SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House of Commons did attend his Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I have the honour to welcome you to the Second Session of the 30th Parliament of Canada.

I am proud to be able to speak with you once more after an absence occasioned by an affliction which forced my withdrawal from public life for a time.

I now have a better understanding of our human frailty, but I have also learned the depths of devotion of those who love us as well as the strength of the human will to survive.

I would like to take this opportunity to offer my thanks to all my fellow citizens who sent their best wishes for my health and who remembered me in their prayers.

The activities of this year have taken me from the grounds of Rideau Hall and across the country. Two of my engagements took me to Vancouver, for the United Nations Habitat conference, and to Montreal, for the Olympic Games.

The whole world was our guest for these two events, and I was struck by the contrast between those of us in Canada who are sometimes inflicted with morbid self-analysis, and those who come to us from other lands, and see Canada as a country truly blessed.

[Text]

For the Olympic Games, the Queen and her family came to Quebec and Ontario, after a visit by Her Majesty and Prince Philip to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick; everywhere they received a warm welcome.

Next year, of course, Her Majesty will celebrate the Silver Jubilee of her accession to the Throne. She will be spending a few days in Ottawa to celebrate it with us, and to celebrate also the Jubilee of the appointment of the first Canadian-born Governor General in Canada, and the 10th anniversary of the foundation of the Order of Canada. This will be the seventh time in ten years that the Queen has visited Canada.

As we assemble in this historic place the day after Thanksgiving Day, it is fitting for all of us to pause and give thanks for the remarkable freedom we enjoy as Canadians, and for those human and natural resources which give Canada a favoured position among the nations of the world.

Because of the basic underlying strength of the economy, and because of the co-operation of the majority of Canadians which is making the anti-inflation program work, Canada has better reasons for confidence and optimism than has virtually any other nation. Our storehouse of natural resources, our food-producing ability, our labour and management skills present Canada with growth opportunities which are shared by few other industrialized countries. The fundamental reality which will guide our deliberations is that Canada is entering upon a decade of opportunity.

It is our strength, and our confidence in ourselves which give us the real opportunity to make greater progress toward those goals which all Canadians share—national unity, equality of opportunity, and the enhancement of individual rights.

I—National Unity

In order to promote that level of unity among Canadians without which we cannot be truly free, truly one nation, nor hope to achieve our shared national goals, the Government will place a very high priority upon the promotion of better understanding among French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians, and upon the achievement of formal constitutional independence.

Since 1968 the policy of official languages, supported by all parties represented in Parliamnt, has been based on the principle of equality, and on the right of Canadians to speak English or French according to their own will. An essential consequence, agreed by Parliament, is that the federal government provide services in the two official languages in the National Capital, and wherever else there is sufficient demand for such services.

The policy is one of fairness and reasonableness toward the people speaking the two official languages of Canada; and the Government is of the view that it must be maintained in the interests of justice and of the unity of Canada.

Canada is a diverse country. Unity can result only from a recognition of that diversity, and not from any attempt to impose rigid uniformity. In matters of language and culture, it is important to recognize the personality of the various parts of the country without departing from fundamental principles of justice and generosity, which should apply everywhere.

The Government has established programs intended to give real meaning to the official languages policy. Some of these measures have proven successful, and will be continued. Others have not, and will be modified.

Grievances originating from public servants through the Commissioner of Official Languages will continue to be reviewed, in order to fulfill the Government's commitment to ensure maximum fairness and effectiveness in the implementation of the official languages policy.

The Government remains committed to the enhancement of the bilingual capacity of the federal public service. However, it believes that a better balance should be established between the money spent to introduce bilingualism in the public service and the money spent to enable more Canadians, particularly young people, to learn to communicate in both official languages. The Government is convinced that a great majority of Canadians are dedicated to the strengthening of bonds among Canadians speaking our two official languages, and belonging to our many different cultures.

[Translation]

Canadians appear particularly anxious that their children have the best possible chance of understanding their compatriots of the other language. Consequently, the Government intends to discuss with the provinces arrangements to increase the effectiveness of training in both official languages in the school systems across Canada.

The Government also intends to increase programs to enable young people from various parts of the country to learn more about one another.

II—Equality of Opportunity

While it is essential to national unity that all Canadians believe we have an equal opportunity to be fully ourselves in a cultural sense, it is just as essential to unity that we enjoy equal opportunities for individual and regional economic fulfilment.

To translate Canada's economic potential into real growth and equality of opportunity, we must be both clear-sighted in our recognition of the obstacles which lie in our path, and united in our determination to remove them.

The most important obstacle is inflation; a destructive force which we all know can take jobs and income away from our workers, rob the elderly of the value of their savings, stunt the dreams of families for a better life, impede the flow of capital necessary for industrial growth, and obstruct the fight against poverty and inequality.

The continued reduction of inflation, and the creation of many more employment opportunities for Canadians, are and will continue to be the Government's highest priorities.

To create the climate necessary for the achievement of these two vital objectives, the Government will continue to practise fiscal restraint. The control of inflation will remain the single most important condition for economic stability in Canada, even after price and income controls are removed. Determined restraint in fiscal and monetary policy is essential to the long-term control of inflation.

The Government remains committed to a reduction in the growth of the public service. In the ten years prior to 1975-76 authorized man-years in the public service grew at an average annual rate of 4 per cent. This year the growth rate was reduced to 1.5 per cent, requiring actual reductions in 27 departments and agencies. The Government will reduce the rate of growth to below one per cent in the coming fiscal year.

In a further effort to reduce the size of government as well as expand the range of opportunities for private enterprise, all federal programs will be reviewed to identify those government activities which could be transferred to the private sector without reducing the quality of service to the public.

The international trading environment will profoundly influence our economic performance, and significant progress will be sought by Canada in the Multilateral Trade Negotiations and through other trade development initiatives. To support private industry in meeting greater international competition, the Government will modify substantially its industrial assistance programs.

[Mr. Speaker.]

[Text]

The Government also places a very high value on the contribution small businesses make to the economic and social well-being of Canadians. Small owner-managed firms are a mainstay of employment in cities and towns across the country. They supply goods and services essential to consumers and to other business, and they demonstrate the innovation and entrepreneurship from which successful enterprise must spring. More than that, small businesses, and the people who own them, manage them, and work in them, are the economic backbone of countless communities throughout Canada.

The Government will introduce measures to assist small businesses by improving local access to financial assistance and other services provided by government departments, the Federal Business Development Bank, and financial institutions in the private sector.

In response to concerns expressed by many Canadian businessmen, the Government will establish a better balance between the need for economic data, and the paperwork burden thereby imposed on small firms. The number of firms required to make statistical reports to government will be substantially reduced. Those larger companies which will still be required to submit information on a regular basis will be able to do so on fewer and simpler reporting forms.

In pursuit of the goal of a higher rate of employment, it will be necessary to improve the efficiency of the labour market and actively hasten the return of unemployed workers to productive effort. Adequate income is a pre-requisite to human dignity; and the Government believes most unemployed Canadians would much prefer to secure that income through worthwhile work than through public assistance. In some cases, and locations, this goal can be achieved only through direct job creation by governments.

You will therefore be asked to approve a comprehensive, year-round, direct job creation program, directed particularly toward areas of chronic high unemployment. Other programs will provide more job opportunities and improved employment counselling for young people.

The Government will not compete with the private sector for the services of unemployed workers, but will create jobs in areas where its efforts will be a necessary supplement to private sector activity.

You will be asked to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act in ways which will permit insurance funds to be used to maintain the income of Canadians being trained for new jobs, and to help employers retain workers who might otherwise be temporarily laid off.

To facilitate these improvements, the Government proposes the merger of the operations of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the Manpower and Immigration Department, so that Canadians may obtain employment support services at a single source.

You will be asked to consider amendments to the Immigration Act, designed to promote Canada's regional and urban development goals, promote family unity, achieve a balance between immigration levels and employment opportunities, and preserve Canada's reputation as an open, tolerant society which welcomes the energy and cultural diversity of people from all parts of the world.

The improvement of labour-management relations in Canada is an essential pre-condition to economic stability. While it considers the collective bargaining system to be one of the important ways of ensuring fair wages in a democratic society, the Government and Canadians generally are deeply disturbed by the loss of productivity and increased social tensions which frequently result from the inadequacies of that system.

The solution is not to be found in excessive restriction of collective bargaining rights, but rather in the development of better mechanisms for settling disputes in a less adversarial, more co-operative manner.

The Government therefore intends to work with the provinces and with labour and business communities to develop a number of initiatives aimed at improving labour-management relations.

It is intended to establish a collective bargaining information centre, which will offer objective economic and compensation data to all parties. It is also intended to encourage greater participation by plant workers in decisions affecting their working conditions; to expand labour education programs; to develop a voluntary code of fair practices; and to establish a national institution dedicated to improving the quality of life in the workplace.

An industrial safety and health centre will be established to assist companies and workers in their efforts to identify and remove hazards.

The Government will work closely with its own employees in various departments and Crown corporations to implement innovative, co-operative methods of improving health and safety conditions. In effect, the Government intends to use its own operations to test new methods of improving working conditions and labour-management relations.

[Text]

Measures will be proposed to improve the collective bargaining system in the public service, to reduce the adversarial nature of the process and to ensure an equitable relationship between compensation levels in the public and private sectors.

The Government intends to promote greater freedom and efficiency in the marketplace, and thus reinforce the market system's vital role in the allocation of national resources among national needs.

Significant revisions to laws promoting competition in the marketplace will be placed before you. The Government is determined to preserve and enhance Canada's traditional policy of reliance on individual enterprise as the mainspring of economic activity.

The focus of the second stage of competition policy reform will be a strengthening of the laws governing mergers and monopolies in order to encourage a more efficient and dynamic economy; one that rewards the creative and the industrious; that allows prices to be determined by the free play of market forces while protecting the marketplace from excessive concentrations of power. The more effectively competition governs the marketplace, the less necessity there will be for detailed regulation and control of the economy by governments.

On the other hand, where competition is inadequate the Government must intervene to protect the public interest. For this reason, changes will be introduced to the National Transportation Act to protect against unfair freight rates.

There is a growing awareness among Canadians of the need for more careful conservation of vital energy resources such as petroleum and natural gas. The Government will place further emphasis on research and development of renewable energy sources and on means of improving the efficiency with which energy is used in Canada, particularly the thermal efficiency of residential and commercial buildings.

To ensure responsible development of our indigenous resources, the Government intends to introduce measures to regulate exploration and development on federal lands.

With a view to conserving the food resources of the sea, and improving the livelihood of Canadian fishermen, the Government will proclaim by the first of January its extended jurisdiction over waters within two hundred miles of our coastline.

As a further element of the Government's food policy, measures will be introduced to make more farm-stored crops eligible for advance payments. The Government will also work with the provinces and farm organizations to strengthen the structure and productivity of Canadian agriculture.

In the field of social policy, extensive federal-provincial discussions over the past three years have resulted in a new framework for the sharing of costs and for making social service programs more responsive. Parliament will therefore be asked to consider a new Social Services Act which will substantially improve the effectiveness of cost-shared social services in Canada, especially for the aged, children and the handicapped.

In response to the need for good day-care services everywhere in Canada, the Government will help to provide more and better day-care services by encouraging the provincial governments to adopt a new system of fees related to incomes. A great many more Canadian mothers who seek employment outside the home will thereby be free to do so, because partially subsidized day-care will be more widely available.

You will be asked to consider amendments to the Canada Pension Plan which would further recognize the value of the contribution made to the family and society by both marriage partners, in the event that one remains at home to raise children while their partner works outside the home, or in the event of marriage breakdown.

On January first, the indexing of family allowance payments will be resumed to compensate for the rise in the cost of living during 1976.

In the areas of medical insurance, hospital insurance and post-secondary education, negotiations will continue with the provinces concerning the gradual introduction of new financial and administrative arrangements. These changes would not only allow the provinces to exercise greater flexibility in the provision of services, but would also serve the federal government's goal of co-operative restraint upon the rising cost of health and social security programs.

Of equal importance to the social well-being of Canadians is an adequate supply of affordable housing in a satisfactory community environment. Therefore, the goal of one million new homes over four years remains a key element of the Government's housing policy. In concert with other levels of government and the private sector the Government will work to increase the efficiency and impact of Canada's total housing effort.

The Government attaches continuing importance to meeting the aspirations of Canada's native peoples and, in particular, to the just settlement of their land claims. At this session, you will be asked to approve the negotiated settlement of claims in the James Bay region.

In the aftermath of the highly successful Montreal Olympics, and the gratifying results achieved by Canadian athletes, federal support for selected amateur sport and fitness programs will be further augmented.

[Text]

This year, the Law Reform Commission of Canada submitted a report on family law which merits the attention of all Canadians. The Government intends to carry on discussions with the provinces to encourage the creation of unified Family Courts with comprehensive jurisdiction over family law permitting disputes to be dealt with more constructively. In addition the government will discuss with the provinces and with the public other aspects of family law bearing on the stability of marriage, the protection of children and the fair sharing of the economic consequences of marital breakdown.

Canadians are becoming increasingly sensitive to the fact that Canada cannot live in dignity as a nation while other people, in less fortunate lands, live in a state of deprivation and hopelessness.

It is not in Canada's economic, political or moral interest to allow the gap to widen between the wealth of the few and the poverty of the many. Therefore the Government will continue to participate in the task of shaping a new international economic order, designed to provide a greater measure of hope to nations seeking the opportunity to help themselves.

The world is now confronted with a broad range of problems of such complexity and widespread scope that no single nation or group of nations is able to apply effective solutions. Only global solutions will do.

Increasingly, therefore, Canada's international activities are being directed toward broad-scale co-operative activities. Human settlements, the law of the sea, environmental protection, food and resources production, terrorism, population growth, control of nuclear armaments, economic development—all demand shared responsibility and universal involvement.

III—Individual Freedom

In speaking about the Government's plans to promote greater unity of spirit and equality of opportunity both in the world community and here at home, it becomes obvious that the achievement of both those goals demands a healthy respect for individual rights, particularly the right of free men and women to exert a real influence over decisions affecting their own future.

At a time of growing complexity in public affairs it is especially important to enhance the citizen's right of access to the information necessary to make well-informed judgements and take responsible action.

The Government therefore places great value on the continuing work of the joint parliamentary committee which has been studying the question of freedom of information, and plans to submit a policy paper to that committee in the hope that early agreement might be reached on the best methods to improve public access to government information. In the meantime, the Government will increase the number and range of internal documents available to the public.

To the same end, you will be asked to consider a Bill designed to clarify the duties and responsibilities of the Auditor General of Canada, and to provide him with better means of fulfilling his important function as a servant of Parliament.

In a similar effort to remove obstacles to information and to equal opportunity, the Government will introduce a Human Rights Bill. The major effect of the Bill will be to prohibit discrimination on the grounds of race, colour, national or ethnic origin, religion, age, sex, marital status, or physical handicap. In particular, the Bill will establish the principle of equal compensation for work of equal value performed by persons of either sex. It will establish a citizen's statutory right to gain greater access to personal records in federal information banks and to correct that information when it is in error. It will also limit the gathering of personal information by the Government.

[Text]

The Government and all Parliamentarians are concerned about the extent to which the average citizen is informed about Parliament. The Government wishes to provide access to the Parliamentary process for as many Canadians as possible. It will therefore seek approval to enable the proceedings of the House of Commons to be broadcast.

IV—Role of Government

It is essential to the enhancement of unity, equality of opportunity and individual freedom that Canadians work together in a spirit of co-operation and mutual respect. To that end, it is important for all participants to have a well defined view of their respective roles in the pursuit of national objectives.

It is appropriate, therefore, to define the role of government in economic and social planning and action. There are some who acknowledge only a very limited role for government, believing that the market system allocates resources most efficiently for production and growth, is least wasteful, and most conducive to individual liberty and initiative.

That view is vigorously opposed by those who insist on a continually expanding role for government in directing economic growth, correcting the inadequacies of the market system, and assuring a socially acceptable distribution of incomes. This view asserts that government spending and intervention must increase to compensate for the failure of the market to serve social goals.

The Government favours a middle road between those two extremes.

This middle road represents a commitment to a society in which all Canadians can develop their full potential, a society in which justice, compassion, tolerance and understanding lead to a strong and united Canada, a society based upon individual initiative and marked by personal freedom. The choice of the middle road implies a reliance on the market to stimulate the growth Canada needs, together with an enduring commitment to social justice and equality of opportunity. On the other hand, that choice also implies that the working of the market must be improved and that less costly, less interventionist ways must be found to pursue social goals.

These choices have shaped the Government's legislative program for the coming months, just as it will shape appropriate policies for the post-control period.

Obviously, the development of the new strategies required by the times in which we live will demand the closest possible co-operation among governments, workers, businessmen, cooperative and voluntary organizations and all other sectors of society. To that end, the Government will launch a major series of consultations throughout Canada to secure a greater sharing of economic and social responsibility among all Canadians.

Consultation in this context does not mean simply informing the public about Government decisions. Nor does it mean an aimless search for the opinions of others. It means that the Government will place before interested Canadians its assessment of the major problems we must solve together, and its definition of the available options.

Parliament will have a vital role to play, as of course will the provincial governments and their municipalities. For example, the provinces will be asked to enter into early consultations with the federal government on the renewal of agreements relating to the anti-inflation program, and on the process by which, at the appropriate time, controls may be removed.

The Government is confident that Canada will realize the great potential of the next decade, because Canadians in all sectors of our society are opening their minds to the future, and are demonstrating a willingness to adopt the means necessary to translate opportunity into reality. Canada will make steady progress toward the goals of national unity, equality of opportunity, and the enhancement of individual freedom, because the people of this country have the courage to tackle difficult problems, the will to take our own future into our own hands, and the wisdom to understand that we work effectively only when we work together.

You will be asked to consider other legislative proposals.

Members of the House of Commons,

The Government intends to present a budget in this Session.

You will be asked to appropriate the funds required to carry on the services and expenditures authorized by Parliament.

Honourable Members of the Senate,

Members of the House of Commons,

May Divine Providence guide you in your deliberations.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister) moved: That the Speech of his Excellency the Governor General delivered this day from the throne to the two houses of parliament be taken into consideration later today.

THE LATE ALBANIE MORIN

TRIBUTE TO DECEASED MEMBER

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all hon. members and yourself particularly will wish to join me in paying tribute to our colleague Albanie Morin who passed away two weeks ago.

[English]

She held a very special place in this chamber assisting you as Assistant Deputy Chairman of Committees. Mrs. Morin was the first woman in Canadian history to hold a position with the Chair in the House of Commons, and did so with great distinction. In addition to her legal and academic background, she brought to that job a quality of fairness and understanding and grace which won her the respect and the affection of all of us.

[Translation]

It is with great sorrow that we heard of her illness last year. Her courage did not waver during those long months and one of her dearest wishes was to return among us to the House of Commons.

On behalf of our party I wish to express our sympathy to the people of Louis-Hébert riding, to her family and children for whom she has been an example that they can rightly be proud of.

[English]

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I want to associate myself with the remarks of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

[Translation]

. . . and on behalf of all Progressive Conservative members, I should like to pay tribute to the memory of Mrs. Albanie Morin.

Her death is a loss for this House, for Quebec, and for Canada as a whole. During her rather brief stay in the Commons, she showed a deep sense of duty and a profound respect for people. Whenever Mrs. Morin chaired our proceedings, she did so with great dignity, because she had an exceptional understanding of a member's role. She had that rare quality of being able to listen, and she would give everyone a sympathetic ear, sound advice and unqualified encouragement.

Along with all Canadians, we mourn today a great lady who served her country to the end.

[English]

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues I should like to join with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) in extending our sympathies to the father of Madam Morin and to her children.

Madam Morin was a woman who served her municipality, her province and her country well for a number of years having been elected, as we all know, as a city councillor before being elected twice to this chamber. She was in the best sense of the term a committed politician who believed very seriously in the positions she took in this House.

[Translation]

. . . she always found pleasure and gratification in serving as a member of this House. She indeed indicated that her happiest days were those she spent in Parliament.

[English]

She was a fine, dedicated woman and an exceptionally committed member of parliament. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, all my colleagues in the House extend to her father and to her children their very deepest sympathy.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my party, I wish to join with the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark), and the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) in extending to Mrs. Morin's children our deepest sympathy on the tragic loss of their mother.

As was so rightly said, Mrs. Morin soon gained the esteem and respect of every member of the House. When she chaired our proceedings, she followed the debate very closely, and she always intervened very tactfully when she saw fit to interrupt a member.

I should like to recall a very important mission she carried out abroad last year, more specifically in Mauritius, as a member of a Canadian delegation to the conference of the International Association of French-speaking Parliamentarians. She was asked to chair the proceedings for a whole day on the occasion of the International Women's Year.

It was with great dignity that she presided over the proceedings on that important day, and I was proud as a Canadian to count among our fellow citizens a person able to do honour to Canada internationally.

Her passing is a great loss for the House of Commons, for Canada and for the province of Quebec, and it is with deep emotion that we pay tribute to such a devoted person. It is a fact that in this House, regardless of political affiliations, in times of trial, when a member of the House dies prematurely, as is the case for Mrs. Morin, we feel greater friendship and respect for each other. We remain human beings, and this is how we must behave and what we must remember every day, that although our discussions are quite lively at times, we still remain human beings.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With the leave of the House, I should like to add a few personal words to express my feelings on such a sad occasion. It is fitting that Mrs. Morin's children should be in the gallery at present. I therefore wish to call the House's attention to the presence of Mrs. Morin's son and daughter in the gallery.

[English]

May I add one point. Having had the great assistance and support of Madam Morin in the task of presiding over the meetings of this chamber, I can say without flattery that she demonstrated all the qualities necessary for presiding over the meetings of this chamber. She exhibited such qualities of dedication, discipline and courage as to lead all of us to believe that she would have become the first woman Speaker of the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MR. MAURICE HARQUAIL AND SECONDED BY MR. CLAUDE-ANDRÉ LACHANCE

The House proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): First of all, Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to extend the sincere thanks of this House to His Excellency the Governor General and to Her Excellency Madam Léger who demonstrated courage and skill in being the voice of her husband this afternoon in the other place, a task which she performed so well, thus becoming an example to all Canadian women.

I should like to congratulate you, sir, on returning as our Speaker in this new session. I am confident that members from all four corners of this chamber join me in expressing to you our best wishes for continued success during this coming session.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I am happy that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his cabinet have asked me to move the motion to adopt the Speech from the Throne. I should like to speak not only of the importance of this speech but more particularly of the benefits which all Canadians will derive from it.

[English]

I wish to take a moment to express the gratitude of the citizens of my beautiful riding of Restigouche to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for his kind invitation to me to move the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I was honoured that not only the Prime Minister but several cabinet ministers as well visited my riding, one of the most beautiful ridings in Canada.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

An hon. Member: Are you in trouble?

Mr. Harquail: I thank the Prime Minister for his kind invitation to me to move the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. It is a singular honour and privilege which I am proud to accept on behalf of my constituents.

Mr. Paproski: Good luck in the next federal election.

Mr. Harquail: I am sure that all members of the House join me in expressing our warm wishes to our new House leader, the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen), for a successful session. He has had a distinguished career, especially during his previous tenure as House leader, and we are confident that he will once again lead us effectively in passing new legislation which this government feels is vital to the success and future of this great country.

● (1520)

Permit me now, sir, to say a few words about the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc), the minister who represents New Brunswick in the cabinet. Not only is he a hard working minister, but it is apparent that he has gained the respect of everyone with whom he has worked.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harquail: I have grown to appreciate and admire his sincere and effective approach to his responsibilities.

I want to take this occasion to congratulate those colleagues of mine who have recently been promoted from the back bench into the cabinet. These young men and women have already shown their various abilities in the short time that they have been in these responsible positions, and I know that all members here will join me in wishing them well in the days ahead.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harquail: As well, let me add my best wishes to those of my colleagues who have recently been promoted as parliamentary secretaries.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harquail: I wish to take a moment of the time of the House to express our sadness at the passing of our colleague, Madam Albanie Morin, the member for Louis-Hébert. On behalf of all members of the House, I express our heartfelt sympathy to the members of her family.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to express the trust and confidence which we feel in our dynamic leader, our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), a man who has led us successfully through several elections, who has led the country through major crises and has put on the statute books many outstanding legislative measures.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harquail: It is my belief that this brilliant man, who is one of the most outstanding national leaders in the world, will lead us to another victory in the next election. He has demonstrated wisdom, foresight and courage in the Speech from the Throne, which expresses the basic philosophy of our party, a party of reform, which permits our government to answer the needs of our people in the areas where assistance is required the most. I can speak with some authority on this subject since my people have experienced extremely high seasonal unemployment.

Not only can we Liberals be proud of our past performance in bringing in the Canada Pension Plan, unemployment insurance, health and medicare plans, senior citizens' and social assistance programs which are of benefit to people in all walks of life, but once again here in this Speech from the Throne we are able to demonstrate in a real way our ability to accept our responsibility to govern and to bring forward policies and programs which will bring effective and beneficial results to those Canadians who desperately require our help.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harquail: I am delighted to see that this government not only expresses its concern about unemployment in this country but is proposing concrete measures in this Speech from the Throne to alleviate unemployment in areas where it is most prevalent, such as in Restigouche. The implementation of such programs is vital to this region, and I am sure my constituents will appreciate this action.

I am encouraged by the government's intention to take some measures to discuss with the provinces arrangements to increase the effectiveness of training in both official languages in the school system all across Canada. It is to be hoped that these measures will encourage a better use of federal funds for this purpose, which has not been the case all too often in the past.

Another issue dealt with in the Speech from the Throne concerns equality of opportunity for regional economic fulfilment. I applaud the action which has been taken to combine the services of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and Manpower, year-round, direct job-creation programs, greater assistance to small businesses, the reinforcement of the market system, the reinforcement of reliance on individual enterprise as the mainspring of economic activity, to protect the public interest, and changes to be introduced to the National Transportation Act to protect against unfair freight rates. The government has shown its understanding of the fact that the maritimes can only develop and grow with special programs to assist in transportation costs.

We are encouraged to note another example of dynamic action on the part of the government on behalf of our fishermen in extending jurisdiction of the coastline to the 200-mile limit by January 1, 1977. Another positive step taken by the government which should bring beneficial results to the people in my area is a program under which the federal government will work more closely with the farmers and the provinces to strengthen the structure and increase the productivity of Canadian agriculture.

Of encouragement to the less fortunate will be the measures contained in the new Social Services Act under which costs will be shared to assist especially the aged, children and the handicapped, together with provisions for pensions to spouses and for the resumption of the establishment of new daycare centres, and this type of assistance, across the country. Another measure to increase equal opportunities will be the resumption of indexing family allowance payments as of the 1st of next year to compensate for the rise in the cost of living during 1976.

A word about justice. I know that with the peace and security legislation which is to come the citizens in my riding will not want me to miss this opportunity to encourage the government to take a more forceful approach to the administration of justice across the country, such as, by way of example, a cutback in the present handing out of suspended sentences. Our people want justice and reason to prevail, but at the same time they want to see the respect for law, order and authority that should exist.

Mr. Speaker, tradition allows me on this occasion to say a few words about my riding, which was made famous not only by the beauty of the fighting Restigouche salmon and the natural splendour of its area, but also because of its place in history in the battle of the Restigouche in 1760. The citizens of Restigouche, whom I have the honour to represent in this House, are God-fearing, hard working and upstanding people who contribute unselfishly day by day to the fibres which make up the fabric of this nation.

Although, as I mentioned earlier, we belong to the less advantaged in this nation, due partly to lack of equal opportunities, we have overcome these disadvantages with our courage, determination and high spirit, qualities which are typical of the Canadians whom I am proud to represent.

Mr. Speaker, because of the regional co-operative approach which has been adopted by all representatives of the region in recent years, one can only foresee progress and good development, better regional transportation facilities. We can do nothing but progress and succeed in the future, especially with the help of the measures contained in the Speech from the Throne which will certainly create more equal opportunities in regions such as Restigouche.

With regard to recommendations of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, I know the members of that committee have worked hard and well in their deliberations. Many good results will come from the eventual adoption of some of these worth while recommendations by this House, some of which I support, such as the cutting down of the length of speeches, which I intend to exercise today.

I now wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance), that the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Jules Léger, Chancellor and Principal Companion of the Order of Canada, Chancellor and Commander of the Order of Military Merit, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada.

May it please Your Excellency:

We, Her Majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Lafontaine-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I am proud to second the motion of the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail), and I share this pride with the citizens of the constituency of Lafontaine-Rosemont who had the courage, in 1974, to elect the youngest member of parliament.

I should like to take this opportunity to join in the tributes paid to the late Mrs. Albanie Morin by several distinguished members of this House, and to express my sincere sympathy to her family.

[English]

I should also like at the outset of this session to pay tribute to Mr. Speaker whose impartiality and clear-sightedness have so often lighted a path for our debates over the last two sessions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Lachance: Finally, I would like to express the wish that the ideal that moves all members will be reflected in our forthcoming proceedings and that wholesome discussion will not develop into virulent confrontations generated by too fiercely partisan political passions. My colleague, the member for Restigouche, has given an eloquent picture of the physical and social configurations of his riding and the proposed government measures which are bound to promote its development.

My own riding is located in another area of the Canadian mosaic and differs on several aspects from the local characteristics as defined by the hon. member who spoke before me. Indeed, Lafontaine-Rosemont with its 60,000 people is a densely populated area with a population that is 90 per cent French-speaking. The average constituent there is either a skilled or a semi-skilled worker and he earns what is regarded as an average income. Its population is much older than the metropolitan average and this is in part due to the proportionately greater number of single people and also the shifting of young households to the housing developments in the Montreal suburbs where living space is less restricted.

[Mr. Harquail.]

Lafontaine-Rosemont is actually a section which is considered by several as being a semi-grey area, and it is close to housing subdivisions which are themselves identified as priority areas and the proximity of which submits it to strong pressures that are seriously endangering the balance between construction sites and the environment. In fact, in recent years, the changes in land use that occurred in downtown Montreal and in its outskirts have lead to a substantial reduction in the already restricted number of low rental housings in Montreal. Those changes and the demolitions they brought about also resulted in population shifts that are already being felt in the fringe districts of those areas, especially Rosemont.

Besides, when compared with the priority areas, Lafontaine-Rosemont has the best residential homogeneity as its industrial component makes up only 4.4 per cent of the entire area. Finally, Lafontaine-Rosemont is what is commonly known as a "renting district" as only 10 per cent of housing accommodations are owner-occupied.

[English]

It will be readily understood why I have taken note with interest of the particular emphasis laid by the government on the problem of housing. The government has renewed its promise to leave nothing undone to provide Canadians with proper housing at prices they can afford.

Finally, there is no doubt the people of Lafontaine-Rosemont will benefit from the new emphasis placed on assistance to small businesses—these are to be found everywhere in my constituency—as announced in the Speech from the Throne, along with a whole series of stimuli of various kinds which the government intends putting forward to help in the further development and prosperity of such small businesses.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, we must emphasize here that whatever may be the physical and social texture of Canada, with its differences, its disparities, and even too often its opposing interests, the speech from the Throne outlines positive steps from which each and every Canadian can benefit and which, no doubt, will have both a local and national impact. Whether in the areas of government restraint, of the growing rate of the public service, of the fight against inflation, of international trade, of the incentives to private enterprise, of the creation of permanent jobs, of the updating of the Unemployment Insurance Act, of the new immigration legislation, of collective or sectorial bargaining, of labour relations, of the legislation governing competition, of energy conservation, of renewable resources, of social security for the aged, the young and the handicapped, of the changes to the Canada Pension Plan with respect to the spouses that stay at home, of fiscal arrangements with the provinces of housing sport, family law, the pursuit of a new international economic order, the right to information, the control by the Auditor general over the federal administration, the implementation of a bill of rights and the broadcasting of our debates, the speech from the Throne meets the needs of a changing society which constantly seeks to improve its living conditions and aspires to increased social justice while maintaining as much as possible the identity, individuality and freedom of choice of man.

[English]

It is not for me to offer any detailed comment on the extremely varied aspects of the government's legislative program for this session as announced in the Speech from the Throne. This will be done over the next few days by speakers from both sides of the House. However, as far as I am concerned, under the general headings of the Speech from the Throne, which deal with such matters as national unity, equality of opportunity, enhancement of individual rights, and the role of government, I trust it will be possible to have frank, positive, and well planned discussions for the greater good of our society.

May I, however, add a few words on a subject which is very close to my heart? I speak here as a French-speaking Quebecer for whom this matter goes far beyond the narrow confines of mere bilingualism; my reference here is to national identity and to our purposes and aspirations as Canadians.

[Translation]

This is a particularly sensitive issue to raise when you are a Quebecer, French speaking at that, and that you are determined to work in federal politics as a parliamentarian, especially in view of the recent events in the field of bilingual air communications, which clearly show the problems which the French speaking minority must face to assert its rights and fully realize its aspirations within the Canadian federation, especially as we must seriously consider the ultranationalistic feelings which still exist in Quebec and which have some very attractive aspects.

A country is of course a physical and geographical entity, but also and most important, it is made up of people who bring to it their cultures, their traditions and their way of life. What gives a people its soul and its nationalism is something deeper than the simple physical existence of a political entity called Canada, something which is closer to their own culture or cultures of its citizens who develop common ideas and aspirations as residents and as an integral part of their country.

In the past Canada has found it very difficult to find its identity. And even now, we often have a negative reaction, we compare ourselves to the Americans and we are glad or sad, as the case may be, because of what they are and of what we are not.

In fact, we should try instead to define what we really are, but we do not have many points of reference to do so. Of course, we had the French colonization, the English conquest, the exploration of Western Canada, Confederation, the railways, the Great War, the World War II, the entry of Newfoundland into Confederation, the Olympics. Of course, there were the American Indians, the French, the English, the Italians, the Ukranians, the Chinese and all the other ethnic groups, but what is it that makes us distinctively Canadian? What makes our history and our people unique? That is what every Canadian must feel. It is a difficult task which we must undertake.

In 1967, during the Centennial celebrations there was a feeling of Canadianism which faded too quickly and we are still faced with problems of identity, Quebec or British Columbia separatism, bilingualism, transportation, constitution, federal-provincial relations and many others.

In spite of all this, I am sure that for the majority of Canadians, the word Canada has a meaning and it is perhaps when we are abroad that we suddenly understand it through the kindness and interest shown to us.

But why? We must find out and fast because time is running out!

[English]

It is in this spirit, Mr. Speaker, that I wish to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for having shown his confidence in me, as well as all members present, for their understanding. It is with pleasure, therefore, that I express my support for the motion moved by the hon. member for Restigouche, and commend it to the House for its approval.

On motion of Mr. Clark the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Accordingly this House stands ajourned until tomorrow at two o'clock in the afternoon. Might I say in passing that a small reception has been arranged for later on this afternoon, beginning at about half past four in Room 253B, at which, of course, all hon. members and their guests would be most welcome.

On motion of Mr. Trudeau, the House adjourned at 3.47 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

SEARCH AND RESCUE

PROPOSED REFERENCE OF SUBJECT TO STANDING COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I do so in view of the statement by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) on April 7, 1976 in which he admitted that "the marine search and rescue organization is no longer entirely adequate". In view of the fact that a departmental task force set up by the minister last spring has already submitted its report with specific recommendations, and further in view of the failure of the government to announce a new air/sea search and rescue policy for Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall):

That in the opinion of this House the government should give immediate consideration to referring the question of air/sea search and rescue in Canada to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communication.

Mr. Speaker: Order. A motion presented pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be dealt with only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF COW-CALF STABILIZATION PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity relating to the financial position of cow-calf operators. The inaction of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has forced the western provinces to act unilaterally to provide emergency relief to the producers. Because the onus remains on the federal government to save the beef industry, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent):

That this House request the Minister of Agriculture to institute immediately a national cow-calf stabilization program based on the full cost of production.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR LANDED IMMIGRANT STATUS FOR VALDES FAMILY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to propose a motion on a matter not only of urgent and pressing necessity but also humanitarian. I hope my colleagues will think twice before saying "No".

Considering that Mr. Valdes left the country last Sunday and that judicial proceedings have been taken to recognize the representations of Mrs. Valdes and her four children, who have been harassed for a year and a half by the Department of Manpower and Immigration following their voluntary request to become Canadian citizens, and considering that Mrs. Valdes is now exhausted and that it is inhuman to leave this lady and her children in such a depressive state which has lasted too long, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal):

That the Cabinet consider immediately the critical and inhuman position of Mrs. Valdes and her four children and that the minister take all the necessary measures to regularize the status of this family as landed immigrants.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore the motion cannot be put.

DAIRYING—REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE STUDY OF DISTRIBUTION OF QUOTAS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43 I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Since about 12,000 milk producers of the south shore area will incur a loss of more than $5,350,000 for the year 1976-77, which represents 23 per cent of their income since this loss accounts for an average of $4,458 per dairy farm which will force some of them to go bankrupt, and since this unfortunate situation is also common to all parts of the province of Quebec, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That the House recommend the formation of a special committee which would undertake a sound review of distribution of production quotas for each province and actual needs for domestic consumption and would consider the economic and social consequences of losses incurred by milk producers.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore the motion cannot be put.

SOCIAL SECURITY

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN OLD AGE PENSION AND LOWERING OF ELIGIBLE AGE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this motion, which I move under Standing Order 43, is of extreme urgency to a great many Canadians. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That this House urge the government to include in its legislative proposals for this session of parliament a measure to increase substantially the amount of the basic pension provide under the Old Age Security Act and to make the pension available at age 60 to all persons not in the labour market.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON FACTORS SURROUNDING DISMISSAL OF WALTER RUDNICKI—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my motion under Standing Order 43 is also urgent and pressing. It is in regard to a decision rendered by Judge O'Driscoll of the Supreme Court of Ontario on July 23, 1976 ruling against the government in the case of the wrongful dismissal of a senior civil servant, namely Mr. Walter Rudnicki. In light of the fact that the judge's reasons for his decision raise a number of serious questions about the improprieties and misconduct of at least one minister of the Crown, as well as the chairman of the board of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the deputy minister of urban affairs and other officials, and since the matter of government secrecy is also illuminated in the judge's decision and statement, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington):

That this House urge the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to avail himself of the earliest opportunity to make a statement in the House which would outline the course of action that he proposes to take to respond to this most serious matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ALLEGED THREATS AGAINST THOSE WHO WORK ON OCTOBER 14TH—REQUEST FOR ACTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to propose a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43, and I hope I will get support from both sides of the House for my motion. Literally hundreds of union members, even their spouses and children, have come to my constituency office or telephoned or written to me to tell me of threats against their livehoods and even their families if they work on October 14. They tell of losing their democratic freedoms within our free democracy.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser):

That the relevant departments and agencies of government undertake an immediate investigation to determine the extent and degree of intimidation used to prevent rank and file trade unionists from working on October 14, 1976, and to identify any individuals who should be prosecuted for the use of threats of violence or other reprisals to prevent any person from working, and to prepare legislation to assure every trade unionist of the right to determine their own economic destinies through supervised free and secret ballot at all times.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be presented for the consideration of the House only with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO DEAL WITH IMPORTATION OF MEAT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the recent beef embargo imposed by President Ford of the United States, and in view of the fact that the Canadian beef industry has been in a serious depression for a considerable period of time, more particularly in the last few months, and in view of Canada's sellout in respect of the Canada-Australia-New Zealand meat agreement, and, further, that because of the United States embargo the Canadian beef industry faces the very real possibility of even heavier volumes of beef from Australia and New Zealand, no doubt already in transit to the United States market, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave):

That the Minister of Agriculture take immediate action to ensure that this product will not be dumped on our Canadian market and to place immediately, if necessary, a temporary embargo on beef from Australia and New Zealand and, secondly, that the minister implement a long overdue Canadian meat import law, and, finally, that he negotiate with his United States counterparts a longer term agreement having regard for historical trade patterns.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SUGGESTED DEVELOPMENT OF PLAN TO REDUCE UNEMPLOYMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that for a year we have had 7 per cent or greater unemployment, I rise on this matter of urgent and pressing necessity to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House calls on the government to work out a detailed plan to provide for full employment, and that to accomplish this objective, plans be made to reduce the present high rate of unemployment by a specific reducing percentage for each of the next three years in the same way as the government set its goals for reducing inflation in announcing its anti-inflation goals.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of such a motion?

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF TRANSFER OF HOSPITALS TO OTHER JURISDICTIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 in view of the fact that the wide and increasing protests over the transfer of veterans' hospitals to other levels of jurisdiction indicate that the policy is not working to the benefit of all veterans of Canada. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That the whole matter of the transfer of veterans' hospitals be referred immediately to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, and that the committee be authorized to travel to those hospitals already transferred, as well as those under negotiation, to determine the inequities of existing transfer agreements.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can only be presented to the House with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

THE MINISTRY

SUGGESTED APPOINTMENT OF CABINET REPRESENTATIVES FROM PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by welcoming the Prime Minister back to the House and his demonstration that he is as usual in command of events. I wish to direct to the Prime Minister a question arising from the fact that the first reaction to the Throne Speech from that side of the House has been the resignation of the Minister of National Defence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: In view of the fact that this resignation leaves the provinces of Manitoba. Saskatchewan and Alberta with only one representative in cabinet, a rather dubious one at that, I wonder whether the Prime Minister will assure the House that he will move immediately to appoint at least one more minister from those three provinces.

An hon. Member: Joe Guay?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the good wishes of the Leader of the Opposition in welcoming me back in the House. I was puzzled to see him grasp so tightly on the arm of his chair before he rose to ask the question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fraser: He has a tighter grasp on the chair than you have on the cabinet.

An hon. Member: This is being recorded, Pierre.

Mr. Trudeau: It looked, Mr. Speaker, as if he were afraid the caucus would take away the only seat he has left.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I also thank the Leader of the Opposition for the constructive suggestions he has made in respect of my cabinet and I will take them seriously into consideration. If he wants any advice on his own shadow cabinet I would be happy to give it to him privately, Mr. Speaker. It would be more valuable.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I think two things are evident. The first is that the Prime Minister's practice of refusing to answer questions has survived the summer; the second is I have a considerably better grasp on my chair and my caucus than he has on his caucus.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POSITION OF GOVERNMENT ON FORMULA FOR AMENDING CONSTITUTION AS STATED BY FORMER MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, since the Prime Minister declines to advise us whether he has been able to find anyone else from western Canada to join his cabinet, I wonder if I might ask him whether, in light of the fact that there was apparently some extensive discussion between the former minister and the Prime Minister of the reasons cited for the former minister's resignation, the statements that were contained in the letter of resignation by the hon. member for Winnipeg South, particularly those statements which claim to set forth the government's firm position on an amending formula for the constitution, can be interpreted to represent in fact a final decision by the government on this question.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have pointed out to the former minister of national defence, and I remind the Leader of the Opposition of this, that last March I wrote to the premiers and gave them three options whereby we thought we could patriate the constitution. Only one of them referred to language rights and an entrenched amending formula; at least one of the other two, as I recall, contained nothing on language rights. So, clearly if the Leader of the Opposition and the former minister of national defence recall the events, it would seem that both the action and the question are a little premature.

REQUEST FOR TABLING REPLY TO LETTER OF RESIGNATION OF MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): The clear implication in the letter from the most recent former minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: —was that there has been a narrowing of the options, and my question was precisely whether that in fact has been the case or whether the former minister of national defence in his letter misinterprets the position of the cabinet of which he was so recently a member. Perhaps in answering that question the Prime Minister might also indicate whether he would be prepared to table his reply to the letter of resignation of his former colleague and whether that reply would contain a detailed response to the positions set forth in a rather lengthy letter of resignation by the former minister.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The answer is quite simple. There has been no change of position in cabinet on those three options. As I recollect, the matter was not even discussed substantially for the simple reason that twice since that letter was sent the premiers met amongst themselves, first in Alberta and then in Ontario, following two previous meetings, I believe, of the attorneys general in spring. I believe these were meetings during which the premiers and their attorneys general were attempting to define the position among themselves. I have not received the report of the chairman of that premiers' conference as yet, therefore I do not know what their position is. I do not know what their response to my three options will be, and I do not know that they have reached any firm agreement among themselves. There has been no change in the cabinet's views. We are awaiting the report of the chairman of the conference to discuss the matter and decide upon it. For that reason, I felt that the minister's resignation was premature. He was acting on the assumption that the premiers might agree, which is perhaps an unwise assumption.

Mr. Clark: Let me repeat, Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister agree to table in the House of Commons his reply to the letter of resignation of his minister?

Mr. Trudeau: When that reply has been received by the former minister of national defence, and if he agrees that his letter to me be tabled, I will certainly table the correspondence between him and me.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INCREASE IN CAPITAL BUDGET OF DEPARTMENT FOR FIVE YEARS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): My question is for the Prime Minister. The hon. member for Winnipeg South, the former minister of national defence, was able, aided by the Chancellor of Germany, to wrest from a reluctant cabinet a promise to increase the capital budget of the Department of National Defence by an inflation factor plus 12 per cent each year for the next five years. Can the Prime Minister assure the House that this commitment will stand?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I can assure the hon. member that this commitment was made by the cabinet and not by the minister alone. It was the subject of a very firm decision by all ministers in the cabinet, and the former minister does not take that decision away with him.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO CHANGE IN RE-EQUIPMENT PROGRAM—REPLACEMENT FOR MINISTER

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): I have a supplementary for the Prime Minister. Could the right hon. gentleman assure the House that there will be no changes in the defence re-equipment programs announced by the former minister, and could he at the same time assure the House that he will name somebody—or perhaps some nobody—as Minister of National Defence before he leaves the country again?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, if I were to find some nobody, I would have to look on the other side.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

MEASURES TO REDUCE LEVEL OF UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, as testimony to all the hard work I put in on my French this past summer I will say touché to the Prime Minister for that one.

On a more serious note I would like to ask the Prime Minister, since Canada has been experiencing unemployment in excess of seven per cent for a total of some 17 months now, and since Canadians obviously want to work and not receive handouts, does the government intend in the present session of parliament to bring forth legislation which will set specific targets on the rates of reduction in the levels of unemployment that it is planning for, and if not, why not?

Mrs. Holt: You don't care about the rank and file.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne indicated the direction the government intends to take on this matter and the House will hear further from the Minister of Manpower and Immigration during the debate.

POSSIBILITY OF BUDGETARY MEASURES TO DEAL WITH UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Finance. Since on a seasonal basis there are over 750,000 Canadians unemployed, and since only 63,000 new jobs have been established this year compared with the 250,000 jobs forecast by the minister in his May budget address, will the minister bring forward this fall a supplementary budget to correct some of this erroneous forecasting made by his own department and also simultaneously announce some major programs to deal with unemployment?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): No, sir.

MANPOWER

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF EMPLOYMENT STRATEGY PAPER

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, it is a brief answer if a stupid one. The Prime Minister's new modesty obviously has not spread throughout the cabinet.

My final supplementary is to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the stated intention of the government in the Throne Speech to provide more information to the people of Canada, will the minister table the 85 page employment strategy paper which the cabinet has approved, and can the minister at the same time indicate whether his employment program will simply involve an expansion of such cosmetic programs as making LIP a year round project and introducing such delightful new schemes as JEEP, whatever that may stand for?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Cullen for leader.

Mr. Cullen: Not yet, Walter. Cool it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Maybe next month.

Mr. Cullen: The leader of the New Democratic Party refers to cosmetics, but it has been known in the past that cosmetics made a very ordinary girl look quite beautiful. I think we will do that with our program.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ALLEGED EXCLUSION OF CERTAIN BENEFICIARIES—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Can he inform the House whether he has ordered or is about to order an investigation relating to statements made on the French television network about two weeks ago by five masked people that his department allegedly gave instructions aimed at excluding some categories of beneficiaries who theoretically would be entitled to unemployment insurance benefits?

[English]

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we have already responded to that criticism in a press release issued, I believe, within two days of the media report.

SUGGESTED CURTAILMENT OF BEEF IMPORTS FROM AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, my question was to be directed to the Minister of Agriculture but in his absence I should like to address it to the Prime Minister or the Acting Minister of Agriculture. The question relates to the October 9 action of President Ford in imposing a total United States quota of 1.233 million pounds of beef under the terms of the United States meat import law. In view of the immediate and very real possibility that Australian and New Zealand shipments may now be diverted to Canada, in addition to our current excessive imports, and in view of Canada's very vulnerable position which permits unlimited access of imported meats at discounted prices well in excess of the "six cents under" agreement, will the Prime Minister or the Minister of Agriculture act immediately to prevent a further depression of all levels of our Canadian cattle markets with appropriate action on Australian-New Zealand beef imports?

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government has acted today. The Minister of Agriculture has announced that the federal government is moving to place imports of beef and veal into Canada under individual permit control effective midnight on Sunday.

SUGGESTED DEMAND FOR RETRACTION OF AUSTRALIAN ALLEGATION CANADA RESPONSIBLE FOR CURTAILMENT OF BEEF IMPORTS BY UNITED STATES

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the announcement just made by the parliamentary secretary but I wish to address a supplementary question to him. In view of the very serious charge made by the deputy prime minister of Australia that Canada was totally to blame for this predictable action by President Ford, especially during their election campaign, and since Australia has enjoyed unlimited access to Canadian meat markets with volumes much higher proportionately than their United States shipments, will the Prime Minister or indeed the government of Canada take immediate steps to set the record straight and demand a retraction from the government of Australia?

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the minister has already answered the allegation by the Australian and New Zealand governments. I must add that this afternoon Canadian officials in Washington are having discussions with the United States officials to find out exactly how this new quota will be applied. That government has announced a global quota and the 21 nations which will be affected by it do not yet know what it will mean to them individually. Our officials are having discussions with United States officials this afternoon to find out exactly what it will mean to Canada.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

POSSIBILITY OF SEPARATING JUDICIAL AND ADVISORY FUNCTIONS

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the glaring inconsistencies in the National Energy Board Act that came to light this summer in defining the quasi-judicial and advisory functions and the fact that there was nothing in the Speech from the Throne about this, does the minister intend to introduce any measures during this session of parliament to separate these responsibilities?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gillies: A supplementay question, Mr. Speaker. Is it the position of the minister that there is no problem associated with having semi-judicial and advisory positions held by one particular person? Does the minister not feel that is an impossible situation in which to place a regulator?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member makes a good point. I do recognize there could be situations in which there could be incompatibility between the advisory function and the judicial function. This is a matter which I have had under personal consideration for some time. Undoubtedly there will be an opportunity for me to discuss this with my colleagues in the weeks to come. Going back to the first question, it is not my intention in this session to introduce amendments to the National Energy Board Act for that purpose.

Mr. Gillies: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister issued any instructions to the chairman of the National Energy Board to ensure that such apparent conflict will not happen again?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that upon reflection the hon. member would realize that a minister of energy, mines and resources would be in a very delicate position in advising the National Energy Board, which was set up by Parliament as an independent body. If the minister were to start issuing instructions to the head of the National Energy Board it would seem to me he would be open, and the government would be open, to the criticism of interfering with the very independence which parliament set up in the Act for the National Energy Board.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF BACKGROUND PAPERS ON WHICH DECISION TO CONTINUE PROGRAM MAY BE BASED

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (Yrok-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. As the Speech from the Throne contemplates that the provinces will be asked to enter into consultations on renewal of agreements under the government's present wages and prices control program, would the minister, within the commitment to be open as promised in the Speech from the Throne, lay before the House and the provinces all background papers that argue for continuation of the program beyond March 31, 1977, as termination of present agreements with most provinces is to occur on that date?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the date we look forward to is, of course, April 1, 1977. I will be glad to make available to both the provinces and the House the analysis which would lead to a continuation of the program.

Mr. Stevens: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister could indicate when he will lay this documentation before the House and the provinces? Could he also indicate the term of the extension to which he is asking the provinces to agree? Is it a further 18 months or even longer?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, we would anticipate this discussion would commence in the new year when we would obviously have more specific details. As the hon. member knows, the Act provides a continuation for two years more.

SUGGESTED DELETION OF PROVISION ALLOWING EXTENSION OF PROGRAM BEYOND 1978

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): A final supplementary to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. As the Prime Minister at least hinted last Thursday that under no circumstances would the control program go beyond the end of 1978, could he indicate if he is willing to cause Bill C-73 to be amended to ensure that under no circumstances may the controls program be extended beyond the end of 1978 by, in particular, deleting the provision that allows the program to be extended simply by order in council?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall take the hon. member's suggestion into consideration. Certainly, it is our intention not to by go beyond the end of December, 1978. If that would reassure the House and get the opposition parties to co-operate with us in the implementation of the program while it exists, I would certainly be prepared to give that undertaking.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

RECOGNITION OF CONTRIBUTION BY HOUSEWIVES

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Are we to understand from the reference to the Canada Pension Plan in yesterday's Speech from the Throne that the contribution of housewives to the social and economic well-being of our country is finally going to be recognized in real and concrete terms?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, this provision is certainly going to mark significant progress in recognizing the contribution of housewives to our economy. I hope, as time goes by, the government will be able to introduce more measures of this nature to recognize that contribution.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

REASON FOR NOT REHIRING MR. RUDNICKI—ALLEGED BLACKLISTING OF SOME FEDERAL CIVIL SERVANTS

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. The Supreme Court of Ontario now having concluded that Mr. Walter Rudnicki was wrongfully dismissed from his position as senior policy adviser at Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, can the minister indicate whether Mr. Rudnicki will be rehired and, if he will not be rehired, why he will not be taken back into the federal civil service?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Rudnicki has been compensated. He has other employment, I believe, with the government of Manitoba and I do not think he has indicated any desire to return to the federal public service. I wish him well in his new career.

Mr. Leggatt: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am sure the minister will want to canvass his answer with Mr. Rudnicki who is seeking employment with the federal public service. In view of the very serious charge Mr. Rudnicki makes, that there is a blacklist of public servants which has been circulated among Liberal ministers and which is officially called the extra parliamentary opposition, will the minister advise if in the area of his responsibilities he is aware of such list. If he is not will he give to this House an undertaking that he will investigate these most serious charges which Mr. Rudnicki has been making?

An hon. Member: And let's have no blarney.

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, this certainly is a very serious charge which the hon. member makes. Fortunately, it is without any foundation.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CHARGES MADE BY MR. RUDNICKI

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister? In view of the question just asked by my colleague from New Westminster, will the Prime Minister tell the House if he will take the first opportunity available to make a statement in the House answering some of the serious charges made both by Mr. Rudnicki and a judge of the Supreme Court of Ontario, in order to relieve the anxieties created across this country, anxieties developing from some of the improprieties implied in the judgment and involving some ministers and senior civil servants?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will look into the matter. I am not aware of those charges. I just heard them alluded to by way of rumour just now by hon. members opposite.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): There is a supreme court judgment.

Mr. Fairweather: It's a supreme court rumour.

An hon. Member: You missed that judge.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, as the House knows, I don't speak to judges. They may have opinions on the conduct of governments which, if they are not on the matter of legality or illegality, I might consider irrelevant.

[Mr. Danson.]

HOUSING

POSSIBLE INTRODUCTION OF NEW PROGRAMS AND ESTABLISHMENT OF MORTGAGE CORPORATION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. My question is prompted by a statement released by the Canadian Council on Social Development identifying six Canadian cities in which the percentage of people able to buy affordable housing has declined, notwithstanding the success of the minister's AHOP program; it is also prompted by the government's failure to identify new programs in the Speech from the Throne. Does the minister intend to introduce new legislation this session and does he intend to press for the implementation of legislation to set up the Canadian mortgage corporation?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, our present programs are working effectively, although in some areas we want to see them working even more effectively. Housing starts, as hon. members know, are close to record highs for this year, but that does not relieve our concern for the future and for people in low income groups still experiencing difficulty. We are tailoring our programs, not through new legislation but through the application of existing programs, in such a way as to make certain to the best of our ability that housing is available to them.

The Federal Mortgage Exchange Corporation is in the province of my colleague, the Minister of Finance. From my viewpoint the activation of that organization, in so far as my portfolio is concerned, is not necessary. We are getting all the mortgage funding required at present. We are getting more than we asked for, more than some sceptical people thought we would get. It looks as if the amount of $1 billion we hoped to get from the private sector will exceed $1.5 billion this year, for our programs.

URBAN AFFAIRS

TAX SHARING WITH MUNICIPALITIES IN VIEW OF FAILURE OF TRI-LEVEL CONFERENCE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the government's failure to obtain the agreement of the provinces for a tri-level conference to discuss the serious questions of fiscal and tax-sharing arrangements with the municipalities, I ask the minister, in view of his failure to bring about this conference, what course he intends to pursue since the problems of our cities are continuing?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that does not mean we are not concerned about the problems of our cities. It means that provinces did not see fit to sit down with the municipalities and the federal government to discuss the report of the task force on public finance. Much information has been gained by that task force and much has been researched. I am now studying it, to see how we, at the federal level, can work, in view of the vacuum left as a result of the lack of initiative of some provincial governments which see no value in consultation, and would sooner engage in confrontation and abandon their responsibilities.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RHODESIAN TRANSITION FUND—POSSIBILITY OF CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, whom I congratulate on his recent appointment. In view of the statement made by the minister following his speech at the United Nations, that Canada could possibly be asked to contribute to a so-called Rhodesian transition fund, is the minister in the position to inform the House whether the government has considered this matter and taken a decision in this regard. If so, what amount is Canada prepared to contribute?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his good wishes. No decision has been made, for the obvious reason, as I said at the time, that no hard proposal had been put to Canada or to the best of my knowledge to any country, other than perhaps the United Kingdom, by the United States. When I met with Secretary of State Kissinger in New York he indicated that part of the settlement proposal was to establish a fund and that he, personally, was then working on a possible assignment of percentages as well as on the total amount which might be in that fund. But there was no direct request that Canada should participate. The implication of a number of comments made publicly is that we may well be asked to do so, but the situation is as I have described it. No request has been made to date.

I should also advise the hon. member that I shall be going to Washington on Friday again to meet with Mr. Kissinger, and this may well be one of the matters on which there will be further clarification at that time.

