ships, which would have been tendered for under the Naval Act of 1910, would have been obsolete the moment the contract was granted. But quite recently the Government bought two submarines which had been rejected by the Government for which they were ordered; they paid for them $250,000, and they were not obsolete. It is the same with the extra-superfine distinction between the two words "false" and "untrue." The same applies to the word "truce." The two parties have entered into a truce which, according to the dictionary, is a cessation of hostilities. Listening as you do, Mr. Speaker, with careful attention to the speeches which are delivered in this House, would you believe, after having heard the speech which has just been delivered by the hon. member for East Lambton, that the party to which he belongs has entered into a truce and has ceased hostilities? When the two parties entered into a truce, the right hon. leader of the Opposition gave the Government a free hand in the direction of the affairs of this country. Parliament was summoned; the Government asked for a certain amount of money; we granted it willingly. All proposed amendments to existing laws which were suggested by the Government were willingly supported by the Opposition. When the session was over it was suggested that a French-Canadian regiment be formed in the province of Quebec. My right hon. friend and leader went on the public platform with his old political opponent and asked the young men to enlist, and the formation of a regiment was completed inside of three weeks. Would you be surprised to know, Sir, that at that very moment, when my right hon. friend and leader was respecting the truce which had been declared between the two parties, our friends of the Conservative party were circulating literature and cartoons with the professed object of preparing for an election, which, it was alleged, would be held on November 28, 1914?

[Mr. Gauthier.]

Mr. PAQUET: In the province of Quebec?

Mr. GAUTHIER: In the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. PAQUET: Would my honorable friend allow me a question? Does he intend to maintain that we have sent out for distribution in the province of Quebec pamphlets concerning a general election?

Mr. GAUTHIER: What I said was that at the very moment that my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was respecting the truce and giving as free a hand as possible to the Government, the Government was circulating in the Dominion of Canada literature and cartoons to prepare for an election that was proposed to be held on the 28th of November of last year.

Mr. PAQUET: I want to know from my honourable friend if, in the province of Quebec, the truce was observed by the Conservative party.

Mr. GAUTHIER: There are two reasons why these pamphlets were not circulated in Quebec: first, they were not translated; and then it would be of no use, because hon. members opposite are very well aware that it is no use circulating literature in Quebec when we have their own records on which to punish them at the next general election.

Mr. PAQUET: My honourable friend refuses to answer.

Mr. GAUTHIER: Mr. Speaker, I think I have answered my hon. friend. The hon. member for L'Islet will have an opportunity to answer before the debate is closed, and, without giving him advice—he had been in this House for quite a number of years before I had the honour of having a seat here—I ask him, he being with the majority, to be good enough to wait, as his turn is coming.

I speak in my own name and in the name of the riding I have the honour to represent. I have been in constant consultation with my people, and what I am going to say I say of my own free will and in my own name. I say to the Government that if they do not want to cut the expenditure, if they want absolutely an amount of $140,000,000 for public works during the present year, why do they consent to impose the burden of taxation on a part of the community which has done more than its share in the struggle which is going on? It is well known that the great majority of our boys who are actually at the front, who have actually reddened the sands of the dunes in Flanders to assist Great Britain in the war that has been waged against her, and which she is fighting in order that she may have the respect of the world for her signature, these boys come especially from the mass of our population. They have supplied the flesh, the bone, the blood, the heart and soul of the nation. I claim then that they have done their share, and the burden of taxation should not be imposed on the mass of our toilers and our labourers. I would not care to make a speech on economics, I am not entitled to give the results of my study or of my reading, but in my opinion a community is composed of two portions, the part that has acquired wealth and the part that is building the country. When you ask the masses of the population to exert their strength, to put their hope, to spend their energies in developing the resources of the country, and they have accepted your invitation, I claim that they have done their share. But what would you say of the wealth owners of this country who can escape taxation in such a time of stress as the one we are going through? The Government has encouraged the made in Canada campaign. At the same time they are increasing the protection in favour of the manufacturer. What will be the result? The result will be that the manufacturer will get the profit because he will enhance the price of his produce and the consumer will pay a higher price, and the Government will get no profit, so that the tariff, as I see it, is nothing else than putting an extra burden of taxation on the shoulders of the poor classes of people with no profit to the Government and with further protection to the wealthy classes of our population. I say that this is unfair. I know very well that our protests in this House are of no avail but I say this, speaking for myself, and for my constituents, that if I had not the courage to stand here and speak my mind and the mind of those I represent I would not be worthy of the position I have received from the electors who have sent me here to speak in their names. I have no grouch against the manufacturers. I have no complaint to lodge against those who have acquired wealth; but I say to the Government, when you are putting the burden of taxation you should take care not to crush those on whom you rely for the development of the resources of this country and allow the rich and the wealthy to escape the burden of taxation. Indirect taxation, to my mind, always falls on the poor and direct taxation on the rich man, and I say that the burden of the taxation proposed in this budget, without entering into all the details of its provisions, should have been put on the shoulders of those who are in a better position to bear it. The poor man should have been let go, for his burden is heavy enough at present. But it will be increased by reason of the protection given to the manufacturer, for upon every article made in Canada the consumer will now have to pay a higher price. In my opinion it was not right for the Government to make the poorer classes bear the burden of taxation.

The party to which I belong has been called more than once the party of disloyalty, but let me remind hon. gentlemen that it was our party that put the British preferential tariff upon the statute book, and our party has upheld that policy on every platform in this country. That surely is proof that we are not disloyal. But this Government, by decreasing the British preference, is not only hurting the credit of Canada in Great Britain, but, what is more important, is raising the price of goods to the consumers of this country; for the manufacturer in Canada or in the United States or abroad who wanted to compete in our market with the goods made in England had to meet the prices of those goods. By raising the British preference, therefore, the Government is simply taxing every man, woman and child in this country, and at the very time when the working people of this country are clamouring for work. There is protection for the manufacturer, but no protection for the consumer.

One last word, and after thanking the House for their kind attention I will resume my seat. What do the bank statistics show that are sent broadcast throughout this country? According to the last reports of the chartered banks in Canada they have more money now than ever before. Is not that a proof that Canada has as much wealth to-day as she ever had before? Why is it that all this money is piled up in the banks in the name of every man, woman and child in the Dominion? It is because public confidence is gone; that is the only reason. Our men are as strong and energetic as they were before, our resources are as wonderful as they were before, and our credit is as good as it ever was before. We have more money than we ever had, but it is all tied up in the banks because the owners do not wish to take any risks with it. And who is responsible for this? I say it is the Government of this country, because they are not only recklessly spending the revenues of this country but preparing to spend recklessly the money that will be exacted from our people by this unjust, unfair and unsound taxation.

Mr. F. S. SCOTT (South Waterloo): It seems to me but fitting that my first words spoken in this House should bear reference to the loss which this Parliament has suffered in the death of the gentleman who preceded me in the position which I now occupy. The more I have come in contact with the members of this House and heard their references to the late hon.

9 p.m. Mr. Clare the more I have been impressed with the high place which he occupied in the estimation and the affections of the men with whom he was associated here. In his home town of Preston the splendid industries with which he was identified stand as a monument to his ability as a business man. We in South Waterloo who knew him so well feel that so great was the work in which he was engaged and so widespread his influence throughout Canada that his loss may well be referred to as a national one.

I should also like to give expression on this occasion to the very great pride and pleasure that I feel at being permitted to serve in this House under the gentleman who occupies the high position of Premier of this Dominion of Canada. For ten years he was the chosen leader of his party while in Opposition. For more than three years he has been Premier of this country, during which time Canada has passed through perhaps the most difficult period in her history. I believe it is the verdict of the people of Canada to-day, and will be the verdict of the people more than ever in the future, that by the statesmanlike manner in which he has guided this country through this difficult time, the Premier has measured up to the best traditions of British statesmanship, and his place is secure in the honour roll of great Canadians.

The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) who has just resumed his seat will pardon me if I do not follow in detail the various arguments he has advanced, but there are one or two points to which I shall refer. It has seemed to me as I have followed this debate, that after the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) had spoken for the gentlemen opposite, the field that has been covered since that time has been practically the same ground over and over again. I should just like to refer to one of the points that was made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, a point that was also emphasized very emphatically by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) this afternoon; and that is their insistence that the Government of the day should cut down expenditures. I confess, Mr. Speaker, that I have a very limited knowledge of the procedure followed by this House in the carrying on of its business, but it does seem to me that it would be a much more businesslike proceeding if hon. gentlemen opposite, instead of speaking in a general way about expenditures, would wait until the Estimates are before the House and then tell us which of them they object to.

The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) also stated that the great burden of taxation in this Budget fell upon the people who were least able to bear it. Well, the Bank of Montreal, under this new taxation system, will pay into the treasury of this country $150,000 per annum, the Bank of Commerce $135,000 per annum, and the Imperial Bank $60,000 per annum, and the other banks will pay in like proportion. On the day following that on which the Minister of Finance brought down his Budget, I was in the office of the general manager of a bank in the city of Toronto, and he said to me: Our share of this taxation will be $60,000 a year, but the banks will not attempt to shift that burden on to their customers, with whom they have been doing business, but will cheerfully pay it, feeling that they are discharging a patriotic obligation which they owe to Canada and to the Empire. That, Sir, I have no doubt, represents the feeling amongst the banking institutions of this country.

I represent a constituency, important from an agricultural standpoint and important also from an industrial standpoint, and my constituents are intelligent people, who follow closely the discussion of public affairs, and I want to tell the Minister of Finance that I have not, up to the present, received a single complaint from them against the customs tariff as proposed in this war Budget.

I can compliment the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) on the manner in which he handled his subject in criticising the Budget, and I have found that the hon. gentlemen on his side of the House who have spoken since he did have done him the compliment of largely following his argument. As I understand the position which the hon. gentleman and his party take with regard to this Budget, it is, that if the gentlemen who have been in charge of the affairs of this country during the past three years had been more careful in their expenditure, and had husbanded better the revenues of the country, there would have been no need for a war Budget. Well, the people of Canada know, the people of the world know, that as a consequence of this war the business and financial conditions of the world have been revolutionized, and that in every country, whether warring or neutral, it has been necessary to introduce unusual fiscal measures of the kind we are now discussing. In the neutral United States, which is far removed from the seat of conflict, shortly after the war broke out it became necessary to introduce special legislation to take care of the financial situation. Australia, New Zealand, every civilized country, has had to pass special legislation to meet the extraordinary conditions which have arisen. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) says: Had I been Minister of Finance during the past three years, and had I had surrounding me on the Treasury benches my chosen people, I would have so administered the financial affairs of Canada that it would not have been necessary to introduce any war Budget. I must admit that for the short time I have been in this House I have been very much impressed with the ability of the hon. gentleman (Mr. A. K. Maclean), but when he makes a contention of that kind, I feel I cannot pay equal tribute to his modesty. When the Liberal party in the Dominion advances such an argument, I am forced to think that the people of Canada will not be prepared to take them as seriously as they themselves.

Another point raised by the financial critic of the Liberal party was that these proposed changes in the tariff made the tariff so high that it became prohibitive, and that it would consequently restrict trade. I have no doubt that hon. gentlemen opposite are sincere when they say that this will be a high tariff, and perhaps they are sincere when they say it will restrict trade, but I certainly cannot agree with them in the conclusion they have arrived at in this respect. Let them look at the tariff which has been in force in the United States for the last twenty-five years, and let them average the duties of that tariff and then compare that average with the average duties in the war Budget now submitted by the Minister of Finance, and they will find that the average rate of duty in the United States has been considerably higher than the average rate in this proposed war Budget. And, Sir, I do not think it can be successfully contended that the tariff in the United States has not always supplied an abounding revenue for the needs of that country.

Particular stress has been laid by hon. gentlemen opposite on the changes proposed in the tariff with reference to the British preference. They say that under no circumstances would they touch the British preference, but I can tell them that if they occupied the Government benches to-day, and if they were to add that seven and a half per cent duty on raw materials and leave the British preference as it is, it would be a very serious thing indeed for Canadian industries. There are in my constituency a number of woollen mills, and they are owned by gentlemen, some of whom support the party opposite, but I want to tell those gentlemen on the other side of the House, that if they adopted such a policy as they propose they would adopt, it would not be very favourably received by that army of people who are engaged in our woollen industries. I submit further, Mr. Speaker, that in so far as the principle of the British preference is concerned, it remains unchanged by this Budget.

A great deal has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite about extravagant expenditure, and while I have no desire to weary the House by an array of figures, I would like to refer to four items of expenditure which this Government had to undertake during the last three years. During the short time the present Government have been in power they paid $56,000,000 towards the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, $10,000,000 for the Quebec bridge, $38,000,000 to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, which they were obliged to pay under an interpretation of the Grand Trunk Pacific agreement, made by the Liberal Government, and $15,000,000 to prevent the Grand Trunk Pacific from being tied up in 1913. Here we have a total of $119,000,000 which had to be paid by this Government, and every dollar of which is a legacy from the Liberal Government and an obligation incurred by them which the present Government had to assume. I have no doubt that were I thoroughly to analyse the situation I would find other large sums of a like nature.

I would like for a moment to refer to a matter brought up by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) in the part which he took in this debate the other night. The hon. member said that he would like to see a more equitable distribution of the taxes than the new customs tariff would give, and he advocated direct taxation. The Minister of Finance has introduced no new principles in his War Budget; he has simply extended the principles that have always underlain the customs tariff. Those same principles were in effect in the tariff that was in operation in this country between the years 1896 and 1911. In so far as my knowledge goes, I have never heard that the hon. member for Edmonton tried to induce the party with which he is identified to change from a customs tariff to a system of direct taxation.

The hon. member for Edmonton also said that the duties on lumber, cement and many other articles, to which I need not refer, affected the prairie provinces. It has been my privilege to visit the provinces of the West; and if I were to be asked what is the chief characteristics of the people of the West, my answer might well be that one of their chief characteristics is their deep-rooted loyalty to Canada and to the Empire. When the hon. member for Edmonton says that the people of the West will be affected by these taxes, if I know the spirit of the people of the West, I say that they want to be affected by these taxes, because they realize that when they are so affected, they are paying a patriotic debt which they owe to Canada and to the Empire.

Reference has also been made by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House to the made-in-Canada campaign, and hon. gentlemen opposite have been inclined to hold it up to ridicule. I do not think that hon. gentlemen opposite properly appreciate the significance of this made-in-Canada campaign. What does it mean? Made in Canada means employment to Canadian industry. When our industries are busy and when our people are well employed, the Minister of Finance of to-day or the minister of to-morrow, whoever he may be, need not worry about the revenues of this country.

The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), not in this debate but on another occasion—and I followed his remarks with a great deal of interest—also paid his compliments to this made-in-Canada idea. His statement was that he was sorry to see this Government give its approval to it; that it savoured to him too much of the idea of "made in Germany," and that in so far as he was concerned, he was too good a Britisher to have anything to do with it. My prejudices against Germany do not carry me as far as that. The Canadian people have a great deal to learn from the German people. It will be a great thing for this country when our people have the same efficiency in all the walks of life that Germany has been able to instil into her people. We have also very much to learn from Germany in matters of education as applied to industry and also to agriculture. Canada cannot do better than take as an example what has been accomplished during the last forty years by the German empire. The development and growth of Germany can to a very large extent be attributed to the great assistance which she has received in the convenient open market which she has had, the free trade market of Great Britain. As a result of that great trade with Great Britain, the greatest market in the world, Germany has developed until she has become one of the greatest and most powerful nations in the world.

The point I would like to make is this, that what the German empire has done the Dominion of Canada in the future ought to be able to do. Compare for a moment the opportunities of the two countries. We have room here for sixteen German empires. German soil is not as rich as our own. The Germans have not the great wealth of forests such as we possess; they have not the great lakes for inland shipping; they have not sea coasts such as we possess; and yet we see what has been accomplished by Germany. As a result of this war, new trade routes will be built up; new business connections in the old land will be developed in a way never before known; but the empire to which we belong, whatever changes there may be, will come out of this struggle with a greater standing in the world and a greater influence for good amongst the nations than she has ever before possessed. With those changed conditions, a splendid field of opportunity is offered not only for colonial, but for British statesmen. If Great Britain, with the great trade which she will command in the future, is going to build up another giant, that giant should come from people of her own breed, it should spring from a people who ask no better future, for no nobler destiny than that they may be permitted to work out their future as part of the British Empire.

So, it seems to me, the future promises a great opportunity for Canada, an opportunity to which our public men, our statesmen, should direct attention. Right Hon. David Lloyd George, Chancellor of the Exchequer, stated the other day that the cost of this war to Great Britain for the first year amounted to $2,500,000,000. An enormous debt will have to be assumed by the people of the Motherland. We know that a large part of the people of the Motherland have expressed themselves as being in favour of tariff reform and preferential trade. Now, my thought is this—that, as a result of the piling up of this debt and of the period of reconstruction which will follow, Great Britain will be compelled to adopt a customs tariff again; and when that time comes it should be the duty of not only Canadian but British statemen to see to it that there shall be secured for the products of Canada a preference in that market; and I know of nothing that will do more than such a preference to promote the welfare, the progress and the development of the Dominion.

I feel that I should not longer trespass on the patience of this House. I was told that when a new member rises for the first time in his place he is received in a very considerate way. That has been my own experience, and I must thank hon. members for the indulgent way in which they have received my efforts.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford): I congratulate the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Scott) on his maiden effort. I am sure we all must acknowledge that his speech in dignity and ability was all that we could expect. I join in his expressions of regret at the death of his predecessor, Mr. Clare. I am sure that we on this side regret that gentleman's death as much as do hon. gentlemen on the other side, for he was a very capable man, a man who had risen in the world by his own efforts, and who had proven himself a man in every respect.

I will not attempt to criticise my hon. friend's speech particularly, but I wish to offer one or two remarks upon it. He started out by telling us that if we would oppose the votes in the Estimates we should be doing our duty more than by criticising the Budget. When he has been longer a member of this House he will know that we do oppose many of the votes in the Estimates—and that is all the good it does. The hon. gentleman says that the banks are ready to pay the extra taxation laid upon them by the Budget. But these are public corporations and the individuals who control their operation do not pay a cent of this taxation out of their own pockets. Moreover, if that taxation becomes a burden on the banks they will simply charge it up to us poor devils who have to borrow money. That is human nature, of course; but it does not show loyalty or patriotism on the part of the banks. They are prepared to do their duty, no doubt; I am not saying anything against them; I shall have occasion to mention them later in my remarks.

The hon. gentleman says the whole business community is feeling the hard times brought on by the war. In his own town, as in many other towns in this Dominion, if it were not for the war—and I am sorry to give that as a reason; it is an unspeakable reason—the hard times would be a hundred per cent worse than they are to-day.

Mr. WILCOX: Don't you believe that.

Mr. NESBITT: I not only believe it, but know it; and in the constituency of my hon. friend who has just spoken I think they have contracts for shells out of which they make money. They do not make shells, woollens, and other goods for nothing, even for the Imperial Government. And so it is with many kinds of industries throughout this Dominion. Everybody knew these hard times were coming. The Minister of Finance warned us of them a year ago. I will go into that also later on. The hon. member for South Waterloo mentioned the woollen industries and said they could not stand the increased duty on the raw material unless the duty on the finished goods were also increased. I cannot agree with him. I know something about the woollen industry, in the same form as do the people in his own town—knitted goods—and I do not agree that the industry could not have stood an increase on the raw material. But we have been opposed to increased duties not only on the raw material but also on the finished article. The hon. junior member of Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) has told you distinctly that we were opposed to the increase of duties entirely.

The hon. member for South Waterloo tells us that Great Britain will be compelled to adopt a customs tariff when this war is over. As I do not have anything to do with the management of Great Britain's affairs, and as I find that the Cabinet in that country are quite capable of managing their own affairs, I will not attempt to criticise their supposed future policy. I have no doubt that they will do what is best for the country at large.

When the Minister of Finance brought down his Budget about two weeks ago, I was not only surprised but much disappointed. He had shown such ability in handling the banking and financial situation in August, that I expected too great things of him, I suppose. I would like for a moment to examine the position in which we find ourselves. He tells us that the current expenditure for the year ending the 31st of this month will be $140,000,000; that the special and other expenses other than war will be $50,000,000, a total of $190,000,000. And he estimates a revenue for the year of $130,000,000. This means a gross deficit of $60,000,000 to be made up this year. The hon. gentleman goes on to say that we borrowed from Great Britain, not only the whole $50,000,000 of the war expenditure voted in August last, but $10,000,000 more, or $60,000,000 altogether. He proceeds to tell us that we issued for Dominion purposes Dominion notes to the amount of $10,000,000 in excess of the issue of $15,000,000 authorized last session. I think he told us the other night that he had really issued $26,000,000 in excess. He also said that we had borrowed over and above the $60,000,000, the sum of £3,000,000 on six months Treasury bills which fall due in June.

He borrowed also $6,500,000 on 1940-60 stock, and $5,000,000 from the Bank of Montreal. This $5,000,000, plus the $15,000,000 additional note issue, when added to the $60,000,000, makes $80,000,000 over and above the $6,500,000, or $86,500,000 that the hon. minister borrowed to carry on the finances of this country during 1914-15. We had in 1911-12, according to the Public Accounts, a surplus of $37,946,776. In 1912-13 the surplus was $56,630,366; in 1913-14, $35,789,921, a total for the three years of $130,367,063, and we borrowed $86,500,000 to carry us to the end of the fiscal year 1914-15. The people of this country are entitled to sympathy because of the fact that although during three prosperous years we had a surplus of $130,000,000, we had to borrow in 1914 $86,000,000 to pay our way. I sympathize with the people because of their having to bear that kind of burden. I would sympathize with the Finance Minister but for the fact that every time we on this side of the House suggest the curtailment of expenditure, we are greeted with jeers from the other side of the House, just as though we had no right to criticise expenditures; just as though there was no such thing in the financial history of this country as the curtailment of unnecessary expenditure. My hon. friend will have to pardon us for thinking that we are supposed to represent the people who send us here. The hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. J. E. Armstrong) this afternoon, and several hon. gentlemen on the other side, evidenced much indignation because we criticised what they are pleased to call war expenditures, but what we call current expenditures. Not a single dollar of the expenditure which is proposed to be raised by the increased taxation will be paid out as actual war expenditure. I should like to find the financier who would tell me, having regard to the Finance Minister's estimates for the coming year, how one dollar of this extra taxation will be paid even towards interest on the additional money that is to be borrowed. It is an absolutely impossible financial probability that any money will be left to be paid as interest on the increased loans after we pay our current expenditure as estimated for 1915-16.

I should like to read a short extract from the hon. Minister of Finance's Budget speech, as follows:

> As regards our borrowings from the Imperial Government, our arrangements are that we shall pay interest at the same rate as is paid by the Imperial Treasury upon its war loans, from the proceeds of which advances are to be made to us. At such time or times in the future as may be agreed upon between the British Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Canadian Minister of Finance, a Canadian war loan or loans will be issued and the borrowings from the Imperial Government repaid. It seems to me that no fairer terms could be named than those so generously accorded us by the Imperial authorities.

Great Britain is not only herself bearing the burden of this frightful war, but she is assisting her Allies, lending moneys to independent European countries and meeting the war expenses of all her dominions. And what are we doing? The Minister of Finance says that no fairer terms could be made; yet he immediately puts on an excess of tariff against the country that is struggling under that heavy burden. It is well known that Great Britain's exports during the last three or four months have fallen off to an enormous extent, and that she needs whatever assistance she can get from her dominions. If she ever needed it, she needs it now. We say that we send men to fight Britain's battles; are we sending men to fight her battles, or are we sending men to fight our own battles? I submit that when we make expenditures in connection with the war and when we send men to the assistance of the Empire, we do so simply for our own selfish ends, for the simple reason that if anything should happen to Great Britain, where would we be? What would happen if we became a German colony to-morrow? We are sending our men, therefore, to fight our own battles, and we are charging Great Britain, upon any exports she may send to us, an additional five per cent in order to show our gratitude for what she is doing for us.

To hon. gentlemen who doubt our loyalty because we are criticising this Budget, let me say that we are prepared to vote the $100,000,000, as we voted the $50,000,000; all we ask is that it be properly expended. I think that the man who overcharges either the Canadian Government or the Imperial Government in the sale of war supplies deserves not merely to receive no further orders, but to be criminally prosecuted. The people of this country are making great efforts not only to pay the amount required for war expenditure, but also to contribute generously to the patriotic funds that have been instituted throughout the length and breadth of this land. There is probably not a woman in the land who has not been knitting something to send to the soldiers at the front; probably not a man in the land who has not sacrificed something during the last few months in order to assist the soldiers at the front. I say again that the man who purposely defrauds either Government in furnishing supplies ought to be criminally prosecuted, no matter who he may be. All we ask the Government is that they take every precaution not only to prevent fraud in this respect, but to assist the Motherland in every possible way to buy what she has to buy in this country at the lowest possible prices.

In 1915-16, after we have borrowed $86,500,000 to pay our expenses up to the end of this month, we have to borrow $204,000,000, including the war grant of $100,000,000. Outside of current expenditure we have to borrow during the fiscal year 1915-16, $104,000,000. Where in the name of common sense are we going to get it? The Finance Minister himself says that the channels—British channels—through which this money formerly came are now closed, and that they will be closed to the industries of this country, to municipal corporations, and to the provinces. But we have to get from some source $104,000,000 over and above the war loan of $100,000,000 and over and above the current revenue, which is estimated at $120,000,000, including excess taxes.

This is the position in which we now find ourselves. Now, what have we got to face it with? We propose to impose certain new taxes. The Finance Minister has put a charge of one per cent on bank issues and a charge of one per cent on the gross earnings of loan companies and insurance companies. The insurance companies are, after all, the fire insurance companies to a very great extent. Life and marine companies are exempt and the other companies are to pay one per cent on their gross revenue. The great fire insurance companies of this country, I have no doubt, will be perfectly willing to pay their share of this tax, as the banks are and as all of us will have to be; but at the same time is it not absolutely unfair that these companies, both the great English fire insurance companies and Canadian companies throughout the length and breadth of this land, will have to pay this one per cent while all the unlicensed companies that do business in this country and the underground companies will get off scott free. We force the Canadian and British companies to take out a license. They are of great benefit to the country because they pay enormous taxes on their realty and they are great lenders on gilt-edged securities, as their funds must be accessible at all times. We force these companies to pay one per cent and let the underground companies go scott free. The underground companies did a business in Canada last year of $250,000,000 insurance. The gross premum on that, I would think, would be something between $150,000 and $200,000. The great Canadian and British companies carry the ordinary business of the people of this country. The business that is done by the underground and mutual companies is largely the business of large corporations who can afford to put their premises in such a condition that they will be insured by these mutual and underground companies. My hon. friend will say that as they pay no licenses we have no right to tax them; but under clause 139 of the Insurance Act we take power to make them report to the Government, and if we have no right to tax them as they are we should make them pay a license in order to do business in this country, so that we can tax them and not be unfair to those who are doing business in a proper way.

I now come to the tariff. I may tell my hon. friend the Finance Minister that the tariff, so far as I know, will not be a revenue producing tariff. I shall not suggest that the tariff is being enacted for the purpose of assisting, as some of my friends say, the large corporations or the manufacturers. I shall not suggest anything of that kind, but I am going to say that as far as I know business the tariff will not be a revenue producing tariff. I believe there would have been a greater revenue from the tariff as it was before than will be derived from the tariff as it is now, for the simple reason that on a great many articles the tariff is absolutely prohibitive. You take the one article of woollens. The Finance Minister said that he relieved the people who could not afford to bear the burden to a great extent. There is nobody who can afford it or who cannot afford but is forced to wear woollens in some manner or form. Practically all the clothes we wear in the winter are woollen or should be, and are to the extent of our power to insure their being woollen, so that every man, poor or rich, is taxed on this article. The tariff on woollens is raised from 35 per cent to 42½ per cent. Heaven knows that the man who cannot do business with a protection of 35 per cent should go out of business, there is no doubt about that. The tariff on cotton is also increased to a ridiculous extent, and so it is on such things as flannel and worsted and all manner of wearing apparel, which all the people of this country must get, for even if they wanted to go naked they could not because it is too cold most of the time. There is the difference between a revenue tariff and a protective tariff: My hon. friends on the other side of the House have always twitted us on this side that when we were in power we always kept up the duty; but I want to say that the inclination during all the time that the Liberal party were in power, led by my right hon. friend and leader, the inclination was downwards and the inclination to place more things on the free list was always there. We were increasing the free list every time. I counted the other night the articles in the old tariff that were on the free list and found there were 232. But in the tariff now brought down there are only about 100 articles on the free list that were on before. That is where we are going to feel the burden to a large extent. Let me mention one other article of interest to the farmer, of whom we are all talking more or less. He will have to pay 7½ per cent duty on number 9 and number 12 wire, or the wires that were free before, out of which fence is manufactured. There is hardly a farmer in Canada, either west or east, who does not have to buy wire fencing. There is not a farmer in Canada but will have to buy wire fencing because the old fences have largely gone to pieces. The Minister of Finance is charging the farmer in that one item about $175,000, if you take last year's importation as a basis. The farmer will be caused some regret if you raise the price of his fence somewhere in the neighbourhood of $3 per ton. My hon. friend might say that the farmer can buy his wire here. There is not the slightest fear but what the one or two industries that do draw wire in this country will raise the price of their wire to the utmost that they will be allowed to by the duty that is now imposed. There is no possible doubt about that, because they have been supplying very little of the wire used in Canada. I am not taking into account the wire used in the telegraph and telephone industries, and similar businesses. The wire to farmers alone will cost in the neighbourhood of from $175,000 to $200,000 if they use as much in the coming year as they did in 1914. And that brings me to what my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax has said we should do with the tariff this year. Hon. members on the other side of the House are inclined to laugh at our suggestion that the expenditure be curtailed. The first item I am going to speak about is the expenditure on the Hudson Bay railway. I know that my hon. friends on this side of the House promised to build that railway, but I have come to the conclusion, or almost come to the conclusion, that political parties are justified in certain instances in not keeping promises which they should never have made. My hon. friends on this side of the House have this virtue, that while they promised to start the Hudson Bay railway, they never did. They sent out surveyors and got reports on the route which, however, were not encouraging enough to induce them to start building.

Mr. SAM. SHARPE: Did they not let the first contract?

Mr. NESBITT: Not that I know of. At any rate they did not build any of the road. The Government are asking this year for a vote of $5,500,000 for the Hudson Bay railway. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) the other evening said that that could be cut down to $1,000,000 without hurting anybody. I say it could be absolutely wiped out, and that if the Government of the day would pull up the rails and sell them to somebody else for whatever they would bring, they would earn the lasting gratitude of the people of this country. In my judgment the Hudson Bay railway has no more chance of earning money than Stefansson would have if he built a railway upon one of those islands where he is lost. They do say that there are some fish in Hudson bay. That could easily be proved, and if there are any fish there and we wished to sell them, the best possible way and the only reasonable way would be to extend the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario railway to some point on James bay, and the fish could then be brought out to the Transcontinental and transferred east and west to the great cities that would consume it. The reports that I have read of the country between Le Pas and Port Nelson show that there is certainly nothing else to bring out from that country unless they bring out the frozen ground once a year or so. We could make a saving of $5,500,000 on that item alone. My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) has mentioned public buildings in Ontario.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: What is the hon. gentleman's view as to stopping the work on the Welland canal?

Mr. NESBITT: I would not stop the work, but you could easily reduce the expenditure on the canal this year, as you could all necessary expenditures.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the contracts are all let, with one exception. Which one would you stop?

Mr. NESBITT: My hon. friend knows that there is a vast difference between pushing on a work and letting it progress at a reasonable rate. My hon. friend knows it is not necessary to stop the contracts. A great many men were sent out of this country last fall. Somebody said just now, 100,000, but I believe it is nearer 50,000; at any rate most of the soldiers were working men, and their absence makes a great difference in the number of working men in this country. My hon. friend knows that the Government could ease up on the expenditure both at St. John and on the Welland canal, and on any other proper public works in this country, and thereby save several million dollars without doing anybody any harm. Now as to public buildings in Ontario. I see in the Estimates that $3,905,100 is required for this purpose. My hon. friend the other night said he would cut off $1,500,000 of that. I would cut off $3,000,000, and not a particle of harm would be done to anybody. There are a number of buildings here that are absolutely unnecessary to the towns that are supposed to require them. What would any business man do in our position? What could he do but curtail his expenditure and cut his coat according to his cloth, as the old saying is? Why, then, should not the Government do that? Why should we not, as representing the people of this country, do what the people want? Take the Barrie drill hall, for instance. There is no more need of a drill hall at Barrie at the present time than there is of one in Palestine. Nor does Berlin need another public building to accommodate the public. There is the Brantford drill hall. Good gracious, are we never to be done with Brantford? Within the last two years $275,000 was spent on a public building there, and now they want a drill hall at a cost of $75,000. We all know that drill halls are absolutely unnecessary this year, for practically no drills will take place. The Militia Department has cut out its annual vote for drilling, and quite properly, because the men who are going to the front are drilling together in different sections all over the country. We have found out that it is not drilling up and down a drill hall that makes a soldier. A soldier should be drilled out in the open weather and given some exercise. Even I myself find it necessary to go out after six o'clock for a walk of two or three miles, in order to keep myself alive after sitting here all day. Soldiers would be better if not drilled in drill halls. Some hon. gentlemen say that these drill halls are also used for Fat Stock shows. Well, let them hold the Fat Stock show in somebody's barn this year. It will not hurt them any. Collingwood also wants a public building at a cost of $35,000, and here is a drill hall for Galt at $45,000. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman who has just spoken would be glad to get that building in Galt, but the little bit of money that is spent in these towns does not do the general country any good. It does not do the good that would be done if the money was kept in the treasury or went to pay our debts, and it is the general good of the country that we are supposed to look after, not some individual who may get a few votes by our spending money in his constituency.

Mr. FISHER: There is an appropriation for a building at Burford, I believe. What does my hon. friend think of that?

Mr. NESBITT: Yes, $25,000. I think it is a ridiculous expense.

Mr. FISHER: The village of Burford is in the constituency I represent, or that I endeavour to represent.

Mr. NESBITT: You represent it well. That is all right.

Mr. FISHER: Is my hon. friend aware that the villages of Drumbo and Princeton in the constituency that he represents, neither one of which is as large or important or progressive as Burford, are asking for public buildings?

Mr. NESBITT: I am aware of the fact that last year the village of Princeton, after seeing the example set by the village of Burford, came down here and asked for a public building. I am also aware of the fact that they asked for a building to cost only $5,000. I am also aware of the fact that there is a vote here of $25,000 for a building in Burford.

I am also aware that the revenue from the village of Plattsville is greater than the revenue from the village of Burford, I am also aware that the revenue from the village of Drumbo is greater than the revenue from Burford, I am also aware that the village of Plattsville is a much better village than the village of Burford, and I am aware of the fact that these villages were satisfied with the expenditure of $5,000. I am further aware, that if you put a building worth five or six thousand dollars in the village of Burford, it would be a palace alongside the rest of the buildings there.

Mr. FISHER: Is the hon. gentleman aware that the village of Drumbo also asked for a public building?

Mr. NESBITT: I told you I did.

Mr. FISHER: You are then aware that both places have asked for a public building?

Mr. NESBITT: Yes.

Mr. FISHER: Are you aware they have asked the member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) and myself to intercede for them?

Mr. NESBITT: I am not aware of that; they did not show good taste there.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

Mr. FISHER: Does the hon. gentleman know that the village of Princeton revised its estimate as to what kind of a public building it wanted and that it now thinks it should have one costing $15,000?

Mr. NESBITT: I did not know that.

Mr. FISHER: Well, that is the fact. Let me put this last question to my hon. friend —is he in favour or is he opposed to public buildings for the villages of Princeton and Drumbo?

Mr. NESBITT: Ever since I have had a seat in this House I have expressed myself in favour of the principle of erecting public buildings for the purpose of collecting revenue in towns and cities throughout the country, in proportion to the revenues collected in these various places. I am stating to-night that I am opposed to these buildings being erected this year when the revenue is short, and I am stating to-night that if you want to build a house, Mr. Representative for Brant, and you have not the money and cannot borrow it, you cannot build the house, and the Government should be guided by the same principle identically. I repeat that I am absolutely in favour of erecting public buildings for the purpose of collecting revenue, in proportion to the revenue collected in each place, but I am not in favour of erecting a $25,000 building and putting a caretaker into it in a village like Burford, where the revenue is about $1,200 a year, and in view of the fact that the revenue is being collected now for an expenditure of probably three or four hundred dollars a year. I have not looked up the post office returns to-night to see what the revenue or expenditure in Burford is, but it is in the neighbourhood of the figures I have given. The expenditure on public buildings in the province of Ontario could be cut down, at the lowest calculation, $3,000,000 this year, without hurting anybody. We should wait for another year to see how the revenue will be then. I do not know anything about the province of Quebec in that respect, but I have not the slightest doubt that the expenditure for public buildings in all the other provinces could be proportionately cut down. Then take the Trent Valley canal, for which there is a vote of one million or one million and a half dollars this year, and I am quite sure that those people who go-out on picnic parties on the Trent Valley canal could, for the year to come, do so by motor, or rig, or walk. All they do on that canal is to hold picnic parties up and down, and therefore that million and a half dollars to be expended there could be saved for this year.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Does the hon. member know what the depth of the Trent Valley canal is, and the size of the locks?

Mr. NESBITT: The depth on the sills is seven feet, I think.

Mr. BENNETT: It is eight feet two inches.

Mr. NESBITT: Leave out the two inches; I think on most of it you will get nearer to seven feet than eight feet.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: It is deep enough to cost a lot of money.

Mr. NESBITT: Yes, it is deep enough to pour a lot of money into it. There is no transportation waiting on the expenditure there and nothing would be hurt by waiting and saving that million and a half dollars for the coming year. Then as to the French river; I asked the Minister of Public Works last year what he is going to do about the French river, and he said he did not know, and I do not believe he knows yet, but everybody knows that to put a canal on the French river would be an absolute waste of money. I suppose there are a lot of people in this country who still in their imagination, fortified imagination I would call it, think we would be justified in going on with the expenditure on the Georgian Bay Canal. I am glad to say these people are scarce, because it would be a wilder and more foolish expenditure that the expenditure on the Hudson Bay Railway.

Mr. GERALD V. WHITE: What stand does the right hon. leader of my hon. friend take on that?

Mr. NESBITT: It does not make any difference to me what stand my leader takes on it; I am telling you what I think about it, and I am only speaking for myself. There was only one possible object in building the Hudson Bay railway and that was to cheapen transportation for the grain of the West, but how are you going to cheapen transportation when you have to haul that grain there and build elevators and store it from one year to the other. Any one who buys grain knows that when you have to carry it over for a year and pay interest charges you cannot get any benefit from cheaper transportation for the grain. Then, when you have got the grain at Hudson Bay you have to have a line of steamers to take it out and there is not a man living who would invest a dollar in a line of steamers which would work for three months of the year and lie idle for the other nine months. That is the plain fact about the Hudson Bay railway, and the Georgian Bay Canal would be a thousand times worse if that could be possible.

Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about throwing men out of work. There is no necessity to throw men out of work. These great enterprises, such as the Welland Canal, the Quebec Bridge, the improvements at St. John, N.B., can be gone on with in a reasonable way, and they will afford employment. The railways will have to make improvements and they will at least have to attend to the upkeep of their roads, and there is no fear of men being thrown out of work. When spring comes there will be lots of work for every one to do. We are now preaching from end to end of the land patriotism and production, while at the same time we are at every turn, by this new tariff, making the necessaries of life dearer for the men who have to produce, and we are making it harder every day for the farmer to get a fair profit from the results of his toil.

Many people believe that the farmers are making fortunes. There is not a cent of profit in farming at the present day unless a farmer has grain to sell, and there are not many farmers in Ontario that I know of that have any grain to sell. The men who have grain to sell are making a great deal of money, but the men who are raising cattle and hogs at the present price of grain are not making any money.

Not only does this new tariff not help the people of the country to produce more, but it retards the production of the country in every way. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance could wipe out $30,000,000 of the expenditure of this country without the slightest difficulty and let the estimated revenue of next year meet the expenditure for that period. I hope that he will see his way to do so. I have great faith in my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, and I hope that he will not be influenced by his colleagues and by those who say, "dash away and spend the money," to go on with such a wild-goose proposition as this tariff and the expenditure that he proposes by this year's Estimates.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver): I understand that the motion under which this debate is being conducted is for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and that it is usual on an occasion of this kind to consider the problem of the ways and means of the country. I have followed the debate up to the present time with a considerable degree of attention and with a hope that we might hear from some of the members of the Opposition, whose right and proper duty it is to offer fair criticism, some constructive criticism, something in the nature of a suggestion to help the Government to meet the most critical financial period with which the country has probably ever been faced in its history; but up to the present moment I have failed to catch any constructive suggestion from hon. gentlemen opposite.

I desire to say a few words in reply to some of the arguments presented by my hon. friend the member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt). He seems to have based his arguments on this one proposition, namely, that the expenditures of the country for the forthcoming year should be reduced so as to meet the estimated revenue for that period. In fact, that seems to be the main argument adduced by hon. members opposite. It was rather interesting to observe the efforts of my hon. friend in wiggling his way through the Ontario Estimates. I was expecting him to criticise them at somewhat greater length; but the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Fisher), I think, rather upset him with some of the queries that he advanced.

The hon. member for North Oxford said that we should have cut off the further construction of the Hudson Bay railway at this time. Does he not remember that, when the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was Prime Minister of this country, and when he and his colleagues sat on this side of the House supporting him, they, in season and out of season, advocated the construction of the Hudson Bay railway? I was not a member of the House then; but I understand that my hon. friend supported and voted for that project.

Mr. NESBITT: I did not.

Mr. STEVENS: Did my hon. friend vote against it?

Mr. NESBITT: I never voted for it. I never heard it brought up.

Mr. STEVENS: That is very good indeed. The hon. member certainly supported the right hon. the leader of the Opposition when he was Prime Minister of this country, and in western Canada advanced the construction of the Hudson Bay railway as one of his main policies.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE: And they won their elections on it.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEVENS: Moreover, on no occasion in the history of this House did my hon. friend raise his voice against this project. I challenge any hon. gentleman opposite to produce a single vote from that party against that project while they were in power. The Government of the day, composed of hon. gentlemen opposite, entered into a contract for the construction of that railway, and the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) himself signed the contract.

Mr. GRAHAM: The then Solicitor General says that I did not do so.

Mr. STEVENS: What does my hon. friend say?

Mr. GRAHAM: I take his word.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the hon. gentleman deny that he signed the contract?

Mr. PARDEE: Whom would you rather believe?

Mr. STEVENS: I am bound to believe the hon. gentleman's statement. In any case, this fact cannot be gainsaid, that our hon. friends opposite supported and advocated the project. They signed the first contract and entered into contracts for the construction of that railway. The construction has been carried out by this Government to the satisfaction of the people of the West, and I believe the railway will prove a very satisfactory project. The question of the construction of railways, of the opening up of the vast territory of the West, has always been a question of great difficulty and danger. You, Mr. Speaker, and the older members of the House who have had the honour of sitting here for many years, will remember that when the Canadian Pacific railway was constructed it was prophesied by certain learned gentlemen in this House and out of it that it would be an absolute failure. Within thirty years the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has grown to be one of the largest and most reputable corporations in the known world. As the Canadian Pacific railway has more than vindicated the confidence placed in it by the Canadian people at that time, and as nearly every other project of a similar character constructed in western Canada has proved itseslf to be a successful venture, it is reasonable for the people of Canada to believe that a railway to that inland sea of Hudson Bay will also be a success. At least we who live in western Canada have faith in the great West, and we believe that the railway will be a success. Let me call my hon. friend's attention to certain resources. He speaks of moving carloads of frozen earth. It has been demonstrated, as far as it has been possible to investigate, that the Hudson Bay is a veritable storehouse of fish which will supply the food markets of Canada and of the world, because it must be remembered that to-day we are shipping from Prince Rupert clear to the old land frozen fresh fish, and the Hudson Bay is a very much nearer shipping place than is the western coast. Therefore in fish alone there are vast possibilities in that section of the country. We have also vast areas of pulp timber in that district, which commodity is rapidly becoming of more and more value in the Dominion and is supporting one of our most valuable industries, and for which the market is increasing day by day. Therefore, when hon. gentlemen suggest that the project should be cut off, that it is wasteful expenditure, that it is extravagantly unjustifiable on the part of the Government, they should at least be thoroughly seized of the facts of the case before they make such suggestions.

My hon. friend also suggested that certain portions of the Welland canal could be stopped. I am not familiar with the details of the Welland canal other than this, that I know that a number of contracts have been entered into. The Government say--I shall be glad to be corrected if I am wrong —that no further contract shall be entered into in the immediate future, but that the present contracts shall be carried out.

Mr. NESBITT: I rise to correct the hon. gentleman. He says that I said that work on the Welland canal should be stopped. I distinctly stated that it should not be stopped.

Mr. STEVENS: I said that the hon. gentleman suggested that the work on the Welland canal should be greatly curtailed.

Mr. NESBITT: The hon. gentleman said I said it should be stopped.

Mr. STEVENS: I did not intend to say that. As I understand it, the Government is simply carrying out present contracts, some of which are fairly well advanced. Every one knows that you cannot stop a contractor after he has assembled a plant worth perhaps half a million dollars. Nor can you tell him in the middle of his work that he must go easy. The only way in which he can make money is to do the largest amount possible; the more he works his plant to capacity the more money he will make. I do not think it would be wise to restrain the efforts of these contractors. More than that, I am opposed to the cessation of public works in Canada at this time. There are thousands of unemployed to-day in all sections of Canada, the condition being attributable directly, in my opinion, to the great war in which we are engaged. And for the Government to close down the public works and throw thousands more out of employment, would be, in my estimation, nothing short of a public crime. My hon. friend mentions certain public buildings, and I was curious to note that he quoted public buildings in Barrie, Berlin and Brantford, which he said were unnecessary, but he had nothing to say about such works as the drill-halls in Guelph and Peterborough, costing about $250,000, which he voted for last year. But in the case of these constituencies represented by hon. gentleman on this side of the House, he certainly would like to see the work cut down.

Mr. NESBITT: I must again correct my hon. friend. I certainly never voted for an expenditure in Peterborough or Guelph such as he speaks about. I opposed such expenditures last year as I do this year. I did not enumerate all the places, but I opposed such expenditures generally.

Mr. STEVENS: These buildings were put up by the late Government, and the hon. gentleman, so far as I am able to learn, did not once raise his voice in opposition to them. Now, a word as to the construction of drill halls which my hon. friend ridicules, and says that we are not using them and that men cannot be drilled in a hall. In every large city in Canada to-day, and in my own city particularly, we have to rent building after building to accommodate the contingents that we are raising. We have no drill hall except a very old one, in Vancouver, yet we need accommodation for the training of the men of these contingents, and so we are forced to rent buildings. If we had more drill halls in Canada where we could assemble the troops we are raising in all parts of the country and where we could give them the preliminary training and drill and then give them the mass drill in the cities where they are assembled, we should be better off.

The hon. gentleman took exception to the Trent Valley canal. That is a work that has been under way for a great many years and it is one that the people of Canada demand shall be completed and put into successful operation at the earliest possible date. Parts of it are being operated now and, I am informed, with very great advantage to the country through which it passes. So with the Georgian Bay canal. Personally, I have never been very enthusiastic about that work, but I look upon it as a matter very largely affecting the people in the eastern part of Canada. The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) would not object to that work going on. I think he would not say "Hear, hear!" to what his friend from North Oxford said. The hon. member for North Oxford said a moment ago unchallenged that he did not care for his leader or anybody else, that he was speaking for himself. It is a happy condition with these hon. gentlemen in the Opposition that they have the privilege of speaking for themselves without involving their party in the argument.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is one of the beauties of being in opposition.

Mr. STEVENS: It reminds me that possibly a great deal of the argument advanced within the last few days by hon. gentlemen is not—I was going to say is not quite sincere, but that would not be parliamentary; but what I mean to say is that many of the arguments on the question of expenditure are put possibly with the hope that the Government may be foolish enough to accept the advice and so injure themselves politically throughout the country. This Government could not possibly indulge in a more foolish act, in my estimation, than to curtail the expenditure on public works at this crisis in the history of the country. Now we have had very considerable criticism of the expenditures, and I shall ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments while we examine some of these expenditures. Because one of the things I have particularly remarked in this debate is that those hon. gentlemen who have criticised the Government fail, as my friend Mr. Joseph Martin puts it, to get down to brass tacks. While they offer criticisms, they do not show how improvement could be made. With regard to the increased expenditure we have certain items to which I wish to refer. First there is $8,730,000 in sinking fund. It is utterly impossible for us to avoid the inclusion of that sum in our Estimates. I am possibly mistaken in what I thought I heard an hon. gentleman on the other side say this afternoon. But as I understood him he said that his view was that this sum should have been included in the sum we borrowed from the Mother Country to carry on the war. What are the facts? The Minister of Finance has made an arrangement with the Imperial Government whereby all the moneys necessary for carrying on the war—that is war expenses and only war expenses—will be advanced on the general War Budget of the Old Land. That is an arrangement for which the Finance Minister deserves a great deal of credit. It would be absurd for us to seek to include in those borrowings the interest covering the same. We get the money on most reasonable terms—the same rate that the Imperial Government will pay, which are the best rates in the world. And surely that is a sufficient concession. It has been argued that this is not a War Budget but that it is presented as a War Budget merely to cover up the failure of the Government to administer the affairs of the country aright. I wish to discuss for a moment the facts of the war with a view to showing hon. gentlemen opposite—though they do not need it; they know it already—that the conditions now pertaining are produced directly by the war, if not by this war, then by the war of 1912. For we all remember that when the Balkan war broke out, and while it was raging, it was daily expected that the great powers of Europe would be dragged into the conflict in which we are to-day. The money interests of the world commenced hoarding funds against the possible outbreak for a period of two years. And it is well they did so, well both for this country and for the Motherland. For I believe that if it had not been for the wisdom of Lloyd George, the great Finance Minister of the Old Land, Mr. Winston Churchill and others we should not have been in the happy position in which we are to-day, immune from attack by foreign countries.

In my city we have two lines of steamships, one of which is operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Five steamships of this service, the Empress of Asia, the Empress of Russia—which are larger than any steamships running into Montreal—the Empress of China, the Empress of Japan and the Monteagle, were taken by the Admiralty at the outbreak of the war and, with the exception of the Monteagle, which has been returned, are being used by them to-day. What effect did this have upon trade? It had this effect: we could not get bottoms in Vancouver for the export of goods, and the consequence was that export trade on the western coast was absolutely paralysed. Steamships not only of the Canadian Pacific railway lines but of the Blue Funnel lines, the Harrison lines, the Holt and other lines, were taken over by the Admiralty, and the tonnage on the Pacific coast at Vancouver, at San Francisco, Portland, and other ports, became so scarce that freight rates were doubled. To-day, therefore, we are precluded from export trade on the Pacific coast because of the lack of bottoms in which to carry our goods. Millions upon millions of dollars' worth of lumber trade which is offering to our lumber men cannot be accepted because there is no way of transporting the goods. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite coolly stand up in their places in this House and, seemingly indifferent to their responsibilities as representatives of the people, say that the war is not the cause of the present disrupted conditions of trade and commerce in Canada.

Again, what effect has the absolute cutting off of all borrowings had upon our trade and commerce? First, the Federal Government could borrow no more money, except for the purposes which I have mentioned; secondly, all provincial borrowings were shut off, with the result that many public works were stopped. Municipal borrowings were suddenly cut off, and in my province—and, I believe, in other provinces as well—the provincial government was forced to come to the assistance of many municipalities in order that they might be enabled to carry out ordinary works throughout the coming year. Lastly, industrial borrowings were cut off and the activities of the various industries of the country were curtailed. This was directly attributable to the outbreak of this war in Europe.

The shutting off of borrowings directly affected the steel industry, because the carrying on of industrial and municipal works for which large amounts of money were borrowed involved the use of a considerable amount of steel. The steel industry was so seriously affected that factories at Hamilton and on the Atlantic coast were shut down, or almost shut down. The practical cessation of building operations throughout the whole of Canada is directly attributable to the outbreak of war. Large financial concerns which formerly received money from the old land were unable to secure any further amounts; loans could not be advanced on mortgages, buildings could not be erected; practically every industry was affected. I think every hon. gentleman opposite must admit that practically the whole of the stagnation in trade which now prevails throughout Canada is directly attributable to the war.

Let us examine some of the items which have been criticised by hon. gentlemen opposite. What is the increase in respect of civil government? $174,000, which consists of statutory increases authorized by legislation passed by the very hon. gentlemen who now criticise this item. What would they have us do? Because the revenue of a post office falls considerably during the year, would they have us close the office and discharge the employees? The same applies to customs ports of entry. There has been an increase in the Post Office Estimates of $1,720,000. How is that increase being spent? Railway service, $405,000. That amount is devoted to parcel post. Up to the present time we have not been able to receive the full benefit which is to be derived from the operation of the parcel post system, but would hon. gentlemen opposite suggest that this newly-organized branch of the postal service be dispensed with? Rural deliveries, an increase of $350,000. In 1912-13 600 new rural routes were established; in 1913-14, 940; to-day there are 2,857 routes. The establishment of these rural mail delivery routes is but the carrying out of the avowed policy of this Government during and prior to the last election. Hon. gentlemen opposite have stated that we are not carrying out our promises to the electors; here is a case in which the Government is faithfully carrying out one of its solemn pledges to the rural districts of Canada, yet hon. gentlemen opposite criticise the expenditure necessary to make good the word of the Government in that respect. In 1913-14 48,000 additional rural mail delivery boxes were established in the towns, villages and cities throughout the Dominion. These are a great convenience to the farmers of the country and to those living in the outlying districts.

Mr. GRAHAM: Do the farmers not pay for their own boxes?

Mr. STEVENS: I presume they do.

Mr. GRAHAM: Then the Post Office Department obtains a revenue from that source; there is no expenditure.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend knows that a postal service cannot be expanded without very considerable cost to the community. He knows, too, that the postal service of this or any other country is not looked upon as a means for obtaining revenue; it is looked upon as a means of communication and a system of enabling the rural districts to keep in touch with the affairs of the world.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think my hon. friend misunderstood me. He was quoting as an item of expense the number of rural mail delivery boxes that have been purchased by the Government. I was trying to point out that the farmers paid for these boxes; consequently there was no expenditure on the part of the Government.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend misunderstands me; I am afraid I have not the faculty of making myself clear. We expended in the expansion of this postal service $1,721,000. I was trying to give to the House some evidence of the fact that the Government has done some real work in this connection. I will repeat my statement; the Government established in 1913, 600 new rural mail routes and in 1913-14, 940. They had in 1912-13, 23,000 rural mail delivery boxes; last year this number was increased to 48,000. The cost of the boxes was borne by those who obtained them, but the cost of the service was borne by the Government. I mention this to show that the Government has done its utmost to give the people of Canada an up-to-date postal service, and I think they have succeeded in doing so.

The Estimates for the Mounted Police have been increased by $509,000. Do hon. gentlemen opposite object to that? No body of men in any country in the world are more worthy of admiration and of the support of the people than the Mounted Police of Canada. The staff of this splendid body of men has been increased for the purpose of keeping track of subjects of the enemy who may be leaving or passing through or coming into the western country. Pensions are increased by $139,000, the statutory increase.

Then, we have subsidies to provinces, another statutory increase which must be given, for which the Government, the Minister of Finance is not responsible. It amounts to $192,000. In agriculture, there is an important increase. Our hon. friends say that this Government neglects the farmer. How is this being spent? One important item of expenditure is testing seed. One great cause of failure and weakness among the farming communities of Canada has been carelessness in the selection of seed; we all know that. During the recent years the present Government, under the able administration of the Minister of Agriculture, has been trying to assist the farmer in the selection of his seed and has been testing it for him and helping him in every way. There have been increased expenditures in connection with the live-stock industry, and to enforce the Meats and Canned Foods Act. I have myself been impressing on the Government the necessity of increased vigilance in the inspection of canned fruits, meats, etc., and there have been great steps forward in this respect. There is also the Pest Act and the Fruit Branch. These are the items on which the money is being expended, and the increase is in each case thoroughly justifiable. The Government cannot carry out these works and keep their pledges unless they have some reasonable aid from the country in the matter of their finances.

As the hour is late, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Hon. W. T. White, the House adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Wednesday, March 3, 1915.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

QUESTIONS.

[Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.]

MR. H. P. DUCHEMIN.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. With reference to the charge brought to the notice of the Government by the member for North Cape Breton on June 10, 1914, as reported on page 5238 of Hansard, that one H. P. Duchemin, of Sydney, N.S., a commissioner appointed to investigate charges against, partisan officials, had embezzled over $75 of the public funds in connection with one item of his account, by charging six days remuneration and expenses for less than one day's work, has the Government investigated this charge?

2. If not, will the Government investigate this charge?

3. Has the said Duchemin been asked for an explanation?

4. What is the total amount paid by the Government to the said H. P. Duchemin for all services in connection with partisan investigations, including outlay since the date of appointment?

5. Is the said Duchemin still in the employ of the Government?

6. Is it the intention of the Government to take steps to recover from the said H. P. Duchemin the money so obtained by him?

Mr. CODERRE:

1, 2, 3, 5 and 6. For the Departments of the Interior, Marine and Fisheries, Militia and Defence, Post Office, Public Works, Railways and Canals and Agriculture, no information.

For the Customs Department, the answer is: The charge made by the member for North Cape Breton was looked into by Customs Department and inquired into by Auditor General and found to be not true. The report of the Auditor General on this matter appears on pages F 48 and F 49 of his report for 1913-14. Mr. Duchemin has been employed only when cases were sent him for investigation. There are no cases now before him from the Customs Department for investigation.

4. Customs Department, $1,190.66; Interior, $26.31; Marine and Fisheries, $1,691.10; Militia and Defence, $36.80; Post Office, $1,242.01; Public Works, $441.63; Railways and Canals, $1,928.60; Agriculture, $124.60.

UNEMPLOYMENT.

*Mr. VERVILLE:

1. Has any representation been made to the Government respecting the unemployed problem? If so, by whom?
2. What is the intention of the Government in that respect?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Representations have been made from time to time with regard to unemployment. A list of them could be brought down in the shape of a return, if so desired. The intention of the Government is to assist in every way that is practicable and reasonable.

MR. T. A. ANDERSON.

Mr. W. M. MARTIN:

1. Has T. A. Anderson been employed by the Government at any time during the years 1912, 1913, 1914 and 1915?
2. Is he still so employed?
3. What was the date of his appointment, in what capacity is he employed, and what is his salary or remuneration?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It would facilitate the answering of this question if we could learn to what department the hon. member alludes.

Question stands.

CUSTOMS VALUATION.

Mr. McCRANEY:

1. What were the values placed on the following articles by the Department of Customs, and the general tariff rate on each, prior to 21st September, 1911: breaking ploughs, gang ploughs, harrow, land packer, seeder, cultivator, reaper, binder (8 foot), fanning mill, hay rake (10 foot), mower (6 foot), wagon, sleigh, manure spreader, portable engines and threshing machines?
2. What are, or will be, the valuations and general tariff rates on each such article since the recent Budget speech of the Minister of Finance?

Mr. J. D. REID:

1. The Department of Customs does not fix the values for these articles. Imported goods are subject to valuation for duty purposes according to the fair market value as sold for home consumption in the country of export.

Different manufacturers sell similar lines of articles at different prices, so that values are not uniform.

Exporters are required to certify on invoices for entry at Customs the fair market value of the goods as sold for home consumption in the country of export.

The general tariff rates on these articles were as set forth in the Customs Tariff, 1907, with amendments as passed by Parliament.

2. Answered by No. 1.

Mr. MACNUTT:

What is the customs valuation of the following implements imported during the year ending March 31, 1914, and the duty collected on each class: breaking plough, gang plough, harrow, disc harrows, land packers, seed drills, cultivators, reapers, binders (8 foot), fanning mill, hay rake (10 foot), mower (6 foot), wagon, bob sleigh, manure spreader, portable engines, and threshing machines?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Department of Customs does not fix the values for these articles. Imported goods are subject to valuation for duty purposes according to their fair market value as sold for home consumption in the country of export.

Different manufacturers sell similar lines of articles at different prices, so that values are not uniform.

Exporters are required to certify on invoices for entry at customs the fair market value of the goods as sold for home consumption in the country of export.

The duty collected during the year ending March 31, 1914, on these articles was as follows:

	Value.	Duty.
Ploughs and parts thereof	$1,011,704	$202,340 05
Harrows and parts thereof	156,869	31,352 80

Land packers are not separately classified in returns to customs.

	Value.	Duty.
Seed drills	$ 99,497	$ 19,899 40
Cultivators and weeders and parts thereof	57,264	11,441 41
Reapers	38,300	6,702 52
Harvesters, self-binding	336,675	58,918 42
Fanning mills	16,411	4,102 75
Horse rakes	41,234	8,246 80
Mowing machines	47,857	8,375 21
Farm wagons	273,053	68,263 25

Bob sleighs are not separately classified in returns to customs.

	Value.	Duty.
Manure spreaders. .. ..$	42,181	$ 8,429 98
Portable engines with boilers in combination, and traction engines for farm purposes. ..	2,342,120	466,000 45
Threshing machine separators..	926,791	185,358 20

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY— QUEBEC TERMINALS.

Mr. GRAHAM:

1 Has work been started on the proposed terminal in connection with the National Transcontinental Railway terminals in the city of Quebec?

2. If so, what amount has been expended on this work up to December 31, 1914?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. Yes.

2. $372,514.86 expended by the commissioners for lands, and $154,293.83 by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company on tracks and buildings.

Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Has the Government purchased what is known as the St. Malo Railway line, adjacent to Quebec?

2. If so, what was the price paid?

3. Has any contract been awarded for the rebuilding or repairing of the road, or any part of it?

4. If so, what is the estimated cost of such repairs?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. Yes.

2. $175,000.

3. Yes.

4. $11,000.

CLOSING OF HUDSON BAY RAILWAY BRIDGE.

Mr. MOLLOY:

1. Is the Government or the Department of Railways aware that Manitoba provincial police are said to have enforced a blockade of the Hudson Bay Railroad bridge over the Saskatchewan river at The Pas, preventing access to the construction camps along the railway during a period from July 22, to about July 28, 1914?

2. Was any order issued or any instructions given by the Government or the department, authorizing this blockade? If so, what was the reason for such order?

Mr. COCHRANE: Copy of telegrams:

The Pas, Man., July 26, 1914.

Hon. Minister of Railways,
Ottawa.

Hudson Bay Railway bridge at Le Pas closed and guarded by provincial police, Conservatives are allowed to go up the line, Liberals absolutely debarred. We demand suspension of the regulation until July 30, 1914. Answer immediately.

A. J. Claney,
President The Pas Liberal Association.
Ottawa, July 27, 1914.

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

J. W. Porter,
Chief Engineer,
Hudson Bay Railway,
Winnipeg, Man.

Wire explanation re following telegram received from A. J. Claney, The Pas, president the Pas Liberal Association, "Hudson Bay Railroad bridge at Le Pas closed and guarded by provincial police, Conservatives are allowed to go up the line, Liberals absolutely debarred. We demand suspension of the regulation until July thirtieth, nineteen fourteen. Answer immediately."

W. A. Bowden.
Winnipeg, Man. July 29, 1914.

W. A. Bowden,
Chief Engineer,
Department of Railways and Canals,
Ottawa, Ont.

Replying to your wire of twenty-seventh, regular train left for end of steel Tuesday, July twenty-first, again Tuesday July 28, as per regular schedule foreign gasoline cars are prohibited from running on Hudson Bay railway, some of the Liberal organization bribed nightwatchman and ran over the line with a light engine which accounts for precautionary measures taken by contractors.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—GOVERNMENT HIGHWAY.

*Mr. COPP:

1. How much has the Government paid for the construction of a highway from lands of the Intercolonial railway at Sackville, N.B., to the new wharf at said place?

2. To whom were such amounts paid, and what services did each of the parties so paid perform?

3. Who was overseer of said work?

4. By whom was such overseer recommended?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. $1,007.48.

2. Pay-list, August, September and October, 1913: Bedford Crossman, labourer, $61.25; J. Hennigan Crossman, labourer, $16.62; Martin O. Crossman, labourer, $5.25; Thomas Crossman, labourer, $29.75; Percy Crossman, labourer, $50.75; Clifford Wry, labourer, $19.25; Jno. GOVERNMENT LABOUR BUREAU.

Mr. STEVENS:

1. Has the Government given consideration to the proposal to establish a national Government Labour Bureau?

2. If so, what conclusion has been reached?

3. If not, will the Government take necessary steps to have a Bill introduced at the next session of Parliament?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Government has the matter under consideration, and whenever any conclusion is reached, an announcement will be made in due course.

SASKATCHEWAN RURAL MAIL.

Mr. McCRANEY:

1. What rural mail delivery routes have been established in the Saskatoon electoral district?

2. How frequent are the deliveries of such route?

Mr. CASGRAIN:

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Who is the contractor for the mail service between Guysborough, N.S., and W. Erinville?

2. When was the contract made?

3. What is the contract price?

4. Who are the sureties?

5. What are the names of all parties who tendered for this service, and the amount of each tender?

6. If there is no regular contract at present, who is performing the service, and on what terms?

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. George A. Peart.

2. Contract dates from 1st October, 1914.

3. $218 per annum.

4. James E. Hadley and J. Avard Fulton.

5. As the contract has not yet been executed it is not considered advisable to give the information at present. It will be furnished when the contract has been signed.

6. Answered by Nos. 1, 2 and 3.

WAR SUPPLIES—HORSES.

Mr. CARROLL:

1. Did the Officer Commanding 5th Mounted Rifles, Lieut.-Colonel G. H. Baker, refuse to accept seven horses which were purchased by Messrs. Palmer and Pallister at Sherbrooke?

2. If so, what were the reasons given by that officer?

3. Did Lieut.-Colonel Baker demand a board of inquiry to examine the said horses and report on their fitness for service?

4. If so, has the board been convened and their report submitted?

5. What is the finding of the said board in respect to the said horses?

Major General HUGHES:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. No.

4. Answered by No. 3.

1. Answered by No. 3.

YARMOUTH HARBOUR DREDGING.

Mr. LAW:

1. What amount was spent for dredging in Yarmouth harbour during the years 1905, 1906, 1907, 1908, 1909, 1910, 1911, 1912, 1913 and 1914, respectively?

2. What were the prices paid for dredging during wears 1911, 1912, 1913 and 1914, respectively?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. 1905-1906, $16,031.57; 1906-1907, $5,728.15; 1907-1908, $26,450.64; 1908-1909, $135,691.88; 1909-1910, $88,972.54; 1910-1911, $92,403.16; 1911-1912, $59,921.66; 1912-1913, $32,679.60; 1913-1914, nil; 1914-1915, $4,038.40; Total, $461,917.60.

2. 1911-1912: 28c per cubic yard and the expenditure was $59,921.66. 1912-1913: Class A $7 per cubic yard; class B 22½c per cubic yard, and the expenditure was $32,679.60. 1914-1915: 40c per cubic yard, scow measurement, for the removal of a small quantity, 10,096 cubic yards, costing $4,038.40, and involving the bringing of the dredge from St. John, N.B., and returning it to the same place.

SHELL-FISH COMMISSION.

*Mr. SINCLAIR:

What was the total cost of the commission appointed July 4, 1914, to investigate the shell-fish industry?

Mr. HAZEN: I find that no commission was appointed on July 4, 1914, to investigate the shell-fish industry. Possibly the hon. member for Guysborough may be mistaken in the year, or the year marked in this question may be a clerical error. A shell-fish commission was appointed in 1912, and if information regarding that commission is required, I may say that at the last regular session of the House a return was laid on the table giving all the information that could be given.

Mr. KYTE: The commission referred to by the hon. member for Guysborough was composed of Mr. O'Leary, Mr. Wilson and Mr. Maclean.

Mr. HAZEN: A commission composed of these gentlemen was appointed in 1912; full information with regard to that commission has, I understand, already been furnished this House.

PROPOSED SYDNEY-ST. PETER'S RAILWAY.

*Mr. CARROLL:

1. Is it the intention of the Railway Department or the Government to commence construction this year of a railway from Sydney, county of Cape Breton, to St. Peters, county of Richmond, through the Big Pond and East Bay district?

2. Has the department or Government decided on any location for such a road?

Mr. COCHRANE: The matter is under consideration.

17TH NOVA SCOTIA REGIMENT.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. Who were the different officers commissioned to the 17th Nova Scotia regiment at Valcartier before they sailed for England?

2. Who are now the commissioned officers of said regiment?

Major General HUGHES:

1. 17th (Nova Scotia) Infantry battalion: Headquarters: Lieut.-Colonel, Lt.-Colonel S. G. Robertson; Major, Major D. D. Cameron; Major, D. Murray; Adjutant, Capt. C. E. Bent; Asst. Adjutant, Lieut. L. R. Cutten; Quartermaster, Hon. Capt. R. McMeekin; Transport Officer, Lieut. C. Hamilton, Catty; Signalling Officer, Lieut. N. F. McKee.

Christie; F. D. Elliott; E. W. Mingo; C. J. Droggett; H. A. Duncan; J. M. Gillis; R. E. Russell; G. A. Ross; M. Brock; G. E. C. Eager.

2. Information not available. Impossible to say what changes have been made by War Office.

WATCHMEN ON RAILWAY BRIDGES.

Mr. MACDONALD:

What are the names of the men employed as watchmen on the different railway bridges in Pictou county at different times since August last on account of the war?

Mr. COCHRANE:

The following are the names of the men employed on the different railway bridges in Pictou County since August last on account of the war, as watchmen: Maxwell Brooks, Peter Beck, John Bone, John McDearmid, Russell Chapman, Clarence McKay, Alfred T. McLeod, James N. Matheson, W. R. Creighton, John A. McLeod, James McKenzie, Robert Purvis, William Conn, Wm. Fraser, John Pringle, Harry Forward, John R. McDonald, Eric M. Stranberg, Fred Ludwig, James Austin, John McVicar, Duncan McKenzie, John McCrae, William McGregor and Howard Robertson.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—UNION STATION CULVERT.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. What was the estimated cost of repairs to the culvert Intercolonial railway near Union station?

2. What has been the cost of said repairs to date?

3. Have the repairs been completed?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. $8,000.00.

2. $9,353.07.

3. No.

ST. PAUL'S ISLAND LIFE SAVING STATION.

Mr. KYTE:

1. Did the Department of Marine call for tenders during the year 1914 for certain work on St. Paul's Island, Cape Breton?

2. From whom were tenders received, and what was the amount of each tender?

3. What was the nature of the work?

4. To whom was the contract awarded?

5. Were any modifications made as to the time in which the contract was to be completed or changes in any other respect?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Yes.

2. Siffroi Robichaud, carpenter and builder, Meteghan Centre, N.S., $8,940; E. C. Doyle, of Arichat, N.S., $9,940; W. S. Thompson, general contractor, Sydney, N.S., $16,175.

3. Dwelling for superintendent and life-saving staff.

4. Siffroi Robichaud.

5. No modification was made as to the date of completion, but the work was not finished strictly on time. The only modification in the contract was the substitution of a Thompson & Sutherland reliance hot water boiler for the Safford boiler specified. A drawback of $250 is being held to insure satisfactory completion of some trifling details as soon as spring weather admits of advantageous outdoor work.

MR. JOSEPH W. JOHNSTON.

Mr. KYTE:

1. Is Joseph W. Johnston an employee of the Department of Railways and Canals in connection with the St. Peters canal improvements?

2. If so, what are his wages?

3. How much was he paid for the months of January, February and March, 1913, January, February, March, April and May, 1914, and January and February, 1915?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. Yes.

2. $50 per month.

	1913.	1914.	1915.
January	$50	$50	$50
February	$50	$50	$50
March	$50	$50	....
April	....	$50	....
May	....	$50	....
	$150	$250	$100

MILITARY EQUIPMENT—WATERPROOF GARMENTS.

Mr. GAUTHIER:

1. Does the waterproof cloak or cape or other garment make part of the kit or equipment of a member of the active militia?

2. Did the equipment, kit or furnishings of the members of the first contingent contain any waterproof coat, cloak or other garment to protect the wearer from rain?

3. Has the waterproof or rainproof cape or cloak been supplied to make part of the kit and equipment of those who have enlisted with the second contingent?

4. Have the members of the first contingent been supplied with any means of protection against rain?

5. Have the members of the second contingent been supplied with any waterproof garment or cape?

6. Is it the intention of the Government to furnish the second and subsequent contingents with any waterproof cloak, cape or other garment as a protection against rain?

7. Are the soldiers of the Allied armies, and in particular, the army of Great Britain, supplied with a waterproof cape, cloak or other garment as a protection against rain and as a means of avoiding sickness and discomfort?

8. Is it true that the department of the British War Office that attends to the furnishing of clothing, supplies each soldier with a waterproof cape or other garment?

9. Is the department aware that every commissioned officer is said to have in his equipment a waterproof cape or cloak, and is this cape or cloak supplied by the department or purchased at the expense of the individual officer?

10. Is it true that long previous to the departure of the first contingent, an offer was made to the Government to furnish at the actual cost of material and labour, a quantity of khaki waterproof cloaks and capes, according to the recognized military pattern, and was this offer accepted or rejected?

11. Is it the intention of the Department of Militia and Defence to furnish every soldier and non-commissioned officer belonging to the second contingent with a waterproof cloak or cape or some other garment as a protection against the discomfort of rain and wet?

12. Is it the intention of the Department of Miltia and Defence to remedy the reported error in connection with the equipment of the first contingent by ordering a quantity of waterproof garments or capes in sufficient numbers to furnish one to each of the members of the first contingent?

13. Is it the intention of the Government to take proper precautions to protect the health of the troops that are going to the front from the Dominion by furnishing each and every member thereof with a waterproof cloak, cape or other garment?

14. Did the Department of Militia and Defence receive any complaints from members of the first or second contingents, or from any other citizen, in connection with the failure on the part of the Government to provide the troops with a waterproof cape or other garment?

Major General HUGHES:

1, 2 and 3. No.

4 and 5. Yes, greatcoat.

6. Nothing beyond greatcoat.

7. No garment other than greatcoat.

8. No.

9. If officers provide waterproof garments, they do so at their own expense.

10. Offers were made, but rejected.

11. No; nothing beyond greatcoat, which is considered more serviceable than a waterproof garment.

12. No; no error is admitted.

13. It is considered that where there is a choice between greatcoat and waterproof garment, the greatcoat is of much more protection than a waterproof.

14. No complaints were made by members of the first or second contingents. Some civilians did write, but recommendations were not approved.

MEGANTIC POSTMASTERS.

Mr. PACAUD:

1. How many postmasters were there in the county of Megantic on the 10th October, 1911?

2. How many were dismissed from office since that date, and what are the names of the post offices in which they acted?

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. 75.

2. 13 postmasters have been dismissed since 10th October, 1911. The names of the post offices with dates of the postmasters' dismissals are as follows: Black Lake, 23rd December, 1911; Coleraine Station, 12th December, 1912; Cranberry, 21st December, 1911; Laurierville, 28th October, 1912; Lourdes, 12th January, 1912; Lyster Station, 29th November, 1911; Plessisville, 10th September, 1912; Plessisville Station, 3rd December, 1912; Pontbriand, 5th November, 1913; Robertsonville, 16th September, 1912; St. Désiré du Lac Noir, 3rd October, 1912; Thetford Mines, 10th April, 1913; Thetford Mines West, 11th April, 1913.

SUPPOSED GERMAN SPY.

Mr. MARCILE:

1. Is the Railway Department aware that a person has been arrested by the Intercolonial Railway police, supposed to be a German spy, having in his possession copies of plans of railway bridges and parts of line?
2. Does the department propose having an investigation to determine as to how he came into possession of these plans?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. A suspected German spy named Reinhold Riedel was arrested by railway detective near Metapedia and handed over to military authorities at Halifax. He did not have in his possession any maps or plans of railway bridge property.
2. Answered by No. 1.

FIRST EXPEDITIONARY FORCE.

Mr. VERVILLE:

1. What was the number of British-born in the first expeditionary forces?
2. What was the number of English Canadians?
3. What was the number of French Canadians?
4. What was the number of professional men?
5. What was the number of labour men or artisans?

Major General HUGHES: This information is not yet available in the Militia Department.

THE NATURALIZATION LAW.

Mr. COCKSHUTT:

1. Is the naturalization law, passed at last regular session of the House, now in force?
2. If so, when did it come into operation?
3. If not now in force, when will it become law?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. Yes.
2. January 1st, 1915.
3. Answered by No. 2.

MR. RODRIGUE CHARBONNEAU.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE:

1. Is the Postmaster General aware that a post office employee at Ste. Agathe des Monts, whose name is Rodrigue Charbonneau, is said to have taken an active part in the recent by-election of Terrebonne?
2. What salary does the said Rodrigue Charbonneau receive?

Mr. CASGRAIN: There is no person of the name of Rodrigue Charbonneau in the employ of the Post Office Department at Ste. Agathe des Monts.

PICTOU COUNTY MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. Were tenders called for the mail service between Hopewell and railway station, Pictou county?
2. Who were the tenderers, and what was the amount of each tender?
3. To whom was the contract awarded?

[Mr. Casgrain.]

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Yes, in June, 1912.
2. H. D. McLeod, at 21 cents per double trip.
3. H. D. McLeod.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. When was the contract for carrying the mail between Chance Harbour and Trenton last awarded?
2. Who were the tenderers for the same, and what was the amount of each tender?
3. To whom was the contract awarded?

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. On the 8th May, 1914, for a contract which dates from the 1st June, 1914.
2. James W. Fraser, $195 per annum; D. Cameron, $290 per annum; John W. Fraser, $325 per annum.
3. James W. Fraser.

Mr. MACDONALD:

Who were the tenderers for the existing contract for mail service between Pictou and railway station, and what was the amount of each tender?

Mr. CASGRAIN: D. W. English, $780 per annum; Alex. Sarson, $783 per annum; Cliff English, $900 per annum. These tenders were considered too high and the tenderers were given an opportunity to submit lower offers, with the following result: D. W. English, reduced from $780 to $730; Alex. Sarson, reduced from $783 to $700; Cliff English, reduced from $900 to $750. An offer was also received from Daniel W. McKerracher at $690, which, being the lowest, was accepted.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

Mr. Macdonald: For a return showing the number of ships employed by the Railway Department, the number of men hired on vessels and on shore, and the amount expended for supplies, men and transportation from March 31, 1914, to December 31, 1914, in connection with the Hudson Bay railway expenditures.

Mr. Carroll: For a copy of all letters, telegrams, reports or proceedings and all other documents in connection with the purchase of remounts in the province of Quebec since August 1 last up to and including the recent purchases made in the Eastern Townships by Messrs. Palmer and Pallister.

Mr. Sinclair: For a copy of all Orders in Council, departmental instructions, reports, correspondence, telegrams, evidence and findings in the posession of the Government, or any department thereof, relating to a certain investigation held in British Columbia by Commissioner Davie, who was instructed to inquire into certain charges against the Captain of the dredge Mudlark.

Mr. Macdonald: For a return showing the names of all applicants for Fenian raid bounty in the county of Pictou who have not yet been paid their bounty.

Mr. Macdonald: For a copy of all letters, papers, telegrams, evidence taken at investigations, reports and all other documents relating to the suspension or other action in regard to the charge of drunkenness against Newton Hopper, conductor on the Intercolonial railway, and to his subquent reinstatement.

Mr. Macdonald: For a copy of all letters, papers and other documents relating to the discharge of Dr. John McKenzie as medical doctor to the Indians of Pictou county, and to the appointment of Dr. Keith as his sucessor.

Mr. Kyte: For a copy of all correspondence, recommendations, letters and telegrams relating to the appointment of H. W. Ingraham as assistant registrar of alien enemies at Sydney, N.S., and to his dismissal from the said office.

Mr. Marcil: For a copy of all documents bearing on the payment made to C. R. Scoles, New Carlisle, Quebec, in July, 1914, of balance of subsidy voted to the Atlantic and Lake Superior railway, on the recommendation of the financial comptroller.

Mr. Michaud: For a return showing how much money was collected for customs duties each year for the last five years at Edmundston, Clair Green river and St. Leonard, N.B., respectively, and the salaries paid in reference to the said outports for the same period.

Mr. Macdonald: For a copy of all letters, telegrams, papers and other documents in regard to a proposed rural mail delivery service between Pictou and Saltsprings, Pictou county, and as to the arrangements for the existing service between those points.

Mr. Macdonald: For a copy of all letters, telegrams, papers and other documents relating to the mail contract between Chance harbour and Trenton, Pictou county, in regard to the existing contract.

Mr. Copp: For a return showing the estimated cost of fitting up the works of the Canadian Car and Foundry Company, Limited, at Amherst, N.S., for military purposes; what rent or other remuneration is being paid, or will be paid, this company for the use of its building; who are to supply the military provisions, including food for men, coal for heating and cooking, and food and other supplies for horses quartered on these premises, and the prices to be paid for same; if it is true that forms for tendering for such military supplies could only be obtained from the office of the sitting member for Cumberland county, and that in several cases forms of tender were refused to applicants; if the Government is aware that in the case of the supplying of hay, as alleged, not only were Liberals not allowed to tender for same, but supporters of the Government were informed they would not secure any part of the contract, if any of the hay to be supplied was to be purchased from a Liberal.

CUSTOMS INVESTIGATIONS.

On the notice of motion for production of papers being called:

Mr. Ross: For a copy of all letters, telegrams, Orders in Council and other documents in connection with the inquiry conducted by officials of the Department of Customs into allegations that W. T. Patten, of Coutts, Alberta, defrauded the said Department of Customs or did commit a breach of the customs law of Canada.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Customs): It has not been the custom of the department to bring down papers of this kind; they are always treated as confidential. The reason for this is that the publication of such documents might have the effect of injuring persons who had committed no breach of the customs law. I would therefore not care to agree to this motion passing, at least without further discussion.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If there is objection to the motion it should be transferred to notices of motion for discussion when it comes up again.

Mr. REID: I have no objection to its being transferred, if necessary.

Motion transferred to notices of motion.

HOUSE OF COMMONS READING ROOM.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Mr. Speaker, I wish to call your attention to the habit of several members of taking the newspapers on file in the Reading Room to their own rooms and keeping them there, thus depriving other members of their use. It would seem reasonable that members who wish to have the newspapers in their private rooms should subscribe for them; or, if this practice is to be continued, additional copies should be provided so that one copy may at all times remain in the Reading Room. The men in charge of the Reading Room tell me that messengers and pages come there and take away papers, and so the curator does not know where they are. I think some remedy for this grievance should be found.

Mr. SPEAKER: If no other hon. gentleman desires to make observations on this subject, I desire to say that I shall take an early opportunity of consulting the curator of the reading room, and endeavour as far as possible to obviate the confusion that seems to have arisen.

Mr. MARCIL: Perhaps you will permit me to say, Mr. Speaker, that during my term as Speaker this difficulty arose. There is only one remedy, if you will allow me to suggest it, and that is that there should be a copy to remain constantly in the reading room. For, once a paper is removed, you do not know where it is.

FOOT AND MOUTH DISEASE.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. D. C. ROSS (West Middlesex): I desire to make an inquiry of the Government with regard to a matter that I consider of very urgent public importance at this time of great need for the conservation of our food supplies for Canada and the Empire. I refer to the foot and mouth disease which has approached very close to our borders, having reached Detroit. I would like to know from the Government if every precaution is being taken to avert this great provincial and national disaster. I would like to inquire further, whether, considering the danger that is threatened, and considering the increased price of cattle and the absolutely inadequate compensation that is made for cattle slaughtered in order to prevent the spread of the disease, it is the intention of the Government at this session to so amend the Act that proper compensation can be made to graziers and farmers whose cattle have to be slaughtered in the public interest and to prevent the spread of the disease?

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Customs): The Department of Agriculture are taking every precaution to prevent the foot and mouth disease entering Canada. An extra staff of employees has been placed at all ports of entry, and the head of that branch of the department, Dr. Torrance, is giving the matter special attention with a view to doing everything to prevent this disease entering Canada. As to the latter part of the hon. gentleman's question, that is a matter with which, I suppose, the Minister of Agriculture has been dealing, and in his absence I am not informed on the subject.

Mr. ROSS: In spite of the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, the matter should receive the Government's very prompt and serious attention.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): The Act as it is now on the statute books has been in force, I believe, for many years. The Minister of Agriculture has not brought to my attention any proposal to amend it. However, I shall inform him of what the hon. member has suggested and will ask a report from him in regard to it.

17th BATTALION NOVA SCOTIA HIGHLANDERS.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): I desire to read to the House some correspondence which I have had with Sir George Perley, Acting High Commissioner, with regard to some statements that have appeared in the press respecting alleged ill-treatment or neglect of the Nova Scotia battalion at Salisbury Plains. After hearing that a statement had been made, I think it was in the Morning Chronicle of Nova Scotia, I directed that an abstract be made of the allegations contained in the article and transmitted to Sir George Perley by cable. That was done accordingly in these terms:

Ottawa, February 25, 1915.

Perley, Dominion, London.

Halifax Chronicle publishes signed staff correspondence from London alleging Nova Scotians Salisbury brutally treated; Seventeenth Battalion Highlanders used for months as lackeys and scavengers for entire Canadian encampment; Colonel Struan Robertson relieved his command; left without equipment and boots; crowded like cattle in filthy camp; and left for weeks without qualified medical officer to cope with epidemic of disease; their condition worse than that of Belgians; also that regiment landed Salisbury without equipment and none received. Please ascertain facts and cable.

Borden.

I received from Sir George Perley the following reply:

London, February 26, 1915.

Prime Minister, Ottawa.

Without knowing facts personally feel confident Halifax Chronicle statement grossly exaggerated. Do not think from what I have heard that 17th were treated any differently from other Canadians.

Perley.

This morning I received the following:

London, March 2, 1915.

Prime Minister, Ottawa.

General Alderson informs me Crowell representing Halifax Chronicle called on him about three weeks ago asking questions concerning sanitary conditions at camp and particularly as regards 17th. Alderson gave him a few facts and Crowell then stated he regretted not having seen Alderson before and thought would be advisable for him cable his paper not publish article which he had written and forwarded. Alderson says 17th Battalion was under exactly same conditions as all other units 4th Brigade, that they were not crowded like cattle and were never left without qualified medical officer, that they had six cases meningitis and otherwise their health was very good.

Perley.

I have also this further telegram:

London, March 2, 1915.

Prime Minister, Ottawa.

Halifax Chronicle. Colonel Robertson was relieved command 17th Battalion. Have brought article attention Lord Kitchner, who says allegations writer quite untrue, and wonders whether there are any means bringing originator these malicious falsehoods within reach law, as such statements are calculated to have bad effects if not strenuously denied.

Perley.

CANADIANS AT THE FRONT.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Hon. CHAS. MARCIL: I desire to ask the Prime Minister if he has any information with regard to the doings and fortunes of the Canadian troops in France. As he knows, of course, there is naturally a tremendous interest taken in the doings of our boys, and the public would be interested to know if anything further than that which has been published has been received.

Major General HUGHES (Minister of Militia): The information at hand is that the Canadian troops, first, second and third brigades, with the artillery, are in the firing line. We are in receipt from time to time of the casualty lists, and these lists are published. Hon. gentlemen can easily understand that it sometimes takes a day or two to get the news accurately, and we do not want to publish it until it is accurate; but as soon as we get it from the British Government, we first notify the friends of those concerned, and publish it immediately thereafter. If it would be of service, we could have the bulletins sent to the various waiting-rooms of the House of Commons for the information of members. The reports as to the behaviour and conduct of our soldiers under fire are just what we might have expected. On every occasion they have borne themselves as became the country whence they came. And, without boasting, I may say that the firing of the Canadians was most accurate and well-sustained.

STAMP DUTIES.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): Can the Minister of Finance tell us when the taxes which are to be collected by stamps are to come into force? In his Budget speech he made a distinction between certain classes of stamp duties, one class to apply immediately, that is, on 12th February, and the others coming into effect on a day to be fixed in the Act. I should like to know to what articles this last clause of the resolution is to apply, and whether stamps have been issued in connection with any of the articles, and if so, which ones?

Hon. W. T. WHITE (Minister of Finance): It is impossible at present to fix the date on which the stamp taxes will come into effect, because the Bill has not yet been passed by Parliament. My hon. friend understands that it has been the practice in the past for customs duties to come into effect at once,, and the Bill which will be subsequently passed so enacts. All commodities brought into Canada being under the control of the Customs, it is quite possible to enforce the law from the date of the Budget speech. But the case is different in regard to stamp taxes, and it is my intention to specify in the Bill the date on which they shall come into effect. My recollection is that in the Budget speech I stated that the stamp taxes on wines would come into effect at once. The stamp taxes upon other commodities, such as patent medicines, and the additional taxation upon letters, post cards and other documents will come into effect upon a date of which we shall give ample notice, and which will be mentioned in the Bill that will be introduced after the resolutions have been approved.

THE BUDGET.

PROPOSED WAR TAXATION.

Consideration of the proposed motion of Hon. W. T. White (Minister of Finance) for Committee of Ways and Means resumed from March 2.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver)—resuming): Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned last night I was seeking to demonstrate that the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite, that this was not a war budget and that the necessity for its introduction was due to the failure of the Government to properly carry on the Administration, were entirely fallacious, and I think the argument which I presented last night amply demonstrated that. But in order to make the point clear once more, I will remind the House of one or two things.

Hon. gentlemen opposite say that the condition which obtains in this country to-day is not due to the war, but to internal conditions. I suggested last night, and I shall do so again to-day, that the condition which obtains in Canada to-day is directly attributable to the war. The lack of shipping, the absolute stoppage of borrowing on the part of municipalities and provinces and industries, the cessation of building on account of lack of funds, the stoppage of railway development largely because it was impossible to get the money to carry on the great undertakings which had been under way for some years, and impossible to get the money to complete them, all these things had a direct effect upon the industries of the country, and especially on the steel industry. One thing which demonstrates that beyond all possibility of controversion is the closing of the stock exchanges throughout the world. If the war had nothing to do with commercial conditions in Canada or on this continent, then I ask why did the great stock exchanges of the world close the day before war was declared, or on that particular day, or the day after, as the case may be, and stay closed for many months afterwards? And to this day the stock exchanges are controlling the minimum prices of stock. And not only that, but all stocks in Canada and throughout the civilized world have suffered a serious reduction in value; and we know very well that with the exception of the leading ones, stocks are unsaleable to-day from no other reason than the outbreak of war. Another argument I wish to suggest is this: Immediately after the outbreak of war, the United States, which is an absolutely neutral country, called a special session of Congress and brought down a special war budget of $100,000,000 to supplement the revenue of that country, which had suffered because of the outbreak of war and the consequent disruption of traffic and trade in that country. If it was necessary for a special budget of $100,000,000 to be brought down by the United States, a neutral country which of all countries in the world might calculate to profit by this war, surely it is not unreasonable for this Government to bring down a measure for the purpose of supplementing the falling revenues of this country, and which fall is directly attributable to the war.

It is claimed that this is not a war budget. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) said yesterday that not one-half of the revenue to be raised by this Budget would be expended. In other words, they quarrel with the extravagance of the Government, and then they quarrel with the Government because the revenue to be collected will not be expended. Now, if this revenue will not be expended on the general business of the country as provided for in the Estimates, it stands to reason that there will be a very large surplus, and according to the hon. member for St. John that surplus on current account will amount at the end of the present fiscal year to about $50,000,000 or $60,000,000. If we have such a surplus, it will undoubtedly be applied to the war expenses of this country. So that that argument of the hon. member for St. John falls to ground. The Government has also been strongly attacked in connection with the British preference. We have been charged with disloyalty. To quote the words of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff)—and I should hesitate to use such language on my own responsibility—they say to us:

> For God's sake, keep your unholy and disloyal hands off the British preference.

That was a pretty strong statement for the hon. gentleman to make. Now what are we doing? The statute provides that the British preference shall be 33 per cent below the ordinary tariff, and the Minister of Finance is simply carrying out the mandate in that statute. He is doing what is right, what is reasonable and fair, and I do not think it lies with hon. gentlemen opposite to reflect upon the loyalty of this Government or upon the loyalty of its supporters because the British preference has been increased.

The hon. member for St. John made another argument yesterday in connection with the French convention. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that he drew a very vivid picture of the ladies dressed in silks and satins and of the poor dressed in linen and cotton. He made a particular point of that, and drew a very vivid picture of the sufferings of the poor. His argument was that the Minister of Finance is exempting silks and velvets and other articles of that kind because he is compelled to do so by the French convention. But in his next breath the hon. member for St. John criticised the Minister of Finance for imposing a tax on wines from France, and he asked if the minister had any right to do that. He stated that we were increasing the tax on sparkling wines, which are mainly the product of France by 1,000 per cent, or from 15 cents, as provided by the French convention to $1.50. Now there is no consistency in an argument of that kind. In my opinion it is but a demonstration of the insincerity of the charges made by hon. gentlemen opposite during this debate.

Mr. GRAHAM: Will my hon. friend allow me a word in the absence of my hon. friend the member for St. John? His argument was not along that line. He argued that the Government was not maintaining the spirit of the French treaty. He was not against the tax on wines, but against the violation of the treaty with France.

Mr. STEVENS: I will read his own words. I do not wish to misquote any one, but my memory is fairly good on these points. I am sorry, by the way, that the hon. member for St. John is not in his seat to answer for himself. His words are as follows.

An hon. MEMBER: Look for the squid.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, I might say on that point that the hon. gentleman made another error in regard to squid, which he considered to be fertilizer whereas they are bait, and which does not appear in Hansard. This is a very convenient way of eliminating an error of that kind. The hon. member for St. John said yesterday:

> And while I am upon the French convention, let me ask my hon. friend if he thinks that he is entirely within his powers in imposing an additional stamp tax upon wine which comes from France and upon which, under the French convention, a specific duty has been imposed. Take wine of the fresh grape, not a strong wine; a specific duty is payable upon that under the French convention, under schedule C. It does not come under schedule B but under C and a specific duty is imposed upon it. You have raised the duty upon that by reason of this stamp tax 100 per cent. Have you the right to do it? You will say you have, because you will say that this is an Inland Revenue tax that you are putting on. Well, now, is it within the spirit of the French convention.

The object of the remarks of the hon. member for St. John was to criticise and condemn the Government because they had observed the terms of the French Treaty in exempting silks, velvets and other articles of that kind, which they were compelled to do. He sought to condemn the Government on the ground of making the taxation bear heavily on the poor instead of the rich. He did not argue anything in connection with the French Treaty that brought forth that statement, but it was a statement calculated to condemn the Government for something they had no control over. I am, therefore, I think, quite within my rights when I say with all respect to the hon. gentleman that this demonstrates the insincerity of his argument.

A great deal has been said in regard to the farmers, and we have heard the argument that this new tax will bear heavily upon them. As far as the West is concerned, and I have resided there for over twenty years, the farmers are quite willing to bear their share of taxation. I do not believe that they would thank any hon. member of this House to represent them as desiring to be immune, or to be relieved, from their fair share of taxation. There is no other class or industry in Canada which will benefit so much as the farming industry. My Rt. hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) stated clearly on Monday that it was not the intention of the Government to penalize the farmers by establishing a fixed price for their products at this time. He stated that they were going to have the right to get the fair market prices of their products which at present are very favourable. Why should the farmers not be willing, as I believe they are willing, to bear their just and fair share of taxation of this kind?

Another argument advanced yesterday was in connection with the duty on coal. It was stated that this Government let anthracite coal in free and taxed bituminous coal. It was also stated, in error, that bituminous coal was the coal of the poor people. As a matter of fact, the bulk of bituminous coal imported into

4 p.m.

Canada is used by the railways and large concerns for steam purposes, and is not used by the poor people at all. According to the hon. gentleman the importation last year of bituminous coal was $15,000,000, and of anthracite, $22,000,000. If these figures are correct, who consumes $22,000,000 worth of coal? My hon. friend would leave the impression on the House and in the minds of the people that this coal was consumed only by the rich, whereas, as a matter of fact, it is well known that anthracite coal is the coal of the householder throughout the length and breadth of eastern Canada, and that soft coal is the coal of the rich corporations who are ready and willing, I believe, to bear their just share of taxation.

I pointed out in connection with the increases yesterday that they were quite justifiable. I desire for a moment now to examine some of the decreases in the present Estimates on which a considerable reflection has been cast, and to show that the Government is doing its utmost to meet the situation with which it is faced at the present time. I remember that when the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) made his very able speech here a week ago, he criticised the Government in connection with the large expenditure for legislation. We find a reduction in the expenditure for legislation of $156,000, and a reduction in the expenditure for immigration of $263,000. Let me pause at this item for a moment. It has been claimed by hon. gentlemen opposite that the expenditure for immigration might be largely cut off. They say that immigration has fallen off, and that therefore this expenditure should be reduced to a very small amount. With that I do not agree at all, because it is utterly impossible to secure an organization, such as we have in connection with immigration, then discharge the members of that organization, and be able within a year or two to get them together again. There is another reason why it would be unwise to disorganize the immigration system, and it is that the immigration department is not solely used as a "North Atlantic Company"; it is not solely used for the purpose of bringing in immigration. It is used for looking after the immigrants in the country. At the present time the whole force of the immigration department which can be spared is used in every port of entry in Canada looking out for alien enemies, looking out for those who might be coming into Canada with hostile intentions since the war has broken out. This department has very large and responsible duties to perform, which duties, as far as I am able to learn, they are performing with great credit to themselves and to the country. A substantial reduction has been made in the immigration vote, which shows very clearly that, while the Government are determined to maintain the efficiency of the department, they are at the same time exercising economy to the limit of their ability.

Another item which has been the subject of attack is that of public works. We have a reduction in public works of $14,833,000 under the present Estimates—$11,000,000 on account of income, and $3,800,000 on account of capital. The hon. member for St. John attacked this particular item in the Estimates, and claimed that it might have been reduced by a much larger amount. When he was Minister of Public Works he commenced in his own constituency works that involved an expenditure of $11,500,000, and the present Government is carrying on those very laudable public works in the harbour of St. John or in Courtenay Bay. Having let a contract, it is the duty of this Government to protect the contractors who have entered into the contract for this work, and see that no unnecessary delays are occasioned or obstacles placed in their way. A reduction of $14,000,000 in the Estimates is a very substantial reduction, and one which goes as far as it is possible for the Government to go without interfering with the condition of Canada and making it worse than it is to-day. It is the duty of the Government and of the Minister of Public Works to keep public works going on to the utmost of the capacity of the Government, in order to maintain employment throughout the various districts of Canada in these laudable and profitable public works. In the Estimates of the Department of Railways and Canals we find a reduction of $5,343,000. Again, I think that is a very reasonable reduction under the conditions which at present obtain. In Dominion Parks there is a reduction of $500,000, and in Trade and Commerce a reduction of $1,903,000. I am sorry to see that reduction, because I believe that in the Department of Trade and Commerce great work can be done, and I am confident that great work is being done, for never in the history of this country has the department counted as it is counting to-day under the able management of the Hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). I am sorry that the Government has seen fit to reduce his Estimates this year, becauses this country has an opportunity of picking up in the other countries a great deal of trade which prior to the outbreak of the war was held by Germany. It is an opportunity for us to expand our trade and commerce in various parts of the world.

I would like to direct the attention of the House for a moment to the argument advanced, namely, that no other country has increased its taxation. I have already referred to the United States, which has found it necessary, although it is an entirely neutral country, to increase its revenue by $100,000,000 by new taxation. Various means have been used, such as stamp taxes. Many of them are the same as those that we have introduced and some of them are of a different character. In Australia, which probably, because of its relation to the Empire, is more analogous to Canada than is the United States, customs duties, the probate dues and the land tax have been increased. The action of the Australian Government in increasing the customs duties is an exact parallel to the action of this Government. The customs tariff has been the method of raising revenue in this country ever since 1878, and even prior to that date. That method was accepted by hon. gentlemen opposite. They followed it through the fifteen years of their tenure of office. They did not deviate from our policy to an extent worthy of mention. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite: How could this Government or this House change the whole policy of the country at a time when we were engaged in a war which taxed the resources of this country? No sane man for one moment would advance the suggestion that the Government should do so. The British Government increased its customs duties, not to a great extent, because the British customs duty is not large. Here are some figures showing the increase: In the year 1912, the revenue derived from customs duties in Great Britain was £36,000,000. In the year 1914, largely because of the increase of duty after the outbreak of the war, the revenue from customs duties was £39,269,000, an increase of £3,269,000, or over $15,- 000,000. It is quite true that the British Government has increased its other forms of taxation, but I give this in answer to the argument of the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean), namely, that no other country has tampered with its tariff.

It has also been pointed out to us, as a reflection upon the ability of this Government to carry on the affairs of the country, that our trade has fallen off. That has been considered by hon. gentlemen opposite as a serious offence on the part of this Government. I wish to examine the trade returns of two or three countries in order to show that we are simply a part of the great commercial system of the world, and that we suffer in common with other countries of the world because of the outbreak of this war and not because, as hon. gentlemen opposite state, of any fault or of any lack of administration of affairs on the part of this Government. In 1912, the imports into Great Britain were £744,000,000. In 1914, they were £697,000,000, a decrease of £47,000,000 or about $235,000,000. In 1912, the exports from Great Britain were £598,000,000. In 1914, they were only £535,000,000, a decrease of £63,000,000, or about $315,000,000. That would mean a decrease in the total trade of Great Britain of $550,000,000. That is in the Old Land, the trade of which is supposed to be buoyant at the present time. We are proud of the trade of the Mother Country, but—

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member for Red Deer says "Hear, hear." I am glad to hear him say "Hear, hear," but he is out of sympathy with his colleagues on the other side of the House, if he does not support their argument that this Government is to blame for the falling off in the trade of Canada, because we have simply suffered in common with other countries. I can give the trade of almost every country in the world, and every country has suffered because of the outbreak of this war. I will not, however, weary the House with further statistics of that kind.

I desire to draw the attention of the House to what I consider should have occupied more attention than has been given to it up to the present time, that is, the opportunity presented to the business men of Canada to extend their trade. We are discussing ways and means of carrying on the business of this country. It is the duty of this Parliament, not only to find the sinews of war, but to try to keep the avenues of trade as normal as possible, to try to readjust the disruption of traffic resulting from this war. It is our duty as legislators to seek new markets for our goods, and to try to take advantage of the markets which have been lost by the enemy.

One of the greatest markets opened to us to-day is that of Russia. Since the outbreak of war a line of steamships has been established plying between Vancouver and Victoria and Vladivostock in Siberia. This line of steamships is plying at the present time every two and three weeks between these two countries, and is carrying on a very profitable trade. I want to point out a few of the resources and possibilities of the country of which I speak. Russia is one of the largest and most compact countries in the world. It has an area of 8,648,000 square miles, an area hard for us to conceive. In 1815, its population was 45,000,000, and in 1912 170,000,000, an increase of 125,000,000 in about a hundred years. It is reasonable to expect that the ratio of increase will continue during this century, thus making a larger market as time goes on for the produce of this country and of other countries that are fortunate enough to deal with Russia. There are nineteen cities having a population of over 100,000, thirty-eight having a population of over 50,000, 3,465 having a population of from 10,000 to 50,000, and 728,157 villages with a population under 10,000. I quote these figures just to demonstrate the possible market in Russia for goods produced in other countries. We must not overlook the agricultural population. Agriculture is one of the greatest industries of Russia, and it is in a very crude and raw condition. It is only in recent years that they have commenced to use modern implements and machinery in agriculture. And here, in my estimation, is one of the finest markets for the manufacturers of Canada. Already, I understand, our farm implements have gained access to the Russian market, but only to a small degree. I understand that the Americans have a great hold on that market. But in a few moments I will bring figures to show that Germany has controlled Russia's market to a far greater extent than any other country. I shall not go into figures with regard to the birth rate, but will say generally that the birth rate in Russia greatly exceeds the death rate, which carries out the idea I have stated that there will be a great increase in the population.

The figures with regard to Russian finance are interesting. The revenue of Russia for the year 1913, was $1,625,500,000, which is a very substantial revenue. From direct taxation they get $125,500,000; customs and excise $336,000,000; stamp duties $110,000,000; state monopolies $482,000,000, most of which comes from the sale of spirits—$418,000,000—; and telegraphs and post offices, $58,000,000. Let me pause to call your attention to the great revolution recently brought about in Russia. Not long ago, by a stroke of the pen, the Czar of Russia wiped out the liquor traffic of that country. This was to apply to the period of mobilization and was designed to protect the troops while mobilizing. The reform was found to work successfully, and the Czar extended the time to the termination of the war. Seeing that this worked better still and that it was received by the people with very great approval, he issued a third proclamation making the abolition of the liquor traffic in Russia a permanent reform, though it meant a direct sacrifice to the Crown of Russia of a revenue of no less than $418,000,000. This enormous sum will have to be made up by other forms of taxation. So far as we can learn, the people of Russia appreciate very highly the action of their Emperor in this matter. From State domains Russia receives a revenue of $502,000,000, made up of rents, $17,000,000, forests $46,000,000, and railways $363,000,000. Again I pause for a moment to call attention to the fact that Russia, which has been looked upon as the most backward of modern civilized countries, receives this revenue of over five hundred millions from State domains, including national railways. Her forests gave a clear profit of $29,000,000, and railways, of which they have 46,000 miles, 36,000 being government-owned, gave them a revenue of $363,000,000. Of course the expenditure on railways was almost as much as the revenue, but they do not undertake to make a great profit on the operation of their railways. We find also that Russia is not so far behind when we come to examine the nature of its governmental system. The debt of Russia in 1913 was $4,425,000,000, the interest on that debt being $202,000,000. The expenditures included $320,000,000 on railways, which left a profit of about $40,000,000. These figures may not have a direct bearing upon the argument I wish to present a little later, but I submit them for the information of the House and in order to inspire in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite and of the Government a belief in the possibilities of Russia as a new market for this country. Let me quote some figures as to agricultural production in Russia. These figures are for the year 1912, which is the latest year for which I could secure accurate information:

	Bushels.
Wheat	888,000,000
Oats	1,022,000,000
Rye	1,086,500,000
Barley	495,000,000
Other grains	350,000,000
Total	3,841,500,000

These are gigantic figures. They demonstrate that, for one thing, we cannot hope to find a great market in Russia for the export of agricultural products, and we might as well accept that fact, because Russia is a large exporter. Russia has a great area under cultivation,—256,000,000 acres in cereals; 11,000,000 acres in potatoes; 95,000,000 acres in meadows; 97,000,000 acres grazing lands; and area of forest of merchantable character, 1,200,000,000 acres. This gives us an idea of the vast extent of that country and its possibilities.

I shall not weary the House with further figures concerning production, but will deal briefly with the question of Russia's commerce. The exports of Russia in 1913, were from European ports $791,500,000, and from Asiatic ports, principally Vladivostock and other ports of the North Pacific Ocean, $81,000,000; total, $872,500,000. These European ports offer us a great opportunity for the exports of our machinery to Russia. Formerly, a large portion of the trade with Russia was carried on by Germany, but that trade has been shattered and will not be re-established for many years, if ever. That trade is open to the manufacturers of eastern Canada, and offers an enormous market immediately at the close of the war. Yes, and possibly before the close of the war, because our splendid battleships are at this moment hammering at the gates of the Dardanelles with bright prospects of breaking their way through to the Black Sea at an early day. As to the exports from the Asiatic ports, that more particularly pertains to our Pacific coast. The imports by Russia via European ports were $658,000,000, and by Asiatic ports $48,000,000, or a total of $706,000,000. Thus we see that the grand total of Russia's foreign trade is $1,178,500,000. This is more than double what that trade was in 1900, when it was only $749,500,000. This offers to Canada the brightest prospect of a market of any country in the world to-day, especially in view of the friendly sentiment that now exists which will lead to a willingness to enter into negotiations for trade with us.

Let me examine for a moment the classification of this trade. As to exports, foodstuffs and raw and half-manufactured articles make up the bulk, an ' with this I shall not deal. But among the imports we find that raw and half-manufactured articles amount to $300,000,000. Manufactures amount to $227,000,000, including the following items: Machinery, $82,000,000; miscellaneous manufactures, $50,000,000, and semi-manufactured and raw metals, such as copper, lead, zinc and silver, $25,000,000. In these items we have a splendid opening for Canada. They have a large quantity of iron in Russia, and I do not expect that we shall be able to export to them iron ore. But for our lead mines in the West, for our silver mines, now lying idle for fifteen years, for our zinc mines which have been unproductive, there is a splendid opportunity. Russia imports $20,000,000 worth of fish for the supply mainly of the inland population. This offers a splendid opportunity for the export of fish from both the eastern and western seaboards of Canada.

I turn now to an examination of the sources of these imports. Russia imported from Germany $320,000,000 worth; from the United Kingdom, $85,000,000; from the United States, $37,000,000; from France, $25,000,000. In respect of other countries the figures are smaller. It will be observed that nearly all these exports to Russia came from Germany, amounting to $320,000,000, and consisting of manufactured articles, we have an opportunity of getting a substantial share of this trade, and I hope that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Government and this House will give some attention to the possibilities of trade expansion which exist in this respect. We can supply Russia with agricultural implements; Great Britain can supply her with woollens and cottons. I believe that a bright future is in store for the woollen trade of Canada if some attention is paid to it. Years ago large numbers of sheep were raised throughout Canada and large quantities of wool were produced. I have not the figures before me, but I think I am safe in saying that to-day we produce only one-tenth of the amount of the wool we produced in 1900. This is not as it should be. Our country is highly suitable to the production of wool, which, together with iron, is one of the great staple products in the world's market. The success of British trade and commerce many centuries ago was based upon the production of wool; later iron and steel played an important part in the expansion of that commerce. In the matter of the production of wool splendid opportunities are open to Canada, and I urge upon the Government the advisability of giving this important industry some attention. I would cheerfully support putting back in the Estimates of the Trade and Commerce Department that sum of $1,900,000 for the purpose of examining into the possibilities of some of the industries and opportunities of trade which I have mentioned.

In the cities and commercial centres of Russia a great demand exists for the metals which I have named—lead, zinc, silver—in semi-manufactured form. In Western Canada—and in some parts of the East, but particularly in my own province—we produce large quantities of copper. That copper is sent in raw or semi-raw condition in the form of mats to the United States, where it is manufactured into copper wire and other products of that nature. Copper is a product which enters largely into the manufacture of many articles and I would urge upon the Government the advisability of looking also into the possibilities of Canada's copper trade. In the Cobalt district we have the world's supply of nickel. This product, which we have a right to look upon as the peculiar heritage of Canada, should be developed by the people of Canada. Nickel, copper, iron ore—these industries are capable of vast development; the market is at our very door, as it were.

I understand that our Canadian steel factories are inactive to-day because of lack of demand for their products. Railway building has ceased; our railways cannot get money to extend or complete their lines and the result is a falling off in the demand for steel rails. But in the vast stretches of Russia in a few years railway mileage will be completed to such an extent as to exceed the activities of the United States or Canada in that respect during the last half century. A few years ago we looked upon Siberia as a barren waste. So did we look upon the vast Canadian Northwest. We were wont to think that only a narrow fringe of land along the boundary line was capable of profitable cultivation; now we find that we can grow wheat a thousand miles north of the boundary line. Siberia is to-day producing millions of bushels of wheat; Russian railway lines will have to be extended into new districts and new territories, and the consequent demand for steel rails will be very great indeed.

I wish to draw the attention of the House to the direction taken by German trade during the last few years. In 1913 the value of German exports was: Agricultural, $432,000,000; raw minerals, $217,000,000; chemicals, $240,000,000; textiles, (woollens and cottons) $400,000,000. To what countries were these products exported? Great Britain imported from Germany $290,000,000 worth. Is there not a splendid opportunity for us to get a share of that trade? Some hon. gentlemen opposite will say: Well, you have added to the British preference and you are going to interfere with trade between the old land and Canada. I consider that argument to be absolutely baseless. All countries have had free access to the British market; we have received no preference whatever. For the sake of argument I will grant that when times again become normal I should like to see a large increase in the British preference, but I should like to see Canadian goods and the goods of the overseas dominions get a slight preference in the markets of the Mother Country. I think we are worthy of that consideration. Germany exported to Great Britain in the year 1913 $290,000,000 worth of products; why should we not have a preference over Germany? I think that one of the results of the war will be a change of sentiment along the line of preference in the markets of the Mother Country. Germany exported to France $173,000,000 worth of products; we have a chance to get into that market and to get a slice of that trade. $126,000,000 worth went into Belgium. I think that Belgium will open the doors of her markets to us more freely than she has done in the past. $321,000,000 worth of products, as I have said, went from Germany to Russia. The four Allies, Great Britain, France, Russia and Belgium, who are fighting side by side for the preservation of democracy in our modern civilization, imported from Germany a total of $910,000,000 worth of goods. Have we not a right to expect a certain portion of this trade at the close of this war? Argentina imported from Germany $60,000,000 worth; Brazil, $50,000,000 worth; Chile, $26,000,000 worth. Sweden, Denmark, Switzerland and Japan come next; they had a large import trade with Germany. My object in wearying the House with these figures was to impress upon the members and upon the Government the opportunities which are open to us to-day in respect of the extension of our trade. In my estimation it is just as much the bounden duty of this Parliament to look to the maintenance and extension of our trade connections as it is to strengthen the sinews of war. This being the case, I say that we should give these matters very careful consideration.

Last night when we were discussing this matter the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) drew attention to the amount of money in our banks. He made a statement something to this effect: Why is there more money in the banks at the present time than there has been for some years, and why is it not let out for the use of commerce and the financial interests of the country? He said the reason was that the people had lost confidence in the Government of the country. That is a pretty strong statement, and yet the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe made it on the floor of the House. It is on a par with a number of statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite. The junior member for Halifax made a very serious attack upon the Government along this line. I shall quote some of his words, because I think the House should take cognizance of them. He was speaking not only for himself but for his colleagues of the Opposition, and, as he said, for the country also. We have always looked on that hon. member as a very conservative member of the House, and as an hon. gentleman who would state only what he believed to be true. I wish to draw his attention to his words, and I think that possibly on second thoughts he will realize that he has not treated the Government in a reasonable or fair manner. He said, speaking of the financial condition of the country and of the course of the Government:

> They are almost entirely responsible for our present financial conditions.

He goes on:

> I feel sure that the record of the expenditures of the Government during the past few years carries its condemnation. The facts prove that degree of recklessness and improvident administration of some branches of the public service which merits criticism and the withdrawal of the confidence of the country.

This is very strong language to be used in a war session when we have a truce. What sort of truce is it which will permit the leading financial critic who speaks for the Opposition to say that this Government has lost the confidence of the people of Canada? In my estimation there never was a time in the history of the Dominion of Canada when the people, from the Pacific coast to the Atlantic, had more confidence in the head of the Government and his colleagues than at the present time. You can travel from the Pacific coast to the Atlantic seaboard, and the name of the Premier, the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden, is synonymous with all that is sound and good and conservative in Government; and for the hon. gentleman to cast these aspersions upon this Government cannot be allowed to pass without some recognition on the part of hon. members on this side of this House. I for one resent that attitude. I feel it to be an inopportune time to make such an attack. As far as I am concerned, I have never made, since the outbreak of war, a single political speech; and yet my hon. friends opposite have not risen to their feet in this debate without making the most partisan speeches on the Budget that I have listened to in the last four sessions I bring this to the attention of hon. members because I do not think that the thinking members of their party outside of this House will support them in the attitude they have assumed in this regard. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) made a statement last night which I think it my duty as a member of the House, in justice to my constituents, to reply to, no matter how weak or ineffective my reply may be:

> Unfortunately the Government have got the Dominion into this deplorable state by reason of their want of foresight and prudence.

He was speaking of the general condition of Canada:

> They have known that for at least three years that there was great danger that war might come between Great Britain and Germany. If they believed that, then surely three years ago they should have begun husbanding the resources of this country, they should have been saving money and putting it in the public treasury to meet the day of trial when it came.

Mr. Speaker, two years ago last fall the right hon. the leader of the Government and his colleagues, after consultation with the Imperial Government, brought before this House certain measures which, in the wisdom of the joint councils of the Empire, were considered necessary for the protection of the interests of the Empire at that time; and in view of the possible conditions which might obtain later on and which time has proven did exist at that time, a Bill was brought down here for the purpose of providing, just as the hon. member for St. John condemns the Government for not providing, for the defence of this Empire. It was thrown out by hon. gentlemen opposite and their colleagues in the Senate, and to-day, if we are suffering at all in this regard, we have them to thank and not this Government. Not only did they throw out this Bill, but when the name of the Right Hon. Winston Churchill was brought forward here as an argument in support of it, the very gentleman who condemned the Government on the floor of the House yesterday was the first one to rise and openly question the wisdom of the policy of Winston Churchill; he and the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) and the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell) were the three chief sinners in this regard. They condemned the policy of Winston Churchill. I ask them to-day and I ask the House where would the commerce of the Empire have been to-day if it had not been for the wise provision and the insistence in carrying out his policy of that great war lord, the First Lord of the Admiralty at that time. We find that when the war broke out the Premier of Canada was ready for the emergency. In spite of the opposition placed before him and his Government two years ago and from then down to the outbreak of the war, he prepared the way for the protection of the trade of Canada; and I was proud when the war broke out to find how quickly the Government seized on the situation and met every emergency and condition with which the country was threatened. Yet for this the Government have been condemned and wrongly condemned by the Opposition in unmeasured terms during this debate. I desire to say that the Finance Minister, in bringing down this Budget, met the most critical condition with which the country has ever been faced, and met it well and wisely. He was looking after the interests of Canada, and I consider the provisions which he has made are provisions which will adequately meet the conditions.

I wish, in conclusion, to call the attention of the House to the measures which the Minister of Finance has taken, not only in the customs tariff, which we have fully discussed, but in the taxes upon banks, upon trust and loan companies, upon insurance companies, upon railway and telegraph lines, upon purchasers of railway and sleeping car tickets and upon persons carrying passengers, upon cheques and receipts, upon express and post office orders, upon letters and post cards and bills of exchange, etc. This is the type of legislation and taxation which has been adopted, and up to the present moment I have received not one protest, and only one objection, and that was to the method of administration of the patent medicine tax. I am of the opinion that even that tax will be administered in such a way as to give satisfaction to the patent medicine industry. They did not object to the tax, but to the method in which it has to be imposed.

Mr. GRAHAM: Did they not think it was a little too high?

Mr. STEVENS: In most cases when any tax is imposed on men they will say it is too high, even if it is only one cent in a thousand dollars. The fact remains that the country has received this Budget with greater satisfaction and with greater expressions of patriotism than I have ever seen accorded any Budget in the history of Canada, and I think the Minister of Finance deserves great credit for its introduction.

Mr. A. B. McCOIG (West Kent): Mr. Speaker, in rising to say a few words on the Budget presented by the Minister of Finance a few days ago, I cannot quite agree with the hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Stevens), for I have received a number of complaints from my constituency. I was very glad to hear the hon. gentleman pointing out to the agriculturists of this country the great possibilities of future trade with Russia and other countries. If we are to receive from these countries the great benefits that the hon. gentleman points out, I know that the members on this side of the House and the people throughout the length and breadth of Canada will all rejoice.

As the Postmaster General has just come in, I should like to direct his attention for a moment to some of the rural mail routes that have been established in the county of Kent. I believe that every route that has been established there has met with the approval of the people of that county. In the section comprising the townships of Raleigh, Tilbury East and Romney and the villages of Merlin and Wheatley, upon the Père-Marquette railway, a number of routes have been established. The Père-Marquette railway has a contract from the Government for carrying the mail to these villages, and up to a short time ago has given an extraordinarily good service. The people in that section were able to get in the forenoon the London morning papers, as well as the Toronto papers, which have received hundreds of applications from subscribers. But now the morning service from London has been discontinued, and the people are unable to get the Toronto papers until the next day. This, and the delay in getting their mail, has caused great inconvenience to them, and they are also inconvenienced by being unable to reach Chatham in any reasonable time in the forenoon. I am sure that the people in that section of the country, who have hitherto received a splendid mail service, would be very grateful if the Postmaster General would give this matter his immediate attention. If he cannot force the railway to give this service, I feel satisfied that an appeal to the Railway Commission would result in the train being again put on, and the people in that part of the country would then be able to get their mail and papers in good time. The people in the vicinity of the International Harvester Wagon Works and Cornhill's brickyard in Chatham township have also made an appeal for better mail service. There are more than sufficient men there to make up a village, but at present they do not care to come within the city limits of Chatham. But they are anxious for a better mail service and have asked for a post office. There is no mail delivery from the city and no rural mail route. The men have to walk a mile or two to the city post office to get their mail, and would greatly appreciate the post office they are asking for. I know the expense would be very small, and the mail carriers we have in the Chatham post office could take the mail to this particular point, where there is a store and a butcher shop doing a good business. The mechanics employed by the Harvester Company and Cornhill's brickyard could in that way get their mail, and the cost of the service to the Government would be very reasonable. If the hon. gentleman will give this matter his attention I am sure he will find that the cost will be small, and I have no doubt that he will grant the request and give these people a satisfactory mail service.

As I was saying, the hon. gentleman who has just sat down has spoken of the great possibilities of trade with the allied nations with whom we are battling shoulder to shoulder at the present time. I regret that the Minister of Agriculture is not in his seat, but I know that the Government will draw his attention to any remarks that they may think worthy of his consideration. I have here a pamphlet printed under the authority of the Minister of Agriculture giving the opinions of the different provincial ministers of agriculture throughout Canada as to the duty of the farmers of this country at the present time.

Let me first read what the Hon. James Duff Minister of Agriculture in the Ontario Government, says:

I hold that the man who joins in the effort to keep up an adequate supply of foodstuffs in time of war is rendering service to his country only second to that being rendered by the man on the firing line.

Hon. George Lawrence, Minister of Agriculture for Manitoba, says:

Gentlemen, the faces of the nation are turned towards you. All eyes are expectantly upon you; for at such a time the Master of the Soil is the master of National Fate. War has a rapacious appetite, and great quantities of food are required not only while actual hostilities endure but long afterward while the consequent waste is felt.

Hon. W. R. Motherwell, Minister of Agriculture for Saskatchewan, says:

Germany, Austria-Hungary, Russia, France, Great Britain, all these countries in normal times, produce only a portion of their own foodstuffs, and Belgium is principally a manufacturing country. Therefore, we may well ask ourselves: "Who is going to feed the world?" and what greater part can we play than we are playing in providing supplies for the front, and thus further, and to the utmost, assist our struggling armies until victory crowns their efforts in this terrible conflict.

Addressing the farmers of New Brunswick, the Minister of Agriculture for that province says:

To the farmers of New Brunswick, this presents an opportunity, not only for patriotism, but for future profit to themselves, by placing them in a position to supply a market that will be open for a long time to come.

I am glad, in this way, to appeal to the agricultural classes of New Brunswick to unite with those who have in ways that are more apparent, gone to the service of the Empire, and lend themselves to the cultivation of the large acreage in this province which has heretofore not been utilized in this way.

In a public address delivered at the Sherbrooke fair, the Hon. Mr. Caron, Minister of Agriculture for Quebec, spoke about war and agriculture:

He stated that the time was particularly well chosen for helping educational work in agriculture. Never perhaps for the last forty years had the farmers such an opportunity as the present one, and it is to be hoped that they would all strive to increase production, not only in their own interest but also out of their loyalty to our country and our Mother Country. He also spoke of the gift of cheese made by the province of Quebec and stated that the Prime Minister had been told in England that the Allies would surely be victorious if there was no shortage of food.

As the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) says, this is not a time for us to put a high tax upon fertilizers, which are so necessary to the agricultural producers of this country. The Hon. Mr. Burrell states in this book that wherever we find a country producing more products at the present time than it formerly did, it is because that country is farming on advanced lines and utilizing fertilizers to a great extent. During my visit to my home on Saturday last I had a call from a gentleman who had placed his order for four tons of fertilizer in the latter part of last fall, and who had purchased a drill to put the fertilizer upon the land. If he were purchasing the fertilizer and drill to-day it would cost him $20 more than he had to pay last fall. He appealed to me to ask the Government, if they were unable to give the farmers the fertilizer in its manufactured state without any tariff against it, to do the next best thing and give them the materials which are used in the manufacture of fertilizer, so that they would be able to mix these materials themselves and get the results which are expected of the farmers by the people of Canada at the present time. In the province of Ontario it is estimated that an extra 100,000 acres of fall wheat were sown last fall. If that is the case, there will be 100,000 less acres to be sown with other grains during the coming spring. As my hon. friend from West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) said, we have at the threshold of our country the Foot and Mouth disease. This has prevented the sale of many of our cattle in the American market. It has had a tendency to throw upon the markets of Canada many cattle, and has greatly reduced the price of beef in all the great centres. There have been many farmers who have been unable to dispose of their cattle, and they will require pasture for them during next season. They will have to reserve for pasture the land that they had expected to break and sow to grain crops in order to pasture their stock. That again will reduce the acreage, not only in Ontario, but throughout Canada. This stock has to be fed, because it cannot be marketed at a profitable price. You will therefore appreciate the great importance of giving the farmers every assistance to procure their fertilizers at a reduced price, or at such a price as will enable them to respond to the appeal for greater production. I believe that the farmers of Ontario, who are as far advanced in agriculture as are the farmers in any part of the world, would prefer that the Government, instead of sending out lecturers to tell them what to do and how to do it, should take the money which is being expended upon these men in the way of salary and expenses and expend it in the way of giving them assistance to produce larger crops. I feel satisfied that if this were done it would meet with general approval, and I am saying this by way of appeal to the Government to do what they can along this particular line.

Now, let us go a little further. The farmer is unable to produce what is expected of him, but what does he find confronting him? When the farmer goes to buy the implements that are required by him to enable him to successfully work his farm, he is met by an increased tariff of 7½ per cent, which he has to pay in addition to the tariff rate that he formerly had to pay. I read in Hansard that the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt), in reply to my hon. friend from Medicine Hat (Mr. Buchanan), said:

> So far as our firm is concerned, there is no truth in that report of an increase. It has been decided by the firm that prices shall remain just as they have been.

We also read in the Press reports about the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) saying very complimentary things about the hon. member for Brantford and expressing gratification that his company had not seen fit to increase the prices of their goods. Notwithstanding the fact that the hon. member for Brantford has made that statement, I say that their prices have been advanced as between 1914 and 1915 as follows: Ontario footlift gang plough, advanced $1; Ontario footlift sulky plough, advanced $2; Walking Maple Leaf gang plough, advanced $1; Maple Leaf wide bottom plough, advanced $1; 12 different walking ploughs: 9 advanced 5 per cent; 2 the same; 1 advanced 10 per cent.

This is not hearsay. I am not trying to mislead the House. If the hon. member for Brantford were in his seat I am prepared to produce to him the private and confidential wholesale price lists of 1914 and 1915 copies of which I have. They are not the only manufacturers who are advancing their prices. There is not one manufacturer making agricultural implements but has advanced his prices and again I think I can give you the extent to which they have been advanced. The manufacturers have announced that there will be an advance of 5 per cent on the first of May of this present year which is not sixty days hence. I say without fear of contradiction that the manufacturers of this country have advanced the prices of agricultural implements which are so badly needed by the farmers to produce larger crops. Not only have they advanced the prices 5 per cent but they have reduced the allowances formerly made to the men who handle their goods and I can speak with authority on this subject because I am connected with a firm handling agricultural implements. The concessions that were made on large quantities and the assistance that was given in the way of setting up implements and wareroom rentals are all cut off. If my hon. friend the Minister of Finance and my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, question my statement they can appoint a commission and have representatives of the manufacturers and the agricultural implement dealers brought before them in Ottawa and any statement I will make will be borne out on oath. That is the position in which the farmer is placed when the Minister of Agriculture asks him to produce more and when the cry of patriotism and production is heard throughout the land. The Government have placed a barrier against the farmer as far as fertilizers and agricultural implements are concerned.

In the counties of Essex and Kent we are under a greater burden than possibly the farmers in any other county in Ontario. In the first place we have a large variety of crops. We have the tobacco crop, the bean crop, the sugar beet crop and the corn crop, and each necessitates the purchase of special implements which in many cases are not manufactured in this country. To carry on these lines of farming successfully it is necessary that these implements should be brought in by the other side. Therefore, in that part of the country we are handicapped to a very large extent by the increased tariff which has been imposed against these implements. On almost every one of these machines there is a fertilizer attachment to enable fertilizers to be properly and economically placed upon the land in order that a larger crop may be secured. Corn planters with fertilizer attachments are brought in mostly from the other side because they are not manufactured in Canada. Tobacco planters are brought in from the other side and sugar beet planters, possibly with one exception are brought in from the other side. Corn binders, with some exceptions, are brought in from the other side, and the duty on them should remain at the same rate at which it was prior to 1915. Grain binders remain at the same price. Those machines, however, which have to be brought in and used by farmers who wish to be successful, have all been increased in price. If this increase of 5 per cent, which has already been announced, and which the different manufacturers in Canada have agreed upon, comes into effect on the first day of May—and every agent representing the different companies are soliciting orders asking that they be given by the farmers before the price is increased —it will be a greater hardship upon the farmers of Essex and Kent than upon the farmers of any other county, because they are in the corn belt.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: In regard to the information that the hon. member has given the House as to the price charged by the manufacturers being in excess of what it was last year, was not that price issued previous to the delivery of the Budget speech?

Mr. McCOIG: The 1914 list was issued in the month of January, and the 1915 list was also issued in the month of January. I am not stating this of myself; but the farmers are saying that the manufacturers were farsighted enough to see that the tariff was going to be increased, and they arranged the prices accordingly so that they might be ready for the game. That is what the Government will be accused of, if it does not take some action to see that a fair deal is given to the users of these machines. Shredders and corn huskers are manufactured exclusively in the United States. These shredders and huskers are used by farmers' associations throughout all sections of the southwestern part of Ontario. Five per cent on a $300 husker and shredder will be an addition of at least $15 on an article that is not manufactured in Canada, and that does not give employment to one labouring man in this country, although it is used so extensively by the farmers, and enables them to carry on their corn-raising business successfully. The large corn belt of the Dominion is in the counties of Kent and Essex. The farmers are not complaining because no duty was put upon corn, but they contend that the implements required to harvest and finish the crop should be allowed to come in without an increase of duty, especially as they are not manufactured in this country.

In my constituency there are hundreds of horses for which we cannot find a market to-day. When the British and French Governments sent their representatives here, the Canadian Government asked them to leave the Canadian market for them to purchase horses in. If that is the case, it has proved very unfair to the horse-raisers of this country, because they are to-day able to supply ten times the demand that there will be from the Canadian Government for horses for army purposes. We find also the Government prohibiting the exportation of horses into the United States. If the exportation of horses fit for army purposes had not been prohibited, we would have been able to send our horses across the border and would have found a market with the British and French buyers, if the maximum is, as I hear it is, $217. I am ready for correction, if that is not the maximum price. If it is, we could send our horses into the United States and pay the $10 tax and supply a large proportion of horses for the British and French Governments. I understand that the maximum price in Canada is $175.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: That is not the case in Manitoba.

Mr. McCOIG: When Sir Adam Beck was at Chatham, he was shown a team supposed to be worth $400, and he said he could not purchase it as the maximum price was $175.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: I have known of horses being sold as high as $200. The horses were bought for what they were worth and not according to any maximum price.

Mr. McCOIG: The hon. gentleman for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) says that the same statement was made in Oxford county. Sir Adam Beck would have no object in making a statement that was not absolutely true.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: It is not true in Manitoba.

Mr. McCOIG: I am telling you what is true in Ontario, which is largely devoted to horse-raising. So far as the services of Sir Adam Beck are concerned, he did the best he possibly could in selecting horses in the county of Kent. Some of the men whom he had given him by the Government did not give to the Department of Militia the satisfaction that they should have given in making the selection of horses. It was a great mistake on the part of the Government to have incompetent men buying horses for the Department of Militia. It was a great mistake that the hon. member for Kings, N. S., (Mr. de Witt Foster) was allowed to purchase horses for the Militia Department. The hon. gentleman has the patronage of his riding. He chooses his veterinary surgeon, and he goes into a province like Nova Scotia where he is well acquainted; and if the veterinary does not buy horses from the friends of the hon. gentleman, the chances are that he will be dismissed. By a return brought down the other day we were informed that the hon. member for Kings, N.S., purchased 428 horses, and, I think, 224 of them were purchased in his own riding. In other words, out of his own riding, he purchased more than half of the horses bought in the province of Nova Scotia. It has not been successfully contradicted, that a number of the horses purchased in Nova Scotia died on the train on their way to Valcartier. I have heard the statement made—and I do not think it has been contradicted—that at Halifax one of the horses was 30 years of age and died on the camp ground after it had been there for only a few days. If that is the case, it will do a great deal to damage the reputation of the horse industry of the Dominion of Canada, when members of Parliament are allowed to take their own veterinary surgeon, to go into a province and purchase horses. I understand that over 400 of the horses were rejected and were sold for a little over $50 apiece. What chance have the farmers to build up a horse industry in Canada so that they will be able to find a market in the other countries of the world, such as those mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens)? The Agricultural Department, in the pamphlets sent out encouraging horse-raising in Canada, offer this, that and the other thing to farmers who will raise horses. Not later than last Saturday a farmer said to me, "If you expect us to raise horses, we want you to explain one thing." I asked the farmer what that was. He said: "What contract does the Government give to a company in Montreal under which they lease thousands of acres of land at a very small rental?" I was not sure of the facts, but I have since got the contract, and here it is. It gives a lease of sixty-five thousand one hundred and twenty acres for a period of twenty-one years. The contract provides:

> And in consideration of the lease of said land to it, the Exchange has agreed to pay an annual rental of two cents an acre for the same; and has agreed that the Government of Canada shall have the right of pre-emption in respect to all horses raised by said Exchange on said land; and has agreed to hold and mature, until they have respectively attained the age of three years and six months, such of the horses as the Minister of Militia, in pursuance of said pre-emption right, may desire to purchase for military purposes, and which he may have selected before such horses have respectively attained the age of three years. The prices to be paid by the Militia Department for such horses are not to exceed two hundred and fifty dollars per animal on the range.

Now, if the National Live Stock Exchange is granted thousands of acres of lands belonging to the people of Canada at a rental of two cents an acre and are guaranteed by this Government the price of $250 for each of their horses, what chance has the farmer on the back concessions who is engaged in raising horses on land for which he pays $100 an acre, besides taxes, and taxes on top of that for fertilizer, implements and everything else? Is there any show for the farmer making anything along these lines when the maximum price paid him by the Government for a horse for military purposes is $175, and these people are getting $250 for a horse which probably is inferior to an Ontario-bred horse?

Mr. SAM. SHARPE: Does not the contract say that the price is not to exceed $250? It is not a guaranteed price.

Mr. McCOIG: The hon. gentleman is right.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Will the hon. gentleman say where the land is located?

Mr. McCOIG: I have not taken up the time of the House with reading the numbers of the different ranges and townships. If the hon. gentleman will move for it, no doubt he can get a copy of the contract.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The land is outside of civilization.

Mr. McCOIG: One would hardly suppose that it was in the city of Calgary. But it is presumably good pasture and well suited for the purpose of raising horses.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: What is the usual price for land for grazing purposes in the prairie provinces?

Mr. McCOIG: I have not such an abundance of information that I can answer the hon. gentleman. I have not been in Alberta. If the hon. gentleman, who is from the West, does not know the price, he can hardly expect an Ontario man to know.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: I think the hon. gentleman will find it very far from two cents an acre.

Mr. McCOIG: Now, if hon. gentlemen opposite have any intelligent questions to ask me I will try to answer them.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: It is to be hoped the hon. gentleman will answer others better than he has answered those already asked him.

Mr. McCOIG: We have heard from the hon. gentleman before. It seems to me it is hardly encouraging for the horse-breeders of this country that, at this particular season of the year, just when we should be considering the class and quality of horses we shall breed for another year, to have this competition brought in against this industry from which we in Ontario have tried to make some money and of which we have been proud. Now, let me go further.

Mr. WILCOX: Before the hon. gentleman leaves that point: Is it not true that under the agreement to which he has alluded the Minister of Militia is not bound to take the horses, but only has the right to take them if he needs them? The department is not bound to take the horses at $250 apiece?

Mr. McCOIG: That is just the objectionable point. If he does not need them, why rent this big piece of land at two cents an acre for the purpose of breeding horses? The hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Wilcox) claims to be a farmer and I understand he is to follow me in this debate. If he knows anything of horse raising he will surely see that the very thing he has stated is the reason why this agreement should not be entered into. The ministers should not set up this competition against the men who are trying to make a livelihood in the horse-breeding business.

A few days ago in the city of Chatham, we had a corn show. On that occasion we heard a good deal of that which has been discussed in this House, "Patriotism and Production." We hear a great deal of advice handed out to the farmers of this country from people whom we may call armchair farmers. That reminds me of a matter to which I had not intended to refer. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. Wright) spoke of gentlemen on this side who are not farmers giving advice on agricultural subjects. But where are the farmers in this House to be found? Certainly not on the Government benches—they are all lawyers and doctors. It does not come with the best grace from a supporter of this Government to seek to discredit the representative here of an agricultural constituency who happens to be a professional man. On the occasion of this corn show in Chatham, it was startling to hear the statement of the representative of the Veterinary branch, Dr. Torrance, make the statement that between 12,000 and 15,000 hogs had been slaughtered in the counties of Essex and Kent last year and that $72,000 had been expended in remunerating the farmers for their losses. And farmer after farmer stood up and called that gentleman's attention to the fact that in many of the States of the Union they are using preventatives such as serum, against hog-cholera. We in Ontario are proud, as well we may be, of our college men. I know that some of the brightest and ablest of our young men are going into the veterinary profession. But when these young men are called upon to take part in slaughtering the hogs of the farmers, would not you imagine that if they were called in consultation they would be able to give some advanced ideas on this subject of the prevention of hog-cholera? The regulations say that when a hog is affected the whole herd must be destroyed. On this occasion, leading farmers in the counties of Essex and Kent told the Veterinary General that they did not want the money from the Government; that they thought the hogs should be slaughtered only when it was absolutely necessary to destroy them. He replied that, in accordance with the statute, it has always been the practice to destroy the whole herd if one hog is affected with hog cholera. In the United States a large number of hogs are being saved by the use of serum, and if a similar practice were followed in Canada the treasury would retain large sums of money which it would otherwise lose. A gentleman from the county of Essex had on one part of his farm a herd of Yorkshires; a few of the hogs were affected with cholera and the veterinary had the herd slaughtered. The veterinary wanted to destroy another herd on another part of the farm, but to this the farmer made strenuous objection. He said: Quarantine the hogs if you will, but give me an opportunity of finding out whether or not I can save them; they are pure-bred animals, and have cost me a great deal of time and money. The hogs were not destroyed; the farmer treated them in his humble way, and every one of them lived.

I have obtained a pamphlet on hog cholera, Bulletin No. 379 of the United States Agricultural Department, which was written by Dr. Dorset, Chief of the Biochemic Division, Bureau of Animal Industry. I shall be glad to hand this pamphlet to any hon. gentleman who is interested, but I should like the House to hear the following extracts from Dr. Dorset's report. He says:

Practical tests of both methods.

As before stated, the serum has been tested by the Bureau of Animal Industry in an extended manner on farms under practical conditions, both the serum inoculations and simultaneous inoculation being employed at different times. In these practical experiments a number of hogs were generally left untreated, so that we might be sure that the herd actually had hog cholera and also to be able to determine better the action of the serum. In these tests approximately 2,000 hogs, located on forty-seven separate farms, were treated. Some of the herds treated were apparently perfectly well at the time, but were in a neighbourhood where hog cholera was prevalent. In other cases the disease was just beginning, as indicated by the sickness of one or two animals. In others the disease had progressed to a considerable extent, a number of the animals in the herd being sick at the time of treatment.

Since these results were obtained the department has brought this method of preventing hog cholera to the attention of the various State experiment stations and live-stock sanitary boards throughout the country and has proposed to them that they take up this work and prepare a serum for the benefit of hog-raisers, as the preparation of serum by the Federal Government on a large enough scale to supply the needs of the entire country seemed to be impracticable. As a result of this, a number of the States have taken up the work, and in practically all cases where a thorough test has been made they have confirmed the results obtained by the department with this method. We, therefore, feel safe in saying that this process will prevent hog cholera, provided due care is given to the preparation of the serum and to its application.

Dr. Dorset explains that in 1912, 29 per cent of 64,000 hogs treated had died. In 1913 only 7·7 per cent of 304,000 died, and in 1914 only 1·9 per cent of 6,000 died. If by the adoption of a serum treatment the Government can help the farmers to save their hogs, they will do away with large expenditures which have to be made at present and will also assist the farmers in their efforts to develop and promote this valuable industry.

Mr. WILCOX: What report is the hon. gentleman reading from ?

Mr. McCOIG: I announced that I was reading a bulletin prepared by Dr. Dorset, of the United States Agricultural Department. He reports that the supplying of serum throughout the United States would be too expensive, but that experiments were being made in the different states. I see no reason why the Canadian Department of Agriculture should not take action along similar lines, and, by the use of serum, save as many of the farmers' hogs as it is possible to save. This method would not only be economical, but it would also help the farmers to carry out the suggestion of increased production which is so often made at the present time. I am sorry that the Minister of Agriculture and the acting minister are not in their seats, but I think that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance are sufficiently interested in this matter to bring it strongly to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture. Hundreds of farmers will be willing to permit the veterinaries to make the experiments in order that their hogs may be saved.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What is the date and number of the bulletin from which my hon. friend is reading ?

Mr. McCOIG: The number of the bulletin is 379, issued November 27, 1909. If we want to encourage the farmers to stay in the hog business and develop the hog industry, it is absolutely necessary that we have some assurance from the Government that action will be taken along these lines; that the whole herd shall not be slaughtered if the majority of the hogs are not affected, and that the farmers shall have the benefit of the system which has been so successfully carried out in the United States.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Has the present Government not been carrying out experiments along those lines in the very district to which my hon. friend refers ?

Mr. McCOIG: So far as the county of Kent is concerned—I cannot say so much about Essex—I am in a position to say that the Government has not made any such experiments. The only experiment that has been made has been when a hog got sick to shoot him, to shoot the farmer's whole herd and put them in a hole with quick lime; and that puts the farmer out of the hog business for the next three months.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: I understand they have been carrying on experiments.

Mr. McCOIG: That is the experiment they make—see how many they can shoot with one shot. That is the only experiment.

I would suggest that the Government should take some of the bright young men in the veterinary profession, call them to Ottawa, get the benefit of their experience, get them to experiment along the lines being followed in the United States, and it may thus be possible to make a big saving and to encourage the breeding and raising of hogs in the corn belt of Ontario. When cross-bred hogs are killed, the maximum allowance is $15, but in the case of pure-bred breeding hogs the maximum is $50. In many cases, to successfully continue in the hog-raising business and get the proper results you cannot continue raising pure-bred hogs, you have to cross the breeds, as you, Mr. Speaker, having occupied a prominent position in the agricultural community you represent, very well know. For instance, if a man has the Tamworth and the Duroch, or the Chester White, or the Yorkshire, or the Poland China, or the Hampshire, each of which breeds is familiar to hon. gentlemen, if by crossing them he can get better results, why should he be compelled, in case of his hogs being killed, to accept only $15, when the man who sticks to the pure breeds gets $50? I remember one man, Mr. Smith, on the River road in Harwich, who had his breeding hogs on the rear end of his farm, but the pigs on the front end were supposed to be affected by the disease, and the Government officials went back and shot all the beautiful big breeding hogs and he received only $10 apiece for them. I ask the Government to consider the amendment of the Act so that some discretion will be left with the veterinary surgeons employed by the Government, and they will be able to pay the farmer, when it is necessary to slaughter breeding hogs, a fairer valuation.

Mr. WILCOX: With regard to the serum that is used for the treatment of hog cholera in the United States, the Government there does not pay for the hogs. Would my hon. friend approve of substituting the treating system for the paying system which the Government has established in this country? I have submitted the whole thing to the Veterinary Director General of Canada at the instance of Messrs. Hiram Walker and Sons, of Walkerville. The whole thing over-looked.

Mr. McCOIG: If the hon. gentleman is going to follow me in addressing the House it is useless for him to puncture his whole speech with interruptions for the purpose of giving the news to the farmers he represents that this is not the first time the attention of the Government was called to this question through the Veterinary Director General. As a matter of fact, that gentleman's attention was called to it at Chatham at a corn show and I am satisfied through some more urging of the question in this House and in other places the department will be induced to call upon the Government to have the Act so amended that it will comply with the requests of the hog producers of Essex, Kent and Canada in general. Representing, as I must say I have the honour and the privilege of doing, a large agricultural section of country and also a large manufacturing centre, I respectfully ask and will appeal to the Government to give these rambling remarks of mine every possible consideration. If they will do that I feel satisfied that to the cry of production and patriotism will be added progress and prosperity among the farmers and the labouring people of Canada.

Mr. A. De WITT FOSTER, (Kings, N.S.): Will the hon. member repeat the statement he made in my absence from the House a few moments ago with regard to the purchases of horses in Nova Scotia and the age of one horse in particular?

Mr. McCOIG: I read to the House the answers made by ministers of the Crown to questions asked by members. I also stated that it was generally reported that one horse that was purchased by the committee purchasing horses in Nova Scotia was bought in Halifax, was 30 years of age, and died in Valcartier camp a few days after it arrived there.

Mr. FOSTER: I wish, upon the responsibility of a member of this House, to give to that statement an unqualified denial, and to assure the hon. gentleman, that there is absolutely no truth in that statement or in other kindred statements which may be circulated either in Halifax or in any other part of the country. The veterinary surgeons who examined the horses were both graduates of the Ontario Veterinary College, two of the brightest and possibly the best qualified veterinarians who could be found in this country. There is absolutely no truth in that statement, as I myself was at Valcartier camp after the horses arrived there and had been distributed to the various units at the camp at Quebec.

Mr. McCOIG: Since the hon. gentleman has been kind enough to inform us of that, would he also inform us why, if two of the gentlemen purchasing horses were graduates of the Ontario Veterinary College, he thought it necessary to accompany them through the riding.

Mr. FOSTER: That is a question of policy which will probably appeal to the hon. gentleman when I tell him that when horses were purchased in Kings County during the South African war, it is generally believed that the same horse was sold four times over.

Mr. McKENZIE: How old was he?

Mr. FOSTER: He may have been as old as my hon. friend from North Cape Breton.

Mr. McKENZIE: Did they feed him on potatoes?

Mr. FOSTER: On potatoes and buckwheat both. Perhaps my hon. friend can appreciate that diet. As a matter of fact, it is generally believed that not only were horses in the province of Nova Scotia sold two or three times over, but that any and all kinds of horses were purchased and turned over to the Government, for imperial purposes I presume, and that various gentlemen in the County of Kings made large sums of money in connection with the purchase of those horses.

Mr. McKENZIE: And that was to be followed up on this occasion?

Mr. FOSTER: On this occasion the member for Kings (Mr. Foster) assisted only to the extent of signing the orders upon the Bank of Montreal, and seeing, so far as he could, that the purchases were carried through without any graft. I may say to the hon. gentleman who seems inclined to laugh that all horses purchased from Nova Scotia were considered by the veterinaries fit to be distributed to the different units, and were so distributed.

Mr. McCOIG: How does my hon. friend account for the fact that half the horses purchased from the whole province of Ontario were purchased in Kings County? Have they a better quality of horses there? Are the horses in the rest of the province inferior?

Mr. FOSTER: The quality of the horses in Kings County is excellent, and there are more of them.

Mr. O. J. WILCOX (North Essex): Mr. Speaker, as it is nearly six o'clock, I shall not launch upon the address I intended to deliver this afternoon; but it seems fitting that I should refer to one or two of the observations which have been made this afternoon by my hon. friend from West Kent (Mr. McCoig). Personally I hold that gentleman in the highest esteem and regard. I think he can claim that I am a friend of his, and he is a friend of mine. But since I have been in this House I have often observed my hon. friend getting in his work politically. I had a note here to congratulate my hon. friend because, when I jotted it down, it seemed to me that he was delivering an address very different from the tale of woe that has been given by his confreres in this debate. But he soon fell from grace. He landed on fertilizers first, like my friend with the squid, the hon. member for St. John. This big farmer of the Opposition stood up yesterday afternoon and proclaimed and enunciated the value, mind you, to the horny-handed sons of toil of a dose of squids applied to fruit trees, and when this farmer who understands all about agriculture was corrected by a young member of this House who had the temerity to tell him what a squid was, the hon. member for St. John walked out of the House and expunged the passage from Hansard.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: What is a squid?

Mr. WILCOX: A squid is an animal that has eight more legs than my hon. friend. It is used as bait for fish, or may be an imitation of lead that is used as a bait for fish. And this farmer of the Opposition was going to spray his trees and fungi and insect pests with squid, and the farmers of Canada would then be on the high road to prosperity.

That is a fair sample of the arguments that have been submitted by my hon. friend. My hon. friend from West Kent—look at his smiling now,—I must not praise him too much or he might pick the passage out of Hansard and show it to his electors if he thought it would do him any good politically. My hon. friend from St. John spoke yesterday of the enormous load that the Government is placing upon the farmers of this country by adding 7½ per cent to the tax on fertilizers and the materials which enter into that product. When my hon. friend had finished speaking I made my way to the Library. I was seeking information. I would not trust myself because I wanted to have absolutely accurate information. So I consulted one of the clerks in the Library, and he went through the Trade and Navigation returns and showed me that the total amount that will be raised by this increased tax upon the imports of all the materials which enter into the manufacture of fertilizers and upon the manufactured product itself, will be only $46,254. This does not constitute such a burden upon the farmers. Let me remind my hon. friends opposite that the farmers realize the issues that are now before the country.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Is fertilizer produced in Canada at all?

Mr. WILCOX: I think it is. I am not assuming that this is the total amount of fertilizer that is used, but I am speaking of the burden which it has been alleged will be placed upon the horny-handed sons of toil by reason of this increased duty. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden, the House adjourned at six o'clock.

Thursday, March 4, 1915.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill No. 69, to incorporate the Colonial Bank (Canada).—Sir James Aikins.

Bill No. 70, to incorporate the General Trust Company of Canada.—Mr. Douglas.

QUESTIONS.

[Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.]

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY.