ADMISSION OF RHODESIAN REFUGEES TO CANADA

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister conducted, or does he intend to conduct, talks with American and British authorities on the admission to Canada of some 20,000 white Rhodesians and refugees? If so, on what assumption?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have held talks on this matter with United States authorities and advice I obtained from that source, which I regard as probably the best informed at the moment, is that the refugee question is not the major one involved at this stage of the negotiations and, indeed, that it probably is not wise to escalate that aspect of the matter at this time.

OLD AGE PENSIONS—SUGGESTED CHANGES IN PROVISIONS RELATING TO RESIDENCY AND PENSIONS EARNED OVERSEAS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. On April 14 he advised the House that the government was to bring in amendments to the Old Age Security legislation affecting, among other things, residency and reciprocal agreements affecting persons who have earned pensions overseas and are now living in this country. That measure involved some 500,000 people, yet in the Speech from the Throne there is no indication that this is a matter of urgency or priority. Can the minister say why this important matter was not included in the Speech from the Throne?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there certainly are several important matters to be discussed during this session when bills will be introduced in the House that are not necessarily mentioned in the Speech from the Throne.

Amendments to the Old Age Security Act are one such a project. The bill is being drafted and I hope I will be able to table it in the House for first reading in the months to come.

[English]

OLD AGE PENSIONS—CONSULTATIONS WITH PROVINCES ON PROPOSED AMENDMENTS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When the minister advised the House about the amendment, he indicated that it did not require provincial approval but that it required provincial consultation. Can the minister advise whether he has consulted, and will the provinces and territories now agree to the type of amendment he envisages as being included in the bill to which he just referred?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I do not think I have ever said, Mr. Speaker, that such amendments required provincial approval or even provincial consultation. I have indicated, however, that I would readily undertake consultations with the provinces so as to maintain the spirit of co-operation developed in the field of social security over the past three years.

This project was discussed with my colleagues, if I remember well, at the last federal-provincial conference held in June, and no objection was made to the project either at the June conference or afterwards. Consequently, I think that we can proceed to consideration of a study of this project with confidence.

DAIRYING—FEDERAL ROLE IN GRANTS PAID BY QUEBEC

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

In view of the fact that Quebec and Ontario producers of industrial milk are experiencing the worst year of their lives, causing the Quebec government to grant $21 million to those producers; and since the Speech from the Throne does not mention any agreement or change in policy in this connection, can the Prime Minister inform the House whether this $21 million grant paid by the province of Quebec to its industrial milk producers was made unilaterally, without consulting the federal government, or whether this is merely a provincial matter from which the government intends to hold aloof?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member seems to care little for the taxpayers' money when he suggests that the government is holding aloof from this matter, when it is in fact paying milk producers close to half a billion dollars in loans and grants. I think they get something like $150 million in grants alone. The hon. member may well be impressed by the millions of dollars given by the Quebec government, but he ought to consider also what the federal government is giving.

As a matter of fact, we are aware of the difficult situation of milk producers in Quebec and elsewhere in Canada, and the cabinet is looking into this matter in order to find some other remedial action.

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

First of all, I would like to thank the Prime Minister for making clear the point concerning long and short term loans to farmers, even though we were already aware of it. In view of the fact that the federal government granted the loans and that farmers must now meet their obligations, except for those concerning farm credit which may be reimbursed within a year or so but which nevertheless must be paid back some day, will the right hon. Prime Minister tell the House, considering the consultations he held with Quebec about this most important issue, as our milk producers are unable to meet their obligations, if the government holds a positive view of the action taken by that province, namely helping with an area of production which is none of its business and falls under federal jurisdiction, I am referring to industrial milk? Will the Prime Minister tell the House if the government holds a positive or a negative view of the whole matter?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says again, in his question, that loans alone are involved here. Obviously he is not familiar with the matter because about a quarter of a million dollars were paid to milk producers in grants. I say again that this is a considerable amount for the farmers.

When the hon. member says that the Quebec government pays out money to a sector which does not concern it in any way, he again proves his ignorance of the situation: surely he must be aware of the fact that quotas are set jointly by the provincial and federal governments and that an important part of the administration is left to the provinces. So, to my mind, in this specific regard, one is ill-advised to claim that the Quebec government, or any other provincial government, is the only one to do something for milk producers, because that is simply not true.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON OWNERSHIP OF GEORGES BANK—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and at the same time congratulate him upon his new appointment. At the present time a large proportion of Canada's groundfish stocks and almost all of our $30 million scallop industry is caught in an area known as Georges Bank, whose ownership is now claimed by the government of the United States. In light of the economic importance to Canada of the ownership of this bank, will the minister advise whether he, any of his officials, the Minister of Fisheries or any of his officials have held recent discussions with the United States over the ownership of this bank? If so, can he give a report to the House on the outcome of those talks?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member who I believe comes from the largest fishing constituency in Canada. Without looking at the record, I will not accept whether the value figures he made reference to are correct. On the second point, in recent weeks there have been two separate sets of discussions between Canada and the United States on this question of the extension of what I suppose we can call the marine boundaries. This is one of the most important matters that will come up during my meetings in Washington on Friday. Some progress is being made, but as the hon. member knows, it is a quite complex question. It may take several other sets of meetings to resolve it satisfactorily.

REQUEST FOR STABILIZATION PROGRAM FOR COW-CALF PRODUCERS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, I will direct my question to the Prime Minister. If possible, I would prefer if he answered it. In view of the economic condition of cow-calf operators across this country, which is so severe it almost borders on creating an emergency for the whole country in the future, will the Prime Minister assure those producers that his government will come forward with a stabilization program in the very near future for cow-calf operators?

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the government of Saskatchewan announced today that it is instituting a cow-calf producer program. Aside from the maritime provinces, the rest of Canada now has a cow-calf program. The federal government has stated on a few occasions that it intended to have a cow-calf program. We have had discussions with the provinces, but we have not yet arrived at a national program. The fact that some provinces do not agree on the level of payments that should be made nationally has prevented us from reaching an agreement with them.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I will again try the Prime Minister. In view of the fact there are now several provincial programs, can the Prime Minister give a commitment that the federal government will match dollar for dollar the money that the provinces are paying into a stabilization fund for cow-calf producers?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, the government of Canada cannot make such a commitment at this time and in any case, talks with the provinces are proceeding. We will be in a position to announce it only when the provinces, the federal government and the departments of agriculture have come to an agreement on the establishment of a program or of a similar price throughout Canada.

REASON FOR WITHHOLDING INFORMATION ON DEFECTIVE MOTOR VEHICLES

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, before directing my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, I take the opportunity to congratulate him on his appointment as minister.

[English]

It has been brought to my attention that the Motor Vehicle Safety Branch of the Department of Transport has a great deal of information concerning investigations of public complaints relating to defective motor vehicles. My question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is, why is this information kept secret and not released to the public?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend of long standing for his kind best wishes. It seems only yesterday that we laboured long and hard together for the great common cause of liberalism.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Abbott: While our paths have now diverged somewhat, it is heartening that we can work together for the benefit of the consumer. I must confess that I can only respond to the hon. member's question by advising that I am unaware of the possession of facts which he described being in the hands of the Department of Transport. However, I will make inquiries and reply.

Mr. Grafftey: In view of the government's new policy to supply more information to the Canadian people, in this particular instance does the minister not feel that the public has a right to know? Why is this particular information not made public in the form of a consumer bulletin as is done in the United States of America?

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, recognizing the usual good sense of the hon. member's points of view, I will take that into account in my inquiries.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REASON FOR FAILURE TO MAKE CHANGES TO INCENTIVES ACT

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, Mr. Speaker. Having regard to the disappointing and surprising absence from the Speech from the Throne of any amendment to the Regional Development Incentives Act, in spite of recommendations from the minister's own Atlantic Advisory Council and constant reminders by provincial governments calling attention to major changes essential for the effective functioning of this Act, would the minister tell us whether the absence of any indication of change with respect to the RDIA is the result of lack of recommendations to his cabinet colleagues or, alternatively, of some objection on their part?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, no recommendations have actually been made to Cabinet at this point by myself or my department because we are now considering as we have done in recent weeks several representations made by various Canadian organizations on the ways to amend the act. I do hope that in the months to come we will be able to reach a consensus in that respect. I would then be in a position to submit to my colleagues in Cabinet the amendments that will prove appropriate to meet the needs.

GOVERNMENT VIEW ON LEGALITY OF PARTICIPATION IN OCTOBER 14TH DAY OF PROTEST

Mr. John Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. It arises from the minister's statement on September 26 that he hopes the national strike is successful. He then went on to add he hopes it is legal. Can the minister tell us whether he and the government now take the position that the strike is legal?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Obviously we shall have to look at events as they transpire tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): As far as the government is concerned the advice of the independent law officers of the Crown may be that in certain circumstances there is illegality, although I am encouraged to hear that the head of the Public Service Alliance has indicated that he cannot in all morality recommend any breaches of the collective agreement as far as that significant element of the trade union movement is concerned. In the private sector, I think it is up to individual employers to decide what action they might take. As to my remarks, I was hoping, and I think there is some indication of this, that a very significant element of the trade union movement will protest, possibly, but protest legally and not break their collective agreements. It is to our interest to have a responsible trade union movement of that nature.

Mr. Fraser: In view of the fact that a poll just conducted in my own constituency shows that the ordinary citizens there overwhelmingly sympathize with the protest—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a supplementary question, will he put it?

Mr. Fraser: —but that those same citizens do not agree with the method being used to protest, can the minister explain how his comments will help those who believe that breaking the law is not the proper way to protest?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): The obvious answer is to recommend, as I have, that if the rank and file organized worker feels under some compulsion to protest he should do so legally and not break collective agreements; he has lots of latitude to do that—lunch hours, split shifts and so on—when he is not working.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Fraser: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of vital importance to the country. It is a matter upon which there has already been a motion expressing concern in the House today. Yet we still find the Minister of Labour, speaking on behalf of the government, unprepared to say what the government's position is on this question of whether the national day of protest, or strike, is legal or illegal. It is clear the minister is trying to avoid this issue, especially since he made a foolish statement on the subject some time ago.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Tuesday, October 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Maurice Harquail for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin by expressing my appreciation of that warm welcome which I think came from all corners of the House.

I also wish to begin my contribution to this debate by expressing, both personally and on behalf of my colleagues in the Progressive Conservative Party, our deep admiration of the example which has been set to all Canadians by the Governor General, not simply in his recent activities but throughout his tenure of office. We all knew him as a distinguished Canadian public figure before he came to his present office, and his courage and determination in carrying on that position in the face of affliction have been an inspiration to all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Clark: In my name and on behalf of my Progressive Conservative colleagues I would like to take a few moments to pay particular tribute to the wife of our Governor General, Mrs. Léger. I would like to tell her how impressed we are by the dignity and courage with which she is assisting her husband and serving all Canada.

[English]

I should like also, naturally, to express my congratulations to the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) and to the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance) for their contributions in opening this debate. I cannot in all conscience wish them well in future parliamentary careers but I do wish them success in what remains of their present parliamentary careers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my Progressive Conservative colleagues, I would like to point out that we will miss in this debate the active presence of the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette). We deplore the illness afflicting our colleague, but we are sure that he will face that inconvenience with the same pugnacious spirit which he has always shown in the House. The same spirit which has enabled him to uphold untiringly federalism at a time when his position was not always overly popular.

● (1510)

[English]

I should at the outset take note of the changes that have occurred in the ministry since parliament rose for the summer.

Mr. Fairweather: Like an elastic band.

Mr. Clark: As my collegue from Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) points out, like an elastic band. I was going to speak of the changes in the past tense but we, like the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), look forward to tomorrow.

If one measures progress by sheer velocity of change, I guess we would have to call this most recent cabinet change a change for the better. For myself, I find more truth in the assessment of my friend and colleague, the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), who remarked that he knew of no instance where the mere act of changing the pallbearers served to revive the corpse!

The opposition sincerely regrets that the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) has left the Cabinet. We did not always approve his ideas, but we knew where his heart was. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, this characteristic is not applicable to all members of the Cabinet.

[English]

I should as well pay my respects to two other former ministers, the hon. members for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp) and Westmount (Mr. Drury). Both have laboured long and, to be fair and to give them their due, have laboured with considerable distinction in the public service of their country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I should say to the hon. member for Westmount that, while we may have questioned his frankness earlier this year in regard to his dealings with members of the bench, I find it refreshing that he is now at least prepared to admit that he cannot resign his seat for fear of his party losing a by-election.

Naturally I want to congratulate the new ministers on their appointments, both those who took over full portfolios and those whose status is more tenuous or uncertain. I am particularly pleased that the government followed our lead in recognizing the importance of small business and the importance of fitness and amateur sport in Canada.

I do not think that it is unfair to the new ministers to suggest to them or to the House that the Prime Minister appears to have made their appointments with his eye as much to the electoral map as to other considerations, including considerations such as proven talent and experience. Even before this morning the Prime Minister and his advisers had clearly written off western Canada, so the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. McIsaac) is passed over despite his experience. The Prime Minister appears to be a little less clear as to whether or not British Columbia is fighting ground, so he has allotted B.C. one minister and three "half ministers". In regard to one of those, Mr. Speaker, I was somewhat surprised last night, when speaking to the new Minister of State responsible for small business affairs, to learn that his first visit outside of Canada in the interests of developing small business policy was going to be to the Soviet Union.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: He now assures me that this is in relation to other responsibilities that he has, but I think that it will awaken some concern among Canadians who have been watching the record of the government as to what precisely is the source of its policy regarding small entrepreneurs and small businesses.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Now tell us about your trip to Rome.

Mr. Clark: The hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay), who hopes by raising his voice to raise his hopes, asks about my trip to Rome. I must disappoint him by telling him that at no time during my trip to Rome did his name come up.

This is a government whose period in office is measured not by elections or by parliaments but by advertising slogans. From the "Just Society" to "The Land is Strong", we now have entered into the area of "Operation Justification". If the goal is to make the people of Canada believe in this government, then we, Sir, are not talking about an operation; we are talking about wholesale surgery.

I was interested to read reports of the Prime Minister's speech in Toronto the other day. That was his speech to the faithful; at least, there were some faithful reported to be there when it began. In that speech the Prime Minister lamented the state of the nation. He even lamented the state of the Liberal party. Well, Mr. Speaker, my lament is not for Canada; I have sufficient confidence in the strength of the people of this country to believe that they can survive even this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I must say that, difficult though it is, I am able to restrain my sorrow for the state of the Liberal party. My lament instead, Sir, is for a Prime Minister and for a government that have become so isolated, so divorced from reality, that they cannot even hear let alone respond to the message of Canadians. My lament is that we have to suffer through this total lack of leadership for another two years until the Prime Minister gives the people of Canada a chance to make a fresh start.

I found, Mr. Speaker, as I am sure many other Canadians did, a particular significance in the words "operation justification". Because that indicates that this government does not believe that there is anything wrong with the substance of its policies. Its members are prepared to go out and not question those policies to justify them. They believe the only problem is with the perception of those policies. In other words, it is not the government that is at fault, it is the people of Canada who are at fault.

There is no intention evidenced, either in the outpourings in Toronto or in the carefully empty speech of yesterday, of any change in the substance of the policies; the government is merely trying to cajole Canadians to change the nature of their response to policies that are clearly inadequate to the requirements of modern Canada. There is no program. There are simply to be public relations on the part of the government in the remaining months of its mandate, and unfortunately that emphasis on public relations began in the throne speech that we received yesterday.

An hon. Member: You are sterile.

Mr. Clark: I hear that word from an expert.

● (1520)

Mr. Clark: I think that no one reading the Speech from the Throne of yesterday could fail to be overcome by the boldness, initiative, and imagination that were evident in that speech! The government, among other bright initiatives, is prepared to give "very high priority to the promotion of better understanding among Canadians". There is a government with courage, boldness and foresight.

Then carrying on in that same tradition the government is prepared, and prepared absolutely and fearlessly, to review what federal programs might be transferred to the private sector. It is going to be a fearless and courageous review.

Then the government is sneaking up finally on the question of freedom of information, that question raised by my colleague, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), in a way that does singular credit to him and to this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: That is a question which I had concluded had now become safe to discuss in Canada because it is a cause even being promoted by the former minister of finance.

An hon. Member: A former minister of finance.

Mr. Clark: Yes, a former minister of finance. I assumed that the former minister, the former hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Turner), was simply repeating before a public forum a recommendation in the direction of greater freedom of information that he made so vigorously to his colleagues in Cabinet during the long time when he had some influence over the affairs of the country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: We had thought that at least this was a safe question on which initiative might be taken, but we found that, instead of bringing forward legislation, what the government is going to do is once again have another green paper, another study as to whether or not it is safe to trust the people of Canada with information about Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Having said all that, Mr. Speaker, it is clear that there was nowhere where the government was more forthcoming or more courageous than when it faced up to the thorny problem of its proper role in the Canadian economy. The choices before the government were very difficult. On the one hand, and I apologize for paraphrasing it, there were strong forces demanding more intervention, as in the assertion which I want to quote:

> The end is a free society of men and women and children . . . and free collective bargaining and the free enterprise system are some tools we have devised to reach that goal. But they're just tools and if they don't provide the right results, we'll curtail a little bit of collective bargaining or the market place free market system—

Against that position were raised equally strong voices supporting the private sector, as in this statement:

> Our strongest and most promising asset is the spirit of the people of Canada, our willingness to tackle difficult challenges head-on, our tradition of self-reliance, responsibility and individual intiative.

What a choice for the government to have to make. Imagine the agony of having to choose between Pierre Elliott Trudeau of April and Pierre Elliott Trudeau of October.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Imagine the dilemma of a government having to choose between its Prime Minister and its Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: It did so with the ingenuity that has become the hallmark of modern Liberalism. The government made its choice and came down four square with Keith Davey.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I should say that there is no question in the mind of any of us here that the government could sustain any number of resignations or defections from its parliamentary ranks so long as Keith Davey stays in place.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: But, if this throne speech was to have any relevance in current Canadian reality, it had to include above all some sense of direction for Canada, some idea of what the government really intends to do with the current controls program and, equally important, what goals it has for the country as we emerge from that program. Canadians do not know where the government is leading them. The Prime Minister and his colleagues have piled conflicting statement on conflicting statement to the point where the overwhelming characteristic of the Canadian mood is sheer uncertainty.

The government had the opportunity, and I believe the obligation in this throne speech, at least to begin the process of easing that uncertainty; of at least beginning to come clean with Canadians. Instead of that we are given some vague talk about the "middle road", and even more vague promises to begin—note, "to begin"—a process of consultation.

What a confession that is for a government to make; that after a full 12 months of controls it is now thinking seriously of beginning a consultative process. It was clear when this program was first proposed here that the purpose of bringing in controls was to buy some time, to get some breathing space that would allow that kind of consultation, and that would allow the bringing together of the economic partners of Canada in order that we might get some agreement as to what we were going to do once the controls' period was ended.

Having it clearly understood that that was the purpose of the program the government stole, why did it take the government 12 months and even more to begin the simple process of consultation? This was the government that boasted it had its full contingency plans ready some three years ago. Instead of contingency plans and instead of consultation we have wasted a full year, a year in which we have not only begun to suffer the inevitable distortions of a controls régime, but during which the climate for securing some kind of consensus of agreement among the partners in the economy has been seriously eroded, thanks to the Prime Minister's propensity for loose talk and confrontation politics.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. Clark: The government admits through the throne speech that inflation is still a serious problem. However it forgets to put the problem within its economic context which is considerably greater and more disturbing for Canadians than for this government. There is no indication in this speech that the government admits the slowness of the recovery and the evidence that we are far from achieving our economic potential. In reading it, no one can detect the fact that Canada is facing a serious problem of balance of payments and that its competitive position on international markets is continually eroding.

[English]

The government asserts its concern about inflation, yet nowhere does it acknowledge that it controls the most basic price of all, the price of money, and that interest rates in this country remain at extremely high inflationary levels. Indeed, we are treated in the name of a housing policy to a rerun of that old cliché about one million starts every four years, when anyone who has cared enough to talk to young Canadian families knows that the main problem today is not finding a house, but is finding the money to finance a mortgage.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I presume the Prime Minister is out talking to Canadians again, and if there is one thing I wish to congratulate him on it is on getting out and rediscovering the country. He usually does it once every four years, but the polls changed rather quickly this time. I understand that in doing that he concedes he is following my lead, and I trust that he will get accustomed to doing that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I note, Sir, that in a flush of uncharacteristic frankness he announced in New Brunswick the other day that the only way the Liberals can win the next election is by a miracle. I have been out campaigning in Ottawa-Carleton and in St. John's West, as the Prime Minister conspicuously has not been, and I can assure him that he will need more than a miracle there. I should say we at least do not really believe he is in that league anyway.

• (1530)

But, Sir, if we can take the Prime Minister's suggested itinerary as being the gospel, to continue the analogy, he is planning a miracle for next week. Just as soon as the results from the two by-elections become known he will disappear. I understand there is unanimity in his cabinet that he should go to Japan. The only argument was about whether or not he should return.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: It is not unusual for a throne speech to be obscure or imprecise, but this speech is much more than that. This speech is misleading. It uses soothing words to try to deny the direction in which the government has been carrying the country. It praises consultation when the government's consistent position has been to act unilaterally. It talks about "a reliance on the market to stimulate growth" when this government, through delays and threats and constant changes, has done more than any other agency to inhibit that kind of growth.

It talks about reducing the number of public servants and is silent about the increasing number of consultants the government has acquired, often without the protection and the standards guaranteed by the Public Service Commission.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, it is bad enough that a government in mid-mandate, elected with a solid majority, should use a throne speech to mislead instead of lead. But that is particularly damaging for this government because Canadians have come to expect that this is a government which cannot be believed. Its history has been marked not simply by changes but by absolute reversals.

In 1974 the Prime Minister campaigned against the very idea of controls. We can remember him pointing his finger on the television screen saying, "zap, you are frozen", and then a year later he imposed what he had opposed. On May 10 he told the trilateral commission that, "to me that is the end of separatism"; and ten days ago in Toronto he said, "But now, perhaps, an increasing number of French Canadians think they do have somewhere to go. And there is a legal political party which for a variety of reasons is getting a large percentage of the vote in Quebec."

This throne speech tip-toes toward greater freedom of information; yet the government still hides the secret reports on post controls prepared by the ten deputy ministers, the group known as the DM ten. The speech again says controls will come off, but then it goes on to propose to negotiate their extension with the provinces. In all of this there is one clear message, which is that no amount of flim-flam can obscure the fact that this is a government that Canadians cannot trust.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: And without trust it is a government that cannot govern, because a basis of trust in a federal and diverse country like Canada is elemental to national unity.

I want to speak for a moment about national unity because I think there has been a mistake in assuming that bilingualism, important as that is, is the only implement or the only issue of national unity in Canada.

[Translation]

Due to the agreement given by all parties in this House, bilingualism has become law and it will remain a basic principle of any Progressive Conservative government which is assured of receiving then as it does now the support of the minority parties in this House. However, the manner in which bilingualism has been implemented has caused some concern among many Canadians, French-speaking as well as English-speaking, but there is no reason to call them bigots or racists. On the contrary, what they need is to consider calmly various injustices now existing in the public service or elsewhere so that the program will be efficient in terms of the law and will be accepted in practice. This is our party's commitment.

[English]

Constitutions are important; laws are important. But this country is more than laws, more than constitutions; it is above all a partnership, and the essence of partnership in this country is to establish a basis of mutual respect and trust. That has broken down in Canada. It is not an accident that it has broken down. It is not due to impersonal forces from abroad. It has broken down because of now nearly a decade of the practice by this government of taking unpredicted unilateral actions and unilateral decisions to withdraw from shared costs programs which previously were forced upon the provinces, of unilateral changes in the anti-inflation board controls after many of the people affected by those controls had just gone through the costly process of adjusting to the rules that had been there, and of unilateral imposition of the program of controls without any consultation with the Canadian Labour Congress or any of the other partners who were directly to be affected.

You cannot run a country unilaterally. You cannot run it on your own. The mistake the government has made, and which it seems intent on continuing to make, is that it alone is the government which can call all the shots in Canada. Of course we need in this nation a strong national government, but we also need in this nation strong provincial governments, a strong private sector, a strong labour movement, a strong agriculture, and a number of other partners who can work together to achieve the promise and the potential of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: What we have instead is an administration that is governed by surprise—changing the AIB regulations without warning, bringing in controls without warning, and depriving Canadians of the climate of certainty which they need to plan their own lives and to pursue their own goals free of the fear that the rules will change in the middle of the night.

[Translation]

The Speech from the Throne briefly referred to the formal constitutional independence of our country. I am sure all hon. members would agree to the patriation of the constitution. However, we must not forget that we are now dealing with two issues. One is purely symbolic: It is bringing back home the document; the other is essential: It implies an agreement on the amendment formula which would make the constitution workable. At a time when the provinces do not trust the federal government disagreement over the amendment formula is to be expected. We should all be aware of the danger that the relentless pursuit of the symbol may jeopardize the chances of an agreement about the amendment formula.

● (1540)

[English]

There appears to be some question about the accuracy or the nature of the interpretation of the stance of the Government of Canada on the constitutional questions by the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Richardson), the former minister of national defence. I presume that there were also other reasons for his resignation. I want to put that question aside, however, regarding the apparent reason for his resignation because one of the things that is most significant about the resignation which occurred this morning is that the hon. member for Winnipeg South, who did not have to come to parliament for a career, was one of many Canadians in 1968 who thought the present Prime Minister would bring a fresh and hopeful spirit to national affairs. I do not know if the former minister of national defence feels deceived; I do know he feels disappointed, and for the country the tragedy is not that one more minister has gone; it is that the Prime Minister who was the repository of so much hope was prepared to trade it all away to take the advice of his flim-flam friends who contrive different incarnations whenever public opinion polls change.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: This was once a government of some purpose. No fair man can deny the sincerity of the Prime Minister's personal commitment to bilingualism, and perhaps to other goals. But that sense of purpose is gone. There is on the government benches an unmistakable and desperate will to stay in office, but there is no will to govern—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: There is no will to face the real problems of Canada, problems of regional disparity such as those raised by my colleague, the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) today, problems of falling productivity, and the fact that too many Canadians cannot afford to buy a home. That commitment went out when the ad men came in.

There is plenty of rhetoric in this speech about the potential greatness of Canada. We all know about that potential and we all accept it, but the job of government, the challenge of the real leadership, is not simply to tell us about our potential; it is to help guide the country toward responding to that potential.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: This government is in an unique position to do that. It has a solid majority in parliament although it is beginning to show strains and, until tomorrow's news at least, it has a full two years remaining in its present mandate. It has the support and assistance of a public service that is large and, in the great majority of cases, very capable, and it has a country and a people who are ready and eager to respond to some sign of genuine national leadership.

The real tragedy of the throne speech is that it fails completely to match either the mandate of the government or the legitimate expectations of the people of the country. In a country that needs above all to renew its trust in government and its confidence in itself, this speech offers more reasons for distrust and new causes of uncertainty.

It is not the job of the opposition to write throne speeches—we will come to that—and it is not our task two years before an election to present a legislative program—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I appreciate the interest of my colleagues opposite in our proposing a legislative program, because unless we did that they would have nothing to guide them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Our responsibility instead is to put forth our sense of national priorities, and I have no hesitation at all in saying that our priorities are quite different from those offered by this government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: What are they?

Mr. Clark: I thank you for asking. The overriding concern at this point in time—I hope you are taking notes—must be to achieve the realistic growth potential of the Canadian economy. As I have stated on many previous occasions, sound economic growth is not an alternative to fighting inflation; it is an essential precondition to any successful long-term policy to contain inflation. If the former solicitor general, at present the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Allmand)—

Mr. Allmand: Not motherhood anyway.

Mr. Clark: I say this with a certain chagrin because he now has some responsibility for parts of my constituency.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Which one?

Mr. Clark: I know that that matter raises some interest on the other side because the Liberal party has no reason at all to know anything about electoral boundaries in Alberta.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Of course there is some competition for nominations in the Conservative party in Alberta. The only thing the Liberals run for in the province of Alberta is the Senate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I might come back to the question. The elementary lesson which the government seems unable to grasp is that it has a responsibility not simply to help redistribute national income but also to help generate national wealth and income. In my judgment a serious commitment to economic growth, not mindless growth but the realistic potential of our economy, is fundamental to achieving the broader aspirations of our society. Indeed, as I look at the problems of national unity in more than the momentary context I see them not so much now and in the decade ahead of us as a matter of language policy, as important as that is, but rather national unity in the next decade will depend on the capacity of all regions and all the people of this country to participate in the benefits of economic growth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I see that the newly appointed Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) is smiling at that matter and I cannot help but note that when he was home recently defending his program he was doing something other than smiling when he met his constituents.

The other priority which is absolutely essential for the Government of Canada to follow as a basic principle is to begin to rebuild the concept of genuine partnership among the major elements of Canadian federalism.

My concept of federalism, and it is the concept of this party, accepts that there can be and there should be strong provinces along with a strong central government. Unlike the Prime Minister, I do not see them as alternatives to each other. I am not afraid of Maurice Duplessis, or Peter Lougheed, or Gerry Reagan, or Robert Bourrassa—

An hon. Member: What about Claude Wagner?

● (1550)

Mr. Clark: The fear and concern of the hon. member for Ste. Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) is reserved to members on the opposite side of the House and not those on this side.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: As I indicated earlier, a partnership depends on trust, and if the government has done anything during the past few years, it has been to shatter any feeling of trust among its partners in Canadian society. Who can trust a prime minister who governs by surprise, who changes the rules in the middle of the night, who piles unilateral decision on unilateral decision, and whose only consistent rule of operation seems to be to do today what he said he would not do yesterday?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: At the bottom line that is what is wrong with this country and with this government. We have national leaders in this government whom the people of Canada, the provinces of Canada, business, labour, and the other partners simply cannot trust and the tragedy is that unless the defections continue and unless the cabinet continues to trickle away, we are stuck with this government for another two years. I hope for Canada's sake that this government will mend its ways and change its direction.

I wish for Canada's sake that I could look at the throne speech and say that the government is changing, but in all conscience, and particularly on the record of the document read yesterday, I cannot, and I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Ste. Hyacinthe, that the following be added to the Address:

We respectfully affirm to Your Excellency that the Speech from the Throne is a further example of the opportunism which has cost the present administration its credibility among the people of Canada and that your ministers no longer enjoy the confidence of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Clark.]

Mr. Trudeau: —the applause which greeted the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) from his side of the House and the applause which then succeeded it, I think, indicates that all in this House are happy for the tone which has been set for the oncoming session by the Leader of the Opposition. Certainly hon. members on this side and you, Mr. Speaker, I am sure, will welcome the fact that the Leader of the Opposition has chosen to open the session in such a constructive way, following the tradition, naturally, of disagreeing with the content of the Speech from the Throne, but doing so with very compelling rhetoric, and I must say, devastating wit which leaves us on this side so much crushed! I do not think I will be able to emulate him. My speech will not be as funny and perhaps will be a little shorter, but on at least one point I want to agree with him, and that is on the statement he made at the outset about the mover and seconder, from whom we heard contributions yesterday.

I would like to congratulate the hon. Member for Restigouche, one of the two newest members of the House, and the hon. member for Lafontaine, the youngest member, for the eloquence with which they moved and seconded the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. The presence of such outstanding young men among us demonstrates the ever-renewed vitality of the House of Commons, as well as its ability to reflect the varied regional and cultural concerns of Canadians.

It was a year ago today, Mr. Speaker, that I spoke to the people of Canada, announcing the government's decision to apply price and income controls.

It has been a year of difficulty and achievement for Canada. The greatest of those achievements is the way most Canadians have responded to the challenge to share the burden of restraint. It is because of that response that I am able to report today, twelve months later, that inflation has become a less disruptive, less threatening force in our lives.

That it remains the single most dangerous obstacle to economic stability cannot be denied. That is why the controls program must continue. That is why it is so important for the people of this country to keep on sharing the restraint which is our best hope for renewed strength and growth.

Of the key groups of Canadians whose support has been vitally necessary to the success of the anti-inflation program, only two groups have been total disappointments to the people of this country. I am referring of course to the members of the two major opposition parties in this House.

While some businessmen were opposed to the program from the beginning, the great majority of those who own and manage the many thousands of large and small business enterprises in Canada have done what was expected of them in helping to make the program work. While the executive of the Canadian Labour Congress adopted the position that everyone except organized workers should restrain their demands upon the economy, most of those workers themselves, in their hundreds of thousands, support the program and have agreed to settlements within the guidelines.

Of nearly 18,600 settlements submitted to the Anti-Inflation Board up to September 10, some 11,000—or 60 per cent—covering more than 1,200,000 workers, were within the guidelines.

While some provincial governments expressed reservations, all entered into anti-inflation agreements with us and all are making every effort to deal successfully with the job.

The Supreme Court of Canada has upheld the validity of the act passed by this Parliament and the majority of Canadians continue to give the program their support.

● (1600)

An important part of the success we have achieved is the result of the extraordinary dedication of the members and staff of the Anti-Inflation Board. To the chairman, Jean-Luc Pepin, the administrator, Donald Tansley, and to the men and women who work with them I offer my congratulations and my gratitude.

Here in parliament it has been a rather less inspiring story. The Leader of the Opposition, for example, has continued to project the confusion of the position he adopted when the controls were being debated in this House. Along with his party he voted for the program on second reading, and against it on third reading.

In his speech a moment ago, in the same breath he referred to the anti-inflation program as the program that we stole from them and then went on to talk about a contingency plan that we had for bringing in inflation—controls—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: —if inflation were caused by certain domestic events. I can only suppose, Mr. Speaker, that between the second and the third reading they suddenly discovered we had not stolen their program but it was a program all our own, and that is why they changed their minds.

The hon. Leader of the Opposition keeps talking about a freeze and does not seem to realize that the program that was brought in by this parliament a year ago did not in any way entail a freeze. It may be something with which the Leader of the Opposition disagrees, but I think it would be important that he understand the reality before disagreeing with it.

Up to and including today, neither he nor his party have contributed anything to public understanding of the crippling and pervasive impact of inflation upon the lives of Canadians, nor any suggestion of appropriate economic tools for the future, nor any support of the vital national effort to control inflation.

The Tory policy on fighting inflation is to have no policy, to avoid stating a policy, while trying to stand firmly on every side of the issue.

Just recently, when the Leader of the Opposition was asked for his position on the general strike planned by the Canadian Labour Congress for tomorrow, or the general protest, to use the more accurate word, he, I think, dodged the question. If he is accurately quoted he said that while he could not support illegal action he could understand the reasons for it. Conversely, on bilingualism, we have just heard him express his point of view. He does support the policy but he cannot understand its applications. So the closest we can come to defining the Tory approach to policy issues is that they cannot support what they can understand, but they cannot understand what they support.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: But I suppose we should not be too hard on the Tory leader's non-policy on the controls' program, Mr. Speaker. He cannot be expected to solve inflation—and Bow River—at the same time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Then there are the efforts of the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) to match the "welfare bum" campaign of his predecessor. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby is in the embarrassing position of having declared a war on profits which nobody seems to want to fight. Not even his encouragement to law-abiding Canadians to break their contracts and defy the law of the land tomorrow—

Mr. Broadbent: I thought it was a day of protest and not a strike.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this is our hope, that it will be a day of protest without breaking any contracts or any laws. This is the hope that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) expressed before, and again today. I have not seen the Leader of the New Democratic Party express that hope but I will be glad to listen to him if he is going to say that—that the protest tomorrow should in no way infringe any law or break any contract; then I would stand corrected. But if, on the contrary, he is encouraging a protest which does entail the breaking of contracts and of the law, I suggest that he is trying to buy support at a very high price—the price of dereliction of responsible leadership.

I hold him even more responsible than the CLC executive for advising workers to engage in an illegal strike, because unlike the CLC leaders he was not pushed into an irresponsible position by militant factions within his own membership. If he wonders why it is difficult to win the same degree of public respect as was accorded to Mr. David Lewis, the answer may lie in the fact that Mr. Lewis was not in the habit of seeking public advantage by counselling disrespect for the law or for legal obligations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: What a phony!

Mr. Trudeau: What are we to think of the present N.D.P. leader's attempts to undermine the anti-inflation program with his indiscriminate attack on profits? Does he really expect people to believe that the only good business is a bankrupt business? If his intention is to criticize only excess profits, why does he not give any standards by which excess can be judged? If his intention is something more than simply playing upon some people's negative reaction to the word "profit", why does he not distinguish among various corporate performances? Does he admit that increased profit resulting from a higher volume of sales or higher productivity can mean more investment, more growth, and more jobs for Canadians? Does he believe that a company which had a bad year in 1975 should aim for another bad year in 1976, so as to maintain the purity of its dismal profit picture? What is he trying to say to Canada, Mr. Speaker? What is he trying to say to the people? Is he trying to say that income controls are working but price controls are not?

Mr. Broadbent: That's right.

Mr. Trudeau: Or that both are working, but to the comparative disadvantage of workers? Well, let us look at the facts.

The most visible fact is that the cost of living, as measured by the consumer price index, has risen at a significantly slower rate during the past 12 months than during the year before. When the controls were introduced last October, the CPI was rising at a rate of 10.6 per cent. Last month the rate had dropped to 6.5 per cent. Everyone in Canada has benefited. That decline has been to the advantage of everyone in Canada, and most particularly of advantage to those Canadians with middle or low incomes.

Mr. Broadbent: And it has nothing to do with the controls program.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Read the Financial Times, one of your bibles, and see.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member says it has nothing to do with the controls program.

Mr. Broadbent: It has nothing to do with it.

Mr. Trudeau: I imagine he is thinking of the role food prices have played in the decline of the CPI.

Mr. Broadbent: Meat prices, perhaps.

Mr. Trudeau: It just happens that my speech writer anticipated that argument. It is so banal and such a cliché that even my speech writers knew what the hon. gentleman would say.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Let me continue reading. There are some who claim that the more favourable CPI figures this fall are attributable to lower food prices and, because farm-gate prices are outside the scope of controls, the guidelines have played no part in the improved price picture. I will read the next part slowly, because I want the leader of the NDP to understand it.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Broadbent: I will struggle.

Mr. Trudeau: He has repeated his paralogism too often. I point out that while farm-gate prices have decelerated by about the same amount in both Canada and the United States, our retail food prices are decelerating more quickly than those of the Americans.

The food component of the CPI rose by a rate of 9.1 per cent in Canada during the ten months prior to controls—I repeat, the food component rose by 9.1 per cent—and by only three tenths of one per cent during the ten months after the controls were imposed. In the United States those same prices were rising at a lower rate of 5.5 per cent during the equivalent period last year—the figures are 5.5 per cent in the United States and 9.1 per cent in Canada—but have been rising at six times our rate—1.9 per cent—this year.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Those statistics are dry.

Mr. Trudeau: I was reading slowly. I am prepared to read those words again, in case the hon. member did not understand.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Perhaps the leader of the NDP is wondering what is the reason for this? How can this be? It is very simple, Mr. Speaker. The largest element in the retail price of food is not the cost of buying it from the farmer, but the costs of processing and distribution, and those latter costs are subject to controls. Some have calculated that 60 per cent of the retail price, more or less, is not made up of the price at the farm-gate but of the price of those after-operations, processing, distributing, and so on. That is why our prices are rising so much more slowly than in the United States, at a time when both countries are experiencing a similar deceleration in farm-gate prices because of excess supply.

Because the increase in the cost of living is declining, and because Canadian workers are permitted under the guidelines income increases greater than the increase in the cost of living, those workers are staying ahead of inflation and experiencing real gains in income, a real increase in their purchasing power. Consequently when the CLC claims workers are suffering the most under controls while companies are only loosely controlled, the CLC is totally in error.

The fact is that by any measure—whether total wage and salary incomes, wage settlements, or average income per employed worker—the working men and women of Canada have experienced a real increase in income of some 3 per cent to 4 per cent over last year.

Mr. Broadbent: Nobody believes it.

Mr. Trudeau: All of these income measures—

Mr. Broadbent: And you don't believe it.

An hon. Member: You do not understand.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, that remark was typical of the negative approach to society for which the NDP always stood. That may be an occupational malady for any person sitting on that side of the House, Mr. Speaker. When the CPI figures are bad for the country, they choose to believe those figures; but when they are good for the country, nobody on that side believes them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Tell us more bad jokes.

Mr. Trudeau: I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that all of these income measures have increased by about 10 per cent—whether it be wage settlements, average income per employed worker, or total wage and salary incomes—all these measures have increased by about 10 per cent over last year, while the CPI in September had increased only 6.5 per cent over last year.

Year over year real increases in average weekly earnings for workers in all industries were higher in the second quarter of this year than any time since the first quarter of 1972.

The total share of wages in national income has regained the high point reached in 1971, while the share of corporate profits has correspondingly declined. This is yet another indication that the control of corporate profit margins is working successfully.

Of course it is true that wage settlements are showing a slower rate of increase this year than last. But what is important to the worker's wife when she goes shopping is that, because of price controls, she has more purchasing power this year than she had in 1975 before controls. Apparently it does not suit the CLC or the NDP, or for that matter the Tories, to tell that to the Canadian worker and to his wife. I wonder why. Perhaps the opposition will tell us why during the course of this debate; or will they stand mute in the face of the accusation of misleading the public for partisan purposes?

The figures are there, Mr. Speaker. They can be interpreted various ways. We only ask that they be interpreted the same way before controls and after controls.

I can understand the arguments of those who say that we need controls but they should end fairly soon, or that we needed controls and they should be modified; but I cannot understand the arguments of those who say we are worse off now with controls than we would have been if we had not had controls. I certainly cannot understand the arguments of the CLC, of many businessmen and of some hon. members on the other side of this House who are suggesting that we should take off controls now. I have said this before, Mr. Speaker: if it could be guaranteed that we would not return to the high rate of demand for various forms of income that were present with us one year ago, the government might be tempted to do that. But no person, certainly not the leader of the NDP, nor the leader of the CLC, has pledged his seat or office for the guarantee of that reality, that if controls come off, suddenly there will be no increase in the inflation rate.

From the very beginning of the controls program the government told the people of Canada that they would not be expected to endure a real loss of income, but simply to accept a rate of increase in real income consistent with the growth rate of the economy. They are experiencing that real increase. The figures I just cited show that, Mr. Speaker. Canadian workers are improving their purchasing power, and labour's share of net national income is rising.

No reasonable person can deny that controls have served the best interests of the Canadian worker, of the average Canadian. And when workers realize that fact fully, realize its implications for themselves and their families, they will have a right to feel badly served—not only by the CLC leaders, but also by those whose interest lies in undermining public confidence in the controls program.

It is evident that Canadians know they have benefitted under controls, and will benefit still further as the program continues to restrain prices and protect real income gains next year and into 1978. The fact that they know this is reflected in the 60 per cent of wage agreements which have been voluntarily settled at or below the guidelines since last October.

At the outset of the program, we said the immediate target was an inflation rate of 8 per cent by the end of the first year of the program. We are meeting this target. Our success so far gives us confidence that we will also meet next year's more difficult target of 6 per cent.

As we enter the second year of the program, Canadians can expect a further reduction in the rate of wage increases, a further reduction in the rate of price increases, a further reduction in the rate of increase of government spending and the growth of the public service.

And as those reductions take effect, we will approach closer to one of the major longer-term objectives of the anti-inflation program—a more realistic level of expectations among Canadians in relation to future income and price increases.

To accelerate the movement toward more realistic expectations, and to lay the groundwork for the removal of controls without a renewal of inflation, the government will be asking Canadians to take part in the consideration of economic and social policies appropriate to balanced growth without controls, and without inflation.

Within the next few weeks, the government will be placing before the people of Canada our analysis of the major problems Canada faces, the principles, and the strategic directions the government has chosen to pursue. In some strategic areas, policies are already clear, and were announced yesterday in the Speech from the Throne. Other important policy decisions, however, cannot be legislated or implemented with any hope of success unless they reflect the will, the understanding and the choice of those who would be most affected by such decisions.

That is why the government over the coming months will seek the close co-operation of Parliament, the provincial governments, business, labour and the general public in focussing on the priority problems the government has identified, on the strategies we will propose, and on choosing from among the options which we will define.

Those choices, and their co-operative adoption by Canadians, are the second crucial element in the anti-inflation program. Controls buy us the time to make the changes necessary for future stability and growth. The government has been using the time provided by the first year of controls to analyze the major economic problems which lie in the path of our future stability, and to define the options available to us. Now it is time for the second phase of that process, the involvement of Canadians generally in making the important choices presented to us by the difficult and promising times in which we live. As those choices are made, they will be translated into new laws and new working mechanisms for achieving growth without inflation.

In the consultation process which will be an integral part of both the further refinement of price and income controls, and the development of new strategies, the government will be very responsive to the concerns and ideas of the people it serves, but will not swerve from its determination to remove inflation as the major threat to our economic health. The strategic areas upon which we hope to focus the attention and action of Canadians are employment policies, social policies, labour-management relations, the sharing of social responsibility, decentralization, growth and investment.

It will quickly become apparent, to all who choose to join with us in tackling the present impediments to stable growth, that inflation is a pervasive disease that is as serious a social and cultural problem as it is an economic one. It is because of the government's commitment to Liberal social goals that we place a particularly high priority upon dampening those inflationary forces which impede full employment, greater mutual respect, safety and health in the working place, and the decentralization of economic opportunities.

We invite the working men and women of Canada to be full partners in the pursuit of social justice and equality of opportunity, to join us under the umbrella of the law of the land in choosing better ways toward a better future for all Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, when I was asked for a quick response to the throne speech I said that it had obviously been ghost-written by Dr. Gallup and that political expediency virtually oozed from each of its paragraphs. After an evening of reflection and spending some several hours in preparation for today's debate, and after listening to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) this afternoon, I feel my comments of last night were indeed a model of restraint.

The throne speech is a political document. It is punctuated throughout with the cynicism that underlines the government's contempt for the people of our country. I say contempt most seriously, because in more than two years since the last election the Liberal party has done nothing to deal with the problems it said were pressing in 1974. Now, having reached an all-time low in popularity, it thinks Canadians can be bought off with glib phrases.

Nowhere in the throne speech does the government indicate that it is planning a massive response to the worst level of unemployment in modern times. Instead the government responds with rhetoric which might improve its standing in the popularity polls.

Nowhere in the speech does the government indicate it has a policy to deal with the crisis of rising oil and gas prices. Instead it only talks of an awareness of the need for conservation of energy resources.

Nowhere in the Speech from the Throne does the government indicate it is prepared to come to grips with the serious housing needs of the people of Canada. Instead it complacently admits that its currently inadequate housing policies will have to do in the future.

The outline of the government's proposals reads like a litany of past and future evasions. In almost every case the government touches on some important element of Canadian life only to avoid coming to grips with the issues. And, as I have already said, the Speech makes no more than a passing reference to three of our most serious problems—jobs, energy, and housing. When the federal government, the senior level of government, can produce a document as cynical as that which was read from the Throne yesterday, is it any wonder so many people today are turned off by politics and politicians?

Why should Canadians take their government or politicians seriously when the governing politicians ignore the real problems facing the vast majority of the people? Why should they trust the government, particularly the government of the present Prime Minister, a politician who in 1974 campaigned for office pledging action in specific areas and totally rejecting wage and price controls? What we got were controls and no action on the specific problems which were the subject of his undertakings. Mr. Speaker, no politician in this country has done more than the present Prime Minister to foster the skepticism with which Canadians increasingly view political activities.

Canadians are fed up with political promises of a "just society", or more recently a "new society", when those promises come from a party which vacillates instead of leading. Now, according to the Speech from the Throne, the Prime Minister has embarked upon a program to build a "middle society", a society in which "individual initiative" and "reliance on the market" become the touchstones of government policy, a so-called "middle society" where social goals are pursued by improving the market because that is what the business community wants.

Does the Prime Minister think Canadians cannot see through this middle-of-the-road nonsense? Does the government think Canadians will not recognize this cynicism?

Achieving social justice and equality of opportunity in our society demands a commitment to change existing structures which have remained unjust and unequal for too long. Yet here we find the government stating categorically that it has no intention of attempting any change which might offend the established order. The message from Bay Street during the summer of '76 has gotten through to the Prime Minister's office.

The real significance of the Speech from the Throne is that it stands as a Liberal party policy paper revealing the disorganized and impoverished state of its authors. It shows clearly that this besieged gaggle has consciously returned to Mackenzie King cynicism. The Liberal message from now on will be, "We are finished with openly trying to build a better society." Liberals will stand instead for the "middle way", the way that carries no commitment. Well, the middle way is really the muddled way, and Canadians know it. It is a way which enables cynical politicians to try to have it both ways. However, the people know better now than to fall for that kind of game.

The Speech from the Throne may or may not have been the swan song of the Prime Minister—we shall have to wait a few more months to see whether his party can survive with him—but it unquestionably laid to rest his political credibility. This latest flip-flop, this calculated muddling, won't wash with Canadians. It comes too close on the heels of the broken promise concerning wage and price controls. It comes at a time when Canadians want leadership and commitment in coming to grips with their problems, not glib responses to popularity polls. It comes also at a time when Canadians can see the Official Opposition party busy providing no alternative. Canadians witness not only Liberal cynicism but also Tory opportunism.

If the audience is the Chamber of Commerce, the Tory position is that profits must be uncontrolled. If the audience contains a sprinkling of trade unionists the Tories claim to understand why workers wish to protest against controls. One day the Conservatives take credit for wage controls, and the next they condemn those controls. The ghost of Mackenzie King is schizophrenic; not content with the Prime Minister's residence, it has also taken up residence in Stornoway.

The Canadian public looks to the official opposition for an alternative. Instead they find the same calculated vacillations as those of which the government is guilty. The voter looks to the Tories for unity of purpose, and finds instead a continuation of disunity. Canadians fed up with Liberal flip-flops will soon see that Conservative indecision is not one whit better. The Tories say they are keeping their programs secret until the election; no doubt they are, because were they to be revealed now they would be seen to be as vacuous as yesterday's throne speech.

This second session of the thirtieth parliament could, if the Prime Minister and the government chose, go a long way toward reducing the skepticism felt by the average person toward government and politics. What is required is a readiness to come to grips with the real issues. The official opposition, too, could help overcome this skepticism if Conservatives were prepared to question intelligently and offer honest, identifiable alternative approaches to issues which concern the average Canadian.

In short, Canadians want an end to cynicism. They don't expect magic but they do want action. They are tired of phony debate on constitutional crises created whenever the Liberals find themselves in political difficulty. They want our constitution brought home to Canada where it can quickly be brought up to date so that the whole country can deal with more pressing issues.

Canadians are tired—and I say this with emphasis—of the bungling on bilingualism. They are prepared to build a bilingual Canada, but both French and English speaking Canadians want fair programs that are explained to them. They are tired of being lectured at and resent being told that every criticism of the present program is a challenge to the very principle of bilingualism. They are tired, in short, of that phony argument.

Working Canadians are tired of government inaction on industrial and environmental health and safety problems. They know what and where the hazards to health and safety are. They know precisely the corporations that are causing these problems and what immediate, straightforward, practical steps would have to be taken to clear them up.

The miners whom I talked to not long ago at Elliot Lake know just what dangers they face from lung cancer, from white-hand or silicosis. They know that unless ventilation is improved when production is expanded conditions will be as hazardous as before. They know it is critically dangerous not to wear uncomfortable and inefficient masks—something as mundane but as serious as that. What they want to know is why the federal government, which has responsibility for uranium development, does not share the responsibility of paying for the research needed to eliminate the long-term effects of mine-related diseases. Why, they ask, has the federal government failed even to help develop a safe mask which the private sector refuses to produce for its workers in the mines?

Canadians also want to know why regulations governing leeching from radioactive tailings threaten their drinking water at home and have made unsafe the water that the local Indian band in the neighbourhood has to drink. The Cree of Cross Lake, whom I visited this fall in Manitoba, want to know why it took six years to get federal action in obtaining safe drinking water.

I was shocked and moved, Mr. Speaker, when I discovered in September that in August of 1976—I repeat, August of 1976—92 Indian kids had been seriously affected with diarrhoea and gastroenteritis and nothing had been done. I am pleased to report that at least the new Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Allmand) promptly initiated corrective action when I drew his attention to the problem, but surely, Mr. Speaker, his department and his predecessors stand condemned for decades of past inaction toward our native people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The question remains, Mr. Speaker, on how many other reserves in Canada has this deplorable circumstance existed? How many of the deaths of young Indians, to put it as bluntly as that, whose life expectancy is the lowest in the country and whose infant mortality is the highest in the country, have been due to the indifference of government officials, and more important, to the indifference of the government in dealing with something as mundane but as serious as pure water for people on the reserves? Throughout Canada, but particularly in the north, the federal government must have priorities which ensure that every Canadian is guaranteed straightforward, practical necessities—safe drinking water and good sanitary conditions. These are still being neglected.

Canadians are tired of the old cartel dictating exploration and pricing policies for oil and gas. They are tired of a federal government that is incapable of preparing a competent energy policy for the whole country. In addition to rigorous and vigorously pursued conservation policies, Canadians, as every public opinion survey indicates, want oil and gas production that is owned, controlled, and operated as a public utility by Canadians. They want neutral, unbiased agencies reviewing and regulating energy producers so that future employment and industrial development are adequately maintained at a price that Canada can afford. Our people want an end to policies that allow the price of a barrel of oil to be tripled in three years, only to find the oil cartel pleading poverty still for future exploration and the energy minister agreeing that the price might have to go even higher to provide even more incentive for even more exploration.

Atlantic Canadians, and I think particularly of Canadians in the provinces of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island who for years have been ignored by the absence of an effective regional development program, want to know why they must suffer again disproportionately in this energy crisis.

When one talks of mining and exploration for petroleum, one is immediately reminded of Canada's grossly inequitable taxation system. Here more than anywhere else in federal policy do we find our people calling for serious reform. The average working Canadian family is overtaxed or taxed unfairly, and wants relief. They do not want to avoid their burden but they do want a fair burden. They know that corporations do not pay their fair share of the tax bill. They know, for example, that in 1970 corporations paid a higher proportion of federal taxes than they do today in 1976, after so many years of so-called progressive government.

Most taxpayers recall with dismay the fact that our former leader, David Lewis, revealed in the 1972 election campaign that corporations had amassed tax deferrals of some $4.8 billion that they would never have to repay. They would be shocked to learn that the amount that these same corporations have deferred today has climbed to nearly $10 billion.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

[Mr. Broadbent.]

Mr. Broadbent: The important thing to remember here is that these are interest free loans to corporations that no Canadian, if he wants to buy a house, can get from his government. But a corporation with its connections with the Liberal party can get billions of dollars in deferred taxes. My party described that situation in 1972 as a corporate rip-off. It remains unchanged. In 1976 it remains a corporate rip-off.

However, Mr. Speaker, the government, with the active encouragement of the Conservatives, has solved the problem for at least one group of taxpayers. It has created a whole new batch of personal tax gimmicks so that the wealthy at least can enjoy their own private rip-off. The Government calls the corporate tax dodges investment incentives. The personal tax dodges are called, both by the government and by the official opposition, saving incentives. Technically every Canadian is eligible for these new tax dodges. In reality only the well-off can afford to take advantage of registered retirement savings plans, registered home ownership plans, dividend tax credits, $1,000 interest income deductions, or half tax rates on capital gains.

The unfair distortion created by these so-called incentives comes very clearly into focus when Revenue Canada can report in 1974 that 252 people who made more than $50,000 paid no income taxes at all. Under this government's tax proposals, many of which were first suggested by the official opposition, there were 252 people earning more than $50,000 a year who paid not one cent in income tax. In 1973 the number was 156, and in 1972 the number was 92. The point I am making is that the situation has been getting regressively worse numerically.

What was the average income of this poor group that paid no taxes? The average income was $92,000 a year. That was the average of those who paid no taxes. Had they paid taxes at the rate of 40 per cent the federal treasury would have been richer by $10 million, and something useful might have been done with that money. The precise point is that this money could have been used in the way of equity to reduce the burden on the other people. Instead, because we have this kind of loophole for the rich, every other Canadian has had to subsidize these 252.

Let me stress that the money involved would not amount to very much of a savings for the other taxpayers. I think it works out to about $1 each, but that is not the point. The issue is one of fairness in the tax system. We do not have a fair tax system when Canadians earning $92,000 a year pay no taxes at all while other men and women whose family incomes are at the poverty level have to pay taxes. That is the situation we have under this Liberal government. Taxes were not even mentioned in yesterday's throne speech.

Let me now return to the redistribution of income, and I was astounded to read one argument. It was absurdly stated that the redistribution of income has been "obstructed by inflation". I was further astounded by the statement that "to support private industry in meeting greater international com-the wage settlements for unorganized workers are substantially below those of the wage settlements for the organized workers and that the vast majority of the unorganized are doing very badly indeed.

In fact according to the calculations—and I would invite the government to provide other data if it has it—it appears that the unorganized working force in Canada has increased its wages and salaries for this year by only 7 per cent. The Prime Minister has not told the unorganized workers that. I would like him to go around the country and speak to the employees of Eaton's and Simpsons, and talk to the cab drivers and unorganized workers in the Ottawa-Carleton area and tell them that their increases are progressing only in the range of 7 per cent.

Mr. Trudeau: What was the figure for last year?

Mr. Broadbent: I do not have the figure, but I would be happy to discuss the point if we had last year's figure. The point, in response to the Prime Miister's interjection, is that the 7 per cent increase does not enable the unorganized majority to cope with the current level of inflation and it is deceptive to imply to the people of Canada that this program is working for the unorganized people when it is precisely that group for whom it is not working. Price increases remain uncontrolled—

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question on the subject?

Mr. Broadbent: Yes.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think the statistic mentioned is a relevant figure. I simply ask the hon. member if he would get the figure for last year. I think the question is relevant, because of course if their increase has been 7 per cent, I believe in money terms and not real terms, then I would point out to him that during the last year the cost of living has gone up by only 6.5 per cent and therefore they are better off than they were when the cost of living was going up by 10 per cent or 12 per cent, assuming the 7 per cent figure is the same this year as last year.

Mr. Broadbent: The Prime Minister is right. Of course they are better off. They are better off by .5 per cent. All I can say is that that is slim pickings for Canada's poor. The point obviously is that if the government had been concerned about that precise group, the unorganized workers, it could have done what the labour party did in Great Britain when it brought in a very different kind of controls program and made certain levels of increases mandatory for the poor people. That was precisely what the Liberals left out in this country.

I do not care what the Prime Minister or other officials say, price increases in this country remain essentially and virtually uncontrolled. Despite spending $1 million in taxes on a misleading advertising campaign, the controls program has not been the cause of the reduction in the rate of increase in the consumer price index. The government claims credit for the weather which has resulted in better crops and lower international food prices. At home meat prices in particular have fallen at the farm gate. Yes, indeed, some of those declines in food prices at the farm gate have been passed on, but I repeat that food prices are virtually uncontrolled, and the main reason we are receiving benefits now as consumers of food is the work done by the Canadian farmers at home and by other farmers abroad, and not the controls program. When you subtract the food component from the consumer price index, what do we find? We find that we have an actual rate of inflation of about 9.3 per cent and that we have a rate of inflation still in housing in the neighbourhood of 13.5 per cent.

Earlier today the Prime Minister had questions concerning where we stood in respect of profits. I reply to the Prime Minister that of course we support the notion that if we have a private sector there will be profits. That was not the argument. The argument I made outside the House in speeches to which he was alluding is that if you are to control profits at all then you set the same kind of restrictions and limitations on them that you set on the ordinary wage and salary earnings, and if you have a $2,400 ceiling, or a 2 per cent maximum on productivity gains for workers, why in heavens name do we not have the same kind of ceiling on profits for the corporate sector? That is the argument.

In the list of speeches I made prior to the opening of the House I provided the names of all kinds of corporations, somewhere between 55 and 60, whose profits are up 25 per cent over last year, 50 per cent, 75 per cent, and indeed over 100 per cent. I referred to these cases, and not one fact has been challenged. I wish publicly to give credit to the research group of the New Democratic Party which did the work on that project. I want to say to the Prime Minister that it is a very unfair program when Simpsons-Sears can increase its profits in that kind of range, or when Canadian Tire can go up 25 per cent or 30 per cent, whatever the figure is.

The argument has been made that their sales have been increasing. I think the Prime Minister asked this afternoon whether that does not entail their right to have more profits. I say that our version of a just controls program is that it does not entail that right; that if their sales are increasing in such a way that their profits are going up 25 per cent, 50 per cent or 80 per cent, then instead of having a system which permits them to go up we should have a system which compels them to reduce their prices and pass on the benefits to the consumers. That is what the program should be all about.

I want to conclude my remarks by saying that the controls program that has been brought in—and we said this all along, not in some empty-handed kind of way which made no distinction at all about the right of corporations to have profits, which of course they must have—is unfair to working Canadians. The evidence supports this because their wages and salaries have been held down while at the same time profits have not been held in check in the private sector.

To speak of a third element in the population, we have the executive salaries which have been permitted to go up because of stock options and because of income received from dividends in an unchecked way. Also there is the situation in petition, the government will modify substantial industrial assistance programs". This boggles the mind. Here we have a government controlling wages of workers; a government which has failed even to begin the redistribution of income in this country; a government which says it will practise restraint, yet a government that is going to increase substantially once again give-away programs to private industry.

What Canadians want to know is how much we have to pay in taxes to keep enterprise free and initiative stimulated. They are sick of paying unfair taxes. A few years ago we were told we needed all these tax write-offs, tax deferrals, and industrial assistance programs to create jobs. Today we have more unemployed Canadians than at any other time in modern history. Even a finance department study, and I emphasize that, which was agreed to under conditions of a minority government, and which reported back a couple of years ago, concluded that these give-aways amounting to billions of dollars each year to the corporations were simply not working and not achieving the numbers of jobs they were designed to create. Yet we still have the same programs on the books, and in the throne speech we were informed that they are to be made even more bountiful for the corporations, and this is at a time, as I say, when those at the poverty level continue to pay taxes, and at a time when individuals earning $92,000 a year pay no taxes. This boggles the mind, particularly when we have this new kind of commitment to corporate give-aways.

At the same time the government is callously cutting off the unemployed from the benefits they need because the jobs we paid for in our tax system last year have not been created. The more than 700,000 Canadians listed as unemployed want work, not handouts. There is a phrase almost like that in the throne speech, but the phrase is not followed up by any commitment to action.

This government simply tinkers with unemployment programs that do little more than extend inefficient and inadequate existing programs. The money the government will spend is the money it will have saved by cutting off the benefits of those already without jobs. That is remarkable logic. You take away from the poor and unemployed and use that same money to provide them with benefits. Instead of going to those who are more adequately situated financially, and instead of doing some serious economic planning involving the private sector, the government takes the money from the poor to provide for the poor. This is the worst kind of political cynicism.

The people of Canada want a government commitment to full employment policies, and policies that will result in at least $7 billion in additional national production, which is currently being lost as a result of current levels of unemployment.

The people want a commitment to housing policies which hold out hope for reasonable rental accommodation and reasonable home ownership costs. We want an end to mortgage rates of 11.75 per cent. A direct solution simply involves direct and tough action with our financial institutions. We want people in Toronto and other cities to be able to look at houses which cost less than $68,776. We want them to be able to look at row condominiums which cost less than $50,204, which is the typical price, and at a cost less than $41,175, the current price of an apartment condominium in Toronto.

A person of no less significance in government bureaucracy than the director of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation said not long ago that the major cause of high housing prices is unconscionable land profits. Canadians want an end to unconscionable land profits. They want an end to speculation in land. Not only do they want an end to speculation in land for housing purposes, they want an end to speculation in arable land suitable for agricultural purposes, particularly because of what has resulted in virtually every province, namely, the loss of arable land.

The people of Canada want a national land policy, the purpose of which is to provide land in appropriate areas for housing, and to preserve the land that is rich for agricultural purposes. We are getting neither of these results from the government's policies. Our people want federal policies which will protect land from all kinds of speculation, both for housing and agricultural purposes.

I have listed this afternoon some real problems for which there are immediately available honest and direct courses of action. The solutions I have suggested in respect of those problems are ones that do not require magic. Nor do they require a commitment from politicians that once these solutions are brought forward all the problems will disappear. In terms of the solutions I have proposed, these are things that will work and will bring a degree of decency to the lives of ordinary people. These are precisely the kinds of detailed proposals that have been absent from the government's policies, absent from the throne speech, and totally absent in the opportunism of the Official Opposition.

Before I conclude my remarks I want to say that many of the positive proposals I have made today would, I believe, make our country a more just and equitable place in which to live. Coincidentally, my party also believes that many of these policies would do more to fight inflation than that unfair, unworkable controls program the Prime Minister inflicted upon us last Thanksgiving day.

The government's controls program has been effective only in restricting the wages of working Canadians. Once again the government has not stressed the situation in respect of the unorganized working Canadians.

I was amused to note that the Prime Minister when he was in New Brunswick, when he undid his shirt, loosened his tie and once again spoke directly to the working people—and we will all recall the statement if we were watching television or were there in person, as I remember it vividly—saying that the big unions have not liked the controls program and the corporations have not liked the program but that the government brought it in for ordinary Canadians. What the Prime Minister did not include in his remarks—at least they were not recorded, and perhaps he will correct me if he did—was that

I say that the government is guilty of legalized frauds against thousands of unemployed who did indeed pay their unemployment insurance premiums because the government even ordered them taken off their gross salaries.

After that monumental blow the minister will tell the papers that unemployment is declining when it is the payroll that was cut by the subterfuges that we all know, either the recipient losing his right to benefits for all sorts of equally insignificant reasons or still because he did not answer at the set time and date a questionnaire he often received too late because of the bad postal service or because that form did not get to the office in time at the date and time set by the civil servant, and I am talking here about that famous rule of four consecutive weeks without pay.

Mr. Speaker, if under that rule a recipient does not receive any payments during four weeks he automatically loses his right to all those benefits and he must again work eight weeks to regain that right. That is the most nonsensical rule that has been found to date.

There was not much willingness in the Speech from the Throne to talk about the famous Anti-Inflation Act whose sole purpose has been to freeze workers' salaries since it was never used indeed to control prices and incomes of multinationals or Crown corporations no matter what one might say. Those big companies were allowed fantastic revenues of 30, 40 and even 50 per cent without a word being said. Increases exceeding the limits set in the Anti-Inflation Act were tolerated and even authorized, even for government corporations. Take postage stamps that were just increased to 10 cents and I could name thousands of multinational companies, private companies, or Crown corporations.

The government says that inflation lost ground under its Anti-Inflation Act and people know from experience that it is because the worker is losing an increasing part of his purchasing power because of the low basic exemption. It is as a result of the low basic exemption in Canada that 75 per cent of wage increases automatically return to treasury coffers. For years the government has been urged to double at least the basic exemption which would give those who earn salaries just above the average a chance to make it uphill. But no, that famous basic exemption is still maintained. Indeed, the right hon. Prime Minister is beginning to realize it because he is considering reexamining that act. I wish it will serve for once to really freeze prices and incomes, not only salaries, and especially reduce the interests of banks which are 90 per cent responsible for inflation and financial monopolies.

We dare not mention control over bank interests and monopolies, as it has been completely removed. Yet it is a major cause of inflation but we keep our hands off this dangerous topic. Nevertheless I am convinced this government will not do anything about it in spite of the review which is about to be undertaken on the Bank Act as this government is the mere lackey of those agencies which affect the daily lives of the Canadian people.

[Mr. Gauthier (Roberval).]

The government intends to amend the National Transportation Act. Let us hope it will deal with passenger service so that the taxpayers who make up for the deficit of the Canadian National will be able to enjoy improved services. But I would like primarily to draw the attention of the House to an issue which is not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, namely a better farm policy. In spite of all the hardships milk producers have suffered, the government has no suggestion to present to dairy farmers who are all, without exception, on the verge of bankruptcy.

Mr. Speaker, this is the worst blow in the speech. While all milk producers were expecting the announcement of a milk policy which would correct the errors of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), the subject is not even mentioned. In order to remedy the lack of commercial directions from the Minister of Agriculture, all producer quotas have been reduced, and this exactly one year after dairy farmers had been asked to make an effort to produce more.

Today the same producers are penalized because they simply listened to the department one year ago. More than this, Mr. Speaker, this government, in connivance with the provinces, paid and gave grants to have our cheese processing plants closed and to favour the production of milk powder. Today we face a surplus of milk powder whereas the few remaining private cheese processing plants do not have enough milk. Our cheese processing plants do not have enough milk. Do you see the ridicule in this situation, Mr. Speaker?

While producers who have exceeded their quota reduced by the department are being penalized, while the surplus production is being seized at the rate of $10,000, $15,000 and $20,000, our cheese makers do not have enough milk to meet the market demand! Someone might say it is not true. I would forgive him, because it is unbelievable!

During the summer holiday, I went to see two owners of independent cheese factories in my riding and they have assured me that while they had orders to impose a fine on surplus production and send this money to the Federation of Industrial Milk Producers, they had not enough milk to meet their sales contracts. It is unbelievable!

Indeed, it is unbelievable, but these are facts I have been able to ascertain from two independent producers, while the only cheese co-operative that has survived the powdered milk storm cannot produce more for want of foresight on the part of the responsible people in the department.

Millions of dollars have been expended for building up stocks of powdered milk while cheese production has been abandoned.

So much so that during these years a cheese factory counting three generations of owners was denied grants which had indeed been accepted in principle in Ottawa, and I pleaded the case myself. But after the departure of the only civil servant qualified to plead for the independent cheese producers, that producer could never get a single penny from the federal government.

respect of doctors and lawyers. We have produced figures to show that their average income will be more than double the $2,400 ceiling placed on the organized workers. Because of these kinds of injustices the New Democratic Party, from day one last year when we saw the implications of the program up to today in the House of Commons, remains 100 per cent opposed to this kind of program. Before we can go on as a government—and I have made some suggestions to the government—and before we give some attention in a serious way to the implementation of some of the positive programs, we must get this abomination known as a controls program out of the way.

Therefore I want to move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), that the amendment be amended by inserting therein immediately after the words "the people of Canada", the following words:

We also affirm that the failure of the government to end the wage and price control program immediately, in light of the obvious inequities of the program, including the practice of limiting the wages of ordinary workers while leaving profits and prices virtually unchecked, is contrary to the expressed wishes of most Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: An amendment to the motion of the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) has been moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner). Now an amendment is moved to that amendment in the motion put forward by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, first let me pay tribute to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada and to his charming wife. I also want to congratulate them for the dignity with which they perform their duties as first couple of Canada.

I also wish to thank the Leader of the Official Opposition for the nice words he had for our leader now in hospital. After seeing him yesterday, I can tell you that he is well for the moment. He asked me to be his spokesman in the analysis of the Speech from the Throne, and I am very proud of it.

Mr. Speaker, again and again I read the Speech from the Throne after it was delivered by the Governor General of Canada in order to detect some indications of the present government's policy. The result is a most complete obscurity. But I realized that the public servants who drafted this literary work are specialized in camouflage.

In summary, they suceeded in dealing with everything and nothing. Nevertheless, parliamentarians and the public are still expecting more precise data on the government's intentions at the beginning of this new session but every time I hear such a speech, I am always disappointed. I finally wonder whether it would not be more serious to simply eliminate the Speech from the Throne.

I wish to congratulate the movers for their speeches and for their endeavour to give an appearance of seriousness to such a lot of hot air.

I know that theirs was a difficult task, but someone had to make a sacrifice and therefore, scapegoats were used. I must admit that there certainly are some serious and positive aspects in this speech, even though they are greatly overshadowed by the negative aspects. The only positive points are those where the government offers to help provinces in areas within their own jurisdiction.

Mr. Speaker, I am always surprised to hear of federal-provincial agreements in areas which concern only provinces. Would it not be more logical, to preserve the autonomy of the said provinces, if they were given fiscal rights tailored to their responsibilities. I find it simply ridiculous to always tell the provinces what they must do, what they need, as if provincial administrators were not just as able as those of the federal government to see to their own business. The federal government interferes in all provincial areas by pretending to help the provinces, which results in this eternal federal-provincial disagreement which will stop only when the central government no longer plays at being the great protector and minds its own business, and to do this, of course, the federal government will have to give to the provinces the fiscal powers required for their own administration. But the government would not miss such a great opportunity for maintaining the status quo and these mixed responsibilites, which aim only at confusing even more the population, at mixing everything up, so that the people and even the members of parliament can no longer distinguish what is federal and what is provincial, and I believe that this is the aim of the present government.

In the Speech from the Throne, the government talks about the independence of the country. This is great, but it is forgetting that the country is made up of provinces and that each one must feel free and independent within its own provincial jurisdiction for the country to be one day truly independent. A society will never be independent and free if its citizens are shackled. The same is true of the provinces which are the economic prisoners of the central government. That is why, whenever the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) talks about Canada's independence, the words do not sound right anywhere in Canada.

The Speech from the Throne states again that Parliament will be called upon to amend the Unemployment Isurance Act. If the government wants to increase the premiums Canadian workers have to pay, while resorting to all manners of subterfuge to give claimants as little money as possible, I state right away that I am against it. If the purpose of this new legislation is to allow the minister to establish regulations to counteract the effects of the act, I am also against it. As a matter of fact, the book which contains the regulations established since the Unemployment Insurance Act came into force is three times as big as the act itself, and the sale purpose of these regulations is to exclude as many unemployed people as possible from the list of beneficiaries.

Today they would like the cheese production to double; unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, we are sorry but it is too late. We have destroyed everything and we will have to start from scratch. All cheese factories were closed, and those responsible for that state of affairs are the ones who were wishing for a monopoly. I heard them: they were hoping for a monopoly in the region with no competition, and that is why we now have to import from 5 to 10 million pounds of cheese every year.

I heard those so-called co-operators cry out before their members: "Cheese factories have to disappear, we have to break down competition to achieve absolute control".

To that I replied that if competition is done away with, 50 per cent of our producing province is killed. I have always maintained that even cooperatives must learn to live with competition. It is even good for them! The Speech from the Throne confirms what I advocated some ten years ago. I quote:

> Significant revisions to laws promoting competition in the marketplace will be placed before you. The Government is determined to preserve and enhance Canada's traditional policy of reliance on individual enterprise as the mainspring of economic activity.

And further on:

> The more effectively competition governs the marketplace, the less necessity there will be for control of the economy by governments.

And we have proof that the contrary also is true: the less competition there is, the more governments have to intervene, to bring monopolies to heel, to control multinationals.

The logical solution? The government must encourage and support private enterprise, if it wants an active economy. I ask the government to quit talking and act. To my mind, Mr. Speaker, more than ever the time has come for action, and I trust this session will be that of private enterprise.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A few minutes ago before the speech of the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) I put in general terms the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) and seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and that is the amendment which continues to be under consideration by the House. I did not put it in specific language at that moment because I wanted to absorb the effect of the text on the amendment and to read it as one paragraph with the amendment.

The motion that is before the House at the present time is that moved by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby and seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, as follows:

> That the amendment be amended by inserting therein, immediately after the words "the people of Canada", the following words:
> "We also affirm that the failure of the government to end the wage and price control program immediately, in light of the obvious inequities of the program including the practice of limiting the wages of ordinary workers while leaving profits and prices virtually unchecked, is contrary to the expressed wishes of most Canadians".

So the text which it would be proposed be added to the address by the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) would be a composite text as follows:

> We respectfully affirm to Your Excellency that the Speech from the Throne is a further example of the opportunism which has cost the present administration its credibility among the people of Canada; we also affirm that the failure of the government to end the wage and price control program immediately, in light of the obvious inequities of the program, including the practice of limiting the wages of ordinary workers while leaving profits and prices virtually unchecked, is contrary to the expressed wishes of most Canadians and that your ministers no longer enjoy the confidence of this House.

Order, please. I take it there has been some discussion and agreement in keeping with the ordinary practice that this day be kept for the leaders of each party. The leaders or their nominees having spoken, at this point it is in order that I see the clock at six o'clock. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning.

At 5.36 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

PROPOSED ACTION AGAINST PARTICIPANTS IN OCTOBER 14TH DAY OF PROTEST—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Today, October 14, is a sad day for democracy. In the continuing struggle for power by the minority of the labour force under the influence of a few union leaders—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think I should once again caution hon. members about getting into preambles that constitute subjects of debate. A preamble to a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 ought to be only sufficient, I would think, to establish the urgent nature of the matter, and not to get into argument.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this day of protest by the Canadian Labour Congress is in fact deemed to be a general strike by a minority, illegal in many parts of the nation, and damaging not only to our economy but to the very essence of our democratic way of life, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage (Mr. Masniuk):

That the government take all necessary and appropriate disciplinary action against the instigators of this general strike, in particular Joe Morris, president of the CLC, and other top union officials.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can only be presented to the House with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT OR ABOLITION OF PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this being labour's day of legitimate protest, I ask leave under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That this House urges the government to take immediate steps either to amend the controls program by providing effective checks on prices and profits or to abolish the program forthwith.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED REPLACEMENT OF PROGRAM WITH AN INCOMES PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a similar motion. In view of the fact that the Anti-Inflation Board purports to restrict professional incomes and has failed to do so, with medical incomes increasing at a rate double that provided under the AIB, and incomes of the legal profession increasing similarly, and in view of the fact that 35 per cent of professional service firms have failed to report under the requirements of the AIB, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this controls program be abandoned in view of its patent unfairness and that such program be replaced by a meaningful incomes program which allows inflation fighting to be done by the rich as well as the poor.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before receiving any further motion pursuant to Standing Order 43, I think I ought to indicate to the House that members might be reminded to examine the subject matter that is now being debated in the House. The motions that have so far been presented pursuant to Standing Order 43 would obviously be quite germane to the motion, and quite debatable pursuant to the terms of the amendment and sub-amendment now being considered by the House during the throne speech debate. I wonder if it is not simply a fiction to ask the House to set aside one motion under which these matters could be debated for the purpose of debating another one which is very similar in terms.

MANPOWER

REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that there is apparently no reduction in unemployment, that the Canadian people has gained confidence in the LIP program for the creation of jobs and the eradication of unemployment and owing to the considerable number of serious projects suggested under the program for 1976-77, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That this House advise the government to earmark supplementary estimates for this program, immediately increasing the estimates of the Department of Manpower for that item.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

LEGALITY OF OCTOBER 14TH DAY OF PROTEST—REASON FOR DELAY IN COMING TO A DECISION

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, in the absence today of the Minister of Labour I wonder if I could direct my question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that yesterday the Minister of Labour refused to say whether the government views the national strike as legal but went on to say by implication that it would be illegal unless the protest took place at lunch hour or off-working hours, and in view of conflicting decisions yesterday in different provinces which resulted in the strike being legal in British Columbia and not in Ontario, and given the well publicized fact that working people and others have been concerned about whether illegal action was appropriate in our democratic system, can the Prime Minister now advise whether he or his ministers or any of them ever asked for and obtained legal advice indicating that this strike would be legal in some provinces and not legal in others.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Surely, Mr. Speaker, it is not for the Government of Canada to decide what is legal or not in particular provinces from the point of view of provincial law and collective agreements under provincial labour legislation. The federal position as stated by the minister, which is quite clear, is that if the protest does not involve illegal actions then the Minister of Labour said he could understand the right of individuals or associations to protest policies that they disagreed with by protesting in a legal way; in other words, if they protest by demonstrating during their lunch hour or after their hours of work. If on the contrary they are breaking a contract, then of course it becomes illegal and the Government of Canada cannot condone it; on the contrary we condemn it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fraser: It is all very well for government members to applaud, Mr. Speaker, but the question is one which all the public is asking. It seems very strange—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a supplementary question would he put it forthwith?

Mr. Fraser: Can the Prime Minister then tell this House, in view of the fact that for many months the government has known that the CLC was armed with the authority given it at the May convention to call for a national strike, despite the fact that members of the government did not feel it would take place, why there has been no direction from his Minister of Labour or from the government in general as to what the parameters of this particular form of protest ought to be in order to keep it legal, keeping in mind as the government well knows that this strike would be breaking a great many contracts which were not within federal jurisdiction, and especially in view of the fact that the Minister of Labour has confused the public even more by hoping that the strike would be a success.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member must have missed what the Minister of Labour said yesterday. He said quite clearly, as I understood him—and he said this outside the House also—that he could not condone illegal action but there was a way of protesting which was perfectly legal. The hon. member knows this. That is the position of the government. If under federal labour legislation there are any illegal acts we will condemn them, and we reserve the right to act in whatever way is appropriate to correct that situation. That is the federal responsibility and a responsibility which we hope the House supports. But we cannot say what position the provinces will take within areas in their own jurisdiction under laws they have passed. I could give the hon. member an opinion. I suppose it would be much the same as that of the federal government. If provincial labour laws are broken and something illegal is done, then I hope those concerned will be condemned in those particular provinces.

Mr. Fraser: The question, Mr. Speaker, is simply this: can the Prime Minister explain why there has been no leadership whatsoever concerning the legality of this strike for the many months that the Canadian public has been looking at the issue and asking itself whether or not it would be breaking the law and whether or not that was appropriate. Where has been the leadership from the federal government?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I might answer the question.

Mr. Fraser: If I can ask the question of the minister, certainly he can answer it.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I do not know where the hon. member for Vancouver South, or whatever his riding is—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): —I do not know where he has been.

Mr. Fraser: I have been talking to the people. Where have you been?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I do not know where he has been in the last two or three months. It has been clearly stated by myself and others time and time again that if it should be perceived, as a result of actions on the day of protest, that collective agreements in the public sector are broken, then sanctions can apply and there would be a breach of collective agreements. My colleague, the former President of the Treasury Board, has said the same thing on many occasions. That is the situation. In the private sector, under provincial jurisdiction, in many cases the option is open to employers to take what remedies they wish to take, if indeed they wish to take them. Would the hon. member propose we suggest something that is not right or incorrect? I trust the hon. member is not doing that—at least I give him that much credit.

Mr. Fraser: First of all, may I say—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Fraser: How many ministers, along with the Prime Minister, are going to be allowed to get in on questions if the opposition cannot come back and ask them other questions?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fraser: They are as confused as the public, and that is the reason the public is so confused.

Mr. Speaker: I was not denying the hon. member for Vancouver South the floor to put a supplementary question, as is often the case in leading off on behalf of the official opposition, if that is why he is seeking the floor. If not, I will recognize the hon. member for York-Simcoe.

Mr. Fraser: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. May I say that when the Minister of Labour asks where I have been, I can tell him I have been talking to the people and it is obvious that he has not.

The question I want to ask of the Minister of Labour is this: What kind of leadership is it when you know there is a strike against a federal law, you know it will involve all kinds of people who are not under federal jurisdiction, and during all these months the government gives no direction to anyone regarding the conditions under which the strike would be legal or illegal? Why did you not take advice on this and why did you not say something?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): The more the hon. member talks, the more ludicrous he sounds.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): If he is implying that union leaders in this country are so stupid they do not know what is legal or illegal, that is a responsibility he can take. I have made it clear that if there are breaches of collective agreements in the public sector, then sanctions and penalties can apply.

Mr. Fraser: What about British Columbia?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): The hon. member says, "what about British Columbia?" That is why I suggested that I did not know where he had been. I was out in Vancouver about two weeks ago and I made it perfectly plain at that time. I did not notice the hon. member complaining about lack of leadership at that time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fraser: The minister did not say at that time that the strike would be legal in British Columbia and illegal in Ontario.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF BACKGROUND PAPERS ON WHICH DECISION TO CONTINUE PROGRAM MAY BE BASED

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. As the protest day is obviously designed in the hope that the government will terminate the wage and price control program at the earliest opportunity, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance, further to my question yesterday, whether he would lay before the House his analysis or other documentation which he plans to put to the provinces when he requests an extension of the present agreements with those provinces with respect to the wage and price control program. Will he lay that before the House immediately so that the provinces and ourselves can have a fair chance to review this documentation. Second, do we take from his answer yesterday that he is going to request a two year extension from the provinces?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I pointed out to the hon. gentleman yesterday that the present agreements with the provinces run until April of 1977, which is nearly six months away, and that at the beginning of 1977, in the first months of that year, it obviously will be important, both for the purpose of debate in this House and for the purpose of discussions with the provinces, to talk about the progress of the anti-inflation program at that point and the considerations we would have in mind with respect to extension of those particular agreements. It seems to me to be a lot more sensible to talk to them about the impact of the program as it will have been experienced up to early 1977 on the then current facts rather than setting out the analysis now and talking about that in six months time.

So it is for that reason I pointed out to the hon. gentleman that the discussions will commence early next year. They should be carried on on the basis of the experience up until that time. Of course, the period of extension would be confined by the period of time which has been authorized by this parliament, which at the present date is for another two years.

GOVERNMENT COURSE OF ACTION IN DISCUSSIONS WITH PROVINCES ON EXTENSION OF PROGRAM

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): I wonder if I may put another question to the Minister of Finance with regard to his last answer. Assuming that in his discussions with the provinces such matters as compensation levels, productivity and profit will be dealt with, would the minister indicate if it is the intention of the government actually to put its position before this House and the provinces, or is it simply going to go into some kind of random discourse, asking others for their views as to what should be included in the agreement? Will the minister state a firm government position, for example, on the questions of profits, productivity and compensation levels?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Naturally, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: What would you expect?

BASIS ON WHICH GOVERNMENT JUSTIFIES PROGRAM

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put my final supplementary to the Prime Minister. In his random remarks yesterday and in his rationalization of the anti-inflation program he spent some time trying to justify the program on the basis that in his view the CPI had gone down, and that it was not only because of the farm gate prices having declined substantially. Is the Prime Minister aware that the chief factor causing food prices in this country to go down is that the beef farmers have literally been murdered by the price of their product going down 20 per cent in the past year, and is this the only way the government feels it can justify its anti-inflation program?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the hon. member is making a representation, not asking a question.

AMOUNT OF WAGE INCREASE FOR UNORGANIZED WORKERS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance arising out of some of the statements made by the Prime Minister yesterday. I should like to ask the minister whether studies have been made by his department or any other government department or agency to ascertain whether the more than 60 per cent of the labour force which is still unorganized in this country has received wage or salary increases in the past year, and if such studies have been made, can he indicate whether the information shows the size of these increases and whether they were above or below the increase in the cost of living in the past year?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, with regard to those under the anti-inflation program the Anti-Inflation Board has been analyzing the rate of increases, and indeed, in its report, which will be made available to the House within a matter of weeks, I expect that the board will probably have something to say about that.

With respect to a more extensive analysis of labour groups which are not covered by the mandatory controls, I would have to say that the board obviously has not. I do not know whether my colleague the Minister of Labour could advise in this regard as to whether his department, in its general survey of labour income, could respond to the question put by the hon. gentleman.

POSSIBILITY PERMISSIBLE MINIMUM WAGE INCREASE MADE MANDATORY

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Many of the people who are not organized work for small employers who are not covered by the regulations of the Anti-Inflation Board. In view of the feelings of many people that the anti-inflation program is not being applied fairly, is the government giving consideration to making the minimum increase of $600 a year, which is permitted under the anti-inflation legislation, mandatory in order that employees in the lowest income levels, most of whom do not belong to unions and have no bargaining power, can be helped to cope with the increased cost of living this past year?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in a very substantial sense a great deal of the work force the hon. gentleman referred to is not under the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada. With regard to the parliament of Canada, he is asking if it is our intention to increase the minimum wage to $3.50 an hour. I can say that is not the intention at this time.

Mr. Orlikow: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I had no intention of asking the minister if the government was giving consideration to increasing the minimum wage to $3.50 an hour. I want to ask the minister whether the government is giving consideration to, and consulting with the provinces in respect of, jointly raising the minimum wage of employees under their jurisdiction so that the large number of people who are working, many of whom are included in the large number who are still classified as living in poverty by such organizations as the Economic Council of Canada, can be taken out of that poverty group and given a wage on which they can live fairly decently?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I can say to the hon. gentleman that both the Minister of Labour and I have continually had discussions with the provincial governments with respect to the level of the minimum wage and there is, of course, quite a spectrum of opinion in Canada as to what the appropriate level should be. As I said, I cannot give any assurance that the minimum wage generally in Canada will be raised either by the federal government or by the ten provincial governments to the level of $3.50 an hour.

MANPOWER

REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Considering the great number of unemployed and the insufficient funds made available through the LIP program in the south shore area, could the minister advise what system has been devised by his department to assess the real number of unemployed and arrive at an equitable allocation of funds in the various ridings?

[English]

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his representations. What we have endeavoured to do this year under the LIP program is to give the heavier allocation in the areas as described by the hon. member, due in large part to the representations made by him and others in the region. We have a formula that has been devised which we think is weighted very heavily in favour of the areas where most of the help is required. There will be more money put into those areas than the areas of less unemployment.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Since the decline of the economy in the south shore area stems from regional industries being in competition with similar industries in the Montreal region, hence the decline in the number of jobs and the increase in the number of unemployed, may I ask the minister to authorize a re-assessing of the unemployed in order to increase, if possible, the allocation of funds earmarked for the LIP program in the Bellechasse riding?

An hon. Member: In all ridings!

[English]

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, if I did that I would probably have 265 re-evaluations to make, one for every riding. We are being as fair as we can.

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR LANDED IMMIGRANT STATUS FOR VALDES FAMILY

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

(Applause)

Mr. Lavoie: If I may be permitted to do so, Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the House that a year ago on this day, I received a similar ovation in Hochelaga, following a well deserved victory.

Considering that many requests have already been made to the Department of Manpower and Immigration about the Valdes family, that Mr. Valdes left Canada last Sunday and that a prohibition order and a stay of execution was presented to the Federal Court aiming at acknowledging the claim of Mrs. Valdes and her four children who have been harassed for over a year by the Department of Immigration, and in view of the fact that it is inhuman to keep this woman and her children in a state of uncertainty which has lasted too long already, would the minister advise the House whether or not he intends to bring this question before the Cabinet so that it may formally acknowledge the status of landed immigrant of Mrs. Valdes and her four children, and in so doing take into consideration the fact that hers was a humanitarian case?

[English]

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the situation the hon. member describes he declares to be humanitarian. There are many humanitarian situations outside the country. People endeavouring to enter this country face situations every bit as difficult as those facing the lady and family to which the hon. member refers; but they see fit to obey our laws and make application in the appropriate way instead of attempting to enter the country illegally and then go through a whole series of procedures. The family referred to has been given the benefit of the most generous appeal procedures in the world; it has been looked at carefully. At present there is an application before the court for an order of prohibition and we will await the outcome of that.

I think it is important for the hon. member to know that we have to deal with thousands of people making application to enter this country who go through legitimate processes. But some enter this country under false pretences and then throw themselves on the mercy of television, or of members, and so on. I do not think that is the proper way to establish an immigration policy.

Mr. Paproski: What would you think if you could get shot when you return to your own country?

Mr. Lavoie: I wish to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

In view of his answer, and considering that we are presently in a period of austerity and that we are told to cut our expenses, if ever this family must leave the country the government would have to pay five one-way plane tickets. So why not keep them here in the country? Those people are accepted here and they are happy in our country. Can the minister say whether he is at least willing to consider his predecessor's statement about the L'Heureux-Dubé report which indicates, on page 2, that an order in council may be put before the Cabinet to keep a family here in Canada?

[English]

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has lost none of his fire during the past year. His representations are honest and straightforward. But once again I suggest that is hardly a basis for establishing an immigration policy.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Tell us about General Quang.

POSSIBILITY OF AGREEMENT FOR DEVELOPMENT OF EASTERN QUEBEC

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Could the Minister state for the benefit of the people in the Lower St. Lawrence, Gaspésie and Magdalen Islands region whether he has concluded his negotiations with his Quebec counterpart as to the economic development of this region and if we can expect the signing of an agreement in the near future?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to advise the hon. member that these negotiations are continuing, that they are not completed since, as I said, they are continuing, and that later on this afternoon, I shall have another round of negotiations with Hon. Gérard D. Lévesque and two of his provincial colleagues. We shall hopefully take advantage of this opportunity to progress and come to a decision so that we may be able to sign this agreement before the end of the current fiscal year.

POSSIBILITY OF CHANGES IN TRIAL PROCEDURES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice about a leak, deliberate or otherwise, with respect to recommendations for introducing a bill to abolish preliminary hearings and jury trials, something which goes to the root of the liberty of the subject. I ask the Minister of Justice, who has been quiet about that leak, if he intends during the present session, or in any session, to bring forward a bill in accordance with those recommendations?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have hardly been quiet. I held a press conference and made public the report to which the hon. member is referring. I made a speech in Vancouver in which I said that we do not intend to interfere with the jury system, the right of the accused to remain silent, and the protection against self-incrimination. The hon. member really was referring to two reports, one being on work done by the Law Reform Commission on pre-trial proceedings, the other being a memorandum for discussion with deputy attorneys general prepared by an official of mine. It related to other matters, namely, how to decrease backlogs in the courts.

Obviously, the suggestions coming from the Law Reform Commission bear the closest examination and scrutiny by all people of this country, including I hope the hon. member, who share my concern that we should, where possible, eliminate delays in the trial process without at the same time interfering with the fundamental rights of the accused. That work is going on, but I am not in a position to say at this time whether any bill will be introduced relating to that matter. I have formed no recommendations; I have not made any.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question? Since the answer of the Minister of Justice was full of ambiguities, I ask, is he going to introduce a bill? If so, will he refer the matter to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs? It is a most serious matter, going to the root of the very freedom and liberty of the subject. The right to trial by jury for indictable offences is as old as Magna Carta. Will the minister do as I suggest before the sort of confusion is created that we saw with respect to Bill C-83?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to say whether or not a bill will be introduced as not even my own department is yet in a position to make recommendations or suggestions to me. Therefore, I am not in a position to say whether or not a bill will be introduced. If one were to be, obviously, it would be referred to the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee.

AIR TRANSPORT

PROPOSAL TO TRANSFER FLIGHTS FROM DORVAL TO MIRABEL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the strong objections voiced by the Montreal business community about the proposal to transfer domestic flights from Dorval to Mirabel airport, does the government intend to put off the planned transfer of those flights until a satisfactory rapid transit system can be built to reduce greatly the time of transit and cost of travel between Mirabel and Montreal?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is inaccurate to refer to the situation in relation to traffic going to Mirabel as a planned transfer. We have been investigating the type of traffic moving through Montreal and the two airports, in an attempt to arrange that traffic in due course in a way to suit the convenience of the region and the people in the area served by the airports. The investigation also deals with the desire to make Montreal a very useful interconnection point for passengers from other parts of the country. We are therefore investigating this matter. It is now clear that we will not make any major change for some months; I would say spring is the next possibility. Our real purpose is to meet the convenience of passengers in every way, and we will try to take all factors into account, including surface transport. But that is only one factor which has to be taken into account.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of information coming out of Mirabel today showing that the new airport was not needed in the first place, is it not now evident that this white elephant the government built was both a stupid and costly mistake?

Mr. Lang: No, Mr. Speaker. The increased traffic using Dorval would have created great problems at that airport and for the people of the area.

Mr. Hees: All you had to do was extend the terminal facilities.

Mr. Lang: I suppose the hon. member is familiar with the kinds of problems which would be created in Toronto for people living near the airport by the expansion of the existing airport. I suppose the hon. member may be familiar with the kinds of problems that would be created for the people living nearby by the expansion of the Toronto airport. The same kind of situation has existed in the case of Dorval.

In addition, the additional land that would have been required would have been extremely costly to expropriate. What we did instead was develop a new airport, which will prove to be an extremely fine example of air service facilities in Canada, in an area where we obtained control over an adequate parcel of land to ensure that the kind of problems that developed in other locations will not occur again. Of course, that airport does not spring into full and final usefulness the minute it is open. However, I have no doubt that if the hon. member opposite will be patient he will see the results, and he will be glad to know that in later days I will be generous enough not to remind him of his words today.

Mr. Hees: Is the minister not aware that the plans drawn up for both the Dorval and Malton airports demonstrate clearly that all of the traffic problems in the next 20 years could be served by the building of an additional air terminal in each case, for which provision was made in the first plans laid out? They are just as applicable today as they were at that time.

Mr. Lang: No, Mr. Speaker. That is quite untrue.

Mr. Hees: Get up to date because that is a fact.

Mr. Lang: The hon. member, as a former Minister of Transport, is still relying on data furnished to him at that time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: That is what your people tell me today.

Mr. Lang: The very clear evidence in both cases was a major expansion requirement, including extra runway facilities and the like, which creates an additional noise problem in the respective areas.

Mr. Hees: Otto, you better stick to wheat.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Hees: I apologize. I am sorry.

Mr. Lang: We are, of course, making every effort to make the maximum use of the existing facilities, including Mirabel, to avoid undue and increasing pressure on Malton in the absence of the additional air facility which had originally been planned, with the concurrence of Ontario, in the Pickering area. We are making every effort to arrange for alternatives for all of the people who will otherwise be inconvenienced by the serious problem of stacking in the air over Toronto if nothing more is done. We are doing the best that can be done. The fact is an additional air facility in the Toronto region is the only way we know of solving the problem of increasing traffic which will be presenting itself.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

FAILURE OF PROFESSIONAL FIRMS TO FILE STATEMENTS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In view of the report in the Globe and Mail that some 35 per cent of professional firms have failed to file their required statements under the AIB regulations, will the minister advise what sanctions there are under the legislation and whether he now intends to take legal steps against those firms which have failed to meet the AIB requirements. I hope mine is not one of them.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my advice is that all of the firms have not yet completed the fiscal period for which the returns are to be filed. In that sense, to a substantial degree, that is the reason there has not been total filing. As to the sanctions available, the hon. member is a lawyer and I would advise him to read the statute.

Mr. Leggatt: In view of the fact the AIB now has substantial information on professional incomes, will the minister advise why that information has not been made available to the public so that we can examine in a very accurate way what effect AIB has had on professional income. There is clear evidence that it has had very little effect on professional income. Will the minister therefore advise when he will be making an announcement in this House, where he will speak for all the people, not just the rich and professional, so that we have a program that controls professional incomes—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

IMMIGRATION

POSSIBILITY OF NEW ACT—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of repeated assurances by the former Minister of Manpower and Immigration that a new Immigration Act would be forthcoming in the present session of parliament, will the minister now indicate if it is the government's intention to introduce a new Immigration Act during this session of parliament rather than amendments only, as indicated in the throne speech?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): A new act, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Epp: At the recently held premiers' conference, agreement was reached among the provinces that provincial involvement in immigration should be guaranteed in any future constitutional amendments. Can the minister indicate whether the principles of the new Immigration Act have received agreement in principle from the provinces?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I will have to check that out, but I understand that my predecessor had extensive discussions with various premiers. We have also read at length and in some depth the excellent report of the committee of which the hon. member was a member. Most assuredly consultation with the provinces will continue. I hope we will be able to enter into agreement with the provinces comparable to the Andras-Bienvenue agreement we now have with Quebec.

AIR CANADA

REQUEST FOR EQUAL LANGUAGE RIGHTS FOR ALL EMPLOYEES

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

In view of the fact that on October 1 last, Mr. A. D. Bone, one of the officials responsible for maintenance at the Air Canada base at Dorval, sent out a circular forbidding the wearing of the badge "Il y a du français dans l'air", and bearing in mind the fact that last March the same vice-president allowed the wearing of the badge "English Only is the International Language of Aviation", can the Minister of Transport tell hon. members whether he is willing to take immediate steps to ensure that Air Canada employees who support the bilingual objectives of the government have the same rights and privileges as those who are fighting against them?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, certain of the matters to which the hon. member refers are presently before the courts and I would not want to elaborate on them. Naturally I have noted Air Canada's clear statements of its obvious willingness to follow the spirit of the Official Languages Act, which we would require of it in any case as a Crown corporation. That willingness was expressed by the Crown corporation once again only very recently.

COMMUNICATIONS

POSSIBLE INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION—REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE HEARING ON PAY TELEVISION

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications. In view of the absence of the word "communications" in the Speech from the Throne by a government which wants to communicate, will the minister advise what has happened to phase two of communications policy, and whether there will be any legislative initiatives in this session?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I intend to introduce a piece of legislation on communications in this session.

Mr. Nowlan: I thank the minister for that answer. I wish to ask more specifically about the communications policy with regard to pay television. In view of the representations the minister has received with regard to the CRTC review of briefs that were submitted in private, has the minister had consultation with the chairman of the CRTC with a view to either having the CRTC ventilate those briefs before a public hearing so that all parties will have a chance to discuss the briefs or, if it is not the CRTC, have that matter referred to a parliamentary committee before the CRTC makes a recommendation to cabinet on something so fundamental as a communications policy in this country?

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, I remind the hon. member that the CRTC held hearings on pay television some time ago. In this second phase, I have asked people to send briefs to update those they presented to the CRTC. This was subsequent to a speech I made in which I indicated some of the rules under which pay TV might be introduced in Canada and some of the structures that might be necessary if and when this is to be introduced. The briefs are now coming in. Indeed, if there is justification, I have no objection to new public hearings. I will be meeting the president of the CRTC on Tuesday to discuss this matter.

SMALL BUSINESS

REASON FOR MINISTER'S TRIP TO MOSCOW

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put my question to the Minister of State responsible for small business and to take this opportunity to congratulate him on his appointment.

● (1150)

Mr. Jelinek: In view of the fact that the government continues to make repetitive but vague promises to the small business community without as much as a hint of any specific policy proposals, could the minister confirm or perhaps deny that his scheduled trip to Moscow, which I think is his first trip abroad since he assumed his new portfolio, is being made for the purpose of putting the capitalist system in a new perspective?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for his congratulations. One of the reasons for the trip to Moscow surely is that the Canadian government is very anxious to sell a number of things, and if we can increase our trade around the world this is good for big business and for small business as well.

ENERGY

CRUDE OIL—ALLEGATION PETROSAR NOT APPROVED AS BUYER BY ALBERTA

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and relates to the report this morning that the province of Alberta has indicated that Petrosar will not be an approved buyer of crude oil for feedstock purposes. In view of the hon. gentleman's responsibility to fulfil federal guarantees that crude oil will be supplied to the project, what does the minister intend to do about this situation?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I heard the same report on the morning news and I have not yet been able to clarify the statement or to define precisely what words were used. I have asked for that information. As hon. members will understand, the implications are very serious if the news report is an accurate one. Because it is so serious, I am anxious to defer my answer now until I have seen a transcript and clarified the remarks of the premier of Alberta.

STATISTICS CANADA

ALLEGED VIOLATIONS OF CONFIDENTIALITY—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the new Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, whom I wish well in the discharge of his weighty responsibilities in a key portfolio. I ask him this question in his capacity as minister responsible for Statcan. Will substantiated breaches of confidentiality by Statistics Canada personnel in fact be acted upon with full vigour, as promised by the chief statistician of Canada in a letter published on August 4 of this year in the Ottawa Citizen, a copy of which I have already sent to the minister? I ask this question because Statcan can only properly function if it enjoys the complete trust of all Canadians in the inviolability of the information supplied to it.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to thank the hon. member for his very kind remarks. With regard to the problem he brought up, I am pleased to assure again the hon. member that Statistics Canada intends to operate according to the law, that is, to keep confidential the information received from Canadians.

[English]

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer and I have one brief supplementary. Can the minister indicate the extent of investigations into Statcan by the RCMP in recent years with regard to breaches of the confidentiality provisions of the Statistics Act? Would he also indicate the scope of these investigations and is the minister prepared to give details at this time or later?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not have the requested information at the present time. However, I shall inquire and if I can make this information public, I shall be pleased to do so.

Oral Questions

SOCIAL SECURITY

REQUEST FOR COPY OF PROPOSED BILL RELATING TO SOCIAL SERVICES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

This morning, in his address to the national conference on mental retardation, the minister referred to a bill to replace the Canadian assistance legislation which will now be entitled the Social Service Act. Would the minister be in a position to table a copy of the proposed legislation or would it be possible to give a copy of it to hon. members as the public is now aware of this bill since the minister revealed it at the conference?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to inform the hon. member that the bill in question which I announced this morning has been discussed at federal-provincial conferences for more than three years and that I have delivered many speeches on that subject in the House and outside. I would be pleased to send copies of my former speeches to my hon. colleague.

Concerning the bill, drafting is not finalized but various projects have been discussed with my provincial colleagues. As soon as it will be completed, I will be glad to table it for first reading. I hope that this bill will be supported by every member and passed quickly to provide Canadians with better social services than those available at the present time.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question merely to correct the minister somewhat. Had he been there after his speech, he would have heard delegates and all those who participated at the seminar expressing rather their surprise and their doubts about that bill, with the exception of federal officials who knew the bill in its present wording.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I can very well understand that 600 people, of whom several attend a national conference on that subject for the first time, were not fully aware of the content of such a bill. But I must remind the hon. member that the Canadian Association for the Mentally Retarded is governed by an executive with whom I had several meetings during the past few years, particularly in January when we discussed the possible content of that bill. Therefore this is no surprise for the leaders of that association, I can assure the hon. member.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that organized labour's share of the gross national product has increased rather than decreased on this the first anniversary of wage and price guidelines, can the minister advise the House whether productivity in Canada in the last 12 months has increased at the rate of 11 per cent, the average general increase which was obtained by organized labour in the last 12 months—

ALLEGED FAILURE OF CORPORATIONS TO PAY EQUITABLE SHARE OF TAXES—POSSIBLE INTRODUCTION OF INCOMES POLICY

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that back in 1952 corporations paid some 54 per cent of the Canadian tax load and today this figure is down to around 30 per cent, is the Minister of Finance considering acting on the advice of a former colleague, Eric Kierans, and introducing an incomes policy under which corporations pay a much more equitable share of the tax load in this country?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, any changes in the incidence of tax, of course, would have to be announced at budget time.

POST OFFICE

MEASURES TO STOP ILLEGAL WORK STOPPAGES

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Postmaster General, whom I want to congratulate on his appointment.

Since last year, during the general Post Office strike, the then minister told the House that collective agreements had been signed to the satisfaction of both parties, can the minister tell us, as sporadic work stoppages again occur everywhere in Canada, which are very expensive to taxpayers, whether he will take strict measures to bring people back to work since they have already signed a collective agreement?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to thank the hon. member for Richmond for his warm feelings. I do want to indicate to him also that we agree that there is a collective agreement and the Post Office fully intends to abide by it. We indicated, and I repeat, that we intend to take the sanctions available to us to deal with any illegal action by postal or any other employees coming under the provisions of the collective agreement.

REQUEST FOR REVISION OF DAIRY POLICY

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Since the policy announced last April with respect to the dairy industry placed milk producers in a near catastrophic situation, and in view of the absence of measures dealing with that industry in the Speech from the Throne, could the Minister of Agriculture say today whether he intends to reassess as soon as possible the policy announced last April to meet needs and eliminate the difficulties milk producers must now face?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, under the agreement that we announced we are assessing the situation from month to month in order to see what is happening so far as production, markets and so on are concerned. We are doing this every month and receive a report from the Canadian Dairy Commission on what supplies are. Production is getting back in line, but not in all areas. There is a suggestion that there remain these shortages, but we still have tremendous surpluses of butter and skim milk powder.

● (1200)

Mr. La Salle: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In view of the answer of the minister that I find entirely inadequate I will put my question to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister told the hon. member for Richmond yesterday that his government had spent large amounts on the dairy industry, and I do not quarrel with that. But since those subsidies made available to milk producers are clearly inadequate and several of them not only in Quebec but also in Ontario could be faced with bankruptcy—and the minister is surely aware of that—I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he intends to demand a decision or a reassessment from his Department of Agriculture to meet the needs or make a minimum income available to milk producers?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when a decision is made it will be announced in the regular way.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, since this is the first Thursday of the session could I ask the usual business of the House question. Before doing so I should like to extend congratulations to the government House leader on his ascension to that position, particularly in this instance when he embraces his return to the House with such relish and enthusiasm.

Business of the House

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Since this is the first day on which we might discuss House business there are a couple of things I should like to raise with him on this point of order. The first is whether it is the present intention of the government to continue the throne speech debate consecutively until the end of the period of time allotted under the Standing Orders, or is there any intention to break into that with anything else? Is the minister now in a position to indicate the general shape of the legislative program for this session, the priorities of the government in respect of legislation, and can he inform us today if he has had any thoughts about the matter of opposition days? What are his intentions in respect of the white paper on banking? Does he intend to refer that immediately to the appropriate standing committee so that input can be had at this early stage from the general public as well as from banking institutions? I ask these questions about legislation particularly in view of the fact that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration indicated this morning an amendment to the act and the Minister of Communications indicated she was going to be bringing in amendments at least, dealing with some legislation. Is it too premature to ask questions in that broad way today?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his good wishes and felicitations on my return to this particular post, and express my appreciation also for the expression of good wishes extended by members of the House generally. I certainly appreciate that very much, indeed.

In respect of the immediate business of the House, I see no immediate relief from this particular debate that will engage us until the end of next week, but it may be that the dynamic character of the new ministers will cause us to change that before then.

The priorities of the government are generally set out in the Speech from the Throne, but I hope at an early date to have a meeting with my colleagues opposite to outline as clearly as possible the legislative program for the next several weeks.

Having regard to the reference to the white paper on banking, I have not had an opportunity of discussing that with the Minister of Finance or my colleagues. When I do so, which I hope will be soon, I will communicate the results to the House. I want to tell my hon. friend, and other House leaders, that I look forward to my association with them with a great deal of relish.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I preface my additional remarks on this point of order with these words. With your permission I should like to pay tribute to the former government House leader, the hon. member for Eglinton. I think I speak for all members of my party in expressing appreciation for the openness and the candor with which he dealt with me as representative of the Progressive Conservative party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): From the minister's answer, may I presume that one of the matters we will be discussing shortly is the question of opposition days and the allotment thereof?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, indeed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I join with the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton in his words with regard to both the former House leader and the one before him who has come back to us. I welcome the President of the Privy Council back to the House leader level. I do not know whether that is a plateau, a peak or a valley, but in any event we welcome him back. I should like to say that if he can persuade this government to come through with legislation along the lines he was able to get the government to agree to when he was last House leader, this will be a very good parliament. I am sure the hon. member knows what I mean. If he can just do some of the things he was not able to do in May, 1974, that would be good for everybody.

Having regard to the business of the House in the weeks that lie ahead, since it has been the practice for a number of years to have a list of the bills the government proposes to introduce during the session presented to the House and placed on the record of Hansard, I am wondering if that will be done in this session and, if so, will it be done very soon?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker. I have considered that possibility and see no advantage in producing a formal list at this particular stage. I will give the hon. member and other hon. members as much detail as possible about the evolving legislative program.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Wednesday, October 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Maurice Harquail for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto by (Mr. Clark) (p. 28) and the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Broadbent) (p. 37).

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, before commencing my remarks I want, through you, to congratulate the various hon. members on the government side on the recent positions to which they have been appointed, and wish them well in their endeavours.

I think I might also say they will be watched very closely because it is quite apparent to the Canadian public, and I think certainly to all hon. members who listened to what their constituents had to say during the summer, that there is much uneasiness with the present government and the present approach the government is taking. That uneasiness in my opinion is not just a passing phase but is deeply rooted and stems from a good number of years of not just mismanagement but no management at all. That lack of management and leadership is the underlying problem the country faces. I say with as much kindness as I can to the new ministers that this is the fundamental task to which they will have to address themselves and that unless they do so the country will not withstand another two years of what we have been through.

I must say I regret that the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) is not here because a personal matter has required that he leave the House. However, I think it would be improper to rise in this debate without stating something bluntly to my friends and colleagues in the New Democratic Party. It is all very well for them to try to take the position on television or in other places that the Conservative Party has no policies or positions. The fact of the matter is that consistently in this House over a good number of years we have said that the country's recovery will depend on productivity, on a competitive market system and a high degree of management-labour accord as well as a close rapport and relationship between government, management and labour. We have said this repeatedly and we have said it in a responsible way. We have said it because it needed to be said since it was not being said by the members of the government or the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and certainly was not being said by some of my hon. friends in the New Democratic Party.

It is time that the New Democratic Party and the government began to realize that the public is not impressed with an economy that is stagnant as the result of the mismanagement by the government of the day and partly because of the philosophy and at times utter nonsense uttered by the other opposition party, the New Democratic Party. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the New Democratic Party at times, even when it is headed—I was going to use the expression "in the right direction" but they would not like that—in the appropriate direction, handles itself with such complete irresponsibility that it cannot be taken seriously. I am sorry to have to say this as bluntly as I do, but it is true. It was exhibited in the amendment moved yesterday by the New Democratic Party. I wish to read that amendment:

> We also affirm that the failure of the government to end the wage and price control program immediately, in light of . . .

Then, it continues. There is no question but that there are aspects of this wage and price control program with which not only do we, along with our friends from the New Democratic Party, quarrel but which we pointed out would cause trouble at the time the legislation was debated. But it would be completely irresponsible to end the program immediately; that cannot be done and the New Democratic Party ought to know that. So, we have to say we agree with the New Democratic Party that there are inequities in the control program and that it could be and should be improved.

We might take as an example the situation we have in the Yukon Territory at the moment where the Cyprus-Anvil Mining Company achieved an agreement many months ago. The Anti-Inflation Board rolled back the agreed wage scale once, and then changed it. Then, the administrator came in and rolled it back a third time to a lower figure. One result of all that is that we are very cognizant of the faults in the system. The second result is that there are 400 people who have been and are on strike. The mine is not operating. The business community in Faro is suffering as is the community of Whitehorse. The White Pass and Yukon Railway has cut its operation in half and has laid off 170 drivers. In addition, the government-owned and operated power commission has increased its power rates. Just to make the matter more incredible, the Canadian Labour Relations Board says the strike is legal.

I agree with the New Democratic Party when members of that party point to this sort of thing and say it is not logical. We, of course, have said over and over again that it is not logical. Members of this party were in the forefront in respect of the situation in Thompson, Manitoba and every member of the New Democratic Party knows this. Someone just said that we would have frozen wages. If our party had been elected—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Would the hon. gentleman please address the Chair.

Mr. Fraser: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. I will watch myself. I was carried away with the enthusiasm of the moment. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that if our plan, which would have placed a freeze on prices and wages, had been implemented in 1973 it would have ended quickly and we would have been out of the whole thing now. Not only that; we would have done it at a time when the inflation rate was only 5.7 per cent which was the situation in January 1973. We continued to advocate the need for some kind of controls in July 1974 when the rate of inflation was 10.6 per cent, and in October 1975 the government did what it said it would never do. But I repeat that if the advice this party had to give the House had been accepted, we would have had controls that would have been fairer. They would have ended by now and we might well have kept that inflation rate a little lower than it became.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fraser: Through you, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I notice some of my friends in the New Democratic Party are saying "oh, oh". What we have now, because they would not support us then, is a controls program that they agree is unfair and which we agree is unfair but which we still say was necessary. However, if they had taken our advice and joined us when they had the opportunity, we would have stopped the inflation rate when it was 5.7 per cent and not the 11 per cent or 10 per cent which it was last October. We would be out of the control system now and they would have done a lot more for the working men and women in Canada.

• (1220)

An hon. Member: Why did you not vote for it on third reading?

Mr. Fraser: I must answer this through you, Mr. Speaker, by saying what was well known by everyone in the House, including the Prime Minister who made comments on it in his speech yesterday. The reason was that, as we said, it was open-ended, and we advocated that the program be brought to a close by April of next year. Everybody in the House knows that that is true and it is just nonsense for the Prime Minister or anybody else to ask why we voted against it on third reading. We voted against it on third reading because it was a bad piece of legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Orlikow: Why did you vote for it on second reading?

Mr. Fraser: I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that there is no doubt that, so far as all members of the House are concerned, there is a very serious situation in the country in the relationship or lack of relationship between employers and labour. It does not do this country any credit to have one of the worst strike records of all the western industrial nations. Quite frankly, the figures are appalling. If you think that I use language that is too strong, you should go to Europe and listen to both labour and management describe our disgraceful strike record. You should go to Germany where trade union members will say, as they have said to me, how can you have a country that has all the resources that yours has, that has people who have, relatively speaking, a very high degree of education, that has obviously people of initiative and competence, and yet so mismanage things, all of you, that you have slipped into a situation of being forced to impose a control system which, if left on long enough, will be counterproductive and in any event will cause a great deal of social and civil strife. This is what a German trade unionist told me. I had the privilege of meeting some of these people during this recent summer.