Mr. GRAHAM:

1. How much money was expended by the Railway Department on the Hudson Bay project during the year ending December 31, 1914?
2. How much was expended on the railway proper?
3. How much on the terminals and harbour?
4. What amount was expended by the Marine Department on the project during the same period?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. $4,188,879.17.

2. $2,344,891.57.

3. Port Nelson terminals and harbour, $1,843,987.60.

4. Department of Marine, $45,676.77; Department of Naval Service: the sum of $40,164.98 was expended in surveying the Hudson bay and strait from April 1 to December 31, 1914.

WAR SUPPLIES—HORSES.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. How many horses have been purchased for cavalry and artillery purposes up to the present in British Columbia?
2. At what places were they bought, and how many at each place?
3. What was the average price?

Major General HUGHES:

1. Cavalry, 509; gunners, 280; total, 789.

2. Vancouver, 67; Ladners, 23; Westminster, 21; Victoria, 44; Sydney, 5; Duncan, 13; Nanaimo, 2; Courtenay, 5; Milner, 3; Abbottsford, 3; Chilliwack, 44; Forthaney, 3; Mission, 5; Clinton, 14; 115 Mile House, 6; 150 Mile House, 6; Dog Creek, 16; Gangranch, 95; Ashcroft, 18; Agassiz, 2; Nicola, 37; Kamloops, 149; Chase, 6; Salmon Arm, 6; Enderby, 7; Vernon,25; Kelowna, 22; Peachland, 1; Penticton, 16; Princeton, 3; Keremeos, 16; Grand Prairie, 24; Golden, 1; Athalamar, 12; Guichon, 32; Merritt, 30; Armstrong, 7; total 789.

3. $131.33.

RIGAUD ARMOURY.

Mr. BOYER:

1. What different sums of money have been expended since the year 1906, to this date, by the Department of Public Works and the Department of Militia, for the purchase, repairs, etc., in connection with the armoury building at Rigaud?
2. Is it true that the Government intends to sell the said armoury building?
3. What persons, societies, companies, corporations or any one else have offered to purchase said building, and what is the purchase price offered in each case?
4. Is it true that certain approved negotiations are being proceeded between the Government and one Archibald Macdonald, for the sale of the said building?

Mr. CODERRE:

Department of Public Works:

1. 1906—Purchase price	$3,000 00
1908-09	1,524 20
1909-10	631 32
1910-11	1,360 53
		$6,516 05

2. Yes.

3. (a) The Rigaud Granite Company; (b) $4,000.

4. Negotiations are completed with the Rigaud Granite Company, and the property has been transferred.

Department of Militia and Defence:

1. 1907—Repairs, $51.30; saddle racks, $53.90; cupboards, $40; acetylene gas apparatus, $50.

1909—Repairs, $1,186; incidentals, $18.

1910—Incidentals, $35; sheeting of walls and casing of windows, $550; heating system, $$400.

1911—Incidental repairs, $71.

1912—Contract for renewal of wharf on drill hall property, $2,245.

1913—Repair masonry work, $35.

1914—Painting roof, $250; repairs to wharf, $100; total, $4,985.20.

2. The control of this building was relinquished by the Department of Militia and Defence in favour of the Department of Public Works on December 8, 1914.

3 and 4. No information.

TRENT VALLEY CANAL COMMISSION.

Mr. KYTE:

1. Referring to the report of the Royal Commission to investigate matters in connection with the Trent Valley canal, dated 19th February, 1914, in which at page 5 the following paragraph appears as a part of said report:

"This report sets forth comparatively few of the irregularities and fraudulent practices in vogue in the office under Superintendent McClellan's supervision. He has not only practised deception and dishonesty himself but has condoned it, and winked at it in others, and he has proven himself hopelessly incompetent for the position he holds."

2. Is J. H. McClellan, the person referred to in the said report, now in the employ of the Government? If so, in what department?

3. When did the said J. H. McClellan enter the said employment?

4. What duties does he perform?

5. What salary does he receive?

6. Upon whose recommendation was the said J. H. McClellan so appointed?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am informed that Mr. J. H. McClellan is not in the employ of any department of the Government.

WAR SUPPLIES—SADDLES.

*Mr. MURPHY:

1. From how many firms or private individuals has the Government or any department of the Government, ordered saddles since the 1st of July,1914?

2. What are the names of these firms?

3. How many saddles have been ordered from each firm?

4. How many saddles has each firm delivered up to date?

5. How many saddles has each firm yet to deliver?

6. What is the price each firm is receiving for these saddles?

Major General HUGHES: Answer to this question is being laid on the table.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oral answer.

Major General HUGHES: Stand as an order for a return.

Mr. OLIVER: In the absence of the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy), I suggest that there is no good reason why this question should stand as an order for a return.

Major General HUGHES: I am not going to discuss the matter; the paper is on the table and the hon. gentleman will have access to it.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman is prepared to lay the information on the table, I think that as this question is marked with an asterisk, an oral answer should be given.

[Mr. Coderre.]

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I think the rule ought to be adhered to. This question ought to be answered orally.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Objection has been made in the past by the Speaker himself and by hon. gentlemen now in Opposition to giving lengthy answers to questions that ought to be made orders for returns. It has been pointed out that pages of Hansard have been taken up with matters that are not of particular or general interest. We have endeavoured, in giving answers to questions, to follow the rule which the Speaker himself has laid down in the past in that respect.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Let it stand, then.

Question stands.

BELGIAN IMMIGRATION.

*Mr. VERVILLE:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to carry out the announced project of importing gunsmiths from Belgium to assist in the making of rifles at the Ross rifle factory, Quebec? If so, how many?

2. Would the Government be disposed to subsidize a movement in favour of a limited number of Belgian farm hands to cultivate sufficient land for the production of what is necessary for the sustenance of the imported gunsmiths and others? If so, to what extent?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN:

1. The Government has made no announcement on this subject, and it has not been under consideration.

2. The subject has not yet been under consideration. The Government is informed that the Belgian Government is strongly opposed to any movement looking to the emigration of Belgians. Inquiry has been made on the subject through the Canadian immigration authorities in London.

SEED WHEAT.

Mr. W. M. MARTIN:

1. How many bushels of wheat have been purchased by the Government to date for the purpose of supplying seed to the Western provinces?

2. What was the average price paid per bushel for such seed grain in each of the months of October, November and December, 1914, and January and February, 1915?

Mr. ROCHE:

1. Purchased and contracted for 2,741,840 bushels of wheat.

2. Average price paid: October, 1914, $1.10; November, 1914, $1.13; December, 1914, $1.14; January, 1915, $1.49; February, 1915, $1.53 per bushel.

GUYSBOROUGH-CANSO MAIL SERVICE

Mr. SINCLAIR:

On what date was the renewal contract for carrying the mails between Guysborough and Canso awarded to Wm. McDougall?

Mr. CASGRAIN: On the 17th November, 1914.

IMPORTATION OF BITUMINOUS COAL.

Mr. GRAHAM:

1. What quantity of bituminous coal was imported into Canada during the year ending March 31, 1914?
2. What was the duty collected thereon?
3. What portion of this coal was imported by the railway companies?

Mr. J. D. REID:

1. 13,754,244 tons.
2. $6,144,582.56.
3. No information is available from customs records as compiled.

PASPEBIAC CUSTOMS OFFICE.

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Where is the customs office situated at Paspebiac, Quebec?
2. Have the premises been leased or purchased, and if leased, for how long, from whom, and at what price per annum?
3. If there has been any change within the last three years in the location of the customs office, what was the reason of the change and who recommended it?

Mr. J. D. REID:

1. The customs records show that the Customs office is situated on the main road at Paspebiac at the "Old stand."
2. Premises are rented from Robin, Jones & Whitman, Ltd., at $100 per year, including heat and light.
3. Change was made September 1st, 1913, by the Minister of Customs in the public interest.

PASPEBIAC WHARF.

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Has the Government acquired the wharf at Paspebiac, Quebec, owned by Robin, Coley & Co., or Robin, Whitman & Jones?
2. If so, what price was paid and who recommended the purchase?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.

CANSO REDUCTION WORKS.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. How many tons of fertilizer were produced at the Canso reduction works last season?
2. Has it been sold?
3. If not, is it available now for farmers, and at what price?
4. Up to what date will applications be received, and by whom?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. 91 tons.
2. Yes.

3 and 4. Answered by No. 2.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

Mr. Buchanan: For a return showing:

1. From whom food for men and horses, and all other supplies and equipment for the field battery now being trained at Lethbridge, have been bought?
2. If by tender, what date tenders were called for.
3. When tenders were opened and contracts awarded.
4. The names and post office addresses of all parties who submitted tenders.
5. Names of the successful tenderers, and the price in each case.

Mr. Law: For a return showing the names and addresses of all persons in Annapolis and Digby counties, Nova Scotia, to whom the bounty under the Fenian Raid Volunteer Bounty Act has been paid; the names and addresses of all persons from said counties whose applications have been rejected; and the names and addresses of all applicants from said counties whose applications have not been disposed of.

Mr. Macdonald: For a copy of all letters, telegrams, accounts, orders and all other documents relating to the purchase of horses for the Militia Department in the county of Pictou during the years 1914 and 1915 to date.

Mr. Marcil: For a copy of all documents bearing on the removal of the salmon retaining pond from Flat Lands to New Mills, N.B., and of all reports on the operations thereof, with a detailed statement of outlay and cost of removal, installation and operation.

Mr. Cruise: For a return showing the names of all parties drawing pensions at present from the Government.

2. The amount drawn annually by each.
3. What offices each held prior to superannuation.
4. What salary each was drawing prior to leaving service.
5. The length of their service.

Mr. Buchanan: For a return showing:

1. The total amount of relief orders issued to date in the Medicine Hat district under the control of H. H. Brown, relief commissioner.
2. The total expense to date in every way connected with these Medicine Hat orders.
3. Who vouched for the expenditures in question, and if more than one person, the names of the various persons, and for how much each did vouch.
4. The total travelling expenses, by whom they were ordered, by whom they were incurred, to whom and in what amounts they were paid, when they were incurred, and when paid.
5. What different means of travel were employed, how much was paid for each, and who were the persons so travelling in connection with relief work.
6. What sum has been charged to the relief work in the form of office rent at Medicine Hat.
7. Who recommended the appointment of H. H. Brown, and upon whose recommendation the other officials in connection with relief work in Medicine Hat district were appointed.
8. Upon what merchants in the Medicine Hat district, under H. H. Brown's control, were relief orders issued, the total amount of goods supplied by each merchant to date, and how much money has been paid to each merchant to date.

Mr. Marcil: For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Government of Canada and of Quebec, or any minister or official thereof, in regard to the control of fisheries in Quebec province, as well as of all documents bearing on that question, together with a list of licenses granted by the Government of Canada for the present year.

Mr. W. Chisholm: For a return showing the names and addresses of all persons in the county of Brant, Ontario, to whom the bounty under the Fenian Raid Volunteer Bounty Act and amendment, has been paid; the names and addresses of all persons from said county whose applications have been rejected, and the names and addresses of all applicants from said county whose applications have not yet been disposed of.

THE CIVIL SERVICE—MR. ADAM SHORTT.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, by your leave I would call the attention of the House to a matter which in my judgment concerns and deeply affects the privileges of this House. I refer to an incident which took place some few days ago when the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) was addressing the House during the Budget debate. My hon. friend from St. John referred to a statement which had been made by Professor Shortt as to the number of dismissals and appointments under the present Administration, to which statement very strong exception was at once taken by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers). Perhaps in order that the House may be seized of the tenor of the incident, I had better read what took place. The hon. member from St. John said:

I have not that familiarity with the Civil Service that Professor Shortt, chairman of the Civil Service Commission, necessarily has. He is a gentleman who is in the employ of the Government; he occupies, I presume, a quasi independent position as chairman of that commission; he has made the statement, made it publicly, made it with deliberation that under this Government the appointments to the Civil Service in the lower grades are entirely a matter of patronage and he says that, whereas there have been something like 2,000 dismissals from the Civil Service, there have been some 10,000 appointments, making a difference of some 8,000.

The hon. member for St. John was interrupted by the Minister of Public Works in these words:

I would like to say that this is a statement that has been repeated so often in this House that hon. gentlemen opposite will possibly be beginning to believe it. No more dishonourable, no more dishonest, no more unfair—

[Mr. Buchanan.]

Then there was some confusion and interruption and the hon. minister proceeded:

I have repeated it twice, but I shall be glad to stay here and go on repeating it if it will be any benefit to my hon. friend. I was referring not to my hon. friend but to Professor Shortt and in that connection I want to say here and now that no more dishonourable, no more dishonest, no more unfair statement was ever made by any man than that made by Professor Shortt, chairman of the Civil Service Commission. It is an absolutely untrue statement.

These, Mr. Speaker, are very strong words, as I am sure that my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works will be the first to admit. To charge a man in the position of Professor Shortt with being guilty of dishonourable and dishonest conduct is as grave a charge as can be made against any man. Professor Shortt occupies not only an official position in Canada, but I may say that he also occupies a very high position otherwise. He is chairman of the Civil Service Commission, and in that respect is amenable and responsible not to the Government but to the two Houses of Parliament. He is appointed under section 9 of the Civil Service Act of 1908, which enacts:

There shall be a commission, to be called the Civil Service Commission, consisting of two members appointed by the Governor in Council.

2. The rank, standing and salary of each commissioner shall be those of a deputy head of a department; and each commissioner shall hold office during good behaviour, but shall be removable by the Governor General on address of the Senate and House of Commons.

These words in the statute are the basis upon which I claim that the House has jurisdiction and ought to take cognizance of such a charge as is now upon the head of Professor Shortt. If an officer of this Parliament or of this country, a public servant in the capacity and of the character of Professor Shortt should be attacked by a Minister of the Crown as having made a dishonest and untrue and dishonourable statement, everybody will agree that the usefulness of the chairman of the Civil Service Commission would be very much impaired, to say the least. Professor Shortt's attention was called to the words of the minister, and in an interview which he gave the following day, the 26th of February, in the Free Press, he expressed himself as follows:

"I have only this to say," replied Dr. Shortt, "The official return is there to speak for itself. It is dated March of last year. I was simply quoting from the return, and I have nothing to do with whatever interpretation Mr. Rogers or Dr. Pugsley may place on that return. I had no information other than was contained in the return—for instance, I had no information about resignations.

"I made the statement that there had been two thousand odd dismissed and ten thousand odd appointed, not including the Post Office Department, merely incidental to a discussion of the outside service. Only two dismissals were reported in the inside service. I pointed out that this was not a matter of party politics so far as I was concerned. My remarks as reported were correct in substance. I repeat, they were founded solely on the information contained in the return and nothing else."

It does not seem clear to me—and I would be glad to have the explanation of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works upon this point, as to what was the particular statement made by Professor Shortt in this connection to which the minister takes exception. Dr. Shortt made two statements, viz., that there had been 2,000 dismissals and 10,000 appointments. I do not know and I would be glad to know from the Minister of Public Works whether he impugned the statement as to the 2,000 dismissals or as to the 10,000 appointments, or both. If I may be permitted to speak frankly to my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, I would say that there has been something almost like quibbling over these dismissals; for later on in the debate the Minister of Public Works, addressing himself to the hon. member for St. John, spoke as follows:

He has surely not read the return himself or he would not venture to make that statement. The return shows nothing of the kind. Take the return of my own department for instance; in it 507 dismissals are credited and there are 700 odd resignations which Professor Shortt never takes into account.

I say with all candour to my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works that I should be glad to be enlightened as to these resignations. Five hundred dismissals is a pretty good number, and seven hundred resignations seems to be a more goodly number. Resignation is a virtue we know, but there is such a thing as being virtuous under compulsion. I have not found in the course of my experience that the spirit of resignation in our time is so prevalent as to lead to seven hundred resignations in one department. The point, however is not whether these resignations were voluntary or not. I shall be very glad to take the word of my hon. friend upon that. But the point of the charge made by the hon. member for St. John was that there have been two thousand vacancies—whether those vacancies were caused by resignation or by dismissals—and ten thousand appointments.

Mr. SPEAKER: It seems to me that inconvenience may arise from the manner in which this matter is being brought before the House. I did not understand the right hon. gentleman to say that he was bringing it before the House strictly as a question of privilege. I take it that a discussion such as is now taking place should be based on a motion of some kind. It could hardly be brought before the House properly as a question of privilege.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I brought the matter up solely as a question of privilege.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am quite willing to hear the right hon. gentleman, but I submit that this is not a question of privilege. It does not come within that category.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If Professor Shortt was a member of the Civil Service he would be strictly amenable to the jurisdiction of the Government alone; and the House would have no control over him. But Professor Shortt is not an officer of the Government. The Government cannot remove him; they cannot control him; they cannot give him any orders. The only body which has any authority over Professor Shortt is the Parliament of Canada, the House of Commons and the Senate. If this be correct, then in my judgment this discussion comes within the privileges of this House.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not desire to prevent my right hon. friend from having the fullest opportunity of discussing this question. I do not understand, however, that he can go into some of the matters which he introduced into the later part of his remarks as a question of privilege, namely, the discussion of how many dismissals and resignations there have been. But I am perfectly willing now to move the House into Committee of Supply in order to give my right hon. friend and other hon. gentlemen the fullest opportunity of discussing this matter.

On the motion of Sir Robert Borden for Committee of Supply:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I was going to say that on this occasion I did not intend to discuss the number of dismissals or resignations. I am not in a position to do so, for I have never seen the return. I asked the Clerk of the House for the report, and I only got a partial one. I have never seen the complete report. The point to which I wish to call the attention of the House is this: A public officer of this country, occupying under the law of the land a most important position and daily fulfilling the functions of that office, has been charged with conduct which has been characterized as dishonourable and dishonest. My point is this: Should an officer of this kind remain under the imputation that has been made against him without being given an opportunity to repel the charge? That is the only reason I have brought the matter before the House. My point is that the language of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works was so strong against that public officer, that he owes it to himself either to be more precise or to give Professor Shortt an opportunity to defend himself. That is the only thing I wish for. Professor Shortt has been impugned in violent language by the Minister of Public Works, and it is not fair that an officer of his importance should remain under that imputation. Professor Shortt staked his reputation on the statement he made. That statement may be true or not, but I say that Professor Shortt should be given an opportunity to vindicate his own words. After the Minister of Public Works has made such a violent charge against Professor Shortt as to say that he was dishonest and dishonourable, I say it is only fair that Professor Shortt should be given an opportunity to defend himself, and that this matter should be investigated. That is the only reason for my action to-day. As to the question of dismissals, we can deal with that later. I appeal to the spirit of fairness of the Prime Minister, and of the whole House, that an opportunity be given to have this matter investigated, and the responsibility placed where it belongs. If Professor Shortt has made a dishonest and dishonourable statement he is liable to the heaviest censure of this House; and if the language of the Minister of Public Works was not called for, then some justice must be done to the man who was attacked.

Hon. ROBERT ROGERS (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, let me say at once that I hope I would be the last man in this House who would venture to make any statement, implied or otherwise, upon any occasion, at any time, or under any circumstances, that I did not honestly and fairly feel I was justified in making. My right hon. friend suggests that the remarks I made upon the occasion to which he has referred affect the privileges of this House. I made the statement which I did, conscious of the knowledge of the circumstances ces, believing that I was right, and believing that I was justified in making that statement. I would not desire to be guilty of making a statement against Professor Shortt or against the most humble citizen of this Dominion of Canada that I did not believe I was justified in making. If my right hon. friend is willing to accept the statement of Professor Shortt, and to accept blame and condemnation at the hands of that gentleman, similar to the charge which Professor Shortt presumed to make against hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, why then let him take that responsibility. If my right hon. friend is willing to accept that position, and stand up here before Parliament and the country and commend Professor Shortt for such a statement, then my right hon. friend must settle it with his own friends on that side of the House, because when Professor Shortt made the statement which had been quoted by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), and to which I took exception the other night, he immediately went on to say:

> What he had said hits one party no more than the other.

If hon. gentlemen are willing to accept such a statement as that from Professor Shortt, and to take the responsibility for it, all I can say is that we on this side of the House do not propose to accept any such statement from Professor Shortt. My right hon. friend has quoted the statement made by Professor Shortt, following the reference to him in the House on Thursday evening last, and he has quoted correctly, I believe, from the Free Press what Professor Shortt had to say. Let me read these words because I think they are of importance:

> "I have only this to say," replied Dr. Shortt.
> "The official return is there to speak for itself." It is dated March of last year. I was simply quoting from the return, and I have nothing to do with whatever interpretation Mr. Rogers or Dr. Pugsley may place on that return. I had no information other than was contained in the return—for instance, I had no information about resignations.

My right hon. friend was careful to say that he had not studied the returns. These returns were laid upon the table of the House from every department of the Government and it is evident from Professor Shortt's statement that he had such returns. They were simple answers to very simple questions. The questions were:

> 1. How many employees if the Federal Government of Canada, including all services and all departments, have been dismissed from October 10, 1911 to the present date.
> 2. How many have resigned?

3. How many have deserted the service?
4. How many deserters have been punished?
5. How many new employees have been engaged or appointed by the present Government during the same period?

The answers are as follows from my particular department, and I am dealing only with the Department of Public Works for the moment:

1. Dismissals 511.
2. Resignations, 725.
3. None.
4. None.
5. 1877.

Professor Shortt acknowledged that he only had the return before him. If he had that return before him he had from the Department of Public Works a return showing that 725 resignations had taken place, and I am sure that my right hon. friend, during the fifteen years that he was in office never had a resignation that he did not have to fill the vacancy. No one knew or understood this better than did Professor Shortt. No one had a better knowledge of the facts and if you take all the resignations in the various departments, which were under the hand of Professor Shortt when he studied that report, you will find that there are very nearly 4,000 resignations to be taken from that 10,000 referred to by Professor Shortt. Was I not, therefore, justified in characterising the mischievous statement of Professor Shortt in the language I did in view of the fact that we have from day to day, not alone in this House, but outside of it, statements being made based upon the authority of the statement made by Professor Shortt with respect to a return that he misquoted unfairly. Not only that, but in view of his statement made the following day in the Free Press, I will go a step further and say that Professor Shortt's statement was not only dishonourable and dishonest but, according to his own statement, it is untrue, because he said there was nothing in the report in respect to resignations.

These are the circumstances which led to the language of which my right hon. friend complained and while it may have been strong I felt that it was justified. I felt that it was justified by reason of the fact that hon. gentlemen upon the other side of the House were referring to it and taking advantage of Professor Shortt's statement to have it circulated throughout the length and breadth of the country, that the Government had dismissed 2,000 officials and had replaced them with 10,000. Surely my right hon. friend, in view of the circumstances, will admit that this was a very unfair statement on the part of Professor Shortt because he admits himself in his interview that he had under his hand a copy of the return. That being so I say it was very unfair for him to make that statement and to place before this country a statement that is not borne out by the facts. I think it was the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) who first used these figures in the House. He was followed by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) and it was only when the statements were repeated by an hon. member with a knowledge of the conditions such as my hon. friend from St. John always has, that I thought it was time that we should correct the misstatements that were being circulated throughout the length and breadth of the country as coming from Professor Shortt. Not only did we have this statement made in this House, but we were having this statement of Professor Shortt's circulated in all parts of the Dominion. My hon. friend the member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), a few days previously, called to task hon. members on this side of the House for being guilty of keeping open the information bureau of the Conservative party in the city of Ottawa. He used rather strong language upon that occasion and was rather severe in his condemnation. Perhaps he will pardon me if I quote a few of the words that he was good enough to use:

> From the moment that war broke out the bureau was closed.

Referring to the Liberal bureau.

> So far as I am concerned, I have never seen a document emanate from it since that time, of a petty nature or of any other nature. Where is the laugh of my hon. friends now? Can they produce a leaflet or a document? Not a single one. And I should be wanting in common manliness if I did not assert it.

My hon. friend from Red Deer, as we all well know, lives only in the shade of Cobden and of Bright and he is evidently not aware that a very large portion of the Liberal party in the Dominion of Canada are getting their monthly leaflets to-day just the same as they were before the war started. It is to this particular little Liberal monthly I wish to draw the attention of the House to now. It was issued only a few days ago, on February 15, and I have a bundle of these leaflets here for the benefit of my hon. friend from Red Deer. This little bulletin for February undertakes to quote the same figures as did Professor Shortt. The article reads as follows:

Return tabled in the House of Commons February 12, giving statement as to dismissals and appointments in the Civil Service since the Government came into power in 1911 makes almost incredible reading, and throws into vivid light the extent to which the party axe has been wielded and how the influence of patronage has been invoked under the Conservative Administration. The return is admittedly not complete and was made up from the different departments on varying dates since the spring of 1911. Yet it shows a record of no less than 2,000 dismissals and 10,576 new appointments.

Such statements, emanating from the Liberal bureau and bearing upon the statement of Professor Shortt in respect to the matter under discussion, are being circulated broadcast. It is true that Professor Shortt went a little farther in that famous speech of his, in which he made that statement, and he went on to tell of an individual who had spoken to him about how rotten the patronage system was in the Dominion of Canada. Since I came here hundreds of people have spoken to me of how rotten the patronage system is in the city of Ottawa, but almost invariably those people have pointed to Professor Shortt as a living example of the abuse of the administration of patronage.

As regards my department, I have nothing to hide in respect to the return. In the outside service we have to account for 1,877 appointments, and as there were 511 dismissals and 722 resignations we, therefore, have to account for having made 669 new appointments during the three years covered by this return.

Mr. CARROLL: What about the 25 inside service appointments in the Department of Public Works?

Mr. ROGERS: I will come to the inside service later on. I am giving the outside service first, so that the matter will be understood by hon. members in all its details.

In the Chief Architect's branch, according to the return, we have to account for an increase of 244. In that branch of the Department we have had under the progressive administration of the present Government erected during the three years that we have been in office something over seventy new public buildings in various parts of the Dominion. Some of these require one or more caretakers, and others as many as six where there are elevators and furnaces to look after. Therefore the increase of 244 in the Chief Architect's branch is accounted for by the increase in the number of public buildings erected in the various parts of the Dominion.

On the staff of the Superintendent of Dominion Buildings we have an increase to account for of 99. This increase is rendered necessary on account of the engineers, firemen, watchmen and elevator men required for the buildings rented and occupied as Government offices, the new Mines Building, and the addition to the West Block. There is also the general staff of labourers and artisans required in connection with the general maintenance of buildings.

In the chief engineer's branch we have to account for an increase of 100, and this is accounted for by the addition of assistant engineers to the staffs of the 36 district engineers throughout the Dominion, rendered necessary by the increased number of harbour works during the past three years.

4 p.m.

The expenditure of the chief engineer's branch in 1911 was about $3,200,000, and in 1914, $7,700,000. That shows the necessity for the increased staff for carrying out the additional work.

The increase of 157 in the assistant chief engineer's branch, which has to do with the dredging operations of the department, is accounted for by the manning of new departmental plant, by the large British Columbia dredges having been put on double shift, and the natural increases in the crews of the various dredges and tugs throughout the Dominion to cope with the increased dredging operations. On account of the British Columbia dredges working a double shift, we have been obliged to add 100 employees. That accounts for 100 out of the total increase of 157. The department has now seven more tugs than it had in 1911. The expenditure for 1911 was $5,030,000, and in 1914, $6,200,000.

The increase of 69 in the telegraph staff is accounted for by the increased mileage of telegraph lines and the number of new offices opened since October 10, 1911. In 1911, the mileage was 8,639¾, and in 1914, 10,312, or an increase of 1,672¼. The number of offices in 1911 was 624, and in 1914, 671, or an increase of 47. The provision of operators for these offices and the line repairers for the additional mileage accounts for the increase in staff. The same answer applies exactly in the case of the inside service.

As regards the inside service in the chief architect's branch, I would like to call the attention of the House to the fact that in 1911 the expenditure for public buildings was $4,150,000, and in 1914, $12,400,000. That shows the necessity for appointing an additional number of architects and draughtmen and the same thing applies to the other branches of the department over which it is my privilege to preside.

Mr. PUGSLEY: To what date is the return brought down?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not yet been able to see the return, for the simple reason that I have several times asked the Clerk of the House for it, but I have always been informed that it is in the hands of Liberal members who have been giving it very close consideration. I hold in my hand a return of my own department.

Mr. PUGSLEY: To what date is that return brought down?

Mr. ROGERS: It does not give the date. Professor Shortt gives the date as March, 1914. I do not know whether he is correct or not; I would not like to say that he is.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the returns of all the departments be given to us before we proceed with the discussion of this motion?

Some Hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend will see how very inconvenient it would be to have a proper discussion of the question without the return, and without knowing the dates to which they were brought down.

Mr. ROGERS: I have not given any consideration to that. I do not know anything about the return, not having been able to see it myself. I am only dealing with the facts as I find them. I complain of the circulation of a mis-statement which is being used for political purposes against the Government of the day, a mis-statement which neither Professor Shortt nor any other man is justified in making as against the present Administration. If we have had increases in the service, they have been due to the development of our country, and we have had only such increases as were necessary for the public service. I wish to express my surprise, and regret, that my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) should allow his little paper from the Liberal Bureau to circulate a statement of this sort and send it broadcast throughout the country. I would like, on behalf of my good friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark), to express my surprise that he has not been kept better informed as to what is going on at the Liberal headquarters. I hold in my hand a letter from a Mr. Godard, dated 26th February, attached to a circular in which he is making an appeal, and he uses this language:

Can you afford to be without this publication? The Canadian Liberal Monthly is published each month at the Central Liberal Information Office at Ottawa. It is prepared under the personal supervision and direction of the Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should be very sorry indeed, let me say again, to use one syllable that could be regarded as harsh or unfair as against any individual in discussing any public question. At the same time, as a member of this Government, I do not propose to stand for mis-statements from Professor Shortt or anybody else. The documents and returns are placed freely on the table of this House for the benefit of hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not think these hon. gentlemen have anything to complain of in that regard and so far as I am concerned, they are at all times welcome to all the information it is possible to give them. At the same time, I hope that in future there will be no misrepresentations either by Professor Shortt or by anybody else with respect to returns that we lay upon the table of this House.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I desire to ask the Minister of Public Works if his position is that Professor Shortt is incorrect in stating that the increase in the appointments numbered 8,000? What Professor Shortt said was that ten thousand had been appointed and two thousand dismissed, giving an increase in the service of eight thousand. Does the minister controvert that statement that there was an increase of eight thousand in the service?

Mr. ROGERS: That is where my hon. friend goes wrong. I had hoped that I had made myself so clear that even my hon. friend would understand me. I said there were two thousand dismissals and four thousand resignations, a total of six thousand, and therefore the Government have to account to Parliament and to the people for an increase in the service of something like four thousand according to these figures. I have accounted for an increase in my own department of 669.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I took the trouble to examine this report about which there has been so much controversy in the House, and I made a table showing the exact figures contained in it, with the exception of the Mounted Police. I did not think it was fair to charge the Government with appointments to the Mounted Police, so I omitted from the table those appointments. There are two important departments of the Government that are not yet accounted for—Marine and Fisheries and Militia. The Department of the Post Office whose figures were not in the original report, has been heard from by a special return laid on the table to-day. These figures I have added to complete the table, making the complete statement, so far as we have the returns as follows:

Resigned	6,548
Deserted	12	10,055

This shows that the only mistake Prof. Shortt made was that of being within the mark. He said that the Government was responsible for 8,000 new appointments, whereas, according to the return that has been placed on the table of the House, they are responsible for 10,045, and two large departments have not yet been heard from. I must say that I am somewhat suspicious about this large number of resignations. It strikes me that the most dishonest and dishonourable thing in connection with the whole business is that dismissals have been characterized as resignations; that the various departments have not been honest enough to state the whole facts. These men did not resign; they were driven out of the service. Does any one imagine that 6,548 officials of the Government sent in their resignations without any pressure? We all know that such a thing never happened, and that these resignations ought to have been characterized as dismissals; that is where the dishonesty and dishonourableness comes in.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): I only intervene in this debate, shall I say, at the invitation of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works. I am sure that in intervening I may well cast myself upon the sympathy of both sides of this House. I will tell my hon. friend why. He charged me with using strong language. That charge, coming from him at the present moment, is a very, very cutting charge. Why, Sir, I was literally afraid to listen to the quotations with which my hon. friend would back up his charge, because the point which has been raised by my right hon. leader has to do with a charge which, I think, some of us will characterize as mild. When we have to deal with a charge against a prominent public servant, that certain statements of his were unfair, untrue, dishonest and dishonourable, we are not dealing in lavender water in the way of language. The House will understand, therefore, that I really was afraid to hear my hon. friend quote what I had said. And what did this quotation amount to? It amounted to a statement made in this House on February 8 that the Liberal Bureau had not since the war broke out been issuing partisan literature.

Mr. ROGERS: Literature of any kind.

Mr. CLARK: The nature of the assertion was as I have stated. Well, that they have been issuing literature between the outbreak of war in August and February 8, when I spoke, is proved by the hon. Minister of Public Works giving a quotation from a document issued on February 15. I appeal to my hon. friend; should he really blame me very much for not knowing on February 8 what was going to be printed on February 15? He charges me with dwelling in the shades of Cobden. In what wonderful shades does he live or what powers of prophecy does he possess that he enables his colleagues in this House to know on February 8 what is going to happen on February 15?

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be glad to send over to my hon. friend the issues of the Liberal Monthly for October, November and December.

Mr. CLARK: If my hon. friend could have found anything in the issues of November and December to prove his case, he would have quoted it. Why did he quote from a copy of the Liberal Monthly published after I spoke? Because he could find nothing of a partisan nature in those published in November and December. But do my hon. friends read the Liberal Monthly, if their laughter means a contradiction of what I say? My hon. friend the Solicitor General says, Oh, yes. Then we may expect him to bring forth the partisan literature before even he, I am sure, will endeavour to prove a case against anything I said on February 8 by quoting something that was published on the 15th, a week afterwards. Hon. gentlemen opposite have an advantage over me, Mr. Speaker, in being regular students of the Liberal Monthly, for I do not happen to be a regular student of that publication. But before I made the statement in this House and after I made it I took occasion to speak to Mr. Godard, whose name has been mentioned in the course of this debate, and he assured me that nothing of a partisan nature had been printed. I myself read one or two issues published after the beginning of the war, and I found a very interesting historical account of the issues involved in the war, dealt with in a manner similar to the way in which they were referred to in the very able speeches of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister and my hon. friend the Solicitor General. Was that partisan literature? I was using this matter regularly in patriotic meetings, as all of us were, not with a view to helping party, but with a view to the justification of the common cause of our country in the eyes of the world. That is what was issuing from the Liberal Bureau, so far as my information goes, and what has been issuing from it even up to the present moment. That applies to the period preceding February 8, and it was that period only that I referred to when I spoke on February 8.

I want to say a single word about a very narrow point which has been brought to the attention of this House, and I want to say that word in a calm spirit. I do not admit the charge of my hon. friend that on the occasion to which he referred I used strong language, that is, judging language by such a criterion as I would bring to bear upon the language of my hon. friend. I do not admit using strong language, and I certainly do not want to use any on this occasion. I think that if the language used by the hon. minister with regard to Prof. Shortt had application anywhere, it was against those gentlemen who were using the figures on this side of the House, and not against Prof. Shortt. I will tell my hon. friend why. I read Prof. Shortt's address as it was reported in the press of this city. My hon. friend should recognize that Prof. Shortt was dealing with the Civil Service, and quoted these figures not with a view to comparing the acts of this Government and those of the last Government, but with a view to showing, in an impartial and non-partisan way, what he conceived to be the improper basis of the Civil Service. I am sure that hon. gentlemen opposite would not laugh at that if they had waited to hear what I had to say.

Professor Shortt in pointing out the unsatisfactory condition of the Civil Service in this country was following a very excellent example, he was following the example of the Prime Minister in many speeches made before 1911, speeches which in principle I am quite sure my right hon. friend would not now recede from. That is what I take in all fairness to be the object of Professor Shortt in delivering the address which he did on the Civil Service; and viewed from that standpoint the quotation of figures was an absolutely correct quotation of the figures as they had appeared in the returns up to that moment. He said there were 2,000 dismissals shown and there were 2,000 dismissals shown. Is that statement unfair, untrue, dishonest, or is the man making it dishonourable? He said there had been 10,000 new appointments and that is so.

Mr. ROGERS: Taking the place of resignations though.

Mr. CLARK: If he had been wanting to prove that they had been placed there not to fill the places of those who had resigned there would be some pertinence in what my hon. friend says now in interrupting; but Professor Shortt was simply dealing with the figures as he knew them, to show the unsatisfactory condition of the Civil Service. That is what I think to be the correct view of what Professor Shortt did. If the resignations, added to the dismissals, reduce the disparity between the persons leaving the service and the new appointments, it would weaken the argument which has been used by this side of the House about the extravagance of this Government. I concede that to my hon. friend. It would almost appear to me from the figures just given by the hon. member from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) that this is a matter which my hon. friend cannot afford to go into too deeply.

Mr. ROGERS: Oh, yes, we can.

Mr. CLARK: It would also appear to me—my hon. friend need not get excited, it is difficult for two of us to speak at once. I am saying that whether I have come from the shades of Cobden or elsewhere my hon. friend does not seem to know very much yet about this return or about what is going on in the Civil Service. However, I am not going into that. I simply wanted to make the admission I have made, that if the resignations added to the dismissals reduced the disparity between those receiving appointments and those going from the service that would weaken an argument used upon this side of the House; but, as far as a man claiming to be honourable, and I claim to be so, understands the meaning of language, that did not justify for one moment the language which was used by my hon. friend (Mr. Rogers); and if I have any knowledge of his character, the moment he sees that he will be the first man in Canada to withdraw the language. That is my opinion of him. It may be misplaced, but I hold it none the less. Nothing that Professor Shortt did justified the language which has been used by my hon. friend. I shall not go further into the question. I think I have cleared myself of the imputation, coming from a source that I was surprised to hear it come from on this particular occasion, of having used strong language. I made a simple statement, or I meant to convey to the House that from the bureau of the Liberal party at the time of the outbreak of war until the moment at which I was speaking, partisan literature had not been issued and that statement I repeat on the authority of those who have read the literature carefully. I am strongly disposed to believe this, because, as I have already pointed out, my hon. friend certainly did not quote any language in justification of his stating the opposite.

I shall not go into what my hon. friend called the progressive administration of this Government. We may admit the adjective if he gives it a shade of meaning which I myself would be inclined to attach to it at the present moment. It has certainly been a progressive administration in the matter of appointments to the Civil Service by the most favourable construction upon the figures of that return that could be put upon them, the construction of my hon. friend himself. There has been no extra business done in Canada, and there has been no extra prosperity to justify even this gap of 4,000 employees between the time when the late Administration was in power and the present moment. A progressive administration? Well, we are going to speak on the Budget some of these days and we will have something to say about the progress of this Administration and the progress of Canada under it. As I said, I intervened for a specific purpose, and having accomplished it I shall express to my hon. friend the hope that when he introduces a comparatively harmless quotation from anything I have said in the future on an occasion when his own language, which I do not think he has justified, is of the strongest possible description, he will not charge me with having used strong language.

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I think it is very necessary, in order that there may be a fair and proper discussion on the question, that we should know what the language was which Professor Shortt, of the Civil Service Commission, used at the Peoples' Forum on the Sabbath evening, which has been brought to the consideration of this House this afternoon by the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I have in my hand a copy of the Free Press of February 15, 1915. Professor Shortt's address was given on the evening of Sunday, February 14. I read from the Free Press this report of Professor Shortt's remark:

> I have met men in the Canadian Civil Service who, though they hold positions under the Government, were quite ready to admit that the Civil Service system was rotten.

He speaks of a Civil Service system which continued for a period of 15 years during all the time my right hon. friend was guiding the destinies of this country. He goes on to say:

> Who took the place of the 2,000 civil servants who were reported in the House the other day to have been dismissed from the service, and his reply to his own question was just 10,000.

I ask hon. gentlemen to consider that language. He asked who took the places of 2,000 civil servants who were dismissed, and he answered 10,000. In other words, Professor Shortt endeavoured to convey the meaning to the people of this country that 10,000 men were employed to do the work that had been done by those 2,000. His language had been evidently chosen with the greatest possible care in order to convey that impression, that under this Government, five men are employed doing the work that was done by one under the previous Administration. Could anything be more absolutely unfair—could anything be more absolutely—and I say it with consideration—untrue than that statement made by Professor Shortt? It is a statement which he must have known to be untrue. If he did not, then he had not read the return that had been laid before this House and which was the basis of the speech he was making at the Peoples' Forum; and if he made the statement without verifying it by reference to the return what can be said in his defence?

In view of the fact that the statement laid before the House in the return showed a very large number of dismissals, Professor Shortt, I say, was absolutely unjustified in making the assertions which he did make; and, further than that, his conduct in making that statement, I have no hesitation in saying to you, is unpardonable and indefensible, because he tried to create in the minds of the people of this country an impression of a state of facts, an impression that is absolutely false and untrue, because 10,000 men were not appointed, as he said in the careful language he used, to take the places of 2,000 men who had been dismissed.

When this statement was made public and the discussion of it commenced, I gave instructions to my deputy minister to have a careful statement made up with regard to my own department, showing the dismissals, the resignations, what superannuations had taken place, how many deaths had occurred, how many new appointments had been made, and how those who had been appointed were accounted for. Let me read that statement, or give a synopsis of it to the House; and I might say to the hon. member for St. John that it is dated February 25, 1915.

I find that in the Department of Marine and Fisheries Marine Branch, including all services and all departments, 464 have been dismissed from October 10, 1911, down to the present time. That number was entirely in the outside service; not a single dismissal from the inside service has taken place in my department since I became head of it in 1911.

Mr. CARROLL: Will that return be brought down?

Mr. HAZEN: It will be laid on the table of the House at once. The dismissals in the Marine Branch of my department have been 464, a small number in comparison with the Liberal dismissals made in that department after hon. gentlemen opposite came into power in 1896. In passing, let me say that my hon. friend from Guysboro (Mr. Sinclair) regretted these resignations as being of a most improper character. No wonder my hon. friend is suspicious about resignations, for if he will look at the records of the Civil Service after the year 1896, he will find resignation after resignation that was forced at the very point of the bayonet. And not only that; but he will find that man after man was removed from the fishery service on the ground that his services were no longer required, yet within a year his place was filled by some henchman of hon. gentlemen opposite. I have pointed out that there have been 464 dismissals in my Marine department. There have also been 340 resignations, and those resignations, so far as I know, are bona fide resignations; many of them made, no doubt, by men who had been taking a more active part in politics, and who, when the new Administration came into power, felt that, in view of the course they had taken, they were not justified in taking office under this Government which they had abused so bitterly. These were all bona fide resignations. What else have we? We find that there were 289 vacancies caused by death, ill-health, old age, superannuation, etc., to which no allusion was made by Professor Shortt in his speech at the People's Forum. Since I came into office, there have been altogether 1,608 appointments in the Department of Marine and Fisheries. How are they accounted for? To fill the places of dismissed officers, 464 to fill vacancies by resignations, 340; to fill the vacancies caused by death, ill-health, old age, superannuation, etc., 289. That makes a total of 1,093 vacancies. The new appointments were 515. How were these new appointments accounted for? Why, my hon. friends opposite are responsible for more than half of the appointments, because they were in consequence of legislation and administrative acts of hon. gentlemen opposite. What are they? We required crews for the Estevan, Bellechasse, and Dollard, all of which were in course of construction and under contract when I became minister. The number of men in those crews is 102. Seven men have been appointed to the Cheticamp life-saving station, and four men to the Prince Rupert buoy depot staff. Twenty lighthouses have been completed, and twenty lightkeepers appointed. Dredge No. 12 came into commission and required a crew of 31 men; Dredge No. 13, a crew of 31 men; the tug Lavaltrie, 16 men; the tug Laviolette, 16 men; Hopper barge No. 1, 14 men; making in all 241 new appointments made necessary in consequence of what took place before this Government came into power. Is there a single gentleman on the other side of the House who will take exception to the appointment of any of those men? Will any of them be so bold as to deny that the appointments are in the public interest, and necessitated by the progress and development of this country?

Let me read to my hon. friends opposite the list of wharves that have been transferred by the Public Works Department, Under the law, these wharves when built are transferred to the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and we appoint wharfingers. Twenty-seven wharves have been transferred to our department, to which we have appointed 27 wharfingers. Was it not right that they should be appointed? Would it have been right to leave these wharves uncared for? And let me point out that the pay of these men has not cost the country one single extra dollar, because they are paid a percentage of the fees collected on the boats that use the wharf.

Mr. CARROLL: How could Professor Shortt give these figures when the return had not been brought down?

Mr. HAZEN: He had no right to make the statement he did without accurate information. Professor Shortt, an officer of this House, an official of this country, took occasion to make a speech that to my mind was animated principally by political animus, and which was for the purpose of discrediting the Government. Professor Shortt not only made a suggestion that was untrue, but practically made an untrue statement in not referring to the complete particulars. Let me continue my statement: fifteen harbours have been proclaimed during the same period, for which harbour masters were required to the number of 15. These men do not receive a salary from the Government, but a percentage of the fees collected at those harbours. To the meteorological stations throughout Canada, 51 new observers were appointed. The meteorological service has been extending very rapidly and is a most useful service. Will any one say that the small amount paid to these observers in the different parts of the country is unjustified, and not in the interests of Canada? To the two new life-saving stations that have been established since this Government has been in power, 14 men were appointed, and let me say here that when my Estimates are before the House I never meet with any criticism for having too many stations in Canada; the criticism from hon. gentlemen opposite always is that the stations are too few. My hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) has appealed to me on several occasions for more of these stations on the river and gulf of the St. Lawrence.

Mr. MARCIL: The minister will admit that it is most extraordinary that there should not be a life-saving station on the St. Lawrence. Only last year 1,200 lives were lost at Kimouski.

Mr. HAZEN: That is exactly what I was saying. I am finding no fault with my hon. friend. I am saying that I am constantly appealed to by him, and other gentlemen who are anxious for life-saving stations in different parts of the country. My statement has been verified by the hon. member for Bonaventure. No one says that these stations should not have been established, and that the men should not have been appointed.

I find that at the various agencies throughout Canada 16 new clerks have been appointed in consequence of increasing business; and every year more buoys, more lights, and more aids to navigation are required. Parliament makes a very generous appropriation for that service, and we attempt to spend the money in the public interest. One new agent was appointed at Fort William. Fifty-eight new light stations have been established in Canada, to which 58 light keepers have been appointed. One deputy harbour master has been appointed, four port physicians, and four steamboat inspectors. We have a steamboat inspector up in the district north of Edmonton where there was none before, and where the owners of steamers had the greatest difficulty in getting certificates for their vessels. In addition to that, we have appointed two port wardens, who are paid by fees; three receivers of wrecks, who are also paid by fees; one inspecting engineer, and 20 additional clerks to the inside service at Ottawa, whose appointments were necessary in consequence of the increasing business of the department.

That is the statement as far as my own department is concerned. If this return had been on the table of the House—and I have no doubt that a similar statement could be made regarding other departments of the Government—would Prof. Shortt have been justified in saying that there had been 464 officials dismissed and that to take their places 1,608 had been appointed? That would have been quite as fair play as to make the statement he did about 2,000 officials being dismissed and 10,000 appointed in their places. I have no doubt that any other department of the Government could make a statement quite as satisfactory as the statement I have made, and I challenge the most careful scrutiny of this statement which I shall lay on the table of the House. With the introduction of the free rural mail delivery system, with the introduction of the parcel post system, with the extension to the people in outside parts of the facilities and advantages of the post office service, and with the enormous increase that has taken place in the customs revenue, would we not have expected Prof. Shortt, if he had wanted to be fair, to have said to those that he was addressing at the People's Forum on that Sabbath evening: Of course, as the country grows, extra officials must be appointed, and with a revenue to be collected $40,000,000 greater than it was before, or with a post office service whose work and income are largely increasing, it is only natural to expect that the country must employ officials to carry on the larger business the several departments have to do. No such idea apparently occurred to the learned professor. He was anxious to make the statement, and after carefully studying it beforehand, and after evidently reading the return which was put before the House, he stated that 2,000 men had been dismissed and that five men had been appointed to take the place of every man who had been dismissed, without reference to the increase in the growth of the business of the country, without reference to the resignations that had taken place, without reference to the superannuations that had taken place, the deaths that had taken place, and other causes as a result of which officials had to retire from the department in which they had been employed.

This discussion has been precipitated by the right hon. leader of the Opposition. He has brought Prof. Shortt in question before this House. He has brought the whole matter up for consideration. After my experience as a minister of the Crown for a period extending over three years I have no hesitation in saying that I do not think—and I think this is the opinion of my department, when I say my department, I mean the permanent men in the department—that Prof. Shortt possesses those qualities that make him an efficient member of the Civil Service Commission. In my department we have lived up to the Civil Service Act. When vacancies have occurred we have asked for a recommendation from the Civil Service Commission, and in more than one instance where we have asked that men be sent to the department men have been sent by the Civil Service Commission who were entirely unfit for the work for which we wanted them and to which they were assigned by Prof. Shortt.

Probably Prof. Shortt might have discharged the duties of his position with more credit to himself and more satisfaction to those who are the permanent heads of the different departments had he paid that attention to his duties which the importance of his position demanded. Let me read to this House a letter which, on the 22nd August last, and after the strongest representations had been made to me by the permanent head of my department, I addressed to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister:

Dear Sir Robert:

On the 20th of this month a letter was addressed by the Deputy Minister of Naval Affairs to the secretary of the Civil Service Commission respecting the issue of a certificate of qualification in favour of Mr. Charles Savary whom it is proposed to promote from subdivision A of the second division to subdivision B of the first division.

Mr. Savary is in command of the Cartier, and is in Ottawa at the present time and prepared to undergo his examination.

In reply to the request made by the Deputy Minister a letter was received from the secretary of the Civil Service Commission stating that it would be duly submitted to the commissioners on their return from abroad. Both of the commissioners are absent from Ottawa at the present time and we are informed that nothing in the way of promotion would be done until they returned. It seems to me most undesirable that the work of the commission should be suspended, and arrangements should be made that one of the commissioners at least be in the office at all times. The action of the commissioners is causing us considerable inconvenience, and no doubt other branches of the Civil Service are being also inconvenienced.

I thought it proper to call your attention to this matter so that on the return of the chairman of the commission arrangements might be made to the effect that that office should always be open and the work carried on.

It may be stated that absolutely nothing is being done through the Civil Service Commission at the present time beyond the merest routine. It seems to me a little less than disgraceful that a time like this should be selected by the commissioners to leave Ottawa when most of the departments of the Government are exerting themselves to the utmost, and that at such a critical time the important duties of the Civil Service should be neglected.

Mr. MURPHY: At the time to which the hon. minister alludes, was not Prof. Shortt absent in the old country on Government business?

Mr. HAZEN: On his own business, not on Government business, I am informed. I took it to be my duty, in view of the inconvenience caused in our department, as represented to me by the permanent head of the department, to call the attention of the Prime Minister to the state of affairs on August 22 last, long before Prof. Shortt had delivered his speech at the People's Forum or put himself in a position of antagonism and hostility to the Government. That is what I have said regarding his qualifications for the position, and I have no hesitation in repeating that statement in the most explicit terms as the result of the experience that I have had in dealing with the Commission.

Now, Mr. Speaker, would it not have been fair for the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), when reading to this House the figures he had made up regarding the employees of the Department of the Interior, to have read the note there is on the statement that has been laid on the table of the House in regard to the Department of the Interior? The statement, after giving the number of men dismissed and the appointments and so on, said:

> Appointments include several hundred temporary employees at Ottawa who do not appear among the "dismissed" or "resigned." They were employed under the Civil Service Act for six months or so and allowed to go when their time expired.

It would not have served the purpose of the hon. gentleman to have read to the House that note of explanation in the report handed in by the Minister of the Interior. Nor would it have served his purpose, I suppose, to have read in the return of the Civil Service Commissioners a statement showing that when one man resigned eight were appointed to take his place. Possibly there was work for all those men to do; but any one could make the argument against Prof. Shortt in his own department that for one official who resigned eight officials were appointed to take his place, because the statement appears in the report that one resigned and eight extra employees were appointed to positions in that department. I do not suppose those eight men were appointed to take the place of the one man who was dismissed. I presume that the work of the Civil Service Commissioners has been increased as the work of the other departments of this Government has been increased, and that therefore they have found it necessary to appoint extra officials for the purpose of properly carrying on the work of their department. I do not want to trespass further upon the time of the House. I have given to the House the statement of the Marine Branch of my own department. I regret that it was not laid on the table of the House before; but possibly it is well that such has not been the case, because it would not have been up to date, and I understand that my hon. friend the member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) raised some point because he claimed that the figures of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) were not up to date.

Speaking from the standpoint of my own department, and I believe I can speak for all the members of this Government, I say that we are prepared for the most careful investigation of this matter, especially as to the new appointments that have been made. They were made in the public interest, and were necessitated by the growth and development of the public work of this country.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I listened as attentively as I could to the figures given by my hon. friend as to the appointments in his own department, and as I made them out, after he had shown us the necessity for the appointment of various people, there was still left about 100 entirely unaccounted for.

Mr. HAZEN: No. I will read the figures again:

To replace dismissed officers ..	464
To replace officers resigned and left the service	340
To fill vacancies caused by death, ill-health, old age, superannuation, etc.	289
New appointments..	515
Total	1,608

Of the 515 new appointments, 241 are due to work started by the previous Administration and completed after October, 1911, leaving 274 new appointments for which we are responsible. These 274 new appointments are made up as follows:

Wharves transferred by Public Works Department, for which wharfingers required (paid by fees), 27; harbours proclaimed, for which harbour masters required (paid by fees), 15; meteorological stations throughout Canada, 51. A station does not necessarily mean a building; it just means a place where a man takes the rainfall, and so on.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is a position for which friends may make a recommendation.

Mr. HAZEN: These stations are scattered all over Canada, and no observer has been appointed except on the recommendation of Mr. Stupart, director of the Meterological Service.

Two life-saving stations, 14 men; additional clerks required at the various agencies, 15 men. New agent at Fort William.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is that a new agent?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes. We used to pay a sum of money indirectly to some other official. In view of the importance of the harbour, we desired to appoint an agent of our own.

Light stations, new, 58; deputy harbour master, 1; port physicians, 4; steamboat inspectors, 4; port wardens (paid by fee), 2; receiver of wrecks (paid by fees), 3; signal service operators, 2; inspecting engineer, 1; additions, inside service, 20; additions, outside service, 8.

The Canadian Government steamer Arranmore, the steamer that we purchased on account of the extra work that had to be done in Hudson strait and Hudson bay, required a crew of 47 men.

Mr. CARROLL: You did not mention that in your first statement.

Mr. HAZEN: I intended to do so. That ought to make a total of 274 new appointments.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It seems to me that my hon. friends the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries have both departed somewhat from the point brought up by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. The object which I understand my right hon. friend had in view and which he sought to accomplish was that, in fairness to the gentleman occupying such an important position in this country as the chairman of the Civil Service Commission, a gentleman who, while appointed by the Governor in Council, yet is not subject to the control of the Government, but to the control of the two Houses of Parliament, ought to be given an opportunity of justifying the language which he used upon the occasion referred to.

5 p.m.

That, I understand, was the point of the suggestion made by my right hon. friend. It must be borne in mind that Professor Shortt is not a member of this House. It must be borne in mind that he has been attacked behind his back, attacked where he has no opportunity to defend himself by justifying his statements or proving the truth of the statements he is alleged to have made, and which I have no doubt he did make, at the Forum upon the occasion to which hon. gentlemen have referred.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Were the members of the Government present at the Forum when Professor Shortt attacked their policy?

Mr. PUGSLEY: That was an assembly which was open to the whole public, including any member of the Government.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: The meetings of this House are open to the public, including Professor Shortt.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But if he spoke in the gallery he would be arrested. Professor Shortt has the right, as any man has, upon the invitation of this House, to appear at the bar to explain his conduct. It does seem to me that the suggestion of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition is only fair—that this House, together with the Senate, having control over Professor Shortt so far as his continuance in office is concerned, not only has a right to appoint a committee to allow Professor Shortt to be heard and to take the evidence which may be given, but it is its duty to do so. It would be entirely out of place for Professor Shortt to make any reply to the statements made to-day by the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. It would be unseemly for him to do so. When he was interviewed by the newspaper reporter after what had taken place in this House during my observations on the Budget, he very properly said he would not enter into a discussion on the subject, that the statement which he had made was a statement simply based upon the returns which had been laid before the House.

Mr. ROGERS: The hon. gentleman has hardly completed Professor Shortt's statement, as given in the interview. According to the interview which he gave out to the Free Press, he went further. He not only said he was simply quoting from the return, but said also:

I had no information other than was contained in the return—for instance, I had no information about resignations.

If he had the return, he had the information about resignations.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He may or may not so far as my knowledge would enable me to speak, because unfortunately we have not been able to see the return.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Professor Shortt did.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not the return of all the departments—that has not been brought down.

Mr. BEST: Then, why did he make the statement ?

Mr. PUGSLEY: He made it from the returns which he had seen, returns brought down by the departments to which he had access.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That return showed 3,500 resignations.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My right hon. friend the Prime Minister, I suppose, may properly ask us to assume that Professor Shortt saw or ought to have seen that return. Whether he did or did not, I do not know, but surely —and I appeal now to the sense of fairness of my right hon. friend apart altogether from any partisan question, because I think that no such question ought to intrude in the discussion of this matter—surely is it not reasonable and fair, is it not in the public interest, is it not a matter of simple justice to Professor Shortt, that a committee of this House (the House having control over Professor Shortt), should be appointed to hear what he has to say, to give him an opportunity of justifying the statements he has made, to come here and defend himself from the attack which has been made upon him by the Minister of Public Works ? That hon. gentleman has stated that Professor Shortt has been guilty, not only of making an untrue and unfair statement, but of dishonourable and dishonest conduct. I say that if the Government does not give Professor Shortt that opportunity it will be doing a great injustice to an important civil servant. I have no warrant to speak for Professor Shortt, and I make no request of this House on his behalf. I have had no conversation with him since this matter came up, but I do say that the Government owes it as an absolute duty to Professor Shortt to give him an opportunity to be heard either at the Bar of this House or by a committee of this House. Why, Mr. Speaker, if this is allowed to go, if Professor Shortt is given no opportunity of justifying his statements to this House, it must destroy to a large extent his usefulness as a public servant. The Minister of Public Works has said that Professor Shortt has shown impartiality in one respect, and that is that, while condemning the condition of the Civil Service, he did not hesitate to throw blame upon the previous Government equally with the present Government. The Minister of Public Works was fair enough to Professor Shortt so far as that was concerned; but notwithstanding the evidence he had as to that, without taking the trouble to ask Professor Shortt as to the facts upon which he made his statement at the meeting referred to, he in this House, giving to his words all the very great weight which the words of a minister must always have in this Parliament, declared that Professor Shortt had been guilty of dishonourable and dishonest conduct. He brands Professor Shortt as a man not worthy to occupy the position of Chairman of the Civil Service Commission; brands him as a man hardly worthy to occupy the position of a private citizen in this country; brands him by the severest terms of opprobrium though he occupies a high position in the service of the people of Canada. That being so, I appeal to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, whether my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition is not making a fair proposition when he said that this matter should be taken up and Professor Shortt given an opportunity of vindicating himself, of showing the circumstances under which he used the language which is referred to, and what facts he had to justify —if he can justify—the language he used. Why, the meanest man in this country would be given an opportunity, outside of this Parliament, of defending himself and of explaining his conduct or justifying his language under such circumstances. Is it to be said, because my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, in the exercise of his best judgment and in the performance of the duty which devolves upon him as leader of one of the parties in this House, makes the suggestion that an opportunity to defend himself should be offered Professor Shortt, this should be made the subject of partisan discussion? Instead of considering the question solely and simply upon its merits, we are to be called upon suddenly to determine whether or not the Government has been justified in making the large number of appointments they have made as the result of the resignations and dismissals that have taken place.

Hon. gentlemen are seeking to draw a red herring across the trail and to show that they are justified in the appointments which they have made. Upon another occasion it would be quite proper to discuss that matter, but I strongly object to hon. gentlemen bringing it into the discussion of the suggestion which has been made by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. But they have chosen to do so, and I, for one, am not opposed to engaging in the conflict with them, if they want to have the matter fully discussed. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries says he has not a doubt in the world but that the returns of the other departments will show that no unnecessary appointments have been made. Has my hon. friend looked at the return? Is he able to pledge his word to this House that no unnecessary appointments have been made in the other departments of the service? I am in an unfortunate position, because I have not been able to see the return, but I am greatly impressed—and I am sure that this House and the country will be impressed—by the statement made by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) that from all the departments in regard to which we so far have returns there have been dismissed 3,495 employees; there have resigned—I presume that in the great majority of cases these would be compulsory resignations—some 6,548, and there have deserted, 12, a total of 10,055. We have further the information that there have been appointed, during the period in regard to which at this late date we have received information, the enormous number of 21,100 persons. Hon. gentlemen may talk as they like about the expansion of business in this country, but I say that nothing which has taken place within the last three years justifies that enormous number of appointments. Never in the past history of Canada has such a large number of appointments been made in the various departments of the Civil Service in the same period of time. Great expansion took place during the whole 15 years that the Liberal party was in power. Everybody knows that it was during that period that our western country began to develop. Everybody knows that between the years 1885 and 1895 the whole country was stagnant; there was no growth, no development. Villages were standing still; towns were dead; the grass was growing upon the streets of the cities.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. PUGSLEY: A pall of despair had settled over the country and people were leaving by hundreds, by thousands and by tens of thousands. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works was there at that time; he knows that what I am saying is true. I speak as one who knows, because I was one of the pioneers in that country. I went there as far back as 1881, and I have kept in close touch with it ever since. Sir, it was not until a vigorous, progressive and broad immigration policy was inaugurated by the Liberal party that the western country began to develop and its population began to increase. Immigrants came in from the United States, from England, and from practically all civilized countries, and a rapid and continuous expansion took place. That prosperity, progress and development continued until not many months after the present Government came into power; but to-day, in our great western country, and in the east as well, the conditions are practically the same as they were in 1895, not long before the Liberal party came into power.

Mr. CROTHERS: Was the hon. gentleman supporting the late Government in 1895?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Many people, Sir, supported the late Government in sorrow, because they saw—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. PUGSLEY: —because they saw that the late Government was doing nothing for the development and expansion of the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That was in 1895; that would be about the time that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister was supporting the Liberal party.

Mr. HAZEN: And my hon. friend himself was supporting the Conservative party at the same time. A fair exchange, perhaps.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will not go into that sorrowful tale, with which my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is so familiar; besides, we have heard so much about it that it is hardly worth while. That was nineteen odd years ago.

Mr. HAZEN: But my hon. friend was reproaching the Prime Minister.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I did not do so until the Minister of Labour called my attention to the matter, and when one becomes reminiscent it is not at all out of the way for him to consider the position occupied by other persons at the time referred to. That is my only excuse for referring to a subject of no importance so far as this question is concerned. But the point I want to make is that under the Liberal administration, during the whole 15 years of development, prosperity, increased population, increased business, increased customs revenue, increased postal revenue, increased inland revenue, increased revenue in all departments, there never was anything like the increase in the number of employees in a corresponding period of time that there has been during the three years that this Government has been in office.

My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has given a list of appointments that have been made in his department. He says that they were to take the places of persons who had been dismissed or who had resigned, or to carry on new branches of the department. But my hon. friend forgets that in addition to that there were a number of employees who were in ill health and a number who had grown old in the service and were incapable of discharging their duties any longer. The services of many of these men, who, as we know, are allowed to remain in the service, doing comparatively little work, might very well be dispensed with. Was it necessary, therefore, for my hon. friend to appoint strong, vigorous young men and women in the place of the 289 old persons who apparently had become unfit for further service? He not only makes these additional appointments of 515 persons, but presumably he fills the places of 289 employees who have grown too old to be of service in the department by appointing younger persons. One would think, therefore, that he must have had a large number of employees in his department whose services were not absolutely necessary. It is common knowledge in this country that this Government has been earnestly endeavouring to make jobs for scores and hundreds of people in various sections of Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I venture to say that the hon. gentleman who protests himself knows as well as I do that this is a fact, and I have no doubt that the same condition prevails in his constituency. Demands were made upon these gentlemen; improperly they yielded to them, and the result has been this enormous and unnecessary increase in the number of employees in the various departments. What does that mean? You have 11,000 more employees in the various departments of the Government than there were when this Government came into office in 1911. What does it mean? Is it too much to say that outside of those who are paid by fees, their salaries would average at least $800 or perhaps $1,000 each, taking the whole 11,000? At $1,000 each then, it means the enormous sum of $11,000,000 which has been added to the ordinary current expenditure of this country. It does seem to me that the burthen resting on hon. gentlemen opposite is not simply to condemn us because we bring these matters up, but to show us what have been the increases in the different departments and to justify those increases. To-day the Prime Minister made the motion that you leave the Chair in order to precipitate this discussion. He might, had he desired, have allowed the limited discussion to go on as to what should be done so far as Professor Shortt was concerned; but when my right hon. friend moved that you leave the Chair, immediately the Minister of Public Works entered upon a general discussion as to whether these appointments were justifiable or not, and spoke of the increase of the business in his department. He has been followed by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. But they still leave us without this report; they cannot even tell us where it is. It is their business to keep control of it, and, if they cannot get the report, to furnish a copy of it. I have no doubt there is in the Department of Secretary of State a copy of this report. The Secretary of State never submits a return to this House without keeping a copy. I have no doubt there is in each department a copy of the report sent to the Department of State in order that they might make up the general report covering all departments. Is it unreasonable to ask that we should be furnshed with a copy of that report? Is it unreasonable to ask that this House should have an opportunity of looking into that report? It seems to me most unreasonable that we should be denied that opportunity. It looks as if hon. gentlemen were simply seeking to cast dust into the eyes of the people of this country in making assertions of a general character without giving us an opportunity of going into details and questioning the correctness of the statements which they make. I and other members of the House would like an opportunity to see the returns from the different departments. There is no excuse for not bringing down those returns before this late date. The returns were moved for by a member of this House at the session of 1913-14, but up to to-day, up to this very moment, we have not got the return of the Department of Marine and Fisheries; although my hon. friend the minister has addressed the House with regard to the subject, we find that we have not even his return before us, and we only got the return from the department of the Postmaster General to-day. There are some other departments the returns for which are not yet before the House. There is no justification for that delay. What is the use of members having the right to move for returns when they are to be delayed month after month, the delay running over into the following year. That is the case with returns which were moved for in 1913-14, so far as this subject is concerned. It is not fair to this House, or to those who wish to discuss the matter, that this return should not be here. Notwithstanding that the returns are not here, knowing as I do something with regard to the condition of this country, I submit that there is no excuse for the enormous number of appointments which have been made. Even in the case of the Department of Public Works, I submit there is no excuse for such a large increase in the number of appointments. The Minister of Public Works speaks of the increase in the work of dredging, and he refers to an increase of from $3,000,000 to $6,000,000. My hon. friend must be wrong in that, because if he will take the Estimates, which can be found in the Blue Book which has been submitted to Parliament, he will find that under dredging, on page 72, there is only $2,307,000. Would my hon. friend be good enough to state how he makes up the difference? Maybe he is right, and it is not contained on page 72, but in some other portion of the Blue Book.

Mr. ROGERS: The report which I sent over to my hon. friend was made up by the deputy minister, Mr. Hunter. I looked it over with him, and I am satisfied it is correct in every detail.

Mr. PUGSLEY: At page 72 it gives the dredging for the maritime provinces, for Ontario and Quebec, for Manitoba and Saskatchewan and Alberta and for British Columbia; it gives the cost of dredging plant in the maritime provinces and the other provinces, and the total is $2,307,000. It may be that under capital account, on harbours and rivers, there is some additional dredging which may give the increased amount, but it is certainly not under the head of dredging. My hon. friend says a large increase in the staff has been necessary for the purpose of rushing along the public buildings. I submit that is not justified by the interests of the country. When I was minister there was a large staff in the architectural branch. While the officials worked pretty zealously, I never saw any urgent necessity for making increases in the staff, and I do not think it was necessary for the minister to make increases in that branch of the department.

Mr. ROGERS: There was occasion for increase by reason of the fact that during the term that you were Minister of Public Works a large number of plans were made by outside architects. We have tried to change that and to have the plans made inside the department, as far as possible. Therefore the department required an increase in the staff for carrying out the work, especially in view of the fact that the department as a whole was spending only $14,000,000 in 1911, while in 1914 it was spending $28,000,000—just double the amount.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend is spending double the amount of money. That raises another question which we have already discussed as to whether that enormous expenditure of $28,000,000 is really necessary in the interests of the country. It all shows that when this Government came into power they were crazed by the degree of prosperity which they found all around them. They were like a young man, somewhat improvident, coming into a great inheritance; and they went to work to spend money just as rapidly as they could, and so they discovered at once that the late Minister of Public Works had not a sufficiently large staff, he had not enough architects to spend all this Government wanted to spend. The Department of Railways and Canals had not enough engineers to carry out their large ideas in connection with development, so far as that department was concerned, and they proceeded at once, not only to ask Parliament to vote this large additional sum of money, but to enlarge the staff of architects and engineers.

They proceeded right here in the city of Ottawa to rent a large number of new buildings, although when in Opposition they criticised the late Government for the number of buildings which we had rented. They told us then that we had more accommodation than was necessary for properly carrying on the work of the country, but when these gentlemen came into power they at once proceeded to rent more buildings at a larger rental than we paid. These buildings necessitate a large number of elevator men, a large number of furnace men, and a large number of caretakers, and add enormously, and I think unnecessarily, to the expenses of the country. What my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works ought to have done was to have gone along slowly with the officials already in the employ of the Government. He ought to have been content to spend $12,000,000 in his department. That is a large sum of money. The minister tells us that the Government has erected eighty public buildings in Canada during the past year. Let the minister tell us how many of those buildings were urgently required to meet the public service, and how many of the postal building that have been erected throughout Canada were actually required. A great many of these post office buildings have been erected in towns where accommodation was formerly rented for a moderate amount, and served the public interest very well. I have in mind the case of a public building which the Minister of Public Works has erected in a county where accommodation was formerly rented. I do not think the rental could have exceeded $100, and yet the Minister of Public Works has erected a public building there at a cost of some $35,000 or $40,000.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In what county?

Mr. PUGSLEY: In my old county of Kings, N.B. The building is in a small village containing but a few hundred people. A beautiful village it is true, but when I was Minister of Public Works I had stated to Parliament that I proposed putting up there a pretty one-story building to cost about $5,000, which I thought would be ample for the purpose.

Mr. ROGERS: Did you ever build one for $5,000?

Mr. PUGSLEY: That was the first occasion on which I thought of putting up a building in such a small town as that.

Mr. J. D. REID: What about Humboldt?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Humboldt is two, three, four, five times the size of the place at which this building had been erected at a cost of some $35,000 or $40,000. What does this mean? Besides the cost of the building there is the cost of heating, the cost of a caretaker, and repairs have to be made from time to time. It will probably mean an expense ten times greater than was previously incurred in that place. And that is merely an instance of what has been done all over this country since this Government came into power. They have erected buildings in places which they stated, when in Opposition, did not require public buildings, and so have added to the public expense all around.

Before taking my seat I wish to say a word or to further on behalf of Professor Shortt, and in support of the suggestion which my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has made. I for one do not believe that Professor Shortt cares one iota for this Government or for this Opposition. When we were in office, I never saw any evidence that Professor Shortt showed any favouritism towards the late Government. In fact, in many cases the recommendations I made were turned down by the Civil Service Commission. But I recognized that the Civil Service Commission was an independent body entitled to the exercise of its own judgment. I recognized that it was when it was proposed to make the Civil Service Commission an independent body, that both sides of this House supported the proposition and expected the Civil Service Commission to take the Civil Service as far as possible out of politics. I have never seen any evidence of partiality towards the Liberal party from that Commission, and I do not believe that Professor Shortt's remarks on the occasion referred to were influenced in the slightest degree by his feeling in favour of the Liberal party or against the Conservative party. I do not think such an idea ever entered his head for a single moment.

The Minister of Marine and Fisheries has referred to the necessity of having some member of the Commission here continually to attend to business. I notice that in the Statutes of 1912 it was provided that the old Civil Service Act should be amended by giving the Governor General power to appoint three members to the Civil Service Commission instead of two. May I ask if that appointment has ever been made?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No, it has not.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why not? My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has read a letter complaining that some of the commissioners were absent. Why has the Government not exercised its power and appointed an additional member of the Civil Service Commission?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I will give my hon. friend some information when he gets through.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I shall have no trouble in getting through before six o'clock. I would ask that complete returns from all departments be brought down; not these fragmentary returns, a return from one department one week and another return from another department the next week. If the Government will comply with the order that was passed by this House upwards of a year ago and bring down complete returns so that we can examine them, and if the Government will appoint a day for the discussion of the necessity of making this vast number of appointments, I think they will find a readiness on this side of the House to meet them in that discussion, and to take up the cases of individuals in the different provinces. But I think we have a right to say that we should have these returns before us, so that we can speak with intelligence and a degree of certainty in the matter. I thank my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) for having, after a good deal of effort, dug out some information from an unwilling Government. We have this fact: some 21,000 appointments have been made to fill the vacancies caused by some 10,000 dismissals, deaths, desertions and resignations. That is something, at all events, upon which we can go and something in regard to which I think we have a very good foundation for appealing to the people of this country. I think it justifies the charge which has already been made during this debate that this Government in its appointments at all events, if not in its carrying on of the general administration of affairs, has been guilty of reckless disregard in the way the people's money has been expended. Through mismanagement, and through failure to have due regard to those principles of economy which ought to govern those having charge of the administration of affairs, the Government have brought this country into a position which should give very grave concern to the people, and lead us even now to consider whether it would not be possible to engage on a work of retrenchment, by means of which many millions of dollars might be annually saved to the people of this country.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, it is no more than justice to the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) to say that the example of debating which he has given the House in the last half-hour is not at all up to the standard of which he is capable upon a subject that he is really interested in and upon which he has something to say. The hon. gentleman was under the unpleasant necessity of switching from the point of the discussion, into which the Opposition now wish they had never plunged, to a subject as dull, monotonous and time-worn as he could discover, and then engaging in a pathetic effort to drag that discussion along its weary length to as near six o'clock as possible. The discussion arose, with the interposition of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) on behalf of the chairman of the Civil Service Commission who has been attacked in this House because, on the basis of a return—and one return alone—he made a public statement, though a civil servant of this country, that was at variance with the facts as shown in that return. If he made a statement at variance with the facts, plainly at variance with the facts and calculated to deceive and made it knowingly he made a statement which was dishonourable, dishonest and untrue. Did he make a statement at variance with the facts? Was it plainly at variance with the facts, and must he not have known that it was at variance with the facts? That is the point before the House, nothing more and nothing less. The statement he made, quoted in two newspapers in the city of Ottawa, was that the return, which he treated as one entity and no more, a copy of which return I hold in my hands, showed that the Government of Canada, since it came into office, had dismissed 2,000 employees of the Civil Service and in their places had put 10,000. That is the report of the Citizen; that is the report of the Ottawa Free Press. That statement is false, that statement is untrue, that statement is misleading, and that statement, on the professor's own showing, was false to his own knowledge. He says that he had the return, that he knew what was in the return, that that was all he knew, and taking that return and knowing what was in it, he said that there were 2,000 dismissals replaced with 10,000 appointments and nothing said about resignations. Both sentences were false, and he must have known that they were false because he had the return, and what some other return may say has nothing to do with that paper. What does the hon. member (Mr. Pugsley) expect to do for Professor Shortt by asking for an additional return which he says will show that what Professor Shortt said about this return is true? How can an additional return vary the facts of the present return? False! Two thousand dismissals were made, almost 4,000 resignations took place which were mentioned, but beyond the dismissals and beyond the resignations there was an intervening hiatus which Professor Shortt owed it to himself and his audience to explain—the number of deaths, the number of superannuations and more than all, the number of temporary appointments—men who go on for certain purposes temporarily and then are left off the serivce. Why, take the report of the Post Office Department alone. Who is there who does not know, and no one better than Professor Shortt, that in every town and city in Canada at Christmas time there are many appointments made to the Post Office service? In my own city of about 7,000 people there are every year added to the post office staff one or two. Take that proportion all over Canada and thousands would intervene between resignations and appointments and the total number of appointees is thereby accounted for.

Mr. W. M. MARTIN: Does my hon. friend mean to say that these temporary clerks appointed at Christmas time in towns and cities are included under the heading of appointments?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I certainly mean to say so and I mean to say further that Professor Shortt knew they were so included.

Mr. MARTIN: They are not so included.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have the Postmaster General's authority for the statement that they are so included, and I prefer to rely upon it.

Mr. MURPHY: Is my hon. friend referring to the report brought down by the Postmaster General to-day?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I am referring to this return. The hon. gentleman will see, if he looks at the return, that in many instances it is pointed out that temporary appointments are included and that the employees are of the class to which I have referred.

Mr. MURPHY: The post office return is not in the one that my hon. friend has.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very well.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Was the post office return in the statement to which Professor Shortt referred?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The post office return was brought down to-day.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. CLARK: Then, how could Professor Shortt know that these temporary appointments were included in the return?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because it says so in several of the departments included in the return itself. Now I will read to my hon. friend from Red Deer. I intend to read to him a lot more just a little later, but I will read to him from the return of the Department of the Interior:

> Dismissals, 309; resignations, 374; deserters, none; punished, none; appointments, 1,651.

There would be a difference of 800 or 900 men. Then, it is said:

> The appointments include several hundred temporary employees at Ottawa who do not appear among the "dismissed" or "resigned" They were employed under the Civil Service Act for six months or so and allowed to go when their term expired.

In a number of other returns the relation of similar facts will be found and Professor Shortt owed it to his audience and to this Government to make that statement and not the statement he did make.

Mr. DEVLIN: That does not refer to the postal clerks who were appointed at Christmas time and to whom my hon. friend referred.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My statement as to postal clerks is absolutely correct. In the return in which postal clerks are referred to the postal clerks taken on at Christmas are included.

Mr. DEVLIN: But not in the return to which Professor Shortt referred.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, but the same principle applies in both cases and that is what Professor Shortt ignored or rather suppressed. Now is my hon. friend satisfied?

Mr. DEVLIN: I am satisfied that my hon. friend was wrong.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It takes very little to satisfy the hon. member. I interposed in this discussion—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will my hon. friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly. I make a very great effort to extend to my hon. friend the courtesy which he extended to me.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I thank my hon. friend for his forgiving spirit. He said he wanted to have a conversation with my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean). My hon. friend says he has a copy of a return which none of us on this side of the House are able to find. Will he be good enough to have a copy of his copy made and laid on the table so that it may be accessible?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I went to get a copy of the return myself a few days ago and I found it was in the possession of the leader of the Opposition.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I will say to my right hon. friend that he found nothing of the kind. I had a partial return, but the main return I never had.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I was informed that it had been in the possession of my right hon. friend and that he had had copies made of it. I asked that one of the copies which had been prepared should be furnished to me and it was furnished to me.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My right hon. friend was more clever than I was, because I never had such a report.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My right hon. friend was not so diligent about the matter as I was.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. W. F. NICKLE (Kingston): Mr. Speaker, when this matter was first broached it did not seem one of very great importance, but as the discussion developed, and as two ministers of the Crown, speaking with great deliberation, and without doubt, realizing the weight their words will carry throughout the Dominion, have made certain charges against the chairman of the Civil Service Commission, it seems to me incumbent on this House to seriously consider the matter. If I understood correctly the position of the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), the members of the Civil Service Commission are beyond the control of the Government and can be discharged only on the joint address of the House of Commons and the Senate. It is not my intention to discuss the evidence submitted or the statements made here this afternoon; but I should not be discharging my duty as I see it if I did not explain to the House through you, Sir, that my spirit revolts at the finding of a man guilty on the ex-parte statement of a newspaper correspondent. If the chairman of the Civil Service Commission is guilty of the improprieties alleged; if Professor Shortt has drawn to himself since he came to Ottawa the attributes that he is alleged to bear, then I think it is the duty of this House to take into consideration the place that he ought to occupy. Those of us who were more or less interested in Civil Service reform welcomed the appointment of a Civil Service Commission. But when the chairman of the Civil Service Commission is charged with having so far forgotten himself as to become biased and partisan, it seems to me not unreasonable that an inquiry should be set on foot. If the ministers were sincere in the allegations that they have placed before the House and the country this afternoon, then it is incumbent upon the Prime Minister to name a committee of this House, if necessary, to act in conjunction with a committee of the Senate, to inquire fully into the conduct of the chairman of the Civil Service Commission. He owes it not only to this House and to each one of us who must bear a certain responsibility for the discharge of the duty of the Civil Service Commission, but he owes it to the country as well. For, if the Civil Service Commission breaks down it must be more difficult for the right hon. leader of the Government to put into effect one of the planks of his Halifax platform—Civil Service reform. I wish to say to the House and to the country through you, that if the condition is as serious as was represented to us this afternoon, I believe that it is incumbent upon the Ministry to name a committee of this kind or to call Professor Shortt before the Bar of this House so that there may be an opportunity for an investigation. If the charges made in this House this afternoon are proven to be true, no one will be more willing than I to see Professor Shortt removed from office. But if the charges are not true, it is not necessary for me to advise the House what should be done, because hon. gentlemen at all times know the courtesy that is demanded towards men who have been wrongly assailed.

Hon. W. T. WHITE (Minister of Finance): A few words will suffice for my contribution to this debate. Silence on my part, especially in view of the fact that my department was particularly referred to by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) this afternoon would be unfair to myself. With respect to the return which was referred to, or was alleged to have been referred to, by Professor Shortt in his address on the evening of the 14th February, I requested my department to prepare a statement with respect to that return, and I am sure that a memorandum from him will be entirely satisfactory to all the members of this House. And I desire, in fairness to myself as I have said, and in fairness to my department, to place the memorandum on Hansard. It is as follows:

The undersigned has had examination made of the answer rendered by this department to the above question. As in the case of all questions and returns to the House of Commons, the answer is given to the question as asked without argument.

The answer of the Finance Department was divided into two parts, (1) relating to the Finance Department with the office of the Assistant Receiver General, and (2) in relation to what is called Departments Generally, or the Char Service. The latter was included because the question comprehended all services and all departments.

(1) In the case of the Finance Department proper, the answer was given as follows:

That is the answer that was embodied in the return which was discussed here to-day.

Dismissed	1
Resigned	12
Deserted	..
Deserters punished	..
Appointed	26

The answer is absolutely correct; but to found an argument upon it as to excessive appointments would lead to error because in the question no mention is made of the members who died, who were superannuated or who were transferred; nor of vacancies existing. The following statement will show the net increase in the period referred to so far as the Finance Department is concerned:

Dismissed	1
Resigned	12
Superannuated	4
Died	4
Transferred	1
Vacancies existing Oct. 10, 1911	2
Total	24
Appointments	26
Net increase	2

Now, in the return made to the House, if we have regard, as Professor Shortt is reported to have had regard, only to dismissals and resigned employees on the one side and to new appointments on the other, the figures would be, for the former 13 and for the latter 26. That is to say, unless the statement were accompanied by the explanation I am now giving, it would appear that we had dismissed one, that twelve had resigned, and that we had appointed twenty-six to do the work that these thirteen had formerly done; whereas in reality the total increase in the staff of the department up to the date of the return, was 2. Now, my deputy goes on:

(2) Departments Generally.

In the case of the char service the return given was as follows:

Dismissed	7
Resigned	22
Deserted	..
Deserters punished	..
Appointed	199

During that time, however, twelve charwomen died so that the net increase was as follows:

Dismissed	7
Resigned	22
Deserters	..
Deserters punished	..
Died	12
Total	41
Appointed	199
Net increase	158

The statement shows that the net increase was 158, but if the return be interpreted as it is reported to have been interpreted by Prof. Shortt, then the figures would be as follows: dismissed, 7; resigned, 22; total, 29; appointments, 199, a difference of 170. But if Prof. Shortt had inquired—and he might very well have inquired, because no man in the city was in a better position to do so,—he would have ascertained that the increase in the char services during the period indicated resulted from the Government's occupying the following 24 buildings.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Additional buildings?

Mr. WHITE: Additional buildings, as follows: Central station, Blackburn building, 500 Sussex street building, Rideau club, 69 Vittoria street, Robinson building, old Union Bank building, 241 Wellington street, Hope building, 6th flat, 223 Queen street building, 328 Queen street building, Quebec Bank building, 265½ Wellington street, Masonic Temple building, Booth building, 14 Kent street building, 105 Vittoria street building, Journal building, 27 Cliff street building, old museum building, biological laboratory, McKay street building, two extra flats in Imperial building, new wing, East block. Unaccompanied by this explanation, it would appear that I had dismissed a number of these worthy charwomen, and had appointed in their stead not the number dismissed, namely 7, but, to do the same work, not less than 199.

Mr. CARROLL: Did you dismiss seven?

Mr. WHITE: I dismissed none of them. Since I took office I have refrained from even considering such a trifling question as the dismissal of a charwoman for partisan or other reasons. My hon. friend's suggestion rather shows what would be in his mind if he were here and I were there.

Mr. CARROLL: I think my hon. friend said that seven were dismissed.

Mr. WHITE: They were dismissed for cause by the officers of the department.

An hon. MEMBER: For political partisanship?

Mr. WHITE: No, not for political partisanship. The hon. member for the city of St. John rather seemed to suggest that the renting of the buildings may have been unnecessary. The trouble with the hon. member for St. John and certain other gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, who have spoken not only on this occasion but recently in connection with the Budget debate as well, is that they evidently labour under the delusion that when they stopped governing, this country stopped growing. I would point out to my hon. friends that the sun continues its daily journey east and west through the heavens, even though a clock may have run down. The hon. member for Red Deer threatens to meet us at Philippi in the Budget debate. We will be there. Let me point out to him that the year before this Government took office the total trade of this country was $750,000,000. The year we took office it was $850,000,000; the next year it was $1,000,000,000, and the next year $1,100,000,000. When we took office the revenue of Canada was $135,000,000; the second year it was $168,000,000—the best by far in the history of the Dominion—and the next year it was $163,000,000. This year, of course, we have the war.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh; the war.

Mr. WHITE: I am surprised to learn that hon. gentlemen opposite do not seem to be aware that a war is now proceeding. It has been borne in on me on many occasions; it was borne in on me yesterday. Intellectual as my hon. friend the member for St. John is, he lacks the vision and imagination. While the great allied fleet has been smashing its way through the Dardanelles on the way to Constantinople, and, according to the despatches, the Allies and Turkish troops are in conflict on the plains of Troy, where gods and heroes contended in prehistoric times, what was my hon. friend discussing in this House? The duty upon squid. Reductio ad absurdum—fertilizers and squid. Having regard to the fact that there is in progress a war not only greater than any that has ever occurred in the history of the world, but greater than the aggregate of all wars that have ever taken place I would point out that the people will expect hon. gentlemen to get a proper sense of the perspective of the situation.

Mr. DEVLIN: That is not fair.

Mr. MACDONALD: What were you doing?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. WHITE: I would suggest that they get a proper sense of perspective in regard to the great war in which we are now engaged. But, to come back to the subject of our discussion, which is at least more important than the matter of squid—

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think the Budget mentioned squid.

Mr. WHITE: It does, but my hon. friend did not understand the Budget.

An hon. MEMBER: The people will.

Mr. WHITE: Yes, they do understand it. I would suggest to my hon. friends that they go to the reading room, turn over the pages of the newspapers issued in various parts of the Dominion, and see how many editorials they will find on the Budget.

Mr. GRAHAM: Quite a number.

Mr. WHITE: Not many. Some may be found in the paper of my hon. friend in Montreal, but not in many other papers. I wish to say this with regard to the matter under consideration.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE: If my hon. friends desire that I should speak to the question, I must ask them not to interrupt; if they interrupt, I purpose answering them. I am like the Scotchman who said he was a peaceful man, but if there was any fighting to do he was not going to take any blows lying down.

With regard to the matter under immediate consideration, I desire to say this: I have known Professor Shortt for many years. I have never on any occasion spoken ill of him; I have always spoken well of him. My right hon. friend called attention to a very important matter this afternoon in introducing this subject. He said that Professor Shortt was amenable not to this Government but to Parliament. As I understand the situation, the assertion of my right hon. friend is correct. I desire to say further that I have no intention whatever of prejudging this matter. I have seen no contradiction by Professor Shortt of the report of his speech. On the contrary, I have before me an article published in the Ottawa Free Press of February 26 purporting to be an interview with Professor Shortt. There is no denial, so far as I can ascertain, of the report which was published in the Citizen on Monday, February 15, the day after Professor Shortt's remarks were made. If Professor Shortt is, as I believe he is, responsible to Parliament, that does not necessarily mean that his actions or conduct may not be criticised in a proper case by this House. But I would say that, occupying, as he does, a position quasi-judicial in its character, it is absolutely incumbent upon Prof. Shortt, or any man who may occupy that position, that he should not in any way intermeddle, or give the appearance of intermeddling, in party politics, that he should avoid the appearance of being influenced in the slightest degree by partisan considerations, in any statement that he may make. Without going into the question of whether he intentionally made these statements or not, Prof. Shortt is a man of very high intelligence, and he might have known, in fact I think he should have known, that in speaking as he did, he was placing before the public a statement which those to whom it might be of political advantage to use would not hesitate to avail themselves of, as they did, Mr. Speaker, as shown by the Minister of Public Works this afternoon.

Now, of what was Prof. Shortt talking? According to this report he was talking of patronage. Taking my own department, because I have risen only for the purpose of defending it, any one might infer, in so far as the returns from my department form a part of the total returns brought down, that, in the exercise of political patronage, I had dismissed twelve or more employees in the Finance Department and had replaced them with something over two hundred. Now, that would be what the public would gather from the statements made by Prof. Shortt, or alleged to have been made by him, and, so far as I can ascertain, not contradicted by him, in this report which has formed the subject of discussion this afternoon. As I have said, a man in Prof. Shortt's position should be absolutely judicial, absolutely impartial; he should have made his statement in such a way that if the naked figures went out they would be accompanied by such explanation as would set all the facts clearly before the public. He failed to do so and the impression went out to the country that this Government had dismissed 2,000 employees and substituted in their place 10,000 employees, and the public would naturally draw the conclusion, and hon. gentlemen opposite fostered that view, because they availed themselves at once of the information, that we had deliberately dismissed, under our powers of patronage, 2,000 employees and substituted 10,000 without additional duties. I say, and I go no further than this because I am not sufficiently familiar with all the facts and hesitate to prejudge the case, that Professor Shortt, in my judgment, was guilty at least of indiscretion, in making a statement of this kind without making also the necessary explanations, which have been given by my colleagues and myself here this afternoon. It is absolutely unfair to us, and has been made use of, presumably to our political disadvantage, by hon. gentlemen opposite, who now make on a question of privilege, an attack upon the Minister of Public Works for resenting the statement which has been used, as I have said, presumbaly to the disadvantage of the Government. My own view is that a man occupying a judicial or quasi-judicial position in this country should not interfere in politics at all, and should avoid statements that will reflect upon either the Government of the day or the Opposition. I would ask that from judges on the Bench, and I think we can ask no less from members of the Civil Service Commission.

The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) was disposed to take a charitable view of the matter. He said the fault lay with those who had made use of the figures, in a sense that Professor Shortt did not intend. Then I say he should at once chide his associates on the other side of the House for so quickly taking up, in a time of alleged truce, this statement, shown this afternoon to have been in substance and in fact absolutely false, and passing it on to the country for the truth, when it is not the truth, as I have shown conclusively in connection with my department, and as some of my colleagues have shown conclusively in connection with their departments. I would say that the judicial spirit, a spirit of the most strict and scrupulous impartiality, should be exhibited by every member of the Civil Service Commission, because, as in the case of the judiciary, I hold that confidence, the confidence of every one in this House, of both parties, and of the Government and Opposition, confidence in the fairness and impartiality of the members of that tribunal, is the very foundation and basis of its usefulness.

Mr. MACDONALD: What does the hon. minister think of the suggestion of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) as to how this matter should be disposed of?

Mr. WHITE: I think over a great number of things that my hon. friend puts forward, and probably he would not mind if I would think over this suggestion also.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Wright): Mr. Speaker, I do not intervene in this debate for the purpose of discussing the relative merits of the understanding of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) and of Professor Shortt. The Minister of Public Works was discussing the return of his own department, and, as I understand it, Professor Shortt was discussing the returns of the different departments of the Government. But I would like to say a word respecting the appointments to the inside service and to the outside service, since the right hon. the Prime Minister has given us this opportunity, and we may not have another opportunity this session. But just before entering upon the very few remarks I propose to make, I would like to say to the Minister of Finance that we on this side of the House have always considered him too big a man to make a statement such as he made a few moments ago, when he said that we upon this side of the House do not thoroughly appreciate the gravity of the situation which confronts the Empire. I say that as regards myself, at least, and I am sure as regards every hon. member upon this side of the House, no more dishonourable, no more dishonest, no more unfair statement, Sir, has ever been made in this House.

Mr. SPEAKER: I wish to say to the hon. member that the use of such language is not permissible. He cannot apply such a word as "dishonourable" to a statement made by a member of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Take it back.

Mr. DEVLIN: I will take back anything which is against the rules of the House. I am not applying the words to the statement made by the Minister of Finance. I am saying, Sir, and I repeat, that so far as the statement refers to members of this House, no more dishonourable, no more dishonest, and no more unfair statement could be made.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member cannot evade the rules in an indirect way. By the rules of debate, it is not permissible to impute dishonourable motives to any hon. member in this House.

Mr. DEVLIN: I submit to your ruling, Sir, as I always do in this House. I will say that it would be dishonourable, dishonest, and unfair for any hon. member of this House to have, upon the subject of the war confronting the British Empire at the present moment, feelings such as the Minister of Finance would have the House believe that hon. gentlemen on this side of House possess. Am I within the rules of the House, Mr. Speaker? I presume the only object of the Minister of Finance in making such a statement was to lead the country to believe that the Opposition, in discussing the Budget or any question which comes before the House, was trying to prevent the Government from carrying out all measures necessary, in their judgment, for the defence of this country. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that we upon this side of the House have as keen a sense of our responsibilities as members of this House as those who have imputed to us such unfair, dishonest and dishonourable conduct. I want to say further, that there are too many men fighting the battles of the motherland on the battlefields of Europe at the present time and directly related to us on this side of the House to allow us to forget for a single moment this awful war, if we had absolutely no other reason to remind us of our duties in this conflict.

I have but a few words to add concerning the Civil Service of this country. At Halifax the right hon. the Premier made the following statement:

> A thorough and complete reformation of the laws relating to the Civil Service should be put into effect, so that future appointments shall be made by an independent commission acting upon the report of examiners after competitive examination. I am convinced that we shall perform a great public duty by establishing in this country that system which prevails in Great Britain, under which a member of parliament has practically no voice in or control over any appointment to the Civil Service.
> To use the power of filling positions in the public service as a reward for party service and without regard to the character and capacity of the individual selected is a gross breach of a solemn public trust... A private trustee so dishonouring his office would be subject to punishment by the criminal law.

When the right hon. Prime Minister made that statement the country believed that he intended to reform the Civil Service. Following that solemn pledge given to the people of this country, the Prime Minister brought from England Sir George Murray. Sir George Murray made a report upon the Civil Service. A great sum of money was spent in connection with the report but no action was taken upon it. Carrying out his pledge still further, the Prime Minister had investigating commissioners appointed throughout the country, to investigate into the acts of civil servants during the campaign of 1911. When the investigating commissioners found that civil servants were taking part in the elections, another step was taken, if not in all cases, at least in some which have come to my attention. The employee was very politely asked for his resignation. If he did not resign he would be dismissed. The employee consequently tendered his resignation under compulsion, knowing that the alternative would be dismissal. As many Grits as possible were got out of the service in that way, and we now find that to take the place of some two or four thousand civil servants—I am indifferent as to the figures—some ten or eleven thousand were appointed. Of course it is simply a question of proportion just how many Tories we required to take the place of a Grit. But if three Tories are necessary to take the place of one Grit who has been dismissed, and the country has to pay these three Tories, I think the country will say that it would have been better to leave that Grit in his place, and certainly cheaper for the country.

This patronage question has always been a disturbing one in this country. During some eight years I have had considerable experience in patronage myself, and I know pretty will what I am speaking of. I do not think there is an hon. member upon either side of the House who, if he spoke the truth, would not say that he would like to see patronage abolished. I am not speaking in a carping spirit, and I do not want to attack the Government or to lay any unnecessary blame upon it. I should like to see the Government find some way of remedying the condition of the outside service in this country. I understand that my right hon. friend could not very well place the whole outside service under one central commission. The right hon. gentleman has found fault with what the Liberal party have done. We undertook to reform the Civil Service. We began by appointing a commission to deal with the inside service, and in time we would have reached the outside service. But the party which replaced the Liberal party has not yet been able to come before the country and say what they purpose to do to reform this iniquitous system. How well I remember the Minister of Trade and Commerce holding up his hands with horror and saying: This system of patronage is iniquitous; you are appointing men to office upon the recommendation of members of Parliament; such a state of things should not exist. Mr. Speaker, I, too, believe that such things should not exist. I feel that if it were possible to deal with the outside service as a great employer deals with his help, it would be a great deal better for the country, and a great deal better for the members supporting the Government. It takes away from the usefulness of a Government supporter to be continually harassed by demands for Government positions. Take the case of the Minister of Public Works. I do not suppose there is a better natured man in the Cabinet than he. But what can he do? A dozen or twenty members get after him for appointments of their friends to the outside service. He would like to refuse, but he cannot; he is too good-hearted. Besides he is not paying the salaries himself; the country pays them. And so he takes on twenty or thirty or forty or a thousand or two thousand. It does not matter to him. Let the country pay. He is a good fellow, and the members will continue to support the Government. The late Postmaster General was even a better natured man than my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, for according to a return brought down he appointed some nine thousand men. He showed better nature there than I think any man in this House would have given him credit for.

Just a word of recommendation to the Prime Minister in closing. Get busy in connection with the patronage system. It has given trouble at all times in this country. It has been reported that during a coalition Government, the Government was upset because the members supporting the Liberal party could not conciliate the Tory end of the Cabinet, and the Tories could not satisfy the Liberal end in the matter of appointments.

I feel that the Prime Minister would like to do something better, and it is now time for him to find some way in which to improve the outside service. I am very sorry that at the beginning of my remarks I may have been a little harsher with my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) than I had meant to be, but I know that he will not bear me any ill will.

Mr. W. T. WHITE: Not a bit.

Mr. DEVLIN: At this critical time in the Empire's history we all have a pretty strong feeling on the question of the war.

Hon. T. CHASE CASGRAIN (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, as I represent in this House what has been described as the most offending department of the Government, I desire to say a few words in defence of the administration of the Post Office Department. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Devlin) has said that it appears by the return which was produced here this afternoon that my predecessor made about 9,000 appointments during the three years covered by the return brought down. Although I hold no brief for my predecessor, Hon. L. P. Pelletier, who enjoys the reputation, in this House and in this country, of having been one of the best administrators that ever presided over the Post Office Department, I feel that it is my duty to answer the statement made by the hon. member (Mr. Devlin). I shall give a few figures to show the number of employees in the Post Office Department, and the extent of the business done by the department, during the last three years, which will, I believe, justify the increase in the number of employees. Do hon. gentlemen know that in the department in Ottawa we have over 700 employees, that outside of the department we have 8,000 employees, and that there are over 15,000 postmasters, making a total of about 23,700 employees, and, therefore, if within the last three years 8,000 or 9,000 appointments have been made, it need surprise no one. Hon. gentlemen upon the other side of the House will admit that during the greater portion of this period the business of the country was growing by leaps and bounds, and that, under such circumstances, it was not at all strange that 9,000 new appointments should have been made? The Post Office Department is not essentially a revenue producing department; it renders a public service to the country, which, to be effective, and to meet the demands of our modern civilization must be the very best that money can procure. I conceive it to be the duty of the Postmaster General to make our postal service as perfect as possible, and that is the duty I have set before me to discharge, whether I have a surplus in the department or whether I have a deficit. The post office cannot stand still; it must progress with the progress of Canada.

Let me refer to the reports of the Post Office Department for the last two years. I find in the report of the Postmaster General for the year ended March 31, 1913—

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Why not take the report for the year 1914?

Mr. CASGRAIN: I am coming to that, if my hon. friend will possess his soul in patience for one minute; it is a better report than the report for 1913 and I am leaving the choice morsel for the last. The report for 1913 says:

> There has been an increase of 2,151 miles in the extent of the system over which mails are carried by railway. The number of miles which mails have been carried by railway and water routes, and ordinary land routes is greater by 2,264,362 miles than it was for the year before.
> The estimated increase in the number of letters and post cards sent during the year is 73,252,000, which is about 11⅘ per cent more than the figures of 1912.
> Owing to the growth of the service in the directions mentioned, the expenditure has increased by $1,710,769.10, as compared with last year, but there was a surplus from the operation of the service which amounts to $1,177,671.86.

Then by the report for the year ended March 31, 1914. We find that there was an increase of 350 in the number of post office money order offices, and an increase of 38 in the number of post office savings bank offices. There was an increase of 648 in the number of new post offices which, multiplied by three, for the three years for which the report has been brought down, would give an increase of over 1,800 new post offices, with a corresponding increase in the number of employees in those offices. The report for 1914 says:

> There has been an increase of 913 miles in the extent of the system over which the mails are carried by railway. The number of miles which mails have been carried by railway and water routes, and ordinary land routes is greater by 4,278,257 miles than it was for the year before.
> The estimated increase in the number of letters and post cards sent during the year is 43,519,000, which is about 6¼ per cent more than the figures of 1913.
> The number of rural mail delivery routes has been increased by 940, and over 48,000 boxes have been erected on these additional routes.

One must also take into account the establishment of the parcel post, which necessitated the appointment of quite a number of new employees.

I repeat that the post office service cannot stand still, that it must keep on growing with the country, that an increasing number of employees is necessary to give a good service as the business increases, and that the department and the Government, instead of being blamed, as they have been blamed by hon. gentlemen opposite to-day, should have been eulogized and lauded for what they have done.

Let me call your attention to one or two facts. I wonder how many hon. gentlemen have ever been in the post office in the city of Toronto. I visited the post office in Toronto in the month of December last and I was astonished to see the increase in the business of that office and the volume of business carried on there. I observed the businesslike way in which the employees were working and that every employee was absolutely intent upon doing his work and doing it well. Do hon. gentlemen realise that within the last two or three years the business of the Toronto post office has so increased that to-day there is more business being done in the Toronto office than in the post offices in Montreal and in Winnipeg combined? It was incumbent upon the Post Office Department to man the Toronto post office so that that great and enterprising city should have a post office worthy of it. The city of Montreal is increasing in population at the rate of 50,000 a year. Do hon. gentlemen opposite think that the post office service in that growing city should be allowed to stand still? Surely it was good business to keep up with the times and so it was necessary to increase the number of employees in the post office in Montreal during the last two or three years.

Something has been said by my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) as to the report which was brought down and which includes in it the 9,000 employees who appeared to have been appointed during the last three years. I am told by the responsible officers of the department that this figure of 9,000 includes the temporary employees who are appointed for the rush seasons at Christmas and New Years, and that it includes also the employees whom the Post Office Department is obliged to take on during the summer months when a very considerable number of the ordinary employees are given their holidays. If you take the increased business of the post offices in the great cities into consideration, the establishment of new post offices and new systems, if you remember that in the interests of the whole community the post office service cannot be allowed to stand still while the country is making progress, and if you take into consideration the further fact that the number which is mentioned in that report embraces not only all the employees who have been appointed permanently but the temporary employees also, you must come to the conclusion that as to the Post Office Department we are able confidently to come before Parliament to justify our policy.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Customs): I do not wish to prolong this debate; but as Professor Shortt has paid a little attention to my department, I feel that it would not be fair to that department to let this discussion close without making a few remarks. The remarks of Professor Shortt that apply to my department are comprised in this short statement:

> Professor Shortt asked: "Who took the places of the 2,000 civil servants who were reported in the House the other day to have been dismissed from the service?" His reply to his own question was, "Just 10,000."

In the return submitted from my department, the question was asked: How many dismissals? The answer was: 271. In addition to that there was question No. 2: How many resignations? The answer was: 194 resignations. Professor Shortt, in his statement, never referred to the resignations; and therefore, as far as the Customs is concerned, I do not hesitate to say that his statement was false and untrue and dishonest in every shape and form. I also do not hesitate to say, knowing Professor Shortt, that the statement was made deliberately for the purpose of influencing the electorate of this country politically against this Government.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What does the hon. member know about Professor Shortt to make him believe that this statement was deliberately dishonest?

Mr. REID: Deliberately dishonest because he did not include some of the answers in the return brought down.

Mr. MACLEAN: That is not answering my question. The minister says his knowledge of Professor Shortt led him to the conclusion that that statement was deliberately dishonest.

Mr. REID: Professor Shortt, before he became Chairman of the Civil Service Commission, was a bitter politician, and from that time forward I have never learned that he has changed in that respect.

Mr. MACLEAN: Then, are all politicians or men interested in politics dishonest?

Mr. REID: Certainly not. I would not for one moment make that charge.

Mr. MACLEAN: That is what you say.

Mr. REID: I wish to state that if any man is appointed to and continues in a Government position, if he uses it for political purposes, he is dishonest.

I would not for one moment attribute anything unfair to the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean), but I rose more particularly to correct a statement which he made, because I fear that it may go to the public and they may believe him where they will not believe Professor Shortt. If my hon. friend will refer to page 387 of the Unrevised Hansard, when the hon. junior member for Halifax—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. It is not permissible to refer to a previous debate.

Mr. REID: When the hon. member was addressing this House with reference to my department on the 23rd of January last, he made the statement that a return showed that in about two years in the customs service there were 271 dismissals.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACLEAN: I think the minister should have an opportunity of making his statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member cannot hope to evade the rule of the House in that way.

Mr. REID: I do not wish to evade the rule of the House, but I wish to say that I have heard the hon. junior member for Halifax make the statement that a return brought down in this House showed that there were 271 dismissals and 1,659 appointments. When he made that statement, I claim that in fairness to the Customs Department he should have stated also that the return showed 271 dismissals and 194 resignations. In other words, he made the same mistake as Professor Shortt did when he was making his speech in Ottawa on that Sunday evening. It was unfair to the Customs Department for the junior member for Halifax to let a statement of that kind go to the public from this House. If I did not take this opportunity of correcting his statement it would not be fair to my department.

9 p.m.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: At the time I made the statement, I did not know about the resignations.

Mr. REID: I take that answer as correct; but if I remember aright the hon. member's statement, he said he had a return that justified that statement.

Mr. CARROLL: Does the hon. member know the number of desertions in his department?

Mr. REID: I have not the statement before me of desertions, superannuations, deaths, or temporary employees; but the offices became vacant for reasons that I stated at the time. The statement made by Professor Shortt from the return which he had was not fair to my department. When I read the report of Professor Shortt's speech, knowing him as I did, I felt that it was made for political reasons. If not, why did Professor Shortt, if he wanted information, not come to the House of Commons and get the return laid upon the table of the House? Any one reading that return would know that it was not complete. There should have been more questions on it in order to give a full and complete answer. Professor Shortt has been Chairman of the Civil Service Commission for a number of years. He could have got officially from every deputy minister all the information he wanted as to the number of employees of each department, and then he would have been in a position to give a fair statement to the public.

Some hon. gentlemen opposite say that the Civil Service should be reformed. I was in this House prior to 1896. Hon. gentlemen opposite know that we had a Civil Service Act in force at that time. There was the inside service and the outside service; and hon. gentlemen know that the Civil Serevice Act made it necessary for officials of the outside service, in many of the departments such as Customs, Inland Revenue and others, to pass an examination for the different positions. When hon. gentlemen opposite came into power in 1896, they were not satisfied with our Civil Service Act and they immediately started to reform the Civil Service. This is how they reformed it between 1896 and 1911. In the Customs outside service there is a class of preventive officers who are appointed without examination and who are supposed to be employed for the prevention of smuggling along the border.

Immediately on the Liberals coming into power they appointed all the officials preventive officers. Instead of limiting the age to thirty-five years as the Civil Service Act requires for the Customs service, they engaged them all the way up to seventy-five or eighty years of age, putting men into the service who were absolutely of no use whatever. After getting into power the Liberals thought it would be better to have a commission with Professor Shortt as chairman. Professor Shortt has ability, there is no doubt about that; but he certainly was a politician and a good one for the Liberal party. He started out to reform the Civil Service, and he was going to show how he could improve it by means of examinations. If I want a customs officer to-day, I have to get one who will answer questions, samples of which I will give. And when I quote these questions, I would like to know if there is a man in this House, from the right hon. gentleman who leads the House, down to the humblest member, who can answer them. If we want a locker, simply a man to open cases, etc., a labouring man, he has to pass an examination and to get a certain proportion of marks in each subject. For instance, he has to know a little about geography, so he is supposed to answer this question:

In what sections of Canada is lumbering an important industry? Where does the lumber for each section find a market?

From what places in western Europe do Canadians get silk, cotton goods, woollens, oranges, steel?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Are not those proper questions relating to the customs?

Mr. REID: They are not improper if you can get a man to answer them. But I venture to say the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) could not answer them himself. Now, if I want a clerk, he has to be able to answer some questions in history such as the following:

What were the Crusades? When did they take place? Name some important events connected with them.

Give an account of the French revolution of 1791, as follows: (a) Causes; (b) Prominent men who took part; (c) Important events.

He must know something of grammar, of course, and so he is asked to parse each italicised word and phrase in an extract which is given. And he is virtually told: If you cannot parse these words you cannot get into the Customs service.

Mr. GRAHAM: Cannot parse.

Mr. REID: Here are more questions in geography:

Where do the people of Great Britain and Ireland obtain the raw materials for the manufacture of silk, tobacco, cotton, woollen and leather goods?

Compare the climate of Manitoba with that of England. What natural conditions cause the difference?

Perhaps I ought not to give more for fear of making the whole Civil Service look ridiculous. But let me give one or two questions in arithmetic:

A person watches a train and finds that it takes 17 seconds to pass him. The train is 374 feet long. At what rate in miles per hour is the train travelling?

A starts on a journey at the rate of 3 miles an hour; 6 hours afterwards B starts after him at the rate of 4 miles an hour. How far will B travel before he overtakes A?

How many days will it take 30 men to do a piece of work which 20 men can do in 45 days?

Now, let me give a few figures as to my own department. In the inside service, in October, 1911, we had 198 employees, and in January of this year we had 232 employees, an increase of 34. In the outside service, I admit, there has been a large increase. We had 2,273 officers in October, 1910-11, and 3,144 in January, 1914-15, an increase of 871. But let me point out that our revenue for 1911 was $73,312,367.50, while in 1914 our customs revenue was $107,179,360.33. In 1910-11 we had customs entries to the number of 1,387,310 inwards and 404,664 outwards. In 1913-14 we had 1,898,110 inwards and 507,224 outwards, or, in round numbers half a million more entries inwards and a hundred thousand more outwards.

Mr. GRAHAM: Like the appointments—more inward than outward.

Mr. REID: There was good reason for every appointment made. The hon. member for South Renfrew knows, perhaps better than anybody else, the policy of his own party when they came into power. He knows that they dismissed every man on the St. Lawrence canals and then put on the same number as had been formerly employed.

Mr. GRAHAM: But there were not half so many as there are now.

Mr. REID: There are no more on the canals now than there were when the Liberals turned these men out.

Mr. MURPHY: Not in winter time.

Mr. REID: Talking of the winter time, when the Liberal party was in power they spent $35,000 in keeping the canals lighted, though they were all frozen up. I have shown that in my department there was a very large increase.

Mr. MARCIL: What is the revenue up to the first of the present month?

Mr. REID: I have not those figures before me, but I am very glad to be able to tell the hon. member that the revenue for last month was about $250,000 higher than for the same month last year.

Mr. W. M. MARTIN: And the war still on?

Mr. REID: So far as the increase in the number of employees is concerned, the Customs Department is in the same position as the Post Office Department. We have opened some 54 new outports. We have had demands from the collectors of the large ports—Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Victoria and other important centres—for more employees; we have not appointed any more officials than the collectors and inspectors reported to be absolutely necessary. I think it will be agreed that in view of the large increase in revenue, very many more officials were required. The people will know, from the statements of fact that have been made from time to time in this House, that we were justified in increasing the number of employees in the Department of Customs. I rose not particularly to explain this phase of the question, but to correct the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) and to point out that the assertions that I heard him make in this House are not in accordance with the return that was brought down. The people will know, therefore, that the statement made by the hon. member cannot be accepted as a justifiable charge against the Customs Department.

Having regard to the utterances of Prof. Shortt, I care very little what assertions go forth in respect of my department. We all know what he is politically; we all know what he would do so far as the Civil Service and the Government are concerned. I believe that Prof. Shortt's statements were made deliberately to injure the Government, and I feel that after making those statements he is not entitled to very much consideration from this House, from the Government, or from the people of Canada.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): There are a number of reasons why I should take part in this debate, but the chief one is that I could not resist the temptation to take advantage of the inspiration which would be afforded me by following the very excellent discourse which we have received from the Minister of Customs on the educational development of this country. I consider it a great pity that a man like the Minister of Customs should be obliged to devote himself to adding up columns of figures and worrying about customs houses and that sort of thing when the educational development of Canada is in need of his assistance. I endeavoured to follow him in the remarks which he made—I am an old school teacher—but in many respects he was a little too swift for me. I thought I would have some fun with him on the question of parsing, but he carefully avoided that subject; I do not think he is particularly fond of parsing. He kept away from analysis, too; analysis was never his forte. I have listened to his speeches in this House for the last 10 or 12 years, and I am in a position to say that they certainly would not stand much analysis. His composition is heresy of the first water; his theology is blasphemy. If there is any method by which the Prime Minister can make a shuffle in the Cabinet and have some one else take the position of Minister of Customs, I would advise him to do so, thus giving the country the benefit of my hon. friend's services as an educationalist—because that is his proper sphere.

The hon. minister was wont in the course of his remarks to discard almost everything as being too difficult. I wonder if he would permit us to discard certain difficult portions of the multiplication table. When I was learning the multiplication table I remember that seven times nine times were regarded as exceedingly difficult; perhaps the minister would, in his capacity as educationalist, direct his efforts towards having these portions of the multiplication table discarded. My hon. friend's attitude reminds me forcibly of the story of the negro who had three things to look after, two blast furnaces and a locomotive. Reporting in the morning, he said: The fires in the furnaces burned out and they were useless all night, and the locomotive was out of order; otherwise, everything was all right. The minister was coming down the scale so rapidly and throwing away everything as he came along that I thought he was not going to approve of anything. It would seem that the babe as he came from the cradle is the kind of officer my hon. friend wants for his department.

As to history, my hon. friend no doubt appreciates the fact that the history of the Tory party would be exceedingly embarrassing. As to geography, why should a Tory know where he is or where he is going? In respect of ordinary mathematics, particularly with regard to the cost of things, the minister and his friends do not bother their heads very much. These things are all very embarrassing to my hon. friend; all defences—if the Prime Minister will pardon my referring to a stale legal phrase—are embarrassing. I would suggest that the Prime Minister give the Minister of Customs a free hand, and let him adopt as his ideal the style of education which Adam had when he was fresh from the hands of the Creator. I should like to find out from my hon. friend the kind of syllabus that he would prepare for submission to the high educationalists of the province of Ontario. So much for the question of education.

I know enough about the Prime Minister to believe that he would like to give everybody a fair show and a fair trial. I do not believe that the atmosphere with which he is now surrounded would change his attitude in that respect. The right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition has brought up a question which involves affording a gentleman who holds a high office in this country, a servant of the people, an opportunity of defending himself and of explaining his position. This high court of Parliament is not open to him; his position is such that he cannot very well defend himself on the platform. He has no right to ask a minister of the Government or anybody else in this House to meet him on the hustings for the purpose of discussing the matter, and he is, therefore, shut out from the ordinary means of defence which are open to other persons. I think, therefore, that it is but fair and proper that the right hon. leader of the Opposition should bring this matter to the attention of the House. I am sorry to find that the matter was dealt with in such a harsh and turbulent manner by hon. gentlemen on the Government side of the House. I observed to-day that the Minister of Marine was running at very high tension and on very high gear shortly after he commenced speaking. When the Minister of Marine has only very poor grist the mill goes at a tremendous rate of speed, the wheels sound very high; and I should not wish for any better evidence of very poor substance and very poor grist for his mill than the speed at which he was going to-day. He had nothing, and so it was like him to pour a continuous tirade of abuse on this man Shortt, who is not here to defend himself. I submit, with all candour, that I do not think it is an evidence of bravery on the part of big men to get absolutely fortified within the walls of this House, and, under the privileges which are theirs by reason of being members of Parliament, abuse a poor fellow who is tied hand and foot and cannot answer for himself. I am pleased to know that there was not very much of a case made out against this man Shortt. The awful noise that was made about his mis-statement turns out in this way: He says that 10,000 men were appointed anew by this Administration, within the last few years, over and above filling every office that fell vacant by any of the different ways by which vacancies occur. A return was brought down, or a calculation made from a return, which shows that not only 8,000 or 10,000 but 11,000 appointments were made, after providing for every resignation and every dismissal. That is the statement made by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) as I understand it. That is not all. There are some departments yet to be heard from. If it is true, and it is from the records of the different departments, that 11,000 extra appointments have been made over and above the number in office when this Government came into power, what is the trouble over the statement made by Professor Shortt? It reminds me of an old man I once knew who made a great fuss because some one said he was twenty pounds in debt. He said it was scoundrelly, rascally, and unfair—I am now following the vocabulary of the Minister of Marine—that he was not twenty pounds in debt. He was asked what his debt was, and he said it was not twenty pounds; it was 19 pounds, 19 shillings, and tuppence, which was just a half penny short of the twenty pounds. Even if Professor Shortt said that 10,000 had been appointed, what is the fuss about? He said 10,000 or 8,000, and we find 11,000 new men appointed. If that is true, why should there be such a fuss about it? It is simply proving that perhaps Prof. Shortt did not make his statement exactly in a way that would suit hon. gentlemen, but when it is all boiled down, when you come down to the hard facts, to brass tacks as the saying is, if $11,000,000 must be provided this year over the amount provided in 1911 to pay for the Civil Service, and only to provide for new appointments, there is no particular fault to be found with Professor Shortt except that he made that statement publicly. It has been said here that this man is a narrow partisan. I never so understood from any one I have talked with. I have not the honour of his acquaintance, but members beside me speak of him as rather an austere man, who would not give way to anybody, who held opinions of his own and would not give them up. The first time I ever heard of him in Nova Scotia was when he was selected as chairman of a board of conciliation by the other members of the board, who agreed that he was a man eminently fair and just, and suitable to preside over a board to bring about a settlement of a labour dispute. From that day to this I have never heard of him as being a narrow partisan. However, be that as it may, I hope he will get justice at the hands of the Government, and if there is any defence necessary that he shall be given the fullest opportunity of making it.

The Minister of Marine and Fisheries was very austere this afternoon about members of the Civil Service or any one who was receiving money from the Government for services, doing anything but just properly earning the salary paid to them. I wish to see how he is carrying out this austere system in his own department. I wish to know if he has kept his officers in the department over which he so ably presides right down to the rule which he laid down for Professor Shortt. Last winter, from my place in this House, I asked him if a certain man in Nova Scotia, named Fraser, residing in Queens county, was an officer in his department. He told me that he was an officer in his department. I find this winter that he is still an officer in his department. I find that in February last he was an officer in his department, and when he should have been looking after the affairs of his office and earning money for the minister, where do I find him ? I find him away down in the extreme northern part of the province of Nova Scotia, in the county of Victoria, electioneering. And what is said about him ? A certain trial took place down there, and a certain judge of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia made certain findings, one of them being:

> The following persons have, in my judgment, been proven at the trial to have been guilty of corrupt practices in this election,

Then he gives a long string of names. In that string is the servant of my hon. friend, W. E. Fraser, of Liverpool, Queens county, N.S. In that list the judge finds twenty-three men, exactly in the same category as the representative of my hon. friend the minister, and he finds them all guilty under the same charge. I submit to all the members of the Government, that not less than seventy-five per cent of that list are officials of this Government, men who are in the pay of this Government, who had gone out of their offices and so conducted themselves that this judge, who is certainly not anxious to find harsh things, unless he has to, finds twenty-three of them guilty, and so says in his judgment. This very matter was brought to the notice of the minister about a year ago, but he has never made the slightest inquiry as to how this man Fraser was attending to his business. He is still in the pay of the Government and will continue to be, and his salary will probably be raised owing to his useful services in the elections. That is only a sample of the way that public servants are basking in the sunshine of this Administration, knowing that the more they do in the way of political rascalities, the better they will be paid and the better they will be liked.

There is another matter which, in justice to myself, it is obligatory on me to bring to the notice of the House. I am particularly pleased that the Minister of Customs is in his seat, because, despite his regard for care and fairness, he has lately been exceedingly unfair to myself.

I see by yesterday's Hansard that he says that a certain statement I made in this House last year is untrue. I take it, Mr. Speaker, that I am permitted to look at last year's Hansard, and that I am not violating any rule in doing so. It was rather a strong thing for the Minister to say that I made a false statement, without ever asking me, who am a member of this House, whether the statement was false or not. If I made a statement in this House, and the minister in answering a question found it necessary to settle a question of fact one way or the other, I think under those circumstances a member of this House can expect to be given an opportunity of stating how he understood the facts before a minister undertakes to say, without ever consulting the member, that his statement is false. The question I am referring to appears on page 646 of Hansard, and was asked yesterday by the hon. member for Guysborough. The question was in respect to the services of Mr. Duchemin, who has been in the service of the Government for the greater part of the last two years. It has been found that that gentleman received last year money out of the coffers of this country to the extent of something like $6,380.48, and it is only fair that we who are to some extent responsible to the people should make inquiry as to how he earned that money. Last year, in my place in this House, when the Estimates of the Minister of Public Works were going through, I made a statement which appears on page 5238 of last year's Hansard, and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, and in justice to myself, I am obliged to read the very short statement that I made on that occasion. I wish to read it with a view to showing that what I said about Mr. Duchemin, who is a servant of this country, was in my judgment absolutely correct then, and is absolutely correct now; and when the minister undertook, in answering a question, to make the bald statement that I did not state the truth, I submit that he was in error and did not fully inquire into the facts. This is what I said when this matter was up last year:

Mr. McKenzie: I wish to refer briefly to investigations held under the Inquiries Act. In Nova Scotia we had headsmen in each county, sometimes one headsman for more than one county. In North Cape Breton and Victoria, in fact all the counties of Cape Breton and eastern Nova Scotia, we had a commissioner named Duchemin, who was a very active commissioner. I understand that the Orders in Council appointing those commissioners fixed their salaries at $15 dollars a day with incidentals, and they only received $15 no matter how many inquiries they conducted in one day. Mr. Duchemin is a man of my own profession, a barrister of some standing, a strong temperance advocate, a man who stands high in his church, and besides all his other virtues he is the editor of the Tory organ, the Sydney Post, in the city of Sydney. Being a prominent man and always preaching righteousness and truthfulness and honesty through his paper and on the platform, it strikes one as peculiar that there should be anything but the most rigid particularity and punctuality about anything that he would do. A man of such high standing would be expected to be very particular when he would come to deal with money matters in which he was personally interested, and where his own personal interests were put in contradistinction to those of the country. On September 6, 1912, Mr. Duchemin held court at a place called Big Bras D'Or in the county of Victoria. He there examined Captain George Livingstone, Captain Roderick McDonald, D. J. Morrison and H. G. McKay, Roderick Bain and Roderick McLeod. These investigations were held between 3 p.m. and 6 p.m. Under the Order in Council Mr. Duchemin would be entitled to $15 for the afternoon's services, besides his travelling expenses, etc. But I find that he submitted to the department six different bills with a full charge in every one of the bills, charging for that afternoon $128.95, while $20 would be about what he was entitled to. The items of the accounts, six of which are exactly alike, are as follows:

To travel, issuing notices, subpoenas, etc., conducting inquiries	$15.00
" Allowance for living expenses	2.50
" Ferry fare	.05
" Horse hire	1.00
" Paid for use of room for holding inquiries	.40
" Service of witnesses	1.00
To Stenographer copying evidence and reports..	$ 1.35
" Stationary and postage	.05
	$21.35

That is the alleged expenditure, Mr. Speaker, in connection with only one inquiry, and that is all that you have been charged for, what took place at Bras D'Or on that day. The Hansard report goes on:

The account in McKay's case is as follows:
Allowance..	$15.00
Living allowance..	3.00
Witnesses, typewriting..	5.40
Total..	$23.40

You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that his dinner in the first instance only cost him $2.50. The same day he bought another dinner for $3, and there is a similar item in each of the six bills, so he took six dinners on the same day, and crossed the ferry five times to examine witnesses, when as a matter of fact there was only one sole, solitary inquiry, at which all the witness were examined in less than one hour and a half, and the proper charge for which was $21.35. The Hansard report goes on:

These accounts cover the six cases that were tried upon the same day, totalling $128.95, whereas $21.20 would have been the proper charge. The men who were investigated and finally dismissed were my political friends, and I was keeping tab on this inquiry. I knew the day on which it was to be held, but to make absolutely sure I wrote to Captain McDonald asking him about this investigation. He writes me from Bras d'Or on the 10th March, 1913, as follows:

Big Bras d'Or, Cape Breton,
March 10, 1913.

D. D. McKenzie, M.P.,
Ottawa, Canada.

My dear friend,—Yours to hand of the 8th instant, and in reply would say you are quite correct as to the date of the investigation. It was held on September 6, at three o'clock p.m., the whole being done between three and six o'clock p.m. The names of the parties who were investigated are as follows: George Livingston, sub-collector; Rod. McDonald, preventive officer; Rory Bain, D. J. Morrison, and Rod. McLeod, boatman; and H. C. McKay, lightkeeper, Bird island.

All those were investigated on the one afternoon at the time before mentioned.

On that occasion I pointed out to the Minister of Public Works that these things were absolutely correct then, and they are absolutely correct now. For an investigation of two and a half hours, this man, who was a servant of this Government, charged $128.95, when he should have charged $21.

The answer in yesterday's Hansard about which I am complaining is as follows

—Mr. Coderre answering for the Customs Department:

The charge made by the member for North Cape Breton was looked into by Customs Department and inquired into by Auditor General and found to be not true.

I submit to the minister that it is true, absolutely true, and I challenge his inquiry. I care not what the Minister of Customs may think of me, but I do think a great deal of my own veracity. I have been in this House for a great many years, and I am getting somewhat of an old man now to be told I go around this country peddling falsehoods against anybody. I challenge the minister or anybody else to point out where I ever made a statement on the floor of this House that was not absolutely correct. I submit that it is the duty of the minister who put on the records of the Parliament of this country against me that I made an untrue statement, to make inquiry and to apologize to me for making a statement which was not true. I say that that money was taken for an investigation and for services where it was not earned. I did not say it was embezzlement, I did not say it was theft; I did not characterize it at all. Before I made my statement I had asked the minister what the Order in Council allowed this man, and he told me it was $15 a day. I have not the Hansard under my hand but that is my recollection. It is well known that he was to get $15 a day no matter whether he made one inquiry or a dozen, or made no inquiry at all, but it was not the intention that, if he spent an hour or two and met with half a dozen or twenty people, he should send a bill in for each one, as was done in this case. I stand by the facts as shown by the record. I got the facts from the department. I moved for the returns, they were brought down and I have them in my possession. These are not my figures, but they are the figures of the department, and without the same testimony, without knowing the facts, the Minister of Customs comes down and says that a member of this House makes a false statement. I protest that when such things as these are said in the face of hon. members in the House who are able to defend themselves, it is not surprising to know what is said about Prof. Shortt, whose hands are tied and whose tongue cannot be used in his own defence in this House. I could not permit this to pass over without bringing it to the notice of the House. It is a duty between one member and another to protect the honour of members of this House, and no hon. member should be permitted to be put on record as being a falsifier when the facts do not bear out this accusation. These are the facts as I have stated them, these records were before the Minister of Customs when he made this statement, and I may say that I would not have noticed his statement at all had it not been called to my notice by an hon. gentleman. With reference to the record of Mr. Duchemin, the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) was asked by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair):

Does the minister intend to investigate the conduct of Mr. Duchemin?

Mr. Hazen: I have no such intention.

There is put before the hon. gentlemen who are responsible for the expenditure of the moneys of this country the record and conduct of one of their servants; they are asked: Do you propose to inquire into his conduct—and a responsible minister says: I have no such intention.

Mr. HAZEN: On what page of Hansard is that?

Mr. McKENZIE: Page 820 of Hansard, 1914. There are many other things that might be said along this line, but I must confess that my real purpose was to bring this record in regard to the matter to the notice of the House.

Mr. G. W. FOWLER (Kings and Albert): Mr. Speaker, there is an old saying that all roads lead at last to Rome. Everything that the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) debates leads at last to Duchemin. The hon. member for North Cape Breton, who is sometimes quite witty and amusing, but at other times, oh, so doleful, and dreadfully dull and prosy, has, during the last three years, taken part in a good many debates; and, even if the subject matter was as far removed from Duchemin, or anything appertaining to him, as the poles are asunder, the hon. gentleman, with that peculiar cast of mind which works in subterranean and intricate passages, always comes back at last to Duchemin. Talk about the proverbial red rag to the male animal of the ox gender; that is not a circumstance to the name of Duchemin to the ex-judicial member for North Cape Breton. The hon. gentleman was very witty in the first portion of his speech, very amusing, but he did not amuse anybody half so much as he did himself. He enjoyed his time-worn, stale, mothbitten jokes much more than anybody else did. Even the admiring chorus of backbenchers had to take second place to the hon. gentleman himself in that respect. The hon. gentleman told us that he was once a schoolmaster. We could have guessed that. He must have been for many years a schoolmaster and got into that narrow pedantic groove that schoolmasters sometimes fall into. But if we are to judge of the rest of his scholastic knowledge by the sample of arithmetic which he gives us, we must come to the conclusion that he was a very poor schoolmaster indeed and that he taught his pupils very badly. He told us that 19 pounds 19 shillings and tuppence—which is short for two pence—was within a half penny of twenty pounds.

Mr. McKENZIE: I will make the correction now. I meant 19 pounds, 19 shillings and 11 pence halfpenny.

Mr. FOWLER: Too late; too late—you have lost your ninepence ha'penny. Your pupils would be reduced to poverty if they followed your instructions in arithmetic. My hon. friend has spoken of Mr. Shortt, and very shortly of Mr. Shortt, but at considerable length of Mr. Duchemin. I do not propose to discuss the Duchemin question now. That has been discussed on several occasions, and I have no doubt that if the hon. gentleman ever meets Mr. Duchemin on a platform in any portion of Nova Scotia Mr. Duchemin will be able to take care of the hon. member for North Cape Breton. He speaks of Mr. Shortt as being a poor martyr who was tongue-tied. It would have been much better for Shortt if he had been tongue-tied. The trouble with Shortt is that he was not tongue-tied at all. He got himself into this trouble; he began it, and not with the statement the hon. member for Cape Breton said he made. I would have thought that when a man had for two or three years occupied a position upon the judicial bench of this country, and had worn the judicial ermine, he would have acquired some fairness of thought, some impartiality; but the hon. gentleman was just as destitute of that when he came off the bench as he was when he went on it. The hon. gentleman knows that he did not state the actual facts when he gave us his paraphrase of what was said. I will read for the benefit of the hon. gentleman, for he needs all the benefits that can come to him, what Mr. Shortt is reported actually to have said; and remember that Mr. Shortt has never to this moment denied what he did say. Therefore, we must judge him by the record. Some one has said that we should not judge him by newspaper reports; but if he does not deny these newspaper reports when the opportunity is given him, if, on the contrary, he glories in what he has said, it is not unfair, unreasonable, or unjust to judge him by the newspaper reports. He says:

> "I have met men in the Canadian Civil Service," he said, "who, though they held positions under the Government, were quite ready to admit that the Civil Service system was rotten." Professor Shortt asked who took the place of the 2,000 civil servants who were reported in the House the other day to have been dismissed from the service, and his reply to his own question was just "10,000."

Who took the place of the 2,000? 10,000 men took the place of the 2,000. That is what Shortt says. Could language be plainer? In the English language could you put a proposition more plainly than that? Prof. Shortt meant what he said when he said it, and he knew he was not speaking by the book when he said it. He knew that he was making a statement that was not correct when he said that 10,000 men took the places occupied by the 2,000 men that had been dismissed. That is the fault we find with Prof. Shortt. Tongue-tied! A martyr! Held up in this House to public derision and public shame! Like a lamb before his shearers, is dumb, he could not open his mouth! He is a brave man is Prof. Shortt. I will show you whether he is a brave man or not. If he had been an employee of this Government, subject to be dismissed from office for partisan conduct, and if he had made such a statement, I would say, however improper or unwise his statement was, it had at least the merit of being a bold one, because he took his business life in his hands when he made it. But what is the situation so far as Prof. Shortt is concerned? He was appointed under an Act which requires the joint action of both Houses of Parliament to dismiss him. He makes this statement. The Senate—that body upon the other side of the building. I look up and see some of the senators in the gallery. Gaze upon the faces in the front row up there—

Mr. SPEAKER—Order. It is not permissible to refer disrespectfully to the Senate.

Mr. FOWLER: You are not a mind reader, Mr. Speaker. How could you possibly know what I was going to say? What have I said that is disrespectful?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The rules of debate prohibit reference to the other branch of this Parliament in a disrespectful or an ironical way. The hon. member was leading on, although he had not gone that far, to a point where he was likely to be out of order, and I thought it proper to call his attention to the fact.

Mr. FOWLER: I was going to speak in the most commendatory terms of the gentlemen sitting in the front row of the gallery. Mr. Speaker, you entirely misapprehend me. I was going to say what firm looking gentlemen they were; how when their minds were once made up to anything, they could not be changed, and that a strong majority of them were in favour of Professor Shortt. I would not say anything derogatory of the Senate. Perhaps I would like to be a senator myself some day, and surely I would not say anything derogatory of that most honourable body.

Mr. NEELY: Shame.

Mr. FOWLER: It is a good thing that it has come to you at last.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. FOWLER: Oh, that is the man, is it?

Mr. GAUVREAU: That is where my hon. friend is wrong as usual. I was not the man. I did not say a word.

Mr. FOWLER: Then why did my hon. friend get up? I did not name him and I did not point to him.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I never said a word at all.

Mr. FOWLER: When the shoe pinches we usually squeal.

Mr. GAUVREAU: You have a suspicious mind, that is all.

Mr. FOWLER: Our volcanic friend is erupting again. When Professor Shortt made that utterance he knew that the Senate would not consent to put him out of business for making a statement that would reflect upon the Government of the day. Therefore it was a cowardly act; and to represent him as a man that has been abused and vilified by the gentlemen on this side who have spoken concerning him, is to make a statement that is not in accordance with fact. Professor Shortt has been too kindly and too well used. He deserves much more severe castigation than he has received. A man occupy-

10 p.m. ing the position he occupies is supposed to be as impartial and judicial as a judge upon the bench in recommending men for public office, and to show the narrow, bigoted partisanship that Professor Shortt has shown, reveals that he is absolutely and utterly unworthy of the high office to which he has been appointed.

I am very sorry that the hon. member for St. John city (Mr. Pugsley) is not in his place. During the few moments this evening when I was absent from the House, the hon. gentleman referred to a matter regarding my county. I do not say that he did it intentionally in my absence. I do not quite know how he dragged it in, and I do not see what it has to do with the dereliction of Prof. Shortt, or with the utterances which he made one Sunday night when he should have been at church. My hon. friend said that there had been erected in the county of Kings, which I have the honour to represent, and which gave birth to that distinguished statesman the hon. member for St. John city—although I have never seen on the part of the inhabitants of that beautiful county any particular show of elation on account of that county having been the birthplace of that eminent statesman——

Mr. NEELY: Clever!

Mr. FOWLER: Another hon. member in pain over there. The statement my hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) made regarding the public building at Hampton is altogether beside the fact. He misrepresented the population of the town. He misrepresented the amount of business carried on there. I am very sorry that my hon. friend is not here, because I am surprised that he would make such a statement about the county town of his native county.

My hon. friend also, as I am informed, stated that this was not the proper way in which to bring up this matter with regard to Prof. Shortt; that Prof. Shortt should be brought to the bar of the House; that this method of procedure was unfair and improper. Knowing the admiration that my hon. friend has for his leader, I am surprised that he should make such a statement, because it was his leader who brought this matter up. The hon. gentleman has had some experience himself with regard to matters of this kind. Let us see what he has done. Did he feel sorry, when he was lashing a certain gentleman, to think that that gentleman had not an opportunity to reply? Did that cause him to restrain his rage? No. A commission once sat in the province of New Brunswick investigating matters in connection with the Central railway. At the head of that commission was one of the most eminent jurists that the province of New Brunswick has produced, a man of high character, of unblemished reputation, a man who has never stained with one blot the ermine which he wears.

I refer to the Hon. Chief Justice Landry, of New Brunswick. And because the Hon. Chief Justice Landry had the temerity to bring in a report supported by the evidence, absolutely, unqualifiedly supported by the evidence which condemned the conduct of the hon. member for St. John city, he abused, and vilified and lashed the Chief Justice in this House where that gentleman had no opportunity to reply. Yet he finds it a horrible thing that this ex-schoolmaster, Professor Shortt, should have his conduct characterized, even in the moderate way in which it was characterized by the Hon. Minister of Public Works. I am surprised, knowing my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works so well, that he restrained himself so much when he had such great provocation. I must not forget my genial friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark). He is an angel of peace; he says: Let there be truce, and—there is truce. Let me give something of what he said on the 8th of February last:

> The most violent form of partisan strife that can possibly be instigated in any country is a general election. I think everybody will agree that partisan discussion is at its best in a general election—or at its worst. Perhaps I ought to correct that: Perhaps it finds a lower level still in the literature that is issued prior to an election.

With that premise he makes out that the issuing of this partisan literature is worse, so far as bitterness is concerned, even than the discussion that takes place during the progress of the campaign. Well, if he is thinking of Grit literature, I should be inclined to agree with him; I think scarcely anybody will dispute the position he takes. He told us also in that connection, that with regard to literature:

> I want to claim before this House and the country that we on this side have an absolutely clean sheet. From the moment the war broke out the Bureau was closed.

Referring now to the bureau for the dissemination of noxious literature to persons of the Liberal persuasion throughout Canada,

> So far as I am concerned, I have never seen a document emanate from it since that time, of a party nature or of any other nature.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I am sure the hon. gentleman wishes to be fair.

Mr. FOWLER: Certainly.

Mr. CLARK: Of course, he will see that I previously defined the literature as party literature. I did not need to repeat that phrase at every step.

Mr. FOWLER: That is exactly what I am speaking about. I am going to be absolutely fair to my hon. friend, fairer even than the Minister of Public Works. The hon. member for Red Deer goes further:

> I have never seen a document emanate from it since that time, of a party nature or of any other nature. Where is the laugh of my hon. friends now? Can they produce a leaflet or a document? Not a single one. And I should be wanting in common manliness if I did not assert it.

Now, I am going to ask the hon. gentleman to take that all back. I know that he is a manly gentleman and I am satisfied that when I hold up to his gaze these printed documents, issued between the time war was declared and the time he made his speech, he will withdraw his statement. I hear an hon. gentleman say that this is not party literature. It is called "The Canadian Liberal Monthly". Let us find the October number, issued soon after the war broke out. We were all standing together shoulder to shoulder like the boys of the old brigade, heart beating close to heart in common defence of the Empire. That was the position we were supposed to occupy. I believe the hon. member for Red Deer was honest in his view, I believe that he was in earnest and that he was genuine. But what says this delectable sheet, this monthly effusion? How was it keeping the truce? I understand that it is issued once a month; which, perhaps is not unnatural seeing that it is a monthly. And under whose direction is it issued? That of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, a gentleman who has been spoken of as a chivalrous man, the wearer of the white plume. Let us see what this says: "A question for Mr. Foster," in big, black type. That refers to Sir George E. Foster, one of the brightest minds in this House, and Minister of Trade and Commerce in this Administration. And this "Question for Mr. Foster" is this:

> The French Government has just placed an order with a Pittsburgh firm for enough horseshoe nails to keep that firm going night and day for eighteen months. The Italian Government has just placed an order with a United States firm for $5,000,000 worth of saddles, boots and other leather goods. The Australian Government has just placed an order in the United States for a huge consignment of steel rails. All these goods could have been made quite as quickly and as cheaply and of equal quality in Canada. This question suggests itself —Is the Department of Trade and Commerce at Ottawa doing anything or nothing to guide orders from friendly or allied Governments into Canadian channels?

I hear an hon. gentleman say: "No politics in that." Oh, no desire to injure the Government in that. Another fond delusion shattered. I see the hon. member for Red Deer shaking his head as he says: "No politics in that." I thought the hon. member would become indignant as soon as I read this. I should not have expected anything better from the hon. member immediately behind him, but I should have expected something better from the usually chivalrous member for Red Deer.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Would the hon. member allow a question in order to elucidate this matter? Is it not a fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the documents emanating from his department shows that he is doing his utmost to get trade for Canada out of the war? And if that be the fact, does my hon. friend think he is guilty of partisanship in doing so? Or is he showing Canadian patriotism?

Mr. FOWLER: I remember that the father of " my Uncle Toby " was once asked a very pecurliar question—

Mr. CLARK: Never mind your Uncle Toby.

Mr. FOWLER: —a very peculiar question, which had as little bearing upon the subject under consideration as the question just asked by the hon. member for Red Deer has upon the matter which we are now discussing.

Could anything be more strongly partisan than an attempt to hold up to the execration of the people of Canada the Minister of Trade and Commerce and his department? Was it not partisan to allege that the minister was not doing his duty; that the department was not doing its duty to the Canadian people, who are making great sacrifices for the Empire; that contracts from foreign countries were, by reason of the supineness of the Department of Trade and Commerce, allowed to go to the United States? Does the hon. member for Red Deer consider that there is nothing of a partisan character in these allegations? In respect of all these books, pamphlets and monthlies, the same state of affairs exists. We find that during the time when this truce was supposed to be in operation, this literature was being circulated all over the country. I am sure that this was done without the knowledge of the hon. member for Red Deer, but I am sorry that I was mistaken in assuming that he would admit that this was wrong, and a violation of the truce.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I would if I knew it to be the case.

Mr. FOWLER: No man is so hard to convince as the man who does not wish to be convinced, and I am afraid the hon. gentleman does not wish to be convinced. But, to return to Prof. Shortt for a moment. Prof. Shortt forgot to tell his auditors on that fateful Sunday night—fateful for him—that in the very department over which he presides there have been two dismissals and resignations, and that eight persons have been appointed to take the places of these officials. This is but another instance of Prof. Shortt's unfairness in regard to these matters. The return says that in respect of the Civil Service Commission there were no dismissals, one resignation, one transfer to another department, no desertions from the service, no punishments, and eight appointments to fill two vacancies—a proportion of four to one. That was keeping up the average pretty well; why did not Professor Shortt be fair enough to make this known? This gentleman is deserving of the condemnation of this House and of this country, and he will receive it when the facts are known by all impartial people. He is deserving of more; if he gets his deserts he will be dismissed from the service of this country by joint address of the House of Commons and of the Senate of Canada.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (Kings, Prince Edward Island): The discussion of this subject has taken a very wide range and several subjects have been brought up which are not quite germane to the matter under consideration. Sir, if things have happened in the other provinces of this Dominion as they have in the province of Prince Edward Island—occurrences with which I am personally acquainted—substantial proof is afforded of the statement made by Professor Shortt and by the hon. member for Guysborough this afternoon that enormous increases have taken place in the number of appointments to the Civil Service. In the Department of Public Works in the province of Prince Edward Island, under the Conservative Administration, one man was removed from office and four men were appointed to take his place. Under the late Administration there were three men in the office of the Public Works Department at Charlottetown. There are now six men in that office, and the names of seven men on the pay roll. Charlottetown is an old established community; there is no more work going on now than there was some years ago.

Mr. ROGERS: I am afraid my hon. friend is mistaken in the statement which he has made; I think he had better revise it.

Mr. HUGHES: I am quite sure that I am not mistaken. The circumstances under which this removal was made are decidedly objectionable. Shortly after the change of government took place some persons in that province who were connected with the Public Works Department and others who expected to be connected with the department, approached the resident engineer and boldly demanded from him a rake-off on the expenditure. The engineer was surprised, and refused absolutely to countenance such a thing. Pressure was brought to bear upon him; other men were brought to his office to influence him, but he stood firm and refused to be influenced. They told him that they would get square with him. The resident engineer at that time was superintendent of dredging for the province. The captain of dredge No. 9 was removed and a new captain was appointed in his place. The new captain, without any authorization or instructions from the resident engineer, proceeded to do dredging for private parties without making any return. When the resident engineer heard of this, he called the captain to account and reprimanded him severely. Upon being asked what authority he had for doing this dredging, the captain said he had been instructed to do it by the persons who were responsible for his appointment. These persons were called in, and the engineer was threatened with dismissal if he interfered with the captain of the dredge. Was he dismissed? No, but he was removed—superannuated. The man who was trying to protect the Government and the people of Canada, although he was well qualified physically and mentally to do his work, was superannuated at $2,800 a year and other men were appointed to do his work. I brought this matter to the attention of the Minister of Public Works some years ago. He told me that he would have an investigation made, and that if he found the charges made to be correct, he would dismiss every man connected with the matter. No investigation has been held and no removals have been made except the removal of the one man who was trying to protect the department. Now, Sir, if things like that are happening in the other provinces of this Dominion, we have an explanation of the enormous expenditure that has taken place under this Government, and of the enormous increase in the number of public servants drawing pay from the people of Canada. These are statements that cannot be controverted, facts that have come within my own knowledge, and they are but an index of what is going on all over Canada. This debate has taken a turn this evening that led me to believe that I would be only discharging my duty by bringing this matter to the attention of the House and by publishing it, because I feel satisfied that what has been done in my province is but a small thing compared with what is going on in the other provinces, where great public works are in progress.

Mr. A. De WITT FOSTER (Kings, N.S.): I do not intend to delay the House at any great length, but I wish to say a word or two, as is my inalienable right as a member of this House, on the subject which has engaged our attention since early to-day. I was much interested in listening to the debate, particularly that phase of it which has dealt with the so-called political truce said to exist throughout the length and breadth of Canada, and with the proclaiming of that truce. Hon. gentlemen are no doubt fully seized of the fact that when the war broke out on August 4 and the political position of one of the great parties in this country was somewhat in danger, the first thing that was announced in the press was the so-called party truce. I wish to tell the House in what manner this so-called party truce was observed in the county from which I come, by hon. gentlemen opposite. No addresses were delivered in that county by myself on political topics. I did address a meeting or two upon patriotic lines, and I addressed a series of meetings in the county to stimulate recruiting, as I conceived that to be the most important duty of any member of Parliament, after the great crisis which came like a bolt from the blue on August 4, and plunged this country, in common with the British Empire, into the greatest war the world has ever known. I had announced a meeting in my constituency on a certain evening, when I saw a poster announcing a public meeting to be addressed by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), by the member of the Local Legislature for Kentville (Mr. H. H. Wickwire), and by Sir Frederick Borden, the ex-member for Kings county. It was the annual meeting, at which the routine business of the Liberal party was carried on during the afternoon, and in the evening a public meeting was called, which was attended by a great many Conservatives of the town of Kentville and of the neighbouring country. They went to hear my good friend the hon. member for Pictou. I am bound to say that the hon. member for Pictou, in some parts of his speech, as he often does in this House, acquitted himself very creditably indeed. But, Sir, there was not one word said to stimulate recruiting in that county. The greater part of the speech of the hon. member for Pictou was an attack upon the Government, and upon the Prime Minister, and upon the hon. the Minister of Militia particularly, for not having replied to that statement in the Globe demanding that the Prime Minister and his followers accede to the request of the Liberal party, to say that no election would be held till after the war. The ex-member for the county, Sir Frederick Borden, said that the Prime Minister of this country was prostituting the honour of this country by refusing to say that a certain number of sessions would be held before the Government went to the country. Prostituting the honour of the country, Sir, when the right hon. gentleman was engaged, to my own certain knowledge, in eighteen or twenty hours' work a day in the interests of Canada and of the Empire. The references to the Minister of Militia at that time were along the same lines. The execrations of Heaven or of some other place were called down upon the Government for the manner in which they were conducting the affairs of the country. The hon. member for Kings county for the Local Legislature even went into the realm of scandal upon that occasion, he even went on to tell the people that if the lid were taken off, the scandals would smell to Heaven, a beautiful thing to happen in a county where we were endeavouring to raise, as we since have raised, some two or three hundred men to go to the front. Yet hon. gentlemen talk about a truce being declared and having been violated by gentlemen on this side of the House. I was convinced from the start, as the youngest member in this House, that a truce was declared because it was politically advantageous to the Opposition party declaring that truce, and the minute it became known, and they realized that such a truce would no longer be advantageous, then that truce would be broken. What of the detectives that it was said in the county were being stationed at Valcartier and throughout the country to watch the Government, to watch the details of this, that, and the other thing? This was keeping the truce!

In regard to the matter of recruiting, I think it was in my own hearing that the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), speaking in this House, said that if war broke out, in the interests of this Empire, he would stump the province of Quebec, so interested was he that Canada should do her part. I would ask how many meetings the right hon. gentleman has held in the province of Quebec to stimulate recruiting there? He has held one or two that I have heard about. I would like to ask how many recruits have been enrolled as a result of these meetings.

After the Liberal meeting of which I have spoken in my own county, I had a series of meetings at which I devoted about ten or fifteen minutes to answering charges levelled at the Government and myself at the meeting referred to, and for the remaining hour or two hours I did the best I could, as I have given of the best energy that was in me since the outbreak of war, in aid of this country and of the Empire.