The record is appalling and all members of the House know it. We must find some way to do something about it. I should like to quote from a speech the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) made on May 25, 1976. He gives government figures which I am sure are accurate. He said:

> The number of man days lost in work stoppages has risen rapidly from an average of six million a year over the period 1970 to 1973 to nine million in 1974 and 11 million in 1975.

He went on to say:

> The first few months of this year indicate that the record of man days lost may be improving.

That is highly dubious if you look at Mr. Flynn's articles. He has been studying the changing rate in strikes and they may be increasing again.

I want to point out something to all members of the House and especially to my friends in the NDP who sometimes seem to think that the Conservative party has no concern for the 2.2 million people in the CLC as well as the other million organized workers outside the CLC, their wives and families, and another six million Canadians who are in the work force. I want to say to the NDP that we are as aware as they are, and sometimes more so, that these people are Canadians, that they are our neighbours, our friends, our sons and daughters and our mothers and fathers. We keep this in mind. Despite the appalling strike record, there are figures which indicate—

Mr. Peters: What is appalling about the strike record?

Mr. Fraser: —that approximately the same number of man days has been lost because of alcoholism and that a similar number of man days has been lost as a result of industrial accidents. I just say that to put all of this into perspective. Nonetheless, the strike record is appalling. It is appalling, of course, because it is unnecessary. It is unnecessary partly because it stems from the fact—

Mr. Peters: Bad government and bad legislation.

Mr. Fraser: —that the system of bargaining has traditionally been in this country a system which involved the individual union and individual employer without any consideration for the total community in which these two parties were bargaining.

Mr. Orlikow: That is the free enterprise system.

Mr. Fraser: It is a system which your party has supported enthusiastically and still does.

Mr. Peters: We do not agree with it.

Mr. Fraser: I want to read to hon. members a comment made by the former minister of transport, the hon. member for Langelier (Mr. Marchand), about the system that we have today. He said:

> How is the level of wages established? Is it according to a certain rule of justice, as I heard yesterday? No. It is according to the strength of each party. I have been in that trade all my life. I was involved in certain strikes where the justice of cause was very clear, and we lost. I was involved in others where it was less evident, and we won. Why? Because we were weak in the first place and strong in the second. This is the way disputes are settled. They are not settled according to certain criteria or principles known or accepted by everybody. It is free bargaining.

The problem with that, of course, is that it leaves us in a situation in this country where the strong unions will be able to constantly secure their position and the weaker unions and the unorganized will be left out. It also means that the philosophy in that statement is to be carried on, that you are going to have the collective bargaining system continue without any consideration whatever for the general climate within which individual bargaining is taking place. I think there are 100 affiliated unions in the CLC and of those there are 9,000 local unions. As many hon. members well know, there is an immense number of individual contracts worked out in the country. I might say in fairness that far more are worked out peacefully than with labour-management strife.

But we will have to find some way by which management, labour and government reach some basis of agreement as to where the economy is going, how it is to function effectively, and what are the appropriate shares that any one of these three groups should be able to take from the Canadian economy without jeopardizing the economy as a whole. It is very difficult to disagree with that statement because it should be accepted as basic common sense. That statement is not misunderstood by trade union leaders in this country. It is misunderstood by some, but there are a good many who understand it perfectly well. One of the things that has happened this year, the most significant thing, I think, in a number of decades of Canadian labour history, has been the CLC manifesto which was declared in the May meeting at Quebec City of the Canadian Labour Congress. Every member in the House should pay a great deal of attention to that manifesto, not only to what is in it but to what is not in it and to why that manifesto was ever enunciated as well as what lies behind it.

Put very simply, the Canadian Labour Congress believed that after the doublecross they received from the federal government on wage and price controls they had to have a closer liaison with the government of the country because it was obvious that whatever their views were they were not being taken into account. Second, they could not trust a government which talked at them but not with them. If hon. members think those words are too strong, they should ask anybody who attended the so-called consensus talks which went on under the aegis of the former minister of finance month after month. During all that time the government never set out to labour what it thought the economy could do, what its own plans for the economy were or what its long term objectives were with respect to employment and industrial strategy.

Mr. Peters: They didn't have any.

Mr. Fraser: They did not have any; that is why they did not indicate them. However, as a consequence of that we have a government day after day in the House of Commons retreating from questions by this party, by myself, by members of the NDP and the Social Credit Party with regard to what is happening in the relationship between government and labour in this country.

What did the minister of Labour keep saying? He said that the government was talking and that the former Minister of Finance was having consensus talks. What did the former Minister of Finance say? He said that it would not be appropriate to say what labour was thinking. The fact of the matter is that the government knew perfectly well what labour was thinking. The government was not listening, and in addition to that, during those entire consensus talks it never gave a hint that it was going to double cross labour and bring in the controls which it promised labour in 1974 it would not bring in. One of the problems we have now is that there is not any trust between labour and the government. Unfortunately, that lack of trust is also in other elements of the community. However, if we are going to have a better climate of labour relations, we must have trust. That does not mean that labour is foolish enough or naive enough to think that in all ways at all times every government will agree with it.

Labour is grown up; it is tough and it knows it will not get its own way all the time, but it would rather have a government indicate that it has to put in controls, if that is to be done, rather than a government which indicates that it will never put in controls, that it would not do that to labour or that it would not freeze wages, as the Prime Minister said all during the 1974 campaign, and then double cross labour and do that without warning, despite the fact that consensus talks were being held.

What has been the response of the government since the controls program came in? The response of the government has been, first, to say that it is carrying on some talks with the Canada Labour Council, which was established. That did not last very long because Mr. Morris pulled his people out of that and the Economic Council of Canada. It is true that at the time I criticized labour for pulling out because I did not see that it would do any good. Labour's response was that it was not doing any good to stay there. That is more an indictment of the government than of labour.

So, what is the answer? The answer is found in the proposition that there must be, on a consultative basis, continual rapport, discussion and understanding between employers, labour and government. The CLC manifesto moves in that direction. Unfortunately, it also contains some other things which need some very careful analysis.

Speaking to the Trade Union Congress in Great Britain on September 9 Mr. Morris told his colleagues there about the CLC manifesto, and he said the following, which bears the consideration of every hon. member:

> The new body, to be possibly called the Council for Social and Economic Planning, would be created by legislation and would report to Parliament through a Minister. The powers delegated to this Council by Parliament would be carried out by a number of subordinate specialized boards and agencies.

He went on to say the following:

> The proposed tripartite body would also have delegated powers to redress the present distribution of income in Canada. The Council's activities in this area would include previewing draft legislation, reviewing current practices, proposing improvements to law and practice, and initiating new programs and projects. The fields of concern would include old age pensions; workmen's compensation; health, maternity, unemployment and other welfare benefits; family allowances . . .

That is an amazing amount of power to propose that parliament delegate to any agency, and the difficulty in this is that it is a delegation which really would remove decision making from the government and approval from parliament. It will be important to persuade trade union leaders that their proposal does go farther than our system can probably accommodate.

This ought to be well known by trade union leaders because certainly their rhetoric—and I am convinced much of their practice—is intensely democratic. One of the difficulties the CLC executive has had in obtaining the power to speak for all its members has been the reluctance of the affiliates to transfer the democratic power they hold within their locals to that executive. Anyone who understands labour relations in this country knows that that is true.

So, it will be incumbent upon us to speak with labour—and hon. members should notice I said speak with, not at—and try to persuade labour leaders that perhaps this proposal goes too far. I think a great many of the rank and file of labour will realize that it is not practical to take from parliament that amount of power. If hon. members have any doubt about just how much power is being asked for, I refer again to the speech given by Mr. Morris where he says the following:

> We also adopted a policy statement, called Labour's Manifesto for Canada, which determines the general orientation of our movement and calls for the creation of a tripartite decision-making body which would have powers to plan social and economic policy, control private and public investment and supervise national income redistribution.

It is the position of this party that the powers asked for in the CLC manifesto are more than the democratic system can provide and that it would be a great mistake to establish in that kind of an agency. However, it is also recognized that what brought about the CLC manifesto was a determination on the part of a great many people within the trade union movement to play a more significant part in the affairs of their country. This is not new in the trade union movement. It can be found in Europe in almost every country which has a productive economy and a high degree of accord between management and labour.

What is called for is probably a multiparty consultative system which would be established at first on an informal basis in which government, management and labour would meet on a consistent basis to examine what the economy is doing, where it is going and what it will bear. Hopefully, the result of those discussions would be that nobody in this country, whether it be government, management or labour, would be destroying the economy, which is absolutely vital for the future well being of all Canadians.

We have some specific suggestions to make as to what form this body should take. We are convinced that there must be a consultative mechanism which involves labour, management and government. We believe this procedure ought to be followed in each province because we recognize federal and provincial divisions of responsibility. We believe that such an institution can only develop if it is, first of all, truly representative and, secondly, if both labour and management can send to it representatives who can speak for their respective bodies. I might comment that while labour has difficulty in finding representatives who represent all labour because the Canadian Labour Congress does not represent all organized labour and there are another six million Canadians who are not organized at all—

● (1240)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I have to inform him that his allotted time has expired. He can continue with the unanimous consent of the House, however. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser).

Mr. Fraser: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I was saying, management does not have any representative group that speaks for management in this country. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association speaks for some manufacturers, chambers of commerce speak for some businessmen, boards of trade are usually local and confined to their own cities and provinces. As a consequence, when the government wants to speak to business it calls in half a dozen of the so-called leaders of industry, and now John Bullock to represent small business, and thinks it has had a discussion with business in this country. It just is not so. As a consequence, if this institution is to work, both labour and management will have to be able to send representatives who really represent and speak for them. We believe that, on the management side, both large business and independent business must have their own representation. Their views and interests are not always the same. Government and municipal employers must also be represented.

On the labour side, the Canadian Labour Congress is, at the present time, the principal labour association but some adjustment must be made to include the other one million union members and something must be done to recognize unorganized workers and farm workers.

We do not believe at this time that this proposed body ought to receive power delegated to it from parliament. Like anything new, it is too much a departure from the traditional Canadian practice to invest an untried association with what amounts to governmental executive decision-making powers. We believe that there should be recognition that the Canadian Labour Congress does not speak for all labour and big business leaders do not speak for all business. Keeping this in mind, there should be equal one-third representation from labour, management and government.

We believe that such a consultative body will only command public respect and confidence if it is clear that all three groups agree that, despite the differences, they will continue to meet and use their best endeavours to find agreement. Such a body will not function if government, labour or management insists on withdrawing just because there is disagreement. Disagreement must be anticipated; the task must be accepted and it is to find agreement.

There must not be any suggestion that such a body is a substitute for the government of the day or the parliament of the day; if there were such a result it would be the antithesis of our democratic parliamentary system and, not without importance, it would be contrary to all the rhetoric and much of the practice of democratic trade unions in Canada. It is also our belief that long before such an institution is established there must be a series of discussions and the form of organization must be agreed to, subject to modifications from time to time. For the present, we see no need to legislate the formation of such a body because its early success will of necessity depend upon flexibility and in all likelihood in the early stages, constant adjustments.

Mr. Speaker, there is a reason to emphasize the importance of this relationship between government and labour because, as I pointed out, we cannot continue to have a productive economy, hopefully giving more to our people as time goes on and caring for the increased number of Canadians that will be here, unless there is fundamental agreement and accord on where we are going and what the economy will bear. This is going to require great frankness on the part of government and it is going to require great responsibility on the part of management and great responsibility on the part of labour.

I say to all hon. members—if you want people to act responsibly, give them responsibility, It is about as fundamental a fact in human experience as can be found. The message that is coming to us quite clearly from labour in this country is that despite all the anomalies and at times erratic behaviour, increasing numbers of trade unionists and trade union leaders are asking for responsibility. If this can be achieved, then all the other details of industrial bargaining will have some meaning. But unless there is fundamental accord between the various sectors of the economy on what we can afford to do and what kind of economy we want to have, all the other measures will be patchwork at best.

If there is any doubt that some such consultative process is necessary, I again remind hon. members that the European experience, while in a different environment than ours, clearly indicates that where you have a good economy and a high degree of accord between labour and management, some sort of consultative system like this exists.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that it might be of advantage for this House to hear the words of the former prime minister of Great Britain on this matter. In the British House of Commons on July 7, 1976, Mr. Heath said:

> Those countries which have had the greatest success in dealing with their industrial situation are those which, in one way or another, have the closest form of consultation with both sides of industry. Those who have studied this will know that in Japan, Germany, Sweden or even Singapore—in those countries where there is close consultation—there is always the best result from the point of view of industrial production and, incidentally, from the point of view of dealing with inflation.

Mr. Speaker, on this day on which labour has chosen to take an unusual step in Canadian history by calling for and launching a national strike or national day of protest, it is important to look beyond today to see just what we can do in the coming months to repair the damage of the last several years. Fundamental to that is the establishment of a climate of trust within which management and labour can deal with government. It is my hope, Mr. Speaker, that before too long this party is going to have an opportunity to establish that climate of trust for the well-being of all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, at the commencement of my remarks I should like to take occasion to express my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Harquail) and the seconder (Mr. Lachance) of the address—to the member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) who joined us in this House just last year but has already given an indication that he will carry on that fine New Brunswick tradition in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It is a tradition which I share by inheritance as the son of a native of Saint John.

[Translation]

I take this opportunity to congratulate my colleague the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance). I was in the class of 1962 with his father and I am confident that his constituents, the Quebec caucus as well as all members of the House compliment him on his eloquence. We are therefore grateful for the services which he will render Canada, as can be expected from his behaviour in this House.

● (1250)

[English]

On a personal note, may I join other spokesmen in expressions of regret at the passing of our colleague from Louis-Hébert, Madam Morin. She was a person of great personal charm; at the same time she showed considerable steel in her personality. Both personality traits were combined in a felicitous way and we are all losers, in this House and outside, because of the passing of a valued member, one for whom there was genuinely high regard on both sides of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It is appropriate on the anniversary of the first enactment of the price and income control program to review the events of the past year, talk about the impact of the controls and of certain events which have occurred, particularly with regard to the so-called day of national protest. I intend to do so in the course of my remarks.

When the government announced the controls program a year ago we said that we would rely on four instruments to recapture economic stability. The first three of these, fiscal and monetary policy and controls on profits and incomes, I shall have occasion to talk about during the course of my remarks. I want to begin by referring to the fourth of the instruments to which we made reference, that is to say, to the approach which would comprise an examination of structural deficiencies in our economy and its institutions.

This afternoon I want, on behalf of my colleagues, to table in this House and release to the public a Government of Canada working paper on the Canadian economy in the post-control period. If we are to act to preserve our long-term interests as individuals and as a nation, we must arrive at as common an understanding as possible of the nature of the prospects and challenges before us.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Does the minister have leave to table the document referred to?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): We suggest that the policy directions set out in this paper be viewed as an agenda for future consultations. We welcome the advice of all Canadians in the modification or the further elaboration of the analysis contained in this paper and the policies it suggests. I would ask that this paper be read with consideration. All will find something here that they disagree with, or that argues against their particular interest. We expect that they will make known that interest. Frankly, we expect that they will do more.

This paper suggests that there are deficiencies in our economy and its institutions that of themselves contribute significantly to inflation. If these factors continue to operate, inflation may well return at intolerable levels once controls are removed.

Continuing inflation will give rise to greater public demands for government intervention to offset the inequities generated by the inflationary process. If governments are to be able to meet social and economic objectives with less rather than more intervention in the economy, inflation must be held to a minimum. I think we must recognize that the Canadian economy may continue to be vulnerable to inflationary forces as we move into the 1980s. This is why there needs to be a wide understanding of the nature of problems and as broad a consensus as possible on measures to correct them.

The international economy will be marked by strong competition for resources and for markets in the 1980s. Continued growth will add to pressures on the prices of foods, energy and mineral resources. The rate of growth of the labour force in Canada will slow in the 1980s, leading to tighter labour markets. Very large investment requirements will put pressure on our capital resources. Competition for financing, equipment and skilled labour will increase, bidding up the prices of all these economic goods.

There are indications that western industrial democracies in general may be entering a period of declining increase in both productivity and growth. Our expectations of rising standards of living will therefore have to keep step with economic performance. These and other challenges will tax our skills and our ability as Canadians to seek the common good of society and co-operate toward its realization.

Hon. members will note in this paper that an essential theme that emerges is the necessity to increase both the reliance on and the effectiveness of the market system as it operates in the Canadian economy. The interplay of dynamic forces that results from an effective market system and has led to continuing economic growth must be encouraged. The role of government policy therefore cannot be to direct and manage the economy in detail. This not only would threaten growth, but could result in a government presence that intrudes too much in the daily lives of Canadians.

Mr. Stevens: It already has intruded too much.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): At the same time this government has no intention of participating in or permitting a dismantling of the socially progressive society Canadians have built in this country. It will therefore be necessary to devise means of assisting the market place to serve fully the social goals and aspirations of Canadians. This may require policies to improve the operation of the market economy. Such policies must be developed and managed in a way that allows governments to fulfil their responsibilities with less rather than more direct intervention in the economic system. Such policies must provide effective alternatives to increasing public expenditures and expanding public bureaucracy.

In this paper we have indicated a middle role for government. That means that we are looking to the other groups with power in the economy to join with us in the formulation of policy alternatives and to take upon themselves some of the responsibility for the achievement of our society's goals.

This will require a closer degree of consultation than we have undertaken to date, without eroding the powers of parliament and the responsibility parliament vests in government for ultimate decision-making. An approach of this nature could enable us to attain our economic and social goals while maintaining the maximum freedom from interference and freedom of initiative. Perhaps I may call it one o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being one o'clock p.m., I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at one o'clock I had indicated to the House the government's approach to the post-controls period, and put before the members a suggested agenda for consultation to deal with the economic problems we now face and will face through into the decade of the eighties.

As I mentioned, this is also an appropriate time, on the first anniversary of the anti-inflation program, to speak as well about that first year and to pose the question, "Where do we stand after the first year of the program?" I suppose that the most direct response, the ultimate measurement by which inflation has always been gauged in this House, is the consumer price index. On that criteria, the year's review gives some ground for optimism.

Statistics for October are, of course, not yet available. In September, the inflation rate in Canada, on a national basis, was 6.5 per cent. Last year, in October, when the anti-inflation program was introduced, it was at the level of 10.6 per cent.

While that 6.5 per cent rate is still higher than is sustainable over an extended period of time, it represents the fourth best inflation performance within the OECD nations and, of course, is a considerable relief from the double-digit inflation we had been experiencing for nearly 18 months prior to October, 1975.

What, then, is behind that general aggregate? Where have the decreases occurred? The most dramatic decrease, of course, has occurred in food. That is partly because of a dramatic drop in the costs of certain meats, because of a drop in the cost of grains and, over the current summer, because of a drop in the price of fresh vegetables.

It may be argued that those declines, welcome as they are to the consumer, owe no particular credit to the anti-inflation program. To the extent that food costs to the consumer are represented by prices at the farm gate, that is correct. However, as we have often heard in this House, as a result of the work of the Food Prices Review Board, and what now seems to be forgotten, is that up to 60 per cent of the cost which the consumer pays for his food arises from the costs of transportation, processing and distribution of food products. It is these additional costs, transportation, processing and distribution, which have been under the control of the anti-inflation program, and those controls have made certain that the lower farm gate costs have been passed on to the consumer.

Looking at other goods excluding food, we have seen an encouraging decline in the rate of increase. It is in the cost of services, most of which are beyond the control of the anti-inflation program, where dramatic rates of increase are still occurring. In September this rate of increase was 12.3 per cent.

There are certain price increases which we anticipated would find their way into the consumer price index this month. As part of our over-all energy policy we have to take account of higher prices for oil and natural gas. Because the junior levels of government, particularly municipalities, have had to face higher payments for the services of their employees, there have been higher levels of municipal taxes. In summary, then, the program has been effective. In those parts of the economy where controls have applied, they have been effective to restrain the rate of price increase.

What has happened to wage settlements during this period? First, let us cast our minds back to the bargaining atmosphere in late September and early October, 1975. People are inclined to forget the kind of wage claims that were then being pressed for. For example, 22,000 members of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers were looking for an immediate pay increase of 71 per cent and a 30-hour week. Ontario doctors were asking for an increase of between 35 and 40 per cent. Alberta doctors were asking for an increase of 40 per cent. British Columbia bakery workers, meat cutters and retail clerks were demanding immediate increases ranging from 38.6 to 76 per cent. Ontario high school teachers were looking for 43.9 per cent, plus a full cost of living allowance and a $720 lump sum payment. Construction tradesmen in various localities in Ontario demanded increases in wage and fringe benefits ranging between 43 and 96 per cent in a two-year contract.

In other words, let us recall that because of the experience with inflation in the previous 18-month period, there had been these wildly inflated wage claims that were being put forward at the time the controls were put into effect.

What has been happening to compensation increases, wage settlements in particular, in the period of the program? One area of comparison may be made between the average increases in the second quarter of 1976 as reported by Labour Canada, where the rate was down to 13.4 per cent, compared with an average rate of 21.8 per cent in the nine months of 1975 which preceded the introduction of the program. That is a rate which does not yet reflect the impact of all anti-inflation roll-backs. Despite the slowing down of nominal wage increases, there have been significant gains in real earnings, in the order of 3.6 per cent for the last three months, over the same period a year ago. Labour income increased by 16.4 per cent between the first half of 1975 and the corresponding period of 1976. The labour share of the gross national product has been sustained at the record level of 56.6 per cent. Therefore, the working man and woman gained in real terms as a result of the anti-inflation program.

It is true that because of wage roll-backs by the Anti-Inflation Board, exceptional rates of increase going beyond the necessities of inflation have not been permitted. But those who previously had not had an opportunity to catch up with the work force as a whole have been permitted to do so, while others who had favourable settlements before the program have at least been able to hold themselves even with the rate of inflation during the past year and achieved some real gain.

At this point, and in light of those particular figures, one must ask, "Why a national day of protest?" Mr. Speaker, it will be clear from the foregoing that the protest is not related to any real disadvantage that the worker has suffered. The problem with the national day of protest is the leadership of some of the national trade unions, rather than their membership. I am confident, today, that there are many workers who will support the so-called day of protest more out of loyalty to their trade union affiliation than from any real sense of grievance arising from the anti-inflation program.

An hon. Member: Tell that to the guy whose wages have been cut.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, let me tell the hon. gentleman this. Recently there has been a lot of talk about polls, and I was therefore interested in the following poll that appeared in the October 6 issue of the Toronto Star in which the question was asked, "Is the Canadian Labour Congress acting in a responsible manner in calling for a national day of protest?" A decisive 62 per cent answered no to that question, another 13 per cent said they did not know if the CLC executive was being responsible, and only 25 per cent said yes.

Hon. members opposite say that they represent union members here in this House and that the leadership of the CLC represents union members. What was even more significant about this poll was that 58 per cent of union households said that the CLC leadership was being irresponsible in holding a national day of protest. Another 10 per cent of union households said that they did not know whether the CLC leadership was being responsible or not, and only 32 per cent were prepared to support the leadership of the Canadian Labour Congress.

Indeed, criticism of the CLC leadership has not been confined to the rank and file. We have seen the remarks of Mr. Donald Secord, of the 40,000 member Canadian Brotherhood of Railway, Transport and General Workers, criticizing the approach of labour leadership to negotiations and advocating a greater sense of responsibility in maintaining the stability of our economy.

The CLC have legitimate views to express concerning the Canadian economy, and they have important interests to defend. But a vocal minority within that organization appears to be seeking to build a base from which they can dictate terms to the rest of the Canadian people. They are demanding that certain of the decision-making powers which are entrusted to parliament be delegated to an extra-parliamentary body. While they suggest that this body report to parliament through a minister, they still wish to be able to have power to direct investment into certain channels and to have undefined authority over labour markets and pricing decisions without referring to parliament on specific decisions.

The CLC has today chosen an extra-parliamentary route to make its protest heard or its power felt. It seems to be demonstrating an increasing preference for the extra-parliamentary approach. I suggest that as it does so it will find an even further declining response to its methods from the Canadian people. This government is on record as favouring a continuing and increasing dialogue and exchange of views with organized labour. Indeed, we are willing to explore the modalities of increasing and more effective consultations on the economy with labour, business and other groups, as I have already said. But those who seek to use the problems of our economy to challenge the authority of our political institutions will find no encouragement in their objectives from this side of the House at least.

To be balanced, let us take a look at the other side of the equation. What has been the business experience during the period of the program? There is no doubt about the fact that during this period corporate profits have been under a squeeze. In the first half of 1976 they were up only 5.5 per cent from the first half of 1975, and the share of profits in the gross national product has fallen over the period from 11.3 to 10.3 per cent.

The role of the anti-inflation program in the restraint of higher profits has been important. About 100 firms have been required by the board to return to the public excess revenues gained during the first period of the program. A thousand price prenotification cases have been referred to the board and the full details of these particular cases will be laid before the House when the board makes its report, as it is required to do under the statute.

As the House knows, at budget time I announced the intention to introduce some changes to the price and profit rules under the anti-inflation program, and for this purpose draft regulations were put out for consultation with those affected. There was an extensive program of consultation throughout the summer, as a result of which the government has confirmed its intention to remain with the basic elements of the guidelines, namely, holding corporate profits back to 85 per cent of the net profit margin in the base year, but permitting by way of an investment credit additional revenue where there have been productive investments by a particular firm.

There has been a great deal of talk in the business press and by some business leaders alleging that the anti-inflation program is the cause for the relatively low level of business investment during the current fiscal year. There are really three rejoinders to that observation. In the first place, most major business investment does not look for a total pay-out in the first two years during the life of an investment, and hence would be hardly deterred by a temporary program. Secondly, at this stage in the economic cycle, and with a very substantial degree of unutilized capacity still in the economy, it is not surprising that at the moment additional capital investment is not being put in place. But even apart from those two factors in the Canadian economy, cognizance should be taken of the fact that investment as a whole is not strong throughout the developed world.

I should like to refer the House to the conclusions of Business Week. In this regard it observes:

> The world's key economies may be exhibiting the outward signs of recovery, but the growth of capital spending—which should be rising with the recovery—is extraordinarily sluggish.

The article goes on:

> Capital spending is lagging behind growth in all the big industrial economies. In the U.S., money is again available in the capital markets. But capital spending is making its slowest post-war comeback from recession.

I would just repeat again to business leadership what I have had to say outside the House, namely, that they and their shareholders stand to gain as much from defeating inflation in Canada as anyone of the rest of us. Purely negative opposition to the anti-inflation program, whether by the Canadian Labour Congress or the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, is shortsighted and against their best interests. As we turn into 1977, what all intelligent management should be looking to is the need for additional capacity and the opportunity during that year to initiate projects in favourable economic terms, rather than postponing those kinds of decisions, lest we find ourselves again with spiralling costs of the kind we had in 1973-1974.

As a postscript to this review of the controls program, I recently had the opportunity to meet my counterparts from other nations at the International Monetary Fund meeting in Manila. The primary area of concern among developed countries was the need to control the high rates of inflation being experienced in all but a few of them.

The success we have had in lowering the rate of inflation, limited through it is to date, has caused certain individuals to declare that in their view the time has come to drop the controls program and leave it to the marketplace to bring inflation still lower. They cite the relative slack in current market conditions as being adequate to work against excessive wage and price increases. No one would be happier than I, as Minister of Finance, to be rid of the burden of controls at this time. But I am not convinced that market conditions on their own would be sufficient to lead to a continuation in the decline of inflation. Those who advocate the early termination of controls have failed to give any reason why, in the absence of the kind of national consensus to which I have referred, the rate of inflation should drop in Canada.

In conclusion, I think we should observe that while, of course, the traditional instruments of fiscal and monetary policy would have been available to control inflation in Canada, by using controls to bring down the rate of inflation we have been able to avoid the massive unemployment that would have been generated had we attempted to achieve the same price target relying solely on those two particular fiscal and monetary instruments.

But controls cannot be a permanent part of our economic system. We still have to rely on continued restraint on fiscal and monetary policy, restraint that has already been in effect this year. We have cut government expenditure and we are committed to holding its increase to no more than the rise in the gross national product. The Bank of Canada, with our full support, has announced new monetary targets for growth in the money supply that will decline with the rate of inflation. We cannot be certain at this time as to the outcome of world inflationary forces in the months to come. But one thing we can decide is that we as Canadians should moderate our own demands on the economy so as to make certain that the inflationary forces are not further revived in this country.

The preference of myself and this government is to achieve that kind of objective by consensus, and it is that consensus we are seeking in the consultations I have referred to, for which the documents I have tabled today are the basis. Until we can arrive at some effective agreement of that kind, and so long as we can be certain that the impact of the program is not creating economic distortions that will work against the interest of the economy as a whole, a controls program of the kind we have put forward, we feel can and must be carried through to effectiveness, and in this we continue to seek the support of the Canadian people and members of this House.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, in the more than 19 years I have served as a member of parliament from the province of Nova Scotia, I have been privileged to speak in the throne speech debate and I therefore welcome the opportunity to comment on the proposals put forth by the government at this time.

I would first like to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address, the newly appointed cabinet ministers, as well as those who have been newly appointed as parliamentary secretaries. I look forward to working with them during the balance of this parliament.

If we look carefully over the doors of the Speaker's chamber in the other place we will see a number of inscriptions in Latin. One of these quotes ins from Cicero, and translated it means, "Let reason prevail with me, more than popular opinion". I would recommend that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his governnment give serious thought to the sound reasoning contained in those words. Unfortunately, it would appear, after reading the Prime Minister's statements, that reason no longer prevails among him and his colleagues and, of course, Mr. Gallup has indicated that this administration no longer enjoys the popular support of a vast majority of Canadians.

Apparently, this fact has finally seeped through the vast bureaucratic buffer, built at great public expense, which surrounds the Prime Minister and his cabinet. It has been interesting to the Canadian people to note the Prime Minister's reaction. At first there was disbelief, then frustration, then annoyance over what the Prime Minister construed as the stupidity of many Canadians who, despite an army of bureaucrats, consultants and public relations men, were seemingly unaware of the benefits provided them by this government. "We will soon fix that," said the Prime Minister. "We will take more than $1 million of the taxpayers' money and in this year of restraint we will run some ads in all the newspapers from the Atlantic to the Pacific".

"What shall we say?" asked his supporters. I presume the Prime Minister told them something like this, "Run the ads and say Pierre Trudeau practised his judo while eating his humble pie; he put in his thumb and pulled out a plum and said, 'What a good guy am I' ".

In light of recent political visits to Atlantic Canada and elsewhere in this country, as well as recent events in this splintered cabinet, the Prime Minister may well feel like emulating Dean Martin who goes around singing, "Everybody loves somebody some time; why don't you fall in love with me somehow?" However, the Prime Minister's fall love fest is as divisive as it is expensive.

In fact, one of the most misleading statements recently made by the Prime Minister is reported in the headlines of the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of October 4, in which he stated, "Time is running out for the Liberals" and that Canada was in danger of breaking up over bilingualism. That statement reminded me of headlines I read one time when I was in the United Kingdom. They read, "Gales lash British coast—continent is isolated". It was not the continent that was isolated at that time, and it is not Canada that is in danger of breaking up over bilingualism. It is the Liberal ship of state which is in danger of breaking up, not on the rocks of bilingualism but on the shoals of faulty economic policies.

I suggest to you, sir, that it took real experts to make a complete mess of one of the world's richest economies. We insult our friends south of the border with our policies on communications, trade, national defence, finance, and external affairs, to name but a few. Then we wonder why they do not come up to visit us during the tourist season. We neglect our resources, and then we wonder why we are short of such necessities as electrical energy, oil and natural gas. We ignore our customers, and we wonder why they no longer buy our goods which are no longer competitive in world markets or competitive in our own. We define Canada as the thickly-settled areas of Quebec and Ontario, and then we wonder why our national policies almost never work.

I say to you, sir, that this government has honed the art of evasion and delay until it is razor sharp. The government has established the survey and the study as the normal substitute for action and decision. Regionalism and bilingualism are nothing more than symptoms of a fed-up feeling by the average Canadian with the central government which is not legislating in the best interests of Canada.

This administration has endeavoured to choke off every effort by the individual citizen or by the people of a region to develop their full potential. Private enterprise has been systematically destroyed, and today we have the absurd situation in this nation of a flight of capital from our country, at a time when our nation is desperately in need of investment capital.

I say to the Prime Minister that his present-day wearing of sackcloth and ashes comes too late to undo the chaos brought about by his blind hopes, his exhortations, his incantations, his studies in depth and his sweeping theories. They have brought about a steady decline in living standards, a steady rise in living costs and a constant sharpening of the cleavage which exists between regions and between interests within a region.

I would remind the Prime Minister and this government that they cannot, by order in council, make everyone wealthy. They cannot legislate prosperity. If this were possible, it would have been done long before any members who are presently sitting in this House were born. The only way Canadians can enjoy a better way of life and a higher standard of living is through increased productivity. This is not only possible but it is absolutely essential in a growing nation like Canada, and it is long past the time that we should get on with the job of increasing our productivity.

The Prime Minister is reported as stating, in Toronto, "The Liberals are out of touch with a large section of the grass roots—especially west of the Manitoba-Ontario border". His recent tours of Atlantic Canada should indicate, even to him, that he is out of touch with the people in our provinces. There is no better way to learn the problems of a region than by at least listening to members of parliament, who collectively represent all of Canada, which I believe is what democracy is all about.

In the time remaining to me, I hope to alert the Prime Minister and his government to some of the problems affecting my province and my constituency, and I hope my suggestions for improving these conditions will receive at least some consideration by this government.

The problems facing Atlantic Canada, and Nova Scotia in particular, are many and varied. It is difficult to classify one as being more important than another, but one of the main problems facing Nova Scotians at present is the high cost of electrical energy and the fact that it is projected shortly to increase by some 65 per cent without any relief in sight from the federal or the provincial governments. It is true that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) recently issued a new "Energy Strategy for Canada", but its broad outlines barely touched the Atlantic provinces and their power potential. After reading his policy, I could not help but feel the minister is obsessed with oil, that he is ready to allow petroleum prices to rise to world market prices, and that he is satisfied to let the people of my area pay increases of some 25 cents a gallon within the next two years.

He mentioned electricity in its nuclear and coal-fired forms, but he steered clear of what I believe to be one of the greatest sources of power in Canada, namely, the development of the tides of the Bay of Fundy. On page 103, under the title "Renewable Energy Resources", he states:

> The potential for general application of such resources as solar, wind, geothermal, biomass and tidal power has yet to be evaluated properly in a Canadian context.

So much for tidal power, but it was ever thus! Nobody wants Fundy power except the people; therefore it gets no consideration by Ottawa's planners. If the minister knew that a $3 million study had just been undertaken on tidal power, another in a long list of studies, he gave no indication of it. His desire for oil production and conservation left him far afield. I therefore feel it necessary this afternoon to remind him that by establishing Fundy power he would save Canada billions of barrels of oil. The output of Fundy tidal power has been estimated at 87 billion kilowatt hours a year. It would take 125 million barrels of oil to equal that production. Ten billion barrels of oil conserved for other uses over 75 years; that is what the minister failed to say.

These are mind-boggling figures, but the experts in tidal power confirm them. In light of present-day needs, to say nothing of future requirements, it is therefore difficult for me to understand why Fundy power still has no priority in federal government policy, and unfortunately there is no indication in the throne speech that action will be taken on this vitally important matter. Evidently the old fears still exist that developments in Atlantic Canada could provide competition for central Canada. There is apparently a belief among the members of this government that a tidal power project would bring the natural north-south lines of economic co-operation closer; that the captive market—which Atlantic Canada has been to central Canada for generations—would begin to burst its bonds. Obviously, this government prefers to see the maritimes and Newfoundland exist as second-class provinces, with their people dependent on its doles and hand-outs, rather than help them move forward to economic and social maturity, which was the promise of confederation.

The Atlantic provinces, and this nation, need Fundy power for a number of reasons. For example, there has been a tremendous rise in the cost of thermal fuels. There is a growing fear of possible thermal and nuclear pollution. There are new techniques which can spread tidal power over to the peak periods in which it is most needed. There is an extensive market south of the border for energy. There is a huge saving of scarce and expensive oil to be gained by a mobile nation. We should be using Fundy tides to produce electricity, and oil to turn the wheels of transportation. There is an opportunity to improve our infrastructure, to correct our chronic unemployment problem, for I say that industry will always move to a location where there is a large and constant source of power.

[Mr. Crouse.]

There are other arguments for Fundy. The need for electrical energy in our area is expected to double within the next eight years, and every source of energy will be required. Fundy's tides can go a long way toward meeting Atlantic Canada's needs. The development of Fundy is too important for interprovincial and federal-provincial bickering. It has to be a political decision, like the decision to build the St. Lawrence Seaway, or the decision to help repay the $2 billion deficit of the Olympics. In fact, the feasibility of tidal power development in the Bay of Fundy was studied and reported upon in 1969 by a board having representation from New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and the federal government, and the total capital cost of the three sites at that time was listed at $2 billion, which is the same amount as our Olympics deficit and only half the amount of the funds to be set aside by the federal government and by industry this year to take care of unemployment in Canada, a figure which amounts to something like $4 billion.

I say to this House, however, that the development of Fundy tides will not be an expenditure but, rather, an investment which will repay its investors a hundredfold in vast power production, part of which can be sold at a profit and, best of all, in conservation of Canada's vital oil supplies which everyone knows will not last forever.

Let us put our unemployed to work, not next month or next year, but today, building Fundy power plants. Where shall we begin? Feasibility studies show that an installed generating capacity of 8,828 megawatts—and one megawatt equals 1,000 kilowatts—could be obtained if Shepody Bay, Cumberland Basin and Cobequid Bay were all developed to the fullest extent that modern day technology allows.

This massive outfit of power can be placed in perspective when it is equated with the installed generating capacity of each province around the Bay of Fundy which totals some 3,600 megawatts, or less than half the generating capacity of the proposed three sites. However, the studies have only covered three sites, at a proposed cost of $2 billion, which seems to have paralysed this government into inaction.

Their attitude seems to be that if it is too big for them to handle, they will do nothing, or, "If we cannot do the big things, let us not do anything". I submit to this House that there is a fourth site, with the dam already constructed and with control gates looking after the flow of water in and out at every change of tide. This site exists at the causeway between Annapolis Royal and Granville Ferry and there is a sufficient flow of water through this causeway which could, when harnessed to generators, provide electricity to a large part of western Nova Scotia. With very little additional cost, generators could be installed at the present site without interferring with highway traffic, for the causeway could fulfil both functions. An estimated $1 million would provide sufficient generators to at least set up a test plant at this site, and since this government seems to have no difficulty in finding a million dollars to shore up its failing image, I would ask that this amount be made available to the Nova Scotia government immediately toward a test plant on the Annapolis River causeway.

Since Nova Scotia is also considering the construction of its first wood-burning plant for the generation of electricity, which indicates the depth of our need, I would also ask that the federal Department of Energy, Mines and Resources assist my province in carrying out a study of all the possible sources of electricity which could be generated on our rivers. I believe that the Mersey River, for example, in Queens County, could provide more electricity for our area, and the beautiful falls at Milton are, in effect, at present wasted energy. At one time electricity generated from a power dam on the Petite Riviere looked after the electricity needs of Bridgewater. Another power dam at Mahone Bay looked after that town's electricity needs along with Lunenberg. In light of Nova Scotia's soaring electricity costs, I believe we must immediately examine the possibility of harnessing the power available to us on all our rivers, power which will not materially escalate in cost once it is developed and which will not use up our non-renewable reserves of coal and oil. Let us get on with this job immediately.

I have dealt with this issue at some length due to its importance in Atlantic Canada, as well as the fact that the increased energy cost is having a marked effect on another very important problem in our area, namely, transportation. The former minister of transport described the problem very well, if not in a very complimentary way to himself, when he said that transport is in a mess. I agree with his assessment. Today it is in a mess that has reached crisis proportions.

I am glad that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is here, because I intend to deal rather extensively with the problems that are faced by his department. Part of the present problem is brought about by the fact that the railroads, which should provide a national service to all parts of the country at equal cost, are in effect providing a regional service at competitive cost only in the heavily-settled areas of Canada while being required by this government to provide service in Atlantic Canada, for example, on a user pay basis. This concept could put our farmers, our fishermen and fish processors, our lumber producers and other industries out of business.

This is not a cliché or a statement made off the cuff. This fact was made quite evident at the transport hearings in Caledonia, Queens County, on September 14 when transport officials were told that the termination of freight service between Caledonia and New Germany would put two large lumber dealers out of business, directly affecting the employment of 70 people and indirectly affecting the whole community. Because Atlantic Canada is a geographical extremity of our nation, we have a greater need for an efficient transportation system than any other part of the country. In light of increasing costs of air and automobile transportation, we should be taking steps now to improve our railway system. Unfortunately, however, I get the impression that this government since 1968 has had a national policy which has brought about a gradual elimination of the passenger rail service, while at the same time forcing up freight rates to the detriment of business in the geographical extremities of Canada.

Our railroads are the only mode of transportation made responsible for all costs, while at the same time they are charged with the responsibility of providing service to areas of the country where alternate forms of transportation do not exist. This places management in a very unfair position, and obviously they cannot carry out these two conflicting duties without being granted federal funds toward capital improvements which would increase efficiency.

Government supporters will undoubtedly ask, "Where will you get the funds?" No one seemed concerned when the government was talking about a new airport for Toronto which would have destroyed valuable farm land, at an estimated total cost of $2 billion. The government spent $157 million for a parking garage at Toronto's terminal two, and $90 million for road improvements to serve Mirabel airport in Quebec, to say nothing of the $440 million which was spent on Mirabel which now is referred to as the greatest white elephant in Canada. The government has on its drawing boards, at a cost of something like $250 million, a plan to provide rapid transit service between Mirabel and Montreal. Where is the user pay concept brought into play when you are talking of making these expenditures, and where do you plan to get this money? Our railroads are still the cheapest means of transporting large numbers of people or heavy loads of freight or machinery over great distances, and they will become more important as fuel costs escalate and fuel is in short supply.

They must be placed in a similar competitive position with other modes of transportation. At present, sufficient funds are not being provided in order to make this possible, and this can only be described as a penny wise and pound foolish policy. The value of our railroads was all too evident only a few months ago when air service was terminated as the result of a strike. The trains were filled with passengers from here to Montreal and reservations to Halifax from Ottawa were impossible to obtain. In my opinion, it is a national folly to let this service deteriorate when it is obviously so important to the well-being of Canadians. It would be interesting to see the response of the travelling public to a new turbo or light, rapid, comfortable train service over tracks from Montreal, through Maine to Saint John, Moncton, Amherst and Halifax. The trip would only take a day, thereby eliminating the need for sleeping accommodation, and it could be provided at an attractive price.

I believe the time has come for a reassessment of our transportation problems and for a new list of spending priorities as they apply to our railroads. Regional as well as national interests must be paramount in any transportation policy. It would also be advisable to consider using electricity as the motive power for our trains. This concept has been adopted with great success throughout Europe for many years. Incidentally, this would be a further use for Fundy power.

After serving for two years as chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, I could not help but come to the conclusion that this government needs a new list of spending priorities. The money for investment which would develop our country and improve our infrastructure is available, but it must be funnelled into the proper channels.

Finally, I wish to deal with some of the fishing problems as they relate to Atlantic Canada. Quite frankly, these problems are many and complex and they are not necessarily related simply to the supply of fish. After attending a seminar at the Nova Scotia Fisheries Exhibition in September, I could not help but come to the conclusion, after listening to fishermen, processors, industry representatives and officials of the Department of Fisheries, that every aspect of this industry, from the ocean to the ship to the processing plant to the wholesaler to the retailer, was in need of attention.

In my view, extending the Canadian territorial limit to 200 miles, as is proposed in the Speech from the Throne, will not by itself restore the industry to health. Rather, this action, although desirable and in fact essential, will only attack one problem among many, namely, that of continued supply. In fact, with both Canada and the United States adopting the 200-mile limit, a new set of problems has arisen. Here I refer to the ownership of Georges Bank, an area claimed by both Canada and the United States and an area that produces a large quantity of our groundfish catch and the bulk of our scallop catch which is one of our most valuable fisheries.

Mr. J. H. Warren, Canadian ambassador to the United States, described the over-all jurisdictional issue in a speech to the Rotary Club of Boston on September 15 as follows:

> The new era will involve fresh opportunities for and challenges to our bilateral relationship. We shall be challenged to demonstrate that coastal state management does not exclude effective international co-operation.

Negotiations with the United States over bilateral fisheries relations are expected to be protected and complex, a fact confirmed yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) in response to a question I put to him concerning this thorny problem. A similar problem has arisen with France, since St. Pierre and Miquelon are asserting their right to a corridor extending out to sea some 200 miles either as a free fishing area or as French waters. At present, the Atlantic coast provinces contain more than two-thirds of the people who work in the fishing industries. In these areas, as a general rule, with some minor exceptions in certain areas, the more a community depends on fishing, the lower its average income tends to be.

A major problem for Canada's fisheries, especially in Atlantic Canada, is stock depletion brought about by overfishing. Foreign fleets, especially those of the U.S.S.R., are generally held to be largely responsible for this depletion. Since 1949 the International Commission for the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries, ICNAF for short, has set the total allowable catches, or TACs, and allocated quotas to member nations. Clearly, the regulating effort of ICNAF has not succeeded in its purpose of regulating fish stocks in the northwest Atlantic, for many stocks, especially our groundfish stocks, are badly depleted. It is this situation, in light of the failure of successive sessions of the Law of the Sea conferences, that has brought about the promised unilateral declaration by Canada of a 200-mile limit.

This government, of course, must share some of the blame for the depletion of our stocks. It has dillied and dallied over the years, holding out like a carrot on a stick the promise of doing something for our fisherman. It has been the government's delays over the years in implementing the 200-mile limit which have brought about the present situation, and it will take years for our fish stocks to improve to a point where there will be beneficial improvement in Canadian catches.

One problem which concerns me, as well as the fishermen and processors, is the amount of fish declared surplus to our needs by bureaucrats when negotiating fishing treaties with foreign countries, without an adequate scientific study on which to base these figures. To talk of fish surplus to our needs only indicates the lack of knowledge of the government about Canada's fishing capacity. In fact, the Canadian offshore and inshore fleets presently have the capability of catching the entire allowable catch of all the traditional groundfish stocks, with the exception of the Hamilton Bank cod stock. This is especially true when we keep in mind the reduced total allowable catch which will be necessary in order to rebuild the stocks.

In my view, this is simply another area in which there is inadequate consultation among the federal and provincial governments. There should be discussions and consultations among all provincial fisheries ministers and the federal government before any agreements giving away our fish stocks are signed with foreign nations. Our provincial fisheries ministers are closer to the scene; they are aware of the problems, and their advice and guidance would be most helpful to the government. I submit this type of advice and counsel is more important today than ever before.

I also believe that in order to develop a sound management scheme for our fisheries, consideration should be given to such factors as the time of the year when fish can be most efficiently caught, and here the fishermen's knowledge should be utilized. Consideration should also be given to the seasonal variations in the quality of fish, as well as other biological factors relating to the spawning period. We cannot continue in our old ways and habits if we are serious in our intention to rebuild our fisheries resources, and this applies to all ships licensed to fish on our banks, whether they be Canadian or ships of other nations.

In conclusion, in order to clear up our difficulties with the United States in the Georges Bank area, as well as in other areas, we should establish, after consultation, a joint management fisheries commission to manage fish stocks in all Canada-U.S. boundary areas. These suggestions will not by any means solve all our fisheries problems, but unless the 200-mile limit, when established, brings greater economic benefit to all Canadian fishermen, the whole exercise will be merely a mirage and a delusion. The throne speech barely mentions Canadian fishermen, and in light of the lack of leadership given by this government on many of the problems I have outlined, I welcome the opportunity to support my leader's motion of no confidence in this administration.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN SPEAKER'S GALLERY OF POLISH MINISTER OF FORESTRY AND WOOD PROCESSING INDUSTRIES

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to inform the House that we have in Mr. Speaker's gallery the Minister of Forestry and Wood Processing Industries of Poland, the hon. Mr. Tadeusz Skwirzynski, and I would like hon. members to welcome him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Although I do recognize that hon. members are always happy to welcome guests in the gallery, I might remind the minister that this is not the proper procedure and this should not be taken as a precedent as to the time when this should be done.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Harquail for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, the amendment thereto of Mr. Clark (p. 28) and the subamendment of Mr. Broadbent (p. 37).

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in 1972 and 1973 when the Progressive Conservative Party began to propose its 90-day wage and price freeze program to deal with the problem of increasing inflation, we opposed that plan.

Mr. Paproski: Your leader did not.

Mr. Orlikow: We said then that the program would not work and that it would be inequitable if it was tried.

Mr. Friesen: Schreyer liked it.

Mr. Orlikow: The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) opposed that suggestion, fought an election on that issue and won by promising the Canadian people that he would not impose wage and price controls, because he said they would not work. Having won the election, he then, in a very few months, adopted essentially the Conservative program.

Mr. Paproski: What about Schreyer?

Mr. Orlikow: I will come to the premier of Manitoba in a little while.

Mrs. Holt: The Prime Minister said there were contingency plans.

Mr. Orlikow: We opposed the anti-inflation program of the government in 1975 because we said, as the Prime Minister has said, that inflation could not be dealt with by wage controls, that price controls would not work and that the program would not be equitable. The events of the last year have demonstrated the validity of the arguments we used in opposing the program.

We have never opposed a genuine incomes policy. A party like ours, which believes in democratic socialism and which works in the same spirit as the social democratic government of West Germany and as the socialist government of Sweden did for more than 40 years—

Mr. Paproski: They went down the tube.

Mr. Orlikow: —did not oppose, and does not oppose a genuine incomes policy which would treat all Canadian citizens fairly, which would not discriminate against the poor and benefit the rich, as the present program does. Let me give just a few illustrations of what I mean when I say that. In the constituency of St. Boniface, which is represented by my friend, the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay), the large hospital there recently concluded an agreement with its workers which provided for a 16 per cent increase. The lowest rate for unskilled workers at that hospital was the magnificent sum of $3.06 per hour. That works out to just over 6,000 per year, just barely over the poverty level. What did the Anti-Inflation Board, helped by the administrator, do? It rolled that increase back to 8 per cent, so that these people, of whom there are hundreds, will in fact live with an income which has been described by the Economic Council and by Senator Croll—certainly no flaming radical—as being in a state of poverty.

The workers in the Cyprus-Anvil mine at Faro, in the Yukon, about whom the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) spoke this morning, have been on strike for months despite the fact that they reached agreement with their company, because of the stupidity of the Anti-Inflation Board and the administrator in not facing up to the reality that unless the workers get that increase they will not stay in the Yukon, they will move to Sudbury, to Thompson or to Sault Ste. Marie. Within a year that mine will be virtually closed because nobody will want to work there at the rates of pay which the AIB has imposed. That is what has happened to ordinary workers as a result of the program.

Let us look at the other end, at how the government and the AIB has dealt with people in the upper income brackets. I am sorry that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) is not here. The hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) asked about the premier of Manitoba. Let me tell him something about the premier of Manitoba. He really believes in an incomes policy. He was naive enough to believe that this Liberal government meant business. When it said that the increase which any individual could get last year would range from a minimum of $600 to a maximum of $2,400, the premier was naive enough, or foolish enough—whatever term you want to use—to believe that the government meant it and that it would apply to all Manitoban citizens, including the doctors.

But what happened when he tried to get the Anti-Inflation Board and the Minister of Finance to put that into operation? The premier of Manitoba believed that doctors are no better and no worse than the other citizens of Manitoba and that they should have to live under the same rules. Suddenly the chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board and the Minister of Finance disappeared from the scene and the premier of Manitoba received absolutely no co-operation. Indeed, he received opposition from the Liberal government and its stooge bureaucrats on the Anti-Inflation Board.

How can the government expect workers like the hospital workers in Winnipeg or Toronto, or the many other workers who are living on poor incomes, to believe it is serious, when they can pick up a recent issue of the Financial Times that indicates the incomes or salaries some of the senior officials of corporations in Canada are earning? Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, the only reason we have this information is that tax laws in the United States require that it be filed by companies whose stocks are traded on the American market.

Let us look at how hard done by some of the senior corporate executives are in this country. Last year, the income of the chief executive officer of Alcan Aluminium Ltd. was $235,000; the chief executive officer of Carling O'Keefe Ltd. was $164,000; the chief executive officer of Imperial Oil Ltd., one of those corporations which is crying that unless it gets better tax breaks it cannot continue to look for oil in this country, was $234,000.

Mr. Friesen: What about the UAW?

Mr. Orlikow: Massey-Ferguson Ltd.'s chief executive officer received $353,000.

Mr. Friesen: What about the Teamsters?

Mr. Orlikow: That is the kind of situation which exists, Mr. Speaker. It is no wonder that people in Canada simply do not believe that this program is working or that it is fair.

Let us look at the profits some corporations made in the last year. The Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister have said that the controls program put limits on corporations and they would have to make sacrifices like everybody else in this country. Let me put a few examples on the record. Cadillac Fairview Corp. Ltd.'s profits went from $13 million to almost $16½ million, an increase of 26.4 per cent. The Toronto Star, a great supporter of the government and a great supporter of the anti-inflation program for everybody but itself, went from just over $7 million to $9 million in 1976, an increase of 25 per cent. Of course, the Toronto Star likes having an increase of 25 per cent for itself, and it wants the government to see that its employees do not get a fair share of that increased profit.

Bell Canada, a company which has distinguished itself by asking for rate increases every year since I came to Ottawa as a member of parliament, saw its profits go from $114 million in 1975 to $148 million in 1976, an increase of 30 per cent in this year of controls.

Mr. Speaker, the controls program is not working. Despite what the Minister of Finance has said today, every poll taken shows conclusively that the public, by a large majority, believes it is not working and that it is being applied unfairly. The minister made a great deal of the fact that the consumer price index showed an increase of only 6½ per cent for the last year. But he ignored some very important facts and glided over some others. He admitted that to a large extent the reduction in the increasing rate of the cost of living is due to the fact that the cost of food has decreased. It has gone down despite the fact that food production is specifically omitted from those fields in which the Anti-Inflation Board can apply controls. It has gone down as a result of very good weather on the North American continent we have had bumper crops and this has led to reductions in the price of beef, pork and vegetables.

If you exclude food, you find some very interesting facts. The cost of housing went up by 11.2 per cent last year. That is not surprising when one realizes that interest rates on mortgages are at an all-time high and there is a tremendous shortage of housing. We are doing little to meet the needs of people in the lower and middle income brackets for housing. The cost of operating a house has gone up by 11.2 per cent. The cost of fuel and utilities went up by 20.4 per cent last year.

Those costs are just beginning to go up, because when we talk about an increase of 6.5 per cent for September—the figure which was announced a few days ago—we know, and the minister knows, I am sure, better than most members of parliament, that this is the first time the increase in the price of fuel has been calculated. The minister knows that by November the full increase which was permitted some weeks ago will show up, and he knows that the government has authorized another increase in the price of fuel in January.

The price of utilities has gone up. The Ontario Energy Board has recommended an increase in hydro rates for the coming year of 30 per cent. That is not the only reason the figure only shows 6½ per cent. The minister knows, or should know, that the increase in municipal taxes shows up in the cost of living figures only one a year, and the month it is taken into account is November. There has been a very sharp increase in municipal taxes in every city in Canada.

There is another important factor which is not shown at all in the consumer price index. That is the cost of health insurance. The reason it is not shown is that in every province the financing of health insurance is done in a different way. In some provinces it is done through premiums and in others it is paid for out of general tax revenue. That is how it is done in Manitoba. In the three largest provinces, British Columbia, Ontario and Quebec, health insurance premiums doubled in the last year. I speak from memory, but I believe it has added in the neighbourhood of $100 or more to the cost of living for every family in those three provinces. That figure does not show up at all in the cost of living figures.

I say the cost of living increase for the year, by January or February, 1977, will not be the 6½ per cent about which the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister were able to crow yesterday and today, but will in fact be in the neighbourhood of 8½ per cent. Indeed, although the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister crow about a 6.5 per cent increase in the last year, the fact is that if one excludes food prices, the increase from September, 1975, to September 1976, was 9.3 per cent, compared with about 10.5 per cent for the same period in the preceding year. To say the least, gains have been minimal.

A good deal has been made today and in past months about the hostility of the labour movement, of trade unions, to the anti-inflation program and the controls program. For some time the labour movement was alone among the interested groups of this country in opposing the controls program implemented by the Liberal government. It is interesting to note that the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, which originally supported the anti-inflation program, has in the last few weeks opposed that program. This country has been governed by Liberal governments since 1963, and by the government led by our present Prime Minister since 1968. Why is the business community now opposed to the anti-inflation program? The reason is obvious: business is having it tough. It claims that this government is making it almost impossible for business to survive.

Let me read two paragraphs from a speech made by a former Liberal cabinet minister who is now a professor at McGill University, Eric Kierans. About a month ago he was addressing the Conference Board of Canada in Montreal and he told the board that business had never had it so good in this country. He gave two examples. I quote his first example:

> The Royal Bank of Canada was founded—in 1870 and by 1970, 100 years later, had accumulated $11.4 billion in assets. Five years later, i.e., 1975, these assets had risen to $25.2 billion, an increase of $13.8 billion or far more than the accumulation of the previous century.

I quote his second example as follows:

> The CPR was chartered in 1881 and had accumulated $2.3 billion in assets by 1970. Five years later, and after a consolidation of accounts, the CPR has assets of $6.2 billion. If the CPR is now looking south, it may be because of its size and finds no new worlds to conquer in Canada but not because Trudeau is a socialist who has prevented them from growing.

Why does the business community now oppose the controls program? It is not hard to see why, if one reads business magazines and newspapers. The government promised business that the Anti-Inflation Board would not create a new layer of bureaucracy. Although I have no precise figures in front of me, I knew we were told that the Anti-Inflation Board could do its work with fewer than 500 employees. I have not seen the most recent figures, but I am certain that the board now employs more than 1,000.