Just a word or two with regard to Professor Shortt, a gentleman with whom I have but a very slight acquaintance. I am informed and have been led to believe that appointments to the inside Civil Service are based upon the results of competitive examinations. I know something about examinations, and the type of examination which has been set along a certain line, and I am bound to say that from my perusal of the type of questions that have been set at different times by the Civil Service Commission, a very great deal of fault might be found with the Commission itself; because in my humble judgment in some cases it is almost impossible to obtain the right man for efficient work so long as his appointment is to depend upon the results of the competitive examination set from time to time by the Commission under Professor Shortt. On one occasion, just a short time ago, the Civil Service Commissioin advertised for a technical man, a university graduate, a draughtsman to be utilized in the Department of the Interior, a man with special qualifications. A young man in my own riding spoke to me about the matter and I said to him, as I have said to all applicants who have spoken to me about positions, whether large or small: There is the examination. There are the conditions laid down by the Civil Service Commission and by the Government. When you have fulfilled those conditions, when you have passed your examination and submitted your record, I will endeavour to see, if I can, that you get a fair show. That is all I will do for you or for anybody else. With regard to cajoling or pleading with any Civil Service Commissioner I should not deem it dignified in any respect for a member of Parliament to resort to that kind of procedure.

What I meant, Sir, by saying that I would endeavour to see that he got a fair show was simply this: If I could find out that Professor Shortt was keeping the position open for a graduate of McGill University or of Queen's University or of Dalhousie University or of Acadia University or of any other university in the country, I should think it my duty to bring it to the attention of this House and of the country. In regard to the particular case I was speaking of just now, a gentleman in my own riding applied for a position as draughtsman in the Department of the Interior. He is a graduate in Arts of the university from which I come, and has had a two years' course in draughtsmanship and science at the same university. Later on he went to Montreal, where he spent four years graduating in both branches of science. He is an expert draughtsman. At the age of eighteen he draughted his own plans, and built absolutely by himself an engine for his motor boat. He built the boat while going through college and sold it for $750, thus enabling him to pay most of his way through his arts course. He is a genius; a man who, I dare venture to assert, is not equalled in his varied qualifications by any gentleman occupying a position in the inside service of this country. He took the examinations prescribed, whatever they were, and in due course gave my name to the Civil Service Commission as one to whom they might apply for a certificate of character. I had known him for six or eight years, and I filled in the ordinary form provided for that purpose. The young man came to Ottawa and was put to work in the Department of the Interior by the Civil Service Commission. Professor Shortt was at that time abroad, whether on Government business or his own I do not know, and I shall therefore impute no motives. But directly Professor Shortt landed in the city of Ottawa the first thing he did was to dismiss this gentleman from the service. I sent him a courteous letter asking for the reasons for this man's dismissal. If the reasons had been that his work was not satisfactory to the department, all well and good; but the answer I got from Professor Shortt was that he had so many applicants whose qualifications were considered better than this young gentleman's that he had to dismiss him and appoint somebody else in his place whose qualifications were higher. I say he had no one whose qualifications were better than those of the young man to whom I refer, and I challenge any one, whether inside or out of this House, to give me the name of a candidate for that position and to state his qualifications alongside those of the gentleman to whom I refer. The proof of that is the fact that although this position was required to be filled in October last, that position for which a man is urgently desired is still vacant. The young man I refer to was dismissed after a month's work in the department. I was informed only yesterday that a new notice had been sent out asking for applicants for the same position. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether Professor Shortt was keeping that position open for some one from Queen's University or from some other part of the country? What were the reasons why he did not allow that man to keep that position which he had filled to the advantage of the country and with the commendation of all those with whom he was working? I agree with what has been said by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, that Professor Shortt has too many things to do. Speaking at public forums and travelling back and forth throughout the length and breadth of this country, he is far too busy a man to devote his time and attention to the important business of conducting the Civil Service of this country, and he should forthwith be relieved of the duties of Civil Service Commissioner, and given ample opportunity to indulge himself along other lines which he seems to find more congenial.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): I had not intended to intrude in this debate, which I am sure in the judgment of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House has run to a point where not much profit is to be gathered from the discussion. I would not have risen were it not for the fact that my hon. friend (Mr. A. De Witt Foster) has made a reference to myself which I think calls for some reply. Just a word or two in regard to all this talk about political truce. What are the facts ? We might as well have them told fairly and squarely. Every one knows, at least every one on this side of the House and the Liberal party throughout the country, that when war came on the right hon. gentleman who leads us to-day as he has led us during so many years and whom we are so proud to follow, announced that so far as he and the Liberal party were concerned he did not propose to engage in political discussion, or to attack the Government's record in the ordinary public affairs of this country. Everybody knows he has kept his word, and that the right hon. gentleman has not appeared on any platform since the war began, except to ask the sons of his own race in the province of Quebec to come forth and follow the flag of old England. Everybody knows that a conference took place between the leaders of the two political parties in regard to the vacant seats in this House. Every one knows that an understanding was arrived at between them, that the men who should fill those vacant seats in this session of Parliament should be men of the same political stripe as those who formerly occupied those seats. And then Parliament met. So far as hon. gentlemen on this side of the House are concerned, so far as any agreement or truce between the political parties is concerned, everyone knows that there has been no such agreement between the political leaders in this country. I say on behalf of the Liberal party in this country, that from the time the war began those who know something about what party management is like in this country, know that we have refrained from political partisanship and from attacks on the Conservative party in this country, in regard to the war or the expenditure for the war. That is where the party stands at this moment, while we claim the right in Parliament to perform our proper functions as an opposition in regard to other matters. But if the right hon. the Prime Minister and the men who sit with him think it is wise to go to the people of this country and ask for a verdict, the responsibility rests entirely with them.

And now I come to the matter to which my hon. friend from Kings (Mr. Foster) has referred. The only occasion upon which I appeared on any political platform since the war began was when I appeared with my hon. friend Sir Frederick Borden, a man who is beloved by the Liberal party of this country, a man who can count as friends many hon. gentlemen who sit upon the other side of the House and who regard him as a man of great ability and one who has filled a high place during his long career as the representative in Parliament of Kings county. It would be well for this gentleman who succeeds him if, in the days to come, he could point to a record of achievement in friendships comparable in any measurable degree with that of which Sir Frederick Borden can boast to-day. I went to the meeting of the Liberal Association of Kings county. I did not attend the political organization meeting in the afternoon but I went to the meeting in the evening with Sir Frederick Borden. Did we make any partisan addresses, or arraign this Government upon their record, or discuss their political doings? Not at all, Sir. On the contrary speaking for myself, I stated what I have stated here to-night in regard to the attitude of the Liberal party in reference to the Government of this country to that time in December and I said I did not propose to discuss party questions, and that I did not think that in the position which Canada occupied in the Empire and the position in which this Empire stood, engaged as it was in this great war, it was proper at all that we should have a political contest or that we should discuss political issues at that time. I pointed out what the consequences would be if you precipitated an election at that time and the reasons why it should not take place. I made no personal attacks upon any one. When my hon. friend undertakes to say that Sir. Frederick Borden attacked his own cousin in that county where they were both born, I say on behalf of that cousin as well as on behalf of Sir Frederick Borden himself, that the hon. gentleman has not given a true version of what occurred at that time. Sir Frederick Borden discussed in a most dignified way, and from the standpoint of a public man who had occupied a high position in this country, the issues of war and the reasons why there should not be political discussion and a political contest. He spoke strongly, with all the knowledge that he possesses upon that question, and with that vigour which always characterizes his public utterances. When we think of Sir Frederick Borden we must always remember, when war's alarums come, when the sound of battle is heard throughout this land, that he gave his only son to the Empire, and the bones of his boy are lying on the veldt of South Africa to-day. His successor comes here with the story that we have heard tonight about this distinguished public man to whom I have referred, and who is closely connected with my right hon. friend the Prime Minister by family and other ties. I would not have risen in this debate were it not to speak on behalf of my distinguished friend, Sir Frederick Borden, and in my own behalf in regard to the position which we took at this public meeting. From the time that it was apparent that war was going to take place between England and the Allies and Germany, hon. gentlemen in this House and my friends throughout the province of Nova Scotia associated with me have not engaged in political or partisan discussion. We have grounded our arms.

I think the suggestion made by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle), who spoke immediately after dinner, was one which would be in the interests of this House to consider very carefully. What are the circumstances? We have Prof. Adam Shortt as chairman of a semi-judicial commission. Perhaps that is not a strictly correct description of his duties. However, he is chairman of that commission, and he stands in relation to the public service in very much the same position as a man occupying a judicial position. He cannot be removed from office except by a vote of Parliament. It is charged by these hon. gentlemen that he made a statement, which in the language of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) was untrue and dishonourable, and a great many other adjectives and adverbs were used by the hon. gentleman which I need not repeat in regard to Prof. Shortt. As far as I am concerned, I do not know the gentleman and do not know anything about him. However, it would be much more dignified for this Government if they thought that Prof. Adam Shortt is a man with the qualifications and qualities which the Minister of Public Works declares he has, to come before Parliament and impeach him. What would be thought if we were discussing the decisions and the acts of a man occupying the position of chief justice of one of the provincial courts of this country in regard to a statement which he might have made upon any matter which for the moment might form the subject of political discussion, and it was thought necessary for every hon. member to denounce that chief justice in all the moods and tenses in which Prof. Shortt has been denounced to-night? Would not the appeal be at once met by the Minister of Justice, as a gentleman who had formerly been on the bench, that high ground should be taken, and that the remedy which the law provided for those who have anything to say against a judge which would cause him to be impeached should be proceeded with in the regular way? In the history of this Parliament it will be found that on all occasions, if any hon. member sitting here in times past had any complaint to make of the conduct of any of the judges, the Minister of Justice and the Government took the ground that if there was any fault to be found it should take the form provided by law, that is, the form of an impeachment.

I am not going to go into the discussion of the question as to how many people were dismissed or how many people resigned or how many people were appointed in their places. I rose simply for the purpose of presenting the argument, and I appeal to the Prime Minister whether I am not absolutely right upon this question, that the proper course for the Minister of Public Works to take, if he has any complaint to make against Prof. Adam Shortt, is to make a motion in the proper way to impeach that gentleman before Parliament on account of the untruthful statement he is alleged to have made, or by reason of the fact that the qualities he is said to possess disentitle him further to occupy his office. If these gentlemen who have attacked him so viciously to-day have not the courage to proceed against Prof. Shortt by way of impeachment, then we have been simply listening to a lot of vapouring, and these denunciations will disappear before to-morrow's sun. I therefore submit that upon this question which has been brought before the House by the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition, the Prime Minister is bound in duty, having regard to the statements that have been made by his colleagues, and the denunciations which have been put forth against Prof. Adam Shortt, to take the suggestion of his own follower, the hon. member for Kingston, and ask this House to proceed by way of impeachment against this gentleman. Otherwise, do not let us have the undignified proceeding of discussing these charges in this haphazard way about an official who stands in the same position, as far as Parliament is concerned, as would a chief justice of the court.

Mr. A. de WITT FOSTER: Will the hon. gentleman deny that, speaking on the platform at the meeting at which I was present, and at which meeting I took notes, he accused the Prime Minister of making a hybrid alliance with the Nationalists, and proceeded to arraign Mr. Pelletier, Mr. Blondin and Mr. Nantel, and said, among other things, that Mr. Blondin had to shoot holes through the British flag in order that he might breathe the air of freedom?

Mr. MACDONALD: I have stated the general tenor of my remarks upon that occasion. I state again that I made no partisan speech, that I did not anywhere discuss the political issues before the country, except as I have stated, and that I made no such speech as that to which my hon. friend referred.

Mr. FOSTER: Do you deny it?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If there is no objection on the part of my hon. friends on the other side, I would like to make a few observations. Having moved that the House do go into Committee of Supply, I can only speak again by consent of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: I assume that the right hon. the leader of the Government has the unanimous consent of the House.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: With regard to what my hon. friend the member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has said just now, I would venture to remind him that sometimes hon. gentlemen opposite have not exhibited the qualities, upon which he has lavished such eulogiums, in making reference to persons occupying positions upon the judicial bench, because I have it very well in my recollection as appearing upon the pages of Hansard that the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition has publicly accused judges of his own province of Quebec of having made subscriptions to political funds in that province. If the right hon. gentleman had taken the course which my hon. friend for Pictou says should have been taken on this occasion, we would hardly have such charges appearing in Hansard.

The speech of Professor Shortt was made on the 15th day of January. My attention was directed to it shortly afterwards, and I thought it my duty to inquire into this allegation which was bound to convey a certain impression to the public that I did not think could be supported by the facts. I did not propose to take any action in the matter except by way of investigation, and placing before the members of this House and the people of the country precisely what were the actual facts. I sent to the House of Commons and asked to have a copy of the return—of which I know nothing whatever, as it had not been brought to my attention, until I saw the observations of Professor Shortt as reported in the press. There was some delay in getting the return. It could not be found at first; but eventually I discovered that copies were being prepared, as I was informed, for my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Pardon me. I never asked for that return until two days ago; I never saw it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am speaking only of the information that came to me. I was informed that copies were being prepared for my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. It may be that the statement made to me was not accurate.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am stating precisely what I was informed, because I could not get the report when I first sent for it. The matter would have stood at that and would have been brought to the attention of the House in the way I have just now suggested, except for the fact that the hon. member for the city of St. John (Mr. Pugsley) saw fit to endeavour to make use of it in the House for a partisan purpose. On the 25th of February, ten days after this statement had been made by Professor Shortt and before I had had an opportunity of investigating the facts, the hon. member (Mr. Pugsley) brought the matter up in the House for the purpose of making a partisan attack on the Government. I quote his language:

11 p.m.

> I have not that familiarity with the Civil Service that Professor Shortt, chairman of the Civil Service Commission, necessarily has.

That is a very true observation, and I pause here to bring to the attention of the House the fact that any statement of this character coming from Professor Shortt would be supposed to come from a man having special knowledge and authority to make the statement. That matter ought to be taken into account by hon. members and ought to have been taken into account by Professor Shortt before he made that statement. The hon. member for St. John continued:

> He is a gentleman who is in the employ of the Government. He occupies, I presume, a quasi independent position as chairman of that commission; he has made the statement, made it publicly, made it with deliberation, that under this Government the appointments to the Civil Service in the lower grades are entirely a matter of patronage and he says that, whereas there have been something like 2,000 dismissals from the Civil Service, there have been some 10,000 appointments, making a difference of some 8,000.

He did not quote precisely the language of Professor Shortt as reported in the public press. Some consideration ought to be given to the fact that up to the present time Professor Shortt has not seen fit to modify or qualify in the slightest degree the statement reported in both the Ottawa papers that have been referred to. I quote in the Ottawa Citizen as follows:

> Professor Shortt referred to a return brought down in Parliament a few days ago showing the names of 2,000 men who had been dismissed since the change of Government. "Who," asked the speaker, "took the place of the 2,000?" The answer was, 10,000.

Is there any hon. gentleman opposite who will say that that did not convey to him the impression that this Government had dismissed 2,000 men and had appointed 10,000 men for the purpose of performing the same duties which had been previously discharged by the 2,000 men? I do not think any gentleman in this House or out of it will undertake to say that that is not the impression which would be conveyed to his mind by the language just quoted. I observe that later on in another newspaper published in the city of Ottawa on the 26th day of February, which was quoted by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, Professor Shortt alludes to this report of his speech. He also alludes to the discussion that had taken place in Parliament in regard to it, and he says he stands precisely by the report, nothing more and nothing less than the report. Possibly Professor Shortt did not see the report at all; he may have depended upon some statement in the public press as to what the report showed. I venture to say that, if he undertook to quote from the report without having read it, he chose an unfortunate course. And if, having read that report, he made in public the statement credited to him in the press, then his action was still more unfortunate. I do not think that any hon. gentleman on either side of the House could in his heart and conscience come to any other conclusion about that statement than that which I have just indicated. I am not going to attribute motives to Professor Shortt in regard to this matter. If there is any hon. member who is ready now to suggest that Professor Shortt did not use the language attributed to him and that he would like to make an explanation about it, I am perfectly willing to receive his explanation and to read it here in the House, in order that full justice may be done; or, if Professor Shortt desires an inquiry as to whether or not he used that language and denies that he ever used it, I would be perfectly willing to grant any inquiry that he might deem necessary for the purpose of justifying himself.

As his language has now remained unchallenged by him in any way, and as he did, as late as the 26th of February last, refer to the incident which took place in the House of Commons without seeking or desiring to modify in any way the report of his language on the 15th of February, I venture to conclude that there does not seem to be very much ground for any inquiry as to whether or not he did use the language attributed to him and which up to the present time has not been challenged by him.

Now, if I am to assume, as I think I am entitled under the circumstances to assume, that he did use that language, I venture to say that it was by no means a fair statement of the case and that it would be certain to convey an impression to the people of this country disadvantageous and unjust to the Government, and that without any warrant. I think I am within the reasonable judgment of every member of this House when I go that far at least. Prof. Shortt was speaking with special authority with respect to a matter that was supposed to be as much within his peculiar knowledge as within that of any man in Canada; and when he saw fit to ignore the fact that the very return which he had seen, or had not seen, contained over three thousand resignations, when he ignored the fact that a considerable number of civil servants had died during that period, that many had been superannuated, that others had left the service for other causes; when, ignoring all this, he saw fit to suggest that ten thousand had been appointed to do the work done previously by two thousand;—I desire in all moderation to say that I do not think his language could be characterized as quite fair to the Government of the day. If he desired to give statistics with respect to appointments and dismissals, he should have at least taken into consideration the elements to which I have just called attention. I think, if he had desired to put the case fairly before the people of this country, he should in all reason have taken also into consideration that in a country like this, a rapidly growing and expanding country, there would probably be some need of additional appointments within a period of three years. But all these considerations were absolutely ignored by him.

I regret that the incident has been brought before the House and to the attention of the country by the methods which have been pursued. I would like to point out that when an hon. member on the other side undertakes to make partisan use of a statement which cannot be regarded as other than misleading, it is hardly to be expected that hon. gentlemen on this side will not resent it. It was promptly resented. My hon. friend for the city of St. John (Mr. Pugsley), following in the wake of the Liberal press of this country, by whom Prof. Shortt's statement was used for the purpose of bringing an unjust charge against this Government, saw fit to bring that question up in the House, and it was resented on the spot. We have had this debate to-day in consequence. I think it would have been better if the question could have been dealt with in the method I had intended in the first place—that is, by placing before this House a plain and unvarnished statement of the facts, and an explanation, so far as any explanation is necessary, as to the increase in the public service of this country. If the question has been brought up, with the result that has been made apparent to-day, Mr. Shortt and every one else concerned have only to thank my hon. friend from St. John City and my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. We have nothing to apologize for in respect to the appointments made to the public service. Hon. gentlemen on the other side have spoken of their desire to debate the question. I tell them here and now that whenever they desire to debate that question we are ready to meet them, and I shall be most happy at any subsequent stage of the session to give them all the opportunity for that debate which they may desire by moving the House into Committee of Supply whenever they so wish. Whether they desire to debate it or to make a motion with regard to it, we shall be ready to meet them, and to combat any arguments they may bring forward. The debate has been more or less discursive, and I shall not now enter into some of the matters, more or less personal to myself, which have been alluded to, as this is not the time or the place for that. I will not compare honours as to changes of political opinions with my hon. friend for the City of St. John, as I have never claimed to be in his class in that regard.

I shall see to it that the returns are made complete with all necessary details up to the present time. We shall have a return containing all the information that has been asked for, and some information, perhaps, that has not been asked for. We shall have that laid on the table of the House, placing all the information before my hon. friends on the other side, and we will invite them to bring forward any motion they desire on this subject of the appointments made to the public service.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (South Renfrew): I scarcely think I would have said anything in this discussion had it not been for two things: the remarks of the Minister of Finance (Mr. White)—the lecture, rather, that he proceeded to deliver to us on this side of the House—and the bland and childlike way in which my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) slid over his dismissals. He is an artist in a class all by himself. When he wants a man to resign or get out, he appoints him to some other position, perhaps some 200 miles distant at a smaller salary and without moving expenses.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. gentleman cannot name one instance.

Mr. GRAHAM: Mr. Norris, of Chicago. Look it up. If my information is correct, the hon. minister asked him to go to Prince Rupert.

Mr. REID: I do not think the hon. gentleman's information is correct.

Mr. GRAHAM: Wait until my hon. friend hears what I have to say. My information is that a certain official who was in the employ of this Government in the city of Chicago at a fair salary was asked to go to a distant point, Prince Rupert, I think, at a smaller salary. This he refused to do, and he was decapitated by Order in Council. If my information is incorrect, I shall have to look up five or six other cases, but I give that to my hon. friend to think over for the night. In any case, outside of that altogether, the minister is an artist in his methods of decapitation. He spoke to-night of a time when I was Minister of Railways, and when we had so many men on the canals. The only extra men I think I ever put to work there were appointed upon the request of my hon. friend to have snow put on a certain bridge so that teams could get over in winter.

Mr. REID: I do not think my hon. friend wishes to misrepresent me. What I asked him to do at that time was to request the officials whom he was paying for looking after the bridge to put snow on the bridge so that heavy loads would be able to cross. I did not ask him to put on any extra employees; the minister himself put them on to do work which could have been done by the men who were being paid to do it.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend took credit for it in his constituency.

Mr. REID: I did not.

Mr. GRAHAM: You cannot please some men, Mr. Speaker, whether you put snow on a bridge or whether you do not. Hon. gentlemen can understand that permanent employees are not engaged in running a swing bridge in winter; consequently we had to get men to put snow on the bridge in accordance with my hon. friend's request.

Mr. REID: The hon. gentleman knows that the man who looks after the bridge is appointed by the year.

Mr. GRAHAM: There was no man running the swing bridge in winter. But that is a small matter. My hon. friend the Minister of Customs, in the remarks which he made on this subject, did not show as much heat as the Minister of Marine did; he did not lecture us as did the Minister of Finance, and he did not do as well as the Minister of Railways, who did not say anything. He was a kind of happy medium, winking the other eye at the boys all the time.

I wish to refer for a moment to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. I have been in public life a good many years, and I have never made it a practice to display my loyalty by means of a brass band, nor do I find it incumbent upon me, in order to prove my own loyalty, to insinuate every time I stand up in this House that some other Canadian is not as loyal as I am. If that time should ever come, it would be the duty of the Government to have me interned until the war is over, because I would be either in favour of the enemy or not fit to be at large in this country. I hurl back into the teeth of the Minister of Finance of Canada his imputation of disloyalty on our part, and I tell him in the strongest terms that we on this side of the House are just as loyal as he or his friends. When it was said that we were disloyal, many years ago, he was one of us, and if we are disloyal, the Minister of Finance laid the foundation of that disloyalty, or was a party to it. We are not disloyal. The people of Canada from Prince Rupert and the Yukon across to the Atlantic ocean are as patriotic and as loyal as any people in the British domains, England herself not excepted. I think the Minister of Finance rather forgot himself when he lectured us along that line. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) has shown whether or not he is loyal; he has a son with the Princess Patricias, fighting in France at this moment in defence of his country. That empty seat to my left, once occupied by the Hon. Dr. Beland, attests more forcibly than any words of the Finance Minister or of anybody else the loyalty of that son of French Canada. Another hon. gentleman, a French-Canadian member (Mr. Gauvreau), has a son defending the great Empire to which we belong. Is this a time, when we are asking men of all races and of all nationalities in this country to stand shoulder to shoulder in the fight for liberty, for a Minister of the Crown to stand up and fling across the floor of the House the taunt that we are not seized of the importance of the fact that Britain and her Allies are breaking their way through the Dardanelles?

Mr. W. T. WHITE: I do not like to interrupt my hon. friend in the midst of the generous heat that he is developing in connection with this subject, but as a matter of privilege I desire to say that I made absolutely no charge whatever against the loyalty of hon. gentlemen opposite. When I referred to the fact that the war had interfered with the trade and revenue of the country during the past year, hon. gentlemen opposite burst into laughter. I said that they did not appear to me to realize that the war was in progress, and that they had not a proper appreciation, in my judgment, of the scale—a proper sense of perspective in regard to the war; otherwise, in connection with the matter to which I was referring, they would not have treated it so lightly.

Mr. McKENZIE: Why would we not have a proper conception of it?

Mr. WHITE: A proper sense of the scale or perspective, is what I said. If you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, as a matter of privilege, I desire to say that I have spoken on many occasions in this House and on many platforms throughout this country, and not only have I never impugned the loyalty of any member of the Canadian community, either Liberal or Conservative, but I have taken occasion to say on numerous occasions—and I reiterate the assertion now—that I know of no disloyal citizen in the Dominion of Canada. I never made any such charge of disloyalty, and I desire my hon. friend to withdraw the assertion that he has made.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. WHITE: I was referring only to the fact that in my judgment there was not an appreciation of the fact that the war was proceeding; that is all I said.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not want to impute motives, but I am afraid my hon. friend has let his talking apparatus run away with his better judgment. I do not propose, so far as I am concerned, to allow my best friend to impugn my loyalty, here or anywhere else.

Mr. WHITE: It has not been impugned.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend, in his explanation, left out the very pith of what he said in the course of his speech. He turned to the hon. gentlemen behind him and, ironically speaking of something that the hon. member for the city of St. John (Mr. Pugsley) had said, he said that apparently we were not seized of the fact that at the present time the fleet of the Allies was breaking its way through the Dardanelles in an attempt to reach Constantinople. If that meant anything at all, it meant that we on this side of the House were looking at things in a small way and were not treating gravely the fact that our sons, our brothers and our fellow-countrymen are fighting in the trenches to defend our rights and liberties. If it meant anything, if it was intended to mean anything, it meant that.

An hon. MEMBER: What else could it mean?

Mr. GRAHAM: What could it mean but that we were not seized of the gravity of the position in which our great Empire is at the present time. I want to say that we are seized of it, but is that any reason, because the Allies' fleet is breaking through the Dardanelles, that we should stand silent and let anybody break into the treasury of Canada?

Speaking of the truce, after consultation with the great leader of the Liberal party, several meetings that have been called were cancelled after the declaration of war. I have attended a good many patriotic meetings and addressed several—without a brass band or the accompanying reporter, but I have never discussed politics one way or the other. I have read many red-hot political speeches of hon. gentlemen behind the Minister of Finance, who were cheering him a minute ago. I read some addresses delivered in Ottawa a few days ago, warm speeches. I do not object to them, I am not objecting to them, let them be made, because members of this House have a duty to perform. Sir, while this side of the House is ready to vote millions for the war, it is not ready to vote a dollar for graft. We are prepared to vote all the money that is necessary, as we did in August vote all the money that was necessary, to carry to a successful issue, the war in which the great interests of this country are involved, but we do not give up our right to criticise the administration of the affairs of this country. We are sworn as members of this House to do that. Shall we abrogate those functions, solely because somebody wants to dodge behind the fact that there is war? I say, Sir, that we ought to discuss, and the Government ought to invite discussion of these other questions; but their war appropriation can be put through without a word of carping criticism from this side of the House; but we are not going to be put in a false position.

Speaking of the truce, I am told that while in August we were voting $50,000,000 to carry on the war, pamphlets were being sent out from the city of Ottawa by the Conservative party under the frank of a prominent member behind the Finance Minister, whose name I shall give to the minister privately if he desires, attacking the Liberal party in the most bitter way. These pamphlets were sent back to me from the province of Ontario, having been sent out with the frank of an hon. member behind the Government, in August, when we were here, Sir, nearly in tears, trying to stand shoulder to shoulder, without a whimper of partisanship and without an element of discord in our ranks on either side. Is that keeping the truce?

I want to go further, now that hon. members have brought the matter up. The member for Kings (Mr. Fowler) has accused my hon. friend from North Cape Breton of getting around to a certain point no matter where he started from. My hon. friend from Kings got around to Kings, his own constituency, within ten minutes. But the mountain laboured and brought forth a mouse, so far as partisanship in the Liberal monthly publication is concerned. I know something of what I say and what instructions were given to the Liberal monthly publication from the time war was declared. The instructions were to give news and statements as to the conditions, but to make no party argument one way or the other—and it published part of the speech of the Prime Minister of Canada. And, Sir, all that the member for Kings could find was one small paragraph jogging the memory of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that we ought to get some of the war orders in Canada—and he has acted along that line. He did not take it as any great or violent attack, he took it good-naturedly as ministers always do. It helped him, as a little criticism always does, to get a greater hustle on. That was all my friend could find. What can I find, if I look? Let me look for a moment, and discover what I find. I find a leaflet which has been sent to a friend of mine during the past few weeks, since we have been in this House, as being circulated in western Canada. Here is a leaflet sent out, published by the Federal Press Agency, 47 Slater Street, Ottawa, Canada, Central publication and distribution office for the Conservative party of Canada. Here is one leaflet: "The aid which Laurier withheld from Britain was so much aid given to Germany." Here is a pamphlet, dated No. 6, 9-12, that would be the 12th day of the 9th month of 1914: "The vigorous and progressive western policy of the Borden Government." Party literature: Here is a good picture of the Prime Minister—no, it is not a very good one, I think I would have that one recalled. It is a worse one of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works. Really, what I cannot see about this western publication is why the Minister of the Interior's photograph was not inserted instead of that of the Minister of Public Works, as the Minister of the Interior looks after the lands of the West. I find another one: "Liberals first advocated closure." This is an old pamphlet being circulated now, I suppose, as there was a greater stock on hand than there was demand for at the time. I come to another one, 14th of the 8th month, 1914, which I think would be August, ten days after war was declared. On the first page I find an insulting cartoon of my right hon. friend and leader which was sent broadcast through Canada: "Give credit to whom credit is due." This was sent out during the special session in August, after the outbreak of the war. I have another one: "The Liberals and the naval emergency: for the sake of a supposed party advantage they gambled with the future of the Empire." On the first page is another insulting cartoon of the right hon. leader of the Opposition. You say that was before the session in August. Was it? Listen to the first line of this pamphlet:

> The war between Great Britain and Germany has come.

It must have been after the opening of war, after August 4th, and here is a pamphlet sent out by the Conservative party of Ottawa, a document of 30 pages, beginning with ridicule of my right hon. friend, at the very time that we were joining hands, willing to stand side by side, for the great Empire to which we all belong.

Let me give another one, prepared at an earlier date, which I am told was distributed after the August session. If my information is wrong I shall stand corrected:

> The farce and the cost of the Liberal navy policy compared with the practical economical and effective policy of the Borden Government.

That has been distributed throughout the country during the last few months, I am informed. This is a pamphlet of eight pages printed and sent out by the Conservative party from their headquarters in the city of Ottawa. And my hon. friend from Kings talks about a truce!

Mr. A. De WITT FOSTER: I did not declare any truce.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend did not have to, he was buying horses.

Mr. FOSTER: That is more than you did for the Empire.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have another pamphlet here dated the 14th August: "Relief for the Western Settler." Talk about the war! Here is party literature being distributed through the West for party purposes, when we are supposed to have no parties. There is another one here called "Why the Three Dreadnoughts." This is a nice little booklet which reflects great credit on the printer, but it contains all the old line of attack on the Opposition. And here is a speech delivered by the right hon. R. L. Borden. I am not taking exception to that, for it was not very partisan; in fact, we helped to circulate it ourselves, we thought it so good. But if my hon. friends insist that that is breaking the truce we will have it recalled. Here is another one that has been circulated in Maple Creek, "The Borden Government the Homesteader's Friend." These are just a few of the pamphlets that are being sent out. Here is one called: "Western Canada and the Liberals," which is being distributed very largely in the West. Then I come to the Federal Press Bulletin, which hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House will know. As my hon. friend from Kings would say, it is a weekly eruption, spelled w-e-a-k-l-y. Hon. gentlemen surely cannot deny that this is being circulated. It bears the date December 24, 1914, and contains an attack on the Liberal party, also an insulting cartoon of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. Keeping the truce indeed! Keeping the truce and sending out tens of thousands of this kind of stuff. I have another Federal Press Bulletin here, dated January 7, 1915, almost down to the minute. And these gentlemen talk to us about violating the truce, which, so far as truce was made, we have absolutely kept. But we refuse to be tongue-tied in criticising what we think wrong. Take all the money you want for the war, but we are going to criticise the other things this Government does, and we are going to criticise them as much as we like. This Federal Press Bulletin contains a two-column article pointing out how futile the Laurier boats would have been in comparison with the dreadnoughts.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That are to be.

Mr. GRAHAM: Two columns of that. Two columns of the most irritating partisan material that could be sent out. It points out that one party was practically against the Motherland. And this at a time when hon. gentlemen are saying, Truce, truce, don't hit us, don't criticise us, truce, there is a war on! And behind our backs they are sending out this party literature, giving us a stab in the back. The German nation has received the condemnation of the civilized world for having on several occasions fired on those bearing a flag of truce; but it is far worse for the people bearing the flag of truce to fire than to be fired on by others. Hon. gentlemen opposite say: You must not shoot, we are carrying a flag of truce. And at the same time they are circulating the most inflammable literature ever sent out by any party in the Dominion. My information may not be correct, but I am told that during the past few weeks thousands have been sent out from this city, and that about two thousand go out weekly. In the face of that, and after the speech of my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr J. E. Armstrong) on the navy, will hon. gentlemen opposite have the temerity to pretend that they are keeping anything that looks like a truce?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: What was wrong with that speech?

Mr. GRAHAM: It would have been an elegant speech if it had been delivered in the heat of a campaign and when no war was on, or if the navy question was not a very live and debatable question between the parties. No man on this side of the House has discussed that question so far as I know, but it has been discussed by three speakers opposite as if to provoke a discussion on the great naval question, in order to get an excuse to appeal to the electorate. If hon. gentlemen opposite want to appeal to the electorate, let them do so. Do not do as you did in October, "stand shivering on the brink and fear to launch away." Make up your minds to go at it, if you want an election. But so far as the war is concerned, we on this side of the House will give the Government no excuse for appealing to the country on the ground that we are not with them on every dollar desired for the war.

Now I come to Professor Adam Shortt. There are more smiles now than when the ministers were speaking. Either the members of this Government are very timorous and easily irritated, or else there was something in this thing that really annoyed them. I do not know which it is. The Prime Minister was the coolest of the lot, but even he just slipped a little near the end and showed a little warmth. Who is Professor Adam Shortt? Some hon. gentlemen who criticised him to-night showed the strength of their criticism by declaring that they had never met the man, or had had no acquaintance with him. If I might venture an opinion—and I will try to substantiate it—the trouble is not altogether over what Professor Shortt said, but because Professor Shortt has stood in the way of hon. gentlemen opposite driving a coach and four through the Civil Service Act. I am not saying that so much about the members of the Government, but I am judging by the speeches delivered by hon. gentlemen behind them. I except the Minister of Customs for this reason. The Minister of Customs declared Professor Shortt a great partisan. Now I have known Professor Shortt for many years, and I have never heard him utter a political syllable. I do not know to this day what the politics of Adam Shortt may be.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Mr. GRAHAM: I say that absolutely as a member of this House.

Mr. A. D. FOSTER: Who appointed him?

Mr. GRAHAM: A Government that carried on the affairs of this country much better than their successors have done, a Government that introduced the Civil Service Act and lived up to it. But hon. gentlemen opposite are trying to poke their fingers through it. The reason why hon. gentlemen opposite are so sore against Professor Shortt is not because of what he said at the Forum, but because he has prevented them from getting their friends into office in violation of the Civil Service Act. The Minister of Customs dealt with his incapacity as a commissioner, and not to any very great extent, with what he said at the Forum. He read copies of examination papers, not to show what Professor Shortt had said at the Forum, but to show that he was not fit for his position. I think I am safe in saying that the Minister of Customs left the impression that the examination papers he read out to-night were for positions as packers, and that class of position.

Mr. J. D. REID: I said clerkships.

Mr. GRAHAM: We will look up Hansard to-morrow. My hon. friend mentioned the closing of boxes and that kind of thing. That is packers' work, and that does not require the examination for clerks which my hon. friend pretended was necessary.

Mr. REID: It requires the examination for lockers, the preliminary examination, and they must pass that unless they are appointed preventive officers.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is getting away from what I am talking about; that is not the question. In the lower grades and in appointments such as that these examinations are not required.

Mr. REID: That is not a fact.

Mr. GRAHAM: Look at it and see if I am not right.

Mr. REID: They are required to pass an examination.

Mr. GRAHAM: They may be required to pass a very light examination, but my hon. friend has many men in his employ in the lower grades who have not passed any of the examinations that were referred to in this House this afternoon. If my hon. friend will look up the requirements of the law he will find that they have a very high standard, so high a standard that University men seek these positions in Great Britain and they get a very high class of officials in this way. The intention of the Civil Service Act, which was not perfect, I admit, was to give the Civil Service a start in the right direction so that hereafter men of the highest type, men educated in our universities and collegiate institutes, might be drawn to the Civil Service.

Mr. A. De WITT FOSTER: They were turned down.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not going into details. My hon. friend was trying to get a man into the department. I know Dr. Adam Shortt, and I say, in the face of everything that hon. gentlemen have said, that there is no higher-minded type of man in the Dominion of Canada than Adam Shortt. He has his peculiarities, as the Minister of Public Works and I have our peculiarities, but he is the soul of honour, and there is no higher type than Adam Shortt. I wish he were in the House to-night to reply to what some hon. gentlemen have said. I would like to see him on the floor of this House ready to discuss the great questions of the country, and if he were hon. gentlemen would find him a foeman worthy of their steel. I know the difficulties that ministers have with the Civil Service Commission—nobody better. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) smiles; he knows what I mean. I have had my difficulties with Dr. Shortt, and I have told him that he was wrong time and again, but I never imputed wrong motives to Dr. Shortt, because I believe he is incapable of entertaining motives other than those of the highest kind. What he was doing at the Forum was criticising our whole Civil Service system, and if you will read what he said carefully you will find that he took a fling at both parties. Of course, the present Government was in—that was the difference—but we had been in for a long time, and he criticised the Civil Service when the late Government was in power. He criticised the system very severely, and it was the system that we left that Sir George Murray was secured to investigate. Dr. Shortt thought that we had not arrived at the right kind of a system, that our officers were not divided in the proper way, that our work was not systematized, and that the ministers had too much to do. Dr. Shortt has always been largely opposed to our present system and wanted it changed. Whatever he said on that occasion was meant to give an example of what he thought was wrong in our present system, and I do not think that he ever had any desire to impugn the motives or criticise the actions of the present Government. I know him as well as any man in this House knows him. As it is, the fact as to the figures must remain whatever Dr. Shortt said or did not say. The figures presented by my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) to-day show a chasm, to use the words of the hon. Finance Minister (Mr. White) between the sum of the dismissable, resignations, deaths and desertions—

Mr. J. D. REID: No.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think so—and the sum of the appointments equals about 11,000 people.

Mr. REID: There were no deaths in the returns.

Mr. GRAHAM: Well, leave out the deaths. It is said that civil servants seldom die and never of their own accord resign. I do not know whether that is true or not, but they seldom resign unless they are forced to. The people will be asking: Is the Government justified in adding these thousands to the expense of the country at a time when we have a deficit—the first deficit in many years? They may not be so particular as to what Dr. Shortt said or did not say. From the public standpoint I do say that when we have a man who has held important positions in one of the leading seats of learning in the Dominion of Canada, in a seat of learning which stands amongst the highest—that is Queen's University at Kingston, and I am proud to have some little connection with that university—when we have a man who has sent pupils out all over the Dominion to carry on their lifework, and who have carried with them a high respect for Dr. Adam Shortt, when we have a man who is in such a position that he cannot be touched by the House of Commons, one who occupies the position almost of a judge, I think it is as little as the Government can do to appoint some body before whom Dr. Shortt can come and put his side of the case as against the abuse which has been hurled at him by some gentlemen behind and on the Government benches. That is only fair to the dignity of this House, fair to the responsibility of the Government, and fair to a man who, notwithstanding what has been said, stands high and will continue to stand high in the estimation of the leading educationalists in the Dominion of Canada.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into Committee of Supply, Mr. Sevigny in the Chair.

Progress reported.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden, the House adjourned at 11.55 p.m.

Friday, March 5, 1915.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That on Monday, the 8th of March, and on subsequent Mondays to the end of the session, Government notices of motion and Government orders shall have precedence after questions and notices of motion for the production of papers.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I will not object to this motion if the date is changed from the 8th to the 15th.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is no objection to that.

Motion amended accordingly, and, as amended, agreed to.

17TH NOVA SCOTIA REGIMENT.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. KYTE: I desire to ask the right hon. Prime Minister if he has received any communication from Mr. H. C. Crowell, staff correspondent of the Halifax Chronicle, with reference to the telegrams from Sir George Perley referring to the 17th Regiment of Nova Scotia, and read to the House the other day?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, I have.

Mr. KYTE: Has the Prime Minister any objection to placing it before the House?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I can if desired. Mr. Crowell sent me a telegram saying he had not had a personal interview with General Alderson, but had had correspondence by telegram, and he repeated his statements as to the conditions and desired me to read this telegram in the House; to which I replied that as the substance of the telegram had already been communicated by him to the press, I saw no reason why I should read it to the House, and that I had sent forward a request, through the Acting High Commissioner, to the War Office that an inquiry should be made into the subject, and that Mr. Crowell should be given an opportunity of appearing at that inquiry and making good his statement.

SEPARATION ALLOWANCES.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. W. M. MARTIN: I wish to ask a question with relation to separation allowances to the dependents of certain members of some of the contingents. In order to put the question properly, I am forced to ask leave to read a letter which I have received from the Regina branch of the Patriotic Association.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the letter is not a lengthy one and the hon. gentleman wishes to base a question on it, I think it would be permissible.

Mr. MARTIN: I shall read only the portions of the letter relating to the matter in question. It is a letter addressed to me by Mr. J. J. Franks, secretary of the Regina branch of the Canadian Patriotic Fund, dated March 1. Mr. Franks says:

> My work in connection with the Regina Branch of the Canadian Patriotic Fund puts me in close touch with the wives of the Canadian volnnteers for overseas service.
> There was great delay in issuing the cheques for the separation allowance for the dependents of the men of the first contingent but that was quite excusable. As great or a greater delay took place in issuing the cheques for the dependents of the second contingent men. I wrote a few forcible letters to the militia officials at Ottawa but they threw the blame on to the officers in charge of the different corps in Winnipeg for not sending in the necessary information, and I have good reason to believe that the chief fault lay in Winnipeg.
> The same unreasonable delay is occurring in connection with the separation cheques for the dependents of the men of the third contingent, now mobilized in Regina. Some of these men enlisted before Christmas, about the 19th or 20th of December, nearly ten weeks, ago and no separation cheque has been received by any of these men's dependents.

The question I wish to ask is whether the Minister of Militia knows whether or not these cheques have been sent up to the present time. If they have not been sent, I would respectfully urge upon the minister the necessity of sending this separation allowance immediately, as in any event it is very small.

Major General HUGHES: The separation allowances are not touched by us until we get the full returns from the various corps. I do not know anything about the second contingent in this regard, but the third contingent papers are scarcely more than in yet, and they must be verified. All these papers have to be verified, and it takes more or less time. The recruiting for the third contingent in Regina began only after Christmas, and there has hardly yet been time to get the papers sent out. However, I will have the matter looked into by the officials of the department.

QUESTIONS OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Mr. Speaker, I desire to refer to a matter of privilege. My attention was called yesterday to the fact that one or more newspapers during the past week have alleged that I eliminated from Hansard a portion or portions of my remarks upon the Budget in reference to the Buy-in-Canada propaganda. I do not complain about the newspapers in question, because, as a matter of fact, the remarks that I did make did not appear in Hansard, and consequently there was some justification for the remarks made by the newspapers. When my attention was called to this, I was of the opinion that possibly I had been responsible for the elimination myself, but upon investigation I learned that I was not responsible, and I have the authority of Hansard officials to say that the deletion of this portion of my remarks was not due to myself. I should not take the trouble to refer to the matter had I not been charged with the elimination of my remarks in this respect, and consequently with receding from the position which I took with reference to the indiscriminate campaign in respect to the Buy-in-Canada propaganda, both of which charges were incorrect.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Did my hon. friend ever ascertain to what the elimination was due?

Mr. MACLEAN: Due to Hansard officials, I assume. But I might say that when my attention was called to it by an hon. gentleman opposite, I undertook to restore the substance of my remarks in the Revised Hansard and I presume that has been done.

Mr. MACDONELL: Are my hon. friend's remarks now included in his speech in the Revised Hansard?

Mr. MACLEAN: Yes. At least, I did everything I could to have them so included.

I do not think the Revised Hansard is out yet.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Mr. Speaker, I also desire to raise a question of privilege. Some of the newspapers have stated that I made a bull the other day in my speech on the Budget. My hon. friend from Essex (Mr. Wilcox) says that I walked out of the House and expunged the passage from Hansard. I desire to say that I did not, directly or indirectly, have any communication with the reporters on the subject. I do not think it would be proper for a member to go to Hansard and ask that a portion of his remarks be expunged. I presume that when corrections are made by members on the spot, the reporters exercise their judgment in getting out their report. I wish to assure my hon. friend from Essex that the statement he made on that occasion is entirely without foundation.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, perhaps you would permit me to give, on behalf of the Hansard staff, the explanation of these two incidents which was brought out this morning at a meeting of the Debates Committee. As to the incident to which the junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) has referred, the explanation is that the Hansard reporter relied on the typewritten copy of the speech handed in by the hon. member for Halifax, and forgot or neglected to interpolate in it the passage to which reference has been made.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is correct.

Mr. TAYLOR: As to the passage referred to by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), the Hansard reporter felt himself justified in using intelligence rather than mere mechanical skill, and, when the explanation by way of correction was made by the hon. member for St. John, the reporter let it go as explained instead of as the matter really occurred.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Quite properly.

Mr. TAYLOR: I have before me the transcription of what did occur, but I do not suppose the House is interested in it now

THE BUDGET.

PROPOSED WAR TAXATION.

Consideration of the proposed motion of Hon. W. T. White (Minister of Finance) for Committee of Ways and Means resumed from March 3.

Mr. O. J. WILCOX (North Essex)—(resuming): Mr. Speaker, it is with a degree of reluctance that I rise to take the part which I am expected to take in this debate. First of all, I desire to say that it is my hope and wish that all I may say may be in accordance with the best traditions of our constitution in regard to debate. I have no desire to speak in an unkindly manner, and should I err in the way of aggression it will be due to my youthfulness in this House, and not to any such intention. When the right hon. leader of this Government and my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition agreed to a truce, I had the hope and conviction that that truce would be kept. Considering what is now at stake—the far-reaching and comprehensive character of the issues with which this Government is called upon to deal, the principles of freedom and of liberty which have been won for us by the sweat and blood of our forefathers, everything in fact that is near and dear to us, and which has sprung up in the splendid democracy we have had in the past—it would have been well for us to follow the course of proceeding which was assented to by my right hon. friend the leader of the Government when he was leader of the Opposition in 1911. I should have thought that this debate might well have ended, as did the other debate to which I have alluded, after the hon. junior member for Halifax had had an opportunity of answering the Finance Minister's speech on the Budget. But, as I listened to the speech of the right hon. leader of the Opposition on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, my hopes fell; for he said that they were bound to criticise the Budget. I think it is true to say that we are living in an age of great achievements. We have boasted of what we have accomplished in this country in the forty years since Confederation. I believe that men on both sides of this House have proclaimed that growth, that development, and that expansion to the people of this country. But now, when everything which is dear to us is at stake—our cherished principles of government, and the liberty and freedom of our people—now is not the time for such wrangling as has taken place in this House during the past week. It has been stated that a truce has been agreed to. I am inclined to the view that my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition misunderstood the meaning of the word "truce." I hold in my hand a clipping that appeared in one of the Liberal papers of this country on the 21st of November, 1914. I regard it as one of the smallest, the meanest pieces of political partisanship that has come under my observation during my public or private life. It reads as follows:

> Recently we have seen him (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) stumping in Quebec, calling upon the French Canadians to enlist for the European war.

The proper thing for my right hon. friend to do, a noble thing for him to do, but listen to the next sentence:

> The whereabouts and the action of the other party's leader at that time were remarkable by contrast. Sir Robert Borden has been golfing and dancing in Virginia and there has been no one to assume the leadership of his people at a time when the public sentiment needed to be stirred as never before in Canadian history.

A truce! A truce! Let me give another quotation. My hon. friend the member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) last night grew eloquent repeating the old story that he always gets off. The following appeared in the Brockville Recorder:

> This is a sorry comment on the vision of the Minister of Militia who should have known or found out the usual climatic conditions of Salisbury Plains.

This is a charge against my hon. friend the Minister of Militia (Major General Hughes). I will venture to assert in all fairness that no man in public life has had greater responsibilities cast upon him than Major General Hughes since war broke out. It is true he is not perfect; none of us are perfect. If we were perfect we would have no business in this chamber. We are human. The minister is human, and the criticism is—

Mr. FOWLER: Inhuman.

Mr. WILCOX: Yes, it is inhuman. Now, I have Webster's close by me here. What is the meaning of this word "truce?" I said a moment ago that my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition should have some regard for the action of his followers. He is still the leader, although I sometimes think my genial friend the member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) has clothed himself with the robes of leadership. What is the meaning of this term? Truce means pledge of fidelity, faith. Imagine the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) the other night calling out in a loud voice: Come on with your election. Pledge of fidelity! The hon. member for South Renfrew last evening said: If you want an election, come on. Pledge of fidelity! Then, truce is a Teutonic word; intermission of action, pain or contest, temporary concession, brief, quiet. When I think of what has occurred by hon. friends I think of that definition—brief, quiet. Truce? They have been endeavouring to undermine this Administration which I venture to assert, has had the greatest responsibility cast upon it since the 4th August, 1914, that has been cast upon the shoulders of any individuals who have yet been called upon to govern the Dominion of Canada. But there is another word. It is trousse. I think that the leader of the Opposition has mistaken the word, because the latter word means small implements that are used for surgical purposes. The people of this country realize what is going on in this House. They understand fully the motives of hon. gentlemen opposite. There is a lack of sincerity that is known throughout the length and breadth of this land. Think of the argument of my hon. friend from St. John, and apply that to the idea of a truce. My hon. friend from Assiniboia talked about extravagance and big taxes, and spent hours of the valuable time of this House in endeavoring to unload upon this Government the responsibility for the condition that exists as a result of the great war.

Well, Sir, to paraphrase what was said in the Senate of the United States some time ago: when this land, now fair, now beautiful, the most prosperous of all the belligerent powers, which are engaged in the greatest struggle known to civilization, shall have become desolate, prophesied by the hon. gentlemen opposite—big taxes, big burdens on the people,—of course there will be one remedy and that is squid. But, Mr. Speaker, let me remind you that that condition will not be brought about in this country by the wanderings and meanderings of hon. gentlemen opposite. They do not particularly care about what they call the big expenditures, because they realize as well as we the conditions which exist in this country. They know what the revenues of this country have been in the past, they know that the revenue of Canada for the past year has not been as great as in former years, and they know the reason why. It does seem to me that there is a lack of sincerity on their part, because as I see it, they are endeavouring to make the people of this country believe that the Government is responsible for the declining revenue, and therefore they say to the people: Put these rascals out and put us in. I want to say a word to my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, and to say it courteously; I would remind him of that very pleasant visit that he made to Tilbury during the election of 1908, when he addressed 5,000 people gathered there from the four constituencies that centre at Tilbury. The pathetic appeal he made to them on that occasion was: This is my last appeal to the Canadian people, I appeal to you this last time for your support before returning to private life, where I hope to live in peace the remainder of my days. Did the right hon. gentleman mean that? I do not believe he did because he came back in 1911, and we are always glad to meet him in Windsor and in the county of Essex, and he has a good many friends there, but not so many friends now as he had. In 1911 he again appealed for one more term to finish his work. And, after the election what excuse did he give to the people of this country for not living up to the pledge he made to the electors of Essex and Kent? He said he had consulted his wife, whom we all hold in the highest esteem and regard, and that she advised him to keep on. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is very great evidence of the congenial disposition of my right hon. friend, that he is so susceptible to the influence of his wife, but I do not know that the people of Essex took the right hon. gentleman very seriously when he made that statement. However, there was the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) looming up for leadership, and from the experiences we have had in this House we might consider that the hon. gentleman has almost assumed the role of leadership. I confess that when my hon. friend from St. John is in the House, I know of no man who can engender a greater amount of bitterness in the debates than he can. When the hon. member from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) was speaking on the Budget and criticising the big taxes, wasteful administration, and so on, I thought I could see the shades of Sir Richard Cartwright and visions of the Hon. William Paterson, who between the years 1867 and 1896 led off with just that same kind of talk as the campaign cry of the Liberal party. Well, Sir, it never brought any result other than long terms in opposition. Mr. James G. Blaine, the great American stateman, said in one of his books:

> It never pays to be a blue-ruin man in the United States. The people are not influenced by that sort of talk. They have an abiding confidence in our future and when dismal accounts are spread broadcast, they simply lose confidence in the authors thereof.

In the campaign of 1893, the Liberal party took about the same position they are taking to-day, and they talked of big taxes, big expenditure and debt. Here is an extract from the Liberal literature of that day:

> We cannot but view with alarm the large increase of the public debt and of the controllable annual expenditure of the Dominion, and the consequent undue taxation of the people under the governments which have been continuously in power since 1878, and we demand strict economy in the administration of the government of the country.

We all know what happened when the Liberals came to power; we all knew that between 1896 and 1911 the expenditure of this country increased by leaps and bounds and that the public debt thereof was added to. Now, here are the words of my right hon. friend:

> If we get into power we will follow the example of Mr. Mackenzie; and I say that although we may not be able to bring the expenditures to what they were under him, we can reduce the amount by two, yes three million of dollars per year.—Wilfrid Laurier.

He was not Sir Wilfrid then.

> For my own part, I do not hesitate to tell him that I consider a yearly expenditure of forty million dollars, or thirty-eight million dollars, altogether for the present resources of Canada. I say that it is a disgrace and a shame to the Government that have been entrusted with our affairs that they come down to ask us and ask an expenditure of $38,300,000 a year for federal purposes. Sir, the thing is utterly unjustifiable.—Sir Richard Cartwright.

Now, is it not a fact—and I call on hon. gentlemen opposite to witness—that Sir Richard Cartwright spent part of his public career in depicting Canada as abandoned by Heaven to all manner of evil fortunes? And what did he gain by it except a long period in the cold shades of opposition, followed by a spell of office which he had to recant by humbly adopting the very policy he had blamed for its imaginary woes.

> In 1909 we were taking $6,115,000 more in taxes out of the people than we should, and we spent $7,571,000 more than we should. An era of economy in expenditure should at once be entered upon.—Wm. Paterson.

Just such argument as we have to-day. The fact is that the outbreak of this war, this world struggle, frustrated every plan of hon. gentlemen opposite. They declared for a truce and started all over again, and all they have to fight on now is the present Budget which was brought down since the war broke out. Now I do not think that conditions are so bad; I know they are not so bad. I believe that my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) in the remarks which he made upon the Budget was so far from the facts that when he reads over those remarks he will not take them seriously himself. The outbreak disturbed trade in this country as it disturbed trade in every civilized country in the world. The shock to international finance was enormous. In the general loss of confidence there arose an instantaneous and universal demand for gold all over the world. Huge volumes of securities were thrown upon the market and sold for what they would realize. Liquidation proceeded upon a colossal scale until the prodigious losses of individuals and the vast drains of gold from the financial centres compelled the closing of the houses of exchange of the world. This is the condition which this Government had to meet, and by reason of this condition the imports upon which we raised the revenues of our country did not reach their former level, and consquently the tariff, which constitutes the medium by which the revenue of this country is raised, was ineffective to produce a sufficient amount to run the affairs of the country. I think that is a reasonable and adequate explanation of the conditions that actually exist.

4 p.m.

Now, my hon. friend from St. John city dwelt at length upon the years 1908-9, 1909-10, 1912-13 and 1913-14. But he had nothing to say about the Estimates of 1910-11 which he himself had assisted to prepare and which the Administration adopted. The very principle which he condemned in the Estimates of 1908-9 was involved in the Estimates which he himself presented. The revenue of this country in 1909-10 was $101,503,710.93. In 1910-11 the revenue was $117,780,409.78, an increase of $16,276,698.85. The revenue of 1911-12 amounted to $136,108,217.36, an increase of $18,327,807.58. That year the Finance Minister was able to apply to the reduction of the public debt the sum of $122,591.32. The revenue in 1912-13 had increased under this progressive Administration to $168,639,903.45, an increase of $32,000,000, and in that year the Government had a surplus of $55,000,000. And in that year, after meeting all the obligations which they themselves had created, and also meeting the obligations which came over to this Government from the Government of the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), the sum of $25,300,000 was applied to the reduction of the public debt. In 1914-15, the current year, when this great world's crisis arose on the 4th of August, the public revenue is unfortunately reduced to $120,000,000. The Government, therefore, have not the necessary funds to carry out the programme which, having regard to the growth and development of the country, they have anticipated putting into effect. My hon. friend the Finance Minister made some remarks during the course of his Budget speech, which I desire to quote:

> The revenue for the present year will, then, approximate $163,000,000.
> Let us now consider the expenditure. First of all, the ordinary Consolidated Fund expenditure will probably reach $126,500,000, or about $14,500,000 in excess of last year. At the last session of Parliament fairly generous appropriations were made for all divisions of the ordinary services of the country. The main increases will be found in Public Works (expenditure chargeable to income) and in the expenditure on account of post office, railways, agriculture, and militia. With the growth of the country the other services have required additional outlays, with the result that for the current fiscal year, as I have stated, there will be an increase in the expenditure on account of Consolidated Fund of about $14,500,000. A revenue of $163,000,000 and an expenditure of $126,500,000 leaves a surplus of revenue over and above the amount required for expenditure upon current account of $36,500,000.
> The surplus for the year, then, will be thirty-six million five hundred thousand dollars as compared with fifty-six million dollars last year.
> In connection with this matter of surpluses, it may not be out of place for me to point out that from the year 1902 forward there have been substantial surpluses of revenue over current expenditure, running from $14,000,000 in 1902-3 to $22,000,000 in 1909-10, to $30,000,000 in 1910-11. For the year 1911-12 our surplus was $37,000,000, for 1912-13, as I have stated, $56,000,000, and for last year, 1913-14, the figure which I have just given, $36,500,000. So we have had during the last three years the largest surpluses in the financial history of the Dominion.

It seems to me that these figures, which are absolutely correct—nothing needs to be taken from or added to them—are evidence of the fact that this Government is giving to the country a good clean, and honest administration and that the finances of the people have been properly administered by the hon. gentlemen who sit on the treasury benches.

In connection with the surplus which has accrued during the last few years, let me point out some of the obligations which this Government has been compelled to assume

We say that we are not responsible for the liabilities which my right hon. friend the present leader of the Opposition and his Government created. The legacies which were handed over by this Government to the present Finance Minister had to be accepted; the necessary money had to be raised by means of the machinery ordinarily used for that purpose in the country. I think it is not reasonable to place upon us the onus of responsibility for $178,000,000 of liabilities which were incurred by my right hon. friend's Government, and which the present Government was compelled to assume, as follows: National Transcontinental railway, $56,000,000; Hudson Bay railway, $9,000,000; Quebec bridge, $10,000,000; total, $75,000,000. To that $75,000,000 must be added the $5,000,000 of implementing money in connection with the sale of bonds to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, the $33,000,000 used for the purposes of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company debentures and the $15,000,000 loaned to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company for the completion of the line. These liabilities amount to the enormous sum of $178,000,000—$16, for every man, woman and child in Canada. The amount is still growing; the National Transcontinental railway, the Quebec bridge and the Hudson Bay railway are still unfinished. In view of the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite incurred these enormous liabilities and handed them over to us, the allegations and charges against the Minister of Finance made by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) and the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) do not come with very good grace. The Minister of Finance has given to this country as clean, as honourable and as honest a service as has been given by any gentleman who ever graced the dignity of the position of Finance Minister of Canada. We do not propose to allow my right hon. friend and his confreres in office to charge this Government with wilful extravagance when the large amount of money which is required is to meet obligations which hon. gentlemen themselves incurred. I could give many examples, but I want to give one in particular. In 1904 my right hon. friend addressed a large and influential meeting at Chatham. I have before me a clipping from the Liberal party paper, the Windsor Record, which reported ad nauseam his address on that occasion. It was fluent, it was eloquent, it was graceful, but it did not just pan out as he expected it would.

Let me read from the preamble of my right hon. friend's address in launching his Grand Trunk Pacific railway scheme:

> There is nothing so sweet or so true to the heart of man as is his native country. Even the old men amongst us who have come from the other side of the ocean, and have brought with them from far away an undying love for the land of their ancestors and the land of their birth, find that Canada becomes dearer to them as Canada advances and as the name of Canada spreads.

That is true. These are lovely words. This was fertilizing the soil for the statement that my right hon. friend was about to make before 5,000 people. Here is the Windsor Record's report of his address in presenting this scheme to the people of Canada. He said:

> It is true, and one is bound to be honest in these matters, if a man in the city of Chatham were to borrow $10,000 to build a house, and he built it, and as soon as it is built, if he could find a tenant who would pay him 3 per cent or 4 per cent on the cost of the house, if he borrowed the money at the same rate, he was not out of pocket a single cent.

That was the reasoning. Here is the statement to which I desire to draw the attention of the House:

> According to our contract the whole amount of money that will be taken from the Canadian tax payer for the construction of that immense railway from ocean to ocean will be simply the sum of $13,500,000, a sum less than our surplus last year. (Great applause).

I desire to state briefly the cost of this road from the statement of the leader of the present Government in speaking upon this question in 1904. What is the proposition? What is the position at present? Let us examine it for a moment. We are committing this country to obligations to the extent of $150,000,000. If we consider the probability that the bonds must be sold at 90 cents we are committing this country to obligations of the extent of $170,000,000; and the Grand Trunk Railway Company, the other partner to the contract, is committing itself to obligations to the extent of only $14,500,000, or a little less than $15,000,000. What is the result of the contract at present? The result is that 1,500 miles of railway built in the western part of Canada as part of an enterprise to which the Government contributes $150,000,000 or $170,000,000, and to which the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company contributes say $14,500,000, is to become the absolute property of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. If we are going to expend $150,000,000 or $170,000,000 for the construction of this line and hand over 1,500 miles of the most profitable portion of it to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, what is the objection to our incurring the other $14,500,000 and owning the whole road?

I wish to draw the attention of the House to another phase of this question. My right hon. friend who led the Government in 1904 went to the people in my county, and in the quotation which I have read, which he will not dispute, he informed the people of that consituency that that road would be built for $13,000,000. I want to place on Hansard just what this road did cost from the official return laid upon the table of the House by the Minister of Railways and Canals:

Statement showing the cost of the eastern division of the National Transcontinental railway for the purpose of basing the amount of annual rental which the Grand Trunk Pacific railway will be required to pay under their agreement; based on the estimated cost submitted by the chief engineer at $161,307,800 and on the supposition that it will be completed and handed over to the Grand Trunk Pacific railway on the 1st January, 1915, and capitalizing the expenditure at 3 per cent as provided in the agreement for the purpose of the rental.

Estimated cost of complete road exclusive of interest at December 31, 1914	$161,307,800.00
Interest during construction at 3 per cent to December 31, 1913	15,136,289.00
Estimated interest on expenditure to December 31, 1914 ..	5,293,322.67
Capital cost for rental purpose at January 1, 1915	181,737,411.67
Interest on $181,737,411.67 at 3 per cent capitalized for 7 years (January 1, 1915, to December 31, 1922)	41,776,681.31
Capital cost estimated to January 1, 1923, for rental purposes..	223,514,092.98
Rental based on above	6,705,422.79

If the road does not earn 3 per cent in excess of working expenditure for the three years ending December 31, 1915, then the interest is added to capital for three years longer, adding $20,725,791.30 to capital cost; making the estimated cost of the railway for rental purposes, $244,239,884.28. Rental based on above, $7,327,196.54.

No allowance has been made in the above for betterment during ten years from January 1, 1915, to December 31, 1925. Should any betterments be made these would have to be added to the cost for rental purposes, and rental increased accordingly.

This country under the bargain made by my right hon. friend must pay without recourse on the bonds guaranteed on the mountain section $56,342,000. Interest at 3 per cent for seven years, which amounts to $11,831,820. The country must also pay the cost of implementing the bonds under the agreement of 1904, clause 8, which will probably amount to about $12,000,000, but which I am placing at the lowest estimate, $10,000,080. This gives a total of $259,929,019, which does not include the Quebec bridge, the cost of which has been placed at $17,000,000; it does not include the interest for three years on $188,528,470 at 3¾ per cent in case the net earnings of the eastern division are not sufficient to pay that rental, which would amount to $21,209,343, these two amounts totalling $38,209,343. Thus we have a grand total of $298,138,462 as the actual cost to the country of a road that was to be built at an actual outlay to Canada of $13,000,000.

In view of the great liabilities which the present Administration has had to take over from the late Government—the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Canadian Northern Railway, and the many other great national works to which I have alluded—it seems to me that the criticism of hon. gentlemen opposite will not be taken very seriously by the people of this country. I should just like to quote, as evidence of how my hon. friends opposite carried on the Government of this country, a statement made by Senator Taylor when he was a member of this House:

Mr. George Taylor (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, on the 14th December I moved a motion in this House asking for a return and the House granted an order which reads on the back:

Return to an order of the House of Commons, dated the 14th December, 1910, showing what amount has been paid by the Government during the last fiscal year for travelling expenses with the names and the expenditure in each case, under the following heads, viz.:

Railway, steamship, and other lines of transportation; private cars; pullman cars; tips to waiters; meals and hotel expenses for the following persons; ministers of the Crown; civil servants of all grades; immigration agents; and other persons employed by the Government on any special or other work.

It is signed by Charles Murphy, Secretary of State, but he adds to the return this statement:

And then Mr. Taylor gave the following list of supplies furnished in 1910 for the private car of the Transcontinental Railway Commission:

Trip.		Provisions.	Liquors.
1.	Plush for private car, $132.
2.	Reid,.. .. .. .. $19 50
	Lapointe.. .. .. 3 30
		$ 22 80
	Bate & Co.		$ 84 85
3.	Bate & Co.		72 17
4.	Moreland.. .. .. $5 00
	Lapointe.. .. .. 6 60
		11 60
	Bate & Co.		64 40
5.	Yonge.. .. .. ..$14 94
	Lapointe.. .. .. 4 75
		19 69
	Bate & Co.		94 05

6. Moreland	$21 00
Lapointe	46 00
Matthews	11 00
		78 00
Bate & Co.			242 05
7. Bate & Co.			126 00
8. Bate & Co.			108 00
9. Bate & Co.			147 00
10. Bate & Co.			99 12
11. Bate & Co.			102 00
12. Bate & Co.			120 16
13. Moreland	$18 00
Lapointe	18 00
		36 00
			124 45
		$168 09	$1,384 25
Total supplies			$1,552 34

That was paid for supplies for the private car of the Trancontinental Railway Commission, for five trips which has assisted in spending two hundred and ninety odd millions of dollars on a railroad which was to have cost the people of this country, according to the figures I have already quoted, only $13,000,000. And that is only one sample, and many others could be given, of what hon. gentlemen opposite left to this Government. It seems to me that criticism of the conditions that exist in this country at the present time does not come with very good grace from hon. gentlemen opposite.

My hon. friend from St. John made a desperate attack upon the Government for raising the duty on fertilizers. He went into the realms of science as usual, and found out that squid was a very valuable thing for removing insect pests. My hon. friend has made allusion to that to-day, and I accept his statement. Nevertheless, my hon. friend made considerable reference to it. He absolutely thought that squid would be a panacea for all the ills to which the fruit life of this country is subject, and he based some argument upon it. But as my hon. friend has stated that he was mistaken—

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am listening with interest to the very eloquent, interesting and informatory speech which my hon. friend is making, but if he will pardon me—

Mr. WILCOX: My hon. friend is not going to interject a speech into my address if I have any rights in this House. If my hon. friend wants to ask me a question, I shall be courteous enough to allow him; but he is not going to interject a speech.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I wish to ask a question on the subject of fertilizers, and I wish to ask it now because I may not have the opportunity later on. We cannot tell when my hon. friend will come back to it again.

Mr. WILCOX: Let my hon. friend ask the question.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend has made the statement that the increased duties upon the imports of all the materials which enter into the manufacture of fertilizers, and upon the manufactured product itself, will be only $4,625.40. I want to ask my hon. friend how he reconciles that figure with the statement contained in the Customs Department report for the year ended March 31, 1914, which gives the value of the fertilizers, compounded or manufactured, brought into Canada during the year at $602,142. The duty on that would be upwards of $42,000, not $4,625.40, as stated by my hon. friend. How does my hon. friend reconcile those two figures?

Mr. WILCOX: I thought it was a question about the squid.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is much more important than the squid.

Mr. WILCOX: I was just coming to the fertilizer. I will be through with the squid in a moment.

Mr. KYTE: Squid is used as a fertilizer.

Mr. WILCOX: I think I can give my hon. friend a satisfactory explanation of those figures.

Fertilizers, imported	$602,142
Duty	58,248
War tax 7½ per cent	45,160
Phosphate rock	16,000
War tax	1,200
Fertilizers unmanufactured	3,073
War tax	231
Total importations	621,215
Total war tax	46,591

That makes a total importation of $621,215 and a total war tax of $46,591. I think that is correct. That is a few more dollars than my hon. friend stated but in the Hansard as quoted there is one figure left off. It reads $4,000 instead of $40,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Instead of $46,000.

Mr. WILCOX: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is a complete answer to it.

Mr. WILCOX: There are about 800,000 farmers in this country. My hon. friends opposite argue that it will be a great burden upon the farmers, but if we take the importation at $46,000, where as a matter of fact it would be a burden of 5¾ cents a piece for the farmers of Canada.

I want to make a reference or two to something that was said by my hon. friend from West Kent (Mr. McCoig), He referred to the rural mail delivery, to the duty on agricultural implements and especially to the serum that is used for the treatment of hog cholera in the United States. My hon. friend from West Kent said hogs were gathered together in a block and shot and he also declared that the application of the serum which had been originated by Dr. Dorset in the United States had been effectual in stamping out hog cholera and that this system should be introduced into this country. This is rather an important matter. The hog industry is a most important industry and if the Government is not now adopting a proper system in regard to the prevention of hog cholera, I agree with my hon. friend from West Kent that it is a question worthy of the most serious consideration of those who are called upon to deal with it. Let me remind my hon. friend that this serum, according to the Veterinary General of Canada, was invented years ago. Why is it that during all the years that have past and gone our hon. friends opposite did not use it if it was a good thing? It was considered, it was studied by the Veterinary General then as it is being studied now, and it has been considered that it is not effectual as a remedy for hog cholera. There was in Essex and Kent a large outbreak of hog cholera during the past year and in this connection I would desire to place on record a quotation from a report handed to me by the Veterinary Director General. It is as follows:

> In the outbreaks which have occurred during the past summer in the counties of Essex and Kent, the first one was traced to a herd of hogs which were being fed with garbage collected in the city of Chatham. From this centre of infection the disease gradually spread until it was necessary to destroy over 6,000 hogs and no less than 195 premises have been infected.

Under the law dealing with these cases $72,000 was paid to the farmers of these districts for the loss sustained during this outbreak of hog cholera.

It has been held in Canada that the most effective way to stamp out hog cholera as soon as it is found to exist is to destroy the animal and to pay two-thirds of the value. In the United States hog cholera has been much more prevalent than it has been in Canada, because, I understand, that there is only the one section of Essex and Kent that is at all seriously affected by it. In the United States it extends over such a large area that it would be absolutely impracticable for the Government to deal with it in the way in which we deal with it in Canada because, if they were to undertake to deal with it in this way, it would probably result in the destruction of a large portion of the industry in the United States. According to the report of the Veterinary Director General, the serum to which my hon. friend has alluded is simply the blood that is taken from a hog which has had the cholera, and which is immune for a considerable length of time. That blood is injected into a well hog and that is supposed to make the hog immune for a period of about six weeks. The period is so short that it is not considered a practical cure. Then medical science has worked out another treatment for this disease. The virus of the disease, together with the blood of the hog, compose a serum which is injected into a well hog, and when this serum develops it is claimed that it will produce immunity for about three months. It has been proven conclusively by the best veterinary surgeons in the United States that this is not a practical cure, that it has in every instance been the means of scattering disease and the losses in the United States have been enormous where the treatment has been used. I submit that the Minister of Agriculture must look into this matter with very great care and caution when it is proposed to substitute a treatment which has not proved effectual in the United States for the system at present in vogue in Canada. It is a matter that is worthy of the minister's most serious and earnest consideration.

In regard to the rural mail delivery which my hon. friend from West Kent has referred to, it is a well known fact that it was the present Government that so changed the regulations as to make it possible for all the people of this country, in the rural districts where the population would warrant it, to have a rural free mail service. As a result of the progressive policy of the department in this connection I would think that the system had been extended all over the country and as far as I can learn the farmers very much appreciate the service which is so beneficial to them.

There are very few constituencies that have a greater amount of patronage than the riding of North Essex which I have the honour to represent, and when I listen to the criticism of my hon. friends opposite and contrast it with the clean administration and the fairness with which I have treated friends of my hon. friends in the service, it seems to me that under no circumstances are our hon. friends at all thankful, and no matter what the Government do they will criticise them and that therefore we should not take them too seriously, as I am sure the people will not. There are in the neighbourhood of 150 civil servants of various classes at the port of Windsor, and since this Government came into power, only five have been dismissed of those over whom I have jurisdiction, and they were dismissed for reasons which I will not state now but which were absolutely good. In view of such a state of affairs, I submit to my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark), who is generally fair, that it is not necessary to defend the Administration on this score. In 1896, when the Liberals came to power, there was published in the Ottawa Free Press what it deemed to be the policy of the Liberal party on this question, about which we heard such a tirade of criticism yesterday afternoon. The Free Press said:

> The rank and file of the Liberal party will acclaim a plain statement of the need for a closer loyalty of the department to this accepted principal of party government—all patronage should go to the friends of the party. Every departure from this is an Act of disloyalty to the followers and supporters of the party.
> No Cabinet minister nor any supporter of the Liberal party can assault this position and be loyal to his party.
>
> Every new appointment every power of patronage, belongs by right of system and precedent to the members of the Liberal party.
> To appease a political foe by gifts of patronage is a sign of cowardice, or even worse.
> In the initial appointment or in the awarding of a government contract, it is expected that the party in power shall be loyal to its friends. Without such loyalty the party becomes disorganized.

Mr. Lister, who was then member for Lambton, speaking on the same subject, said:

> I take it that the principle propounded by my honourable friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is the true principle. Every man in this country so long as the law does not deprive him of the right to vote has that right. I would oppose to the very utmost the interference by anybody with that right. But the moment an official goes beyond it, the moment he becomes a partisan, then he takes his official life in his hands, and if the fortunes of war go against him he must have to cease to be a public servant in this country, I say, moreover, that if the government do not do their duty in this regard they will disappoint the Liberal party in this country. and further, they will disappoint certain office-holders because they expected to die officially if we succeeded to power. What is the law on the subject? What are the rights of these people? It is laid down in Todd's 'Government of the British Colonies," in these words:
> "But an active interference in political contests in opposition to the existing administration would constitute a sufficient offence to justify the removal of any public officer."

This policy was carried out to the letter, and I have here the list of dismissals made by the Liberal Government in 1896, and I find that there were dismissed nine officers and the whole carrier staff in the Windsor post office. M. K. Cowan, the then clever representative of South Essex, dismissed every officer with one or two exceptions in South Essex, in 1896, and he made it his boast how they had been so dismissed. I submit to the people whom I have the privilege of representing, and I submit to my right hon. friend, these facts as a comparison with what happened when the Conservative party came into power.

Hon. gentlemen opposite would endeavour to lead the people to believe that the present Administration has not given to the country efficient government. The Conservatives have been in power for three years, and I submit they have given to Canada the most successful administration of public affairs and the most useful legislation that any government ever enacted in the same period. Since the Conservatives came into power three years ago they have given more beneficial legislation to the country than the Liberal party placed upon the statute books during their whole fifteen years in office. I make that statement seriously, conscientiously believing it to be true, and I shall place on Hansard a few of the legislative measures enacted by this Government.

This Government has settled the boundaries of Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec, which was a vexed question in the country, and with which the Liberal party, when in power, were afraid to deal. The Conservative party came into office new, aggressive, and progressive, and they dealt with the question and settled it in a manner satisfactory to the people of Canada.

This Government initiated and had passed into law the Bill in aid of Agriculture, which appropriated $10,000,000 spread over a period of ten years, to be devoted to agricultural instruction throughout Canada. This was intended as an uplifting of the agricultural industry, which is the great industry of the country, by a system of education in all its branches. The basis of success in agriculture, as in all human effort, depends upon the knowing how. There is the science and the art of agriculture; the science is the knowing how and the art is the putting of that knowledge into operation. The Minister of Agriculture, progressive and aggressive, placed in the Estimates $10,000,000, in order that the science of agriculture in its fullest details might be instilled into the minds and into the hearts of the farmers of this country, so that there may be brought about increased production which will be beneficial to all the people of Canada.

They have improved the steamship service to the West Indies and reduced cable rates to those islands, a great boon during the present war.

This Government have inaugurated a greatly improved tri-weekly mail service between Canada and Great Britain. They have also made arrangements in regard to insurance on the St. Lawrence and reduction of rates to Halifax, a thing highly beneficial to the people of this country.

They have a dry-dock under construction at Quebec, with similar dry-docks proposed for Halifax and Esquimalt.

This Government has undertaken the development of harbours at St. John, Quebec, Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton, Port Arthur, Fort William, Vancouver and Victoria. Imagine an Opposition talking about extravagance on the part of this Government which has only been in power for three years, which had to assume responsibilities in the interest of national growth, and to enlarge harbours in all these places I have named. My hon. friend from Centre Toronto (Mr. Bristol) the other day stated that this was the first year in the history of Canada when more wheat went down the St. Lawrence to Montreal than went by way of New York, largely due to the progressive policy of this Government and the development of our national ports and harbours.

And there is the Naval Bill. I will not take time to more than allude to that this afternoon. But I have quotations here from the press to show the position of my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), who last evening got so warm on account of the truce. And, as to that, the Chief Whip of the Liberal party, who is under the direction of the right hon. leader of that party, went to South Huron in November, and at a Liberal meeting there, delivered a political speech. He took the ground there that if the policy of my right hon. friend of 1909-10 had been adopted, a Canadian cruiser might have had the glory of sinking the Emden.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Wilcox.]

Mr. WILCOX: I had not intended to go into—

Mr. PUGSLEY: What ship sank the Emden?

Mr. WILCOX: The Sydney. My hon. friend need not think he is so clever; I have been trying to lift up the hon. gentleman all I can, but I am afraid he is going down again. It is a fact, I believe, that hon. gentlemen opposite discarded their own Bill. And I am not discussing this thing in any partisan way. In 1911 they discarded by their own resolution the policy which they had previously

5 p.m. adopted. Is it not a fact that the Government in one day passed every clause of the Bill of which we have heard so much in this House? Is it not a fact that when this Government came into power, and when its right hon. leader went to England to consult the Lord Commissioners of the Admiralty, who have a thousand years of naval experience to guide them, they advised that, having regard to the conditions that existed, the wise and proper thing to do would be for Canada to construct three of the greatest ships that science could build or money could buy? Is it not a fact that the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in the former Administration advertised for tenders for the construction of a Canadian navy, and that tenders were in on the 1st of May, 1911? Yet that Government, though it did not go out of power until the 21st of October, left those tenders for six months and never awarded a contract. Do we not know that, according to the speeches of the supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite, those ships were to be constructed practically in every constituency bordering on the water and in which there was a Liberal candidate? The opponent of Colonel Currie, the gallant member of this House who stands at the head of the 48th Highlanders in the trenches in France, argued that the ships would actually be built at Collingwood, on the Great Lakes. And when the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) pointed out that the Welland canal was not big enough to let those ships through to the sea, his opponent nearly fainted. Which shows—and I have here absolute proof of it—that hon. gentlemen opposite were dealing with this great question on a purely political basis. If the present Government had adopted the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, it would have taken four years to construct the yards in which the ships were to be built. The Right Hon. Winston Churchill, First Lord of the Admiralty, said so. And it would have cost $75,000,000 to construct the docks on which these ships were to be built in Canada. And when we had these ships, we could not man them in Canada, because it takes years for the men to be trained. In the memorandum submitted to us by Right Hon. Mr. Churchill, First Lord of the Admiralty, with all the experience he had back of him concerning naval affairs, I take the following:

Minimum Time Taken to Obtain a Commission.

Officers:
Captain, 24 years.
Commanders, 18 years.
Lieutenants, 8 years.
Others (medical, clerical, etc.)
Midshipmen.

Minimum Time Taken to Obtain the Rating.

Seamen ratings:
Chief petty officers, petty officers and leading seamen (including signalmen and telegraphist branches, 6 to 12 years.
Able seamen, ordinary seamen, boys, 3 to 4 years.

Gunnery ratings:
Seamen gunner, 5 years.
Gunlayer, second-class, 8 years.
Gunlayer, first-class, 10 years.
Gunner's mate, 10 years.

Torpedo ratings:
Seaman torpedoman, 5 years.
Leading torpedoman, 8 years.
Torpedo gunner's mate, 10 years.

Minimum Time Taken to Obtain the Rating.

Men:
Engine room artificers, 6 to 12 years.
Stoker petty officers, including chief stokers and leading stokers, 4 to 12 years.
Stokers, 1 year.
Armourers, 4 to 12 years.
Electricians, 6 to 12 years.

Where were the men to come from to man these vessels? The First Lord of the Admiralty was absolutely clear in his correspondence in stating that it was impossible for the British Admiralty to man these ships. He says:

In 1909 the question turned upon the provision by Canada in the Pacific of a fleet corresponding to the Australian fleet unit, involving an initial expenditure estimated at £3,700,000, and maintenance of an estimated cost of £600,000 per annum. The Canadian Government did not think this compatible with their arrangements and suggested that they should provide a limited number of cruisers and destroyers which were to be stationed in the Pacific and Atlantic.

The right hon. leader of the Opposition would not agree to the adoption of such a plan as that suggested by Australia, because, forsooth, it did not make provision for the establishment of a fleet unit on the Atlantic.

The Admiralty agreed to help in the organization and manning so far as possible. Between that time and 1912 a commencement was made with the establishment of a Canadian naval force, but in those three years only small progress was made with the training of recruits and cadets and it would have been impossible for the Canadian Government to man a single cruiser.

That is what the First Lord of the Admiralty had to say. Who should know better than the members of the British Admiralty the conditions which prevail in this respect in Canada as well as in other parts of the Empire? The letter goes on:

The provision of two fleet units consisting of the most modern ships would divert from their necessary stations large numbers of very efficient officers and men which would have to be lent by the Admiralty. The case of the Australian unit stands on a different footing, for its establishment directly relieves the British ships hitherto maintained on the Australian stations, thus ultimately setting free a considerable number of men. Looking to the far greater manning difficulties which now exist than existed in 1909, the establishment of two such units would place a strain upon the resources of the Admiralty which, with all the will in the world, they could not undertake to meet.

It was evident, therefore, that we could not man ships in Canada; that it would take four years to build the docks and two years to complete the hull of a ship which would be able to accomplish the feat referred to by the chief whip of the Liberal party.

I am sure that even my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Public Works will admit that I am not addressing this House in any partisan spirit. I should not have referred to the navy at all if it had not been for the speech which the chief whip of the Liberal party thought it expedient and wise to make at the annual political meeting to which I have referred.

The issues of this war are vital to civilization, and vital to Canada. Let us bear ourselves through the struggle in the spirit of Abe Lincoln's war motto: "With malice toward none; with charity for all; with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right—let us strive on to finish the work we are in; to bind up this nation's wounds; to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow and orphan; to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace." I believe that that is the sentiment of the people of this country.

The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) is a Britisher at heart. I appreciate many qualities possessed by my hon. friend. I think he is a big man, and I shall be very much surprised if when he delivers his address on the Budget he does not take a loftier view of the subject than that which has been taken by hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken in this debate. I know that I am speaking his sentiments and those of the whole people of this country when I say:

> To our British institutions and traditions we'll hold fast;
> We will follow old Trafalgar: nail our colours to the mast.
> We'll clinch the ties that bind us and give the world no cause to think
> That our Empire's chain will sever at its firm Canadian link.

Mr. O. TURGEON (Gloucester, N.B.): In rising to address this House on the question which is under consideration, you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, to divide the Budget speech of the hon. Finance Minister into two parts, the one part relating to the war and the other to what the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) calls the civil Budget for the year 1915-16. That part of the Budget which pertains to the war involves the Government's asking for $100,000,000 for the maintenance of Canadian soldiers at the front. Every British subject in the world to-day is only too proud to assist in the defence of the Empire and we on this side of the House, expressing the unanimous feeling of the whole country, will vote the $100,000,000 for the purpose of meeting the expenses of the Government in connection with the war during the next year as readily as we voted the $50,000,000 last autumn. I would vote $200,000,000 as freely as I will vote $100,000,000; my only apprehension is that the Government should have asked for more, thus not exposing themselves to the risk of running short of money. No one in Canada, the proudest of the sister nations of the Empire, would for a moment contend that we should not exercise every possible effort to assist the Empire in the present crisis. England entered into this war only after exhausting every effort to bring about conciliation between the belligerent powers. She is at war to-day for the maintenance of the integrity of smaller nationalities and to uphold principle of adherence to international agreements. When the violation of Belgium's neutrality was threatened by a foreign nation, the Prime Minister of Great Britain no doubt remembered those noble words of W. E. Gladstone when, on an occasion somewhat similar to the present, he said: "Britain cannot merely look on while the sacrifice of independence and freedom is in consummation." Great Britain would have been false to her great mission in this world if she had not taken the course which she has taken in connection with the war which is now in progress When I say we are here to help England, we are also here to help Canada. In helping England we help Canada, as it is our war just as it is the war of England. I was pleased the other day to hear the hon. member from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) say that it was the duty of Canadians at the same time to defend our heritage, the wealthiest that Providence has ever offered to humanity, with institutions under which we are free to cultivate the highest ideals of christianity, institutions the most liberal human hearts have ever cherished, institutions under which the rights of minorities are protected and all privileges of language and religion secured by perpetual treaties and the law of the constitution: and no man in the House will deny that it is Britain which has given to Canada those great institutions and which she is bound to respect and protect and preserve to the very last hour of her existence—and she is now fighting for her existence. We know that if our treaties and our constitution were once translated to the control of the Kaiser they would be treated as mere scraps of paper, which he would burn with the same barbarity with which he burned the cathedral of Rheims, and the other churches of France and Belgium. Every soldier who has gone or will go from Canada to engage in this war rests under that dual responsibility to the Empire and to Canada. It is useless to say that any one in this House or outside of it in Canada is not as desirous as any member of the Government to give all the money possible to aid in carrying on the war. The Canadian nation is willing to give, is willing to pledge its future in order to assist in relieving the Empire of the burden under which it labours to-day.

Having thus referred briefly to the war features of the Budget, I wish to discuss for a few moments some matters of international administration. But first I wish to warn the Government that in the expenditure of the money raised for war purposes they must be constantly on their guard against possible middlemen, possible agents, possible brokers who, like their fellows in every war that has occurred in any country, have sought to take advantage of war conditions to amass fortunes for themselves. I congratulate the Minister of Finance on having been able to place Canada in such a position that the Mother Country has undertaken to furnish the $100,000,000 necessary for our war expenditure this year as well as the $50,000,000 which is now almost expended. But I would thank more particularly the members of the Government of Great Britain, who have been so generous in financing the allied countries in this war and have also advanced money to enable Canada to defray the expenses of administration in our own country. I believe it will inspire every Canadian to pay with double courage the amount of money which may be necessary to do our share towards carrying on the war.

We have heard a great deal since the Minister of Finance gave us his Budget to the effect that we should not criticise anything being done by the Government. This is not the time to criticise any expenditure in connection with the war; we voted the $50,000,000 at the special session in August practically without discussion; but when it comes to our own internal affairs, which must go on during the war, it is the duty of the Opposition to make full inquiries into all expenditures and to see that the Government of the day preserve a proper balance between the expenditure and the revenues of the country. It is under circumstances of such stress as we are undergoing to-day that a Government must show the greatest wisdom and foresight. We have been told that the revenue has decreased on account of the war and that all the trouble existing to-day in the financial condition of Canada dates from the 4th of August when the proclamation of war was made. While it is undoubtedly true that for some weeks after the declaration of war our trade was interfered with, that trade has since been restored to a large extent owing to the control of the seas by the British fleet, and no man in this House will deny that serious depression and a decrease of business existed in Canada long before the declaration of war. The figures of the Department of Trade and Commerce under the direction of the able minister at its head shows that before the declaration of war there had been a great falling off in business. For the twelve months ending the 31st of July last, the decrease in the customs revenue compared with the same period of the previous year was $20,000,000. The imports for the same twelve months were $577,906,000, some $114,000,000 less than the imports for the preceding twelve months.

I have taken those figures from the Department of Trade and Commerce. The Government have seen the revenues falling since July 1, 1913, but no measures were taken to meet the situation in the session of 1914. When this Government came into power, only three years ago, they found a surplus of $40,000,000 left them by the Liberal party. The next year they had a larger surplus. And now to-day they complain, as we have just heard from the hon. gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Wilcox), that they have had to carry out undertakings left to them by the preceding Government. We left them $100,000,000 of surpluses, which had been collected during the years when the sails of the ship of state were still feeling the inflation of the Liberal prosperity. But what has this Government done with that money? They have not built the Georgian Bay canal even. They complain of having had to spend money on the Transcontinental railway. We had a thorough discussion about that last year. When hon. gentlemen opposite came into power we had already built eighty-five or ninety per cent of the Transcontinental railway. They have now been three years in power and have not finished it yet, and part of the money that they have spent on it has gone to a commission which so far has proved nothing as to the quality of the road. Talk of prosperity! Last year it was my lot to spend two months in the West. I was there in June and July before the war broke out, and visited many of the farmers. Was there any great prosperity there? No. Prosperity had vanished from the West the year before. There was no great talk of prosperity from one farmer or the other. The first thing a farmer would say when approached on the question would be: We want wider markets; if we had them we should not be in such a bad position as we are in to-day.

Under the old Government the ordinary expenditure varied from $76,000,000 in round figures in 1908, to $86,740,000 in 1911. For the year ending March 31, 1912, our expenditure was $98,161,000. In 1913, $112,057,000; and in 1914 it rose to $127,384,000. That meant an additional charge of $6.14 per head of population. Has there been extravagance? We know that during the fifteen years of Liberal Administration the Liberal party granted railway subsidies to the amount of $25,140,000. The present Government in three years granted subsidies to the amount of $24,830,000. During the fifteen years of Liberal Administration the interest on the public debt was increased from $10,645,000 to only $12,536,000. Now, the Finance Minister announces that next year the interest on the public debt will amount to $21,500,000. In 1911 we had an expenditure of $87,000,000, and with that expenditure we had prosperity all over the country. Every man in the East and the West was happy and prosperous. In the small provinces just as much as in the larger. Ontario was so prosperous, indeed, than when my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition wanted to further the prosperity of the country by giving our farmers larger markets, hon. gentlemen opposite and their friends in Ontario said: Leave well enough alone; the country is prosperous enough. The country was so prosperous that they did not want to interfere with it. To-day, with an expenditure of $127,000,000 all we can do is to talk of unemployment. We hear nothing but unemployment from every province. Look around, Mr. Speaker, and see the state of unemployment, and then look up to Heaven for inspiration, for it is vain to look to this Government.

Mr. BURNHAM: That is the next place.

Mr. TURGEON: Yes, that is the best place, to be sure.

Mr. BURNHAM: I said the next place.

Mr. TURGEON: The war has not affected the industries of Canada so very much, although I am doubtful as to the future. In fact the war has given employment to many of our people. The equipment of our contingents and their maintenance abroad, for which we have borrowed $50,000,000 from the British Government, has helped the Government of Canada to reduce unemployment to a considerable extent. The contracts we have got from the British and French Governments have enabled factory owners of this country to keep their employees at work, if not full time, at least half time. If we had not these contracts, however where should we be? The other night the hon. member for St. Mary's, Montreal, (Mr. Martin) told us about the condition of the workingmen of Montreal. But I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what would have been the conditions of those men, and of the workingmen of Toronto, if we had not obtained contracts from the British and French Governments, and from our own Government? Not only that, but we are building eight submarines in Canada to-day for the British Empire. Eighteen hundred men are employed in that work, 900 by day and 900 by night, and there is a possibility of getting further contracts. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite used to say it would take twenty-five years to build ships in Canada. One of those submarines will be ready as soon as navigation opens on the St. Lawrence, and another will follow in a short time.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think they are being built by the Fore River Shipping Company, at Quincy, Mass., under contract with the British Government.

Mr. TURGEON: They are being built in Montreal for the British Government and are giving employment to Canadians in Montreal.

Mr. PUGSLEY: And to a good many Americans.

Mr. TURGEON: They may have brought some skilled workers over. All of these things are done in every new industry that is opened in the country. The Finance Minister told us that for the present fiscal year the current expenditure will be $140,000,000, and the capital expenditure $50,000,000, or a total of $190,000,000, and that he estimated the revenue at $130,000,000. Again I wish to be fair to the Minister of Finance as well as to the Government. I appreciate the fact that it was necessary to spend $2,500,000 for the relief of the districts in Saskatchewan and Alberta affected by the drouth last summer, and $7,500,000 for the purchase of seed grain for these districts. The minister, taking into consideration the commercial and industrial depression during the past year, has told us that there has been a rapid decline in the volume of imports and exports. For the nine months ended 31st December of the present fiscal year our total exports, of merchandise only, amounted to $350,000,000, as compared with $380,000,000 for the corresponding period of the previous year, a decrease of $27,000,000. During the same nine months our imports, of merchandise alone, were $391,000,000, a decline of $112,000,000, as compared with the corresponding period of the previous year. The minister has carefully demonstrated that the decrease in the exports was not so great as the decrease in the imports; the decrease in the exports being cut $27,000,000, and in the imports, $112,000,000.

He expressed the hope that we might, in the course of a few years, bring about a balance of trade between exports and imports. I am in favour of such a balance of trade as may be practicable, but I would like to see it brought about not by the restriction but by the expansion of trade. I may be permitted to tell the Minister of Finance that if exports have not decreased so much as imports he must give credit to the fact that the American Government and the American people have opened their markets to a portion of the products of the farmers of the west, as well as to the lumber and fish of the eastern provinces. How much more would these exports have been decreased had not the United States, a year or eighteen months before, allowed the cattle, hogs and products of the west practically free into their markets ? It has been a great boon to the people of the west. These goods, however, were not allowed to go in free as they would have been under the reciprocity treaty under which our farmers would have had the benefit of free wheat, free oats and free cattle, and under which they would have been encouraged to go further into farming. Owing to the limitations of their market, a great many people in the west became discouraged, and some of them, as we know, went back across the frontier to the south. My hon. friend's revenue would have been much less but for the fact that large quantities of farm products have been enabled to go across to the great market to the south of us.

The same observation applies to the conditions in the maritime provinces, and for the conditions which we find there we have to thank Providence, or to thank the Government of the United States. Had not the Government of the United States taken the duty off lumber and fish, in what position would New Brunswick have been as compared with the conditions found there during the past few years ? Lumber and fish are the two chief industries of the maritime provinces, and agriculture has expanded according to the success of the lumber industry. It has been going along parallel with its prosperity or its adversity, and all the world knows to-day that if our lumbermen had not had the advantage of the free market of the United States during the last year or eighteen months, half of them would have been bankrupt.

I have it from the largest lumber manufacturers in New Brunswick. We hear a great deal of talk about the British market, but the British market was not available during the last two years for the lumber operators of New Brunswick, and if they had not had the market of the United States, where millions of dollars worth of their products have gone, how much would these figures representing the exports during the last few months have been decreased? The English market has been supplied from the shores of the Baltic. It is true that just now, on account of the war, the English market is open again to New Brunswick, as well as to the other provinces of Canada, but owing to the scarcity of vessels which has increased the tariff rates across the ocean all the profit that the business might possibly show have been absorbed. This will continue during the time of the war, which we hope may be short, but when the war is over the same conditions that prevailed prior to the declaration of war will be found to exist again and we will have to look to the American market for the products of our forests and fisheries.

Never in the history of New Brunswick have the fishermen got the prices they have received for their products of every kind during the last two summers. At the time of the declaration of war, had not the American market been granted to the fisherment of New Brunswick they would have been affected very unfavourably. For a few days, owing to the scarcity of vessels, those fish dealers who were dealing with the countries on the Mediterranean and with Europe generally had to keep the products which they had on hand because they could not ship them, but, fortunately for them, the American market demanded everything that they could command and at the very best prices they have ever had. This condition has prevailed during the last three or four months or since war was declared.

Now, the Minister of Finance is naturally under the necessity of asking Parliament for permission to levy a new tax in order to meet the requirements of the revenue. My hon. friend has called that a war tax. I want to be just to my hon. friend; I can hardly believe that we must attribute to him the adoption of the name " war tax". I imagine, from the last statement that he has given to the House, that he was not inclined to qualify as a war tax the amount of money which he is asking from the people of Canada to-day. I would have thought perhaps that my genial friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers), knowing that his old political weapons are worn out in Manitoba, might have looked for another term and might have suggested a " war tax".

Mr. PUGSLEY: A sort of taking name.

Mr. TURGEON: A taking name. However, we have to deal with it. The Government proposes an increase of five per cent on British imports, thus lessening the value of the British preference, and an increase of 7½ per cent on imports from other countries. Since 1897, when the Liberal Government gave a preference to British goods, the trade between England and Canada has greatly increased, with corresponding benefit to the industrial people of the Motherland. There has been a growing desire among the people of Canada, the farmers of the West more particularly, for a still greater preference for British goods, in the hope that the happy day might some time come when there would be free trade between Canada and the Motherland and Canada and the sister British colonies, just as there is between the provinces of this Dominion. That desire has been expressed by the farmers in the East and in the West, and while the Government may call this additional five per cent a war tax, I can assure them that the people of Canada will not be deluded by any such statement. In 1897, when the British preference was instituted, the value of the imports from Great Britain to Canada amounted to $30,000,000, but in 1914, these had increased to $240,000,000, and on this trade an additional 5 per cent taxation will have to be paid. We have recently heard in this House discussions on the necessity of controlling ocean rates of freight in the interests of the producers of this country, and with the prevailing scarcity of vessels on account of the war, and the abnormally high rates of freight, this is surely a very bad time to put additional taxation on British goods. By this tax you will, I believe, decrease the trade between England and Canada, and so you will have fewer ships carrying smaller cargoes and compelled to charge higher rates. A few days ago Lloyd George made a speech, in which he used this language:

> It is intolerable that the lives of Britons should be imperilled for the sake of a farthing an hour. During war, governments should have the power of settling differences so that work shall go on. If men are entitled to more money the Government should give it. I do not believe the parties involved will refuse to comply with the urgent command of the Government that there should be no delay.

In view of such a condition existing in England, does the Finance Minister think it a wise policy to legislate against British goods, in this the hour of Britain's distress.

The Conservative newspapers point to the fact that the increase on British goods is only 5 per cent, whereas the increase on goods from the United States and other countries is 7½ per cent, but under present conditions the increase of 5 per cent against Great Britain is a far greater barrier to trade between Great Britain and Canada than the increase of 7½ per cent on goods from other countries is a barrier to the trade with them. In sending goods to Canada, the United States is not hampered by war conditions, for they have their railways to bring their products to this country, and the distance is comparatively short. I believe it costs between 5 and 10 per cent more to bring goods to Canada from the Mother Country than from the United States, so that the whole British preference is practically wiped out. I ask the Minister of Finance if that thought occurred to him when he was increasing the tariff against British goods. The hearts of the Canadian people are with the Mother Country, and if we are to bear our share in the burdens as well as the glories of the war, is this not a time to refrain from further taxing British goods? Surely it is not a patriotic example to set to the sister British nations, or even to the people of the United States. I am sure that generous, loyal, proud, Australia will not view with equanimity this increase of taxation upon British goods. Australia is very sensitive in her feelings towards the Mother Country; Australia is loyal and faithful to contracts and agreements, and she is legitimately resentful of breaches of such contracts. Australia has recently adopted a new tariff, and she has given preference to British goods, which preference she has extended to all the sister British nations with the exception of Canada. What does the Minister of Finance think of that, notwithstanding the eloquent and patriotic message which the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in the name of the Prime Minister of Canada, sent to Australia on the occasion of the Australian man-of-war Sydney sinking the German steamer Emden and thus clearing the Pacific ocean for British trade? These are considerations that seem to me worthy the attention of the people of Canada. I express the impulse of my own heart at any rate, and I imagine that my feelings are the feelings of every Canadian to-day. I am sure the Minister of Finance, in the generosity of his heart, will allow me to ask him if he is not prepared to re-consider that portion of his Budget speech and strike off that 5 per cent addition to the tariff.

As six o'clock, the House took recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

The House in Committee on Private Bills, Mr. Sevigny in the Chair.

Bill No. 8, respecting the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia Railway Company—Mr. Green—in committee.

On section 1—extension of time for construction:

Mr. OLIVER: Would the chairman of the Railway Committee please state what locality the completion of this unfinished portion will relieve?

Mr. LANCASTER: The line will run from Edmonton to Dunvegan, thence following the Peace river valley to Parsnip river, in British Columbia, thence to the town of Fort George. The company claim to have partially constructed this line, and they want an extension of time to complete it.

Mr. ROGERS: I think that two years is too long a time to give them within which to commence the construction of the uncompleted portion of this line.

Mr. LANCASTER: The usual terms of renewal are two years within which to commence construction and five years within which to complete. No representations were made to us that it would be desirable to make the time any shorter.

Mr. OLIVER: To what point is the road now completed? We would like to know what particular piece of road this extension would apply to. I am not opposing the Bill, but I want to get the information because the matter is very closely connected with my constituency.

Mr. LANCASTER: I am not able to tell the hon. gentleman exactly to what point the line has been built. We were assured that this line has been commenced, and we were asked for an extension of time. The province of Alberta is interested in this road, and before the committee passed the Bill the Minister of Railways telegraphed the Premier of Alberta to get his views on the subject. He was asked if he would be satisfied if the charter were renewed on the following terms—giving him the section exactly as read just now by the chairman. He answered that it would be well for the country to have the renewal granted in accordance with the terms of that section. The Premier of Alberta, therefore, knew what we proposed to do and approved our taking that course.

Mr. OLIVER: What I wish to know is this: to what particular point upon the proposed line does this extension of time purport to apply?

Mr. LANCASTER: I could not answer that question.

Mr. ROGERS: The Premier of Alberta may be correct in his view, but large settlements have for years been anxiously awaiting the extension of this line. The settlers have grown large quantities of wheat and grain, which are still in store pending the extension of this line of railway, and I think it would be extremely unfortunate if Parliament, by passing this Bill, should leave it open to the company to postpone the commencement of the line for two years. I do not think that we ought to take that responsibility upon ourselves until we are in possession of the whole facts in connection with the matter.

Mr. CARROLL: In the consideration of this matter by the railway committee the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) took objection to our renewing the charter for the length of time stated, but other members of the committee who were familiar with the road said that the company were rushing it to completion just as quickly as they possibly could and that they had, through the sales of bonds guaranteed by the Government of Alberta, obtained practically enough money to enable them to complete the line. The member for Strathcona (Mr. Douglas) advised the committee that the company were proceeding with the work as rapidly as possible.

Mr. ROGERS: We are not discussing at this moment the date of the completion of the railway. If this clause passes we will give the company two years within which to commence construction of the line. There is great need for a railway in that locality, and I think we should consider the matter carefully before granting this extension. If as my hon. friend (Mr. Carroll) has stated, they have the money and are in a position to proceed with the work at once, why should we give them two years within which to commence construction?

Mr. OLIVER: I am probably more familiar with the conditions connected with this matter than any other member of the House. Steel has been laid on this road up to a point about 270 miles from Edmonton, and within a comparatively short distance of the Smoky river. I understand that bonds have been sold with a view to carrying the road to Spirit river, a point opposite Dunvegan. Beyond Spirit river is what is called the Pouce Coupe prairie district, which is just outside the boundary of Alberta. The Alberta Government have guaranteed the bonds of the railway to the boundary of the province, or, in other words, to the end of the Pouce Coupe prairie. No doubt the railway company desire to build as fast as they can, but they are getting an extension of time now which applies to the road to Fort George, and, for the distance from Smoky river to Fort George, that is certainly a very reasonable extension. But for the short distance between Spirit river and Pouce Coupe, about 60 miles, I think there should be no such extension of time for completion. In the large settlement of Grand Prairie, where there is great need of railway communication, there are about 16 townships of solid settlement. The first settlers went there about five years ago, and have been going in ever since. To reach that district they made long and difficult journeys. They knew that when they went in there they would have to wait some time for a railway; therefore they went in, to use a western expression, fairly strong-handed. The country offered good opportunities; they have broken up large areas of land and have had a large production. During the first year or two the production was absorbed by the incoming settlers, but production has now out-run the possibility of consumption by increased settlement, and the Grand Prairie district is in the very greatest need of a railroad. The Dunvegan line does not run through Grand Prairie; it passes about 50 miles north of Grand Prairie city and Lake Saskatoon, which are the two principal points in the Grand Prairie settlement. The construction of this line under its present charter, therefore, does not affect the Grand Prairie settlement, but it does affect the Pouce Coupe prairie settlement, through which this line is intended to run. I am not strictly in order in discussing the charter of the Canadian Northern at this time, but I take advantage of this opportunity to point out that they have a line partially completed which runs through Grand Prairie, the distance from the end of the steel to Grand Prairie being about 200 miles. They have graded about 50 miles beyond that, so that they have about 150 miles of absolutely new construction to undertake in order to reach Grand Prairie. They, too, have sold bonds guaranteed by the province of Alberta, and they might be expected to engage in construction. Their work, however, has been at a standstill for two years, and the people of Grand Prairie, expecting that the road would be pushed to completion, have gone into heavy production and are in a condition of very grave disappointment at the present time. I do not know what can be done by this Government to compel the Canadian Northern to use the money that they have actually borrowed on the guarantee of the province of Alberta in order to build that line to Grand Prairie. Whether or not they have enough money I am unable to say, but there is no doubt about the fact that the money is in their treasury, the road is not being built and the settlers are in very great need of transportation facilities. If it is not possible to urge or compel the Canadian Northern to give the settlements of Grand Prairie railway communication some time within this present year so that the crop of last year, which is still in the granaries, may have an outlet and the people may be encouraged to put in a crop this year, I suggest that means be taken by this Government to arrange for the construction of a connection from the Dunvegan line to Grand Prairie, a matter of about 50 miles of prairie construction. I do not know what the Dunvegan Company may be able or willing to do, but I know that their track will be within 50 miles of the Grand Prairie settlement. This summer, with a reasonable amount of aid, they could reach the Grand Prairie district and relieve the congestion which now exists. The charter with which we are now dealing does not make any provision to that end. It carries the line within 50 miles of the Grand Prairie settlement, but it might as well be 500 miles distant so far as the actual marketing of the crop of that district is concerned.

Mr. LANCASTER: Would it help if this were amended from two to one year? We must fix some time for the commencement. I am inclined to think from what was said by the Minister of Public Works and the hon. member for Edmonton that we in the Railway Committee might have made it one year under the circumstances, but we must fix some time. The hon. member from Kootenay (Mr. Green) is in charge of the Bill and I would not care to make the amendment in his absence, so I would suggest that the Bill stand till Monday.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to urge any delay in the Bill, but I would have liked to obtained the information I ask for. I have been trespassing on the patience of the House in order to lay before them the actual conditions in regard to settlement and the means of railway communication there. If the Canadian Northern railway cannot give the Grand Prairie people railway communication within the current year, means should be taken to enable the Dunvegan people to do so.

Mr. ROGERS: I know, as has been stated by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), that the people of Grand Prairie are undoubtedly in great need of railway facilities. They are suffering very severely. The construction of this Dunvegan line takes the railway within 40 or 50 miles of the Grand Prairie settlement, and if we, by the passing of this clause, are going to extend the time for the building of this line of the Dunvegan railway as far as Dunvegan, we are going, in my judgment, to deprive the people of Grand Prairie of a railway for the next two years; and I do not think it would be the wish, intention or desire of the members of this House to do that because we have had deputations here already this year pressing strongly for an extension of the railway from some quarter, and I am inclined to believe the House may be asked to approve of a charter providing for the building of a line of railway into that particular district. I do not know what arrangements the Canadian Northern railway may have with the Alberta Government, and we are not responsible for that here. It would be impossible for us to give any information as to whether or not it is possible for the Government of Alberta to press the Canadian Northern railway to construct that 200 miles during the coming summer. I would very much doubt if that would be possible under the present conditions. But whether that be so or not, I think we would be making a very grave mistake in this House if we should undertake to give an extension of time for the commencement of the Dunvegan railway for two years' while those people in the Grand Prairie section are building their hopes on the extension of this line from which they would be able to construct a branch or make some arrangement by which they would be able to connect with this Dunvegan railway. I confess I am not very familiar with the facts. But in fairness to the people of that locality, who urgently need the railway, I think we ought not to go on with this Bill, and give this extension of time, until we have more information. I think we might let the Bill stand till Monday.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would like as one member of the committee to find out to what point the road is now completed. The Bill is a most peculiar one. It says:

> The Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia Railway Company may commence to construct the uncompleted portion.

The steel might be laid on a portion of the line, but if the ballast was not down or the railway stations were not built they could say that portion of the line was uncompleted, and so defer the commencement of completion of it for two years. It seems to me that some point on the line ought to be mentioned.

Mr. LANCASTER: When the Bill was in committee some place was pointed out. I have an idea where it is, but I am not sufficiently sure to state distinctly in this House where that point is. It was pointed out on a map on the wall when the Bill was in committee.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does not my hon. friend see in what an uncertain state the Bill will be left? The Bill provides that they may commence to construct the uncompleted portion within two years. It does not follow that the Bill applies only to that portion which has not been commenced. It might apply to two or three hundred miles on which the steel had been laid, but which was not fully completed.

Mr. ROGERS: I think this had better stand until Monday night.

Mr. OLIVER: I just wish to supplement the information I have given, because I am afraid I shall not be here on Monday. The steel has been laid from Edmonton to McLennan Junction, 260 odd miles from Edmonton. Grading has been completed and steel is now being laid from McLennan Junction to the east bank of the Smoky river. From the Smoky river the right of way is being cleared for sixty miles to the Spirit river. I understand the bonds have been sold and that the money is available for constructing that part of the line from Smoky river to Spirit river. It is already in process of construction. The right of way has been cleared and the supplies were taken in there this winter. So that part of the line must be considered to be in progress. That is the piece of road that goes nearest to the Grand Prairie section.

Mr. BRADBURY: Is the end of that sixty miles within fifty miles of Grand Prairie?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes. Grand Prairie is forty miles south of the line of the Dunvegan.

Mr. BRADBURY: If that line was completed it would bring the road within fifty miles of Grand Prairie?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes, even without being completed. For the last 25 of the 50 miles is within 50 miles of the Grand Prairie settlement; in fact less than that. So they do not need to build to Spirit river to be within 50 miles of Grand Prairie. They would be beyond that to a certain extent when at Spirit river. A branch line to Grand Prairie would probably leave the line of the Dunvegan at the crossing of the Burnt river, and follow the Burnt river to Grand Prairie, a distance of about fifty miles. I do not wish to be understood as wanting to delay the Bill. I am just giving this information because I am afraid I shall not be here on Monday. I would much prefer to see the Bill go through than to hold it up, but I think it has been unfortunately drawn for the purpose of expressing the idea that was in view. I am quite willing to accept the views of the Alberta Government, inasmuch as they are the people who are furnishing the money under their guarantee.

Mr. ROGERS: I am not objecting to that at all. I am prepared to accept the views of the Alberta Government. But in view of the representations that have been made as to the pressing necessity for this extension, I do not think that we should at this moment pass a clause that will give the railway power to delay construction for two years.

Progress reported.

Bill No. 20, respecting the Canadian Northern Railway Company—Mr. Bradbury—in committee.

On section 2—extension of the time for completion:

Mr. ROGERS: I would like to take the same exception to this Bill that I took to the other, because I think the Railway Committee probably did not realize the importance of the extension of railways in Western Canada. A number of lines are enumerated here in which five years' time is to be granted for their completion.

Mr. LANCASTER: They are all commenced and partly constructed that section 2 relates to.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, but five years for completion is a long time.

Mr. LANCASTER: That is the general thing.

Mr. ROGERS: That is a very great mistake, I am afraid.

Mr. LANCASTER: We always allow five years for completion.

Mr. ROGERS: I think five years is a very long time in western Canada, and I think that we are giving very wide extensions here. Clause 3 reads as follows:

> Unless the company commences within two years and completes and puts into operation within five years from the passage of this Act—the powers of construction shall cease.

Mr. LANCASTER: That is an extension of time for a line that has not been commenced.

Mr. ROGERS: Most of the lines in clause 2 have already had extensions from this Parliament and now they ask for five years more.

Mr. LANCASTER: They have shown their bona fides by beginning.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, but five years is a very long time for the people of the West to wait. I would like this Bill to stand until Monday.

Progress reported.

Bill No. 28, respecting the Toronto Eastern Railway Company—Mr. William Smith—in committee.

On section 2—extension of time for construction:

Mr. LANCASTER: All we did with this Bill was to strike out the words "or near" wherever they occur pursuant to the policy of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) who wants us, whenever possible to strike out these words and define the place where railways are to go in order to prevent the contention, not to use a stronger word, that goes on when locating railways. In paragraph (c) of section 2 we omit the words "Lake Scugog" and insert

"Port Perry," so that the road shall go from Port Perry to Lindsay.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

Bill No. 29, respecting the Van Buren Bridge Company—Mr. Michaud—in committee.

Mr. LANCASTER: The only amendment made to the first section is to add the words "in Canada" and we add a section 2 (a).

Mr. HAZEN: Has the hon. gentleman any information about the cost of the bridge?

Mr. LANCASTER: It will be a pretty expensive structure.

Mr. HAZEN: This bridge will cross the River St. John, which is the boundary line between New Brunswick and the State of Maine, and, therefore, this legislation will only permit bonds to be issued on the part of the bridge which is in New Brunswick. Is it intended to issue similar bonds on that portion of the bridge in the state of Maine?

Mr. LANCASTER: So I understand. It is a mutual arrangement I am informed and we are only legislating to give permission to put a lien on the property in Canada. The other part of the bridge will have to be dealt with by the authority of the state of Maine.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Mr. Michaud, who is in charge of the bridge, understood it would stand until his presence in the House. Perhaps it would be well to report progress.

Mr. HAZEN: I think it would. It appears to me that if this Bill gives authority to issue bonds only against that portion of the bridge in Canada, it would not afford much security to the bondholders.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I understand that by legislation in the state of Maine, bonds will be issued to cover the bridge and franchise in Maine, and then the company having the same authority in Canada, they will include the property in the United States and the property in Canada in the one mortgage. The total mortgage is $250,000.

Mr. HAZEN: That is what I wanted to know, whether it was $250,000 on each part of the bridge or $250,000 on the whole.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I understand that is the total mortgage.

The following Bills were considered in committee, reported, read the third time, and passed, without discussion:

Bill No. 27, respecting the St. Lawrence and Adirondack Railway Company.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 38, respecting the Vancouver, Victoria and Eastern Railway and Navigation Company.—Mr. Taylor.

Bill No. 41, respecting the Athabasca Northern Railway Company.—Mr. R. B. Bennett.

Bill No. 12, to amend the Independent Order of Foresters Consolidated Act.—Mr. Glass.

Bill No. 16, respecting the Title and Trust Company, and to change its name to Chartered Trust and Executor Company.—Mr. Nesbitt.

Bill No. 42, respecting the Canada Preferred Insurance Company.—Mr. Stevens.

Bill No. 45, respecting the Vancouver Life Insurance Company.—Mr. Stevens.

Bill No. 31, respecting the British Columbia Southern Railway Company.—Mr. Taylor.

Bill No. 32, to incorporate the Brulé, Grande Prairie and Peace River Railway Company.—Mr. R. B. Bennett.

Bill No. 34, respecting the Manitoba and North Western Railway Company.—Mr. Cash.

Bill No. 37, respecting Pacific, Peace River and Athabasca Railway Company.—Mr. R. B. Bennett.

Bill No. 46, respecting the Western Dominion Railway Company.—Mr. R. B. Bennett.

Bill No. 36, to incorporate Northern Pacific and British Columbia Railway Company.—Mr. Taylor.

THE BUDGET.

PROPOSED WAR TAXATION.

Mr. TURGEON (resuming): Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair at six o'clock, I had reviewed the question of the British preference, and had made a suggestion to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance that he should repeal the increase of 5 per cent in the tariff rates under the British preferential tariff and solve the problem of raising revenue for the next fiscal year in some other way.

I wish now to consider the balance of the tariff, in which there is an increase of 7½ per cent on all imports, a measure which in my estimation is simply protection and is not calculated to bring in any large amount of revenue. Under the circumstances and in the hard times of which we complain, this will simply add to the difficulties of the poor man, as the tariff is not distinctive; it is a flat increase which falls upon all alike and does not protect the poor man as opposed to the rich man. The Conservative papers of Canada since the announcement of the Budget by the Minister of Finance, have endeavoured to create the impression among our people that the new tariff tells as heavily against the Canadian manufacturer as against the importer, but I say it is protective in every part. It is protective even as to the importation of the raw materials, although, under this tariff, he will not get a refund of the duty which he has paid on these raw materials when he exports his manufactured goods to foreign markets. The Canadian manufacturer will be taxed on the goods that he imports, but he will be taxed only to that extent; while the importer of manufactured goods from the Mother Country or from other markets will be taxed not only upon the raw material but on the labour and the legitimate cost of his operations, and therefore the Canadian manufacturer still remains with an advantage from the tariff of three or four per cent as against imported goods, while he has the advantage of the 7½ per cent the importer will have to pay for all the goods he gets. This applies to all goods imported, to farm machinery of all kinds, except again for reapers and mowers, three or four articles which are generally bought by the larger farmers or by four or five or a dozen farmers clubbing together to get one of these expensive machines. Every other article that the farmer has to use, ploughs, forks, spades, shovels, trucks or wagons of any kind, are taxed more and more. We are calling upon the people to go to the land. We expect a larger acreage of arable land next spring. Many new settlers will go on the land and many young farmers will extend their acreage. Every one of these will be under the necessity in the early spring of buying new cultivating implements and will have to pay the duty on these articles. The western farmer buys his harvester or mower when his crop is practically ready for harvest. If he has been favoured by Providence and nature he can easily get credit from the banks or his friends, and buy the harvester or whatever else it is that he needs; but the poor farmer cannot so easily get credit in order to buy machinery to properly cultivate his land. So you see how this tariff works against the poor farmer, and particularly against the new farmer; and we are expecting a great many of them, especially in the spring.

This tariff bears upon every article. It is a uniform tariff. There is no preference for the poor man. As the hon. member for St. John said the other night, the linen and woollens used by the poor man are being taxed just as much as the velvets, embroideries and silks used by the rich. The fishermen in the maritime provinces have to wear woollens nine months in the year, and those articles are taxed an additional 7½ per cent. Other articles are being taxed. I would call the attention of the Minister of Finance to marlin twine, and remind him of the statement made by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) when speaking on the Budget a few days ago. He referred to the twine and corkwood used by lobster fishermen, and urged that they be put on the free list. It may be that the Minister of Finance has not thought of the condition of the lobster-fishing industry at the present time. But my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the Prime Minister, who represent the maritime provinces in the Cabinet, should have had some thought for that industry. I am sure they have had during this winter correspondence enough from the lobster canners and the lobster fishermen. This industry of the maritime Provinces is in a precarious condition at the present time, and has perhaps been affected by the war more than any other industry. For lobster is a luxury. This product of the maritime province used to find a market in France, Belgium and Great Britain, and we know that those countries to-day are not in a position to buy this expensive luxury. A great deal used to be sent to Germany, and we know that none of our lobsters can go there now. For the next year, if not for the next two or three, this industry will have to find another market. The fishermen will have to try and introduce lobster as an article of food in the towns and villages of the maritime provinces as well as in Quebec and Montreal. I hope the Minister of Marine will give his attention to this industry at the present time and see if these articles cannot be put on the free list.

Mr. BLAIN: I might remind my hon. friend that no change is being made in the tariff with respect to binder twine.

Mr. TURGEON: The minister of Marine is well aware of the kind of twine I am speaking of.

This tariff is a protective tariff. The Minister of Finance and the manufacturers of Canada are placing the people of this country in a curious dilemma. The manufacturers of Canada are appealing to-day to the people of this country to buy goods made in Canada. I do not object to goods made in Canada. When we ask for as low a tariff as possible on imports, it is because goods made in Canada cannot be sold at higher prices than goods imported. But what a dilemma the people of this country are in to-day. The manufacturers say: Buy goods made in Canada; while the Finance Minister says: I must have more revenue, and must therefore put a higher duty on the goods you use. If the people of Canada in the exercise of their patriotism pay heed to the Minister of Finance and import goods, the treasury of the Minister of Finance will be replenished, but the Canada-made goods will have to stay on the shelves of our merchants. On the other hand, if the consumers of this country buy goods made in Canada the Minister of Finance will have no revenue, and will not be able to balance his accounts as he calculates. So no matter how we take it, this is a mere protective tariff. I do not think the Minister of Finance can possibly get the revenue he expects from it. Again, although the tariff may favour the Canadian manufacturer and give him the home market, it practically forces him out of foreign markets by taxing his raw material. And no nation in the world can be prosperous until it has foreign markets. The United States, with a population of 100,000,000 people, tried to be satisfied with their home market; and the home market is all right to a certain extent, but a nation never reaches a very high place unless it has exports. Exports keep up the growth of the nation. Again, the people of Canada should at this time be trying to capture the markets of the world. This war should stimulate our manufacturers to search for foreign markets. While this war has closed many a market to Great Britain and Canada, it has also closed many markets to Germany. Markets that were practically, or largely, controlled by the German manufacturers, are now open to newcomers. It is the duty of the Canadian manufacturer to devote his activities to the opening up of markets, to the sending of our goods to the South American Republics, where Germany has had control of the markets, and to other countries the markets of which Germany will not be able to regain for some time and which neutral countries will not be able to supply. By this tariff you practically arrest or impede the activity of the Canadian manufacturer in the direction of extended markets. I am in favour of local markets, of home markets, but as I say to-day a special opening presents itself to the manufacturer and if he can command outside markets he will be able to do better in the local markets without charging so high for his products at home because, while he is devoting his activities to securing command of the foreign markets, he will develop activities also that will put him in a position to manufacture more cheaply and therefore sell more cheaply in the market of the Canadian people. You do not want to have a redundance of work. You cannot manufacture for your own people all the time. The products have to go out, and if you confine your activities to the home market you must necessarily operate at a greater cost than if you were to operate on a larger scale with a view to extending your trade and supplying larger markets.

Hon. gentlemen say that this is a war tax and that the people will submit. The people of Canada will submit to anything for the victory of the British Empire, will pay anything at all, but here we are considering our position as a people. We are not to take the position that we are bound to be submerged by this war. We must take the position that Great Britain is able to come out of this war victorious and we hope before many months are over that she will come out victorious and greater than ever before. We must not act to-day as though we expected to be a conquered nation and must therefore leave out activities to be resumed by future generations. It is the generation of to-day that has a duty to perform towards Canada and towards Great Britain and it is only by encouraging the activities of those engaged in agricultural pursuits that you can possibly bring prosperity to the country.

In my humble opinion we would not be in the position in which we find ourselves to-day if we had had those larger markets that were offered to us three years ago. Prosperity has declined as a natural consequence of the refusal of those wider markets to our farmers. The Minister of Finance is in this position, that he must say with me and every one: We were happy and prosperous until 1911, but now we are in a different position. As I said this evening I do not want to be offensive, but in my opinion the Conservative party are reaping the fruits of their erroneous education in 1911. I might use stronger language but I do not want to be interpreted as being a disloyal man. I want to make it as mild as possible, and I say that the conditions with which we are confronted to-day are a result of the erroneous education which has been given to the people of Canada by the Conservative party.

We are told by speakers on the other side of the House that we offer no suggestions. I have made the suggestion that you strike out the increase of duty on British goods, then go on and consider also the other tariff of 7½ per cent and see what can be done with it. Do you want another suggestion? I suggest to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance that in place of the tax upon British goods he might bring in an income tax on the people of Canada. It is true that the Minister of Finance said that $2,000,000 might possibly be collected by such a tax. That all depends on how he starts. If you took the incorporated companies—the mortgage companies—and placed a tax of 10, 5 or 3 per cent upon the amount that is set aside every year for dividends, you would get a large amount of money which would help you to remove the tax upon British goods. If you took the salaries that are paid by corporations to their chief officials, or to the railway magnates who own personal property beside their railways, and if you placed a tax upon these amounts, you would raise a very large revenue and it would be a much more popular tax for the Government to impose than the tax that they have placed upon British imports.

My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) has suggested economy with respect to many items in the Estimates. There is no member of this House who views with more gratification than I do the rapid expansion of the commerce of this country, but let us candidly and frankly admit between ourselves that there is a large amount of money asked to be voted this year for public buildings and post offices. I am always pleased to see a post office erected in any village or town, but as long as we have war, or the conditions of war, let me tell my hon. friends on the Government benches that the town or village that has been for years without a post office or public building can possibly wait another year or until the war is over. I see that post offices are provided for indiscriminately in all portions of the country. You might save a good many millions of dollars by adopting that suggestion. I am not suggesting that the erection of these buildings should be put off indefinitely but that it should be put off for this year or until the war is over. My hon. friend from St. John has also proposed a decrease in the expenditure on the Hudson Bay railway from $5,500,000 to $2,000,000 or $3,000,000. I have been an advocate in this Parliament of the Hudson Bay railway for ten or twelve years. I have never changed my opinion and I believe it will be a good thing for the commerce of Canada and especially for the West. I do not say stop the construction of the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. BRADBURY: Hear, hear.

Mr. TURGEON: I am for it. I defended it before my hon. friend was in this House, I have done it many times since and I am willing to vote for it again. But, you cannot reach the completion of the work for the season of navigation next summer. You may have the railway finished but you cannot have your harbour completed at Port Nelson, because there you require wharves and piers which will take years and years to build while, if you had placed your terminals at Fort Churchill you would practically have had a harbour ready for your purpose and would have been in a position to have opened up for trade next summer. This matter is decided now and as long as the people of the West cannot enjoy the benefit of the Hudson Bay route next summer let us go easy and wait another year to complete it. I believe that suggestion will appeal to the judgment of every practical man in Canada. While I believe the Hudson Bay railway will prove of great assistance to the trade of the West, my faith in all wordly matters is limited by practicability and we know that the trade will never be practicable for more than two or three months in the year, and as long as we cannot have the advantage of this route until July of the following year we had better wait until the war is over. These are practical suggestions and I am sure that if these items to which I have referred were removed you would not require any additional tariff taxation. Strike off many of these expenditures and practice economy wherever you can in every possible line. Develop the agricultural industry, encourage all the farmers possible to go upon the land, and you can do this by giving them the free markets for their wheat that you refused them three years ago and again last year. As I said before recess the Minister of Finance would have found that his exports would have decreased much more had it not been for the advantage of the market that we had to the south of us. If free wheat had been given to the people last year the increase in production would have been very much larger than it has been. Although it was a bad season there would have been a much larger crop and our railways would have had more grain to transport. Our railways are to-day in such a position that they certainly cannot pay their operating expenses. The railways in Canada will never prosper unless through the prosperity of the farmer, and especially the farmer in the West. It may be said that all the wheat will be wanted for Great Britain should unfortunately the war not be over by next harvest. But, if that should happen, the Government has still power to reserve the wheat, and if the war should be over by spring, the farmer will know that no matter what crop he produces he will have the American market as well as the Canadian and European markets. This Canada of ours is not made only to be the granary of the British Empire; it is destined by Providence to be the granary of the world. Last winter, when in this Parliament we asked for free wheat, we heard many speeches about restricting the cultivation of wheat, and we were told by gentlemen opposite that the farmers of the West were wheat miners, and that they should stop growing wheat and go into mixed farming. I have seen in the West last summer on the one farm immense fields of wheat and immense fields of oats, and of barley, and of flax. Again, the farmers of the West were advised to go into the hog industry, but I can assure hon. gentlemen that the hog industry in the West is larger than the people of Ontario think. If the farmers of Alberta and Saskatchewan did not have the free markets of the United States for their pork, it would be sent to the Toronto market, and the farmers of Ontario would be reduced to taking four or five cents a pound for their pork.

Such, Mr. Speaker, are my views as briefly as I could express them as to the position in which the country is to-day. However depressed from a financial standpoint things may be for the moment, I am a Canadian who has faith in the resources of the country, and even if we have a crop failure for a year or so, and even if we have mal-administration by the Government in power, I do not lose faith in Canada, and I believe that in the end the Canadian people will get out of the difficulty and grow rich and prosperous.

I beg to say in conclusion that as far as the war is concerned we are all here as Canadians, and all ready to vote whatever money may be required to prosecute our share in the great struggle. But we have also to look to the internal condition of the country, and it is not for us to imagine that everything must be closed down because of the war. It is just because we are at war that we should double our energies so as to keep the people of Canada prosperous, and to enable them to repay to Great Britain the money which she is so generously lending us now, to enable us to participate in defence of human liberty. I trust that the Government will take into consideration some of my suggestions. I feel hurt as a Canadian that under present conditions the Government should have seen fit to put an extra tax on British goods, the more so, because I repeat that by curtailing expenditure and economizing, and providing measures to develop the energies of the Canadian agricultural population by giving them freer and wider markets, there would be no necessity for putting on additional customs duties. We have heard about a truce, and I believe that things now have gone along pretty quietly, but if any party has broken the truce, as was shown by the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) last night, the Conservative party are the sinners. Perhaps I might be accused of breaking the truce if I remind my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that we had the pleasure of a visit from him at Bathurst on the 12th of September last.

Mr. PUGSLEY: On a political mission?

Mr. TURGEON: I regret that the minister paid us only a very short visit. Having learned in the evening that the hon. gentleman was to be in my town the next day, and not being able to move around as quickly as formerly I used to, I ordered a carriage to take me to meet the minister at ten o'clock in the morning, so that I might pay him my homage as the representative in the Cabinet of my province, shake hands with him and give him the welcome of the county of Gloucester, but when ten o'clock came I was told that the minister had come and gone at nine o'clock in the morning.

Mr. HAZEN: I am an early riser.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: He was not in bed at all.

Mr. TURGEON: The hon. minister says "I am an early riser," but I did not expect him to be such an early riser. I am sure that though his visit was short he found the conditions favourable as far as the industries in the town of Bathurst and that portion of the county of Gloucester are concerned.

Mr. HAZEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. TURGEON: I am very glad the minister did pay us that visit because he was able to see the buildings that are going up for the pulp and paper industries. The people of Gloucester and the people of Bathurst are not reserving their energies until after the war, they are busy all the time developing new industries. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries had scarcely left the town when I began to hear talk about an election. It may be that his friends did not report what he said accurately but at all events it was announced that we were to have an election within two months, and the leaders of the Conservative party who accompanied him prepared for a convention to choose the strongest man that could be found to defeat the member for Gloucester. His friends told us that it was done on the recommendation of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, but it may have been that they were indiscreet about his utterances, as sometimes they are about my own. At all events they said the minister told them to get ready for an election in two months, and if it did not happen within two months it would certainly come in the spring. At all events it is sure that shortly after the visit of the minister, the Conservative party organized a convention and selected a man whom they thought would be able to defeat the modest member for Gloucester. We were notified at the same time that the then Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) was to be present at that convention to address the electors, but in the interval his health got bad, and later on it was announced that the eloquent member for Dorchester (Mr. Sevigny) would take his place. We had the pleasure of a visit from Mr. Sevigny and he addressed the meeting after the Conservative candidate had been chosen, and he is reported by the St. John Standard to have said:

> Mr. Sevigny, M.P., Quebec, was then called on and in an hour's speech in French held the closest attention of the large audience, while he set forth most eloquently the splendid record of the Conservative Government.

I was most pleased to see my hon. friend from Dorchester (Mr. Sevigny) a while ago. But, if he is correctly reported, his speech could hardly be regarded as being in strict accord with the truce which had been made. He is one of the most eloquent members of this House from the province of Quebec, but apparently he came to take part not in a recruiting meeting, but in a political meeting. I was surprised to hear discussion of the probability of an election about the middle of September last year, only two or three weeks after we had departed from this House having agreed to unite all our energies in the prosecution of the war, and when we were engaged in the work for the patriotic fund, for Belgian relief and for the proper care of our boys who were going to the front. Yesterday fault was found with the publication of a paragraph in the Canadian Liberal Monthly as being a breach of the political truce. But this that I have quoted I think, is a case much more in point. I am glad that my hon. friend from Dorchester has now entered the House. I do not by any means find fault with him for visiting my constituency. I am glad to see by this report of his speech that he told his audience he would come again next spring. I shall be doubly pleased to see him in Gloucester county, in Bathurst or in Caraquet as he may prefer, and I hope to have the opportunity to make things pleasant for him outside of politics. It does not trouble me at all to see the Conservatives organizing. As the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) knows, I am ready for an election whenever it may come. But I have asked my people not to talk election until this war is over. We have given our pledge not to embarrass the Government, and have assumed that we are not to have an election while the war is in progress. When the war is over the Government will be at perfect liberty to have an election, and we shall be ready to meet them; but if they bring on an election during the war they must take the responsibility for it. So far as I am concerned, I am ready for the election to-morrow, or six months hence, or next year. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries knows that that is but a statement of fact. On former occasions he has come to Gloucester and his masterly eloquence has been listened to by the people there with attention and respect. My hon. friend from Dorchester has also received the commendation of the people there who have listened to him, but I believe his impression must be the same as that made upon the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and that each of these gentlemen must feel that their eloquence in support of the Con-

10 p.m. servative party falls without effect upon the cultured minds of the electors of Gloucester.

Let us deal with the affairs of the country with the same energy and good will as before; and if the Government brings on an election before the war is over, let them assume the responsibility for it, as I have said. We have been accused of not realizing the conditions that face the Empire, whether in the Dardanelles, the North sea or elsewhere. Mr. Speaker, we do realize those conditions to-day, as we did yesterday and as we did months ago. Our wishes and aspirations join with those of the people of nearly all the world for a victory for the British Empire and the restoration of peace. And our hope is that that victory shall not be a mere compromise but that the war shall be prolonged, if necessary, until the Kaiser and militarism are overthrown, so that when peace is established it may stand forever. So that, in the eloquent words of the great American orator, Bourke Cockran, no more dreadnoughts, no more great armaments, may exist, but merely such means of force as are necessary to police the shores of every country, and that the millions upon millions now expended upon armament and wars may be used for the development of the nations to the glory of Christian civilization and the advancement in morals and in happiness of the people of the whole world.

Mr. G. H. BRADBURY (Selkirk): I am sure the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon) will pardon me if I do not attempt to follow him in all that he has said. But I wish to refer to one or two of his remarks which have been in line with remarks made by other hon. gentlemen on that side of the House. He spoke as if the policy "made in Canada" was not a desirable policy to advocate at this time.

Mr. TURGEON: I think the hon. gentleman has misunderstood me. I approved of Canadian-made goods, price being the same; but I pointed out the condition in which we are when the Minister of Finance says: Do not buy Canadian goods; I want the revenue.

Mr. BRADBURY: I do not think the hon. gentleman has improved the matter. What he said was this: To advocate the policy of buying goods in Canada would be to deprive the Minister of Finance of revenue which he expected through his policy. Now, I wish to say to hon. gentlemen on that side of the House that the "made in Canada" policy is a policy intended to stimulate the great industries of this country and to give work to hundreds of thousands of men that are idle on the streets of Canadian towns and cities to-day. There is no doubt in my mind that it is a wise policy. If the Canadian people in days gone by had dealt more directly with their own great industries we should have had a greater industrial Canada than we have to-day. Under the wise protective tariff inaugurated by the great Conservative party in 1878 Canada has prospered That tariff was denounced by the Liberal party for the eighteen long years when they were in Opposition, but when they attained office they took this policy as their own, and Canada prospered under the protective tariff. The principle of buying goods manufactured in Canada is in keeping with the policy inaugurated by the Conservative party and carried out during all the time it has been in office.

To one who knows anything about the two great political parties of Canada, it is interesting to listen to the arguments advanced by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. The remarks of the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) are usually very moderate and very fair, and in listening to the hon. gentleman's speech the other day I was surprised that he had the temerity to make the statements and the charges that he did. He tried to fix on the leaders of the great Conservative party on this side of the House the stigma that rests upon the Liberal party: that of not implementing pre-election pledges. In view of the unsavoury record of hon. gentlemen opposite in the matter of pre-election pledges, I would have thought that no hon. gentleman on the other side of the House would have dared to mention the subject. During the course of his admirable speech the hon. junior member for Halifax said:

> They promised time and again by their leaders that if honoured with the confidence of the electorate, they would carry on the public services for a much less sum; and they professed much regard for the sanctity of public pledges given by political leaders. In their election handbook of 1911, I find this.

He then proceeded to read what I presume to be a paragraph from that handbook, as follows:

If there is one thing more clear than another in the government of a democratic country it is that political leaders should be held to a strict account for their pledges, and platforms. These form the basis of the contract between them and the electorate. These undertakings are solemnly given. They are not actionable in Courts of Law, and therefore all the more should they be held cognizable in the great moot court of the people, and their terms rigidly exacted.

On the basis of that item the hon. gentleman attempted to build the argument that the leaders of the Conservative party had made the pledge that if they were returned to office they would reduce the expenditure of this country. Later he said:

Is not the conduct of the Government in the circumstances open to the gravest censure? Was not this a fitting season for the Government to practise economy and implement its pre-election pledges? The present Government party, when in Opposition, promised, if elected to power, a reduction in public expenditure. Let us see if they have observed faithfully their pledges in this respect.

I desire to say that the hon. gentleman cannot quote any statement contained in the platform laid down by the Conservative party previous to their return in 1911 asserting that if returned to office they would reduce the public expenditure.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Go to Hansard and you will find it.

Mr. BRADBURY: I have looked at Hansard. I do not think the hon. gentleman can find any such statement; I venture to say that it does not exist, because no such pledge was given. What the leaders of the Conservative party said was that if they were returned to power they would handle the revenues in such a manner as to avoid waste. They condemned in the strongest possible terms the extravagance of the late Administration and the manner in which the public revenues were squandered under Liberal rule. But not a line was written or a word uttered by the leaders of the Conservative party pledging themselves to reduce expenditure. Why do I say that? Because the Conservative party realized that with the development and expansion of our growing country the expenditures were bound to increase. They realized that great public buildings would have to be erected in different parts of the country; that our waterways would have to be improved; that steps would have to be taken to develop the resources, commerce and industries of our country. The Conservative party complained not so much of the amount of money expended by the Liberal Government as they did about the manner in which the public funds of Canada were handled by them.

Mr. LAW: Did the hon. gentleman read all the manifestos issued by the Conservative party during the election of 1911? There were several.

Mr. BRADBURY: I think I read all literature that could be rightly called part of the platform of the Conservative party. No hon. gentleman on the other side of the House can produce a pamphlet issued under the authority of the Conservative party in which a pledge of that kind was given to the people.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Did the hon. gentleman read a certain manifesto in which the first paragraph was that the expenditure of $74,000,000 by the Liberal Government was extravagant beyond all possible defence?

Mr. BRADBURY: No, but if I had read it I could readily have understood it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I can show my hon. friend a copy of that manifesto, which is signed by his leader.

Mr. BRADBURY: I could well understand the leader of the Opposition at that time using such language, because every man who sat on the opposite side of the House previous to 1911 contended that the expenditures were extravagant and that the finances of the country were handled in an outrageous and wasteful manner.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I can send you a library on that point.

Mr. BRADBURY: The hon. junior member for Halifax advocated that the expenditures on public works should be cut down. On page 387 of Hansard he is reported as saying:

Instead of the Government's asking for an expenditure of $20,000,000 for public works, they might have asked for $10,000,000 or less, and, if need be, they might have wiped out altogether expenditures for public works for the next fiscal year. I do not believe that the people of any province of Canada would have objected to the most drastic measures on the part of the Minister of Public Works during the present year and during the next fiscal year in connection with public works expenditure.

Then our hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) made this statement about the Civil Service:

We could reduce the number of officials, reduce them largely, and not interfere with the public service. We could cut the cost of public works in two and not interfere with the public service... I understand that they are spending some $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 in Halifax. I venture the assertion that if the money was properly expended you could do all that is necessary for the development of trade in the city of Halifax for $5,000,000.

I do not think the junior member for Halifax would agree that the work in Halifax could be completed for $5,000,000. But what I want to point out is that we are to-day passing through perhaps the most critical period in the history of Canada. When we have thousands of men idle in the streets of most of our great cities, I claim that one of the most unpatriotic things that this Government could be guilty of would be to stop public works in this country or cut them down to such an extent as would limit the work that should be provided for the mechanics and labouring men of our cities. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) condemned public expenditure just as strongly as the junior member for Halifax.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I did not say that public works expenditure should be cut out; I said to reduce it to what it was in the year 1912 or 1911.

Mr. BRADBURY: The language I read is very plain, it is in Hansard. I do not know what the hon. gentleman meant to say, I am only quoting what he did say. The hon. member for St. John said that this was not a time to go on with large public works, while the people of this country were spending every dollar they had in charity. Mr. Speaker, the working men in this country do not want charity, the working men want work, and it is the duty of a patriotic Government, as far as possible, to give them that work. I think when the hon. gentlemen face their constituents they will find it difficult to explain to them the language which they have used in this House as regards cutting out public works in this country, which meant, if it meant anything, that the public works should cease and thousands of men be thrown out of employment. Let us see what one of the outside leaders of this great party has to say about this question. I hold in my hand a clipping from the Toronto Globe, and every one who knows anything about the Liberal party recognizes that the editor of the Globe has a good deal to do with the leadership of the Liberal party. I find this in the Toronto Globe of Wednesday, February 10, 1915:

When to Spend Public Money.

The time to spend public money freely is when private enterprise is on the ebb. If governments and public bodies enter upon huge programmes of public works when a building boom and a rush of railway construction are in progress the inevitable result is to attract to the country far more workers than it can provide employment for under normal conditions, and so to intensify the depression which follows boom conditions. This is precisely what is happening in Canada to-day. The Estimates introduced by the Minister of Finance make provision for carrying on public works begun in former years, but the financial situation is so difficult that practically no new works are to be begun during 1915 at the very time when the need for employment is greater than ever before in the experience of the building trades throughout Canadian cities.

It would be peanut politics to attempt to make party capital out of the situation. No Government in Canada, Liberal or Conservative, has ever deliberately curtailed expenditures upon public works in good times so that it might more freely provide employment during seasons of depression. In all probability this failure to take thought of the morrow has been the result of the belief of politicians that hard times dog their opponents only, and that the remedy may well be left for their opponents' consideration. The interests of the nation should be placed above party, however, and The Globe would like to see a healthy growth of public opinion in favour of husbanding the resources of the Dominion, the provinces, and the municipalities in boom periods so that public works may be undertaken at seasons of the greatest need. The work carried forward at such seasons would be done more cheaply and more thoroughly than under conditions of abnormal activity, and would render unnecessary the spending of vast sums on maintaining willing workmen in idleness.

My friend from St. John would allow the people of Canada to dole out charitv to the mechanics and working men; but The Globe, the Liberal organ, holds that it is peanut politics to preach a doctrine of that kind. The Globe says further:

There are many organizations engaged in the study of social conditions—Conservation Commissions, Unemployment Commissions, Social Service Commissions. They could do nothing more calculated to fill up the valleys of depression than to secure that public employment shall be at the minimum in Canada when private employment is at the maximum, and that the stress of hard times shall be lessened by the construction of public works during seasons of depression.

Hon. gentlemen opposite are trying to have it so arranged that the public works shall be at the minimum, that the public expenditures of Canada shall be cut in two. One hon. gentleman went so far as to sav that one large item of $5,000,000 in connection with the Hudson bay should be cut out altogether. In view of these statements it is hard for me to know which party to believe, the Liberal party in this House or the Liberal leaders out of the House. It reminds me of the story of the gentleman who was visiting a neighbour's house and was charged by a vicious looking dog which went at him as if it was going to eat him. The host came out and said, "Oh, don't be afraid of him; can't you see he is wagging his tail?" The visitor replied, "Yes, but I do not know which end to believe." It is the same to-night, I do not know which end to believe, whether I should believe the junior member for Halifax and the hon. member for St. John, and the other members who have advised the Government to cut down expenditures and leave the workingmen to the charity of the people of Canada, or those who advocate a wise continuance of public works.

As it is getting late, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Rogers the House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

Monday, March 8, 1915.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

REPORT.

Report of the Department of the Interior for the year ended March 31, 1914, volume I.—Mr. Roche.

FRANCO-CANADIAN STEAMSHIP SERVICE.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I have seen a statement in the press to the effect that a steamship service has been inaugurated between France and Canada. Can the Minister of Trade and Commerce give us any information on that subject?

Sir GEO. FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): We have been informed that arrangements have been perfected by the British Admiralty by which eighteen vessels will be placed upon the service between our ports and Havre, France. The purpose of these vessels is to transport Government supplies, solely and entirely. It is calculated —and so far as I have seen the calculations, I think they bear out the basis on which they are made—that Government supplies and requirements will tax the total capacity of these vessels. There will be a tri-weekly service. That is the general plan, but all the details have not yet been worked out. If it happens that any one of these vessels is not filled to capacity by the supplies being sent to the British or French Governments, then other Government supplies furnished by private or company contractors may be transported. The service, however, is not meant for general trade.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Do I understand that there is no correspondence on this subject?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is some correspondence, but we are expecting further correspondence on the subject. As soon as the correspondence is complete, it will be brought down. In the latter part of January the Government sent a representative to Great Britain for the purpose of conferring with the War Office and with the Admiralty, in order that some provision might be made for the transport across the Atlantic of supplies purchased in Canada by the British or the French Government. It was observed at that time that tonnage was becoming extremely scarce, and rates abnormally high. Mr. A. H. Harris, of the Canadian Pacific Railway, who went to England for this purpose, has just returned; and we are informed by him that, as stated by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, eighteen vessels have been assigned by the British Admiralty to this service, and withdrawn from other service. We are informed that the vessels will be available for this purpose from now until the end of the war. I understand that one or more vessels have already arrived on this side, and that one has been loaded and is now on her way back to Great Britain or France. Another advantage which will be of general interest is that, by this arrangement, the tonnage which has been used in carrying coal from Great Britain to Halifax for the use of the Admiralty at that port, and which has been heretofore used to a very considerable extent for the transport of these supplies, will, it is hoped, be available for general purposes, and in that way assist in supplying the general demands for tonnage to transport goods from Canada to the Mother Country.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is the sailing port from Canada?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No definite sailing port has been fixed. I presume that the boats will sail from St. John or Halifax in the winter, and, when navigation opens on the St. Lawrence, that all or the greater part of the tonnage will go by the St. Lawrence route. If it should appear that the necessities of transportation might be more advantageously met by the vessels sailing from ports in the maritime provinces, those ports would be available, and I have no doubt that suitable arrangements might be made to that effect with the British Admiralty.

UNITED STATES POTATO EMBARGO.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. B. B. LAW (Yarmouth): I should like to call the attention of the Acting Minister of Agriculture to a report I saw in the press a few days ago. It is headed "Canadian Potato is Under the Ban—United States Inspector's Report—Powder Scab Found," and reads as follows:

> Hon. Martin Burrell, Minister of Agriculture, in December last made an arrangement with the Department of Agriculture at Washington, by which permits were to be issued to shippers of Canadian potatoes allowing potatoes to enter the United States. This arrangement was to continue so long as there was no powdery scab found in any of the shipments. Unfortunately the United States inspectors have reported that they have found powdery scab in a shipment of potatoes from New Brunswick to Boston and have given notice to the Department of Agriculture that no Canadian potatoes will be permitted to enter the United States from Canada after the 5th of March, instant. The potatoes complained of in Boston were immediately purchased for export from Boston and there was no difficulty, in so far as the quality was concerned, with the country to which they were to be exported. The Department of Agriculture is investigating to ascertain if the statements made by the United States inspectors have any foundation.

I should like to ask whether these are the facts; whether the department has made an investigation, and whether potatoes can be shipped from Canada to the United States at the present time.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Customs): The statement is correct. The Department of Agriculture has been notified by the United States authorities, as intimated in that despatch. A carload of potatoes shipped to Boston was condemned by the United States inspectors. Some hon. gentleman considered the potatoes all right, and purchased and shipped them to Cuba. The Department of Agriculture, feeling that the American inspectors were not justified in condemning the potatoes, sent an inspector to Boston for the purpose of thoroughly looking into the matter. The inspector has not reported yet, but I shall be very glad to let the hon. gentleman see his report when it is received.

Mr. LAW: Then it is a fact that potatoes cannot be exported from Canada to the United States at the present time?

Mr. REID: That is the position.

Mr. MARCIL: From what province in Canada were they shipped?

Mr. REID: They were shipped from New Brunswick, and I have no doubt they were New Brunswick potatoes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Since this difficulty occurred, has the Department of Agriculture taken steps to supervise each shipment, in order that none of our potatoes so affected shall be exported?

Mr. REID: I understand that the Department of Agriculture has inspectors at all the ports, watching shipments very closely. If there is anything wrong with the potatoes, the inspectors do not allow them to go out of the country. Our inspectors think that the American authorities were not justified in condemning that shipment of potatoes to Boston. Every precaution is taken by the department to see that nothing is shipped unless in first-class condition.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Had this carload been inspected?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. F. B. CARVELL: After the minister received notice about this carload of potatoes shipped to Boston or New York—I understood that it was at New York that the difficulty occurred—did he take any steps to have the car examined by an intelligent inspector, or was nothing done in the matter? The reason I ask is that the potatoes in question were shipped, not only from my own constituency, but from my own home. On Saturday afternoon I had the privilege of interviewing an inspector of the Department of Agriculture, a very capable man indeed, who had received his training at Macdonald College, and he assured me in the most positive manner that the cars were personally inspected by him. He said that he had inspected practically every potato, and could not think it possible that there should be a diseased potato among them. I mention that because I think the Government should know it, and I would like to know if any further inspection was made in Boston or New York.

Mr. REID: The hon. gentleman confirms what I said a few minutes ago, that in so far as the Department of Agriculture is concerned the inspectors were taking every precaution to see that no potatoes left Canada except in proper condition. When Mr. O'Halloran, the Deputy Minister, brought this to my attention on Wednesday or Thursday of last week, I instructed him to send an inspector to Boston, to examine the potatoes thoroughly and make an official report. I do not see that I could have done other than that. At all events I gave instructions to do everything possible, to have them examined again thoroughly by an independent inspector and to make a report accordingly.

DISTRIBUTION OF SEED GRAIN.

Mr. W. M. MARTIN: I would like to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche) to the fact that information has come to me to the effect that certain agents of the Government from Saskatchewan are refusing to accept applications for seed from men who are on patented lands and also that the Dominion lands agents at Wadena, Battleford and Biggar are refusing to take any applications from men who have received their patents. I would like to ask the minister if, in view of the statement he made to this House on February 10 in which he agreed that every application should be given proper consideration, he has instructed the agents to receive and consider every application properly, whether the land of the applicant is patented or not.

Mr. ROCHE: The policy which was announced here by myself is being followed out, I believe, to the letter. Instructions were sent to the Commissioner of Immigration, who has charge of this matter of the distribution of seed grain, to deal with cases coming from the holders of patented as well as unpatented lands in all deserving cases. Of course, there have been several thousand applications of cases that do not come under the enumeration that has been laid down, and they have therefore been refused. Mr. Bruce Walker was in the city on Saturday, and he told us that outside of the drought-stricken area 7,000 applications had been favourably acted upon.

17TH NOVA SCOTIA REGIMENT.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I would like to say to the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte), who asked me to lay upon the table of the House some telegrams from Mr. H. C. Crowell of Halifax, that I expected to have them ready to lay upon the table of the House to-day; but I find that there are some more to be filed and I will lay them on the table of the House to-morrow. I would like, however, to explain that it appears that the interview which was alluded to in the telegram from Sir George Perley was an interview with General Guy Carleton Jones, director of the Army Medical Service. The mistake occurred in this way, that the code word which was translated by the decoding clerk in this telegram as "Alderson" appears twice in the code book, and the decoding clerk selected the particular word which worked out as "Alderson." A further telegram from Sir George Perley explained that he had used the code word which appears elsewhere in the code book and which worked out as "Jones," and this was the word he intended to use. Therefore, Mr. Crowell is quite right in stating that he did not have an interview with General Alderson, but nevertheless there was an interview with Surgeon General Jones, Director General of the Army Medical Service in England. It was he, as I am informed, who had the interview with Mr. Crowell in which Mr. Crowell expressed the opinion that has already been communicated to the House.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

The House in Committee on Private Bills. Mr. Sevigny in the Chair.

Bill No. 8, respecting the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia Railway Company—Mr. Green—in committee.

On section 1—extension of time for construction:

Mr. ROGERS: When this Bill was up on Friday night we had under discussion the time during which the company should have the right to start work, the provision being that it must be started within a period of two years. There was no disposition, as far as I understood the matter then under discussion, on the part of any person, to delay in any way the passing of the Bill, but in view of the fact that this railway company have already sold their bonds and have the money on hand, and as there is a pressing necessity for the construction of this line of railway, at all event from a point known as Smoky river to a point known as Spirit river, a distance of some fifty miles, it was thought that it might be well to make a reduction in the extension of time allowed for commencing the work from two years to a lesser period by reason of the fact that the conditions are favourable and also by reason of the fact that, as I understand it, those who are in charge of the work are not anxious for an extension of two years but are willing to carry on the work as soon as spring opens in so far as this fifty miles in particular is concerned. I think that perhaps the Chairman of the Railway Committee will be disposed to amend that clause and provide that work shall be commenced within a period of six months instead of two years. I think that would cover the difficulty, taken with the assurance we have from the railway people that they are going to go ahead with the work and that they propose to complete as speedily as possible the line from Smoky river to Spirit river.

Mr. LANCASTER: Under the circumstances, I do not see any objection to the suggestion of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Rogers). As I said on Friday night, we granted a time for commencing the unconstructed portions of these roads because some of the charters are already expiring. If we had been sure in the railway committee that none of these franchises would run out before His Royal Highness would give his consent to this Bill we would not have needed to have worried about the commencement. We would simply have said that they should be allowed five years to complete the uncompleted portions of their road. But the better opinion among lawyers is that when charters are expiring, or have expired, it is necessary to also give a time for commencing. Some of these franchises would expire in three or four days from now and it was necessary that we should resuscitate them. That is why the clause is worded as it is. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) remarked on Friday night about the peculiar language, and that is the explanation. If it were not so we would not have said anything about what is contained in the first five or six lines; we would simply have dealt with the time when they should complete the uncompleted portions of the road. In view of what was said on Friday night and, with the unanimous consent of the House, I will move to amend this clause by striking out the words " two years " and inserting in lieu thereof the words " six months " for commencement. I am assured by counsel representing the company that they propose going right on at once or as soon as this Bill is passed and the company do not object to this change. They will not object to being required to hurry on within six months. Therefore, in accordance with the suggestion of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, I move to amend section 1, by striking out the words " two years " in line three and inserting in lieu thereof the words " six months."

Mr. GREEN: I am sorry I was not in my seat on Friday evening when this Bill came up for discussion. I am not rising now particularly to object to the shortening of the time to six months. This Bill was discussed very fully in the Railway Committee, and it seems strange that it should for some reason or another have met with opposition, not only there but in the House. I wish to point out that this Bill is one that should receive every encouragement in this Parliament, because these people are railway builders; they are not people who are asking for anything unreasonable; they are in the business of building that particular railway, as evidenced by the fact that they have already built and have laid the steel upon 262 miles of that railway. Their charter expires on the 17th day of March, a few days hence, and it is necessary, as the Chairman of the Railway Committee pointed out, to have the extension granted at this particular time, so as to prevent its expiration, and inability to reinstate it if it is not signed by the Governor General before the date of expiration. These people have not only built the road so far, but they have the money on hand to continue construction. The line of railway is northerly from Edmonton to mile 131 where the railway crosses the Athabasca river. The bridge over this river is of steel on concrete piers. The route from the crossing of the river is generally westerly along the south shore of the Lesser Slave lake, and through the settled district just west of Lesser Slave lake. From the end of steel, grading has been done to a point a short distance east of Smoky river, and it is proposed when the frost goes out of the ground to continue the grading and lay the steel in a westerly direction. The intention is to construct the line of railway to Peace River block, where it will join with the Pacific Great Eastern railway, a line of railway which is being built through the province of British Columbia. Bonds for 350 miles of the railway, to the extent of $20,000 per mile, were guaranteed by the province of Alberta, the rate of interest being 4½ per cent. It is the intention of the company to push work vigorously for the obvious reason that the company is anxious to obtain all available freight from Spirit River and from Grande Prairie. The company is seeking legislation at the present session to enable it to forthwith construct a line of railway from a point on its main line near Spirit River settlement through Grande Prairie, with the object of giving relief at as early a date as possible to the settlement in Grande Prairie.

When this charter was before the Railway Committee, objection was taken by some members of the committee that the government of Alberta, being interested as guarantors of the bonds, should be consulted. They were consulted by telegram by the Hon. the Minister of Railways, and he had a reply from the Premier of that province saying that they had no fault to find with the Bill as it was, and that under the contract for the guarantee, they were in a good position to protect the province from any attempt on the part of these people to forego construction at the present time. There is no desire at all on the part of the contractors to retard construction, because the line already built is of no service until it is extended to meet the requirements and to get the trade of certain districts which are settled. The country through which the line is already built is not settled to any great extent, and therefore these people are particularly desirous of continuing the work, so as to reach the settled districts. I repeat that I have no desire to oppose the amendment offered by the Chairman of the Railway Committee, that the period be reduced from two years to six months. I think, however, it would have been better to give a year, but six months is quite satisfactory to the promoters of the railway, and I think by the time this House meets again we will find that the railway has not only been completed to the confines of the province of Alberta, but that it has probably been connected up with the Pacific Great Eastern railway of British Columbia.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend (Mr. Green) says he cannot understand why there is opposition to this Bill, both in the committee and in the House. I desire, as a member, to protest against any hon. gentleman saying it means opposition to a Bill, simply because a member wants to have it put in proper form. The Bill in its present form is decidedly objectionable. It is all very well to say that the gentlemen who are building this road are railway builders. I know they are. I know that Mr. Macdonald, who is the principal party concerned in the building of the road, is a gentleman of the very highest character and may be expected to push the road forward as rapidly as possible. But, every time we pass a Bill in this House we are forming a precedent for future legislation, and under this legislation as it is, the company need not strike another blow, even on the portion of the road on which the steel has been laid, but which may not be completed because it is not ballasted or because station-houses have not been built. I cannot for the life of me see why it is necessary to put any provision in the Bill as to the commencement of construction upon the uncompleted portion. The road has been commenced under the provisions of the charter, and all that would be necessary would be to provide a time for completion, but under this Bill the company can lie down to-morrow and not strike another blow for two years, and not complete that portion of the road which may be practically constructed. That is why I took objection to the form of the Bill. I had no idea of opposing the measure, nor had I any idea of throwing any obstruction in the way of the company. I am quite sure that the Minister of Public Works, in the views he expressed in the committee, had no such thought either. But what I wanted was to endeavour to have proper legislation passed so that in regard to the road which is under way the company should be compelled to go right ahead with as reasonable speed as possible.

Mr. CARROLL: I fail to see how an amendment to this Bill, making it incumbent on the railway company to commence construction within six months, is going to assist in the speedy construction of the road. I would point out that the policy of the Railway Committee of this House, in recent years, has been to have some uniform time fixed, to which charters should be extended. I think the chairman of the committee will bear me out in saying that until last year the policy of the Railway Committee for the two previous years had been that where a railway company had not commenced the construction of a road to give it two years to commence and five years to finish, if it was an ordinary railway. Last year an innovation was made in the Railway Committee, and instead of granting two years, the policy of granting one year was adopted.

Mr. LANCASTER: My hon. friend can hardly call that a policy. What we concluded was that each tub should stand on its own bottom, and that each Bill should be dealt with on its own unique facts and particular merits, believing that there might be cases in which in the interest of the public and not too harmful to the progress of the company, they should be cut down to one year. We did that in some cases and refused to do it in others. So far as I was concerned, I advised in the committee—perhaps advised is too strong a word to use—but I suggested that each Bill should be treated on its own special merits. And where one company might get two years to commence and five years to finish, another company might get only one year to commence, and, in fact, in some cases, it might not be found desirable to extend the charter at all. It was not a policy for any fixed time exactly that was laid down by the committee.

Mr. CARROLL: Until last year the policy of the Railway Committee was to give companies which had not commenced construction two years to commence and five years finish. Last year some of the members of the committee thought that was too long, and in some instances the time for commencement was cut down to one year. When the extension of time for this railway was challenged in the Railway Committee, I took the ground that if we were going to cut down the time in which to commence to construct the uncompleted portion of the road, we should also reduce the time for completion; that is, if we gave the company six months in which to commence construction, we should give it three years instead of five years in which to finish, because it is not going to help out the completion of the road to limit the time in which the company may commence operations and to let it have five years in which to complete. I am sure that every hon. member, whatever part of Canada he may come from, is anxious to see this road built; and if this amendment calling for commencement of construction within six months is to go through, another amendment should be made that the road should be finished within three years.

Mr. LANCASTER: My opinion is that it does not necessarily follow, that because you cut down the time for commencement of construction to six months, you should also cut down the time for completion from five years to three. When a company has commenced construction and has spent and is spending money on its road, for its own sake it will endeavour to complete the road as soon as possible, because it gets no revenue until the road is completed. Obstructions may arise preventing the completion of the road within the three years; and there is no harm in giving the company five years, so long as it is going ahead with the construction.

Mr. CARROLL: Why not give the company two years in which to commence construction?

Mr. LANCASTER: That is a different matter entirely.

Mr. CARROLL: The hon. Minister of Public Works is anxious for the completion of the railway, and he is right in taking the stand that he does. He will not, however, accomplish his purpose by giving the company a short limit in which to commence operations and five years in which to complete the road.

Mr. LANCASTER: He will accomplish it by forcing the company into an undertaking on which it will lose interest and from which it cannot possibly get any profit or revenue until the road is completed.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Very unfair discrimination is being shown against this railway company. Ever since I have been a member of this House, in the Railway Committee we have been extending charters for railway companies. A premium is being put on railway companies which do not do anything. This railway company has done more actual construction in a given space of time than any other company in Alberta. It has completed 262 miles of its line and has a service on that portion; it has in addition 25 miles of steel laid. This railway runs through a country which is not productive of freight or revenue up to the point which it has reached at the present time, namely 262 miles from Edmonton; but from now on the company is bound to make revenue by pushing its line forward. There is no question of commencement at all, because the railway company has never ceased constructing its line. It is doing construction work at the present time. It is merely on account of the fluctuations of the market that it is asking for an extension of time. I do not think that the committee is dealing fairly with this particular railway company in limiting it to six months for commencement of construction.

Mr. LANCASTER: The company is not raising any objection.

Mr. DOUGLAS: That is not the point. This section is not going to hinder the company in the least, because it is going right on at present with the construction of its line. The point is that there is unfair discrimination against this particular railway company. That is why I object to this section. It will not affect the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia Railway Company, if you put the time to commence construction at ten days. This is the point: Is this committee going to single out this particular line of railway and insist on a six months' limit for commencement, when companies owning charters for railways going through this same section of country are doing nothing whatever to earn their charters?

As regards the settlement in the country through which this railway runs, I saw a clipping the other day which stated that in 1914 there were 1,280 homestead entries in the Peace River agencies and 913 in the Grande Prairie agencies. This railway does not project far into the Grande Prairie district; but when it reaches Spirit river it will come within fifty miles of the Grand Prairie country, and I am informed by men who know that during the coming summer this railway will reach the Spirit river, giving communication to the people of the Grande Prairie district within fifty miles of this railway. I do not contend that it will hamper the company in any way to insert the six months' limit.

Mr. ROGERS: I can assure my hon. friend that there is no intention on the part of any hon. member to place any unfair restriction on this particular railway or to treat it in any way that could be termed unfair. On the contrary, as I understand the disposition of hon. members on both sides, they are well disposed to give this railway company every assistance and every consideration possible. I was moved to make the remarks I did by reason of the fact that a couple of years ago we had a deputation from the Grande Prairie district, which is forty or fifty miles from Spirit river. This railway company had its charter; it had its bonds sold and had the money ready with which to go on and build the line from Smoky river to Spirit river. What the people from the Grande Prairie district had in view was the clause in this extension, namely, that the company was to have two years in which to build the line from Smoky river as far as Spirit river, a line which interests particularly the people of the Grande Prairie district. They were hoping to get a local line with which to connect with this railway, to enable them to ship their grain. On the deputation there was one farmer who had in his granary over 65,000 bushels of grain. Hon. members can understand the temper and feeling of people who grow grain in such large quantities as that: they pay very careful attention to the wording of any extension of time granted to any railway that is likely to give them relief. There is no objection on the part of this railway company to the time limit being fixed at six months. If the company were not satisfied with that time limit, and if there were any difficulty from any point of view, I would not press the point; but in view of the anxiety of the people of the Grand Prairie district for railway communication, I thought it only fair for us to give them such consideration as we could. So far as I am aware, there is no intention on the part of any hon. member to place any difficulty in the way of this company going on with its work. As all parties are agreed as to this change of time, I do not see why there should be any objection to it.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I am not voicing any objection; I am merely stating that it will not hamper the railway company to have this amendment inserted. If the minister is sincere in his desire to assist the people in Grande Prairie, he will take the same stand as he is taking at present, when the Bill respecting the Canadian Northern railway comes up.

Mr. NESBITT: Will this railway serve the people of Grande Prairie or will it not?

Mr. DOUGLAS: It will come within fifty miles.

Mr. NESBITT: That is a good distance to walk.

Mr. BUCHANAN: As regards these extensions of time for railways, last session I favoured a limited extension and I favour it to-day. I am also in favour of the view taken by the hon. member for South Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll), that the time for completion should be reduced if the time for commencement is reduced. Western Canada is plastered with railroad charters. Extensions are granted year after year, but construction is not proceeded with. Present financial conditions may be an excuse for delay in completing railroad lines, but generally speaking I think it would be better for western Canada if many of these railway charters were cancelled. Settlers have been living in isolated districts in anticipation of the construction of railroads and their hopes are not being realized on account of these everlasting extensions. This applies to districts in all parts of Western Canada. The need is not so great in sections of the country which already possess railway transportation facilities, but I think that a railway company proposing to build into a section of the country where there are no railroads should not be given continued extensions of time; it is a discouragement to the people. If this general principle were adopted, the people of districts in western Canada which are not provided with railroads would be in a position to know whether or not they are to have railway communication.

Mr. GREEN: The hon. gentleman evidently did not hear the explanation I made a few moments ago. This is not a paper charter. The company have no objection to the reduction of time to six months, but it would be manifestly unfair not to treat them as other companies are treated so far as the time of completion is concerned. These people are on the ground, spending money every day on the construction of this railway. They have so much of it built that they must of necessity continue construction, or they will get no business. I am quite in favour of limiting the time in respect of companies with paper charters, but in view of the fact that these people have the money and are prepared to continue construction, I think it would be too bad if we should not meet them on all possible points.

Mr. GRAHAM: I cannot for the life of me see what good or harm this motion can do anybody. If the company were ready and willing to go on, the changing of the time limit would not hurry them a bit; if they were hanging back and did not want to go on, I would see some reason for the proposed amendment. It all depends upon what we mean by commencement. I have known holders of charters to work a team and scraper four hours, and call that a commencement of a railway line. Such provisions look well in the statute, but my experience is that anything we have so far done to compel companies to commence construction has not amounted to much. Almost anything may constitute a commencement; the important consideration is the time within which the line must be completed. If this motion is passed other companies will be asked to accept a similar condition. In some future application for extension of time, a reference to the statute will show that in this instance Parliament imposed a six-months' limit, and that, therefore, the same limit should be imposed in the case under consideration. This would, perhaps, make the proposed operations prohibitive.

Mr. LANCASTER: I think the Railway Committee should deal with each separate charter on its own merits.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is a good theory, but in many respects we are creatures of precedent; the special pleader
4 p.m. always quotes precedent. If by this proposed amendment anything were to be accomplished in the interests of the people who want this railway, there would be no reason why it should not be adopted, but, so far as I can see, it will accomplish nothing. If Parliament is afraid that the company will not proceed with the work, the six-months' limit will not make any difference; the company can go on just the same under the Bill as it now stands.

Mr. COCHRANE: I know the company will be perfectly satisfied with this amendment; otherwise I would agree with the hon. gentleman.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

On section 3—electric or other power:

Mr. LANCASTER: This section was put in by the committee, as a condition of renewal, so that the provisions of the Bill will conform with our present policy with regard to water-powers.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—consent of municipalities for railway upon highways, etc.:

Mr. LANCASTER: Sections 4 and 5 were not in the original charter. They are our standard sections for the protection of municipalities in the matters mentioned, and were imposed as a condition of renewal.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

Bill No. 17, respecting the Canadian Pacific railway—Mr. W. H. Sharpe—in committee.

On section 2—extension of time for completion:

Mr. TURRIFF: To what particular branches of road does paragraph D of section 2 of chapter 96 of the Statutes of 1913 refer?

Mr. LANCASTER: That is from a point on the Kleinburg-Sudbury branch, between Bolton junction and Palgrave, and westerly through the counties of Peel and Halton to a point on the Ontario and Quebec railway near Campbellville.

On section 4:

The company may sell, lease or charter any steam or other vessels of the company to the Canadian Pacific Ocean Services Limited, an incorporated company, or to any other incorporated company duly empowered to acquire, hold, own, maintain or operate steam or other vessels upon such terms and for such considerations as may be determined by the boards of directors of the companies respectively.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): This clause and the succeeding clause in the Bill, which gives power to hold shares of the Ocean Services Company, make the most radical change that has yet been made in the policy of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. If I read this Bill aright, and if I understand the explanations that were offered at the Railway Committee, the proposal of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is to sell to the Canadian Pacific Ocean Services, Ltd., a company that is to be organized, any of its steam or ocean vessels, upon such terms as may be determined on by the board of directors of the companies respectively. The Canadian Pacific railway has been a great national proposition in this country. It has been largely subsidized by the country in land, finished railway, money and many other concessions that were given to it. Eventually it was completed from ocean to ocean. It has been raised to the position of being the greatest railroad under any one corporation in the world. It has had a most successful career. The progress of Canada has been identified with that of the Canadian Pacific railway; and it may be said that the credit of Canada has been upheld, in a sense, by this railroad. Recently an announcement was made that there was to be a change in the policy of the railway, it was said that it was the intention of the company hereafter to segregate the extraneous assets of the company. That was announced by the president of the company at public meetings and at the meetings of the shareholders. I understand that the proposal of the company now is to dismember this great national railway in which Canada has such a vital interest, and that the first thing to be dismembered will be the ocean steamships. It was proposed, when this Bill first came to the Railway Committee that they were also to take away the lake steamships, but they found that they could not do that, and so withdrew that proposal. They propose now, in this very simple clause, to begin the dismemberment of the great Canadian Pacific railway, to take the ocean steamships out of its jurisdiction and put them under another company called the Canadian Pacific Ocean Services, Ltd. We got the information in the committee the other day that this Canadian Pacific Railway Ocean Services, Ltd., is a company that is to be incorporated under the Joint Stock Companies Act of Great Britain; and, once it is incorporated there, it is without the jurisdiction of the Canadian Parliament, and so the ocean steamship service is beyond any interference by the people or the Parliament of Canada. This new company, we were informed, is to have an immense capitalization. We have the old company and its great capitalization, and we are now having established in England another company with large capitalization and large bonding powers under British control, absolutely out of the control of Canada. You will notice that this Ocean Services Company is to acquire the steamboats on such terms and for such consideration as may be determined by the board of directors of the companies respectively. That is, the Canadian Pacific Railway is to appoint the directors of the two companies, and so can, on any terms it likes, transfer the ocean steamships to the new company, and thus remove them from the jurisdiction of Canada.

Was it the intention of the original charter that this great road should be dismembered and the assets passed over to another company over which we have no jurisdiction? I never heard of such a proposal as that, of Parliament giving up its jurisdiction over a matter of such great national interest as the Canadian Pacific railway.

Mr. NESBITT: Have we control over the ocean rates now?

Mr. MACLEAN: I say that we can get control.

Mr. NESBITT: Have we control now?

Mr. MACLEAN: I think we have. I will ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he was not a member of the Royal Commission appointed in Great Britain to consider our jurisdiction in this matter. Until we find out just what our jurisdiction is, I do not propose to abandon the powers we now have. I would find a way of controlling the ocean rates of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I am certainly not going to make confession in this House that we have no jurisdiction over that matter.

Mr. NESBITT: The hon. gentleman stated that we had control, and were giving up control.

Mr. MACLEAN: I am not going to argue that to-day. Non possumus is a very good argument, but I am not going to adduce it in this case. I do not think any one who knows that great road and the great work it has done could make such a confession at this time. What is happening is this: We are giving power to a British company over which we have no control. That is perfectly certain. Once this British company is created we have no control over it, and I contend that we can have control over ocean rates. The fifth clause provides that the Canadian Pacific Railway may guarantee the securities of the Canadian Pacific Ocean Services Limited. That is, we are not only putting the steamships outside the jurisdiction of this House by turning them over to a British company, but we are giving to the Canadian Pacific Railway power to guarantee the securities of a company outside of our jurisdiction. That is the effect of this Act. It is a very simple proposal, and yet to my mind the most radical proposal that was ever put forward in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway. And the company brings it forward just after the Government have brought down an amendment to the Railway Act containing a clause for the regulation of the financial operations of any railway company in this country. One of the clauses of the Bill introduced by the Minister of Railways last session says in substance, that no company shall issue any stock, shares, certificates of stock, bonds, debentures, debenture stock, notes, mortgage or other securities without first obtaining leave of the board. Then there is this clause:

> The board as it deems the circumstances warrant, may refuse or may grant leave for the proposed issue or may grant leave for such part thereof as it is satisfied is reasonable and proper, and may in any case impose any terms or conditions it may deem proper.

Last session the Government committed themselves, and brought in a very good Bill to amend the Railway Act. The Bill contained the two clauses I have just read, namely, that the issue of securities by any railroad of this country must first be approved by the Railway Commission, who can impose terms in any respect they like.

Mr. CARROLL: Is that the law now?

Mr. MACLEAN: By reason of the lateness of the session last year the Government postponed its Railway Bill for another session. They have not brought down the Bill this year; so I have brought down a Public Bill in my own name, and it is now before the Railway Committee. So this radical proposal in connection with the Canadian Pacific railway is made just after the Government announced its intention of amending the Railway Act. My contention is that if the Government intend to make that Bill the law of the land—and I believe they do—this Bill of the Canadian Pacific Railway ought to be delayed until the Railway Act is amended. If the Government measure can wait for one session, so can the proposal of the Canadian Pacific Railway; or if one goes through, both should go through; and the amendment I shall bring up to-day will be in that direction.

I pointed out in the Railway Committee the other day that the Canadian Pacific railway was a great national undertaking, and that its original charter contained a clause which ought to be of great interest to the House to-day. What I am speaking of is partly set out in the preamble and partly in a subsequent clause. The preamble says:

> Whereas by the terms and conditions of the admission of British Columbia into union with the Dominion of Canada, the Government of the Dominion has assumed the obligation of causing a railway to be constructed, connecting the seaboard of British Columbia with the railway system of Canada; ... and it is necessary for the development of the Northwest Territory and for the preservation of the good faith of the Government in the performance of its obligations, that immediate steps should be taken to complete and operate the whole of the said railway;

And the last sentence in section 7 says:

> And the company shall thereafter and for ever efficiently maintain, work and run the Canadian Pacific railway.

We not only gave these bonuses and gifts to the Canadian Pacific railway, we not only built that road because it was an essential part of Confederation and because we had to do it in fulfilment of our obligation, but we imposed on the Canadian Pacific railway—and it is imposed on no other railway in this country—that the undertaking should be maintained as a railway for ever, and as a first class railway at that. And now, before we have revised our Railway Act, we propose to allow this company to begin its work of dismembering its assets. For this proposal, as shown by a statement of Sir Thomas Shaughnessy's the other day, is only one of a series of movements to dismember this railway. They first propose to dismember the steamship service.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have not read the original charter. Does it provide that the Company must establish a line of ocean steamships ?

Mr. MACLEAN: I do not say that it does. But a great national unde taking has grown up by reason of the aid given to that company by this Parliament; and now that company proposes to enter upon a policy of dismemberment.

Mr. J. D. REID: Not to dismember the railway

Mr. MACLEAN: This means the dismemberment of the railway, as I shall show. Sir Thomas Shaughnessy pointed out the other day that it was the intention of the company to segregate their extraneous assets. In plain English, that is they are going to dismember the road; they are going to cut the limbs off the trunk; and I call that the dismemberment of the Canadian Pacific railway.

Mr. MARCIL: Can the Canadian Pacific Railway sell their steamers to another company ?

Mr. MACLEAN: Perhaps they can, but I am not going to give them power to put the security of the Canadian Pacific Railway behind this other company.

Mr. LANCASTER: Where is the vice in what the hon. gentleman has just said?

Mr. MACLEAN: I am coming to the vice. I can hardly get a chance to make my case here. You would think I had a most vicious intention judging from the attitude of some hon. gentlemen towards my proposals, whereas I am merely trying to protect the public interest in regard to this Canadian Pacific railway which we have subsidized so generously in the past. Sir Thomas Shaughnessy says that he proposes to segregate the extraneous assets. He is going to lop off the steamship company. Hon. gentlemen say he can do that already. I do not know whether he can or not, but I am not going to help him to do so by legislation in this House. He said: I am going to dismember the lake steamship service which is absolutely a part of the service within Canada. He found he could not do that so he withdrew from that position. He has further stated that they are going to dismember the lands and townsites and put them under another company. If they get that power they will then dismember the express, hotel and telegraph system and in the end we will only be a trunk line of railway with a capitalization of $235,000,000 or more and the other securities that have been issued on the Canadian Pacific Railway. All other assets will be put into other companies with different capitalizations. The result will be that the Canadian Pacific Railway and its associates and all the work that it is now doing under the original charter, and it is doing all this work under the original charter, will have a capitalization of two or three times what the capitalization is at present and the people who pay the freight will have to pay heavier charges as a consequence. It is not in the public interest that we should allow the company to dismember its various assets. Counsel for the railway when they appeared before the Railway Committee stated that they intended to keep control of these assets, that the stock of the new company which they would receive for the steamships which they sold would be placed in the treasury of the Canadian Pacific Railway. When they were asked if they had any objection to a clause being put in this Bill defining that, and saying that the Canadian Pacific Railway shall hold all this stock for the benefit of the public, they refused to consent to it. They may have some other intention in regard to the stock. It may be that they propose to distribute this stock in the new company among their shareholders or it may be that there will be a new melon cut for the benefit of those in whose interest this legislation is being asked. It is not in the public interest that this great railway should be dismembered or that the proceeds of the dismemberment should be used by the company for the benefit of the shareholders. There is no guarantee that such a distribution among the shareholders will not take place. Do we want to have control of ocean services in Canada? Do the people of Canada suffer now from the fact that heretofore we have not been able to control ocean services in Canada whether they were connected with our railways or not? Is it not the case that a commission appointed by one of the provinces of the West found that the high freight rates in connection with the movement of the grain of the West was due to the high ocean freight rates? That was found to be absolutely the case. The millers of the country are on record as protesting against excessive ocean freight rates. The people of Ontario and the boards of trade of Ontario and of Montreal have protested against excessive ocean freight rates. To-day the fact exists that, notwithstanding all we are doing for the farmers of the West, notwithstanding the distribution of seed grain and of feed, the farmers of the Canadian West, at the prices which they have obtained in recent years for their wheat, will not be able to stay on their land and make a living if they get the same kind of treatment in regard to ocean freight rates that they have got in the past five years. Notwithstanding the fact that the farmers of the West are faced by the conditions brought about by the war, notwithstanding that the railways have recently got an increase in the freight rates in the West, or some modifications—perhaps it may have been a reduction—the railway companies are now down before the railway commission asking for an increase in rates. When the West is stricken by one thing and another, and especially by reason of the recent bad year—not by the war—

Mr. GRAHAM: A restricted market.

Mr. MACLEAN: I am not for a restricted market. When we are faced with these conditions, two things happen: The Canadian Pacific Railway is getting absolutely clear from its steamships so that the Parliament of Canada cannot control it in that respect, and it is getting ready to put up the freight rates and to dismember all the other portions of the system over which Parliament has had control. Is that a thing to do to-day? We are likely to have further trouble in the Canadian West if we allow the Canadian Pacific Railway to take these steamship lines away and put them under a British company, thus leaving them free to raise the rates. At the same time we are going to allow them to evade this new law, which the Government proposed last session and which I have introduced this session, giving the Board of Railway Commissioners control over the capitalization of railway companies. It is not good policy to do that. It is not in line with the policy of Sir John A. Macdonald, who built this Canadian Pacific railway. He built that road for ever, and the bigger it got the better pleased he was with it. The greater it became from his time to that of the Administrations subsequent to him the more it became the pride of this country. But now like a flash, and in two innocent little paragraphs, the Canadian Pacific Railway is here asking for power to dismember itself.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. MACLEAN: Yes, they are asking for power to take away these steamship lines. They came with a proposal to dismember the lake steamships. Here is what Sir Thomas Shaughnessy says—

Mr. LANCASTER: That was all amended in the Railway Committee.

Mr. MACLEAN: Yes, it was all very nicely fixed up. Sir Thomas Shaughnessy said:

> It is only another step in the direction of eliminating from the direct operation of the railway company items that do not relate to the railway property itself.

The railway property itself, according to Sir Thomas Shaughnessy, means the road bed and the stations, but all the other things are not considered a part of the railway. He would dismember this great corporation that we have built up, take away all these auxiliary services and leave only the railway service. That was not the original intention. That is not how this road has grown to the enormous proportions which it has attained to-day. Now we have before us a proposition for its dismemberment, its breaking up, and we have information to that effect in this statement by Sir Thomas Shaughnessy given to the public the other day.

What is the real object of this Bill? In view of the fact that we are likely in this Parliament to get jurisdiction over the steamship lines, they are going, with our assistance if they can, to place the steamship lines in a British company over which we shall have no jurisdiction. They are going to establish this British company for the creation of a great steamship service. This British company, with its large capital, will have ships on the Atlantic and ships on the Pacific, and own the vessels that the Canadian Pacific Railway own to-day, but not under the jurisdiction of this Parliament.

Mr. MARCIL: Are not all the Canadian Pacific Railway steamships at present registered in England?

Mr. MACLEAN: There is another of these questions that they bring up.

Mr. MARCIL: I merely wanted to know for information.

Mr. MACLEAN: I do not know whether they are or not, but we will admit that they are. Now I am coming to the point, and that is where we will be tested by the people of the country. We do propose to allow this dismemberment to begin, and it is proposed to allow it to apply to the ocean steamships, and it is proposed to create a British company outside our jurisdiction. That may be possible, and at all events it is being done now, and no matter what any hon. member may say, or no matter what excuse he may offer for the Canadian Pacific Railway, I want to ask him whether he is prepared to do this? After we have created this great company and taken over these steamships, here is the next clause of the Bill:

> The company (that is, the Canadian Pacific Railway) may guarantee the securities of the Canadian Pacific Railway Ocean Services, Limited.

Now, the Canadian Pacific Railway Ocean Services, Limited, is, as everbody will see, for the express purpose of creating a great sea monopoly beyond control of Canada, beginning with the boats of the Canadian Pacific Railway on the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and every ocean they may go upon. And when they have done that and when they have lopped this limb off and given it to the other Company, they propose that this Parliament of Canada shall authorize the Canadian Pacific Railway to endorse the securities, no matter to what extent, that may be issued by this foreign company, in order to create and build up and strengthen the greatest sea monopoly that ever was in the world. There will be no monopoly on the seas equal to this new monopoly the Canadian Pacific Railway propose to build up. They propose to put boats on every sea, they propose to put them under the jurisdiction of a British Act, where we have no control whatever, and they propose to do it all on the credit of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the Canadian Parliament is asked to endorse that proposal and to give this power. Goodness knows it is bad enough to stand all we have stood in the past, and it is bad enough for the farmers of the Canadian West to have suffered from excessive ocean rates in the past. And we are distributing free seed grain among the farmers of the West, and when these great railways are coming to ask for higher rates, is that a time to go a step further and give to the Canadian Pacific railway power to guarantee the securities of this company, for building up a great monopoly to unfairly treat the people of Canada? There is the issue, and that is the issue that will come home to the people of this country, and that is the issue I present to the Government and especially to the Minister of Railways. I say that is not good policy. I say it is not good policy at this time to give this great power of segregation. I say it is absolutely mis-policy; I say it is against the public interest; I say it is against the interests of the farmers of the West that the Canadian Pacific Railway should be allowed to cut a rod to beat the backs of our own Canadian people. That is the issue, and you cannot get away from it, and that issue is now up to this Parliament. What business have we to allow the Canadian Pacific Railway to build up a corporation outside of our own country, and on the strength of its own credit, in order to use unfairly the people of Canada? There have been excessive ocean charges in the past, and the Canadian Pacific Railway feel they are in a way responsible, because they are in the great ocean combine, and they fear we might find a way to get at them through the commission of which the Minister of Trade and Commerce is a member, and to put them under our jurisdiction. I know there is a way yet to be found to get them under our jurisdiction with regard to these ocean freight rates, and now they are trying to get away from that. Are we going to let them get away from us under this clause which empowers them to endorse the notes of this foreign company and this hostile company to the Canadian people? And it is to be a hostile company to Canada so far as ocean rates are concerned. They are trying now to get away from our jurisdiction; they fear we have jurisdiction, or that the Empire will find a way to get jurisdiction over them, and at such a time we are letting them go and giving them these privileges which they can exercise as they like. If the Bill to amend the Railway Act, introduced by the Government last session, was good law, and if the same Bill which I have introduced this session is good law—

Mr. CARROLL: Suppose the amendment to the Railway Act had been passed last year, how would it affect this matter?

Mr. MACLEAN: It would affect it to the extent that the Canadian Pacific Railway would not be allowed to guarantee these bonds without the consent of the Railway Commission.

Mr. CARROLL: I think the hon. gentleman is wrong there.

Mr. MACLEAN: Why should that Act not provide for that?

Mr. CARROLL: Does the hon. gentleman think he is referring to the Act correctly?

Mr. MACLEAN: I think so. Anyhow, if such a provision is not there it ought to be there, and what the Minister of Railways undertook to do was to put the securities of these railway companies under the control of the Railway Commission. That is what they are doing in the States, that is what we ought to do here, but we are very slow in doing it, and while we are slow in doing it the Canadian Pacific Railway is trying to get away from us. Is it calculated to advance the settlement of the Canadian West that we should let these steamships get away from us and let them get under a foreign company?

Mr. MARCIL: Does the hon. gentleman call a British company a "foreign" company?

Mr. MACLEAN: As regards this legislation, yes. I am surprised at the loyalty of the hon. gentleman from the Baie des Chaleurs.

Mr. MARCIL: The hon. gentleman is old enough to remember the discussion which once took place in this House on the word "foreign."

Mr. MACLEAN: I did not take part in that discussion. At all events, the least that can be said of this is, that it is an extraneous company; it is a company over which we have no control, and it is to be incorporated so that we cannot have control over it. But we have control over the Canadian Pacific railway, and we have control over the securities of the Canadian Pacific railway, and that is a point which is easily grasped by the ordinary people of this country, and we are allowing the Canadian Pacific railway to endorse the securities of a company that is to build up a great ocean combine over which the people complain we will have no control.

Mr. MACDONALD: How could one company build up a combine within itself?

Mr. MACLEAN: In the very way that the Canadian Pacific railway has built it up now. The Canadian Pacific railway is a member of the North Atlantic steamship combine, and if I were the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Railways, before I would pass this legislation I would say to the Canadian Pacific railway: I will allow you to do some of these things if you first give us a pledge that you will come out of the North Atlantic steamship combine. The dominant force up to date in the North Atlantic steamship combine is the Canadian Pacific railway, and the people most ill-used under it are the people of Canada.

Mr. MACDONALD: How can it be the greatest; what about the Cunard line and the White Star line?

Mr. MACLEAN: They are not greater than the Canadian Pacific railway, but even if they are, they are out of our jurisdiction, and if the little villain is under our jurisdiction let us get hold of him. Let us not let him escape because there is a bigger villain elsewhere. You can argue from now until doomsday, but the point is that at a time when our western farmers and our Canadian merchants generally are complaining of excessive railway freight rates, and excessive ocean rates, and at a time when the doctrine is being set up that we have no jurisdiction over ocean rates, we are allowing the Canadian Pacific railway to put its ships into another company, and we are giving it the power to guarantee the securities of this foreign company to an unlimited amount, to create a still greater ocean combine and to terrorize the people of Canada to a still greater extent in the future. That is not good Canadian policy; that is not the National Policy; that was not the intention of Sir John A. Macdonald. It is not an up-to-date policy in connection with this great railway proposition. In the States to-day they have ordered some of the companies that built up extraneous assets to dismember. For instance, a lot of the coal companies which became railway companies, and railway companies which became coal companies more than they were railway companies, have been ordered by various authorities to disband, and to reorganize, and they have reorganized into other companies.

An hon. member near me says that is what is proposed to be done by this Bill. If the Canadian Pacific Railway do this, let us have control of the way in which they do it. Let us not give them a free hand to do as they like. When they are doing it, let us not give them a free hand to use the credit of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to build up the greatest ocean combine in the world. My contention is that they should not be allowed to use their capitalization for that purpose. We did not build up the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and give them land and money and railway lines for the purpose of letting them use their capitalization for the establishment of an outside ocean steamship service that we cannot control, that will put up the freight rates and that will put our farmers out of business. If we allow the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to form an independent steamship company, we shall have to go a step further and find a remedy. That remedy will be the creation of a great ocean service, and we cannot entrust it to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. If this dismemberment which is under way goes on, we shall have to create a great merger with which to fight the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in this policy. We may have to merge two or three railways that at the present time have a hard struggle for existence, and to link them up with the Canadian Pacific railway and the Transcontinental. If we do that, we shall have to buy ocean steamships, and we may have to pay a very much larger sum now for the chartering of ocean steamships than we would have had to pay some time ago. If this dismemberment goes on, we shall have to nationalize the railways and our steamships on the oceans, or we may as well let our farmers in the Canadian West go out of business. It is a crazy-quilt policy to subsidize and to encourage farming in the West, and then in the East to allow a great company to create on the ocean a steamship monopoly with which to take all the products of the farmer away from him, following the policy of some American companies in the early days, which said: How much can we take from the farmer and still keep him as a poor man on the land? In western Canada we have pretty nearly reached that stage at the present time; and we would have done so if it had not been for the increased prices that the farmers are getting this year because of the war. If Siberia should go more into wheat production; and if that great country Persia, that may be opened up by reason of this war, and the countries in the valley of the Tigris and the Euphrates, which is a better wheat-growing section than is western Canada—do the same, our farmers under our excessive freight rates will be put out of business.

These freight rates are charged by a company which we are allowing to pass out of our jurisdiction and on the flotations of stock on which we are placing no limitations. The Canadian Pacific Railway can give this steamship company any amount of credit, and there is not a line in this legislation to provide that, if the company wants to do certain things, it must go to some authority and get its approval. By this Bill, the company can do as it likes; it can issue stock to its shareholders at a low rate, as was done recently. There has been no control of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in the past, and it does not propose that we shall have any control of it in the future. Is the Parliament of Canada about to give the power to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to do this thing that is improper and contrary to the interest of the public? The Canadian Pacific Railway Company are asking for this power, and I gather that the Government proposes to give it to them. I do not, however, propose that they shall have that power without my protest and the protest of the portion of the country from which I come. The people of Ontario are against the capitalization of railway companies being beyond Government control. Last year the Government took over the control of the finances of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. That is a beginning, and a good one.

Mr. MACDONALD: Was that what the Government did last year?

Mr. MACLEAN: We have control of the capitalization. We may not have control of the securities, but some of them at least are guaranteed by the Government. We took control of the capital stock. The amount of that is stated in the Act and the company cannot increase it. That company was compelled to put all its operations into one system, and we have it more or less under control. We ought to have the Canadian Pacific Railway Company under control. This legislation is not in the public interest, and it is not legislation that we should put through during this time of war.

It has been stated that it is the policy of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to dismember certain of its operations, such as telegraphs, hotels and lands. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company to-day owns lands that it got from the Government or that it purchased by means of money that came from the Government, that are worth from $200,000,000 to $500,000,000. It is proposed next to take out those lands and put them into a like independent company, and use that as a melon for distribution among its shareholders. These lands and moneys which were given to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were ear-marked for the benefit of the undertaking and not for the benefit of the shareholders. The contention is made that the shareholders can do as they like with these things. They can do what they like only in the light and interpretation of the Act of Incorporation which was for the creation of a great transcontinental railway for the purpose of binding the provinces together. The railway company has used those lands and moneys to build itself up to the strength to which it has attained, and it should therefore not be allowed to dismember. It is not good policy to allow it to take this land out of the company. I want to see the Canadian Pacific Railway Company keep itself intact. If it has in its treasury enormous reserves, which it is now trying to get rid of, those reserves are dedicated, consecrated and ear-marked according to my interpretation of the original charter, for the mitigation of railway freight charges and not for excessive dividends to the shareholders. Are we to sit quietly by and to allow this dismemberment to go on until there is nothing left but the trunk with the severed limbs?

If the Canadian Pacific Railway Company sells these steamships now to the new company, there is no intention that the proceeds realized from the sale shall be used for the reduction of the existing capitalization. The dismemberment is to go on, but the old capitalization is to remain, and the new proposition is all on new capital. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company in a very short time—and it says it is to keep in touch with all these new companies and to have control of them in some way—will have a capitalization of $500,000,000 instead of $250,000,000, as it is now. We are therefore authorizing a great exploitation and increase of the securities of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in one way or another, and we are not keeping control of it. We have some control over the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in regard to certain stock issues, because the company has to come to the Governor in Council and get authority to issue it. I believe the Government of the hon. gentlemen opposite gave the company that authority on two or three occasions.

Under this most dangerous legislation the credit of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company will be used to build up a great ocean combine, over which our people will exercise no control. The new organization will not be subject to Parliament or to the Governor in Council; I would propose that at least it shall be subject to the control of the Railway Commission. For the reasons which I have given here in committee, I submit that this clause and the one following it are against the public interest. I propose to vote against them, and later to submit an amendment.

Mr. TURRIFF: I think it will be agreed that there is a doubt as to whether we exercise control at the present time over the ocean freight rates of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Perhaps we do, but if we do not it is possible for the Government of Canada to secure that control. Last session the Government introduced a Bill to that end; I do not know why it was not brought up this year and put into effect before the introduction of such legislation as this. I should like to ask any hon gentleman—the hon. member who has charge of the Bill (Mr. W. H. Sharpe) or the Minister of Railways—what disadvantage the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is subjected to at the present time by reason of the Canadian ownership of these steamships? Does any one suppose for a moment that by organizing a new company and having the bonds secured by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company can get money any cheaper than they can get it under their own name? No company can get money cheaper than the Canadian Pacific Railway Company; I imagine that even the Government of Canada cannot do it. Why, then, do they ask Parliament to-day to authorize the withdrawal of their ocean and coast steamships from the control of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company? Why do they ask Parliament to place this steamship service under the control of what my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) calls a foreign company, and what I call a foreign company, because it will not be subject to the control of the Canadian people?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: The coasting vessels at Prince Rupert and Vancouver would, under this legislation, also pass out of our control.

Mr. TURRIFF: Yes, they are engaged in the coasting trade. This new company might as well be incorporated in Germany as in Great Britain, so far as our control of it is concerned. I ask again: under what disability is the Canadian Pacific Railway Company labouring at the present time? Has Canada not treated them well? Have we not given them almost everything they asked for? Have we made any unfair or unreasonable exactions from them in the past? I will admit that they have given us good service. They are a big corporation; they have a big business, and they have conducted it, generally speaking, on good business principles. But has the company anything to complain of in respect of its treatment by the people of Canada or by the Government? I think it will be universally admitted that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has absolutely nothing to complain of. What, then, are the grounds upon which they ask Parliament to have this steamship service withdrawn from the control of Canada, from the control of the Canadian Parliament, from the control of the Canadian people? There must be some reason.

Mr. COCHRANE: They never have been under the control of Canada; they have been registered in England right along.

Mr. TURRIFF: The minister says they have not been under Canadian control. But on every occasion upon which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company wanted money to buy boats or to acquire other properties, they came to this Parliament for authority to issue stock; so that we have an indirect control, at any rate. Moreover, if the Prime Minister would reintroduce and have passed the legislation that he introduced last year, absolute control would be secured. In view of what has been done for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the people of Canada have a right to control its operations. What have the people done for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company? We built $32,000,000 or $33,000,000 worth of railway, and handed it over to them—for nothing. We gave them 25,000,000 acres of land—for nothing. We gave them other assistance and other bonuses to help the company along. And can it now be said that the people have no right to exercise any control over the doings of this company? Can it be said that all the money which the people assisted the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to raise was used in the building of the Canadian Pacific railway or its branch lines? Any one who would say that has a very superficial idea of the ramifications of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company as it exists to-day. I am speaking now of the operations of the company in Canada. Let us see what they control in addition to their ocean and coast steamers and their Great lake fleet. They have a string of hotels from the Atlantic to the Pacific. They have lands given them by the people and lands purchased by themselves—lands which are now townsites, worth millions and tens of millions of dollars. The people of Canada put up part of the money with which these purchases were made; the Government of Canada gave them permission to issue bonds to secure the money to buy these townsites and other properties. They have a large amount of money invested in smelters and in mines in British Columbia. The money that they put into these industries was supplied partly by the capital this Parliament authorized the company to raise and partly by bonuses given them by the people of this country. Look at the timber they own at the present time. They are now asking that the steamship services only be separated from the company, but I have here an interview with Sir Thomas Shaughnessy, in which he intimates that they propose that all outside properties shall be eliminated from the control of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company proper. They have spent millions of dollars on irrigation lands. We granted them authority to sell securities to obtain money for that purpose; in a little while they will separate these properties also from the main company. Then they have telegraph lines, electric railways, express companies. The Hull Electric railway, which runs into Ottawa, is owned by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. In a short time, according to Sir Thomas Shaughnessy, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company will ask permission to withdraw all these outside interests from the control of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company proper. Do they propose at the same time to reduce the capital of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company? Not at all. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company are just a little afraid that possibly the Canadian Parliament may ultimately control their ocean freight rates, and they are taking steps to prevent this before the legislation of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, introduced by his Government last year, is put into force. Shall we stand idly by and make no protest while that is being done?

5 p.m.

Mr. CARROLL: How does the legislation of last year amending the Railway Act affect or conflict with this Bill?

Mr. TURRIFF: Not being a lawyer, I probably do not understand the matter very well; but in a general and rough and ready way, I think I understand this; and I think my right hon. friend the Prime Minister and the Minister of Railways must have understood it in the same way when they introduced the legislation giving power to the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada to supervise the securities that were issued by the railway companies. I think that would go so far as to cover not only the issuing of the securities themselves but the guaranteeing of securities of any subsidiary company, and if it did not give such power the Act should be so amended as to give it. So I do not think we can get away from the fact that at the present time we are in the very good position of being able, in view of the legislation introduced by the Government last year, to have control of the capitalization and the securities issued by these different railway companies and other companies.

Let us see how it is going to affect those who have to pay the freight rates. The hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) has spoken of its effect on the western farmer. He never said truer words in his life. We talk about the disadvantage the war has been to everybody. So it has in many ways, but financially the war has been a godsend to the people of the West; and if it had not been for the high prices obtained for the last crop there would have been a much greater protest from the West against the passage of any legislation such as we are now considering than there has been. Let us see the position in which the western farmer will be when this legislation is passed. Prices are high now, everybody, particularly the Government, is urging on the farmer to go in for production and patriotism. Well they need not bother about the patriotism end, the farmers are as patriotic as they are; nor need they bother about the production. There is no occasion to tell the farmer, if he has a field ready to sow, to sow it, if he can get the seed.

Mr. BRADBURY: But he has to get the seed.

Mr. TURRIFF: In some cases he has to get the seed, but there is no need to lecture him on the growing of his crop or on patriotism. Let us suppose that this war ends sometime during the coming summer, as I think in all probability it will. Great Britain has a year's food on hand to-day. I have no doubt that France is in much the same position. These countries that are at war are not going on a margin of one or two months' food supply, they have a huge supply of food products on hand and when the Dardanelles are opened in the course of a few weeks there will be an outlet for an immense amount of food supply and you will find that all the Allies will be well stocked up. Supposing the war ceases next fall, what will happen? Do you think the high prices will be maintained? Not for one moment, there will be a slump in the prices of food products, and a big slump. Then where will the farmer be? I make the statement without fear of contradiction that to-day it cost from 6 cents to 8 cents a bushel more to take wheat from Fort William to Montreal than it did three or four years ago. Why? The railroads are not charging more to bring it to Fort William, there has not been very much increase in freight rates on the Great Lakes; the great bulk of the increase has been on the ocean end. The ocean freight rates have been increased so that, as I say, there is now a difference of from 6 to 8 cents a bushel.

Mr. MARCIL: May I point out that before reaching the sea, on the Atlantic seaboard, flour that used to sell in my constituency at from $5.75 to $6 a barrel is now selling at $8 and $8.50 a barrel.

Mr. TURRIFF: That has nothing to do with the question we are now discussing.

Mr. MARCIL: I am trying to say that regardless of the ocean rates there has been an unjustifiable increase in the price of flour in Canada.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: So much the worse.

Mr. TURRIFF: I do not think it has anything to do with the question I am discussing; but I shall give the answer to my hon. friend's question. The big milling companies bought wheat last Fall, millions and tens of millions of bushels, at 80 cents and 90 cents a bushel, and later on they perhaps bought it at a $1 a bushel. Owing to manipulation, to a certain extent, but partly to the big demand in European countries, not only the countries at war but those that expected that they would be drawn into the war, putting in huge supplies of wheat, the price went from $1 up to $1.50 and $1.60 a bushel, and the mills are therefore charging for flour which they grind from wheat which cost them less than $1 a bushel, the price they would charge if they had paid $1.50 and $1.60 a bushel. That accounts for the increase in the price.

Mr. MARCIL: The enhanced price does not go to the farmers in the West.

Mr. TURRIFF: A great deal did not, because the large proportion of the crop had been sold before the 1st of January last year, so the farmers did not get the advantage of the whole increase in price. The great bulk of the crop was sold before the price reached $1.50 a bushel. Many farmers thought that when wheat got to 90 cents or $1 a bushel it was a good price, and it was, and they sold for that good price. But I do not think that argument has much to do with the question that we are now discussing. The freight rates have been increased, and that increase has taken place partly for transportation before the produce reaches the ocean, but largely for carriage on the ocean.

Mr. STANFIELD: How does the hon. member account for the fact that since this war broke out, in England freight rates have increased more than 100 per cent?

Mr. TURRIFF: That has nothing to do with the question, and the only way I can account for it is that the Government of Great Britain had commandeered hundreds of vessels that were engaged in carrying freight.

Mr. STANFIELD: I am speaking of the railroad freight rates in Great Britain.

Mr. TURRIFF: Because I think in England they are not a bit better than we are; and when the railroad magnates think they see a good chance to do the people oy extra freight rates they have probably taken advantage of it.

Mr. STANFIELD: The Government took over the railroads as soon as the war broke out.

Mr. TURRIFF: I do not know anything about freight rates in England, and I do not care what they do there. If they do wrong there that is no reason and no excuse for doing wrong in Canada, and I do not think my hon. friend will say it is a good excuse. But here is a company under no disability whatever in Canada, coming to Parliament with a very mild-looking couple of clauses in another Bill altogether, having nothing to do with ocean shipping; and with these two mild-looking clauses they propose to take out of the jurisdiction of Canada forever any possible chance of having any say whatever in connection with ocean freight rates. I say there is absolutely no justification for it. I assume that the Prime Minister was in earnest when he introduced his legislation last year, providing for the regulation of ocean freight rates. That legislation has not yet come into effect; it is still before Parliament; and if, before that legislation is put in force, he allows the Canadian Pacific railway to withdraw from the scope of that legislation a large portion of their assets, then he will be responsible for something that should not be done and for which the Government will be held strictly to account.

The farmer in Canada has got to the limit of what he can stand. If it had not been for the higher prices obtained this year on account of the war, not a dollar would have been made out of last year's crop, even by those who had a good crop. And remember how the burdens of the farmer are to be increased this session. Here are the railroads clamouring before the Railway Commission for an increase in freight rates. They say the increase will not apply west of Port Arthur; but how can it be said that the West will not be affected by the increased rate from Port Arthur down to the Atlantic, when our western wheat goes over that line, and when a lot of the stuff we use in the West is drawn over that line from the East? But that is not all. It is proposed to increase the cost of producing wheat to a very large extent. The Government is increasing the cost of everything the farmer uses in producing his wheat. The Railway Board is likely to increase the freight rates, I understand, and now we have the Canadian Pacific railway trying to withdraw their steamships from the control of this Parliament, so that they can do any mortal thing they like in the way of increasing freight rates on the ocean.

Mr. LANCASTER: How can it hurt the farmer of the West? The Bill is for the purpose of strengthening the Canadian Pacific Railway in their competition on the Seas. For the Canadian Pacific Railway has not a monopoly of ocean traffic; it has to compete with the steamship companies of Great Britain and of the United States and of foreign countries. This Bill will strengthen the owner of Canadian vessels in his competition with other steamship companies.

Mr. TURRIFF: What disability is the company under at present?

Mr. LANCASTER: As I understand it, they want to be able to conduct their business in a business-like way. I do not want to interject an argument into my hon. friend's speech; but it strikes me that this Bill is very much in the interests of the people of Canada, because it keeps everything that the commission has control over limited to the seaboard. The companies cannot mix their rates as partly land and partly ocean, which might be done if they were not separate companies. I cannot see anything in this Bill except the strengthening of the Canadian Pacific Steamships in their competition with steamship lines of other companies of foreign nations. I do not see how that can hurt the Canadian farmer or the eastern or western citizen.

Mr. TURRIFF: The Canadian Pacific railway is not conducting its ocean business in a businesslike way, simply because it is a branch of the main company.

Mr. LANCASTER: It is not a branch of the railway at all. The whole argument of my hon. friend is based on a fiction.

Mr. TURRIFF: It is a part of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The boats were secured by the money of the Canadian Pacific railway. Where else was the money obtained? This proposal, that the Canadian Pacific railway should have power to guarantee the securities of this new company, will not relieve the Canadian Pacific railway in the slightest degree, except in this sense: it will relieve them for the future from control by the Parliament of Canada. In view of the fact that the legislation before us will have the effect of enabling the Canadian Pacific railway to enter into combines and to secure a greater monopoly of ocean traffic than they now have, and in view of the legislation introduced by the Government last year, surely it would be the part of wisdom for this House to say: We will let this Bill stand for a year, until the Prime Minister makes good the legislation introduced last year. If we do that we shall not be hurting the Canadian Pacific railway. They have gone on for years with their ocean service as a branch of or as a part of their main company; they have not suffered at all, and they are not suffering to-day. They have any amount of money in their treasury, and if they have not, they can get it just as readily through the present company as through the proposed new company. So we should be imposing no hardship whatever on the Canadian Pacific railway by delaying this Bill. What good reason can be brought against allowing the Bill to stand? It is quite possible I may be absolutely wrong in the views I hold on this subject, but I think it would be best for the Bill to stand until next session when, during the recess we shall have had an opportunity of learning more about it. Surely that is not asking too much, especially when there is a great possibility that its enactment may be to the detriment of the people who use the railway and the ocean service of the Canadian Pacific railway. Take my own constituency, absolutely an agricultural constituency, practically a wheat-growing constituency. The fact that it costs our farmers from 6 to 8 cents a bushel more than it did a year ago to send wheat to the Old Country means that every farmer of the West is being deprived of that 6 or 8 cents a bushel, and when the war is over they will not be able to stand these increased rates. This war will have one effect, and hon. gentlemen opposite, and the Government especially, should not lose sight of it. In the West to-day to one farm occupied you will find two farms empty, in township after township; and that is not in the drouth-stricken area, but in districts that had a good crop last year. How is that? Simply because the farmer is finding it harder every year to make a living.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Low prices and high freights.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Narrow markets.

Mr. TURRIFF: And combines, monopolies, high freight rates, and the tariff. It means that you are going to drive the farmers from the land, not by hundreds, but by thousands. I may be wrong in thinking that this legislation will have that effect. But I think the Canadian Pacific railway is no better than another company; it is just as ready as the Grand Trunk or the Canadian Northern railway or any other steamship company to take the last cent from the farmer in freight rates. The farmers have not been able in the past to stand the high rates, and many of them have been driven off the farms. I fear that this legislation will have the effect of driving thousands and thousands of our farmers off the land. It makes me tired to hear this propaganda of getting people back to the land. That is beginning at the wrong end. What is wanted is legislation that will enable the farmer who is on the land to stay there. If you enable the farmers to stay on the land, you do not have to bother about a propaganda to get them to go back to the land. There are thousands of people living in cities who would be glad to go on the land if they felt they could make a living from the land. But you are going the wrong way about it by introducing this legislation in view of the fact that the Government brought down legislation dealing partly with this question last year. I would suggest that this whole matter be left over until another session. Then we could take up the matter and thresh it out on its merits.

Mr. NESBITT: Suppose the Government did control this steamship company and did control the rates, what benefit would it be? Where would we benefit from it?

Mr. TURRIFF: According to the argument of my hon. friend, we might better dissolve the Railway Commission. Has it been of no advantage to have the Railway Commission controlling rates? I think it has.

Mr. NESBITT: But they have controlled them under the system of allowing them to pay, have they not? They have not fixed railway rates at less than it paid the railways to carry the stuff?

Mr. TURRIFF: Three or four years ago the ocean companies were charging very much lower rates than they are at the present time, and we did not hear of any great difficulties among the ocean steamship companies. They were declaring good dividends until some men got together in New York and London, merged these companies and issued a large amount of watered stock upon which they have not been able to pay dividends. But there is no doubt that on the actual amount of money invested in these steamship companies they were making good returns.

Mr. NESBITT: Were they making money in these companies?

Mr. TURRIFF: They were paying dividends.

Mr. NESBITT: Then why did they sell? If you were making money out of a corporation, would you sell out?

Mr. TURRIFF: I would not hesitate to sell if I were making money out of it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: May I ask if this Bill stands over until the Government bring down the measure that was introduced last session, would not that measure apply to all steamship companies as well as to the Canadian Pacific railway?

Mr. TURRIFF: I think so. I think that would be the advantage of having this legislation passed instead of discriminating against other companies by giving special advantages to the Canadian Pacific railway. If this Bill is passed this session, and next session the right hon. the Prime Minister brings down and passes the legislation to which my hon. friend has referred, there may be disabilities as against other companies that he has exempted this company from.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This Bill would not have any such effect, because if this Parliament has power to pass the legislation which was proposed at the last session applying to all steamship lines, the legislation would apply equally to the Canadian Pacific Ocean Services Limited. In our desire to try and get rates reduced, and it is a very laudable desire and one in regard to which my hon. friend from Assiniboia has always proved himself to be the friend of the western producers, we ought not to be unfair to the Canadian Pacific Railway simply because it is a great and successful company which, as has been said by the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean), has done so much for the development of Canada and, indeed, whose development and prosperity have been wrapped up to a great extent with the prosperity and development of our country. Parliament at this session has given the Grand Trunk Railway Company identically the same powers as those which are asked for by the Canadian Pacific railway.

Mr. LANCASTER: The Bill was passed on the same day as this Bill was held up.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The powers are exactly the same.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Will my hon. friend read them?

Mr. PUGSLEY: They are in different language, but the effect is exactly the same.

Mr. MACLEAN: Read them, please.

Mr. PUGSLEY (reading):

> The directors of the company may from time to time, as often as they deem expedient and in such manner and upon such terms as may be mutually agreed upon—

The very language to which my hon. friend takes exception in this case.

—make advances to or assist any company, now or hereafter incorporated, of which the capital stock issued and outstanding, or a controlling amount thereof, is now or may at the time of any such advances or assistance be held by or in the name of, or for the benefit of the company, and may acquire, hold, guarantee,—

That is the word to which my hon. friend takes such strong exception.

Mr. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY (reading):

—guarantee, pledge, sell or otherwise dispose of shares, bonds, debentures or other securities of any such company and for any such purposes may use the proceeds of any class of stock heretofore or hereafter issued by the Company, and upon the acquisition of any such shares, bonds, debentures or other securities may exercise all the powers of holders thereof and receive any dividends or interest paid thereon.

Under that section the Grand Trunk Pacific, or the Grand Trunk Railway Company, could to-morrow organize lines of steamships both on the Atlantic and the Pacific, put them under the name of another company and guarantee the stock and other securities of that subsidiary company. Then we find that the Canadian Northern Railway Company have segregated their steamship line from the railway; the steamships are owned by the Canadian Northern Railway Company, but held in the name of The Canadian Northern Steamships, Limited, and owned in the same way as it is proposed that this company may own the steamships of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. We ought not to discriminate against the Canadian Pacific Railway simply because it is a great company and has done so much for Canada, while giving the same powers exactly to the Grand Trunk Railway Company and recognizing the right of the Canadian Northern Railway Company to have the same powers when they organized the Canadian Northern Steamships Limited.

Mr. SAM. SHARPE: Did not this Parliament at the last session, when granting the loan to the Canadian Northern Railway Company, combine the Canadian Northern Steamship Company with the Canadian Northern Railway Company proper, and are we not doing exactly the opposite in this case?

Mr. PUGSLEY: At the last session the separate existence of the Canadian Northern Steamships Company Limited was not wiped out, but the company was connected as a steamship company the same as all other subsidiary companies with the Canadian Northern Railway Company, and all we did was to require that they should be merged together in the sense of all the securities which were to be issued being chargeable upon the mortgage. The reason was that as the Government was guaranteeing the bonds of the company to the amount of $45,000,000 it required that all the assets of the Canadian Northern Railway Company and of the subsidiary companies, some twenty or more in number—

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Should be put in a convenient form for giving security.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, should be covered by the securities. The Canadian Northern Steamship Lines maintained their identity just the same as the twenty or more subsidiary companies continued their identity. I remember a very strong argument was urged for preserving the identities of these companies at that time. If Parliament has the power to regulate the rates of ocean steamships, it will have the same power after this Bill passes to regulate the rates of the Canadian Pacific Ocean Services Limited as it will have in regard to the Donaldson line, the White Star line, the Allan line, the Beaver line and all those various lines of steamships now crossing the Atlantic. Surely we ought not to discriminate as against one railway company in respect to its steamships, and not control the rates exacted by the other lines. If Parliament can pass a law such as is proposed, there is nothing in the Bill now before the House to prevent a statute after it is passed being effective as against the lines of the Canadian Pacific Oceean Services Limited just as much as in respect to any other lines of steamers. In regard to the right of the Canadian Pacific Railway to be allowed to do what they seek power to do, I asked my hon. friend from South York as to whether or not the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was ever obliged by statute to establish steamship lines. I thought that might have an important bearing upon the consideration of this Bill. He has admitted, and I have no doubt that it is the case, that there is no obligation, that there never has been any obligation, on the part of the Canadian Pacific Railway to establish or operate steamships on either the Atlantic or the Pacific. There is nothing to prevent that company, without any violation of its charter and obligation to the Canadian people, disposing of all its steamship lines to-morrow.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Has it not created a public service under that original charter ?

Mr. PUGSLEY: It created it through money earned by the railway, I presume, and which otherwise would have been distributed to its stock-holders. I presume that certain earnings of the Canadian Pacific railway, instead of being distributed to its stock-holders, have been used for the acquisition of these steamships. I can understand that as a matter of purely domestic arrangement within itself, it may be very convenient for the Canadian Pacific railway to organize a separate company, just as the Canadian Northern has done, to operate its steamship lines. My hon. friend (Mr. W. F. Maclean) talks of segregating the assets, and he says the Canadian Pacific railway may come here by and by to separate the hotel system from the railway. What of it; we have allowed that to be done by the Grand Trunk company. This magnificent hotel, the Chateau Hotel at Ottawa, is not owned by the railway company, but by what is known as the Ottawa Terminals Company. The hotels at Edmonton, Regina, Prince Rupert, and in the Rocky mountains, are owned, as I understand it, by the Grand Trunk Pacific Development Company, and not one of them by the railway company. Where would be the harm and who would object if the Canadian Pacific Railway to-morrow were to organize a great hotel company, in which would be vested these various hotels, so that they would be managed separately from the railway company ?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: If these hotels are in the railway proposition now, and they do segregate them, do they propose to cancel the capitalization which now represents them in the capitalization of the company ?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Let me ask my hon. friend what would happen if they sold these hotels outright ?

Mr. MACLEAN: They should put the money represented by them into the capitalization.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I presume the money would go into the treasury and if Parliament has any control over it well and good. But undoubtedly they have the power to sell such of their property, outside of their railway, as they think it advisable to dispose of. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company could to-morrow sell all their steamers, and they could to-morrow sell all their hotels. Where is the objection from the public standpoint to they themselves organizing a separate company to manage these steamships or to manage the hotels? Wherein is the objection to their having the power to guarantee the securities of the subsidiary companies, so that the money may be raised at a lower rate in the markets of the world, and thereby the charges upon the public less than if the subsidiary companies were obliged to pay a higher rate of interest upon the borrowed moneys. I can see no reason at all which would induce me to vote against the Bill, which I believe is entirely one of domestic concern for the Canadian Pacific Railway.

There is another consideration for those of us who are interested in Canadian ports—I suppose all members of this House are interested in Canadian ports, although some may be interested more than others because of local circumstances and considerations—and it is that we should not impose disabilities upon any railway company in respect to its line of steamers which would have the slightest effect in inducing it to discriminate against Canadian ports, or to disregard the business of Canadian ports and attempt to carry the trade through the ports of the United States. Suppose the Grand Trunk Railway Company were to come to-morrow to get authority to organize a great line of steamers upon the Atlantic, and to organize a subsidiary company for the purpose of owning and managing these steamers, and have power to the parent company to guarantee their bonds. Surely we would give that authority at once. We want to make Canadian ports favourite ports for ocean business. If we were to impose disabilities upon the Canadian Pacific Railway, and discriminate against them as compared with other lines of railway owning steamships, one could very well understand what might happen. They might dispose of their steamers altogether to companies in which they would have no interest and over which they would have no control, and instead of preserving that business to Canadian ports we might be doing very serious injury to the trade of these ports. I say, encourage by all means possible the enlargement of the ocean fleets of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and if they want it—and they would not come to Parliament unless they thought it would be an advantage to them in their financial operations and in the operation of their steamship lines—I say by all means give them the widest possible powers. Then, if we can pass a general law applicable to all steamship companies, which would enable Parliament or the Railway Commission to control the rates, by all means pass it and make it applicable to all steamship lines as well as to the steamers of the Canadian Pacific railway.

Mr. SAM. SHARPE (North Ontario): It seems to me that Parliament is attempting to do this session exactly the opposite of what it did last session in the case of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. Last session we spent a great deal of time to compel the Canadian Northern Railway to combine its various companies and various assets into such a corporation as would enable it to give certain securities to this Parliament for advances made. In the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway now, we are apparently dismembering the corporation, and separating it and weakening it, and, to a certain extent, losing the control which Parliament has at present over it. I was present in the Railway Committee, and I listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion that took place there, and I am free to say that I was greatly impressed by the argument presented by the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean). The Canadian Pacific Railway is a mighty corporation; it has been built up with the great assistance of the Canadian people, who gave them 25,000,000 acres of land and $25,000,000 in money. We are all proud of the great enterprise, and no person wants to hamper it in any shape or form. In any remarks I may make I wish it to be understood that I have no hostility whatever to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I have always been friendly to the company, and I like to see it prosper as the country prospers, but it seems to me that every member who registers his vote in favour of this proposition is voting against the public interest of this country. We are now in practically what is a war session, and it was understood that no important legislation would be enacted outside of war measures, and the railway company will not be hampered if this legislation rest for a year or so, in order that Parliament may become seized of all its ramifications.

I moved in the Railway Committee that these two clauses should be referred to the Railway Board. We have there an expert body in Mr. Drayton and his associates. Mr. Drayton made a trip to the old country for the purpose of investigating these ocean rates and this very question, and I moved in the Railway Committee that the whole subject be submitted to him, in order that he might if necessary suggest safeguards in connection with this legislation. If it is dangerous legislation we should have expert opinion on it. It was said in the Railway Committee that there was no precedent for any such thing, but I remember two or three years ago in the Private Bills Committee, when a water-power Bill came up for consideration, I moved that it be referred to the Conservation Commission, headed by Sir Clifford Sifton, and that motion was carried. Sir Clifford Sifton and his expert associates went into the merits of the Bill, with the result that they reported against nine of the fifteen clauses. Why should we be paying these expensive commissions, if we cannot use them when we desire to? If these commissions can give us any assistance or any advice to protect the public, why should we not get it from them? Why should we be opposed to submitting this Bill to the Railway Commission to see if they cannot arrange proper safeguards to regulate ocean freight rates? The sense of the committee was against adopting my motion, and it did not pass.

There is no question to my mind but that a most important thing in a young and progressive country like ours, is to have favourable freight rates. That is important, not only to the western farmer but to the Ontario farmers and the Canadian farmer generally. We are shipping cattle and hogs and farm produce in Ontario, and these ocean shipping combines are sucking the life-blood out of the Canadian producer. We must not confess our inability and impotence to provide a remedy. We should grasp the question and devise means whereby we can have control over these ocean rates, and we should not be in too great hurry to pass this legislation. Why not consider it carefully and let the matter come up at a future session of Parliament? The member for South York pointed out that we are allowing the Canadian Pacific Railway to guarantee the bonds of a foreign corporation, and we are facilitating them in getting away from the control of this Parliament and of the Railway Board. An article on the front page of Saturday Night, March 6, 1915, discussed the question of freight rates, and it is startling to hear of the enormous and staggering increases that have taken place in ocean freight rates during the past year. Judge J. W. Alexander, Chairman of the United States Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, in a recent article in defence of that Government's Ship Purchase Bill, which it may be stated has been practically talked to death, and will probably be heard from no more, gives some astonishing figures in connection with this subject. The article is as follows:

> Since the outbreak of the war, ocean freight rates between New York and Liverpool have increased on grain, cotton and flour from 300 to 500 per cent, and the increases between New York and Rotterdam have been much greater. From Baltimore to European ports (exceptng Germany) rates have been increased on grain 900 per cent; on flour, 364 per cent; on cotton, 614 per cent. From Norfolk to Liverpool rates on grain have been increased from 157 to 200 per cent; on cotton, 186 per cent. From Norfolk to Rotterdam the rates on cottom have been increased 471 per cent; to Bremen the rates have increased 1,100 per cent, namely, from $1.25 per bale to $15 per bale. From Savannah to Liverpool the rates have been increased on cotton 25 per cent; to Bremen the rates have been increased on cotton 900 per cent. From Galveston to Liverpool the rates have been increased on grain 174 per cent; on cotton, 361 per cent; to Bremen the rates have been increased on cotton 1,061 to 1,150 per cent.

People naturally say that war conditions increase the rates, and that seems to be true. The rates, however, are continually being increased, and the western farmers are complaining about the unjustifiable increases. Is this Parliament, then, quietly to permit the Canadian Pacific Railway to transfer its steamship lines to a company with a foreign register in order to escape any restriction that we may impose upon it?

It has been pointed out by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) that Sir Thos. Shaughnessy, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, has stated that it is the intention to separate the assets into various companies. The capital of the company, however, is to remain the same. Are we to sit by and pass legislation allowing the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to transfer part of its assests to another company and to increase the aggregate capital without any increase of assets? That is the effect of this legislation, namely to transfer the ships from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to a subsidiary company, without reducing the capital of the parent company. Therefore, the aggregate capitalization is going to be increased by the capitalization of such subsidiary company. If we are to do our duty to the people of this country, we cannot permit this process to go on any longer. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company should conform to any restrictions that this Parliament may impose upon it; we should not lessen those restrictions; we should not facilitate the separating of those assets, and we should not allow them to be transferred to a company beyond our jurisdiction.

When this matter was before the Railway Committee, I suggested to Mr. Beatty, counsel for the Canadian Pacific Railway, that it would be quite proper and interesting for this House to know the relative earning power of the steamship line as compared with the earning power of the railway. I do not know whether any information was brought down or not; but it is important, as it is at the present time and will be for some time to come an important earning power of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The company is anxious to separate that earning power from the earning power of the railway, so as to conceal its great earning powers. That earning power should go to the benefit of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the parent company; and if the total profits exceed 10 per cent, the company has automatically to reduce its freight rates to the farmers.

Mr. COCHRANE: The company has done that now.

Mr. SHARPE: Has the company submitted itself to the jurisdiction of the Railway Board?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. LANCASTER: Two years ago.

Mr. SHARPE: That is all the more reason why the proposed amendment should be accepted. We all know that the Railway Board has done excellent work. If we have confidence in the Railway Board, then why refuse the amendment of the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean)? The hon. member does not say: This shall not be done. He simply says: It shall be done by a board in which we have the greatest confidence. We have confidence in the Railway Board, which is not going to impose onerous conditions upon the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. It will deal with that company fairly; it will not impose conditions upon the company that will drive it to American ports. Why should we refuse a reasonable amendment which provides that these transfers shall be made and the proceeds of these sales shall be employed only for such purposes and upon such terms as the Railway Board shall designate? That is a very reasonable proposition.

My hon. friend the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) asked: What disability will the Canadian Pacific Railway be under if it is allowed to remain just as it is to-day? The steamship lines were built up out of the earnings of the company. The people of Canada paid for them. Why do we not compel the company to register its ships under Canadian register? The only excuse offered to the Railway Committee by Mr. Beatty, counsel for the Canadian Pacific Railway, was that it would simplify bookkeeping to transfer the ships. With all respect to that gentleman, I think that is an absurd reason. It is no reason for this Parliament to allow such a radical change to take place as regards the policy of the Canadian Pacific Railway. If it is only to simplify bookkeeping, we should stay our hands, because we know that, with all the ramifications of a company like the Canadian Pacific Railway, it has a proper system of bookkeeping. That is no excuse to offer to reasonable men legislating in the interest of the people of Canada.

This legislation is aiming to do just the opposite of what we were doing before. When we wanted the Canadian Northern Railway securities, we spent days and weeks compelling the Canadian Northern to form one holding company into which to put all its assets. We wanted it to put all its assets into one basket, so that we would know what they were. In this case we are allowing the Canadian Pacific Railway to divide itself up into several companies, and we are weakening the control that we should have over it. I trust that the amendment of the hon. member for South York will receive endorsation at the hands of hon. members.

Mr. CARROLL: I did not hear the hon. member for South York move any amendment to the Bill.

Mr. LANCASTER: We are on section 4.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: My amendment is on the Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. LANCASTER: It has not been moved yet.

Mr. MACLEAN: It will be moved at the proper time.

Mr. CARROLL: The hon. member proposed his amendment before the Railway Committee. If sections 4 and 5 contain all the atrocious things the hon. member says they do contain, I would have no hesitation in voting against the passage of those two sections. I do not see, however, that the hon. member for South York or the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) or the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe) have shown us that any of the things will happen which they say are going to happen by the passage of this Bill. When this Bill came before the committee, section 3 read as follows:

> The company may sell, lease or charter any steam or other vessels of the company to the Canadian Pacific Ocean Services, Limited, an incorporated company, or to any other incorporated company.

That gave the Canadian Pacific Railway Company power to sell, lease or charter its boats on the Great Lakes. It was immediately seen that this matter took the boats on the Great Lakes and the inland boats of the railway company away from the jurisdiction of the Railway Board under which they are at present. The proposal was at once made in the committee that an amendment should be put in as follows:

> Excepting the inland river and lake boats of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

The Canadian Pacific Railway Company did not oppose that amendment, and this shows their recognition of the fact that the ocean liners of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are not and never were under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners. This legislation, therefore, does not attempt to put these services outside the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company may sell, lease or charter their boats, or may dispose of them in any way they may desire, and they ask that in doing so they may guarantee the stock of the Canadian Pacific Ocean Services Company or any other incorporated body which may purchase or acquire those boats. Is that an unheard-of thing? Certainly not; we are doing it every day. We are doing it in connection with all railway companies; why should we not do it in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company? The new company is paying for these boats not by handing gold to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, but by means of bonds and securities. It is provided that the company may subscribe for, purchase, take, acquire, hold, guarantee. Is there anything unbusinesslike in that? Is there anything in this legislation which will prevent the Board of Railway Commissioners from exercising any control of ocean rates which they do not exercise at the present time? The hon. member for South York spent two days in the Railway Committee and an hour in the House to-day arguing this point; he is as clear about it now as he was then, and that is as clear as mud. It is recognized by the best legal talent in Canada that the Board of Railway Commissioners have no jurisdiction over ocean freights at the present time; how in the world can this proposed legislation take away from them that which they have not?

At six o'clock the Committee took recess.

The Committee resumed at 8 o'clock.

Mr. CARROLL: It has been suggested that one way in which this Government could make the Canadian Pacific Railway subject itself in the way of giving the Railway Board jurisdiction over its freight rates would be to compel the Canadian Pacific Railway to have its boats registered in Canada. I believe that if that were done it would result in the ocean liners controlled by the Canadian Pacific Railway and other companies plying to ports in the United States. I do not think that would be to the advantage of the people of Canada, much less to the farmers of the West who have grain to ship across the Atlantic. The member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) said that this legislation would frustrate or defeat the object this Parliament had some years ago in incorporating this company and assisting it financially. I fail to follow him there. He cited a clause of the Act of incorporation which said that the Canadian Pacific railway should continue to be operated as a first-class railway. I fail to see how, if this legislation passed and the Canadian Pacific Railway was allowed to lease or sell or charter their boats to an independent or subsidiary company, that would in any way interfere with the line continuing to be operated as a first-class railway. If there were anything in this Act which would be to the disadvantage of the farmers of the West or to any class or portion of the people of Canada, I do not think this committee would for an instant think of passing the Bill. How is the farmer going to be affected? The farmer in the West at the present time may appeal to the Railway Board, in so far as transcontinental freight rates are concerned. The farmer in the West is not in a position to appeal to the Railway Board in so far as ocean freight rates are concerned because the Railway Board has no jurisdiction and does not pretend to take to itself jurisdiction over ocean freight ratet at the present time. The only trouble and the real difficulty that was in the Bill has been removed by the amendment made in the Railway Committee to clause 4, excluding from the operations of that clause the inland boats of the Canadian Pacific railway, so that it cannot dispose of them to a subsidiary company. The whole thing appears to me to be a business-like transaction. I do not believe that the Canadian Pacific Railway has in view the undoing of the farmers of the West or of any portion of the population of Canada. The Canadian Pacific Railway are running this road as a money maker like others and in running it they must give a fair measure of justice to the people of Canada. If they do not this Parliament is here to make them do so. If they attempt to raise transcontinental rates we will have recourse to the Railway Board; but I do not think there is much danger of such an abuse in view of the fact that they now have two transcontinental lines competing with them. My friend from South York is reading into these clauses things which the clauses do not contain. I am afraid he is gifted, if you can call it a gift, like one or two of the clans of the Highlands, with second sight and can see things nobody else can. There would be a great deal in his contention, everything that he is arguing for, if our Railway Board to-day had jurisdiction over ocean rates. They have not that jurisdiction, and therefore we are not giving to the Canadian Pacific Railway any privilege which they have not now, with the possible exception of guaranteeing the bonds of this subsidiary company.

Section agreed to.

On section 5:

The company may subscribe for, purchase, take, acquire, hold, guarantee, pledge and dispose of shares, bonds and other securities of the Canadian Pacific Ocean Services, Limited, and of any other company to which the steam or other vessels of the company may be sold, leased or chartered.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: This is the clause that authorizes the Canadian Pacific Railway to endorse all this capitalization of the proposed new company. It is said that we have no jurisdiction over ocean rates or over this company. We have jurisdiction, I think, over ocean rates, certainly it has not been proved to me that we have not, but we have jurisdiction over the Canadian Pacific Railway, and they are here to-day as suppliants. The history of progressive legislation in Great Britain, in this country, in every country, is that grievances have been rectified when the persons who have acted unfairly have appeared before the legislature as suppliants. The Canadian Pacific Railway is here to-day as a suppliant. It has imposed most unfair charges upon the people of the Canadian West for ocean transportation. It has done this because it entered into a combine on the north Atlantic; and it proposes now to make a still greater combine, and we have the company now under our legislative control, and it is proposed by this legislation that we should part with that jurisdiction and permit them to endorse any capitalization in connection with outside companies.

Mr. LANCASTER: What are we letting them out of in this Bill?

Mr. MACLEAN: I am asking that we shall keep them under control, that we shall say they must not endorse the bonds of this company without the consent of Parliament and of the Railway Commission of Canada. That is my proposal, and that is the thing that I wish to see adopted. Why should we say that we have no power, and let the company do what it likes with the credit we gave to it and allowed it to build up to its present position? It should not be permitted to lend this credit to another company. And grant that we gave permission to the Grand Trunk, as has been said, then we did wrong. I was in the committee the other day when that was up.

Mr. LANCASTER: You never said a word.

Mr. MACLEAN: Perhaps not. The hon. gentleman did not.

Mr. LANCASTER: I fixed the Bill up.

Mr. MACLEAN: My great crime is that I do not watch everything; and if I try to watch one thing I am inconsistent. Probably the worst vice one can have is inconsistency. And then they say you are irrelevant, illogical, or the draughtsmanship is bad, as some of the lawyers say when you draw up an amendment. But Parliament never achieved any reforms without taking advantage of what it already possessed. We can secure a great deal in the public interest if we keep the capitalization of this railway under the control of Parliament or of the Railway Board. I have been through all this, and heard these charges of irrelevant and illogical argument, and of your statement being as clear as mud, and all those other polite things. And then the things you meet on the street. I could not go down the street to-night without having somebody say to me: "Oh, did you get that off?"—as if I was loaded with bile and wanted to get it off. I went through all this in connection with the regulation of express charges in this country. The Minister of Justice and the man who aspired to that position told me that I was most illogical, that my draughtsmanship was bad, and that the jurisdiction did not apply. They have tried to keep express companies out of our jurisdiction, but they are now in it. Lawyers in this House would say: Oh, you have no jurisdiction over an express company, because it owns a boat service on the lake, or because some of the goods are carried by stage; and for a while the railways said we had no jurisdiction over the freights on inland waters in this country. But we have the jurisdiction now; we have acquired it in some way, but we should never have acquired it if we had confessed that we had no jurisdiction. We have some jurisdiction over the Canadian Pacific Railway in regard to freight rates. We have sent the Minister of Trade and Commerce on a commission to ascertain just what our jurisdiction is. But it does not do to confess you have no jurisdiction.

The argument of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) was practically: Oh, you are making fish of one and flesh of the other. Now, I may be inconsistent; we all may be; but a progressive measure has never been put on the statute book in order to cure some grievance or to improve a certain condition, which did not do some injustice in some way to somebody. That is how reforms work out. They do not work out by clear-cut logical statements, but by Parliament trying to attain something. Reform is worked out by judges bending the law in the line it is supposed to move, or ought to move. There is always some injustice and some irregularity, but eventually you get progress. From my experience in Parliament I should say that the way to get reform—and it is a way that seems to be more disapproved than any other—is to follow the good old English method. When we have a corporation here as a suppliant for increased powers—and we have them every year—we should say to them: If you want relief we are going to examine your character; if you are asking for relief in regard to ocean steamship rates, why are you in the North Atlantic combine? Why will you not submit your rates to us? If we followed that method we should be constantly progressing, and should get legislation in the public interest. I do not care how irrelevant the argument may be, or what it may lack in clearness, but I say we should not abandon our position and give this railway unlimited power to use its credit for the benefit of a steamship company outside the jurisdiction of Canada.

Mr. NESBITT: Are the Canadian Pacific Railway now in the North Atlantic combine?

Mr. MACLEAN: I do not know; they were in it as big as could be.

Mr. NESBITT: Was it not proved at the investigation in the United States last summer that the Canadian Pacific Railway were not in the combine?

Mr. MACLEAN: They have been in the combine, and have led the combine; just as they own the Allan line to-day and profess not to own it.

Mr. NESBITT: I understood they were proved not to be in the combine.

Mr. MACLEAN: It has not been proved. They have been in the combine; they are in it now; they are directing the North Atlantic combine, and are going to direct it more when they have this legislation. It is against the public interests that they should be given this power to guarantee the securities of a company outside of our control. They are under our control now and we should say to them: If you are going to use this power, you must use it subject to the approval of the Railway Commission of this country, as laid down in the Government Bill of last session and in the proposed amendment I have on the Order Paper this year.

Mr. NESBITT: The hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) has made serious charges against the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Minister of Railways must know something about this, and I should like to hear what he has to say about it. He has been looking over the Bill. He was in the Railway Committee the other day when the Bill was up.

Hon. FRANK COCHRANE (Minister of Railways and Canals): Everything seems to have been discussed but the point of the Bill. I do not think there is any question of our power to pass legislation to control any ships that come within the three-mile limit or into our harbours. Would it do us any good to force this company to submit its rates to the Railway Commission or to the Government or to whomsoever it may be? It would only antagonize them, and drive them to other ports. I think there are three things which will help to get us lower ocean rates. First of all, we might make an international agreement with the United States in reference to a board; so that these ships could not be driven from Canadian ports to Boston, Portland or New York, which have all the time better rates than our own ports. There has been a little effort to bring that about. Another great thing is in regard to insurance. Insurance on vessels using Canadian ports is much higher than on vessels using American ports; that is a very serious thing, not only for ocean liners, but for tramp ships as well. Take Halifax or Quebec in the summer. These ports are then no more dangerous to approach or leave than Boston, for instance. In fact, I think either of the two ports I have mentioned is preferable to Boston. If we follow the advice of the hon. gentleman (Mr. W. F. Maclean) and tell the Canadian Pacific Railway that we will not allow them to guarantee the bonds of the stock of this new company which they propose to create, this new company could get along without this help, but could not sell its stock or bonds in the market of the world as easily as it could if the Canadian Pacific Railway were behind it. The main reason for this legislation, as explained to me by the Canadian Pacific Railway, is because the British Government has commandeered nearly all their ships. That has caused freight rates to go up. They do not know when the boats will be given back to them, nor how many may be sunk before the war ends; so they have incorporated a company in England, and we all know how Lloyd George looks after companies there. They want to get these ships started at once; and the more ships we have on the Atlantic the lower the freights will be. Another great factor is the growth in our shipping, although it has not grown like American shipping. Again, there has not been much inducement to tramp steamers, which in my opinion are a greater leveller of freights than anything else. I do not see any harm in the Bill. The views I have on this question are very much in line with those contained in the speech made by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley.) I think he laid down the case very clearly from all the different points of view. I think we would be only cutting off our noses to spite our faces if we accepted the amendment which has been given notice of. I do not agree that we have any control over ocean freight rates at the present time and I am of the opinion that the Bill should go through. Some hon. gentlemen have talked all around this question, but they have not touched upon the real point at issue.

Mr. MACDONALD: I think that my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) has come closer to the practical question in regard to the control of ocean freight rates than my hon. friend from South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) did in considering this question. The problem of lower freight rates is one in which not only the farmer is interested but every man who is connected with the production of raw material or produce of any kind which he desires to send abroad. Every producer in every province of the Dominion who looks for a market in the Motherland, to which country our exports have increased very rapidly within the last ten years, is particularly interested in the problem of how to get these products carried to the old country as cheaply as possible and equally interested in getting what he purchases in Great Britain brought back to this country at the lowest possible figure. The question of what the freight rate upon these articles may be at any particular time does not depend upon any internal condition in this country. The whole thing is a problem of supply and demand and those men who have lived in the maritime provinces where we have had some connection with shipping interests know that within the last five years, indeed, down to a year and a half ago, and even later than that, the freight rates for our vessels that were owned and doing business there were at the very lowest possible ebb. Within the last year the conditions have entirely changed and between 2,000 and 3,000 of the freight-carrying vessels of the world have been withdrawn from that service; the exact tonnage I do not know but I know that this large number of the vessels have been withdrawn in consequence of which a very much less tonnage is offering, or is available, for the purpose of carrying our produce to and fro. The consequence is, just as in any other lines of business in the world, that the cost of transportation has increased because there are fewer people in the business of transportation. There is another thing that hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this question seem to have forgotten and that is that Great Britain controls the carrying trade of the world upon the seas and the people in Great Britain are very much interested in getting all they can out of their ships when the time for their harvest has arrived, so to speak. There is a greater demand for vessels now than at any time in the past, and the ship-owner of England, not being a special philanthropist, has taken advantage of the excessive demand for his tonnage just the same as a man in any other business would. My hon. friend comes in and says that because that is so, in this year of grace 1915, when the Canadian Pacific Railway asks us to pass a measure in the financial character of which there is nothing extraordinary, we should hold them up and not let this measure pass without stipulating that they cannot have anything to do with this new steamship company unless a clause is inserted in the Bill that freight rates shall be under the control of the Railway Commission.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I did not say that.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is not that the whole purport of the hon. gentleman's argument upon the holding up of the Canadian Pacific Railway the question of the control of ocean freight rates?

Mr. MACLEAN: No, I have never argued that.

Mr. MACDONALD: Then what was my hon. friend talking about?

Mr. MACLEAN: My argument was that the control of the securities of the company should come under the Railway Commission.

Mr. MACDONALD: Who is going to regulate the freight rates?

Mr. MACLEAN: I did not say; we will find a way later on, but in the meantime do not let the control of our securities pass out of our hands.

Mr. MACDONALD: I was listening to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACLEAN: Listening to some of your friends on the other side of the House.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend is not going to disclaim his association with my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff)?

Mr. MACLEAN: I did not say it.

Mr. MACDONALD: If he did not iterate and reiterate that in the course of his speech I do not know what he was talking about in regard to ocean freight rates.

Mr. MACLEAN: I did not say it.

Mr. MACDONALD: Then, what did my hon. friend mean?

Mr. MACLEAN: I meant what I have just said; I proposed that the Canadian Pacific Railway, should only give its endorsement to the securities of this other company after these securities had been approved by the Railway Commission.

Mr. MACDONALD: What about ocean freight rates?

Mr. MACLEAN: You must ask those who dealt with that question. I said ocean freight rates were a grievance in this country and, in the meantime while they were a grievance, we should not let the control of the securities of the Canadian Pacific railway in connection with shipping pass out of our hands.

Mr. MACDONALD: I think I am accurate in what I say. My hon. friend means that we should not give the Canadian Pacific Railway this legislation unless we do something in regard to ocean freight rates. We have power in this Parliament to pass legislation by which we shall say that the Board of Railway Commissioners, or some other board, should fix the rates to be inserted in all bills of lading or charter parties in connection with the carrying of goods of different classifications, but the Minister of Railways and Canals has pointed out that our jurisdiction in this matter would cease the moment any ship passed the three-mile limit or whenever we attempted to legislate beyond the confines of our country. But in the meantime, after putting that legislation into effect, there is this problem, that we have the United States to the south of us, and an exporter in Canada at any point west of Quebec would divert his export trade to the American ports where there are no such limitations, no railway commissions, and ship his goods in that way. That is the way it would work out. That is the actual business result of it. At the same time we could not by any possibility control by our legislation here the freight rates which the English shipowner might ask the shipper on the other side who wanted to ship his goods to Canada. Our lumbermen and our fishermen in the maritime provinces are quite as much interested in this question of freight rates as are producers of other classes in different parts of Canada. We are in this unfortunate position that, while Canada thirty years ago was at the very top of the list in the shipping world when she built her wooden vessels, she to-day has practically no vessels on the sea at all. Unfortunately our iron and steel industry had not been advanced to that point, when our wooden vessels disappeared from the sea, that we could roll and combine steel plates into ships in the way in which this work was done by the steel men of England who had a long lead on the people of any other country in the steel industry. To-day we have practically no Canadian merchant marine. As a consequence England's shipowners control this business, as to freight, as to transportation and as to all those questions of the sea and until you can make what might be called an international arrangement with England by which the English and Canadian Governments, or some joint commission to be appointed by both, would have supervision over the question so that you could make it work at both ends, any action by us would be entirely inadequate and inoperative. In order to make that provision entirely effectual you would have to have an international arrangement between Great Britain and the United States by which the freight rates would be just the same in both countries. It seems to me that that is a fair statement of the actual business conditions in regard to ocean freight rates. I would have liked to have heard from the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), who has given this question his special attention, a statement of his views upon this question because it is a most important one. The fault I have to find with my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) is that the proposition as it is contained in the Order Paper in regard to this particular legislation in reference to ocean freight rates would be entirely inoperative and inadequate and there would be no sense in putting it on the statute books.

The question of the control of the capitalization of the company may open a very wide door. It is a question whether or not due publicity as to the assets of a company and other information given to the public with regard to any stock issue would not be quite as advantageous as to make it compulsory for any large enterprise to come to any particular board in this country to get a certificate of character. Suppose one of our large railway companies contemplating a bond or stock issue came to the Board of Railway Commissioners and succeeded in getting its approval of the right to issue the stock or bonds, it would be at once urged by investors abroad, in the event of any failure on the part of the enterprise, that Canada through her properly constituted authorities had given a certificate of character to that enterprise and to the right to make that stock or bond issue, which misled the investor, and that might result in very great injury to the credit of the whole country in the future. On the other hand, if you have proper publicity in regard to the status of a company arranged for, then the investors would have to make their own investigations and take their own risk. It does seem to me that my hon. friend (Mr. W. F. Maclean) has not made any case which would entitle the House to say to a company that comes here with an ordinary business proposition, that it should be held up by the imposition of conditions which are entirely unnecessary and which would be inoperative and inadequate.

Mr. TURRIFF: I wish to ask the Minister of Railways why the Canadian Pacific Railway Company should go to Great Britain for incorporation of the Canadian Ocean Services, Limited, instead of getting incorporation in Canada?

Mr. COCHRANE: The ships owned by them at present are registered in Great Britain, and I suppose whatever new ships they get will be acquired out of the funds guaranteed by the Canadian Pacific Railway. I do not know of any other reason.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The English Joint Stock Companies Act is stricter even than Canadian legislation of a similar character, if my memory serves me correctly. The English law is very strict with regard to safeguards against undue capitalization, and it is also very strict as to the returns that are required to be made public by any company incorporated under it. The English law is so much stricter than ours, and some of its provisions seem so desirable, that not long ago I directed the attention of the Minister of Justice to it, with a view to having some of the safeguards in the English Joint Stock Companies Act adopted in this country, and I am inclined to think that that could be done with very great advantage. I venture to think that no company, whether the Canadian Pacific Railway or any other, would seek to incorporate a subsidiary company under the English Joint Stock Companies Act, with a view of getting any undue advantage in the way of capitalization.

I am sure that every hon. gentleman in this House realizes that the control of freight rates upon the Atlantic is a very different thing from the control of railway freight rates in Canada. A railway in this country is absolutely subject to our own jurisdiction, it is incorporated under a statute of this Parliament, and it can be held to very strict account under the provisions of the Railway Act. The road can only be operated in this country where it is built, and it is subject to the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada. But when you undertake to regulate freight rates upon the Atlantic, you are face to face with a very different proposition, and legislation for the purpose of regulating ocean rates, if it were not framed with the most careful consideration for conditions which vary much more with respect to ocean carriage than with respect to land carriage, instead of benefiting the producers of this country desiring the advantage of cheap transportation, might put them in a very much worse position than they were in before, for the simple reason that ocean tonnage urgently required in Canada might be driven elsewhere. We have had the matter under consideration more or less for the past two years, and we have made investigation, not only on the other side of the Atlantic but in the United States. We have even had under consideration the possibility of obtaining joint action by Canada and other countries, for the purpose of exercising control. I am not very familiar with the subject of ocean rates except in a general way; but it must be borne in mind that even before the shortage of tonnage which was created by the outbreak of war, there had been—as has been represented to me and as I have reason to believe—considerable advance in the cost of ocean transportation for the reason that the cost of labour and materials and of supplies had advanced. I think it has been demonstrated in this discussion that as to any control which we might desire to exercise or which we can reasonably and adequately exercise over ocean freight rates, this Bill does not prevent us from exercising it in the future. We shall have just as good right to exercise that control if this Bill is passed, as we would to exercise it now.

I listened very attentively to the argument on the point that this Bill tends to create a monopoly and affords greater facilities for entering into a combine, and I am bound to say that I have been unable to appreciate the force of such argument, although I realize the desirability of our preventing combines in respect to rates upon the ocean, or rates upon the land either. I cannot see that the formation of this new company would tend to facilitate a combine. The allegation has frequently been made here that the so-called Atlantic conference has tended towards the increase of rates; but so far as I can see, the establishment of any such conference in the future would not be in any way facilitated by the organization of a separate company in this case. As a matter of fact, in the United States they are forcing companies to do that which the Canadian Pacific railway desires to do now of its own accord. Legislation in the United States, and the decrees of the various commissions which have been established in that country, have prevented one corporation from carrying on the business of a railway and the business of a steamship company at the same time. They have also prohibited railway companies in the United States from being interested in coal areas and carrying on the business of coal companies.

It would seem to me that if the steamship company proposed in this Bill had been organized years ago by capital provided by the Canadian Pacific railway or by those who were interested in that company, and if the proposal were made here to-day that it should be merged in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, there would be even a louder cry than that which is put forward in opposition to this Bill now.

As to weakening the Canadian Pacific Railway company, I cannot see that this Bill weakens it, and I think the company is pretty thoroughly able to safeguard its interests. As a matter of fact, there is not a great deal of change in the situation, as far as I understand it. The company up to the present time has invested a certain amount of its capital in the acquisition of steamship lines on the Atlantic and on the Pacific. Its ownership in those steamship lines would enable it to sell or dispose of them, so far as I understand the legal effect of the various Acts under which the Canadian Pacific Railway has acquired that ownership. What the Canadian Pacific Railway proposes to do is to organize a separate company, incorporated under the English Joint Stock Companies Act, with all the safeguards to which I have alluded, and it proposes that the ocean-carrying business of the Canadian Pacific Railway shall be transacted by this company and not by the parent company.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

As far as control of rates is concerned, if the allegation be true that the profits from the ocean carrying business of the Canadian Pacific Railway are very large, the separation of that business in this distinct way is an advantage to the public rather than a disadvantage, because it will prevent any juggling with the receipts from the railway carriage and those from the ocean carriage, which might otherwise be possible. At all events, if it does not absolutely prevent that, it will make it more difficult. The Railway Commission would be able more distinctly to know that the profits of the ocean business were, as distinct from the profits of the railway company considered purely as a railway company.

The purpose of the Bill is almost altogether administrative, endeavouring to put the business of the Canadian Pacific Railway into a position in which it will be easier to carry on the ocean-carrying business as distinct from the land-carriage business.

The only difference in the situation created by this Bill is this, namely that the Canadian Pacific Railway owns the steamships directly to-day, and that after this Bill has passed and after the steamships have been transferred to the new company which is to be organized, the Canadian Pacific Railway will own the steamships in effect although not directly, because it will hold the stock which represents those steamships. There will be no difference in substance although there will be a difference in administration.

It has been argued very strenuously that the stock may be distributed and divided amongst the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The Company cannot distribute its stock amongst the shareholders if it proposes, as I should imagine it would propose, to retain control of the ocean-carriage system, because if it distributes its stock amongst its shareholders, it will at once lose control, and the purpose which the company had when it embarked upon the business of transportation across the Atlantic and across the Pacific would cease to be effective. I would not therefore be inclined to attach importance to the idea that there would be any distribution of this stock, because the stock held by the Canadian Pacific Railway will represent the control which it must exercise, unless it proposes to go out of the ocean-carrying business.

So far as the guarantee of bonds is concerned, it is a very common thing amongst railways—and I think it is a very common thing in the legislation which has been authorized by this Parliament for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company—to give to a major railway company—if I may use that expression—the power to guarantee the bonds of another company which it purchases or leases. It is precisely that principle which has been brought into this Bill, namely, the purpose of enabling the Canadian Pacific Railway a very great corporation with very great assets, to guarantee the bonds in order that the money which is to be raised for the purpose of adding to the steamship lines of the Canadian Pacific Railway may be raised at the lowest possible rates of interest. So far as that goes, it is manifestly a proposal in the interest not only of the whole enterprise but of the people of this country at large.

Mr. CARROLL: Would the value of the stock of the present shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company be decreased in any way by the transfer of the assets in the shape of ships, supposing the stock were given to persons who did not hold stock in the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I suppose the assets represented either by money or by stock would be in the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I do not see that it would affect the situation assuming that they were sold at their actual value. What impressed me was this, that it merely amounts to a change in the form of ownership. The Canadian Pacific Railway has direct ownership in those steamships under conditions as they are at present. After this proposal is carried out, that interest which it now possesses will be represented by stock held by the Canadian Pacific Railway in the new ocean steamship company. Do I make myself clear to my hon. friend?

Mr. CARROLL: Yes.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It does not affect the capitalization of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which remains the same; but that which was represented by the ownership of those vessels will, after this proposal is carried out, be represented by the stock held by the Canadian Pacific Railway in the company which owns the vessels. Therefore, I cannot see that there will be any actual or substantial change in the assets of the Canadian Pacific Railway which will be affected by this Bill.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I thought the question asked was: Are the rights of shareholders of Canadian Pacific Railway stock safeguarded under this legislation? Take, for example a man who owns 1,000 shares of Canadian Pacific Railway stock. After the ships are removed from the company, what does he get in lieu of that security; or is it in the power of the company to say: We will take the ships away from the assets, and we will leave you what you have? Will the new company give the Canadian Pacific Railway Company something in lieu of the consequent depreciation in the value of the stock?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Matters affecting the disposal or utilization of the assets of the company are left by the shareholders and directors. We are entitled to assume that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, when they sell these steamships, will get a reasonable price for them, and that that price will be represented either in money or in stock. I understand the proposal is that the price shall be realized in stock. The stock which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company will receive will represent the value of the vessels. Instead of a direct ownership, there will be an indirect ownership through the stock, but the value will be there just the same as it was before.

Mr. NESBITT: I think we all wish to be absolutely fair in matters of this kind, even in respect of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I asked the hon. member for South York if the Canadian Pacific steamship services, as at present incorporated, are a part of the North Atlantic combine. He said that they are. My memory is most distinctly the opposite. Last year when the United States appointed a commission to investigate the North Atlantic combine, it was found, not only that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had absolutely no connection with that combine, but that they were its chief competitor.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM: I am not inclined, like some hon. gentlemen, to chide the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean). I believe, with him, that we get no reforms of any consequence unless some one begins to agitate. Sometimes agitations are made too soon; sometimes too strong; but no harm can result from genuine agitation which in the opinion of the agitator is necessary to effect some reform. I admit that some beneficial results have been accomplished in respect to certain matters which the hon. member for South York first brought to the attention of the House, and I think that credit is due him for these results.

The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) did the natural thing when he requested the Government to insert in this Bill a clause providing for control of ocean freight rates, because the company, in a general way, promised to do something along that line. When I had the honour of being Minister of Railways and Canals and the late Justice Mabee was Chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners, we conducted negotiations with the authorities in Great Britain looking to the inauguration of a scheme for the control of ocean freight rates. Justice Mabee expressed the view that we could control ocean freight rates, but, as has been pointed out by the Minister of Railways to-night, the control which we would exercise would be, in a large measure, unimportant; if Canada acted alone, the control exercised would not be sufficiently far-reaching. The present Solicitor General on one occasion took me to task for not getting the ocean freight rates under control, and he himself proposed to do it. The hon. member for Assiniboia was merely calling upon the Solicitor General to make good his promise, but it has not been a very easy task. I think the Government did send the present Chairman of the Board of Railway Commisioners to Great Britain to inquire into this matter. I do not know what information he gained, but I venture the assertion that he did not get much farther than I did. The reasons are quite apparent. This is a problem that cannot be solved by one country or by two countries; I am inclined to think that it could not be solved even if Great Britain, the United States and Canada were to unite in their efforts to solve it. Great Britain owns a large proportion of the world's shipping, but many other countries as well are concerned. The negotiations which the late Government were conducting in this matter came to an abrupt termination. After it had been determined that it would be unnecessary and unprofitable to conduct any further correspondence, I discussed fairly and frankly with some of the authorities the prospects of carrying out such an arrangement. Some of the difficulties were made manifest, and are manifest now to those who understand the subject. Great Britain owns perhaps 90 per cent of the shipping of the world, and anything that we should do would be ineffective unless Great Britain co-operated with us. We could impose a license fee upon vessels landing goods at Canadian ports, but if we did that and some other country did not do so in respect of its own shipping, Canadian ports would be avoided. I discussed with men in authority the advisability of our co-operating with the United States in the matter, and it was agreed that our co-operation would solve the difficulty to a certain extent. But the chief difficulty which exists in connection with ocean or lake freights is not found in the control or management of railways. The Prime Minister made that quite clear. Any one who buys a ship can run it, but only the proprietors of a railway can manage a railway. Hon. gentlemen sometimes forget that if the Board of Railway Commissioners undertook to control freight rates on the ocean, they might be obliged, owing to changed conditions, to change rates as often as they had a sitting. Under regulations of the Board of Railway Commissioners, transportation companies are not allowed to carry freights at less than the rates agreed upon. To do so would be discrimination, for which a fine is imposed. Supposing a man wants to send a cargo to Canada from a point on the other side of the Atlantic or Pacific. In order to get a proper freight rate on that cargo, he wires to his agent on this side to see if he can get a return cargo, because ships, like railway trains, cannot give fair rates unless they get a cargo both ways. It quite frequently happens that the agent on this side can arrange for a return cargo at a very much lower rate than that which is usually charged, but, if the Railway Commission had previously fixed a certain freight rate, the steamship would be liable to a fine if the return cargo were carried at a lower rate. It is much more difficult to regulate ocean freight rates than it is to regulate railway freight rates. There are several difficulties in the way; I sympathize with the Government in that they are finding it not easy to do something in the accomplishment of which their predecessors did not exactly succeed.

9 p.m.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Public ownership of steamships would solve the difficulty.

Mr. GRAHAM: Perhaps public ownership of steamships would do it, but that is not applicable to the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners. That would not apply to that jurisdiction. I was referring to the remarks of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), for which he had good reason. But unless we are prepared to go the length of purchasing a line of steamships, then I say the difficulties are almost insurmountable unless all the other countries will come in. Even if they did come in, I see the other difficulty, it would suppress the tramp steamer. My hon. friend says they are doing business, and after all the tramp steamers enable us to get very cheap rates at times on special cargoes, and are often regulators of freight rates.

As to the guaranteeing, I am a firm believer in the opinion that we will soon have to do something in Canada to regulate our large mergers; but in this respect I shall make a confession. Owing to a difficulty that I seemed to have when I was a member of the Government in finding just what the Canadian Pacific Railway was earning on its railway and what the operation of the road was costing, I was trying to study out some means by which I could have this company separated into two parts so that we could, in a clearer way, get at the real cost of the construction and operation of the railway. I had that in my mind, and I was wondering about it and had consulted one or two of my best advisers on railway matters as to how that could be brought about so that, once and for all, we could find out what would be a fair rate to impose on the Canadian Pacific Railway in respect of rail freights. Now I find they are making this very separation, and I really think it is a good thing for the Dominion of Canada that we are getting the railway away from the steamship line. With the steamship separated from the railway I think we will be in a far better position to control rail rates.

Mr. JAMESON: Will the hon. gentleman explain to the committee how we will have better control of the railway when the steamship lines are separated?

Mr. GRAHAM: It is hard to explain; but if my hon. friend had endeavoured to go into the earnings of the Canadian Pacific Railway when the steamships were so interminably mixed up with the railways that it was difficult to say just what part of the profits belonged to the railway and what part belonged to the steamships, he would realize the difficulty of arriving at a just conclusion as to the profits of the railway company.

Mr. JAMESON: That does not affect our control.

Mr. GRAHAM: The control of the Board of Railway Commissioners or the extent to which they exercise it depends on what is a fair return to the railway company for its investment and operation; and if you cannot tell what the investment is or what the cost of operation is exactly, you cannot tell what is a proper rate to impose on the railway.

There is yet a question between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Government as to whether the Government controls the Canadian Pacific rates by land at present. The Canadian Pacific Railway have never relinquished the right which they say exists under their original charter concerning rates.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Has my hon. friend seen the Order in Council passed on that subject?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have not seen it, I was told such an order exists. My own opinion was that the Railway Board should control the rates.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What has happened is this. The litigation between the Government and the company, initiated just before my hon. friend became Minister of Railways, was brought to a conclusion by an arrangement under which the Canadian Pacific Railway admitted that its rates were subject to the control of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada. We withdrew the litigation on their express and explicit agreement, which is attached to the Order in Council, that henceforth the rates should be subject to the control of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada. This agreement was made a year ago last November and there cannot be the slightest doubt that the Canadian Pacific Railway, in respect of its rates, is absolutely subject to the control of the Board of Railway Commissioners and has been ever since the 7th day of November, 1913. As a matter of fact, before that, by an informal agreement, the company had been assenting to the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, as I am informed, but reserving, nevertheless, their right to raise the question if they saw fit to do so at any time.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Order in Council had slipped my mind. I remember now that it was handed over to me on one occasion. The situation before the Order in Council was passed was that the Canadian Pacific Railway agreed tacitly to the control of the rates, but reserved the right to raise the question under the old statute.

As to the guaranteeing of the bonds, the present is a very peculiar and exceptional time. Our securities, in common with all others, do not find such a ready sale at the present moment as we would wish. We are interested at the present moment very deeply in seeing that any securities that Canada has to offer through any of her great undertakings ought to be of the highest character and bring the highest price. This is not essentially a new organization at all, it is the separation of an old organization, which has a very high position, and rightly so, in this country into two integral parts, distinct and separate one from the other. The Canadian Pacific Railway, as I understand, are not asking permission to guarantee the bonds of some new organization in which to speculate in securities or of which the business will be speculative; they are simply asking that when they detach from the parent company the steamship line the parent company, which will still, in another way, own the child, may see it through by guaranteeing its securities. I think the situation is altogether different from what it would be if a new company were being organized and, at the present moment, when it is essential not only to the company but to the credit of Canada that the securities should be gilt-edged, I think no harm can be done by allowing the parent Canadian Pacific Railway Company to guarantee the bonds of its offspring, this new company, which really is part of itself. It is not an outside organization, it is not a new organization or company, but simply the old company dividing itself into two parts and asking that what is called the parent company may be allowed to look after the other company in the way of guaranteeing its bonds.

As to the position of the shareholders, I think the Prime Minister has stated that clearly. I might say in passing that the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) will agree with me that the Canadian Pacific Railway never neglects its shareholders. The shareholders in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company proper will be part proprietors of every asset the Canadian Pacific Railway gets from the steamship company; and while the Canadian Pacific Railway will hand over to the other company the steamships, the steamship company will give them something in lieu of the steamships in which every shareholder will have a proprietary right as a stockholder in the original company. I am as anxious as any person can be for the control of freight rates, and will support any measure for that purpose that can be properly worked out. But this is something that will require international action, and cannot be successfully done otherwise.

As regards the guaranteeing I see no reason why, under these peculiar conditions, I should not support the action of the committee in allowing the parent company to guarantee the assets of the company which is simply being detached.

Mr. TURRIFF: My right hon. friend has made one thing clear at all events, and that is that the Canadian Pacific Railway, in going to Great Britain for incorporation, are not going where the regulations will be less strict. My right hon. friend has explained that the conditions are even more strict in many respects. We all know that no company likes to be under strict regulations; they much prefer lax regulations, and latitude to do what they want. Therefore this company has not been incorporated in Great Britain in order to be under less strict regulations. There must be some other reason, and I think that reason has been made very clear. They are anxious to escape from the control of this Parliament. They do not wish this Parliament or the Board of Railway Commissioners to control their freight rates. If that is not the case, they would never have incorporated the company in Great Britain, where the regulations are much stricter than here. I want to put a further point up to my right hon. friend. Suppose that the railway legislation introduced last year had become law.

Mr. COCHRANE: If it was the law, it would not touch this.

Mr. TURRIFF: We shall see whether it would or not. Suppose it had become law last year. Under that legislation the Board of Railway Commissioners would have had the right to regulate the issues of securities by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. That is what the legislation is for. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways may shake his head, but if the legislation was not for that purpose why was it brought down?

Mr. COCHRANE: It was for railroads, not steamships.

Mr. TURRIFF: My hon. friend seems to forget that at that time as at present, the steamboats were a part of the Railway Company.

Mr. LANCASTER: No, they are not.

Mr. TURRIFF: They are a part of the assets of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The steamships are bought with the proceeds from stock authorized by this Government—if you do not choose to go further and say that they were partly bought with the cash, land and bonuses given to the Canadian Pacific railway. If that legislation had passed and become the law of the land, I am satisfied that, before issuing securities to raise money to buy further steamships for enlarging their fleet either on the Atlantic or on the Pacific, the Canadian Pacific Railway would have had to secure the approval of the Board of Railway Commissioners. Apparently the Canadian Pacific Railway see that very well. I have no doubt that, when the Prime Minister brought down the Railway Bill last year, they imagined he was anxious to have it passed; and although they believe that it will not be introduced this session, as my right hon. friend has stated that he did not intend to bring in any legislation this session except what was necessary in connection with the war, the Canadian Pacific evidently expect that at the next session of Parliament this legislation will be put on the statute books, and that by that legislation they would be prevented from doing what they proposed to do by this Bill. They believe that they would have to secure the approval of the Board of Railway Commissioners.

If the Government put this Bill through they must assume the responsibility. My right hon. friend further states that there is no likelihood of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company giving any part of the stock of the Canadian Pacific Ocean Services, Limited, as a bonus to the shareholders of Canadian Pacific stock, because in that case they might lose control of the steamship stock. But I would like to point out to my right hon. friend that they could give 49 per cent of that stock as a bonus, and still retain control of the company. They could even give 75 per cent of it to the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and still retain control for all practical purposes.

Another point was mentioned by the Minister of Railways, by the hon. member for Pictou, and by the Prime Minister. They all presupposed that if the railway or steamship company had to get the approval of the Board of Railway Commissioners for an issue of stock or securities, or for their freight rates, the Commissioners would be unfair to them. I do not believe any hon. member of this House thinks anything of the kind. I think every member of this House believes, and has a right to believe, that the Board of Railway Commissioners would be perfectly fair both to the railway and steamship company, and to the public of Canada. I think there is no force at all in that argument.

My hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) brought up another point in connection with earning the 10 per cent. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister states that that is now entirely eliminated, that the Canadian Pacific Railway by Order in Council are absolutely under the control of the Railway Commission so far as railway rates are concerned. But to my mind that is the very strongest argument why this Bill should not be passed. Because if, as was pointed out here to-day, the ocean carrying end is going to be the big profitable end, it would be quite possible for the Canadian Pacific Railway to give certain through freights, credit the small end to the railway company and the big end to the steamship company, and in that way avoid earning over 10 per cent on the railway line, which is under the control of the Railway Commissioners. They could make what profits they liked on the steamship end and we could say nothing about the matter.

Mr. LANCASTER: Does the hon. gentleman not realize that the Board of Railway Commissioners would have control over the railway just as they have over the rates of any other railways, no matter whether a steamship service is at the end of the line or not. The Board of Railway Commissioners cannot allow the Canadian Pacific Railway to charge lower or higher freight rates than any other railway under the same conditions, whether there be a steamboat service at the end or not.

Mr. TURRIFF: I realize that perfectly. My hon. friend knows I am perfectly right. A railway and steamship company could keep their books to show as much profit as they liked on the steamship end, and as little as they liked on the railway end.

Mr. LANCASTER: If the books were kept separate, would not the Railway Commission be able to ascertain much more easily whether there was any wrongdoing in connection with the bookkeeping, than if there was one set of books for, say from Liverpool to Winnipeg or from Liverpool to Calgary? Would it not be easier for the commission if the books were kept separate? Would it not be an assistance to the Railway Commission if a Bill of this sort should pass? It struck me directly I saw the Bill that it would.

Mr. TURRIFF: It would be if we had control at both ends, but this whole legislation is for the purpose of evading any possible future control. I imagine that that is the object that the Canadian Pacific Railway have in view. I cannot see any other object. A railway company of the magnitude of the Canadian Pacific Railway comes here and gives us as an excuse for this legislation that they are taking incorporation for the steamship end of their company in Great Britain where the conditions are much more onerous than they are here, as was pointed out by the Prime Minister, and they tell us that they are doing this to simplify book-keeping. Nobody takes that seriously. Nobody would imagine that the Canadian Pacific Railway would do that for the purpose of simplifying their book-keeping. It is too absurd to be credited for one moment. There is something else behind it and as far as I have been able to judge by the debate, and by the character of the legislation before us, the only conceivable object is to have that end of their business withdrawn from any control by this Parliament through the board of Railway Commissioners in the future.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In what way does this withdraw it?

Mr. TURRIFF: Because there is a question that we have not that power now. Under the legislation they have to come to this Parliament for power to guarantee the bonds of this company and if we have not got the power then it is quite possible we might get it. The legislation goes a long way to convince me that the Government thought we had the power. If we have not we could get it. But if this legislation is passed it is out of our hands forever and we will not be able to get it. If this legislation goes into force well and good, the Government, of course, will take the responsibility for it, but if my hon. friend was in earnest last year in his proposed legislation I think in all fairness to the country and to the different railway and steamship companies this legislation ought to be held over until the legislation brought down last session is dealt with by the House.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: It has been said by the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) how well the company look after the interests of the shareholders. Certainly they do. Do they look after the interests of the public? What is happening to the public in this case? I want to call the right hon. the Prime Minister's attention to his argument that we are following the procedure of the United States in compelling the companies here to dismember as they compel them to dismember in the United States.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did not say that we were compelling them to dismember.

Mr. MACLEAN: No, but the point I am making is that in the United States, when they were compelled to dissolve, they were compelled to cancel the capitalization. There is no reduction taking place in the capitalization of the Canadian Pacific Railway and no claim that there is. The same old capitalization continues and the same old argument will be made that we have taken the assets out and left the capitalization. They will come to the railway committee and say: We have to pay a ten per cent dividend on $225,000,000 or whatever their stock is. When the ex-minister says that his object was to keep them in order, did he try to have the capitalization that would be represented by the separation cancelled? No, the capitalization keeps to the same amount and if you wish to protect the public interest you ought to compel the company to cancel the capitalization. The hon. member for Renfrew is willing to allow the Canadian Pacific Railway to continue to do what it likes with its capitalization. Does he know that it made another recent issue of stock and sold that stock for less than it was worth to its own shareholders? Does he justify that? There has been so much of that in the past that the public demand the control and regulation of capitalization. They demanded it so strongly that the Government conceded it and put it in a Bill introduced last session. It ought to be made law this session when this Bill is going through. Certainly we should take that up next session, or we should take it up now so that these two matters might be dealt with concurrently.

Mr. SAM. SHARPE: It looks as if the Canadian Pacific Railway, by this legislation, is anticipating the railway Bill that it is proposed to bring down next session regulating the issue of securities by new companies, and the placing of these issues under the control of the Railway Board. The hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane), the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham), and all the hon. members of this House who have supported this Bill, and who are against the amendment moved by my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean), place their opposition to that amendment on something that does not exist in fact; my hon. friend does not pretend that the amendment will accomplish the control of ocean freight rates. He does not pretend that his amendment will have any control over ocean freight rates, but he says it will control the issue of securities by railway companies, the very object that the railway Bill will accomplish when it goes into force. Hon. members who have opposed the amendment of my hon. friend have not dealt with the question of capitalization and the effect of increasing the capitalization of the Canadian Pacific Railway and its subsidiary companies. Assuming that the capitalization of the Canadian Pacific Railway at the present time is $300,000,000, including the railway, the railway tracks, lands, hotels and steamship companies, if this Parliament allows them to separate their assets into several companies, leaving the railway with the parent company, the capitalization will still remain at $300,000,000, a subsidiary land company might be formed with a capitalization of $150,000,000, a steamship company with a capitalization of $40,000,000 and a hotel company with a capitalization of $10,000,000, which will increase the capitalization by $200,000,000; so that instead of a total capitalization of $300,000,000, the Canadian Pacific Railway will have a capitalization of $500,000,000, without any increase in the value of the assets. That is what is going to happen under this legislation, and what my hon. friend from South York wants to do is exactly what is proposed to be done and there is the Bill which is promised next session. My hon. friend says: Do not press this Bill now before the House until next session, but if you do, put in this amendment so as to control the capitalization of the Canadian Pacific Railway. When this Bill was before the Railway Committee, the counsel of the Canadian Pacific Railway said that it was the intention that the stock in the subsidiary company was to be handed over to the Canadian Pacific Railway in return for the steamship. I asked him if they intended to divide that among the shareholders or to retain it in bulk in the treasury of the Canadian Pacific Railway. He said that it would remain in bulk in the treasury of the Canadian Pacific Railway. When it was proposed that it should be kept in the treasury of the company instead of being divided among the shareholders in the form of a melon-cutting, they would not accept an amendment to that effect. It looks as if they were evading and anticipating the principle of the amendment which the Minister of Railways and Canals desires to apply to all the railway companies in the country, viz., that the securities issued by railway companies shall be under the control of the Railway Commissioners. We would all have confidence in the ability, fairness and integrity of the Railway Board in dealing with applications for the issue of securities. They are not going to impose any unfair conditions upon the Canadian Pacific Railway or any other company, but they will take into consideration the circumstances in connection with each issue. The effect of this legislation will be to increase the capitalization of the Canadian Pacific Railway by $40,000,000 without increasing their assets one cent. It is not fair to the public who will have to pay rates, in addition to those now paid, sufficiently high to provide dividends for this increased capitalization.

On the preamble:

Mr. TURRIFF: I wish to move this amendment, of which I have given notice:

That the following clause be added to the Bill as clause 6:

That the freight rates charged by the company shall be subject to the approval of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada.

Amendment negatived.

Bill reported.

On the motion for the third reading of the Bill:

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN moved in amendment:

That the said Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be recommitted to the Committee of the Whole for the purposes of amending the same by inserting the following:

5a. The said transfer or sale of the company's said steam or other vessels above authorized shall be subject to such terms and conditions as may be imposed by the Board of Railway Commissioners and the company shall not invest in or guarantee the securities of the said Canadian Pacific Ocean Services, Limited, or any other corporation to which it may sell or transfer its said vessels without the leave of said Board of Railway Commissioners first had and obtained. And the Board may specify the purposes for which the proceeds arising from the sale or transfer of said boats by the Company may be used.

He said: I move this amendment for the reasons which I gave this afternoon in the committee.

Amendment negatived on division.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed.

Bill No. 20, respecting the Canadian Northern Railway Company—Mr. Bradbury—in committee.

Mr. LANCASTER: The only amendment made to this Bill is that we have stricken out the words "or near" where they occur, so as to make it sure as to the places where the railway shall go. We have inserted after the word "company" in the second line of section 2, "subject to the restriction in the routes herein contained"—the restriction simply being that we struck out the words "or near" wherever they appear.

Mr. GRAHAM: You are not making the road run like a rail fence?

Mr. LANCASTER: The intention is to make it run to places and not only near to places.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I suppose the chairman of the Railway Committee will have no objection to inserting a provision that this road shall be started within six months, the same as in the former Bill.

Mr. LANCASTER: I do not know that the conditions are the same. I said it a dozen times last session, and I said it two or three times this session, that where the change is made from two years to six months or any other period to commence the road, it is only done where a case has been made out for it. There was a good case made out to-day for limitation in a certain Bill. I want to say finally, and I hope people will understand me, that, so far as I am concerned, my understanding is that if the policy of the Railway Committee was changed last year it was not changed to any hard and fast rule as to time, but on the understanding that each Bill should be dealt with on its merits, and there is nothing inconsistent in making the period six months in one Bill and two years in another, if the facts justify it.

Mr. DOUGLAS: The railway from Strathcona to Calgary is included in the Bill and there are ten miles of that line built and graded and a bridge erected, but not an inch of steel has been laid. There has been no work done on it for four years, and the company is asking for an extension of time to five years in which to complete and two years in which to start work.

Mr. LANCASTER: They have commenced part of it.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Yes, they have graded ten miles and they have left it lying there for four years. There is more need for the six months' clause in this particular Bill than in any Bill I have known to come before this House.

Mr. LANCASTER: Why?

Mr. DOUGLAS: The Canadian Northern is a live corporation. This proposed line will be in competition with the Calgary and Edmonton Railway, and it has been promised to the people for a long time. The company actually started operations and then suddenly stopped, and now they are asking for two years in which to recommence.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Government are partners in the Canadian Northern, they own 49 per cent of the stock, and I think they should set a good example and begin work within six months.

Mr. BUCHANAN: I went on record this afternoon about these extensions of time to railways, and I would point out that this company is asking power to complete a line and put it in operation within five years, but there is nothing in this Bill as to when they shall commence. The Bill says:

Unless the Canadian Northern Railway Company, hereinafter called the "company", completes and puts in operation within five years after the passing of this Act, the following lines of railway, all of which have been partly constructed, the powers of construction conferred upon the company by Parliament shall cease and be null and void, as respects so much of the said lines as then remains uncompleted.

There is included in this Bill a line from Calgary to Lethbridge. There has been some work done on that line, but I do not think anything was done during the past year. I would like to have some guarantee that this company shall recommence construction at once. Five years is altogether too long a period to give them to complete the road. When the end of the five years approaches, the company will probably start to do some work and then they will come back to Parliament and ask for a further extension of time, and put up the argument that they have done something. There ought to be some guarantee given to the House and to the country as to when this company intends to start work on this line. The bonds on this particular line have been guaranteed by the province of Alberta. The province is anxious that construction should be commenced, and while I do not know the purport of the message the Premier of Alberta sent to the Minister of Railways about it, I think he made the statement that the money had been raised and is in the bank, ready for the Canadian Northern the moment they undertake construction of this particular line.

Mr. COCHRANE: You refer to that one piece of line?

Mr. BUCHANAN: Yes, I am speaking of the particular branch which affects my section of the country. I do not believe an extension of time over too long a period should be given to any company. I think there should be some guarantee given to Parliament that the construction of these lines should commence within at least a year, and especially the lines which have been guaranteed by provincial governments. This particular line, to which I am referring, was incorporated and the bonds guaranteed in 1909, and, although they have done some grading, I do not believe that any steel has yet been placed on any part of that road which has been under construction. While the financial conditions are bad this year, still there is money in the bank which the Canadian Northern can use in the construction of this particular line. I would like to have a statement from the Minister of Railways as to whether the Canadian Northern will be compelled to commence the construction of the lines, the bonds of which have been guaranteed by provincial governments.

Mr. COCHRANE: If with respect to any line or branch line included in this Bill, the bonds of which have been guaranteed by the Provincial Government and sold and the money in the bank, the hon. gentleman moves an amendment to cut the time for commencement down to a year, I would be inclined to support him.

Mr. TURRIFF: What proportion of the common stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company does the Government now own?

Mr. W. T. WHITE: 40 per cent.

Mr. TURRIFF: We have in this Bill a proposition from the Canadian Northern Railway Company to grant extension for five years to complete those branches that were commenced over five years ago and that had a certain amount of work done on them. The settlers along those lines are patiently waiting every year for the work to be completed and nothing is being done. As the Government is now owner to the extent of 40 per cent in the Canadian Northern Railway Company, if it does not see that the company goes on and completes those branches, it will certainly have to assume 40 per cent of the condemnation of the settlers of those particular parts of the country. With the Government owning such a large proportion of that stock, it is its bounden duty to see that something is done. There is absolutely no excuse for any railway company grading two or three miles of road, as was done in my part of the country a few years ago, in order to prevent another road from coming in, and then as soon as the other road is shut off, stopping work for five or six years. As the Government is the junior member of the Canadian Northern to the extent of 40 per cent, it should see that that kind of work is discontinued in the future, or it will have to assume the responsibility for it.

Mr. BUCHANAN: In connection with the line to which I was referring, I am prepared to move an amendment that construction be commenced within a period of one year and that the line be completed and placed in operation within three years.

Mr. COCHRANE: Is that part of the line guaranteed?

Mr. DOUGLAS: This line is guaranteed by the Alberta Government, and the Canadian Northern solicitor gave the Railway Committee the assurance that it was going on this year, so that this amendment will not counter their wishes.

Mr. COCHRANE: Have the bonds been sold and is the money in the bank?

Mr. DOUGLAS: A certain proportion of the money is in the bank.

The CHAIRMAN: I have to declare this amendment out of order, because no notice has been given of it.

Mr. COCHRANE: With the consent of the House it can be moved.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is no objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Buchanan moves an amendment:

That the following paragraph be added to clause (f): always provided that the railway line provided for in clause (f) shall be commenced within one year and put into operation within three years from the passage of this Act.

Mr. LANCASTER: If the House is unanimous, I am not objecting to this amendment, but I do not think that is the right way in which to bring about the amendment that the hon. gentleman wants. We have to look at the whole Bill. Section 2 reads:

Unless the Canadian Northern Railway Company, hereinafter called "The Company completes and puts in operation within five years after the passage of this Act the following lines of railway—

I think we would have to insert before (f) another section making what I have just said apply down as far as (f) and no farther, and then say that they may commence within one year and complete within five years this other railway. That is the proper way to make the legislation. Otherwise it will be very confusing, and it is not the usual way in which we pass such Bills.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not think the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Buchanan) will have any objection to the suggestion made by the Chairman of the Railway Committee. The amendment was drawn very hurriedly, and I am satisfied that in the way in which it was drawn it would be perfectly clear and intelligible because it is a rule of construction that an exception to a general clause always governs the general clause. It might, however, be better to arrange it as the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) suggests; that is, section 2 would go down to the end of clause (e); then before (f) make a new section 3, which would read as follows:

Unless the Canadian Northern Railway Company, hereinafter called "the Company", commences to construct within one year from the date thereof and completes and puts in operation within three years after the passing of this Act the following line of railway which is in course of construction, the powers of construction conferred upon the company by Parliament shall cease and be null and void as respects so much of the said line as remains uncompleted.

And then go on to (f). That might be more in accordance with the general policy of the drafting of the Bill. I am satisfied that the hon. member for Lethbridge will accept that suggestion.

Mr. LANCASTER: Is the hon. gentleman of opinion that we should mention here the time within which the line should be commenced?

[The Chairman.]

Mr. DOUGLAS: Yes, because work has been suspended for two or three years.

Mr. LANCASTER: But the line has been commenced.

Mr. BUCHANAN: They did some work in 1912 and probably some in 1913, but I am satisfied that nothing was done in 1914. They did do some grading a short distance out of the city of Calgary, but what I want to make sure of is that they will recommence construction.

Mr. LANCASTER: I submit this amendment for the approval of the Committee:

10 p.m.

That section 2 terminate at the end of subsection (e), and that the following be inserted as section 2a:

Unless the company commences to construct within one year and completes and puts in operation within three years after the passing of this Act the unfinished portion south of Calgary of the line of railway which the Alberta Midland Railway Company (since amalgamated with the company) was authorized to build by chapter 45 of the statutes of Alberta for 1909, as set out in paragraph 4 of the schedule of such Act, namely: From Calgary to the confluence of the Little Bow and Belly rivers, thence in a southwesterly direction to a point at Lethbridge, the powers of construction conferred upon the company by Parliament shall cease and be null and void as respects so much of the said line as then remains uncompleted.

Section amended accordingly, and, as amended, agreed to.

Bill reported.

Bill No. 29, respecting the Van Buren Bridge Company—Mr. Michaud—in committee.

Mr. PUGSLEY: When this Bill was before the Committee on a previous occasion I stated that Mr. Michaud, who was in charge of the Bill, was absent; but I think he expected to return to-day, and as the Government have taken Mondays after to-day I would not ask that the Bill stand over. The American legislation ratifies the mortgage as applied to the American side of the bridge, and this legislation ratifies it as applied to the Canadian side, so that the whole bridge is covered by the $250,000, which is not an excessive amount for a bridge of this character.

Mr. LANCASTER: In the Railway Committee we sat for some time past the hour of adjournment to oblige Mr. Michaud, who was anxious to go away but wished to have this put through. I understood that he wished me to have it put through the House in his absence.

Mr. HAZEN: There is no objection to the Bill passing.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

Bill No. 58, respecting the Casualty Company of Canada—Mr. Macdonell—in committee.

On section 3—section 7, chapter 63, statutes 1911, enacted by section 4 of chapter 100, statutes, 1913, repealed:

Mr. GRAHAM: What does section 4 mean?

Mr. W. T. WHITE: In the absence of the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Macdonell), in whose name the Bill stands, I might explain that the company has changed its original plan. When the Act of 1913 was passed the company intended to carry on the business of accident and sickness insurance. It now proposes to go ahead with a more limited programme for the present, and it has asked for a change whereby it shall be permitted to commence the business of plate glass insurance when it has $50,000 of capital subscribed and $15,000 paid up and to continue to add to its business as provided in section 3 and in accordance with the terms of this Act. The insurance department is quite satisfied that the amount of subscribed capital in each case is sufficient for the class of business to which it relates.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

The following Bills were considered in committee, reported, read the third time, and passed, without discussion:

Bill No. 53, to incorporate the Marcil Trust Company.—Mr. Marcil.

Bill No. 59, respecting The Empire Life Insurance Company, of Canada.—Mr. Macdonell.

Bill No. 43, respecting The Huron and Erie Loan and Savings Company, and to change its name to The Huron and Erie Mortgage Corporation.—Mr. Marshall.

QUESTIONS.

[Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.]

EMPLOYMENT OF T. A. ANDERSON.

Mr. W. M. MARTIN:

1. Has T. A. Anderson been employed by the Department of the Interior at any time during the years 1912, 1913 1914 and 1915?
2. Is he still so employed?
3. What was the date of his appointment, in what capacity is he employed and what is his salary or remuneration?

Mr. ROCHE: As far as the Department of the Interior is concerned, no.

PRINCE ALBERT PROPERTY PURCHASE.

Mr. W. M. MARTIN:

1. What properties have been acquired by the Department of Public Works in the city of Prince Albert since January 1, 1912?
2. From whom were such properties acquired?
3. What was the total price, and the price per foot in each case?
4. For what purpose were such properties acquired?
5. What was the date of each purchase?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. None by the Department of Public Works.

2, 3, 4 and 5. Answered by No. 1.

MOOSEJAW PROPERTY PURCHASES.

Mr. W. M. MARTIN:

1. What properties have been acquired by the Department of Public Works in the city of Moosejaw since the first of January, 1912?
2. What was the total price paid, and the price per foot paid, for each of such properties?
3. For what purpose was each property acquired?
4. From whom were such properties acquired?
5. What was the date of each purchase?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Lots 21, 22 and 23, block 122.
2. $22,000, or about $2.35 a square foot.
3. For Immigration hall.

WAR SUPPLIES—CANVAS SHOES.

*Mr. MURPHY:

Referring to the purchase of 95,000 pairs of canvas shoes at a cost of $190,000, as set out on pages 58, 59 and 60 of the memoranda respecting work of the Department of Militia and Defence, European war, 1914-15, as follows:

	Pairs.	Price per pair.
Ames, Holden, McCready.	36,500	$2 00
Tetreau Shoe Manufacturing Co.	36,500	2 00
Louis Gauthier Co.	22,000	2 00

And to the further purchase of 45,000 pairs of canvas shoes at a cost of $90,000 as stated by the Minister of Militia and Defence in his reply to a question reported on page 419 of unrevised Hansard for 1915, as follows:

Names of Contractors.	No. ordered.	Price per pair.
Cook and Fitzgerald.	5,000	$2 00
Dufresne and Galipeau.	5,000	2 00
Dufresne and Locke.	10,000	2 00
Jas. Muir Co.	10,000	2 00
Brandon Shoe Co.	5,000	2 00
Regal Shoe Co.	5,000	2 00
E. T. Wright Co.	5,000	2 00

1. Were the 95,000 pairs of canvas shoes supplied the officers and soldiers of the first contingent?

4. If they are still in the Government stores, when, and to whom, will they be issued?
5. Have any more canvas shoes been ordered in addition to those above mentioned? If so, how many pairs?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. The quantity supplied to troops of the 1st Division, Canadian Expeditionary Force, was 75,000—not 95,000; the two items of 10,000 pairs each given on page 60 of the memoranda respecting work of the Department of Militia and Defence, European War, 1914-15, being a clerical error, and a duplication of two items of 10,000 each on page 59 of the same memoranda.

Canvas shoes were supplied to all non-commissioned officers and men of the 1st Division.

2. Of the balance, a proportion were sent to Salisbury, and the remainder were held in Ordnance charge for distribution to non-commissioned officers and men of the 1st Division, and for various drafts for Overseas.

1. Yes.

2. Messrs. Keever, Mackay & Moore. Average price paid, $171.09.

3. The principal veterinary officer for Canada and his assistants.

OTTAWA-HULL POSTAL RATE.

Mr. DEVLIN:

Is it the intention of the Government to establish a rate of one cent upon letters between Ottawa and Hull? If not, why not?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Ottawa and Hull are separate cities, and are, moreover, situated in different provinces. A drop letter is one that is posted and delivered in the same office and to have it otherwise would necessarily lead to an increase in the rate, as the department could not afford to carry letters from one office to another at a one-cent rate per ounce. If such were the case there would be no object in maintaining a two-cent rate per ounce for letters. If this privilege were given between Hull and Ottawa, it could not be withheld from all other places in Canada. To carry letters in Canada at the one-cent rate per ounce, in view of its long distances and sparse population, is not at present a possibility.

OTTAWA AND HULL TOWN PLANNING COMMISSION.

Mr. DEVLIN:

1. Has a commission been formed to prepare plans relating to the cities of Ottawa and Hull?

2. What is the salary, if any, of the commissioners?

3. What was the date of appointment of said commission?

4. What amount has been expended for the said commission by the Federal Government?

5. What amount, if any, has each of the cities of Ottawa and Hull contributed toward expenses of said commission?

6. Has said commission prepared any plan of improvement for said cities of Ottawa and Hull?

7. If so, has such plan been submitted to the Government?

8. If not, what is the cause of the delay?

Mr. W. T. WHITE:

1. Yes.

2. No salary.

3. Commission was appointed by Order in Council of September 12, 1913.

4. $57,724.65.

5. No amount has as yet been received on this account. Under the terms of the Order in Council of September 12, one-half of the cost is payable by the cities named jointly and rateably according to population.

6. Final plans have not yet been submitted.

7 and 8. The report of the commission is almost completed, and will, it is expected, with the final plans, be ready for presentation to Parliament before the close of the present session.

WALLACEBURG CUSTOMS OFFICER.

Mr. GORDON:

1. What salary did the customs officer at Wallaceburg get during the last four years of the Liberal Government?

2. What does the present officer get?

2. $1,400.

3. Yes. D. F. Johnson, $850. R. D. Purser, $850.

4. 1906-7 $10,182.22, 1907-8 $125,161.39, 1908-9 $244,213.26, 1909-10 $231,957.64, 1910-11 $269,539.72, 1911-12 $275,490.68, 1912-13 $316,481.70, 1913-14 $361,992.75.

5. $15 per month.

LEVIS DRY DOCK.

Mr. BOIVIN:

1. Did the Government call for tenders for the building of the dry dock at or near Lévis, Quebec?
2. How many firms submitted tenders and what are their names?
3. To whom was the contract given?
4. At what price, and upon what conditions?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Yes.

2. Six: M. P. and J. T. Davis, O'Brien and Doheny, Sir John Jackson, Holbrook, Cabot and Rollins, The Sherman Salter Company, Laurin and Leitch.

3. Contract was awarded to the lowest tenderer: Messrs. M. P. and J. T. Davis.

4. (a) Schedule prices which amount, approximately, to $2,721,116. (b) The ordinary conditions governing regular contracts, with date of completion 17th July, 1916.

5. Where were deliveries made?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. In 1913, 151 tons; in 1914, 91 tons.

2. The total cost of operation in 1913 was $19,450.18. 151 tons of scrap and 15,272 gallons of oil were produced.

The total cost of operation in 1914 was $16,058.38. Ninety-one tons and 7,072 gallons of oil were produced.

3. Otherwise.

4. In 1913 it was sold to A. N. Whitman, Halifax, at $32 per ton f.o.b. works.

In 1914 it was sold to the farmers and the United Fruit Growers Association at $20 per ton f.o.b. works.

5. Answered by No. 4.

Mr. LAW:

1. How many tons of fertilizer were manufactured at the Clark's harbour fish reduction plant during the years 1913 and 1914, respectively?
2. What was the cost of same per ton?
3. Was it sold by tender or otherwise?
4. To whom was it sold and at what prices?
5. Was it sold delivered at any point or f.ob. plant?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. In 1913, 98 tons; in 1914, 81 tons.

2. The total cost of operation in 1913 was $11,121.36. Ninety-eight tons of scrap and 3,480 gallons of oil were produced. In 1914 the total cost of operation was $10,137.74. Eighty-one tons of scrap and 4,868 gallons of oil were produced.

3. Otherwise.

4. To farmers at $20 per ton f.o.b. works.

5. Answered by No. 4.

WAR SUPPLIES—BICYCLES.

Mr. PUGSLEY:

1. How many bicycles were purchased for use by the first overseas contingent?
2. From what persons or firms were they purchased?
3. What was the price paid for each?

Mr. HAZEN: 450 bicycles, military pattern, were supplied by the Canada Cycle and Motor Co. of Toronto at $62 each.

EMPLOYMENT OF A. GENEST.

Mr. McCRAE:

1. Is A. Genest an employee of the Post Office department at Sherbrooke?
2. If so, what are his duties, and at what salary?
3. Has he been constantly at work?
4. If he has been off on leave of absence, how long, and for what cause?

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. A. Genest is an employee of the Sherbrooke post office.

2. He is a first-class clerk, grade A, with salary at the rate of $1,600 a year.

3. The records show that Mr. Genest has reported for duty each day, but on account of the disease from which he suffers, he has not been able to work the regular hours of duty.

4. Absences from duty on account of illness—pulmonary tuberculosis: 1903, 31st March, 1 day, with pay; 4th to 12th April, 9 days; 1904—15th March, 1 day; 1905—10th June, 1 day; 1906—27th December, 1 day; 31st December, 1 day; 1907—1st to 14th January, 14 days; 20th January to 25th March, 65 days; 30th December, ½ day; 1909—9th and 10th February, 2 days; 20th to 25th April, 6 days; 1912—23rd March, 1 day; 1912-13—9th May, 1912 to 8th May, 1913, 1 year; 1913, 9th May to 14th October, 159 days, without pay. Mr. ROCHE:

1. Total area of school lands sold in the province of Saskatchewan in each of the years 1912, 1913 and 1914, is as follows: 1912, 103,707·01 acres; 1913, 661·38 acres; 1914, 597·48 acres. Total, 104,965·87 acres.

2. Average price at which the lands were sold: 1912, $19.30; 1913, $25.33; 1914, $16.35.

In addition to the above there was also realized from the sale of town lots in 1913, $9,757.

[Mr. Casgrain.]

EMPLOYMENT OF W. W. DAVIDSON.

Mr. W. M. MARTIN:

1. Has W. W. Davidson, of Moosejaw, been in the employ of the Department of the Interior at any time during the years 1912, 1913, 1914 and 1915?
2. If so, what was the date of his appointment?
3. In what capacity is he employed, and what is his salary or remuneration?

Mr. ROCHE: In so far as the Immigration Branch is concerned,

1. Yes.
2. September 1, 1914.
3. Relief supervisor; $150 per month.

ICL. RY. LUMBER CONTRACTS.

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Is Alex. Pratt or I. P. A. Pratt, of Matapedia or Sellarville, Quebec, saving lumber for shims, tops and bottoms of cars for the Intercolonial railway?
2. If so, is the work done under contract, and what prices are paid?
3. If under contract, were tenders publicly called for, and at what date?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. Yes. P. R. and A. Pratt, of Matapedia, P.Q.

2. Yes At the following prices:

Shims, 7 inches wide by 12 inches long—¼-inch, $3.65 per 1,000 f.o.b. Matapedia; ½-inch, $7.30 per 1,000 f.o.b., Matapedia.

Shims 3 inches by 7 inches by 7 feet—$245 per 1,000 f.o.b. cars, Matapedia.

Shims 7 inches wide by 24 inches long—1½-inch, $43.75 per 1,000 f.o.b. cars, Dawson Siding; 1¼-inch, $51.02; 2-inch, $58.32; 2¼-inch, $65.65; 2½-inch, $72.90; 2¾-inch, 80.22.

For spruce for car decking, $16 per M. ft., b.m., delivered f.o.b. cars, Dawson Siding, near Matapedia.

3. For shims: Yes, on 23rd October, 1914. For spruce: On December 29th, 1914.

MATAPEDIA WATER SUPPLY.

Mr. MARCIL:

Has an agreement been arrived at between the municipality of Matapedia, Quebec, or any party there, and the Department of Railways and Canals, regarding a supply of water for fire protection or domestic purposes, and what is the nature of the agreement?

Mr. COCHRANE: It is proposed to grant, by way of a lease "during pleasure," to Alexander Pratt, Lynch Dube and Cie., Robert Ferguson, John A. Robertson, John A. Ryan, Thomas V. Woodman, Sarah Smith and S. M. Adams, of Matapedia, P.Q., unincorporated, but known under the name of the Matapedia Water Supply Company, about one million gallons of water per annum at six cents per thousand gallons, for water supply and fire protection at that place. This lease has not yet been executed.

LETHBRIDGE POSTMASTERSHIP.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. What was the reason for the dismissal of Edward N. Higinbotham, as postmaster at Lethbridge, Alberta?
2. Was an investigation asked for?
3. Was an investigation held?
4. If so, what was the result of the investigation?

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. On the 23rd September, 1914, the departmental officers were instructed by the Postmaster General that as soon as the Lethbridge public building was ready for occupation it was the intention to appoint a new postmaster, and the Superintendent was requested to keep in touch with the progress made, and as soon as it was ready for the department to take possession to inform the Postmaster General so that the change could be made without delay. This was done in accordance with instructions, and the Post Office Inspector, on the 9th October, was instructed to make the change.

2. In a petition in favour of the late postmaster, which was received at the department in November last, it was suggested that an investigation should be made, but the appointment to the postmastership and the transfer of the post office to the new incumbent had already been made.

3. No.

4. See answer to No. 3.

ICL. RY. COAL SUPPLY.

Mr. WM. CHISHOLM:

1. Has the Railway Department called for tenders for coal for the Intercolonial?
2. If not, when will tenders likely be called?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. No.

2. Date not yet settled.

EXPORT OF CANADIAN HORSES.

Mr. TOBIN:

Has an Order in Council been passed prohibiting the sale and export to the United States of Canadian bred horses from four to eleven years old? If so, when was such Order in Council passed?

Mr. J. D. REID: An Order in Council was passed on August 7, 1914, which prohibits exports to any place other than the United Kingdom or any British possession of "Saddle, draught and pack animals, suitable for use in war."

QUEBEC RURAL MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Have any rural mail routes been established in Bonaventure, Gaspé and Rimouski counties?
2. If so, where are these routes situated in each county?
3. What is the cost of each service, and were tenders called for?
4. Did the Department refuse to establish any routes? If so, where, why and when?

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. No.

2. See answer to No. 1.

3. Although no routes have been established, tenders were called for a proposed route from St. Fabien, County Rimouski, and contract was awarded on January 27, 1915, at the rate of $700 per annum; but as the necessary fifty per cent of the eligible residents failed to subscribe for boxes, the route could not be put into operation. Tenders were also called for in February, 1914, for a proposed route from New Richmond Station No. 1, County Bonaventure, but were excessive.

4. Yes. In the case of St. Fabien proposed route, fifty per cent of the eligible residents have not yet remitted payment for their boxes as above mentioned, and until they do the regulations prohibit the inauguration of the service. In the case of the New Richmond Station proposed route, all offers for the performance of this service have been too high, and until a reasonable offer is received the Department will not establish the service.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden, the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

Tuesday, March 9, 1915.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES FOR 1914-15.

A message from His Royal Highness the Governor General, transmitting Supplementary Estimates for the year ending March 31, 1915, was presented by Hon. W. T. White (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the House, and referred to the Committee of Supply.

UNITED STATES POTATO EMBARGO.