Further, it was said that the board would not interfere in the day to day decisions of business organizations. The facts are clear. Now decisions are not being made. Workers and companies find they must wait months, sometimes six months or more, for decisions concerning agreements concluded with regard to wages. Companies find that the rules are complicated, cumbersome and changing all the time. Instead of using their time to improve business, increase productivity and find new markets, business leaders must spend more time filling in forms and meeting the demands of the Anti-Inflation Board. The current issue of the Financial Times devotes a full page to the woes of business leaders. Apparently, when the program began middle management was given the responsibility for dealing with the Anti-Inflation Board; now business leaders themselves find it necessary to deal with the board. That is how they spend their time.

The business communities of West Germany, where a socialist democratic government is in power, and of Sweden, where a socialist democratic government has been in power for more than 40 years, can communicate better with their governments than can the business community in Canada. The reason has nothing to do with the philosophies of those foreign governments which espouse philosophies similar to those of the NDP. The reason is simple. In the two countries alluded to, where the social democrats are or were in power, and in Sweden they were in power for more than 40 years, business has to pay its fair share of the cost of operating the country; but business also knows the rules of the game, knows what it can do and what it can invest. This country's business community has turned against the anti-inflation program because it does not know how to operate under the new bureaucracy and the new regulations with which this government has saddled the country. They are not working.

I now come to one of the main reasons for the NDP's opposition to the whole concept of the anti-inflation program. It made no sense to us to dampen the expectations of the people of this country, given present circumstances. It made no sense to say to people of this country who wanted houses, "Well, there just isn't enough money: We cannot build them for you this year, next year or the year after." It made no sense to say to people who wanted a television set, "We can't build enough television sets," or to people in city cores who wanted old schools torn down and their children educated in modern, middle class schools like the ones built in the suburbs, "We can't build new schools; there isn't enough money." It made no sense to say this one year ago or two years ago.

Mr. Speaker, in recent times more than 7 per cent of this country's people have been unemployed. For 17 months we have had greater than 7 per cent unemployment. For months and months more than 700,000 people have been out of work. Given this government's policies, policies which it obviously intends to continue, it is very likely that more than 8 per cent of our work force will be unemployed this coming winter in January and February, 1977. Close to a million people in this country will be unemployed.

I, as a member from Manitoba where between 18,000 and 20,000 people were unemployed in recent months, or about 4.5 per cent of the work force, find it hard to understand why some hon. members are not more concerned about unemployment. For instance, the newly appointed Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) represents a constituency in Newfoundland where unemployment is running at almost 15 per cent. Nova Scotia is suffering from double-digit unemployment, at about 11 per cent. Unemployment in New Brunswick is running at about 12 per cent, and in Quebec at over 9 per cent. In Quebec, in August of this year, 234,000 were unemployed. The September figures, which were released several days ago, are even higher.

However, members representing those provinces do not seem at all concerned. Do they believe, as do some well paid media people and tenure professors in our universities, that many people do not want to work? Do they believe that unemployed wives are not really unemployed because their husbands are working, despite the fact that the only way they can buy a home and make mortgage payments is if both husband and wife work? Is that what they believe? We do not think so. We in this party believe that we can have full employment. We do not believe that except for the United States Canada must have the highest rate of unemployment of any industrialized western country. We are not alone in our belief that Canada can have full employment.

Senator Hubert Humphrey, who has had long experience as a United States senator and vice-president since 1948, introduced into the United States Senate a bill entitled the Humphrey-Hawkins bill. The objectives of that bill have been endorsed by the Democratic presidential candidate, Jimmy Carter. We believe, as Senator Humphrey believes with regard to the United States, that we can and should have full employment. It is the responsibility of the Canadian government to ensure that this is the case.

The record proves conclusively that the Liberal government does not believe that full employment is either possible or important. We in this party are prepared to make a national commitment to full employment. This should be done through legislation. A bill should be introduced setting out clearly and unequivocally a specific timetable for achieving full employment in this country.

We in this party propose that unemployment be reduced to 5 per cent nationally within one year, and to 3 per cent within two years. This can be achieved in Canada in the same way that Senator Humphrey believes it can be achieved in the United States. The Liberal government will not do that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. He may only continue with unanimous consent. Is there consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Mr. Orlikow: We believe we can have full employment. We believe that employment can be meaningful. We do not accept what the Liberals have been proposing in recent years, alphabet soup projects such as LIP, LEAP and OFY which have been the main thrust of Liberal employment programs. We believe people want to work and will do so if given the opportunity. We are committed to that. The government's anti-inflation program as it has been developed over the past year goes in the other direction. Therefore, we are going to have even higher unemployment than we had before the program began.

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join in this debate on the Speech from the Throne. I believe very strongly that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has set before us a great challenge, one which the Canadian people might have expected and in all probability wanted. I will divide my speech into two sections. First, I wish to point out some of the specifics I see in the Speech from the Throne. Second, I want to indicate the inspirational way in which I feel it can have an effect on the Canadian people.

Before the Speech from the Throne I wrote to many of my constituents. I circulated among many people I know in business, labour unions and professional people and suggested that they write indicating to me what they, as Canadians, would like to see in the Speech from the Throne. I am pleased to say that these Canadians, being as responsible as ever, took the time to do that. Some sent a very short note. Some older people replied in plain ink on scribbling paper. Others with secretaries made four, five and six-page replies. They indicated what they would like to see in the Speech from the Throne. In looking over the speech, I discovered that it deals with the kinds of things they wrote to me about, indicating a response to the Canadian people.

A paramount issue in my constituency is national unity. Most people who wrote said that we need better understanding among French and English-speaking Canadians, but we must achieve formal constitutional independence and increase the effectiveness of training in both official languages in the shool systems across Canada. Those are three paramount thoughts on national unity in my constituency. They have been reflected in the Speech from the Throne.

My constituents wrote to me about equality of opportunity. They talked of a reduction of inflation, creating employment opportunities, practicing fiscal restraint, reducing growth in the public service, transferring some government activities to the private sector and, to increase trade, that we modify our industrial assistance programs. The poeple who wrote to me are ordinary citizens, not paid members of parliament. However, they said many things that were said in the Speech from the Throne.

They asked that we improve financial assistance to small business. In many cases when people talk about small business, they refer only to capital expenditure. Many small businessmen get loans from industrial banks, provincial governments or their own banks for capital expenditure. However, they often find they do not have the funds with which to purchase the ingredients for the new products necessary to fill the orders they receive. They do not have the funds for ongoing expenditures. This is true of many small businesses in Canada. In the frozen food business, many small businesses have difficulty fulfilling contracts because they are unable to buy the necessary ingredients. In addition, it has been requested that the amount of paperwork to be completed by small businesses be reduced. For example, a small business with six employees might require the services of one or two employees just to complete government forms.

With regard to unemployment, my constituents wrote that there should be year-round job creation. They do not believe that the work ethic is dead. They do not accept the fact that Canadians are lazy. Often it is businesses, companies and others who utilize unemployment insurance for their own benefit, laying off people in order to achieve new methods.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Did you like the speech?

● (1530)

Mr. MacFarlane: It said that we should create jobs to supplement private sector activity, that we want retraining programs and a merger between the Unemployment Insurance Commission and Manpower. This has been said before, so I would not want the hon. member to think I liked the speech because it came only from the minds of great Liberals or the mind of a great Prime Minister.

An hon. Member: Is there such a thing?

Mr. MacFarlane: Sometimes a speech like this is the vehicle for the expression of the opinion of the Canadian people, and we have a Prime Minister who is becoming very expert in reflecting the opinion of the people.

So far as immigration is concerned, they are asking for some amendments that will further the cause of family reunification. We are all aware of sad cases, yet one of the things that Canadians still continue to ask is whether we are going to assist in the reunification of families. We have always done this, and they want to know whether we are going to continue to do it. Canadians have also indicated their concern for a balance to be struck between immigration and employment opportunities.

I could go on for pages talking about reflections on the Speech from the Throne, Mr. Speaker. In the field of labour-management relations people are asking about collective bargaining centres, about a greater rate of participation by plant workers, expanded labour education programs, a voluntary code of fair practices, a national institute to improve quality of life in the workplace, and establishing an industrial safety and health centre to identify and remove hazards. These are things that the people want this parliament to do. I do not suggest for a moment that the opposition parties will not, in their view, play a very strong role in the legislation that will finally come forward from the Speech from the Throne. Their amendments and suggestions, if for the good of the Canadian people, will certainly do much to mould the policies put forward by the government in the Speech from the Throne.

As for competitions policy, we should strengthen laws for mergers and monopolies and give protection against unfair freight rates. In the field of energy we should increase research and exploration. Other items include social policy, settling the land claims of our native peoples, increasing federal support for amateur sport, family law, external affairs, individual freedom and the role of government. These are all subjects about which ordinary Canadians have written in their letters.

One area where I might be critical is amateur sport. The government has indicated that there will be increased federal support. I will always say that this is not enough, that the support does not go far enough. I shall probably never be truly satisfied until we have a minister of sport. I do not accept a ministry of state for fitness and amateur sport, but at least this does provide a good plateau from which to start. We can then go forward up the ladder and do things properly in the long term. Those are the matters of substance in the Speech from the Throne.

I have often thought, as I have looked at this great country of ours, at this brave new world, at this Canada, that there must be an unusual and great destiny for us. Indeed, when I saw many of our youth fight in the last great conflicts for Canada, World War II and the Korean war, fighting for what they believed to be the cause of our free society, I thought that at some point we would harness all our human resources and move on to our destiny, which was to bring a new light and a new attitude to all the world.

South of us were the lands where the Statue of Liberty beckoned. These were the lands where they said, "Give us your poor, your hungry, your tired". These were the lands which for so long held hope for a tired, weary world. I remembered, in another generation, how my father had gone to fight the war to end wars, and how he had been so maimed. He came through it and brought a family through that terrible depression. I remembered living as a family of five in two rooms, and yet I once again remembered how my brother went to the army and my sister to the navy, I myself to the air force, and came through a second great conflict. My hope continually was that this present youth, this present generation, would really not go to war and therefore would end war where my father had failed, where I had failed and my brother and sister had failed.

This must be the destiny of Canada, I thought. Surely this new world had a destiny to bring to the entire universe as we went to the moon and looked back at the earth, a feeling of hope, a feeling of greatness for the future. To my surprise, it seemed as though a destiny had been broken off, not just interrupted but broken off. It seemed as though we had become involved in wars which some people said were none of our business.

It seems as though we had lived in a land of luxury and were no longer interested in other human beings. We had become self-satisfied and we ourselves were all that counted in this tired world. We were taking back our invitation to the poor and the hungry to come and bring their tiredness and tribulations with them. The Statue of Liberty had closed its eyes. North America had shut its voice. We might have even shut our ears. It seemed that the entire country was in an internal turmoil. Canadians looked askance at Canadians. New Canadians were looked upon as different. There was talk of separation both east and west. Loud voices spoke out representing each of the founding races and threatened to be unreconciled. It was even evidenced by the fact that racial tension began to rip through our neighbour to the south.

In parts of Canada, new Canadians were looked at as not of our stock. It seemed that we were not in search of a destiny at all, but we wanted to mark time and enjoy the good things that we have for ourselves and we would never share them with anyone else.

In the midst of all this, great problems of corruption were alluded to in government. There seemed to be a lack of moral fibre in our leaders. There was a complete loss of hope in this generation. It seemed as though everyone was out to get what they wanted for themselves. It seemed that destiny was involved in survival today and there was no bright hope in the future.

How could this selfish, self-centred, non-sacrificing community fulfil its destiny to leave the world a bright new future? Our destiny was gone. If we were destined for anything, it was to wallow in the fields of mediocrity and in the valley of sloth. If we were in charge of our own destiny, then our destiny was not to clean the pool but to pollute the pool, the earth, the air, and even the minds of those around us. We had not merely lost our path on the road. We had not merely taken the low road or mistakenly meandered through the fields. We had lost our destiny.

Somewhat bewildered, I stood as though all alone on a mountain top and I could hear voices. Some were very old voices and they spoke of when the days were hard and difficult during the days of the depression, the tragedies of wars. These were pruning days. They had come through these days together, although having faced great tragedies, having lived together, worked together and accomplished something for the future. These older voices said, "You can't lose your destiny. There is a future for you. Look to the new generation". Then I heard many other young voices. These young voices kept talking of how they would gather with the youth of the world. They would gather with the youth across the land. They would unite in love and security. They would bring to society a brave new world.

As I heard these two voices, I heard a clamour which almost drowned them out, and this was the clamour of a third group. They had gone to the best schools, had lived the rich, affluent life. They were the ones who had everything given to them on a silver platter because their parents, having been through so much pain, had said that their children must live better. These were the ones who said that the past was wicked, the future was rotten, let us live for today.

It was in this simple moment, on top of that one hill, hearing those three voices, that I understood the problem we faced on this continent. We were facing the death of a generation. We were facing a clawing, clinging, screaming people who knew they were going, a materialistic group who had no hopes for the future. This middle generation could see only itself and really resented the voice of the grandparents of the past who could talk so joyfully about their hardships. They really resented unknowing youth who talked as though there would be a bright new dawn.

For them, life was measured in pennies and dollars, cars and television sets and all of the materialistic things and objects on which you can put your hands and view and taste, touch and feel. There was no imagination left—the imagination that was so vivid in the stories told by old grandmothers, the imagination that was so vivid in the young boy or girl who thought that he or she might be a pilot, or a fireman, or a nurse, or a doctor, or a missionary.

This society that was dying was cynical. But, you know, the great chance was there. Joined with the youth and the aged, some of this society, you and me, may pull ourselves out from this dying generation. We do not have to sit on the Titanic and slide into the ocean ahead of time to meet it, or just go down with a gurgle.

We have a chance to pick ourselves up and reach for the stars. We have a chance for a second destiny, and that second destiny will be made by the volunteers, the ordinary citizens of Canada. It will not be made by the highly paid employees. It will not be made by the experts. It will not be made by the academics or by all of the researchers or all of the social workers or by all of the greatest of management experts in the world. It will be made by the ordinary citizens from all walks of life. Businessmen, athletes, artists, dancers and corporation owners will give of their own talents, one to the other. We believe our export will be the export of attitude; that our most important resource in this part of the world is human resource and our youth.

We will indeed achieve our second destiny, and our second destiny is a bright new world. Our second destiny is not a city paved with gold. Our second destiny is not all of honey and flowing fields of wheat. Our second destiny is somewhat a drawing in of the belt. Our second destiny is a commitment to be concerned about all others, regardless of their race, colour or creed. Our second destiny means that we will be willing and joyful to sacrifice in order to help others. Our second destiny is no mere ride over the river Styx to the valley of death. Our second destiny surmounts even death. This generation, those of us who will join the youth of the future, will indeed prove, "It's coming yet, and yet shall be that man to man shall brother be".

Service clubs, fraternal organizations, churches and institutions and cities and countries, with this new wave of nationalism will exhibit not our differences but will exhibit what we bring to the table: our talents from Canada, our talents from the old country, brought together not in a melting-pot but in a grand mosaic, a grand stained-glass window which shouts out our destiny. It is our hope for the disenfranchised and our hope for the world. Our destiny is indeed a road that climbs up until it disappears in the light at the end of the tunnel.

Destiny is in the doing. Those who stood side by side and saw their comrades slain in battle in the cause of a new world will join us. Those who survived the great depression have empathy for the poor of Canada and the poor of the world. The challenge of our youth is not once more to be cannon fodder. However, like the noble ones who came before them, their sacrifices will be great. Let us join with them in the doing. We are on the verge of a new generation. We are witnessing the death of one. Let us toss off the tentacles of the materialistic past. Let us move together to a bright new world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, this is going to be a very difficult act to follow, as I see that the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) has just emptied the press gallery. This is the first time that has happened since I have been here.

I should like to start by congratulating the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. In supporting the government's programs, those two backbenchers displayed what I think is an inordinate amount of courage and fortitude. My intention is not to give a wide-ranging speech on the economic ills of the country, as that certainly will be left to other hon. members. I would like to give a brief rundown or exposé of my thinking about the case for a long-term food policy for Canada and outline some of the reasons we should have such a policy and what has happened in agriculture over the past decade.

My interest in agriculture is certainly both political and practical; political since my constituency is totally agricultural and practical in that I am proud to say I am a practicing agricultural producer in Manitoba. I believe the greatest occupation in the world is that of agriculture. To my mind, there is no greater profession than that involved in the raising of food for one's fellow man. Canada has always had what was considered a progressive agriculture, that is, up until the last few years. What I would like to do is build a case, as I have mentioned, for a long-term food policy for this country.

It has become increasingly apparent that Canadian agriculture in recent years has gone through a crisis of leadership. As a result, agriculture has been found wanting. Some of the issues which have consumed our farm leaders over the past few years have been egg marketing, dairy quotas, rail line abandonment, feed grain policy, the tinkering about with the beef industry, to name only a few. All of these are essentially negative issues. The strategy each time seems to have been to cut losses rather than to maximize opportunity or try to preserve something that might have made sense decades ago, rather than to see if they would make sense decades from now.

The leader of this negativism that has spread over Canadian agriculture has been the present minister, and during his term as Minister of Agriculture, Canadian farmers have faced the best opportunities they have ever seen. Such opportunities usually come to an industry only once in decades, and for Canadian agriculture it has taken over 50 years since it has had the opportunities agriculture has faced in the past three or four years.

One could ask what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has done about these opportunities. I think the very simple answer is that he has made a mess of them. About the only product the Minister of Agriculture seems capable of getting Canadian agriculture geared up to produce is milk powder, and that is about the only major export product Canadian farmers produce that is really not needed in quantities in world markets.

As an example, world grain markets have expanded by about 40 per cent in the last five years, yet the United States has taken about 85 per cent of those expanded markets. There is much evidence of the failure of Canadian agricultural policy in the past decade. As an example, Canadian agricultural productivity has been pitiful. When all resources are taken into account the level of Canadian agricultural productivity from 1972 to 1974 seems the same as ten years ago. No wonder a good portion of the industry is running to hide behind the negative sort of policies we have adopted in this country, policies that have been expounded at great length by the negative Minister of Agriculture.

One can ask whether this can be turned around. That is a fairly legitimate question, the answer to which is, hopefully, that it can be. Certainly, at the present time some of our top economic policy thinkers in the federal government have become aware of the problems related to Canada's approach to farm policy. The unfortunate truth is that this would require a new Minister of Agriculture. The most positive thing the present Minister of Agriculture could do for Canadian farmers is quit. That is unlikely to happen, at least in the foreseeable future, and Canadian agriculture is likely to be adrift and leaderless for some time.

In talking about a long-term national food policy, we must ask ourselves what we should be looking at. I suggest we will have to deal with this very important question in the very near future. It would be wrong to say that no food policy exists in Canada. On the contrary, there are dozens of policies at both levels of government affecting food production, distribution and consumption.

If you want a good example of non-cooperative federalism, it would be hard to beat the array of legislation and regulations affecting the food system in this country. Not only is there a frequent inconsistency of regulation from one jurisdiction to another, but there have been cases where within the same jurisdiction one department's policy has conflicted with that of others. A good example of this can be found in a situation surrounding border control on eggs. It would be interesting to know how the authorities at Industry, Trade and Commerce rationalize their policies with those of the agriculture authorities when it come to Canada-United States trade policies.

Given the propensity for the right hand not knowing what the left hand is up to, no doubt there have been many attempts to provide some over-all structure to governmental activity in the food sector. For example, I understand that the federal government formed an interdepartmental committee of senior officials a year ago to deal with food questions. It was established to co-ordinate departmental programs affecting all areas of food. Although this group has doubtless been very busy during the past year or two, there has been no public indication suggesting that this group has seriously engaged in a long-term food policy. It would also be an exaggeration to say that no province has adopted long-term food policies. In Quebec, for example, I understand that the government has set its sights on self-sufficiency in food over the long term.

I have to ask myself how practical that policy will prove to be. It may make sense politically, but it certainly is highly questionable in economic terms. But at least it is a long-term food policy against which the various short-term government measures in that province can be measured. It provides an objective against which the means adopted in particular circumstances to solve a problem can be evaluated. It is precisely the type of clear enunciation of long-term objectives, based on a national consensus, which I think Canada requires.

There are good reasons Canada has not yet managed to develop a long-term food policy, reasons other than obstruction and the negativism of the Minister of Agriculture. First, there is the fact that for several decades food has not been a pressing concern for most Canadians. We have taken very low relative prices to be the normal state of affairs. We ignore the fact that by international, as well as historical standards, Canada has been extraordinarily blessed in its food resources.

Another important factor which has militated against the development of our national food policy, and which will continue to do so, is the array of jurisdiction of authority over the various aspects of the food question. I do not believe it would be an exaggeration to say that there are more than 25 separate departments and ministries of government in Canada with regulatory authority over one aspect or another of the food system. This kind of confusion of responsibility remains a major deterrent to the development of a national food policy. In my view, it can only be overcome by firm and statesmanlike leadership at the federal level. Nothing is more basic to society than food. Reflecting this fact, the various elements of Canada's food industry constitute a very large portion of the total national economy.

As a fundamental concern, it is questionable whether we can afford to leave this sector any longer without an over-all direction or framework on which the activities and planning of both government and the private sector can be based. It is questionable because circumstances have been changing. It is evident that when people no longer can count on cheap, abundant food, when instability affects both their stomachs and their pocketbook, there emerge powerful passions and forces in our society which could very well be destructive.

At the risk of oversimplifying the problem, existing policies in Canada were generally designed to cope with the problem of food surplus. As time goes on, we seem likely to face a situation of increasing global food scarcity. When the world situation has reached a point at which a country like Brazil decides, as a matter of foreign policy, to increase production of food because of the political influence food will give it in the world council, then circumstances have indeed changed radically from the decades of bulging granaries. When food begins to become a political and even a military weapon, it is indeed time for Canada to disregard the luxury of co-ordinated short-term, ad hoc food policies.

The next question that could be asked would be, what would we be looking at in terms of a national food policy? I am sure the government will be asking this question, because apparently it has no idea what a national food policy should look like. At the national level, I think we should be looking toward an umbrella framework which would provide a consistent orientation to policy-making. It would provide agreed parameters within which discussion affecting food production, distribution and consumption could be taken. The framework for a long-term national food policy should be relatively inflexible in terms of the goals or over-all objectives which it would describe, but it would not otherwise be limited by the means of achieving these goals.

Another important characteristic of a food policy should be that it be practical. It must provide a useful perspective on real problems and offer fairly straightforward guidance, reflecting a national consensus so that it can be adopted by successive governments in any particular region of Canada. Of course, it is easier to describe the characteristic of a long-term national food policy than to actually articulate a policy with those characteristics. The process of articulation will require contribution from as many interested and informed people as possible. It should not be left exclusively to government officials or politicians.

A comprehensive national food policy should address itself to the following concerns: first, output. Canadians must be assured an adequate supply of good quality food. Second, nutrition. The quality of food for all Canadians must be maintained at the present high standards. A national food policy would certainly have to ensure this particular aspect. The national food policy would have to address itself to the most important question of farm income. Without going into any details, adequate incomes to producers will in the future have to be available to those willing to participate in a modern, up to date agricultural industry.

In a comprehensive, long-term national food policy, we must also address ourselves to the problem of Canada's role vis-à-vis the world. We cannot consider our food situation in isolation alone. Thus, our food policy would have to be concerned about our trading relationships and be as aggressive and market oriented as possible. We have already seen, in the case of beef, what can happen if we forget that there are two sides to the case of import controls. Similarly, a long-term food policy would have to articulate Canada's role in alleviating world hunger. Before being able to arrive at any kind of policy conclusion in this area, it would be necessary to attempt to identify exactly what the world food situation is now and what it is likely to be in the near future. With the government's track record, we may see some of the suggestions I have made in a national food policy proposed at some time by the Liberal government. If this is the case, so much the better.

One thing is clear: unless the Minister of Agriculture changes his tactics, he will go down in the history books as one of the most negative ministers of agriculture this country has ever had, and along with the negativism he will leave a legacy of confusion and distrust and a clear record of total lack of any constructive policy.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like at the outset to pay a special tribute to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada and extend to him my best wishes of good health, because it is our best asset and only when it has somewhat deteriorated do we appreciate it further. I would also like to extend to his wife, his helpmate, my wishes of good health and long life.

I would also like to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address in reply, a difficult and unrealistic task that follows parliamentary tradition. It is a long-established custom in our Parliament and in the Canadian legislatures and it is always with some pride that members are called to move and second this motion. This is why I wish to extend to them my warm congratulations.

Mr. Speaker, I am deeply pained that the leader of the Social Credit Party of Canada (Mr. Caouette) is not here because he lies in hospital. I am sure that he would have liked to be at present the opening of this second session of the thirtieth Parliament and to take part in its proceedings. Any responsible and sincere individual acknowledges that he is a great Canadian who has worked for the unity of our country while remaining a French-speaking Canadian who has advocated the same ideas in the same terms throughout the country.

So I want to pay him a special tribute and wish him good health so that he can see some day the implementation of an annual guaranteed income through national dividends for everybody and a compensated discount on Canadian products that would be paid through the creation of a new credit from the Bank of Canada, the only democratic financial institution really owned by Canadians, as opposed to the present system that takes the money from the workers through taxes to give it to the less privileged so that someday, if we continue along this line, we shall all be poor.

Mr. Speaker, the first session of the 30th Parliament lasted two years and enabled the government to refrain from announcing its policy sooner. Yet, at the opening of the second session of the 30th Parliament, I thought that in the Speech from the Throne this government would announce several new measures to resolve the many problems faced by Canadians. So it is to fulfill my duties as representative of the people in Parliament that I take part in the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. The government says that it will continue to fight against inflation but it does not say which means it will use to do it efficiently. The Social Credit Party of Canada would be made responsible for this calamity called inflation if it ever had the opportunity to implement its financial and monetary credit system instead of the present credit-debt system applied and supported by the present government.

In fact, some members of this House and sometimes even the press made unfair judgments concerning the Social Credit Party of Canada without knowing the least thing about its philosophy. I even heard recently on the radio in the Quebec area the moderator of a hot line who was ridiculizing this policital trend, this economic philosophy and who admitted at the end of the program that he did not know a thing on the subject. It is unfortunate that people with such a large audience demonstrate so much irresponsibility because either you say the truth or you lie to the people. You cannot do both at the same time. So I urge the management radio stations to assign to those programs people who are responsible. I am not against the fact that our attitudes or ideas are criticized but at least it should be done by knowledgeable people. It is the least we can ask.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, after the government announced its anti-inflation measures in October 1975 I declared to the House that once more this government, as the unconscious servant of the big financial institutions, was making the poor bear the burden of inflation in the present credit-debt system. So I declared then that a general wage increase of about 10 per cent would widen even more the gap between the small wage earner and high income people. It was obvious that the injustice would be worsened as a 10 per cent increase for a worker earning $6,000 would give him only $600 more a year whereas those earning an annual salary of $20,000 would get an increase of $2,000 a year which would widen the gap by $1,400 a year.

And that even if the essential needs are the same for all. That is what low income people complain about, those who are not organized, who cannot benefit from regular salary increases, who get only the minimum wage. In my view, this is insufficient for a decent living.

There are thousands of low income people who pay taxes to pay for salary increases of persons who earn much more than they do. That is why I say the gap is widening and discontent growing. That is why we are now experiencing protest throughout the country, even from organizations that benefitted from these measures. Nevertheless the low income people who are unable to make representations and demonstrations say so by their silence. They write to their Member of Parliament to complain. I am sure all members receive communications of this kind. These constituents expect us to speak on their behalf on the floor of the House and invite the government to change its position on that matter and give them a fairer deal.

I think, as it has often been said in the House, that the real solution would be a guaranteed annual income. The government is aware of that question but it makes very little progress on that road. As on other occasions, I am quite afraid that when this measure will be presented the damages will already be too great, it will already be too late, we will be outdistanced by events, and we will not obtain the results that we could get if we acted immediately.

In the Throne Speech, the government reassures us about its intentions as far as the bilingualism policy in Canada is concerned. At last the Liberal party has understood that it will take a long time for Canada to become a bilingual country and the best means to reach that end is to act at the level of the primary and secondary schools, without encroaching upon the provincial responsibilities in the field of education. I sincerely think that the federal government can find a formula that could help the provinces even more, it could grant the fiscal incentives that would enable them to adopt programs for teaching languages, a second language, at the primary level.

I think that that very measure has been adopted in several countries in Europe, countries which are bilingual, and when we go there, as several hon. members may have realized, we often meet people who can speak two, three and sometimes four languages. There is no quarrel about that, it is a recognized fact, an accepted fact and, in these countries, languages do not create any problems. I think that the same thing could be done in Canada.

There are presently some linguistic problems in the field of aviation. Everybody knows about that. We hear more about those problems in the province of Quebec because our French-speaking fellow citizens are directly concerned and they are the first victims. But I do not understand why this useless battle goes on because some claim that people will travel in much safer conditions if only the English language is used in that field.

It is double Dutch to me. How could you have more safety just because English only is spoken in air-ground communications! I cannot believe that we are not intelligent enough to find ways and means to translate faithfully into French all the words used in air-ground communications.

I think this is just an excuse and it seems to me we should show sings of good will throughout Canada, whether we are French-speaking or English-speaking Canadians and try to find a fair and equitable solution not only for the majority but also for the minority.

I was stunned to see ministers resign on this issue. If my information is correct, the resignation of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) yesterday had something to do with bilingualism in Canada. I really cannot understand that. The whole thing reminds me of a fireman. We all know what a fireman is. It is a man who fights fires which are out of control. Some people are proud to be firemen as long as there is no fire to fight, but the moment one breaks out they resign because they will not fight it. I feel that the best way to be efficient is to stay on the job and try and push one's own ideas without damaging anybody else's cause, but with the conviction of fostering the interests of all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal with the resolution of a municipal council which I received last night. It comes from the City of Montmagny. In this resolution, the city council members state that they support the "Gens de l'Air" in their efforts to establish French as a useful and practical language in communications. The city council concludes, and I quote:

That it assure l'"Association des gens de l'Air du Québec" of its moral support in their fight;

That it authorize the Association to run a subscription and organize a badge selling campaign within the territory of the City of Montmagny for the purpose of obtaining money for their fight;

That a copy of this resolution be sent to the hon. members representing the constituency in the Quebec National Assembly and the House of Commons in Ottawa, to "l'Association des Gens de l'Air du Québec", Hangar No. 2, Quebec City Airport.

That is signed by the clerk, Yvon Lemay; the mayor of that municipality is none other than Dr. Cajetan Gauthier whom several of you know for his services to Canada when he was in the Canadian forces. I congratulate the Montmagny city council for having taken position on the matter and I trust the message will be heard in high places so that instead of quarrelling we might get along and finally act like intelligent people and solve the problem.

Mr. Speaker, I was astonished that, in the Speech from the Throne, not one word was spoken about agriculture, as if it were an economic sector of no importance. Yet, as far as Quebec is concerned, it is the very foundation of agriculture, which explains the considerable dissatisfaction expressed by the producers of that province on hearing that, as a result of the dairy policy we know, their income has been cut by 23 per cent as of today. I have here a document I shall not read because it is very long and complicated; I received it yesterday from the dairy producers' union of the south shore, and it is signed by its secretary, Adrien Lavoie. One paragraph reads as follows, and I quote:

Economic situation

The drop in incomes as defined will be $5,350,000, representing 23 per cent.

Considering that 1,200-odd producers in our region will have to face such loss, this will mean for them an average decrease of $4,458 per dairy farm.

Those are official figures which I quote trustfully because usually those people give us very precise information.

Together with the same document I also have here a letter dated September 24, 1976 that was sent to a producer of my region. In this letter, it is said that for five successive remittances, the producer has not received one cent. Each cheque carried the mention "cancelled". I do not know whether it is legal to proceed in such way, I am not qualified to pass judgment but, at any rate, this is called a cheque and no payment whatsoever can be made with it. The producer is unable to pay for his meal account, his hydro and gas bills.

Therefore, it is a sad situation but something even worse adds to it. I will quote from the letter, Mr. Speaker:

> The Federation of Quebec Industrial Milk Producers have instructed us to deduct from your pay cheque covering the period September 1 to September 15 and the following ones, if applicable, an amount of $1,200.54. This amount represents a deduction for export costs exceeding quotas (penalty) which had not been taken off your pay for the period June 16 to 30, according to the 50 per cent formula as applied to your performance between April 1 and June 30. This 50 per cent formula was cancelled on August 1.

Therefore, for the period I just mentioned alone, June 16 to June 30, this represents $1,200, that is 50 per cent, whereas 100 per cent amounts to $2,400. Consequently this farmer whom I know very well is going to go bankrupt and yet he was among those who were encouraged to remain on their farms because they were employed outside the farm and their wives were running the enterprise with their children. Therefore, he was encouraged to remain on his farm, but for this purpose he had to increase his herd to make his business profitable. So he believed that; he bought cows for a good price, he accepted quotas and he was sure that he would have a normal year. But he happens to do so at the wrong time and the dairy policy that we know serves him badly and at the end he is not the one who leaves the farm, it is the mother who finds a job outside the farm to save whatever is left. Therefore, when I say that it is a disaster for many, I do not exaggerate.

I would like to take this opportunity to tell the government that they are dishonest to put the blame solely on dairy producers because, in fact, it is well known that loans from the Farm Credit Corporation have been easier to get this past year and that farmers were invited to have more producing farms and, of course, it was impossible to forecast everything. But I blame the government for allowing the importation of heavy shipments of dairy products to the point that in 1975, according to an official document I have in hand and which stems from serious research, our importations reached $56 million while our exportations only reached $35 million. Normally, we are an exporting country.

So I think we should do more to encourage research for a greater utilization of our milk so that we can find new products we could sell on our market and I think that in this way we could safeguard the basic industry in Quebec, namely the milk industry.

I have here a press release published in a paper dated October 6 which happens to confirm these possibilities. It says the following, and I quote:

> A new milk product has been on the market for one year already, UHT milk, which is treated at ultra high temperature and which may be preserved longer than traditional pasteurized milk.

Thus I think we should encourage to a greater extent the production of this milk so we may store it and send it to underdeveloped countries. Mr. Speaker, when we talk about giving milk to underdeveloped countries through the CIDA program, we hear people make the following answer: But African people do not want to drink our milk. They are not used to that kind of milk and they do not drink it.

Mr. Speaker, it is my belief that the Creator made everybody the same, either in Africa, in Canada or elsewhere in America and anyone can see for himself that females are surprisingly like our mothers who fed our children. Like us, they consider milk as a natural product and it is widely appreciated. In that sense, I would like to relate an incident to hon. members. Fifteen days ago, a nun who has lived for 20 years in Africa made a visit in our parish and spent two days in my home.

During meal hours, I took the opportunity to inquire about African families and about the way they feed themselves. I asked her the following question: If we give them some milk, would they use it or throw it away? She answered affirmatively. She told me that her community had bought for $40,000 of powder milk last year that this milk had been distributed to the poorest and most hungry families and that if it had been possible to buy more, Africans would have welcomed it.

Now I think it is an excellent means to help these hungry people while disposing of a production exceeding the needs of the domestic trade. Mr. Speaker, another means we could use to settle that problem would be to restore discounts on dairy products so that, larger families and those with lower incomes might take advantage of these products at bargain prices.

Two or three years ago, that policy did a great deal of good when it was introduced. I think we should go back to it. That would be another way of eliminating the dairy problem. The right hon. Prime Minister was telling us yesterday that the Canadian government is spending $250 million a year to help the dairy industry. That is right, but this is not the only industry being subsidized in Canada. Look at all industries which are subsidized through regional economic expansion and you will notice that there are many industries in other sectors, many people taking advantage of legislation meant to help their businesses.

In my opinion, while thanking the government for its generosity towards Canadian dairy producers, it would be advisable to add a few million dollars to diversify our policy, as I just suggested, so that Canada as a whole can take advantage of it and therefore save the dairy industry from disaster. Mr. Speaker, I see that my time is running very quickly, but I would have another subject to deal with, and I refer to unemployment. In our area, in the south shore region, people are very uneasy. There has been talk of industrial decentralization for many years. In theory, this sounds great if done with good intentions. But in practice, this is not what is happening. Again recently, in my region of the south shore, certain industries have had to reduce their personnel because they have lost contracts, customers who ordinarily had certain materials subcontracted by these industries. Moreover, while saying that it wants decentralization, this government is now helping industries in Montreal to expand. It is helping the same type of industries as those in our area to develop.

I am quite sure that there is no intention of wrong-doing, but it still remains that the movement is towards the large centres and that the less favoured centres suffer more and more. When we look at the figures, it is not surprising that unemployment is increasing in these areas. This is why today I asked the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr.

Cullen) if there were modern methods of evaluating, finding and compiling data on the healthy unemployed and whether he would earmark additional funds to implement as many LIP projects as possible. The minister replied—and if I had been in his place, I would perhaps have done the same—that if he did this for the Bellechasse riding, he would be asked to do the same for all other constituencies in Canada.

This is a reply that I had been expecting, but I still believe that the Local Initiatives Program has been greatly improved in the last two years, and when this year's program was announced, I took the responsibility of sending forms to each municipality to invite them to take part in the program and of asking them once again to submit serious projects which would make good use of the money of Canadian taxpayers so that something would remain afterwards. I believe that this is the best advice that we can give to those whom we must serve. The population replied and many projects were submitted. However, I was discouraged to receive a week or two ago a letter from the minister informing me that only a certain amount would be made available to us.

Mr. Speaker, you can imagine the situation of a member of Parliament who has $2 to $3 million worth of serious projects before him and who is offered about one tenth of the money he needs. With the best will in the world, how to distribute this money—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the House that the hon. member's allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I thank you, Mr. Speaker, as well as all my colleagues. It is not my habit to abuse the generosity of the House and my comments will be brief. However, I am very grateful to you for allowing me to finish what I want to say. As concerns the LIP projects, I would like everyone in the House, all the members whose ridings are most affected, to join me in telling the government that they appreciate this program and would like to see more money allocated to it for the creation of jobs, because even if we do not give work to those people, we shall have to support them. If we do not support them through unemployment insurance benefits, we shall do so through welfare benefits and nothing will be accomplished in this way.

I believe that the government should seriously analyse the situation and think during the next few days about giving the Minister of Manpower and Immigration additional credits so that more projects can be implemented.

As you may have noticed, Mr. Speaker, I am not making my remarks as a criticism, patronizingly. Rather, I am making them responsibly, conscious of my responsibilities towards the population as a whole, proud of the experience in my constituency, especially last year when various monies were put to very good use. That is why I will request that this year again the government carry on along this line.

I would have liked, in conclusion, to touch on the subject of housing as I had promised I would last night to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) but I do not want to impose upon the goodwill of hon. members. I will take up this matter at an other time. Meanwhile, I would like, if I may, to make a few suggestions which I consider to be good ones in order to help him perfect his program for the improvement of housing facilities in rural areas. However I can say today to the minister that this program, a very recent one, is already under way in my constituency.

Numerous projects are submitted, some are finalized and people feel quite satisfied about the way things are going. That is why I have asked the minister last night, in private, to see to it that this program be extended so that a greater number of municipalities benefit from it, which would also enable us to reduce unemployment, create jobs, while promoting housing improvement for the rural population.

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleagues on both sides of the House. As one of those who was first elected in 1974 and who has not yet made the traditional discours de début—frankly the words "maiden speech" seem too amusing to comment upon—it is my intention today to address my remarks to several areas concerning both the branch I represent in fitness and amateur sport, and the riding I represent, as well as areas pertaining to the larger picture concerning the health and fitness of our nation as a whole.

I am sure hon. members noted with interest the following short statement in the Speech from the Throne on Tuesday:

[Translation]

In the aftermath of the highly successfull Montreal Olympics, and the gratifying results achieved by Canadian athletes, federal support for selected amateur sport and fitness programs will be further augmented.

[English]

The key word is "augment." My message to the Canadian sport and recreation people across this country is, "augment."

I should like to point out to hon. members that the two primary areas under my administration, Sport Canada and Recreation Canada, are both in the forefront of improving the participation of Canadians both in excellence in amateur sport and in ever greater numbers in upgrading physical fitness. Sport Canada will be further strengthening the national sports governing bodies and increasing the understanding of amateur sport in our nation. There will be further activity in medical research as it pertains to amateur sport, and new initiatives will be undertaken in assembling sufficient data on which decisions may be based for the greater advantage of amateur athletes.

It is my intention to place considerable emphasis on coaching as a preliminary move which, with the advice of the National Advisory Council, I am confident will form another part of a firm foundation that is required to create the continued evolution of excellence Canadians expect both in competition and in personal fitness.

I serve notice to you, Mr. Speaker, that I shall be asking your leave to rise in my place and speak of the enhancement of Canadian fitness many times in this session, and I frankly ask the co-operation of hon. members on all sides in acquainting me with recreation and amateur sport needs and aspirations in their home areas. If some of them do not hear me, they may not get any.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Campagnolo: I come here, too, Mr. Speaker, as a parochial politician from an area which has very great and immediate concerns. First, I wish to briefly acquaint you with some of my parochial concerns. I have never found "parochial" an improper word in the House of Commons. What are my parochial objectives? I want to assist in setting a standard for the nation during a time of proposed development undertaken by both the federal and provincial governments, by working with conscience and responsibility in employing expertise in adapting development to the environment, and not the other way around, to provide incentives to professionals to work and live in the north, and to reduce the eternal east to west flow of everything from freight rates to the national news, and then start work on the south to north differential that denies the one-tenth of Canadians who live above the fifty-second parallel and below the sixtieth parallel their fair proportion of this world's goods at the same price as their southern neighbours pay.

We have been given a golden gift in this nation, and are in danger of allowing regionalism, grievances and differences of language and culture to shatter our rich heritage. We in this House know we must share, through a solid constitution, these gifts, and even more than most citizens, recognize that a constitution is not a whimsical Gallup poll reflecting day to day changes in the pulse of public opinion as the pulse of the nation orders. The Department of National Health and Welfare is concerned about other matters, about which I am sure hon. members will be interested.

It is usual for those who speak for the government in such debates as this with a twofold purpose: to defend the ideas and proposals put forward in the throne speech itself and to comment upon the remarks made in reply to the throne speech by hon. members opposite. I am most pleased to be able to address myself to the first of these purposes, but find that I am in a bit of a quandary with respect to the second. I should like to take issue with the comments made by the official opposition but, since the leader and his colleagues have produced only words without substance, I find it impossible to do so.

Continuing a tradition which has been well established in the official opposition since last February—and, indeed, for much longer than that—all we have heard so far in this debate is sterile negativism. Our proposals allegedly serve the interests of no one. Well, if that is the case, where are the bold alternatives to which Canadians are entitled? This House and all Canadians might have expected that the opposition would finally begin to put substance to its easy generalizations, but since we have all been deprived of that once again, I can make no further comments on the remarks emanating from that source.

Mr. Horner: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Campagnolo: I remind the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) he was not here to listen to his leader yesterday. I remind him of a premier from British Columbia who was a pretty good one-line stand-up comedian, but he did not last that long.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I want to set the record straight. The reason I was not here yesterday is that I was in Montreal listening to some former Liberals tell me about the problems of transportation in the province of Quebec.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. That is not a point of order, it is a point of debate.

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, I bow to the hon. member for Crowfoot in his knowledge of transportation, but not of Liberals.

But to continue: I cannot make quite the same comments about the remarks of the other parties in opposition. They have at least tried to list some things to which we did not address ourselves in the Speech from the Throne. That is fair enough, but it ignores the fact that governments cannot do everything at once, and it flies in the face of this government's philosophy that governments ought not to try to do too much lest they sap the initiative of the private sector. I am sure the hon. member for Crowfoot would be very concerned if we began to do that.

Mr. Horner: Your words do not convince me of your intentions.

Mrs. Campagnolo: I hope you will have an opportunity to speak.

Mr. Horner: I remember the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. minister has the floor. I suggest we listen to her. We may learn something.

Mrs. Campagnolo: I appreciate the comments you have made, Mr. Speaker. Today, then, I wish to address myself primarily to social policy and particularly to our proposals with respect to the Canada Pension Plan, family allowances, social services and the status of women. While all parties in opposition have tried to shy away from these areas in their comments, probably in recognition that the government is providing solid and popular proposals dealing with these subjects, I do want to draw your attention to them. They reflect, directly, this government's feeling that the apparatus of the state exists to do things for people, not to people. Thus, we hold that while we must apply a firm hand where necessary, we must also demonstrate compassion wherever that is appropriate. One place where compassion is vital is in the provision of social services.

In my previous occupation, and indeed in the present one, I have often been brought face to face with what can happen when social services are not available: at one end of the scale, people pushed to extremes of suicide and criminality, and at the other end people weighed down by troubles they have not been able to solve by so-called conventional methods and who are living Thoreau's life of quiet desperation. Somewhere in between lie homes broken by family and financial stresses, people with what society defines as handicaps who are on welfare only because they cannot get transportation to a job, people who desperately need subsidized day-care services, and single-parent families struggling to retain their unity and dignity.

Because I have seen these problems, I take particular pleasure in commenting on the proposed social services act. I am very pleased to be the first person to bring to this chamber's attention this very positive outcome of the social security review which was begun by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) some three years ago. There are a number of ways in which this legislation is special. For instance, the very fact that the provision of social services is being considered quite separately from income support legislation is a break with tradition, a forward-looking step which is making Canada the envy of many other countries.

Developing a separate piece of legislation is an important step because it recognizes the fact that those who need services, such as day-care, homemakers' services, crisis intervention services, credit counselling or rehabilitation services, are not only poor people. It reasserts that giving people more money does not magically solve all problems, not even the problems of the poor. It is not enough to be able to pay for a service; the services must first exist.

In effect, this means we are recognizing that social services are needed at one time or another by everyone, although to date not everyone has been able to take advantage of them. Children, regardless of their parents' situation, may need protective services. Their parents, regardless of family income, may need the kinds of services that help bring the family back together again or prevent it from falling apart in the first place. Families with handicapped children need a number of services to make it possible for the child to flourish in a warm family atmosphere without putting impossible strains on family life, exactly the kinds of strains that in the past have forced families to give up their children and place them in institutions. Rehabilitation services which were once reserved only for people who could work will now be available to people who may not be able to, especially children and older people retired from the work force.

[Mrs. Campagnolo.]

Day-care services are no longer seen as services reserved for the poor; all kinds of people are now using these services. The proposed legislation will make it possible for a much larger number of them to have the whole or a portion of their fees reimbursed. Moreover, day-care is not restricted to children. Many retired people who might otherwise enter an institution will be able to remain in their community and enjoy their retirement a lot more because they will have the opportunity of going to centres where they can meet friends, just relax, or get together to find ways of improving community life not only for themselves but also for others.

Another very important consideration is that the legislation was not conceived in a vacuum. Since this is cost-sharing legislation, thorough consultations were held with the provinces. Moreover, the Minister of National Health and Welfare from the very outset invited submissions from individuals and organizations and received them. The proposed social services legislation from its very conception was a response to the kind of things government was hearing from people. It listened to their concerns and incorporated as many solutions as was feasible into the legislation.

People were saying that no one—not the physically handicapped, not the elderly, not the mentally retarded—no one is so useless that society should automatically put them away in institutions, regardless of how good these may be. Everyone has something to contribute and the right to stand on their own two feet to the extent that that is possible. For the handicapped, this proposal will mean transportation services to get a job or other community activities. It will also mean a range of rehabilitation services which get them ready for a job and make it possible for them to keep it. It will mean living in their own apartment with the help of a visiting attendant or homemaker. It will mean homemaker services for the elderly who want to live in their own home for as long as possible, and for some of them it might mean the provision of badly needed meals on wheels, or a visiting nurse.

We believe that social services are cost-effective. They save tax dollars. There are short-term savings in keeping people off welfare and in the labour market and a number of services do this, including day-care services and rehabilitation services. It is also cheaper in many cases to keep people out of institutions because these have become a very expensive form of care. There are other longer-term savings especially in the prevent type of service. If we can provide children, for example, with services at critical points in their lives, and promote positive personal development, we can be reasonably sure that they will not become dependant adults, dependent on alcohol, drugs, or welfare; they will not be subject to chronic mental illness, or become criminals. For all these reasons, I am sure that many hon. members are looking forward, as I am, to the forthcoming debate on this important legislation.

As a result of the recently concluded federal-provincial review of our social security system, several significant amendments have been made to the Canada Pension Plan over the last several years. These amendments improved both coverage and benefits under the plan. For example, the ceiling on pensionable earnings was raised substantially in 1974 and set to increase at 12.5 per cent per year until it catches up to the national average industrial wage level. This means that new Canada Pension Plan benefits payable are much improved. Also, the minimum income levels required in order to obtain access to Canada Pension Plan coverage were reduced in order to expand the scope of the program and extend the protection of the plan to a larger number of Canadians.

In addition, the earnings and retirement tests which applied to Canada Pension Plan retirement pensioners between the ages of 65 and 70 were abolished. This measure ensures that Canada Pension Plan beneficiaries with low pensions are not penalized for trying to improve their incomes by continuing to work. At the same time, the limitation on the adjustment of pensions-in-pay in line with changes to the consumer price index was removed to fully protect pensioners against the erosion of the purchasing power of their pensions.

Another very significant amendment to the Canada Pension Plan was the introduction of equal protection and coverage for male and female contributors and their families. That is, the limitations that had once existed in respect of benefits paid to the survivors of female contributors were removed. This recognized the principle that the earnings of either marriage partner should receive similar protection under the Canada Pension Plan against the contingencies of disability, death and retirement.

The government is now advancing a further improvement to the Canada Pension Plan as part of its continuing program to ensure the plan continues to meet the challenge of this changing world in which we live. These proposed improvements represent one result of several years of study, federal-provincial discussions and dialogue with interested groups and individuals across the nation.

In 1970, the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in Canada recommended that provision be made under the Canada Pension Plan for spouses who work at home. This approach was supported in the reports and recommendations of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women and the Canada Pension Plan Advisory Committee, both of which greatly assisted the government in developing these proposals. These groups expressed the need to give recognition to work in the home and to provide financial security under the Canada Pension Plan to a spouse who works at home. As well, a great deal of correspondence was received from individuals and interested groups which indicated that some concrete steps should be taken as soon as possible. These proposals have also been the subject of study and discussion throughout the federal-provincial social security review.

As a result of these consultations, a two-part proposal for amending the Canada Pension Plan is now being advanced. The first part of the proposal would allow the CPP pension credits earned by both spouses during marriage to be split equally between them upon marriage dissolution—that is, upon divorce or annulment.

Mr. Friesen: What does that mean?

Mrs. Campagnolo: It means you get half. The second part of the proposal would allow contributors who leave the labour force to raise young children to drop those periods of low or zero earnings from the calculation of their average lifetime earnings in calculating CPP benefits. The hon. member for Scarborough East knows a great deal about this since he was on the committee that helped evolve many of these proposals originally.

The provision to split Canada Pension Plan pension credits upon the dissolution of a marriage is aimed at ensuring, for the "spouse at home", an equal share of an asset that has been accumulated as a result of the efforts of the two partners during the marriage. This provision thus provides a measure of financial security and recognition for the spouse who works at home, and his or her dependants, at a time when Canada Pension Plan protection may be extremely important. The spouse would have immediate financial protection under the Canada Pension Plan against disability, and the children would have protection against the death of their parents. In the longer term, the spouse would be entitled to Canada Pension Plan retirement benefits. This provision is consistent with the view expressed by the federal law reform commission on the economic nature of marital partnership.

The second proposal would allow a contributor who leaves the labour force to raise a family to drop out those months of low or zero earnings from the calculation of average lifetime earnings. This would ensure that any parent who worked at home caring for children under the age of seven would not be penalized for that period during which she or he had low or zero earnings. Consequently, this proposal would protect the potential pension benefits and eligibility acquired by such a parent either before or after the child-bearing period.

Both of the above proposed revisions are endorsed by the government of Quebec which intends to introduce an amending bill to give effect to identical provisions in the Quebec Pension Plan. As a result, the introduction of our proposed amendments at this time will enhance the universality, portability and transferability of social insurance coverage under both the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans. That is, Canadians will be largely unaffected by their occupational locale or career mobility because the parallel structures of the two plans will be maintained.

When the government launched its anti-inflation program last fall, it recognized that it had to set an example by curtailing expenditures wherever possible. One of the areas of greatest expenditure is in the income security field. In 1974-75, federal expenditures on this sector were $10¼ billion. However, we also recognized that any cutback in these expenditures would work hardship on the people these programs were designed to help. The family allowance program is the one welfare program that reaches into all the strata of our society and supplements family incomes without regard to the levels of these incomes.

We concluded that, on balance, a cutback in this program, although it would mean hardship for some families, would cause less disruption of total family income than would a cutback in any other federal welfare program. And by limiting the cutback to the amount of escalation that would otherwise have been provided in 1976, the government sought to limit the impact on family incomes of this anti-inflation measure. The government therefore suspended the indexation of family allowances for 1976; families continued to receive a $22 monthly allowance instead of the $24 allowance that escalation would have provided for. Estimated federal expenditures on this program in 1976 were thus reduced by $220 million.

It should be recalled that in 1972 the allowance rates were $6, $8 and $10 a month, depending on age. In October, 1973, they were raised to $12 as part of the government's program to help people cope with the effects of inflation. The following January, the new family allowance program set the rate at $20 a month, and in 1975 indexation raised it to $22.

However, it is a basic tenet of this government's philosophy that its income security programs should be indexed so that the purchasing power of the various pensions and allowances will not be eroded by rising prices. It would be inconsistent with this philosophy to continue the suspension of family allowance indexation beyond 1976, and therefore indexation will be resumed in January. The exact amount of the increase will not be known until November when the October price index figures are available, but on the basis of current figures I would anticipate family allowances will increase by close to 8½ per cent in January of next year.

It should be clear, then, Mr. Speaker, that the program of restraint to which our government intends to hold does not imply an end to the improvement of social measures to help those who truly need our help. In places where it is appropriate, we are moving to introduce greater cost efficiency based on the lessons we have learned over the years. In other places we are moving to increase the social justice of our programs. In all cases our ongoing concern will be to provide the very best social security system possible for Canadians at a cost which the nation can afford.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I look forward to bringing information to this House on fitness and amateur sport.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I do not know why it is, but every time the hon. Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport (Mrs. Campagnolo) speaks she evokes in my memory statements made by our mutually admired William Shakespeare, and today has been no exception. After listening to 30 minutes of that purple prose I must say that, by George, King Lear is right, "Nothing can come of nothing."

[Mrs. Campagnolo.]

I must comment on the observation she made that the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) was not here during our leader's speech yesterday. I could not help but notice that while the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was speaking half the government benches were empty. Then the government whip, the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay), was good enough in the performance of his duty to go out and bring a few stragglers in so the government benches were at least two thirds full by the time the Prime Minister was finished.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): You certainly don't have much of an audience, do you?

An hon. Member: You are here, Joe.

Mr. Friesen: I was pleased to hear the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport on one of the Vancouver hotline shows about two weeks ago. I was very pleased to hear her, and I hope she appears very often because every time she does she helps the Progressive Conservatives a great deal. At that time she gave her unqualified support to the Prime Minister, and is therefore among the elite of Canada as there are fewer and fewer of those people left. I should like to point out to her the kind of leadership she supports when she supports him.

Let me refer to the Prime Minister's speech of yesterday, specifically to his words as reported at page 30 of Hansard. This is the kind of logic for which he is well known. He was referring to food prices when he said:

> Some have calculated that 60 per cent of the retail price, more or less, is not made up of the price at the farm-gate but of the price of those after-operations, processing, distributing, and so on.

Now get these golden words:

> That is why our prices are rising so much more slowly than in the United States, at a time when both countries are experiencing a similar deceleration in farm-gate prices because of excess supply.

Even the Prime Minister knows that the average hourly wage rate in Canada today is higher than that in the United States, and knows also that productivity costs per unit today are higher in Canada than in the United States. How in the name of logic can he say that prices are climbing more slowly in Canada than in the United States?

I know the Prime Minister is not given to grocery shopping and that the taxpayer pays for all his groceries, but there are many housewives in the lower mainland of British Columbia who would like to take him shopping for a few days—perhaps not by the hand, but rather by the ear. He seems to forget that we are losing $5 million each month because shoppers in the lower mainland of British Columbia travel into Washington State to buy groceries cheaper than they can in Canada. In spite of this the Prime Minister has the unadulterated gall to say prices are climbing less rapidly in Canada than in the United States. I would like him to meet a few of the housewives who do their shopping in British Columbia. He should know, for example, that cookies baked in British Columbia are cheaper in Washington than in B.C.

Mrs. Holt: And we pay our food packers three times as much; come on!

Mr. Friesen: But that is post farm-gate prices.

An hon. Member: Listen to the arguments before you open your mouth.

Mr. Friesen: This is why we are losing markets to the United States and why agricultural products are creating growing inventories in the warehouses of Canadian producers. It will not be long before the farmer in British Columbia is frozen out and our shoppers will be at the mercy of the United States corporate farmers. That is something the Prime Minister is not considering when he makes these bold statements. So much for his credibility regarding those remarks!

Let me make a few comments on the contents of the throne speech which at best can be described as a political survival kit. The Prime Minister is doling out K-rations to his supporters in order that they can stay alive at least until the next election and, hopefully, after it. We, however, hope to lose a few Liberals the next time.

The pablum that was served in that speech was more important in respect of what it did not say than what it did say. For example, the statements regarding the war on the high inflation rate were well taken. This is the number one priority in Canada. While the statements themselves were very innocuous, it is important that we keep that fact in mind. We cannot minimize the anxiety that high unemployment and high inflation create among our people, or the terror they face at the end of each month when they try to pay for their groceries. This war on inflation had better be a real one instead of just shadow boxing.

Even though we might be able to solve all our economic problems in Canada and beat inflation in the very near future, we would still have to face another overriding problem that is perhaps even more serious. I refer to the problem resulting from government officials trying to decide for Canadians what kind of people they ought to be, or ought to become. Broadly speaking the problem results from cultural determinism being forced on us. As an example we have the CRTC—and I know there are other such agencies—which have never had to face the electorate, and its members never have to put their jobs on the line. These officials sit on the 14th floor at 100 Metcalfe Street, Ottawa, deciding what Canadians can watch on television and listen to on radio. This is always done in the name of or in the interest of Canadianism.

I would remind hon. members of one thing common to all governments that believe in strict control, as does this government. They always couch their strict controls in the name of and with the cloak of patriotism. They do it for the good of our country and its culture. This means that those who oppose restrictive policies are unpatriotic and un-Canadian.

I remember watching a news broadcast some years ago coming from across the line. That was something I would not have been able to do had the Maple Leaf curtain been properly draped along the 49th parallel. It was a news report by Huntley-Brinkley in which they referred to the parable of a couple of dogs in Germany.

One dog was from West Germany and the other was from East Germany. The West German dog asked the East German dog why he would want to leave his country. He said he looked well fed and well taken care of, his coat was shiny and he did not appear to be lacking anything. The East German dog said, "I like to bark".

The CRTC wants to tell Canadians how to bark, when to bark, how they ought to listen to the bark, and what the quality of the barking ought to be. But you see the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) is so used to government restrictions that he does not listen any more. He is totally mesmerized by it. The whole Pavlovian theory is working beautifully in his case.

The CRTC bureaucracy with its 700 employees is no longer a regulatory body but rather is a control agency in respect of the Canadian people. It determines what Canadian culture should be. The members of that bureaucracy are the wise ones. No doubt there is a need for supervision, but the main function of the CRTC seems to be to take choices away from the Canadian people. Let me give an illustration by referring to a letter which came to me that was written to the Chairman of the CRTC by someone from Trail. Part of the letter states:

> These new FM regulations caused us to lose our local FM station. Small radio stations in rural areas cannot meet these new regulations, and the public does not want its FM listening pleasure ruined. If you are so intent on Canadian FM, how about getting us in Trail some Canadian FM? Your regulations killed our local FM and CBC took over, only to broadcast CBC-AM on our FM station. For years I have been writing trying to get CBC for Trail. Now we have it—but we lost our local Canadian FM in the process. Is this progress?

There you have an example of CRTC brilliance. I should like to refer to a statement made by a very brilliant and outstanding liberal. I have to go back one hundred years to find one, John Stuart Mill, who said:

> The cultivation of the active facilities by exercise, diffused through the whole community, is in itself one of the most valuable of national possessions.

There you see is the secret. The community does establish these functions and creates these facilities. We do not need these national bodies to tell us how to live and what kind of people we ought to be. We do need a clear service on the network, but we do not have to be told what to read, what to listen to, and what to watch. It is my firm contention—and I know there are people in this House who agree with me—that it is time for the CRTC to go and that we should have a body which is purely regulatory and not an oppressive control body. That is one area that was omitted from the throne speech. I should like to refer to another.

I refer to page six of the throne speech and read these words:

> . . . the government believes most unemployed Canadians would much prefer to secure that income through worth-while work than through public assistance.

I agree, but there is nothing in the throne speech that makes it possible to have the kind of tax relief that would allow private enterprise to expand the way it should if it is to provide these jobs. If Canadians want to work, so do the businessmen. So long as the government continues its oppressive and excessive tax policies, business will be driven out of the country. I have a very active but relatively small business in my riding. That business is now diverting some of its activity to the United States. It is tempted to do this because of the tax policies of this government. It is tempted to make its Canadian operation a warehousing operation because it can operate more profitably in the United States. Effectively we have four levels of government all trying to tax the same person. Because the federal government has the over-all tax power it makes sure it gets its tax first.

There is a new television production company operating in Vancouver which some time ago wanted to bring its equipment across from the United States because it could not get that equipment in Canada. It could do so if it would be willing to pay in advance about $100,000 in federal taxes and customs duties. This is a new Canadian company. Meanwhile an American company could have come in and done the same work for $1,500.

All the while the government talks about wanting Canadian business to be totally and purely Canadian. It wants Canadians to own business, but when Canadians have the opportunity preference is given the foreign operators. Now the government talks about a job-creation program. There is no mention of tax relief for business. The government would rather collect all those excessive taxes, recycle them through the government funnels here in Ottawa and give them out in a job-creation program so that more bureaucrats can get a job, rather than let them work there in the private system which they would have been doing in the first place. This is totally unproductive. That is the second point the throne speech fails to discuss.

The third point is that the throne speech says really nothing about criminal law or correctional philosophy. Canadians are crying out for law and order, but they really want more than that. Every totalitarian government in the world can have law and order. What Canadians are desperately crying for is a balanced perspective in criminal law and correction. Their sense of moral and equitable justice, rather than of technical justice, has been completely raped.

Those of us who live in British Columbia and represent the people there have very fresh memories of the incidents in the B.C. pen. Two residents of my constituency were held hostage during the last incident. Fourteen months ago, in a previous hostage taking, several of my constituents were involved in that one too, so I think I have a right to speak on that particular problem. I do not envy the job of the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) in trying to negotiate with criminals in that kind of situation. But there is something wrong when there are at least eight hostage takings within the one federal penitentiary within an 18-month period. Surely those prisoners have found that there is some kind of a reward bigger than the risk involved in that kind of activity. The balance is all screwed up.

We have a member of the citizens' advisory committee coming into the penitentiary and telling the RCMP how they ought to treat the prisoners. We have the prisoners being served hot meals while the guards on duty have cold lunches. Something is really all screwed up. We have local officials who are deemed by Ottawa not to be smart enough to make decisions in a local emergency and therefore these officials have to funnel all suggested decisions back to Ottawa, with a delay of three or four hours before they can make a decision on the scene. We have a situation in which the federal government leases the most expensive floor space in Vancouver in the Pacific Centre but cannot find the money in order to provide more guards or stop overtime, or to provide the kind of training those guards need. The government says it must exercise austerity. This is the time it picks in which to exercise its austerity. I should like to refer to another aspect of this.

Another constituent of mine, named Marshall Green, was in a predicament a few months ago. He tried to prevent a murder. He states:

> I managed to push the muzzle of the gun downwards before it went off, shattering my left leg at the groin. I then wrestled for possession of the gun with the man who appeared intent of finishing me off. Just as I passed out, witnesses arrived on the scene and disarmed my attacker, Kenneth Earl Marquardte.

● (1720)

> The local RCMP charged Marquardte with attempted murder. He entered no plea when charged, was remanded for psychiatric assessment and was subsequently released on his own recognizance and $5,000 bail. The preliminary hearing was originally set for August 5 and I learned, only after I caused a number of telephone calls to be made in early August, that the hearing had been adjourned.
> I heard nothing further from the Nakusp RCMP or the Crown prosecutor's office in Nelson. On Monday, September 13th, I received a newspaper clipping from the Nelson Daily News which stated that "Kenneth Earl Marquardte, 47, of Nakusp, was sentenced to five weeks in jail to be served on weekends and probation for six months on a charge of wounding with intent . . ."

Mr. Paproski: A psychologist's decision.

Mr. Friesen: He goes on to say:

> When I caused an inquiry to be made of the Crown prosecutor handling the case he confirmed that Mr. Marquardte had pleaded guilty to the charge of "wounding with intent" and that after his counsel had called two character witnesses and read in the psychiatric report, Marquardte was sentenced on September 2nd, 1976, as reported in the newspaper.
> The prosecutor then confirmed that the Crown did not propose to appeal the sentence. The prosecutor went on to explain that I had my civil remedies, which I understand means that I can sue my attacker for damages, or that the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board can settle with me and then sue Mr. Marquardte, if they choose to, under their rights of subrogation.
> My concern is that I have lost my livelihood, have and will suffer terrible pain, will have to undergo extensive surgery at least twice, may loose the use of my leg forever; and my assailant has scarely lost any time away from his job after admitting that he tried to kill me.

Where is our sense of justice? It is not enough to have law and order. What we need is a balance in our approach to justice in our system.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Friesen: Then he goes on to say:

> I must now spend years in civil litigation against my attacker or elect to claim from the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board who can only award a maximum of $15,000. Is that justice?

Is it any wonder that law abiding citizens, peaceful people in our country, are discouraged? I think that the throne speech is woefully lacking in the attention it pays to the needs of the common, ordinary citizens who are entitled to a return to morality and justice, and to a balance in that area. Sooner or later we must come to a time when the criminal has to accept responsibility for the consequences of his behaviour. As I said before, a situation where prisoners get hot lunches and guards get cold lunches is not acceptable.

A fourth and final area to which I should like to address myself is in regard to the lack in the throne speech of any mention of the need for increased medical research. I know there will be others in my party who will address themselves to this matter, but again this is an ominous and condemning example of the scale of values that the government has established for itself: help to criminals, nothing for those who are incapable of helping themselves.

The Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport dwelt on the need for social services, and I agree with this because we do need that kind of help. But she said nothing about the fact that the government has made cutbacks in medical research. I want to refer to some statistics, which admittedly are a number of years old, but that makes it even worse because since that time the government has cut back even more.

I wonder if hon. members are aware of the fact that Canada spends per capita only one sixth of the amount on medical research that the United States does. Canada spends $2.08 per capita and the United States spends $12.91. These statistics relate to the time before the government announced its so called austerity program and before it made cutbacks in funding for medical research several months ago. How much more shameful is the situation today.

I should like to refer hon. members to the statement made a few days ago by the president of the Association for the Mentally Retarded. Here we come to what could be construed as being very crass and cold dollar and cent statistics on the care of the mentally retarded. The president of that association said:

> As an illustration, the lifetime cost of serving one person severely mentally crippled by a preventable condition or cause may be conservatively estimated at $400,000. For instance—

He gives the name of the disease which I cannot even sneeze out, let alone pronounce.

> —phenylketonuria, a condition which produces massive brain damage, is one condition for which research has given us the means of detection and prevention. In a year, screening turns up an average of 20 PKU babies who, untreated, represent a potential lifetime bill to Canada of $8 million for each year's crop.

If you want to look at the crass dollar and cent expenditures you see you find what a foolish way it is to exercise austerity to take away money for medical research which would prevent this kind of expense. But how much more debilitating and soul destroying is the knowledge of all these people who are trying to help those who cannot help themselves, how much more discouraging is it for them to realize that here we have a government which is cutting back on medical research rather than trying to help those people who need help the most. This is the kind of government we have. It is time we had a restoration and a balance, as well as a sense of proportion, in the way in which the government applies its energies to help those who cannot help themselves and make us a kind of people who can face each other with a sense of honour and dignity.

I cannot in all conscience support the motion of the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) and his colleague, as good as their speeches were, and I am happy to support the motion of our leader that we have no confidence in this government.

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a subject with my colleagues in the House which deals with the matter of what we as a parliament can do to control government spending.

In the Speech from the Throne a subject matter was raised which I think is worthy of a rather prolonged debate in the House, that is, a debate between the proponents of a greater involvement of the state in the economy and the opponents of a deeper involvement of the state in the economy. However that debate may proceed, there is no doubt at all that there has been an enormous increase in the spending of the state and that this parliament, through its various committees, is not in a position, in my view, to control this government spending in the way that is expected of it. So the purpose matter of my remarks in the throne speech debate is to raise this issue among us and to make some suggestions of ways in which the government itself might contribute, and ways in which parliament by changing its committee structure might come to a better control of government spending. The stakes are very high, and they are not only in monetary terms.

The size of the public sector today is very large. It is estimated that governments at all three levels spend some 40 per cent or 39 per cent of the incomes in our country. They spend that proportion of the total economic effort registered as the Gross National Product. It may indeed be the view of some, which I do not share, that the public sector may become so large, or is already so large, that it may tend to destroy the very market system it is designed to support and regulate. We noted in the Speech from the Throne that the decision of the government was to proceed down a middle road as between increasing involvement or lesser involvement in the economy. Whether the government is able to proceed down this middle road will depend in some part on how this parliament can control government spending.

The point I am going to make is that we do not now control government spending except in a technical, legal or constitutional sense because, after all, parliament is the sovereign. But as a parliament we do not have the means—and I include hon. members on all sides of this House—to hold any government to the middle road, or to any other road, because we do not have the structures here which would enable us to play that role.

In my view it is urgent that we find new means of controlling government spending so that we can influence the degree of involvement which we feel appropriate for the state in the market economy which we wish to see continued. It is urgent also because there is already such a built-in bias in public expenditure growth that, unless we find better mechanisms, the state will perforce play a much greater role, whether or not it is described as a middle road.

The suggestion I want to make is that the government itself should be publishing annually a white paper giving a five year record of what it has spent, in some detail, and including a five year forecast of what it plans to spend in the coming five years. For example, with the appropriate committee structure we should be able to look in some detail at what happened between 1971 and 1975 and with some considerable detail at what the government plans for the years 1976 to 1980 with respect to expenditures on all programs.

I think that such an annual white paper would put us in a position to grasp the totality of the increase in government spending spread over a period of time, and that it would show the extraordinary rise which has taken place. It would also no doubt show us that there is no real strategy for containment or reduction in the plans for the future. We would at least be in a better position, if we saw those plans, to exercise some judgment and restraint. We cannot exercise that judgment or control if we as a parliament do not have the mechanisms to do so. The case I am putting is that we do not have those mechanisms. I am going to ask also whether we have the will to create them. It is important to do so not just in terms of partisan debate over whether a program should be expanded or not, but, more significantly, whether the market economy will survive the incessant growth of the public sector, a growth which proceeds at rates of increase substantially in excess of the average growth rate of the economy. Therefore unless we find better mechanisms, the public sector will inevitably get larger and larger.

The white paper which I am suggesting on the part of the government—and in a moment I will come to parliament's part as opposed to the government's part—would also put hon. members in a position to tackle in a more effective way the question of wastage in expenditures.

And now what about ourselves as a group of members of parliament as opposed to ministers? I think we ought to admit that the experiment in having standing committees review the estimates is only a limited success. I personally doubt that the standing committee approach is adequate to our needs. I doubt it in part because we fragment our view of government spending when we deal with it by separate departments. For example, there is a group of 20 of us who will be considering the expenditures of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, and another 20 who will be considering the expenditures of the Department of National Health and Welfare. And so it goes. But we do not have any vehicle by which we can look at the totality and the plans, and get an over view, and thus try to find some means of control, which is something more than a recording of what has been happening and a reporting back in a manner that is not really an effective control.

I think we must go beyond the standing committee approach to another device, and the suggestion I make is that we no longer look at the estimates through the various 20 or so standing committees, but that we consider a single expenditure surveillance committee. Perhaps it should be quite large—40 members or so—because its members may have to divide into subcommittees. It seems we should have a single expenditures control committee or surveillance of expenditures committee—or call it what we will—which would examine, as the present standing committees do on a selective basis, some departments where there is special interest, grouped perhaps more into larger categories than presently. However, apart from looking at the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to use the same two examples, it would have as its main function the question of examining the over-all rates of spending, the over-all balances between departments and programs in terms of that five year plan which I have suggested, and in terms of what we on our part feel is appropriate for the dimensions of the public sector within the total economy and in terms of the requirements of a market economy for some control on this really unrestricted growth of the public sector.

The main duty would be to make comparisons, reach a view, and make greater efforts to get at the question of control, which parliament has really lost.

I think one of the questions which is most exercising our constituents today is control of government expenditure, and I do not think we are in a position to respond to them. That puts us in the position where we are going to face increasing cynicism about parliament as an institution. There is no doubt that the public is right, and it is not just because of the restraint program which is currently in operation. It is not just because expenditures have increased. It really is because of the basic issue of what is the role of the state in a market economy. We are not in an adequate position to influence that expect in ineffective debate. We need a mechanism which will help us contribute in terms of control of actual spending.

● (1740)

There is one other point I should like to make with respect to my suggestion for a new committee. It has been discussed recently in the House of Commons Committee on Procedure and Organization, as some hon. members will be aware. This kind of committee would be a counterpart, as it were, to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts which looks at the record after the money has been spent; what we really need now is a similar over-view committee that looks at all the estimates taken together before they have been accepted. The present fragmented approach through the standing committees will not give us sufficient leverage to exercise the parliamentary function of control over spending before they are agreed to in the House.

A further point which is worthy of consideration is whether we ought to have the budget debate much closer in time—perhaps it cannot occur simultaneously with the estimates, but we should be looking at taxation and supply questions as well as spending questions much closer together in time.

I entered this debate on rather short notice, Mr. Speaker. While I feel this is one of the most important questions to which we could turn our minds, I also know that we will have an opportunity soon to look at the recommendations coming from the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. I hope we will give more attention to the matter of a revised committee system, certainly not from the point of view of change for the sake of change but to ensure that we can do our part to keep government on that middle road.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, along with my colleagues in this Chamber I am very pleased to participate in the opening debate of this second session of the Thirtieth Parliament. As a member who came here first in 1974, and having participated in the first session of this parliament which was the longest in the history of our country, I found it rather refreshing to hear the Speech from the Throne on Tuesday of this week. In many ways, even though I am in opposition, I was rather pleased with what I heard.

I think one should bear in mind though that a Speech from the Throne is nothing more than a collection of high-sounding words until the government decides to act or implement it. We should also remember that a good many of the promises made in the last Speech from the Throne have not been kept so perhaps I should review a list of those unkept promises.

In the last Speech from the Throne we were promised new consumer credit legislation, including the disclosure by lenders of effective rates of interest on loans; total revision of bankruptcy law to help the consumer debtor; the improvement of urban and inter-city transportation services; legislation to provide for an efficient port system; measures for government intervention in cases where a Canadian company may be prevented by its foreign ownership from fulfilling export orders; revisions to the Public Service Staff Relations Act; human rights legislation; provisions to broadcast the proceedings of the Commons. We see several of these items again in this Speech from the Throne. The government also has not delivered on guarantees for the domestic control of uranium mining. It makes me wonder just how much of this Speech from the Throne will be implemented.

I should like to quote some portions which I find encouraging, and yet which are hard to believe. The speech is reported in Hansard for Tuesday, October 12, and on page 2 there appears the following passage:

> . . . the government will continue to practise fiscal restraint. The control of inflation will remain the single most important condition for economic stability in Canada, even after price and income controls are removed. Determined restraint in fiscal and monetary policy is essential to the long-term control of inflation.

I am puzzled when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) makes the statement that he is going to restrain government spending, and yet when we examine the facts we see that he is not. That is amazing, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister said exactly the opposite in his musings last New Year to what is stated in the throne speech. At that time he said we needed more government intervention in the private sector.

In the New Year's Eve message the Prime Minister stated we were going to have more intervention in the private sector, yet in the Speech from the Throne he states that he would like to leave things more to the private sector. We have seen this flip-flop so often with this Liberal administration, Mr. Speaker. We saw it in 1972 when our party campaigned on certain proposals and was severely criticized for them, yet when this government was in a minority situation it implemented pretty well what we had campaigned on. In 1974 we saw exactly the same thing. As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, I am still optimistic that it will implement certain areas of the Speech from the Throne and I feel that many are noteworthy.

> The government will introduce measures to assist small businesses by improving local access to financial assistance and other services provided by government departments, the Federal Business Development Bank, and financial institutions in the private sector.

The merger of the Unemployment Insurance Commission with the Department of Manpower and Immigration is also proposed. This is a measure which my good friend, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) has advocated many times in this House. Moves are proposed in the area of labour-management relations. I think this is important and I hope some proposals are forthcoming. One only meeds to look around at the difficulties experienced on the labour- management scene today, such as the day of protest organized by the Canadian Labour Congress. Also mentioned is the National Transportation Act. We have been promised amendments to this act before, but to date no concrete steps have been taken to improve it.

One thing that is noteworthy is the absence of specific programs in an area that perhaps concerns the Canadian population more than any other, and that is the matter of criminal law or correctional philosophy.

There was no mention whatsoever of the constitution in the Speech from the Throne. We have seen how significant the constitutional debate is to the governing party with the resignation of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson).

As I have said on several occasions, Mr. Speaker, the purpose of politics is not to justify our own existence but rather it is to dedicate ourselves to the welfare of our country and its population. As my leader and others participating in this debate said so well, it appears that the government is concerned strictly with the winning of elections. There is a limit to the power of governments; they cannot solve all our problems. Therefore we must, as individuals concerned about the welfare of our country, strive to make this a better country for all our citizens, but I seriously question whether this government is doing that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, would the House be willing to call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the House agree to calling it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the speech that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) made earlier today, he made one statement which I thought was very important. As I took it down, these were his words: "This government has no intention of participating in or permitting a dismantling of the socially progressive society Canadians have built in this country." I regard that as a noble sentiment. It is one to which I hope we can hold this government.

It is true that during the last half century Canadians have managed to build a socially progressive society. At least we have moved in that direction. Most of it has come about since the end of World War I. Indeed, the greater part of it has come about since the experience this country had in the 1930's.

I may also say, as everyone knows, that most of it has been in the form of legislation we have won because of the prodding of those who have sat in this House under the leadership of the late J. S. Woodsworth, the late M. J. Coldwell, the present member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), David Lewis, and our present leader, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). It is true that governments of other parties have put the social legislation on the statute books, but what a struggle it has been to pry it out of them. However, now that we have it I am glad that this government states categorically that it does not want to participate in the dismantling of our socially progressive society.

None of us imagines that the government would actually dismantle that society by taking it apart or by abolishing some of the social legislation that has been passed. However, the main point I want to make in my remarks tonight is that the progress we have gained can be lost if it is not kept up to date. If the social legislation that is on our books is treated with indifference, treated as though we have achieved the last word and have nothing more to do, the value of that legislation can be whittled away just as much as if it were actually dismantled.

My plea tonight is that this government not forget its responsibility to make improvements in the pieces of social legislation that we have on the statute books of Canada.

I have quite a number of things that I want to mention, so I will have to speak briefly about each of them. I suppose in effect what I am doing is indicating the things that I think ought to have been in the Speech from the Throne. If these things had been in the Speech from the Throne, it would have been a much brighter, more hopeful document than the one that was read to us a couple of days ago.

First, despite the fact that the Old Age Security pension is ever so much more in dollars today than it was when it was started back in the middle 1920's, most of our senior citizens 65 years of age and over are having a difficult time to get by. Even with the supplements they get in one form or another, in a society in which the cost of living is rising, and in which the standard of living is improving, thus creating a different milieu in which these people are living, they are finding it difficult to get by on the amount they receive.

In my view there ought to have been in the Speech from the Throne a commitment to increase the basic amount that is paid under the Old Age Security Act. That basic amount at the present time is $100 as specified in the act, plus the escalation that has taken place, which brings it during the present quarter to $139.39 a month. In my view that amount ought to be greatly increased. As a matter of fact, in light of today's cost of living and in light of our responsibility to our older people, it ought to be as high as $250 or $300 a month. But I suppose it is just as unrealistic to expect that substantial an increase all at once as it was when I argued that it ought to be $50 when it was only $30. However, we should be moving in that direction. What we should have before parliament at the present time is a proposal for a substantial increase in the amount of that pension.

At the same time, Mr. Speaker, I insist that the time has come for a lowering of the eligible age, certainly for all those who are out of the labour market. The spouses' pension that was introduced in June of last year recognizes that there are people between 60 and 65 who should be given a pension under the Old Age Security Act, but that is all that can be said for it. The means test on that spouses' allowance, and the fact that it is payable only to a person between 60 and 65 years of age married to and living with an older spouse, cut out widows, spinsters, widowers, bachelors—a great many thousands of people in that age bracket who are just as much in need of pension income as those who happen to meet the conditions of that provision. This, of course, would be taken care of if my proposal were accepted, namely, that all persons between the ages of 60 and 65 who are out of the labour market should be entitled to receive the basic old age security pension and the guaranteed income supplement as well. So I put that down as an item that is missing from the Speech from the Throne but which ought to be there.

While I am talking about old age pensions—and the same point applies to the rest of the pensions—I suggest the time has also come for a revision of the formula under which escalation takes place. Members on the government side frequently get up, as did the Minister of State responsible for fitness and amateur sport (Mrs. Campagnolo) this afternoon, and tell us that the government has provided escalation that enables pensioners to keep up with the rising cost of living. It does no such thing; they are always behind. The consumer price index measures price increases in a general way and does not necessarily cover the things our elderly people actually have to buy. Whether it is quarterly or annual, it is always three or four months, eight or ten months, or even a year or more behind.

I contend that the escalation formula should be put on a current basis so that in any quarter recipients of old age security or other pensions receive an escalation that will enable them to meet the rising cost of commodities in that very quarter. That is at the top of my list in the Speech from the Throne, Mr. Speaker. These substantial improvements in the Old Age Security Act ought to be in that speech.

I call also for significant improvements in the Canada Pension Plan. There were doubts about this plan in some quarters when it was brought in, but it has proven to be a very successful piece of social legislation, so successful in fact that some of us think it should be greatly improved. The main improvement that in my view should be made is that the plan should be amended so that the pension that one receives on retirement is more than the present 25 per cent of one's average earnings over the prescribed period. There are those who have advocated that it should be as high as 75 per cent, but certainly we should move to 40 per cent or 50 per cent very soon.

There are two or three other aspects that ought to be improved. The requirement that a contributor be in the plan for three years before there is a survivor's benefit, or for five years before there is a disability benefit, does not correspond to ordinary insurance practices, and I think those provisions should be changed.

Tonight I wish to emphasize in particular that the two changes that the Minister of State referred to this afternoon, although they go in the right direction, do not begin to provide equality for women under the provisions of the Canada Pension Plan. Let me examine the two things that are being done, as outlined quite correctly this afternoon by the minister. First, there will be a provision that when marital breakdown takes place, whether divorce or separation, the total assets, whether there is one contributor or two, will be divided between the two partners fifty-fifty. But there is no improvement in the total situation of the two spouses; it is a case of splitting assets, and you only get a so-called advantage if you have a marriage breakdown.

The other provision that was announced this afternoon—at least, spelled out this afternoon; it has already been announced—is one regarding women who are in the work force and therefore contributors to the Canada Pension Plan, who take a few years off to stay in the home to raise their children, and who then subsequently go back into the work force. They will be permitted to drop out from the computation of their pension benefit those years that they spent at home.

That is fine, Sir, but what about the wives who have spent the whole of their married lives at home raising the children, looking after their children and their husband, playing their part in the life and work of that couple or family? There is nothing for them at all. They are not contributors so therefore do not get an advantage. The fine principles which were referred to by the Minister of State will not be realized until there is full equality. I realize she referred to the fact that there is equality at death: when a female contributor dies, she can leave the same benefit to her surviving widower that a male contributor can leave to his surviving widow.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): That is equality.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is equality that you get at death. You also get equality in terms of a fifty-fifty split in your marriage breaks down, and you get some consideration if you have been in the labour force, stayed out for a while to raise children, and then you return. But if you are an ordinary spouse at home the whole of your married life there is not one cent of benefit for you.

I contend that that is falling far short of equality between men and women. I noticed the other day that the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni) asked the minister whether the references in the throne speech to pension improvements meant that housewives were now in the Canada Pension Plan. The very guarded answer that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) gave made it clear that they are not.

I know a little about the Canada Pension Plan. It is a wage related scheme, and there are technical difficulties working it out and so on. But we will not have done the fair thing and established the kind of equality that we talk about until there is for homemaker spouses, in one way or another, the same pension benefits that there are for women, spouses or single, who are out in the labour market. This is extremely important, and I hope in this session when we deal with human rights legislation and have more amd more said about equality between men and women that this will be done. It should have been included in the throne speech itself.

I am also sorry that there is no reference to the position of the blind and disabled. It used to be that every time we made improvements for other categories, their position was improved as well. But since we have got into old age security, the Canada Assistance Plan, into services and so on, there does not seem to be special consideration for the blind and disabled. I appreciate the fact that there is to be a social services act before us in this session and it may be that under it, with the co-operation of the provinces, something more will be done for all persons who need assistance. However, I am sorry we have reached the point where the blind and disabled do not get the special attention that I think they deserve.

I move on to list two or three more things that I feel should have been in the Speech from the Throne. One of them has to do with the position of retired civil servants, and I couple with them retired Royal Canadian Mounted Police personnel and retired Canadian Armed Forces personnel. Generally speaking, the pension plans respecting these groups have been greatly improved, but there are two or three pieces of unfinished business that some of us thought we were going to get resolved during the last session, especially when we were dealing with these matters before the special joint committee on employer-employee relations in the public service. However, in the end we lost out. It is most unfair that some persons who worked for the government in one way or another can get the escalation in their pensions prior to age 60 while others cannot. Those who feel this discrimination the most are retired RCMP personnel and retired members of the Canadian Armed Forces. That is a point I hope will be looked at more seriously during this session than was the case during the one that finished a couple of days ago.

I also press the point which again we thought we were going to have dealt with during the last session, and that is the position of the widows of any members of these groups, retired public servants, retired RCMP personnel or retired armed forces personnel, where the marriage took place after the contributor had gone on pension. In these days it can happen that the second marriage may last longer than the first one, yet we have this rule that denies to a widow in such cases the right to a pension when the husband dies. We had representations from delegations here during the last session who made the point extremely well and we were given the impression that the government was sympathetic, but in the end nothing was done to right this wrong.

Those are points that ought to be taken care of and there are others that affect retired public servants, retired RCMP and Canadian Armed Forces personnel, but I put these two points before the House with particular emphasis. I suggest there ought to have been references to them in the Speech from the Throne and I hope something will be done about them during the course of this session.

As I speak about these groups of retired persons I mention in particular the matter of escalation. Let me say that one of the most significant reforms we have won around here in recent years was the provision for the escalation in pensions at least in keeping with the rise in the cost of living. When we applied it to old age security we had to go on and apply it to retired public servants and all other groups, including those who draw war veterans' pensions and allowances. I deplore the kind of attack that occurs in some of the financial papers in this country against this principle of escalation. Usually the line is that others do not get it, so why should these groups get it? The answer to that is that all groups should get it. What we have started by way of providing escalation to old age pensions, pensions of retired public servants and others who work for the government, should be extended to apply to all pensions in both the public and private sectors.

Another area in respect of pensions which has concerned me all the years I have been in this place and which I think should have been in the Speech from the Throne has to do with pensions of retired railway workers. It is now over two years since Dr. Noel Hall was commissioned to study and report on all railway pensions in Canada. I suppose the number of questions I have asked the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) about that report, such as when were we going to get it, is legion. I understand he does now have the report, that it is being translated, and that sometime fairly soon it will be tabled. I understand also it will be printed in large enough quantities so that all those who are interested will be able to get copies of this important report. The next step will be to implement the recommendations I am sure that report will contain.

I cannot imagine that Dr. Noel Hall could have spent two years examining the pension situation so far as railway workers in this country are concerned without coming up with recommendations that call for improvements. Many railway pensioners have died in the two years he spent carrying out the study. Let us not take two, five or ten years to make the improvements he will probably be recommending. We call for action soon, not just by the publicly owned Canadian National but by the privately owned Canadian Pacific as well.

As I say, that is another of the items I think should have been in the Speech from the Throne. I have already made the point that if the things I have been lining up for a throne speech had been there it would have been a much better document than the one read to us in the other place a couple of days ago.

I come to the last of the items I wish to mention and these have to do with veterans. First I should like to commend the Royal Canadian Legion on "Operation Service", a program or project the Legion has in effect right now under which it is trying to locate veterans, or their widows or survivors, who may not have known the benefits that were available to them, in the hope that they can now apply for and obtain those benefits. I am glad to see the publicity that has been given to this project, not only by the Legion itself but by others. I hope it will result in many cases of veterans or their survivors obtaining the benefits which are available to them but about which they have not known.

I am happy to say there have been improvements. The present Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) has given us good leadership in this area and has fought hard for veterans in the Cabinet and we like what he has done. The fact is that this far away from the wars, and in a time of restraint, to get anything done for veterans is significant. We are glad that improvements have been made. But even in the last session when we were making the improvements involved in the bill that dealt with pensions for prisoners of war the government overlooked two or three things we had recommended, and I should like to put them in my proposals for a more adequate Speech from the Throne.

First of all, when we provided pensions for those who were prisoners of war we provided them only for those who were prisoners during World War II. We covered those in Hong Kong and in Europe, but there are still around aged veterans who served in World War I, who were prisoners of war and had horrifying experiences, yet they are not covered. The number of dollars it would cost to provide pensions for the few of them around would be almost nothing. To have overlooked them I think was a disgrace, and I hope we may yet cover that inadequacy.

The government also erred, the committee did not, last session in not including pensions for those who were escapers or evaders. The prisoner of war compensation goes only to those who were actually in the prison camps, but there are others, at least one of whom is a member of this House, who spent months in Europe afraid for their lives as escapers or evaders, and it seems to me they should not be overlooked. I should like to see them included.

A very important recommendation was contained in the report of Dr. Hermann, and that had to do with widows of veterans on disability pensions. It was the same recommendation that Mr. Justice Mervyn Woods made when he gave us the Woods report several years ago.

As matters stand, if a war veteran is on a disability pension of 48 per cent or more and dies, his widow gets the full widow's pension, but if the veteran's disability pension is less than 48 per cent she gets zero—no pension at all. Mr. Justice Woods recommended, as did Dr. Hermann, that there should at least be pro rated pensions for such widows. Two or three times in the parliament before last, in the last one and in this one, the standing committee has recommended that this change be made, but the government turned us down. This ought to have been included in this Speech from the Throne. I hope it will be considered during the course of this session.

The other point I wish to make is that in terms of veterans' affairs some very real improvements should now be made in the War Veterans Allowance Act. It has been a good piece of legislation and has filled the bill in many cases where the Pension Act which provides war disability pensions did not, but it seems to me that this long after the wars we have had, at this stage when our veterans from those wars are getting into the upper years so far as age is concerned, we should move more in the direction of a guaranteed annual income for those veterans. I want a guaranteed annual income across the board. I hope we move in that direction and I hope the discussions between the federal government and the provinces produce something along that line soon—soon, please. But if it is going to take time to do this for the whole population at least we can start with an adequate and guaranteed annual income for war veterans, and this could be done under the aegis of the War Veterans Allowance Act.

Mr. Speaker, I agree with the Minister of Finance in what he said this afternoon, that there should be no dismantling of the socially progressive society Canadians have built in this country. But that means more than just not taking destructive steps. It also means we must keep all these measures up to date. Therefore, I contend that the things that I have talked about tonight, such as improving old age security, the Canada Pension Plan, pensions for retired civil servants, pensions for RCMP and Canadian Armed Forces personnel, for retired railway workers and certainly for veterans and their survivors, are things which ought to have been in this year's Speech from the Throne. If they had been it would be a much better speech than the one that is before us.

Mr. Art Lee (Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, it is always indeed a pleasure and honour to follow the last hon. member who just spoke very ably on the Speech from the Throne. As a member who had the honour and distinction of seconding the motion in reply to the Speech from the Throne in the first session of this parliament I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail), and the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance), for their excellent speeches the other day. I should also like to congratulate all the new ministers on their appointments, particularly the new Solicitor General (Mr. Fox). He is certainly handling a difficult situation in the British Columbia Penitentiary very ably, and I look forward to working with him as his parliamentary secretary.

I rise to enter this debate to express to the people of my great riding of Vancouver East and my province how I feel the Speech from the Throne will better their lives. I do so not only as a British Columbian but as a westerner. What is a westerner?

In my speech during the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne in October, 1974, I attempted to define a westerner as follows:

> It is true that Canada is made up of many diversified regions and economies. It is equally true that western Canada in its make-up is not homogeneous but is, in reality, very heterogeneous. There are, however, some regional traits common to British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba.
> First, industries in western Canada are predominately resource-oriented. Second, westerners are individualists; each of us has a feeling that we can make our own way and direct our own life. Third, westerners judge a person for what he or she is, and not so much on the basis of where he or she comes from. Fourth, westerners take great pride in our earnest hopes for a unified Canada based on the diversity of our ethnic origins.

An hon. Member: I think you got that from Chatelaine.

Mr. Lee: No; it is from my speech during the last session. Because of these regional traits we feel that the west is unique. We are more confident. We are more optimistic. We are more outward looking. Economically most of us westerners believe in the free enterprise system and undoubtedly welcome decentralization of decision-making, especially decision-making on the federal scene. That is why I, as a westerner, am gratified to see this government outlining a legislative program that strengthens the faith in the individual and strengthens the capacity of the market system. Among other things, the encouragement to small business, and the Human Rights Act are welcome words to westerners.

What does the west want?

An hon. Member: They do not want Liberals.

Mr. Nystrom: James Richardson.

Mr. Lee: We want to do our own thing. We want to shape our destiny in Confederation. One thing which we westerners want is an atmosphere in which individual enterprise and the market economy can thrive. I shall not reiterate the reasons and the encouraging results of the government's control program, for others have done so. I would, however, like to say a word about the day of protest.

An hon. Member: Lang and Goodale have got to go.

Mr. Fraser: What do you have in common with Goodale?

Mr. Lee: An extreme amount. He is a westerner as well.

The labour movement has held a day of protest against the anti-inflation program. The methods used by some of the trade union leadership in seeking the support of their rank and file membership have unquestionably cast a shadow upon their credibility and, more important, have left many of their rank and file with doubt that their leadership believes in the protection of one of the hallmarks of our great democracy, namely, the freedom to dissent.

A peaceful protest is a part of a democratic tradition, and I support the right of any and all Canadians to make representations to the government or to criticize governmental policy at any time. But from my point of view the trade union leadership has not made the right decision on the anti-inflation program. The program to restrain prices and wages was the government's response to a world inflationary trend which, in Canada's case, was combined with an unacceptably high level of employment. For some weeks before the program was introduced public opinion polls showed that the majority of Canadians wanted the government to do something to stop inflation and turn it back.

This time last year an inflation rate of more than 10 per cent a year was making it very difficult, if not impossible, for ordinary Canadians to make ends meet. Fear of still higher prices was causing trade unions to ask for wage increases of 20 to 25 per cent or more in a one-year contract. Companies were unable to predict their costs even three months ahead and they were forced to make their prices subject to revision without notice.

Nobody likes controls. I don't like them. The government does not like them. We would all like to get out of controls as soon as possible. Critics of the program are insisting that the government get out of the program now. But this is not what the majority of Canadians want. The polls show Canadians have some reservations about some aspects of the program, but they want the restraints to continue, at least for a temporary period.

Since the program came into effect we have made some encouraging improvements in price levels. Prices are still going up, but not as fast as a year ago, and remember it is a control program, not a freeze. In September the rate of increase in the consumer price index was 6.5 per cent over September 1975. This compares with a rate of 10.6 per cent a year ago.

On the wages and salary side, the Anti-Inflation Board is approving increases that average between 11 and 12 per cent for 1975-76. It is quite obvious that workers are now keeping ahead of inflation, whereas a year ago wages were falling behind price increases. On average, workers are 4 per cent better off in real take-home dollars, not inflated dollars, than they were a year ago.

I hope that labour's day of protest did not involve any breaches of the law. We all recognize the right of citizens to protest against government policy, but a general strike could breach collective agreements and therefore could be illegal. The labour movement has a vested interest in maintaining its collective agreements.

Following the day of protest I urge trade union members to get behind the program and help us reach to our goal sooner. I also urge them to tell their leadership to accept the invitation of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to continue the consultation meetings which were started last June. The door is still open.

Another thing we westerners want is a unified Canada based on the diversity of our ethnic origins. We westerners regret the resignation of the former minister of national defence, one of our spokesmen in government. Although I respect his decision, I believe it was premature. The discussions and negotiations between the federal government and the provincial governments regarding the patriation of the constitution have not been concluded. Unfortunately I feel that his resignation has again crystallized the issue of billingualism.

As a Canadian of Chinese ancestry, who has unfortunately lost most of the use of the Chinese language, I can understand and sympathize with those who wish to preserve the French language in Canada. This worth-while and earnest attempt to preserve and foster the French language is not an easy goal to obtain. The government has recognized this in the Speech from the Throne by placing more emphasis on teaching French in the schools.

Certainly it is difficult being a western representative. Often when I travel in western Canada I hear words such as these, "You should be ashamed of yourself, selling out western Canada to Quebec—let them separate". I can assure my fellow westerners that it is equally difficult being a representative from Quebec. My colleagues from Quebec, I am sure, often hear words such as, "What are you doing there in Ottawa selling out our interests to English speaking Canada? Let us separate".

Canadians in the past have faced, and undoubtedly in the future will face, these emotional questions. As a westerner I am confident that we will respond positively because we westerners take great pride in our earnest hopes for a unified Canada based on the diversity of our ethnic origins.

I wish to touch on another thing that we westerners want. We westerners want freer trade. First, let me lay a myth to rest. Let us consider the Canadian tariff. Protectionism costs Canadians money—Canadians from coast to coast. Beat protectionism down and everyone will benefit, easterners and westerners alike. We are all consumers whether we live west of the Rockies or east of the Ottawa river. Do away with import duties and we will all be better off from an economic point of view.

What then is the present political climate for this long standing dream which we westerners have? Trade policy, or to use the term that economists prefer, commercial policy, is a matter of the highest importance. In fact it relates to a subject that is centuries old. But the fact remains that it is more important today than ever to determine whether we are to establish our policy by basing ourselves on the past or by looking toward the future. The problem was most recently brought up very forcefully in a report of the Economic Council of Canada in a document entitled "Looking Outward" which deserves very special attention.

Essentially the Economic Council of Canada's report suggests that Canada adopt a new commercial policy. This policy would be one that has always been advocated by westerners, namely, freer trade. The logic of those who drew up the report lead them to say freer trade would mean greater producer specialization, production spread over a longer period of time, and lower costs. As for the consumer, he or she would benefit from a movement toward freer trade in that prices would be reduced both for imported products and for products manufactured in Canada, while at the same time he would have the advantage of the wider choice of goods to purchase.

What is of equal, if not even of greater importance, is that the council maintains that unless we adopt a freer commercial policy, our relative position internationally will continue to deteriorate. Already it can be observed that during the past few years Canada has gone from our traditional second to eighth place in terms of our standard of living. Although I realize that such international comparisons of standards of living are subject to technical criticism, the fact remains that such a relative decline gives food for thought. I believe that Canada should adopt a gradual policy which works towards freer trade.

I believe that the conclusions of the Economic Council of Canada on this subject are correct and therefore should have generated a much wider national debate than they have before. We must debate openly and candidly what our intentions should be as regards the future of our commercial and industrial policy. The issue is not a partisan one, it should not be a regional one, and it must be addressed soon. It must concern labour as well as management. Long after our price and income controls are finished and forgotten, the consequences of the policy decisions taken over the next few years will affect the lives and livelihood of Canadians well into the 1990's.

I am concerned that to date the report has generated so little discussion. I must say that whatever discussions have taken place have left me somewhat disappointed by their superficial and, let's say the word, frequently too nationalistic character.

I take the liberty of emphasizing the fact that we must not confuse our more emotional short-term feelings with a rational analysis of what could be beneficial for all the provinces of this country over a long period of time. The 23 recommendations made by the Economic Council of Canada illustrate clearly the exhaustive and practical nature of its analysis of Canadian commercial and industrial policy. Oriented toward the reduction or abolition of tariff and non-tariff barriers to international trade over a period of time, they do not neglect various matters connected with foreign investment and the operation of multinational companies. Moreover, the council looks at and recognizes the problems related to economic dislocation, the adjustment process, and the additional administrative requirements.

I want to reiterate that my primary objective and hope as a westerner are to generate a much more vigorous and positive debate on the whole body of problems posed by the report of the council. That report must absolutely be given every consideration, and I encourage the government to do so.

Perhaps it would be a good idea at this point to summarize the basic advantages that greater freedom of international trade would have for Canada. Forecasts for economic gain from the elimination of tariffs are from 5 per cent to 10 per cent of the Gross National Product. As regards producers, Canadian corporations would benefit from the specialization which would be brought about by increased access to foreign sources of raw materials and to foreign markets.

This would enable them to use their capital more effectively by channelling it into activities where there was higher productivity, and by reducing under utilization. In the same way, workers could benefit from better paid jobs since their productivity would be higher. It is believed that Canada will have to face a probable shortage of workers during this decade. Consequently, according to the council, possible unemployment should not be a major obstacle to the enactment of its recommendations.

The advantages Canadian consumers could draw from a liberalization of trade are evident. The effect of the reduction or abolition of import duties on goods entering Canada would be to reduce or even eliminate some hidden subsidies presently paid by consumers. Even if this means only a few cents here and there, over-all import tariffs represent quite a heavy price to pay for the maintenance of often short term production opportunities in Canada. As a secondary consequence greater interdependence between nations through liberalization of trade should dampen domestic inflationary pressures, a result which must also be considered beneficial to consumers, particularly those people on fixed incomes.

The recommendations of the council are therefore aimed essentially at the liberalization of Canada's international trade with other countries on as broad a basis as possible. Thus the council feels we should do everything in our power to lower both our own barriers to trade and those of other countries by seeking to form free trade associations with other countries, for example, with the United States, the European Community, and Japan.

I repeat that I am here as an advocate of freer trade, but one who realizes the issues are complex and there are no easy solutions. I do feel, however, that the council's report is a serious effort to deal in a practical fashion with a body of economic problems which Canada will have to face in the coming years.

Aside from the more or less traditional arguments that I have cited about basing international trade on the most productive industrial sectors of a country, the economic council also emphasizes the appearance on the scene of other international forces which indicate that trade liberalization offers a more advantageous future for Canada.

Among the trends that have developed during these last decades, one of the most significant is without doubt the creation of integrated international economic systems. While 20 years ago there were more than 20 developed countries in the non-Communist world, each having an essentially separate economy, today we are confronted with the economic superpowers, namely, the United States, the European Economic Community, and Japan. The other economic entities seem very small by comparison with this trio of giants. The thrust of expansion in these affluent economies is generally orientated toward industrial activities requiring advanced technology and intensive utilization of intellectual resources. In the manufacturing sector, at any rate, the key to efficiency is modern organization of production, that is, large-scale production necessitating a vast industrial infrastructure and a very high degree of product specialization.

Mr. Oberle: Is this still the west you are talking about, Art?

Mr. Lee: Yes, it is something I hope your party stands for as well, freer trade.

The emergence of a certain number of new "Japans" is a phenomenon of equal importance. These are developing countries—Taiwan and Singapore, for example—which show great ability to produce technologically uncomplicated goods such as those Japan manufactured before the Second World War. And as was the case in Japan in that era, the wages paid by industries in those countries are relatively low, labour is industrious, their machinery is advanced technologically, and hence their products are quite inexpensive.

These countries export a large part of their production to the richer, more industrial countries such as Canada, where they easily compete with comparable, although more expensive, local products.

These changes in the international economy are of particular importance for a country such as Canada, for while we are an economically advanced state, the size of our internal market is too small to enable us to increase adequately our level of efficiency through mass production and specialization in our manufacturing sector. This situation limits our ability to compete with the production of the major industrial nations and the newly industrialized areas of the Third World. This is increasingly the case not only in foreign markets but also even within Canada. Moreover, it tends to prevent Canadian industries from undertaking the development of technological innovations which could make up for the disadvantages stemming from high unit costs.

Canada is thus caught in a vise between industrialized countries and developing countries. As time goes on this pressure on Canadian industry will continue to get more intense.

[Mr. Lee.]

The practical character of the council's recommendations therefore is underlined by the emphasis placed on the need to establish an over-all major program of industrial readjustment with high employment, of which the costs would be a matter of community rather than individual responsibility. As hon. members can see, this is the only equitable course, insofar as Canadian society as a whole is concerned, which will reap the benefits of trade liberalization.

The practical nature of the council's recommendations is also reflected in recognition of the fact that it will be extremely difficult for Canada to gain increased access to foreign markets. Although since the Second World War there has been a notable drop in the customs duties charged by the industrialized countries, particularly from the prohibitive levels they had reached in the 1930's, there has been observable for some time an appreciable multiplication of the non-customs barriers which have the impact of restraining foreign competition. Not only will these non-customs barriers be more difficult to remove, since it is easy to justify them for reasons such as, for example, national security or fraud protection requirements or dangers to health and safety, but the mere detection and defining of these barriers pose numerous problems which must be overcome if trade liberalization is to have any real meaning. In short, our country must be prepared to make concessions in some important areas of domestic policy in order to remove obstacles to our exports.

Nevertheless, the most relevant argument advanced by the Economic Council in support of its recommendations is precisely one which I mentioned earlier, namely—according to some statistics—the drop from second to eighth position internationally in Canadian income per capita, since the Second World War. If at least some of the changes advocated by the council are not made in the commercial and industrial policy of Canada, low productivity levels could remain a problem for our country, and its international position or the real income per inhabitant could continue to fall relatively in the 1980's and 1990's. The question is whether Canadians are prepared to accept this to protect the status quo.

If the answer is affirmative, then they need not heed the recommendations of the Economic Council. But if the answer is negative, then they will at least have to examine carefully and discuss the matters raised by the council.

In conclusion, I strongly feel, as a westerner, that there should be a much more vigorous debate on the Economic Council's report on commercial and industrial policy. If I have encouraged the government to read this report, which will not grow stale over time, and to think about it in the months to come, I shall have attained my goal. Thank you for your attention.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I take pride in rising to speak so early in the debate on the Speech from the Throne in this second session of the Thirtieth Parliament. It is also interesting to follow the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who spoke a few moments ago on the need for increased pensions. It almost makes one wonder whether he ought not to have been declared to have a conflict of interest for the stand he took.

I was amused, though, at the rather latex imagination displayed in the interpretation of the Speech from the Throne made by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Lee). I could commend the hon. member, however, for some of the other thoughts he expressed. The only sad thing is that those thoughts were not expressed in the Speech from the Throne nor was there any indication that they might be used in forthcoming legislation.

A careful reading of the Speech from the Throne indicates that it must have taken a search of two volumes of the thesaurus to find a definition of the world "hollow"; I am sure this is the only Speech from the Throne that will echo when we drop it.

The Liberal party told Canadians in 1974 that the issue was leadership. I think there was nothing in this country's history as important as October 12 to demonstrate that that is a fact. That is probably the only true statement they made in the 1974 leadership campaign.

There was one omission from the speech that I think was obvious to every Canadian. If we recall for a moment the first session of the Thirtieth Parliament we remember that two of the important thrusts at that time were the abolition of capital punishment through Bill C-84, and the accompanying Bill C-83, the act to tighten up security in this country. Virtually every Canadian recognized that Bill-83 was simply a cosmetic measure to try to get the capital punishment bill through this House.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that our prisons have been getting very drafty lately; people are going in and out of prison just like they go in and out of the theatre. It was a natural follow-up to the last session that there be something in this Speech from the Throne about law and order. The problem has been documented by recent events, particularly in the federal prisons and most particularly the prison in New Westminster, British Columbia.

There is in Canada today what we would have to call a law and order crisis. If we were really to talk about security in this country under a Liberal government, we would conclude that we would have greater security if the citizens were locked up and the prisoners let go free.

Bill C-83 introduced in the last session of this parliament was in truth nothing more than a gimmick to get Bill C-84 through the House. That has been proven by the fact that in the Speech from the Throne there was no further thrust toward peace and security in this society. This flies in the face of some very devastating facts, and we note that the gun control legislation was really a fly coil collection of concepts jumbled together in a manner that in no way linked one to the other. It was put before the House, and dragged on for months on end simply because the government had not made a sincere or earnest attempt to do something about law and order.

I think it is time we looked at some of the facts relating to peace and security in this country to see exactly what is happening. In a recent 12-month period four prison employees have been killed; since 1970 60 prisoners have committed suicide, 14 inmates have been slain, and a much larger number were bludgeoned, beaten or stabbed. In the last ten years there has been a 90 per cent increase in violent crimes. Three out of every four prisoners are graduates of the prison system. Prisoners are simply being recycled. We do not have a prison system in Canada; all we do is reintroduce them to their old homes.

Last year we spent $256 million to house some 9,000 men and women in federal penitentiaries, which is three times the amount spent only seven years ago. If the annual prison bill continues to increase at this rate, by 1984 it will be in excess of $1 billion. I think we have to ask ourselves to what extent are we going to provide federal funds, government funds, taxpayers' funds for a prison system that is not working.

There is no doubt when you get well over three-quarters of the prisoners re-entering the prison system, when you get stabbings and killings taking place at the present rate, when the prisoners are becoming the rulers of the prisons, that there was an obvious need for something in the Speech from the Throne that dealt with law and order. That was omitted, and it simply underscores that Bill C-83 was gimmickry when it was introduced in the last session. The government talked about peace and security but it had only one thing in mind, and that was the abolition of capital punishment. It achieved this without giving Canadians an assurance that it would do something about peace and security. I think more Canadians would have accepted the abolition of capital punishment had the government acted in exactly the reverse way—had it done something about peace and security first and then come in with a position on the abolition of capital punishment.

The annual cost of maintaining a prisoner in a maximum security prison is 60 per cent more than the average Canadian industrial worker earns. I think that underscores one of the faulty priorities we are imposing upon our society—when we simply recycle people at a maintenance cost considerably higher than the average Canadian is earning today.

The basic cause of the problems in our prison system is the government's ambivalence and its confused policy on peace and security. The government is in a spin; it is totally unsure of its priorities. It does not know whether a prisoner should be rehabilitated, whether he should be punished, or whether the intent of prisons is to protect the public. On any one of those objectives ministers tinker and experiment at great risk to the public at large. I think we can say with considerable assurance that the government owes it to the Canadian people to come forward with something in a Speech from the Throne that will guarantee to Canadians a sense of security and a feeling of peace.

In this country we have the wrong attitude toward first offenders. Through the judicial system, first offenders today are getting off without any form of punishment whatsoever. In fact once a first offender is released it often happens that he is simply enticed, by the system itself, to repeat the crime.

Anyone who has ever trained a horse or a dog, anyone who has ever worked in the field of child psychology, is well aware that bad behaviourial patterns should not be allowed to be repeated time and time again. There can be no hope of successful rehabilitation that way.

Every farm boy knows that you cannot allow a dog access to the chicken coop all summer long and then in the fall of the year attempt to train him to keep out of it. Our court system today is saying that when a person commits an offence for the first time he should be allowed out on probation or let go free. What I am saying does not necessarily mean of course that every first offender should end up in jail; it just means that every first offender should be given some penalty.

If the government had any imagination it would design a system that would show first offenders that when you do not live within the law you have to face the consequences. I think that concept is missing from our law and order system today. Those who have disobeyed the law and have been the gainers because they disrespected the law obviously will be encouraged to repeat the commission of crimes. One of the most important omissions from the Speech from the Throne is this: the speech says nothing about law and order. That is to say, there is no hint at follow-up legislation to that proposed in the first session of the thirtieth parliament.

May I now deal with another subject of tremendous consequence to Canadians. I submit that misleading information coming from the federal government has caused tremendous damage to some regions of Canada and brought about what some in this country today call the beef crisis. People who talk about this crisis are really talking about the low prices cattlemen are getting for livestock to be sold for slaughter, that is, for beef.

In this country there is not a crisis in the beef marketing system; the crisis has to do with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). What has happened since the minister assumed his responsibilities? Between 1973 and 1974 we heard 29 ad hoc, short-term policy pronouncements affecting the beef industry, the third largest industry of this country. Those 29 ad hoc, short-term pronouncements tended to disrupt the market, alienated our American friends, and put ranchers and cow-calf producers in a net loss position, in that their production costs exceeded income. Sadly lacking is any long-term policy in this field. That is shameful. The meat packing industry is this country's largest food producing industry, and the third largest industry over-all.

Let us consider some data to see how important meat is in the economy. For example, please note that annually some 200,000 freight cars filled with meat products are shipped in this country. The meat industry is, as I said, this country's third largest; it is a $2.5 billion industry which pays $265 million in wages and salaries to employees here. Approximately 275,000 ranchers across Canada supply materials for the meat industry. Interestingly, about 80 per cent of Alberta cattle killed weekly ends up in the Montreal consumer market.

I do not for a moment think that the importation of beef from Oceanian countries, that is, from New Zealand and Australia, an importation which has depressed the meat industry of this country, has come about by accident. It is my firm conviction that our federal government planned such importation in order to keep meat prices down because it wanted to show that its anti-inflation program is working. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) spoke in the Atlantic provinces he repeated, again and again, that the anti-inflation program is working. It was suggested that this is evident because food prices in recent months rose 6 per cent, whereas one year ago they were rising at the rate of 10 per cent. He repeated the same message in southern Ontario. As recently as one or two days he again said, on television, that the anti-inflation program is working because the cost of food is down.

The truth is that the cost of food is not down. One would find, if one itemized all food costs, that the price of all food except pork, poultry, and beef has risen. Consumers have made major savings in beef. In other words the Liberal government, which has most of its support and seats in two provinces of Canada, is saying to the ranchers and producers of Alberta and the other prairie provinces that they are expendable. The government is writing off the prairie provinces. It recognizes that it has no seats from Alberta. It is saying that it does not care about the damage it is doing to the enterprising ranchers of the prairie provinces: they are considered as expendable. Therefore the government intends to import cheap beef from Oceanian countries, beef which is sold at low prices, in order to prove that the anti-inflation program is working. That is an insensitive and callous position. It is wrong to fight inflation on the backs of those who are made the victims of a crisis brought about by the importation of cheap beef to this country. It is wrong in this way to write off certain voters.

Remember, we had a surplus of meat in this country because of the policies this government introduced in the first place. They date back to when the Liberal government introduced the LIFT program, which was designed to encourage farmers to take land out of grain production and seed it to grass. This policy encouraged the production of cattle. I submit that the LIFT program ought to have been called the goof program. That program brought about an increase in the country's cattle population, to the extent that as of February, one year ago, the cow and heifer population of this country had increased 45 per cent over that of one year before. We saw high levels of domestic over-production of beef, and now we see the devastating results of an increase of 139 per cent in beef imported from New Zealand, and of an increase of 10 per cent from Australia. This is wrong. The government is writing off people in regions where it has no political support. Is it any wonder that the government seems to be dividing the country instead of unifying it?

The government's policies are at fault. There is nothing wrong with Canada. I do not take the position that Canada is a country divided by nature. What is wrong is this: the government's policies have pitted one part of the country against another. Putting it another way, the government has tried to trade off the loss of votes from the raw material and producing areas of this country against the gain of votes in the large transportation and population centres, which by their nature contain a larger number of seats and votes.