On the Order of the Day being called:

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Customs): When the Orders of the Day were called yesterday, I explained to the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell), that I had instructed the Deputy Minister of Agriculture to send a special inspector to Washington to investigate the claims made by the American officials with regard to the potatoes condemned at Boston. I discussed the matter with the Deputy Minister of Agriculture this morning and I find that the potatoes, after being condemned, were immediately purchased by some person in Boston and at once shipped to Cuba; so that when our inspector arrived at Boston to make his investigation the potatoes were not to be found. Mr. O'Halloran, the deputy minister, tells me that the potatoes were inspected by two United States federal inspectors. They condemned the potatoes. They sent samples to Washington and the report of Mr. Orton, the plant pathologist of the Department of Agriculture in Washington confirmed their report. It was on this confirmation of their report that the potatoes were condemned. Mr. O'Halloran tells me that they are endeavouring to get samples of potatoes from Cuba, the country to which they were shipped, and when they succeed in getting the samples we will be able to give a further report.

CANADIAN TROOPS IN ENGLAND.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I would like to inform the House that additional information has been received that the troops numbering about 4,000, who were despatched some time ago, have reached Great Britain in safety; that they are stationed at different points, where very suitable accomodation has been provided for them, and that they are all in good health and spririts.

[Mr. Speaker.]

NAMES OF ENLISTED CANADIANS.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I desire to ask the Government when we may expect the publication of the names of those who have enlisted, including those who have already gone to the front as well as those who are in Canada. It is a matter of a good deal of interest to many people in Canada, and if the list could be issued in parts it would be of great advantage to the public.

Major General HUGHES: A great many of the lists are ready now, but we are waiting until they are completed before issuing them. I had expected that they would have been ready before this, but the Printing Bureau is pretty well loaded up with work. We will press the matter forward as rapidly as possible.

THE BUDGET.

PROPOSED WAR TAXATION.

Consideration of the proposed motion of Hon. W. T. White (Minister of Finance) for the Committee of Ways and Means, resumed from March 5.

Mr. G. H. BRADBURY (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, when the House rose on Friday night I was drawing attention to the criticisms offered by the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) and the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley). I had remarked upon the temerity of the hon. junior member for Halifax for having challenged this side of the House in the matter of implementing its pre-election pledges. I think that a party with such an unsavory reputation as far as its pre-election pledges are concerned ought to hesitate before making any such statement as that which was uttered by the hon. junior member for Halifax. I also criticised the attitude taken by the hon. junior member for Halifax regarding the cutting down of the Estimates for public works; and I wish to quote his words now, and when I do, perhaps what I said on Friday night will be better understood. Speaking of the Estimates of the Public Works Department, the hon. junior member for Halifax said:

> Can the Minister of Public Works himself submit to the House any fair defence for his request to Parliament to vote practically $20,000,000 for public works expenditure in 1914-15? I do submit, and in fairness, I think, having in view the circumstances prevailing throughout Canada this year, and throughout the world for that matter, that instead of the Government's asking for an expenditure of $20,000,000 for public works, they might have asked for $10,000,000 or less, and, if need be, they might have wiped out altogether expenditures for public works for the next fiscal year. I do not believe that the people of any province of Canada would have objected to the most drastic measures on the part of the Minister of Public Works during the present year and during the next fiscal year in connection with public works expenditure. Many of these projected works were without justification, the necessity for others have at least temporarily passed away by reason of the declining business of the country. Expenditures for these purposes should have been reduced to the minimum this year and next year.

The hon. member for St. John, taking the lead from the hon. junior member for Halifax, followed along the same lines. He had been advising my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) to cut down the expenditure on public works. The minister asked him across the floor of the House if he would be willing to have the Estimates cut down for his own county, and his reply was:

I would not be worthy of my position as a member of this House if I did not answer "Yes" to that question. I would not be worthy of the confidence of the people of my constituency if I were so cowardly that I would not dare to stand up in my place and give an answer to that question in the affirmative. Therefore I say that in these times of stress and trouble the amount proposed for St. John harbour of $1,500,000 might very well be cut down during this year to $750,000. The work could go on, and a great deal of work could be done for that money.

When he was making these observations, I interjected a question across the floor of the House, asking him if it was not wise for the Government of this country to spend money when times were hard to provide work for the working people of this country. His answer was:

That is right, if you have the money in the Treasury. But is this the time to tax the people of this country, when, as I have said every dollar, every cent, they can spare is being given to charity.

Right here I want to emphasize what I said on Friday night. The artisans and working people of this country are a self-reliant, independent class of people. They are not looking for charity, they do not wish to be pauperized, they want to be provided with work, and it would be an unpatriotic act of this Government, or of any provincial government, or of the authorities in any city in Canada, to follow the advice given by the hon. member for St. John, to reduce their expenditure on public works at this time, if they could possibly secure the money to go on with these works. A more unpatriotic position could not be taken by hon. gentlemen representing great cities, such as Halifax and St. John, which cities must have thousands of men out of employment, than to ask the Government not only to cut the Estimates, but if necessary to eliminate them altogether and to stop all public works. What position do these hon. gentlemen occupy in connection with the great organs that represent them in this country? I find on looking over the files that the Toronto Globe discusses this matter. The Globe is the mouthpiece of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House; in fact, its editor is looked upon as the outside leader. When there is any trouble in this House, we generally find the editor of the Globe—

An hon. MEMBER: Reverend.

Mr. BRADBURY: The reverend editor of the Globe sitting in the gallery encouraging hon. gentlemen by his smiles, and perhaps even by his enthusiastic applause. Therefore I think I can refer to him as the outside leader, without being offensive. Here is what he said on the 10th of last month. The editorial is headed: "When to Spend Public Money," and is as follows:

The time to spend public money freely is when private enterprise is on the ebb. If governments and public bodies enter upon huge programmes of public works when a building boom and a rush of railway construction are in progress the inevitable result is to attract to the country far more workers than it can provide employment for under normal conditions, and so to intensify the depression which follows boom conditions.

This is precisely what is happening in Canada today. The estimates introduced by the Minister of Finance make provision for carrying on public works begun in former years, but the financial situation is so difficult that practically no new works are to be begun during 1915 at the very time when the need for employment is greater than ever before in the experience of the building trades throughout Canadian cities.

It would be peanut politics to attempt to make party capital out of the situation. No Government in Canada, Liberal or Conservative, has ever deliberately curtailed expenditures upon public works in good times so that it might more freely provide employment during seasons of depression. In all probability this failure to take thought of the morrow has been the result of the belief of politicians that hard times dog their opponents only, and that the remedy may well be left for their opponents' consideration. The interests of the nation should be placed above party, however, and the Globe would like to see a healthy growth of public opinion in favour of husbanding the resources of the Dominion, the provinces, and the municipalities in boom periods so that public works may be undertaken at seasons of the greatest need. The work carried forward at such seasons would be done more cheaply and more thoroughly than under conditions of abnormal activity and would render unnecessary the spending of vast sums on maintaining willing workmen in idleness. . . .

There are many organizations engaged in the study of social conditions—Conservation Commissions, Unemployment Commissions, Social Service Commissions. They could do nothing more calculated to fill up the valleys of depression than to secure that public employment shall be at the minimum in Canada when private employment is at the maximum, and that the stress of hard times should be lessened by the construction of public works during seasons of depression.

And yet, in the face of this pronouncement by the Globe, hon. gentlemen opposite are endeavouring to induce this Government to lessen its expenditure and to reduce work in this country to a minimum, thereby throwing tens of thousands of Canadians out of employment. The reverend gentleman who wrote that article described the conduct of hon. gentlemen opposite as "peanut politics," and I commend that description to them. No more unpatriotic move could be made by any man or body of men in Canada than to endeavour to induce municipalities or governments to curtail expenditure in these trying times. I believe it to be the duty of every great city, every municipality, and every government in Canada, to spend every dollar they honestly can on legitimate works, for the purpose of providing labour for our people. We cannot afford to lower the standard of our workingmen, by making them subjects for charity.

I wish Mr. Speaker, to devote a little time to making a comparison between the records of hon. gentlemen who occupy so serenely the Opposition benches to-day, when they were in power with the record of the Conservative Government now in office. The junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) had the temerity to chide the Conservative party for having violated its pre-election pledges. I wonder where the Liberal party stands in that respect. Let me refer to some of the promises made by the Liberal party before they came into power in 1896, and how well they implemented them. It will be remembered that just previous to the election of 1896, and many of us are old enough to remember that campaign, these hon. gentlemen, having been for eighteen long years in the cold shades of opposition, travelled throughout Canada and in every city, every village, and every concession, preached to the farmers the doctrine of discontent, trying to make them believe that they were the men who were paying the taxes and were being bled white by this awful protective tariff, and promising what they would do to relieve the situation if they came to office. I quote from one of the planks in the Liberal platform of 1893:

We cannot but view with alarm the large increase in the public debt and the controllable annual expenditure of the Dominion; we demand the strictest economy in the administration of the government of the country.

That is an admirable declaration for a political platform, and one which if lived up to would have redounded to the credit of the Liberal party. But what was their record when they came to power? In 1896, when the Liberals assumed office, the public accounts show that the national debt of Canada stood at $258,000,000, and in 1911, when they went out of office, they had managed, not to decrease the national debt, but to increase it to $340,000,000, or an increase of $82,000,000 during the fifteen years they were in power. But that does not tell one-half the tale. The Conservative Government had been in office for eighteen years, and it had laid the foundation of Canada's greatness, so that prosperity was in full tide when the Liberals came to power, and with a buoyant revenue the Liberal party that was pledged to reduce taxation and expenditure took out of the pockets of the taxpayers of this country, in the ten years immediately preceding their defeat in 1911, $311,486,000 more than the Conservative party took in any ten years previous to 1896. Therefore, when you add this to the $82,000,000 of national debt, which they heaped upon this country, you can form some idea of the manner in which the Liberals implemented their pledge of economy to the people of Canada. I believe the Liberals never intended to carry out that pledge; it is quite clear to-day that the pledge was made to catch votes, and in that they succeeded. But the Liberal party stands before this country guilty of having violated every pledge they gave to the people of Canada previous to 1896. But that is not all. These gentlemen opposite have now the temerity to charge the Conservative Government with having increased the public debt since it came into office. True, this Government has increased the public debt, but let us see why. I find, on looking over the official returns, that on the 31st of March, 1912, the first year the present Government was responsible for the expenditure, the public debt stood at $339,919,460, and on the 28th of February just past, the debt had risen to $401,891,909, or an increase of $61,972,000 in the last three years.

But, Mr. Speaker, how was this debt increased and what was the cause of the increase? The increased debt under the Conservative Government, was incurred entirely for the purpose of taking care of liabilities left to it by the Liberal party when it went out of office. It was a legacy, Sir, left to this Government, and this Government was in honour obliged to accept it and provide for it. I shall give to the House a statement of what it has cost this Government to care for some of the undertakings that the Liberal Government rushed into so recklessly, previous to their defeat in 1911. In order to care for these liabilities left them by the Liberals, it was necessary to provide no less a sum than $178,000,000. For the fiscal years 1912-13 and 1914-15 we find the following expenditures on works which were in progress when the present Government came to power; on the National Transcontinental railway which was undertaken by the Liberal Government against the advice of the Conservative party; the present Government expended $56,000,000, and on the Hudson Bay railway $9,000,000.

Mr. W. M. MARTIN: Does the hon. gentleman object to the construction of the Hudson Bay railway?

Mr. BRADBURY: I will answer that question in a minute or two. On the Quebec bridge, which was undertaken by the Liberal Government, the present Government was obliged to spend $10,000,000. It is a monument to the shame of the late Government that a great undertaking like the Quebec bridge should have been permitted to be placed in the hands of incompetent men, and that it should have cost not only the loss of $6,000,000 to the people of Canada, but the loss of 80 lives of our citizens through the neglect of the men constructing and managing that bridge. That makes a total of $75,000,000.

Then there was the implementing clause in connection with the sale of G.T.P. bonds. The bungling finance of the late Government necessitated the providing of $4,994,416 to pay the difference between the price at which the bonds were sold and their par value. This was something to which the late Government committed this country through incompetence or something worse.

Then, there was the caring for the balance of the issue of £14,000,000. Six million eight hundred thousand pounds of Grand Trunk Pacific bonds had to be provided for. The present Minister of Finance, in order to save the country an additional loss of $6,000,000 or $8,000,000 or $10,000,000, took up the bonds at par, and paid $33,093,333. Therefore since coming into office this Government has had to provide these enormous sums in order to pay the liabilities left on the hands of this country by the late Administration. Mr. Speaker, had it not been for these liabilities which the Government had to meet, had it not been for the war, the national debt of this country would not have been increased by one dollar. In fact, it could very easily have been reduced, and would have been reduced. This, Sir, is my answer to hon. gentlemen opposite who try to make capital out of the fact that the national debt of this country has been increased by the present Government.

How do our hon. friends opposite stand in regard to the pledge which they gave to the people in 1896 to reduce the national expenditure of this country? They stand on that count just as they stand on every one of the pledges which they gave to the people previous to 1896. Every pledge that they gave was ignored and violated by the Liberal party. The people of this country at length awoke to a realization of the class of men who were in control of the destiny of this country up to 1911.

These hon. gentlemen who are criticising the public expenditures of to-day, who are advising the Government to curtail them, are on record as having promised the people that, if they were returned to power in 1896, they would reduce the public expenditure of the country, although at that time it was very small in comparison with what it has reached at the present time. In 1896, one of their pledges was:

> We cannot but view with alarm the large increase of the public debt, and the controllable annual expenditure of the Dominion, and the consequent undue taxation of the people under the governments that have been continuously in power since 1878.

The Conservative party had been in power since 1878, and that was what was worrying the Liberal party.

> We demand strict economy in the administration of this country.

The right hon. gentleman who to-day leads the Opposition made this pledge:

> If we get into power, we will follow the example of Mr. Mackenzie; and say that, although we may not be able to bring the expenditures to what they were under him, we can reduce the amount two, yes, three millions of dollars per year.

Then there was the pledge of the late Minister of Finance, Sir Richard Cartwright:

> For my own part I do not hesitate to tell him that I consider a yearly expenditure of $40,000,000 or $38,000,000 altogether too large for the present resources of Canada. I say, it is a disgrace and a shame to the Government that have been entrusted with our affairs that they come down to us and ask for an expenditure of $38,000,000 a year for federal purposes. Sir, the thing is utterly unjustifiable.

I could go on reading pledge after pledge made by these hon. gentlemen to reduce the public expenditures of this country. I hold, Mr. Speaker, that a public pledge given by party leaders to the people of this country on the verge of an election is just as sacred and should be lived up to just as carefully and as scrupulously as a promise or pledge given in any business transaction.

But what has been the record of hon. gentlemen opposite on this question? In 1897, the first year in which the right hon. gentleman who to-day leads the Opposition, was responsible to the people in this country, the current expenditure was $38,349,760. That is the amount at which the right hon. gentleman found the expenditures of the country when he took office. The capital expenditure was $3,523,000, which makes a total of $41,872,760. In 1902, five years afterwards, the Liberal Administration, with its promise to the people to reduce expenditures still warm on its lips, had increased the current expenditure to $50,759,392, and the capital expenditure to $10,078,638 or the total to $60,838,030. The expenditures still kept going up until 1911. It was a growing time, and the Liberal party was spending the people's money like a drunken sailor throwing away his money recklessly. In 1911 the current expenditure had risen to $87,000,000, and the capital expenditure to $35,000,000, or to a total of $122,000,000. But in 1912, the current expenditure for which the late Government was responsible, had risen to $109,000,000, and the capital expenditure to $46,000,000, or to the total of $155,000,000. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite criticise Conservative ministers for having brought down an estimated current expenditure for this year of $140,000,000. This is the record of the Liberal party as to the manner in which it has implemented its pledge to reduce the expenditures of this country.

I would like for a moment to draw the attention of the House to the percentage of increase in expenditure. The total disbursements under the late Government increased by 178 per cent in the fifteen years it was in office. The increase per head was 85 per cent. Let me give a ten-year record, which is worth placing on Hansard. The ten-year record of expenditure under the Conservative party previous to 1896 shows that it had expended on public works in this country $423,358,000; whereas the late Government, pledged to reduce the expenditures, during the ten years after it had come into office, had spent $919,748,517, or an increase of $496,390,517. The per capita expenditure in 1896 was $8.80, and in 1911, $16.40, just double what they found it on assuming office.

This is the record of the Liberal party, showing how it implemented its pledge that if returned to office it would reduce the public expenditures. I do not know that I should have taken up even a moment of the time of the House in reviewing this question—for the people are thoroughly conversant with it—had it not been for the taunt thrown across the floor, the charge made that the party now in power deserves censure for not having implemented its pre-election pledges.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The hon. gentleman has not attempted to answer that.

Mr. BRADBURY: I have answered it by denying it, and by showing that hon. gentlemen opposite cannot prove it. The onus of proof lies upon the hon. members who made the charge.

Mr. MACLEAN: You have answered it simply by referring to the pre-election pledges of hon. gentlemen on this side a quarter of a century ago.

Mr. BRADBURY: These pledges given a quarter of a century ago were given by the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who still leads that party. And I hope he will live long to lead it. He is still with us and is still responsible for the policy of the Liberal party.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. BRADBURY: I find that these hon. gentlemen have a record on the question of the tariff. They went up and down this country for years denouncing protection. And I will read just one or two of their pledges, for it will be of interest to the younger members on the other side of the House, who do not know what their friends were committed to in days gone by. Sir Richard Cartwright said:

> I say our protective system was a huge mistake in so far as it was honest at all; and in so far as it was not honest, it was a huge scheme of robbery. . . Their ideal is protection; ours is free trade. We will never desist until this country is freed from the incubus that has been weighing it down for fifteen long years.

The right hon. leader of the Opposition spoke in the city of Winnipeg on one of his western tours. I remember well his coming to my own constituency, and speaking in the town of Selkirk, bringing with him the late Hon. D. C. Fraser, then member of this House for Guysborough; and I remember very well that at this meeting this is what he said:

> The people of this country, the inhabitants of the city of Winnipeg especially, are toiling for a master who takes away a very large portion of your earnings, the earnings for which you toil and sweat for privileged masters, for those who use protection which I claim is bondage. If the Government take away from you any portion of your earnings, be they large or small, to give them to somebody else, that Government is as much a robber towards you as is the highwayman who puts a pistol to your head and says: your purse or your life. I denounce this policy of protection. Protection cannot be defended on any fair principle.

I also wish to call the attention of the House—because it affects my own province—to the utterance on behalf of the Liberal party of that day, by a leading member of the Liberal Government and the pledge he made to the people of the West:

> Return us to power, and we will give you free trade as they have it in England. That is the Liberal policy. We will no longer tolerate the policy of the Conservatives which robs you for the benefit of a handful of manufacturers. We will at once and for ever wipe off the statute book the villainous protection policy which has stunted the prosperity of the whole country and taken the heart's blood out of the people of Manitoba. Free coal oil, free clothing, and free implements you will have if the Liberal party are returned to power.

This is the statement of Hon. Mr. (now Sir Clifford) Sifton, a man who was the right-hand man of the present leader of the Opposition when at the head of the Government, and the strongest of his ministers from the West; in fact, he was known as the dictator of the Liberal policy; and this is the pledge he gave, speaking for his party. And what did they do when they came into power? One of the first things, Mr. Speaker, was to take into the Senate two of the greatest sinners, perhaps, so far as the West is concerned—Sir Melvin Jones and Hon. Mr. Frost. That is the way they carried out their pledge to give the farmers free implements. And for long years they did not even touch the duty on farm implements. At length they made up their minds that they must do something, that the farmers of the West could not be fooled all the time, and on the eve of an election they reduced the tariff on agricultural implements from 20 per cent, where the Conservative Government had left it, to 17½ per cent. And the farmers were told by Sir Clifford Sifton that 17½ per cent was only a revenue tariff. This is the manner in which they fooled the farmers of the West into supporting them. They managed for fifteen years to pull the wool over the eyes of the farmers of the West by their promises to do something year after year. But the day came when the farmers had their eyes opened. As soon as the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) had the temerity to attempt to impose the reciprocity pact upon the people of this country, as soon as he attempted to make Canada an adjunct of the United States, the farmers of Canada turned him out of office.

What was their success in dealing with the tariff, in eliminating "every vestige of protection," as they promised to do? On every platform in Canada these pledges were made by responsible men and repeated by those irresponsible, that if the Liberals were returned to office they would eliminate every vestige of protection from the tariff. But in fifteen years of power, they succeeded in reducing the tariff just about two per cent. Why, Sir, the greatest reduction ever made in the National Policy tariff was made by the Conservative party itself, made by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). And he is not a free trader. This party does not pose before the people as being a party of free traders. We believe in the National Policy; we have advocated it in season and out of season; we believe in fair protection to farmer and manufacturer alike; there is no hypocrisy in the position we occupy before the people. But hon. gentlemen opposite declare themselves to be against protection. My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) on all occasions since being placed in opposition has preached the doctrine of free trade—a beautiful theory but utterly impracticable in this country, and proven impracticable in the world generally. History tells us that when Cobden introduced free trade in England, he declared that within a few years the world would adopt free trade. And to-day we find that the world is protectionist everywhere except in Great Britain.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Hear, hear.

Mr. BRADBURY: "Hear, hear," says the hon. gentleman——

Mr. CLARK: What is the matter with Great Britain?

Mr. BRADBURY: Great Britain has prospered in spite of free trade, by reason of her great marine power and by direct taxation. My hon. friend will not tell me that free trade prevails even in Great Britain. He knows that it collects a large part of its revenue to-day from tea and other commodities of that kind, which we allow to come into this country free for the poor people. The hon. gentlemen who now occupy the Opposition benches had control of the affairs of this country for fifteen years. In that time they became the close and intimate friends of the great manufacturing industries of this country. But to-day, when they are in the cold shades of Opposition, there is nothing too hard or too cruel for them to say about the manufacturers. We will have the same old story from the Opposition benches before many years have passed that was preached by the Liberal party before 1896; the policy of blue ruin is starting to show in the faces of hon. gentlemen opposite, and we will have it proclaimed from every platform that the country is going to the dogs because they are not ruling its affairs. But it will take a good deal of persuasion on the part of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition and his eloquent friends to convince the people of this country that it will be a safe proposition to restore the Liberal party to office.

I wish now to refer to a few more of their many violated pledges, although time would not permit me to discuss them all. One plank in their platform was very interesting and very important in the West, that was the cry: The land for the settler and not for the speculator. Here is the plank in their platform:

Public land for the actual settler.

The sale of public lands of the Dominion should be to actual settlers only and not to the speculators, upon reasonable terms of settlement and in such areas as can be reasonably occupied and cultivated by the settler.

I want to say without any reservation that when that plank was put in the platform of the Liberal party it did more to win hundreds of votes from settlers in Manitoba even than their anti-protection plank, because there was a growing feeling that the lands of this country were being exploited by large speculators and that the poor settler was not being taken proper care of. How did the Liberal party implement that pledge? Did they keep the land for the settler or did they hand it out to the speculators, their special friends? You will all remember how they handled the Saskatchewan land deal. This notorious transaction has been spoken of in every part of Canada. Some 250,000 acres of land that is to-day the choice land of the Saskatchewan valley was sold to political friends for $1 per acre. This was divided up so that the boys would get a share of the rake-off on these lands. You all remember that the Premier of Saskatchewan was charged by a paper in Moosejaw with having received $12,000 as his share in this land transaction. This was on the eve of an election, if I remember aright. He immediately took proceedings in court, bringing an action for libel claiming $25,000 against the paper. The case was hung up until after the election was over and then his attorney withdrew the case and paid all the costs. That does not look like the act of an innocent man. But he was not the only one. It is rumoured on pretty good authority that a Government official in a high position received $25,000 of this stock; but he was timorous and returned the stock, and then three weeks afterwards repented and tried to get the stock back but did not succeed. This is the manner in which the Liberal party of Canada started out to implement their pledge to keep the land for the settler. Here was a magnificent area of land, 250,000 acres in extent, which in all fairness ought to have been divided up among the poor settlers who were looking for good land—settlers who, on account of transactions of this kind, have been crowded on to poor lands, some of them utterly unfit for settlement, while the good lands near the railways have been given away to Liberal friends, the speculators. This is one instance of how they implemented that pledge.

4 p m.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Was not that land which was sold to the Saskatchewan Land Valley Company sold on the condition of actual settlement?

Mr. BRADBURY: Mr. Speaker, it was, and the condition was such a liberal condition that any man or set of men could have fulfilled it. However, it makes no difference what the condition was, we had the actual settlers in that country who wanted land, who were hungry for land; but they were crowded away from the centres and from the railways on to the poor lands in the different provinces—and here were men who secured this land, 250,000 acres, for $1 an acre. These lands to-day are worth from $40 to $50 an acre.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is it not true that before the Saskatchewan Land Valley Company got this land and began to bring in settlers there was a territory over 60 miles in length along that railway on which there was no settlement, although the railway had been built for a number of years, because the general impression was that it was not good land, or land which was fit for settlement?

Mr. BRADBURY: The answer to that is very simple. It may not have been thrown open to homesteading at the time and consequently no homesteaders could get on it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend is entirely mistaken; the land was all opened to homesteading.

Mr. BRADBURY: I do not want to deny the hon. gentleman the opportunity of asking questions. What I have said was stated many times before.

Mr. CARVELL: And denied many times.

Mr. BRADBURY: We have the proof of the pudding to-day; we know what has taken place, and we know that a more glaring and outrageous scandal never was perpetrated on the people of Canada than the sale of these lands to this company; and the proof of it is that much of the stock of this company was divided up amongst a bunch of political friends. But I pass from that.

What has their policy been in connection with grazing leases? The hon. member for West Kent (Mr. McCoig) criticised the Government the other evening for having given away or sold cheaply some grazing lands for the purpose of raising horses. The hon. gentleman is young in this House and young in public life, or he would not have referred to this matter; for what does the record show? It shows that one outfit or one combination of political friends secured nearly four hundred thousand acres of grazing lands on irrevocable leases for twenty-one years at the nominal rent of one cent an acre, I think, and they were given the right of purchasing ten per cent of that land at one dollar an acre. That is how hon. gentlemen opposite attempted to assist the poor people of this country, the farmers' sons who are looking for homesteads, and many of whom are to-day being crowded out of their own districts and forced to go farther west or farther north to lands many of them utterly unsuited for cultivation.

Then, we have the irrigation land deal. A few of the friends cleaned up a million and a quarter of money on that. Then there was the Blairmore townsite, a notorious case at the time. Many hon. gentlemen in this House will remember the man who got this townsite for something like $480—a townsite that was worth to the people of Canada at least two or three hundred thousand dollars. Hon. gentlemen opposite gave this townsite to a political friend. The man has since died, so I will not go any further into that. Then there was the exploitation of timber lands. I heard the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) wax eloquent the other evening over the high price of lumber on account of this extra tariff. If the party that he has followed so long and so ably and faithfully had conserved the timber resources of the Northwest Territory and of Manitoba, we might to-day have been in a position to give to our people cheaper lumber than we can now give them. These timber lands are held by a few men, Liberals, who got them for a song.

Then, there was the exploitation of the fisheries. You all remember what they did with our fisheries. They gave all the fisheries north of lake Winnipeg—a kingdom in itself—to their political friends for the nominal sum of $10 a year, with the right to fish in Hudson bay—a most glaring outrage, I think, in view of the fact that our fisheries are one of the most valuable assets we have in Canada to-day. After this matter was exposed in the House the leases were cancelled, as they ought to have been. The pity is that the policy of restoration did not go farther and force some of these men who had received our timber lands and our coal lands in the manner they did to restore at least a portion of them to the Crown.

Then, we have the St. Boniface land deal, engineered by one of the Commissioners of the Transcontinental railway. The evidence shows that $161,000 was cleaned up on that deal. Hon. gentlemen opposite have had the temerity to throw a challenge across this House regarding the manner in which pledges are kept, and I am giving these few examples to show the people of Canada how hon. gentlemen opposite implemented, when in office, the pledges they gave to the people of this country. They have not shown, nor can they show one pledge given by the leader of this side of the House that has not been kept.

I want to refer for a moment to another pledge given to the people of this country —the pledge in regard to prohibition. Perhaps no question is receiving such earnest attention from the people of Canada to-day as the question of prohibition, the question of curtailing in some way the sale of liquor. On the eve of an election, when this was a live question, the right hon. gentleman saw his opportunity and pledged himself to give the people of Canada a plebiscite, and to make good that plebiscite if it was carried by the people.

I want to refer for a moment to one or two of the pledges the right hon. gentleman gave. In 1895, just the year before the election of 1896, the present leader of the Opposition held a large meeting in Carleton Place, and spoke as follows:

> The Liberal party has pledged itself in convention at Ottawa that whenever in power they would take a plebiscite on the question as to whether the people want a prohibitory liquor law or not. The answer is not in my hands, it is in the hands of the people, and according to their answer such legislation they will have at the hands of the Government.

That was a fair and distinct promise given to the people of Canada. If you vote for prohibition, the right hon. gentleman in substance said, I, as Premier of this country, will implement that pledge.

Mr. WILCOX: What was the hon. gentleman reading from?

Mr. BRADBURY: From a very admirable speech by a gentleman named Mr. Bennett, which is found on page 4305 of the Hansard Debates of April 25, 1900.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is it ancient or modern history?

Mr. BRADBURY: It is ancient history, like a good many of the promises made by hon. gentlemen opposite. The right hon. gentleman went to the city of Winnipeg. He found the prohibition question a very live one in Manitoba, as it has been since and he took the opportunity of renewing his pledge there. He said:

> He pledged his honour that as soon as the Liberals came into power they would take a plebiscite of the Dominion by which the party would stand, and the will of the people would be carried out even were it to cost power for ever to the Liberal party.

No promise could have been clearer, no stronger words could have been used; and yet, when the voice of the people of Canada voted in favour of prohibition by a majority I think of something like 13,000, the Government closed their ears. The book was closed and nothing was done. But there is a little history in connection with that matter. Every one who took any interest in that question at that time will remember that the different provinces of Canada, with the exception of the province of Quebec, voted largely in favour of prohibition. I forget the exact figures, but the majority for prohibition was one hundred thousand or more. The result of the poll in Quebec could not be ascertained for days and weeks. There was a feeling throughout the country that the ballot boxes were stuffed, and an investigation proved that to be absolutely true. Let me just read what was found to prevail at some of the polling stations. In Quebec Centre, poll 23, 105 votes were polled when there were only 101 names on the polling list. They polled a splendid percentage between them.

Mr. WILCOX: All against prohibition?

Mr. BRADBURY: All against prohibition. At No. 1 poll, West Quebec, there were 114 votes polled and 115 on the list; at No. 2 poll, 111 polled and 114 on the list, and at the Lachine poll, Jacques Cartier, there were 108 votes polled and 111 on the list. I only quote these few figures to show that the suspicion of the temperance people who were earnest and anxious for temperance legislation at that time was amply justified. I do not believe there is any province in this country which is more interested on this question to-day than the province of Quebec. They have made great strides since those days and they are in line with the people of Canada on the question of prohibition. Some of the strongest legislation that has been passed by any of the provinces has been passed by the province of Quebec during the last few years. They have made wonderful progress in regard to this question. But they were under the tutelage at that time of men who did not want prohibition put up to the Government of that day. While the promise was given, it would have been a calamity in the eyes of some of the leaders of that day for any Government to have introduced prohibition. But the day is coming, and it may not be as far away as some think, when this will be a live question again in this country and the records of hon. gentlemen opposite will stand out before the public as a warning, and will show whom the people can trust on great questions of this kind.

If this were only the record of the Federal Government, led by my right hon. friend, it would not be so bad. But we found the Manitoba Liberals very apt pupils of my right hon. friend who leads the Opposition. They took hold of this question right on the eve of an election. They said to themselves: This is a good election cry; it is something we can sweep the province with; and Mr. Greenway, Premier of Manitoba, in 1892, advocated prohibition and said to the people: We will have a plebiscite, and if you vote for prohibition you will get it. What was the result? There were 45,573 voters on the lists in Manitoba at that time; 18,637 voted for prohibition and only 7,115 against. Did they get prohibition? Why, the Liberal leader took the same position in Manitoba as the Liberal leader has taken in the Federal House here. Mr. Greenway simply pigeon-holed the result and allowed the matter to stand as it stands at the present time. Although he had two and a half times as many votes in favour of prohibition in Manitoba as had been cast against it he still refused to act. The province of Ontario was in the same position under a Liberal Government. But another election was coming on in Manitoba at a time when the Greenway Government was discredited and was in a very tight box. The people of Manitoba are an easy people, at least they were once very easily fooled and cajoled by the Liberal leaders. In 1898 Mr. Greenway again submitted the question of prohibition. This time prohibition was carried by a majority of 9,000. Still there was no prohibition. The leaders of the Liberal party never implemented the pledge they gave to the people. It would seem that the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition to-day and the great Liberal leaders of Canada had been close and apt students of the German historian Bernhardi, who had taught that no pledge or promise should be kept unless it redounded to the interest of the party or state that was affected. That is what caused this great war that is going on to-day. The British Government, in its own defence, and in defence of its honour, determined to keep the promise it had given to the Belgians to protect the neutrality of their country. If the Liberal party of Canada had had control of a situation of that kind they would have had no difficulty in getting out of the responsibility as they have got out of other pledges that they have given to the people of Canada. I have devoted all the time I intend to give to this phase of the question.

Mr. CARVELL: Hear, hear.

Mr. BRADBURY: I think I have convinced even the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell), that it is not safe for the Liberal party to charge this side of the House with not implementing its pledges. I now wish to discuss one or two phases of the present Budget as referred to by our hon. friends on the other side of the House. My hon. friend the junior member for Halifax, during his discussion of the subject said:

> But the general tariff to-day, as amended is such as to diminish the value and destroy the purpose of the preferential tariff to Great Britain.

This is a question, Mr. Speaker, that nearly every hon. gentleman who has spoken from the Opposition benches has dealt with. The fact is that when you go into this matter you find that the changes in the tariff have not materially changed the preference given to the British manufacturer. The British manufacturer occupies the same position relatively that he did before. The proposition before the House increases the general tariff by 7½ per cent and makes only 5 per cent of a reduction in the British preferential tariff which still leaves the preference in favour of Great Britain 2½ per cent better than it was before. Just an illustration; take item 453 in the Customs Tariff an you will find that on machinery the British preferential tariff was 15 per cent and the general tariff 27½ per cent. That is what it was before this change took place. That gave Great Britain a preference of 12½ per cent. Now the new tariff adds 5 per cent to the British preferential tariff rate and 7½ per cent to the general rate. That makes the duty, under the British preferential tariff, 20 per cent and, under the general tariff, 35 per cent, giving a preference in favour of Great Britain of 15 per cent or 2½ per cent better than it was. The same thing applies to item 567 which deals with clothing. Under the old tariff the preferential duty was 30 per cent and the general rate 35 per cent, giving Great Britain a preference of only 5 per cent. The new tariff, which we designate as a war tax, although that is disputed by hon. gentlemen opposite, adds 5 per cent to the British preferential tariff and 7½ per cent to the general tariff. The result is that we find that the duty on clothing from Great Britain is 35 per cent, while the duty under the general tariff is 42½ per cent. The preference given to Great Britain in that case is 7½ per cent, or 2½ per cent better than it was.

It is very difficult to understand, Mr. Speaker, how hon. gentlemen opposite make out that the British preference has been destroyed, in view of the fact that the British preference as a whole is as great to-day as it was before this Budget was brought down, and in some things it is greater. The tariff has not touched mowers, or reapers, or binders, or binder twine, and all these things are just in the same position as they were. And yet we have the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) and other hon. members waxing eloquent over the manner in which the farmers of this country are being taxed.

Mr. W. M. MARTIN: Would the hon. gentleman mind telling us how many reapers and binders and mowers were imported from Great Britain?

Mr. BRADBURY: Reapers and binders are not imported from Great Britain, but the duty of 7½ per cent that is applied to all other items is not applied to these items. The Government of this country did not place an extra duty on these implements.

Mr. CARVELL: Ask him about ploughs.

Mr. BRADBURY: I will tell my hon. friend something about ploughs before I finish. We had in this House a few years ago the Minister of Finance of the late Government, a very eminent man, a man who was looked upon by the Liberal party, and indeed by Conservatives, as one of the big men of Canada; I refer to the Hon. Mr. Fielding. Let us see what position the Hon. Mr. Fielding now takes with regard to this Budget, and let us compare it with the position taken by his Liberal friends in this House. If Mr. Fielding were in the House now, sitting beside his old leader, I venture to say the criticisms that have been offered to this Budget never would have emanated from the Liberal party. I quote from the Journal of Commerce, of which the Hon. Mr. Fielding is editor, and in its issue of Friday, February 12, 1915, dealing with the Budget, it says:

> Increased taxation is not at any time welcome, and therefore Mr. White's budget is not likely to be regarded as a thing of joy. But taxes which at another period might evoke sharp criticism may be accepted under present conditions with something like equanimity.
> While expenditure had increased, the revenues were no longer flourishing. The war, no doubt, added to the diminution of income. But even if there had been no war, additional taxation would have been inevitable. Whether the money was required for one purpose or another, the situation to the Finance Minister was the same. He had to raise more revenue.

I commend this to hon. gentlemen opposite.

> If there are any who are disposed to criticise his method they would do well to reflect whether any better and more convenient way could have been taken. The exemptions that have been made show the minister had a commendable desire to avoid, as far as he could, the placing of additional burdens on those least able to bear them. Some of the minor taxes may prove more irritating than profitable, but they are not unjust. The addition of five per cent to the tariff on British goods, and seven and one half per cent on other goods, is the main feature of the Budget. If the question were one of permanent fiscal policy, these additions would, of course, be open to grave objection. But they are imposed to meet what we all hope is a temporary condition, and if those who for the moment may profit by them distinctly understand this, and govern themselves accordingly, there will probably be little objection to this portion of the Budget.
> Altogether, Mr. White seems to have made the best of a troublesome situation.

This is the opinion of the late Liberal Minister of Finance in reference to the Budget, and he was once looked upon by his own party as one of the greatest men in Canada; in my opinion he was the greatest finance minister the Liberal party ever had. These are his opinions; this is his advice to his party, and, comparing Mr. Fielding's remarks with the remarks of the hon. gentlemen opposite who are making this carping criticism on the Budget, the comparison places them in a very awkward position before the people of Canada. We had the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), a few nights ago in this House, in his wild heroics, raising his hand to Heaven and declaring: keep your unholy and disloyal hands off the British preference. Just imagine the hon. gentleman waxing eloquent over this matter, and this in the face of the advice of the great Finance Minister of his own party, which warns him to be careful in his language, and points out to him that there was no better way to deal with the situation than that in which the present Finance Minister has dealt with it. But, Mr. Speaker, the attitude of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Turriff) does not deceive any one; it does not deceive the electors in the West and it does not deceive the members in this House. So much for the British preference. Some hon. gentleman a few moments ago spoke of ploughs, and the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Buchanan) and the hon. member for West Kent (Mr. McCoig) have both referred in this debate to the increased duty on ploughs. The hon. member for Medicine Hat said:

> I have here a clipping from the Winnipeg Free Press of Tuesday, February 23—

The Free Press is a very dangerous authority to quote on a question of this kind.

> —containing the report of an interview with Mr. H. W. Hutchinson—

Mr. Hutchinson is a life-long Liberal, a man no doubt anxious to cast suspicion upon any act performed by the Conservative Government and ready to raise agitation or ill-feeling amongst the farmers, so as to make them dissatisfied. This is the man whom the hon. member (Mr. Buchanan) quotes in this House as an authority.

—vice-president and managing director of the John Deer Plough Company—an American institution. Then the hon. member for Medicine Hat goes on to quote the following language from Mr. Hutchinson:

The prairie farmers will, of course, be called on to pay the duty. We have been already notified by Canadian manufacturers that prices will be increased to us and we have already begun to prepare a new price list for the sale of our commodities. On every walking plough there will be an increase in the price paid of from $1 to $2; on every sulky plough an increase of $4; on every drill an increase of $5.

Later on the hon. member (Mr. Buchanan) quotes Mr. Hutchinson as saying:

On every gang plough an increase of $6; on every wagon an increase of $7, and on every disc plough an increase of $8.

This is a quotation by the hon. member (Mr. Buchanan) from an interview given by Mr. Hutchinson, the agent of an American manufacturing concern, and the inference he intended to leave on the House was that the Canadian manufacturers had increased their prices on farm implements. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that on examination it will be found that the Canadian manufacturers have not increased the price of these goods since this tariff came down. If there have been any increases—they are very small, and I will cite them to the House later—they were made months before the tariff was thought of, and just in the ordinary regulation of the prices of the different machines. I have here a letter from the Cockshutt Plow Company, and the Cockshutt Plow Company owes it to itself to make this explanation.

I hold no brief for this company; but I am glad to be put in possession of facts that warrant me in saying in this House that the Canadian manufacturers were too patriotic to take advantage of the circumstances in order to increase the price of those ploughs, when they might have done so. This letter, which was written after the hon. member for West Kent (Mr. McCoig) spoke, reads as follows:

Mr. McCoig has, I notice, been making a statement in the House from our "Private and Confidential" lists in which he states we have advanced our prices for this season. Mr. McCoig being an implement man knows that each year a price list is issued (ours appearing in December) with such changes as are rendered necessary by the cost of production.

This list that was complained of was made up in December, 1914.

He saw fit to give only the increases and not the decreases.

As a matter of fact the ploughs that he named were advanced about 50 cents each, and not on account of the tariff, but to meet increased cost. These ploughs he referred to are a type that are sold in Eastern Canada and are not suitable for prairie use, and not one single type of these ploughs suitable for Canadian trade is made in the United States. As an implement man Mr. McCoig knows this, or else he does not know his business.

He goes on to say:

The Maple Leaf gang he refers to was not advanced in price—last year it was quoted without straightener. This year it is quoted with straightener at $1 more, so here also he is mistaken.

That explains the dollar increase in the cost of the gang plough.

The Ontario Footlift gang plough to which he refers is a new and improved design, and appears in our list for the first time, last year's pattern having been discarded.

He also in his speech infers that on May 1, our prices will again be advanced 5 per cent. How does he know? Who told him? We certainly did not, and we have already publicly stated our prices had been made for the season and would stand, so Mr. McCoig is wrong again.

This is an answer to the hon. gentleman who has been trying to make it appear that the Canadian manufacturers have been taking advantage of the situation in order to raise the prices of their ploughs to the farmers.

Let me give some of the reductions that have been made: Grain binders, 4·5 per cent; corn binders, 1·7 per cent; S.D. hay rakes, 4 per cent; hay tedders, 3 per cent; seed drills, 1·3 per cent; No. 2 cultivators, 1·6 per cent; No. 5 cultivators, 10 per cent; No. 3 disc harrows (16x16), 8 per cent; lever drag harrows, 3·4 per cent; two-way sulky ploughs (2B), 7 per cent; two-way sulky ploughs (1B), 13 per cent; gasoline engines, 7 per cent to 13 per cent, according to size.

The increases are: Reapers, 5 per cent; land rollers, 3 per cent; 16-tooth cultivators, 3 per cent; footlift sulky plough, 6 per cent. On 21 types of walking ploughs listed, 9 were increased 5 per cent; 1 was increased 5½ per cent; 1 was increased 10 per cent; and 10 remained the same.

That is a pretty fair answer to the statement made by the hon. member.

I hold in my hand the Cockshutt Plow Company's list for 1915, which is red-inked, showing the reductions that have been made. Some of the items that affect the farmers of the West are as follows:

Grain binders: No. 3 binder, 5 foot with sheaf carrier, $5 decrease; No. 3 binder, 6 foot, with sheaf carrier, $5 decrease; No. 3 binder, 7 foot, with sheaf carrier, $5 decrease; No. 3 binder, 7 foot, with sheaf carrier and pole truck, $5 decrease; No. 3 binder, 8 foot, with sheaf carrier, $5 decrease.

That reduction runs through the whole list. I am authorized to say that the list as it stands to-day is lower than it was in 1914, and that it will not be increased.

Mr. MACNUTT: Is that decrease made to the farmers or to the dealers?

Mr. BRADBURY: It is made to any man who wants to purchase those implements. You can buy them or a dealer can buy them. That is a complete answer to the statements made in the Winnipeg Free Press interview which was used by my hon. friend the member for Lethbridge (Mr. Buchanan). I am satisfied that that hon. member would not have read that interview in this House if he had understood the situation.

There is another article affected by this tariff, namely, cement. Hon. gentlemen opposite have a record onthis. My hon. friends, the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) and the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), who I am sorry is not in his seat, have devoted a good deal of time to endeavour to make the people believe that they are being injured by this tariff to the extent of the increased duty.

Mr. TURRIFF: So they are.

Mr. BRADBURY: The hon. member says, "So they are." The hon. member waxed eloquent against the great merger that was permitted to be formed. There is an old opposite have a record on this. My hon. they first make mad." If the hon. member had reflected on the attitude of his party towards that merger when it had an opportunity of preventing it, he would have hesitated before making such a statement. I had the honour of having a seat in this House when the merger was formed. I was sitting on the opposite side, and I called the attention of the late Minister of Finance to this merger and warned him of what might happen. I received a very unsympathetic reply, and no action whatever was taken to control the operations of the merger of which the hon. member is complaining to-day.

Mr. J. D. REID: I think the hon. member for Assiniboia supported that legislation.

Mr. BRADBURY: I am quoting from Hansard of 1912-13, volume 1, page 400. I asked the question:

[Mr. Bradbury.]

1. Has the attention of the Government been called to the cement merger that has taken place, by means of which the Canada Cement Company, Limited, has taken over ten of the largest cement companies of Canada with a capital of $30,000,000 and that on account of this merger the prices of cement to the consumer has been very much increased?

2. Is it the intention of the Government to take action to protect the public against this merger, which threatens to be a huge combine, thereby increasing the cost of cement which is almost a necessity to-day in great works?

Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance): The Government are aware from information in the public press, that a number of cement manufactories of the Dominion have been consolidated under one large company. Whether this consolidation has unduly enhanced the price of cement is a disputed point.

The law provides two methods of dealing with combinations which unduly enhance prices.

Then, the former Minister of Finance goes on to point out that the citizens can take action, but that he, or the Government responsible, refuse to take any action. Why? You have not far to go to find the reason—the promoters of the cement merger were leading Liberals. The late Senator Cox, the present president of the company, Senator Edwards, Senator McKay—all leading Liberals—are the men who created this merger. If this is a combine, the Liberal party are entirely responsible for it.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: What year is that Hansard?

Mr. BRADBURY: It is 1912-13.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: The hon. gentleman has made a mistake in the date.

Mr. BRADBURY: Yes, I have given correctly the date of the book from which I am now quoting, but I had a mistake in the date in this way: I am quoting from quotations made in a speech of my own of that year. But it was on the 16th of November, 1909, that I called the attention of the House to this matter. And what was the attitude of my hon. friend from Assiniboia at that time? Though he sat in this House then, he never raised his voice against this merger. And the hon. member for Edmonton, who was a trusted member of the Government of that day, had nothing to say. These hon. gentlemen, like others on that side, when in office were great friends of the combines and mergers; but since leaving office they have changed their attitude and are now trying to fool the farmers again.

Now, I wish to deal with the cement question as affected by the present tariff. The hon. member for Assiniboia says:

Now my hon. friend comes forward and puts an extra duty of 7½ per cent on cement. . . .

Is he saving it to the farmer or to the town or villages that are using cement for paving, or to the business man who uses cement in putting up buildings? Is he saving it to any user of cement? No, Mr. Speaker, he is not, he is handing over a bonus of thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars to the greatest combine and merger that we have in Canada today.

This is the merger which he himself allowed to be created, against which he did not raise his voice, though I was trying to prevent it in 1909. I wish to make the same statement about cement that I made about ploughs and farm implements a few moments ago. I am assured by the president of this cement "merger-combine," as my hon. friend called it, that there is no intention to raise the price in Canada. They have facilities to produce a surplus of two million barrels a year; they can control the situation to-day; and they say they have no intention of increasing the price of cement to the people on account of this tariff.

What was the situation? In 1894 the tariff on cement was 40 cents a barrel, including a duty on bags. In 1897, the duty was 43 cents a barrel. In 1905, under hon. gentlemen opposite it had been increased to 53¾ cents a barrel, and in 1906 it was reduced to 51¾ cents a barrel. Now, the reciprocity pact which these hon. gentlemen were so anxious to foist upon the people contained a provision, which, had it gone into effect, would have reduced the duty on cement to 46½ cents a barrel, including the duty on bags. In 1913 the duty was reduced by the Conservative Government—the present Government—to 43 cents a barrel. It has always been the pleasure of the Conservative party to reduce the duty on commodities to assist the farmers and poor people of this country. The present increase in the tax makes the duty on cement 53½ cents a barrel—puts it back where it was in 1905 under the Liberal Government; and in view of their own record, I do not think hon. gentlemen have any reason to complain. On account of this awful war, we have had to increase taxation, and so the duty on cement is raised until it is one-quarter cent a barrel less than it was under the Liberals in 1905. In 1912, it will be remembered we had a cement famine—cement was needed all over this country. The present Finance Minister took advantage of a clause in the Customs Act to cut the duty on cement in two. And at once he and every hon. gentleman on that side including the hon. gentleman from Assiniboia, attacked the Government for doing it.

Mr. TURRIFF: No.

Mr. BRADBURY: I can produce the record.

Mr. TURRIFF: No.

Mr. BRADBURY: I take the hon. gentleman's word. I have not his record, but I have that of the hon. member for Edmonton. The hon. member for Edmonton charged this Government with having been actuated by a desire not to help the farmers but to influence an election. That was the position taken by the Liberal party. It happened that there was an election in Saskatchewan. But people in the West and all over Canada were in need of cement, and thousands, and ten of thousands, of men without employment because cement could not be had. And when the Government cut the cement duty in two these hon gentlemen were unpatriotic enough to denounce this Government for having done what it could to assist the farmers, declaring that the Government was not doing it for the good of the people but to influence an election. I do not think, in view of the record of hon. gentlemen opposite on this question, that they have any ground to stand upon nor any warrant for the charges they make that the present tariff will be an imposition upon the farmers. I have no hesitation in saying—and I am speaking by the book—that the price of cement will not be increased one cent a barrel in this country by reason of this tariff. The farmers of Canada will not refuse to pay their share of the war tax.

I have taken up a great deal more time than I had expected, but there are some things that I feel I must deal with. The hon. member for Edmonton makes a great noise about the stamp duty on letters. He makes this statement:

Then $300,000 is expected on insurance premiums, $7,000,000 from increased postal rates, and $3,000,000 from railway passengers. It appears to me that the ordinary man who uses the postal facilities is bearing an unduly heavy share of this burden of taxation, while the great financial interests are bearing an unduly light proportion.

Then he goes on, lower down:

While the ordinary man who posts a letter pays $7,000,000, the man who rides in a railway train pays $3,000,000. The principle of direct taxation is sound, but this is not the way I would do it.

What are the facts? We want to be fair in regard to these questions. Any man who knows anything about the postal system of Canada knows that the great business houses of Canada, the banking institutions, insurance companies and other great corporations, pay the largest proportion of the postal revenue. I venture to say that not 50 per cent of this postal tax will be paid by the ordinary man in Canada; it will be paid by the large corporations such as the banks. I have one bank in my mind now which is paying out $150,000 a year in postage. These are the institutions that are going to bear the burden of taxation in this as in nearly all other matters. That goes to show how unfair the criticism from the opposite side of the House on this question has been. If these gentlemen had taken the advice of their ex-Finance Minister they would not have found themselves in the awkward position they are placed in to-day, on account of their unpatriotic criticism of the present attempt to handle a difficult question.

I cannot close without referring to another matter which affects my own province, that is, the question referred to by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) and the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt). During their speeches both of these gentlemen condemned the construction of the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I desire to correct my hon. friend. I did not condemn the construction of the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. NESBITT: I did.

Mr. BRADBURY: Perhaps I had better qualify my statement. The hon. gentleman objected to the expenditure provided for the Hudson Bay railway this year.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Of $5,500,000.

Mr. BRADBURY: He advised the Government to cut the $5,000,000 estimate down to $1,000,000. His friend behind him went one better and said:

> The first item I am going to speak about is the expenditure on the Hudson Bay railway I know that my hon. friends on this side of the House promised to build that railway, but I have come to the conclusion, or almost come to the conclusion, that political parties are justified in certain instances in not keeping promises which they should never have made.

This kind of reasoning is exactly what caused this war that is going on today. My hon. friends while on this side of the House had this virtue, that while they promised to start the Hudson Bay railway they never did. They sent out surveyors and got reports on the road which, however, did not assist the late Government in keeping its pledge to complete this road. But the fact is that they did not have courage enough or honesty of purpose enough to implement the pledges they had given to the people because they had pledged themselves in 1908 that if they were returned to power the farmers of the Northwest could take their grain to the Hudson bay ports within three years. That was a distinct pledge given to the people of the West, and I say they did not have honesty or fairness enough to implement that pledge. My hon. friend says they did not start the building of the road; but they did start to build a bridge across the Saskatchewan which cost a large amount of money, and the road was in that condition when the Conservative party came into power. I shall quote what the hon. gentleman did say, I want to be fair:

> When we come to the Hudson Bay railway and the terminals at Port Nelson, while I have always been in favour of the construction of that railway, yet we ought to pause, and instead of proposing to expend, as the Government is doing, $5,000,000 during this year on that railway and terminals, the Government, in fairness to the people of Canada, ought to cut that amount down to the sum of not more than $1,000,000.

That is his proposition. But I find that the hon. member for North Oxford was a little stronger. When Mr. Sharpe asked: "Did they not let the first contract?" my hon. friend from North Oxford said:

> Not that I know of. At any rate did not build any of the road. The Government are asking this year for a vote of $5,500,000 for the Hudson Bay railway. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) the other evening said that that could be cut down to $1,000,000 without hurting anybody. I say it could be absolutely wiped out, and that if the Government of the day would pull up the rails and sell them to somebody else for whatever they would bring, they would earn the lasting gratitude of the people of this country. In my judgment the Hudson Bay railway has no more chance of earning money than Stefansson would have if he built a railway upon one of those islands where he is lost. They do say that there are some fish in Hudson bay.

This, Mr. Speaker, coming from a man who occupies the prominent position in his party that my hon. friend does, the man who was sent to Ontario during the reciprocity pact discussion to tell the manufacturers that they had nothing to fear—"We do not intend to reduce the duties, you are all right"—sent there by his leader, a man chosen for the most important committees in the House, I say the hon. gentleman must have been—

Mr. NESBITT: Would my hon. friend repeat what he said about my being sent to tell the people in Ontario. I do not take back anything I said about the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. BRADBURY: I am glad you do not.

Mr. NESBITT: But I want to know what the hon. gentleman says about my having been sent to tell the people of Ontario. Just repeat that.

Mr. BRADBURY: What I said was that during the discussion in this House, as every hon. gentleman remembers, the hon. gentleman had been in Ontario, in his own constituency, I think, and he told the manufacturers that they had nothing to fear.

Mr. NESBITT: That is not what you said. I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker. You said that I was sent by somebody. Now, who sent me ?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BRADBURY: I will tell the hon. gentleman before I get through. The hon. gentleman stated to these people, to the manufacturers, that they had nothing to fear. He said: " The present Government, if reciprocity comes into force, are not going to lower the duties." When these words were read by an hon. member to the right hon. gentleman who now leads the Opposition in this House, then the leader of the Government, and the right hon. gentleman was asked if the hon. member for Oxford had been authorized to do this, the answer was that he was only speaking or only announcing the policy of his party.

Mr. NESBITT: The hon. gentleman is only quibbling. I asked him a straight question. He said a few moments ago I was sent by somebody. Now, why don't you repeat what you said and not try to quibble ?

Mr. BRADBURY: I object.

Mr. NESBITT: You have talked long enough without taking up any more time. Why don't you state what you said ? You know it was not true.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: The truth cuts.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Selkirk has the floor and is entitled to a hearing and attention.

Mr. BRADBURY: In connection with the building of the Hudson Bay railway and in connection with the position that the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House seem to take through their quasi-leader from Oxford, I want to say that there is not one man in the West who dares enunciate this doctrine west of the lakes, not one. I want to say that the Hudson Bay railway was promised by the Liberal party. In 1908 the present leader of the Opposition gave the people of the West to understand that, if his party was returned to power, the Hudson Bay railway would be completed within two or three years at the most, that the grain from the West could then be taken over that road to the markets of the world. The conduct of the Liberal party with respect to this railway is just in keeping with their attitude on every great question that affects the people of this country. They are one thing in one province and another thing in another province; one thing with one class of people and another thing with another class. It is a double-faced policy, and I might say a double-barrelled policy, which will affect some hon. gentlemen opposite who come from the West in a manner that will not be satisfactory to them.

Mr. TURRIFF: Don't worry about us.

Mr. BRADBURY: My hon. friend will have his own troubles. He will have lots to worry about without my worrying for him.

Mr. TURRIFF: I will take care of them.

Mr. BRADBURY: I want to say just a few words about the railway situation. The railway situation in Canada has been made anything but a pleasant one, by reason of the reckless legislation of the right hon. gentleman and his friends on the other side of the House. Just on the eve of an election the right hon. gentleman guaranteed bonds to the extent of thirty-five million dollars to induce and assist the Canadian Northern to become a transcontinental line. I hold that that was one of the most reckless projects ever undertaken by the late Government, except perhaps the building of the Transcontinental, which was a huge mistake, a blunder that has cost the people of this country hundreds of millions of dollars. If we had the millions of money that have been wasted in the building of the Transcontinental, we should not have to borrow one dollar to conduct our share of this war. If the late Government had not encouraged the building of the Canadian Northern round the shores of lake Superior, creating another transcontinental line, we should not, perhaps, be in the awkward position we are in to-day. The policy of the Conservative party was the only sane policy for this country. If that policy, which included the extension of the Intercolonial railway, the purchasing or taking over of the Canadian Pacific railway lines around the shores of lake Superior, and giving running rights to all roads, had been carried out, we should then have had one road coming through that barren country instead of three, and our railway situation would not be as it is to-day, a burden upon the people and a yoke around the necks of the farmers of the West. The building of that Transcontinental railway has robbed the farmers of the West of the opportunity of securing a fair reduction in freight rates, a reduction to which they were justly entitled, and which they expected to get when this railway was foisted upon the people of this country. I should like to point out to hon. gentlemen opposite that they are responsible for the position that the farmer of the West is in to-day in regard to freight rates. We could have had a much greater reduction in rates if our systems had not been duplicated. And if I know anything about the signs of the times and about the railway situation, the day is not far distant when the Government of Canada will be forced, in defence of the people, to take over as government undertakings one or perhaps two of these great Transcontinental systems. That has been made necessary by the reckless spending of public money, by the reckless use of Government guarantees by hon. gentlemen opposite. When my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) was criticising the Government for going on with the construction of the Hudson Bay railway, I noticed that his friends from the West all sat smiling; they did not cheer; but they did not contradict him. They allowed it to go out to the country that their opinion was that this road should be stopped and the rails pulled up. But the farmers of the West will have something to say about that. I should like to ask some of these gentlemen from the West whether they are in favour of this road? Is my hon. friend from Assiniboia in favour of the Hudson Bay railway or not?

Mr. TURRIFF: Since my hon. friend has asked me the question I am quite ready to answer. There is no doubt at all that it was the late Government that undertook to build the road. My hon. friends opposite had promised to build the road for 20 years, but had done nothing. I quite agree with the remarks of my hon. friend from St. John, and would say that the Hudson Bay railway, in common with all other enterprises, might well be given less money this year, until an equilibrum is obtained between our revenue and expenditure.

[Mr. Bradbury.]

Mr. BRADBURY: The hon. gentleman has not answered the question I asked. I asked whether he was in favour of building the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. TURRIFF: Yes.

Mr. BRADBURY: The fact that the Hudson Bay railway was not started by the late Government although they had given a pledge is no surprise to anybody who knows how the Liberal party has implemented other pledges it has given to the people of this country.

Mr. W. M. MARTIN: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the railroad was not started by the late Government?

Mr. BRADBURY: The building of the railway was not started by the late Government. Surveys were made by the late Government and a bridge was under construction. The late Government was committed to the whole of this project both by promise and by money allready expended.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The contract was actually let.

Mr. BRADBURY: But you did not carry out your pledge to give this road to the people within three years of the election of 1908. What is the difference between the two parties? The present Government has been in power only about three years and this railroad is fast nearing the Hudson bay. We are assured of the completion of the road in 1916, and our western crop in the fall of that year will be able to go over that road to the European markets. So, as a western man, I say it is most unpatriotic for the Liberal party to denounce the proceeding with the construction of this road as we are doing at the present time. If we adopted the suggestion made by the hon. member for St. John, and backed up by my hon. friend from Assiniboia to cut down the expenditure by four-fifths, what would happen in the West? We have nearly three thousand men working on that road to-day; two thousand of them would have been turned on the streets without work. That is in line with the whole action of hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in power. They spent the revenues of this country lavishly, and now because the Government of the day is trying to care for the situation, trying to prevent our working men and artisans from becoming paupers and subjects for charity, as my hon. friend from St. John suggests, hon. gentlemen opposite are criticising the expenditure that we propose to make at the present time.

In conclusion, let me add just a word in regard to the distribution of seed grain in the West. It has been a great boon to the farmers.

I want to say to the Government that I believe they could extend their activities along the line of assisting farmers in the northern part of Manitoba, and I suppose the same condition prevails in other provinces. We have a large acreage of very difficult land that is settled by thousands of people. In the northern part of my constituency I suppose I have 15,000 or 20,000 people settled on land that is very difficult to bring under cultivation. I have suggested to my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche), and I do it again here from my place in the House, that some active assistance should be given to districts of this kind in the matter of cultivation. I claim that the Government could very well devise some means by which a certain acreage on each of the homesteads where poor people are settled could be cleared and broken up with large power machines so that the people might be put in the position to become producers in a short time. I believe it will pay the Government to render some assistance in the way of providing stock in some of these districts. The northern part of Manitoba is a dairy proposition. We could make it one of the finest dairying districts in Canada if those poor people had a start. I commend it to the serious consideration of the Government and I would ask them to see if it is not possible at a very early date to assist the settlers in that district in such a way as will enable them to become self-sustaining producers. Unfortunately, in some of these districts, we are forced to resort to relief work during the winter months. I hold it is a mistake to have to dole out relief, year after year, to the settlers. We ought rather try to make these people self-sustaining by giving them something they can make a living at. By selling them a few head of cattle on deferred payments perhaps you would enable them to get into a position to make a livelihood and to pay back the advance in a few years. The Government would not lose one dollar on the investment and the farmers would be a great deal better off.

Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the crisis that exists in the Empire to-day, notwithstanding that Canada is doing its full share in providing both men and money to assist in the defence, notwithstanding that the Opposition has made pledges both inside and out of this House to assist the Government in every way possible in doing what is necessary for the defence of the Empire, we find that these hon. gentlemen have raised every obstacle possible in connection with this Budget. The quibbling argument advanced by men on the other side of the House that this is not a war tax is unworthy of the hon. gentlemen who make this statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. It is not permissible to say that the conduct of another hon. member is unworthy. It must be assumed that what he does is done with a proper motive.

Mr. BRADBURY: I will qualify that by saying that the statements made by the hon. gentlemen are entirely worthy of the hon. gentlemen who made them. The attempt is made to create the impression that the taxes that are levied are not war taxes because the dollars that are going into the revenue are not going directly into the war fund. Every hon. gentleman knows that the interest on this borrowed money has to be met, seven or eight millions of dollars. Every man in this House knows that we are making provision and ought to make provision, if we are doing our full duty to the men we have at the front, for perhaps a large pension list, and in this way I say that every dollar of this money going into this increased tax may be considered just as much a war tax as the money we are borrowing from Great Britain. I believe that when these hon. gentlemen have the chance of meeting their constituents they will find that the opinion of their constituents is that they made a huge mistake in taking the attitude they have taken in this House regarding the Budget that is before the people at the present time.

Mr. THOMAS MACNUTT (Saltcoats): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to attempt to follow the arguments of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bradbury) who has just taken his seat. He dealt, in the first part of his speech, with ancient history. Later on he made some statements that I do not think are in accordance with the facts. He said, amongst other things, that the imposition of higher taxes under the tariff would result in the lowering of prices in Canada, and that the manufacturers are too patriotic to charge any more on account of the additional protection which they have obtained.

I want to speak more particularly on behalf of the farmers of the West with reference to the effect this tax will, in my opinion, have upon production which is bracketed with patriotism. I have no doubt that the farmers of the West, and farmers generally, will continue to be patriotic, but I am very much afraid that this tariff will have the effect of reducing production rather than increasing it. The people in Canada generally are behind the Government and would be behind any Government in connection with matters appertaining to this war. They would not desire to do anything to embarrass the Government as long as they were legitimately endeavouring to assist Great Britain and her allies in bringing this war to a successful termination. But it does not follow that domestic concerns should not be criticised. This Budget refers to domestic matters. I see that the speech of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. White) is headed in Hansard "Proposed War Taxation." I think it should be changed to "Proposed Deficit Taxation," because if it were it would be fairer. The hon. Minister of Finance made this quite clear himself in his statement to the House, and I will quote a few words from what he said with reference to this matter:

> So far as concerns our special war expenditures which may reach one hundred million dollars I should be disposed, if we had not such heavy and uncontrollable capital expenditure to meet, to recommend that we should pay at least a part of it from current revenue. But it is obvious upon a consideration of the figures which I have submitted that we shall not by any reasonable supplemental taxation measures be able to close the gap between revenue and expenditure much less to pay a portion of the principal of our special war outlay. In the circumstances I have no hesitation in proposing to the House that we shall borrow the full amount required under this heading.

And further on:

> It is therefore the intention of the Government to negotiate for a continuance of the arrangement which I have mentioned with the Imperial Government for the purpose of procuring the funds necessary to meet our special war expenditure.

That is proof that this proposed tariff and direct taxation is not for the purpose of carrying on the war or of maintaining our soldiers at the front. It is claimed, with a good deal of justice, that the deficit as between revenue and expenditure mentioned by the Minister of Finance is the result of extravagance and mismanagement. I am not going to deal with that phase of the question because it has been already fully treated in this debate. There is a deficit, and no matter who is to blame, the people must pay it. But the right people should pay it and in proportionate amounts. I believe that the farmers under this Budget will have to pay more than their proportionate amount. Although the hon. member (Mr. Bradbury) says the additional tariff will make articles cheaper, I think it goes without saying that it will raise the price of everything we have to purchase on which an increased duty has been placed. The farmers, as everybody else, will have to pay for their clothing and for the necessaries of life. In addition they will have to pay the extra tax on their farm implements. The hon. member read a price list to show that the prices would not be increased, but would probably be decreased on the articles he referred to. If that be so, this is not a revenue tax at all, because foreign goods will not be imported. The additional taxation would have to be added to them and consequently it would discourage importations, and all goods would be made in Canada, and there would be no revenue coming to the Government. There is no doubt, however, in my mind, that the manufacturers, unless they have over-produced, will most decidedly take advantage of this increased taxation to put up the prices. The Toronto News makes this statement:

> The farmers should be pleased with the exemption of binder twine and agricultural implements from the general tariff increase.

The Toronto News evidently thinks it is an authority on western matters, just as most eastern men who have gone to the Pacific coast come back and think they know all about it. But when the Toronto News speaks about agricultural implements, it shows how little the editor of the News knows about farming. There is only one class of implements which is not included in the increase in the tariff, while it is made to appear that there are four—binders, harvesters, reapers and mowers. They are simply all harvesters, and mowers also are harvesters, so that there is only one class of implements that is exempted and that class is of no service in the production of crops, although they certainly save the crops. There may be others besides the Toronto News who do not know what agricultural implements are required, and I consequently will give the names of some of them: a breaking plough, gang plough, harrow, land packer, seeder, disc, cultivator, fanning mill, hay rake, wagon, buggy, sleigh, etc. Fence wire, lumber, and cream separators, will be included in this additional taxation.

The greatest asset the Dominion has is her undeveloped agricultural land. Manufactures are very important, but they can only legitimately be a result and not a cause of prosperity. The manufacturers cannot create wealth, they may acquire it and distribute it or retain it, but they do not create it. We would be all glad to see the manufacturers doing well and prospering, but they cannot prosper unless the land is occupied and the people on the land are prosperous. How are you going to make the agriculturists of this Dominion prosperous? We have millions of acres of unoccupied land to-day which should be under cultivation. It has been the object of every government in this country to try and settle the western lands and that has been accomplished with more or less success. But the success in that direction is not continuing at present and it is because the conditions are not made sufficiently inviting for people to stay on the land. It is well enough to talk about "back to the land," but you cannot compel people to go back to the land or to stay on it when they get there. The only way you can get people to remain on the land and to cultivate it properly is to surround them with reasonable comforts and remove the obstacles and difficulties in their way. The farmers do not ask for special privileges, but they do ask that unnecessary burdens should not be placed on them. We find that the men on the land are not satisfied to remain, and that is the case even now, although the increased prices of products occasiond by this unfortunate war are temporarily inviting. However, I believe there is not a farmer in Canada who would not sooner take much lower prices, and have no war, if that were possible I believe that the prices of farm products will increase on account of the war, but that will only be a temporary condition and things will go back to the normal when the war is over. It is the duty of this Government to institute a policy, in the interests not only of the farmers, but of the manufacturers and the business men and all the people. A policy could be inaugurated which would make the farmers feel that they are getting some of the wealth they create and render them content to remain on the land. I believe that the West could be made inviting to the right kind of men. There are many ups and downs in the farmer's life, but if many of the burdens that are now placed on them were removed, not only would those who are still on the land feel like extending their operations but others would be induced to come and the country would be developed. Quotations have been made from an interview with Mr. Hutchinson, but there are so many good points in that interview that I wish to place it all on Hansard. I may say that if the John Deer Company increases the price of implements every other manufacturer will do the same. The prices are generally all about the same no matter who makes the implement, so that I think there must be a combine among them. This is the interview with Mr. Hutchinson:

H. W. Hutchinson, vice-president and managing director of the John Deere Plough Company, was asked by the Free Press yesterday for an opinion on the effect on western Canada of the increased duty on farm implements. Mr. Hutchinson has expert knowledge on this subject, having been most intimately connected with the trade in this country for many years.

In reply to a number of questions he stated that he fully recognized the need for a very large increase in the Dominion revenue. He was of the opinion, however, that it would be a very grave mistake at the present time to impose a heavy burden on the prairie farmer, on whom the burden of this tax, should it be imposed by the Parliament, would instantly fall. An advance in the price of tillage implements would inevitably have the effect of checking cultivation which, under the stress of the present conditions, ought to be encouraged in every possible way. The proposed tax, Mr. Hutchinson pointed out, would be much higher than was generally supposed owing to the fact that in addition to imposing the duty the Government also made what might be deemed an arbitrary valuation of the imported goods, thus in reality greatly increasing the percentage of the tax. Mr. Hutchinson also pointed out that although the Government of Canada during the past four years had apparently reduced the duty on certain agricultural implements, there had been no real reduction owing to the fact that the arbitrary valuation placed on the imported goods had been greatly increased, so that the total revenue was not affected.

That does not quite agree with the statement made by the hon. member for Selkirk.

"The prairie farmers will, of course, be called on to pay the duty," said Mr. Hutchinson. "We have been already notified by Canadian manufacturers that prices will be increased to us and we have already begun to prepare a new price list for the sale of our commodities. On every walking plough there will be an increase in the price paid by the farmer of from $1 to $2; in every sulky plough an increase of $4; in every drill an increase of $5; in every gang plough an increase of $6; in every wagon an increase of $7; and in every disc plough an increase of $8; with similar advances in the prices to the farmer of all kindred tools. The margin on which dealers do business is so small that no part of the burden will be borne by them. It will all be passed on to the farmer.

"When I was in Ottawa some time ago I made inquiries regarding the arbitrary revaluation of imports by appraisers. There is no provision which I could find in the Customs Act for this re-valuation. After a great deal of investigation I discovered that although provision was not made for a re-valuation in the Customs Act, Parliament had given the Board of Appraisers power to arrange for this re-valuation. As a result of this arrangement farmers will be called on to pay a duty not of 27½ per cent, as they supposed, but of 32½ per cent, the increase at the present time being from an actual duty of 21 per cent to an actual duty of 32½ per cent. I wish to say in the strongest possible way that the proposition to impose this great additional burden on grain growers under the present circumstances would be a mistake from every point of view. An increase in revenue is needed but it should come from some other source and the attempt should not be made to secure money for government purposes in such a way as to impede or check the growing of wheat which will be so greatly needed in Europe in the near future.

"I think it desirable to point out in this connection, when it is proposed to ask the farmers of the country to pay this large extra sum of money, that the concessions which are said to have been made to farmers in recent years were not real. Both the premier and Mr. Rogers in former years promised reductions in the tariff to farmers. There was an apparent reduction in the duty of binders, harvesters and mowers. The valuation of these imported goods was, however, arbitrarily increased so much that prices in 1914 were higher than they were in 1913. Certain implements have been by the Government admitted free of duty, such as traction ditching engines. These implements are, however, not made in Canada and there was consequently no interest in this country asking for protection. The same thing is true of binder twine, of which there is very little produced in the Dominion.

"Every financial man in Canada realizes how important it is that production of food should be greatly increased in the Dominion. Men are being encouraged to leave the cities where they are not productively employed and to go on the land. The present proposal to increase the duty on tillage implements to 32½ per cent would counteract every effort that is being made and will prove in many cases the last straw which will break the back of the man who is trying to secure a start in life as a farmer."

That interview is from a non-partisan source, given by an experienced man, and it was worth while taking up a little time to read it.

There is an increase on everything that a farmer uses in connection with his production. There was a wonderful increase in dairy produce when cream separators were put on the free list. Fence wire is in great demand amongst the farmers; but it will now be made dearer, and the use of it will be decreased instead of increased. Several schemes have been devised to endeavour to get men back to the land, but this seems to be a scheme to reduce production.

There is one implement that should certainly not have been interfered with—the manure-spreader. It takes about 18 months before raw land will produce. A great deal of land in the West has been cultivated for many years, and there are enormous masses of manure and old stack bottoms throughout a great part of the West. These should be on the land. The season is short; hand-spreading is slow; labour is dear; these heaps remain where they are, and they are going to waste. If farmers could obtain manure-spreaders cheaper, the production would be vastly increased. Land that is now producing a certain quantity of grain could be made to produce 50 to 100 per cent more by the use of manure-spreaders. They are, however, almost out of the reach of the farmers now, and they will be still farther removed from his reach by the increased duty. Is that in the interest of increased production? I think not.

I was at a convention of the Saskatchewan Grain Growers' Association, held about three weeks ago at Regina. About 1,200 accredited delegates were there, and also a large number of interested visitors. During the session, which lasted five days, a great number of resolutions were brought before the convention and were intelligently discussed. There were at that convention intelligent and clever men who, in my opinion, were fit to sit on the front benches of this House. There are also large similar associations in Manitoba and Alberta. To show the attitude of the Saskatchewan Grain Growers' Association in the present situation, I will read a couple of resolutions passed at their convention. One is as follows:

1. Resolved, that this convention reaffirms our demand for wider markets, and free trade with the Mother Country.

2. That this convention is in favour of raising the immediate deficiency, and eventually the bulk of the requirements of the country by a system of taxation of graduated income tax, a tax on land values and stamp duties.

Another is as follows:

Whereas, the British Empire, of which the Dominion of Canada is an integral part, is engaged in a dreadful war with a powerful, astute and rentless enemy;

And, whereas, the Empire has engaged in this war not with the purpose of conquest or aggrandisement, but in defence of a basic moral principal of international jurisprudence;

And, whereas, the Saskatchewan Grain Growers' Association has ever been loyal to Canada and the Empire;

Therefore, be it resolved, that this, the annual convention of the said association, express hereby its hearty approval of the action taken by the Central Executive in instituting a Saskatchewan Grain Growers' Patriotic Fund;

And, further, that we will encourage and support both the Cash Contribution Fund and the Patriotic Acre Fund, as set forth by circular published by the general secretary.

This is an indication that the farmers are prepared to pay their share of the expenses of the war, and that as citizens of the country they are prepared to bear their share in assisting any fund made necessary by the war, such as the Belgian Relief Fund, the Red Cross and the Patriotic Fund. Every delegate of the Saskatchewan Grain Growers' Association has pledged himself to give the gross product of at least one acre to one or another of those funds. He is giving, not the net, but the gross product, because if you deduct all the expenses, there might be very little left. The gross product, however, will amount to something, and it will mean a huge contribution from the farmers. This contribution is not meant to advertise the association in any way. These farmers know that they have certain responsibilities, and they are willing to bear their share of the burden.

The method they believe in for raising the necessary funds is the imposition of a tax on land values and a graduated income tax. Under the land value tax, I think that farmers themselves will perhaps have to pay more than any other class of people, as they have more land. But for my part I think it would be an excellent plan to raise the revenue in that way. We have a municipal system throughout the country from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and the collection of this tax would simply mean an additional column or two in the tax notices. In Saskatchewan, a supplementary tax is collected from the farming land of one cent an acre, for the benefit particularly of the rural schools, and that only requires, as I have said, an additional column in the tax notice to collect it. The municipal collectors, I think, get five per cent for collection, and the money is sent to the Government. A similar system could be employed for the collection of a Dominion revenue along the same lines. Then, those who have incomes of a certain size could bear their fair share of taxation. In this way we could pay for war expenses and make up the deficit which, as I have said, the people must pay whether the Government is justified in its general expenditures or not.

However, the greatest objection that most of us have to this Budget is the decrease in the British preference, and that decrease is brought about, no matter how hon. gentlemen may manipulate the figures to show the contrary. It is quite clear that imports from Great Britain will be discouraged. We borrow money from the British people and the British Government to carry on our part of the war, and then we tax their trade to make up for the waste and extravagance that has gone on in Canada. That is not very encouraging, nor does it fit in well with the remarks attributed to an hon. gentleman opposite that he belonged to the "Imperial party" and that it was a good thing for the Empire and for Canada that the "Imperial party" was in power at this time.

Generally speaking, direct taxation is the best way to raise the increased revenues desired. But though it is a direct tax, I think the tax on letters and postcards is not justified. I doubt very much if the Government's revenue can be increased in that way. Years ago, under the old rates of postage, there was always a deficit in the Post Office Department of many hundreds of thousands of dollars. Postal rates were reduced, and I believe I am right in saying there has been a surplus ever since, although salaries were raised and the service extended very materially. Judging by the experience of the past, I fear that people will be discouraged by this tax from writing as much as before. Take the matter of postal cards and picture cards,—millions of these cards are posted especially by young people because the expense in each case is a trifle. But when it is made to cost two cents instead of one cent to send a card—an increase of one hundred per cent—I doubt that half as many will be sent. Business men also will curtail their correspondence and advertising circulars a great deal.

It is almost six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and, as I desire to finish before you leave the Chair, I will omit reference to a number of matters which otherwise I shou'd have dealt with. Let me state, briefly, my reasons for being opposed to the new tariff schedules:

Much of the expected increases would not be required if expenses were curtailed.

The tariff charges are more protective than revenue-producing.

Greater production of foodstuffs will be discouraged.

Unnecessary and unequal burdens will be inflicted on the farmers without adequate returns.

The cost of living will be increased, especially to the poorer classes.

There is every indication that higher protection will be maintained.

It is a direct blow at closer British connection.

Referring especially to one of my conclusions, that "there is every indication that higher protection will be maintained," I have just time to quote from the remarks of the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Macdonell):

> My hon. friend cavils at protection. Protection seems to be the red rag that angers Liberals in this House and out of it. I have no apology to make for protection; I am a stalwart protectionist. Protection has built up Canada. When this country is in straitened circumstances, as it will be more or less, and as all other countries will be owing to the war, and after it is over, it will be protection and the protectionist interests and the National Policy over again that will rebuild this country and put it back where it was before the outbreak of the war, and make it even more prosperous than ever before,

I gather from that that these additional taxes will be maintained. Let me quote a few lines from the analysis of the Budget by the Financial Post:

> The increase in the general import tax of 5 per cent on preferential and 7½ on our general tariff should encourage more manufacturing in Canada; but to get its full value the Minister of Finance should make some announcement as to its permanency.

I think we have every reason to fear that this increased tax is not for the purpose of producing revenue, but to protect the manufacturers of Canada, increase their profits and thereby retain their friendship. But business men do not all take the same view. Every hon. member, I have no doubt, has received a circular sent out by Mr. Stewart E. Bruce, of Toronto, in which he says:

> As a business man I consider this tax levy ill-advised and ill-considered and I have given my objections in detail.

It is fortunate that we can find a man here and there, even in Toronto, who is not a slave of protection. But they are rare indeed. As it is six o'clock, I will bring my remarks to a close.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

THE BUDGET.

PROPOSED WAR TAXATION.

Mr. RICHARD BLAIN (Peel): Mr. Speaker, on the 4th of February this session of Parliament was opened. It will be remembered by the House and by the country that the war in which we are now engaged was declared on August 4, 1914. The first question the Canadian people asked themselves when war was declared was: Have we a Government in power in which the people of Canada have implicit confidence; have we a Prime Minister at the head of affairs who is able to cope with the task, and who has also the confidence of the whole Canadian people? The right hon. gentleman who leads the Government (Sir Robert Borden) was equal to the task at the commencement of the war; and during this session of Parliament he has shown himself fully equal to the burdens placed upon him, and he will, I am sure, be able to take his part in this great struggle to the satisfaction of the whole Canadian people. When Parliament was called in August last the eyes of all Canadians were centered upon the city of Ottawa and upon the Government. Everybody expected that some important legislation would be introduced, and that some additional war taxes would be placed upon the Canadian people. The people had made up their minds to bear those taxes, whatever they were, cheerfully, as the Canadian people always do in matters of this kind. An amount of $50,000,000 was voted in the special session of August, 1914. There was practically no criticism in the House; there was no disappointment in the country, and the people of Canada felt pleased to think that the Government were willing to face this matter fairly and do their part in the great struggle. The war continued, and Parliament was again called together on the 4th of February, 1915, the session in which we are now engaged. On the 11th of February my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) introduced his Budget, termed the War Budget. The people of Canada again expected, when this session was called, that some war taxes would be placed upon them, and the Budget that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance introduced is called, and will go down in history as, the War Budget. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance presented his Budget in a way that met with the approval of all members of this House. There was no word of partisan warfare, there was nothing to stir up the Canadian people and make divisions among them. It was presented in a fair and honest way, a business presentation of an important Budget. I think the thanks of the whole Canadian people are due to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance for having been able to meet his task and present his Budget in the manner in which he did. Naturally there would be a great deal of thought by the Canadian people upon this Budget. Almost every person in this country, being a Canadian and interested in the welfare of Canada and the Empire, was anxious to know what it contained. Every Board of Trade engaged in the great commercial interests of Canada was interested in the Budget. The agricultural classes, from one end of Canada to the other, were particularly anxious about the Budget presented by my hon. friend. The manufacturers, towards whom some of our friends on the other side are not too kindly, being large employers of labour, naturally asked themselves the question: How will this Budget affect trade? and I am bound to say—and I think this House and the people of Canada will agree with me—that no Budget was ever presented to the people of Canada that met with such universal approval as the one introduced by my hon. friend on the 11th of February. The financial critic on the other side of the House, the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean), had eleven days from the date of the introduction of the Budget on the 11th of February down to the 23rd of February, when he rose in his place to discuss the Budget and to present to the people of Canada the Opposition's opinion upon it. It is currently reported that my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax consulted his friends. Everybody would expect that he would consult his friends. The Opposition had a caucus in the meantime to consider, I suppose, among other things, the Budget that was presented. To that I offer no objection. My hon. friend the junior member for Halifax, I understand, had the co-operation and the help of a gentleman not now in this House, who is very conversant with budgets, who has had the honour of introducing many in this House himself; and, after all this, the hon. gentleman's criticism was mild.

He could not raise very much objection. He was unable to single out with any emphasis those portions of the Budget to which he objected; and when the people of Canada read what my hon. friend had said they concluded that the best the Reform party in this House could do was to make only a mild criticism of the Budget introduced by the Minister of Finance. The Journal of Commerce, Montreal, discussing the Budget, said:

> Altogether Mr. White seems to have made the best of a troublesome situation. It will be much easier to find fault with his proposal than to offer any better as a temporary and convenient money-raising scheme.

I understand that the Hon. Mr. Fielding, the ex-Minister of Finance, is the editor of that paper; so no doubt he is responsible for that utterance. That is a statement from a gentleman whose opinion on budgets is worth something. He says that the Minister of Finance has made the best of a troublesome situation. Why troublesome? Because the people of Canada were engaged in a great struggle, are engaged in a great struggle now. The Finance Minister not only had to provide for the large expenditure that is going on from day to day, but had to meet many and great obligations placed upon the people of Canada by my hon. friends opposite. That meant an enormous expenditure. At the same time, on account of the disturbed condition of trade resulting from the war, the Minister of Finance was confronted with people in every part of the country saying that they feared unemployment; and unemployment there was in small measure, I think.

Some hon. gentlemen opposite have made strong statements in this House to the effect that the Minister of Finance should have cut down the general expenditure of the country. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance has cut down the general expenditure. He was absolutely frank when, in presenting his budget to the House, he said:

> So far as expenses are concerned the policy we enunciated in August we shall continue. Our estimates contain no new items, and as to items which they include we shall proceed with works not already under contract only as we feel justified having regard to the financial situation.

That was an honest statement. And so careful was the Minister of Finance that there should be no misunderstanding in this House or out of it as to how trace should be kept of the money raised by the Budget, that he said:

> The revenue obtained from the present tariff changes will be separately shown in the Trade and Investigation returns of the Department of Customs. By this we shall know the precise amount collected through the customs under the provisions of the War Revenue Act.

Surely that was a fair statement; there was nothing to conceal; there was no quibbling as to whether this part of the Budget was for a war tax and that part for another purpose. The statement was made on behalf of the Government that, in so far as the new Budget presented to this House was a war Budget, the Minister of Finance would see that a clause was placed in the Customs, returns giving the revenue obtained from the present tariff changes, and showing exactly how that money was being received. Surely that was frank; surely that was what the people of this country expected from my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, so careful a man in financial matters. Surely there was nothing to provoke criticism from the other side of the House lest any taxes collected under the war Budget should be devoted to other than war purposes.

I think that the Opposition led by my right hon. friend has not done itself justice as a party. When we assembled in August last they made a few declarations that they would assist the Government, that they did not propose to carry on political hostilities, that whether bound or not bound they were going to have a truce, that they would give every possible assistance to the Government in providing ways and means for carrying on our share in this great struggle. But when the Minister of Finance introduced his Budget this session it seemed as if a change had come over the Opposition. The Minister of Finance presented his Budget to the House on the 11th of February. On that day the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) attacked the Government at once. He attacked the Government at the close of the speech of the Finance Minister; he attacked the Government when my right hon. friend the Prime Minister moved:

1. That it is expedient to provide that a sum not exceeding one hundred million dollars ($100,000,000) be granted to His Majesty towards defraying any expenses that may be incurred by or under the authority of the Governor in Council during the year ending the 31st day of March, 1916, and so on. What did the hon. member for St. John do when that resolution was introduced? He rose in his place and attacked the Government right on the war resolution introduced by the leader of this Government. He made the statement that some persons down in New York were declaring that they represented the Canadian Government, and were trying to give contracts for this Government and for the British Government. Surely that did not look as if the Opposition were trying to assist this Government; for if any purchases had been made, either for the British Government or for this Government, they must have been made in part out of the $50,000,000 appropriation voted last August. My hon. friend from St. John made a very long speech, in the course of which he read an article from an Ottawa newspaper that I think condemned himself and his speech as well:

As a consequence of the misrepresentations that have been made to business firms in the United States and Canada by persons who have fraudulently styled themselves agents of the British and French Governments, it has been considered advisable by the Government to publish the following list of purchasing agents for military purposes of the allied governments.

And continuing in that statement is a list of the gentlemen representing the British Government, whose head office was in Montreal, and of the gentlemen representing the French and Russian Governments. And notwithstanding the statement in the hand of my hon. friend—a plain statement made by this Government and given to the newspapers so that every one might understand the situation—the hon. member for St. John attacked the Government, and charged that somebody had been in the United States buying ammunition for the war at exorbitant prices, prices that far exceeded the regular prices of ammunition in that country. Surely that does not look like wanting to assist the Government. Surely that savours of partisanship. My hon. friend went on in that long speech condemning the Government. The same day the hon. member for St. John attacked the Government for the purchase, under the guidance of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), of two submarine vessels. He stated that an Order in Council had gone through to buy two submarine vessels for $1,050,000. He attacked the Government upon that in his speech, a copy of which I have here. He makes an effort—and to his own satisfaction, I suppose, succeeds—in connecting Sir Richard McBride, Premier of British Columbia, with this transaction in a way that he thought was very shady. All he had to do, as my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries stated in his reply, was to walk across the floor of the House and ask my hon. friend if there was an error in the Order in Council passed by the Government for the purchase of these submarines. My hon. friend states in his speech that if my hon. friend had crossed the floor and asked him that question he would have told him that an error had taken place in the figures and that when the error was detected the correction was made in the proper and legal way, so that the amount put through for the purchase of the two submarines finally was the exact amount that was paid for the submarines

—$1,150,000. The hon. member for St. John spent a long time discussing that. I might point out that while hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are making an effort to convince the country that they are assisting the Government, we find the hon. member for St. John, on the day the Budget is introduced, attacking the Government on two points in a partisan way that does not do credit to the hon. gentleman who, I am very glad to see is now in his seat. My hon. friend is a master at all that sort of thing. He has sat on both sides of the House and has a great advantage. My hon. friend is able to put to good account all that he learned on this side of the House while in the Government and on the other side while in Opposition. Whatever may be said in the country, whatever may be said either in the East or in the West, if these hon. gentlemen propose to continue this political, partisan discussion in this House, they will be unable to make the people of Canada believe that they are assisting the Government in discharging their responsible duties.

During this discussion many hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have endeavoured to poison, if possible, the minds of the farming interest of Canada against the Government, because, forsooth, they are imposing some taxes upon the people. In the early history of my hon. friends opposite such a policy was pursued by their leaders. There was an effort made by the Reform party some years ago to put the farmer against the balance of the citizens of Canada. They pursued that warfare with some success. They told the farmers that if there was protection at all placed upon the statute book that protection must be paid for by the farmer, that the manufacturer was the gainer, and that the farmer was the loser.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. BLAIN: My hon. friend says, "Hear, hear." I do not expect any change in my hon. friend. I may say to my hon. friend who says "Hear, hear," that he cannot fool the farmers that way now. The farmers do not require any special defenders in this House, because they are able to take care of themselves both here and in the country as well. The farmers have flourished under the protective tariff and it does not do my hon. friends opposite much credit, because, after condemning the protective tariff when it was introduced by the Liberal-Conservative party many years ago, and promising that it would all be taken off the statute books when they came into power, they were in power for fifteen years and you would have to search the tariff with a microscope to find out any changes that these hon. gentleman made in the way of a reduction. They condemned the Liberal-Conservative party for protection; but when they came into office they adopted the very same policy. Then my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark), who the other day tried to stir up the farmers and to make it appear that they were opposed to this Government and to the proposed tariff taxation, will have a very difficult task on his hands to make the farmers in the West believe that protection is all against their interests. He will have a greater task on his hands because he supported a Government that maintained protection. My hon. friend could have performed that task perhaps more successfully, if, when he was sitting on this side of the House he had proclaimed the same belief that he now gives expression to. He came into the House in 1908 when his party were in power, and if my hon. friend's voice had been heard from his place at that time condemning the Government for protection and refusing to give them his support, and if he had continued in that policy while he was there and also while he was on the Opposition benches, he would have a record. But the best he can do is to say: My actions show that I supported protection, that I supported it to the letter when my party was in power, the same policy that is now on the statute books under this Government I now condemn. That is my hon. friend's position. Whenever my hon. friend has taken the floor he has taken rather special pains to point out that this taxation provided for in the Budget that we are now discussing, presses very severely upon the farmers and the poor man. I say: away with that sort of argument. The poor men of this country do not require such defenders, the farmers are strong and brave, the poor men are willing to take up their burdens with the rest, and the farmers will condemn any gentleman in this House who is trying to suggest that they are not willing to bear their fair share of the burdens that are placed upon us by this war.

It is not at all difficult to show that this Government has done much for the farmers of Canada. When the Liberals were in power the cry came loud and long that the farmers in Western Canada required government-owned elevators, but the Liberal Government did nothing. Also, when the Liberals were in power there was much complaint about excessive freight rates, but these complaints were unheeded, and government-owned elevators were only established when the Conservatives came into power. It was the party now led by my right hon. friend Sir Robert Borden that erected in western Canada four splendid large elevators which cost the treasury of Canada $4,000,000. There would not be so much to complain of did hon. gentlemen opposite tell the farmers of Canada what this Government has been doing for them, but these gentlemen have a way of their own, and that way is to cover up everything which this Government has done and to try to set the farmers against the Government. While the hon. gentlemen opposite are insidiously doing this, they are at the same time endeavouring to make the people of Canada believe that they are here this session for one purpose, and one purpose only, and that is to assist the Government in meeting the great difficulties which to-day present themselves. Well, the people of Canada will read the speeches of these hon. gentlemen opposite and they will put the proper estimate on them, and their opinion of such tactics will not redound to the credit of my hon. friends opposite.

In this Budget the farmers have not been neglected. I have in my hand a speech made by the Hon. Mr. Fielding, Minister of Finance in the Liberal Government, who, in presenting the Budget in 1906, stated that some farmers in Canada were in favour of protection while some were opposed to it, and that certainly the farmers would not support a government that would take off protection on their products and leave it on the products of other industries. It is an undoubted fact that many of the farmers of Canada believe in protection just as other classes of the community do, and the farmers who believe in protection are not confined to one side of politics only, or otherwise they would have put the late Government out of power long before they did. I think that is a fair test to apply. The Liberals promised many things, especially in western Canada, but when they came to power they did not keep their promises, and yet the farmers of the West did not hurriedly vote them out. To quote a few articles upon which farmers will have increased help under the war Budget, I may mention: Butter, eggs, pork, oats, potatoes, apples, peaches, strawberries, plums, cabbages, onions and celery, and these represent a much larger number of products on which the farmers will have help under this Budget. We have competition from the United States on many of the articles I have mentioned. There have come to Parliament and to the Government in past years large delegations pointing out that the market gardeners of the United States were dumping their products into Canada, against the best interests of our own farmers. Whatever may be said about this Budget, it is an undoubted fact that there is some special help given by it to the farmers, which, I am sure, the farmers will appreciate.

While hon. gentlemen opposite are talking about assistance for the farmers, they should not overlook the fact that at this very session of Parliament the Government is doing much for the farmers of the West; and I am glad to be able to say there is no protest from the people in any part of Canada against the policy of the Government in this respect. In southern Alberta and Saskatchewan last summer, there was a great drouth, and in many places the crops were almost a total failure. I might mention in this connection that in northern Ontario last year there was a partial crop failure; and, while the Ontario Government is now making provision to help the farmers in that region they are not asking the Parliament of Canada for any appropriation to assist them. The people of Ontario feel it to be their duty to help their friends in the northern part of the province when they require help, and the Government of the province of Ontario is rendering that help cheerfully. In addition to that, the people of Ontario are willing to bear their share of the burden, if it is a burden, and to support cheerfully such help as the Government of Canada is giving to the farmers of the West. Recently, when speaking in this House, the Minister of the Interior, discussing the aid given to farmers in the drouth belt of Saskatchewan and Alberta, said:

> I know that the banks have been very cautious in the past in advancing farmers money for that purpose, but I also know that my colleague, the Finance Minister, has been in touch with the head officers of our Canadian banks. He asked them to loosen up, to let the farmers have more credit. As a result of this intercession by the Finance Minister, the general managers of our Canadian banks instructed their western bank managers to meet all legitimate demands. The head officers in the East state they are quite willing to advance money on fair security. . . Up to the 31st March this year our estimates for seed grain and relief amount to somewhere in the neighbourhood of $5,800,000, which amount will be supplemented next year for relief to the extent of $3,000,000 or $4,000,000. The expenditures, if we were to act upon the applications that are being made to us at the present time, would amount to in the neighbourhood of $11,000,000. That is a pretty serious expenditure for this Government to assume, especially during a time of financial stringency. . . Not only have we had to supply seed grain but also provisions to keep a number of these people alive during the winter months, such as groceries, the necessaries of life and fuel; and for relief of this kind we have expended $2,500,000, which is included in the $5,800,000. . . In addition to that the farmers say: What is the use of giving us money to purchase seed grain, or giving us seed grain unless we have our stock in condition to put that grain in? We recognize the validity of that argument, and we shall supply them with feed for stock during the months in which they will be engaged in putting in their crop. I think that we have been dealing very generously and very reasonably with the requests that have been made to this Government.

I cite this language of my hon. friend the hon. the Minister of the Interior, to remind the House that the Government is not neglecting the farmers of the West, and to remind these gentlemen who try to poison the minds of the western farmers against the Government now in power, that they had better learn what the Government has done and is doing for the welfare of the farmers of the West before they expect the farmers to believe what they say.

There has been a good deal of discussion in this House with regard to the preferential tariff. I have here a statement showing a number of industries in the United Kingdom which will be materially assisted by the War Budget. This statement gives the marginal preference under the Customs Tariff of 1907 of the late Government and the margin of preference under the war revenue Bill.

That is a list of articles coming from England to Canada which will have under the present Budget an increased preference. It is an important list and one that should be considered by my hon. friends opposite when they are endeavouring to prove that the preferential tariff, in so far as it is affected by this Budget, should be changed. I heard one hon. gentleman opposite say that it should be wiped out altogether, and that the goods coming from Great Britain should come in free. I do not see what my hon. friends opposite are trying to do other than to excite the minds of the old country people, who are coming into Canada in large numbers, against the present Government and to make them favourable towards hon. gentlemen on the other side. My hon. friends know that these people are coming in Canada in large numbers for the purpose of making their homes here. They are bringing their wives and families and are locating here. Of the large number of immigrants that have come into Canada in the last few years, it could not be expected that all would locate upon farms. Some of them have grown-up families, and they come into the towns and villages and other centres of population. For my part, I believe in a policy that will build up manufacturing in Canada, and that will help men of capital to employ labour. This policy when properly understood by the old country people, will meet with their approval. My hon. friends opposite will not succeed very well by trying to point out to the old country people that because, forsooth, my hon. friends are in favour of a preferential tariff with Great Britain, they should receive the support of the old country people as they come and locate here. In that respect my hon. friends will be altogether disappointed.

My hon. friend the junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) the other day stated that the trade conditions of this country were not particularly disturbed by the war, and he mentioned in particular the iron and steel industry. I have here from to-day's Montreal Daily Mail a statement, the heading of which is: "War had serious effect upon the Scotia Steel Company—the company was hard-hit by war." The article reads as follows:

As was to be expected, every part of the company's operations was affected by the war. In the first place, as was well known in the trade, the Scotia Company had sold a large amount of its iron ore at the beginning of last year to Germany, and, of course, these sales could not be consummated after the war broke out. On this account the iron ore mines had to be shut down and at the same time the general recession in the steel trade in Canada was so immediate that practically all the iron and steel departments were idle for a large proportion of the last half of the year. During all this time the company was also confronted with the problem of meeting the cost of keeping the mines unwatered and maintaining the plant, all of which naturally caused serious inroads to be made upon the profits of the first half of the year. Under these unusual and unprecedented conditions, the showing made is regarded as satisfactory. The situation is already much improved and the indications are that from now on further improvement should be the rule.

Notwithstanding the depressed conditions of the steel industry we were able to keep the most of our plant in operation during the first half of the year. In view of the fact that Parliament had provided for assistance to two of the Transcontinental railways, to the extent of $50,000,000, a very large part of which it was understood would be expended in equipment we felt justified, from negotiations then pending in assuming that there would be considerable improvement in our business during the last six months of the year.

The outbreak of the war not only destroyed these expectations, but it very seriously interfered with all our operations. We had sold our output of iron ore for the year principally in Europe, and on the first of August had about 120,000 tons mined and ready for shipment. As further shipments to the continent were impossible, we immediately suspended mining operations and our ore mines have since been idle. Not only the profit on all the ore on hand at Wabana, but also on all ore which would have been mined during the remainder of the year, was lost to the company.

I read that article for the benefit of my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax, who stated that the war has not seriously affected the trade of this country. The Scotia Steel Company is in his own province of Nova Scotia. His own province follows Ontario in its war taxation. I read the following article:

The first direct provincial taxation in the history of Nova Scotia since Confederation is now proposed by Premier Murray, who introduced a Bill in the House of Assembly yesterday called the Provincial War Tax Act.

Under its provisions it is proposed to levy a tax of one mill in the dollar on all assessable property in the municipalities, towns and cities of Nova Scotia. The tax, it is estimated, will produce $117,000 additional revenue. The provincial deficit at the end of the fiscal year was $113,000.

[Mr. Blain.]

Premier Murray intimated that this would not be the only new taxation Bill to be presented at this session of the Legislature.

So it is found that even in Nova Scotia war has something to do with disarranging trade.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: How much?

Mr. BLAIN: So much that the legislature of the hon. gentleman's own province was compelled, according to what I have read, to place a war tax upon the province, He shakes his head. Well, I propose to take the word of the provincial premier to the effect that, following the example of Ontario, he is introducing a war tax. What would that mean? I would ask my hon. friend.

Mr. MACLEAN: The hon. gentleman is quite right in saying that a new revenue Bill has been introduced, but I do not admit that it is made necessary by the war. There was a loss of revenue prior to the declaration of war, and I think that the Nova Scotia Steel Company has been busier since the outbreak of war than before.

Mr. BLAIN: Does the hon. gentleman suggest that the war has helped trade in Nova Scotia?

Mr. SINCLAIR: There is not the slightest doubt that the large orders received for war materials have greatly helped the position of the Nova Scotia Steel Company and that that company is in a better position than when the war broke out.

Mr. BLAIN: The hon. gentleman differs in his view from his friend beside him, and the Premier of Nova Scotia—who is a Liberal—seems to think that the situation calls for a war tax, the first time since Confederation. I assume that he would not introduce a war tax if he did not think it necessary. War tax made necessary by the war.

Now, I wish to say a word or two with respect to the trade of Canada. Figures have been compiled showing that during the last two years $1,309,209,000 worth of goods of every kind have been imported into Canada. Everybody knows that Germany has been a great competitor in the industrial life of the world and that large quantities of its goods have come into Canada. In answer to hon. gentlemen who say that manufacturers propose to increase the prices of goods because of the increase in duties, I wish to say that in conversation with a very large manufacturer in western Ontario, I asked him the plain question: "Do you propose to increase the prices of your manufactured goods because of the war tax"? His answer was "No," and that, I believe, will be the answer of many manufacturers throughout Canada. I said: "How do you propose to manage your business successfully, seeing that you have to pay additional duties upon your raw material"? And, by the way, that is something which is never stated by hon. gentlemen opposite in discussing this matter. They always represent this as an increase in the tax on the manufactured article and declare that the farmer will have to pay it; they fail to see that this is a uniform tax upon the people generally, including the manufacturers. If the manufacturers import raw materials into this country, under this tariff they will have to pay on materials from Britain 5 per cent more and on materials from the United States 7½ per cent more. The manufacturer with whom I was talking said: "Although we have to pay an increased tariff on raw material, we do not propose to make any increase in the price to the consumer; we are going to make a portion of this enormous quantity of goods that is imported into Canada every year." And that will be the answer of the manufacturers generally—that prices for this year are on the same basis as those for last year, and they the manufacturers, will continue to furnish goods to the people of Canada at the same prices as last year and will maintain their prosperity by increasing their output to fill those portions of the market that were filled in other years by the importation of goods from abroad. I have a card under my hand sent out to his customers by a large manufacturer in Ontario stating that former prices are withdrawn, and on the bottom of the card is a note that a price-list will be issued with reduced prices.

9 p.m.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What does he manufacture?

Mr. BLAIN: Boilers, radiators, and steam-heating goods.

Mr. MACLEAN: I am told that the manufacturers of fertilizers have increased their prices since the introduction of the new tariff.

Mr. BLAIN: Will the hon. gentleman give us his authority?

Mr. MACLEAN: I do not speak by authority, but I think the information is pretty reliable.

Mr. BLAIN: I am afraid it would please my hon. friend if they did increase prices. His colleague from the city of St. John (Mr. Pugsley) seemed to be particularly anxious on the fertilizer question.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. gentleman will find that the farmers are anxious too.

Mr. BLAIN: It is the only specific article the hon. gentleman dealt with. He looked into the Budget very closely, and is very conversant with it, yet the best he could do was to attempt to prove that fertilizers should be on the free list. For my part, I say these fertilizers can be and will be manufactured in Canada. That is the answer. And I would ask the hon. gentleman whether he would rather have them imported from the United States and Germany, or would he rather have them made in Canada?

Mr. PUGSLEY: As the hon. gentleman has had the courtesy to ask me a question, I would point out to him that in the manufacture of fertilizers it is very important to get the raw material. You want nitrates, you want potash, you want phosphates—

Mr. EDWARDS: And squid.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is hardly worthy of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) to introduce into such a discussion as this remarks which have no bearing upon the subject. My hon. friend from Peel will bear in mind that nitrates, potash, phosphates and other ingredients of fertilizers were all on the free list until this Budget was introduced. If they are to be made in Canada, you must have the natural elements in order to compound them.

Mr. BLAIN: I understand some have been imported from Germany.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Potash from Germany and nitrates from Chile.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Are you going to make the potash in Canada ?

Mr. BLAIN: If the friends of my hon. friend had their way we would not manufacture very much in Canada.

Mr. MACLEAN: Answer that question.

Mr. BLAIN: Yes, although my opinion may not be very valuable on this point, I shall be very much surprised if the people of Canada do not find themselves fully equal to the task of making and manufacturing in Canada all the fertilizers required by the people of Canada.

Mr. MACLEAN: I asked my hon. friend if he thought we would manufacture potash in Canada now, under the new tariff.

Mr. BLAIN: I say that we may not be able to manufacture potash, but we will manufacture something that will take its place. My hon. friend beside me says they are making potash in Canada at the present time.

There has been some criticism by newspapers of the present Budget, although not very much. In the main, the newspapers have applauded the Finance Minister for his Budget. I have here a paper which does not usually give much help to the Conservative party. It is the Christian Guardian, published in Toronto on February 17. The article is headed, "Canada's War Budget," and reads:

Canada needed to raise $30,000,000 by extra taxation this year in order to meet part of the extraordinary war expenses, and the problem for the Finance Minister was to raise that amount with the least possible friction. There were rumours that tea and sugar, tobacco and liquor would again be singled out for special attention at the taxgatherer's hands, but wisely, we think, tea and sugar have not been further burdened. Instead there is a general increase of 7½ per cent intermediate and 5 per cent preferential. . . Evidently the new tariff has aimed to spread the increased tax as lightly as possible over the whole community, and there will probably be little objection to it. The money has to be raised and the new taxes will not be specially burdensome to any one class.

That is from a paper that does not usually give support to the Conservative party. Since this Government faced the war problem they have had to purchase a very large quantity of goods. Their ambition was to purchase these goods in Canada as far as possible, and I do not think there has been any criticism against the Government upon that point. They have aimed fairly, regardless of politics, to see that manufacturing establishments that could make these goods were given orders. That applies not only to the goods purchased by this Government, but to goods purchased for Britain, Russia and France. For example, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce had control of the purchases of blankets for the French Government. Did he assist his political friends particularly in these purchases? Let me point out to the House what was done. He called the blanket manufacturers of Canada together, regardless of politics. He had the advantage of their knowledge and discussed the question as to what the price for blankets should be if they were purchased in Canada for the French Government. After a somewhat prolonged discussion, they arrived at a price that was regarded by them and by the Government as a reasonable and fair price, considering the price of wool and workmanship. The price was submitted to the French Government and it was satisfactory to them—60 cents per pound. Did the Minister of Finance suggest that these orders should go to Liberal Conservative supporters? No; he made it broad and clear that every manufacturing establishment in Canada that could make blankets should send to Ottawa and receive an order for as many blankets as it could make up to a certain day. That was the proposition of the hon. gentleman who was representing the Government in respect to the purchase of blankets for the French Government. The blanket manufacturers from all over Canada came and received their orders, and the blankets were made, and I think, in the main, the transaction was very satisfactory to the people of Canada as well as to the French Government. That applies also to other large purchases that were made by this Government for the British Government; and I may say that, although there is some criticism about the goods manufactured for the soldiers, I had the privilege of seeing some articles that were sent from France as a sample for the Canadian manufacturers to go by in making another line of goods, and the articles made by the Canadian manufacturers surpassed altogether the sample, which is a proof that, after all the Canadian manufacturers find themselves in a position to supply a very large quantity of goods and to make them equal to the requirements of the British, French and Russian Governments.

The Toronto Globe undertook to criticise the Government in two articles, one of which I shall read. The Globe of January 19 said:

Put Names on War Supplies.

There is one effective way of putting crooked contractors for army supplies in the pillory, and that is by requiring that all makers of cloth, clothing, shoes, and equipment shall stamp their name in some indelible fashion upon the articles they make. It is already observable that contractors, discussing the failure of supplies to come up to requirements, are certain that it was "the other fellow" who put shoddy workmanship into articles on which men's lives depend. There should be a means of checking up vociferous contractors. No other would be half so effective as the production of the defective articles with the name of the maker stamped upon them. The Militia Department should lose no time in insisting that all army contractors put their names upon their product as a guarantee of good materials and honest workmanship. The country is paying the top price for war supplies and has a right to demand that the contractors play fair and provide goods of the highest quality.

That was a mild criticism by the Globe. No other inference could be taken than that the Government were not insisting on the manufacturer putting his name on the article produced by him. If the Globe had been anxious to do the fair thing by the Government in power and to assist them in their difficulties and the task they are facing, all they had to do was to go or write to the department and ask them for a copy of the tenders. I have a copy in my hand. This is the notification sent from the department to successful tenderers:

Department of Militia and Defence, Ottawa.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that your tender of the —, instant for the supply of certain goods has been accepted as follows:

Please note that delivery should be made at ——— and should be completed not latter than ———. The supply must conform to the sealed pattern and specifications in every respect, and each article must bear the manufacturer's name and the date of manufacture.

All the editor of the Globe had to do before poisoning the mind of his innocent readers by suggesting that the Government had failed to compel the manufacturer to put his name and the date on the article he was making for the Government, was to write or ask the department for a copy of the tenders; and he would then have seen that the Government was careful enough to insist that every man who manufactured goods for this Government must put his name and the date on his goods. Therefore I say that that kind of argument will not have much effect upon the electors of this country.

I had some other statements to make, but I have already spoken much longer than I had intended. I say that, in my opinion, the Budget is satisfactory to all classes of people in Canada. The people of Canada have implicit confidence in the Prime Minister and in his Government. Whatever criticism has come from the other side of the House, no gentleman was able to stand in his place and say that any department of the Government was neglecting its duties in these perilous times; for every department had met the situation strongly and honestly; every department had measured up to what the people of Canada expected from it. Whatever may be said about the enormous expenditure of money, the $50,000,000 that has been expended and the $100,000,000 that will be expended, the people of Canada believe that they have an honest Government in power, which is meeting the situation strongly, and fully carrying out what the people of Canada expect from them; namely, that in this important crisis we should bear our full share both for Canada and for the Empire.

I want to say one word in regard to the clothing, boots, and other supplies furnished to our soldiers. I was told in conversation with a gentleman who was born in the old country, and who had lived alongside Salisbury Plain and played there when he was a boy, that he could not believe the statement he had read that there was wet weather and very deep mud on Salisbury Plain. He said that he had played upon Salisbury Plain in his early boyhood days, and that it was almost impossible then to find a blade of grass upon the Plain. I am mentioning this in order to point out that, no matter how this Government may have been criticised in regard to the clothing, boots, etc., supplied to the soldiers, the greatest enemy was the wet weather at Valcartier camp and the exceptionally wet weather experienced at Salisbury Plain; and over this the Government had no control. The people of Canada must understand that Salisbury Plain was selected as a training camp for our soldiers, not by this Government, but by the Government of Great Britain and by the War Office; and I have no doubt that they selected it as the proper and the best place they could provide for the purpose. While some part of the clothing and boots and shoes may not have stood all that was expected of them, I repeat that it was not because of their quality, but because of the extraordinary weather conditions experienced at Valcartier and Salisbury Plain. I think it is only fair that I should mention this, not particularly in defence of the Government, because I do not think they require any defence, even on that point, but in order that the people of Canada may fully understand the facts in connection with the articles I have mentioned.

I am sure that when the people of Canada have had a better opportunity of studying this Budget, when they understand it more fully, when hon. gentlemen opposite have made all possible criticism of it, the people of Canada will say with one voice that this Government and the Finance Minister have placed before the country a uniform and satisfactory Budget which is in the interests of the people of Canada—and I am sure the people of Canada will bear their burdens cheerfully, whatever they may be—a Budget that will meet with the approval not only of the people of this country, but of every part of the British Empire.

Mr. ROCH LANCTOT (Laprairie-Napierville): Mr. Speaker, before I proceed with the few remarks I have to offer to this House I wish to refer to the speech delivered in the course of this debate by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury). I find that he is reported on page 760 of Hansard to have used the following words:

> The hon. gentleman cannot quote any statement contained in the platform laid down by the Conservative party previous to their return in 1911 asserting that if returned to office they would reduce the public expenditure.

Now the Montreal Gazette dated August 15, 1911, a conservative paper, has the following article:

> Conservative Policy.
>
> What the Party is Pledged to Carry On.
>
> The Liberal Conservative party gives its pledge to carry out the following policy if returned to power:
>
> (1 A thorough reorganization of the method by which the public expenditure is supervised. The increase in what is known as ordinary controllable expenditure from $21,500,000 in 1896 to nearly $74,000,000 in 1911 is proof of extravagance beyond any possible defence.
> R. L. Borden.

Mr. LANCTOT. (Translation): Mr. Speaker, on the 18th of August last, Parliament was summoned in extraordinary session. The object in view was the organization of a contingent of 22,500 men, to be sent to fight with Allies in France and Belgium. The Government then asked and obtained, for those objects, a vote of fifty million dollars. The Minister of Militia set immediately to work to put the contingent on a proper footing. The men of that contingent spent a few weeks at the Valcartier camp to complete their military training. On October last, those men went to England, and on arriving there were sent to Salisbury Plains to complete their training. Since then they have given a good account of themselves on the battlefields, whatever may have been alleged to the contrary, on the 18th of February last, by the Toronto Evening Journal which showed its lack of patriotism to the extent of stating that our Canadian contingent, after making a favourable impression on its arrival in England, was no longer in a position, after several months of training, to do honour to Canada when its services were needed in action.

It was with satisfaction that, personally, I voted the 50 millions to defray the contribution which we deemed it proper that a country such as ours should vote.

But, Mr. Speaker, I believe that such help must be proportionate to our resources, and that we have no right to indulge in inconsiderate and uncontrolled expenditure. The help which a son must give to his father should be proportionate to his resources and to the needs of his father, and if we must accept that proposition as being absolutely logical and reasonable, we must also infer that we have now greatly exceeded the limit of our obligations.

Let us calmly look into the situation, having solely in view the performance of our duties as representatives of the people.

It is universally conceded that England has all the money that she wants. We know, through the Minister of Finance himself, that we go to England to obtain the very moneys that have been appropriated for our war expenses. Is not that sufficient evidence that instead of fulfilling an obligation, we have on the contrary imposed upon ourselves an immense sacrifice?

In view of the present financial situation in England and in our own country, is it not evident that our sentiments of loyalty and the deep indignation felt at the atrocities committed by those blood-thirsty Germans have been the sole motives of our spontaneous participation?

But, Mr. Speaker, I ask this House, are we then justified in leading the country into bankruptcy? No, unless it can be shown that our participation to the full is the only guarantee of the certain success of the Allies. And as a member of this House is expected to fully speak his mind, let me say right here that the interest we have in this war, however great it may be, is far from being equal to the interest of England or of the other independent nations engaged. We are only a self-governing colony, and we have no war to wage here for the conservation of our sovereignty, as other nations have, and that makes an enormous difference. If we had to follow the dictates of certain visionaries, we would exhaust, nay we would have already exhausted at this moment our resources in men and money, and, I say, under what circumstances?

The chancellor, Lloyd-George, has just announced that England is in a position to make loans to foreign nations so as to keep the war going five years more. He also stated that France has enough money to last her more than two years. Then, our Minister of Finance is bound to acknowledge that we have to go to England to get the money which we desire to apply to that war. Then again, Lord Kitchener stated that he has an army of more than two million men, and General Joffre has a million and a half of reserves. In the face of such statements, which considering the high standing and responsibility of those making them are beyond cavil, would the people of Canada think that we are justified in bleeding the country any further? I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the most practical and patriotic way for us to contribute effectively to the war and to the aftermath of the war would be to let our population give itself up entirely to the improving of our agricultural resources, through the encourragement of intensive farming, so that a large part of the world may be secure against all danger of famine, a danger which has already assumed such a threatening aspect.

The House will perhaps allow me to quote an extract from an editorial in the Westminster Gazette:

> We are told that Canada desires to carry its contribution in men to 150,000, before next fall, should that number be required. It is needless to say that we do not believe that such a sacrifice will ever be required from the Dominion. We fully acknowledge that Canada will be with us in the present war to the extreme limit of its resources. But we hope that the recruiting which is going on in England will suffice, and that we will never be obliged to make such a call to Canada. We must not forget that what is required from Canada during the present conflict is a double service. That country must remain the granary of the Empire, and if we are to achieve victory in this war, the men working in the Canadian fields will help us in that victory just as effectively as those who expose themselves to the fire of the enemy.

Mr. Speaker, during the session of August last, the hon. Minister of Finance, with a view to providing for the requirements of this war, moved that the House should resolve itself into Committee of Ways and Means in order to raise the customs and excise duties on articles and foodstuffs which are generally taxed in times of war. Those articles were particularly coffee, sugar, spirits and tobacco.

The hon. minister expected that the imposition of those duties would yield an additional revenue of fourteen millions. Now, in spite of that additional revenue, the deficit announced by the hon. minister for the fiscal year ending on the 31st of March next will be at least 60 millions, not including the 50 millions voted in August last for the war.

At this session, the hon. minister comes down with proposals for additional taxation for war purposes, and how does he proceed? Is there anything in his words of a nature to reassure the people? The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) stated a moment ago that the people of Canada never received from a Finance Minister so satisfactory a statement as the one of this year. Let me say to the hon. member that he has not visited all the electors of this country; and as representing the county of Laprairie-Napierville, I challenge contradiction when I say that I have not yet met either a Conservative, a Liberal or a Nationalist favourable to this alleged war tax and to such a participation to the full, yea, which has reached such proportions that we are well nigh on the eve of bankruptcy.

If I am not mistaken, the hon. minister has informed us that the English Government had advanced the 50 millions voted last year, and was ready to advance the 100 millions that are now asked for, and even more if that is necessary. If such is the case, the tax asked by the hon. minister is not intended for the payment of those sums or part of those war loans, but rather to cover a part of the deficit occasioned by the extravagances of this Government.

Why should we impose those new taxes on the people? Why not wait until those 150 millions are spent, and then we could give our note, as all business men do, and pay that note at maturity.

No, you will not deceive the electors of Canada as easily as you think. You have taken them by surprise in 1911, but you will not succeed in any further attempt, if that is what is contemplated. The people realize fully what is the object of such a demand; that is easily discernible; the tax is intended to make up for the deficit of this year and for the one of next year, which every one says will be of 200 millions, including the war expenses. Such is the result of the extravagances of this Government.

And what is the cause of all that? The reason must be found in the fact that we have in this Administration only one man having previously held office. I mean Sir George E. Foster, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, to whom the Government have not seen fit to confide the portfolio of Finance, because he might have been a source of embarrassment to them, and whom they promptly sent out as trade commissioner to the antipodes.

I have often heard the hon. minister taking to task the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and in flaming words denounce the extravagance of the Laurier Administration. He may have been sometimes in the right. At all events, he was wont to say that a party which was spending 70 millions for the ordinary expenses of the country was surely extravagant, and he used to add that if ever the Conservative party should resume power it would surely reduce the expenditure. Accordingly, they were careful that Sir George Foster should not be put in charge of the Department of Finance.

The present Minister of Finance (Mr. White) never previously having held office, or occupied a seat in this House, of course lacked the requisite experience.

The hon. Prime Minister seems to me wanting in energy, and that is why we see every one of his colleagues doing exactly as he pleases. I say that this Government is too costly, that extravagance is too rampant, and that is why we are heading towards bankruptcy.

A moment ago, I heard the hon. member for Peel saying that the people are satisfied since his party has reached power. When hon. genetlemen assumed office, there was an annual surplus of 30 to 40 millions, and after three years and six months we see an increase in the gross debt of nearly 200 millions, and of over 80 millions in the net debt. That is why the present Government have seen fit to increase the taxes at the session of August last and at this present session to nearly 45 millions. And yet they will try to make the people believe that everything goes well and that the present Administration have only "clean politics" to their credit, in fact that they are a Government of honest men. You may rest assured that the people are well enough posted as to the capabilities of this Government.

I was saying a moment ago that the present Government has only been in power three years and six months. Honourable gentlemen claim that they diminished the public debt during the three first years of their régime. To that, I can only answer: If you have done so well during the three first years, you have managed the affairs of the country very badly during the last five months. We will discuss that. In 1911, the elections took place on the 21st of September. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) had only had five-twelfths of the Estimates submitted to the House. Now, on that very year, the Laurier government could only go on with the public works to the extent of those five-twelfths. The Liberal party having undergone defeat hon. gentlemen assumed power. During the following session of November, we were asked by the new Government to pass seven-twelfths of the Fielding Estimates. You remember, Mr. Speaker, that there were very few new items submitted to the House, with the exception of the three famous dreadnoughts which were to cost 35 millions.

Reference has been made to dreadnoughts; I wish to refer to them myself, and I must ask, would the country be richer if those dreadnoughts had been provided for two years ago, or would England be in a better position to conquer on sea to-day with those three dreadnoughts still on the stocks?

Mr. BELLEMARE, (Translation): Will the hon. member allow me to ask a question. Does he mean to say that Canada would be richer if the Laurier navy was now in existence?

Mr. LANCTOT. (Translation): I am very glad to be asked that question. If the Liberal government had remained in power, I presume that the Laurier bill, passed in 1910, would have followed its course, and that we would have to-day three or four cruisers to protect our coasts. We would not have been forced to buy two submarines which had been refused by the government of Chile, and to pay $400,000 more than the price agreed between the builders and the Chilean government.

Mr. BELLEMARE. (Translation): Is my hon. friend not aware that the two submarines which have been bought in Vancouver are used as destroyers?

Mr. LANCTOT. (Translation): The hon-member surely will not contend that submarines are not a part of a navy. At any rate, those submarines are not in the Pacific ocean, and are not worth any thing because they have not been built in accordance with plans and specifications.

I wonder in what situation we would be to-day if the Government had succeeded in the Senate, as they succeeded in the House, in putting through their famous policy of dreadnoughts, even though the hon. member for Maskinongé managed to get in because of his opposition to all expenditure savouring of militarism to the Laurier navy, and to any war contribution whatever proposed by the Borden Government, claiming besides that he was a representative of the people who would not hesitate to take a firm stand and say: Now, gentlemen, I am here with a mandate of the electors of Maskinongé, I am neither Conservative nor Liberal, I am in favour of the people who have elected me, I intend to keep my pledges to my constituents, and I must protest against all such expenditure made by the Government in power. I have been elected to oppose any government indulging in all such expenditure, either for a navy or for a war contribution. It is the first time I hear him, and he will certainly regret having asked me such a question.

But let us see what has been done by that honest Government which to-day boasts that it has so well managed our affairs during those last three years. The hon. member for Toronto-south (Mr. Macdonell) who spoke after the member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) stated that his party had diminished the debt and completed the Transcontinental; and some of those hon. gentlemen have even gone so far as to say that the Transcontinental had cost this government 116 millions. Let us see what are the facts:

In 1911-1912 the expenditure reached..	$21,110,683.05
In 1912-1913 the expenditure reached..	13,730,733.48
In 1913-1914 the expenditure reached..	12,683,701.97
In 1914-1915 the expenditure reached..	6,511,551.00
Total..	$54,836,679.50

It is true that we have spent some millions, but we have that railway as an asset, whareas you have only the bare expenditure. Since those honorable gentleman reached power, they spent for various other purpose enormous amounts which have given no return whatever. I may first point-out in support of that view what has been going on in the Department of Public Works. There were public works that had to be carried on in the county of Laprairie. I am considering Laprairie, because I happen to know that county better than some others. In 1911, out of a total of $27,000 we have had five-twelfths of that amount and that other seven-twelfths of the money have only been expended in the following spring, after the Conservatives had assumed power. At the time the Liberals were in power, we had only one foreman to supervise the works. What happened after these gentlemen had assumed power? They appointed ten, some people even say twelve foreman, to help spend the other seven-twelfths.

Such are the methods followed by this Government in carrying out public works. there are as many foremen as workmen, a fact that has fallen under my notice, not only in my county, but also, last summer, in the Lower St. Lawrance, where I was then visiting. At the St. Irénée wharf, at Rivière Ouelle and at Rivière du Loup, there were two foreman and only one workman on the job. I must say I was somewhat taken aback on witnessing such squandering of money. At St. Irénée, $5,000 had been voted for the wharf, and that amount would certainly have been sufficient if the number of foreman had not been so large and if there had not been such a waste of money. However, I see that in this year's estimates an additional appropriation of $10,000 has been made to carry the work to completion.

In the county of Laprairie, over a distance of 8,000 feet a highway has been built, varying in height between five and ten feet. With a view of preventing its washing out by the St. Lawrence the district engineer, Mr. L. J. Michaud, recommended the construction of a stone wall eighteen inches thick. That wall was to be cemented in accordance with certain plans and specifications. The contractors did not comply with those specifications, and were content with building a dry stone wall, only six to nine inches thick. However for the purpose of deceiving, the wall was covered with a light coating of cement, which heavy rains washed away in the fall, leaving only a crumbling wall, with gaps of six hundred to fifteen hundred feet. Onlookers were amused saying that the Germans had come during the night and effectively bombarded the place. What is the reason of it? It may be found in the fact that the man who has the patronage in that county is waiting, to complete those works, for the federal and provincial elections. When engineer Michaud wanted to do his duty, he was immediately suspended. I am bound to blame the engineer for not having his duty despite all threats. He should have given up his position, rather than be derelict in the fulfilment of his duty. At all events so far, we have only got a portion of that famous "King Edward highway" on which work was started in 1910.

But we are told; you have also spent money yourselves, and in certain cases employees have been cheating the Government. There does not exist, I dare say, a single Government which is not more or less cheated by its employees. But there is a great difference between the expenditure for which the Liberal Government is responsible and that made by the present Government. Thus, in 1910, the ordinary expenditure chargeable upon the Consolidated Fund, amounted to $79,411,749.12, in 1911, to $87,774,198.32; in 1912, to $98,161,440.77; in 1913, to $112,059,527.41; in 1914, to $127,284,472.99; in 1915, to $140,000,000 and in 1916 it will be another $140,000,000.

One of my political friends was saying to me a few days ago that he had lately met a great politician of this country—now out of politics—and that he had asked him what he thought of the present Government, and if he could see no way to reduce expenses. And he answered: 50 millions could be easily taken out, but I say at least 40 millions.

What is the reason for the increased expenditure? It may be detected in the increased cost of administration. Thus, in 1911-1912, we spent on account of civil government, fisheries, mines, and geological surveys, immigration, quarantine, Indians, public works, customs, dominion lands, post offices; $33,321,660.41. In 1913-1914, for the same services; $50,570, 553.53; in 1915-1916, we are asked to vote $60,230,128.62.

We can thus see that the present Government spends, in round figures, 27 millions more than in 1911-1912. True that the public works of the present Government cost 12 millions more than in 1911-1912. However there remains on civil government account the further enormous amount of $15,000,000. And I am not far from agreeing with the statement recently made by professor Shortt that the 2,000 men who had been removed from office had been replaced by 10,000 newly appointed officers.

But, speaking of civil servants, we do not see everything. The report which has been brought down does not mention the commissions of enquiry which have covered the country, nor does it speak of the secretaries, or of the briefless barristers whom the Government employs the whole year round, and who would be dying with hunger if only this Administration did not happen to hold power.

I will only mention two cases—and there are hundreds of similar ones—Mr. Bergeron who has been a member of this House during some twenty years, and who is costing us lots of money. He has the misfortune of always losing his elections, but finds some solace elsewhere, being secretary of a commission in British Columbia, called the Indian Reserves Commission. From March 1913 to March 1914, he worked like a Trojan and managed to furnish 366 working days in the year. That is a record.

[Mr. Lanctot.]

Mr. GAUVREAU: That was a leap year.

Mr. LANCTOT: At $30 a day and no time lost, Sundays as well as week days. And that reminds me of a story. Once upon a time there was a candidate in the county of Laprairie, when the famous Curran bridge was under construction, and lucky owners of wooden derricks were being paid $50 a day by the Government; and as they were being paid for Sundays the same as for week days, that candidate used to say that the $50 for Sundays were for praying God, so that the iniquities of the Conservatives might be forgiven.

In my county, every one will be of the opinion—and I dare say the hon. member for Maskinongé will bear me out in this—that a man who draws $20 a day may well afford to pay his board. But such is not the case of Mr. Bergeron. I find in the Auditor's Report the following item: 366 days board at $10 a day. Surely, he has a good appetite and it cannot be said that he is a dyspeptic. That makes the good round sum of $3,660 only for board, and you have not come yet to the end of it. That man is also fond of taking automobile rides, and when he travels by railway he takes mighty good care to secure a seat in the parlor car, and at times the state-room.

According to that report, Mr. Bergeron drew both for salary and board $11,180; however the report states further that he has been paid $140 in excess, and I have no doubt, knowing Mr. Bergeron as well as I do, that his account of next year will be reduced in proportion.

But that is not all, and according to the Auditor General, there is, for travelling expenses of Mr. Bergeron in British Columbia, an additional item of $1,568.91 for automobiles, cabs, board, etc.

I have been told that Mr. Bergeron is now in Montreal, and from what I know of him I am confident he will not waste any time.

Then we come to the case of Mr. Ferguson, K.C., who has been drawing $50 a day, and has earned during 317 days $15,850. Besides that, he has an additional account for board, cabs, autos, etc., totalling about $2,000. It may also be interesting to note that the mere printing of his initials on his trunk has cost us the trifle sum of $37.

But there is another man who is costing still more to the country, and that is the hon. Minister of Justice, who enjoys a State pension. In 1867, the object of the legislators, in framing the law for the superannuation of the judges, was to provide for the retirement of those who, by reason of age or infirmities, had become unable to administer justice, and might even inflict grievous losses on litigants. I told the hon. Minister last year that he should introduce a bill providing that, so long as he remained Minister of Justice, he should abstain from drawing his pension as judge. The hon. Minister simply answered with a smile. But this year, he got angry when the leader of the Opposition saw fit to make him the same reproach. So that I am making some headway with my state pensioner. I offered him to meet him in St. Anne division, and discuss the matter with him. I am still waiting for an answer.

It is not his duty, as Minister of Justice to make laws or amend the bad ones? Let him give up his pension, and he will command our admiration. It is true that he would lose $4,666 a year. But I have been told that he has other jobs on hand, in Montreal or elsewhere. What is the outcome of it all? It is that the minister being unable to attend personally to his duties, the salary of his deputy-minister was increased to $10,000. And not only that, but as he spends all his time in administering estates in Montreal, we are obliged to adjoin to him two chief clerks in his department with a salary of $4,000 to $5,000 each a year.

Hon. gentlemen on the other side are always telling us that everything is serene, that everything is all right and that the country is prosperous. But following on the statement of the Minister of Finance, that we may expect a deficit of 200 millions next year, I do not think that those gentlemen are sincere when they thus praise the Government.

There is a talk of elections. Well, as far as I am concerned, I declare that I would be happy to have an election in Laprairie-Napierville, either right now or in two months, and I am sure that the people of the country will overthrow this Government which has so badly managed our affairs for the last three years.

Mr. A. BELLEMARE (Maskinongé). (Translation): Mr. Speaker, considering the grievousness of recent developments, I beg to call the attention of the Government to the following proposal:

"To provide the farmers of each province with seed grain of superior quality and chosen by experts, which would be sold and delivered at cost price to every farmer who applies for it. We should even pay, if possible, the freight to destination. In such manner, we would be sure to see the provinces of Quebec and Ontario with the maritime provinces take to the growing of wheat during next season."

By such means, the Government would greatly assist the farming community, because, after all, a time will perhaps come when the ears of grain will be of greater service on the battlefields than even muskets or bayonets. Indeed, what would be the use, for the Government, of sending soldiers, if the Allies, our friends, should be famished.

The best way to be of service to the Empire, is to make a granary of Canada, and in support of that opinion, I will quote an article of a London paper, the Westminster Gazette, dated 6th of November last, and which says:

> We fully acknowledge that Canada will be with us in the present war to the extreme limit of its resources. But we hope that the recruiting that is going on in England will be sufficient, and that we will never be obliged to make such a call for men to Canada.
> We must not forget that what is required from Canada during the present conflict is a double service. That country must remain the granary of the Empire, and if we are to achieve victory in this war, the men working in the Canadian fields will help us win that victory just as effectively as those who are exposing themselves to the fire of the enemy.

We see in that paper, which is published in the very heart of the Empire, that they set a higher price on the foodstuffs than on the thousands of men who could be sent at our own cost, and a great many papers in Canada proclaim the same necessity.

The Press of Montreal of the 16th of November says:

> The opportunity of increasing our agricultural production is no longer put in doubt. The war will reduce enormously the ordinary output of the wheat crop in Europe. Among the millions of men enrolled under the flags of the nations at war, how many are there not who have been taken away from the cultivation of the land?
>
> Canada contains an immense number of agricultural lands which have never been cultivated, and which are only waiting for the ploughshare in order to yield enormous crops.
>
> As regards the farms already under cultivation, only a little more care and better methods are often necessary to increase the yield two-fold or even three-fold.
> Intensive agriculture is now in order on our continent, because it is easy to foresee the day when the millions of men whose estates have been ruined by the war will expect to receive from our soil the wheat which will save them from starvation. The new world will become the granary of the old world. In view of the present situation, is it not the duty of the Government to lend a helping hand to private initiative, so as to allow the carrying on of the agricultural development which has now become a necessity.

Let me quote also the Devoir of September 2, last:

Of the 20 million men engaged in the conflict, a large proportion, and probably the majority, belongs to the rural class. A considerable number were also engaged in industries connected with agriculture: agricultural implements, chemical fertilizers, manufactures of sugar, dairying industry, etc. From ten to twelve millions of men, who were busy helping to develop the world's patrimony, and to produce the necessaries of life, will now have for their sole object, during the next year or perhaps two years, destruction and devastation.

And elsewhere:

The famine which is threatening the world, if the governments and peoples do not immediately take means to prevent it by drastic and exceptional measures, will exceed in its extent and horror all the disasters of the war.

We see in those two papers that a very pressing appeal is made to the Government.

I will go farther, and I will now quote from the bulletin recently published by the hon. Minister of Agriculture under the head of "The Agricultural War Book."

In that pressing appeal to the farmers of the country, the hon. minister says:

Europe has mobilized about twenty million men. A great number of those men were engaged in the cultivation of the soil, in the countries just now at war. Even in neutral countries, a great many producers have been called to the colours in provision of a possible conflict. It is difficult for us to understand the extent to which the production of the great agricultural countries of Europe will suffer through the departure of so many millions of farmers. And all those men, not only then cease to produce, but they become destroyers.

If the war lasts until next summer, the output of the European lands will certainly fall below that of the preceding years. Even by looking at the situation under its most favourable light, we see that the output of the whole world will be barely sufficient in 1915 to meet the demand for foodstuffs. Canada has promptly answered the call of the Mother Country by sending men and equipment. But Great Britain needs not only men, it needs also food for this year and next year. We are now sending our surplus; let us prepare to send next year a still greater surplus.

We may foresee that wheat and the other foodstuffs will be this year a source of considerable profit to producers, and we may also be sure that those Canadian farmers who, through some additional efforts, will increase the extent of their wheat crops and other crops, together with the number of their cattle, will contribute in the most effective manner to the support of the Empire in this hour of peril.

I desire to call particular attention to those words of the hon. minister: "Great Britain needs not only men, she must have also food this year and next year." Indeed those remarkable words confirm my opinion that we should, even if it is necessary, send fewer men to the war, and spend a little more for agriculture, because after all the sinews of war is presently not so much a matter of money, as is generally thought, but rather wheat and the other foodstuffs.

With the realization of that project, our work will be doubly useful, being of use for the support of our armies and the improvement of the agricultural class.

I have spoken of that proposal at different places, and namely in the county of Maskinongé, which I have the honour to represent in this House. All are ready to respond to any offer of assistance which the Government may extend for the carrying out of that scheme, because I have often heard the remark: "Where can we find at a reasonable price the seed-grain which will be needed right to begin with?"

While visiting my county, I have been able to see by the numerous notices and circulars which are being widely circulated in the rural communities that the Minister of Agriculture spares no pains to give a new impulse to agriculture in all its different branches.

Among the principal means which have been advocated in this educational campaign, I see that they attach a great importance to lectures on agricultural topics. I certainly do not undervalue the importance of the theoretical teaching, but nevertheless we must never lose sight of the practical side of the question; and that is the principal justification of the proposals which I have the honour to submit to the House.

Of what use, indeed, would it be for the Government to send lecturers advocating intensive farming, if nothing practical comes out of it?

We have had in the past many lecturers who have visited our provinces, and the outcome has been rather disappointing in view of the energy expended.

The province of Quebec which is better known to me than any other has magnificent agricultural lands in fine condition, and which would produce abundant crops of wheat; but in order to accomplish that, it must not be forgotten that the farmers will have to be provided with all the seed-grain they may need.

That proposal seems to me of a most urgent nature; because the world's production of wheat, in 1914, according to the estimate of Broomhall, has fallen to 3,615,000,000 bushels as compared with 3,840,000,000 in 1913, or a total shrinkage in the world's output of wheat of 233 millions of bushels.

The United States, in 1914, had the largest crop of wheat on record. It was estimated at 892 millions of bushels, as compared with 763 millions in 1913, or an increase of 129 millions of bushels.

The above statistics go to show the necessity of immediate action and the opportuneness of my proposal.

Should the Government be in a position to do even more towards furthering such a plan, we would be greatly pleased, for after all if it be so important to develop by all possible means the growing of wheat in our provinces, it is equally important not to lose sight of the other foodstuffs which may also be much needed.

With regard to that, I will give an extract from Le Canada, in which I find the following under date of 3rd of December last:

> It is certain that the high price paid for wheat this fall must have been a great encouragement to farmers for the development of that particular crop. Indeed, wheat at $1 a bushel is a real gold mine for the farmer.
>
> Our farmers of the province of Quebec, who as a rule do not grow much wheat, should try this year to sow a few acres of it, even if it be only tentatively, as the high prices paid for that cereal should be an inducement to them.
>
> But, at all events, we must suppose that they will not fail to increase their sowings of oats, barley and peas, because those cereals will certainly remain for a long time yet at prices never reached heretofore.
> Lands should no longer be left in hay in order to save work. Although hay will still continue to be very remunerative this year, the grain crops will certainly be a much better investment.

On the other hand, I am satisfied that the farmers of all the provinces, with the encouragement they will get from the Department of Agriculture, will promptly abandon their old methods of culture and devote themselves on a much larger scale to the growing of cereals, and more particularly wheat.

At the outset, they may find it up-hill work, but there can be no doubt that the results will be far more satisfactory.

As regards myself, I owe it to the hon. minister to state that the country fully appreciates the efforts made by his department to ensure the well-being of the agricultural community and encourage intensive farming, and I have no doubt that the Government will take in very serious consideration the proposal which I have had the honour to submit.

Let me say again that we have here a splendid opportunity to show our practical sense. Let us bear in mind that it is no use to send a lumberman in the woods to fell trees unless he be provided with a good axe.

It may be objected that it will be infringing on the powers of the provinces. I say: No, for under the terms of the resolution of the 4th of February last, which is now before the House, it is provided that 100 millions shall be appropriated for war purposes. I notice in clause D the following words:

> "(d) the carrying out of any measures deemed necessary or advisable by the Governor in Council in consequence of the existence of a state of war."

Now, any measure taken by the Governor in Council may, under that clause, if carried, be considered as necessary in consequence of the state of war in which the country is at present; and it seems to me that the department would be justified in distributing seed-grain in all the provinces outside of the West and in appropriating for that purpose an adequate proportion of the items which will be voted for the defence and the security of Canada and the Empire.

Mr. LANCTOT. (Translation): While the hon. gentleman is on his feet, will he be so kind as to inform the House of his views as to the war tax?

Mr. BELLEMARE. (Translation): What tax do you refer to?

Mr. LANCTOT. (Translation): The duty of 7½ per cent.

Mr. BELLEMARE. (Translation): Well, I hope the hon. gentleman will move against the imposition of such a duty, and then he will find out how I will vote.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, listening to the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury) and the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain), one has to come to the conclusion, if these hon. gentlemen take themselves seriously, and they generally are serious minded persons, that they regard those of us on this side of the House as being a most horrible class of people. The hon. member for Selkirk is very much concerned about our patriotism. But this is not so serious a matter as that which troubles the hon. member for Peel who looks upon us as a lot of poisoners. Apparently, in his opinion, there is nothing that we are not prepared to poison; we poison the minds of the farmers, we poison the minds of the people of Great Britain and there are few things that we do not poison. However, these hon. gentlemen are quite willing to mix with us on different occasions. I am sure that if these hon. gentlemen took themselves seriously they would not consent to mix us in such a friendly way as they do. Hon. gentlemen opposite in this debate are prepared to discuss everything on earth except the Budget. The hon. member for Peel did deal with the Budget for a little while, but he apparently thought it was a dangerous subject and shied away from it as soon as he possibly could. Hon. members are more anxious to find fault with their opponents for their alleged wrongdoings, which have nothing to do with the Budget, than they are to discuss the proposal brought before us by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. White). If these hon. gentlemen, who have so much to say about the failure of the late Government to materially reduce the tariff, would take the trouble to look up some of the financial returns of their own Government and make a careful computation therefrom they would find that had the same average rate of duty, which was collected during the financial year ending June, 1896, the last year in which their friends of the Conservative party were in power in the old days, been charged on the imports of Canada during the thirteen years and nine months from June 1897, the year in which the Fielding tariff came into operation, to March 1911, we would have been obliged to pay in customs duties some $90,000,000 more than we actually paid, and had we during that same period of thirteen years and nine months, paid at the same average rate which was collected from 1879, the year of the introduction of the National Policy tariff, to 1896, there would have been collected from us in customs duties an extra $112,000,000. These sums may seem very trifling to hon. gentlemen opposite but I think they would have some difficulty in explaining them to the people of the country or satisfying the people that these sums were so small after all. I do not propose to defend the late Government because of their failure to decrease the existing duties more than they did. I think they should have made greater decreases than they did but that is no reason why we should not give them credit for the reduction that they did make and which these hon. gentlemen opposite seem bound to deny.

I want to say a word or two in regard to some of the criticisms of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. Wright), who seems very much displeased with the farmers of the West. This hon. gentleman thinks that the farmers of the West have been very derelict in their duty in not sending more representatives here who are farmers. He thinks that they should have sent all farmers here. If my hon. friend would only look at that in a fair way, I think he would come to the conclusion that this only shows the broadmindedness of the farmers of the West. It shows that they only want to be represented here by people who understand their situation as well as that of the whole country and who are able to deal with the subjects that come up here for consideration irrespective of whether they come from the farms or the towns. But my hon. friend is not quite fair to the western farmers or to their representatives. If he takes the trouble to properly inform himself he will find that there are several farmers occupying seats on this side of the House who represent western constituencies even if he does not include myself in that category. My hon. friend says:

> Some time I would like to see some seat on the Opposition side occupied by a real farmer, one of those men who are actually suffering from the conditions that prevail in the West at the present time.

My hon. friend has his wish gratified now. I am actually suffering by the conditions which prevail in the West under the present Government. At the present time I have more money than I personally own locked up in western farming operations, and during the time that the hon. gentleman's political friends were in office before I spent twelve years working on a farm. Talk about suffering! Surely any man who has farmed in the West for fifteen or sixteen years under Conservative rule, or misrule, should have suffered sufficiently to satisfy a harder heart than that of the hon. member for Muskoka. My hon. friend says that he is a farmer. He is willing to admit that I have some knowledge of actual conditions in the West and in that he is more kind than the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) who on a previous occasion in this House inferred that I was not a proper farmer, but merely a miner of the soil. My hon. friend (Mr. Wright) claims to be a farmer and I suppose that he means that he is a real farmer. Well, the Guide calls him a blacksmith and general merchant and agent. If a gentleman who occupies all these positions can be classed as a real farmer I do not see that the time I spend in my law office can disqualify me from being classed as a farmer. My hon. friend also owns a farm in the West, I believe. I understand his farm is in my constituency. I have heard a great many complaints from our Ontario friends about our mining the soil instead of keeping an unlimited supply of live stock. I never heard that my hon. friend was any better in that particular than the rest of us. He occasionally visits his farm in the West and I suppose he gives some directions as to the farming or mining operations carried on there. I have no doubt he rakes off the profit from the mining operations but he scorns to remain and spend them in the wild and woolly West. Instead of that he speeds eastward and spends that money in the more refined atmosphere of Muskoka. In the old days we talked about our buckboard farmers. My hon. friend apparently prefers to be classed as a parlour car farmer or an absentee landowner.

My hon. friends opposite find fault with hon. members on this side of the House because, while we agree that all possible assistance should be given to Great Britain in these days, and while we agree that we should contribute whatever money is necessary in order to give that assistance, we object to the mode in which that money is to be collected by the Government. Their objection is unreasonable but we are perfectly justified in the course we are pursuing because it is our duty to criticise wherever we find the Government failing to collect the money that is required in the way in which it should be collected. At present we know that our forces at the front are engaged in a severe conflict, but it strikes me that the taxpayers of Canada have also a stern battle before them in financing not only the war operations but also the ordinary operations of the country in this time of stress. Our soldiers at the front look to their commanding officer for directions and it strikes me that the commanding officer, if he is a wise man, will take counsel with, and seek the advice and even criticism, of those who are about him. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance at this particular time occupies the position of commander in chief of the taxpayers of Canada but the law requires that Parliament shall be called together to consult with him. I think it is our duty to consult with him with respect to whatever measures he puts before us. If we fail to offer criticism or advice to the hon. gentleman we are derelict in our duty. A clear duty devolves upon Parliament as well as on the ministers. To follow this simile farther; a general at the front is bound to make whatever progress he can, but he is bound also to safeguard the lives of his men. In the same way the minister should feel that he is bound to guard the money of the ratepayers. If he takes more than is necessary to accomplish his proper purpose, he is blameable, and if we endorse such action we are also blameable.

It has been made abundantly clear in this debate that the Government is largely responsible for the present shortage in our revenues; but I do not propose to discuss that at the present time. We have also had a good deal of discussion on the question as to whether or not this is a war tax, and neither shall I go into that question at any very great length. It is admitted on all hands that no part of the money which will be raised by this tax will be used to pay any part of the expenses of the prosecution of the war. It is claimed on the other hand that this deficit has been caused by war conditions, and that may be true as to a certain amount of it. In support of that contention, we are told that in the United States they also had to place extra taxes in order to make good a deficit said to have been caused by war conditions. This illustration of the United States may be very good so far as it goes, but it does not go far enough to help the Finance Minister very much. We are told that the revenues of the United States are suffering because of this war to the extent of over one hundred million dollars. If we try to find out what, under similar conditions, the revenue of Canada would suffer, we must use the test of population, and if we do that we find that Canada's revenue should suffer to the extent of less than ten million dollars, although the Minister of Finance asks us to raise thirty million dollars, and that without touching the war expenditures at all. It seems to me that, while both the United States and Canada are commercially affected by the war, naturally the United States should lose more in her revenue than we, because we are engaged in fitting out a very large force of our own, and the equipping of that force brings a great deal of money to our manufacturers and our traders, and should be a benefit to all classes. Besides this, we receive a preference from the Mother Country in the matter of contracts, because we know that the Mother Country is very anxious to look to us for as much of her war supplies as we can possibly furnish. It is true the United States will reap some benefit in that way, but that benefit must be very much less than ours. There is, therefore, no reason why our deficit on account of war conditions should be even as great in proportion to our population as the deficit in the United States because of the same conditions.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Is it not a fact that the Allies have placed enormous contracts with manufacturers in the United States?

Mr. THOMSON: That is quite true. I have said that the United States is reaping considerable benefit from that, but I am sure my hon. friend knows that if it is a matter between giving a contract to us and to the United States, Great Britain will give us the preference. The hon. gentleman shakes his head, but I do not think he means it. He must be aware of the fact that if we are not getting a preference in this respect it is the fault of our Government, who are not performing their duty unless they see we are getting a preference, but I am quite certain they are performing their duty in that particular and that we are getting a preference. Therefore the loss per capita we sustain will not be as great as the loss sustained by the United States.

I notice that the United States did not raise any part of the revenue it required from customs tariff. It is all raised from direct taxes. It seems to me that, when it was necessary at this particular time to raise all the money we possibly could at the least possible expense to the tax-payer, that was a wise plan. If that were the main object of the Minister of Finance, I am satisfied he would have adopted the same principle as that adopted in the United States, and that he could raise all the revenue necessary to make up the deficit from direct taxes. But I do not think that is the main object of the Minister of Finance; I think his main object is not to raise revenue, but to put money into the pockets of his political friends the manufacturers of Canada. The range of direct taxation adopted by the United States is very much wider than that adopted by our Minister of Finance. It seems to me that if the minister had followed the same wise plan as did the Government of the United States in the matter of direct taxation, and collected from these other institutions at the same rate as he has collected from those where he has adopted the principle of direct taxation, he would have no difficulty as to the required revenue, and indeed in my opinion he would have a great deal more than he will get under his present scheme. I do not purpose going through these particular items that are subjected to a direct tax in the United States and not in Canada, but let me refer to one particular matter. The Minister of Finance lays a special tax on wines, but he leaves other liquors alone. The United States not only puts a tax on wines, but also on ale, beer, whisky, brandy, and other intoxicating liquors. It may be said that if we adopted the same principle in Canada it might affect the consumption of intoxicating liquors, and therefore we would not get so much revenue as we expected. Well, if it did affect the consumption of liquors that would not be altogether an unmixed evil, and I do not think it would render our people any less able to face the conditions. Besides that, the American Government is not only taxing these things to the consumer, but it also taxes the manufacturer of these articles. Of course I know that would seem rank heresy to the Minister of Finance, and we can hardly expect him to adopt such a suggestion. He would not think of taxing the manufacturer. He is quite willing to tax everybody else in the country for the benefit of the manufacturer, but he would not think of taxing the manufacturer, and therefore there is very little use in making such a suggestion to him.

I notice that the Minister of Finance proposes to increase a great number of items in our tariff by 7½ per cent on the general tariff, and 5 per cent on the preferential tariff. I do not know what proportion of these goods the minister expects to come in under the preferential tariff and what proportion under the general tariff. I think, however, that the general rule has been that about one-fourth of our imports have come in under the preferential tariff, and if we make our calculation on that basis we will find that the general increase on the things affected by the proposal of the minister will be 6⅞ per cent. So that if we calculate at 6⅞ per cent on the articles we shall import, that might indicate the extra amount we shall receive, provided there is no decrease in our imports. I am satisfied, however, that the minister has carefully calculated and studied out what the effect of this increase will be. I have made some calculations, and I think I have a pretty fair idea of what was in the mind of the Minister of Finance as to how much he expects the imports of the country to decrease. We can tell fairly well what we have to pay extra on the articles we import. We know that exporters generally sell at a minimum profit. It is not true that manufacturers dealing in the home market sell at a minimum profit, because protection is an institution erected for the benefit of the manufacturers to prevent that, and to render it unnecessary to sell at a minimum profit in the home market. We know very well from experience that the manufacturer does not sell at a minimum profit in the home market; but when he exports he sells as a rule at a minimum profit, because he has to sell at as low a profit as he possibly can afford in the foreign market, where he meets with competition from all the world, and unless he can meet competition he cannot enter the market. We cannot therefore expect that outsiders shipping into this country will be able to sell their manufactured articles except at the old price plus the duty.

The question then comes up as to whether or not our home manufacturers will increase their prices. It is quite plain that the minister has formed the conclusion that the manufacturers will increase their prices, but that they will not increase them to an amount equal to the increase in the tariff. That is quite clear from the conclusions announced here as to the amount of money which the Minister of Finance expects to receive from the extra taxation. If he expected that the home manufacturers would not increase their prices in the least, he would know very well that instead of getting any increased revenue from the tariff by means of the increase which he made, he would get a vast decrease. If that were the case, not only would he fail to receive the necessary money to make up the decrease in the revenue, which he expected to do, but he would have to make other provision in order to get money to pay for the ordinary expenses of the country, because it would be unreasonable to expect that our imports would continue to any fair proportion of the present extent. They would practically cease if the manufacturers undertook to sell at the present prices.

I have looked up the trade returns, and I find that these proposed increases may naturally be expected to affect about $500,000,000 worth of our whole imports. If these imports will not be decreased by the change, and if one-fourth of them will come in under the preferential tariff, we should obtain $34,375,000 from the proposed tariff increases. The minister, however, expects only between $20,000,000 and $25,000,000. Therefore he probably expects that some $40,000,000 of the manufactured goods which we now import will be made in Canada. I think, on goods classified by the Government as manufactured goods, we collect considerably over 25 per cent duty; but if we put it at 25 per cent, we shall lose by reason of the decreased imports $12,750,000. I suppose in that case the Government will expect an increase in the importation of raw material needed for those home-manufactured goods.

The tax on raw material is very low. If we put it at 8 per cent, we shall be making a liberal allowance. If we have an increase of $8,000,000 in our imports of raw material, we shall receive from the present duty and the proposed increase $1,030,000 extra. This amount taken from the $12,750,000 leaves $11,720,000 to be deducted from the sum of $34,375,000 that we would receive, were there no decrease in our importations. This would reduce the extra revenue we should receive from that source to $22,655,000, which is about what the minister expects. I do not believe he will receive that amount. It is quite likely that the imports of manufactured goods will decrease by $100,000,000 instead of $40,000,000, in which case our revenue will drop to about $5,000,000, and the increase in home manufacturers and decrease in imports would require to be only a little more than that to wipe out his whole proposed increase in tariff revenue.

But if this tax increases our home manufacturers even by $40,000,000 and decreases our imports by a like amount, what will be the effect on the consumers? Will the manufacturer raise his prices? Surely he will. Otherwise we may expect the leopard at once to change his spots. If he raises his prices even by half the amount of the increase in the cost of imported articles, there will be a tremendous increase in the cost of living to the Canadian consumer. Not only will the price of the imported article be increased, but the cost of the home manufactured article also. I have been unable to obtain an official statement of our home manufacturers since 1910, but it seems quite plain that the value of our home manufacturers is at least four times that of our manufactured imports. Our imports of manufactured goods affected by the proposed increase will be approximately $400,000,000. Therefore our home-manufactured goods affected should amount to $1,600,000. Let us add even $40,000,000 to that and calculate the cost to the consumer added by the proposed tariff increase, and we shall find that, even if we count only on the home manufacturers charging us one-half of the increase, we shall be paying an additional $56,375,000 into the pockets of the manufacturers. Add to this the $22,655,000 we shall pay to the Government under the proposed increase, and you will find that the minister proposes to collect from the Canadian tax-payer $78,030,000 in order to have a little more than one-fourth of that sum paid into the public treasury. If the increase in our home manufactures and the decrease in our manufactured imports is $100,000,000, the position of the consumer and the public treasury will be infinitely worse. If a general at the front should show such disregard for the men under him as the minister is showing for the money of the Canadian tax-payer, he would be court-martialed.

We have heard a great deal about the campaign for buying goods made in Canada. That campaign is all right, providing it is properly handled; but as carried on to-day it is merely a scheme to rob the public. That scheme is rolled up in the old flag in order to give it an air of respectability. Manufacturers should encourage buying in Canada by manufacturing and selling better and cheaper goods than the consumer can buy elsewhere. They can well afford to do that under the present tariff, which is already largely in their favour. The manufacturers will have no trouble at all in doing that if they will make an honest effort. If they do that, they will not need any expensive literature or public meetings in order to boom this "Made in Canada" campaign. Then the consumer could well afford to pay the extra tax in some other way. But the minister should arrange that what we pay shall all, less reasonable expenses, go into the public treasury. As he has arranged the tax at present, we shall pay $3 or $4 into the pockets of his manufacturing friends in order to pay $1 into the public treasury. This is not a tariff for revenue; it is a tariff for the enrichment of the manufacturers and the enslavement of the public.

As regards the proposal of the Minister of Finance, I have another serious objection, which has been dealt with to a certain extent by other speakers. I refer to the increase in the tariff on goods imported from Great Britain. It is quite plain that Great Britain at the present time is in a peculiarly bad condition as far as exporting goods is concerned. The cost and the danger of shipping her goods are very much greater than they have been in the past, and are very much greater than the extra cost and danger experienced by her greatest competitor, the United States. If the present Government allows Great Britain to come in under the present tariff and charges the United States and other countries 7½ per cent extra, I believe the United States will still be getting a preference and will be in a still better position as compared with Great Britain than the position in which it was before, because the United States has none of these dangers and none of the increased cost that Great Britain has. The minister knows that, and he knows the duty that we owe to the Mother Country in her time of extremity. It seems to me that the minister is more unfair than is apparent from a casual glance at this Budget. In the existing tariff I find there are twenty-one items in which a duty of from 5 per cent to 25 per cent is charged on foreign products, and no duty is charged against Great Britain. But, under the hon. minister's proposal, these will be entirely wiped out, except the inconsiderable items of limes and crude lime-fruit juice. Furthermore, I find that, according to the last trade returns, we were importing about 21 1-3 per cent of our total imports from Great Britain. Under the minister's proposals there are certain exceptions made, certain lines of goods to which the increase will not apply. I find that of these excepted only 18 per cent come from Great Britain. So, the blow to Great Britain is more severe than appears at first glance. We have heard a great deal of patriotism. I am not going to accuse any one of lack of patriotism, but, surely, if such an accusation could rest against any one, it would be against the minister who, at this particular time, when the need of Great Britain is so great, when she is in such a crisis, when the dangers to her shipping are so great, when she is undertaking greater financial burdens than ever were undertaken by any nation in the world's history, places these obstacles in the way of her trade. It seems to me this is the time when Great Britain might have been shown consideration, instead of discriminations being made against her as is done. The Finance Minister makes complaint that others do not show a proper sense of the perspective of the situation. Surely, he is the last man in Canada who can afford to administer such censure as that; surely if any one is blameable from that point, he is the man.

It is alleged that it is necessary to increase the tariff in order to give employment to working men. But what about the cry, "Back to the land," about which we hear so much? What about the statement that there are not sufficient labourers to seed, harvest and thresh the grain necessary for the very salvation of the Empire? Would it not be better to send the surplus men, if we have them, to work the land, to produce wheat, meat, eggs, butter and other things that will be of use to the Empire, rather than ask us to put our hands into our pockets and pay out $56,375,000 to the manufacturers in order that a few men may be employed and our manufactures increased by $40,000,000? According to the Government's figures, that would only give employment to about 18,000 men who, according to the Government figures, would receive only $8,250,000 in wages. We are asked to pay $56,375,000 into the pockets of the manufacturers in order that they may give $8,250,000 to the labourers. Would it not be better to pay that $8,250,000 direct and keep the rest in our own pockets and then give these unemployed men useful employment in the production of foodstuffs beneficial to Canada and the Empire?

We hear a great deal of talk about the farmers. I am not talking about this matter from the standpoint of the farmer, but from the standpoint of the consumer. The consumer is the one to be considered but the Finance Minister considers only his protected friends. The consumers are willing to pay into the treasury everything really needed, but they are not willing to pay untold millions to the manufacturers. It would be better for the Empire, for Canada and for the unemployed that we should pay $8,000,000 direct to them and save the balance of the money, and let these men employ themselves in a way more useful to the country. It would be better for all parties except the manufacturers. But I think the manufacturers have had more than their share; I think they have done well enough; and I think they would be well advised to let well enough alone.

Mr. J. H. FISHER (Brant): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to occupy the time of the House for more than a very few minutes; but there are one or two matters I would like to refer to.

First, I desire to congratulate the Minister of Finance upon the splendid way in which he presented his Budget to this House, and also upon the general satisfaction with which it has been received throughout the country. At the present time, every one realizes that he must bear his share of the increased expenditure of the country and I am quite sure that all classes will cheerfully do so. From my own constituency I have not heard one word of protest or complaint in regard to the tariff, in fact the only complaint I have heard at all came from a Liberal paper which complained that a duty had not been placed on binder-twine.

There is one matter to which I desire to refer before going on with the consideration of this subject, and that is the remark made by the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) the other night in regard to a beautiful village in my constituency. I think I have one of the finest constituencies in the Dominion. The township of Burford is one of the finest in the Dominion, and the village of Burford, which was singled out for attack by the hon. member, is one of the finest villages to be found in Canada. The hon. member for North Oxford, the other night, in reply to a question that I put to him said that a twenty-five-thousand-dollar public building in a village like Burford would look like a palace beside the other buildings. I cannot let that go unchallenged, because Burford is one of the most progressive, up-to-date and progressive villages in Canada; and the fact that I have been able to get a twenty-five-thousand-dollar building for that village should not excite the jealousy of the hon. member for North Oxford. I made him an offer the other night that if he wishes to get a public building for the village of Drumbo or the village of Princeton, in his own constituency, I would give him my assistance, and I was sure the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) would assist also; that in fact we had both been asked by constituents of the hon. member to give him that assistance. The hon. gentleman said, in reply, that he was not aware of it, but his constituents had shown very bad judgment.

That may be the case, but I believe that these places are entitled to public buildings, and I am sure, as I have said, that both the hon. member for South Oxford and myself will be pleased to give him any assistance in our power in obtaining them. The hon. member for North Oxford has been a friend of mine for many years. When I first knew him he was at his best, and at that time, I believe, he was a Conservative. I am sorry to say that since then he has fallen from grace.

He also referred to the fact that there was a vote in the Estimates for an armoury at Brantford, and he wanted to know if we were never going to be done with Brantford. I want to say that an armoury in Brantford is needed, and we are proud of what Brantford and the town of Paris and the county of Brant has done in the way of sending soldiers for the defence of the Empire. Nearly 1,000 men have enlisted from the city of Brantford, Paris and the county of Brant; and if it was necessary I am sure we could send another 1,000. Thus I do not think the hon. member should have any fault to find because we are asking for an armoury for Brantford. It is a military centre, one of the best in Canada, and it is certainly entitled to the amount placed in the Estimates for the armoury.

But by many, if not all, the speakers on the other side of the House the suggestion has been made that at a time like this the Government should curtail the expenditures, more particularly in regard to public works and public buildings. This is not the opinion that I have heard expressed in many places on many occasions; on the contrary, I have heard the opinion expressed that the Government should prosecute vigorously all public works in order, as far as possible, to relieve the situation and give employment to those who are out of work, largely owing to the war. The cry everywhere is that more public works, municipal, provincial and Dominion, should be undertaken in order that the unemployment situation may be relieved to some extent at least. Many municipalities are endeavouring to do this, and in my opinion it is the duty of this Government to carry on all the public works for which they can find the money; and I know that that policy will be approved by the people at large and that the policy of the Opposition, as expressed in this debate, that important public works should be either stopped or greatly curtailed will not be considered to be in the best interests of this country. I hope that the public works which are being carried on in Canada will not only be continued but, where it can fairly be done, increased, thus giving all the employment possible.

There is another matter that does not seem to appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite, and that is the made-in-Canada movement. If I remember rightly, the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) spoke very lightly in regard to this movement. To be sure, his remarks do not appear in Hansard, but I believe that has been satisfactorily explained. I can assure him, however, that the remarks of the hon. gentlemen opposite who make light of this movement do not express the opinion held throughout the country. Take the section of the province of Ontario from which I come. That is an important industrial as well as farming centre, and the people there all firmly believe in this movement. Not alone the artisans of Hamilton, Dundas, Brantford, Paris, Guelph, Berlin, Galt, Waterloo, Woodstock, Preston and other manufacturing centres, but the merchants and farmers as well realize the importance of the made-in-Canada movement. The artisan knows that increased demand for Canadian-made goods means more work and better wages for himself, and consequently more comfort for his family; the merchant knows it means more and better business, while the farmer has learned the value of the home market and knows that it means a better market for everything he has to sell. This view is shared by Liberals and Conservatives alike.

11 p.m.

I should like to read a few short articles on this movement taken from the Brantford Expositor, the leading Liberal organ in the section from which I come, and I would commend these extracts to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. After quoting an article from the Canadian Courier, the Expositor, on the 14th October, 1914, said:

> The Courier does well to impress upon Canadians the serious danger which threatens the Empire as a whole, and the need of readiness for still greater sacrifices than any which have thus far been made. The responsibilities in this regard must not be minimized. But, on the other hand, there is no need to be downhearted. While the war brings serious responsibilities, and must involve a considerable derangement of trade, it also brings great opportunities for adopting measures which will in due time extend our commerce and greatly increase employment. A large amount of business hitherto done by European countries, and by the Mother Country as well, is open for seizure, and with properly directed effort a good deal of it must come to Canada. Then we are being taught, as never before, the advantages of trading more largely within ourselves, and of giving preference to agricultural products and manufactured goods which are grown or made in Canada. There is, consequently, need of courage and determination at this crisis, and if these are properly displayed the time will assuredly come when we will confess that the great sacrifices occasioned by the war have not been made in vain.

On the day previous to that, October 13, the Expositor published an article with the heading, "A Good Creed for Canadians:"

I believe in Canada.
I love her as my home.
I honour her institutions.
I rejoice in the abundance of her resources.
I have unbounded confidence in the ability and enterprise of her people, and I cherish exalted ideas of her destiny among the nations of the world.
Anything that is produced in Canada, from Canadian materials, by the application of Canadian brain and labour, will always have first call with me.

On November 4, 1914, it published another article, from which the following is an extract:

To keep prosperity in Canada and the spectre of hard times out, just means that from now on the people of Canada will consider their own business of first importance, will spend their money for the goods made in Canadian factories. It is the importance of maintaining Canadian pay-roll that puts us all on the same level.

Again on January 30, 1915:

The people are anxious to give preference in their purchases to goods that are the product of Canadian industry, but they must be made more familiar with the nature and extent of these articles. An educational campaign backed up by frequent exhibits in every city and town in the country of made in Canada goods will do much to increase the activity of the manufacturing establishments of the Dominion.

On February 9, 1915, the Expositor contained a number of economical epigrams, of which I will read two or three:

Now that the real estate soap-bubblers are out of business in this country we are again estimating the value of land by the number of smokestacks. There's more money in the made-in-Canada habit than in the subdivision habit.
God made the farm, but man makes the factory. The factories of Canada, created by Canadians are entitled to the admiration of every farmer in Canada.
Half the world does not know how the other half lives, and half the people of Canada might just as well say they don't care how the other half live so long as they deliberately keep them out of work by buying imported goods.

These are clippings from the most prominent Liberal paper in that section of the country. I am sure that after listening to these extracts, every member in this House will agree that the made-in-Canada policy has taken a strong hold on the people of Canada, and, as the importance of the question is better understood, this hold will continue to grow. I might say that the editor of the Brantford Expositor is Mr. T. H. Preston, a gentleman who stands deservedly high in the councils of the Liberal party in Canada, a former member of the Legislature at Toronto, and, if I am correct informed, he was at one time offered the leadership of the Liberal party in that House If he had accepted it I am sure he would have filled it with credit to himself and to the Liberal party. The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) is a personal friend of Mr. Preston, and I am sure will endorse what I have said with regard to him.

There is another matter that I wish to refer to briefly, and that is in reference to dismissals and appointments in the Indian Department. It may be that it would be better to allow the Minister of the Interior to deal with this question, but as I have a large Indian reserve in my constituency I naturally feel somewhat interested. The statement was made by the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) that there had been 135 dismissals and 295 appointments in the Indian Department. As far as they go, these figures are correct; but the statement is not complete. From the statement made by the hon. member for Halifax it would appear that the appointments exceeded the dismissals by 160. But what are the facts?—135 employees were dismissed, 122 resigned, 17 left the service, and 14 died; thus leaving the dismissals, resignations, etc. 288 as against 295 appointments, or a difference of only 7. This puts the matter in a very different light, and what is true of the Indian Department I am satisfied will be found to be true of many of the other departments. I was led to give these figures because I knew that as far as the reserve in the county of Brant is concerned, there had been only one resignation and only one appointment, and that appointment was made at the request of the Indians themselves. I could not understand the figures when they first came out but after getting the correct figures and the complete statement I can easily see where the mistake occurred.

I also wish to say a word in regard to the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Fripp) to permit of the exercise of the franchise by the men who have enlisted for active service. I was not present when this Bill was presented and discussed, and I therefore wish to take this opportunity of saying that while there may be some considerable difficulty in arranging the details as to how the vote should be taken—and I believe the committee are finding great difficulty—I sincerely trust that a satisfactory way will be found to overcome it. If there is one class of men in the Dominion who above all others should have the privilege of casting their votes whenever an election may come, it seems to me that it is those men who have left their homes and all that is dear to them, and are now fighting the battles of this great Empire, and who are prepared to die for her if necessary. In my own county we are proud of the fact, as I have already said, that nearly one thousand of our best young men from the city of Brantford, the town of Paris, and the county of Brant have enlisted for active service. I consider that it would be a matter for regret if these men, many of whom have taken a prominent part in public affairs, should be deprived of the right to cast their votes. I know a great many of them personally, and as I say a great many have taken a prominent part in public affairs, and it does seem a shame that these men should be deprived of the franchise. I know they are great difficulties in the way, but similar difficulties were overcome at the time of the American war, the war between the North and South; and at the election between Lincoln and McClelland, nearly 120,000 northern soldiers in the field cast their votes. I am sure there must be some way of overcoming these difficulties, and I sincerely trust that the committee having the matter in hand will find a solution.

In conclusion—and I think, Mr. Speaker, you will agree that I have kept within my limit very well—I wish to congratulate the hon. Minister of Finance upon his splendid speech, and upon the presentation of a Budget that has, I believe, already commended itself to a large majority of the people of Canada. Let me also say that whenever the present Government may see fit to appeal to the electors I am satisfied that they will again be returned to power by an overwhelming majority.

Mr. B. B. LAW (Yarmouth): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of attention to the remarks made by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Fisher), and I must congratulate him on the very moderate tone of the speech which he has delivered on this occasion. If the hon. gentleman will pardon me, there are only one or two matters in his speech that I care to refer to. The first is the matter of public buildings. The hon. gentleman seems to think that the Government should go on putting up public buildings as in ordinary times of peace. He says that all public works should go on for which they can find the money. That is a very broad statement. I presume that the hon. gentleman means, provided the country can afford it or can borrow the money. I am probably as much in favour of public buildings as the hon. member for Brant, but I think that this is a time when the Government should cut out some of the public buildings which are provided for in the Estimates, and which will no doubt be criticised when the Estimates come up. I believe that the erection of public buildings in different parts of the country is a necessity, provided they are in proportion, not out of proportion, to the population; and many have been built in the last two or three years which were altogether out of proportion to the population.

The hon. gentleman has referred to the fact that the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) was a Tory some years ago. I should like to inform my hon. friend that, if this Budget passes without any amendment, there will be more Conservatives who will have their eyes opened at the next election, and who will turn to the Liberal party and give their support to it.

I should not occupy the time of the House in continuing this discussion were it not that I consider this the most important matter that has been brought to the attention of the people of this country for many years. I wish to say at the outset that I am in hearty sympathy with the Government in asking this Parliament for an appropriation of $150,000,000; and I am prepared to vote any further amounts which the Government may consider necessary in order to prosecute this war to a victory which shall be lasting, which will mean the end of militarism and of Kaiserism, and which will give freedom and protection to the smaller nations of the world. In saying this I feel that I am voicing the sentiments not only of every member of this House, but of Canadians as a whole.

But what I do object to is the levying of increased taxes and burdens upon a portion of the people under the guise that the money so raised is for war purposes. If we look at the present situation of the Government, and inquire what has led to the most humiliating position in which it now finds itself, only one conclusion can be arrived at. I maintain that the deficit of $60,000,000, the largest in the history of our Dominion, which the Finance Minister was compelled to present in making his Budget speech, is the result in part of gross extravagance and absolute waste by the present Administration. The hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) in his speech the other day said that this Budget was historic, and I agree with him. I sincerely trust that Canada may never be called on to witness another Budget with such a large deficit as this. From 1896 to 1911 times in Canada were exceedingly prosperous, due largely I maintain to wise administration and careful expenditure of the public money.

At the time the Liberal party went out of power our ordinary expenditure was about $80,774,000. But what do we find, Sir? Almost immediately upon the present Government taking the reins, Providence seemed to hide his face, and hard times to take possession, and the revenue to fall off. What, Sir, I would ask, would any sane and competent board of directors of any large business concern do under these circumstances? Would they continue to add to their staff of employees, increase wages, pay dividends out of capital, and generally increase their expenditures? I am sure, Mr. Speaker, you would say such a board should be dismissed; but, Sir, this is what the present Government have done, and they cannot deny their record. Instead of curtailing their expenditure, let us see what they have done. Their ordinary or consolidated fund expenditure for the last four years and their estimated expenditure for the coming year are as follows:

1912..	$ 98,161,000
1913..	112,059,000
1914..	127,384,000
1915..	140,000,000
1916 estimated..	140,000,000

I know, Sir, that comparisons are sometimes odious, but I ask you to compare the management of the present Finance Minister with that of the Hon. W. S. Fielding, Finance Minister under the Laurier Administration, and what do we find? When in 1908 and 1909 the revenue was showing a slight falling off, the then Finance Minister commenced to trim his sails and get ready for a storm if it should come. Without crippling a single industrial or other enterprise in Canada, he was able by his sagacity and good judgment to announce in his Budget speech a substantial surplus.

I think the present Finance Minister is also open to criticism for not cutting down his expenditures during the present fiscal year; but can there be any justification whatever for the remarkable and extravagant Estimates placed before this House at this session for 1915-1916, in face of the hardest and most trying times in the history of Canada? I say, Sir, most emphatically no. There can not be any excuse offered whatever, and only one interpretation can be put upon it, and that is that the expenditure of so large a sum under present conditions is only intended for political and party advantage.

I think a fair way to judge any Government, be it Conservative or Liberal, is to a large extent by their attitude while in Opposition, and just here it is interesting to note the manifesto issued by Mr. R. L. Borden, now the Prime Minister, in 1911.

This was the Conservative party's platform in that year:

> The Liberal-Conservative party gives its pledge to carry out the following policy if returned to power.

The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain), in speaking this afternoon, considered that a pledge given by a party or a Government was as sacred as any pledge that could be given in the world and I agree with him. Here is what the Conservative party pledged itself to carry out if returned to power:

> A thorough reorganization of the method by which the public expenditure is supervised. The increase in what is known as ordinary controllable expenditure from $21,500,000 in 1896 to nearly $74,000,000 in 1911 is proof of extravagance beyond any possible defence.

It is interesting to note that instead of the expenditure being $74,000,000 it has practically been doubled under the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite. On April 26, the present Prime Minister, then Mr. R. L. Borden, moved the following resolution:

> That the public assets have been depleted and the public expenditure has been largely and unnecessarily increased by reason of the unsystematic improvident and extravagant methods of the present Administration.

An hon. MEMBER: In what year?

Mr. LAW: 1907. You will find the quotation in volume 4 of Hansard of that year, page 7856. If these words were transposed to apply to the present Government, I would agree with the right hon. the Prime Minister in every word and sentence which he expressed. I would ask if these hon. gentlemen have carried out their pre-election pledges? I leave it for the people of Canada to judge them by their work. They seem to have taken as their model one of their members who, when they had come into power and at the full flush of victory, said: "Dash away and spend the money no matter where it comes from." Let me read some remarks made by the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Geo. Foster) in a speech delivered by him on March 17, 1908, which shows that he cannot be in sympathy with the course adopted by the Minister of Finance and the other members of the Government. I quote from page 5165, volume 3 of Hansard, 1907-8. He says:

In 1890 when the first stress of hard times came the aim of the Government was to lighten the load of taxation upon the people and in that year taxation was taken off the common necessaries of life to the amount of $521,755. In 1891, pursuing the same course the Government struck the duty entirely off all raw sugar, and reduced the duty on refined sugar, and in the years from 1891 to 1895 the relief given to the tax payers in that respect alone was $19,851,995, counting the decreased duties upon a nearly equal consumption.

You will notice that that is entirely different from what they are doing at the present time. He goes on to say:

But, Sir, there was another way in which the Government aided in that time of trouble. It economized in expenditures. I think a Government should always set an example to the country. I think a government ought to act very largely as a business man or as an individual having a business and a home would act, and economize in the matter of expenditures when depression is on.

That is entirely in contrast with what the present Minister of Finance is doing. Instead of economizing, the expenditures are increasing by leaps and bounds and in order to put the people of the country in a position to meet these increased expenditures they are putting on customs taxation and also what they call war taxes. Then the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce goes on:

In 1890 we spent $41,770,332.
In 1891 we spent $40,793,208.
In the five years succeeding we spent on an average in round figures $42,000,000 a year. So that by this economy in expenditure we thereby saved to the country money which we would have had to have borrowed and the burden of carrying which would have laid upon the people. As showing the reduction in this respect, in 1891 $41,702,383 was expended as against $43,518,198 in 1889. In these two ways the country was helped to go through the period of stress and by that help it came out all the better.

I am sure that if the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government had placed the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce in the position occupied by the hon. Minister of Finance the country would not find itself in the position that it is in to-day. He believed, as many in this House and out of it believe, that when times are hard it is not wise to increase the expenditure but rather to economize and thus relieve the burdens of the people. I am sure that when I give the next authority that I am going to refer to on the condition of affairs, namely, that of Sir Thomas Shaughnessy, the expression of opinion will be taken as coming from a man who probably understands the conditions in Canada as well as, if not better than, any one else. Sir Thomas Shaughnessy says:

"The individual, the community, the nation, fully understand," says Sir Thomas Shaughnessy, "that in war times sacrifices have to be made. These they are willing to undertake, as they are necessary for the integrity of the Empire. At the same time they will accept the extra burdens with the better grace if they are well convinced that proper caution and economy are exercised in the disbursement of the extra taxes and the administration of affairs." Our cursory examination of the Estimates does not make it evident that the same drastic cut has been made in the cost of administering our public offices as have been made by the Canadian Pacific Railway or any other well conducted business establishment in the Dominion.

The Financial Post of February 20 says:

We are in full accord with Sir Thomas Shaughnessy when he says that the country cheerfully assumes its special Imperial burdens at this time but the task would be less onerous if accompanied by a public conviction that the administration of public affairs was being adjusted to a war basis as done in industry and commerce generally.

The plain fact seems to be that the Government have decided to continue all public works already started and to maintain current expenditure on a normal basis. No railway, business or any undertaking of a private character is at present on a normal basis. All have had to economize; the Administration should not hesitate to act as the people it represents have had to do. Every department practically asks for more money than it did a year ago, although the taxpayer who furnishes it has extraordinary private difficulties to face, as well as the provision of the sinews of war.

These authorities, I am sure, will not be questioned.

Now, Sir, I wish to say this, if I thought for one moment the increased tariff was for war purposes, and would be kept on only during the present war and its consequences it would receive my hearty approval, with some exceptions and prominent among them the lessening of the British preference. But to my mind it is a tariff for the manufacturers to increase the cost of every article of clothing and food worn and used by the already over-taxed and burdened labouring and poor man as well as the farmers and fishermen, even down to the fertilizers, which is a necessity for every farmer to use in the lower provinces at all events, and the coal oil, lard, beef, pork, beans and many other articles, which I do not wish to take up the time of the House in enumerating, and which our hardy fishermen use, even to cork which is used only and entirely by them. I maintain, Sir, that our fishermen who are habitually risking their lives in the prosecution of their daily duties should not be further burdened with increased taxation, while the rich and affluent who wear silks and satins are not paying any increased duty on these articles. I say, Sir, this is discrimination with a vengeance, but like all protective tariffs it always bears harder on the poor man than on the rich.

I was somewhat amused to hear the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) telling the people of this country that the manufacturers of Canada would not increase prices on their goods, and I shall be glad if such is the case, but I must be allowed to say that I doubt the statement because in many cases the manufacturers do not require much of an excuse to do so. I think this is a time when they will take advantage of their opportunity.

Let me deal for a moment with the reduction of five per cent in the British preference. To my mind this is a part of the tariff that should not have been touched, but if touched at all, it should be to increase it rather than to decrease it. May I ask are these gentlemen who propose this reduction, the same and belonging to the same party, who in 1911 went up and down this country waving the flag and advertising their loyalty from house tops! Can it be possible it is they who intend to borrow from England millions of dollars; in fact every dollar which our participation in this war will cost and thus show their gratitude to the Motherland in this her hour of deepest affliction, when she is sacrificing her best blood; yea her life almost to preserve justice and liberty and to defeat and overthrow forever despotic militarism. I have only to answer that in my humble opinion this is the basest ingratitude. This is not the time to lower the British preference, but rather it is the time to increase it. I believe it would have received the cordial support of the people of this country had the Government decided on that policy. Let me read for a moment an article taken from the Winnipeg Tribune which puts the case in a nutshell. The Tribune is, I am told, an independent paper, and in its issue of February 6, 1915, it very nicely heads this article, "A Trick on the People". The Tribune says:

"Canadian" writes to the Tribune to the effect that he supports a family of five, on a moderate salary, and contributes regularly from his wages "the sum of $5 per month to the Patriotic Fund—$60 per year, which I give cheerfully—and I am ready to give more, if called upon. But," he adds, "my blood fairly boils at the intrigue and the trickery of our politicians. The imposition of a tax of 42½ per cent on the clothing of our soldiers' children, and 37½ per cent, on the shoes to protect their feet, arouses the deepest anger and resentment within the breast of any full-blooded man born with the instincts of British liberty in his make-up. The tax is a disgrace and a humiliation to Canada. It is not a revenue or a war tax as you have well said in your journal. Surely our manufacturers of clothing and blankets are not cripples that they require a tax of 42½ per cent as a bonus; because, as we all know, prices are governed by the tariff. Competition at home is a myth if the Government only stands in and shuts its eyes to the combinations that are formed right and left to bleed us, as our notorious un-British tariff permits."

"Canadian's" feelings are those of ninety-five out of every hundred men in western Canada. Premier Borden and the Hon. Mr. White, have evidently played sharp with the people in raising the tariff on clothing, woollens, and articles previously taxed beyond the highest revenue producing point. It is plainly a protective move, because it is taking, by legislation or by force, money out of the pockets of the vast majority of our citizens and placing it in the pockets of a few. To think that under the guise of "war taxes" such a trick should have been played on the people is enough to arouse the justifiable indignation manifested in the letter of "Canadian."

It will be found that there are a good many people in this country who endorse the views expressed by this writer.

As to the duty on cotton-seed meal, which is not made in Canada, I find that the new tariff will increase the cost to the farmers from $2.40 to $3 per ton. This article is used very extensively in the maritime provinces, and probably in the upper provinces as well. It has to be imported from the United States and the 7½ per cent increase will largely increase the cost of this product, which the farmers cannot do without.

I maintain that the increased cost of fertilizers and feed, which are fundamental to the success of our farmers, may lead to their not using the quantity they might and ought to otherwise use. Just a word as to the tax on fertilizers and feeds used by the farmers. If my information is correct, Great Britain has no duty on plant food. Australia goes so far as to give financial aid to farmers to purchase fertilizers, and even the United States, a highly protective country, does not charge any duty on fertilizers used by farmers. The Farmers' Advocate of London, Ontario, puts the case very well when it says:

While on this point we might also mention cotton-seed meal and cake. This was formerly free, but is now subject to the new impost. It is difficult enough, feeders know, to feed stock at a profit under present conditions and cotton-seed meal has helped them out some this winter, but it is forced up by the new tariff 7½ per cent, or between $2.40 and $3 per ton. This means that it will cost the feeder just that much more to produce dairy products and meat, and yet he is told to produce more. Encouragement is in order. Cotton-seed meal, is not manufactured in Canada. Even the "dumping clause" in the tariff has no application to this material which is not of a "kind or class made in Canada." It seems that there is room for reconsideration of this item.

I sincerely trust, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Finance may see his way clear to leave off the dutiable list this important article of feed, which is so extensively used.

I had intended to refer to the war tax upon patent medicines. I know that this tax is very unpopular indeed, and I have had several letters from druggists in my own town objecting to it, but as I have read in the papers that the minister intends reducing the duty, from ten per cent to four per cent. I presume there will not be quite so much objection to it.

As regards the extra postage of one cent on each letter and one cent on each postal card, the Government is making an absolute mistake in dealing with the matter in that way. In 1896, when the Liberal party came into power, there was a deficit of nearly $1,000,000 in the Post Office Department. Sir Wm. Mulock, who was Postmaster General at that time, reduced the postage from three cents to two cents, and since that time there has been a surplus in the Post Office Department, due very largely and almost altogether to the fact that the postage was reduced. By raising the postage to three cents, the revenue will decline and the Government will have a loss rather than a gain. The result of such a policy will be seen later on.

There is just one matter more to which I wish to refer. The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury) spent a great deal of time on prohibition, although I do not know what it has to do with the Budget. I want to put myself on record as a prohibitionist, first, last and all the time. The hon. gentleman seems to blame the Liberal party and the late Liberal Government for not passing a prohibitory measure. Neither the hon. member for Selkirk nor any other hon. gentleman opposite can point to any temperance legislation passed by the Conservative party during the eighteen years they were in power previous to 1896 or during the last three or four years they have been in power since 1911. If the present Government desire to bring in a prohibitory measure, I am prepared to support and to vote for it at any time. There are one or two other matters to which I would have referred if the hour had not been so late.

Mr. H. B. TREMAIN (Hants): Mr. Speaker, the question which is now before us has occupied the attention of the House for some time; yet I ask your indulgence and that of the House while I offer, in support of the Budget, a few observations which appear to me to be pertinent. I have listened attentively to the criticisms made by hon. gentlemen opposite to the financial statement presented by my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance; and while they are varied and lengthy, they do not appear particularly helpful, since no serious alternative solution of the problem has been advanced from the Opposition benches, for the purpose of making up the deficit created largely through war conditions. It is undoubtedly true that, before war was declared, Canada with all other world communities, was suffering the consequent reaction caused by a period covering some ten or fifteen years of speculation, extravagance and over-development in many lines, brought about largely through unreasoning optimism and the more or less greed of the individual which lures one on to reap a speculative gain where one has not sown the productive crop of earnest, sustained work and endeavour.

We all hear it frequently advanced in a more or less jocular vein, always with an apparent undercurrent of earnestness, that during the administration of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, Providence smiled on his administration and provided large crops and good times for a country apparently governed in accordance with the beneficent plan of the Deity. If this is so, it might logically be expected that the Opposition should also assume responsibility for any unfortunate factors resulting from the policy pursued by them while in power, especially as the seed of speculation sown during that period was nurtured and developed by a lavish capital expenditure in this country on transportation facilities furnished, in my opinion, for years in advance of the present needs of even a country of Canada's potential possibilities, thus materially assisting through these vast expenditures to create in this country an era of extravagance and speculation, the effects of which confront us to-day, making the acute conditions that we are facing through the war and the consequent interruption of trade even more acute. As I have said, it might logically be expected, since the Opposition eagerly point out and take credit for the favourable factors of the situation just outlined, that they should also assume the responsibilities for the consequences of the policy pursued by the late Liberal Administration.

If this point is well taken, as I believe it to be, no doubt the hon. gentlemen opposite might pertinently ask why the expenditure on capital and revenue account shows an increase rather than a decrease since the present Administration took office; but when it is remembered that heavy capital expenditures made by the present Administration were largely placed on their shoulders by the late Liberal Administration, whose committments in connection with the National Transcontinental railway and whose policy with reference to guarantees and bonuses to the Canadian Northern railway, made it imperative that the national credit of Canada be maintained in the money markets of the world, and in accordance with this necessity that these enterprises be carried through to a successful termination. With these facts in view, the criticism of increased expenditure by the present Government on capital account is more or less of a boomerang, if made for the purpose of showing, in comparison, the economy and superior business methods of the late Administration.

My hon. friend the junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) in the role of financial critic of the Opposition, made a speech in his customary good taste; and considering the exigencies of the times and the necessity of providing campaign material to the followers of his party in the country, he carried out with skill and address the task of making the best of the situation in an effort to impress on the electors that the large deficit faced by this country was not created through war conditions, but was resultant from the reckless expenditures of the present Government.

When quoting figures to justify this contention, he, of course, carefully, as becomes an experienced parliamentarian, avoided any reference to the large committments inherited from a Government of which he was a strong and consistent supporter. He points out the necessity of economizing in expenditure—we all agree that this is necessary—but does he particularize as to what public works should be discontinued? I think not. In any event, he does not furnish a comprehensive list of such. He no doubt fully realizes the safety of the policy of dealing in generalities in this respect as opposed to that of particularizing those unnecessary works at present, in his judgment, being carried on in opposition to the dictates of prudence and economy.

He dwells on the amount of money expended on the Civil Service, but does not apparently favour an arbitrary reduction of say ten per cent in salaries. He believes the number of Government employees excessive; but does he advocate dismissals of a large number from the service? It seems to me that in the remarks of my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax, he furnishes us with a shining example of destructive criticism, effective, no doubt, from the standpoint of an Opposition member, who is not obliged to lay down a constructive policy to replace that which he endeavours to discredit, a policy necessitated by the present situation, brought about largely through conditions arising from the war now raging in Europe.

I might also point out that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) in an interesting speech dwells on the fact, and complains somewhat bitterly of it, that in laying down a policy to increase the revenue of the country, the manufacturers are benefited through increased protection. I believe in the principal of protection for a country in Canada's present stage of development, situated as we are adjacent to a great manufacturing country like the United States, whose industries are highly developed and efficient in the production of their output; but at the same time I am not an unreasoning protectionist, and would not personally advocate, save for revenue purposes or to assist in the solution of the grave and acute problem of the unemployed, any further general revision of the tariff upward at present.

But it seems to me somewhat unreasonable to oppose a policy which seeks to increase the revenue necessary to provide fixed charges in the way of interest on our war loan, and also to provide for the carrying on of necessary public works, merely on the ground that at the same time, through some additional protection, it will enable many industries running on half time, or closed down temporarily, to operate profitably, thus re-employing labour, and in this way alleviating the problem of the unemployed, which problem is causing the greatest anxiety to thoughtful students of conditions in industrial centres. Even in the maritime province, which have not been as seriously affected as other parts of the country, only large orders for war supplies, and munitions, prevented the situation at many points from becoming indeed serious. The hon. member from Assiniboia complains that the burden of taxation rests on the farmer. Does it not rest to as great an extent on the salaried classes—on the inhabitants of cities and small towns?—and on all classes alike? Apart from a policy nearly approaching confiscation, how can the moneyed classes be made to bear anything save a similar percentage of taxation on their purchases, to that borne by the farmer, or the working classes, when such revenue is raised through excise or by an indirect tariff tax? The only way to make men of large means contribute in a greater volume to the revenues of the country seems to us to be through the levying of a direct tax on large incomes, say over $20,000 or $25,000 per annum. I am personally not averse to any such methods, but if the burden of taxation is inequitable and does not rest as heavily on the wealthy as my hon. friend from Assiniboia thinks it should, I might point out that the party which he supports, and which, in my opinion somewhat hypocritically, poses as the special friend of the working classes, appears to have made little if any effective effort to solve the problem during the period from 1896 to 1911, while they had the power to do so.

The Liberals were returned on a policy opposed to protection, but the percentage in general decrease of the tariff during their term of office was trifling when considered in the aggregate, as my friends opposite well know.

The difference in the theory of government held by individual members opposite and their putting into practice of these economic theories, dear to the hearts of many of our Opposition friends, is indeed startling, and impresses the thoughtful throughout the country with the fact that the Liberal party out of office were prodigal in promise and in power furnished the country with a striking example of being bankrupt in fulfilment of the promises so prodigally made.

My hon. friend from Assiniboia knows that this Government is rightfully assisting in every way the farmers in the West, by providing a large sum for the purchase of seed grain, a policy in which we all concur. No one appreciates more than I do the economic importance of the farmer, or is more ready to concede that the basic economic prosperity of Canada rests primarily on the development of natural resources, the greatest of which, in this country, is agriculture. But surely, my hon. friend does not contend at the present time, that the farmer wishes to avoid his proportion of the increased taxation which the existing grave situation necessitates levying on this country. I think the farmer of this country is not surpassed by any class in devotion to the democratic principles for which this great Empire of ours is engaged in a life and death struggle, and that he does not ask that he be relieved of his share of the burden which it is our duty to shoulder, so that we in this country may render effective aid to the Empire of which we form no unimportant part.

It appears to me unfortunate that many politicians, in an effort to make capital for their party, frequently engage in an attempt to place manufacturer against farmer, when both are so necessary to the development of an evenly balanced and prosperous nation. The growth of industrial centers means the prosperity of the farmers adjacent to those centers who are engaged in mixed farming, and I hope and believe that the continued growth and development of large manufacturing centers in the West may eventually lead to that large measure of co-operation existing between the majority of farmers in Ontario, Quebec, and the maritime province and the industrial classes in the manufacturing centers.

It is unfortunate that at times in this great country of ours, apparently, designing demagogues for political advantage attempt to place class against class and creed against creed, and thus create jealousies and mutual recrimination that sometimes threatens to bring about sectional divisions of thought on geographical lines. This appears to me not only reprehensible but dangerous. And it is the sincere hope of many people of independent thought in this Dominion of ours, that as years go on, the force of public opinion will prevent this policy being carried out to as great an extent in the future as it has been carried out in the past. Mr. Speaker, I would like to place myself on record as being opposed to the breaking of the party truce. Mutual recrimination on both sides seems to be largely responsible for this. I do not think that the majority of unbiased Canadians wish to see this country, during the war, engaged in undignified strife and the consequent turmoil of a political campaign. This surely would not be a very creditable procedure on the part of Canada and Canadians until absolutely necessary through lapse of time. Even then, in my opinion, Canada might well see what course is pursued in Britain with reference to an election, before embarking in the bitterness of party strife engendered by the widely divergent views held by the two great parties on the Naval policy alone.

It seems to me that some of my hon. friends have been unfair to the hon. the Minister of Militia, even after making the broadest allowance for party feeling. I have no doubt some mistakes may have been made in the Militia Department; the man who does nothing never makes a mistake, but I think that the prompt despatch of 30,000 Canadian troops now gallantly engaged in battling for those principles dear to us, a fitting tribute to the energy and driving power of the Minister of Militia, on whose shoulders has rested a burden far too heavy for the shoulders of many of his uncharitable critics.

In conclusion, I would appeal for a greater measure of co-operation between the two great parties during the grave crisis through which our Empire is passing. When the victory of democratic communities is achieved, over the forces of autocratic despotism, represented by Kaiserism, then and not till then, let our political warfare again be waged, and when the efforts of our Empire and her Allies have resulted in victory, crowning the forces of righteousness, it should be time enough to re-engage in party recrimination and strife in this country.

At the next election the supposed misdeeds of an Administration faced by a gigantic task such as no Government in the history of Canada has coped with in the past, or will likely be called upon to face in the future, can then be brought to the attention of the electorate for a favourable or unfavourable verdict,—until then the interests of the country should be placed above politics, and would seem to me to demand a temporary cessation from petty political bickering and strife.

On motion of Mr. Douglas (for Sir Wilfrid Laurier), the debate was adjourned.

DEATH OF JAMES W. RICHARDS, ESQ., M.P.

On motion of Hon. J. D. Reid for the adjournment of the House:

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM: Mr. Speaker, I think it but fitting that reference should be made to the passing of one of our colleagues in this House; I refer to the Hon. Mr. Richards, of Prince county, P.E.I., who passed to the great majority in this city some two hours ago. Mr. Richards was a man who had a great many friends in this House. He came here with a ripe experience of public life, a man born, I think, but certainly educated as a boy in Prince Edward Island; he grew up to be honoured and respected by his fellows and was elected to the legislature there, occupying continuously a seat in the Legislature of Prince Edward Island as the representative from Prince county for some thirty years. He was promoted to be a member of the Government of his province, and, after serving his province well in that capacity, he was elected in 1908 to a seat in this House. He was not a man who was aggressive; it was a little difficult, perhaps to become acquainted with him; but those who know him best esteem him most. He came to us with a ripe experience, and he has gone from us full of years, having given a full life to the service of his province and of the Dominion of Canada. He brought to us, as I have said, diffidence; but he had an unobtrusive ability which was esteemed and recognized by all who knew him. I am sure the House will be unanimous in expressing regret at the loss of so valuable a member and in expressing sympathy with his family.

Hon. J. D. REID: I had not heard of the death of our esteemed friend Mr. Richards, and we on this side of the House join in expressing our sympathy with the family and friends of the deceased member. I certainly am expressing the feelings of every member on this side of the House in endorsing all that my hon. friend has said. Mr. Richards was a faithful member of the House of Commons, always very attentive, and he was respected by every member. I have had the pleasure of sitting in the House with the late Mr. Richards ever since he became a member. I came to know him very well, and found him to be a very genial, kind-hearted man. We join with the hon. member for South Renfrew in expressing our deep sympathy with the family of the late Mr. Richards in their bereavement.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12 o'clock midnight.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Speaker: HON. THOMAS SIMPSON SPROULE.

WEDNESDAY, March 10, 1915.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

QUESTIONS.

[Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.]

INTERNED ALIENS AT PETAWAWA.

Mr. PROULX:

1. How many prisoners or aliens are interned at the Petawawa military camp?
2. What is the cost per day or week for their board?
3. How many officers and men are in charge at the said camp?
4. Have these officers and men had any previous military training?
5. What is their remuneration?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. 564.
2. 29 cents per day.
3. 1 camp commandant, 1 medical officer, guard, 5 officers, 157 men.
4. Yes, annual training.
5. Lieutenants, per day, pay, $2; field allowance, 60 cents; subsistence, $1.50; captains, per day, pay, $3; field allowance, 75 cents; subsistence, $1.50; majors, per day, pay, $4; field allowance, $1; subsistence, $1.50.

BITUMINOUS COAL IMPORTS.

Mr. GRAHAM:

1. What quantity of bituminous coal was imported into Canada during the year ending March 31, 1914?
2. What was the duty collected thereon?
3. What portion of this coal was imported by the railway companies?

Mr. J. D. REID:

1. 13,754,244 tons.
2. $6,144,582.56.
3. The coal imported by the railway companies is not compiled separately from other bituminous coal importations, in the customs returns.

KINGSTON PENITENTIARY.

Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Is there a Mr. Begg employed in the Kingston penitentiary?
2. If so, how long has he been so employed?
3. Was his name mentioned in the report of the commissioners appointed to investigate the condition of things at the Kingston penitentiary?
4. If so, what did the report say concerning him?
5. Has his position been changed or his salary increased since that report was made?
6. If so, what position does he now hold, and what is his salary?

[M. J. D. REID.]

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. Yes.
2. Since October 1, 1902.
3. Yes.
4. The matter is dealt with on page 25 of the report which has been laid on the table of the House, and whereof a copy is annexed to this answer. (Report filed with Clerk of House).
5. His position has been changed. In view of the recommendation made by the commission, it was thought desirable that Mr. Begg be transferred from the hospital to another department. The salary attached by statute to this new position is larger than that he formerly received.
6. Clerical assistant in the office of the accountant, salary, $1,200 per annum.

WOOL STORAGE WAREHOUSE.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. Has a request been made to the Government for the establishment of a Government warehouse for the storage of wool at Lethbridge?
2. Has a request been made for the appointment of a wool inspector at that city?
3. Is the Government aware that the granting of these requests would be of assistance to the woollen industry in southern Alberta?
4. Is it the intention of the Government to comply with these requests?

Mr. J. D. REID:

1. Yes.
2. Yes.
3. The Government has had its officials considering these suggestions, as well as others that might assist the wool growers industry.
4. Under consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE.

Mr. DELISLE:

1. Has the Department of Trade and Commerce sent the following reply to the secretary of the Metabetchouan Company, Quebec:

Ottawa, January 21, 1915.

"La Cie de Metabetchouan,
Quebec, Que.

Weekly Reports.

Dear Sir,—

In reply to your postcard of the 9th instant, I regret that I am unable to comply with your request, as the Weekly Report is not printed in French.

Yours faithfully,
R. Grigg,
Commissioner of Commerce."

2. If so, what is the minister's reason for not having such Weekly Reports printed in French?

Mr. FOSTER:

1. Yes.
2. The Weekly Report has been issued since 1904, and is distributed to commercial bodies, manufacturers and wholesale business men in Canada. The practice as to printing and distribution is the same as followed since the commencement of the publication, although the quantity has largely increased. From 1904 to 1910 the department had not received half-a-dozen requests for copies in French. During 1913 and 1914 five inquiries have been received for the report in French. The cost of a French edition would be about $4,000.

WAR SUPPLIES—HORSES.

Mr. SAM. SHARPE:

1. How many horses were purchased by the Government in the riding of North Ontario since 1st August, 1914?
2. From whom were the horses purchased, and what was the price paid for each?
3. Who was the purchasing agent?
4. What sum was such purchasing agent paid for his services?

Major General HUGHES:

1. 276.

2. Purchased by Major S. E. de la Ronde, 1914:

3. Major S. E. de la Ronde, year 1914. Mr. A. Z. Palmer, year 1915.

4. Major de la Ronde, being already an official of the department, received no extra remuneration for the purchase of horses. Mr. Palmer was paid at the rate of ten dollars per diem.

Mr. BOURASSA:

1. How many of the horses purchased for the first overseas contingent were sold by auction at Quebec last autumn?

2. (a) What was the total amount received by the Government from the proceeds of said auction sale, and (b) what were the total expenses incurred therewith?

3. What has been the amount expended for feed and care in connection with such horses from the time when the overseas contingent sailed to the date of the auction sale?

4 How many of such horses were offered for sale without finding purchasers, and were either killed or given away?

Major General HUGHES:

1. 481.

2. (a) $25,855; (b) $1,292.75.

3. Estimated, $3,056.

4. None.

Mr. TOBIN:

1. Did the officer commanding 5th Mounted Rifles, Lieutenant-Colonel G. H. Baker, refuse to accept seven horses which were purchased by Messrs. Palmer and Pallister, at Sherbrooke?

2. If so, what were the reasons given by that officer?

3. Did Lieut.-Colonel Baker demand a Board of Inquiry to examine the said horses and report on their fitness for service?

4. If so, has the board been convened, and their report submitted?

5. What is the finding of the said board in respect to the said horses?

Major General HUGHES:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. No.

4 and 5. Answered by No. 3.

[Mr. Sam. Hughes.]

Mr. TOBIN:

1. Did Sir Adam Beck act as purchaser of remounts for the first contingent?

2. If so, how many remounts were purchased by him, and what was the average price paid per horse?

3. What was the average, per horse, to cover all expenses in purchasing the said horses?

4. Were the owners from whom the said horses were purchased paid by Government cheque, or were they paid for by Sir Adam Beck, by his own personal cheque and he afterwards reimbursed?

5. Were the said horses branded at time of purchase, or only after arrival at Valcartier?

6. If the latter, why were the regulations as laid down in Mobilization Orders 1913 not complied with?

7. What qualifications has Sir Adam Beck that would enable him to determine the different types of remounts required for the various branches of the service?

Major General HUGHES:

1. Yes.

2. 334 horses, average price $166.08.

3. $7.50 per horse.

4. Paid by order on Bank of Montreal, signed by Sir Adam Beck, and the Veterinary Inspecting Officer, and endorsed by the seller of the horse.

5. Horses were branded at the time of purchase.

6. Answered by No. 5.

7. Is an excellent judge of horses, as well as being a thoroughly honourable gentleman desirous of serving Canada and the Empire in the hour of need.

Mr. McCREA:

1. Did the Department of Militia advertise, or has it advertised, to buy horses at Sherbrooke and other points in the Eastern townships for the 5th Mounted Rifles now in camp at Sherbrooke on different dates, and at different places?

2. If so, were buyers present at places so advertised prepared to buy horses?

3. How many horses were bought at each place, and at what price for each horse?

4. What were the total expenses in connection with the said buying, including advertising, wages or compensation of the buyers and expenses, also wages or compensation of veterinary, and all other expenses in connection with said horses that were bought?

Major General HUGHES:

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. Actonvale—3 horses: 1 at $172.50, 1 at $172.50, 1 at $190. Sherbrooke—7 horses: 1 at $165, 2 at $300, 1 at $150, 1 at $175, 1 at $150, 1 at $150.

4. Estimated expenses, $129.40.

DUTIES ON MICA.

Mr. DEVLIN:

1. Have representations been made to the Government by any person or persons in the county of Wright since October, 1911, relative to the duties upon the importation of mica?

2. If so, what was the nature of such representations, and by whom were they made?

Mr. W. T. WHITE:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

ICL. RY.—LEVIS STATION.

Mr. BOURASSA:

1. What is the estimated loss as a result of the destruction by fire of the Lévis station?

2. For what amount was such insured, what was the amount of premium paid therefor, and what was the name of the company and the company's agent who solicited and obtained the risk?

3. What was the amount received by the Government in settlement of such loss by fire?

4. Is it the intention of the Government to rebuild said station? If so, will it be rebuilt on the present site? If not, what other site has been selected?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. $57,849.20.

2. Station was not insured.

3. Answered by No. 2.

4. Yes. Positive location not yet decided upon.

G. H. PICKLE, SHERBROOKE.

Mr. McCREA:

1. Is J. H. Pickle an employee of the Customs Department at Sherbrooke?

2. If so, at what salary and what are his duties?

3. Has he been constantly at work, is he, or has he been off on leave of absence, how long, and for what cause?

Mr. J. D. REID:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. The customs officer's name is G. H. Pickel and he has been off duty from April 1st, 1914, to February 1st, 1915, on account of sickness subscribed to by usual medical certificate, and in accordance with the custom that is in force with all departments of similar cases.

A. B. GILLIS, WHITEWOOD, SASK.

Mr. W. M. MARTIN:

1. Has A. B. Gillis, of Whitewood, Sask., been in the employ of the Department of the Interior or the Militia Department any time during the years 1912, 1913 1914 and 1915?

2. If so, what was the date of his appointment, in what capacity was he employed, and what was his salary?

3. Is he still employed?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. No.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

W. J. GALLON, REGINA.

Mr. W. M. MARTIN:

1. Has W. J. Gallon, of Regina, been in the employ of the Department of the Interior at any time in the years 1912, 1913, 1914 and 1915?

2. If so, in what capacity, for what length of time, what was the remuneration and date of appointment?

Mr. ROCHE: No.

PORT OF HALIFAX NIGHT WATCHMEN.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. Were two customs night watchmen at the port of Halifax, Messrs. Connolly and Lavers, recently dismissed from the service? If so, upon what grounds?

2. Have any persons been appointed in their stead? If so, whom?

Mr. J. D. REID:

1. The services of Officer Connolly (aged 62) and of Officer Lavers (aged 63) are being dispensed with, the inspector of customs having reported that they are unable to perform their duties in the customs service.

2. F. C. Graham and N. F. Sutherland have been added to the customs staff at Halifax for watchmen's duties and other services.

GEORGE E LONGARD, BAYSIDE, N.S.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. Was George E. Longard, of Bayside, Halifax county, N.S., appointed to any office under the Government?

2. If so, what are his duties, and what salary is he paid?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Yes.

2. To take fishing bounty claims and distribute cheques in payment thereof. $85 for the season's work.

GEORGE ROBINSON, CAMBRIDGE, N.B.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. Was George Robinson, of Cambridge, N.B., appointed a special fishery officer for the provinces of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island?

2. If so, what are his duties, and what salary is he paid?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Yes, for New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island.

2. To examine streams and afford the department detailed information in regard thereto, to enable it to decide intelligently on the stocking of streams from the hatcheries; to prevent mill owners in New Brunswick from allowing sawdust or mill refuse to pass into the water, and to assist the regular officers in preventing violations of the law. $600 per annum.

CARDINAL STATISTICAL OFFICER.

Mr. GRAHAM:

1. What is the name of the statistical officer of the canal at Cardinal?

5. If so, when, and what is his salary?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. George Reid.
2. April 13, 1912.
3. $1,000 per annum.
4. No.
5. Answered by No. 4.

CARDINAL CANAL—REMOVAL OF HOUSES.

Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Did the Government call for tenders for the removal of three houses which were situated on the Government property beside the canal at Cardinal?
2. If so, how many tenders were received?
3. Who sent in the tenders, and what was the price of each?
4. Who was the successful tenderer, and has he completed the work?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. Yes.
2. Eight.
3.

*The tenders accepted; superintending engineer notified on November 7.

As the offers for the engineer's house were considered too low, none of them were accepted.

On the 29th November, the department received a letter from Mr. C. D. Sargent, superintending engineer, dated 28th November, covering an offer from E. V. Dodge, dated 26th November, of $135 for the engineer's house, which was recommended for acceptance by the superintending engineer and the Chief Engineer of the department, and was accepted.

4. E. V. Dodge. Work is completed.

YARMOUTH MARINE HOSPITAL.

Mr. LAW:

1. Are the drugs and medicines used at the Yarmouth Marine hospital purchased by tender?
2. If not, from whom were they purchased during the years 1913 and 1914, respectively, and what were the amounts paid?
3. How many seamen during the years 1913 and 1914 were treated outside the Marine hospital?
4. Why were they not treated in the Marine hospital?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. No.

2. In 1912-13, $4.20 from Messrs. Ingram and Bell, Toronto. In 1913-14, $91.15 from B. F. Trask, Yarmouth.

3. 1912-13, one seaman at the Yarmouth hospital. In 1913-14, one seaman at the Yarmouth hospital.

4. 1912-13, Seaman Leonard Allan of the vessel Westport met with an accident necessitating amputation of one limb. Upon the suggestion of Dr. Wilkinson, port physican, he was taken to the Yarmouth hospital and treated there at the rate of $1 a day, to avoid expense of having special nurses at the Marine hospital. 1913-14, C. Muise, seaman of the vessel Condor. This sailor was admitted at the Yarmouth hospital on his own request, saying he would defray expenses; when about to leave it was found he had no funds, and upon recommendation of the collector of customs the department allowed fifty cents a day, the same as would have been paid to the Marine hospital.

MATTATALL LAKE POST OFFICE.

*Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Was Alfred H. Bonnyman, of Mattatall Lake, Colchester county, N.S., postmaster, dismissed from office?
2. If so for what cause?
3. Was there an investigation and by whom?
4. Who was appointed to the position and on whose recommendation?

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. No. A petition was received from the residents representing that the post office was situated at one end of the district and recommending that it should be removed to a more central and suitable location. A report was obtained from the post office inspector, which showed that the post office was in too close proximity to the Lake Road post office, being only one mile distant from that office. The Postmaster General directed, therefore, that the post office should be removed to the site proposed, which is one and a half miles further from the Lake Road post office. This necessitated a change also in the postmastership.

2 and 3. See answer to No. 1.

4. Mr. George H. Fisher, on recommendation of Mr. John Stanfield, M.P.

NOVA SCOTIA ELECTORAL LISTS.

* Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Have the electoral lists for any of the electoral divisions of Nova Scotia for 1914, been printed by the King's Printer?
2. If so, what are the divisions for which the said lists have been printed?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. Yes.
2. Cumberland, Halifax, Hants, Kings, and Pictou divisions.

POST OFFICES CLOSED.

* Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. How many post offices have been closed in the Dominion of Canada since January 1, 1914?
2. How many of the total number were closed by reason of the decrease in the business of said offices?

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. 1,255.
2. 35. There have been 1,110 offices closed on account of the establishment of rural mail delivery.

MONTREAL-CAMPBELLTON STEAMSHIP SERVICE.

Mr. MARCIL:

1. How much was paid in the year 1914 for the Montreal-Campbellton, N.B., steamship service?
2. To whom was the money paid?
3. Was the amount computed per round trip, and what was the amount paid per trip?

Mr. FOSTER:

1. $9,615.25.
2. The Gaspé and Baie des Chaleurs Steamship Company, Limited.
3. Yes. $384.61.

SHIPPING CASUALTIES.

*Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. What is the number of casualties at sea and on the inland waters of Canada in connection with sailing vessels of Canadian register for the year ending December 31, 1914?
2. What is the number of lives lost in connection with casualties referred to in question No. 1, if any?
3. What is the number of casualties at sea and on the inland waters of Canada in connection with steamboats or vessels propelled other than by sail, of Canadian register, for the year ending December 31, 1914?
4. What is the number of lives lost in connection with casualties referred to in question No. 3, if any?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. At sea, 82; inland, 3.
2. At sea, 14; inland, 0.
3. At sea, 49; inland, 29.
4. At sea, 38; inland, 1.

ST. JEAN L'EVANGELISTE MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Who is the contractor for the mail service between the post office and railway station at St. Jean l'Evangeliste, Quebec?
2. (a) What is the price paid, (b) when was the contract awarded, and (c) were tenders called for?

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Georges Frenette.
2. (a) Twenty cents per trip, which amounts to $125.20 per annum. (b) 1st August, 1914, for a contract to date from 1st September, 1914. (c) Yes.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

Mr. Law: For a copy of all letters, telegrams, vouchers, pay-rolls, correspondence, specifications and tenders for the construction of the new fog-alarm station at Cape Roseway, Shelburne county, N.S.

Mr. Thomson: For a copy of all reports, petitions, letters, telegrams and other documents in connection with the dismissal of W. M. Thomson from the postmastership at Fort Qu'Appelle, and of any petition or petitions for his reinstatement, and of all correspondence in connection therewith.

Mr. Ethier: For a copy of all letters and correspondence between D. McDonald, superintendent of the Intercolonial, at Lévis, P. Brady general superintendent at Moncton, or any other official of the said Intercolonial railway and Théophile Bélanger, commercial traveller of the city of Montreal, concerning certain claims made by the said Théophile Bélanger for delay of baggage in transportation between Drummondville and Matapedia, in May, 1913, also all reports made bearing upon such claims against the said Intercolonial railway.

Mr. Ethier: For a copy of all petitions, correspondence and other documents in connection with the dismissal of Emile Cyr, postmaster at St. Hermas, county of Two Mountains.

THE BUDGET.

PROPOSED WAR TAXATION.

Consideration of the proposed motion of Hon. W. T. White (Minister of Finance), for the Committee of Ways and Means, resumed from March 9.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of summarizing the arguments which have been presented on this side of the House, on the subject now before us, and to present my views upon it in as concrete a form as possible. When at the opening of hostilities in the month of August last the Government announced that it had offered the services of Canada to the Government of Great Britain, if these services should be found useful, we on this side of the House, His Majesty's loyal Opposition, the Liberal party of Canada, declared at once that to this policy we would offer no objection, but on the contrary that we would give it loyal support.

To that engagement, then announced, we have been absolutely faithful. We would have deemed it contrary to our dignity and to our duty if we had at that moment, by word or deed, in any way impeded the Government in the heavy responsibility it had assumed.

But it would be equally contrary to our dignity and to our duty were we to fail to point out most seriously the laches and deficiencies which mar the resolution introduced by the Government, as it asserts, in consequence of the war, but, as I believe, only under colour of the war.

The attitude which we have assumed has in some quarters been animadverted upon in rather severe language. To the objections which have been urged against our course I for my part cannot pay any respect. The view represented by these objections, if it were to be adopted, would constitute a very serious stricture upon parliamentary institutions. It would mean that parliamentary institutions, while good enough in time of peace, would have to be discarded in time of war. It would mean that the Government, which in time of peace under our system, should be kept under rigorous observation, in time of war should be given an absolutely free hand. It would mean that the Opposition, which in time of peace has the right to approve or to disapprove, to oppose or to consent, would in time of war be inhibited from any criticism, even though wrong were to be rampant under our eyes. I have not so read parliamentary history. If the war with Germany had been wrong in principle, if it had been causeless or purposeless, if it had been without justification, we would have been ready to so express our opinion. For that course there are abundant precedents. There is the precedent of Charles James Fox, who in 1800 severely blamed William Pitt for rejecting the peace overtures of Bonaparte. There is the precedent in almost our own day of John Bright and Richard Cobden criticising and condemning the war of the Crimea, representing it as useless if not criminal—a judgment which, by the way, has been pronounced by history to have been absolutely correct. Here the case is different. We were of the opinion that Great Britain was supremely in the right; that she was engaged in a war the most sacred that she has ever waged. Being of that opinion, we did not hesitate to give to the Government our adherence when it proposed that Canada should bear her share in the war. To that course we have been absolutely true.

We went further: Not only did we give our support to the Government, but we thought it would be more in accordance with the fitness of things that we should refrain even from discussing those domestic problems which always divide a free people. In so far as I had command of my party, I gave directions that no literature coming from a source which I could control should be of a party character. That injunction has been reasonably well fulfilled, and it has been fulfilled under great provocation, because, as a matter of fact—as was stated the other day by my hon. friend the member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham)—every week from the official bureau of the Conservative party torrents of the most controversial kind of literature have been issued. It came to such a point that in the month of December one of my friends brought me a whole batch of such literature and asked me with some indignation: "What are you going to do?" After having looked at it, I said to my friend: "It seems to me that the Conservatives are more partisan than patriotic; we will show them that we are more patriotic than partisan, and we will not change our course." We did not change our course. It would not follow, however, and certainly it was never intended by me nor by any of those who sit around me that, when we were summoned to Parliament and called upon to pass judgment, to sanction or not to sanction the measures brought down by the Government in consequence of the war, we were to abdicate our judgment and to sit here as recording machines, simply to register the decisions of the Government. We are still of the opinion that the war is the supreme issue; but if we believe that in the method of carrying on the war, in the policy proposed by the Government, there be errors of judgment or otherwise, then it is our imperative duty to cry halt, to show the mistakes, to point out the true course, and to use every endeavour to prevent the mistakes from being carried into effect. When we come to matters of this kind, it is always well to refer to England, where parliamentary government is certainly better understood than in any other part of the world. The situation in Great Britain is exactly the same as in Canada. There the duty of the Government and the rights of the Oppositioin have been again and again discussed, and the judgment of the country has sanctioned the course pursued by both parties. It may be well here that I should quote in this respect an article of great authority, published in the Saturday Review, giving opinion upon the very question which exists in England as it exists here to-day. I commend to the House the following language:

The brillant speeches of Lord Curzon and Lord Selborne last week will help to remind the Government that the right of criticism and inquiry is claimed in war time as well as in peace. It would be quite fatal to the Parliamentary system if this right were for a moment in question. It would reduce our political system to absurdity if the duty and function of an Opposition automatically ceased whenever the Government of the day was called on to grapple with a big and critical problem. In time of war, as in time of peace, it is the duty of the Opposition to watch constantly and jealously the men to whom the task is given of employing to the best of their ability the resources and wisdom of the country. In time of war this task mainly resolves itself into finding the right men for the work in hand, and in securing that they shall have all the support they require in material and in authority.

* * * * * *

The Opposition must consider itself as deputed to guard against any wasting of the nation's manhood or treasure. Should the Opposition become aware of, or should it reasonably suspect, incompetence or bad faith in any responsible minister or in any political group, it is its duty to speak out and call the accused to a strict account Such action has nothing to do with party politics.

* * * * * *

The Opposition cannot surrender its right of criticism and thorough inquiry into such matters as these without grossly failing in its duty to the country.

* * * * * *

An Opposition in war time must not be factious, but it must be watchful, critical.

* * * * * *

The Opposition is bound to reserve to itself the right to question the Government, to watch closely and perpetually its political conduct of the war, to express any misgiving or disagreement it may feel frankly and distinctly.

To this I may add the comment of a paper published in this city, a paper which is not unfriendly to the Government; I refer to the Evening Journal. In its issue of a recent date we read:

War and Party Politics.

Australia and New Zealand have had general elections since the war broke out, and some of our Canadian papers are pointing to these as illustrating the fact that domestic politics do not need to be suppressed in war time. Would it not be better to look to the view of both parties in the Mother Country? When the Imperial Parliament met in November, "This," said Premier Asquith, "is not a proper time for dealing with any matter of domestic politics," and the view he thus expressed was taken willingly by both sides. Practically the whole attention of the House was devoted to the war and matters arising out of the war. A fine example of the surrender of party to patriotism was given by Mr. Austen Chamberlain when, with the approval of the leader of the Opposition, he accepted Mr. Lloyd George's invitation to co-operate with him in making the Budget proposals as workmanlike as possible. These proposals were not such as he himself would have submitted, but once they were laid before the House he consented, without prejudice to his own views, to resume the Treasury consultations which proved so useful at the outbreak of the war. By this proceeding the path of the Finance Bill was set free from difficulties which might have hindered its progress.

Mr. Bonar Law held as an exception that every member and every newspaper had a right to attack any member of the government who might be doing his work inefficiently. And nobody questioned that.

I commend these words to the attention of the House. You will see that in Great Britain the Opposition were consulted by the Government as to their financial proposals. This is a matter of record and of history. I might go further than this newspaper goes and say that at all stages of the war, from the first to the present day, the Opposition have been kept in constant consultation by the powers that be; they were consulted as to military operations, and at every step were asked to give their advice. It was not so in this country. We were not consulted. If we had been honoured in the same way—not that I claim anything in that respect, but representing here a great party comprising almost half of the population, having views of their own on many of the financial problems which now confront us, claiming to be as patriotic as the other side, and claiming to have done their duty as amply as was in their power—I say that, if we had been consulted, we should have been happy to give our views as to the policy to be pursued. I do not say that our views would have been accepted; but certainly there would have been an effort on my part at all events to give way on some of my own views, and I might have felt it right to ask the other side to give way on some of their views also, so that we might have been unanimous in policy as we have been unanimous in the objects which policy is to serve. But we were not consulted. I do not complain of this; I have no right to complain. But my hon. friend the Finance Minister has no right to complain either if to-day we have to take issue with him, and take issure sharply, upon the resolutions which he has laid before the House.

In his opening speech in presenting these resolutions to the House, my hon. friend laid the financial situation of the country before us, and everybody admits that that situation is a serious one. He told us that for the year which is to close on the 31st of this month he expects a revenue of $130,000,000 and an expenditure of $140,000,000, leaving a deficit of $10,000,000 upon consolidated fund account. Besides this, there is $50,000,000 of expenditure on capital account and $50,000,000 of war expenditure, making a discrepancy, a chasm, between revenue and expenditure of $110,000,000. The situation for next year is still more serious. The hon. gentleman tells us that for next year he does not expect a revenue of $130,000,000, but of $120,000,000 only, while he expects a total expenditure of $200,000,000, leaving a deficit of $80,000,000. This is exclusive of war expenditure, and when that is added there will be a deficit of $180,000,000 between revenue and expenditure for the year. This is a serious situation, a situation the gravity of which we cannot dispute. The figures would be staggering but for the enormous resources of Canada. They do not stagger me. But I do not hesitate to say that the situation is such that there is danger that Canada will be seriously hampered unless that situation is very carefully handled.

Now, my hon friend has a policy to meet the situation; and what is it? As to the war expenditure, he has been very lucky; he has had the good fortune to have opened for him the Imperial Treasury. He appealed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer has told him that he will provide all the money required for the war. So far as war expenditure is concerned, therefore, the hon. gentleman is free from anxiety; he has only to provide for the other expenditures. But the domestic situation is almost as serious as the other. And as to that domestic situation, the only policy the hon. gentleman has to offer is additional borrowing and additional taxation, a double method which, he will admit, is neither novel nor ingenious. There was another method called to his attention by my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) when he opened the debate on this side, a method which, I am sure, must have suggested itself to him more than once, a method which, if he had adopted it, would have saved him a tremendous amount of worry and anxiety. This method, however, some evil genius prevented him from accepting—the method of economy and retrenchment. The hon gentleman, perhaps, has not yet perceived, though I almost think he must have perceived it, that economy and retrenchment are words not to be found in the vocabulary of the party with which he has cast his fortune.

The hon. gentleman had ample warning of the situation which was coming upon him. He has a very serious task before him, and I sympathize deeply with him in his efforts to meet it. But while, as I repeat, he has had due warning of what was coming, I fail to see any precaution he has taken to meet the difficulty. The prudent mariner when he sees the clouds gathering upon the horizon, at once prepares his ship to meet the danger. He slackens speed, lowers his fires, and keeps his power well in hand. It would have been well had my hon. friend considered that example and prepared accordingly. But he did nothing of the kind. He did not slacken speed, nor did he lower his fires. On the contrary, he threw more coal into the furnace until the supply was exhausted; and when the storm struck his craft he was left pounding helplessly, and helplessly drifting. Is this an exaggerated statement? Is this an unfair presentation of the case?

Let me ask, what has been the attitude of my hon. friend since he took office? He took office in October, 1911. In that year we spent on consolidated revenue account something like $98,000,000. He will tell me—and I agree at once—that for this expenditure he is not alone responsible, that he simply spent upon the basis of the Estimates which had been prepared by his predecessor, Mr. Fielding. Then, take the year following: Instead of $98,000,000, he spent $112,000,000, an increase of $14,000,000. In the year after that he increased the expenditure to $127,000,000, an increase over his first year of $29,000,000. And for the present year, he tells us, he expects to spend $140,000,000, or $42,000,000 over the expenditure of 1912. Thus in three years he spent in excess of what would have been spent in three such years as that in which he took office, the sum of $85,000,000. How happy he would be if he had been more careful and if he had this $85,000,000 to-day in the treasury to face the situation in which he now finds himself. But he has not. Has my hon. friend been made wiser by his experience in the matter of expenditure? Coming to Parliament with announcements of more taxes and more borrowings, can he claim that in his contemplated expenditure for the coming fiscal year he is as economical as he ought to be? Can he say with justification that he could not have applied the pruning knife to the Estimates instead of resorting to increased taxation? In 1912 my hon. friend spent $98,000,000 on consolidated account; this year he proposes to spend $105,000,000 or $7,000,000 more that he spent in 1912, and he proposes to spend on capital account something like $44,000,000. Would it not have been possible for my hon. friend to have cut down those large figures? In view of the stress under which we are labouring at the present time, in view of the necessity of providing money for war purposes, in the face of a huge deficit, does my hon. friend believe that he is justified in making these large demands upon the country? Would it not have been better for him to have gone back to the expenditure of 1912?

It has been stated by almost every hon. gentleman on the other side of the House who has taken part in this debate that we must have large expenditures on public works. I have no objection to expenditures on public works; I quite approve of expenditures on such revenue-producing works as are needed for the development of the country. But are these the kind of public works my hon. friend has in contemplation? It is true that some of them belong to this class. I approve of expenditures upon canals, upon railways, upon works which will give employment to many persons who are now unemployed. But I ask the attention of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House to the fact that there is in the Estimates, to be provided for out of consolidated revenue fund, a contemplated expenditure upon public works of $22,000,000. This amount, which is made up of more than 600 different items, is to be expended upon small works, such as public buildings, post offices, postal stations, armouries, barracks, drill halls, and things of that kind in various parts of the Dominion. Unemployment does not exist in the rural parts of the country, and the expenditure of this $22,000,000 will give no relief to present conditions of unemployment. Would it not have been possible for my hon. friend to have applied his pruning knife and to have cut off a good deal of this expenditure? If I were in the position which I occupied at one time, if I had upon my own shoulders the responsibility of determining these matters, I would have decided that under the existing circumstances, no such expenditures as these should be made during the present year. I admit that some of these works may be useful; but the greater number of them are purely ornamental and all can be postponed. If we had such abundant revenues as we had some years ago, these expenditures might be indulged in; but in these times of stress I think that it would have been better policy to have said: We will cut off all but what is indispensable so that we shall not have to resort to taxation which in view of the prevailing conditions must be doubly oppressive. Whether or not the war is considered, everybody agrees that the financial situation of the country at the present time is serious. Hundreds and thousands of men in all the large cities of Canada are begging for work and cannot get it; distress prevails in all those communities. Is this a time, I ask, to make these large expenditures? I submit, with all deference to the judgment of the free people, that economy and retrenchment, not more taxation and more expenditure, is the proper policy under present conditions. But my hon. friend the Minister of Finance takes another course. Ignoring retrenchment and economy, he goes on spending money as in the days of plenty. Instead of retrenchment, he proposes new taxation; that is the chief feature of the resolution which he lays before us. In regard to my hon. friend's resolution I have this to say to him: in my estimation, although labelled war expenditures and war taxation, these taxes and expenditures are not war measures at all; the object of this resolution is simply to benefit the privileged and protected classes.

The resolution which my hon. friend has brought down may be divided under three heads: first, special taxes; second, a general increase in the customs tariff; third, an increase on British goods. Let me consider in consecutive order these three phases of his proposals.

First, the special taxes. My hon. friend has been extremely moderate in his tax of one per cent upon banks, loan companies, trust companies and some insurance companies—he has not taxed all insurance companies I do not know why; perhaps we shall find out later. These powerful corporations will have reason to believe that they have a friend at court—I should say a friend not at court, but in the very seat of power. The pin prick with which he merely scratches their epidermis will cause them no hurt at all; it will simply create in them a feeling of pleasant surprise that they have been let off so easily. The increase in postage, in one case of 33 per cent, in the other of 50 per cent, is in my humble judgment, a very doubtful experiment; I doubt if my hon. friend will get much revenue from that source. In 1896 the Finance Minister of that day (Sir Geo. Foster), in his Budget speech, made this statement:

> There is now a deficit of nearly $800,000 between the total receipts and the total expenditure of our post office service, and this, I fear, makes the time somewhat distant when what otherwise might be fairly asked for can be granted: that is, a reduction of postage rates in this country.

That is the view which was taken at that time by the Minister of Finance—a man of ability, as everybody knows—but he had not the courage which was manifested by some other men who came after. Four or five years afterwards the Postmaster General was my colleague, Sir William Mulock. He took the position that by reducing the rates of postage he would increase the revenue to such an extent as to wipe out the deficit which existed in the Post Office Department.

After a slight decrease in the first year the revenues immediately became buoyant and have been increasing ever since; so that today the surplus is larger than was the deficit in 1896. Does my hon. friend expect that, by increasing the tariff as he proposes, he is going to benefit the treasury to any extent? It is doubtful, I repeat, and time, and time alone, will tell.

As to the other items included in the special taxes, I have nothing to add to what has been said by my colleagues who have already spoken. But there is one item to which I would call the special attention of the House, and to which I take absolute objection; that is, the taxation upon railway travelling. In my judgment, the taxation in that respect is absolutely unfair to the poorer people, and wholly to the benefit and advantage of the rich. My hon. friend has placed upon railway travelling what he calls a horizontal tax. He provides that every purchaser of a ticket costing over one dollar and not more than five dollars shall pay an additional five cents; and on a ticket costing over five dollars—for each five dollars and, in addition, for any fractional part of five dollars, he shall pay five cents. Further, he provides that every purchaser of a berth in a sleeping car or a seat in a parlour car shall, in addition to the regular charge for the berth or seat, pay ten cents in respect of each berth bought, and five cents in respect of each seat bought. I say that the basis of this taxation is absolutely wrong. There are three classes of railway fares in this country: second-class, first-class, and parlour car. The taxation upon railway travelling should have been graduated so that the burden would fall the lowest upon the second-class traveller, and the highest on the user of the parlor car; so that this tax would weigh less heavily upon the poor, and would weigh more heavily upon those who best can afford it. Let us suppose this tax has come into force. Here are two men going to the railway station to buy tickets say to Montreal. One of the men belongs to the working class. He may be out of employemnt, a man who has lost his job in Ottawa and is trying to better his fortunes by going elsewhere. He has carefully calculated the price of a second-class ticket. He has his thumb upon it, when he is told that his ticket will not carry him over the railway unless he pays an additional five cents. He fumbles in his pocket. He may or may not find the five cents. If he has not, he has to give up his trip. If he finds five cents, he has to give up some luxury, nay, some necessary of life. The other man belongs to the wealthy class, and we have many of the wealthy class in this country, thank God. This man may be a young swell, the scion of wealthy parents, who never yet earned an honest dollar in his life, and who thinks no more of the price of the ticket than of the stump of his cigar. Or he may be an old gentleman who has retired from business after having made his pile. To him the railway ticket is not even a consideration. Or he may be a professional man deriving a large revenue from his profession, so absorbed in it that he has not even a thought to give to any such consideration as weighs upon the mind of the first traveller. He may be one of this class or one of many more. Whoever he may be, he thinks so little of the payment of his first-class ticket that when he has it he does not even enter the car for which he has paid the price. He forthwith buys another ticket which gives him a seat in the parlour car, one of those palaces on wheels upon which modern art has lavished all the luxury of the age. He goes into the car and falls into a seat covered with velvet. If the seat is not soft enough for his limbs, he is propped up with pillows and cushions by coloured attendants. The Queen of Sheba dazzling the Orient, even the Orient, with the splendour and gorgeousness of her retinue and equipage, was not surrounded with such luxury as this modern epicure. And for that luxury a benevolent Government taxes him the sum of only five cents. I ask my hon. friend and hon. gentlemen opposite whether that policy is right; whether they do not agree with me that this tariff was made, not for the poorer classes, but for the benefit of the wealthy classes. If it is true that the poor widow who out of her want put two mites in the treasury of the temple gave more in the sight of God than the rich man who gave much of his abundance, it is just as true that in the sight of that just God the poor man is wronged who out of his want is taxed just as much as the rich man out of all his wealth. I say to my hon. friend that his whole conception of the basis of this taxation is wrong, and I hope that on reflection he will agree with me. When you have poverty as you have it at this moment, when you have want as you have it at this moment, it is not fair that the same degree of taxation should be placed upon the poorer classes as upon the wealthy classes. My hon. friend does not seem to have given any heed to this consideration, and it is my duty to call it to the attention of the House, and to ask my hon. friend to revise this resolution when the proper times comes.

I now come to the other resolution dealing with the increase of the Custom tariff. My hon. friend has told us that his primary object was to raise revenue. Does he call this a war tariff? Does he pretend that when he made that increase he had in view the revenue of the country—that his primary object was to raise revenue? If my hon. friend had had for his primary consideration the raising of revenue, he would have made not a horizontal but an undulating tariff, so as to weigh less or more according to circumstances. If my hon. friend had had in view simply the raising of revenue, and not, as I said a moment ago, the idea of benefiting the privileged and wealthy and protected classes, he would have selected some articles on which he could have raised a maximum of revenue with a minimum of inconvenience and loss. But he has not done that. He is raising his revenue in such a way that he must and will have a minimum of revenue with a maximum of inconvenience and loss to the community. My hon. friend says that we have to provide for the war, and he gives this tariff as a painful necessity of that war. He says that the ordinary revenues of the country will not suffice, and that he must look elsewhere. If that is the object he had in view, I ask him why he put his tariff upon articles which we do not import? What revenue does he expect from articles which we do not import at all? He knows very well that that will give him nothing at all. What is his object, then? Sir, we are living in hard times. Unemployment is only too prevalent; at this moment there are in every community men to whom the providing of the daily bread is an arduous problem. That is the consideration which my hon. friend should have had first of all. What revenue does he expect from the articles which go upon the tables of all classes, especially upon the table of the poor? These articles are not imported into this country, and therefore the tariff on them will not produce revenue. I ask my hon. friend what revenue he expects from the duty on meats, or cereals, or things of that kind. He knows very well that the revenue from these sources will not fill the hollow of his hand. But it is possible for speculators to speculate upon the prices, in order to make wealth for themselves at the expense of poor people. That is what is going on, and my hon. friend has never seen it. He has made his tariff universal. It will profit somebody, but it will not be the treasury of the country that will profit by it. Still, to this there are some exceptions, and these exceptions only prove the rule. My hon. friend has exempted wheat and flour. I do not blame him for it; on the contrary, I quite approve. He did not give us the reason why he did it. He was wise in this; better no explanation at all than a poor excuse. But the reason is very obvious: my hon. friend would not dare to take upon himself at such a time as we are now confronted with to put additional taxes upon the bread of the people. He shrank from it, and we approve of his doing so; but I ask him, if he shrank from placing a duty on wheat and flour, would not a parity of reasoning have forced him also to exempt all other classes of food? He did not think it.

There is another item in the tariff as to which, for my part, I would like to have some explanation. My hon. friend has made a general increase which places an increased customs duty upon spirituous liquors of all kinds. I would have expected that he would have done what has always been done under such circumstances, imposed a corresponding excise duty. He did not. In the month of August, when he increased the customs duty upon spirituous liquors, he also put a corresponding excise duty on liquor. This time he did not; and what is the reason? If there is an article which ought to be taxed, which has always been taxed under all systems of taxation, it is wines and spirituous liquors. But he did not see fit to impose an excise duty. I am told and I understand that at present there is a financial advantage to the distillers of the country in that item. They have to their advantage 7½ per cent upon what they produce, which I understand means 25 cents per gallon upon the total production of the country. I make this statement with some diffidence, because I have not had time to look carefully into it myself; but I have it on good authority that the duty, ad valorem, will produce at least 25 cents per gallon, and, if there is no corresponding excise duty, an immense advantage accrues to the distiller, because the production exceeds 9,000,000 gallons, and that would mean something like $2,000,000 more of profit. That is the situation that we have before us. I charge against my hon. friend that upon this point the principle on which he has acted is altogether wrong, and that the whole thing is unacceptable to the intelligence of the people.

But that is not all. This tariff, says my hon. friend, is a war tariff intended to help England in the most stupendous struggle in which a nation ever was engaged; yet, would you believe it, the last feature of this tariff is to put an additional duty upon British goods and give a blow to British trade. Only a few weeks ago my hon. friend approached the British Government to help him in his difficulty; only a few weeks ago he applied to the British treasury for a loan to help him carry on the affairs of this country and to discharge the obligations with which he is confronted; and, having been relieved of his obligations, my hon. friend returns a blow which, I am sure, never was expected by the British Government when he applied to them for the loan which he obtained. It was only a few weeks or months ago that Mr. Lloyd George, speaking of the situation in which England was placed, stated that in the last resort the battle would be won not by the armies in the field but by silver bullets. And everything that has taken place since goes to show that the judgment of Mr. Lloyd George at that time was well founded. The powerful armies which have been fighting with one another for the last six months with varying success and with no marked result on one side or the other, may continue to do so with little progress. Already it is apparent that this war is to be a war of attrition, that the power will win—shall win—whose resources will enable it to withstand the struggle the longest. Germany understands that to-day. Germany, having failed to crush France, having failed to crush Russia, understands that if she wins at all it can only be in one way, and that is by ruining the trade of Great Britain. If she can ruin the trade of Great Britain she can hope for success; but unless she is able to dislocate the trade of Great Britain, her hope of success is gone. Therefore Germany has adopted new tactics, and one of her tactics is to destroy the trade of Great Britain. She has surrounded the British Isles with a cordon of submarines with instructions to pounce upon every ship that comes in or goes out. To-day we learn that three ships have been sunk in that way. On top of all this, all the trade that may escape the submarines and reach its destination in Canada will fall under the taxing machine of the Canadian Government. Is this what we had reason to expect? Is this the policy which my hon. friends ought to have adopted under such circumstances as those with which we are now confronted? When the policy of decreasing the duties on British goods was adopted in 1897, it was adopted as a bond of union as well as an economic measure, and everybody will agree that it has been reasonably successful. It has increased our trade with Great Britain in such a way as we never expected it would; it has more than trebled our imports; it has more than quadrupled our exports; and under it Canada has been prosperous as she never was before at any time in her history.

I am well aware that this policy never was popular with a certain large section of the Conservative party. They never dared attack it openly; they waited for their opportunity, and England's danger they made their opportunity. If we were not in war times, if we were living now in times of peace, I would remind these gentlemen opposite that that policy contributed in no small degree to the era of prosperity which it was the good fortune of the Liberal party, under Providence, to bring to this country. I would remind them that four years ago, when we wanted, not to let well enough alone, but to make well enough better than it was, when we wanted to improve our trade relations with our neighbours in the United States, one of the arguments of our opponents was that freer trade with the United States meant the prevention of freer trade with Great Britain. I would remind them that there are only two countries with which we trade to any great extent Great Britain and the United States; and I would call the attention of the House to the strange conduct of the victorious party who four years ago would not let us sell to the United States and who this year will not let us buy from Great Britain.

But these are war times, and it is not the occasion to discuss economic problems.

Great Britain is at war, Canada is at war, and when Great Britain is at war and when Canada is at war, to attempt to curtail the trade between Canada and Great Britain is not a Canadian idea; it is at best a German conception: When Parliament met on the 4th of February last we were prepared to go far with our friends on the other side of the House in these strenuous times; we were prepared to give up a good many of our own ideas in order to meet them; we were prepared to make sacrifices in order to have unanimity of opinion; but we were not prepared to go that far, and that far we shall not go. To-day, therefore, we have to part company with them, and for these reasons I move, seconded by Dr. Pugsley:

That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be resolved :

This House is ready to provide for the exigencies of the present situation and to vote all necessary ways and means to that end, but it regrets that in the measure under consideration duties are imposed which must be oppressive upon the people whilst yielding little or no revenue, and that the said measure is particularly objectionable in the fact that instead of favouring, it is placing extra barriers against Great Britain's trade with Canada, at a moment when the Mother Country is under a war strain unparalleled in history.

Hon. W. T. WHITE (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I rise to discuss the amendment proposed by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, and the more salient features of the criticism directed by the junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) against the Budget. But before entering upon my argument I desire to call attention to a remark made by the leader of the Opposition to the effect that we need not complain if he takes issue with us upon this Budget. I desire to say to my right hon. friend that we do not complain. We welcome the issue that my right hon. friend presents upon this Budget or any other issue he may desire to bring forward. We ask no indulgence except that indulgence which is the courtesy passing between members on both sides of this House and between Government and Opposition. Let me say to the right hon. gentleman distinctly that we have no complaint; we are prepared to meet fairly and squarely the issue which he has presented to us.

And, Sir, what was the substance and the gist of the attack made by the junior member for Halifax, the financial critic of the Opposition, against the Budget which I had the honour to present to the House? He said: You have been extravagant in the expenditure of public moneys; the war is not the cause of your financial condition; that additional measures of taxation were unnecessary; you should retrench expenditure and establish an equilibrium between income and outgo. He said further—I desire to state his case as strongly as he would state it himself—that our fiscal proposals were unscientific and inequitable and that the British preferential rate should not have been raised. My right hon. friend to-day associated himself with that line of argument, and indeed so have all other members on that side of the House who have spoken since the junior member for Halifax addressed the House.

My hon. friend seemed to be quite at home when dealing with the topic of extravagance, and well he might. The Administration of which my right hon. friend was the head, and of which my hon. friend from Halifax was a strong supporter and almost a member, with the most intimate knowledge of its counsels, ran such a career of unbridled extravagance—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Mr. WHITE: Yes, unbridled extravagance, especially during the late years of its existence as a government, that its continuation for any considerable length of time would have ruined beyond redemption, during the present generation, the credit of this Dominion.

I speak with a full realization of the gravity and seriousness of the charge that I am launching against the late Government. No man has had a greater opportunity of realizing that extravagance than I have, because upon my shoulders has fallen, in consequence of that policy of uncontrolled prodigality, of utter wastefulness and of reckless extravagance, a heavier load than has rested on the shoulders of any Minister of Finance since Confederation. I am not complaining. I am not the man to complain. I have always been able to see my way through. I saw my way through in the year 1913, when, in the midst of that great financial stringency brought about by the Balkan war and by the shadow of this great war cast before, I was struggling with the consequences of the ruinous railway policy launched by hon. gentlemen opposite. In the midst of this war, which is not only the greatest war in the history of the world, but greater, as I said the other day, than the aggregate of all wars of all history. I see my way through, just as I saw it through in August last, when the outbreak of this tremendous struggle threatened to overwhelm the finances and the commerce of the world. I saw my way through then. I see my way through now, and at no time since the outbreak of this war have the prospects been so good, so far as the country is concerned, as they are to-day.

Upon every debate on the Budget I have heard reiterated, ad nauseam, statements about the overflowing treasury and the rich estate bequeathed to this Government. In the past I have refrained from speaking of the subject, because I have always put national considerations before immediate political advantage in discussing subjects in the House. To-day, while I propose to speak on some of those subjects on which in the past I have remained more or less silent, I desire to say that having regard to my position and to those national considerations, and to possible misunderstandings of my utterances, I shall exercise the restraint which I have always exercise since I have had the honour to occupy the position of Minister of Finance.

I propose to say something about the overflowing treasury and the rich legacy bequeathed to us by hon. members opposite. What is the test of a solvent estate and a rich legacy? Is it that the bank account is not overdrawn? Is it that there is some cash on hand or on deposit? In estimating the value of an estate, do we not take into consideration liabilities direct and indirect, debts owing, notes of hand, endorsations, guarantees given by the decedent who left the estate? Is it a rich legacy, if the legatee with a certain sum of ready money, is left also the obligation of millions of dollars of liabilities? That is the kind of rich legacy that I have inherited as Minister of Finance—some ready money in the treasury, but obligations, not of millions, not of tens of millions, but literally of hundreds of millions of dollars of direct and indirect liability, that I have had to meet since I have become Minister of Finance of this country, obligations due not to any action on the part of this Government, but to the mismanagement and reckless expenditure of the Government that preceded us in office. Did I succeed to a rich legacy when called upon, on account of the flagrant maladministration of the preceding Government, to find, as I have said, not only millions, not only tens of millions, but hundreds of millions of dollars, a very considerable proportion of which is inevitably lost to this Dominion? There is an old saying: "Give them time and the chickens always come home to roost." I propose to see that those chickens rest upon the proper side of this Chamber, that is to say, with hon. gentlemen opposite. The financial chickens are coming home to roost, and my hon. friends opposite cannot leave them with us. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister cannot stand sponsor for the financial chickens that have been coming home to roost during the last two years—and the end is not yet.

To deal with all the aspects of the mismanagement of the late Government when in office would require a special session of Parliament. I propose to deal with only a few of them.

During the year 1913 and the early part of 1914, during the financial stringency to which I referred a few moments ago, we had the burden of completing the railway policy initiated by the Government of my right hon. friend, of repairing the consequences of his mistakes. I say to him now that his railway policy, in its potential consequences, is fraught, and has always been fraught, with the utmost danger to the Dominion of Canada.

Take the National Transcontinental railway from Moncton to Winnipeg, the eastern division. Let me ask my right hon. friend: When he went to the country in 1904 what was the estimated cost of that section? His Minister of Finance in this House estimated that cost at $60,000,000, and my right hon. friend told the people of this country—I will explain his method of calculation, because I desire to do no injustice to him—that the cost would be $13,000,000. He estimated his $13,000,000 in this way: The interest upon $60,000,000 is $1,800,000 a year. For seven years, the period during which no interest was to be paid by the Grand Trunk Pacific, the interest would amount to about $13,000,000. His theory was that, after the end of the seven years, the Grand Trunk Pacific would pay interest at three per cent upon the cost, and that consequently the entire cost to the people of Canada would be $13,000,000. He gave the impression to the people, when appealing to them on this issue, that $13,000,000 would be the cost of this road, and the Minister of Finance said that $60,000,000 would be the cost. What has been the cost? $200,000,000, more than enough to pay for Canada the cost of this great war, in which we are fighting for our liberties, and the liberties not only of the Empire, but, as I verily believe, of the world. The difference between the cost estimated by his Minister of Finance and the actual cost of the Eastern division of the National Transcontinental would pay the entire expenditure for which the Government has asked Parliament under two Bills of Appropriation, namely $50,000,000 and $100,000,000. Were the sections built simultaneously? Was the road built continuously as contemplated by the contract or was it built upside down, wrong end first—as a crazy carpenter would attempt to build a house by starting at the chimney, trusting to leave it in the air while he finished the rest of the building? The line from Moncton to Lévis was built and it was left there, the ties rotting, the rails rusting, trees growing on the right of way, while contractors, favoured contractors, refrained from going ahead with the vital link between Winnipeg and Cochrane. And what is the result? Conceived in 1903; started in 1905, what is the result to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company? What has been the cost of the prairie section by reason of the delay? That prairie section is still under construction after all these years. Will they get through the prairie section, which is still in the period of construction, for less than $45,000 or $50,000 a mile instead of the $20,000 a mile that was estimated? And will they get through the mountain section at less than from $80,000 to $100,000 a mile instead of the $50,000 or $60,000, as was estimated? You ask me, what bearing that has on the question? I will tell you. The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) talked about freight rates. I say that, having regard to the bungling in the building of the National Transcontinental by hon. members opposite, the hon. member for Edmonton should either rise in his place and repudiate the action of the late Government with regard to the building of the Transcontinental or he should never mention the words freight rates again in this House. These things belong to the past, but the evils they entail live after them. Out of the respect I bear my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) I hope that his title as a statesman in this country will not rest upon his railway policy. The cost of this bungling and of the mistaken policy for which he is responsible will be visited upon the taxpayers of Canada to generations yet unborn.

What has this to do with the burdens which I have had to assume as Minister of Finance? On account of the delay in the construction of that road, on account of the position of the prairie section and of the mountain section still in the period of construction without the earning power which they could reasonably have been expected to attain had the line been completed in time, I had to advance $15,000,000 by way of loan to "finish the work" of my right hon. friend as he would put it. And at the last session of Parliament legislation was put through under which we guaranteed $16,000,000 of additional bonds to enable them to complete. Last fall, in order to save this railway of his, this child of his imagination as he calls it, in order that Prince Rupert might be linked up with Winnipeg, I had to find $6,000,000 for that road. And my right hon. friend will rise in his place and criticise me in this House for that action. But it was the right thing to do under the circumstances, and I am prepared to defend it here or anywhere.

And let me ask the right hon. gentleman, who was responsible for the so-called "implementing legislation"? One of my first tasks, one of the first burdens I had to take up as Minister of Finance, was to find the sum of $5,000,000 to hand over to the Grand Trunk Pacific by reason of the judgment of the Privy Council on this so-called implementing legislation, which showed up in the most unmistakable fashion the bungling of the late Government. More than that, in order to save the situation, I had to purchase $33,000,000 of the securities of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada, and they are in the vaults of the Treasury to-day.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: And purchase them at par.

Mr. WHITE: And, as my right hon. friend suggests, I had to purchase them at par. In connection with the implementing bungling and other bungling of the late Administration, I had to find no less a sum than $40,000,000, at a time when the markets of the world showed greater stringency, than at any time, I suppose, in the lifetime of any one here. Yet hon. gentlemen get up and talk to me about the "rich legacy" I had, about the "solvent estate" that was handed over to me. And they call me "the prodigal son" because I had to take care of these obligations which they had incurred. Talk about large families! If obligations were children, my right hon. friend would truly, like George Washington, be the father of his country.

Let me ask my right hon. friend who has made an attack upon me to-day—and I must say I was surprised at its demagogic character; it did not seem to me to be quite in keeping with his ability as a statesman and parliamentarian—let me ask him, who bungled the Quebec bridge? Who let the contracts for the eastern division of the National Transcontinental? Does he say that we should repudiate these contracts entered into by his Administration? For that is what is implied in the criticism of hon. gentlemen opposite. At least $25,000,000 or $30,000,000 will be required before the Quebec bridge is completed—I mean the total expenditure. Who conceived it? At whose instance was the work commenced and the contracts let? Am I blamable because I was obliged to find money for all these purposes, for the purposes of these huge enterprises undertaken, some of them most unwisely, by hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in power?

Now, let me say this to my right hon. friend—and I say it because I want him to remember it and the people of Canada to know it: upon four accounts alone during the last four years $125,000,000 had to be found for works undertaken during the incumbency in office of my right hon. friend. That is greater than the entire revenue of Canada in the year preceding that in which we took office. So that, if he is basing his criticism of me upon revenue as well as expenditure of the year before we came into office, he must write off the revenue for one year.

So much for direct liabilities. But what about indirect liabilities? What about guarantees? Who initiated the policy of guarantees in this country? My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. $125,000,000 were given in guarantees by his Government; $70,000,000 to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, and, I think, about $55,000,000 to the Canadian Northern Railway. Through the action of my right hon. friend these companies became involved with the credit not only of the Dominion but necessarily of the provinces as well, and the result is that we have been obliged to take the action for which we have been most severely criticised by hon. gentlemen opposite and in some places throughout the country. We have inherited not a rich legacy, but obligations such as have devolved upon no Government that ever held office in Canada; obligations for which we are not in the slightest degree responsible. These facts cannot be controverted; I defy any hon. gentleman to get up and say that I did not have to find the money which, as I have stated, I have been obliged to find. With what face does the hon. member for Halifax charge this Government with extravagance! When the charge of extravagance is passed from this side of the House to the other side, there is only one course for hon. gentlemen opposite to adopt, and that is to put up the white flag and throw up both hands, because no possible defence is open to them on the facts.

The hon. member for Halifax said:

> There never was the slightest effort on the part of this Government to establish an equilibrium between income and outgo.

What are the facts? My hon. friend had absolutely no justification for that statement; he knew better. In 1912-13, the year after we took office, we had the largest surplus in the history of this country. I have not changed the methods of bookkeeping which prevailed under my predecessor—that cannot be controverted—and up to this year we have had to our credit as a Government the largest surpluses in Canada's history. Can the hon. gentleman say that we have not established an equilibrium between income and outgo when we reduced in 1912-13 the national debt of Canada by not less than $25,000,000? I want to say this to the hon. member for Halifax and to my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. On March 31, 1914, less than one year ago, the net debt of Canada was less than it was when this Government took office. Let me talk to my right hon. friend about debt. He has probably never been in debt, because he has no appreciation of what it means. He never had any appreciation of the meaning of debt when he was in office, and he needs some education in that respect even now. My hon. friend cannot get away from these figures, because they are official. From September 30, 1911, about the date we took office, to July 31, 1914, the end of the month preceding the outbreak of the war, the increase in the debt of Canada was only $8,000,000. That was under Conservative administration. But for the period of two years and nine months preceding September 30, 1911, the Liberals, under my right hon. friend the present leader of the Opposition, increased the net national debt of Canada by $70,000,000—nine times the amount of the increase—during the same period under Conservative administration. And, forsooth, we are extravagant. Well, I think that from this forward we shall not hear very much about extravagance from hon. gentlemen opposite. What is proposed by my hon. friend the member for Halifax? He says, drop public works. Then the hon. member for the city of St. John, coming along to conduct a sort of salvage operation to pull my hon. friend the hon. member for Halifax off the rocks, says: Let us stop in the Pickwickian sense; in other words, let us slow down.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not a bad idea.

Mr. WHITE: If my hon. friend does not mind, I will give him a little attention later; there is something coming to him, just as there is to the hon. member for Halifax. This is what the hon. member for St. John, quoting the hon. member for Halifax, said:

> They might have wiped out altogether expenditures for public works for the next fiscal year.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is not fair. Read my statement.

Mr. WHITE: I am quoting from the remarks of the hon. member for St. John. Let me ask the hon. member for Halifax this: What did he mean when he said, "Establish an equilibrium between income and outgo"? If he did not mean that we should cut out $60,000,000 of public works expenditure, I would like to know what he did mean. I estimated a revenue of $120,000,000 and an expenditure of $180,000,000 on consolidated revenue fund and capital account. If he says, as he did, that we should establish an equilibrium between income and outgo, that means that we must cut out $60,000,000. The real fact of the matter is that the hon. member for Halifax said a great number of things; he was hedging in the matter.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: All I ask the Minister of Finance to do when criticising my remarks about public works expenditure on consolidated revenue account is to quote me fairly and correctly.

Mr. WHITE: I am trying to quote my hon. friend's remarks fairly. I understood him distinctly to say—and if I am wrong it is open to him or to any other hon. member to correct me—that the remedy was to stop public works. The hon. member for St. John, as I say, was engaged in salvage operations; he was stirred to his depths by the proposal that public works should stop. Let us see what he said. I have it here; it is one of the finest passages in parliamentary history, if not in all literature. He says, quoting the hon. member for Halifax:

> They might have wiped out altogether expenditures for public works for the next fiscal year.

Then he adds this immortal touch, so far as literature is concerned: "That is, if need be."

Mr. PUGSLEY: That was a good word.

Mr. WHITE: What policy did I announce in regard to public works? In my August Budget and in the present Budget I said that there were no new items in the Estimates, that as to public works we should proceed only as the sources of revenue from which expenditure might be defrayed were apparent. I met the situation. My Estimates of last year were $210,000,000. The Estimates I have presented to the House for the coming year are, according to my Budget, in the neighbourhood of $190,000,000; as compared with $210,000,000 last year. Let no man say that we are not trying to meet the situation. But we are not going to lose our heads. We are not going to destroy this country. My right hon. friend, too, and I am surprised at him, is evidently in favour of stopping public works. I want to recall to my right hon. friend, for probably he has forgotten it, just how strongly public works weighed on his mind years ago, just what importance he has in the past attached to the subject of expenditure on public works. I do not know anything that could have been closer to his heart. For what did my right hon. friend say at the Imperial Conference in 1907, on a motion by Dr. Smartt in which it was set out by way of resolution:

> That this Conference—considers it to be the duty of the dominions beyond the seas to make such contribution towards the upkeep of the navy as may be determined by their local legislatures—

That is, by this Parliament and other parliaments.

> —the contribution to take the form of a grant of money, the establishment of local naval defence, or such other services, in such manner as may be decided upon after consultation with the Admiralty.

What did my right hon. friend say upon that occasion? He said:

> I am sorry to say, so far as Canada is concerned, we cannot agree to the resolution. . . We have too much to do otherwise; in the Mother Country, you must remember, they have no expenses to incur with regard to public works.

Public works weighed so much on the mind of my right hon. friend at that time! They weighed more heavily on his mind than the supreme question of contribution to the defence of the Empire. He said:

> Whereas in most of the colonies, certainly in Canada, we have to tax ourselves to the utmost of our resources—

And here he is to-day complaining about taxes!

—in the development of our country, we could not contribute or undertake to do more than we are doing in that way. For my part, if the motion were pressed to a conclusion, I should have to vote against it.

That is the importance and the weight my right hon. friend attached in 1907 to the question of expenditure on public works. He put it even before the matter of contribution to the defence of the Empire. In view of what my right hon. friend said in 1907 and thinks to-day, unless his views have materially changed since, I would ask him what his choice would be to-day if he had to choose between shutting down public works under contract in this country, and bringing down a $100,000,000 Bill, representing what we propose to expend in the defence of the Empire?

Mr. BRADBURY: Public works.

Mr. WHITE: I do not say what his choice would be. I asked that question.

And now I come to the genial and urbane member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley). I was afraid he might be thinking I had overlooked him, but no one can overlook him in this House. The other night I was impressed by a word that my hon. friend used. He does not often use it; it is a word that we would hardly associate with the hon. gentleman, although we hold him in very high esteem and regard. It was the word "sacrifice." He said, in substance, that the Hon. Mr. Fielding, when Finance Minister, had come to him in 1908 when the financial stringency was on, and said: "Really, you must cut down your Estimates." And the hon. member for St. John tells us that he cut them down fifty or sixty per cent. It seems strange that the hon. member for St. John should so willingly cut down his Estimates.

Mr. PUGSLEY: A very sensible thing to do.

Mr. WHITE: We shall see how sensible it was. I always finish stronger than I begin. This was a case of such conspicuous, such unusual, such extraordinary sacrifice on the part of my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Public Works, knowing his predilection for public works as I did, that I looked this matter up, and this is what I found—too bad all these figures are on record. In 1906 the Estimates were $14,000,000. In 1907, for nine months, $10,000,000, which is about $13,000,000 for the whole year; and in 1908, after my hon. friend had made the sacrifice, $15,000,000. What a sacrifice was that, my countrymen! And what a job he was putting upon the Minister of Finance if he presented Estimates for double that amount, that is, $30,000,000, as compared with $13,000,000 the previous year. Of course he could afford to cut them down. He probably put the $30,000,000 in so that he could cut it down to $15,000,000, and still be considered in excess of the previous year. What year was that? An election year, 1908. It seems passing strange that the ex-Minister of Public Works should in such a year, an election year, say just as a matter of course: "Oh, well, my colleague, the Minister of Finance, has just cut mine down fifty or even sixty per cent; but it is a sacrifice which I am glad to make at this time."

Now, then, have we heard enough on the question of extravagance, that charge put forward against this Government? I say, Mr. Speaker, that the late Government were inventors, originators, parents, progenitors and propagators of the most inordinate, reckless, purblind and wilful extravagance that this country or any other British country has ever known. And the figures I have given and the statements I have made prove it. My hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) put forward a most extraordinary assertion, and this time I will quote it. This is the statement he made in criticism of the Budget, and this is the second heading that I shall deal with:

I am of the opinion that our customs revenue will be found to have fallen but little as the result of the war. . . . I personally do not believe our loss in revenue is in any substantial degree attributable to the war.

That was a most extraordinary statement for the financial critic of the Opposition to make. I said the other night, and I desire to say it now as a foundation for the observations I propose to make, that there are certain things in this House that are taken as presumed; and one of them is the personal loyalty of every man in this House. If I have to say that my hon. friend from Halifax is not or was not aware of the effect of this war upon the trade of the world, that he has no adequate realization of its consequences, I do not desire to be taken as in any way reflecting upon his loyalty, because the two ideas are not in the least connected. It is not necessary that I should explain that to a man of the intelligence of my hon. friend from Halifax.

Let me point out to this House what was the situation created by this war not only in this country but in other countries. Stock exchanges of the world closed, trade cut off at once, automatically, with all enemy countries, international exchange absolutely collapsed, no transactions internationally possible financially and few commercially because the German raiders were threatening the commerce of the seas, finance and commerce all over the world almost prostrate, freights increased, risks of shipping so great that ship owners would not hazard ocean trips! Yet my hon. friend from Halifax says that in his opinion it ought to have had no appreciable effect upon our customs receipts. I pointed out in my Budget speech that this Dominion had been borrowing no less a sum than $1,000,000 a day up to the time of the outbreak of the war. That borrowing was cut through as with a sword. How did we bring in the million dollars a day that we borrowed? My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) is an economist of repute and even of renown. I ask him: how did we bring in the million dollars a day that we borrowed? Did we bring it in in gold? My hon. friend from Red Deer will be able to explain to the House that you could not bring it in in the form of gold. Great Britain would never part with a million dollars a day in gold. When we borrow in Great Britain we really import our borrowings; they may not come from Great Britain, they may come from some other country. In the past we have been importing from Great Britain and the United States but the million dollars a day that we borrowed from Great Britain came in in the form of imports. How do I raise my customs revenue? From imports. My hon. friend's proposition is that you can cut off borrowings of a million dollars a day, and cut off imports representing a million dollars a day, and yet there will be no effect upon your revenue. A million dollars a day represents $300,000,000 and more per year and my hon. friend says that it will have no effect whatever upon the customs revenue of the Dominion. I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is an affront to the intelligence of this House to argue that the war has had no effect upon the revenue of Canada. That cessation of borrowing at once diminished building operations throughout this whole country. Buildings that were under way, railway construction that was projected, stopped instanter. Why? —because the funds were not forthcoming. Moratory legislation in London prevented for months the payment of even the funds which have been provided for in advance. Yet my hon. friend says that it ought to have no effect upon the revenues of the country. My hon. friend pays an unintended compliment to this Government if he asserts that Canada is the sole exception in all this world and that the war on the gigantic scale upon which it has been waged has not had any appreciable effect upon the imports of this country. Let me give my hon. friend a few figures and I shall use figures very sparingly. These are official figures and they are not open to contradiction. Take the foreign trade of the United Kingdom; there was a decrease in imports in July last of 3.9 per cent. In June it had been only .1 per cent. In August, such was the effect of the war, that the imports of the United Kingdom dropped 24.3 per cent; in September 26.6 per cent; in October 28.1 per cent and in November 18.2 per cent.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Is that as compared with the previous year?

Mr. WHITE: As compared with the previous year, showing that the imports of the United Kingdom, which had begun to drop by July, decreased 24, 26 and 28 per cent for the months succeeding the outbreak of the war and the argument is that the war has had no effect upon Canadian imports. Take the United States, the great Republic to the south of us, and what is the position there? Why, the position is very similar. There had been an increase in United States imports to the end of July. In the months of March, April, May, June and July the increases in the imports were 17.6 per cent, 18.9 per cent, 22.8 per cent, 20 per cent and 14.8 per cent. Then what happened? Then came the war, and when I stated the other night that the war came along, arguing that it had had a definite effect upon this country's trade, I was met with a burst of laughter. The returns of the United States show that up to the month of July there had been an increase in imports from abroad. In August there was a 5.7 per cent decrease, in September an 18.1 per cent decrease, in October a 3.6 per cent increase, in November 14.7 per cent decrease and in December a 37.7 per cent decrease. The same is true of Australia and I have the record in my hand.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Give the figures for Australia.

Mr. WHITE: I do not want to weary the House. The returns for Australia for the months of March, April, May, June and July showed an increase of 17·3 per cent, 4 per cent, 15·4 per cent, 2·9 per cent, and 11·9 per cent respectively. Then what happened when the war broke out? In August there was a decrease of 4·5 per cent; September a decrease of 30·5 per cent, and in October a decrease of 28·3 per cent. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite tell me that the war has had no effect upon the revenues of this country. The sole exception in all the world is Canada ! What a compliment—an unintentional compliment—to this Government that could bring about such a modern miracle !

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is not a compliment to this Government, but it is a compliment to Canada.

Mr. WHITE: I am very glad that my hon. friend has interrupted me, because I recall something that I had inadvertently overlooked. My hon. friend was speaking about the way they acted during the consulship of Plancus. Hon. gentlemen who have read their Horace will remember the consulship of Plancus, who flourished in the days of ancient Rome. Let me tell my hon. friend what happened in the year 1908, the year to which my hon. friend wanted to draw our attention. What were the total estimates for nine months of the year 1907, the year of the great panic ? They were $75,000,000, or for the whole year, $100,000,000. Next year, 1908, the year in which my hon. friend made, not a sacrifice hit but a sacrifice, the estimates of expenditure were $124,000,000, and in 1909 they were $133,000,000. Excelsior was his motto.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does that include capital as well as current expenditure ?

Mr. WHITE: The same kind of money is required to provide for capital expenditure as is required to provide for current expenditure. I want to please my hon. friend. He knows how I would like to please him, and I have the figures. If my hon. friend—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will my hon. friend answer the question ?

Mr. WHITE: Certainly I will answer the question when I come to it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Well, you have stated that the amount of the expenditure, or the estimates for 1908 was $124,000,000. Does not that include a large amount of capital expenditure ?

Mr. WHITE: Undoubtedly. It includes all the Estimates.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would it not include over $40,000,000 of capital expenditure ?

[Mr. W. T. White.]

Mr. WHITE: I would not say how much. I said that the total Estimates were $124,000,000 for 1908.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Capital expenditure is very different from current expenditure.

Mr. WHITE: We will come to that in a moment. We expect patience from my hon. friend, because we associate with him an almost Jovian complacency. The total expenditure in 1905-6 was $83,000,000, and in 1911-12, only five years afterwards, it was $137,000,000. My hon. friend has asked me as to consolidated fund expenditure, and I answer him that in 1905-6 it was $67,000,000 and in 1911-12 it was $98,000,000. My hon. friend has also asked me about capital expenditure. The minor public works do not trouble a finance minister; what troubles him are these great undertakings we have inherited from the Liberal Government. It is not a question of finding a few dollars for a post office; it is a question of finding tens of millions of dollars, a considerable portion of which will be lost to the Dominion, in respect to some of these ill-advised projects which were undertaken by hon. gentlemen opposite. The capital expenditure in 1905-06 was $12,000,000, and in 1908-09, under this excelsior policy—I had almost said this German policy of extension—it had reached $42,000,000, or 3½ times what it was four years before. And yet I am charged with extravagance by these gentlemen opposite. Let me ask my hon. friend how he met that?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Why don't you answer his question?

Mr. WHITE: I have answered it.

Mr. MACLEAN: You have not touched upon it at all.

Mr. WHITE: I have at hand no figures other than what I have given, but I may before I finish be able to answer the precise question put by my hon. friend.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister will get these figures?

Mr. WHITE: I will get them and they will discomfit my hon. friend considerably. Let me ask hon. gentlemen opposite how they provided this money that they required to meet the rising expenditure in 1905, 1906, 1907, and 1908, which culminated in the enormous expenditure of 1911-12. Let us see what is the difference made by them between the British preference in the year 1900 and the British preference in 1907. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) put a statement as to this upon Hansard, and I have it here, and I will ask the right hon. the leader of the Opposition one or two questions concerning it. I want to test him and to find out whether he is absolutely—I am not permitted to use the word "sincere"—but whether he is really in earnest in asking why we raised the British preference. I ask my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, and I ask my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) who is to follow me in this debate, to give attention to what I say now. I ask my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition why did he, as shown by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), raise the British preference on dry white lead from 3½ per cent to 20 per cent; why did he raise the British preference upon white lead in oil from 16⅔ per cent to 30 per cent, or just about double, and why, above all, and to this I direct the particular attention of the hon. member for Red Deer, did he raise the British preferential rate on wool cloth from 23⅓ per cent to 30 per cent; why did he increase the British preference on wool clothing from 23⅓ per cent to 30 per cent; why did he increase the British preference on silk clothing from 23⅓ per cent to 30 per cent; why did he raise the British preference on paints from 16⅔ per cent to 20 per cent; on varnishes from 13⅓ cents per gallon and 13⅓ per cent ad valorem to 20 cents per gallon and 15 cents ad valorem? Did my right hon. friend do that for the purpose of adopting a protectionist policy, or did he do it because he needed revenue? There is no escape from the dilemma I present to my right hon. friend. He must say, if he answers at all, that he did it to give greater protection to Canadian industries, or he must say on the other hand, that he did it to get revenue, and there is no other possible answer open to him. And if the right hon. gentleman admits he did it on the ground of protection, then what does all this talk against protection mean from hon. gentlemen opposite, and what has my hon. friend from Red Deer to say to that. And if my right hon. friend admits that he did it not for protection but to raise revenue in order to meet the enormous increase in the expenditure of this country during the year in which this change in the British preferential tariff was made, then I say to him, if he had to do it then to get revenue, with what face can he say now—in presence of the greatest war in history, with finance and trade collapsed, and with our imports and borrowings cut off—you should not for the purpose of raising additional taxation, have increased the rate of British preference. We have not decreased the British preference. We have increased the British preference in the sense that it is more advantageous to the British manufacturer to-day than it was when I brought down my Budget.

My hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) declares that additional taxation is unnecessary, and he says: establish an equilibrium between your income and your outgo. I estimated that for the coming year $180,000,000 was necessary and I said that on the basis on which we then were of customs and excise duty, our revenue would be $120,000,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: How much of that is on capital account?

Mr. WHITE: I think $40,000,000 was estimated on capital account, and $140,000,000 on the other.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. member for Halifax did not include that.

Mr. WHITE: Then he should not talk of establishing an equlibrium between the income and the outgo. As we all know, there are public works in this country under contract, and the honour of this Dominion is involved in carrying out the contracts, and it is the same kind of money I have to find to pay capital expenditure as to pay consolidated revenue expenditure, and it represents the extravagance of hon. gentlemen opposite. What is the remedy? My hon. friend from Halifax disclaims and says: "I did not say to stop all public works." I accept the hon. gentleman's word. There is no fairer member in this House than he, and I accept his word when he says he had reference to consolidated fund expenditure only. But what in substance is said to the people of Canada by hon. gentlemen opposite, and what is the effect which they intend to produce by this debate? Is it not to say to the people: The policy of the Liberal party is to stop expenditure on public works in this country, to reduce the $180,000,000 to let us say $140,000,000. The hon. member for St. John has added the words, "if need be." Well, if he were sitting on this side of the House I do not think it would be a case of need be; I think he would be able to see that there would be no need to reduce the expenditure so far as he was concerned.

But what about the Civil Service? We have an organized Civil Service extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific. What are you going to do with it? Are you to break up your organization and dismiss your officials when you may need them a few months hence? The hon. gentleman says that we have increased consolidated fund expenditure from October, 1911, by some $40,000,000.

The mistake made by hon. gentlemen is precisely what I pointed out the other night. Why, they think that this country has stood still. What are the facts? The year before we came into power the total trade of this country was $750,000,000. The first year that we were in power one-half or a little more than one-half of which year belonged to hon. gentlemen opposite, the trade was $850,000,000; the next year it was $1,000,000,000, and the next year it was $1,100,000,000. Has the country stood still? What about the extension of parcel post? What about the money that we have been obliged to raise on account of the bungling policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, to which I have already referred? Where is that money coming from? The machinery of the Government has had to be increased throughout the entire country. Of course, it had to be increased, if we were to meet our obligations as administrators of the affairs of this country. Therefore, it is only to be expected that the consolidated fund expenditure of Canada will increase. There are items in the Estimates which I announced that the Government would not proceed with until the sources of revenue from which they were to be defrayed were apparent; but I would point out to hon. gentlemen opposite that in this country there is such a thing as uncontrollable expenditure; and when contracts or obligations are entered into regarding the finishing of the National Transcontinental, regarding the completion of the Quebec bridge, regarding all those different works undertaken by hon. gentlemen opposite, is it to be laid down that in order to avoid this expenditure, we are to break those contracts, to do a dishonourable thing and to render ourselves liable to actions on the part of those contractors who have their plants established and who are going ahead with the work in good faith?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is it not true that in all the contracts of the Public Works Department, and, I think, also in all the contracts of the other departments, it is provided that, where the appropriation is exhausted, the contractor has no remedy, but must wait for further appropriations or can go on and wait for his money until Parliament votes it?

Mr. WHITE: I am surprised at my hon. friend, who is a lawyer, putting forward an argument of that character. It is true that in most of the contracts there is that clause. I will suppose my hon. friend to be a contractor—and he knows something about contracts. He has asembled a plant and has spent $1,000,000 or more on his plant, and has several thousand men employed. Does my hon. friend mean to say that when a contract is entered into, although there is a saving clause of that character, the Government of this country is entitled to say to the contractor: "Quit work, and suffer whatever loss you may sustain?" Such action is absolutely unjustifiable.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Government has done it frequently.

Mr. WHITE: Some consideration might arise which might make it expedient to follow such a course; but if the Dominion Government closed down its contracts and threw thousands of men out of employment, what would be the next duty of the Government? To start relief works throughout the country in order that the men might not starve. As Minister of Finance I have had requests from provinces and from municipalities to assist them or to attempt to increase their credit with financial institutions in order that they might take care of the wholly abnormal situation respecting unemployment forced upon them by the war. An appeal was sent out yesterday to the Dominion Government and to all the provinces and the municipalities to create a great fund for the purpose of taking care of the unemployed. We had a member of the Opposition—and the curious thing is that the Opposition have such an elastic policy on this as on all other questions—we had the Mayor of Montreal the other night not protesting against our continuing public works, but asking us to go on with more public works. Hon. gentlemen opposite speak about our extravagance and the works that we have undertaken. The right hon. leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) within the last year or so have said: Yes, we are in favour of the Welland canal; go on with it; and in addition to that, go on with the Georgian Bay canal. What is the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to expenditures? Have they been wise in their day and generation? Did they foresee this war? If they did, what accounts for their action in 1912? If we were to close down those public works, we should simply aggravate a situation which is bound to be serious enough in war time, and we should not save the expense, because we should have to establish relief works in order to relieve unemployment. It is a fortunate thing for the people of this country that they have in office at the present time men who do not become panic stricken, who do not lose their heads, who do not say: Stop all the public works in this country; but who say: We will proceed with such work as will afford employment and with those works especially which, at the present time, we have under contract for completion, having regard to the honourable discharge of our obligations, and we will do the best we can with the fiscal measures which we have proposed to this House and with such borrowings as we may be able to accomplish in the money markets of the world.

My hon. friends, the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) and the member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), the other night said: "What would any private business man do? Of course, he would shut down at once." The case of a private business man and the case of a government are two very different things. A private business man has no obligations outside of his own business and his own family. He can say: As for me, I will cut down my expenditure; I will dismiss every employee I have. To the credit of the business men of Canada be it said that they have not adopted that policy. A private business man would say: What have I to do with seed-grain distribution in the West? What have I to do with drought-stricken districts? What have I to do when calamity overtakes a portion of this country? He would certainly say: I have nothing to do with these matters; I am a private citizen. The position of the Government, however is different. Government is much wider than business. Government is as wide as humanity. It touches humanity at every point. Business is only a division of politics, and public life is much wider than business life or private life. Therefore, the policy that might be adopted by a private individual is not open to the Government of this country to adopt, if we are to have any regard for the obligations that devolve upon us, charged as we are with the administration of the affairs of this country.

My hon. friend the junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) says: "No new taxes are necessary." Does my hon. friend, who is the financial critic of the Opposition, mean to say that no new taxes are necessary at this juncture? I point out again that, from the right hon. the leader of the Opposition down, there has not been an appreciation—I say it with all respect and with absolutely no intention of imputing any improper motive—of the effect of this war not only upon the trade and commerce of this country, but upon the financial position in which we necessarily find ourselves, and which we have not sought after. In the Budget speech I stated that next year we should require to raise no less a sum than $300,000,000. I am sure most of the hon. members realize what $300,000,000 means. Are they aware that every day of the year, if we except Sundays, I shall have to provide no less a sum than $1,000,000 for the expenditure of this country on war and on purposes other than war? Our expected revenue for next year was $120,000,000, so that there is a difference of $180,000,000 to make up. Yet the hon. junior member for Halifax says: "No new taxes are necessary." I tell hon. gentlemen opposite that if they do not understand the situation the people of this country do understand the situation; and one reason why my Budget was so well received—as it has been well received—throughout the country, was the profound and instinctive judgment on the part of the people that we had faced our situation and not temporized with it.

Now, the money for war is borrowed; and my hon. friend put forward this view: You are obtaining so much from the British Government. But we are borrowing the money just as much as if we had borrowed it in the open market. We increase the national debt, we are liable for the interest, and Canada is obliged to pay just as if she had borrowed the money in London, or in Paris, or in New York. There is no gainsaying that. What is the use of trying to draw a red herring across the trail? Canada is committed this year to an expenditure of $300,000,000—almost two and a half times the estimated revenue without this war taxation.

My hon. friend from Halifax, followed by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, says that this is not war taxation. I confess, I had expected better from the right hon. leader of the Opposition, for such a statement is the very acme of absurdity and partisan misrepresentation. I have been abused a good deal about employing the title, "War Revenue Bill," and I propose to discuss the matter for a few minutes. I have been likened to a man who puts out a fraudulent prospectus. But I am not thin-skinned; I do not rise and indulge in heroics at such a charge; I respect the members of this House, and I think I have their respect, even if we do occasionally fight each other. But I have been likened to a man who puts out a fraudulent prospectus, stating this is war taxation when it is not.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE: That statement, "Hear, hear," does more credit to the hon. gentleman's partisanship than to his intellect. All this money belongs to the one fund. Let me put it to my hon. friend from St. John City: Supposing that, instead of borrowing $100,000,000 from the Imperial authorities, I had borrowed that $100,000,000 in London, or New York or Paris. I should have had my revenue of $120,000,000, the estimated revenue on consolidated fund account, and also the $100,000,000 I had borrowed. Does any one mean to say that if, in order to meet that situation and prevent our national debt from increasing at an alarming rate, I bring down a measure for additional taxation to assist the revenue, that is not war taxation? The funds are not earmarked, the money I borrow in London and the money I raise here are all available for the purposes of Government—for the expenses of civil government, for consolidated fund expenditure, for capital expenditure, and for providing the cost to Canada of this war; these are all mingled in the same fund. I think it is the pettiest quibble ever put forward by a great party to say that this is not war taxation. Take the tax that I am denominating especially a war tax—though they will all be included—that is, the stamp duty. I shall have to pay, and if hon. gentlemen will look at the Estimates they will see that I shall have to pay, at least $7,000,000 of interest upon the debt that we have incurred on account of this war; it is a melancholy thing for me to be obliged to say—we shall have to provide, if we may at all depend upon the calculations of those experienced in these matters who should be able to make their calculations with a fair degree of accuracy, a pension list, and I am afraid a growing pension list, of between $4,000,000 and $5,000,000 a year. Does anybody grudge that a portion of these taxes should be used for the purposes of paying the interest upon this war loan and for a pension list which will insure to the widows and children of those who have given up their lives for the country that they shall not be reduced to penury? Are those war taxes or are they not? Now, come to the other taxes, the sums I am raising by means of tariff increases. What has caused me to raise the tariff? I pointed out that my borrowings were cut off in the markets of the world; I cannot go to the London market and get a dollar except with the consent of the British Treasury. And we are a belligerent, Mr. Speaker. One million dollars a day this whole country, including Governments, Dominion and Provincial, municipalities, corporations and individuals were borrowing and importing, and we were deriving our revenue from duties upon these imports. If that is cut off and I have to replace it, does any one dare to rise in this House and say that that is not war taxation? What caused it? The war. The man in the street knows it was the war; there is not a child of ten years of age in Canada who does not know that it was the war; and hon. gentlemen opposite well know it is the war.

Now, the taxation proposed is the minimum measure which the Government could adopt unless it deliberately shirked its financial responsibilities. I say further that even if the $10,000,000 that my hon. friend from Halifax, according to the hon. member for St. John City said should be cut off, or even if $20,000,000 could be cut off the policy still is to raise money by additional taxation in order that the finances of this country may be dealt with in a proper way and that our debts may not increase at too rapid a rate. I have some regard for those who are coming after me; and I say it is the bounden duty of the people of this country—and I know they will discharge that duty willingly, loyally, patriotically—to meet the very moderate taxation having regard to the responsibilities we are assuming, that this Government is imposing in order that we may pay a share of the expenditures devolving upon the Government immediately or indirectly due to this war.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. WHITE (resuming): Before resuming my argument, I desire, in compliance with the request of my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax, to place upon Hansard details of the expenditure for the years 1906-7 and 1907-8, the last being the year in which, according to his own statement, the hon. member for St. John City (Mr. Pugsley) made his historic sacrifice. I stated this afternoon that I would supply the information, and that it would not be particularly comforting to the hon. member for St. John City.

This afternoon I gave the total expenditures for the years 1907 and 1907-8. In order that the record may be complete, perhaps it would not be out of place for me to mention the figures again. The fiscal year 1906-7 was one of only nine months; during that period the total consolidated revenue fund expenditure was $51,000,000. Add one-third for the three months omitted, and you have $68,000,000 as the approximate expenditure on consolidated revenue fund account for the fiscal year 1906-7 if it had been of the ordinary period of twelve months. For 1907-8 the consolidated fund expenditure was $76,000,000, and for 1908-9 $84,000,000.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What was the expenditure for 1909-10, which was the year the Finance Minister cut down his ordinary expenditure?

Mr. WHITE: I beg my hon. friend's pardon; it was in 1907 that the financial stringency occurred in this country, and it was in the following year that the Minister of Finance attempted to cut down the expenditure. But the figures for 1909-10 are just as strongly against my hon. friend as those for 1908-9, because if we assume that the consolidated fund expenditure for 1906-7 was $68,000,000, then for 1909-10 it would be $79,000,000.

Mr. MACLEAN: How much less than that of the preceding year?

Mr. WHITE: On consolidated fund account, $5,000,000 less than that of the preceding year. As to capital expenditure—because there is capital expenditure in the Department of Public Works and in the Department of Railways as well as consolidated fund expenditure—for the nine-months period of 1906-7 the expenditure on capital account under the late Administration was $11,000,000. 1907-8 was the year of the financial stringency, and the only one in respect of which a comparison may be made with the present period so far as the question of the reduction of expenditure is concerned. For the year 1907-8 the capital expenditure had grown to $30,000,000, almost double what it would have been during the preceding fiscal year had that year been a period of twelve months. It is no wonder that in 1909 my predecessor insisted on cutting down the Estimates, because for the fiscal year 1908-9 his expenditure on capital account had grown from $11,000,000 three years previously, from $14,000,000 two years previously and from $30,000,000 one year previously, to the colossal sum of $42,000,000. I wish to point out to my hon. friend that during the fourteen months of which the fiscal year 1907-8 was a portion and during the remainder of the calendar year 1908, my predecessor borrowed on the London market no less a sum than $110,000,000. I may hold the record as a war borrower, but my predecessor holds the blue ribbon among finance ministers as a peace borrower.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the Finance Minister state the purposes for which his predecessor borrowed that money?

Mr. WHITE: He borrowed it to meet the consequences of the extravagance to which I have referred. He borrowed it because the late Government, instead of being able to build the National Transcontinental railway for $13,000,000 as estimated by my right hon. friend the present leader of the Opposition and $60,000,000 as estimated by the late Minister of Finance, (Mr. Fielding), found themselves confronted with an expenditure which has run into $200,000,000. Mr. Fielding did not want to borrow the money; he was obliged to do so, and he borrowed $110,000,000 within a period of thirteen or fourteen months. There has been nothing like it since Confederation.

Following up that line of argument, and to give the remainder of the detailed information asked for by the hon. member for Halifax—for the comfort, too, of the hon. member for the city of St. John—I may say that the total estimates presented to the House for the nine months ended March 31, 1907, amounted to $74,000,000. Add one-third to that and you get approximately $100,000,000 for a period of twelve months. For the fiscal year ended March 31, 1908, the aggregate of the Estimates was $124,000,000, and for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1909, the total Estimates were $133,000,000. Yet hon. gentlemen charge me and this Government with extravagance.

Now we come down to the particular department over which my genial friend the member for the city of St. John presided. I have under my hand a statement prepared by my deputy as to the total public works estimates, capital and income, presented to the House for a certain number of years. I find that for the nine months ended March 31, 1907, the main consolidated and supplementary consolidated estimates for the entire year amounted to $10,000,000. Add one-third, and we have approximately $13,000,000. In the following year, in which my hon. friend says that he made a sacrifice, we find that it had run up to $15,000,000, and in the next year, in which my hon. friend the member for Halifax claims the sacrifice was made, it had run up to no less a figure than $20,000,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: How much of that was against consolidated revenue and how much against capital?

Mr. WHITE: I have told my hon. friend. The figures I have given are on consolidated account. The figures on capital account run into a much larger sum. I am glad my hon. friend has drawn attention to this, because there was an omission in my statement. The main consolidated and the supplementary consolidated for the year ending March 31, 1907, was $7,685,000. Add one-third to that and we get approximately $10,000,000 on consolidated fund account. For the fiscal year ending March 31, 1908, we have on consolidated fund account $12,000,000; for the year ending March 31, 1909, nearly $17,000,000. Now my hon. friend has the information.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The reason I asked was that the minister previously gave $10,000,000 for 1907—for the nine months, I presume. One-third added to that would make $13,000,000. Then, for the next year the minister gave $15,000,000 instead of $12,000,000.

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend now has the corrected figures, which sustain the contention I advanced this afternoon, that my hon. friend, although he may not have realized it, did not as a matter of fact make a very notable sacrifice in 1908 in connection with cutting down his expenditure.

When the House rose, I was about to deal with the taxation measures which I introduced to the House and to the country upon the occasion of the Budget speech. What was the object, Sir, of those taxation measures? The object was to supply a portion of the expenditure which we are making in connection with this war, and to maintain upon a proper basis the financial credit of this Dominion. Notwithstanding any suggestion of my right hon. friend to the contrary, that was the only purpose; and there was no other purpose whatsoever. I say now to my right hon. friend that this Government and any Government confronted with the situation with which we have been and are confronted, must either impose further taxation or cease sending troops to the front. I say on my responsibility as Minister of Finance that we must raise additional revenue by the imposition of further taxation or cease sending troops to the front to participate in the defence of Canada and the Empire. And I defy any man in this House to controvert that statement. Does any hon. gentleman suppose that we should be justified in pursuing the weak financial policy of resting with a revenue of $120,000,000 when we are confronted with the necessity of raising for the coming year no less a sum than $1,000,000 a day, excluding Sundays, or a total of $300,000,000 a year. Into what financial position would this Government and this country drift if I should fail to face the situation, if I should temporize with it? I should be derelict in my duty if I did not resolutely cope with this situation. The public of this country expect me to discharge my full duty in that regard; and I have done it. I say further that, giving this House and the country the benefit of such financial experience as I have had, instead of raising too much money by taxation I have erred, as I intended to err, on the other side; and I pledge my reputation as a financier that the leading financiers of the world would say: You have not gone far enough, you should have raised more money by taxation instead of less money. But I am content to bear that criticism, for, as a matter of fact, on account of the profound dislocation of business, on account of the condition of this country by reason of the war, it was my desire to impose as small a measure of taxation as was consistent with dealing with this matter on a reasonably proper basis.

If hon. gentlemen opposite are heart and soul with this Government in the prosecution of this war, and I make no comment as to their intentions or motives, I say they must take one of three courses. There is no alternative left to them. They may either say: Cease sending troops to the front; and I do not understand them to say that; they may as an alternative suggest another method of supplementing our revenues, so as to meet the situation with which we are confronted, or, if they are sincere in their statements that they desire to co-operate with the Government in prosecuting this war, they must concur in the proposals of the Government. There is no escape from those three positions.

Mr. MACDONALD: In his Budget speech did not the hon. Minister of Finance say that he proposed to borrow in England all the money that was necessary for war expenditure ? And did he not proceed to justify that on the ground that posterity would pay it?

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend seems to have failed to grasp the significance of what I pointed out this afternoon. This money is borrowed; the interest on it must be paid; and in addition to that, I must borrow large sums of money in order to carry on the business of the country, including the capital and special expenditure.

Mr. MACDONALD: The interest on the war expenditure will not be $8,000,000.

Mr. WHITE: In addition to borrowing the $100,000,000 from the Imperial Government, I shall have to borrow during the coming year the difference between $120,000,000 and $200,000,000, or raise a part of it by revenue; and I propose to raise a part by revenue, and borrow the balance. Does my hon. friend think that, at a time when I am increasing the national debt by borrowing $100,000,000 for war, I should not have had regard at all to the fact that I shall have to borrow $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 in the open market, and further increase to that extent the national debt of this country? What would my successor in office say if I adopted the weak financial policy of saying there shall be no increase in taxation; we will not face our situation at all; we will borrow all the money? I doubt very much if we would be permitted to borrow on the London market unless we showed as a matter of fact that we were prepared to shoulder a portion of our expenditures for this coming year.

No proposal has been put forward as an alternative to the fiscal measures I introduced here for the purpose of supplementing the revenue. There is the situation which exists, and the facts cannot be controverted. This Government, on account of the war, as I showed conclusively this afternoon, is face to face with a situation in which there is a difference, a gap, between estimated revenue on the old basis and expenditure of no less a sum than $180,000,000, of which I shall borrow $100,000,000 from the Imperial Government. That leaves over $80,000,000 still to raise. I ask: where is the alternative proposition brought forward by hon. gentlemen opposite? I have shown conclusively that unless we are going to dishonour the Government by breaking contracts entered into by hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to large public works in this country, unless we are going to stop all expenditure of money upon public works and turn hundreds, if not thousands, of men out of employment whom we would have to support afterwards by means of relief work, we must raise additional revenue.

No suggestion of a feasible character is forthcoming from any hon. gentlemen opposite. The only hon. gentleman opposite—and I honour him for it—who came forward with a suggestion—and I now propose to show that it is entirely not feasible—was the hon. member for Saltcoats (Mr. MacNutt). I did not have the pleasure of listening to the hon. gentleman yesterday, although I read his remarks, and as I understand him he said that we should have raised the additional revenue required by an income tax and a tax upon land. I dealt with the income tax proposition in the Budget, and I pointed out conclusively that upon the basis of the American income tax upon individuals we could not hope to raise more than $2,000,000. I pointed out another consideration. Municipalities and provinces assess individuals upon income. I see in the reports in the papers that the province of Ontario and the province of Nova Scotia are imposing a tax upon income, personal property and real property. My hon. friend suggests that we should pile Pelion upon Ossa and Olympus upon both, and add to the taxes of the municipalities and the provinces, by which we would not be able to raise more than $2,000,000. What about the expensive machinery of collecting that amount, and how long before the revenue would come in? There must, in the first place, be an assessment, and there must be an opportunity for appeal against that assessment. There must be tribunals created throughout the country for the purpose of hearing appeals and settling assessments. There would be an appeal from all these bodies, and afterwards there has to be provided the machinery for collection. How much would be left of the $2,000,000 which we would raise from any such tax? Supposing I raised the whole of it, supposing I raised $2,000,000, let us say $3,000,000, let us say $4,000,000, what does it amount to in Dominion finance? Nothing has impressed me more than the total inadequacy of the suggestions which come from various parts of the country, and which, although the people who make them are not blameworthy, show that they simply do not understand the situation or the futility of the suggestions they make for meeting the financial needs of the Dominion. Their idea is that we might raise $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 in this way. At a rate of expenditure of a million dollars a day how long would it last? Sometimes that amount is paid out inside of half a day. I must cope with my situation, I must take measures that are adequate to meet the situation, and I say that an income tax would be a broken reed as far as Dominion finance is concerned.

Take the land tax. In various papers the suggestion has been made to tax all unoccupied land. There has been brought to my attention by municipalities for months past this state of affairs. They have taxes outstanding that we cannot collect. I am not going to specify the parts of the country in which this condition particularly obtains. They say: Will you arrange for us to get credit at the bank, because we cannot collect taxes; they are in arrears, one, two or three years. Let me ask this House, this body of intelligent men: How much would I raise in ready cash, how many millions of dollars could I take from the owners of unoccupied land in this country and within what time could I take it? The obligations of the Dominion must be met on the nail. Bills come in and the cheques must issue. I cannot wait for the slow processes of an income taxation measure. I cannot wait for the slow processes of a measure of taxation upon unoccupied lands. Not only that, but I must always bear in mind the supreme fact that I referred to in the Budget that, under the British North America Act, while it is open for the Dominion to impose direct or indirect taxation, as far as the provinces and municipalities are concerned, they are limited absolutely to direct taxation; and I lay down the principle, and I think it is a sound principle, that unless the national necessities imperatively so demand, the Dominion Government should not invade the field to which the provinces of Confederation are confined. The only suggestion of a constructive character is that made by the hon. member for Saltcoats. No other suggestion has been put forward that is feasible or practicable. There are three alternatives, three propositions and I will mention them again. The Opposition to be consistent, if they agree, as I assume they do, in our participation in the war, must say: Cease sending troops; or they must suggest an alternative, a feasible and practicable method of obtaining revenue, or they must agree with the proposals of this Government. They have done, Mr. Speaker, not one of the three—absolutely not one of the three. I await some other suggestion that will solve the problem. This Government is in its present position through no fault of its own. We are not responsible for the enormous expenditure undertaken before we came into office, we are certainly not responsible for the acts of the German Emperor in bringing on this war. Our problem was to devise ways and means. I call attention to what I said in August. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition says: You are taxing the poor man, you are letting the well-to-do man escape, you are taxing necessities and not taxing luxuries. When I heard my right hon. friend say that I wondered if he had overlooked the August session. I taxed practically to the limit, liquors, cigars, and tobacco, and I said at the time that I expected my fiscal proposals would, on the basis of the past year, raise a revenue of about $14,000,000. But I subtracted about one-third from it and I thought we might get an income of $10,000,000 if things were at all as we expected. I pointed out that on account of the situation that existed, with the uncertainties and vicissitudes of a war like this, I put forward my view with the utmost hesitation and diffidence. I am on record as saying that. But I calculated that we might get in the neighbourhood of $10,000,000 for a twelvemonth year and I said that I hoped to get about $7,000,000 for the balance of the fiscal year from August to end of March current. My hon. friend must not overlook that. I taxed there what are known as sumptuary articles, articles which are certainly not necessities but luxuries and which the people can do without. I taxed articles of that kind, and I calculated to raise a large revenue, and now I am confronted with the situation which I have disclosed in full to the House. And, what have I done? It is my duty to devise ways and means to meet the situation, and my only motive in bringing down these fiscal proposals is to enable this country to meet in part the expenditure of this war, and to maintain the credit of the Dominion of Canada.

I divided my fiscal proposal into two parts: special taxation and general taxation. My right hon. friend had a good deal to say about my special taxation, and he was pleased to treat it with a good deal of levity and some ridicule. I do not believe the right hon. gentleman understands it. My right hon. friend referred to the tax upon railway tickets, and let me ask him a question in connection with that. Is he not aware that it is a fundamental principle of taxation that if you carry a tax beyond a certain point—and it requires very nice discrimination to fix that point—you defeat your own purpose? This question of putting a tax on railway and pullman tickets is a matter that gave me a great deal of concern and I inquired into it most carefully. Let me tell my right hon. friend that, had I raised unduly the tax upon railway tickets the inevitable effect would be that those who live near the border in Canada would travel over the railways of the United States to their destination. It occurred to me at once that there should be a larger tax upon sleeping-car and parlour-car seats, but let us take the case of a person who is travelling from Montreal or Toronto, or from Windsor, or from Chatham, or from London, through to Winnipeg or Vancouver, and what would have happened if I placed a larger tax on railway tickets? Why, they would simply go to their destination via United States railways. I had to give attention to the same thing in connection with my proposal respecting the taxation of tickets upon steamships; I had to consider the competition of the United States steamship lines.

I did not bring down an undigested measure to this House; I thought this thing out. My right hon. friend speaks about the poor man travelling on a second-class ticket; and in that connection let me make my hon. friend acquainted—because I do not think he knows—with the proposals. In the first place, so far as railway tickets are concerned, up to one dollar there is no taxation whatever. It is only when a ticket costs over a dollar, and from one dollar to not more than five dollars, that there is a tax of five cents, or a maximum percentage of five per cent. On tickets valued over five dollars for each additional five dollars or fractional part of five dollars which the ticket costs the charge is five cents. Will the right hon. gentleman tell me how any poor man is injured by that? It is a small tax, and it would seem to me that it is only a five cent matter that the right hon. gentleman wants to talk about. My right hon. friend this afternoon drew a picture—and it seemed to me it was a demagogic picture—of the pampered son of wealthy parents, who he said had never done an honest day's work in his life. Well, there is many a man who is the son of wealthy parents—I never had that advantage myself—who is not dishonest. But the right hon. gentleman pictured this son of wealthy parents, lolling in luxury, with pillows surrounding him, such as the right hon. gentleman is accustomed to, in the pullman, and no doubt he spoke as one having experience. My right hon. friend, no doubt, travels in that way all the time; he travels in luxury, and whether he travels on a pass or not I do not know. I hope he does; I have no objection whatever to his traveling on a pass. My right hon. friend overlooked another thing—as to whether he intentionally overlooked it or not I have very great doubt—but, take a chair car ticket from Toronto to Hamilton, which costs 25 cents. A man pays 5 cents on that, which is a percentage of 20 per cent. The poor man is taxed only 5 cents if he chances to buy a ticket which amounts to one dollar in value, or a maximum of 5 per cent, and the man who habitually takes a chair car, and pays 25 cents for the privilege, is also taxed 5 cents, or 20 per cent, just as he would in respect to a dollar or a two dollar charge for a chair. Adding it all together, you will find that the man who habitually uses a chair car will be fairly heavily taxed, and that is a factor in the case. Had we increased the tax on the sleeping-car tickets and the chair car tickets—and the same will apply to the ordinary ticket—beyond a certain point every man who lives near the border would in all probability travel by the United States, if he is going to a western point, in order to save any heavy tax that would be imposed on him.

This measure was thought out carefully, Mr. Speaker. I do not like hon. gentlemen opposite to think that I bring down any half-baked or ill-digested measures to this House. Although I do make mistakes, as any man may, and a man who never makes mistakes never makes anything, I feel that I have made no mistake in these fiscal proposals.