Let me repeat the importance of the meat industry to Canada. It makes annual sales of about $2.5 billion, is the third largest manufacturing industry of this country, ranks second from the standpoint of materials used, materials worth over $2 billion, spends about $5 million every day on livestock purchases, employs over 31,000 people, and pays $265 million annually in wages and salaries. Further, it contributes over $20 million annually in income taxes, and spends over $13 million annually for fuel and electricity. Yet the government is willing to write off that entire sector of the economy in the prairie provinces and southern British Columbia. It is saying these people are expendable, and it is doing this to prove that its anti-inflation program is working.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Richardson) would probably agree with what the hon. member is saying.

Mr. Malone: I agree. Probably he is in Winnipeg, telling people that he likes some of the things he is hearing from my side of the House.

An hon. Member: Nonsense!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Read the last part of his letter.

Mr. Malone: May I refer to something else, which, ironically, shows what is happening in this country. The Prime Minister has created a new portfolio and appointed a new minister in charge of small business. Who can deny the importance of such a portfolio? Obviously it is important for us to give more attention to small business in this country. But the fact is, as can be documented again and again with good examples, the services and policies of the government are deliberately driving away small business from this country. If there is anything that could underscore that better, it would be a review of what the postal system is doing in relation to small business.

We are getting absolutely terrible service from two major post offices in my home province, namely, Edmonton and Calgary. In one rural post office in my constituency complaints have been received from Medicine Hat, Armstrong, B.C., Salmon Arm, B.C., Kamloops, B.C., Oshawa, Ontario and Edmonton.

One constituent who receives a regular mailing of a weekly paper has kept a record of dates on which he has received it. He received a paper on June 21 that was mailed on June 2, one on June 21 that was mailed on June 9, one on June 30 that was mailed on June 23 and one on August 17 that was mailed July 28.

Letters to the publisher of a local weekly from a disgruntled client states that it takes ten days for the paper to get from Stettler to Medicine Hat by mail, and eight days to Edmonton. The fact is that people can walk to either of those places in half that length of time. That is a literal fact. Virtually anyone, except the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt), could walk from my constituency to Medicine Hat, but it takes ten days to get the mail delivered that distance.

One weekly paper laments that if the poor service continues, in due course it will be out of business. The government has the gall to give us what it calls a minister of small business while at the same time its actions and policies are driving small business out of a profit situation.

There are two or three other things I would like to put on record with regard to the Speech from the Throne. One deals with a request for an investigation into farm implement service. When the harvest season rolls around in the fall of the year, that is the time when grain people make almost all of their annual income. It might be said that a grain farmer can make several hundred dollars an hour during the harvest season. However, during this past harvest season the equipment repair situation was nothing less than atrocious. For example, on a major combine produced and serviced in the prairie provinces, there is a particular "V" belt. If that had broken on a machine this past summer, there was not another one available in any of the three western provinces.

It has also been reported and calculated that in numerous communities there have been waits of over two weeks for replacement parts for farm machinery during the harvest season. That should point out graphically that during the two to three weeks harvesting season, depending on good weather, parts for farm machinery should be available. There should be an investigation into the whole supply and service of the implement situation in this country.

It is incumbent upon the government to cause an investigation and have a hearing in the farm communities so that people involved in farming can voice their concerns and complaints. There should be some rectification of this problem that is causing serious economic concern in the wheat and grain producing areas of the prairie provinces.

It is not right for some people to be able to harvest a bumper crop when, because of a mechanical breakdown and having to wait several weeks for replacement parts, their neighbours must suffer a devastating loss.

I note also from the Speech from the Throne that the government intends to increase the status or importance of the female in society. While I commend and applaud those words, I cannot help but be suspect about their content.

We recently witnessed what was labelled International Women's Year. It was really nothing more than a $3 million campaign of "Why not?" buttons. That is no way to treat women in our society. If we did a study of what has happened to females in this country in terms of improvement of their status since International Women's Year, we would not see any improvement in the hiring rate of women in the public service. There has been no real improvement in terms of legislative action in relation to women. The only thing that would be demonstrated, and demonstrated soon, in terms of women in this country that would help upgrade their status would be an increase in the number of women in the House of Commons.

I wish to give a concrete example. The government should take legislative action in relation to farm wives. Anyone associated with farming or ranching communities is well aware that the farm wife often works just as hard as the farmer. They work side by side. She often drives farm equipment and machinery, trucks grain in the fall of the year, and puts in a 15 to 16 hour a day during spring seeding and fall harvesting. What an insult it must be to that farm wife in April when her husband writes her off in income tax for $1,644. He could hire a man, but he cannot pay his wife. If he did, it would be considered as part of the family income. If the government is sincere about attempting to do something for females in this country, that is one place it could start to do something meaningful.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Malone: In a collection of throne speeches the government has talked about what it is going to do for women. It is high time that the women in this country asked when this action is going to come about. It should again be repeated that the best symbol of what will happen with regard to improvement in the status of women in this country will happen on October 18.

I wish to spend some time discussing another extremely neglected area in terms of the Speech from the Throne. I refer to the government's commitment to do something about the elderly in our society. Being elderly is not treated as a stage in the development of life. In many ways these people are treated as though they were a separate species. They are taken out of the main stream of society, often put into homes or, more often, made to feel as though they are without purpose, without participation, citizens of a different status from others in the adult society.

I cannot think of a more real plight or blight in society than the treatment given to senior citizens in this country. One answer might be to expend more money in terms of pensions. That might help to some degree. However, a government with any imagination would realize that the problems being faced by senior citizens go far beyond the simple financial status. They should be able to participate and have the opportunity to become fully involved in doing something. True, it may be at a slower rate; true, it may not be at the same pace. They are able to participate in their younger years, but there has not been a structural system set up in Canada today to allow these people in their golden years to have an opportunity to feel useful, as if they are people of self-esteem who can do something. This is robbing us of a great deal of talent, and moreover is creating tremendous expense not only in terms of human happiness but in terms of social cost and medical bills. It also treats them in a way in which we really would not want to treat the most lowly person in this country. The fact of the matter is that Canada was built by the senior citizens of this country.

• (2130)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has now expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: He may continue with unanimous consent. Is it agreed to allow the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Malone: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I heard the young maiden across the way say he thought this was my maiden speech.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): You have not changed all that much.

Mr. Malone: While talking of senior citizens I would also like to commend the new minister in charge of fitness and sport—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Malone: I have not come to the commending yet but to what she might do. Whenever we talk of fitness and sport, the general emphasis is on the youth. I hope the new minister in charge of fitness and sport will take it within her jurisdiction to look at senior citizens' homes. Because in truth, while they may not be the kind of people who will be challenging for Olympic competitions of some kind, fitness obviously is important to our senior citizens, just as it is important to the health of any other age group in society.

If there is any place where we need to talk about fitness and the availability of physical exercising equipment, it must be in relationship to our senior citizens. When we stop and think of the very poor architectural design of our senior citizens' homes, the fact that residents are often cooped up in one room with a hallway down to the dining lounge and with a piano at the other end, when we recognize that fitness is important to the whole circulatory and respiratory system, one of the things we should do is to expand the concept of fitness and sport beyond our young people to the senior citizens of our country. If we are talking about the health of a group of senior citizens, people who can fully participate in and contribute to our society, then it is incumbent upon us to try to extend to them all the amenities of life that are traditionally enjoyed by anyone of adult age.

One other concept I should like to put forward for the consideration of the House is that it would do us well to give consideration to establishing in each province in Canada a co-op store in which senior citizens can sell their products, such as doilies, pillow cases, sheets, bookends—whatever it may be—and receive a significant tax break. I make that suggestion on this basis. The truth of the matter today is that we always talk of giving more money to our senior citizens.

What we fail to do is provide an avenue by which senior citizens might become participants in their own well-being.

Whether this example I have given is utilized or not, it is imperative that we discover a method whereby senior citizens are able to advance their own status economically, have a sense of participation and a feeling that somehow they have gained more self-esteem because they are able to take part in the social and educational structure of Canada. A senior citizen has to be treated like a regular human being, not as a species separate from the rest of society. In other words, we need a whole rethinking as to how we analyse and talk about our senior citizens.

In the same vein, when talking about how the throne speech fails to recognize senior citizens, we should also take a look at the age group that is soon to become a senior citizen. In truth it can be documented by a considerable number of psychologists and sociologists that the vast majority of Canadians, without a shadow of a doubt, are not prepared for their retirement years. What happens is that they go into psychological depression following their working careers, and this often happens because no program has been established in this country, either through the industrial factory or by the public service, to prepare people for a meaningful, creative and involved retirement.

In the provinces and through the dominion government we provide a health scheme that pays for medical costs. What we have failed so miserably to do is to establish a preventative medicine system. In the same way, there is no preventative system in the social justice sphere that we spoke of earlier when talking about the prison system. I think we need to readdress ourselves not only to the problem of inflation but to our prisons, to agriculture, an area in which this country is falling far short of its potential, to the problems of our senior citizens, and more important, to opportunities for every region to be able to feel like it is a part of Canada, linked together by some kind of transportation system.

The subject of transportation has been in the throne speech for I do not know how many times now, but I do know that for at least the sixth time the Department of Transport has promised a complete review of the rail network on the prairies. Such a review is now back in the throne speech and all we can hope is that this promise will culminate in some action that is over 100 years late in coming. This has left the prairies still the producer of raw material and has made central Canada the sole manufacturing area of this country. The three prairie provinces are placed in a tremendous deficit position in the economic sense because of an inequitable freight rate structure.

It does not make sense that we in this country have a freight rate system under which it is cheaper to ship products from Toronto to Vancouver than it is to ship products from Toronto to Calgary. Nor should it be in this country that we have a kind of freight rate structure in which rapeseed as a raw material per rolling ton costs half as much to ship in the same kind of boxcar from Lethbridge to Toronto as it does to ship the processed rapeseed meal back from Toronto to Lethbridge, Alberta. You have the same tonnage, the same car style and the same mileage, but a freight rate structure that is obviously biased against a certain region of Canada.

The Prime Minister shrugs his shoulders and wonders why the Canadian people are wrong in not being able to understand that the country will become divided. Obviously it is going to be divided so long as government policies are divided. This is not a country that is bent on being divided, but we do have a government that is bent on dividing people.

I have been looking at what is happening in terms of transportation. We are going to establish a new port policy. A new port at Churchill which will increase the grain flow out of that port during the production year would be something that would reduce the transportation costs of prairie farmers. It would increase to a tremendous degree the amount of income which could be generated within the prairies. There would be a decrease in transportation cost resulting from opening the port of Churchill to handle a much greater proportion of the grain produced in the prairie provinces. But the fact of the matter is that the government has reneged on its promise over and over again.

An hon. Member: That's not true.

Mr. Malone: In response to the hon. member who just said that this is not true, let me suggest he has not been back to his constituency recently. His is a farming constituency, and if he had talked recently to any of the people there he would know that one of the things that is wanted and needed very badly for economic advancement is this improvement to the port of Churchill, and a whole new ports policy. This is a fact with which we have to reckon very soon.

Having regard to the throne speech, what we have again is simply a hollow piece of paper that echoes when it falls. It is nothing more than a collection of adjectives from a thesaurus. It is nothing more than the empty promises we continue to hear. All we can hope for is that legislation will in some way give the Canadian people some hope.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is it agreed that we call it 9.45?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being 9.45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38(3), to interrupt the proceedings and forthwith put any question to dispose of the subamendment which is now before the House. Therefore, the question is as follows:

[English]

The question is, therefore, on the amendment to the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the amendment to the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Broadbent) which was negatived on the following division:

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF ACCIDENT INVESTIGATION COMMISSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I rise on an issue of urgent and pressing necessity. We are rapidly approaching the second anniversary of the Panarctic Air crash which dramatically illustrates the need for an independent accident investigation commission which the speech from the throne signally failed to mention. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That this House urge the government to introduce immediately legislation setting up this commission.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be presented to the House only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSED COMMITTEE STUDY OF METHOD OF COMPUTING CONSUMER PRICE INDEX—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given that the government is about to manipulate and change the composition of the consumer price index, and given the importance placed on the consumer price index as a measure of the cost of living by governments, by business, by labour and by consumers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That this House instruct the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs to hold hearings into the composition, applicability, and accuracy of the consumer price index with power to call witnesses and commission research and that it communicate its findings to this House before the government makes any changes to the consumer price index.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be put to the House only with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF FAMILY OF THE LATE RIGHT HON. LOUIS ST. LAURENT

Mr. Speaker: Before proceeding with the oral question period I know that all hon. members will want to join with me in adding just another small tribute to those that have already taken place during the presentation of a bust to the House of Commons this morning and the unveiling of a statue in front of the Supreme Court of Canada by the Prime Minister, both events honouring a very distinguished former Prime Minister, the late Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent who is represented here by several members of his family. I should like to signal their presence in the gallery, particularly represented by his senior son, Monsieur Renault St. Laurent and Madam St. Laurent.

● (1110)

Mr. Speaker: Tributes, of course, were paid to the late Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent this morning by the Secretary of State and, also upon the unveiling of the statue by the Right Hon. Prime Minister. I may say that I would like to take credit for this suggestion, but I cannot in all honesty do so. The suggestion was made to me moments ago by the right hon. member for Prince Albert who has suggested that the text of both those addresses, in order that they have a special place in the annals of Canadian history, be appended to today's Hansard. If that is the wish of the House, it will be so ordered.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Oral Questions

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

EXTENT OF REDUCTION OF GOVERNMENT INTERVENTION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance. Noting that the working paper with respect to the government's post control position concludes that there should be less direct government intervention and an increased reliance on the market economy, would the minister add credence to these words by indicating to what extent it is planned to arrest the growth of Crown corporations. For example, is it planned to abandon PetroCan's intervention in the market economy?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the role that Petro-Canada is already playing and can play as a catalyst in providing wider exploration in the frontier areas of Canada seems to be the very best argument for that kind of role by government. Indeed, there will be some areas where, for example, in manpower retraining, on which my colleague will have the occasion to speak, the role of the government will be reduced and that of the private sector increased. Particularly in determining the adequacy of Canada's energy resources and petroleum and natural gas resources in frontier areas, we still believe that Petro-Canada can and will play a very effective role.

Mr. Stevens: In view of the fact that the year old white paper entitled "Attack on Inflation" expressed the commitments "to reassess the costs to the private sector of many government rules and regulations" and to review the inflationary impact of its own regulatory agencies, and further noting that this commitment is reaffirmed in both the throne speech and the working paper tabled yesterday, would the minister point to any specific instances of deregulation or changes in regulation which will have the effect aimed for in the white paper and the subsequent references which I have noted?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the occasion to refer again to the actions being undertaken by my colleagues with respect to the filing requirements imposed on the private sector, particularly the small business sector, which we think will be very effective in reducing the administrative load which those companies will have to bear in dealing with the government of Canada. We hope that, in turn, we will have co-operative action from provincial governments so that the collective imposition by government of regulations on the private sector will be reduced.

POSSIBLE INTRODUCTION OF NEGATIVE INCOME TAX

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): I have another supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. As the working paper dealing with the government's role in the post control period tabled yesterday states the following:

[Mr. Speaker.]

It will be necessary to pursue an examination of the integration of income transfers with the tax system.

Would the minister be more explicit and indicate to the House if this is a wordy way of stating that it is intended to introduce a negative income tax?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): That is not so. I would point out to the hon. gentleman that, indeed, under the arrangements for supplementary old age security payments we already have just such a system. It will be important to the activities of my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and others of my colleagues to pursue ways in which the tax system can be integrated with the transfer payments we now have.

METHOD OF REVIEWING PROVISION OF GOVERNMENT SERVICES AND TRANSFERRING SOME TO PRIVATE SECTOR

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board. Having regard to the gestures which the government has advanced, both in the Speech from the Throne and in the documents tabled yesterday, aimed at expanding the role of the private sector and having regard to the proposition that all federal government programs will be under review, can the minister advise the House just precisely what form that review will take, what criteria the review will be based upon and who will be conducting it? Would he also elaborate and tell the House what initiatives the government is planning to permit the private sector to provide those goods and services which were referred to in the document yesterday which are now being handled by government sources or agencies?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think any elaboration I make today would follow on the comments of my colleague, the Minister of Finance. With regard to those services which are clearly public and the government responsibility, we are looking at our expenditures very carefully. Indeed, we have been doing that for some time now, and that is a process which I intend to continue.

With regard to those services which are being provided by Crown corporations, I do not think I can make any further comments beyond those my colleague the Minister of Finance made, except to say that the matter is under very serious review to determine what might be better provided by the private sector, but certainly with the proviso that those goods and services must continue to be made available effectively to the public whether through the private sector or through public intervention.

Mr. Mazankowski: Am I to take it from the minister's answer that this review will take place within the confines of the Liberal hierarchy and that it will not be a public review? Are we to assume that from the answer the minister gave, and if the minister is not going to establish a public review of government programs and services, why not?

Mr. Andras: I think the events of the last few days, particularly the comments in the throne speech and the document which has been circulated, to which the hon. member for York-Simcoe referred, are clear indications that we are going to seek the advice of a wide range of Canadians in different sectors of the economy in the process of determining what kinds of services could or could not be transferred to the private sector.

STATISTICS CANADA

PROPOSED COMMITTEE STUDY OF METHOD OF COMPUTING CONSUMER PRICE INDEX

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and at this time, my first opportunity to question the minister, I congratulate him on his recent appointment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: Given the importance of the consumer price index and the fact that many people are doubtful as to the veracity of the CPI, will the minister give an undertaking to this House to stop immediately any research on the proposed changes to the consumer price index and refer the question of the CPI revision to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs for hearings, so an independent report may be brought back with recommendations to this House?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his kind wishes. If he has some concrete suggestions to make on the matter, he should send them to me. I think that we should leave the experts of my department to consider the problem and if changes must be made, we will discuss them with the committee. However, it would be premature to bypass the experts on this issue and open a debate which could be fruitless. I feel that I should first receive a report from my officials and refer it, if necessary, to a committee of the House.

[English]

Mr. Saltsman: I appreciate the minister's request for any suggestions. I put forward a very important suggestion that it go before a committee for examination. I certainly do not—and no member of the House of Commons does—have the research facilities to challenge the research facilities in the minister's department.

If I may point out to the minister that the public service is not—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Bellechasse.

INCOME TAX

INQUIRY IF INDIVIDUALS CHARGED INTEREST ON LATE PAYMENTS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue, but first I wish to congratulate her on her appointment and offer her my best wishes of success.

During the last session, in reply to a question which appeared under my name on the House of Commons Order Paper, the Department of National Revenue stated that there were up to $223 million in unpaid taxes by multinational and national corporations, arrears on which an interest of 6 per cent is charged. May I ask the minister whether the individual who is late in paying his income tax to the Department of National Revenue is treated on the same footing as these larger corporations, whether he is given a respite to allow him to pay his taxes, and whether the interest rate he has to pay is the same as that paid by the larger corporations?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to accept the premise of the question asked by the hon. member, but I would like first of all to thank him for his good wishes on my appointment to this new office. On the second part of his question, I think I can assure him that taxpayers who owe money to the government of Canada are always treated with the utmost consideration whenever they experience any difficulty. The employees of the local offices of the Income Tax Division meet them and discuss with them their financial problems and make some arrangements. I have never found a case where interest had been charged, but I shall look into this matter.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for this answer. As a supplementary question, I should like to ask whether, under the law, taxpayers who are required to file quarterly reports during the current year and pay their income taxes are penalized or will be penalized in the same way as large corporations which are behind in their payments?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, if I were a parliamentary secretary, I could refer the question to the minister for further information. I hope hon. members will allow me some time to continue my apprenticeship of the income tax legislation. For the time being, however, I am not in a position to reply to the hon. member.

ENERGY

CRUDE OIL—DENIAL BY ALBERTA OF FEED STOCK FOR PETROSAR—ALTERNATIVE SOURCES OF SUPPLY

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Now that it has been confirmed that the Alberta Petroleum Marketing Commission is not going to approve Petrosar as an approved buyer of Alberta crude oil for feedstock purposes in the chemical industry, can the minister tell us what plans the minister has to ensure a supply of crude oil for that major development?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think it may be premature to put that interpretation on the news stories coming out of Alberta. I, for one, have not been successful in being able to clarify the position of the Alberta government on this particular issue. A number of messages were conveyed to them yesterday seeking a transcript of the premier's remarks and clarification of what they meant. We have not yet received them, and I am in the position of awaiting a reply to a telex sent to Mr. Getty dealing with that specific point.

Mr. Gillies: A supplementary question. I cannot understand the difficulty the minister is having with this communication because the statement was made by the premier of Alberta in the House the day before yesterday and as long ago as April 1974 a letter was sent to the chairman of Petrosar, with a copy to the Prime Minister, saying that Alberta was not going to permit its crude oil to be used as feedstock for Petrosar. I am concerned and I should like to know what the minister has done during the last two years because it was telegraphed to the country that Alberta was going to take this position. What contingency plan has been put in place by the government to deal with this important problem?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared yet to accept the assumption that the hon. member has made that there will be no Alberta crude oil delivered to the Petrosar plant.

Mr. Gillies: A final supplementary. I should like to ask the minister why he is not prepared to accept that assumption now that the premier of Alberta has made the statement in the legislature of Alberta that this feedstock will not be available.

BANK ACT

POSSIBILITY OF AMENDMENT FACILITATING APPOINTMENT OF WOMEN AS DIRECTORS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Will the minister tell the House and country if he intends during the present session to introduce legislation amending the Bank Act, in order to facilitate the appointment of women as directors of our chartered banks? I ask this as probably 75 per cent of bank employees and half of all bank customers are women.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have noted the statements of a number of senior bank executives in this regard. I am sure the hon. member was as delighted as I was at this morning's announcement that the Bank of Nova Scotia has now appointed a woman director. One of the principal difficulties drawn to my attention by the Bank of Nova Scotia was that the subscription requirement for qualification as a director would require the expenditure of about $100,000. Very clearly that is a disincentive. During the course of the Bank Act amendments we might take a fresh look at whether this requirement, which has been part of the Bank Act for a long time, might be reduced, in order to open up greater participation in such directorships not only to women but to others in the community as well.

REASON FOR FAILURE OF CANADIAN PRESS TO AGREE TO CONTRACT WITH EMPLOYEES

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. Since the Canadian Wire Service Guild was certified as the bargaining unit for 275 Canadian Press journalists and staff as long ago as September, 1975, and since there is still no contract, which, personally, I find a shocking disgrace—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Muir: —even though the Guild has been willing to submit to binding arbitration, can the minister advise the House what is preventing agreement on a contract, keeping in mind that this legal strike of Canadian Press employees affects 108 daily newspapers and about 200 radio stations, to say nothing of the hardship it is creating for the employees and their families.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the hon. member's interest in this dispute. I think one of the many stumbling blocks concerns the question of union security. My officials have been meeting with the union and the publisher's executive committee, in an attempt to resolve this dispute and get a first agreement—so far without success. There is an indication that I may meet with them next week. I shall have a further report at that time as to where we stand.

Mr. Muir: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I thank the minister for his reply and ask if he intends, as he intimated, to act in the matter, will he advise the publishers that this is 1976, not 1926 or even 1936 when we had to fight for union recognition? Bring them up to the present.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I will be more than happy to convey the hon. member's views to the publishers and note particularly that the Prime Minister refused to cross that particular picket line.

BEEF—REQUEST FOR RESTRICTION OF IMPORTS FROM AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Agriculture relates to the Canadian beef import issue and has particular reference to the minister's news release of October 13 headed "Federal Actions to Protect the Beef producers." Since beef has been on the Canadian import control list all year, and since nowhere in the minister's statement does he indicate that this individual permit device will be used to restrict, reduce and, hopefully, temporarily stop Australian and New Zealand beef imports to Canada, will the minister indicate clearly if he finally intends to act now, in the interest of the Canadian cattle industry, by taking immediate action to restrict severely Australian and New Zealand beef imports and, in so doing, give protection to the Canadian cattle industry?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as a result of government action no beef or veal will be allowed into Canada after Sunday night, October 17, unless by permit. That covers all nations presently exporting beef or veal to Canada.

BEEF—RIGHT OF UNITED STATES TO RESTRICT IMPORTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I raise a further question relating to yesterday's meeting in Washington on the important beef import issue. Since Canadian meat exports to the United States now exceed 70 million pounds for 1976, some 5 million pounds above the first agreed level of our exports to the United States and, further, in view of the recent denial by the U.S. Acting Secretary of Agriculture, namely, that there was no U.S. agreement which would permit 90 million pounds of Canadian exports, does the minister still insist that President Ford has no right to halt Canadian beef imports, as the minister indicated last Monday?

● (1130)

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, part of the agreement we have with the United States of America is on beef moving into their country and beef moving into our country. You can technically say the Acting Secretary of Agriculture is correct because there was no figure used. They were to notify us when our trade to them became abnormal and we were to notify them when their trade to our country became what we thought was excessive. That was not done. As far as we are concerned, negotiations in the United States yesterday went fairly well. Beef is moving freely into the United States as of today. I am sure the hon. member is aware that live cattle are still going to move to the United States and I am sure he is happy they went up $3 a hundredweight yesterday.

HEALTH

SWINE INFLUENZA—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON IMMUNIZATION PROGRAM

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Will he inform the House about the present state of the selective immunization program against swine influenza in particular, why the program is behind schedule and any precautions the minister may have taken in view of reported complications in the United States?

Mr. Paproski: The Prime Minister has not taken his shot yet.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as far as the complications in the United States are concerned, the hon. member knows that the disease centre in Atlanta is examining the situation very closely. Up to this time, there is no indication that the complications referred to in the press are related to the swine fluvaccine. There will be further periodic reports from that particular disease centre. With regard to the slight delay in the delivery of the vaccine, it is related to production and delivery problems from the European producers in particular. I understand that the first delivery of bivalent vaccine for the high risk groups should begin at the end of this month.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGATION DEPARTMENT WILL NOT HIRE NATIVES OF POND INLET

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment concerning what appears to be a clear case of racial discrimination by his department's officials. The chairman of the Pond Inlet Settlement Council, a Baffin Island community, has been advised by Department of the Environment official from Toronto that as a matter of policy his department will not directly hire local Inuit, Metis and Indians for this branch of the federal government service. Will the minister investigate this matter and report back to the House as soon as possible?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly investigate this matter. If the facts turn out to be as the hon. member alleges, I can assure him that type of directive will be withdrawn.

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who I congratulate and offer my very best wishes, as well as my condolences, because he has a very difficult portfolio, even though he has taken some employees of his department from my constituency. In arriving at the unemployment figure, are those persons who are not on unemployment insurance who register at Canada Manpower Centres included and are those persons who are not on unemployment insurance who Canada Manpower does not or is reluctant to register for employment included?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I do not know the answer to that Mr. Speaker.

PUBLISHING

REPORT ON CANADIAN BOOK PUBLISHING—DATE OF RELEASE

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. In congratulating him, I wonder if he is going to grow a beard which seems to be the symbol of that office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: Also, I would like to ask the Secretary whether he will be as forthcoming as a minister as he professed to be as a backbencher. Can he share soon with the rest of us a report on Canadian book publishing which for some strange reason is marked secret?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have no immediate plans to grow a beard, but on the recommendation of the hon. member I will take it under advisement. I assure the hon. member that I plan to be as forthcoming as I always have been. It is our intention to publish the report to which he referred. I would like to have a chance to look at it more thoroughly than I have so far. I may have some comments to make at the time it is presented.

GUN CONTROL LEGISLATION—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Will he advise the House as to what course the government intends to take with respect to the gun control legislation which met its demise with the end of the last session? What does the government intend to do in this regard?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the previous President of the Privy Council had some discussions with the House leaders. The present President of the Privy Council will be having discussions with his counterparts as to the legislative program of the government and will be seeking the unanimous consent of the House to reinstate the measure.

[Mr. Jones.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: It's dead.

Mr. Fairweather: The consent of the Liberal party.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In other words, the government is going to endeavour to resuscitate it and restore it to life. I, for one, am opposed to that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the reaction from the opposition appears to have simplified the discussions that my colleague, the House leader, intended to have.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The Liberal caucus took care of that.

Mr. Basford: However, I in no way want to discount the persuasive powers of my colleague, the House leader.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: I hope that the jubilation of members opposite will not continue when, as will undoubtedly occur, there is a tragic shooting in this country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POTATOES—REQUEST FOR ACTION TO STOP IMPORTS TO BRITISH COLUMBIA FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that the United States is sending in stripper potatoes to British Columbia, therefore depressing the price of potatoes in British Columbia below the price of production of British Columbia potatoes, can the minister tell us when he is going to put on an automatic surcharge against this unfair competition?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we are not going to put on a surcharge. We are going to announce a program of stabilization which will amount to payments to producers of their cost of production plus current input costs.

Mr. Reynolds: In view of the seriousness of this situation in British Columbia, can the minister tell us how quickly he will be bringing in that program?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, we cannot bring it in before the final accounting for all shipments of potatoes is made. It will be done as soon as possible. We have the final figures for the early crop and are now working on that. There will be meetings with the potato growers concerned in western Canada.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

EXCLUSION OF NASKAPI INDIANS FROM JAMES BAY AGREEMENT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Is the minister aware that when the federal government signed the James Bay and northern Quebec agreement on November 11, 1975, the Naskapi Indians, indigenous to the area, had been excluded from the agreement, despite their genuine efforts to reach a responsible settlement?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have been made aware of this situation. We are trying to take steps to resolve this particular problem as quickly as possible. Some communications have been sent to me by the Naskapi Indians and I am trying to deal with this problem.

Mr. Holmes: The minister knows the federal government has a special constitutional and trust responsibility on behalf of native people and their lands. I would like to ask the minister if he can indicate if an agreement will be reached with the Naskapi Indians before the James Bay legislation is introduced into this House?

• (1140)

Mr. Allmand: I would have to look into that. We have a commitment to introduce the bill as quickly as possible and we shall probably introduce it within a few weeks. In the meantime, we are trying to resolve the problems of the Naskapi people.

CONTINUANCE OF LAND CLAIMS COMMISSIONER

Mr. F. E. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): I should like to follow up that question by inquiring as to the present status of the office of claims commissioner established by the minister's predecessor. Will it be continued? Will this office and these activities be carried over into British Columbia where special problems exist as a result of the absence of treaties?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I am not sure whether the hon. member is referring to the office which was held by Mr. Barber or not.

Mr. Oberle: No. I was referring to the office which was held by Mr. Digby Hunt, the commissioner they brought from the Yukon.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Hunt's position will be filled very shortly.

Is the hon. gentleman aware that the telecast of the Canada Save the Children college football game will once again this year be delayed by one day rather than coming live? Is this being done as a result of agreement or does it follow a unilateral decision by the CBC?

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): A question to the Minister of Labour, Mr. Speaker. Does the hon. gentleman have any information he can give the House with respect to progress of his efforts to achieve settlement of the dispute which has tied up the Port of Halifax for many weeks?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am continuing to urge the MEA to accept the terms of settlement. As the hon. gentleman knows, the union has accepted them. I understand the MEA is meeting with the Premier of Nova Scotia this morning. FLOODS

GOVERNMENT REACTION TO PETITION FOR CONTROL MEASURES ON RIDEAU RIVER

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Has the minister had an opportunity to review the petition which was sent to him by some 500 residents on the Rideau river concerning flood control and the maintenance of the water level on the river? If he has had a chance to do so and consult his officials with respect to it, can he tell the House what he intends to be about this problem?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I do recall some correspondence with respect to this matter; I do not recall seeing a petition. However, I will check and make sure that all the material is brought to my attention. I might say that as a result of the correspondence certain action is being taken.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—TRANSFER OF INMATES TO WILLIAM HEAD INSTITUTION

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the new Solicitor General whom I should like to congratulate because, finally, his talents have gained some recognition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): In wishing him good luck I feel obliged to sympathize with him, even to commiserate with him, because of the shambles left him by his predecessor.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Oh!

Mr. Paproski: You have all the prisoners on your side.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): In formulating my question I should like to hope that the minister will manage to avoid—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a question, will he please put it?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I was hoping he would be able to avoid the leather jacket. Can the minister inform the House whether some of the dangerous inmates from the east wing of the BC Penitentiary who held a guard captive at knifepoint recently at that institution are being transferred, or are to be transferred to, William Head on Vancouver Island—

Mr. Paproski: Why not Ivan Head?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): —and, if so, when will the transfer take place and how many prisoners are involved?

[Mr. Gillespie.]

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for his kind words. As far as the transfer of prisoners is concerned, possibly one third of the inmates there were already classified as medium security risks. I am informed that the only people being transferred out to medium security institutions from the BC Penitentiary are those who were previously classified as medium security risks.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I am sorry, but the minister's information does not appear to correspond with the information which is reaching me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I say this because extra security precautions would be required in advance of any transfer—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): The minister has not answered my question yet. I am speaking of extra precautions either in the form of physical security—

HOUSING

POSSIBILITY OF ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR REHABILITATION OF EXISTING UNITS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Bearing in mind that many people across Canada who own their own homes cannot, because of their low incomes and the effects of inflation, afford to repair them, can the minister tell us whether there are any plans to expand the funding for the residential rehabilitation program under NIP and Rural and Native Housing?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I might tell the hon. member that funds have been increased for this year. The program is proving highly successful both in the NIP area and in the area of rural and native housing. I am presently looking at new approaches with a view to making the programs apply to a broader number of people, since it does rehabilitate existing housing, making it more attractive at prices people can afford. I give this a very high priority.

Mr. Marshall: Can the minister inform us as to the status of a request by the command of the Canadian Legion in Newfoundland for a $4 million program for the rehabilitation of veterans homes?

Mr. Danson: This is under review as a pilot project.

Considering the decision of the Quebec Court of Appeal to reject the appeal by Air Canada in the case involving this corporation and French-speaking pilots who are members of the Quebec Association des gens de l'Air has the Prime Minister considered the possibility of availing himself of the power of evocation of the Governor General in Council, in the Supreme Court, so as to bring this issue before the highest judiciary authorities in the country and provide a clear interpretation of the Official Languages Act regarding its significance in the present dispute?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall consider this proposal very carefully. However, I am not in a position to answer one way or the other today, except to say that it is a very valuable suggestion.

ALLEGED USE OF NON-UNION EMPLOYEES BY CANADIAN PRESS TO REPORT PROCEEDINGS OF PARLIAMENT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour a question supplementary to one asked earlier in connection with the strike at Canadian Press. Is the minister aware of the fact that the proceedings of this House are being reported for Canadian Press by scab newsmen, and in view of the Prime Minister's quite proper refusal to cross a picket line arising from this dispute will the minister look into what can be done to stop this deplorable situation in this House of Commons?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the circumstances that led the hon. member to make these comments. I think he is as aware, as I am, that this is not a matter for me or the government to resolve. As far as the unfortunate strike itself at CP is concerned, we are going to do everything possible to resolve it.

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of such a mandate having been given to any people the hon. member referred to, but if he would be kind enough to be more specific I will try to answer.

An hon. Member: How specific can he be?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, in light of the minister's comment I wonder whether he would either educate those individuals responsible or muzzle them so they will no longer come into Kootenay West spreading groundless rumours when in fact they have no foundation, and could he perhaps educate those people or put a muzzle on them—

BEEF AND VEAL—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON STATUS OF IMPORTS FROM AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, but, because it is supplementary to one asked by the hon. member for Medicine Hat, perhaps I should direct it to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the October 13 announcement by the Minister of Agriculture that "the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has instructed that the general import permit for beef and veal into Canada be changed at midnight next Sunday", and due to the fact that importation of beef and veal from Australia and New Zealand is 60 per cent over the historical level at the present time, does this mean that imports will be cut off for the balance of the year or that New Zealand and Australian imports will enter Canada at the same price at which they are entering the United States?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): No, it does not, Mr. Speaker. Negotiations are going on with Australia and New Zealand at the present time. We are awaiting figures from Australia and New Zealand to confirm what commitments have been made. We will consider this, but that does not mean we will accept them as legitimate shipments to Canada. They will come under the same restrictions on Sunday, October 17, as those from any other country.

POSSIBLE INTRODUCTION OF GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Considering that the minister already spoke about a guaranteed national income, can he tell the House now whether he will submit during this session a legislation regarding the application of a guaranteed annual income program which he himself promised?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, during discussions I had with the provinces in the past years and particularly last June, it was clearly agreed that no legislation in this regard would be submitted in the course of this session. It has never been considered.

DATE OF PUBLICATION OF BADGELY REPORT

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Justice tell the House when we can expect to receive a copy of the Badgely report?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, my latest information is that I may expect to have it for publication in November. Whether some delays may occur, I do not know.

CONCURRENCE OF MINISTER IN REDUCTION OF TARIFF ON CERTAIN FOOD ITEMS

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture which relates to the government ways and means motion and custom tariff tabled in the House on October 13. In this schedule many food items produced in Canada have been subject to a reduction in the protection of duties levied on imports of these products. Was the Minister of Agriculture consulted before these reductions found their way into the ways and means motion, and does he agree that it is in the best interests of agriculture that these reductions be made?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that if the hon. gentleman will study them he will find that these tariffs are insignificant, amounting to hardly anything at all. I was consulted and I was in agreement with them.

FISHERIES

CONCURRENCE OF MINISTER IN REDUCTION OF TARIFF ON CERTAIN FISH PRODUCTS

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a similar question to the minister responsible for fisheries. Fish and fish processed products coming into Canada have also experienced a reduction in protection by tariff levy. Does the minister feel this is advisable in view of the fishing situation as it presently exists in Canada, and the market structures as they exist?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I will have to look at the implications of the hon. gentleman's question and report to him at a later date.

Mr. McCain: Was he consulted?

TRANSPORT

ESTABLISHMENT OF ACCIDENT INVESTIGATION COMMISSION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport I should like to direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Will he assure the House that the government still intends to proceed with legislation to set up an independent accident investigation commission, and that its omission from the Speech from the Throne was not deliberate?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I shall take the question as notice and give the hon. member a reply some time next week.

PRIVACY

POSSIBLE INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION PROTECTING INDIVIDUALS

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that the Speech from the Throne promised legislation protecting the privacy of individuals, will the minister tell the House when this legislation will be introduced? Can he give the House the assurance that, unlike the limited bill which died on the order paper and which would have provided more protection for the government than for the individual citizen, the new bill will spell out in detail in the legislation itself the conditions under which information about the individual can be collected, stored and disseminated instead of leaving it up to the government to legislate by regulation?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I expect it can be introduced shortly, and I would expect that it will be considerably different from Bill C-72.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

USE OF FUNDS TO SUPPORT JOB CREATION

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I would refer him to the working paper entitled "The Way Ahead" which makes reference to experimentation in the use of unemployment insurance funds to support job creation. I would ask the minister to clarify whether such initiatives would be used to establish a program of income support for the low income employed, or would the money be taken directly from the UIC fund for job creation?

● (1200)

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it will be dovetailed with other funds to be made available to cover a whole series of projects under job creation and I will be speaking on this at some length I think during the throne speech debate.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Chrétien: I have more, Mr. Speaker.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Thursday, October 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Maurice Harquail for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Clark (p. 28).

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne spoke abundantly of national unity. Paradoxically, in his reply to the House, the Prime Minister (Mr.Trudeau) did not breathe a word of it.

I refuse to believe, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister chose deliberately to ignore the prime concern of all Canadians. In all indulgence, I attribute the behaviour of the leader of the government to the shock he must have suffered when his Minister of National Defence resigned for strange and enigmatic reasons. It therefore behoves us of the official opposition to make up for the pusillanimity of the Prime Minister in the House and broach openly this delicate matter which some would sweep under the rug.

To remain silent at this time would justly provoke the anger of my fellow citizens. To remain silent while federal institutions are cracking up in various places would amount to ratifying national suicide. People are well aware, Mr. Speaker, of the reaction against the implementation of the Official Languages Act, they are aware of the inequity suffered by many citizens for various reasons, and they are well aware that in the province of Quebec, resignation has given way to impatience to such a point that I feel in the majority of Quebecers, since 1973, a disgust which could soon be expressed in the provincial election by a spectacular increase in the popular vote for the independence movement and which could realistically give at least 30 seats to the Parti Québecois.

In this morning's Devoir, Mr. Michel Roy, with his usual insight, asked this question, and I quote:

> Does Canada want to separate from Quebec?
> [Mr. Chrétien.]

His intellectual integrity should have made Mr. Roy ask the real question, which is: Does Canada want to separate from the Liberal Party? We already know what would be the reply of the Canadian people. If the Liberals in Quebec are defeated in the next elections, I shall not be heartbroken, and I know that several of my friends opposite share this feeling. Moreover, the fact that a wish for change should be felt at all levels of society does not surprise me either; and if a new team should replace an inadequate team bogged down in mediocrity, this would not worry me in the least. What frightens me is that this feeling which is getting stronger and stronger in one of the two Canadian majorities has increased as the federal government has demonstrated inability, delays, contradictions and arrogance. And on this last point, neither the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal) nor the Gens de l'air will disagree with me.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, on this issue of national unity, this speech from the throne is an indication of just how sad and muddled the present government is in its approach to the challenge.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wagner: When the problem is people, they put their faith in a piece of paper. When the questions are complex, they hide behind the simplistic and the shallow. Let me be precise.

The question of the constitution is quite separate from the question of national unity. Only the most partisan of interests would suggest the blurring of both concerns—blurring, by the way, which could seriously make national unity the victim of a badly thought-out approach. The people of Canada want their constitution brought home. We want the right to be able to change the rules of the game in our own way as a mature and sovereign nation. We can benefit measurably from the final instrument of independence. That instrument, however, is not the panacea that the government opposite hopes it will be. It is, more realistically, a test—a test of the maturity of our nation, a test which we will have to respond to by both bringing it home and making it work for Canadians. It is a document which has not served this nation badly over the years, a document that can serve all Canadians more effectively at home.

I ask this government to be cognizant of one thing. The bringing home of a constitution is, in the thrust of things, a symbolic gesture symbolizing maturity, independence, consensus and unity. If it is done in such a way so as to threaten the very qualities the constitution seeks to symbolize, then the onus for that will be on the heads of this government and its leader.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) might indeed like to see the members of our party oppose the return of the constitution so that he might fan this issue as only he knows how. But that will not happen. We are at peace with the patriation of the constitution. We embrace its importance and its significance. We understand what was to be the Victoria charter. We understand what the premiers have said to each other and what they have said to Ottawa, and we are impressed with the room for moderation and understanding on all sides. We obviously have more faith than some opposite. Nevertheless, there is a way, based on further federal-provincial talks and a conciliatory attitude, for the thing to be done right, with guarantees for French and English Canadians and without defranchising any one section of this country. It would be fitting and appropriate if Her Majesty could celebrate her jubilee in Canada with a ceremony which passed Canada's constitution to Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wagner: It would be quite a day if she could lend her imprimatur to a process that has brought Canadians together and unified this nation. This government has a duty to ensure that that is what happens, because that is what this great country deserves. But let this government, in dealing with the constitution, not overwhelm itself with delusions of adequacy. French and English Canadians have fears and concerns which have yet to be met and yet to be understood.

The principle of bilingualism is only valid when it means the same to Canadians as the principle of fairness. This government has somehow managed to divide the two principles in the minds of many Canadians. That is the single, greatest tragedy of the present government. That is the single, most gnawing doubt that attacks the very gut and fibre of our country. There the record of this government is a record of failure.

But the time for dwelling on that is not best spent here. Perhaps the cabinet might have its own discussions and sort itself out first. I say only this: Louis St. Laurent and the French fact were not unpopular in English Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wagner: Mike Pearson dealt with it adequately and fairly and made progress which was respected on all sides. The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) made important strides, and did so with support from all Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) would like to ask the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) a question.

Mr. Wagner: I will be pleased to answer any question when I finish my speech.

As I was saying before I was interrupted, the right hon. member for Prince Albert made important strides, and did so with support from all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wagner: May I suggest that the days of dogmatism, of imbalance and of emotionalism are the days when bilingualism suffered its greatest body blows. The principle of fairness was the principle that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) joined with others in the House to endorse and support.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wagner: He believed, and I believe, as well as responsible English and French speaking Canadians believe, that the two principles are still synonymous. A parliament approves a principle; a government makes that principle operate fairly. This government has failed. It cannot make the principle work fairly because Canadians do not believe that if is fair or that it can be fair. All the deathbed conversions in the world will change nothing. The damage is too great. The wounds are too deep.

This country deserves a government that will make bilingualism and fairness synonymous, that will make equality of opportunity synonymous with encouragement, not with discrimination; that will make second language skill a factor of opportunity and not simply one of compulsion and threat.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister had not strived to systematically undermine our constitutional regime and to stealthily assume responsibilities which de jure fall under provincial jurisdiction; had he not, on so many occasions and against so many people, used abusive language; had he not given such hopes to so many Canadians whom he deceived eventually miserably; had he not been, regarding controls, so shamelessly deceitful towards the people, he would not have created around him such an hostile climate which now compromises even his most commendable initiatives.

However, the Prime Minister seems ill-advised to maintain that even general bilingualism in the public service of Canada constitutes almost the only condition of Canada's survival as a political entity.

Bilingualism is undoubtedly important for the future unity of Confederation. But this country's unity also requires the federal government to uphold a general policy that is acceptable to everybody. We will be in a better position to achieve such unity in this country when the government stops treating the provinces as competitors rather than associates and when it sincerely asks them to take part in the development of national policies. We will achieve this goal more quickly when this government further promotes the development of regional communities according to their own dynamism.

The main feature of Canadian federalism must be the free development of these communities within the framework of national goals which are not too demanding. But in this regard the government deserves some blame. If its bilingualism policy was not welcome in many circles, it is not only because of its deficiencies and the wrong directions it takes but also because the government is vigorously opposed to many legitimate regional expectations.

The day Ottawa will stop acting like a steamroller, the day they will stop trying to hoard for their sole benefit all the live forces of the country, that day we will no longer have to worry seriously about the future of the Canadian Confederation.

[English]

Had the ministers of this cabinet shown more compassion for the elderly public servants, they would not be faced with the prospect of backing down on their program. Fairness in its implementation would have brought unity and peace of mind within the ranks of the public service.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wagner: National understanding would have been enhanced. We would have been spared the ugliness of the latest utterances which shocked public opinion and forced the government to wonder about its own wisdom. I am referring to last summer's flare-up over the language issue in air-ground communications in Quebec. Panic, I hope, and sheer bias gave rise to one of the worst crises this country has experienced over the last decades. It is my hope that cold reason will ultimately prevail.

● (1220)

I expect that the commission of inquiry will provide satisfactory answers to both the issue of air safety and to the understandable desire of French-speaking Quebeckers to use their own language in air-ground communications. It would be a pity should a majority of Canadians deny my fellow compatriots the right to speak French amongst themselves while performing their duties in Quebec air space. Only the most stringent considerations of safety should cause that right to be circumvented.

For the first time the throne speech has been strangely silent on world affairs, as if Canada was living in complete isolation and as if this government did not care about what is happening abroad. Before I proceed further on this subject, may I, as spokesman for my party on foreign policy, welcome the appointment of the new Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wagner: I am sure our relations will be fruitful and pleasant, and that whatever differences might occur between us on policy matters, our personal friendship will remain undisturbed. Surely the minister will not take umbrage if I say to his predecessor how much his departure from this post after such a brief stay will be noticed. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) is leaving the portfolio of External Affairs just as he was beginning to shine in his own right and was emerging from the status of glorified usher to which from the start he had been reduced unwillingly by the Prime Minister's personal advisers on foreign policy.

In Europe I was told that the former minister played a most appreciated role in the north-south conference and that his contribution would be missed. I must, however, deplore the fact that the tenure of office of the minister was marred by a couple of incidents which profoundly shocked Canadian opinion and did serious harm to our country's image abroad. I refer especially to the Taiwan gaffe which brought so much ridicule and disrepute to Canada and almost scuttled the Montreal Olympiad.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Wagner: Perhaps more serious was the unfortunate decision to allow the High Commission in London to grant certificates of non-Jewish origin to Canadians wishing to visit Arab countries. The public outcry which ensued caused the ministry to desist from such a despicable practice, but the government still owes this House a satisfactory explanation as to the circumstances which led to what the Ottawa Journal aptly described as a new yellow star system in reverse.

Now that the former secretary of state for external affairs has become once again the government House leader, I hope he makes good his promise, as reported in the press on June 29, to stimulate more debates on foreign policy. He might even try to convince the Prime Minister that it is never counter-productive to report back to the House following his journeys abroad. So we hope to hear from him after his trip to Japan.

It is not enough for a minister of external affairs, and for that matter for any minister of the Crown, to appear once in a while before a standing committee and make general statements on matters pertaining to international issues. What is needed is a concerted determination to allow this House to debate, as they come up, issues which might affect Canada and its international stances.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wagner: There is no doubt that although we do not have a tradition of bipartisan policy on external affairs, there are many aspects on which both major parties agree and many on which we disagree. It would be healthy for democracy to debate openly our differences and to have an opportunity of offering Canadians a choice.

There are problems which presently raise concern in Canada. The Rhodesian, and generally the African situation, is in the minds of us all. What are the chances of a peaceful solution, and what role, if any, could Canada be called upon to play in this area? Or do we leave it to Dr. Kissinger to tell us what we should do and how much we should pay? When shall we finally be favoured with decisions of this government pertaining to the Arab boycott and its possible effects on the Canadian business community? What exactly will be Canada's role in formulating the new economic order? In view of the growing income disparities between developed and developing countries, has the government decided to reconsider some of its methods of helping poorer countries to achieve a more decent level of prosperity?

Many Canadians who came from eastern Europe still experience difficulties in reaching families and members of their families there or obtaining authorization to bring their relatives into Canada. Without commenting on the role played by the U.S.S.R., I would certainly like to see more frequent discussions of the problem of family reunification in order to improve upon what we can term a still uneasy friendship. I, myself, am looking forward to the opportunity of becoming better acquainted with the problems in east-west relations.

We all witness with anguish the arms build-up in eastern Europe, in the Middle East and elsewhere, with the risk of new military clashes between neighbouring states. We are not yet immune from a nuclear catastrophe, and we want to know what Canada is doing to help accelerate détente and nuclear disarmament. With regard to selling our nuclear technology to developing countries, we are still a long way from a satisfactory level of safeguards and a really effective system of international inspection.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs spoke the other day in reassuring terms of our dedication to the survival of Israel as an independent state, while remaining friendly toward the Arab world. I agree with him; but we would like to know more about his veiled threat of withdrawing from the United Nations peacekeeping operations in Cyprus and possibly elsewhere. Is saving money the main consideration now for this government? Are we going to abandon the traditional policy which endeared Canada to the whole world particularly relating to peacekeeping? Has the government given any consideration to the German and Israeli proposals dealing with terrorism?

As far as our relations with the United States are concerned, they certainly need to be improved. This government remains seemingly undisturbed, as if irritants were normal between friends. It is high time we did our utmost to try to solve outstanding issues before they get worse.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wagner: While standing by our right to act independently as a sovereign nation, we must make sure that any disturbance—even unwarranted in our view—in our relations with the United States is immediately cleared up. We must dispel the clouds as soon as they gather in order to avoid possibly devastating storms in the future. To that end more is needed than chance encounters between ministers or heads of governments. We must entertain a constant flow of communications with the American Congress and administration and keep the American people better informed of our views.

Canada is about to become again a member of the Security Council, and as such we are going to be called upon almost daily to express our opinions on current problems and to cast important and perhaps decisive votes. It is only fair that the government desist from its secretiveness and frankly take parliament and Canadians as a whole into its confidence with regard to its foreign policy.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, because of the internal problems caused by the helplessness of the government, and in the face of the deterioration of our image abroad, I do not hesitate at all to second wholeheartedly the motion of censure put forward by the leader of the opposition.

• (1230)

Mr. Raynald Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, it is very gratifying to speak after the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner, it gives me the opportunity to ask him whether his remarks truly reflect Progressive Conservative views rather than his own views. I am aware that at the time of the PC convention he put forward the same views, but his party did not accept them.

It is all very well to make fine speeches, to propose such fine principles in the name of the Progressive Conservative party. I am asking the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe the real purpose of his reference to the official languages. I know he is a Quebecker, but how can he refer to our two official languages when 17 members of his party voted against the Official Languages Act, along with Social Credit members who also voted against the same legislation on the basis that it was not enough. I honestly wonder if the principles referred to by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe are only principles he would like to see implemented. I know the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) will also speak on the subject, and I am convinced the principles stated by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe earlier are the same as those put forward by the hon. member for Moncton, who was not accepted but rejected by the Progressive Conservatives.

Mr. La Salle: What about Richardson?

Mr. Guay (Lévis): Mr. Richardson is still with us. He remained a Liberal for a questions of principle. I could refer to a number of resignations from the Progressive Conservative party. Resignations were among Progressive Conservative members for Quebec, who resigned and later returned to their party. I wonder why the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) rejoined that party. He wore the badge "Il y a du français dans l'air", which is very nice, but he rejoined the Progressive Conservation party after his colleagues voted against the official languages legislation. After a protracted debate on the Canadian flag it lasted for months and months on end, centering on Canadian unity it is a matter of record who voted against the Canadian flag. Some people simply reject the concept of a symbol for Canadian unity. Well, Mr Speaker, I would like to refer to the resignations from the Progressive Conservative party. There was the hon. Mr. Balcer for instance. What did he say about the Conservative party? And what did the hon. member for Joliette say the first time he resigned from the Progressive Conservative party? He simply indicated there was no room for a Quebecer in the Conservative party.

It has been the same for Mr. Justice Allard, the hon. member for Sherbrooke. He has said the same thing: There is no room. The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe has just resigned as the official spokesman for external affairs. The hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Lavoie) has been given no responsibility. He had to make a statement to the Progressive Conservative party. Because he is a Quebecer, he is given no responsibility. The hon. member for Joliette has been given the responsibility to be the official spokesman for a department which does not even exist. That is the situation. If you want to talk about resignation, let us talk about it, but really I would like to proceed to some more important matters.

I would like the hon. member for Joliette and the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe to ask their leader to give his definite opinion on the matter of the air controllers in the province of Quebec, that is on the matter of bilingualism. Why is it that on a certain occasion the leader of the opposition went to Quebec and told the air controllers he was prepared to meet them any time? But it seems that when he came back to Ottawa, the Conservative brain trust, the Tory brain trust told him: You will not meet the air controllers. And he did not meet them!

An hon. Member: Those are really petty details—

Mr. Guay (Lévis): Maybe so, but if the hon. member for Joliette really wants to make a speech, he can do so after I finish mine. If he wants to answer it, he can do so, but I also hope he will answer the questions I just put to him.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to turn to bilingualism. In 1970, during the debate on the establishment of the Ottawa National Arts Centre, I personally introduced an amendment that read as follows:

That in the appointment of members and officers of the Council, due consideration be given to the linguistic duality of Canada and its cultural plurality.

Mr. La Salle: I never heard of that.

Mr. Guay (Lévis): For which, I was practically called a racist by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) who was then leader of the opposition. I am quoting his very words:

. . . This is an amendment that is dangerous to Canada and to Canadians. It will divide Canadians on the basis of race.

This quotation appears on page 6252 of Hansard of June 10, 1966 and follows an amendment that I, a Quebecer, had put forward on bilingualism so that the bilingual and multicultural character of Canada might be recognized. Yet the Progressive Conservative Party has never approved any of those proposals which aimed at making this duality an acknowledge fact in Canada.

The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) made a big speech on the principle of national unity and I agree with him in theory. But when you consider facts, when you look around and go to the bottom of things, you cannot help notice the difference between the principles he advocated in his speech and the way they are implemented. Therefore I will now put one question to the only three French-speaking Progressive Conservative members, I will ask them what they are doing within that party.

Mr. La Salle: You are asking us?

Mr. Guay (Lévis): Before he leaves—for I see he is on his way out—the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe proposes a motion of confidence to know whether the government has the confidence of Parliament.

[Mr. Guay (Lévis).]

Mr. La Salle: It does not have it any more.

Mr. Guay (Lévis): I, for one, seriously wonder whether his leader has any confidence in him.

Mr. La Salle: Of course.

Mr. Guay (Lévis): I ask that question very seriously. But we do not have to hold a press conference about it. When you approve someone, you support him or you do not. You do not have to repeat every three months: I trust my leader! I trust my leader and I do not feel the need to repeat it every day.

• (1240)

Mr. Speaker, I will now proceed to some really practical matters of concern to Quebecers. When we talked some moments ago about the problem of air controllers, some people expressed doubts about the position held by some Liberal members from the Quebec area or elsewhere. I have just given an example when I said that the French position must not only be advocated in the air but also on the ground, and also within the Progressive Conservative Party. I believe the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe has quite a job to have the French position accepted within the Progressive Conservative Party.

Mr. La Salle: So does the Prime Minister!

Mr. Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, on last December 13, I received a telegram from a doctor in my constituency saying that the man in charge of the complaint office for Air Canada in the Place Ville-Marie Building in Montreal, Mr. Gotbold, was a unilingual English-speaking employee. So I do not think the problem of French is only in the air. However, I support the two government members who have fought a battle and who are still doing so, namely the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal) and the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané) who are doing an outstanding job to bring to their senses certain Crown corporations which seem to despise the laws and to make them abide by those laws.

As a Quebecer, I wonder, and I ask also the Quebecers within the Progressive Conservative Party, why we Quebecers have been asking every day for over 100 years the right to speak French in our own province. I do not know what would happen with English-speaking westerners if they had to wonder if they have the right to speak English at home. The problem is crucial. I want this country to remain united as much as the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe.

Those are, Mr. Speaker, principles and things that can be advocated in a very serene and very positive way. From which side of the House did the protests come? The outcry of indignation came from those two Liberal members, because in our party, there is no resignation, there is no giving up, there is no quitting because we disagree; there is room for struggle within our party and this is what the hon. members for Maisonneuve-Rosemont and Matane are doing. I will speak about that later. I also want to criticize the government but I will try to be positive, contrarily to the members of the official opposition to whom I have been listening these last days. Their speeches are negative. After this short digression, I will now speak about a program in which I and the people from my riding are greatly interested, namely the Local Initiatives Program.

I also had to fight within the department. The Department of Manpower is responsible for LIP and I never saw so many people disagreeing with a program. I take my riding as an example, and I could as well take many others such as Beauce or Lotbinière. I have never seen such a disagreement. My riding submitted 53 requests amounting to $1,400,000 and got a budget of $195,000 or 14 per cent of the requests.