My right hon. friend has also spoken about the poor man having to pay an increase of 50 per cent upon the letters he mails. That was not a fair argument, and I will tell you why. Who writes the most letters in this country? Is it the business house or the ordinary man, or the poor man, speaking generally? The ordinary man does write an occasional letter, but the business houses of this country are writing hundreds of letters every day. And that is where that tax is going to fall. It is going to fall upon the men who can afford to pay it, and I would have a much poorer opinion than I have of the people of this country if I thought that the men, on behalf of whom these appeals ad misericordiam are put up, were unwilling to pay their mite in order to assist in this war we are waging for civilization. At the autumn session I exhausted the revenue possibilities on liquors, cigars and tobaccos, and what was I to fall back upon —unless I was going to put this country in a position in which its finances would be unsound and incapable of sustaining the situation created by the war—except the tariff? The point escaped the observation of my right hon. friend, or he intentionally overlooked it, that in order to raise additional revenue under the tariff as it existed prior to the 12th February last I was obliged to put a tax upon free goods and raw materials. I know as well as anybody knows that when you get beyond a certain point you are not likely to increase your revenues, and of course that is common knowledge to every man who knows anything about taxation measures. Where was I then to meet the requirements of the situation? I had to tax raw material and I had to tax free goods, and consequently I imposed a horizontal increase of 7½ and 5 per cent. What followed from that? It followed necessarily from that—and I do not believe any hon. gentleman in this House will get up and say it could be avoided—it followed necessarily from that, that I was obliged to increase the duty upon the finished article. If to-morrow my right hon. friend were a manufacturer in this country, and if the duty upon his coal and his raw material and his partly finished product were increased, what would the position be, if we failed to increase also the duty upon his finished article ? Only one thing would happen to him—he would have to give up business. Therefore, it follows that when I was obliged, as I was, to increase the duty upon raw material and upon the partly-finished product used by the manufacturers and business people of Canada for the purpose of making the finished product, I was obliged also to raise the duty upon the finished product. Any other course would have been fraught with the most disastrous consequences to the business interests of this country. No other course has ever been pursued by any Minister of Finance in this country, including the Minister of Finance who preceded me. So far as I know, there never was any increase, if the tariff had been at all properly adjusted before, in which an increase in the duty upon raw material was not accompanied by an increase in the duty upon the finished product. That is trite and commonplace knowledge.

Hon. gentlemen opposite raise the objection that the manufacturers will benefit. Have they taken into consideration the fact that I am trying to raise by these tariff changes some $20,000,000 to $25,000,000; that I am taxing raw material; that I am taxing free goods that the manufacturers had available before; that I am taxing the partly-manufactured product used as raw material by the manufacturers ? If the manufacurers have to pay that increase, as they will have to do, must they not have an increase on the finished product ? Since I have been in this House, hon. gentlemen opposite have never ceased to criticise adversely the industrial interests of this country. If I am right in stating that I was obliged to resort to the tariff—and to impose a duty upon free goods and raw material, and no alternative has been put forward by hon. gentlemen opposite—then is it an answer to say that the manufacturers are getting an increase upon their finished product ? What will hon. gentlemen opposite do with the manufacturers if I am obliged to impose this duty? Will they drive them out of Canada? Will they destroy their establishments and thus throw hundreds of thousands of men out of work? If my argument is sound, that I had to resort to the tariff, then there is absolutely nothing in the contention of hon. gentleman opposite that I should not resort to it by reason of the fact that an increase is made upon the finished product of manufacture.

Let us see what these industrial institutions mean to this country. The Government has a large family to look after. We have not only the farmer, but the artisan, the labouring man, the industries and the business men of this country. We must look after them all. There is no better friend, so far as I know, of the farmer of this country than I am. There is no kind of farm work that I have not done in my time; there is no man in a better position to know the needs of the farmers than I am in, and since I have been in this House, I have never denied to the Minister of Agriculture, and I never will deny him, any sums of money that he considers necessary for the purpose of furthering the farming industry, the great basic industry of this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite have spoken about increases made on Consolidated Revenue Fund. Let them compare the Estimates for agriculture for this year with those of four or five years ago. Yesterday I brought down an estimate for no less a sum that $10,000,000 to relieve, in proper cases, those in the drought-stricken districts in the West, and to assist them in purchasing seed grain for the coming crop. With due respect to hon. gentlemen opposite, I say that these taunts against the Canadian manufacturers and the industrial establishments and the workingmen and artisans of this country should be stopped. Will my hon. friend the member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) share in those taunts that are flung across the floor of this House about the privileged classes; that is to say, those engaged in industrial pursuits in this country? According to the last census returns there was no less a sum that $1,200,000,000 of capital invested in industrial concerns in Canada; there were no less than 500,000 artisans and employees supporting themselves and their families by the products of their labour in those industrial establishments; and those men were paid no less a sum that $250,000,000 per annum. Since the outbreak of war the business interests of this country have not complained; they have manfully borne their burden, and in some cases it has been a heavy one by reason of the cutting off of our borrowings and the diminution of capital expenditure. They have tried to hold their organizations together; they have tried to give such work as they could to their work people, and they deserve not recrimination, not denunciation, but the credit that should be accorded to all Canadian citizens when they are doing their duty to themselves and to those in industrial relationship to them.

Made in Canada! My hon. friend the member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) says: "Made in Germany." My hon. friend is an economist: he has studied political economy. When I speak about economics, I always feel that my hon. friend understands me, and I understand him when he is speaking about economics. Let me ask my hon. friend this question: when a private individual determines to economize, when he finds that he must curtail his expenditure, what does he do? He does a great number of things for himself which he formerly engaged others to do; he makes a number of things for himself which he formerly paid others to make. Take the case of a nation. When a time like this occurs and when war dislocates the business of the world, what does a nation immediately do without knowing the principles of economics as my hon. friend and myself understand them? The nation says nationally: If we increase our imports too greatly at this time, and if our exports do not increase sufficiently to meet them, unless we are borrowing, what will happen? We must export gold. My hon. friend the member for Red Deer knows that just as he knows the tables in mathematics. That is axiomatic. And what is the feeling underlying the instinct of the Canadian people in favour of this movement? It is that at this time—I do not say another time, because the movement has taken form at this time—what we can manufacture in Canada to advantage we want to manufacture in Canada in order that we may be able to keep our establishments going, maintain our staffs, keep our operatives employed and add to the general prosperity of the country. Is there anything wicked about that?

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Only stupid.

Mr. WHITE: The hon. gentleman passes a very serious reflection upon a number of very worthy people in this country in saying that those who are in favour of made-in-Canada goods at this time are simply stupid. I do not think they are stupid at all.

My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), referring to the tax on banks and trust companies, spoke with a great deal of humour about our touching the epidermis of the banks and trust companies. Now, I will ask him, and I will ask the hon. member for Red Deer who is to follow me, a question: We are taxing the Bank of Montreal about $150,000 a year; we are taxing the Bank of Commerce about $135,000 a year; we are taxing the Imperial Bank about $60,000 a year; and other banks in proportion. If my right hon. friend the late Prime Minister was of the opinion that that is good legislation and mild legislation as a taxation measure, will he explain to the hon. member for Red Deer why it was that in the year 1904 he raised the British preferential rate on woollen goods from 23⅓ to 30 per cent? If it was a revenue measure, he would have derived more revenue from adopting the course I have adopted.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mere titillation.

Mr. WHITE: He refrained from titillating. Why, he actually raised the British preferential rate upon granite headstones, so that those that a man left behind after he had gone to the grave would have to pay a heavier tax upon their importation from Great Britain.

The right hon. gentleman spoke about our tender treatment of the distiller. Why, he asked, did you put on an increased customs duty without putting on a compensating excise duty? In his airy fashion he had overlooked the fact that we are imposing higher taxes up the distiller for all the raw material he uses, including coal, and also upon the machinery which turns out his product.

The right hon. gentleman talks about the British preference, about the Government and about hon. gentlemen on 9 p.m. this side never having been in favour of the British preference. Who brought forward the idea of a British preference? He knows as well as he knows that he is sitting in that chair that, although we have raised, as I shall show we were bound to raise, the British preferential rate, we have increased the preference or advantage to the British manufacturer. Let me give a simple illustration that my right hon. friend will not fail to understand. Let us assume that upon a certain line of goods the general tariff previous to my bringing down my fiscal proposals was 30 per cent, and that the British preferential tariff was 20 per cent. On $100 worth of goods brought into this country what would have been the preference in favour of the British manufacturer? Ten dollars. Increase the general rate by 7½ per cent, make it 37½ per cent, and increase the British preferential rate by 5 per cent, making it 25 per cent, and how much now has the British manufacturer by way of advantage over his foreign competitor? Twelve dollars and a half as compared with ten dollars which he had before. Hon. gentlemen will say: You block them from coming into the country. Take the free list alone, amounting to about $25,000,000 of goods coming in from Great Britain. Nobody supposes that a tax of 5 per cent is going to prevent the Canadian people from buying these goods. If hon. gentlemen opposite put forward their contention—and I am not controverting it—that the consumer pays the tax, I say that upon this list of goods formerly free and now subject to this increased duty the people of Canada will pay the tax, and they will pay it gladly because they know its purpose and object.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

What is preference? Preference is the advantage which one nation enjoys in the markets of another as compared with competing nations. Any one knows that who knows anything about fiscal matters at all. Now, the list of free goods representing importations from Great Britain of $25,000,000—take these alone, to say nothing of the others—and what was the position before I brought down my fiscal proposals? The position was that the British manufacturer was competing on even terms with foreign nations in this market. What is the position to-day? The position to-day is that we have increased his preference, and he is in a better position with regard to those goods than he was before February 11, 1915. That statement cannot be controverted. It is absolutely axiomatic; it is the truth, and the people know it is the truth.

There is another fact in connection with this matter that I would commend to the consideration of the hon. member for Red Deer, my fellow economist in this House. We are increasing our exports to Great Britain, and I hope we shall continue to do so. The hon. member for Red Deer will not deny that if we increase our exports to Great Britain, we will necessarily increase our imports. Apart from the dislocation of ocean traffic caused by the war, no man need tell me that the fiscal measures which I have introduced will be any obstruction to British trade with Canada; I say the result will be quite the contrary. It is true that if our merchant marine is not on the sea; if our ships are commandeered or requisitioned, as they were last fall on the Atlantic and on the Pacific, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens), there will, of course, be interruption of trade. But that interruption of trade will not be due to my fiscal proposals; it will be due to the war, and primarily to the German Emperor, for whose acts I must disclaim responsibility.

I am going to assume that hon. gentlemen opposite are absolutely sincere in the contentions that they put forward in this House. My right hon. friend said: why did you raise the British preferential rate? Any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House who has studied the subject knows that if we raise the general rate we must raise also the British preferential rate. Take the case of iron and steel manufactures. I ask the attention of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) to this point. They have to pay duty on ore, coal, coke and other materials; I explained to the House why I had to levy a tax on raw materials. Will the hon. member for Pictou rise in his place and say to me: You would be justified in increasing to Canadian manufacturers the duty on ore, coal, coke and other materials, without increasing the British preferential rate also? What would be the effect of this upon the great industry in the constituency of my hon. friend the member for Pictou? It is perfectly obvious that the British manufacturer would get in his coal free, his coke free, his ore free and his raw material free, and if I did not increase the British preferential rate as well as the general rate, I would destroy these Canadian industries. I said once before in this House, and I say now, that I am not here to destroy; I am here to construct and to build up. Take the case of hides and tanning material. Does anybody mean to say that we are not obliged to increase the British preferential rate upon leather when increasing the duties on hides and tanning materials? In what position would the leather manufacturers of Canada be, if, having to pay an increased duty upon hides and tanning materials, they had not the benefit of the British preferential rate upon their finished product in order to put them on a parity with the British competitor in this market? The same thing applies to woollens. If, for the reasons which I have given, I increase the duty upon foreign wool, dye-stuffs and other material used in the woollen industry, must I not increase also the British preferential rate upon the product of the woollen manufacturers? I could give instance after instance of a similar nature. Take the cotton spinning and weaving industry. Could manufacturers of these products afford to pay 7½ per cent duty on raw cotton if the yarn and fabrics produced in Great Britain from similar material were allowed entry at customs at the British preferential rates in force previous to February 11? I think I have, therefore, sufficiently disposed of the arguments advanced by my right hon. friend with regard to my fiscal proposals in so far as they relate to the British preference.

I have been abused with respect to the action of the Government in the matter of the British preference. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) the other night invoked the Deity; he said: "For God's sake, keep your unholy and disloyal hands off the British preference." He challenged us that night to appeal to the country, and I observed the next morning—without surprise—that the clock in the tower had stopped during the night. My hon. friend knew his man. He and I are on terms of amity and friendship; if he had addressed that remark to the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), the evening could not have ended without tragedy. He felt safe, however, in accusing me of having unholy hands and of being disloyal. He knew that I knew I was not disloyal; and I knew that he knew that I knew that he was not disloyal, and no harm resulted. But it is not a very desirable thing to be called disloyal.

The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) said in the debate on the Address—and I adopt the sentiment that he expressed: "Let the Government place itself behind the man in the trenches." That is what this Government has been doing and intends to do. From the outset I said as Finance Minister—and my leader has said it before me—that our first business is war until this war is concluded. Shall we send our flesh and blood to the front and haggle over a matter of taxation necessary to maintain them there? Our object, as I have said, is to raise money for the prosecution of this war, either directly or indirectly, and I believe the people will pay it cheerfully, loyally and patriotically.

The attack upon this Budget has signally failed; and it failed because it was fundamentally unsound. The speech of my hon. friend from Halifax, which he had ten days to prepare—and I should like to know the perplexities of mind that he experienced in preparing that speech—was a case of special pleading. I have often heard that the duty of an Opposition is to oppose. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it. I say it is the duty of an Opposition to oppose in a proper case; and I say that this is not a proper case in which the Opposition should oppose. I have disposed this taxation in such fashion that the people of this country regard it as equitable and just. I have placed taxes upon luxuries; I have taxed liquors; I have taxed tobacco to the utmost it will stand, and there is a point beyond which you will diminish, and not increase, your revenue. I have imposed taxes upon the financial institutions of this country. I have imposed taxes which will fall the most heavily upon those in this country who are best able to sustain that burden; and I have had to fall back upon the tariff in order to raise the larger part of the money required to enable us to do our duty in this crisis. Mr. Speaker, I hope I shall not be taken as disrespectful to the Opposition. Nothing could be further from my thought, but sometimes it has been borne in upon me that the debate upon this Budget has been trivial in character. War on a scale unprecedented in all history; some fifteen or twenty million men engaged; the Germans and Allies facing each other upon a front resting upon Holland and Switzerland in the West, and extending from the Baltic to the Carpathians in the East; and there is now proceeding before our very eyes one of the greatest operations in the world, one of the most spectacular, one of the most dramatic —the forcing of the Dardanelles.

What is the expenditure of Great Britain to-day, and how is she facing it? The expenditure of Great Britain herself in this great contest is no less than ten million dollars a day; ten million dollars a day with a population of forty-five million.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: And free trade.

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend had better not be too sure about free trade. The future may hold surprises for many as to free trade. The expenditure of Great Britain is ten million dollars a day; and Lord Kitchener is raising an army of one and a half or two million men. We in this country are raising troops and equipping them and forwarding them with the utmost despatch possible with our limited facilities. Why have we limited facilities? Why? I have never heard any expenditure seriously criticised in the House except the expenditure of the Militia Department. If the Militia Department had not been starved, if the organization had been better maintained, we should have been better able to bear the strain so suddenly imposed upon us in August last. We should have had more equipment for the troops, more clothing and ammunition, and we should have been in a much better position to take our part in this war. But there was no vision in the criticism of hon. gentlemen opposite, and where there is no vision the people perish.

The real question is: are we to do our share in this war or are we not? We have taken the people of this country at their word. They say send one contingent, send two contingents, send three contingents, send every man that wants to go. But I want to point out that war is made not only with men, not only with armaments, not only with munitions, but it is made with money. The people must be prepared to sacrifice not only blood, but treasure. If not, where is the Imperial spirit? And the people of this country are prepared not only to send money, but they are prepared to pay the reasonable measure of taxation which this Government is imposing.

Now, what do these charges of extravagance amount to? Are they not frivolous and vexatious at a time when the Government is struggling, and struggling successfully, with the greatest crisis with which the public men of this country have ever been confronted? I ask my right hon. friend who occupies a conspicuous position in this House and in this Dominion and in the Empire this question: In view of the fact that he himself raised the British preferential rate, and in view of the facts that I have brought to his attention to-night as to the necessity for increasing the British preferential rate not only on grounds of revenue, but by reason of the necessity of adjustment, was he wise this afternoon in bringing forward his criticism of the Government, and endangering, to some extent, the public credit of Canada because of the weight that may attach to his words? My right hon. friend's words carry beyond the walls of this House; they carry across the sea. And I ask him, has he represented the situation fairly or has he represented it unfairly? With regard to the British preference, I think he has represented it unfairly. And if his words when they go across the sea have any adverse effect upon the credit of Canada, I ask him if that is co-operation in this crisis with which the Empire is confronted.

My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) made a couple of serious charges against me this afternoon. He virtually charged me with false pretenses. He said that under the colour of a war tax I had deliberately raised this tariff, not for the purpose of revenue, but for the purpose of assisting the privileged classes of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE: Hon. gentlemen say "hear, hear." That is to say that all I have stated here to-night is untrue. That is to say that, as Minister of Finance, I have not been sincerely desirous of raising by additional measures of taxation sufficient revenue for the purpose of meeting the increased expenditure due to this war, and maintaining the credit of this Dominion. Hon. gentlemen seem to participate in that charge made against me by the leader of the Opposition. In substance they say, or at least those of them who said "hear, hear" that under colour of this war tax it is my intention, not to raise additional revenue, but to assist the privileged classes of this country. Mr. Speaker, I shall not do myself the injustice of denying it. I have too much self-respect to deny a charge of that kind if it is pressed home. My right hon. friend has charged me virtually with false pretenses, and he read an article from which I took one phrase because it was the gist of his attack upon me for increasing the British preferential rate. This was the phrase I took: "Suspect bad faith." That was in the article that was read by my right hon. friend this afternoon. That is that if bad faith is suspected it is not to be supposed that the Opposition will agree in the proposals of the Government. What was the innuendo, taking that remark, or utterance, in connection with the subsequent remarks of my right hon. friend? I desire to say this: My right hon. friend has introduced this amendment regarding the British preference condemning this Government for, as he states, placing extra barriers against Great Britain's trade with Canada at a moment when the Motherland is under a war strain unparalleled in history.

My right hon. friend has suggested my motive in increasing the preferential rate. I wonder if it would be out of order if I suggested his motive in moving his amendment? I may be wrong, but I have a very clear idea as to the right hon. gentleman's motive in introducing his amendment. Let me ask my right hon. friend if there is anything upon his heart, or his conscience, that induces him to move this amendment? I would ask my right hon. friend to take the drama of Macbeth and refer to the sleep-walking scene in the fifth act, in which Lady Macbeth, looking upon the hand stained with the blood of King Duncan, says: "All the perfumes of Arabia will not sweeten that little hand." My right hon. friend the Prime Minister, acting upon the prescient advice of the Admiralty, two years ago introduced into this House the Naval Aid Bill, whose purpose was to assist in the naval defence of the Empire. My right hon. friend obstructed and killed that Bill. I say to him now—I say it with great respect, I say it without any imputation except upon his statesmanship, certainly not upon his loyalty—that all the amendments, whether relating to the British preference or otherwise that he may move now or at any other time, will never obliterate the memory of the action which he took in connection with the Naval Aid Bill.

In conclusion, I desire to make a somewhat deliberate statement. I say to my right hon. friend that there are two ways in which it is possible to oppose effectual participation by the Government in this war. Firstly, such participation may be directly opposed. This has not been done. Secondly, participation can be opposed by opposition to measures, such as our fiscal proposals, necessary and essential to the carrying on of the Government of this country, the fulfilment of our contractual and other honourable obligations, the maintenance of the credit by which we are enabled to prosecute the war. It is obvious that we cannot prosecute war abroad unless we are in a position to carry on our affairs at home, pay the interest upon our public debt and preserve our financial credit in international markets. The policy of the Opposition as exhibited in their criticism of this Budget would not permit this to be done. As to their attitude upon this war Budget at this the most critical period of the Empire's history, I pass no further comment than to say that the people will know, appreciate, weigh and understand. They desire this Government to carry on this war with all its heart and all its soul and all its strength. This is what we propose to do. This we conceive to be our mandate from the people of Canada. If the right hon. the leader of the Opposition doubts whether we have this mandate, let him say so. My right hon. friend may rely upon it that we shall not fail to take all necessary measures to ensure that Canada continues with the will of its people to carry out its whole duty to itself and the Empire.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I think you, Sir, as an old parliamentarian, whom we all very much respect, will agree with me that in the main the discussion upon the Budget has been free from acrimony, and on the whole has been a credit to both sides of the House. I think it possible, Sir, that you may have detected beneath the discussion in the main an underlying sentiment that the average member of this House has no intention whatsoever that the Government or the Parliament of this country shall be diverted from the main business of the Empire and of Canada at this moment. As I did in the short August session, so I have pleasure in doing now. I should like, if I may be permitted, to voice the general satisfaction, which I believe exists in this country, and is reflected in Parliament, at the prompt and energetic action of the Government in regard to what they have done to back up the flag of the Empire in this war. There has been no holding back on the part of my right hon. friend the leader of the Government (Sir Robert Borden), and I have pleasure in bearing testimoney to the fact in spite of the somewhat provocative peroration of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White). The right hon. leader of the Government shows to this country in his own person in no small degree those qualities of doggedness and pertinacity which are the heritage of our race and which have done much to found the greatness of the Empire, and which will, please God, settle this war as it should be settled. I should like to add, which I do very sincerely, that I am personally glad that my right hon. friend has, if he did nothing else in the public life of this country, secured his niche in the temple of great Canadians.

Having said so much, I must say that I think it necessary to state that there is an inability on the part of some hon. gentlemen on the other side who have spoken—and I think on the part of the Minister of Finance—to distinguish between a policy and the method by which that policy is carried out. I really think the Minister of Finance fails to make that distinction. I would rather not have made any reference, even as I propose to do now, by way of illustration, to the difficulties we had on naval defence a couple of years ago, but I am encouraged to draw an illustration from circumstances into which the Minister of Finance, for purposes best known to himself, has dipped somewhat freely. Two years ago there was a good deal of doubt in this country as to the feasibility of submarines being of any use in naval warfare; I think there was a great deal of doubt on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite about the feasibility or usefulness of submarines. The advent of war banished that doubt very quickly, because the Government proceeded to buy a couple of submarines, and I endorsed their action, immediately the war broke out. There was a similar doubt two years ago about the possibility of building ships in Canada, but to-day with the blessing of the Government opposite, submarines are being built in Montreal. I do not raise this except as an illustration of the necessity of distinguishing between a policy and the method by which that policy is put in operation, and I respectfully submit to the Prime Minister and his followers that if it be good to buy submarines now, and if it be good to build them in Canada now, it cannot have been so bad two years ago.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: May I ask my hon. friend to what remarks he is alluding when he mentions my opposition, or our opposition, to submarines two years ago?

Mr. CLARK: My right hon. friend's strong point is perhaps not imagination, but if he will compare our speeches at that time with his policy, I think he will be able to make out where the two parties stood.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Subject to correction by my hon. friend, I do not remember the question of submarines having come up at all, but I may be mistaken.

Mr. CLARK: If my hon. friend's memory is bad and he needs enlightenment, I with very great diffidence and deference refer him to an utterance of mine in which I read a whole article from the British journal known as the Economist, pointing out that the German dreadnoughts were a mere delusion, and that when war came, if it did come, their action would be exactly as it has proved to be, and that before risking their dreadnoughts they would endeavour to put British shipping out of commission by submarines. I was dealing with a somewhat dangerous matter—not dangerous from the point of view of argument, because if the events of the war have not convinced hon. gentlemen opposite that there were two sides to this question, then I am sure nothing that I can say would convince them—not dangerous from the point of view of argument, but dangerous from the point of view of having any acrimonious discussion about anything touching upon the defences of the Empire at the present moment. I was proceeding to illustrate the principle I have laid down: that it is necessary to distinguish between a policy and the method by which it is carried out. It is so in regard to this Budget. The Minister of Finance comes to this House and he says: our policy is to raise the necessary money to carry on this war—I ought to say he said "my" policy. We are agreed upon that policy, but does the Minister of Finance suggest for a moment that being agreed upon the policy of raising whatever money we need, we are to stroke every "t" and dot every "i" which his immature experience leads him to put down on a fiscal measure in this country. Let me give the Minister of Finance one or two illustrations of the foolishness of such an intellectual attitude. Let me suppose that a farmer has sent his son to the front, and many of them have—which is more than my hon. friend will ever do, but that is an accident. The farmer having sent his son to the front, I should say that he is making a sacrifice to help somewhat to carry out this war. But when the Minister of Finance comes down to the House and says to this farmer, or to many such farmers: we propose to raise the money by which your fighting sons are to be kept at the front by making it more difficult for you to buy your agricultural machinery, then I say there are two sides to the question as to whether that is the proper way to carry on the war successfully; and especially so when that difficulty to buy agricultural machinery is created by giving tariff pap to the people who are engaged in the manufacture of agricultural machinery. Red Cross work is presumably helping the war at the front—" help the boys at the front," to use the words of my hon. friend from East Lambton—but when the Government comes down and says: we propose to add to the price of the woollens which the Red Cross workers knit into socks for the soldiers at the front, we say there are two opinions possible about that proposal being helpful in carrying on the war. When a woman parts with her companion in life, who goes to the trenches, presumably she makes sacrifice enough when she gives up her husband of many years and stays at home—and we know many have done it—to look after two or three children; but when a Minister of Finance comes down to this House with a proposition which amounts to going to that woman who is keeping the children at home, and saying to her: you have given your husband up to the trenches, that is magnificent; we are are a good protectionist Government and we propose that you shall build up the woollen manufacturers of eastern Canada by paying more for the socks of the children that you are looking after at home, we say there are two sides to the question as to whether that is a proper way to carry on the war.

Having cleared the ground by laying down a principle and trying to illustrate it, I come to the Budget of my hon. friend, and although he said at the opening of his very long speech to-day that he did not mind criticism of the Budget, like every one who makes a speech of three hours' duration, he is liable to forget at the end what he said in the beginning, and from his closing remarks one would think he minded very much; because, if his closing remarks had any meaning at all, they were a lecture delivered to this side of the House on daring to question his financial omniscience. In the Budget speech of my hon. friend, he produced a speech which was admirable in form, but, in my judgment, execrable in substance, and that is the most I can say for it. The speech that we have heard to-day was execrable both in form and in substance. Despite my hon. friend's having spoken for three hours this afternoon and evening, he has absolutely failed to shake the attack made upon his Budget by the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean). The power of my hon. friend's attack was manifest at the moment it was delivered. My hon. friend the member for South Toronto (Mr. Macdonell) was put up to reply to the speech of my hon. friend the member for Halifax. He spoke for a short time before dinner, and it was manifest to every one that he was so shaky that he would need to get reinforcements during the recess. Therefore it was no surprise to me, when my hon. friend the member for South Toronto resumed after recess, to find that he was flanked by the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames), who had moved across a great many benches in order to sit near him. I cannot help reflecting to myself that, when the protectionist lawyer from South Toronto is joined by the protectionist manufacturer from Montreal, the consumers of this country bear a striking resemblance to a certain man who once went down from Jerusalem to Jericho.

Just as the speech of my hon. friend was not shaken by the speech of the hon. member for South Toronto, it certainly was not shaken by the mixture of declamation and sophistry to which we have listened in this House this afternoon. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance has come out in a new light to-day. I am told by old parliamentarians that just before the election of 1896, the Prime Minister of that day, of whom I desire to speak with the very greatest respect, was so much in the habit of using the personal pronoun and of relating his own personal deeds, that in the ensuing general election the people of the country were perforce compelled to say to him: You have done so much and told us so much of your doings that we do not want you to do any more. I cannot help thinking that in this case coming events cast their shadows before, and that our hon. friend will be relegated to the obscurity from which he came. As the first personal pronoun resounded through this Chamber, and as my hon. friend passed from one wave of passionate utterance to another about what he had done, the thought occurred to one inevitably: What a mercy it is, not that we have such a Government in this country, but that the country had such a saviour as my hon. friend. My hon. friend reads Shakespeare. He has referred my right hon. leader to the play of Macbeth. I would advise him to read Hamlet's advice to the players again—he has read it before—and to pay particular attention to the phrase, "And tear not a passion to tatters." I do not know whether my hon. friend resents very much any imputation of insincerity, but his mood this evening was so different from his usual good nature and smiling countenance that I wondered whether he was not for the moment playing a part. What was there to make all the sound and fury about? I did not see anything in the beautiful oration of my right hon. leader to have vexed him in that way. There was nothing that was not really of the choicest description.

My hon. friend has referred to the right hon. the leader of this side of the House as a demagogue. The two orations will be read with very different feelings by the great majority of intelligent Canadian citizens. What was this long speech to which we have listened? For two years and some months before the war put an end for the time being to political controversy, the Government opposite had as its main argument the tu quoque argument. It is distressing in the extreme, the moment we resume to some extent political controversy, to find that my hon. friend has learned nothing during his period of rest from controversy, but that he comes before us to-day with a tu quoque argument, couched, it is true, in very much stronger language than he has ever used in this House before the war, but I excuse him on that account, because the war does affect people and there is no doubt whatever that the strain to which he has been subjected has acted to a slight extent upon his brain.

My hon. friend spoke of the unbridled extravagance of his predecessors. The question this country is concerned about is the present Budget, not the Budgets of years and years ago. The people are too busy trying to keep body and soul together under this Government to be very much interested in ancient history. I warn my hon. friend that that is the case. He spoke of the uncontrolled prodigality of the late Administration, and he told us that they had loaded him with obligations and burdens. His were the mighty shoulders upon which rests all the trouble that has descended from the previous Government.

Hon. W. T. WHITE: It is a legacy.

Mr. CLARK: There is a double answer to my hon. friend's tu quoque argument after all. What was he doing in politics or in private life before 1911? If we can believe what he said during the election of 1911, up to the reciprocity election he was a devoted follower of my right hon. friend. If that be true, my hon. friend was taking part with my right hon. leader in building up those burdens and those obligations. Therefore, there is a certain political fitness that, when he has emerged into his present position, he should have a good share in bearing the burdens which he has helped to build up. That is the first answer. Yet if we impugn his sincerity, he is awfully angry with us. Was he altogether sincere in speaking of the unbridled extravagance of the party of which he was an associate at the time they were in power? Was he sincere in speaking of uncontrolled prodigality? If he was, he was one of the prodigals and one of the unbridled men.

There is another answer to my hon. friend which is perhaps more to the point. If he was aware of the burdens and the obligations to which he became the heir why did he proceed to increase the ordinary expenditure of this country by tens of millions of dollars? When he speaks again he will have something else to do than to put so many questions to me—though I hope not to neglect any of them—he will have something to do in answering the question I have put to him. If he knew that these terrible obligations and burdens had come upon him, he had one duty in the world, and one only as a primary duty, and that was to begin at once by careful economy to cure the evils which had been sent down to him.

Hon. W. T. WHITE: They were incurable.

Mr. CLARK: My hon. friend tells us that he was the heir of obligations and burdens. In spite of these obligations and burdens he went on to claim that he had larger surpluses and had reduced debts more than his predecessors had ever been able to do. Does my hon. friend really deceive himself so much in the case of—I do not want to use a strong word—self-concentration in which he is bound up? Does he deceive himself to the extent of thinking that he had anything to do with these surpluses? Does he deceive himself to the extent of thinking now that his Government in the first two years they were in office, had anything to do in providing surpluses? Is he quite fair in blaming his predecessors for his obligations and burdens and pluming himself upon the surpluses and reduction of debt? Surely it is a fair argument that for the first two years this Government was in power, if they received the obligations and burdens that their predecessors sent down to them, they received from their predecessors the money with which careful financiers would have tackled those obligations.

My hon. friend when he boasts of those surpluses, reminds me of the younger son of a distinguished family who asked that the portions of goods coming to him might be given to him, and then took himself into a far country. I have no doubt that the associates with whom he foregathered there thought that as long as his money lasted, that that younger son was an admirable financier; but when he got among the husks no doubt they formed a different opinion of him. There is this to be said of the prodigal, that experience in his case was a wise teacher and sweet were the uses of adversity. But the experience which produced in the prodigal son a salutary attack of penitence has had an effect upon my hon. friend which resulted in a lamentable exhibition of ill-humour and egotism.

With regard to the comparison of the two Governments, there is this to be said about the previous Government—that if they were extravagant they had the money to do it with. That is a statement the accuracy of which I think the hon. gentleman will not deny. Now, I am against extravagance whether in prosperous times or in adverse times. I learned some of my finance from the speeches I used to hear from my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) when he was in Opposition. I found him a good financier; I found in his speeches many words of wisdom, following up lessons in finance which I had learned from the greatest financiers in the old country. I am against extravagance whether on the part of the Government or on the part of an individual, and whether in adversity or in prosperity. But if I have to choose between a Government spending an income which it has and a Government borrowing to spend, I prefer the former. The difference between the two is that between a successful man of business and a man who is in the hands of the money-lenders and who borrows to pay interest on previous borrowings. That is what I have to say in regard to my hon. friend's tu quoque argument. There are other points in what he said this afternoon to which I hope to refer before I resume my seat, but I do not propose to be drawn away by, what for want of a better word I may call, his arguments from looking at the present conditions of the country as revealed in the Budget, and the proposals for relieving that condition.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the Budget statement of my hon. friend revealed a lamentable condition of finance in this country. And unfortunately it is true that the lamentable condition of finance revealed by the Budget finds a reflection in the conditions of our people outside of this Chamber. Deficits and debt in Parliament are accompanied by poor trade and a good deal of destitution and unemployment among the people. The Minister of Finance has attributed, or has been very anxious apparently to attribute, this condition entirely to the war. Well, I like to be candid, I like to be fair; and I am bound to say that in my humble judgment conditions have been aggravated by the war. I do not think it possible to deny that the conditions have been agravated by the war. But there is a possibility for two opinions as to how far the war has operated in this direction. The Minister of Finance talks as if there was no possibility of an argument upon this subject. I should like to point out to hon. gentlemen opposite that a very distinguished member of this House, the hon. member for West Toronto (Sir Edmund Osler) has made a public speech in which he strongly states an opposite opinion. And, after all, we cannot brush to one side an opinion on a financial question uttered by the hon. member for West Toronto. That hon. gentleman was an authority on finance in this country before the Minister of Finance had ceased wearing long clothes. The hon. member for West Toronto made a speech in which he said that conditions had been saved in this country by the war, that orders had come to this country which had put business in motion and which meant $200,000,000 to the common people. In any case, I want to point out this in answer to the argument advanced by the Minister of Finance: to prove his point that the finances of this country have been thrown into disorder almost entirely by the war, what did he do? He quoted the trade figures of Australia to prove that in Australia a similar condition of affairs had come about.

10 p.m.

He quoted the trade figures of the United States to show that the war had brought about the same condition of affairs there. I understood my hon. friend to state—I should like his attention upon this point and correction if I am wrong—that in both Australia and the United States the figures of imports were showing an increase before the war. Has it not occurred to my hon. friend that there is a very striking difference on that point between Canada and these other countries? I should have thought that candour and courage in argument would have led my hon. friend at that point to deal with the unanswerable figures given by the hon. junior member for Halifax. The hon. member for Halifax quoted the figures of our import trade from January of last year down to August of last year, when war broke out, and by those figures he showed that contrary to what was the case in Australia and the United States, month by month, through January, February, March, April, May, June, July, there was an average decrease in the imports into Canada of over $10,000,000 a month. Surely those figures needed to be met. What did my hon. friend say with regard to that argument? Not a syllable. He did not controvert them, because they were incontrovertible proof that bad times were severely upon Canada before the war came at all. My hon. friend shakes his head. Was a decline of over $10,000,000 a month in the imports not a sign that bad times were approaching? It is capable of exact proof that after two and a half years of administration by this Government, when nobody was dreaming of war, there was every evidence that Canada was passing into a condition of commercial depression; and that condition has since been aggravated by the war.

I have on the sheet that is now in my hand some headings of columns which I myself took from newspapers in the month of July last. I took them for a specific purpose. I was going to give an address upon the times, and I took these headings as the best rough and ready evidence I could get of what was the condition of Canada at that time. I find amongst them this heading: "Canadian Pacific railway stock reaches a new low level." Canadian Pacific railway stock, worth less, I take it, than it had been for 17 years; less, at any rate, than it had been since it reached its maximum during the 15 years when my right hon. friend was at the head of Government. I find another heading: "A further large falling off in customs revenue." Another: "Fifty-three per cent decrease in immigration into the country." Remember that these are all from newspapers published previous to last July. I find another heading: "Proposed deportation of unemployed." I find in the Canadian Courier, an independent journal, of a date preceding the outbreak of hostilities, a statement to the effect that the most serious problem for Canada at the present is the question of the unemployed. These rough and ready pieces of evidence were found by myself in reading the newspapers of Canada before there was any question of war at all. I take it, Sir, that the hon. Minister of Finance cannot in his light and airy way dispose of that question by saying: in my first year I had a surplus; in my second year I had a surplus, and in my third year I had the war. Before the war came at all two years had sufficed for this Government to get in its work and they would have proceeded from surpluses to deficits and destitution and unemployment if never a shot had been fired on the battle field.

It is pertinent, however, to ask hon. gentlemen opposite: why should war produce the bad results in Canada which we all deplore? We still have the home market. As a free trader, I think that is a fair question for me to put to my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster.) Hon. gentlemen opposite have deafened me ever since I came to Canada about the splendid chance of prosperity we get by nursing the home market. Well, there are no German ships or guns here; we still have the home market. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce used to dwell upon the glories of interprovincial trade. We still have interprovincial trade; why should we have hard times? The real value of war from the fiscal standpoint is that it reveals protection in operation. Protection is the sworn foe of foreign commerce, and for the purposes of restricting foreign commerce gun-boats are far more effectual than tariffs. You have protection put in operation by gun boats, and the results do not seem to be to the liking of protectionists, because they say: we have hard times, and the war has produced them. But if they believe in protection; if they believe in their made-in-Canada propoganda, in the home market and in interprovincial trade as the real panacea for the fiscal needs of a country; if they believe in these things, war has just produced what protection would have produced if carried out to its logical issue. As I say, they do not like the result; it would be wonderful if they did, for the result proclaims in characters unmistakeable, so plain that he who runs may read, that the National Policy is a palpable failure. It is a palpable failure as a revenue producer, because it is a palpable failure as a trade producer. There is one point that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance appealed to me on in respect of which I agree with him; that his failure of revenue is due to failure of imports. There we are at one, though I cannot congratulate him in being equally at one with every one on the other side of the House.

I noticed that my hon. friend listened with very great interest and attention and with frequent applause to my hon. friend for Muskoka (Mr. Wright) when he spoke the other day. My hon. friend the member for Muskoka gave it as his deliberate opinion that this country would be very much better off if we reduced very largely both our imports and our exports; or rather, he said we should be as well off as we are now. I submit to the member for Muskoka that we are just as well off as we are now because we have reduced both our imports and exports.

I think that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance might use a little of his spare time to teach elementary economics upon his own side of the House. The National Policy has failed as a revenue producer because it has failed as a trade producer. It is now admitted by my hon. friend that our prosperity was due to borrowing. It was due, as I have frequently contended in this House, to the freest of free imports, and was not due to protective tariffs at all. The National Policy has not only failed in these respects; it has failed as an industry builder. For, Mr. Speaker, it is well worthy of remark that for forty years under both political parties—I am not here to defend all that has been done under this head by the Liberal party in the past—we have had the doctrine proclaimed that you must build up cities in this country for that home market to which we are now reduced by the conditions of international trade. We have this peculiar situation to-day, that the farmers of the country, especially the western farmers, who have never had any real benefit from protection, who cannot have any real benefit from protection because they produce more of their products than are used in the country—they are exporters, and the price of their stuff is as a rule settled abroad—the farmers are reasonably prosperous; not, I think, with all due deference to my hon. friend from Assinboia (Mr. Turriff), as prosperous as he would represent; the price of wheat has gone up; the price of pork at the present moment is very poor in western Canada; the price of beef on the foot is very poor in western Canada; but still the farmers are getting reasonably good prices; and they are getting them, not by the help of protection, but in spite of it. It is in the towns that we have our destitution; these towns that have been built up by the National Policy, where industries were to exist, where everybody was to be made prosperous, and upon which the farmers were to depend upon for their prosperity. It would seem, then, that the National Policy is breaking down as a builder of industries. How has this condition been met by the Government? I do not think I have exaggerated; I should be very sorry to. I hope I am a loyal and patriotic Canadian, though I am only an adopted son in Canada. I do not want to say anything which would hurt my adopted country, any more than I want to say anything to hurt the Empire in the struggle in which she is now engaged. I hope I have not exaggerated.

I have tried to depict fairly what is the condition of this country at the present moment and I turn to ask the question, how has the condition been met? In regard to the way the Government has met the situation let me quote what the Minister of Finance said concerning our special war expenditures:

> I have no hesitation in proposing to the House that we shall borrow the whole amount required under this heading.

Now, that is very specific language. There was a tendency towards the end of the speech to which we have just listened, for my hon. friend the Minister of Finance rather to qualify and depart from the position which he took in the words:

> I have no hesitation in proposing to the House that we shall borrow the whole amount required under this heading.

That is, under the heading of special war expenditure. Very well.

I define absolutely the attitude of hon. members on this side of the House. I say, and not only I say, but it is notorious that we all say: we agree. You are borrowing $100,000,000; we agree. But immediately the Minister of Finance makes that statement, he sets out to give us an account of the whole list of new taxation in the country, the whole series of new taxes, and after he had got through the description of those taxes he went on in his Budget speech as follows:

> These, Mr. Speaker are the proposals of the Government, having as their object the raising of additional revenue rendered necessary by the war and our participation therein as a belligerent.

Now, it seems to me that these two statements are at variance. Even in the brief speech in which he introduced his Budget my hon. friend was not quite consistent in the two statements he made. The fact is that the case for new taxation is not established. And as I understand the difference on this point between the two sides of the House, I should like to state it thus: the Government proposes to borrow the whole money which they are spending on special war expenditure; we agree. The Government need in addition $7,000,000 for interest and the nucleus of a pension fund. The drain upon the pension fund cannot be great, fortunately, for some little time to come. As I understand the amendment of my right hon. friend, it raises no objection to getting the money for the interest on the pension fund by some method of direct taxation. I so read the amendment of my right hon. friend, because it would be impossible to speak of direct taxes as burdening the people without giving revenue. I take it, then, that this is the position as between the two sides of the House; with the consensus of both sides the money for the carrying on of the war is being borrowed; the interest and the nucleus of a pension fund are being provided by direct taxation, because my hon. friend only needs $7,000,000 for interest, and the minimum sum he expects to get from direct taxation is $8,000,000, although the Toronto Star has calculated it at $14,000,000. Then where is the justification for the increase of the general tariff and for the obstacles against trade. I hold very strongly—and in this I think we are in general agreement on this utter failure in four hours of talk by the Minister of Finance, and in a great many more hours by hon. gentlemen behind him, to give any justification for increasing the customs taxation at this very serious juncture in the country's history.

My hon. friend the Minister of Finance rather pooh-poohs the idea of our recommending economy, because when an individual gets hard up or is in straitened circumstances he has to economize. I do not know where my hon. friend learned his economics. Personally, I think I can quote very high authorities for the position that a nation's economics should be conducted upon the same principle as an individual's economics. John Bright once said: "I make no distinction between the morality that ought to guide a man and that which ought to guide a nation." I take it that moral principles are involved in the way that a man or a nation raises money and spends money. I do not agree with my hon. friend that the nation can learn nothing from the individual in this matter. What is a nation? An aggregate of individuals. Does my hon. friend mean to tell me that a departure from sound economic principles which ruins a man can be undertaken by a nation? I do not agree with him for one minute. I stand with John Bright in declaring that the same economic principles in the main which guide a man ought to guide a nation. My hon. friend the junior member for Halifax used a notable phrase in regard to this Government's extravagance. He said that they had exalted extravagance to a virtue. We have had hon. gentlemen getting up in this debate and backing up that kind of thing. They say: The Government must go on spending even if they have to borrow. I wonder when we ever should be economical. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance condemns extravagance on the part of his predecessors who had plenty of money to spend, and he justifies extravagance on his own part when his revenues are falling and when he does not have the money to spend. I stand in this matter with Cobden. So far from exalting extravagance to the height of virtue, Cobden used the epigram that I remember twice being quoted by Mr. Gladstone, "Public economy is public virtue." If my hon. friend the Minister of Finance had not retired from the House I would have strongly commended that short statement to him. It is very brief, and I have no doubt it has been conveyed to him many, many times by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Geo. Foster), who really cannot view the shortcomings of this mere tyro in finance with anything like equanimity.

Mr. Winston Churchill, who is at the head of a great spending department which might be allowed to be extravagant at the present time if ever a department was—Mr. Winston Churchill, in the midst of the war, making a speech in the House of Commons and talking of the new departures on the part of the British Admiralty, had this to say:

> Everything in our power will be done to avoid extravagance. We shall therefore welcome the advice of businessmen where they can help us.

As my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition said this afternoon, the Government of Great Britain calls to their assistance the Opposition in the House of Commons and in the House of Lords, and Mr. Winston Churchill also has asked that he should have the advice of any business men who could help him to conduct the great spending department of the Admiralty on economical lines. The Minister of Finance, when he was constructing his Budget, instead of calling to his councils the Opposition, and especially my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, whose long experience in Government would enable him to give much valuable information and advice, appears to have consulted with the Canadian manufacturers.

My hon. friend the junior member for Halifax, in arraigning this Government, was interrupted by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister with a question and the question of my right hon. friend reminded me of a celebrated programme called the Halifax programme. I was surprised at my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, because I remember reading that modern evangel promulgated in the city of Halifax, and I remember many expositions of it by my right hon. friend. I do not apologize for quoting the statement which was made in one of these expositions by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister to the effect that an expenditure of a little over $100,000,000 by the late Government was prima facie evidence that the Government was corrupt. When my hon. friend the Finance Minister, or any other hon. gentleman on the other side of the House, turns and asks us where he could begin economizing I think it is a perfectly logical procedure on his part to consult the Prime Minister. He must have had some ideas, if he was sincere, when he promulgated this gospel. I was surprised at his addressing his colleague in the representation of Halifax and putting to him the question as to whether he would consent to begin economizing in the city of Halifax. If he had been as sincere as the early projectors of the original evangel, who began at Jerusalem, Halifax is the very place that he would have begun to put into practice the gospel which he preached previous to 1911.

I appeal to my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the best of good humour, because I am perfectly sure that he has had many a serious interview with this Cabinet. I told him when he joined it that he was a schoolmaster amongst children, that he was the only gentleman who had had any previous Cabinet experience, and the country is paying dearly for the fact, because he has been utterly powerless either by advice or example to restrain those with whom he is associated. My hon. friend in the year 1908, with an expenditure of about $108,000,000 for current and capital account, made a speech in this House in which he said:

> The rapid pace that has been set and the recklessness of the expenditures that have been undertaken have obliterated all the old rules, all the old lines in reference to expenditure.

If that was the case with an expenditure of $108,000,000 a year what are we to say about the old lines and the old rules when the expenditure for the same object has got up to $160,000,000? Then, plaintively in that address, after making this statement he asks: Whither are we rushing? I wonder if he ever addresses that inquiry to his colleagues in the Cabinet. If not I would strongly urge him to do so and especially to try and enforce the inquiry upon the present holder of the portfolio of Finance. The fact of the matter is that the Prime Minister made a fatal error in the original composition of his Cabinet, and I would advise him at once, if he wants to guide this country through to a saner and stronger financial position, to transpose a certain couple of ministers. The Minister of Finance would have made a splendid Minister of Trade and Commerce. Especially would he have excelled in the performance of the duties of the Department of Trade and Commerce which are described as those of the chief commercial traveller of Canada. The Minister of Finance has a smile that my hon. friend without portfolio opposite knows would be valuable in a commercial traveller, but a smile is no good to a watch dog. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has a smile, but he wears it in his heart. My hon. friend, if he had been given the portfolio of Finance and had been entrusted with the proper duties as the watch dog of the treasury, would have kept his smile most effectually when his present neighbour, the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) and others came to him to make the drains for their spending departments which have landed the country in the position in which it is in at the present time. But the Government do not see fit to appeal to the Prime Minister or the Minister of Trade and Commerce for lessons in economy. They do not wish to have them put in practice at the present time, and they have decided upon other proposals.

Let me say at once that the proposals of taxation which the Finance Minister has brought down for the approval of this House are absolutely lacking in initiative. I congratulate the Government upon their direct taxation; I congratulate them on embarking on direct taxation at all. The imposition of direct taxes is a very joyful spectacle for one who has been preaching the economic doctrines that I have been preaching in Canada for a number of years past. I have heard many men, since I came to Canada, ask: Where would you get your revenues if you established free trade and do away with tariffs? the people of this country would never stand for direct taxation; you will not have it for generations. Well, Mr. Speaker, war is a fine fiscal schoolmaster, and the war has brought us to a position in which this country has gone in for direct taxation, and I congratulate the Government upon introducing it. But the choice of the Minister of Finance in regard to his direct taxes has, as my right hon. leader has pointed out, not been quite fortunate. He has passed his direct taxes almost in every case right on to the consumers of the country, and to that extent he has failed to carry out direct taxation as it is carried out in the old country where the greatest burden is borne by the people who are most able to pay the taxes.

I think the Minister of Finance offered to the House, both when he introduced his Budget and again to-day, an extremely weak argument in opposition to an income tax. When he introduced his Budget he said that the income tax in Great Britain was mostly gathered upon huge investments. My recollection is that the minimum income paying tax in England is $1,000 a year, and I do not think the Minister of Finance is correctly informed in making the statement he did. I pointed out a year ago, I think in my Budget remarks, that at that time an income tax had been imposed in the United States, an income tax existed in Germany, that an income tax existed in France, and that surely the statesmanship of Canada was not absolutely so deficient that it could not come near the statesmanship of these various countries. I noticed the other day Russia, one of the Allies, had imposed an income tax for war purposes, and the minimum income paying the tax is $500 per annum. If our Allies are doing this, I do not see why Canada should not have put on a good fat tax upon large incomes, and I want to say that while such a tax would have this merit that it followed the example of all other civilized countries of the world, it would have had the approbation of the great masses of the people of Canada. It is a fair tax because according to the first principle of taxation we ought to gather our taxes as much as possible in proportion to the ability of the tax-payer to pay. I am perfectly certain that a good fat tax upon big incomes would have been a popular form of taxation, and a better form of taxation than many of the vexatious stamp duties which the Minister of Finance has lightly borrowed from the United States. Australia is a country to which we may look for comparison, and sometimes for guidance. Australia is well worthy of imitation in a great many ways. I do not think that hon. gentlemen opposite would be inclined to impugn the loyalty of Australia; I am perfectly sure that they, as we, felt a thrill of joy and satisfaction when the Australian battleship "Sydney" captured the German commerce-destroyer "Emden." What has Australia done in this matter of direct taxation? Australia, for the purposes of this war, has raised $5,000,000 by a federal probate duty, in addition to the probate duty already imposed by the various states.

The Minister of Finance, while commending the courage of the hon. member from Saltcoats (Mr. MacNutt) for mentioning a land tax, brushed aside a tax upon land values as a thing that was almost unworthy of his consideration. I do not know whether the Minister of Finance knows that Australia, for war purposes, is raising $13,500,000 by a land tax, in addition to the land taxes gathered by the various states of the Commonwealth. I want to put this to the members of the Government, as well as to members on my own side of the House, that the breakdown of protection in the matter of raising revenue will compel the statesmanship of Canada, sooner or later, as it has compelled the statesmanship of Germany, of the United States, of Russia, of England long ago, to seek direct taxes for carrying on the federal government, leaving the trade of the country free to develop the wealth in the country, which can be taxed as it is in England. Then all your taxation would go to the treasury and none of it to pamper and to feed special interests. I want to point out that land-value taxation is attracting increasing attention in Great Britain and in the United States, where the doctrine of taxation of land values was first promulgated. It has been employed in our own provinces in the West with a very great degree of success, and I want to emphasize the fact which my hon. friend from Saltcoats mentioned: that the grain growers of the prairie provinces, as well as the grange of Ontario and the United Farmers of Ontario have through their delegates in every case unanimously carried a resolution in favour of the taxation of land values in preference to raising additional obstacles against the trade of Great Britain at a time when Great Britain is at war.

Meantime, let me say further about this tariff policy of the Government, that it is a policy lacking not only in initiative, but, I think, lacking in common sense. I will tell you why, because I do not want to use strong language without being able to justify it. The National Policy has failed, else why betake ourselves to direct taxation as the Government has done in this case? The National Policy has failed as a revenue producer, and the policy of the Government is lacking in common sense because they propose to help that failure by more National Policy. I do not think that is a rational procedure. If a medicine is killing every patient that gets it, I do not think it is common sense procedure to administer extra doses of that medicine to the next patient who comes along. It is possible at this juncture to look at the history of tariff in this country. Its history has now been prolonged to such an extent that we can trace the trail of the serpent by the slime it leaves. The National Policy was introduced into this country in 1878. Looking at these years, I have always, since coming to this country, allowed it five years to get into operation, and I have compared the trade of Canada in 1883 with the trade of Canada in 1895, these being the last twelve years that the old Conservative Government was in power.

I have again and again pointed out in this House that in 1895, 17 years after the introduction of the National Policy, the foreign commerce of Canada was smaller by $6,000,000 than it was in 1883, twelve years previously. That is a very significant fact. You yourself, Mr. Speaker, sat in this House at that time, and you saw the trade of the country stationary year after year, until in 1895, after seventeen years of the National Policy, it was lower than it was in 1883, and the condition of the country generally was in keeping with the trade figures.

The other day I came across a quotation from the News-Advertiser of Vancouver, of February 1, 1895, giving an account of a board of works meeting twenty years ago, in which I read:

> Mr. H. A. Ball submitted an elaborate scheme of a poor farm in the East End Park where the hungry could be fed and work found for them.

That was after seventeen years of the National Policy in Vancouver. That was when the political forefathers of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) were running the affairs of the Dominion. I should think he would recognize a likeness between those times and now. The failure was so evident to my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce that, financier and statesman as he was, he faced the situation. What did he do? What my hon. friend the Minister of Finance is doing now—administer more National Policy? No, he reduced the tariff of this country very considerably, although the reduction came too late to save his party. His party went out of power in 1896; my right hon. friend came into power; and despite statements which I have never considered very fair on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite that nothing was done to reduce the tariff during the fifteen years that my right hon. friend was in power, in 1897, following the example, as I freely admit, of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, my right hon. friend reduced the tariff very largely. One hundred and fifty articles were put upon the free list and the British preference was introduced. It is no wonder that my right hon. friend says, as he said this afternoon, " Here we draw the line."

My hon. friend the Minister of Finance, forsooth, impugned the motives of my right hon friend as if the British preference were a new thing with him. So far as actual legislation is concerned, my right hon. friend is the father of the British preference in this country. The result of his introduction of the British preference was that just as British goods come here, so British immigrants and British capital come here; and the thing that my hon. friends opposite cannot get over at the present moment is that, for the fifteen years during which my right hon. friend and his colleagues guided the destinies of Canada, Canada was inhabited by a prosperous, wealthy, contented, and happy people. It goes without saying, that with all due allowance for the war, the National Policy in a much briefer period had brought about in the beginning of last year when there was not any war the very condition of affairs which existed in this country in 1896, when the upholders of the National Policy were sent about their business, because their policy had proved a failure. What is the cure for this depression? Is it to be more National Policy? Is it to be a made-in-Canada campaign?

Mr. SAM SHARPE: Hear, hear.

Mr. CLARK: My hon. friend the member for North Ontario says, "hear, hear." I would like him to go down to Toronto or Montreal and explain his made-in-Canada campaign to the thousands of unemployed there.

Mr. SHARPE: I would like my hon. friend to come to Orillia or any of our towns and say that the made-in-Canada campaign is a stupid policy.

Mr. CLARK: I would not do so without explaining the campaign. Of course, my hon. friend does not understand how stupid it is, but I will explain that point to him. I would like my hon. friend to go to his own city, in which he has spoken in favour of this made-in-Canada campaign, and explain how the National Policy is going to cure the problem that you have resulting from the National Policy which you have followed so far. Let my hon. friend say to one of those unemployed men, of whom there are thousands in the cities throughout Canada; You are having too many imports because that is the meaning of the National Policy campaign. If it means anything, it means that imports are a curse. I do not know what my hon. friends think about imports. If the made-in-Canada campaign has any meaning, it means that you are going to exclude imports. Yet my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce tells us that the country is depressed because we do not have imports any longer. Let any hon. gentleman opposite go to one of the unemployed in Toronto and say: We want fewer imports into this country at the present moment, and let him explain the economics of the policy. If the unemployed man were thoughtful he would say: When Laurier was in power, we were importing largely and we were prosperous; I was getting three good square meals a day then, and I have difficulty in getting them now either for myself or for my family. I imagine that my hon. friend opposite who was on this mission would have to tell that poor workman that he was getting too many imports at this time; that they were bad for him; that he needed dieting. He is getting the dieting all right. The imports were all right—the imports into the country accompanied by sufficient imports into the stomachs of the workingmen of the country. There must be a reason for that fact.

I wish I had time to tell hon. gentlemen opposite of some experiences that I had the last time I spoke on protection in England. When I was in England in 1906, I took part in the campaign there. The agitation was along exactly the same lines when Mr. Chamberlain was trying to impose protection upon the old country. His party was telling the people of Great Britain that carpenters were unemployed there because Britain was importing too many window-sashes and doors from Canada. They were having a made-in-Canada campaign in Great Britain. It does not look so well when we see it from this side, does it? Protection is supported by the same fallacies everywhere.

Where was the fallacy? Why did not the workingmen of Britain listen to the argument as it was put to them over there? Because teachers who knew something of economics immediately came along and said to the workingmen of Britain: It is very true that we are importing large numbers of doors and window sashes from Canada; but the peculiar thing is this, that statistics prove that carpenters in Britain have least unemployment when we are importing the most doors and window-sashes from Canada. Does my hon. friend the member for North Ontario (Mr. Sam. Sharpe) begin to see some light upon the made-in-Canada proposal? Why was it that carpenters were busiest in Britain when they were importing the most doors and window-sashes? Simply because they were busiest in the building trade, and the carpenters of Britain were making better money at hanging the doors made in Canada than they could make in making the doors.

Is there any wise economist on the other side who will tell me that the people of Great Britain do not know their business? Will the hon. member for North Ontario undertake to go to Britain and teach this made-in-Canada policy to Mr. Lloyd George, and improve the narrow fiscal understanding of Mr. Asquith and Sir Edward Grey? I think not.

How will the new tariff act? According to the minister who is responsible for it, it will not only raise revenue, but also promote agriculture and industry. Well, I never heard a prophecy that I think less likely of fulfilment than that one. If it is going to get revenue, how is it going to promote the made-in-Canada campaign? It is difficult to tell what the exact result of the tariff will be, but I venture to say that it will raise the cost of living for every man, woman and child in Canada. It will raise the cost of living as a result of the action of the Government which my hon. friend from Brantford supports, and it will raise that cost of living at a time when he has been engaged in trying to persuade the same Government to fix the price of foodstuffs in Canada. And I commend to him the consideration of the monumental nature of his inconsistency in that attitude. It will certainly raise the price of everything that we buy for clothing, everything that we buy for production, and nearly all we buy for food. That is the one certain result of the tariff as it is being imposed by the Government.

The Minister of Finance gets very angry with us on this side of the House if it is even suggested that that is the object of the tariff. Well, I would only say that there are many utterances of hon. gentlemen opposite that would lead us to believe that that would be the effect of the tariff in any case, and that the effect will be produced, not so much by reason of the price of imported goods, as by reason of the price of goods produced in this country. I do not know how many hon. gentlemen noticed the interruption of my hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain) the other evening. I think it was when my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turiff) was speaking. He was talking of the tariff upon axle greese, and my hon. friend from Peel very innocently said: Could not we make all that in Canada? Then, as my hon. friend from Assiniboia pointed out, what becomes of the proposal to get revenue by this means? On the one hand, the Minister of Finance tells us that these new taxes are going to give him $20,000,000 to $25,000,000 for the year—and he calls them war taxes, forsooth, though he has told us already that he is going to borrow all the money for the war—and, on the other hand, the follower of the Minister of Finance tells us that he proposes that as much of these goods as possible should be made in Canada. It is impossible that the tariff should at once raise revenue and promote the industry of the country. It never did so. Wherever the protective tariff is introduced it fails as a revenue producer, as the minister told us this afternoon it must do. The real objection to the tariff legislation of this Government is in this, that by raising prices to the consumer of almost everything used in this country, it builds up the fortunes of a limited class of our people at a time when everybody else in this country is learning how to suffer patiently. I pictured in my opening remark the farmer who has sent his son to the front and is left on the farm to make his living there. To complete the picture I need to introduce between the farmer and his son the gaunt and greedy figure of the tariff beneficiary who is prepared to line his own pockets by the financial suffering of those left at home while the son who has gone into the trenches is shedding his blood for his country. The real iniquity of these proposals at this time is in this, that while every man, woman and child outside of the beneficiaries of the tariff is learning to spell letter by letter, and to write in tears and blood, the word "Sacrifice!" the tariff beneficiary is there with his hands out for his subsidy. I am glad that I stand with those who are prepared to sacrifice and not with those who are seeking subsidies. Then my hon. friend from Victoria, and other hon. gentlemen on that side of the House, with unctuous patriotism on behalf of others say that they are quite sure the farmers of the West will be quite prepared to make their share of sacrifice.

An hon. MEMBER: They will.

Mr. CLARK: Yes, their share. They make their sacrifices in sending their sons to the trenches; but they do not propose—the workmen of our towns do not propose—to make a further sacrifice in the case of unjust taxation to the Moloch god of protection. That is the issue between us in regard to this question of tariff taxation and of "sacrifice" which falls so lightly from the lips of hon. members opposite, and I am glad to say falls so thoughtlessly also. The policy of the Government is short-sighted. What is the good of sending lecturers on production all over Canada, and at the same time putting these obstacles in the way of production. Production depends on power to exchange. You erect barriers against international exchange and then go to the farmer and say: Produce more but do not seek markets in which to sell your produce. It would be as rational to say to a man: Breathe freely, it is good for your health; and at the same time to put a string around his windpipe. You prevent your foreign trade by tariffs, and then you say to the farmers: For goodness sake, in these serious times, produce more. Short-sighted!

Now I come to the British preference. The short-sightedness, I think, comes out especially in connection with the British preference. The Minister of Finance put some question to me in regard to the British preference, and indulged in that flippant sophistry which usually finds its expression in the columns of the Toronto News, about the preference not having been lowered. The amendment of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition does not say anything about the preference. It says there are additional obstacles being placed against British trade. That is what the amendment says, and that is what the tariff is doing—putting additional obstacles against British trade. No denial is possible to that simple statement.

Of course, my hon. friend comes along with his arithmetical and proportional calculation and says: but we are not doing so badly to Britain as we are to the other countries of the world. But what consolation is that to Britain? Suppose my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works—which God forbid—had fallen into the hands of the Germans, and his family had fallen into the hands of the Germans with him. Suppose they had said that he was so wicked a character that they would cut off both his hands and gouge out both his eyes; would it have been very much consolation to any remaining member of my hon. friend's family if they had taken from my hon. friend only one hand or only one eye? That is all there is to this childish argument. What is the good of talking about Britain still having a preference in the market if you are making the tariff so high that she cannot compete with our own producers? That is my answer to my hon. friend's economic refinements which he makes with such abundance and such a profuse use of the first personal pronoun.

What was the other question my hon. friend put to me? He said: "Were the duties against British goods raised by my right hon. friend for the purposes of protection?" I am enough of a Scotchman to answer my hon. friend's question by asking him another, and the other question I want to put is this: if my right hon. friend raised the duty on some specific British import to the point that it became a protective duty, how is my hon. friend going to get a revenue by raising it still higher? I trust that some of my hon. friend's colleagues will draw his attention to my answer to his question. War taxes? How can these be war taxes? If my right hon. friend made the tax protective and barred the goods from the country, or largely so, are they going to be admitted when my hon. friend raises the tax still higher? They know that there is only one answer to that question; it is a protective tax; it is a tax to protect the home producer. Do not let us hear any more about sacrifice just at this point in the argument.

My hon. friend's policy is short-sighted because, inevitably, we are handing over business to the United States. The United States, we are told, have imposed war taxes, but they have been sensible enough to do so not by way of raising the tariff, but by imposing a very large number of direct taxes. They have found out the fallacy of tariffs over there. It is a piece of absolute folly, hurtful to Canada, to put a tax, for example, on wool, at the very time when the United States are admitting wool free into their country, thus freeing the hands of their manufacturers. If you go to almost any manufacturer in Britain to-day and ask him why he prefers free trade to protection, he will say that it is because as a manufacturer he has done better under free trade. If you ask him why, he will say because of the cheap rate at which he can get his raw material. But in the terrible times through which we are passing and which are still in front of us, the highest wisdom of this Government in restoring the manufacturing industries and the prosperity of the commerce of this country is to be found in their following a road diametrically opposed to the road which has led Britain to the commercial and manufacturing supremacy that she has in the world to-day.

My hon. friend's policy is short-sighted, because after this war every one of us knows that we shall need British capital again. My hon. friend says that the present depression of trade exists because we cannot get capital. I want to call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that he has in his Budget taken the best way to debar British capital from this country. Just as when the British preference was first introduced, goods came and our goods went in payment, which is the basic principle of all international trade, so the people came, capital came and prosperity came. My hon. friend has reversed all this, with the zeal of a pervert.

Hon. W. T. WHITE: Don't you believe it.

Mr. CLARK: Don't believe what? Is my hon. friend not putting on these taxes?

Mr. WHITE: Do not believe the theory that you are putting forward.

Mr. CLARK: I am not dealing in theories. My hon. friend is the theorist for this Government, and the theory he puts forward to-night in this very connection was the most extraordinary that I ever heard come from a man who professes to be an economist. I hope he will not include me in his class any more; he is in a class absolutely by himself. My hon. friend puts forth the theory to-night that these tariffs of his will not bar out trade. Then what becomes of the "Made in Canada" propagandism? I said it was stupid, but it is worse than that if the tariff will not bar out trade. I will have to correct myself and call it wicked as well. Trade, as a rule, is not founded on sentiment. When the Investors' Review and the Economist, both journals of very high standing, animadverted to the disadvantage of the increased obstacles which my hon. friend has put on against British trade, they did not do so on the ground of the effect on Britain. They know something about trade and finance over there, and both these trade journals lamented the increased obstacles against British trade on the very grounds which I have now been bringing before the House; because of their hurtfulness to Canada and the Canadian people. They both support the fiscal policy which has made Britain what she is to-day in the hands of Mr. Lloyd George and his colleagues, who were in Parliament and preaching sound economics at the time when my hon. friend had scarcely escaped from the schoolmaster's rod. These papers lament the fiscal legislation that my hon. friend is introducing because of its hurtfulness to Canada. But I will say that if ever sentiment entered into relations of trade I would have thought it would do so at the present moment in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite. This is a view that is being held by large numbers of British people in this country. I have a couple of sentences that were written to me by an Englishman in Winnipeg the other day; the writer will be recognized as an Englishman by the straightforwardness, honesty, sincerity and strength of his speech. He says:

> Every one I hear talking thinks it is nothing less than a stab in the back, a real piece of treachery, helping the enemy. To borrow the whole cost of the war from England and then turn round and tax her goods extra, ostensibly to find the money to repay her, but really to give the tariff hogs a little more swill, is rotten.

That is how Britishers in the constituency of my hon. friend (Mr. Rogers) are talking about this tariff.

Hon. ROBT. ROGERS: That gentlemen is not acquainted with many people out there.

Mr. CLARK: My hon. friend may be mistaken on that point. In the last election Winnipeg gave a popular majority against the Government of which my hon. friend was once an ornament of about 8,000. My hon. friend should not be too sure about what he knows of the people of Winnipeg. My friend, Mr. Dixon, who was elected on that occasion by the biggest majority ever given, I think, a provincial candidate in Manitoba, is a free-trader and single-taxer, who came originally from the city of Nottingham. There are more people there who have fiscal light than my hon. friend dreams of. The last trial of strength was not very strong in support of the view which has just been expressed by the hon. gentleman, for whom I have a very great regard, so great a regard that I would not like him to live in a fool's paradise in this matter. Instead of spending his time studying electioneering politics I would recommend that he study economics, and then when he runs up against a propaganda like Dixon's he will be able to deal with it with arguments of a different kind to what are used in practical politics.

I wish the Government even now would repent on this matter of the British preference. I say it sincerely, I would not put a tax on British goods just now; and a man is always sincere when he commends others to take the course he would have taken himself. I would not put an additional obstacle against British goods at this time. I would have been too fearful of linking up myself, even in thought, with what has been done by the enemies of my country. If I may repeat what has been said by my right hon. leader this afternoon: "I would not fight British trade with tariffs at the time that the Germans are fighting it with submarines." It would be most impolitic to do so when British trade is doing so much for the world as it is doing. My hon. friends will tell me it is not Britain's trade, it is the Navy. Of course, it is the Navy. But what built the Navy? Protectionists will never build a navy. The last thing protectionists want is ships. If you go in for the home market and interprovincial trade, which have failed you so lamentably at the present moment, and for the made-in-Canada propaganda you will never build many ships. The Navy is the direct result of trade. It is the final outcome of the commercial and the colonizing and civilizing qualities which are the glory of the British race. British trade is to-day the chief support of the Allies, Mr. Speaker, it is more than that. It is itself the chief ally. It is British trade which is bringing succour to the poor and needy Belgian refugees. It is British trade which is enabling Britain to finance her own outlying dominions and the smaller belligerents states. It is British trade which is keeping open the ports of the North American continent and of all neutral states. It is British trade which is saving to-day the civilized world. Hon. gentlemen opposite think the time fitting to obstruct that trade, and at the same time propose to throw extra burdens on our own people. We on this side of the House most confidently believe that in this most serious crisis it is not wise either to obstruct your commerce or to burden your people.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer a few remarks with regard to the motion now before the House. After listening to the addresses on the Budget that have been delivered here this afternoon and to-night, I can imagine that at this late hour hon. gentlemen are pretty well loaded up with the subject, and that nothing new or interesting can now be said with regard to it. It is just about a month ago that the Budget was delivered in this House. For nearly two weeks we were living in expectation of the Opposition's taking up the discussion of the Budget; but adjournment after adjournment took place, until finally the financial critic of the Opposition replied. To-day we have listened to an address from the right hon. leader of the Opposition, who has moved an amendment dealing with one phase of the Budget. I believe that at this particular time in our history we should consider the questions that come before Parliament in a sober, serious manner, that matters should not be considered lightly or with levity. I regret to have come to the conclusion that that has not characterized all the addresses that have been delivered in this House.

I have listened with a good deal of interest to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Michael Clark), after addressing the House for an hour and a half. I have heard him on previous occasions dealing with public questions in this House, and I must say that I have often listened to him with a good deal of interest. But the very fact that to-night he has not been up to his usual standard is an indication that he found the subject a very difficult one. We all recognize in the hon. member for Red Deer a keen debater, a man with a logical mind who is quick to detect and reach the weak joints in the armour of his opponent; but to-night, if we are to judge by the vehemence and lung power which he displayed, I think he was sadly lacking in the arguments he is usually able to find. I shall attempt to deal with just a few of those he has advanced. We have listened with interest and sometimes with amusement to the arguments he has advanced in favour of that old hobby of his, free trade. We have heard him denounce protection to-night in a manner that would indicate that he was thoroughly sincere in that respect. But the hon. member for Red Deer is somewhat like the parrot that once found himself in difficulties, and who, after coming to a sober realization of the plight he was in, came to the conclusion that he had talked too much. I have heard the hon. member for Red Deer deal with protection from a different standpoint to that which he assumed to-night. I remember that he had made a speech on protection two years ago, and I took the trouble to find out whether he was always the ardent free trader that he is to-day. When I heard him denounce this made-in-Canada propaganda I could not help thinking that I had heard him on a similar subject in the past, and on looking over the records—and you can find his name displayed on almost every page of the records of that year—I found that the hon. gentleman did not always denounce the made-in-Canada movement that we hear so much about to-day. In fact, he championed it, and a very able and eloquent champion he was. I wish to quote a few remarks that he made in this House in March, 1913, which will be found in the Unrevised Hansard, page 4648. He said:

> The simple fact is that Canada cannot afford these dreadnoughts, sending money out of the country without recompense in the shape of developing industries within the country.

That was the attitude of the hon. gentleman at that time. Is that the song he sings to-day? No, he preaches an entirely different doctrine. He was a made-in-Canada man at that time.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Is there anything inconsistent between defending my own house against a burglar and buying something from a neighbouring store?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No, but I am inclined to think that if the people of the British Empire had been of the same opinion as the hon. gentleman on that occasion the burglar would be in possession to-day and we would be paying tribute to our neighbours. We would not be sending our men over to help Britain in the fight that is now engaging the attention of the civilized world. He goes further; he says that of the $91,000,000 of an increase in our trade of the previous year, only $9,000,000 represents the increase in exports. That means that we increased our borrowings to such an extent that our increase in production will barely suffice to pay the interest on our increased borrowings. To-day he says: Buy in the cheapest market and sell wherever you can. He denounced protection and he cited figures down to the year 1895. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that down to the year 1896 when the Liberal Government came into power, they had denounced protection and they had proclaimed what they would do with it if returned to power. Was it any wonder that the manufacturers of the country, that the people who desired to invest money in industrial development, were nervous at the possibility of those gentlemen being connected with the Government of this country? We know as a matter of fact notwithstanding the professions that were made at the time, the manufacturers were privately assured that if hon. gentlemen opposite came into power they would not repeal the protective tariff. Is it to be wondered at that capital obtained confidence after the late Government had been in power a few years? People realized that the protective tariff had come to stay, and that hon. gentlemen opposite were not sincere in their professions when they said they were going to repeal the protective tariff. Confidence having been established in the minds of people interested in manufacturing industries that protection was the policy of both parties, a great development took place between the period to which I refer and the present time. Year after year we have seen industries springing up, and we have secured the investment of hundreds of millions of dollars in different lines of manufacture. I know that the hon. gentleman from Red Deer does not like to hear this and in order to get away from a conscience that is troubling him he has, I believe, walked out of the House. I do not intend to devote further time to that subject.

The protective tariff that he has attacked to-night has been attacked also by hon. gentlemen opposite. They still sing that old song that we heard so much of in 1911—unrestricted reciprocity. The hon. leader of the Opposition said to-day: In 1911 you debarred us from selling to the United States and now you are going to prevent us from buying from Great Britain. Does he not realize that the markets of the United States are freer to us to-day than they were when reciprocity was an issue? Is it not a fact that we can sell more freely to the United States under the conditions that exist to-day than we could have done had reciprocity come into effect? I have the best of authority for making that statement and I am going to quote my authority. After the Wilson tariff had come into effect, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) was in the United States, and he was calling upon the President. The Globe of November 27, 1913, contains the folowing allusion to this subject:

> Representative James R. Mann, the Republican floor leader of the House who has followed Canadian tariff matters closely, was asked what trade relations might be discussed between the Canadian Premier and President Wilson, Mr. Mann said: "I do not see what object Premier Borden could have in discussing trade questions with the President or the present Administration. I cannot understand what more could be obtained by Canada by way of trade benefits than the Dominion can now have under the Underwood tariff law. The United States gave Canada much more in the Underwood tariff reductions than the Canadian reciprocity proposed to give. While the latter Act was intended to be reciprocal, the Underwood Act is not, and Canada does not have to give anything in return.

That is pretty good authority. Yet in face of that we find that on March 7 of last year the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) who, I am sorry to find, has not been able to attend during the last few days on account of illness, made this statement in a public address delivered at Buffalo:

> "If an appeal were made now to the Canadian people," said Mr. Lemieux, "there would be an overwhelming majority in favour of the reciprocity pact."

That is also taken from the Globe of March 7, 1914. We had a similar statement from the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon), who is an ardent advocate of reciprocity. I can imagine what the condition of affairs would have been if at the present time reciprocity had been in existence. With a war in progress in the old land and tariff entanglements that would be bound to create differences between us and the United States, the situation would have been one full of embarrassment. I have not admired the course of the United States during the whole progress of this war, and I am pleased that we have no entanglements, no alliances of any kind, but that we are able to assist the Empire in whatever manner we choose.

I want to call the attention of the House to a remark made by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition in his address this afternoon. He was referring to the truce which he claimed had not been observed on this side of the House. I have heard this question during the past few days discussed in the House. I have been quite of the opinion that there was no truce for some time past, if ever. I heard my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) make a statement that he and the leader of the Opposition had cancelled some meetings which they had intended to hold and that they had observed the truce. I can quite understand why they would cancel meetings at the time the war broke out. I can imagine what sort of a reception the leader of the Opposition would have had if he had gone out through this country holding political meetings at that time in view of the record which he established for himself in preventing Canada from doing her part to assist Britain in strengthening the naval forces of the Empire. He well might withdraw, but the Liberal press in this country, day in and day out, have continued to discuss political questions not at all as if a truce existed but as if they were going to avail themselves of every opportunity of gaining a political advantage. I want again to quote from the Toronto Globe which, as the House well knows, is the organ of the Liberal party in the province from which I come. In its editorial column it says:

"Our policy," said Sir Wilfrid, speaking of the attitude of himself and his supporters during the long session, "was that we should have two fleet units, one on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific, to take the places of the British squadrons which had been removed from these waters. . . . We on this side of the House are as ready to bear our burden, to discharge the duty we owe to the Motherland as British subjects, as any others can be; but we want to do it in the manner which was adopted by all parties at one time, when this question was approached free from party bias, by the organization of a Canadian navy on lines compatible with the autonomy of Canada." The reference here is to the naval debate that grew out of the resolution of Mr. Foster in 1909.

Sir Wilfrid pointed out at some length, and with great clearness and emphasis, the effect of the removal of the North American squadron from the North Atlantic Ocean: all Canadian exports would, in the event of a foreign war, have to pass into and through the United States, to be carried to their destination under the flag of that country. The present war has made plain the prophetic character of this presage. The presence of a few German cruisers meant for a time serious derangement of British commerce, not merely on the Atlantic, but also on the Pacific and Indian Oceans. If Canada had, under the Borden Administration, carried out the Canadian naval policy, in co-operation with Australia and in accordance with the terms of their agreement of 1909, these German cruisers would never have produced a tithe of the alarm and destruction they caused.

This is the Liberal policy as outlined by the Liberal leader in Parliament. It purports to provide for the defence of Canada on both oceans, and also of Australia and New Zealand.

That editorial was contained in the Toronto Globe of November 25, 1914, and other editorials of a similar nature have appeared in that and other papers, all of which goes to show that the Liberals have not been keeping the truce. The Winnipeg Free Press also contained similar statements, one of which I shall read:

Among the nations of the Empire, Australia stands higher now in the sight of all the world by reason of the achievement of the cruiser Sydney of the Australian navy. Canada in 1909 adopted the Canadian navy policy by unanimous vote of the Dominion Parliament, on a resolution moved by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and seconded by Mr. Borden. This Dominion entered into an agreement with the Commonwealth of Australia to co-operate on the Pacific with Dominion navies. That agreement was abandoned by the present Government of this country. Would it not have been a fine thing if a cruiser of the Canadian navy, say the Winnipeg, had chased down and destroyed the Emden?

I would point out to hon. gentlemen opposite that they have not observed the truce, when their press contains such articles as these by which they are deliberately attempting to mislead and influence the people of this country. In 1909 the three Dominions, Australia, New Zealand and Canada, decided to share the burdens of naval defence. All three Dominions started even and Australia built a whole fleet unit and New Zealand built a battle cruiser in 1909, but down to nearly the end of 1911, when the late Government went out of power, we find that Australia and New Zealand had completed their part of the contract and Canada had not done anything. The Liberal Government did not attempt to do anything with regard to naval defence; it was a matter of procrastination with them. Not a ship was built, not a keel was laid, not a contract was given by the Liberal Canadian Government during all the time they were in power. To-day they say: why we were just on the verge of doing something when the change of Government took place. I say, Sir, that tenders called for by the late Government were received on the 1st of May, 1911, and shortly after that, on the 12th day of May, Sir Wilfrid Laurier and two of his ministers, went to England to attend the Imperial conference, there to throw cold water on Imperial matters. They arrived back in Ottawa on the 12th of July, the dissolution of Parliament took place on July 29th, and the election was held on the 21st of September. During all these summer months the tenders were lying in the office pigeon-holed, and the Government never made any attempt to let a contract. This showed that they were not sincere in what they were professing to the people of this country; it proved that they had no intention whatever of carrying out the policy they were preaching with regard to naval defence: I believe that the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) gave us an insight into what was the custom and habit of the Liberal party, not only when in power, but when in opposition, when the other day he stated in this House: that he had come to the conclusion that political parties are justified in certain instances in not keeping promises which they never should have made. Is not that a nice doctrine to preach? That political parties should not keep promises which they should never have made. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Nesbitt) did not go so far as to say that if it was going to have any political effect it might be a good thing to make these promises and to not observe them afterwards. Later on, in his speech, the contention of the hon. member (Mr. Nesbitt) was that the present Government should not only ignore what the late Government had done with respect to the building of the Hudson Bay railway, but be done with the whole thing. He indicated that the late Government, although they had made extensive and expensive surveys, and had made a careful estimate as to the resources of the country through which the railway passed, were not absolutely convinced they were justified in building that road. The impression he would leave on the minds of the people is, that this was one of the promises that the late Government would be justified in breaking. In contrast to that, let me point out that at a political meeting at which I was present not very long ago, during the South Huron by-election, the right hon. the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), late Minister of Railways, were present, and if I remember corectly, and I think I do, the hon. member for South Renfrew said: the Tory Government we now have in power in this country have done nothing; they have not put any practical legislation on the statute books; it was not they who initiated the Hudson Bay railway, I signed the contract for the building of that road, and all the credit should go to the Liberal Government and not to the present Government. What are we to think when we find a member of the Opposition getting up in this House and asking us to denounce the building of the Hudson Bay railway now, and to disregard the contract that had been entered into by our predecessors? Is that the kind of honour we want to see on the part of governments and political parties in this country? I say no, and I hope that such a damnable doctrine as that will receive the treatment it ought to receive from the people of Canada. That is not the kind of honour we want to see inculcated into the youth of this country? I may say that a more pernicious doctrine was never preached by any political man in this country than that which fell from the lips of the hon. member for North Oxford on that occasion.

I want to make a few further references to this truce, which has been violated by the Toronto Globe, by the Winnipeg Free Press, and by almost every Liberal candidate who has been nominated during the past few months. The most offensive partisanship has been displayed by these gentlemen at these conventions, and it has been published broadcast in the Liberal press throughout Canada. I want to say, Sir, that the record of the Opposition with regard to the construction of the navy is just exactly in keeping with the doctrine that was preached by the member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt). I want to say, further, that only on January 19 of last year we had a statement from the leader of the Opposition in this House, which gives a pretty fair index of what was in his mind, and, indeed, the same idea was expressed by many hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. The right hon. gentleman said:

> Emergency? Who speaks to-day of emergency? Twelve months have passed since my right hon. friend the Prime Minister introduced his measure. Twelve months and more have passed since that time when he saw the German peril. He saw Germany almost ready to jump at the throat of Great Britain. He saw clouds on the horizon; he saw these clouds rent by lightning; he heard the murmurs and rumbling of distant thunder. But my right hon. friend to-day lives in peace. The atmosphere is pure, the sky is clear.

Those were the predictions of the right hon. gentleman just one year ago. Two years ago he succeeded in defeating the proposition introduced by the Prime Minister of Canada to render some assistance to the British Empire, and to remove the stigma and reproach standing against us to-day that we have never done anything for the Empire; that we have been receiving favours at the hands of Great Britain, and that we have never displayed the manliness to assume a share of the burdens of Empire. When the Prime Minister brought down that measure it was defeated by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition and those who sat behind him in this House and by his followers in the Senate. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), who was heartily in accord with the policy of his leader, on the same day, January 19, 1914, made the following statement:

> The whole case of contribution was a case of emergency, and the emergency disappeared when the fleet went to Gibraltar. And if it disappeared at that time, where is the emergency to-day? My right hon. friend knows, and every one of his supporters knows, that the fleet has been dispersed to the seven seas and the German fleet with it—and every lover of civilization is very glad to see that come about. And that dispersal of the fleet is the second absolute justification of all that the Opposition did last winter, whether it was in the House of Commons or in the Senate.

That shows where the influence exerted in the Senate came from.

The right hon. leader of the Opposition says: "In Great Britain the Government have called the Opposition in and have consulted with them as to conditions in regard to the war; they have taken them into their councils. He complains: We have not been taken into the councils of this Government; consequently, you need not complain if we criticise you to-day. Let me tell the right hon. gentleman that the attitude of the Opposition in the old country was not the same as the attitude of the Opposition in Canada. They have not displayed the same disposition that has been displayed here year in and year out by hon. gentlemen opposite. During all the years that my hon. friends were in power and during the few years that the present Government has been in power, my hon. friends opposite day in and day out have exerted themselves to prevent Canada from assuming her part of the burden of the Empire. Is it any wonder, with a record such as that, that the hon. leader of the Opposition was not called into the councils of the Government. He says: Do not complain if to-day we are criticising the course of the present Government. Is it pique that influences the right hon. gentleman? Is he so sensitive because he has been left out that he finds it necessary to criticise the Government on a question of this kind with the Empire engaged in the most serious war that has ever taken place in the history of the world, with millions of men armed to the teeth, with the contesting parties locked together to-day in a death struggle, each realizing full well what defeat or victory will mean to them? Is this a time for a political leader to exhibit a disposition of that kind and to complain that because he has not been consulted by the Government, he will criticise it?

The right hon. gentleman occupied most of his time in picturing the grave injustice which would be done to the poor man, and how the wealthy man was going to escape practically scott free. He referred to the tax on railway tickets. He did not tell hon. members that the wealthy man was taxed twice to the poor man's once. The wealthy man is taxed when he purchases his ticket and also when he takes a seat in the Pullman car. I could not see any force in my right hon. friend's argument. I have taken the trouble to look the matter up, and I am still of the same opinion.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Would my hon. friend not consider it a reasonable proposal that a second-class ticket should bear a smaller rate of taxation than a first-class ticket bears?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I do not see that there is very much difference. As a matter of fact, I think most people travel first-class in this country.

Mr. SINCLAIR: You would get all the more revenue, then.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I think the explanation given by the Minister of Finance this afternoon covered that matter thoroughly.

At the outset of the remarks of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) he referred to the purchase of submarines by the present Government, and also to a speech that he had delivered some time ago with regard to submarines and the part they were going to play in the war of the future. I do not know whether I have the speech to which he referred or not, but you can find the name and the speeches of the hon. member for Red Deer plastered all over Hansard of that session. In that year, 1913, he made the following statement:

> My thirteenth point is that this gift of money at this particular juncture of the world's history is from the point of view of science a most unwise policy. If I am right in my reading of the future I believe that science will join with religion to end war and I think that science in the end will prove a more powerful factor than religion, because religion has taken a long time about it. I submit that from a scientific point of view Canada is behind the day in going in for the construction of dreadnoughts. Before the dreadnoughts are completely built we may find that we might as well have thrown the $35,000,000 into Deptford basin. The future war is to be a war of airships, and, when you have have a war of airships, you will soon have the end of war as far as civilized people are concerned, because when airships get into business the people who make the war will be hit. If an airship can cross from Germany and drop a shell upon the Imperial House of Commons and possibly strike the Minister of War or the Minister of Foreign Affairs they will arrange their policy in such a way as to avoid war.

In order to point out the frivolity that has characterized hon. gentlemen opposite in their discussion of these questions at this time, I want to say that never in the history of the world has the efficiency of the dreadnought been so demonstrated as it has been during the present war. What do we find to-day? We find that the fortifications on the Dardanelles are being blown to pieces by British dreadnoughts. We find that the dreadnoughts in the North Sea are guarding the commerce of the world. The enemy has been simply wiped off the ocean. In the battle which took place at the Falkland Islands was victory not due to the fact that we had ships sufficiently powerful to get within range of the enemy? The cause of the loss we suffered off the coast of Chili, was owing to the fact that our ships were not able to get within range of the German ships before they were sunk. And yet we find in this House that, in spite of conditions such as I have indicated the hon. member for Red Deer, with all that wisdom with which he believes himself possessed still refers to what he said two years ago and contends that the submarine and the airship are going to settle the wars of the future. We are more concerned with what is taking place at the present time than with what may take place five, ten, fifteen years hence. Just one year ago when hon. gentlemen opposite were taunting the Prime Minister by saying that the emergency had passed, what was that right hon. gentleman doing? Was not he organizing a committee composed of the heads of the various departments in order to prepare for just exactly what took place a few months later, so that when war broke out between Great Britain and Germany we found ourselves in a position to proceed immediately owing to the work that had been done?

I wish to quote just two or three remarks made by other speakers. The hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) spoke on this subject on June 20, 1914, Hansard page 51. This is what I find recorded in Hansard as having fallen from the lips of the hon. gentleman who is to-day criticising, or attempting to critise the Government for what they are doing to provide the sinews of war and to remove the stigma, the reproach and the shame from our escutcheon that rests there to-day:

> There was presented to Parliament last session a measure providing for an expenditure of $35,000,000 for the construction of three battleships and the presentation of them to the British Admiralty. This policy was urged upon the ground that Britain's supremacy was imperilled and that a great conflict was imminent between two great European powers. Tokens and signs we were told were not wanting. There were pealings of thunder and flashes of lightning, premonitions of this terrible naval conflict between two great naval powers, and upon this ground we were urged, cajoled and threatened to support this measure of the Government. We were told it was purely an emergency policy: that the Government had in mind the adoption of a permanent policy which they would shortly present to Parliament. Several months have at least elapsed since then. The evidence of the emergency conditions and of the European Armageddon has vanished: time has vindicated the position which the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House took upon that occasion. The relations between Great Britain and Germany have improved immensely since then.

That is, since a year before when the Government of Canada were endeavouring to do something that would render effective aid to the Government of Great Britain.

I said that the Government had organized a committee of the various heads of departments associated with the head of the Militia Department to make preparation for what was apparently inevitable owing to the action of the German people. During every session since I became a member of this House the Opposition have concentrated their energies on the criticism of the Militia Estimates. They ridiculed the idea of this country being called upon to do anything in defence of the Empire. They sneered at the men who wore the King's uniform. The men who are sitting in this House to-day who have not volunteered for service threw slurs at the men who at that time were wearing the uniform. I would call attention to the remarks of the hon. member for Caleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell). These remarks were made on the 1st of June, 1914, just two months before war broke out:

The principal cause of the trouble with the minister—

That is, the Minister of Militia.

—and his top-heavy militia is the report of a general by the name of French, who came to this country some years ago, and in my judgment his visit was one of the greatest misfortunes that has befallen Canada.

I told the late Minister of Militia publicly and privately that in adopting the ridiculous and unreasonable report made by this gentleman, he had committed a great mistake. It might be all right if General French was reporting on the conditions in Bulgaria, or Russia, or Germany, or even Italy, but when it comes to a country like Canada where there is not a possibility of trouble, his ideas are ridiculous. There is no more possibility of a war breaking out between Canada and any country in the world than there is of the Minister of Militia or myself, committing suicide between now and to-morrow morning.

The department brought over a man like General French and he lays out the country in divisional areas. That was not enough and they had to increase the divisional areas and get more officers. That was not bad enough, although the Lord knows it was pretty bad. Last year they brought over another of these gentlemen, General Sir Ian Hamilton. I do not think we have suffered so much from his report as we did from that of General French, because the most of the damage had been done already; perhaps I am not voicing the sentiment of every one in this House, and I presume I am not; but I want to give the minister credit for getting rid of this foreign—

He heard a hiss pass through the House at that, and so he said:

—I will take that word back. This English General Inspecting Officer, or whatever you call him. When I was in Germany, I admit that I could see the result of the military training there: you could see it as the men walked along the street. In Canada you do not get enough military training for it to be of any benefit physically. All you get in the militia of Canada is that you teach about 25 per cent of the men in Canada how to get drunk.

This was the hon. member for Carleton's estimate of the men who belong to the militia of this country. I say that a more contemptible insult was never hurled at the men wearing the King's uniform. These words are on Hansard, and they will remain a reproach against the hon. member for Carleton as long as he lives and does not volunteer for service in order to remove the reproach that stands against him. And what did we hear from another hon. gentleman, also very close to the late Government, and now one of the chief whips of the party of hon. gentlemen opposite?

The Minister of Militia has not been hoping to build up a militia which may be and which ought to be useful; he has been simply building up a militia which may be called out at any minute. His idea is absolutely wrong, and it is not a good idea for the young people of Canada to grow up with. I am in favour of the militia, but a minister who is in charge of the Militia Department of the Dominion of Canada and who is building up a militia day in and day out along the lines that to-morrow we may be at war with somebody, has not got the right idea in mind and is imbuing the spirit of war into the souls of the people of this Dominion. There is no question about the necessity of a militia, but why should we spend in militia the enormous sum we are spending to-day is more than I can understand.

[Mr. Sutherland.]

Numerous criticisms of this kind were hurled against the militia expenditures and the Minister of Militia. Hon. gentlemen opposite to-day contend that we should reduce the expenditure of this country. Is this one of the items that they want reduced? Have they the hardihood to say: We do not approve the enormous war expenditure you are making? No; they say: We are heartily in sympathy with the voting of $100,000,000 or whatever sum may be required. I ask the hon. member for Red Deer: Is it not well that the Government should be prepared for the situation which has arisen? If hon. gentlemen opposite were sincere in the professions which they have made during the course of this debate; if they were anxious to unite with the Government of the day in rendering whatever aid they could to the Empire, they would not have made the flimsy criticisms which they have made in connection with the proposals of the Government.

On June 1 last, just two months before the outbreak of war, the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) made the following remarks:

I agree that according to his own judgment he has been doing his best.

That is, the Minister of Militia.

But he is far too enthusiastic in the course he is pursuing. He is far ahead of his time; in fact, the time will never come in this country when the expenditure he proposes will be justifiable.

Mr. Sam. Hughes: Take care; do not be too sure.

Mr. Guthrie: I do not take much stock in these warnings given by the minister at Victoria and Toronto as reported by the newspapers in those cities. We must realize and I am sure his colleagues do realize—that this is a country of peace and not of war.

These are the sentiments of hon. gentlemen opposite as expressed before war was declared. They criticised with all the vigour which they could command the estimates of the Militia Department. What do they say to-day? The hon. member for South Wellington said that he did not take much stock in the statements made by the Minister of Militia at Victoria and Toronto. Have they not turned out to be correct? Is there a man in this House or in this country who will say that the Minister of Militia from the outset has not displayed wonderful foresight and organizing ability in connection with the mobilizing of the troops at Valcartier a few weeks after war was declared? After the troops had been drilling, shooting and undergoing strict discipline for a few weeks, a murmur of impatience arose from many hon. gentlemen opposite because the troops were not being hurried to the front. I believe it would have been better if the men had remained at Valcartier longer than they did; the training that they were undergoing there was hardening them for the work which they will have to do. The unfortunate weather conditions which they encountered when they crossed the water were such as even the authorities in Great Britain could not be expected to foresee, and I believe that the men were not physically as fit when they went to the front as when they left the Canadian shores. But it is to-day a standing compliment to this Government and to the Minister of Militia that these troops were mobilized and sent to the front in such a satisfactory manner. I want to say that if there is a man in the country who objects to the war tax, the best thing he can do is volunteer for service at the front. The men who are prepared to pay the taxes realize that they are not making much of a sacrifice compared with that which is being made by the men who have gone to the front.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The hon. gentleman says that gentlemen on this side of the House or anywhere in the country who oppose this Budget ought to volunteer for active service. May I ask the hon. gentleman why he does not volunteer himself?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am not objecting to the sacrifice that hon. gentlemen opposite are objecting to; that is just the point I want to emphasize. The man who objects to contributing by way of taxation to the defence of the Empire ought to volunteer for active service and thus show that he is prepared to make some real, actual sacrifice.

Mr. SINCLAIR: No one is objecting to the war tax, so far as I know. I never heard of any objection.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is the so-called war tax to which we object.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: That brings me back to the matter that I thought had been effectively cleared up by the Minister of Finance this afternoon.

Mr. SINCLAIR: There are two resolutions on the Order Paper, one relating to a war loan, and the other to domestic affairs. I should like to hear my hon. friend's opinion of the one relating to domestic affairs.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: During the course of his remarks the junior hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) said:

> I understand hon. gentlemen opposite to contend that the falling revenue and the fresh taxation imposed is due to the war. If I am not correct in this, let the correction come now. At any rate, this point is worthy of investigation. I personally do not believe that our loss in revenue is in any substantial degree attributable to the war.

The hon. gentleman does not believe that the falling revenues are in any degree attributable to the war. Yet the revenues of the United States, a country which is in a position to reap enormous benefits from the war; a nation which has shown no inability to take advantage of opportunities to make financial gain, have been galling to such an extent that they have been obliged to resort to war taxes. Some months previous to the war large financial concerns in this country suddenly began to experience a condition that was somewhat unusual. Several months before war was declared one of the largest transportation companies in the world, with most of its assests in Canada, experienced a condition of affairs that to many seemed unfathomable. How was that? It was owing to the fact that for months previous to the declaration of war, early in August last, it was decided by those responsible for the war that the war should take place in the near future, if the date had not actually been fixed. We find that the stock of the Canadian Pacific railway, one of the greatest corporations in the world, had fallen from $280 per share to as low, recently, as $155 per share. What was the effect upon the other large transcontinental lines in this country which had not developed traffic to the same extent as the Canadian Pacific railway, and which did not possess the wealth of that company? The condition of these other lines was such that they had to come to the Government for assistance; and in order to prevent these roads from going into the hands of a receiver the Government found it necessary to do something in order to carry them over for the time. Hon. gentlemen opposite are well aware of that. They know perfectly well that these conditions existed not only in Canada, but in other countries. There was a falling off in our revenues, and as the Minister of Finance pointed out to-day, and pointed out so clearly that I am satisfied hon. gentlemen opposite are well seized of the weight of the arguments he advanced, it was necessary in order to meet the falling revenues of the country, to increase the customs taxation of this country.

The hon. gentleman also referred to pensions. To-night I received a letter from the Militia Department with regard to a young man from my own town who went over with the first contingent. He has already been injured so that his eyesight is seriously affected for ever, and the notice says that he will become eligible for a pension. You may rest assured, Mr. Speaker, that as the days go by, dozens and scores and hundreds —thousands I am afraid—of the men who are to-day across the water or mobilized here ready to depart at a moment's notice, will have to be compensated by means of a pension for the injuries received during the war. Many things have to be considered in connection with this.

There is one other matter I wish to refer to before sitting down, and that is the remarks on the British preference made the other night by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff). Those remarks have already been dealt with by the Minister of Finance, but I wish to call attention to them again. We have heard hon. gentlemen opposite wax indignant, not when they were accused, but when their record was held up before them, and when after having spelt it out to themselves they came to the conclusion that the record reflected on their loyalty. The hon. member for Assiniboia said:

> Tax the banks and the trust companies and the insurance companies; tax every one, make them pay what money you want; but for Heaven's sake keep your unholy and disloyal hands off the British preference.

He waxes indignant when he thinks that this Government have done anything that could be interpreted as touching the British preference. As a matter of fact, what the Government have done is to increase the British preference by 2½ per cent. That is the interpretation, and the only interpretation, of their action. But what did the hon. member for Assiniboia say a couple of years ago? He is reported on page 4684 of the unrevised Hansard of March 3, 1913, to have used these words:

> If we are to provide ships does it not seem reasonable that, as far as possible we should build them at home?
> [Mr. Sutherland.]
> I am not going to say that it might not be advisable in the first instance, as far as large vessels are concerned, to have them built in the Old Country.

That is the very thing we were contending for. We wanted the dreadnoughts built in the Old Country, so that we could render at the earliest possible moment effective aid to the Empire. He goes on:

> Why not make a start now. Why not use a part of this $35,000,000, that we are proposing to send out of the country, to establish the necessary shipyards in our own country, where these vessels could be built by our own men and out of our own material as far as possible. Do you think that it will appeal to the labour men, or to the farmers who supply the the food stuffs for these labouring men, to have this money sent out in a lump sum to another country.

To another country, mind you, not to our own country or to the British Empire, but to another country. He was afraid that we were going to send the money to a foreign country to assist its working men and deprive our farmers of a home market. He was strong on the farmer, the western farmer as he called him. He goes on:

> I know this policy does not appeal to the farmers that I represent. They take the ground that if we are going to spend $35,000,000 on war vessels, it should be spent at home. That is the policy that ought to appeal to Canadians, and that would appeal to my hon. friends on the other side of the House if it were not for the arrangement between the governing party and the Nationals. We are spending millions of dollars to bring people into the country, and here we are sending millions out of the country instead of providing work at home for the people that we are bringing in. Hon. gentlemen opposite are always ready to advocate the home market. Where are their home market principles on this occasion? Why do they not carry out the policy of building up the home market? It would be quite easy to do, it would be in line with what they have been advocating for many years.

This is the hon. gentleman who says: "Keep your unholy and disloyal hands off the British preference." He was not willing to allow British workmen to build British men-of-war to be paid for by Canadians. That is what this super-loyalist on the Opposition benches said, this man who says, "Keep your unholy and disloyal hands off the British preference." How loyal, how patriotic they are to-day! What a change has come over them during the past few months! And let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that in view of the record they have made for themselves, not only during the time they were in power but when they were in Opposition, I believe the people of this country are justified in coming to the conclusion that these gentlemen endeavour to trim their sails to catch every breeze that blows, that they are opportunists pure and simple, and that they were opportunists all the time they were in power; that the reproach against them to-day is that they were not sincere in their professions of loyalty to the Motherland and to the British Empire in the statements they made in this House and out of it.

I have another quotation here which I thought might interest the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) who is I believe to follow me. On March 3, 1913 the hon. member for Guysborough said:

> No Canadian will ever get a dollar of the money.

He is speaking of the money to purchase the dreadnoughts to be used in increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire. He is a strong protectionist now; he is not so much worried about the British preference as he is about the Canadian workman.

> No Canadian workman will be engaged in the building of the ships, and no Canadian material will go into them. The fact that the Government will have something to do with the letting of the contracts on the other side of the water will not give very much comfort to the people of Canada when they know that all the money is going out of the country and that the workmen of the Old Country, who are already overcrowded with work, will get the benefit of it.

He was afraid that those dreadnoughts would be built, that they might be available, that they would not be built in Canada, but that they would be built by British workmen. It is so characteristic of hon. gentlemen opposite that, as I said at the outset, Hansard is chock full of it. I have run across another statement from the hon. member from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) which goes to knock out the argument that he has been advancing here with regard to the made-in-Canada propaganda which, according to that hon. gentleman, is not only wicked but stupid. His argument was just as strong, just as conclusive as that of the hon. member for Guysborough, and perhaps a little more so, along the same line, that these boats should be built in Canada. He said:

> The simple fact is that Canada cannot afford these dreadnoughts, sending money out of the country without recompense in the shape of developing industries within the country.

He was a great protectionist at that time.

I want to make one or two references to a matter which has already been touched upon by the Finance Minister. I am taking this from the Globe of March 14, 1904. The right hon. leader of the Opposition delivered an address in Toronto, and I believe that on the following night he delivered a similar one in Guelph. The meeting was during an election campaign in which there was no issue but this great transcontinental railway that he was going to leave as a monument to his skill as a statesman. My right hon. friend was picturing this project to the people in that delightful manner of his that is so captivating, and he led the people to believe that we were going to have the very best transcontinental line. He declared that in order to demonstrate that it was the shortest route all you had to do was to take a rule and draw a straight line across the map of Canada which straight line would show the transcontinental railway. This is what he said:

> I will not bore you with figures; I will give you the figures compiled by the experts of the Finance Department, who calculate that what we would pay in interest for seven years represents a sum in cash which, if it were put in the bank to-day, would amount to a little more than $13,000,000, and a little less than $14,000,000.

He had it figured out pretty closely between $13,000,000 and $14,000,000.

> That is all we would have to pay for the struction of the road if—

Then he qualifies it with the word "if" that comes into almost every statement that he makes:

> —if our expectations and contracts prove to be as accurate as we think they are. I ask you, my fellow-citizens, if we can get that tremedous railway for $14 000,000 do you think that will be so very heavy a burden for the Canadian taxpayers, when I tell you that the surplus we had in the year 1902-3 was $14,000,000, and last year, 1903-4 it was $15,000,000? This is the project I have to lay before you, this scheme and plan of the Government.

He was prophesying what that road was going to cost. We have to-day some definite knowledge as to what the cost of this road is likely to be. We had a statement from the Minister of Finance this afternoon that that portion of the road from Winnipeg to Moncton has cost this country $200,000,000. The hon. member for Guysborough asked why it is necessary to impose taxes outside of the war tax? It is just in order to meet contingencies of that kind. There are on the road west of Winnipeg large obligations that this country will have to meet. Speaking in the House the other day, I pointed out that one of the most serious questions that the people of this country, particularly the farmers, had to contend with is the transportation problem, and I said that I did not look forward with much confidence to the future or entertain the hope that we would be able to lessen the cost of transportation. I said that there were three transcontinental railways nearing completion, with the Hudson Bay railway also under construction, with nothing like sufficient traffic to keep them busy, and that under these circumstances it would also be impossible for us to have low rates. We have pursued a most reckless and extravagant policy in regard to our railway construction, and the question is one that requires to be most carefully considered by Parliament and the people. I do not envy the task which confronts my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) in regard to these matters. We know that as a matter of fact the eastern portion of the transcontinental railway should never have been built, and that if the policy that the present right hon. Prime Minister had at that time in mind of extending the Intercolonial, upon which this country has expended enormous sums of money, westward to the lakes, had been adopted, it would have been more in the interests of Canada. That would not meet with the approval of hon. gentlemen opposite. They did not wish to encourage the Government ownership of railways. No, they would prefer to give some rich corporation advantages in that respect. Previous to the election of 1911, hon. gentlemen opposite who were then in power, guaranteed the bonds of the Canadian Northern railway for that portion of their line from Montreal west to Port Arthur, to the extent of $35,000,000. Their action on that occasion made it necessary for the present Government to again come to the assistance of the Canadian Northern railway, and everything that has since been done in that respect is a sequence of the course of hon. gentlemen opposite previous to the election of 1911.

We have heard considerable criticism of this Budget from hon. gentlemen opposite, who have declared that the proposals contained in it are not in the interest of the people generally and the farmers particularly. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) was very strong on axle grease. He said: They are going actually to increase the British rate on axle grease. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) was very strong on squid. He thought it was a terrible thing to increase the duty on squid. It seems that fertilizer was what he had in his mind.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think it is out of order at half-past twelve o'clock for the hon. gentleman to indulge in untruthful remarks.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I made no reference to the duty on squid. What I called attention to was the fact that squid had been made free, and the Government was boasting as to that. They had put a duty on fertilizers and many other things, and they were claiming credit for making squid and one other article free.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It is quite evident, judging from the last remarks of the hon. gentlemen, that he is a little bit hazy yet as to what he did say. I have a distinct recollection that he associated squid with the fertilizers, and I think other hon. gentlemen who heard him will bear out my recollection. I want to say, Sir, that the increase in the duty on raw materials and free imports made it necessary that the tariff should be increased on the finished products. That is quite clear to every one who looks at the matter with an unprejudiced mind. So far I fail to have received a single objection from any one of my constituents against the Budget proposal, and indeed I have failed to see even a serious criticism of the Budget in the press of the country. I think it is a great compliment to the Minister of Finance that his proposals have been received in the manner in which they have by the people of Canada, and I deeply regret that hon. gentlemen opposite have not displayed a different spirit towards the policy of the Government at this particular time in the history of the Empire. I could understand them if they said: We do not approve of what you are doing, but in view of the seriousness of the situation, and in view of the fact that it is necessary for us to present a united front to the enemy and to assist the Motherland in every possible way in this crisis, we will defer our criticism for a future occasion. Had they done that, I think their action would have commended itself better to the people of this country. Let me commend to these hon. gentlemen opposite the patriotic words of Kipling:

> Oh, East is East and West is West,
> And never the two shall meet,
> Till earth and sky stand presently
> At God's great judgment seat.
>
> But there is neither East nor West,
> Border, nor breed, nor birth,
> Where two strong men stand face to face,
> Though they come from the ends of the earth.

Had the right hon. leader of the Opposition met the leader of the Government in this spirit, he would, in my opinion, stand much higher in the opinion of all Canadians than he does now.

Mr. JOHN H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): It is a very late hour for me to ask the indulgence of the House for a short time. My great difficulty in answering my hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) is not on account of the argument he has put before the House, but on account of the fact that he has been speaking to the wrong resolution. If you will refer, Mr. Speaker, to the order paper you will find there are two resolutions, one which relates to ways and means, and which concerns altogether our domestic affairs, and the other which relates to the borrowing of $100,000,000 to carry on the war. The resolution that is before the House is that relating to our domestic affairs, and the second resolution has not even been moved yet. When that resolution is called, I am quite sure it will pass without a dissenting voice; but it is a curious thing that my hon. friend has made a two hours' speech on a resolution that has not yet been called. Why should we have from him a long speech about dreadnoughts and about war, on a resolution that is not yet before the House? I think I can suggest a reason, and I think that reason is that this domestic resolution which we are discussing involves some explanation from Government supporters which my hon. friend is not prepared to give. For example, there is a deficit of $80,000,000 in connection with our domestic affairs, and it was due to the House that the hon. gentleman should have endeavoured to explain that. He did not do so, but he treated us to a long dissertation about dreadnoughts and matters that have no concern at all with what we are now discussing. My hon. friend must not think that he can answer criticisms of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House by telling us that the British and Allied fleets are pounding their way through the Dardanelles. That is a fact, and we are glad to know it, and we join with my hon. friend in wishing them Godspeed, and I may tell him that we are doing just as much to help them along as he or any other member on that side of the House.

I do not want to say anything at this stage that will open up old sores, but if I did venture to make a remark I might say that if my hon. friend and the Government that he supports had not made a football of the Canadian navy for party purposes, we would have at least four light cruisers of the style of the Australian light cruiser Sydney which did such splendid work in this war, to keep the trade routes open for British commerce, and to assist the old land in the struggle.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Why did you not build them?

Mr. SINCLAIR: The dreadnoughts which my hon. friend is talking about could not be ready for use at the present time. The contest in this House in regard to dreadnoughts took place in 1913. Perhaps it will be news to my hon. friend that the Queen Elizabeth, the newest dreadnought of the British fleet, was launched in 1912 and that it has taken the mechanics of Great Britain from that day until a month or two ago to prepare her for the work she is doing now in the Dardanelles. The dreadnoughts spoken of by my hon. friend would be to-day on the stocks in some shipyard in Great Britain, even if the Government had got their policy approved of, whereas if the Government which he supports had gone on with the Canadian navy proposed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, we would have at least four ships to assist the old country in the fight which is now raging.

The question as to the truce between the two parties has been discussed a good deal in this House. My hon. friend from East Toronto (Mr. Kemp) has made the statement at a meeting in his city that there is no truce, and that there never was a truce. I beg to differ from him. No hon. gentleman who listened to the discussion which took place at the special session in August last, could come to the conclusion that there was no truce. My hon. leader on that occasion stated the position that the Opposition took in regard to this matter, and it was accepted very kindly by the leader of the Government and he complimented the leader of the Opposition on the patriotic stand he had taken in declaring that we should show a united front to the world in this awful struggle. They both acted on the truce that was then entered into, the proof of which was seen in the case of the by-elections. No candidates were put up in any of the constituencies in these elections, showing that it was well understood by both the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition that there was a truce between the parties at the time. This side of the House never had any notice from the leader of the Government that the truce was broken, until we saw the speech of my hon. friend published in the newspapers. The question the people of this country are asking is: Is this Government really desirous to devote their whole attention to the war, or do they regard it of more importance to score another victory against the Liberal party than they do to defeat the Kaiser.

Is that the position they take? In Great Britain it is well understood and well known that there will be no election until after the war is over. As a result there is no party strife. Mr. Speaker, what would you think of the British Government if you were forced to the conclusion that they thought more of their salaries and of their places than they did of the fate of the Empire at such a time as this? I would like to have the same opinion of the Canadian Government as I have of the British Government, but if there is to be a truce, it ought to be a fair and honourable truce, and it ought to apply to both parties. There were indications in October last that the Government was preparing for an election. Large quantities of Conservative literature were sent out from the Conservative headquarters at Ottawa. A number of Conservative conventions were called in the West at the same time. The word was passed around to the faithful in the country. In the maritime provinces there was straws showing how the wind was blowing. It has been the custom in the maritime provinces for many years that the repairs to the Intercolonial should be done in the summer time, when the days are long and the weather fine; but to the astonishment of every one, the order came in the month of October, as I understand, to start out the working gangs on the Intercolonial.

Mr. COCHRANE: That is not true.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I was so informed, and I believe my information to be true. It was about the same time that the announcement was made at Winnipeg that seed grain was to be given to every one in the drouth-stricken districts in the West. A section of the Cabinet was somewhat outspoken on this question of an election. The hon. leader of the Government in the Senate at a public meeting of his friends in the city of Calgary is said to have stated in a confidential tone of voice that an election might come as a thief in the night. The Prime Minister himself was silent. So far as I know, he said nothing. That reminds me of a story that is told about a Presbyterian minister who received a call from another church where there was a bigger congregation and a larger salary. There was a good deal of local curiosity as to whether he would accept the call or not. He was very popular in his congregation. One of his congregation thought he could find out something by interviewing the minister's little son Willie. Accordingly he asked Willie if his father was going to leave. "Well," Willie said, "I cannot tell you—father has been praying over that question for the last three or four days; but while father has been praying, mother has been packing the trunks." That is something like the case here. While the Prime Minister was praying over the question of an election, the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Railways were packing the trunks. If the Prime Minister desires to have a truce from party strife and a quiet time to devote his whole attention to the war, he can have it by making a frank statement to this House; but he must not ask us on this side of the House to go to the jury without having an opportunity of stating our case.

I wish at the very outset to say that I was much pleased with the frank and candid statement of the Minister of Finance in his Budget speech at the opening of this debate. The tale was a very sad one, but he told it in plain language. He told us frankly that, leaving the war Budget out of the question altogether and dealing only with the ordinary and capital expenditure for the fiscal year ending on the 31st day of the present month, the country was face to face with the staggering deficit of $60,000,000. He frankly admitted that he saw no means of raising all this money from the revenue with which to meet the inevitable bills as they are presented for payment. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance is in the position of a bankrupt debtor who admits his liabilities and confesses that he has not the money with which to pay them. In order that there may be no question on this score, let me refer to his own language. In speaking of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1915, the Minister of Finance says:

> Taking all the foregoing into consideration, the increase of Canada's national debt for the year would probably aggregate $110,000,000. In this I am, of course including our expenditure for war.

The war expenditure for the past year, as every one knows, is $50,000,000. It is only fair that we should allow the interest on that, amounting to $2,500,000; but we have $110,000,000 of a deficit, according to the minister. $52,500,000 of that deficit must be charged to the war, and $57,500,000 must be charged against the present Government.

For the fiscal year 1915-16 this is the forecast of the hon. Minister of Finance:

> Assuming that our total cash requirements for all purposes whatsoever, including our war expenditure, will amount during the coming year to over $300,000,000 while our revenue on the present basis would yield only $120,000,000 we are faced with the problem of raising by additional taxation and borrowing a sum in excess of $180,000,000.

To close the account for the year ending March 31, 1916, the minister tells us that he must borrow the unprecedented sum of $180,000,000. The war loan, including interest, accounts for $105,000,000 of that amount, and, therefore, we have to increase the public debt by the enormous sum of $75,000,000 to maintain the middleman in affluence and to keep the pot boiling. In other words, leaving the war altogether out of the question, the minister proposes to add to the public debt for the year ending March 31, 1916, the enormous sum of $132,500,000. That is a staggering addition to the public debt in the short space of two years.

During the fifteen years of Liberal rule, at a time when the country was engaged in great enterprises and was making enormous expenditures in such great public enterprises as the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Quebec bridge, the deepening of the St. Lawrence channel, the aids to navigation along the coast, the total increase in the public debt was $149,000,000, so that, apart from the war altogether, this Government proposes to add about as much to the public debt in two years as the Liberal Government did in fifteen years. If this enormous addition to the public debt was on account of the war, we would not complain; but there is not one dollar of the $132,500,000 for war expenditure.

The minister informs us that our whole war outlay is to be borrowed from Great Britain. It is a matter of regret that we did not show a little more independence. It is well for us that Great Britain is rich and also so generous. Great Britain has enormous burdens at the present time. It has been stated in the House to-night that no less than £2,000,000 a day is required to keep the army and navy going at the present time. Great Britain has to finance her allies; she is assisting a number of the smaller nations of Europe, and she is also assisting the colonial dominions, Canada is a rich country, and should do something for herself. On looking at the bank statement issued at the end of the year, I find that the people had on deposit in the chartered banks, including the Government savings banks, the enormous sum of $1,067,118,549. It would seem to me that we ought to have been able to float a loan in Canada, and to do something on our own account instead of borrowing the whole amount from Great Britain as we are doing at the present time.

In any criticism that I offer on this occasion to these proposals, I want to draw a clear distinction between what I call the extravagance and recklessness of this Government and the proposed war expenditure. I desire to express my cordial approval of the provision made for carrying on the war. I need not say that the struggle is of such vital importance to Canada and the Empire that we should not hesitate to throw all we have into the scale and mortgage our future if necessary in order to win. No country has ever gone to war with cleaner hands or with a more righteous cause. Every Canadian should be proud that we have an opportunity of taking some part, even though it be a small part, in the world's greatest struggle for freedom. We have our party differences in this House, but there is no difference on the declared policy of the Government to assist Great Britain to fight this war to a finish whatever the cost. We on this side desire to emphasize the fact that the Government can count on us absolutely to see the business through; but we will insist on honest administration and on proper treatment of our recruits. Attempts are being made here and there to gain some political advantage for the Conservative party out of the war. All such attempts should meet with the condemnation of every right thinking man in Canada. It has already been pointed out that campaign documents of this character have been issued from the bureau of the Conservative party. My hon. friend from North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe) whom I regret not to see in his place, is said to have made a speech—I was going to say a hot-air speech—at a place called Hot Springs not long ago, in which he said that it was fortunate for Canada that the Imperialistic party was in power at the present time.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I should like to know from the hon. gentleman who says "hear, hear," what claim the Tory party has to the title of the Imperialistic party? What did they ever do to entitle them to the name? If anybody knows anything that the Conservative party ever did to entitle them to that name, I wish he would stand up and tell us about it. There has been one step and only one taken since Confederation that had imperialistic significance, one step that touched the imagination and won the applause of men of British blood the world over. That step, as you will remember, was greeted with enthusiasm by England's great Imperial poet and by Her great Imperial statesman, the late Joseph Chamberlain. You will understand that I refer to the British preference. And this "Imperialistic" party supported by my hon. friend from North Ontario voted against the British preference.

There are two incidents of recent Canadian history that everybody remembers. The Tory party four years ago hitched up with the National party of Quebec. Now, it is a matter of history that the leader of the Natonalist party dictated the names of three members of the first Cabinet of the right hon. leader of this Government. Why did the leaders of the Nationalist party leave the Liberal party? The reason given in the province of Quebec is that the Liberal leader was too British for them; and in searching about for some party that was less British than my honoured leader, they allied themselves with hon. gentlemen opposite. I hope they feel at home there. We have a saying in our part of the Dominion, and I have no doubt that you have it in Ontario, that birds of a feather flock together. This "Imperialistic" party took to their bosom the gentleman who said it was necessary to shoot holes in the British flag in order to be free. They showered honours upon him, first making him Deputy Speaker, and then taking him into the Cabinet and giving him a seat at the Council board. I suppose that is regarded as an Imperialistic move by my hon. hot-air friend from North Ontario (Mr. Sam. Sharpe). That is incident number one. Number two is this present proposal to add 5 per cent to the tax on all British goods. Is this a time to strike a blow at the trade of Great Britain, when the old country is engaged in a struggle for her very 1 a.m. existence? With the enormous increase in freight rates and war insurance this 5 per cent is a heavy addition to the expense of doing trade at present between Great Britain and Canada. If hon. gentlemen will go to the reading room and turn up the files of the New York Herald, they will see that four or five months ago grain could be carried from New York to Liverpool at 2s. 6d. a quarter, and to-day it takes 7s. 6d. a quarter to carry the same grain. Rates of insurance have gone up enormously. So the handicaps against British trade are so great that it is almost impossible to carry on business with Great Britain at all. And on top of all this hon. gentlemen opposite come in with a 5 per cent additional tax on British goods. One can imagine the astonishment with which the news was heard in London, especially when a few months before the British Government had agreed to advance to the Canadian Government the whole war expenditure to be made by this country. I think I can see the blush on the face of the Canadian High Commissioner when he handed in the news to the British Government. One can imagine the feelings of the Kaiser when he heard the news that he had another ally in addition to the Turks, when he learned that he would not need submarines to stop trade between Canada and the old country, but that the Canadian Government would see to it that British trade would be crippled. One does not like to speak of it. Tell it not in Vienna, publish it not in the streets of Berlin, lest the daughters of the enemy rejoice, lest the daughters of the uncircumcised Hun triumph. Does my hon. friend from North Ontario regard that as an imperialistic move? I am glad to say that the Commonwealth of Australia has taken a different course; it has taken the patriotic course and is not interfering with the tariff on British goods. Australia, like Canada, found it necessary to raise money, and in December they made a new tariff. They increased their general tariff from five to ten per cent on a large number of imports, but almost without exception they have left British imports without an increase. There is no flag-waving party in Australia. Australia is British in the true sense of the word. As has already been remarked in the House to-night, there is more than one way in which Canada can take a lesson from the Commonwealth of Australia.

We all recognize that Canada is passing through a period of hard times. We may differ about the cause. Statesmen on this side of the House saw the depression coming prior to 1911, and they endeavoured to provide for it by opening new markets for Canadian products. Their efforts were frustrated, and Canada is having a taste of the depression that existed prior to 1896. There is a disposition on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite to attribute the hard times to the war. Everybody who has a good memory knows that that is not true. It will not be denied that real estate began to decline early in 1913. The receipts of the great railway corporations fell off long before the war. The Customs revenue began to decline about twelve months before the war broke out. In December, 1913, some of the large industrial concerns in Montreal closed their doors and thousands of men were turned out of employment.

Mr. GLASS: Is it not a fact that the financial conditions prevailing in 1912 were directly due to the war which was then taking place in Europe?

Mr. SINCLAIR: What war was that?

Mr. GLASS: The Balkan war.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I do not think my hon. friend can show that that was the case; I feel quite certain that he cannot.

I was pointing out that as early as December, 1913, many of the large industrial concerns in Canada had practically closed their doors. As a matter of fact, it has been shown that the war has actually had a favourable effect upon conditions in many parts of Canada. I could produce the evidence of many witnesses on that point. Reference has been made to the statements of a gentleman whose opinions are bound to be respected by hon. gentlemen opposite. I refer to the hon. member for West Toronto (Sir Edmund Osler), who is president of the Dominion Bank. The annual meeting of the Dominion Bank was held on January 22, 1915, and the following is an extract from a report of that meeting:

> In moving the adoption of the report, Sir Edmund Osler, the president, took occasion to discuss somewhat plainly some current misconceptions regarding commercial and banking affairs. He intimated that the business situation in Canada at the present time was being assisted rather than injured by the circumstances arising out of the war. The prevalent depression, he thought, had been little intensified by the outbreak of hostilities, and it had, in fact, been relieved to an extent by the higher values which it had placed upon the country's produce and by the employment produced by the orders for war materials.

That is the view of the hon. member for West Toronto, and I do not think any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House will oppose it. I may also give the opinion of Mr. H. H. Richardson, general manager of the Bank of Nova Scotia, who keeps in close touch with business affairs in Canada. At the annual meeting of the Bank of Nova Scotia he used the following language:

> To be quite frank, those who blame the present depression on the war are only hugging a delusion.

These are the views of hard-headed business men, and they must be accepted. If hon. gentlemen opposite want an explanation for the hard times through which Canada is now passing, they must look for it nearer home. Confronted with these serious conditions, what have hon. gentlemen opposite done? Have they found a solution of the difficulty? Have they attempted to find a solution? The only panacea they have suggested is that we should borrow more money and spend it on party favours. Economy has been mentioned, but economy is the last thing this Government thinks about. On the contrary, they have indulged in the most reckless extravagance ever since they took office. We on this side of the House knew that a crisis was approaching in the financial affairs of this country. That crisis could not be avoided; the reckless extravagance of the Government was bound to bring it about. If my hon. friend the Minister of Finance sets the house on fire he must not complain when he sees it burn.

In 1911 my hon. friend fell heir to a fat surplus. In his first Budget speech of that year he admitted that the surplus left him by the late Finance Minister was $30,000,000. Accepting the slogan of my prodigal friend the hon. member for Queens, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Nicholson), "Dash away and spend the money," the Minister of Finance proceeded to dissipate it—a million here, two millions there, five millions somewhere else, fifteen millions to Mackenzie and Mann in one year and forty-five millions in the next. Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die; but we will have one belly-full anyway—that was the spirit in which they embarked on their prodigal career. They spent the resources of this country like a drunken sailor spends his wages; now they find that it is all gone and they are face to face with an enormous deficit. That is not what the people had a right to expect from the Conservative party; that is not what they promised prior to 1911.

My hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Hon. J. D. Reid)—I am sorry he is not in his seat—was a great economist prior to 1911. I remember that he and his associates held up this House for over two days and two nights discussing sixpenny tips that the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries gave to waiters in the city of London. When my hon. friend was in opposition he set his face like a flint against extravagance; when he got over on the other side and secured a seat in the Cabinet his face was not in the least like flint—it was rather like pudding. He has been one of the greatest sinners in the matter of extravagant expenditure.

Hon. gentlemen opposite promised a reduction in expenditure. Some hon. gentlemen have had the hardihood to deny this, but we can produce the proof. The leader of the Conservative party on August 15, 1911, published in the Montreal Gazette the manifesto of the party, upon which the election was run. It was headed: "Conservative Policy; what the Party is Pledged to carry out." I quote the first paragraph:

The Liberal Conservative party gives its pledge to carry out the following policy if returned to power:

1. A thorough reorganization of the method by which the public expenditure is supervised. The increase in what is known as ordinarily controllable expenditure from $21,500,000 in 1896 to nearly $74,000,000 in 1911 is proof of extravagance beyond all possible defence.

A long list of other pledges and promises follow, and the whole is signed "R. L. Borden." There is the pledge, Mr. Speaker, but where is the fulfilment? Upon what occasions have the Government made any attempt to live up to that promise? Has there been any attempt to effect a thorough reorganization of the method of supervising expenditure? I venture to say that never since the days of McGreevy and Connolly has there been so little supervision of expenditure as there is to-day.

The Auditor General is supposed to look after grafters and persons who are trying to rob the treasury, but he is now busy looking after the ministers. The Auditor General recognized that in times of war, the Government must have a freer hand; accordingly, he arranged with them that Orders in Council would be issued authorizing special expenditures. But the Government did not adhere to that arrangement. For months the Department of Militia spent money right and left without any supervision whatever, and after the illegal expenditure had reached the sum of about $5,000,000 the Auditor General had to step in and refuse credit to the Finance Minister. This is what the Auditor General said:

This is a clear violation of the War Appropriation Act, and also of the understanding on which I consented to the issue of a letter of credit. I have, therefore, to request that you will inform the Department of Militia that their letter of credit is no longer available for payments on account of war appropriation, and to further cheques may be drawn for the purpose until the provisions of the Act are complied with.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

I regret the necessity for this action, but I have no other course open to me. I know it is a very serious matter to place any obstacle in the way of the Militia Department when the country is at war, and with this in view I consented to an arrangement which could not in any degree hamper the department. In return I had every right to expect that the Minister of Militia and Defence would not only carry out the agreement of his officials, but that he would also respect the direction of Parliament

(Signed) J. Fraser,
Auditor General.

So far as I know, the Finance Minister made no reply to that statement. But there you have the practice of the department; and I submit that that is supervision with a vengeance. I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Rogers, the House adjourned at 1.15 a.m. Thursday.

Thursday, March 11, 1915.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

PRIVATE BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill No. 71, respecting the Sterling Life Assurance Company of Canada.—Mr. Macdonell.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Correspondence between the Auditor General and the Militia Department.—Major General Hughes.

Copy of Order in Council P.C. 304, regarding establishment of ranks of Lieutenant-Commander, Engineer Lieutenant-Commander, and Lieutenant-Commander, R.C.N.V.R., in the Royal Canadian Navy.—Mr. Hazen.

QUESTIONS.

[Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.]

WAR SUPPLIES—HORSES.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. Who is Mr. Woodworth, who purchased horses for the Militia Department in the county of Pictou in 1914?

2. Where does he reside, and what is his occupation?

3. Were the horses he sold his own horses, or did he act as a middleman?

Major General HUGHES:

1. Mr. Woodworth purchased no horses for the Militia Department in Pictou county in 1914.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. DEVLIN:

1. Did the Right Honourable, the Prime Minister, when leader of the Opposition, make the following statement at Halifax:

"A thorough and complete reformation of the laws relating to the Civil Service should be put into effect, so that future appointments shall be made by an independent commission acting upon the report of examiners after competitive examination. I am convinced that we shall perform a great public duty by establishing in this country that system which prevails in Great Britain, under which a member of Parliament has practically no voice in or control over any appointment to the Civil Service.

"To use the power of filling positions in the public service as a reward for party service and without regard to the character and capacity of the individual selected, is a gross breach of a solemn public trust. A private trustee so dishonouring his office would be subject to punishment by the criminal law."

2. If so, what was the object of making such a statement?

3. Have any appointments to the Civil Service been made since October, 1911? If so, how many?

4. If any, have the appointments to the inside or outside service been made upon the recommendation of a member of Parliament?

5. What steps, if any, has the Prime Minister taken to implement the above mentioned Halifax pledge?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN:

1. The language quoted consists of certain statements detached from their context but is substantially correct.

2. To impress the importance of the subject upon the people and upon the Government then in power. The purpose had considerable success as the then Government within a few months thereafter introduced the reforms effected by the Civil Service Act of 1908.

3. Appointments have been made to the Civil Service since October, 1911. A return to be brought down as soon as the necessary information has been compiled will indicate the number.

4. Appointments to the inside service are made upon the certificate of the Civil Service Commission under the provisions of the Civil Service Act. Appointments to the outside service are made upon the responsibility of the Government and after careful inquiry as to the character and capacity of the individual selected. For the purpose of obtaining such information the Government is ready to receive assistance from members of Parliament or from other persons who are capable of giving reliable information as to such character and capacity. The recommendation of a member of Parliament or any other person is not alone or of itself sufficient for the appointment of a public officer, as character and capacity must be taken into consideration by the Government.

5. The public steps which have been taken by the Prime Minister are within the knowledge of the hon. member asking the question, as they are on record in Parliament. As to other steps which have not yet been made public, any necessary announcement will be made in due course.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—ABUTMENT CONTRACTS.

Mr. WILLIAM CHISHOLM:

1. What was the estimated cost of the Intercolonial railway abutments recently built near Antigonish?

2. What was the contract price for the construction of said abutments?

3. What was the actual cost of said abutments?

4. How many tenders were received for said work, from whom, and at what figures?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. $22,100.

2. Amount based on schedule prices, $13,941.60.

3. Not in a position to state, as certain matters are still unsettled.

4. Nine; from the following: C. Edgar Whidden & W. E. Landry, Antigonish, N.S., $17,804; McDonald & McIntosh, Elderbank and Antigonish, N.S., $13,941.60; Walter McNeill, New Glasgow, N.S., $17,499.52; Chisholm, McGillivary & McDonald, Musquadoboit, N.S., $16,701.60; Roderick R. McLellan, Antigonish, N.S., $16,783; A. W. Girroir, Antigonish, N.S., $16,162; A. McGillivray, Antigonish, N.S., $14,088.20; K. A. Morrison, Ottawa, Ont., $17,492.20; E. R. Reid & E. M. Archibald, St. John, N.B., and Middleton, N.S., $22,106.

MR. A. GOBEIL.

Mr. KYTE:

1. When did A. Gobeil retire from the position of Deputy Minister of Public Works?

2. How long was he in that office?

3. What was the amount of his retiring allowance under the statute?

4. Is he employed by any department of the Government at the present time, and what is the nature of such employment?

5. What is the total amount he receives from the Government at the present time?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. 1st July, 1908.

2. Appointed deputy minister on 1st January, 1891.

3. $2,160.

4. No.

5. $2,160.

JOHN W. McLEOD.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. Is John W. McLeod employed in the Department of the Interior or by the Conservation Commission?
2. If so, in what capacity?
3. Where are his headquarters?
4. What is his salary?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. Yes, in the Department of the Interior, temporarily.

2. Making an investigation in conjunction with McGill University into the present and future supply of timber for coal mining in Nova Scotia.

3. He has no fixed headquarters outside of Ottawa.

4. One hundred dollars per month.

RECRUITING AT HALIBURTON.

Mr. KYTE:

1. How many men have offered their services to the Minister of Militia from the township of Haliburton, and what are their names?
2. How many were accepted, what are their names, and where are they now stationed?

Major General HUGHES: The hon. member is not very well up in his geography. There is no such place as the township of Haliburton. There is a county of Haliburton and a village of Haliburton. If the hon. gentleman refers to the riding I have the honour to represent, the riding of Victoria and Haliburton, I may say that there have been 411 raised directly up to a week ago and about 80 since, making about 500 raised for the first contingent, 250 for the second, and 150 for the third. Nearly 1,000 men, all told from that riding have volunteered, directly or indirectly for active service.

THE LATE JOSEPH LeBLANC.

*Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. With reference to a statement made in the House of June 9, 1914, by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries relating to the request of Mrs. Margaret Richard, of Port Felix, N.S., for assistance for the adopted child of the deceased sailor Joseph LeBlanc, namely:

"Our information is that this child, who was living with him, was a nephew, and that the father of the child is living and is well able to provide for it.'

Who furnished this information to the minister?
2. Is it in writing?
3. If so, will the minister lay it on the table of the House?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Information is based upon a letter from Captain Stuart of C.G.S. Canada, addressed to Admiral Kingsmill, and dated April 10, 1914; contents of letter result of statement made by E. Richards, cousin of the deceased.

[Mr. Coderre.]

2. Yes.

3. Yes. The following is a copy of the letter above referred to:

Canada, Shelburne, Friday 10, 1914.

Dear Admiral Kingsmill,—I received your letter of April 6th in reference to J. LeBlanc who died last summer in Montreal General hospital. On inquiries from his cousin E. Richards, who is a fireman on board, LeBlanc was not married, but apparently was taking care of a boy, his brother's son, whose mother was dead and who I suppose Mrs. Margaret Richards now has charge of. As the father of this child is still alive, I can't see why Mrs. Richards has to take the responsibility.

LeBlanc's Government service dated from April 11, 1913 to July 29, 1913, a little over three months. I will make further inquiries the next time I visit Whitehead.

I remain,

Yours sincerely,

C. J. Stuart.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—ENVELOPES.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE:

1. Does the administration of Government railways make use of a certain kind of envelopes known as Window envelopes, made by the Transo Paper Company, Chicago?
2. Can those envelopes be procured in Canada?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. Yes; one lot of one-piece envelopes with transparent window was purchased from Business Systems, Limited, of Toronto, on January 24, 1914.

2. These envelopes are not made in Canada.

LAKE ST. JOHN HYDROGRAPHIC WORK.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE:

1. Has the Government during the past two years had certain hydrographic work done on lake St. John, with a view to discovering if it were possible to dam the waters in the Grande Décharge canal, lake St. John, either by means of movable locks or otherwise?
2. If so, (a) at whose request was such work done, (b) what was their nature, who received instructions concerning them, and (c) what report was made to the Government?
3. What was the cost of such work?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Yes.

2. At the request of the Chambre du Commerce du Saguenay. (b) District Engineer Amiot was instructed to make a survey and prepare plans; (c) No report has yet been received at headquarters.

3. $2,862.74.

POST OFFICE REVENUES.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE:

1. What has been the revenue of the Quebec city post office for the year ending the 31st March, 1911?
2. What has been the revenue of the same post office during the year ending the 31st March, 1914?

3. What has been the revenue of the Montreal city post office during the same two years?

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1, 2 and 3:

	1911.	1914.
Quebec ..	$ 160,968 62	$ 184,362 24
Montreal ..	1,152,177 27	1,625,615 86

RIMOUSKI DREDGING.

Mr. TOBIN:

1. During the years 1913-1914 was any dredging or deepening work done on a little river between Lake St. Mathieu, county of Rimouski, to the station of St. Fabien on the Intercolonial railway?

2. If so, what sums were expended on such work?

3. Was such work done by day labour or by contract?

4. Who directed and superintended such work?

5. Were certain sums paid to certain people for damages sustained on account of the said work or otherwise, and what are the names of the said people, and the amounts received by them?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Yes.

2. $4,849.15 in 1913; $997.33 in 1914.

3. Day labour.

4. The district engineer, Mr. J. C. Taché, and a foreman, Joseph Belanger.

5. Yes. $415 were paid to Messrs. Ernest Dionne and Honoré Chouinard, $400 of which was in settlement of their claims, and $15 for payment of legal expenses incurred.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY—BRIDGEKEEPERS.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE:

1. What are the names of the persons who have been appointed as bridgekeepers on the National Transcontinental railway between the Escourt station and the Lefebvre station?

2. What is the salary of each of such persons?

3. By whom were these persons appointed, and on whose recommendation?

Mr. COCHRANE: The Department of Railways and Canals has no information.

DUTIES ON SPIRITUOUS LIQUORS.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE:

1. What is the amount of the duties paid on the spirituous liquors that were in the customs, from the 7th to the 21st August, 1914, and addressed to the following importers of the city of Quebec: Langlois & Paradis, Whitehead & Turner, Naz. Turcotte & Cie., J. B. E. Letellier, A. J. Turcotte & Fils, A. Toussaint & Cie., N. Rioux & Cie., Ledroit & Frère, Gagnon, Garant, Ltée., La Cie Européenne, Quebec Preserving Co., L. H. Levasseur, Joseph & Co., Geo. Patry, Geo. & Ed. Couture, Lévis, A. Carrier & Fils, Lévis?

2. What quantity of liquor was delivered to each of such importers during the said period?

3. What are the amounts that have been readjusted between each importer and the department on the goods delivered between the 7th and 21st August, 1914?

4. In what way did the Government fix such readjustments, and did it fix the amounts thereof?

5. Are there still any accounts or settlements pending, and which are the importers whose accounts have not been finally settled?

Mr. J. D. REID: It is not customary to give information as to the business of private individuals with the department.

Mr. SPEAKER: Question dropped.

ILE KAMOURASKA LIGHTHOUSE.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE:

1. Who recommended Mr. Charles Blondeau, of St. Pascal, as inspector of construction work at the lighthouse in Ile de Kamouraska?

2. How many trips did Mr. Blondeau take to the said Ile de Kamouraska during the construction of the lighthouse.

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Mr. W. A. Potvin, of Fraserville, and Hon. L. P. Pelletier.

2. There is no evidence in the department to show how many trips were made. The department received three signed progress estimates and a final report from the inspector, and the department's agency officers at Quebec report that the inspection was satisfactory.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—SUBSTRUCTURES FOR BRIDGES.

Mr. BOULAY:

1. Who obtained the contract for the construction of the concrete piers between Montjoli and Matapedia?

2. How many piers were built during the season of 1914, and what was the cost of each of them?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. There were no concrete piers constructed between Montjoli and Matapedia within the last year, but two new substructures for bridges were constructed, for which contract was awarded to R. B. Stewart, of Derby Junction.

2. The two new substructures for bridges cost $4,893.94 and $3,864.15, respectively.

SHERBROOKE, N.S., AND MOSHER'S RIVER MAILS.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Who is the present contractor for carrying the mails between Sherbrooke, N.S., and Mosher's River?

2. What is the date of the contract?

3. (a) What is the duration, (b) and amount?

4. What is the name of the previous contractor?

5. What is the yearly amount paid to the former contractor?

6. Why was the previous contract cancelled?

7. What are the names of the sureties under the existing contract?

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. This is a section of the mail route between Sherbrooke and Sheet Harbour. The contractor for the whole route is J. S. Cameron.

2. Executed 15th May, 1912.

3. (a) From 1st April, 1912, to 31st March, 1916. (b) $3,293 per annum.

4. Matthew McGrath.

5. $3,334 per annum.

6. Mr. Cameron represented to the department that his contracts had been cancelled in the years 1897 and 1910, before they were due to expire. This was found to be the case, and instructions were given by the Postmaster General on the 29th December, 1911, to terminate McGrath's contract by giving the three months' notice provided for in the contract and to invite public tenders.

7. Matthew McGrath and Alexander F. Cameron.

KILLARNEY AND MANITOWANING MAILS.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER:

Is it the intention of the Postmaster General to establish a daily service during summer months between Killarney and Manitowaning, Ontario?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Application has been made for a daily mail service between Killarney and Little Current (not Manitowaning), but the department has not yet completed inquiry into the matter.

WEST ARICHAT CUSTOMS.

Mr. KYTE:

1. How long has the office of collector of customs at West Arichat been vacant?

2. Who is performing the duties of collector at the present time?

3. Have any applications been received for the position? If so, what are the names of such applicants?

4. Have any petitions or recommendations been received favouring any of such applicants?

5. By whom are such petitions or recommendations signed?

6. When will such appointment be made?

Mr. J. D. REID:

1. The customs preventive station at West Arichat has been closed from 30th November, 1914.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3, 4 and 5. Applications or petitions for appointments are regarded as confidential.

6. When the services of an official are considered necessary.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

NOVA SCOTIA INDIAN SUPERINTENDENT.

Mr. CARROLL:

1. Has William Gore Foster, of Dartmouth, N.S., been appointed to the position of inspector of Indian reserves?

2. If so, on what date was the appointment made and what is the salary to be paid him?

Mr. ROCHE:

1. Mr. Foster has been appointed Indian superintendent for the province of Nova Scotia, his services to be available for such other work in the maritime provinces as the Department of Indian Affairs may require of him.

2. He was appointed by Order in Council of 18th September, 1914, at a salary of $1,800 a year.

WAR SUPPLIES—HORSES.

Mr. BOULAY:

Who had charge of the purchase of horses required for the militia or the first contingent, in the province of Quebec, from the 1st of July, to the 1st December, 1914?

Major General HUGHES: The principal veterinary officer and his assistants.

Mr. DOUGLAS:

1. Has the Government withdrawn the commission for the purchase of horses for army purposes in Alberta?

2. If so, will a new commission be appointed and when?

Major General HUGHES:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

Mr. LAW:

Referring to information given to the House by the Minister of Militia on February 24, that 224 horses were purchased in Kings county since August 1, for military purposes, and on March 8, that a certain number of horses were purchased in Kings county from Messrs. Keever, McKay and Moore, at an average price of $171.09.

1. Is this intended to convey the idea that the principal veterinary officer for Canada purchased 224 horses in Kings county from Messrs. Keever, McKay and Moore?

2. If so, has the Government the names of the private individuals who sold these horses to Messrs. Keever, McKay and Moore, and what are they?

Major General HUGHES:

1. Yes.

2. We have not the names.

3. Whether or not all were graduate nurses.

4. If so, from which hospital each graduated.

5. Whether all the nurses who have been sent to the front have passed the special military training course, for which provision is made by the Department of Militia.

CANADIAN TROOPS IN FRANCE.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I beg to inform the House that the following telegram was received yesterday from Sir George Perley, Acting High Commissioner in London:

Just received letter General Alderson in which he makes following statement: "Our men have now been in trenches over a week and I am very glad to be able to say that they are doing quite remarkably well. I knew they would do well but they have done much better than I expected and all has gone with less trouble than I anticipated. All artillery, infantry, engineers, medical people, supply, etc., have settled into their places and work in way that makes me both pleased and proud."

NOVA SCOTIA POSTAL SERVICE.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Richmond, N.S.) asked for leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing the question of the postal service in Nova Scotia.

And leave having been granted,

He said: For some weeks great complaints have been made with respect to the carriage and delivery of mails in the constituency which I represent, and in other constituencies as well. The hon. Postmaster General a few evenings ago in discussing the work of his department explained the development which has taken place in the postal service of the Dominion of Canada during the last three or four years. The expenditure in respect of that service now amounts to $13,000,000 a year. The report of the Postmaster General for the fiscal year ended March 31 last disclosed the fact that a great many rural delivery routes and other conveniences have been established throughout the Dominion of Canada. I respectfully submit that we in the eastern part of the province of Nova Scotia do not participate in these additional conveniences which are enjoyed in the other sections of Canada. If confidence in the postal service is withdrawn, the very foundations of civil life are shaken. I have here a letter which I received a few days ago from an official in the province of Nova Scotia, in which he makes complaint regarding the postal service in the part of the country over which his jurisdiction extends. He says:

I have been the prime mover in the agitation for improvement in our mail accommodation; but, unfortunately, I have had occasion to make so many complaints for some time past of delay and miscarriage of mail, that I have doubtless made myself obnoxious. When I got tired sending complaints to Halifax, I began sending them over their heads to Ottawa and, I am sorry to say, with no better results, until at last I made my bow and retired from the contest, promising not to trouble them any more.

Since I am on the subject, I may as well say that the same causes of complaint continue. There is not a week that mail does not go astray or get delayed en route. Within the last week the Halifax newspapers, on which we depend for the daily news, miscarried twice. The enclosed letter will disclose a flagrant case. I sent a parcel of blank forms of school returns to the teachers at Port Hood for their semi-annual returns. Subsequently, a letter came from the secretary of the school board asking me to forward a set of blanks, which I did. Some days afterwards a telegram comes, asking why I did not send the required forms. The third consignment reaches in due course, and, as you will see by Mr. Murphy's letter, the other two parcels came sauntering leisurely along some days later.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Would my hon. friend give the name?

Mr. KYTE: I shall be very glad to give the name to the Postmaster General. I do not think it desirable to enter the names of private citizens upon the published records of Parliament. Another gentleman in the county which I have the honour to represent, and to whom I had arranged that Hansard for this session should be sent daily, writes:

I have not received a copy of Hansard the last two weeks, and I have received but four copies in all since Parliament opened.

Parliament opened on the 4th day of February last. As I said, I had made arrangements to have a copy of Hansard sent to this gentleman daily; but up to the date on which he wrote, the 5th of March, he had received only four copies and had not received a copy for two weeks. Another gentleman for whom I had made a similar arrangement writes me that up to the 15th of February he had not received a single copy of Hansard from the Printing Bureau. I may say, in justice to the officers of the Printing Bureau, that before I thought of bringing this matter before the House I communicated with them and they satisfied me that the failure to deliver Hansard to the gentlemen to whom I refer cannot be traceable to them as they gave satisfactory proofs that they mailed Hansard every day. I have another case which affects myself more particularly, and as it does affect me more particularly I regard it as the most serious case of all. On the 11th day of January last I wrote a letter addressed to my hon. friend for South Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll). That letter should have reached him on the evening of the 11th day of January. On the 15th day of January he wired me asking why I had not sent him the letter which he expected. I communicated the non-delivery of this letter to the post office inspector at Halifax, who immediately undertook to trace it, but up to the present hour without success. This is quite easily understood as the letter was not registered and there was no way in which it could be traced through the various post offices that it would pass through en route. Suffice it to say that this letter, which was an important communication and one which I was very desirous should reach my hon. friend in due course of mail, has not yet come into his hands. Another letter which I addressed to him on the following day which should have reached him on the 12th day of January did not reach him until the 16th, some four days afterwards, and the delay in that case was caused by the letter having been mis-sent in another direction to another post office. These matters are too important to be allowed to continue and, while I have no reflections to make upon the hon. gentleman who is now discharging the important duties of Postmaster General, I am bound to say that the conditions which we have at present are those which he inherited from a not over punctilious predecessor. From time to time in this House, members representing the party to which I am associated have felt called upon to protest against the numerous changes of postmasters in the province of Nova Scotia. For many years we had a system of post offices that were in charge of postmasters who had served a considerable time in those offices and who, by training and experience, were calculated to give every possible satisfaction. After the change of Government there was a demand for the universal dismissal and official execution of these postmasters, particularly those who happened to be in sympathy with the late Government. As a consequence of this demand these competent and well trained officials have been dismissed from office and a band of men quite untrained and unqualified has taken their places. In so far as this is a reflection upon the Government I am willing that that impression may remain. I think it is too bad, however, that the public service should suffer in the manner I have described. I would urge the Postmaster General to take such steps as will give us some reasonable assurance that the postal service will be conducted more satisfactorily in the future. I know of one case where a man living in my community, having undergone a serious surgical operation in an hospital in a neighbouring county, on his return found it necessary to communicate with the medical man under whose treatment he was. He addressed three letters to the medical man in question, none of which had reached its destination upon the 30th day of January at the time I left home, notwithstanding that the letters had been written some two or three weeks before and should have reached their destination within 24 hours. There is another case of a woman living in my neighbourhood who suffered for many weeks from a serious illness by which she was reduced from comparative affluence and comfort to a condition of great distress. A friend of hers sent a generous benefaction to her by letter addressed to the post office where she received her mail. This letter was not received, and when inquiries were especially made it was found that this letter remained in the post office for four weeks, notwithstanding that the person to whom it was addressed had every day sent messengers to that office for her mail. I know other instances which I would be glad to discuss with the Postmaster General which would seem to indicate that there are grounds for public confidence in postal service being weakened. I fear very much that there are some postmasters who have an idea that, since their friends are in power and they have been selected to fill these offices on account of party services rendered by them, they are at liberty to set at defiance certain rules and regulations which heretofore have been regarded as binding. I fear that there is not that secrecy existing in the post offices in some places in Nova Scotia that it is necessary and desirable should exist. I know cases where persons not at all connected or associated with the post office staff have the run of post offices in some small centres, and no person mailing letters at these post offices has the assurance that the addresses, if not the contents of the letters, will not be disclosed to those who have an interest in ascertaining this information. If reports be true, we are upon the eve of a general election in this country, Important confidential correspondence in relation to the election campaign must necessarily pass through post offices. I take the responsibility of saying here to-day that there are certain post offices in my county where I would not take the risk of mailing confidential correspondence during an election campaign. I desire to make this statement in order that the Postmaster General may make a note of it, and issue warnings to these postmasters that the public have a right to repose some confidence in their discharge of their duties, and that no trifling with the mails will be permitted. I know of an instance where, in a municipal election campaign, certain correspondence was supposed to have been deposted in the post office upon the eve of that election. On the day subsequent to that, a day when the post office was not supposed to be open, two persons not associated with the post office were seen coming out of it, one of whom shut the door as he came out and put the key in his pocket. That information satisfied me that in this particular case the public interest is not safeguarded, and a proper appreciation of his obligation is not felt by the postmaster. I have information to the effect that in another election campaign in this country some two years ago, not in the province of Nova Scotia, 90 per cent of the campaign literature which was mailed in certain post offices in one constituency was never delivered to the persons to whom it was addressed.

The statements which I make here this afternoon are made in absolute good faith, and with a full knowledge of the responsibility which should rest on any hon. member who undertakes to make such statements in this House. But I repeat that, in addition to the specific complaints which I have made this afternoon, there are many others which I might very well bring to the attention of this House; but I do not desire to delay the proceedings. All I ask at the present moment is that the hon. Postmaster General will give such instructions to his inspectors as will enable them to ferret out the cause of the non-delivery of the mail in the instances I have referred to, and in those instructions give a warning that postmasters cannot in future interfere with the mails and letters passing through their offices without running the risk of being summarily punished for such an offence, even though they have been appointed to their offices by the hon. gentlemen at present occupying the Treasury benches.

[Mr. Kyte.]

Mr. WILLIAM GRAY: I should like to ask the hon. member whether the late Government, when they came into power in 1896, did not dismiss competent men and put incompetent men in their places?

Mr. KYTE: I can only speak of knowledge concerning my own constituency; and with respect to my own constituency I desire to tell my hon. friend that from 1896 to 1911 not one postmaster was dismissed in the county of Richmond, which I represent. Every man who had been appointed by the Conservative Government previous to 1896 was continued in his office, and he has continued to hold up to the present moment.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): I have much pleasure in confirming, as far as my personal knowledge goes, the observations made by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte). I think his observations in bringing this matter to the notice of the Postmaster General ought to be of some service, and ought to bring into existence such a condition of affairs between the postmasters and the department that the postmasters should know that they are not to be at all events encouraged in conduct of that kind. I wish to say to the Postmaster General that to my knowledge the post office in the Tory centres in the part of eastern Nova Scotia that I know is just a place that is occupied by Tory heelers for their meetings at all hours and at all times, Sundays not excepted. While the Postmaster General cannot follow these men into their offices and see that they take proper care that the letters are not opened or interfered with, there is one thing which I think he can do; and that is to prevent the post office from being a place of common resort of the kind I have mentioned. If the Postmaster General will make inquiry into the situation which I speak of, he will find that in all the villages where changes and new appointments have been made since the last general election, the postmasters think they are there as political agents of their friends, and that the post office is of course the proper place in which to gather and discuss political matters; and if they suspect any letters that may be going through they take such steps as may be advised, in order to obtain the desired information. That is a condition of things that should not exist; it should be removed. A little over a year ago a local election took place in the county of Victoria. The chief Tory organizer of the province of Nova Scotia, Dr. Hayes, who was on that occasion black-listed and disqualified by the judge of the Supreme Court—

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member is travelling outside what is permissible on this motion, which is to inquire into the unsatisfactory condition of the postal service now in Nova Scotia.

Mr. McKENZIE: It so happens, Mr. Speaker, that I have no particular gift by which I can say everything that I have to say in just one word; and that it is necessary for me to make two or three sentences before I come to the real sentence. I was going to say that this man has commandeered the post offices down there.

Mr. SPEAKER: If I understood the hon. gentleman correctly, he was speaking of an occurrence that happened over a year ago. Of course he cannot, in that case, be addressing himself to the present condition of the postal service in Nova Scotia.

Mr. KYTE: I think, from the wording, that the notice is not limited to the present condition of the postal service.

Mr. SPEAKER: The notice reads:

The unsatisfactory condition of the postal service in Nova Scotia.

I presume that has reference to the present condition.

Mr. McKENZIE: I submit that the condition of terror under which postmasters are held by Tory officials existed then, and exists now; it is a continuous trespass, as it is known to the law. I submit that we can speak of this condition as having commenced over a year ago, and as having continued to exist up to the present time. I submit that it is quite proper to go back, if we can, to the origin of the disease, and follow it up to its present stage. I submit that that was the condition over a year ago, and that it is the condition now.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. It seems to me that my ruling ought to be respected. A notice worded as this is must be taken as referring to the present.

Mr. McKENZIE: I say that this condition exists by reason of the interference of Tory officials in the county of Victoria. I say that the chief official of the Tory party in the county, who is the chief adviser of the Premier in Tory matters in that province, a man who has been blacklisted by a judge of the Supreme Court, terrorizes and commandeers the post offices, and that in the county of Victoria or any other place where he is doing this you cannot get a postmaster to do his duty; for this man goes about telling them he is authorized by the department at Ottawa to dismiss them if they do not carry out his behests. That is the condition, and if I am not to speak of it as in the past I bring the conditions as in the present to the notice of the Postmaster General, so that he may deal with it. I wish to keep strictly within the motion that is before the Chair, but I did not know that it contained a word which restricts us to the very present. I submit to the Postmaster General and to the Government that not only the post office, but every other public service or utility in Nova Scotia, including the telegraph service, is being dealt with in the same way. They commandeered the telegraph service at that election. Thousands of messages were sent out and the minister knows they were not paid for. The man in charge, who is still in the service of the Government, swore that he put those messages through free, without a cent being paid, and he is still the man to whom we must go for our telegrams in the county of Victoria. The condition being such as this man has sworn to himself, I submit to the Postmaster General that he cannot be too severe in dealing with matters of that kind.

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (South Cape Breton): I do not wish to take part in this discussion except to corroborate something that has been said by my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Kyte). In the first or second week of January last I had occasion to write to the hon. member for Richmond on a matter of importance not only to ourselves personally, but to a large number of other people. In the ordinary course of mail I should have had a reply to my letter on the 12th or 13th of January. On the 14th or 15th of January, not having received a reply I telegraphed the hon. member for Richmond to ascertain why he had not answered my letter, and in regard to certain inquiries I had made with reference to some engagements in which we were both concerned. He telegraphed back that he had answered my letter, and gave me the desired information. My hon. friend also wrote me a letter on the same subject. While I should have had the letter on the day it was written, I did not receive it for four or five days afterwards owing to the fact that the postmaster at the place of mailing the letter had sent it to another post office which bore no resemblance either in name, spelling or otherwise, to the place to which the letter had been addressed. I am not making any charges; I do not know who was responsible for this, I do not know whether the person who mislaid this letter did it wilfully or not, but there is some looseness or laxity certainly in the post office where the matter occurred. There are other instances that affect myself in the matter of sending out literature, but I am not going to make any comment upon them. It may be the fault of nobody. In the county I represent, people are coming and going, it being a great industrial centre. Very often the literature I send out—Hansards and that sort of thing—is returned to me here. I am making no charge, but I wished to corroborate the statement of my hon. friend from Richmond in reference to the two letters that he addressed to me in the month of January.

Hon. T. C. CASGRAIN (Postmaster General): I thank the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) for having drawn the attention of the House to these matters, which are of considerable importance. I beg to express the regret of the department that he has been put to inconvenience by not having had these letters transmitted through the mails as they should have been. I am a little surprised that any complaints made about the very unsatisfactory manner in which the post office seems to have been conducted in his town have received no answer.

Mr. KYTE: The letter of the official that I read to the House has no reference to the post office in my town. He lives in another part, and his statement has reference to another post office.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I would ask my hon. friend to kindly come to the department and give me further particulars. I cannot punish any of these men without hearing them; I have to give them fair warning. If it is necessary to hold an investigation, we certainly shall do so. It will be my endeavour to make the postal service as perfect as possible. Anything that money can do to promote that end will be done by the department over which I have the honour to preside.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is a fair conclusion to draw that if anything goes wrong in the administration of the post office it is done through intention or design. I have had instances in my own experience which are of a much stronger character than anything which has been mentioned this afternoon, and I have not thought for one moment of attributing the result to any intention to do wrong. I remember about six years ago I sent an important and urgent letter from Halifax to Ottawa. It reached Ottawa nearly three weeks after I had despatched it, having gone to Vancouver and having returned from Vancouver by slow stages. It was important for many reasons that the letter should have reached Ottawa in due course. I did not, however, jump to the conclusion that any Liberal partisan in the post office had done this from design. My hon. friends on the other side seem to have come to an unwarrantable conclusion. During nearly the whole of a year, about five years ago, a business man in the city of Ottawa sent to me almost daily three or four letters which had occupied in their transmission to him two or three times, and sometimes four or five times, the length of time that would have been necessary. I used to forward these communications from this business man to the Postmaster General for the purpose of directing his attention to the unnecessary delay. In a very large country like this such delays will from time to time occur. So far as the aspersions which have been cast on the postmasters of Nova Scotia are concerned, I regret that hon. gentlemen who have spoken this afternoon should have gone so far as to cast what I believe to be undeserved reproach upon a class of men who, I believe, are inspired by a sincere desire to do their duty. On their behalf, until some definite and concrete case of maladministration is brought to the attention of the Postmaster General and dealt with as it ought to be dealt with, I desire to repudiate any such aspersions on the postmasters of Nova Scotia. I have had experience of them when they were very largely Liberal appointees, and I found no occasion to reproach them then. I think that no greater occasion for reproach is to be found against those who have been appointed by the present Government. I shall make inquiries as to what the hon. member for North Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) has said in regard to Dr. Hayes, and ascertain what Dr. Hayes has to say in regard to these accusations. They have not been brought to my attention before, but with all due respect to the hon. member, I venture to think that it will be found he spoke beyond warrant and beyond the limit of what he should have said, when he made these charges against Dr. Hayes this afternoon. So far as the distribution of campaign literature is concerned, I have heard of reproaches of that kind for the last fifteen or seventeen years, and a great many of them when my hon. friends on the other side of the House were responsible for the administration of the Post Office Department. I know that in the election of 1904 my own political friends made the declaration that they verily believed that not more than 25 per cent of the campaign literature which was sent out in very large quantities from Ottawa ever reached the destination for which it was intended. I do not know whether that is the case or not. I simply desire to remind my hon. friend that we have heard a good deal of these charges during the past seventeen years and before we came into power.

Motion to adjourn the House negatived.

GRANBY MAIL DELIVERY.

Mr. BOIVIN: Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Casgrain) to an article which appears in the Leader-Mail of Granby, of Friday, March 5, 1915. It is also in connection with the post office service, but in this case there are no officials to blame. The statement is as follows:

> The morning mail missed the train again on Wednesday. This is a matter which should be taken up vigorously by the Board of Trade. There is too much doing these days to allow us to quietly submit to being without mail for twenty-four hours. There is no good reason why the mail bags should not be brought from the city direct by the Central Vermont. Under existing arrangements they come to Farnham by Canadian Pacific railway and if this train is late the Central Vermont comes along without them. Telephone requests that the bags be put on the freight which follows the passenger train here do not bring any results and we have to wait for the evening train to pick up the bags and bring them along. Will the Granby Board of Trade, which has been suffering from drowsiness lately, kindly wake up and attend to the matter.

Under the present arrangement the town of Granby, with a population of 5,000, receives a closed mail in the morning on the train from Montreal and the registered mail on the evening train. This closed mail is placed on the Canadian Pacific railway train at 8.25 in the morning. The mail is thrown off at Farnham and transferred to a train which leaves Montreal via the Central Vermont at 8.35 a.m. If the Canadian Pacific railway train is fifteen or twenty minutes late in arriving at Farnham, the mail has missed the connection with the Central Vermont train and remains on the station platform during the entire day. I would ask the Postmaster General if some arrangement could not be made by which this morning mail, instead of leaving at 8.25 by the Canadian Pacific railway, could be placed directly on the train which leaves the Bonaventure station at 8.35, and thus save this inconvenience.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I will look into the matter, and if it is possible to remedy the evil I will have it done.

17th NOVA SCOTIA REGIMENT.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have received a telegram from Sir George Perley, which sets forth the substance of General Alderson's reply to Sir George Perley's letter regarding the allegations of Mr. H. C. Crowell. General Alderson states that the only word of truth in the whole article is that Colonel Robertson has been replaced. He further says that all the nonsense about the 17th Battalion being used as scavengers, etc., is pure invention.

POSTAL WAR STAMPS.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. STEVENS: Referring to the following clause in the new proposed taxation, under the heading of Special Taxation:

> On every letter and postcard posted in Canada a war stamp of one cent.

Does this clause apply to mail emanating from this House under the frank of hon. members? If not, in my opinion, it should.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I will bring my hon. friend's inquiry to the attention of the Minister of Finance, and I will give an answer to-morrow.

THE BUDGET.

PROPOSED WAR TAXATION.

Consideration of the proposed motion of Hon. W. T. White (Minister of Finance) for the Committee of Ways and Means and the proposed amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto, resumed from March 10.

Mr. JOHN H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): In the resolution now before the House the Minister of Finance requires to explain a deficit of $80,000,000. He ought also to deal with the Estimates submitted to the House. Permit me to pick out a couple of sample items such as a new dredging plant for Manitoba and the inspection of pickled fish. When listening to the speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, I could not help wondering what the bombardment of Constantinople had to do with a dredging plant for Manitoba or with pickled fish. I was curious to know the purpose of this item of $33,000, to provide a new dredging plant for Manitoba. I did not know that any dredging was required in that province. I made some inquiries, and it was hinted to me that the Minister of Public Works was promoting this scheme, and that his idea was to dredge a track for the prairie schooners in order that there might be facilities afforded to carry cargoes of homestead inspectors for use at the next election. I do not know whether that explanation is the proper one or not; but if it is not it is for the Minister of Public Works to explain.

Mr. HENDERSON: Not worth while.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Why, let me ask, did not the hon. Finance Minister deal with the questions before the House? It looks to me as if one of those resolutions is kept on the Order Paper in order to reinforce the other.

When the House adjourned last night I was dealing with the question of a pledge given to the people of Canada by the Prime Minister a few days before the last election. I read the first clause of his manifesto, which was published on the 15th day of August, in the Montreal Gazette and signed by the Prime Minister. In this pledge he promises on behalf of his party, if elected, a thorough reorganization of the methods by which public expenditure is supervised. That pledge has not been redeemed. I pointed out to the House that there never was a time in the history of this country since the days of Connolly and McGreevy when there was such a lack of supervision of public expenditure as there is to-day. In order to prove my case I produced correspondence laid on the table only a few days ago between the Minister of Finance and the Auditor General. You can see by that correspondence that things went so far and that the expenditure was so loosely made, in one department of the Government at all events, that it became necessary for the Auditor General to step in and stop the payment of the cheques of the Minister of Finance at the banks.

I want to produce another witness, an hon. gentleman who supports the Government. I refer to the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. William Smith). You, Mr. Speaker, know that there is in this House no more loyal supporter of the present Administration than the hon. member for South Ontario. It will be conceded that that hon. member would do things for his party that he would not do for himself. He attended a meeting of the Horse Breeders' Association at Toronto on the 2nd day of February, 1915. He took occasion to make a speech, and I will read a paragraph from the report of it published in the Toronto Telegram, which I understand is a Conservative journal. Here is what my hon. friend says:

> Perhaps the course of the Government has not met with universal satisfaction, and no doubt there is good reason for this. What I am about to say, I say as a supporter of the Government and with a due sense of the significance of my words. As far as I can see, gentlemen, there is going to be a considerable graft in this business. I fear the tactics we condemned in connection with the Boer war remount purchases are to be repeated. This should not be. Men have been sent out to buy who might play a game of marbles, but who cannot buy horses.

There you have the opinion of a gentleman who is supporting the Government. His opinion was evidently given very reluctantly. He knows what is taking place, because if there is anything he knows well, it is horses. That want of oversight in the purchase of horses was not confined to the province of Ontario. In the province of Nova Scotia there was one gentleman detailed to purchase horses who would also, I have no doubt, be all right at playing marbles. Every one knows that the Militia Department is besieged day after day by contract brokers, patronage hunters, middlemen, and cattle of that character. All you have to do, if you do not know the facts, is to go down to the headquarters of our war department and see for yourself. There you will find them in hordes, like the army worm. I have very much sympathy with my hon. friend the Minister of Militia, who wished that he had the power to turn his quick-firing guns upon them. That is the way the business of this Government is being done in Ottawa; and outside in the rest of Canada the business of the country devolves upon patronage committees. In the town in which I live the recruiting officer could not select a medical doctor to examine the recruits volunteering for service without submitting to the dictation of a patronage committee. That is how the Minister of Finance is standing behind the boys in the trenches. It makes a man's blood hot to think that at a time like this, when so many of our people are making great sacrifices, when over fifty thousand of the best blood of Canada are risking their lives in the country's service and every day adding to the number, when some twenty thousand of our countrymen are at this moment somewhere in the blood-soaked swamps of Flanders exposed to the hardships and dangers of war for the defence of their country. All honour to them for their patriotism and courage and devotion to duty. But what shall we say of the grafters, and the jobbers, and the patronage hunters who in this hour of their country's need are thinking only of themselves and of what they can steal for their own pockets or for the reptile funds of their party? The Auditor General is the only safeguard we have; and it would appear from the correspondence laid on the table that he is spending a good deal of his time at present looking after the ministers. It is a Godsend for the people of Canada that we have an Auditor General and that he is a man of integrity and courage. Otherwise they would steal the Mace off the table and the carpets off the floor of this Chamber. I pointed out in connection with the pledge given by my right hon. friend the leader of the Government (Sir Robert Borden) that he stated in his manifesto that a yearly expenditure of $74,000,000 was extravagance beyond all defence. To-day instead of $74,000,000 we have an ordinary controllable expenditure of $140,000,000. Now, Sir, if there was no excuse, no possible defence for an expenditure of $74,000,000 in 1911, when my right hon. friend wrote that manifesto, how can there be any defence to-day for the enormous expenditure of $140,000,000? If there is a defence we should like to hear it. For, I submit, that in the whole course of this debate no one on the other side so far has attempted to make a proper defence on that question. The people are asking throughout the country, Could this staggering deficit be avoided? I submit that it could. All will agree that with honest administration and the practice of economy it could have been greatly reduced. I will venture the statement that if the grafters and middlemen and patronage hunters and partisan committees had been driven out the Minister of Finance would not have to meet Parliament to-day in the humilating position he finds himself.

My hon. friend to-day says he could not interfere with contracts because the honour of Canada is at stake. That is a new theory for hon. gentlemen opposite. They were hardly warm in their seats before they cancelled a contract made by the former Administration in my own constituency for the construction of a branch railway. The former Postmaster General has admitted in this House that he cancelled hundreds of contracts. A return was placed on the table last year showing that he cancelled no less than five hundred contracts for carrying the mails throughout this country. Many of these contracts were entered into after public tender and competition, and many of the men whose contracts were cancelled were ruined in the operation. But he claimed the right to do that on account of the fact that there is a clause in all Government contracts that enables the Government to cancel. It is a new doctrine for hon. gentlemen opposite that they cannot cancel contracts. Where was the "honour of Canada" in the cases of these five hundred contracts? Where was the honour of Canada in the case of the railway contract in my county.

Referring again to the deficit why should not this Government live within its income? The people are practising economy. They are endeavouring to live within their incomes. The late Government lived within its income. If this Government cannot live within its income, permit me to suggest that they should be requested politely but firmly to step aside and make room for a Government that can. If you ask me to be specific, I will venture a few suggestions. In the discussion which took place in this House a few days ago, it was pointed out that the official staff appointed throughout this country since this Government came into power has been increased by the enormous number of ten thousand new officers. I know very well that explanations have been made, and I am quite willing to make allowances for all these explanations. But after the explanations had been submitted, after allowance has been made for what can be said on behalf of the ministers, we are forced to the conclusion that there was utter recklessness in securing positions for their partisans. The Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid), whom I am glad to see in his place, is one of the most plausible of ministers in making explanations. But we all know the Minister of Customs. His method of appointing officers has been exposed at various times in this House. My hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Kyte) gave one case that happened at Red Island in his county a few days ago. The Minister of Customs dismissed an officer there because there was nothing for him to do; and then immediately afterwards appointed a party friend to do nothing at an increased salary —nearly twice as much as the former officer had. I pointed out a similar case in my own county. The hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. Chisholm) also exposed a case of that character in connection with the department of my hon. friend, in Antigonish. In that case it appears that a preventive officer was dismissed because there was nothing for him to do. The report of the inspector stated that the officer had not struck a blow for nine years—and made no report to the Government for that length of time. In the face of that report the officer was very properly dismissed. But a party friend, one Moses Delorey, had to be looked after, and he insisted that he must have his reward. The Minister of Customs was up against it.

Mr. J. D. REID: He is doing good work since.

Mr. SINCLAIR: So, what did the minister do? He put Moses Delorey in the place of the dismissed officer. But the salary was not large enough, and in the face of the report of the inspector, he did not like to increase the salary. So he appointed the same gentleman as an inspector of food. This "inspector of food" is residing in a country district where no inspection of food is carried on.

Mr. REID: I did not do that.

Mr. SINCLAIR: No, but the Minister of Inland Revenue did. The return shows what was done. This man has for two years been drawing a salary as inspector of food; and outside the porridge pot in his own kitchen he has inspected nothing yet. In my own town, a few miles further west on the Intercolonial railway, a young man by the name of Cavanagh was dismissed from the customs service by my hon. friend because there was no work for him to do.

Mr. REID: That was a good reason.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Yes, if it was true, but what happened? In the place of this man, for whom he could find no work, my hon. friend appointed two men, at substantial salaries, to do the work Cavanagh had been doing. Similar instances could be found all along the three thousand miles between Cape Breton and British Columbia. In the face of examples of this kind, what is the use of hon. gentlemen opposite trying to refute the accusation that they have increased their staff of officials to such an extent that their action has become a public scandal? The number of new appointments, after making allowance for resignations and dismissals, is placed at 10,000. One hon. gentleman estimated that these appointments would cost the country in salaries an average of $1,000 each. I think that that estimate is high. Some of these persons occupy important positions in the inside service, and, of course, draw correspondingly large salaries; but some are employed in the outside service at salaries which are not so high. But if we estimate the average salary at $500, that means $5,000,000 a year, or $16,000 a day, which is required to pay this increased official staff, the great majority of whom have been unnecessarily appointed to positions in the public service since hon. gentlemen opposite came into power. In view of these circumstances, what is the use of telling us that we are doing a patriotic act when we pay five cents additional a bottle on patent medicine, or two cents instead of one for a post card?

My second proposal is that the Government should abolish the middleman. I am glad the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) is paying attention; he was the great critic of the middlemen when he sat on this side of the House. The middleman has had four fat years.

Mr. J. D. REID: He had about fifteen when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power.

Mr. SINCLAIR: He never flourished as he does at present. Suppose we abolish the middleman; let us go back to the honest old system of tender and contract and throw the business open to the other half of the population. I have not the slightest doubt that if the business of government were properly and honestly carried out, we would save $8,000,000 or $10,000,000 a year.

Another device employed by hon. gentlemen opposite since they came into power is the appointment of royal commissioners. In this way hon. gentlemen succeeded in finding fat jobs for men like Mr. A. B. Morine, Mr. H. P. Duchemin and a multitude of others whom I could mention. Go over the history of this Government in its first year of power, and you will find appointments of this kind by the score. A return, which was placed on the table of the House only a few days ago, disclosed the fact that no less than 132 of these commissioners, mis-called royal commissioners, were appointed. Amongst them were commissioners to investigate the Civil Service, commissioners to investigate the Transcontinental railway, commissioners to investigate the shell-fish industry, commissioners to investigate the sardine industry, commissioners to investigate partisanship by the score. According to the return, as I have said, 132 of these commissioners were appointed. The late Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) himself appointed 61 of the 132. It is only fair, however, to explain that in some cases there were duplications; men like Mr. H. P. Duchemin and others were appointed by more than one department. But the cost to the country of these 132 commissioners must have been enormous. I have no idea what the actual cost has been; it has not been laid before the House. One of these scavengers traversed the eastern section of the province of Nova Scotia, leaving behind him a trail of ill-will, perjury and injustice, and for his services he was paid $6,681.71. I do not know what the Government paid the other 131, but if they paid them at the same rate, the cost would be nearly a million dollars, $881,892. Is it any wonder that the Finance Minister finds himself in difficulties and short of money?

Let me give you another instance of wastefulness which occurred in my own constituency. The Government cannot be accused of spending money in my constituency; it is one of the constituencies that have had a rest since this Government came into power. The only expenditure made in my constituency during the whole four years was a wasteful expenditure: I refer to a railway survey made by the Minister of Railways last autumn. After the Government cancelled the contract for the construction of the Guysborough railway in 1912, I endeavoured to elicit from the Minister of Railways as to what course the Government intended to take. He replied that he had made provision for a survey. I explained that a survey was unnecessary; that the road had already been surveyed and that the minister would find in his office the profiles, plans and details which would give him all necessary information. That was in the year 1912. In 1913 I again brought the matter to the attention of the minister, asking him if he had made a survey. The following reply, which will be found on page 2009 of Hansard, 1913, was given by the minister:

> The Minister of Railways and Canals investigated this matter of a branch line from Sunny Brae to Guysborough, and after discussing it fully with the engineers it was ascertained that the preliminary surveys were sufficiently complete to determine the feasilbility of the line and that no further surveys would be required until it was decided by the Government that the line should be constructed.

In the face of that answer, in which the Minister said that no further survey was necessary and that he had ample information in his office, in the autumn of last year, when it was thought that an election was coming, the minister sent seventy-seven men into my constituency to make a survey. Some of them were heelers of the party from Montreal, and some from Moncton, and some from other places. A few local men were employed, but the minister could not find Tories enough in my constituency to do this work. According to information which I received from the Minister of Railways only a few days ago, the cost of this survey was over $20,000; yet in the Estimates for the current year not a dollar is provided for the construction of the road.

Owing to this and other extravagances the Finance Minister must have more money, so he has decided to get $30,000,000 from the people by taxation this year. His plan is to add 7½ per cent to the general tariff and to impose 5 per cent additional on British goods; a tax of 1 per cent on bank circulation—of which I entirely approve; taxes on railway tickets, telegrams, express orders, money orders; increased rates of postage: a letter which formerly cost two cents will cost three, and a post-card which formerly cost one cent will cost two. Taxes are placed also on bills of lading and on patent medicines. The tax on patent medicines has been very strongly objected to. Patent medicine is regarded as the poor man's doctor; it is used almost exclusively by people who cannot afford a doctor's prescription. I am not going to discuss the matter further than to say that the fishermen of Nova Scotia, who were promised free medicine by the Prime Minister in the manifesto issued by him before the election of 1911, will be amazed when they learn how the Tory party are keeping their promises.

An income tax has been proposed. I would be inclined to favour an income tax; the Minister of Finance objected to it, for reasons which, to my mind, were not very forcible. With his large staff of officials he should not have to engage the services of additional employees in order to collect an income tax. The hon. Minister of Customs himself figures in the list of appointments to the extent of 1,649 new officials.

Mr. J. D. REID: That is not correct. The hon. gentleman is not stating that correctly.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Substracting from that the number who died or were dismissed.

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: There was a large increase was there not?

Mr. REID: I said there was an increase but the hon. gentleman did not explain it correctly in the first instance.

Mr. SINCLAIR: My hon. friend did not wait for my explanation, after we make all allowances, there is a very large increase.

Mr. REID: But there has been a very large increase in the revenue and new offices have been opened.

Mr. SINCLAIR: At present there is a very large decrease in the revenue.

Mr. REID: No there is not, the revenue is increasing now.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It is increasing for the last month but that is only temporary, the decrease has been very marked for the whole of last year.

Mr. REID: No, it has not.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Well then, the hon. gentleman's returns are not correct, my proposal is that the Minister of Customs could furnish a staff of men throughout this country who could collect the income tax without burdening the country with a new set of officers. There is one thing I would like about the income tax, it would afford some of those millionaires in Toronto and Montreal who have been accustomed for many years to shout loyalty, an opportunity to do something more substantial for their country than singing God save the King and waving the flag.

I wish to enter my protest against the 7½ per cent increase in the general customs tariff. My chief reason is that it will increase the cost of living, which is already too high. It will not produce much revenue, it will put perhaps $3 in the pockets of the combines for every dollar it will into the treasury of the country. Besides it is done without any discrimination, no account is taken of the large number of articles of which there is no importation. These articles are taxed just the same and from them not a dollar will come into the treasury of the country. A very large amount will be extracted from the pockets of the people by this means. Take, for example, the item of unbarked marlin, a kind of twine that is used on the coast of the maritime provinces by the fishermen for making lobster traps. Under the old Government that twine was admitted free. Under the present Government it is taxed 25 per cent.

Mr. J. D. REID: There has been no change in the tariff there, the hon. member knows that well.

Mr. SINCLAIR: My hon. friend knows too that he put a different construction on that item of the tariff since he came into office.

Mr. REID: That is not in accord with the facts, and it was thoroughly explained.

Mr. SINCLAIR: My hon. friend cannot deny it; we have had the matter discussed several times in the House and it has been proved beyond all question that a different construction was put upon that item of the tariff after my hon. friend came into power.

Mr. REID: It never was.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I can prove it from the importers who imported the article. For 15 years it came in free until my hon. friend took office.

Mr. REID: It never was.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The tariff schedule itself shows it, but at the present time there is none of that cordage imported into Canada. That is a statement that my hon. friend will not deny. It is completely controlled by the cordage combine at Halifax or Montreal, wherever its headquarters are. The consequence is that the 25 per cent is at present squeezed out of the fishermen of the country and no cordage is imported. What will happen under the new tariff? Any one can see that in place of 25 per cent the fishermen will have to pay the cordage combine 32½ per cent. Why was that not put among the excepted articles? That is only one of a very large number of items of which there is no importation in respect of which the people will be oppressed with a heavy tax and not a cent will reach the treasury. It is clear that the war is being made a pretext to confer a boon on the combines at the expense of the consumers of this country.

It has come out during one of the discussions in this House that the Conservative party issued a pamphlet claiming that they knew about the war for some two years before the war took place and that we innocent people on this side of the House did not know anything about it, that we could not recognize an emergency when we saw it. All I can say in reply is that if they really did know, there is no parallel in all history for their conduct unless it be the well known case of Nero who kept on fiddling while Rome was burning. When the crash came they were totally unprepared, both by land and sea. They had allowed the barnacles to accumulate on the bottom of the Niobe in Halifax. She was partly dismantled; some of her machinery was stored in a warehouse on a wharf in the dockyard. The officers had been encouraged to desert. The officers of the Naval Department were engaged in preparing a book on how to cook fish instead of preparing for war. A few days before war broke out the departmental report for the year was issued. I received my copy of the departmental report on the 6th day of August, just two days after the war broke out. I opened it eagerly to find whether the naval defence which we had in this country was in a good state of preparation. On the eighth page of the book I found the following:

> Owing to the decision of the Government not to continue H.M.C. ships Niobe and Rainbow in full commission, the course of exercise and training for these ships has been discontinued and they are at present manned by nucleus crews.

That is what I found in the Naval report issued about the time war broke out. A few days after they got very busy in the dockyard at Halifax. A force of men was put on, a double shift was set to work, the ship was refitted and prepared for sea. That was the condition of our naval vessels when war broke out. What, let me ask, was the condition of the militia? Was it any better? The Militia Department, on an expenditure of about $12,000,000 during the previous fiscal year, was in very little better shape than the navy. The treasury was empty; the Finance Minister had been scraping the bottom of the pot for months before the war came. There was no clothing for the troops, no boots were ready for the soldiers. It has come out in the investigation that there was not even a specification in the department to tell what kind of boots a soldier should have for active service. There were no blankets, and socks were as scarce as blankets. Even the camp at Valcartier was not ready, the stumps had to be taken out, it all had to be cleared and drained and a water supply put in. There was absolutely nothing ready but a long list of honorary colonels. Yet we are told that these gentlemen knew all about the war two years before it broke out! At the time of the Boer war some years ago, with a yearly expenditure of only $1,700,000 on militia, the country was much better prepared than it was on this occasion. Permit me to remind hon. gentlemen opposite of the promptness with which the country responded in the case of the Boer war. The president of the Transvaal Republic declared war against Great Britain on the 9th day of October, 1899. On the 30th day of October of the same year, just 21 days afterwards, the steamship Sardinian was sailing down the St. Lawrence bearing the first contingent to a distant part of the world to fight for the flag, the men all ready and equipped. That is the way the late Government met the emergency in 1899, not, of course, on such a large scale—

Mr. GLASS: Could the hon. gentleman tell how many men were sent at that time?

Mr. SINCLAIR: I have not the number here. I do not pretend it was anything like the same number as has been despatched at the present time; but I am pointing out that the Department of Militia, as managed and controlled by the late minister (Sir Frederick Borden), was in a state of preparation to respond to the call of war, and in the short space of three weeks he was able at least to do something; whereas the present department was not able to do anything in anything like that space of time. Let me suggest that my hon. friends will do well to suppress that pamphlet that has now become so well known and notorious, if they have not done so. If not, it is bound to do harm to them. The Canadian voter is the last man in the world to tolerate incompetence, especially at such a critical time in the country's history as the present.

I am glad to see that the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) is in his seat; I want to have just one word with him. My hon. friend from West Peterboro, when he spoke, rattled some old bones and attempted to revive the old navy debate. We have no objection on this side of the House to revive the navy debate. We are ready to discuss that question at all times. My hon. friend poses as a philosopher, and I am free to admit that there is a thin veneer of philosophy outside of his outside skin.

But when you scratch him you find a Tory; and a Tory of that type that is peculiar to the province of Ontario, the type that relies more on kindling prejudices against my honoured leader than on the justice of their cause. His patriotic soul was wrestling over the use of the word "may" in that clause of the Naval Service Act which permits the Canadian navy to be used for the defence of the Empire. The word "may" did not suit him. In that word he saw a deep plot to wreck the Empire; and he wanted some word like "shall" or "must," I suppose, substituted for "may." He had no faith in the Canadian people. That is what was underneath the suggestion he made in that speech.

Mr. BURNHAM: It is only a portion of the Canadian people that I have no faith in.

Mr. SINCLAIR: That is what was at the bottom of his suggestion. It is the same old Tory heresy that, in the early part of last century, placed his party against the granting of responsible government to this country; it is the same spirit that placed his party in England against granting self-government to the Boers a few years ago; the same spirit that, a few months ago, almost turned the British Isles into an armed camp over the question of home rule for Ireland. I am sorry that that spirit still lives in the backwoods of West Peterboro. But, suppose we had put the word "must" in. Do you think that would have made any difference? Would it have been respected by the present Government? Suppose we had put the word "must" in the British Preference Act. Would that have prevented my hon. friend the Minister of Finance from driving a horse and cart through it at the present time? Certainly not. My hon. friend knows that very well. But of course I am well aware that that speech of his was for consumption in West Peterboro. It is a well known fact in this country that he won his last election there on a bogus cry. He has practically admitted it in the House.

Mr. BURNHAM: I appeal to the House against such an assertion as that. He has no right to say that I admitted such a thing in the House. The statement is false.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker. I say it is not false. I say it is true, and I can prove it by the records of the House.

Mr. BURNHAM: Do so.

Mr. SINCLAIR: My hon. friend openly admitted in the House that the question that was discussed in his county and on which he ran in 1911 was the Ne Temere Act. And what was the promise that my hon. friend made his electors? Did he not know at the time he made that promise that the highest legal authorities in this country had decided that this Parliament had no power to deal with the Ne Temere? Was he not well aware of that? But in face of the knowledge of that fact, he made the promise to his electors that, if elected, he would see that a uniform marriage law was passed for this country. Has he fulfilled the pledge he gave?

Mr. BURNHAM: I do not run the whole House.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Has he attempted to carry it out? He was well aware at the time he made it that he could not carry it out. He must have been aware of it. And now he is trying to stir up another question that he expects will do service for him in the backwoods of the same riding. I think I have dealt sufficiently with that question.

I do not wish to detain the House any longer; so, to sum up:

1. I am cordially in favour of the proposed war loan. I am also in favour of such taxation as may be necessary to meet the interest on the war loan. I am prepared along with my colleagues on this side cordially to support any measure that will enable the Government to give effective assistance to the Empire in the supreme crisis through which it is now passing. To quote from my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), "millions for war, but not a dollar for graft."

2. I am opposed to the 7½ per cent increase in the general tariff because it is levied without discrimination. It will bear most heavily on those classes of the community least able to pay. It will not produce any substantial amount of revenue, and it cannot fail to enrich the combines.

3. I am especially opposed to the 5 per cent additional impost on British goods. By this impost, we are treating Great Britain as a foreign country, and are striking a blow at British commerce. If ever there was a time when the interests of British trade should be safeguarded it is at the present, when the old land is engaged in a struggle involving its own existence and our future.

4. This is not a war Budget. If it were, I would cordially support it. We have the admission of the Honourable Finance Minister that not one dollar of the money to be collected under this Budget outside the interest on the war loan, will go to prosecute the war; and as a matter of fact the interest on the war loan will be borrowed as well as the principal.

5. The Government, in face of decreasing trade and a falling revenue, should have adopted a policy of retrenchment and economy; and if the Government had done this during the past four years, nay, if they do so now, this increased taxation will not be necessary.

I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. S. FRANCIS GLASS (East Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate for the first time in the debates of this House, and I trust that I shall not transgress any of its rules. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Sinclair), and yesterday I listened with an especial interest to my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark), because, from the views he has enunciated on previous occasions in this House, and the stand he has taken as a free trader and a Cobdenite, I knew that he was a lucid and clear speaker. I am not sure, however, that my views on the question of protection have been changed by hearing the able remarks of the hon. gentleman. I knew that he had lived in the old land, where free trade has for so long stood the test of time and given such satisfactory results. I am also not unmindful of the fact that the great German Empire and the great country to the south of us have, by protection, on entirely different systems, built up their trade and grown wealthy, possibly to an even greater extent than the Motherland herself. I believe that conditions in the old land make free trade the desirable policy for that country to pursue. But so far as Canada is concerned, there has never since protection was adopted been submitted to the people of this country an alternative fiscal policy which met with their approval, or which they were prepared to try out. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) has referred to the panacea which the Government of the day applied to this country in 1911, in order to try and relieve our people from the ills that, in the Government's opinion, existed at that time —a time when the revenues of this country were buoyant, and the country in a prosperous condition. Our hon. friends, in their wisdom, thought it good policy to undo the splendid structure that had been built up through the years under protection by casting in their lot with the United States, and opening up to them the markets of this splendid country. I am glad that the hon. gentleman has given us the opportunity of considering that question of reciprocity again, and I can only say that if it should be the desire of the Opposition to discuss with the people again the same subject the Government are prepared to take the issue to the people, and I have no doubt the result will be the same as it has been since 1878. We have had similar policies enunciated at different periods in our history since 1878, and they have been submitted to the people. It seems to me that hon. gentlemen opposite take the view that the people do not really know what they want. They have had the question tested before by an appeal to the people and the country has supported the policy of protection.

The present situation is an extraordinary one. Nothing like it has ever at any time faced us in this country, and as hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have expressed their views on financial affairs as they are now, they seem to want to impress on the country and to try to convince themselves—although I cannot believe that they are convinced—that the great war now raging is responsible only for the amount of money that we actually expend in aid of the military that we send to help the Mother Country. Surely hon. gentlemen opposite do not believe any such thing. Surely they do not believe that the conditions of war are not responsible for the decreasing revenues of this country, or that there are not losses to the country resulting from the war conditions in Europe which are entirely aside from the expenses that will be incurred in equipping the forces we are sending to the front. The failure of so many intelligent citizens to realize and appreciate the tremendous effect of this war on finance, commerce and industry throughout the whole world is to me surprising.

The world's population to-day is estimated at 1,620,000,000 people, and of these 925,000,000 reside in the countries and their colonies affected by this war. The total area of the globe, exclusive of the polar regions, is about 52,000,000 square miles, and of this the countries engaged in the war represent an area of 28,500,000 square miles. Five continents are engaged more or less in the fighting. The greatest wars of the past centuries were but trifling as compared with this mighty conflict. To-day armies aggregating 15,000,000 of the flower of the world's manhood have been summoned from field, forest, mine, and factory. The great armies of England, France, Germany, Austria and Russia are facing each other in deadly combat along a battle line of over 1,000 miles. The war has already cost $8,500,000,000, it having been in progress for six months, and that represents an expenditure of $17,000,000,000 a year, or $47,000,000 a day. The world's trade is estimated at $40,000,000,000, and of this total the nations at war and their colonies represent $25,000,000,000. The commerce and finance of the whole world are so closely related and interdependent that it might be said that the arteries of the whole world are as closely associated as the arteries of the human body, and yet with these conditions prevailing in the great countries of Europe hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House virtually tell us that these conditions are in no way responsible for the shrinking revenues. The war has driven the powerful German marine off the high seas, and the foreign trade of Germany, Austria and Belgium, representing 22 per cent of the trade of the whole world, has practically vanished. These countries did with our country, as well as with the United States, a large volume of trade. Importation from these countries has absolutely vanished. That, necessarily, must diminish the revenue of Canada. Many of the agencies of transportation have been destroyed. Trade routes being deranged, demoralization and partial destruction in every branch of commercial and industrial activity is in evidence. During the year England's exports decreased by $475,000,000 and her imports by $355,000,000 making a total decrease in her foreign trade of $830,000,000. Notwithstanding her enormous importation of food stuffs her imports in January last fell off $3,000,000 and her exports for the same month decreased $98,000,000. We know that in England large numbers of men have been withdrawn from the factory and the farm to fight in the trenches of France in defence of the Empire and that there is to some extent a dearth of labour in the larger factories and industries of England which are employed very fully at the present time. It is not surprising that it should be so. Belgium's trade of $1,500,000,000 is gone entirely and her fields are laid bare.

5 p.m.

Going back a little beyond the present conditions I asked a question of my hon. friend from Guysborough last night which he did not answer. The question was if my hon. friend did not know that a war existed in the year 1912 and that the conditions brought about by reason of the war were conditions that led to the stagnation and to the interruption of commercial activity throughout the whole world. I referred to the Balkan war. The Balkan war, was a live, active war in that year and as a result of that war $450,000,000 of the capital of the world was obliterated. The increased outlay by armaments for the war and the gradual rise in the world's standard of prices, were the chief factors contributing to the financial depression of the time being. If hon. gentlemen wanted to be fair they would not condemn the fiscal policy of this country which for so many years has justified its existence and has been the source of a large revenue, and a source of strength in the development of our many industries. They would not deride that policy which the public six or seven times had endorsed as the correct policy of this country, nor blame the policy of protection for the conditions that prevailed at that time, which, were, as hon. gentlemen must know, directly due to the world disturbance in finance and commerce. Reciprocity was the panacea suggested by my hon. friends. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) said last night:

> We all recognize that Canada is passing through a period of hard times. We may differ about the cause. Statesmen on this side of the House saw the depression coming prior to 1911, and they endeavoured to provide for it by opening new markets for Canadian products. Their efforts were frustrated, and Canada is having a taste of the depression that existed prior to 1896.

The hon. gentleman seemed at that time to have a vision of the future, a thing that hon. gentlemen opposite have not been troubled with in the past, because if they had that clear vision of what would come as the result of submitting that policy to the people of this country, they would have preferred the honour of serving their country as leaders in this House to going down to ignominious defeat as the result of submitting that policy to the people. If hon. gentlemen opposite wish to challenge the Government again on that issue, I am sure we shall be prepared to meet them in the country, and I have no doubt as to what the result will be when the question is submitted again to the people.

Our friends have to some extent derided the campaign, as we may call it, of patriotism and production. I have even heard hon. gentlemen, who are interested in matters of agriculture and who represent agricultural districts, ridicule this policy. It will be an unfortunate thing for this country if the time ever comes when a man engaged in agricultural production thinks there is nothing more to learn. I have the honour to represent a district which is peculiarly an agricultural one. In fact, I have not in the whole constituency even an incorporated village of any kind. My constituents are a very intelligent and progressive people. The Ontario Government has established in my county a district representative of the Department of Agriculture. It is the farmers who are progressive and enterprising, and who wish to be up-to-date who read the literature sent out and who attend the lectures that are given by that representative. A patriotism-and-production meeting was held in my district last month. At that meeting I learned from the district representative in our country of the splendid results obtained by our young men in what was called the acre-profit competition in the province of Ontario last year. In my own district, in the county of Middlesex, there were three farmers' sons, one of whom, as the result of the information he had obtained and the interest he had manifested in the lectures, was able in the competition to produce from one acre 501 bushels of potatoes, at a cost of $32.50, which were sold at 40 cents per bushel, giving a profit of $168 per acre. The other two boys from the same district were within ten bushels of these results. Each of those three boys produced an average of over $160 clear profit per acre as a result of the effort they had put forth in intensive production. The campaign, as the matter has been laid before the people, is encouraging them, not so much to a greater acreage as to a better production. The great problem is that of labour. Until that problem can be solved it will be difficult to increase production. The farmers of our country are working late and early, and are unable to procure sufficient labour. Notwithstanding that, I do not think any one denies that it is quite within the bounds of possibilities to apply more science to the development of agriculture, and by that, and by a little better tillage, to produce larger results on the same acreage.

There are three ways in which a farmer can increase production: first, by the application of increased labour; secondly, by the application of more intelligent and scientific methods, and thirdly, by application of increased capital. I do not say that these three are entirely independent of each other. On the contrary, they are very closely connected. No one of them can be applied by itself alone. Each carries with it the necessity in some measure of both of the others. Pure bred stock, tile drains, improved buildings —all these things make for better production and essential pre-requisites for them is capital. The tendency of the whole financial world is to draw capital away from the farms. We find in all the small towns the banks establishing branches. The object of this is to collect the savings of the farmers and to distribute them in the commercial centres, applying the money to commerce and industry. This is the natural thing to do but works injury to farmers themselves who used increased capital for their operations. It cannot be denied, however, that agriculture is awakening to higher and to greater possibilities. The situation within the Empire in this world crisis calls upon our people for increased production. The people in this country are largely responding to that call. To fulfil these requirements, to meet the urgent demands of the Empire, the present need is for a large increase in the amount of capital available for rural credit on conditions suitable for agricultural enterprises? What in view of the situation is required? What can be suggested by way of remedy? It is an economic certainty that every enterprise promptly responds to the magic touch of prosperity. Let the farmer have an experience of this, and you will see agriculture expand. Better returns to the farmer need not mean higher prices to the consumer owing to improved marketing, improved methods of transportation and storage facilities, not operated in the interest of the railways and the middleman, but in the interests of the producers and consumers. If scientific production is a good thing, then why not scientific marketing and scientific distribution? We cannot enlarge our farming activities unless the means to supply the capital is provided.

The question of credit for farmers is one which I think is of greatest importance. This is one of the problems that, I hope, this Government will be able to meet. We are told, when a subject of this kind is presented, that it offers difficulties. But in spite of the difficulties the situation has been grappled with in the United States. A movement was commenced over a year ago to meet the growing needs for extended rural credits. A commission was appointed under the authority of Congress to go abroad and make a study of this whole matter, especially the organization and operation of rural credit associations in Europe. On its return the commission made a report, and, as a result, a Bill was introduced in both Houses of Congress embodying the ideas and plans of this commission. This is called the Moss-Fletcher Bill. The McCumber Rural Credit Bill was later introduced as an alternative plan; and finally the Bulkley-Hollis Bill, an amendment to the Agricultural Appropriation Bill, was the one which met the approval of the Banking and Commerce Committee of the Senate and was reported to the House of Representatives by a committee of that body. So the Bill has made good advance.

Some plan should be devised to enable farmers to organize co-operative credit associations throughout Canada with the assistance of the Government given under proper safeguards. The matter would imply using of the credit of the Government in a business-like way to reduce the enormous interest the farmers now have to pay. The great difference between the credit required for farmers and the credit required for ordinary commercial purposes is that the farmer requires a loan for a longer period than the ordinary commercial or industrial loan is expected to run. The application for credit should be supported by the Government in such a way as will give to the farmer, under proper safeguards, the assistance of the Government. That, to my mind, will go further to solve the problem of production and the problem of labour on the farm than anything else. It is of primary importance, above all other things. The interests of the farmer imperatively demand that we should have legislation extending direct Government aid to the tiller of the soil. Cases have come within my own observation, and in my own township, of farmers with a large area of grazing land, but without the capital to buy the necessary stock, and so their land goes to waste. I have seen more failures, I think, directly as a result of the want of capital to carry on the work of farming than from any other cause affecting my own district. I do not say that there are many who are in that unfavourable position. In fact they are comparatively few, because the farmers of that district are progressive. And I find that the most progressive farmers there are those who do not sell their grain at the first price the market will give them after threshing, but they feed that grain to the stock on the farm, and so, as they say, their grain leaves the farm on the hoof. These are the men who are making a success of farming in our district.

Now, I have said there are difficulties in this matter. They have had difficulties to face in their efforts to solve this question in the United States. Sam Warren defines difficulty as being only a word indicating the degree of strength requisite for accomplishing particular objects; a mere notice of the necessity for exertion; a bugbear to children and fools, but only a stimulus to men. There may be difficulties surrounding this question, but I believe that the more the problem is pressed upon the Government, the sooner a way will be found to solve it. I believe that Agriculture should be the most important department of the whole Government. We have our experimental farms, as we call them, in different parts of the country. And while these accomplish a good deal, in my humble opinion, the system of appointing district representatives in the various communities where they can become practically the agriculturists' doctors, right among the farmers themselves, is accomplishing a great r measure of good even than the work of the experimental farms. I hope the time will come when agriculture will be deemed of so much importance in this country that in every county at least, if not in every township, we may have a demonstration farm right in the midst of our people, which can be carried on with profit, and which will arouse the interest of the farmers in the most up-to-date and scientific methods of agriculture.

It has been stated, and it seems most unfortunate if true, that in Ontario, notwithstanding the enormous production of that province, they are not producing half of what the farms are capable of producing. I have given a good deal of thought to this matter and have discussed it with our representative including hon. gentlemen who are here representing constituentencies in the great West and who are endeavouring to make a good living out of farming in that country. I believe the time will come when they will follow the information that can be given in their agricultural schools in their several districts, and when the farmers there will not sell their oats at 25 cents a bushel and their barley at 30 and 35 cents, nor will they sell their wheat at the ridiculously low prices that have prevailed, but will feed their grain to stock and send it off on the hoof so that a twenty-five cent bushel of oats will represent a dollar or a dollar and ten cents before it leaves the farmer's hands. Our friends on the other side constantly complain of the tariff. But I believe the time will come when they will get interested in these lines. When the great West becomes a leading industrial district the demand from that country for extensive changes in the tariff will entirely disappear.

In regard to the patriotism and production campaign throughout the country, I desire to say a word though the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) is not here. I would respectfully say that I think the campaign would have been productive of even better results if the advertising campaign had preceded the meetings. I believe that the information gathered by the Department of Agriculture and issued in bulletins from time to time does not accomplish its full purpose, because the means of distribution is not what it should be. We have discussed this in the agricultural committee of this House and have not been able to suggest a method which would give the best distribution for this literature which, properly distributed, would be so valuable to the farmers of this country. I have thought, and still think, that it would be a good plan if bound catalogues of the publications of the department were in every rural reading library throughout the country. Then the man who is interested in live stock, the man who is interested in horticulture, the man who is interested in field crops, may send for the particular literature dealing with the special branch of agriculture he is particularly interested in.

I want to touch briefly on the matter of reciprocity, because that subject may, perchance, be a live issue when another appeal is made to the people. The inconsistency of hon. gentlemen opposite in connection with this matter is amusing. I have a clipping from the Winnipeg Telegram in which reciprocity is recommended because eggs in Minneapolis are only 29 cents a dozen while in Winnipeg they are from 35 to 45 cents a dozen; because butter in Minneapolis is from 29 to 34 cents a pound, while in Winnipeg it is from 30 to 40 cents a pound. In the last reciprocity campaign hon. gentlemen opposite attempted to convince the people of cities and industrial communities on the one hand that the effect of reciprocity would be to lower to them the prices of these commodities, and on the other hand, that the farmer would get a better market on the other side for his produce. Hon. gentlemen were so inconsistent in the matter of reciprocity that they could not interest the people in it. It has been said that protection is foolish, and that if it were abandoned the country would be better off. But if it were not for the duties which keep them away, would American capital and American manufacturers invest half a billion dollars in establishing industries all over our country? Almost every member of this House has within his own constituency evidence of the fact that American manufacturers are establishing branches in Canada. My hon. friend the member for North Essex (Mr. Wilcox) probably knows better than any one else what the effect of reciprocity would be upon the large industrial district of which his constituency is a part. You cannot convince the farmers of that district that the markets of Detroit are better for his produce than the home market. He has the big markets of London, Toronto, and other places, and to these markets, taking advantage of the protection which he is afforded, he may ship his vegetables and other produce. The automobile industry in my hon. friend's constituency has grown to enormous proportions; notwithstanding the financial pressure which exists at the present time, it is expanding rapidly. The question naturally resolves itself into an inquiry as to what would be the benefit of reciprocity to the farmers. It has been repeated time and again—and it certainly must be evident to any hon. gentleman in this House—that a market that produces a surplus of 300,000,000 bushels of wheat cannot be the natural market for the products of this country.

I believe that hon. gentlemen opposite look upon the Globe as orthodox. I have a clipping from that journal of the issue of February 13, which says:

> The price of Canadian wheat is fixed not in Winnipeg but in Liverpool. The price of cattle and hogs on this side of the border cannot long remain materially above that of food animals in the United States. The value of Canadian cheese is set by the volume of consumption in the trenches of Flanders and the mills of Lancashire.

In the same editorial the Globe deals with the question of radial railways, which is a project with which I have a good deal of sympathy. It says:

> If the farmer needs radial railways and better roads to help him in marketing, the Government should come to his aid in organizing such services. Even the social side of farm life might be benefited greatly by united effort. Whatever is needed to turn the stream of settlement to the land should be done cheerfully and with the good-will of all classes of the community. Ontario's prosperity, like that of the Dominion at large, must spring from the presence on the farms of contented and prosperous food producers.

Under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite the people of this country had this matter presented to them practically every year under a different name, but on each and every occasion they turned it down. There is no doubt that there was in the mind of our great neighbour to the south another object than that of trade expansion. One could quote hundreds of sayings taken from the American press which really represented the true and inward view of the people of the United States at that time. The following newspaper extract deals with ex-President Taft's views on the subject:

The world price of wheat and the other principal grains grown in this country is, as the president truthfully maintains, fixed, not in the United States, but abroad, where the surplus from this continent is disposed of. Canadian wheat is wanted, he says, as grist for the Minneapolis millers, whose plant has a capacity 35 per cent greater than what is needed to grind the wheat of the United States. "Canadian wheat can," he said. "be imported and ground into flour without materially reducing the demand for or price of United States wheat, and the surplus will be sent abroad as flour."

If this is the whole effect of the free entry of our wheat into the United States, how are our farmers to benefit? The president confesses that the arrangement is in the interest of United States flour manufacturers grinding for the export trade.

Canadian flour manufacturers also grind for the export trade, and the markets to which their product goes are the same as those to which the Minneapolis output goes.

But the president sees one result that will be of material benefit to all the farmers in the United States.

He saw a result that would benefit the United States, but if you take something from the farmers of Canada and give it to the farmers of the United States, then you deprive our farmers of their rights. The editorial goes on to say:

Live stock men and dairy farmers there will get the benefit of the bran and shorts that are by-products of the flour made in Minneapolis mills from Canadian wheat.

And, of course, if United States farmers gain those advantages, Canadian farmers will lose them.

The President's view as to prices was emphasized by the following remarks which he made on the subject:

But I do think that reciprocity will enlarge the reservoir or the supply of farm products for our people, and thus prevent undue enhancement of prices beyond the present standard. If this be the case, then neither the farmer will be injured nor will prices increase.

The following words of the ex-President are very significant:

"I always feel an impatience, perhaps an unreasonable one, in having to argue the questions of schedules with reference to the advantage of the reciprocity agreement with Canada, because it seems to be that the reasons for adopting it are deeper and wider than are to be found in comparison of percentages and rates with respect to special localities and special businesses."

Another clipping which I took from the Southern Lumber Journal, sets out very clearly the intent or expectation of the worthy President of that day. It is as follows:

Be that as it may, the people of the United States through their representatives in Congress and the United States Senate should straight-a-way demand that negotiations be instituted without delay by Secretary of State Knox for the peaceable annexation of Canada; but, for annexation, if it should have to come about through conquest. If there is any virtue in the reciprocity treaty as ratified by the United States Congress and signed by the president some days ago, it is to be found in the fact that this instrument lays the foundation stone for the annexation of a country that should have long since been a part of the United States.

President Taft and the advocates of this measure have made this plain in many of their speeches and addresses on this subject.

Whatever the United States goes gunning for she usually lands, and history is ever repeating itself. For instance we might cite Cuba, the Phillipines and other instances of conquest and practical annexation during the past few years. These are but illustrations of what we can do when we try. We are to-day the first and greatest country among the nations of the earth, and with Canada and her wonderful resources added to our already world-wide and all powerful assets, we could easily say "peace be still" and make the other nations of the world come and go at our beck and call. . . .

What would have been impossible and out of the question a few years ago, may now be considered within easy reach.

The great Liberal party of the Dominion of Canada standing behind this proposal of reciprocity which was a veiled effort from their standpoint for annexation:

National and international lines are likely to be upset in many places on the world's map before another decade.

They were prophets that time. Literature of that kind and articles of this manner were cast broadcast before the people of the United States. It is the custom of hon. gentlemen opposite to look at the blue and dismal side of everything, and we have had examples of that during this debate. According to them, this country is in a deplorable condition. This reckless, extravagant Government has brought it to this position. My hon. friend who has just sat down, referred to the increase in the Civil Service. Why, in Great Britain the Civil Service Estimates increased from £29,000,000 in 1907 to £55,000,000 in 1914, and the Estimates for the present year are a million and a half pounds greater than those of last year. Whatever may be the cause, with all the prosperity of commerce and business and development, and with all the wealth that our Mother Country boasts, they have found it necessary to increase their Civil Service in keeping with the development of their country. I do not think our hon. friends have been fair in their criticism of the Civil Service administration. The hon. minister tried to explain from time to time that many recent appointments to office, resignations and dismissals, represented those temporarily appointed. We all know that, for example, in connection with surveys and public works during the summer men are engaged for five or six months and then quietly retire from the service.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does not the hon. gentleman think that if these gentlemen he speaks of were gentlemen who were dismissed at the end of six months they would appear on the other side of the account? We have from the various departments a number of appointments and dismissals. If a man were appointed for six months and relieved from the service no doubt his name would appear as a dismissal.

Mr. GLASS: That explanation was given by the minister, but I would answer my hon. friend's question by asking him this one. Will the hon. gentleman say that to his knowledge there are at the present time 10,000 more civil servants than there were in 1911?

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am going wholly by the return placed on the table of the House by the Government.

Mr. GLASS: The returns do not show that. I know it is very easy to twist or rearrange figures to suit a purpose.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The fact is that the returns show a larger number, for 515 additional officers in the Marine and Fisheries Department are not included in that 10,000, and we have not yet heard from the Department of Militia. In addition to that, the return only covers about two years.

Mr. GLASS: I have not made any particular study of this, and I was only stating the figures given me by my hon. friend. But I think that if my hon. friend wanted to be fair and to give the proper information to this House, he would endeavour to find out from the Department. The fair comparison would be not the increase in appointments but the increase in the number of employees now in actual service. That comparison would be a proper and fair one; if the increase were unreasonably large in proportion to the increase and development of the work in the departments there might be some cause for criticism, but there is no ground for criticism along the lines my hon. friends have pursued. This gloomy picture that is painted of our country and the conditions that exist here is not justified by the actual results as shown in the buoyant statements of the banks, with their large reserves and deposits, and also in the statements from loan companies and insurance companies. Under the existing circumstances there has been a surprising growth in our railway earnings and remarkable improvement in the bank balances and clearings. All along the line the tide seems to have turned. On the 30th of January the banks of this country had a total paid-up capital and reserve of $227,203,192. The deposits in the chartered banks in Canada were $996,877,212, the deposits elsewhere were $91,807,007, making a total of deposits of $1,088,684,219. But the increase in the deposits for January over the corresponding month in the year 1914 is very striking. These are things that come close to us and are indications of improved conditions. The increase in the amount of deposits this year over January, 1914, was $21,929,917. In addition to the capital invested in these banks, our loan companies have a paid-up capital of $59,700,000. I have not the figures of reserves of loan companies but in many cases the reserve exceeds the paid-up capital and I do not think I would be very far mis-stating the fact if I said that the reserves were equal to the paid-up capital. We have invested in our manufacturing industries in this country $1,247,583,609; in railways $2,250,000,000; in canals $102,000,000. Our factory output amounted to $1,600,000,000, and the wages in our factories to $241,000,000. These figures are for 1910. The returns for this year show large increases over them. It does not look to me as though this country were in a deplorable condition financially, and I think that all along the line the tendency is towards improvement.

Hon. gentlemen complain about the cost of the administration of the Post Office Department in Canada. I find upon investigation that even in the United States the total revenue of the post office from 1865, the time of the civil war, to 1913, was $3,775,000,000 and the cost of operation for the same period was $4,555,000,000. There was that difference between the revenue and the cost of operating the Post Office Department of that great country. From 1884 until 1914 there have been almost constant deficits in the Post Office Department of that country. In 1902 the deficit amounted to $2,961,169, and in 1909 to $17,479,770. The aggregate deficit in the United States Post Office revenue from 1884 to 1914 reached the enormous total of $210,544,802, or an average yearly deficit of $7,797,955. That is in the great country south of us, with their much more dense population than that of Canada and their enormous revenue. Looking at that record we have reason to be proud of the administration of the Post Office Department in Canada.

The development of the parcel post system and of rural mail delivery has been a matter of very great interest to the farmers of this country. I do not know that any department of this Government has ever had to undertake a matter more difficult or complex than the arranging of rural mail routes throughout this country. The work has been done well. From the district I represent, a pretty large area, I have not received a single complaint of the service that has been given by the department. When we want to get an estimate of the prosperity of this country we sometimes look at the annual bank reports. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that the present condition of the country is due to the gross extravagance of this Government. Let me read from the proceedings of the annual meeting of the Royal Bank of Canada which was held on January 8, 1914. Mr. E. F. B. Johnston, K.C., in seconding the adoption of the report, said:

> Personally, I have great confidence in the vigour and elasticity of Canada and its people. Compared with many other countries, people in Canada do not know what hard times mean. The fact is that financial stringency in Canada is generally caused by over-prosperity. Many business men of Canada during the past two or three years have been doing $200 of business on $100 capital. If they had confined their business relatively in volume to the amount of capital they had invested in it, they would not be hard up.

He goes on:

> We may ask on an occasion like the present: What of the future? I am very sanguine as regards Canada. Let us look at some of the evidences of prosperity which are laid before us:

Then after giving certain figures in regard to England, he says:

> Coming to our own country, we find a pronounced feeling of hopefulness. From every province comes the voice of prosperity.

That was the optimistic opinion expressed of the conditions in the fall of 1913 by the director of one of our banks at that time. The Minister of Finance too, when the Budget of 1914 was brought down in this House, was considerably optimistic as to the future of Canada; for then, neither he nor any one else knew of the great conflict that was lurking in the rear. Let me now turn to the annual meeting of the Royal Bank which was held on January 14, 1915. Sir Herbert Holt, the president, in moving the adoption of the report, said:

> The outbreak of war was followed by a convulsive derangement of international exchange and general trade. Stock exchanges were closed, in many countries a moratorium was proclaimed, and a financial catastrophe of world-wide proportions was only averted by the wise and timely action of the British Government in providing through the Bank of England, powerful machinery for sustaining and protecting credit during the war, and for twelve months after peace is concluded. Much credit is due to the Canadian Minister of Finance for the emergency measures so promptly introduced to protect the situation in Canada. The efficiency of these is demonstrated by the fact that the business of the country has pursued its ordinary course, and we enjoy the distinction of requiring no recourse to a general moratorium.

And further on, he says:

> Having no misgivings regarding the final outcome of the war, we venture the prediction that its economic effect upon Canada will be beneficial, although the magnitude of the struggle is without precedent. Previous wars during the past half century (namely, the war of Prussia against Austria in 1886, and against France in 1870, the South African war and the Russo-Japanese war) were all followed by active and expanding trade, but in each case, only two countries were engaged, as against the inclusion of nearly all Europe on the present occasion.... If the present war be long-continued, the European nations involved may become financially prostrated for many years. Even if the war is not long-continued, the flow of capital from Great Britain to this country is not likely to be resumed for a considerable time, and new constructional work will therefore be retarded. On the other hand, we reap distinct commercial advantages from our geographical position and remoteness from the scene of warfare, which permit us to prosecute our farming and manufacturing industries unmolested in spite of our participation in the conflict.

That is the opinion of the president of the Royal Bank. I have said before that I believe the time will come when our industries in the great West will be so developed that they will impress even our friends in the West that our home market, which industries alone can build up, is a matter of some interest to them; and when that time comes we shall not hear so much of the cry for free trade. I should like to give the House some figures taken from the report of the Royal Bank, from which I have already quoted, giving the number of factories in this country by provinces, the capital employed, employees, salaries and wages, and the value of products.

1913—	Establishments.	Capital.	Employees.	Salaries and Wages.	Value of Products.
Alberta	334	$ 34,166,900	8,079	$ 5,052,530	$ 21,747,275
British Columbia	748	142,404,000	38,558	19,955,400	75,473,700
Manitoba	505	55,491,000	20,053	12,630,800	62,126,500
New Brunswick	1,329	41,814,700	28,654	9,623,400	41,000,900
Nova Scotia	1,702	92,137,800	33,336	12,303,000	61,007,100
Ontario	9,201	689,168,540	276,430	136,174,500	671,130,000
Prince Edward Island.	508	2,330,000	4,354	614,600	3,618,500
Quebec	7,592	378,441,000	183,124	80,368,600	406,167,950
Saskatchewan	199	8,125,000	3,761	2,240,970	7,329,300
	22,118	$1,444,078,940	596,349	$278,963,800	$1,349,601,225

The total value of the products from all the factories was $1,349,601,225. Those figures show how this country has prospered under the tariff, and I do not think they furnish any reason for discouraging our optimism. I have said that the evidence all round shows that conditions in this country are not deplorable. In Winnipeg last year, in spite of the adverse conditions, 91 charters were obtained for industries, and 22 new industries were established in that city. Twenty-four of the companies that obtained charters had a capital of from forty to sixty thousand dollars; 24 a capital of from eighty thousand to one hundred thousand dollars; 6 a capital of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and 8 a capital of one million dollars. The prospects in that section of the country for the coming year are most encouraging. Since 1913 a great many more acres have been brought under cultivation, and the area under crop this year will be very much larger than last year. But, estimating the crop for next year on the basis of the area under cultivation in 1913, the value of the crop, at present prices, would be $293,281,218, as against $94,604,616 in 1913.

The estimated increased production and price of wheat alone for the coming year will be more than three times what they were in 1913.

A Conservative estimate of the oats, barley, flax, hay, live stock and dairy production, in which the prices for oats are placed at an advance of 100 per cent, barley at 100 per cent, hay at an advance of 30 per cent, with dairy products, live stock and flax unchanged, implies an increase in the returns to the farmers of the west of something like $88,206,758, as compared with a return in 1913 of $63,816,307.

This article goes on to say that

It is reasonable evidence that the farmers' crops for 1915 ought to approximate in value to him something like $381,487,976.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GLASS (resuming): Before the House took recess, I was endeavouring to point out conditions as they exist at the present time, and to show that from all evidences Canada has more reason for optimism than for pessimism. The condition of transportation companies, the improvement of banking conditions and trade generally point to a hopeful outlook. Hon members of the Opposition have endeavoured in the course of their arguments to impress upon us the necessity for economy at such a time as this, but I do not know that they are any more impressed with the need for economy than are the members of the Government. It is simply a matter of difference of opinion as to the best way in which to conduct the affairs of the country at this time. If one wants to see the dark side of a question, it is quite easy to exaggerate conditions. I have here a clipping from the Globe under date of March 5, 1915, only five days ago, which says:

Economy is contagious. Talk of hard times, whether warranted or not, is certain to cause a tightening of purse-strings. That industrial corporations not injured but aided by the war have reduced wages is a natural though a lamentable development, the glut of the labour market making it possible. The encouragement toward business as usual will have but little influence on men who see a chance of increased profits by improving opportunities, but there is no ground for a general tendency toward personal economy by those who do not fell any pressure in that direction. Farmers have not lost their market by the war, and so far as prices have been affected the tendency has been upward. Their position, so far as production and returns are concerned, has been improved. But it is worthy of note, and perhaps to be regretted, that they have been affected by the contagion of the economy irresistibly forced on many city workers. Instead of more freely patronizing mercantile and industrial establishments in accordance with the better markets they are enjoying, the farmers have been inclined to fall into line with the prevailing habit.

The prosperity of agriculture is a matter for congratulation. The farmer has borne the heavy end of the load, and it is always cause for general satisfaction when he comes into his own. Our dependence on him is revealed and confessed in the request that he increase his output. The individual farmer, knowing how ignorant the wisest adviser must be regarding the personal considerations surrounding the operation of his farm, may resent advice as to methods or general operations. But the advice to enjoy the good things within reach and extend liberal patronage to other industries now feeling depression may be regarded from a broader outlook. The farmer has no ground for fearing the influence of the war. His business can never be ruined. He may be injured by taxation or by the obstruction of trade routes, but the world will continue to demand all he can produce. In the matter of markets he has nothing to fear. It is in the interest of the province and the Dominion at large that the farmers fully enjoy the prosperity that has fallen to them through the necessities of an unprecedented situation. By thus benefiting themselves they will confer a still wider benefit on their fellow-citizens now, in many cases, sadly in need.

Agriculture is the great basic industry of Canada, and its products yield practically $1,000,000,000 a year. At a time like this, when the demand for gold is so great, and when the impossibility of increasing our borrowings is so evident, the fact that the farmers of this country can produce from the soil products to the value of $1,000,000,000, is a matter of congratulation and should dissipate all pessimism.

Before recess, speaking of the development of the business of this country under our wise and prudent tariff policy, I said that this country was justified in adopting that policy by the experience of countries in Europe and on this side of the Atlantic which had adopted protection. The wealth of all the countries of the world has grown enormously during the past century. Sir George Paish, who is an authority on statistics, says that the wealth of the United Kingdom in 1814 was computed at $12,500,000,000, while a conservative estimate would place it now at about $85,000,000,000, or an increase of about 580 per cent, while its population has grown 130 per cent. The income of the British people has increased 700 per cent—from $1,500,000,000 to $12,000,000,000. We all admit that the United Kingdom has prospered under free trade to a degree which must be gratifying to that nation, and the colonies take just pride in that prosperity. For the sake of comparison I want to point out that the wealth of the United States in the same period has increased from about $1,750,000,000 to something like $150,000,000,000, or nearly 8,500 per cent; and the income of the people has risen from less than $500,000,000 to about $35,000,000,000 a year, a matter of 6,500 per cent. To those who uphold the doctrine of free trade we admit that it has done in Britain what protection has done to a larger extent in this country. If the nation to the south of us, following along on the lines of protection, has built up such powerful industries and has so developed its factories, and has increased its wealth to such an extent as is shown by these figures, we feel that the conditions that prevail in the United States should prevail in Canada and that it is our duty to protect our Canadian workmen. We have evidences everywhere of the benefits of protection. A clipping I have here shows how necessary it is for the large factories in the United States to establish factories in Canada.

"Our company is now incorporating in Canada and will build a factory at Toronto," said Mr. Booth to-day, "simply because our tariff policy is wrong. Canada is a great, aggressive vitalizing country commercially and a great market. It is naturally a commercial unit with the United States, but tariff walls separate the two countries, and we are forced to go to Canada with a factory to escape the Canadian products without asking for reciprocal advantage in their markets for 30 to 35 per cent burden their tariff imposes. Meanwhile, the Wilson administration is proposing to open our markets to our manufacturers."

That is a condition which existed some time ago. We know that Governor Foss in the state of Massachusetts, in appealing to his people, drew particular attention to the fact that $500,000,000 of American capital had been invested in industries in Canada because they were compelled to come to this country to obtain the market of which they were deprived by reason of the tariff of Canada against them. I do not see how, with such evidence before us, there can be any ground for arguing that this policy has not been a good policy for our country.

My hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) in his closing remarks made one or two observations to which I wish to refer. I am surprised that my hon. friend should draw any comparison between the conditions under which the contingent was sent to fight for the Mother Country in South Africa in 1899 and the conditions under which the immense body of troops was organized to assist the Empire in the present crisis. I am surprised also that he should refer as he did to the efforts of the Militia Department in the organization of the camp at Valcartier. It is quite possible that, with the short time at the disposal of the department and the very extraordinary conditions that existed, mistakes may have been made in connection with that camp, but I think it 'is a tribute to the capacity of this department of the Government, and of the Government itself, that so enormous a camp should have been organized in so short a time, gathering men from the four quarters of this great country, equipping them, and sending them out within the space of a few weeks. I had the pleasure of visiting the camp myself, and was very much impressed with the wonderful executive ability and energy displayed and with the wonderful things accomplished in so short a time. The contingent for South Africa, to which my hon. friend alluded, and which he compared with the contingents that the Government is sending forward to-day, consisted, if my recollection serves me well, of about three thousand men. I do not know how many trained regular soldiers we have in the country at this time, or how many we had at that time, but I think that a draft of men could have been made at twenty-four hours' notice from the regulars stationed in barracks of the Dominion at that time, and there would be no reason why that contingent should not have sailed within a week of mobilization. Aside from that, we know that at that time the sea was not menaced with hostile ships. In the present case, it took a considerable time to get our men across the ocean. We know that care was necessary, and that the Government showed its wisdom in taking precautions against molestation by pirate submarines or enemy battleships on their way across the sea. It is a tribute to the power of the British navy, as well as to the organization completed here, that so large a number of men—I understand the largest body of armed men that up to that time had ever been transported across the Atlantic, were carried in safety. And to-day they are in the trenches, fighting for Canada and for the Motherland. We realize that this war is no more the war of the Empire than it is the war of Canada. We do not regard ourselves as fighting England's battles, but as fighting our own battles. And if there is one thing on which this country and the Empire are to be congratulated more than anything else, it is that Britain's command of the sea enables commerce to cross and re-cross absolutely unmolested. If we have so little commercial disturbance in our country to-day it is due directly to the power that the British navy wields. In view of the protection that has been afforded us not only now but in former times and that has thrown its sheltering arm around our country, we are responsive to the call of duty, which is the call of privilege, to serve the Mother Country in this trying time.

My hon. friend from Guysborough also referred to the British preference. I would like to ask hon. gentlemen opposite who do not see eye to eye with us in this matter how they can logically oppose the increase of the preference unless they oppose increase in the duty on raw materials. The revenue has to be raised, and they concede, I believe—I do not see how they can refuse to concede—that we must have raw materials for our industries. A small duty must be paid on those materials in order to produce revenue. Now, in Great Britain raw materials are free, though they come from the four quarters of the globe. Would it be just to our manufacturers here to propose that they should pay a tax of 7½ per cent on raw materials and allow the manufacturers of England, who have their raw materials free, to send their products here to compete with our labour? In other words, is it reasonable that we should put a handicap of 7½ per cent on our manufacturers? Even if it were said that the handicap is not so great, the best that can be said is that while the increase is generally 7½ per cent the increase under the preference is 5 per cent. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been trying to draw a red herring across the trail on this subject of the preference. I think the Finance Minister put the matter very well yesterday when he defined "preference" when he said that a preference was an advantage given to one country over competing countries in the markets of another country.

The net result of the increase in the British preference is that to the extent of 2½ per cent Britain is given a greater advantage over foreign competitors in the Canadian market than she had before. I do not think for one moment that there will be any criticism of this increase in the old land; nor do I think that there is any just reason why hon. gentlemen opposite should criticise it here. Evidently their only reason for doing so is to attempt to prejudice the minds of the people by asserting that we are fighting the Mother Country with tariffs while our men are fighting in the trenches. If we had taken any action other than that which has been taken, I am sure it would have been a gross injustice to the manufacturers of this country.

I have watched with very much interest the course taken by hon. members of the Opposition for many years past, and I have observed that they have never been exactly in unison on the tariff question. Their attitude in that respect reminds me very much of a tug-of-war, twelve men on each side, pulling a rope in different directions. If six of the twelve on one side should desert and pull for the other side, I fancy they would picture very vividly the attitude of hon. gentlemen of the Opposition with regard to trade and tariffs: one section pulling for protection, another for exemption from taxation in respect of matters in which they are particularly interested; another for free trade. We have to get away from these conditions; we have to get away from provincialism in tariff matters. The policy this Government proposes to pursue is to adopt —as indeed, they have adopted—a national tariff which shall benefit all people in all parts of our country. I thought the designation "mixed pickles," given by a newspaper to the wants of the Liberal party, was very good. I will read the article; it is entitled, "A Catalogue of Liberal Wants":

An extension of public enterprise to help mitigate conditions of unemployment. The cessation of all expenditures on public works. A generous assistance in money and men to carry on the war. No additional taxation. A wider success for the made-in-Canada campaign. Free trade and direct taxation. No taxation for other than war-purposes.

These wants are just about as consistent as the opinions of hon. gentlemen with respect to trade and tariff matters.

There has been a falling off in immigration; let us examine this question for a moment and endeavour to ascertain how we stand in the matter of immigration as compared with other countries. I have the following clipping taken from the Winnipeg Telegram of a few days ago:

War has in great measure checked the flow of immigration from Europe to America.

I presume our friends would say that the reason for this check is due to the tariff policy of this Government. (Reading):

It is true that a partial check, owing to the commercial depression, common to the American continent, had taken place before the outbreak of hostilities, but the most marked decrease has become evident since the beginning of August. Nor while the present conflict is maintained is there any possibility of a reversion to former conditions, but rather a still further falling off.

Canada has not suffered more than the United States. In the latter country the decrease in immigration from Europe for 1914 was 45 per cent, or well over half a million.

If this statement is correct I see no reason why our tariff policy should be condemned, because so far as immigration is concerned we are not in so bad a condition as our friends across the line.

I have said that figures can prove almost anything; I believe they can be changed to substantiate arguments which would not otherwise be capable of proof. The total immigration into this country from 1911 to 1914 was 1,141,957. From 1897 to 1910 it was 1,575,029. It will appear, therefore, that the immigration for three years under the present Government amounted to almost as much as it did during the first fourteen years of the administration of the late Government. The immigration policy which our friends of the Opposition had adopted—praise and credit is due them for this—was commencing to bring results; the greater part of the immigration which took place under their administration came in during the latter part of that period of fourteen years. For the ten years from 1897 to 1906, the first ten years of their administration, the total immigration was 832,383. From 1896 to 1911 the immigration was 1,142,788. The flow of immigration into this country had commenced to slacken before the present war. Why? By reason of the Balkan war to which I have previously referred. Our friends opposite seem entirely to forget that the Balkan war of 1912 was largely responsible for the conditions which prevailed in this country during the year 1913. Those who wish to be fair in their criticisms and who have confidence in the assertions of the financiers of Europe and of this country, realize that the direct cause of the industrial stagnation and interruption of commercial activity in 1913 was due to the Balkan war. War does not create capital; it destroys it; and one of the results of the Balkan war was that a total of $450,000,000 was wiped out and withdrawn from the world's capital.

I could present to the House a great many reasons why, having regard to the circumstances, we should be gratified with the manner in which the affairs of the country are being administered at the present time, but they are so palpably apparent to any student of present conditions that I am sure there is no reason why I should present them.

If we are true to ourselves, if we do our full duty to our country, we will not go about whining about hard times. There is no country under heaven to-day that has greater reason for self congratulation and thankfulness for the conditions prevailing in it than Canada. In the providence of God it is to be hoped that this horrible war may be brought to a speedy and satisfactory conclusion. The sooner peace comes the sooner trade and commerce will be restored to normal conditions. Whatever the future may hold, the people of this country will meet the problems that will arise fearlessly, as in the days gone by. We will march on to our destiny side by side with the great country to the south of us, building up a nation on the northern half of this continent that will be worthy of and true to the traditions of the great British Empire. I have often thought in connection with this great war of the immortal words of Tennyson in his call to the colonies:

> Sharers of our glorious past,
> Brothers, must we part at last?
> Shall we not, through good and ill,
> Cleave to one another still?
>
> Britain's myriad voices call:
> Sons, be welded, each and all,
> Into one imperial whole,
> One with Britain, heart and soul—
> One life, one flag, one fleet, one throne.

May that be our destiny.

Mr. W. S. LOGGIE (Northumberland, New Brunswick): Mr. Speaker, I followed with very much interest the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Middlesex (Mr. Glass). He made a very moderate speech, somewhat lengthy perhaps, but that of course is to be pardoned. He touched on many matters which to my mind are hardly relevant to the discussion of this Budget. He referred, among other things, to the reciprocal trade proposals that were before the country in 1911. He anticipated that that might be a live issue in the coming election. I may tell the hon. gentleman that in my judgment it will not be an issue in the coming election. Conditions have changed since it was a live issue. So far as the maritime provinces are concerned, we appreciate very highly the reduction of tariff made by the United States. It has been a great boon to the producing interests of the maritime provinces. It has enabled the producer to earn a very much better livelihood than ever before. The pockets of the producers have been very much enriched because of it and I do hope that although we may be compelled under the present circumstances to put an increased duty on natural products from the United States, our friends across the line will not change their tariff which is so favourable to our Canadian interests, especially in natural products. The hon. gentleman has asked if it would be justice to put a duty of 7½ per cent on raw material coming from the United States or a foreign country into Canada to be manufactured in Canada, and not put a corresponding duty on the manufactured article. The hon. gentleman must not forget that at the present time the manufacturer has an extra duty over and above the 7½ per cent, ranging from 20 per cent to 30 per cent; and with reasonable facilities and with capital procurable at a not unreasonable rate of interest, there is no reason why manufacturers in this country should not compete successfully with such a duty as this in their favour.

If the Minister of Finance were in his seat it would give me very much pleasure to convey to him my congratulations on the Budget which he presented to the House. It also would give me very much pleasure to say that I would have been glad to have been here to listen to that address. I regret that I was not able to be here, and the reason I assign for not being able to be here is the war. I am quite sure if I were asked to establish that, I could establish it with as much success as has attended the attempt which has been made to establish that a customs duty applied for current revenue is a war tax. Let me join hands with the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House in saying to the Government that they have our hearty sympathy and our support in the efforts that they have made to stand by the Mother Country in this time of extremity. It is certainly a great struggle that the Empire is engaged in, and to Canada as a daughter nation I am sure it gives pleasure to be able to do our little part in sending our sons to the front to fight the battles of the Empire, which are practically our battles, because on the success of the Empire depends the freedom of our firesides. I wish heartily to concur in the vote for $100,000,000 for the prosecution of the defence of the Empire. I also consider it a pleasure to be able to congratulate the Finance Minister on the very favourable arrangement he has made for securing money on reasonable terms for this great purpose; and I say further that if another $100,000,000 is required we shall come to the rescue and do our part. We shall not fail to do our full duty as His Majesty's loyal Opposition to support the Government in their aid to the Empire for the defence of this great, young nation of ours. If I may be allowed to quote from Holy Writ, "To-morrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant." We are willing to give $100,000,000 to-day; and to-morrow, if more is required we shall give it abundantly. Having said that, I am bound to support the Government in so far as regards the money that is to be used for war purposes. The Finance Minister tells us that he will require in the near future $100,000,000 as a principal; and that the interest on this sum and on the sum already borrowed will be approximately $7,000,000 a year. He lays before this House a plan, to be followed later by a resolution as to how this $7,000,000 is to be collected. He proposes special taxes on letters, bills of exchange, bills of lading, cheques and so on, which he tells us will give him approximately eight to ten million dollars. He tells us that it will take approximately $7,000,000 to pay the interest on the war loan already borrowed and on the war loan he expects to borrow during the coming fiscal year. Now after he has taken that $7,000,000 from the revenue he expects to get from the special taxes, there will still be a few million dollars to the good, which could be used for the nucleus of a pension fund, or for other purposes in connection with the war.

So far as I have gone, I am in entire accord with the Government of the day and with the proposals that the Minister of Finance has brought down. But the Minister of Finance has presented another resolution to the House. He tells us that he wants $20,000,000 to make up the shortage, if I may so call it, between revenue and expenditure on consolidated account; and he proposes to tax, with a few exceptions, all raw material coming from foreign countries or from the United Kingdom. Mr. Speaker, I realize that this is not an easy situation to explain. When it was suggested yesterday, that the tax raising the duty on raw material now free to a 5 per cent and a 7½ per cent basis, and imposing light taxes on manufactured articles, was not a war tax and should not be considered as a war tax, the Finance Minister showed some heat. But I do not think he demonstrated last night that the customs tax he proposes is a war tax; and I must take issue with him on that part of his Budget. Inasmuch as the Government is borrowing $100,000,000 from the British Government for war purposes, and imposing a special tax to raise the interest on that amount, I say that all full provision has been made for the $100,000,000 and the interest thereon, and that it is not fair, it is in a sense misleading, to say that all the money that is to be raised is to be applied to war purposes, when, as a matter of fact, it is going to consolidated account to make up the shortage between revenue and expenditure. But that is not all. On every entry that comes through the customs house in future, and that is coming through the customs house to-day, there is a clause at the bottom, "War tax, 7½ per cent," and in that way every merchant in this country gets the impression that the 7½ per cent is being used for war purposes, whereas it is going to make up the shortage between revenue and expenditure on consolidated account. But even that is not all. The merchant, having paid his 7½ per cent, tells his customer that he has paid 7½ per cent into the treasury for war purposes, and then he in turn charges his customer 7½ per cent. Let me illustrate what I mean by a letter from John Millen & Sons, a wholesale firm in Montreal:

> We beg to advise that owing to the recent increase in customs tariff announced on the 12th inst., it will be necessary for us to advance our prices to meet this additional cost. Therefore, until such time as we can rearrange our list prices and discounts we will add the 7½ per cent war surtax to all invoices for imported lines of motor supplies, and we would advise you to make the same increase in your prices to your customers.

For the moment, I am not so seriously objecting to the 7½ per cent, but what I do seriously object to is that it is passed down from the custom house officials to the wholesale merchants and on to the customer that this money is for war purposes, when actually it is going to make up the $20,000,000 shortage between revenue and expenditure on consolidated account.

I wish to say a word in regard to this increased taxation, because I shall support the amendment before the House. I regret I cannot support the whole proposals of the Government; but there are exceptions. I think it is only fair to say that, under the exigencies of the case, I am willing to hold up my hand and vote to-day for $100,000,000, and I congratulate my hon. friend the Minister of Finance for being able to get this money so easily. And, further, I will hold up my hands and vote to-morrow for another $100,000,000 if needed. I am willing to meet the exigencies of the situation in a liberal manner so that the Government shall not be handicapped in the prosecution of the war and in doing their full duty to the Mother Country as well as what is necessary for the protection of our own homes. The amendment reads as follows:

> This House is ready to provide for the exigencies of the present situation and to vote all necessary ways and means to that end.

I concur in that—

—but it regrets that in the measure under consideration duties are imposed which must be oppressive upon the people.

Are they oppressive upon the people? That is the question we want to ask? Is my right hon. leader correct in putting that statement before the people?

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. LOGGIE: Well, let us see.

Mr. GRAHAM: They decide the case before they hear the evidence.

Mr. LOGGIE: In 1908 the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) deplored the taking of money from the pockets of the people, money that he said was their capital. We had raised the amount of taxation per capita from $5.50 in 1896 to about $11. As a matter of fact, the rate of taxation in 1910 was about $11. Under the present tariff the per capita tax was, in 1914, $15, approximately. What does that mean to the average family of five people? It means that the present tax per annum is no less than $75. The Minister of Trade and Commerce bewailed the taking of a very much less sum out of the pockets of the people. I want to show the House how this new tax works out. I said that the tax as it exists to-day amounts to $75 per family. To that you add this 5 per cent and this 7½ per cent respectively—I do not mean together—and you have the result that you are adding about one-third to the taxation of the people by this new Budget. In 1914 the rate of duty collected on goods imported into Canada was 15·648 per cent, including all goods dutiable and free. One hon. gentleman the other night calculated what the increased rate would be, that is to say, the horizontal rate all round, and I think he said that it would be 6·7 per cent, or something like 6⅞ per cent. To make the calculation easier I have assumed that 5 per cent on a certain amount and 7½ per cent upon another certain amount, taken together, will be about 6 per cent. That means that you are increasing the duty—not the rate of duty on the original invoice—but the duty itself by 33⅓ per cent, and you are making the cost of living go up by $20 per capita or equal to $100 per family, by this increased taxation that you propose to levy upon the people.

But that is not all that it is costing the people of Canada. If that were all I do not know that it would be so very serious. All the goods that are consumed pay this extra duty. Only about 25 per cent of the goods that are consumed in Canada are imported; the other 75 per cent are made in Canada. Do the consumers pay an equal advance on the goods made in Canada? Can I demonstrate that they do? Without demonstrating that I have shown that taxation is increased by 33⅓ per cent under this proposition, and when I tell you that the increased tax must be added to the other 75 per cent of the goods consumed you will agree with me that the proposition of the Government is most burdensome to the people.

Let me present that part of my plea to the House. For a good many years barbed wire and spring wire came into this country free. Before the 12th February the price that was ruling in Pittsburg was about $2 per 100 lbs. That was the base price, and what is meant by the base price is the price of barbed wire and not of plain spring wire. Since this Budget has come down the price of barbed and spring wire has been advanced by the Canadian manufacturers 7½ per cent, or 15 cents per 100 lbs. During the year 1914 the importation of barbed wire amounted to 23,000,000 pounds, valued at $504,000, while the importation of plain spring wire amounted to 71,000,000 pounds, valued at $1,308,000 in round figures. This wire, let me repeat, has in the past come into Canada free. The 7½ per cent duty amounts to $126,000. If next year we import the same quantity of barbed and plain wire the farmers will pay to the Treasury $126,000. That is not all. If that were all I do not think I would have so much to say. The statistics are not available as to the exact quantity of home-made wire that is consumed in Canada. I have estimated, on the best information that I could get, that two-thirds of the wire consumed in Canada is made by the wire mills in Canada, and that one-third of the amount used is imported.

9 p.m.

The importations are largely in the western provinces. I suppose transportation is the cause of that. The people in my district who use this wire use only the domestic article. I know nothing about the importations, but I know that the increased duty has enabled the manufacturers to say that the price has gone up by the amount of the increase in the duty. Therefore the farmers of Canada will be taxed for barbed wire and spring wire $253,000, which will go into the pockets of the manufacturers, besides $126,-

000 which will go into the Dominion treasury. That is exactly how this taxation will work out. It is reasonably fair to state that it is burdensome. If the burden cannot be helped, that is another matter. It is the duty of the Government to see if there is not some other way to find the money than to make the taxes upon the farmer and the artisan burdensome.

I want to refer to barrelled pork which at the present time is dutiable. The total importation of barrelled pork in brine in 1914 was 11,960,408 pounds, valued at $1,210,473. On this value we paid a duty of $237,525.46. The total importation of barrelled beef in brine was 1,503,606 pounds, valued at 116,000. The duty paid on it was $12,000. The total importation of bacon and hams was 7,000,000 pounds, valued at $1,250,000, and the duty paid was $140,000. The duty collected by the customs on these three items therefore amounted in round figures to $390,000. If you add 7½ per cent more duty you get an increased taxation of $180,000. If that is all, it means that the consuming public must pay that same rate of duty to the packers of the Dominion, because, because their prices are put on a par with what these goods can be laid down for. I think I would be safe in saying that the packers in Canada produce more than half of the barrelled pork, and beef, and bacon and hams that are consumed in Canada. Therefore, on this food commodity the people of Canada will be paying a taxation of $379,000. I think that every hon. member should understand the whole effect of the proposals of the Government.

Yesterday the Minister of Finance, in referring to the legislation under the war revenue Budget, said:

> Does any person grudge any portion of those taxes?

I say no. But he says:

> Now, come to the other taxes, the sums I am raising by means of tariff increases. What has caused me to raise the tariff? I pointed out that my borrowings were cut off in the markets of the world; I cannot go to the London market and get a dollar except with the consent of the British Treasury.

If the money cannot be got except in this way, the people of this country must bear the burden. The minister, however, does not tell us in that statement that he cannot borrow the difference between the current revenue and the current expenditure of $20,000,000. If he could borrow it, it would have been very much better to borrow it. It is only fair that future generations should to some extent bear the brunt of the extreme situation in which we are placed. If the money cannot be raised, and if the minister can suggest no other means of raising it, then I suppose the majority of the House will approve of the proposals of the minister. I presume that he considers there is no other way to get that money.

While I will not find so much fault with the 7½ per cent he is putting on foreign goods and raw materials imported into Canada, I take strong exception to his attempt on this occasion to tax the raw material and the manufactured article imported from the United Kingdom.

The hon. Minister of Finance asked us what he is to do about it. He tells us that he has to put a duty of 7½ per cent on the dyes and other raw materials entering into manufactures, which duty the Canadian manufacturer must pay. He referred especially to cotton. I think he might very well have said to the Canadian manufacturers: We must put on this duty of 7½ per cent, but I want to show you where you will have the benefit as against the British manufacturer even though there is no change in the duty on goods from the United Kingdom. How could he have done it? In the first place he could have pointed out that the duty of 7½ per cent on raw materials does not amount to more than 3 per cent on the finer line of manufactured textiles. On cheap grey cottons and common duck, it might be as high as that, but on the finer goods I think he could easily have shown that this duty of 7½ per cent on the raw material would not have amounted to more than 2½ per cent on the manufactured article. On the other hand, what is the British manufacturer up against? Let me tell you a little experience I had a few days ago. I sent some canned lobsters to New York for forwarding to France, and I booked freight ahead for a certain proportion of that consignment. Later I found I had another shipment to make and I asked the broker for the rate. During the interim ocean rates had gone up nearly a hundred per cent. Now, if the Canadian merchant—putting it that way in this case, though the same applies to the manufacturer—wishes to buy the goods from the manufacturer and bring them across the ocean to compete with Canadian manufacturers, is not he obliged to add these extra rates of transportation to the cost of the goods? Will not that help the Canadian manufacturer to compete at any rate to the extent of 2½ per cent? More than that, might not the minister have said to the Canadian manufacturer: The British manufacturer must transport that cotton from New Orleans to the United Kingdom at double rates of freight, and we will not touch the duties from the United Kingdom either on raw material or on manufactured articles. My hon. friend from East Middlesex (Mr. Glass) told us the British preference was not decreased, and that the British manufacturer has now a greater preference in our markets against the foreign manufacturer. I do not deny that. But would it not have been a magnanimous thing for Canada to have " let well enough alone," to use an expression at one time very popular with hon. gentlemen opposite, especially when we help ourselves by helping the trade relations between the Motherland and this great daughter Dominion? So I think it was unwise—I do not say it was unpatriotic, because I do not believe there is an unpatriotic man in the House—to touch these duties under present circumstances.

I have shown that this duty on raw materials would represent only 2½ per cent on the manufactured article. And what protection—if I may use the word which hon. gentlemen opposite have sought to make their own, but which they have urged very strongly upon us—what protection has the Canadian manufacturer of cotton or woollen textiles as against this 2½ per cent represented by the duty on raw material? I have a little table here which I will not take time to read, but the general result of which I will give. On woollen goods that come into this country from the United Kingdom there is an average duty of 25 per cent. And do you mean to tell me that the Canadian manufacturer cannot afford to pay 2½ per cent when he has a protection on the manufactured article of 25 per cent? It seems to me the minister might very well have gone that far. I think that is a good reason why I can support the amendment presented by my right hon. leader. That amendment states that the Government's fiscal measure is particularly objectionable because it places extra barriers against British trade. Another reason—and I have dealt with that also—is that while this means increased taxation especially on goods from the United Kingdom, it will yield little or no revenue. Certain commodities do yield a very little revenue, but as to others, I think the amendment sets out the facts as they are.

The Minister of Finance asked us three questions yesterday, or he put the matter before us in three phases. He practically asked us to answer these questions: first, shall we cease to send troops? Well, so far as I am concerned, I say send more troops if needed. Second: he puts it up to us to suggest an alternative method. Can I suggest an alternative method? Yes, my suggestion is that the British preferential tariff be not disturbed.

Mr. BURNHAM: Would the hon. gentleman be good enough to tell the House where the preference would be if we had free trade ?

Mr. LOGGIE: I do not know what the hon. gentleman means; I think he should be a little more explicit. Free trade—does my hon. friend mean with the whole world ?

Mr. BURNHAM: Just as you like.

Mr. LOGGIE: Very well; I will take it just as I like. My suggestion is that the present rate of duties on goods from the United Kingdom be not disturbed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Answer the question.

Mr. LOGGIE: The question arises: can we get the money in any other way, and how much do we require ? In 1914 we imported from the United Kingdom non-dutiable goods to the value of $28,000,000, in round figures. As there are several commodities to which the increased rate does not apply, I put it down at $25,000,000, which, at 5 per cent, would yield us $1,250,000. In the same year we imported from the United Kingdom dutiable goods to the value of $100,000,000, in round figures, which, at 5 per cent, would yield us $5,000,000. So if my suggestion is of any value, we would require $6,250,000 to take the place of the revenue to be derived from the proposed increase in the British preference. I have on previous occasions pointed out to the House that pork, which is the chief food of the lumbermen and fishermen, is already over-burdened with taxes. It was my privilege and my duty to tell the Government led by my right hon. friend the present leader of the Opposition, that the duty on pork under the late Administration was burdensome. What is the result of increasing the duty upon pork by 7½ per cent ? When hon. gentlemen do this, they add $1.50 to the price of each barrel of pork. In other words, the duty on a barrel of pork is now $5.50, and the fishermen pay three cents per pound into the treasury of the Dominion of Canada for every pound of pork they eat. Instead of doing that I would make the fishermen pay more on his tobacco. If he is bound to use tobacco, let him use it and pay duty upon it, but make the taxes upon pork as reasonable as possible. I would suggest that the rate of duty on spirituous liquors be increased by 50 per cent and the duty on tobacco be increased by 25 per cent. The man who smokes a cigar is in a better position to pay an extra 25 per cent duty than the fisherman is to pay an excessive duty on pork. If this were done the money would be obtained without increasing the British preference. Money talks; it was Lloyd George who said that silver bullets count in this war; so do silver bullets count in connection with the tariff. I have had some financing to do myself; I have been mighty hard up some times, and I know what it is like. I know, too, what it is like to borrow, and I sympathize with the Minister of Finance in that respect. I put these proposals forth on my own responsibility; I have not suggested them to hon. gentlemen beside me, but I believe they are worthy of the serious consideration of the Minister of Finance.

I frankly affirm that I cannot agree with all my hon. friend's proposals. I do believe that he should not place upon the necessaries of life any additional taxation if it can possibly be avoided. No increase should be made in the taxation upon goods coming from the United Kingdom. It is my judgment that this is necessary not only in the interests of Canada and of the Empire, but in the interests of our standing in the Motherland as well. I concur, therefore, in all my hon. friend's proposals but one; this I do heartily, and with pleasure. I suppose that the suggestions I have made will not be accepted by hon. gentlemen opposite, but I submit them for their careful consideration. I realize that this is a solemn occasion; I realize that we have to do our duty by our homes and our firesides; by our country and by the Empire of which we are all so proud. I take second place to none so far as loyalty is concerned; I will hold the talismanic flag as high as any hon. gentleman in this House. I hope the Government will do their full duty under the conditions which now confront us. Circumstances may arise after the House is prorogued which may call for extreme exertion. And if they do call for extreme exertions, if the Government of the day use their best judgment and act wisely, they shall have my support and sympathy in everything that can be done to bring this war to a successful issue.

But let me utter one word of warning. While I say all this, the Government must expect to be criticised for the management of this money. If they do not use this money economically and honestly, and see that it is administered honestly, they must expect to be called to account and to be criticised. That is our duty; we would fail to do our duty to the country at large and to our King if we did not hold them responsible for the proper discharge of their duties and a proper dispensing or paying out of this war fund. We undertake to return to the Imperial Government this money. We undertake to pay the interest in the meantime, and we are bound to see that those who have charge of the treasury benches so use their privilege that they can render an honest account, so that the people of Canada will be proud of the part which Canada has taken in the defence of the Empire on this momentous occasion.

Mr. JAMES BOWMAN (East Huron): Mr. Speaker, coming as I do from a county which is considered one of the leading agricultural counties of Ontario, I might say in the Dominion of Canada, I think it is my duty to say a few words with regard to the application of this Budget to the various industries in my county.

Before doing so I wish to tender my most hearty congratulations to the Minister of Finance for the very efficicent manner in which he has conducted the finances of this country since taking office. His work during the past three years has shown the master hand, and his ability has never shone forth with greater brilliancy than in introducing this Budget. The minister was called upon to devise ways and means to meet extraordinary circumstances, which have been brought about in this country by the war, resulting in a falling off of the trade of this country, with a consequent decrease in the amount of revenue collected and available to meet ordinary expenses. Then, too, several million dollars must be provided as a nucleus for a pension fund for our soldiers, and also a sum of $7,000,000 as interest upon the war loan, the $150,000,000 which has been raised for the purpose of mobilizing our soldiers and sending them to the front to fight in defence of the Empire. The minister had to devise ways and means to meet these expenditures, and in doing so he had a choice of three principles as the basis of the method of collecting taxation. Two of these principles have been tried in this country. We had the policy of revenue tariff which was tried some years ago, prior to 1878. It was then put in practice by a Liberal Government. That tariff was 15 per cent in the beginning, and was afterwards increased to 17½ per cent. It is unnecessary to tell the people of this country the position in which Canada stood at that time. It was anything but good; our manufacturing industries were closed, our labouring men thrown out of employment. As a result of that, the business men of this country sent a delegation to Ottawa to wait on Sir Richard Cartwright, then Minister of Finance, asking that he give a measure of protection to the interests of this country. However, he ignored their request, they had to go home unsatisfied. But it was not very long until a man rose to the occasion in the person of that great statesman, Sir John A. Macdonald. He espoused the policy of protection and made it a plank in his platform during the election of 1878, with the result that he carried this country with an overwhelming majority. He continued that policy of protection consistently for the 18 years that his Government was in office, subject of course to certain regulations which were necessary to comply with the needs of the country. During that time what were our Liberal friends in this country doing? They were still advocating a revenue tariff. In 1891 they advocated unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, and later on, prior to the election of 1896, they advocated free trade as they have it in Great Britain. During that time the people of Canada rejected these policies; they rejected the revenue tariff and also reciprocity with the United States; and prior to the election of 1896 Hon. Edward Blake, who was considered one of the leading statesmen among our honoured friends, challenged them before they talked of free trade as being practicable in Canada, to devise some possible plan whereby the revenue needs of this country could be met in any other way than by placing a duty on goods similar to those which were produced in this country. That was the challenge thrown out by the Hon. Edward Blake. The hon. gentleman opposite never devised any feasible plan nor have they done so up to the present time. What did they do? They were returned to power in 1896. They were not returned as a result of the policies which they had advocated, but they were returned on an issue that was foreign to the fiscal policy of this country. They had the opportunity of their lives when they came into office. The right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), a man of ability, I admit, had told the people of Canada that if he was placed in power he would give them free trade as they had it in Great Britain. He told the farmers in this country that the manufacturers were nothing but a lot of robbers and that if he was placed in power he would abolish every vestige of protection. I say to the right hon. gentleman, and I am sorry he is not in his seat, that then was the opportunity, if he was sincere in what he told the farmers of this country, to give free trade as they had it in Great Britain. But, Sir, what did he do? It has been said, and it has not been denied, that he gave an assurance in secret to the manufacturers of this country that, if returned to power, he would see that their interests were conserved and their protection retained. Let that be as it may. We are satisfied that after Sir Wilfrid Laurier was elected in 1896 he took to his bosom the manufacturers of this country who, he claimed, were robbing the farmers of Canada. During the election, I think in Centre Toronto, Mr. Bertram, the Liberal candidate, was authorized to give the assurance to the manufacturers of Centre Toronto that their protection would not be abolished; and on the strength of that Mr. Bertram was returned as a supporter of the hon. leader of the Opposition. I will go further, and say that during the fifteen years the right hon. gentleman was in power he consistently carried on the policy of protection. What did he do when he went out of office in 1911, after he had entered into that reciprocity agreement with the United States, and was asking for the people's mandate upon it? He said to the manufacturers of this country: I have always befriended you, and I am going to befriend you still; I am going to see that your protection still remains; and he had nothing to say regarding the best interests of the farmers of Canada.

In this connection let me read what the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt)—and I am sorry he is not in his seat—said in the reciprocity campaign. He spoke at a meeting in the city of Woodstock, and is reported by the Toronto Globe as follows:

> He could not see that the manufacturers would be touched very much, as few articles manufactured in Canada were affected. He was sure the Bain and Woodstock wagon companies would compete in the world's markets, even with 2½ per cent reduction in the tariff. He thought the manufacturers opposed reciprocity because of what might follow, the "thin edge of the wedge," but he had been assured by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Fielding that nothing of the sort would follow. They had gone as far in the farmers' interest as they would.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier was asked whether he had given Mr. Nesbitt authority to give that assurance, and this is what he said:

The statement made by the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) was quite consistent with our policy; it was nothing new, and he had perfect authority, not only he but every member on the Liberal side, to make that statement.

The present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) asked Sir Wilfrid Laurier this question at that time:

Did the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance authorize the member in question to make that statement?

And Sir Wilfrid Laurier replied:

I have answered that already. It is perfectly true. The hon. member for North Oxford and every Liberal member had such authority; he was not kept in ignorance of our policy in this matter and knew it well. He only stated what is our general policy.

I think that this is conclusive evidence that the Liberal party when in power were protectionists. The manufacturers were their friends to the very last. In 1911, the year the Liberal party went out of power—and it was the farmers of this country who put them out—the Liberal party said to the farmers: We ask you to sell your products in a free market, and to buy in a protected market.

What is the history of the fiscal policy of this country? From 1878 to 1911, when hon. gentlemen opposite went out of power, the policy of protection was consistently carried out. May I give some further precedents to show that the policy of protection is the only policy upon which to build up Canada as a great nation. Every country in the world, with the exception of Great Britain, is to-day fostering its industries under that very policy. We have Germany, a great country, a country which has developed her manufacturing industries and her agricultural industries until to-day she is able with a smaller area than the province of Ontario to support a population of nearly seventy million people. We have the United States, a great nation, which has developed wonderfully in the past under that policy. She has grown up under it, and to-day has a market of which hon. gentlemen opposite are jealous; they envy it, and that market was built up under the policy of protection. And that is what we in Canada intend to do. But I think I can hear the voice of my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) pointing, as always, to Great Britain as an example; but what are the facts in connection with Great Britain? Great Britain has free trade at the present time; but what were the circumstances in 1847, when she discarded the protective tariff? She was supreme so far as the development of her manufacturing industries was concerned; she had cheap labour; she had great natural resources; her commerce reached out to every country in the world; and therefore Great Britain thought it was an opportune time to set an example to the other nations of the world. But that example was not followed by the other nations. To-day we see other nations forging ahead, and actually depriving Great Britain in her own market of the sale of many of her products for which she should have a ready sale at least in her own market. In view of all this, I think the judgment of our Finance Minister is such as to be worthy of commendation by the people of this country. He has maintained the policy which has proved successful, not under the Conservative party alone, but under our Liberal friends opposite.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask, where stand our friends on the Opposition benches to-day? They have gone back to the old position that they held prior to 1896; they are back now to decrying the manufacturers of this country, calling them robbers, the oppressors of the farmers of this country, and every imaginable name that they can possibly get their tongues around. The farmers of this country to-day, of whom I am one, are intelligent people. They are not going to be misled by any political—I was going to say clap-trap, but I understand, Mr. Speaker, that you would rule that out of order—so I will say the farmers are not going to be misled by any political deception. The Liberals are telling the farmers to-day that the manufacturers have set out to rob them. It is very strange that, as soon as they get out of power, they should tell the farmers that the manufacturers are trying to rob them. That is very difficult to understand. Speaking as a farmer, speaking in my own interest as a farmer, and I have every respect for the agricultural class in this country and wish to see it succeed, I think it is the greatest mistake to try and create a cleavage between the manufacturing, agricultural and labouring interests in this country. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) last night said that protection is not a builder of industries. I disagree with the hon. gentleman in that regard. What do we find is the fact? Take the census of 1910. We find that there are no less than 19,000 manufacturing establishments in this Dominion and that these manufacturing establishments represent an investment of $1,240,000,000, all of which is adding to the tax-paying power of the country. They have 500,000 employees in their employment paying to these men, as the reward of the labour which they give, the very large sum of $230,000,000 per year. This money which is being paid out in wages is distributed through the length and breadth of Canada and around these industries have grown up large urban centres. I might mention the city of Montreal with its half million population, the city of Toronto with its 400,000, London, Hamilton, Ottawa, Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton, Vancouver and many other places of equal note. What is the result? Where does the farmer realize the benefit from protection? These great cities that have grown up around manufacturing industries are affording farmers a great home market. That home market is consuming a very large percentage of our farm products. Notwithstanding that I think I can hear the echo of the voice of my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) when he puts up a very strong plea, a wail of pity, for the farmers of this country. He says that the poor farmer has to pay 7½ per cent additional taxation on the fence wire and fertilizers which he uses. He says that this is a very heavy tax on the farmer; but why did not my hon. friend point out to the members of this House the increased market that this policy has built up for the farmer?

It has been claimed by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House—it was contended by the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean)—that this extra tariff of 7½ per cent would not be one that would bring very much revenue to the treasury. What does that mean? If it does not bring in revenue to the treasury it means this: We are now importing millions of dollars worth of manufactured articles. These goods, if they are right—and I am taking it for granted that they will be right—will all be manufactured in Canada thus bringing millions of additional capital into this country to build up additional factories, employing additional labour, paying out additional wages and, as a consequence, increasing the great home market for the farmers of Canada.

I was surprised the other evening to hear my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) put up a pitiful wail for the farmer of Canada. He said the farmer had to pay this additional tax upon the fertilizer which he uses, but in the next breath the hon. member said that he would like to have free food. He would like to see these things placed on the free list. The hon. member for Carleton, New Brunswick (Mr. Carvell), I think in the session of 1912-13, was asked by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) if, should he get into power, he would abolish the duties on eggs, butter, and so on. The hon. member for Carleton said that he would, that that was his position. Then we have the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) yesterday getting up and declaring himself in favour of free food. What does that mean to the farmers? I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to appeal to this country on the free food question. They are trying to draw a red herring across the trail, and they are trying to deceive the labouring classes in the cities in order to gain some political advantage. The good citizens of Ottawa, Montreal, Toronto or any other of the cities, are too wily to be trapped by any such appeal as that. They know that protection means the building up of industries, that it gives them employment, and that they would not get that employment if these industries did not exist. They know that protection to industries cannot exist if you do not give protection to the farmers. The working man therefore says: If this policy gives me employment at a good wage I am in a position to pay to the farmer a fair price for the products that I use. If you will allow me to apply a phrase which the late Goldwin Smith used at one time with reference to commercial union between Canada and the United States, I would say that this great policy of protection couples together the interests of the manufacturer, the farmer and the artisan, that it puts them all together as one economic whole, and that if you destroy the interests of one you destroy the interests of all. The attempt has been made at various times in this House to show that the United States is a great market for Canadian farm produce. It was also declared here to-night that the farmer has no protection upon anything which he has to sell. I want to read to the House the list of a few articles under the heading of provisions which come into Canada in competition with the farm products of this country. During the fiscal year 1914 we imported 8,000,000 lbs. of butter. We are not producing sufficient in this country to meet the demand. I contend that the additional 7½ per cent that is levied by this Budget will be a great advantage to the farmers of Canada in conserving that market for them. I am going to give you a list of articles that we import from the United States. During the year 1914 we imported from the United States 10,000,000 dozens of eggs. We are not producing enough eggs to supply our market, and therefore the additional tariff of 7½ per cent is quite an advantage in our own markets. We also imported 5,758,000 pounds of lard. lard compound, 934,000 pounds; bacon and ham, 7,150,000 pounds; beef, fresh chilled or frozen, 235,000 pounds; beef, salted, 1,496,000 pounds; dried or smoked beef, 1,204,000 pounds; mutton and lamb, 3,825,000 pounds; pork barrelled in brine, 11,950,000 pounds; or we took from the United States in the fiscal year 1914 no less than $7,615,000 worth of provisions. With the additional duty of 7½ per cent, which is applied under this Budget, we give the farmers a very great advantage.

We have come to a period in this country where the cry is: "Back to the farm." It would not have been necessary for us to have that slogan sounded throughout the country, had the late Government given attention to the agricultural industry. In the county from which I come, and which is one of the best agricultural counties in this Dominion, under the Liberal Administration, in the ten years from 1901 to 1910, we lost nearly 8,000 of our rural population by migration from the farms to the cities. That looks very bad for the agricultural industry in my part of the country. Was anything done by the Liberal Government to remedy that condition of affairs? They had every opportunity; and if they had taken such a deep interest in the farming industry, they would have in time applied a remedy. Nothing, however, was done, and to-day we are forced to use our utmost endeavours to get the people back to the land. I must give this Government, under the leadership of the right hon. the Premier, credit for what it has done for the agricultural classes.

At the very first session of this Parliament there was a grant brought down by the Minister of Agriculture to assist the various provinces along the lines of aid to agriculture. At the succeeding session an additional grant of $10,000,000 was brought down by the Minister of Agriculture, that grant to be divided over a period of ten years, which would mean $1,000,000 a year to be given to the provinces for the purpose of assisting that great industry. That is having its effect at present, and the farmers have never been in a better position than they are in to-day.

[Mr. Bowman.]

Rural mail was introduced by my hon. friends opposite, but it is no credit to them, and if I were in their place, I simply would conceal that bit of information. They instituted the rural mail delivery in some ridings where it was of some political advantage, and so it was used as a political expedient. Do you think the farmers in my riding could get rural mail under the late Government? No, but the farmers in North York and South Oxford and Wentworth and other Liberal ridings could. The present Government are now giving rural mail, irrespective of political considerations, to the farmers of this country wherever the population warrants it, and that is of great advantage to the agricultural industry, because of its convenience and the addition it makes to the comforts of farm life.

Parcel post is being initiated by this Government, and no doubt in time it will be very largely developed. I am sorry that the Postmaster General is not in his seat, because I wish to throw out a suggestion to him. The zone system was inaugurated in connection with parcel post for the protection of towns and villages throughout the Dominion from any encroachments or inroads which might be made upon them by the large wholesale businesses such as Simpson's or Eaton's, of Toronto. While it is perfectly right and proper to have that zone system to protect the small towns and villages, it is very unfair to the farmers living at a certain distance from Toronto and other large centres. People speak about the high cost of living. If we want to reduce the high cost of living, let us abolish that zone system on farmers' products coming from Western Ontario to the city of Toronto. It would be the means of giving to the people of Toronto cheaper farm products, and would be a convenience to farmers living more than twenty miles from Toronto. It is unfair to place an extra tax upon farmers living beyond the zone limit. A farmer living close to a city has a greater advantage because he has that home market at his door all the time. Therefore, I would suggest to the Postmaster General that he should take this matter into consideration and try to have the zone system not apply to farm products coming to the various cities in this Dominion.

We have done much to help the farmers of the West. In the first place I just wish to remind my hon. friends opposite who come from the West and who have been speaking about free wheat and the American markets, that if the people of the West want any aid, let them come to the province of Ontario, or to Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick, and we will willingly hold out to them a helping hand. We have helped them by building up transportation facilities for them, and in many other ways. Therefore, I say to the western members: Be careful never to introduce a policy that will sever the connection existing between the East and the West. We have assisted the farmers of the West by building interior and terminal elevators. This Government has gone ahead with the building of the Hudson Bay railway, the contract for which was entered into and signed by the late Government. I was disappointed to hear the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) say that if he had his way he would tear up the rails on that road. Was the hon. member in the House when this road was initiated by his Government? The hon. gentleman does not answer my question. If he sat quiet in his seat and allowed a proposition like that to go through Parliament without protesting, he did a thing that was very wrong in view of the opinion he holds. And had I done so, I certainly would not come to this House to condemn that road and say I was in favour of having it torn up. I have better hope for that road and I hope that it will prove a benefit to the people of the West.

This Government has removed the duty on ditching machines. Under the late Government they were dutiable, but as soon as this Government came into power they placed these machines on the free list, a decided benefit to the farmer.

Another very important matter is the reduction in duties on agricultural implements. This Government has reduced these duties from 17½ to 12½ per cent, giving to the people of the West a greater advantage than the late Government was giving under the Reciprocity Treaty of 1911. When cement became scarce in this country and the price was extortionate, this Government cut the duty in two in order to secure this article to the people at a reasonable price. This is an illustration of the vigilance exercised by this Government in maintaining the interests of our agriculturists.

The hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) asked what advantage it would be to the people of Canada to have a tax on wool. If these gentlemen were looking to the interests of the farmers, they would see what advantage it would be. The sheep-raising industry of this country has been ruined; our farmers had to go out of the business, for they had to compete with the world, and prices were low.

Mr. NESBITT: May I ask the hon. gentleman is he sheep farming?

Mr. BOWMAN: I was at one time.

Mr. NESBITT: But you do not carry it on now?

Mr. BOWMAN: No.

Mr. NESBITT: Would the hon. gentleman be surprised to know that sheep-farming has been profitable within the past few years?

Mr. BOWMAN: And this legislation will make it more profitable.

Mr. NESBITT: So far as I am concerned, though I carry on sheep-farming, I do not think it will help me a bit.

Mr. BOWMAN: Probably the hon. gentleman has no faith in protection. In speaking to his friends on the quiet, I think he will admit next year that his profits have been greater than this year. It is strange that the hon. member for North Oxford should say that the extra duty on fertilizers and fencing wire will be a burden on the farmer because they will cause him to pay much more for the goods, and yet that it is no protection to the farmer to have a duty of 7½ per cent placed on the wool he sells. If the hon. gentleman thinks that is a logical way of treating this argument I am satisfied.

While this Government has done much for this country, there is something else that can be done. If the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) were in his place I would throw out this suggestion: We have millions of acres of waste land in this country. We are talking about greater production, we are talking of back to the land. There is nothing that would give a greater incentive to greater production than giving the farmers cheap money to drain waste lands. We have millions of acres of these lands; and is it unreasonable for me to say that money should be given to the farmers at 3½ or 4 per cent to carry on the work of drainage? In the province of Ontario we have a fund to assist tile drainage. But if a farmer wishes to take advantage of the system he cannot get the money, because the fund is so limited. This Government is giving assistance to agriculture. Why cannot they give assistance to the province to provide a fund that shall afford farmers money to drain their farms at a reasonable rate? Under the Drainage Act, for instance, the security is good and there is no obstacle in the way—our municipalities are the security under this Act. In one township municipality of my riding the amount expended in drainage is a quarter of a million dollars. Repeat that all over Canada and it means a very large amount. The farmers cannot afford to pay 5½ or 6 per cent for money to be invested in the drainage of these waste lands. While I admit that the condition of agriculture is improving, I say that it can be still more improved. No people in this country are more deserving than the agricultural class. Theirs is the basic industry of this country, and they are certainly deserving of the attention of any Government.

In my opinion, the time for free trade or a revenue tariff policy in this country has gone by. There was a time when it would have been possible to treat on free trade lines with the United States. I refer to the time of the termination of the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854, and that termination, I believe, was brought about in 1866. The people of Canada, both Conservatives and Liberals, asked for a renewal of that treaty. It was of advantage to Canada at that time —we had no other markets. But we were turned down by the United States. As a result the fathers of Confederation met and in 1867 they laid the foundations upon which to build a great nation here in Canada. In accordance with the principles adopted at that Confederation we have built our transportation lines east and west and are developing trade along those lines. Are you going to enter upon a policy that would ruin the transportation lines of this country, disorganize trade and make us again subservient to the United States, the very party that turned us down when we wanted a favour? I say no. I say the people of Canada will never submit to such a policy; and any party that goes to the people making any such demand of them will be rejected at the very first opportunity.

In conclusion, it is to me a pleasure indeed to have the opportunity of serving under the leadership of Rt. Hon. Sir Robert Laird Borden. He is a man of whom this country feels proud; he is a broad-minded man, and a worthy successor of that great chieftain, Sir John A. Macdonald, who so loved this country that he said: "A British subject I was born and a British subject I will die."

Mr. ARTHUR B. COPP (Westmorland, N.B.): In the few observations that I purpose making to the House this evening on the subject matter of this debate, it is not my intention to follow the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Bowman), in his attempt to defend the Government for the condition of affairs which is set out in the Budget laid before the House by the Finance Minister. I may say, however, that I was extremely pleased after listening for a short time to that part of my hon. friend's speech which had reference to protection, to hear him at last admit that the policy laid down and followed by the Liberal party during the fifteen years they were in office, was the very policy that he himself advocated. He said he was delighted to be able to say that credit was due the present Government for reducing the duty on agricultural implements coming into Canada from the United States. If it is a good thing to reduce the taxation on agricultural implements coming from the United States into this country for the use of our agricultural classes, would it not be equally beneficial, I ask my hon. friend, to reduce the taxation which is now imposed on other articles and commodities which the farmer needs?

[Mr. Bowman.]

I was somewhat afraid when my hon. friend offered his congratulations to the right hon. Prime Minister that he might place the right hon. gentleman on a plane equally as high as that which the hon. Finance Minister himself, according to his own statement yesterday, has attained. If the hon. Finance Minister had been here, I suppose the hon. gentleman would hardly have had the temerity to say what he did in reference to the right hon. Prime Minister this evening.

My hon. friend argued this matter from many different standpoints. I should not have asked the indulgence of the House to-night were it not for communications which I have received from my constituents in the county of Westmorland and from persons in other constituencies thoughout the province of New Brunswick in regard to matters affecting the agricultural welfare of this country.

I listened attentively to the hon. Finance Minister when he presented his statement to the House the other day, and I want to do him the honour of saying that I rather admired the ability and ingenuity with which he carried out the task of presenting to the House in a most optimistic manner the most pessimistic Budget or financial statement ever offered to any Parliament by any minister of finance since Confederation.

When the hon. junior member for Halifax, who, I believe, is called the financial critic of the Opposition, replied to the hon. Minister of Finance, I think I may be pardoned for saying that he performed the task assigned to him with a very great deal of ability. In a calm, deliberate, dispassionate, but none the less emphatic and convincing manner, he laid before this House his ideas and his arguments with regard to the finances of Canada. He showed by facts and figures—and this has been admitted by all hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken in this debate—that a serious condition of affairs prevails in Canada at the present time. It is not my intention to go through the Budget from beginning to end, with the intention of quoting figures or making computations or comparisons; that has already been done by my hon. friend the financial critic of the Opposition. I have listened day after day to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, with the hope of hearing some answer to the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Halifax.

The first hon. gentleman to volunteer his services in the defence of the Government was my hon. friend the member for South Toronto (Mr. Macdonell), who is not now in his seat. After some general arguments as to the public expenditure of this country, and an elaborate exposition of the made-in-Canada propaganda, he finally disposed of the argumnts of the hon. member for Halifax in the following crushing and trenchant manner:

> I desire to say a word or two about the Budget. I believe that this Budget has been received with more satisfaction than any Budget ever produced in the history of this country. There has been little criticism of the Budget so far as I am aware; we know that party criticism creeps to the surface at the slightest opportunity.

After a few sentences in regard to the wonderful Budget brought down by the hon. Finance Minister, he concluded by saying:

> What does my hon. friend suggest in substitution of the Budget that has been brought down?

Subsequently the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) disposed of the arguments of the hon. junior member for Halifax in the following words:

> It would be far better for him (Mr. Oliver), and better also for the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) to have taken the Minister of Finance and the rest of the Government party into their confidence, and told them how to construct this Budget, and wherein they are in error.

These hon. gentlemen, if we take them seriously, think that it is the duty of the Opposition to instruct hon. gentlemen opposite how to construct their Budget and arrange their tariffs to suit the conditions as they exist.

The right hon. leader of the Opposition yesterday informed the House that he had not been consulted in regard to the framing of the proposed tariff schedules in any manner, shape or form. I do not claim that the right hon. leader of the Opposition had the right to be consulted on that occasion, but if he was not consulted, why do hon. gentlemen opposite ask hon. gentlemen on this side of the House to instruct them as to how to arrange their tariff legislation?

I would say further that if these gentlemen are sincere there is one way, the constitutional way, to get information from this side of the House. In the first place, if they found themselves absolutely incompetent or unable to grapple with a question as they apparently have admitted they are, it is their duty to go to His Royal Highness the Governor General and hand him their resignations in a proper and constitutional manner. If that were done and my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) were recalled to office he would do as he did in 1896, when on assuming office he found a condition of affairs similar to what we find to-day, and he at once, by his ability, in a systematic and businesslike way, restored calm and confidence out of confusion and chaos. He did this in 1896 and he would do it to-day and do it without imposing additional taxation upon the poor people of this country. That is my argument in answer to hon. gentlemen opposite when they ask us on this side of the House to come over and tell them what we would do under the circumstances. It reminds me very much of a young physician who, shortly after commencing practice, being unable to properly diagnose a case, saw his patient becoming gradually weaker, until when the patient was in the last throes he called in a more experienced practitioner. The doctor thus called in said it was too late, that the patient was beyond recovery. The young physician then said: "What would you have done under the circumstances?" Our friends on the other side see ruin and bankruptcy in Canada, as they say in effect, and find that they have to impose a direct tax on the people to carry on the ordinary affairs of the country; and then they say to us: What would you do under the circumstances? I think that is not a fair proposition. While during the last year I was not a member of the House and do not know just what attitude members on this side adopted towards the appropriations of last year, I do not think that we should be held responsible for last year's expenditures. That money was voted and that money and more has been expended. But when hon. gentlemen ask suggestions from this side of the House in regard to the ensuing year, our friends on this side have said again and again that they believe the proper thing for the Government to do is when they find themselves face to face with this unparalleled condition of affairs in Canada, to call a halt and consider where they are drifting and what they are doing. Every hon. member should be honest and fair with regard to this matter.

The hon. members for St. John and Halifax made the suggestion to my hon. friends that we believe the proper thing to do was to curtail the expenditure. The line of demarkation between the hon. gentlemen opposite and hon. gentlemen on this side of the House seems to be something like this: Our friends opposite say that it is the duty of the Government to spend money freely and lavishly, to go on with all public works to as great or a greater extent than in the past for the purpose of keeping our men employed and at work throughout the country. To a certain extent that is a fair argument. We on this side of the House have suggested that instead of placing increased taxation on the people of this country for the purpose of keeping men employed by extensive public works in Canada the Government should curtail, not stop absolutely, the public works.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have spoken as if we proposed to stop all public works. We would not stop all works but, instead of increasing the expenditure and taxation, we would curtail expenditure and keep taxation at the present level or possibly a lower level. That is the line of cleavage between the two parties in this House. The proper course for the Government would be to retrench and curtail rather than continue the lavish expenditures of the past two or three years, an expenditure which has rendered it necessary for them to levy direct taxation. I believe that in approving of such a policy as this I am voicing the sentiments of my constituents.

My hon. friends' hearts apparently bleed for the workingman. I do not want to suggest the least trace of insincerity on the part of the hon. gentlemen; but I do say that the man who makes the most money out of public expenditure is not the man who uses the shovel or the pick or the man who goes down and does manual labour; it the contractor who holds the big contracts who makes the big money out of public expenditures in Canada. Therefore I say that the ordinary individual as a rule would be better off if the expenditures were curtailed to some extent, and thus save the workingmen the increased burden of taxation. I spoke of the workingmen not getting proper treatment at the hands of the contractors. I would remind the House, and the Minister of Railways particularly, that after the war had been declared in August last, when the manufacturing concerns in our town were closed and the workingmen were walking the streets without money to pay their rent or to buy succour and clothing for their families, the Government purchased or agreed to purchase a certain line of railway running from the town of Sackville on the Intercolonial to Cape Tormentine; a distance of 40 miles. I am not criticising that action, because I am in favour of the taking over of branch lines, and this was a branch line that it was proper to take over. But the road was in such condition that the Government had to start at once to make repairs on the same. And I want to tell the Minister of Railways, whether he knew it or not—I do not suppose he did—that while our local labouring men were walking the streets of Sackville, this Government brought in foreigners, a large proportion of them Austrians and Germans I am informed, to do that work. I think that was an unreasonable and unfair thing to do. Our local men were entitled to the work on that road, but instead of that they were put aside and foreigners brought in.

My hon. friend from East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) in addressing this House the other night made what struck me as rather a peculiar criticism of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. First of all he talked about a party truce; and I am not here to say anything for or against the truce except this. It has been said that a party truce had been arranged. Personally I know nothing about whether such a truce was entered into or not. I do know that before war was declared the leader of the Opposition had arranged to hold some meetings in large constituencies in the West in the interests of the Liberal party, and, incidentally, if they were in the interests of the Liberal party they would be in the interests of Canada; but immediately on the declaration of war the right hon. gentleman cancelled all these engagements. The war session of this House was called, and so far as I have been able to hear from hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House there was absolute unanimity in regard to the war measures brought down in that session.

Suggestions have been thrown out from both sides of the House that even during that period there was not strictly a truce, as literature was being sent out from the printing bureaus because it could be franked and go free. I do not know anything about that. Before the present session was called, I presume that some truce was arranged in regard to filling the vacant constituencies, and as a result of that I had an easy way of entering this House, and I appreciate the honour of representing my constituency. But if I felt that in coming to this House in that way I was sanctioning any party truce, that my tongue was bridled, that I could not offer criticism in regard to the matters that I believe to be deserving of criticism, much as I appreciate the honour of representing my constituency, my conscience would not have allowed me to accept the nomination and a seat in this House. That is my feeling with regard to the party truce. Following the party truce still further, the question of an election arises. But I am not here to discuss the question of an election. I think I know enough about politics to know that the Government of a country are not influenced very much by what an Opposition may say as to the right time to hold an election. I do not expect this Government to take us into their confidence, or to be influenced by anything we might say in regard to an election. But I think I am voicing the sentiments of every hon. member in this House when I say that no one who has been through many campaigns is anxious to start on another one. We all fight rather shy of elections, the Government as well as the Opposition. Let me say further that I should not consider myself worthy of the honour of representing my constituency if I allowed myself to be influenced in what I believe to be proper criticism by the fear that my sayings might bring on or put off an election, or that the question whether there would be an election or not should influence me in refraining from offering what I believe to be just criticisms on the actions of the Government. Following the remarks of my hon. friend from East Lambton, he said that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House were embarrassing the Government. Well, that is an admission to begin with that the criticisms being offered are somewhat embarrassing. He went farther and said that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House were rising in their places and trying to embarrass the Government with their criticisms, at a time when it was confronted with one of the greatest crises in the history of this country. I grant that. But I want to say that the Government are not the only ones concerned in that question; the people of Canada are confronted with the same question. I believe I am voicing the sentiments of every man, woman and child who knows what war is, when I say that every one in this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific has just as much at stake in this war as any member of the Government and fully realize that responsibility.

Mr. CARVELL: Even including the Finance Minister.

Mr. COPP: Even including the Finance Minister. My hon. friend from East Lambton painted a beautiful picture of our gallant soldiers marching to the front and going into the trenches, while hon. gentlemen on this side of the House were embarrassing the Government by their criticism. If the hon. member had gone a little further he could have painted a better picture. He might have made it more explicit, more emphatic to the people of Canada. When he pictured our gallant soldiers going into the trenches, he might have said that they were clad in khaki uniforms bought from political friends at a very large profit, their feet encased in shoes made of split cowhide with shanks of wood and paper manufactured by unscrupulous dealers without proper inspection and making a handsome rake-off on the transaction. But my hon. friend did not go quite that far. He shed copious tears over the fact that we were embarrassing the Government. He might have shed a tear for our gallant soldiers who for months or weeks, whichever it may have been, were exposed in this class of boots to the wet and slush of the training grounds of Valcartier and of Salisbury Plain.

The Montreal Daily Star, discussing the boots worn by our gallant soldier boys, says that it is more than a scandal—it is a crime. That is the evidence and information we have in regard to this boot question. If everything in connection with the equipment, supplies, and munitions of war had been carried on in an honest and fair manner, then I say that the criticism we have to offer to this Budget should not embarrass the Government; it should be a distinct advantage to them, for it gives them an opportunity of explaining away all the suspicions which my hon. friends opposite say they have not heard of.

Let me tell my hon. friends, if they have never heard it, that this country is seething with suspicion in regard to public contracts for materials for war purposes. We are not breaking any party truce, we are not doing any more than our bounden duty in pointing out to the people what has been done and what we believe has been done. We have voted $50,000,000, which has been expended during the past six months, and $100,000,000 more is to be voted by this House. I have not heard a single suggestion which would indicate that any hon. member of this House was not perfectly willing to vote $100,000,000 and, yea, more if necessary. My hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) hit the nail on the head the other night when he said that we are prepared to give millions for defence but not one dollar for graft. Yet we are told we are disloyal because we offer these criticisms and because we call upon the Government to show that there has been no graft in connection with these contracts.

So much in a general way. I said at the outset that I wanted to speak particularly for one or two classes of people. I am sorry that I have not had the experience of the hon. gentleman who told us this evening that he was a farmer. He said that he believed that the Government had done more for the farmers of Canada than any Government has done for many years. I am not in a position to say whether they have or have not. I do not want to offer any undue criticism of the Government in regard to any matter in which they believe they are doing the right thing. I do not know anything about the farming industry in the province of Ontario, but I know something of the agricultural interests in the province of New Brunswick. I speak more particularly of this matter because I have been asked in numerous letters and telegrams that I have received from my own constituents to bring up the question of fertilizers and agricultural implements on which the duty will be increased by the tariff arrangements that have been brought down by the Minister of Finance. Many of the letters and telegrams I have received are not from political friends of mine, but are from very strong supporters of the Government, who, I suppose, will continue their support. I am not here talking politics. I want to draw to the attention of the Government as seriously as I can the condition of the farmers in my own province, especially in the county which I have the honour to represent, and to point out how they are affected by this proposed duty on fertilizers. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance says they must have a certain amount of revenue, that they need money, that money is the backbone of the war and of the country and that they must have it. I have no quarrel with my hon. friend in regard to that. I may have a tender feeling for the farmer, but I do feel that this proposed tariff arrangement places entirely too heavy a burden upon the agricultural industry of this country.

My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) the other night referred to the question of fertilizer. I want also to refer to this article which is so important to the farmer. I understood the hon. gentleman who preceded me to say that they did not use a great deal of fertilizer in Ontario, and that it was not in as general use there as it was in the maritime proinces. I am sure that they use very little of this fertilizer in the western provinces, because the peculiar soil which they have there does not require the use of large quantities of fertilizer for the production of crops. Those who are attempting to make a living on the farms of the maritime provinces have to depend almost entirely upon fertilizers for plant food. The farmer in the maritime provinces has not the large acreage that the farmer in the west has. The farmer in New Brunswick with a farm of 50 or 75 acres is considered to have a large farm. The farmer who undertakes to make his living off 50 or 75 acres, or even less than that, must have a very large yield per acre; therefore he must use a great deal of fertilizer to secure that large production per acre.

An hon. gentleman who addressed this House a few days ago only told 11 p.m. half the story when he said that there had been only $45,000 paid in duty on fertilizers imported into this country during the fiscal year ended March, 1914. He referred only to the manufactured article used by the farmer. He left out the ingredients that go to make up this compound, and most of which ingredients have hitherto come into Canada free. The increased duty on compounded and manufactured fertilizer upon the basis of our importation during the fiscal year 1914 will be $46,438.55. Then, we must take into consideration the ingredients that go to make up the manufactured fertilizer that is imported and manufactured or mixed at home. The increase on acid phosphate alone will be $7,356.07. In addition, there were free imports of blast furnace slag, phosphate rock, fish offal and refuse, crude bones, bone dust, and charred bone, guano and other manures, nitrate of ammonia, kainit and potash, chlorate of potash, potash muriate, and nitrate of potash, amounting to $1,008,539 on which the duty will be, under the 7½ per cent increase, $75,640,.42. The whole increase to the farmers on fertilizer imported into this country will therefore be not $45,000, but $75,640.42. The whole increase to the is a mere bagatelle. In view of the fact that the largest quantity of this fertilizer is used in the maritime provinces it means quite a large bagatelle to the farmers in that part of the country.

That is not all the burden that has been placed upon the farmers and agricultural people of our country by the proposed increase in duties brought down by the Minister of Finance. Take the very question that my hon. friend spoke about with regard to the agricultural implements that are being imported into Canada. Take the customs returns for the year ended March 31, 1914, and take the different machinery, such as cream separators, ploughs, mowers, fencing, barbed wire, spring wire, threshing machinery, cultivators, seeders, manure-spreaders and other items, and you will find that the increased duty that will be imposed on the farmers of this country will amount to $701,727.37. It is really a direct tax on the farmers, although imposed on the articles indirectly. Seeds, which were formerly on the free list, are now subject to a duty of 7½ per cent, and on seeds alone the duty amounts to $15,705.71.

Let me recapitulate as follows:

Increased duty on fertilizer ..	$130,435.04
Increased duty on farm machinery, wire fencing, etc.	701,727,37
Increased duty on seeds	15,705.71
Total	$847,868.12

The farmers of this country will have to pay that amount in excess of what they paid under the late Government for the things they must have for their farm work. It is more than a mere bagatelle to the farmer. That amount, however, is not the worst feature of the tax on the farmers. While the farmers are paying that amount to the Dominion Treasury, they are paying to my good friends the manufacturers of this country the sum of $2,543,604.36. I estimate that on the basis that, for every dollar's worth of goods that we import from foreign countries, we use three dollars' worth of goods manufactured in our own country. I believe the proportion is even greater than three to one. I have no quarrel with the manufacturers. While I am referring particularly to the case of the farmers and agriculturists, I have never had occasion during my short political career, when referring to matters such as this, to offer sympathy to the farmers. Sympathy is not what they want. They are not beggars. They do not want sympathy, they want fair treatment. You are treating the farmer fairly when you are giving him—as the old Government did—fertilizers practically free. Until 1913 he had his fertilizers absolutely free because the basic slag was brought in free. If I remember aright, during the session of 1913 the Government, or the Board of Customs, arbitrarily placed basic slag among the manufactured or mixed fertilizers with a tariff rate of 10 per cent. That was done upon the request of one individual who manufactured basic slag in Cape Breton, in the province of Nova Scotia, in order to assist this firm in maintaining high prices and thus sacrificing the interests of every farmer in Canada to that extent.

My hon. friends have spoken considerably and we have seen a great deal of advertising in the press supporting the Government in regard to the patriotism-and-production campaign. That is the splendid phrase and I think there is nothing that would so please the people of this country as to realize that this Government is giving them something in the way of patriotism and production. I find that my hon. friends from New Brunswick have been holding a number of meetings under that heading. Those meetings are held, as I understand, under the patronage of the Minister of Agriculture of this Government, in conjunction with the Minister of Agriculture of the Provincial Government. In the county of Westmorland they have been telling the farmers how they can increase their production. I was somewhat sorry to find that the gentlemen who were going through the county of Westmorland telling the farmers how they could get a bigger production on the farms were a dental surgeon, Dr. Price, from the city of Moncton, and a merchant, Mr. F. B. Black, from the town of Sackville. I want to be absolutely fair. They had with them a gentleman by the name of Mr. Blair. I do not know what position he holds, but I suppose he is an agriculturist. I do not want to say anything that would be offensive, but it seems to me that the meetings held throughout the province of New Brunswick, under the patronage of the Minister of Agriculture, who has not been able to be in the House for some time, and of the hon. Minister of Agriculture for the province of New Brunswick, instead of having as their object patriotism for Canada and greater production on the farm, they have as their object patriotism to the Conservative party and the greater proportion of Conservative votes in the province of New Brunswick. That seems to be more in keeping with the attitude of my hon. friends in the province of New Brunswick. The Government should consider well what it means to a very great portion of the population of this country to increase the duties on the raw materials of the farmers who use them to turn out their finished product and give it to the people of this country.

Now, I wish to follow that line of argument for a moment, and I promise you, Mr. Speaker, that I will not draw it out too long. For every dollar of extra cost you make the farmer pay in carrying on his work of production, with a view to building up these great cities which, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bowman) says, are built up by the protective tariff, you make the consumer pay on the goods that he and his family consume. There are to-day in this country many men who are not able to earn even the necessaries of life; and as soon as the duties are increased and it costs the farmer more to produce his bushel of wheat or oats, his ton of hay or his pound of beef, that extra expense goes to the consumer of that article. And the consumer for whom I speak especially, and speak with all sincerity, is the workingman of our country. When the Government levy taxation upon a class of people who are not able to pay it, they are doing injustice to the country, and I believe that they will regret in a short time that these taxes are imposed upon the people.

I have numerous letters and telegrams dealing with these matters. It seems very strange to me that hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the other side have declared that the farmers are absolutely satisfied, that they have not had a single comment to show that there is any opposition to these measures. I would not like to insinuate that these hon. gentlemen have had suggestions from the farmers, but I should like to know what the Acting Minister of Agriculture must have thought as his supporters one after another have arisen and declared that they have had no word from their constituencies with regard to this matter. Do the Government say they have had no protest from New Brunswick with regard to increasing the duty on fertilizers? We have the evidence of the Minister of Agriculture of the province of New Brunswick himself, who speaks officially for every farmer in that province, that he had sent in protest after protest to this Government in regard to fertilizers. Yet hon. gentlemen say that everybody is satisfied and everybody loyally willing to pay these taxes. No doubt they are loyal, and those of them who are able to pay are quite willing to do so. But you cannot get blood out of a post, and there are hundreds, and thousands, and tens of thousands of men in this country to whom the imposition of this unjust and iniquitous tax will prove a heavy burden and one, that I believe, they will not be able to bear. If hon. gentlemen opposite have heard nothing against this measure, I should like them to read the Farmers' Advocate, a farming journal published in the province of New Brunswick. Here is a long article—I do not propose to read it—giving a most logical and cogent argument against this increase in the duties.

Mr. GRAHAM: That paper is published in London, Ont., too.

Mr. COPP: Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not by Liberals either.

Mr. COPP: I do not know that it makes it any stronger that it is published by Conservatives. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Graham) may have more faith in Conservatives than I have. It is a journal published in the interests of the agriculturists of this country. I believe the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) will bear me out when I say that the farmers of New Brunswick are trying, and I believe sincerely trying, to place agriculture on a stronger and better foundation than that on which it has rested in the past. That being so, I think the hon. gentleman might have used his influence with this Government; and if he had even in this one partcular induced his colleague the Minister of Finance to say "We," instead of "I," and to take him into his confidence, he might have been able to save his farmer friends in the province of New Brunswick. I know he has a tender feeling for the farmers, as I have myself. I believe that if he had used his influence, as he would have done had he taken the matter seriously—as seriously as I believe he is taking it now—he would have taken some measures to see that our people are not so over-taxed, for, incidentally, taxing the farmers is taxing the labourers as well as every other consumer.

Taking the customs returns for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1914, and working them out on the basis of the imports into Canada during that year, I gained some striking information. If you turn to page 441 of that report, you will find that in the province of New Brunswick during that year we imported $6,907,434 worth of dutiable goods. It may sound local to speak of my own province, but I wish to bring it close home. On these imports we paid a duty of $2,201,144.66. We imported also $7,477,125 worth of goods free of duty. This makes our total importation $14,364,559. Now, I have taken the trouble to compute what this increase of duty will mean to the province of New Brunswick. If the same quantity of goods are imported as during the year to which I refer, the taxes on our dutiable goods will be increased by $518,-057.55. The goods formerly on the free list and now subject to a duty of 7½ per cent will amount to $560,784.37. This makes the total increase of duties to be paid $1,078,841.92. Bringing that nearer home, I find that my own county of Westmorland—for the advantage of having my Conservative friends to carry on the affairs of Government for the last three years, while they have been going headlong into expenditure—will pay into the public treasury, in addition to what it paid under the late Government, $136,539.26.

I have made a further computation for the benefit of my Conservative friends who represent constituencies in the province of New Brunswick. The price that Charlotte county will pay for the privilege of having a Conservative member in this House is $64,709.82. I have every respect for the hon. gentleman who represents that constituency (Mr. Hartt), but I rather believe that $64,000 annually is more than he is worth to the county. The county of Kent will be charged $74,590.56 for the privilege of participating in the arrangement made by hon. gentlemen opposite. The constituency of Kings and Albert will pay $92,772.10 for the part which they took in putting the Conservatives in power in 1911. The county of York will pay $96,000. These are merely a few of the computations; hon. gentlemen who represent other constituencies in the province of New Brunswick may figure it out for themselves. These figures are emphatic indications of what it means to the people of the maritime provinces—yes, to the people of the whole Dominion—to have my right hon. friend the present Prime Minister at the head of the Government and to have as his colleague and Minister of Finance the hon. gentleman who, to use his own words, has had placed upon his shoulders a burden heavier than that borne by any other Minister of Finance in the Dominion of Canada.

I do not know why hon. gentlemen opposite have imposed this taxation upon the people on the pretext of its being a war tax. I presume they have their own reasons for doing so. I do not want to throw out the insinuation that they are trying in any way to deceive the people in regard to this matter, but is it possible that hon. gentlemen opposite really believe in their heart of hearts that they are paying a war tax when they buy a one cent postage stamp to put beside the two cent stamp on a letter? For that two cent stamp, if for nothing else, hon. gentlemen opposite will give the late Liberal Administration credit. Do hon. gentlemen believe that the purchase of that extra one cent stamp constitute the payment of a war tax in every sense of the word? Have hon. gentlemen considered what the people will think of this extra taxation? Would it not have been just as well, instead of having two stamps, to make the postage three cents and have done with it, the extra cent going to the Post Office Department? Hon. gentlemen might just as well have come to this House and said frankly: we are going to increase the rate of postage to the rate which prevailed in 1896. That is what it means to the people of this country. The hon. Finance Minister addressing the House yesterday, said that this tax was a mere bagatelle so far as the people were concerned; that it was the businessmen who wrote hundreds of letters who would have to pay the tax. The businessman who writes hundreds of letters is well able to write them and to pay the additional postage, but when the mother sends her weekly or monthly letter to her son in the trenches, she will be called upon to pay an extra cent on that letter. I do not think that is the kind of loyalty which should be shown by the people of Canada. The hon. minister said yesterday: we are taxing the banks; the Bank of Montreal will pay $150,000 a year. Does my hon. friend, great as he is in finance, in arithmetic and in economics, think that he can hoodwink the people by making such an assertion? Did he ever see a financial institution in Canada or anywhere else that could not find some means of turning the screw another notch in order to take the extra cost out of the people who do business with them? It is the people who will have to pay, not the banks; that cannot be refuted.

I believe that my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals has been guilty of carelessness or laxity in respect of the Intercolonial railway. I do not believe that the hon. Minister fully realizes what this railway means to the people of the maritime provinces. Hon. gentlemen have heard this question discussed year after year in an abler manner than I can ever hope to discuss it, even if I had time. The Intercolonial railway was built by the Dominion of Canada as a bond of confederation between the maritime provinces and the great provinces to the West. Many things, perhaps, were done in the early days of our history that would not be done under the present conditions; many things are done to-day which would not have been carried out then, but if it were not specifically set out clause by clause it certainly must at least have been implied that the Intercolonial railway should be built and operated to give the people of the maritime provinces an efficient and up-to-date service. To-day the Intercolonial railway is not being operated in the interests of people who live along the line. The hon. member who represents the county of Colchester (Mr. Stanfield) as well as other hon. gentlemen who represent constituencies served by the Intercolonial railway, will agree with me in this assertion. The taking off of the Ocean Limited, the best train that ever ran from Halifax to Montreal, makes the Intercolonial railway subservient to the Canadian Pacific railway. It takes away the traffic, and the man going from Halifax to Montreal who in nine cases out of ten would take the Ocean Limited, to-day takes the Canadian Pacific railway because it saves time and is a better service. My hon. friend says that the Ocean Limited will be restored as soon as trade brightens up; but by that time travellers will have become accustomed to using the Canadian Pacific railway, and it will be difficult to induce them to change back. The people in northern New Brunswick and in Nova Scotia I believe are greatly dissatisfied with the present condition. The Minister of Railways and Canals has increased the freight rates on the Intercolonial railway and makes the excuse that he does this because he wants to make the Intercolonial railway, as far as possible, a paying institution. I would advise my hon. friend, instead of increasing the freight rates on the people who use that road, to cut down the salary of the manager of the Intercolonial railway from $20,000 to $10,000 and save money there, instead of increasing the salaries of the higher officials. The gentleman who to-day is living in Ottawa on a superannuation retiring allowance looked after and ran the Intercolonial railway as well as it is run to-day, and I think the largest salary he ever received was some $6,000 a year. For the same work to-day, if you figure out the number who are employed as assistant superintendents and this, that and the other, you will find that where it formerly cost the Dominion of Canada from $6,000 to $10,000 it is costing now from $60,000 to $70,000 for the same service. While we pay the extra wages, we are not getting as good service as under the old arrangement from our old friend who for so many years so ably presided over the destinies of that railroad.

Many things have been said during the debate contrasting the administration of the present Government and the late Government. Taking the pledges and platforms of the two parties and reading them as they have been read during this debate, we find a wonderful conglomeration of platforms and promises, fulfilled and unfulfilled. But that is neither here nor there; the people of Canada hold the present Government responsible for the present situation of affairs in this country. They are the gentlemen who are responsible. My hon. friend may talk about the Liberals and we may talk about the Conservatives; these are the fashionable names for the parties. But we can go a little further, we can refer to the Liberal party as the revenue tariff party, believing in as much interchange of commodities with foreign countries as possible, at as low a tariff rate as possible and with as many items on the free list as possible while the other party believes in high protection. Go a step further down and it is nearer the truth to say that the Liberal party is the party whose main object is the interest of the masses of this country, while the Conservative party is the party who has the interest of the classes at heart. It is for the people of this country, comparing the record of the Liberal party for the fifteen years of their administration and the Conservative party for the three years they have been in power, to make their choice; sooner or later the record of these parties and the present condition of the country must be left to the jury of our country, and whatever their verdict may be the members on this side of the House will be satisfied to abide by it.

On motion of Mr. Ball, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden, the House adjourned at 11.40 p.m.