Even if I were to accept 8 or 10 projects, I would deceive a lot of people. Never before has a program disappointed so many people. The publicity urged people to submit ideas. Maybe the leader of the opposition is the only one who has no ideas. People were told: If you have ideas tell them to the manpower centre; if you are creative, come to the manpower centre. People were often invited through a publicity that I consider perhaps not misleading but at least abusive. When you whet appetites, you have to satisfy them. The government must find the moneys required and, if it does not have them, then I agree that it should do away with LIP and implement a program to create jobs, not for 30 weeks, but on a permanent basis.

I know that, in the Speech from the Throne, and I am very happy about it, there are recommendations to that effect. The minister will make recommendations with a view to creating jobs, to promote creativity, and that means creating permanent employment. With the Opportunities for Youth program, we had exactly the same problem. If the riding of Lévis is granted 10 projects, on the assumption that, in the summer, four to ten students will work for each one of them, we will quit going over the same ground all the time. In fact, this is a race. I was visited by those who work on those projects, a delegation of 53 persons; I had 53 telephone calls from malcontents. Not that I am afraid of that but when one has whetted appetites, one has to see to it that they are satisfied.

I shall now speak of another recommendation. I spoke of integrating the students in community projects. I have been struggling for a long time now to obtain that those students who want to work in industry can do so. I myself lived through that experience. I have asked the unions several times to include in their collective agreements a stipulation whereby, even though a student is not a member of the union, the company is authorized to hire him. A given industry could hire a dozen students during the summer time and so enable them to pay for their studies.

Many other topics could be dealt with. One of them will interest several of my fellow-citizens of the province of Quebec, specially in the agricultural ridings. As a member for a Quebec riding, I am particularly concerned about the absence, in the Speech from the Throne, of any mention of the reforms to be brought in the field of agriculture, and the dairy policy. In Quebec, milk producers will be faced with bankruptcy in the near future unless the present policy is changed. On the one hand, the producers are penalized for exceeding their quotas; on the other hand, and I am very well informed about this matter, the producers are short of milk if they want to achieve full capacity. That is the ridiculous contradiction the present system produces. We have lost face enough before our fellow-citizens. I hope the government will have understood this. I dare hope that the Cabinet will put forward the proposals formulated by the Quebec caucus which had been supported by the caucus of the other provinces, particularly for the increase in milk quotas, which would partly solve the problem of the penalties imposed on surpluses for those who have been unjustly and unfairly treated.

Mr. Speaker, there is another subject alluded to in the Speech from the Throne: unemployment insurance. As I said to the Progressive Conservative hon. member who was here earlier, I do not want to make a negative speech. As far as the Unemployment Insurance Act is concerned, it is really extraordinary to note the number of cases we have to pass on to our secretaries in riding offices for solution. I know that we are about to amend the act. For the average man, this act is not really clear. It is incomprehensible.

The government should provide people with a summary of the rights and obligations of beneficiaries, that whenever there is a dismissal, a lay off or a termination of employment the employer be compelled to hand a certificate which would have to be produced. I have witnessed very pitiful cases during summer and in more than a year. People are not informed and I think we will have to do something. Indeed it would be a very practical solution. When an employee is fired, the employer hands him his unemployment insurance book with a summary of this law to inform him clearly of his right and obligations.

I felt therefore I had to make such a recommendation to the government and I hope it will act on it in the near future. In any case, whenever the Unemployment Insurance Act comes up for discussion and amendment I shall participate in the debate in a very positive way and make recommendations to the government.

I will now turn to another subject and I will be very short, Mr. Speaker. I hope this will be the last time I rise on the issue. In the nearly fourteen years that I have been sitting in this place, I remember having fought battles along with the hon. member for Langelier (Mr. Marchand) even before he was elected to this House. I led a battle about coastal shipping and the merchant marine.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that people have been preparing reports, making studies and asking questions for quite some time. I, for one, gave notice of a motion to urge the government to implement the recommendations of the Darling Report on the merchant marine. And I know very well that in a very near future a common front—a formula dear to unions—will gather across Canada to revive the debate on the merchant marine issue.

I request the government to appoint somebody for the examination of all those things. I know that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) has already dealt with those issues. I know that the Department of Industry is considering their consequences. I know that the Department of Finance is involved. In fact, it seems to me that no one is responsible. That is what I ask with much insistance. I hope it is for the last time. If we do not want a merchant marine, I want the government to say so to the Canadian people and we will forget about it, period. Let no one tell us there will be further studies will be made. No. And if the government does not know the Darling Report recommendations, I could repeat them.

In an industrial country like Canada, with the longest rivers in the world, we have no merchant marine. We own no ship. We are an exporting country and we have no merchant marine.

Lately I got many telegrams from various shipyards. We no longer have the policy we used to have. The STAP program gave assistance for building ships ordered by foreign countries. Subsidies amount to approximately 17 per cent whereas they previously reached 40 per cent. This program was discontinued. What is the future of our shipyards? In my area, a shipyard has already closed. I remember quite well when it happened because it was during an electoral campaign: 1,000 people were suddenly out of work. Does this government plan to do the same thing with other shipyards? And mine is not the only area where this problem can surface. It is going to affect every shipyard all over the country. And we know for a fact that over 12,000 people—I say 12,000—in Quebec and Ontario alone I think are employed in shipbuilding.

So, Mr. Speaker, the cabinet will have to be more united, better coordinated if the responsibility is to be entrusted to someone who, in accordance with the recommendations of the Darling report, will recommend to us, Canadians, that we have our own merchant marine. The recommendations of the Darling report on coastal shipping were implemented. I remember it quite well. In a year or two, the matter will be closed. Coastal shipping and a merchant marine were always at issue.

We made our point. And I am convinced that the government will listen and take my remarks into consideration. Let them read the report once again and abstain from asking for still another report and further studies. That is what I said at a recent union meeting of shipyard workers. Do not submit to me any more reports to convince me that we need a merchant marine in Canada, because I am convinced. And that is the question I put to the government. I am convinced that a decision must be made. If it looks fully into all the recommendations of the Darling report, the government will have no choice but to set up a body, a Ministry of State, or to appoint a minister to implement the recommendations. We are not asking for an affirmative answer today or that two, three, four, five, six or ten billion dollars be appropriated overnight, but that a schedule be drawn up so that we may know where we stand. That is the question I put to the government because not only is it vital to the survival of shipyards and shipbuilding in Canada but it is also vital for a country as industrialized as ours, as I said earlier, an exporting country, to have a merchant marine when other small countries have their own. Our prestige would be enhanced on the international level.

The Liberal government was able to understand the needs of our economy in the past, with regard to coastal shipping for instance, and when it created the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in 1968. I want to commend the government because the riding of Lévis and the Quebec City area are among those in Canada which have benefited the most from those job-creating grants. The minister will speak about job creating, but I think of that assistance program designed to extend update businesses or set up new ones, and I only regret that not enough funds are provided.

I know that the farmers are going to protest. I already mentioned that but only with regard to the dairy policy. Dairy farmers get $631 or $632 million from the government in the form of loans and grants, which represents close to one quarter billion dollars. However, the DREE estimates barely amount to $500 million.

Therefore, I am convinced that the present minister is doing an exceptional job. He has visited every province. Some industries should not be refused assistance for lack of funds. This is what happens in the case of LIP projects. It happened for the student assistance programs. So, let the programs be publicized, but if needs are to be created, those needs should be met.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being one o'clock p.m., I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Before beginning the speech I wish to make this afternoon, I should like to congratulate you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, on your reappointment this session and to express my congratulations, also, to the hon. member for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell (Mr. Ethier) who has joined you and who yesterday for the first time took his place in the chair presiding over the deliberations of this chamber. I can speak for my colleagues in this party and, I am sure, for members of all parties in this House when I say that the appointments to which I have referred are richly deserved and we look forward to working with you as this session continues.

I should also like to say here in the chamber what I have said directly to the mover and seconder of the address in reply, the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) and the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance), that is, to offer them my congratulations for the honour accorded to them and on the manner in which they delivered their speeches. Although those hon. members sit on the other side of the House and we have our disagreements from time to time, I am glad to say that their families who were here to watch from the gallery on that occasion, as well as their constituents who will no doubt read the speeches when they are distributed, have reason to be proud of the way in which this responsibility was discharged.

I should like, also, to join my leader in paying tribute to the Governor General of Canada and his lady. Anyone who has watched the struggle of a loved one to recover from the devastation of a stroke, as I did in the case of my own mother, cannot fail to be moved by that man's persistence and courage in the face of adversity. I think, too, of the support and encouragement which Madam Leger is giving her husband on every occasion, particularly on this occasion, the most public of all, the opening of parliament.

The past months have been eventful months indeed, particularly the months since October 12, 1975, when the Liberal government embraced the controls they had damned in the course of the election campaign. Those months have been a devastating experience for the government—perhaps in the minds of many people that is not too unfortunate—but they have also been a devastating experience for the public generally. In support of this statement I am not relying on public opinion polls, although one cannot completely discount them.

Nor do I rely on the opinions of columnists who hon. gentlemen opposite may judge to be unfriendly toward them. Rather, I rely on what I see before my eyes—a government which is lurching from crisis to crisis, important ministers leaving, or being left to occupy either of the extreme ends of the front benches, the space which has been described as the St. Helena or the Elba of the Privy Council. I shall not easily forget the look on the faces of the supporters of the government when they were justifiably flayed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) on Wednesday.

What has happened to this administration, Mr. Speaker, is that it has played the power game, and played it for the sake of the game rather than using the rules of the game for the purpose for which the game was created, and that is to govern and lead. It was not always so with this government, but it has become abundantly clear now that that is the level to which it has fallen.

I would not want you to think that the government does not have its apologists. It does have them in abundance, but within the once great Liberal party there are thoughtful people at the grass roots in a constituency like Ottawa-Carleton or St. John's West who are standing back and are shocked by what has happened to the party which brought forth the likes of Laurier and St. Laurent, the latter whom we honoured this morning. They are turning away from the party in despair, and in droves. These apologists grasp at straws to justify this fall from grace. They will tell you that this Gethsemane through which they are passing is some form of martyrdom, when it is really the result of a failure of vision and loss of a sense of purpose and a sense of vitality that a sense of purpose can bring to any government.

I am, quite frankly, alarmed as a Canadian that some of these apologists would adopt the simplistic approach that the only reason for unpopularity is that the country is against bilingualism and the Anti-Inflation Board. To say that in respect of bilingualism is to say that the majority of Canadians are prepared to deny the sense of equity, fairness and justice that is, and was, the purpose of the Official Languages Act. That position, if that is the position of the government which has been expressed by some of its apologists, most notably and recently by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), is hypocritical at very best.

That is not to say that Canadians are not upset by the way the government has chosen to implement the principle in some areas. The public service of Canada has felt the sting of its stupidity, the double-talk, changing statistics, the force-feeding, the overzealous designation of positions, all of which has taken place because the government has been out of touch with reality for a long period of time. They ignored the warnings of their friends, and even the man I defeated was one of those. They ignored the warnings of Keith Spicer, a servant of this House, and they paid half a million dollars to Professor Bibeau to be told that which every public servant knew, that the program, though well-intentioned, was misdirected; and when the chips are down, and that is their equivalent to the Gallup poll statistics, they suddenly flip-flop.

Look at the words in the Speech from the Throne. The government would leave the impression with us, from those words, that it intends to treat the public service with the benign neglect that Mr. Spicer suggested. The throne speech implies that the pace of implementation will slacken—and I use the world "implies" advisedly—while just a few days earlier, in that true confession session in a hotel in Toronto, the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) said it could not slacken. I quote from the Ottawa Citizen of October 4, which states:

> Mr. Roberts also says a slowdown in the rate at which bilingualism is being implemented in the public service would be a severe blow to national unity.

More double-talk. I have spoken many times in the House and outside about this matter. I represent a large number of public servants. There are certainly other problems in the public service, and I have spoken about them as well.

It is a fact that morale is low in our public service. It should be high, but it is not. The great majority of literally thousands of letters and telephone calls I have received and discussions that I have had with public servants tell me that the public service has accepted the principle of the Official Languages Act which, put simply, is that an English-speaking Canadian in Hamilton and a French-speaking Canadian in Chicoutimi have the right to address and be addressed in one or other of the official languages by their government. The public servant does not need Professor Bibeau to inform him or her that the scope and extent of designation is out of proportion to the need, that the language teaching system is unsound, that the usefulness of training on the job was at best overrated, and that the cost in dollar terms and in human terms demands some change.

I do not know how many times a government has to be told this, but surely no reasonable person would suggest that to question doubtful implementation procedures is equivalent to a denial of the principle. Here we have the case of the throne speech saying one thing and a minister of the Crown saying another. Is it any wonder there is skepticism? Is it any wonder that anyone who has witnessed the performance of this government in the sensitive area of implementation in the public service could be anything but at least skeptical?

If, as we expected, in the course of the debate there is an enlargement of the so-called assurances in the Speech from the Throne, the public service will not accept them now. That is the position we have come to. They accept them for what they are, and that is words, sir—mere words. That is why the commitment to examine the concerns about implementation given by the Leader of the Opposition the other day is so important in the national capital and in the nation itself.

The plain truth of the matter is that if there is any relationship in the field of language to the problem of national unity, and I think there is some, the problems began not with the passage of the statute, in my judgment, but with the methods used by the government to implement the principle. If there is to be any lessening of the difficulties in terms of national unity—and I respectfully suggest that any government worth its salt would re-examine its position in terms of implementation—well, we will see what this government says but, more important, we will want to see what this government does.

I read on in the speech and noticed that the government had been smitten with a sudden revelation that the place to learn a second language was first in the schools with the young people, rather than those who have advanced to the middle and later years. The government did not need Professor Bibeau to tell it that. It did not need Keith Spicer, either, to tell it that. The parents in the national capital area and the parents in this country as a whole could have told the government that just as well. Even the government's opponents were telling it that.

What has been the government's commitment in the past to this important part of the bilingual policy? To be sure, money is being spent on language training in the schools, but it is pitifully small in terms of the magnitude of the problem. However, it is being spent. But can this government be trusted here? I do not know, and I am sure there is some skepticism among the four boards of education in the national capital area based on the performance of this government. No sooner did it have the boards committed to a very important experimental training program, the results of which would have been in use all over this country—and that was the intention—those boards, having based their commitment on a commitment of funds from the federal government, the federal government denied the boards a source of funds.

This has had a profound effect on language training in the national capital, on the people in that program and on the future of language training. If past performance is any guide to us, then it is a shaky foundation upon which to build any faith in this government, even in that area. Again we will have to wait for the performance.

Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) spoke in Toronto of national unity. The real blow to national unity has been this government's attitude that it was always right when events have shown that it is almost always wrong. It assumed that bilingualism was the only vehicle for national unity. Certainly it is an important one, but not to the exclusion of other considerations. The leader of our party mentioned the problem of regional disparity respecting unity. The whole transportation problem facing Canada will affect national unity. Lack of an energy policy will have an effect on national unity. The ease with which the federal government backs out of cost-sharing programs, without so much as a fare thee well, affects national unity. The medicare scheme is a good example of that.

The surprises in the federal taxation, imposed without consultation, on resources in this country have an effect on national unity. The failure of this government to tackle disparity in terms of decentralizing productive industrial capacity will affect national unity. Language is not the only factor in national unity, but because of the preoccupation of this government with language, its tunnel-vision approach to the question of national unity, and our feelings about ourselves it has suffered considerably at its hands.

The other excuse upon which the apologists for this administration rely to explain their fall from grace is the suggestion that Canadians are against the war on inflation. Mr. Speaker, that is as simplistic as it is untrue. Canadians are not against the war on inflation. They are against the deceit—and they were deceived by a government that said one thing when it asked for a mandate and acted in another way when the country gave it that mandate. Canadians have no time for such a fraudulent performance. This is what they are really telling the government by virtue of the opinion polls and by any other indicator which one would like to use. Even the defectors from the government, and there have been a number, are telling them the same thing.

Mr. Speaker, if this government had any political character to begin with, it has now lost it and that character has been replaced by political expendiency and a litany of failure. The most obvious failure, of course, is to stem the stampede of ministers out of the ranks. Or one could choose this government's attitude to scandal, the sheer cosmetic quality of its approaches to the problems facing Canada. I make no comments on the reasons for the resignation of the Minister of National Defence except to say that his constitutional theories, at least as they relate to numbers, are questionable. But his leaving, the time he chose to leave and the circumstances under which he made this announcement, are significant. While his action may be judged by some as premature or for the wrong reasons, the act of leaving is itself an indication of the extent of the rot in this government.

Mr. Speaker, I spoke a few moments ago about national unity, the importance of it to our country and the importance of it, as well, to our capacity to tackle the things that must be tackled if the legitimate aspirations of the people of Canada are to be met. It is a fact, I think—I believe I can state this safely—that even a government dedicated to disunity could not have done a better job than this government. For some reason or other the present administration has forgotten how our country came about.

It was not forged in revolution, like the United States. It did not cast off any bonds at the beginning. It came together by agreement, or at least by consensus and understanding, because there were some reluctant participants at the outset, as you know, Mr. Speaker.

Since there was consensus in 1867 and before that, a good case was made for creating a nation in the northern half of North America. The fact that it came together by agreement and consultation, compromise and understanding, has made our confederation a very delicate thing indeed. Mr. Speaker, our confederation will continue to exist only so long as those elements of compromise, understanding, agreement and consensus exist in the minds of those who have authority in the various jurisdictions of our country. Even if we would wish it otherwise, the geography of the country, the relative isolation and population in Canada, the fact it is stretched across a rather thin line in terms of the vastness of the land, made a federal state relevant to the Fathers of Confederation, and that relevance continues today.

Federalism, as we know it in Canada, as it was conceived at the outset, is not to be subjected to confrontation, and yet that has been the principle weapon of this government in dealing with the provinces. And much of the distrust of the federal government springs from the use of that element as a tool in federal-provincial relations. I view a federal state as one in which it is possible for a strong central government to work in concert with strong provincial governments. But somehow or other the equation of confederation has gone out of balance. The atmosphere has been poisoned by the emotionalism of the threat of unilateral patriation.

I do not foresee the situation developing very quickly where the provinces will agree on the terms and conditions for amendment of the constitution, the British North America Act. But that is no reason these discussions ought not to go on. It is obvious from all reports that there has been some progress, but I am concerned about the fears expressed by Senator Forsey that unilateral patriation, without an amending formula, will put us in a constitutional straitjacket which could make it difficult for us to meet changing problems in a world where the velocity of change is almost overwhelming.

It goes without saying, as the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wager) said this morning, that this party does not fear the homecoming of the constitution, if one could call it that; far from it. But the government seems intent on moving ahead with or without the consent of the provinces. I would rather the government cooled it. The atmosphere is not right and I have some doubts about this government's ability to change, and the feeling is growing in Canada that there will be no change until the government itself is changed.

There is nothing about our confederation that would not make it subject to the change in attitude that was suggested by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). Perhaps it is time there was a government in Canada that would not begin its approaches to the question of federal-provincial relations from the premise that the necessary condition of negotiation is conflict. There will be differences of opinion, to be sure, but conflict and mistrust can so poison the atmosphere of negotiation that meaningful negotiations are impossible to undertake.

Mr. Speaker, it is more than merely notable that the man who came to Ottawa to save us from ourselves in 1968, as he says from time to time, has presided over the period of the greatest unrest and conflict in our history. His preoccupation with one policy, language, as the cement of confederation, to the neglect of all other considerations, has turned that cement into a wedge which is endangering our feelings toward one another. I regret that state of affairs in terms of the life of my country.

Mr. Speaker, there is one last thing I want to say. It is this same government that has proven itself so untrustworthy in so many ways that will shortly ask the House to amend its rules and Standing Orders so as to make members the handmaiden of the government; to make this a place for the expedition of government business to the exclusion of its real purpose, that of a forum for the discussion of public affairs.

Mr. MacFarlane: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I should like to remind the hon. member that we both sit on the same committee, under instructions from the House to deal with these matters, not under instructions from the government.

An hon. Member: I have never heard such nonsense.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I share the concern of the hon. member, but I wish he would let me finish my speech; then perhaps we can give him unanimous consent to make a contribution of his own.

The Speech from the Throne spoke of broadcasting the proceedings of parliament and other changes in this place. There is a much more fundamental need, that is, a change in the attitude of this government to the right of Canadians to know. The throne speech made no commitment for a freedom of information act. In fact, it contains an evasion. If the speech indicates anything at all, it is that this obsession with secrecy will continue while a study is pursued. I could approach the possibility of rule changes with much more equanimity if I knew that this government was committed to the concept of a freedom of information act in the terms that the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) has worked so diligently and so well to achieve.

Charles Lynch has said—I do not often quote Charles Lynch, but I will now; sometimes he is right, and he was right yesterday in his column—that this government is the most secretive in the western world. I believe he is correct. The Rudnicki case—the case of a public servant wronged by his employer—contains an indication of how far this government is prepared to go in terms of secrecy.

The former minister of labour, the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell), spoke of the necessity for instituting the machinery to examine on a long-term basis the estimates of government, not only in terms of future programs but in terms of the achievement of past programs. I suggest that that concept, without a freedom of information act, would be almost meaningless. When I look back to 1968, this same government under this Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), came before the people and exhibited a sense of purpose and fairness and held out to the Canadian people a promise of equity, justice, compassion and concern. Today, as I look across the floor, I see that not only has this government become a shambling collection of the once great, at least in the minds of some, but it has debased its mandate. Whatever the result of the confidence vote in this chamber may be, the government, does not have the confidence and trust of the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It is regrettable that the people of Canada cannot express themselves except in the limited way in which they will next week.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have heard many speeches in the House about the difficulties of this government and the way we face these problems, but very few clear statements on where we should go and what we should do. I feel there is a lack of understanding of the complexities of the times. It is all very well to say that the government should increase or decrease the money supply, or play around with fiscal arrangements, and with simple answers can straighten out all kinds of problems. These things do not work today because these times are not the kind of times we had in the 1960s, and I am waiting for some concrete suggestions from the opposition as to how to deal with today's problems.

I suspect that the opposition is not really cognizant of the kinds of problems that are faced by governments throughout the world today. These are not ordinary times; they are unique times. Let me give two examples of the uniqueness of these times. We have never had the kind of inflation we have today, which is worldwide, and at the same time high unemployment. These things, in classic economic terms do not go together, yet they exist throughout the world and in this country at present, and as a matter of fact we are doing a good deal better than most countries to resolve these conflicting problems. I am sure that most of us grew up with the myth that there are unlimited resources and all we have to do is to get those resources developed. But all of a sudden we have a totally new concept which has come into play in the last four or five years, namely, that there is a limit to our resources, that there are severe limits to our energy resources, for example.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

So these are unique times, and we have to think in terms of the problems, not just carping. Let me deal for a moment with inflation. As I said, we have had this type of inflation at least since the early 1970s and it is quite unique. It is global in its implications. It is a fact that certainly all the OECD countries and the western and industrialized countries, as well as the third and fourth worlds, are affected by this inflation. It is something with which we have to come to grips.

We have been accused of deceiving the public in the 1974 election. We did not buy the kind of program that the Tories were peddling, namely a 90-day total freeze. But at the end of the 90 days I suppose the world was going to come to an end because there were no suggestions as to where to go after that. We said there was a contingency. Let us analyse the year 1974. I believe the government has been at fault in one respect, in that we had not gone to the public to justify fully why in 1974 we did not do something which we did in 1975. I think there is a good justification for this.

Let us look at the situation in 1974. We had a period of prolonged demand inflation, inflation caused by a shortage of goods both nationally and globally. It was the kind of period which would be worsened by controls, and these are what the U.S. government applied in 1972. This created unbelievable problems, because the problem was not cost, it was demand. In mid-1974 this started to change. I might say one other thing about the time before mid-1974. Wages were not a major factor in inflation at that time; wages were lagging behind. Between the summer of 1974 and the late summer of 1975 wages began to be a factor in inflation. Costs became a factor in inflation more than before, especially costs within Canada. In the first half of 1975 wage settlements were running at an average of slightly less than 22 per cent, 21.8 per cent to be exact. Beginning to escalate into the inflationary situation was a severe cost-push problem.

That is a very different kind of inflation from the type we had in early 1974, and I think it is important that people begin to realize that. What would the Tories have done in 1974? They would have had a three months freeze, and then presumably everything would have gone away. Of course, it would not have gone away because this is a worldwide problem which has to be handled in conjunction with a whole series of other problems.

Let me talk a little about what we tried to do before we brought in controls, because this government, with the previous finance minister, made a serious effort to bring about voluntary compliance of the trade union movement and the industrial leaders of this country, but they were not successful. In September of 1975 we were faced with a whole series of wage demands which were beginning to become ridiculous, such as 71 per cent in the Post Office and over 40 per cent for Quebec teachers to catch up with the Ontario teachers who were asking for another 40 per cent. There were demands of 50 per cent, 60 per cent and 70 per cent, and these were the things we were facing.

What is a government to do? Economists throughout the country were saying that we must have some kind of control period, and so we did. What is the nature of that control period? First, we decided basically not to control prices because that is a very, very difficult thing to do over a long period, and we certainly were not going into a short control period. In my opinion, that would have created only trouble. It would have created a tight scene and then we would have had the kind of distortions which took place in the United States after 1972.

So we decided there had to be a way to control prices indirectly; without that, having an army of people administering the controls. walking into major stores and seeing how many items would have to be controlled, would not work. We assumed that this is a free enterprise system, that there was a market and that where there was good competition there should not be much problem. What did we try to do? We tried to control the two things which are factors in terms of cost. One of them is wages and the other is profits. The Tories say we should not control profits and the members of the NDP say we should not control wages, but nobody tells us what we should do. Nobody makes any suggestions except to say that we should not do this or that.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Try resigning.

Mr. McRae: What has happened? I mentioned that in the first half of 1975 the average wage settlement was in the area of 22 per cent, or 21.8 per cent. The second quarter of 1976, which is the last quarter for which we have figures, shows wage increases of around 12 per cent. There is a decrease, there is no question about that. Since controls, profits also have decreased on the average by about 7 per cent to 8 per cent, so those two things have been controlled.

What about prices? Prices have gone, from an average increase in the year before controls of something like 11 per cent, to an average increase of something like 6.5 per cent. Hon. members immediately say that that is because of food and that food is not controlled. It certainly is controlled. It is not controlled at the farm gate, but if 60 per cent of the cost is after the farm gate—and I hear hon. members using these figures—and goes to the producer, the distributor, the packager, the advertiser, and so on, these are certainly costs; and taking food and everything else into consideration we are now down to 6.5 per cent.

While wage increases are now at 11 per cent and 12 per cent, inflation—that is, the cost of living—has come down to 6.5 per cent, and that is basically the total cost of living. So there has been a successful period. Allowing for inflation and for some extra productivity, basically speaking the workingman today is better off than he was a year ago, and the person on a fixed income, such as the senior citizen, is considerably better off than he would have been had we not gone into controls. So I do not understand why the country is so upset.

It seems to me that the control period has worked. But that is not the only thing we have to talk about, because inflation is not the only economic problem facing this country. We have the problem of high unemployment, and this is something we have not solved. We are doing much better in the inflation field than we are in the employment field, but even so this nation has created more jobs per capita than any other country among the OECD countries. Between 1971 and the third quarter of 1975 we produced something over 19 per cent new jobs, so for every four people who were working in 1971 there are now five working in Canada.

The United States only produced 8 per cent more jobs, and that is one of the best figures. Our labour force has grown at a tremendous rate, partially because of the post-war baby boom and partially because of the fact that the number of women in the labour force has grown substantially. I have a figure here with regard to the proportion of women in the labour force between the ages of 25 and 44. In 1953 the figure was 23 per cent and in 1974 it was 47 per cent.

We have too much unemployment in this country, and in the next year we have to do a great deal more in terms of creating jobs both in the private sector and, I believe, in the public sector, because I do not think we will create jobs in the private sector at the rate we need to create them. We will have to do something about our 7 per cent unemployment rate; we will have to bring it down. But just the same, among all the OECD countries Canada has by far the best record in terms of job creation.

If it were just a simple matter of jobs and inflation, perhaps we could solve all our problems locally, and perhaps even the Tories could handle it; they probably could manage. But the scene is not just a simple matter of inflation or creating jobs; the interplay between inflation and the creation of jobs is a problem. If we do the things we really need to do to bring the unemployment rate down to 2 per cent or 3 per cent, we will seriously affect the inflation aspect; and if we let inflation go too far, we will create more unemployment.

We have serious problems in these areas, but I think we must talk about other areas. For instance, we must talk about the world resource scene and particularly the energy scene. I am not speaking in terms of amounts of BTUs lying around but, rather, in terms of the financial aspect. We have about seven years' reserves of crude oil in the western basin. There are very improbable supplies in the north and on the offshore islands. There is nothing to speak of, or nothing which is worth going after. There are growing shortages of gas.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. McRae: You tell me where these supplies are. We are not going to be self-sufficient in the next few years, or perhaps more. There are some supplies in the tar sands, but the costs there are astronomical, and this is what I am here to talk about. I am not talking about the total situation in terms of energy, because there always was energy, but I am talking about the energy which must be put in and the dollars which must be put in to get the energy out. That is where we are going to be in trouble.

Last spring it was estimated—I heard a much higher estimate recently—that in the next 15 years we will need over $180 billion of capital just to maintain a 3.5 per cent energy growth rate. If we drop below that, of course, we will not need that amount of money. That $180 million, amortized in any reasonable fashion, would mean that we are talking about $3,000 per family unit, roughly what a family now pays for a house per year, in today's dollars. These are some of the problems. Where are we going to get that $180 billion capital plus another $400 billion or $500 billion capital which we need for other things? Just to increase the money supply or to play around with fiscal policy will not provide solutions. This is far more complex than people realize, and I think it is up to members of this House, on the government side and on the opposition side, to consider these problems seriously and not just criticize.

We have some very severe balance of payments problems. Our balance of payments current account is running about $5 billion in the red. There are those who say that foreign capital is a great thing and I agree. It built this country, but it still costs us close to $3 billion per year to service that capital. We are running about $43 billion in the red, in net terms. That is the money we owe to other countries. These are some of the things we have to face.

Then there is another very bad international scene—a very difficult international scene for any government to come to grips with. There has been a tremendous increase in the number and size of global corporations and the amount of liquid assets that are beyond the call of national governments. The United States Senate finance committee calculated that in 1973 these assets were between $150 billion and $260 billion, and that the total assets of global corporations were 1½ to 2 times the size of the total liquid assets of national governments and their national banks, and that these liquid assets were able to move very rapidly; they had a great deal more mobility than the assets of national banks or even of groups like the International Monetary Fund.

There was the problem of the whole trend of worldwide inflation being changed because of the mobility of the assets of the global corporations. One can look at the descent of the pound sterling and ask to what extent is the inability of the International Monetary Fund and the inability of the national banks to control the movement of funds responsible.

I point out these facts to show that there are very complex problems that must be dealt with. There are no simple answers, and the answers that might have worked in the sixties do not work today. I ask opposition parties to start dealing with these problems and not just watch the Gallup polls or just criticize without offering solutions.

When we say that controls may be a bad thing, or say that we should get out of controls, we should look at what might happen when they end. We should look not only at the problem of inflation but at all the other factors which are difficult to control. I say these are very complex times, Mr. Speaker. Now is not the time to be negative; it is the time for all of us to start looking for solutions.

I should like to take the last five minutes or so of my time to speak about the role of the Department of National Health and Welfare and to make one or two comments on the Speech from the Throne and what the department will be doing with respect to the provinces. I should like to comment on the initiatives being taken by this government to map out and institute new and innovative financial and administrative arrangements between the federal and the provincial governments in the areas of medical insurance, hospital insurance and post-secondary education.

These programs have developed on the basis of open-ended cost-sharing arrangements whereby the federal government effectively matched the expenditures by provinces. The key word is "open-ended". This was an effective means to encourage the development of these programs and to make them available on a Canada-wide basis. There have been some difficulties, however, as the provinces have had problems restraining program costs in fields where a dollar of expenditure automatically generates 50 cents of additional federal contributions.

As a result of the problems in constraining costs under open-ended cost-sharing, the federal government has had to impose limits on the rate of increase of federal contributions to medical care—as we did with Bill C-68—and to post-secondary education and has served notice that the agreements under hospital insurance will come to an end in 1980. All of these actions have complicated provincial planning for the future as they are uncertain about the future level of federal participation in these programs.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) outlined to the provinces at the June 14-15, 1976, conference of first ministers a broad new approach for providing federal contributions to the major shared-cost programs. Under this proposal the federal government will continue to pay a substantial share of the medical insurance, hospital insurance and post-secondary education program costs. But the federal contribution will be paid in a manner that does not distort provincial priorities, that will encourage the provinces to effect cost constraint in these programs, and will not involve the federal government in open-ended spending commitments. Fundamentally, the established programs' financing arrangement would determine the federal government contribution independent of provincial program expenditures and on a basis that would result in greater equality in the per capita contribution made to the provinces by the federal government.

This movement away from open-ended cost-sharing for these established programs will substantially improve this government's ability to plan its own expenditure. At the same time, the provinces will have much greater flexibility in the use of their own funds and in the planning of their programs. For example, in the health field there will no longer be concern about whether or not a particular health service is shareable.

This added flexibility will assist them in providing the most appropriate and cost-efficient system of health services for Canadians.

A much more detailed outline of the principles and structure of the established programs' financing proposal is contained in the Prime Minister's statement presented to the provinces at the meeting referred to earlier. I should like to add several comments that are of particular relevance to the federal government's involvement in the health field.

Under established programs' financing there will continue to be a substantial federal contribution to health program costs and a substantial component of this contribution will be in the form of cash. In addition, and I should like to stress this point, there will continue to be basic health insurance program objectives of the type currently used for medical care embodied in replacement federal health legislation. These objectives are—and I have taken this reference directly from the Prime Minister's statement—comprehensiveness of coverage with regard to services; universality of coverage with regard to people; portability of benefits; accessibility to services uninhibited by excessive user charges, and non-profit administration by a public agency. It is intended that these basic program objectives will be retained within a more flexible and less administratively detailed federal-provincial financial arrangement than currently exists.

Second, I should like to comment on the timing for the full involvement of the health programs under established programs' financing. The current agreements for hospital insurance between the two orders of government are not scheduled to terminate until 1980. If the provinces wish to retain these agreements until that time, the health programs will not be fully brought under established programs' financing until this government's obligations under the hospital insurance agreements have been fulfilled. There is no danger of our going out of it until the date when the programs come to an end. It was clear, because of the variety of termination dates for the major shared-cost programs, that there would have to be a gradual introduction of the new financial and administrative arrangements.

Finally, with respect to the health field, it should be noted that this government will continue to pursue policies which attack some of the underlying causes of ill health in Canada. We will continue to encourage Canadians to adopt a lifestyle that maintains their good health. Operation Lifestyle, and information to discourage the excessive use of alcohol, are examples of steps that this government is taking to promote the retention of good health by Canadians.

In summary, it is the intent of this government to map out and begin to institute during this session a new financial and administrative arrangement for medical insurance, hospital insurance and post-secondary education. The established programs' financing proposal will both facilitate cost constraint and will provide the provinces with the necessary flexibility to provide appropriate but cost-efficient health and post-secondary education programs.

I should like to conclude my remarks by reiterating our concern about open-ended cost programs, about government expenditures, about the health of Canadians, about preventive medicine, about preventive health care, which we think is extremely important, and to mention some of the proposed programs such as the anti-alcohol program.

I should also like to ask all members of the House, regardless of their party, to be much more thoughtful when looking at Canada's economic future, to be much more thoughtful in terms of the very basic problems this country has to face and, to be more thoughtful in terms of understanding the limits to which any government of this country can go; given this kind of understanding of, for instance, the great shortage of capital that is going to face us in the next 15 years, I ask hon. members to move ahead with a real effort to explain to the people of Canada the complexities of these times. We should explain that we are not dealing with the relatively simple times of the sixties, but with complex problems of the seventies which will not be solved without a great deal of assistance from all concerned and more understanding on the part of the Canadian people.

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, may I join with my colleagues in expressing congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) and the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance). They deserve a compliment for their courage in supporting a document as empty as the Speech from the Throne.

I listened with great interest to the previous speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. McRae). Having listened to his economic theories, I am of opinion that he might have written that part of the throne speech which examined the alternatives and came down clearly between two stools, in a surprising show of clairvoyance on behalf of the government.

I compliment those who made it to the cabinet for the first time. The appointees from British Columbia unfortunately seem not to have made it to the first rung of the ladder; they are half way up to the first rung. The duties of the new Minister of State responsible for amateur sport (Mrs. Campagnolo) seem to be somewhat divided. One part consists of being a hired pistol for the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde); the other of being a campaigner in British Columbia. It is known as being underemployed, considering the ability the hon. member has shown in her previous position as parliamentary secretary.

Before I talk about my usual subject, defence, I want to mention something concerning health and welfare which the parliamentary secretary and the Minister of State responsible for fitness and amateur sport both left out of their speeches. The omission was glaring. I am referring to the reciprocity of pensions.

Last April 14, six months and one day ago, the Minister of National Health and Welfare saw fit to rise in his place and, in a speech filled with his usual, fulsome self-praise, stated that he wished to announce the government's intention to submit to parliament in the coming months legislation amending the Old Age Security Act. According to the minister, parliament would be asked to adopt measures, to build into our program the possibility for the inclusion of rights in international reciprocal arrangements with other countries such as Italy, the United States, and the United Kingdom, so that our residents who have earned social security rights in other countries can receive them in Canada. Last Wednesday, as reported at page 19 of Hansard, the minister, answering the question of my colleague from Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), said that the bill to negotiate reciprocity of pensions between Canada and several other countries, including the United Kingdom, is being drafted. He said:

> ... I hope I will be able to table it in the House for first reading in the next few months.

Six months ago he hoped to prepare the bill in the next few months; now, six months later, he hopes to be ready for first reading in the next few months. Even more alarming was the minister's answer to the supplementary question of the hon. member for Hamilton West. He said:

> This project was discussed with my colleagues, if I remember well, at the last federal-provincial conference held in June, and no objection was made to the project either at the June conference or afterwards. Consequently, I think that we can undertake with confidence a study of this project.

That is what the minister said, as reported at page 19 of Hansard. What on earth was he talking about? Six months ago he said he would bring in a bill in a few months. Six months later he is still to bring in the same bill in a few months. Then he said that he thinks "we can undertake with confidence a study of this project."

In his fulsome speech of April 14 the minister said that this provision was going to affect, I think, half a million Canadians. Now he is ignoring those half a million Canadians and putting them on the shelf to cool, while he studies the project. Among those affected are tens of thousands of Canadians who are existing in distressed circumstances on British and other European pensions. Remember, the sole source of income for many of those elderly citizens is their British pension. In the last two months the pound has dropped drastically. This has meant a direct cash cutback for them on each month's cheque. Conditions for them are impossible. They have waited patiently for the past three months for parliament to reconvene.

I assumed, as any reasonable person well might, that the Minister of National Health and Welfare, having had the months of the summer in which to prepare a bill, would, as his first action, present it for first reading. That has not been the case. I hope the minister will think this over and try to relieve as quickly as possible the distress of those who have become innocent victims of his procrastination.

As we know, another cabinet minister has resigned. I am speaking of the former minister of national defence. I was concerned in case the departure of the minister meant the end of the financing arrangements he had been able to wrest from a reluctant cabinet for increasing the capital budget of the Department of National Defence. I was pleased to note that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), when answering my question two days ago, affirmed that these increases would not be cut back, but would continue. We will look forward to seeing the estimates of the Department of National Defence come down either in December or January.

Today we are without a minister of national defence, although I understand there is an acting minister who is not in the House today. Presumably the parliamentary secretary could, to a limited extent, answer questions on behalf of the minister. As lamentable as this situation is, it is by no means inconsistent with the conduct of the country's defence policy. Lack of foresight, the absence of any concern for the long-run consequences of their actions, indeed a general unwillingness to discuss or even think about the future of the forces in any terms except platitudes—all these approaches have characterized the Liberals' national defence "non-policies".

To deduce what the government intends to do with the forces we thus have little to go on, save what we can extrapolate from past actions. Let us turn then to look at the sorry events of the past decade and examine them for any consistency of approach in the decisions on defence. The past decade has been one of marked change in government. There has been a veritable explosion in its growth; by any measure the money collected by the government, the size of the civil service, government expenditures as a percentage of GNP—government as a whole has become large, almost beyond recognition.

There has, however, been one salient exception to this tendency toward expansion; this same decade has seen the contraction, undermining and, indeed, virtual destruction of a major part of the capabilities of the Canadian Armed Forces. While the Trudeau administration has been responsible for this vast expansion of federal spending, its considered policy seems to have been to run down the forces and their equipment by quietly denying them the resources necessary for their continued existence as effective fighting forces.

The process which caused this contraction is no secret. The defence budget was held close to a constant figure during a period of ever-increasing inflation; the consequence was a defence budget which shrank in absolute terms. The result was a drastic reduction in manpower, from 110,000 in 1966 to 78,000 in 1976. What is not so well known is the way in which the government's short-run opportunism caused the Department of National Defence to misallocate its long-term resources. Not being privy to the government's long-term plans, DND tried to protect its manpower at the expense of weapons procurement even when much of its equipment was clearly approaching the end of its useful life.

Now we can look at the cabinet's handiwork and see what a sorry waste of resources DND was forced into by this hesitant and disastrous policy of bringing the forces down to their present level, without ever having the political courage or simple honesty to tell the Canadian armed forces and the country back in 1966 that the total strength would be drastically reduced by 1976. If the truth had been told then, so many defence dollars spent on the long rearguard action to conserve manpower and bases could have been switched into the capital budget; thus obsolescent equipment could have been replaced at the proper time.

The purchase of equipment could have been spread over the last decade, equipment which would now be in service providing new teeth for the maintenance of our national sovereignty and of our commitments to our allies. Instead we are facing the prospect of having to pay a huge bill for replacing virtually all of our major weapon systems now, over the space of just a few fiscal years.

Even if the government denies that it was its deliberate intention to starve DND of its ability to invest in weapons for the future, it must agree that it was foolish and failed to provide for the future by a proper investment policy. Any businessman or manager worth his job could have told it that with 63 per cent of the annual defence budget going to pay and allowances, 26 per cent to maintenance and operations, and only 11 per cent to capital expenditures, as it did in Canada in 1972, there would be trouble. The Liberals' short term political expediency has indeed cost the forces dearly.

Yet 1972 was the year after "the defence review", a review produced with the usual fanfare of a Trudeau media event, and published in the form of a white paper, "Defence in the Seventies." We can see now what this performance was really all about. It was a phenomenon which Trudeau-watchers should know so well by now, the mere façade of a policy, launched amid a blitz of glossy PR work, of "meaningful" briefings, a supposed re-ordering of priorities, and carefully leaked anecdotes about Prime Ministerial decisiveness.

Well, as we all know, that is all we get. The review itself is the only action that takes place. After the maximum publicity has been reaped, the Prime Minister and his team—that inner group whose numbers, like inflation, have soared during the last decade—take off for pastures new, leaving the ministerial "fall guy" to the gradual realization that this is it. The officials and the minister have the dubious privilege of picking up the pieces, salvaging what is left of their commitments, and measuring the gaps between them and their inadequate resources.

So "Defence in the Seventies" was a public relations front, a façade behind which the Trudeau cabinet could cut DND's budget in real terms and emasculate it as an effective force.

Quite suddenly last year the policy appeared to have been changed. The then minister was suddenly heard everywhere in the land promising new equipment and the money to buy it. However, it is also very noticeable that no other minister, let alone the Prime Minister, has been heard to say anything in public in support of the commitment to re-equip the armed forces. Why is this so? The answer is that the Liberal cabinet may have promised new weapons, but its members' hearts are not in it. Let me suggest that this is because they do not really feel that DND should have the money. They have not suddenly become converts to a proper defence policy for Canada. On the contrary, one has to look in some surprising places for the real reasons for their sudden interest in defence, and these reasons are hardly calculated to fill the country with confidence that the Liberal government is fulfilling its obligations to provide for the security of this country.

We should all ask ourselves why the Prime Minister has suddenly become interested in NATO, interested beyond the ritual mouthing of support which he has previously given his allies. The only past actions of his concerning NATO which come to mind are the decisions to cut the Canadian manpower contribution by half, and not to replace the aging Centurion tank.

Yet recently we have a new found enthusiasm for tanks, and we have all witnessed the tragic comedy caused by the previous minister of national defence's precipitous haste to announce a contract for the LRPA. So precipitous was the haste to announce the first LRPA contract that cabinet did not even give it the attention one might expect from any group of responsible adults about to spend a billion dollars. But then what was another billion to a cabinet which asked so few questions about a company like Lockheed that its members signed an agreement without even bothering to read the briefing notes prepared for them by their own officials?

Why should the NATO commitments suddenly appeal to the Prime Minister? The answer is not any perception of an increased Soviet threat; that right hon. gentleman appears not to be even dimly aware of the upgrading of Soviet tactical land, sea and air forces. Anyway, he barely bothers to conceal his contempt for such military matters. He certainly feels it beneath his dignity to make a speech about them.

The latest comment I have heard from his lips was that, when speaking of the former minister of national defence retaining his portfolio, he had bought Jim his new toys and he should stay on and play as minister of national defence.

No, the Prime Minister is interested in NATO because he was left in no doubt that, if he wanted his "contractual link" with the European Economic Community, a precondition of a favourable deal was to end his shameful neglect of the equipment needs of the Canadian Armed Forces. A sad state of affairs has surely come to pass when foreign governments care more for Canada's Armed Forces than does the Trudeau cabinet.

The LRPA deal has been signed. The contract is now being put into effect. I have very few comments to make on that. I wish the company well. I hope they survive to the end of the contract. Canadians should hold their breath for the next four or five years until we get the aircraft for which we are going to pay so dearly.

It is interesting to note that when the then minister of national defence failed to get cabinet approval in May, it was given over to the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) to close the deal. He did this with the usual fanfare and, with his usual business acumen, was able to see that a plane priced at $953 million in December could be bought at a different price because it had a lot less on it and he would only have to pay an extra $60 million for it. Having watched that same gentleman buy oil at $1 a gallon and not be able to sell it for 15 cents a gallon, one should not be surprised.

The new long-range patrol aircraft is an inferior plane compared to the one for which the then minister of national defence attempted to get approval. It has less instrument landing capability. The November plane could land in conditions of 100-foot ceiling and one-quarter mile visibility. The new plane, which costs $60 million more, needs double that minimum.

Second, the bomb-bay canisters are no longer going to be part of the contract. They provide, in their words, a unique sovereignty, surveillance, research and civilian sensing capability. This has now gone by the board.

The data annotation system on the new plane is of inferior quality compared to the one on what we might now call the Richardson aircraft. The electronic emission detection system on the new plane is not up to that on the old one. The system on the new plane is "capable of growth to a more advanced system".

Finally, and perhaps most different, is the data interpretation and analysis centres. There were to be two, one at Greenwood, and one at Comox. Now there will be one at Greenwood. The one at Comox is not to be of the same quality or standard as the one at Greenwood. It is to be a DIAC with a reduce capability. This capability is yet to be defined. This means we know what we are going to pay, but we do not know what we are going to get. By the time we pay for the canisters, the upgrading of the Comox facility and anything else we decide to restore to its former capability, the bill will be far beyond the currently stated price.

I wish now to say a few words about tanks. A couple of years ago the then minister of national defence and the Prime Minister discovered tanks were no longer needed and they were going out of the tank business. But following their conversion by the Chancellor of Germany they decided it would not be too bad an idea to re-equip the Canadian forces with tanks. I would remind hon. members that they had totally spurned an opposition initiative and suggestion in committee about a year ago that they should consider renting tanks while deciding what tanks to order. They suddenly changed their minds and decided that this was a good idea and they are now arranging to rent German tanks for up to two years. I welcome this idea. Indeed, I suggested it.

I now further suggest that before getting into a contract to buy Leopard I tanks, they should bear in mind that at least 19 prototypes of Leopard II have been constructed and the new version is about to come on the market. It will be superior in many respects to the Leopard I. What worries me is that we are now proposing to buy the Leopard I just at a time when it is the last off the line, in other words, the last of a series. Almost instantly we shall be using a new obsolescent tank.

One of the important factors is that the Leopard II will be equipped with a 120mm gun. The Leopard I carries a 105mm gun. The Warsaw Pact countries are currently operating a tank which is impervious to attack by a 105mm gun and for this reason, if for no other, I would ask the new minister to check into the possibility of buying the Leopard II instead of the Leopard I, or at least the possibility of having the 120mm weapon retro-fitted into the Leopard I.

A similar lack of foresight is involved in another new commitment, one which any responsible cabinet would have seen coming for the last two or three years at least. This is the extension of our economic zone to 200 miles offshore. As from the New Year these responsibilities will fall on some department or departments. The government is silent as to which will be assuming responsibility for the role of co-ordinating offshore operations. This being the case, the Canadian taxpayer must assume that, as usual, either the government doesn't know or is as muscle-bound as ever with committees, task forces, inter-departmental studies and so on, all of which are producing mounds of paper, but there is not one responsible politician who can get something going in time to be ready for the declaration of sovereignty. There is absolutely no sign of any extra funds forthcoming to meet the equipment, manpower, or operating costs which will be necessary to fulfil this new commitment.

Since the various agencies of government do not have the funds to enable them to carry out proper fisheries patrols in the much smaller area of sea currently claimed, we shall shortly be witnessing yet another example of a tired, worn out cabinet failing to reach any decision except that most common Liberal decision, the non-decision or decision by default.

Recently the minister and senior officers of the forces have taken to claiming that a shipbuilding program does exist. We have heard mention of a 20-year program; we have heard mention of 20 ships in 20 years. A general officer touring in Germany recently published an article in Kanadaire the service newspaper there, to claim that there was a shipbuilding program. Having heard these stories, I put a question on the order paper on July 6, question No. 5,479. It is reported in Hansard at page 15076 as follows:

1. Has the Department of National Defence set up a planning section or any other type of unit, section or project office to carry out planning and procurement of the 20 new ships announced by the minister and, if so, how many (a) servicemen (b) civilians are so employed?

2. What is the amount of money allocated for this purpose for the fiscal year 1976-77?

In his reply the former minister of national defence said:

No. Although no specific announcement about procurement of 20 new ships has been made, planning studies for ship replacement continue to be carried out by departmental staff as part of their regular duties.

He went on to say that parts (a) and (b) were not applicable, and that the answer to the second part of the question was "Nil". So much for Liberal promises about re-equipping our fleet.

To sum up, after a decade of neglect and cuts in defence spending we now find ourselves in a situation where we must race to catch up for the lost years and lost equipment dollars. Due to the negligence of successive defence ministers in the Trudeau era we must suddenly spend a disproportionate amount from the federal budget on defence during the next few fiscal years. If the first effort, the LRPA debacle, is anything to go by, the House cannot allow the government to proceed any further with major procurement decisions affecting our defence policy for the next 20 years for this is how long the new weapons will have to last without a much fuller examination of its policy. Not only must we be told many more details concerning any future contracts but we must also make sure we buy the right items of equipment for the right price in the proper order of priority. Clearly the ministers who have been involved in such matters in the past proved incapable of handling them.

In the past several months there has been a continuing review during which the military and civilian officers of the defence department have sought to work out these questions. However, only the cabinet is privy to the information which is supplied from these sources. In the name of security and official secrecy the taxpayers, especially their elected representatives in this House, are denied such information.

At hearings of the Defence Committee which examines the estimates this problem was revealed at its most acute. Senior officials of the department were prevented from outlining even the broadest picture of future costs and priorities following the doctrine that once a policy had been submitted to cabinet for consideration they were not free to discuss it with members of parliament. On the other hand, if a subject had not yet reached the stage at which a firm proposal had been made for cabinet consideration, the officials refused, as they put it, to "speculate" except in a most general—and therefore pretty useless—way. One might be forgiven for believing that this practice was designed to deny information to the House. In any case the result is that the options for future defence arrangements which have been given to the cabinet have been denied to the public.

One consequence of this, of course, is that the military and others whose views the cabinet ignores tend to leak their plans to the press, partly no doubt because of the government's own use of this channel of communication. What we need is a new quorum or method of formalizing a proper debate on defence without endangering security.

A good example is the study which was conducted with regard to the closing of bases. This study was first mentioned last winter. Word spread that the government was considering the closing of several bases in the interests of rationalization. Question after question was asked in the House, and invariably the minister of national defence stonewalled, saying that the survey was under study by the cabinet and he was therefore not free to discuss the matter. We continued to press for answers, and then a strange press leak in July or August indicated that the study was no longer a current issue—no bases were to be closed. The whole thing was to be forgotten. This was followed, two days later, by a denial from the department. The matter was still under consideration by the cabinet—don't hold your breath waiting for the final answer. This leaves a terrible amount of uncertainty in the country.

Such cities as Edmonton, Calgary and London all have major bases; none of them know whether their base is the one to be chopped. This uncertainty is even worse than the final act of closing a base. I would ask the minister either to announce a policy and tell us what bases are to be closed, or to tell us frankly that there is no intention to close any bases.

One other thing I should like to mention. The re-equipment policy has been moving very slowly ahead. I would like to put it clearly on the record that the Conservative party believes that up to the present the Department of National Defence has not made a clear case with respect to the replacement of CF-101 Voodoo fighters. We are in favour of all other aspects of the re-equipment program.

My party supports, and incidentally has been doing so for rather longer than the present government, the need for new tanks, armoured personnel carriers, the replacement of the CF-104 Star Fighter in the ground support role, the long-range patrol aircraft and, not least, a new naval shipbuilding program. Those are things supported by myself and my party, and I want that clearly understood.

Finally I should like to say I had the pleasure this summer of visiting our peacekeeping forces on Cyprus and in the Middle East. All Canadians can be extremely proud of the very fine job they are doing out there under very difficult circumstances. They are tremendous troops and are capably led. I am sure General Clay Beattie is considered by Cypriots on both side of the demarcation line as being really the peacemaker and the peacekeeper on Cyprus. Anyone who would wish to discourage peacekeeping should compare the state that Cyprus is in with the state Lebanon is in. Lebanon does not have a peacekeeping force but Cyprus does.

While in Cyprus I had the privilege of being the guest of the PPCLI, a very fine regiment indeed—none better in the world, I submit. I wish to express my thanks for the courtesy and treatment I received from Lieutenant Colonel Gollner and his very fine battalion.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, it is not infrequently my fate to address the House on Friday afternoon. I should like to say to those who are present that I am reminded of the minister who, on a rainy day, said to the rather sparse congregation that he had the quality if not the quantity of his congregation with him. I think I can say that to the hon. members of the House who are with us still.

An hon. Member: Particularly looking forward.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, the House in its wisdom has provided that the Speech from the Throne gives an opportunity for discussing any problems affecting the welfare of Canada. I therefore make no apology for directing my speech to the sphere of international affairs. However important our domestic problems are, and I know they are important, they are no more important to the future security and welfare of Canadians than the global inter-dependence which is an increasing fact of life.

It is no accident that questions such as survival in a nuclear age, food, health, population, the rights of women, and the problems of the environment have all been subjects for international conferences under the auspices of the United Nations, and at all of these conferences the view emerged that international action was required if solutions were to be found. One can add to this list the subject of inflation which is, after all, not purely a national phenomenon.

The first item in the international situation I should like to deal with is the immense mal-distribution of the resources of the world, both material and personal. It is estimated that the world is spending a figure of over $300 billion a year on arms. The world bank was asked to make an estimate of what it would cost to make the basic investments required to deal with certain fundamental obstacles, and it came up with the following figure: food and nutrition, $42 billion; education, $25 billion; rural and urban water supply, $28 billion; urban housing, $16 billion; urban transport, $8 billion; population and health programs, $6 billion, amounting in all to roughly $125 billion over ten years, or about $12.5 billion a year. I would ask you to compare those figures with the 10-year figure for arms expenditure which is expected to be at least $2,500 billion in the next ten years.

Proposals have been made to remedy this gross and insane misspending of resources. The Pope proposed at the World Food Conference a diversion of 10 per cent of arms expenditures to development aid. The Soviet Union, which is one of the main players in the lunatic game of over-kill and first strike capability, has also proposed a 10 per cent cut in arms, the savings to be transferred to development aid. Barbara Ward in her book "The Home of Man" repeats the proposal. It is my suggestion that Canada take up this proposal seriously and undertake to make its contribution of a 10 per cent cut in arms expenditures to be transferred to development and to meeting the basic needs of mankind, and to persuade other nations to do the same.

I referred to the Soviet proposal, which was responded to with a resounding silence. One is perhaps entitled to be skeptical about the bona fide intentions of a country devoted to arms expenditures such as the USSR. However, if it is a bluff the bluff should be called.

The former minister of national defence was obviously elated when he apparently persuaded the Cabinet to agree that military expenditures should not only keep up with the cost of living but should increase by 12 per cent a year. I suggest that his resignation gives an opportunity for reconsideration. There is no more inflationary an expenditure than spending on arms. It is not necessary in order to provide Canada's needs for defence, defence of her sovereignty, and to give priority to peacekeeping consistent with Canada's aims and objectives, to spend the amount of money that is being spent. I am well aware that there will be people in the House, as there are in the country, who will say that this proposal has no popular appeal. I think they are quite right. We have been conditioned to think of defence expenditure as sacrosanct. When one considers what could be done with the rearrangement of expenditures as suggested, namely, the proposal made of cutting 10 per cent of arms expenditure and applying it to development, it is in fact, counsel of sanity in a world that might otherwise drift toward self-destruction.

A second priority in Canada's international policy should be practical support for the new economic order. Canada is indeed committed to making the new economic order a reality and this commitment was referred to, albeit in rather vague terms, in the Speech from the Throne. I suggest that the importance of this cannot be exaggerated. World instability has resulted from gross inequalities between developed and developing countries. Developing countries entered on a path of confrontation demanding trade concessions and a change of structures in the world's economic system. They are now testing the developed world to see if it is ready to choose the path of co-operation and social justice.

In this connection I should like to pay tribute to the former secretary of state for external affairs. He was co-chairman at the North-South Conference in Paris at which positive solutions were being sought. I remind the House that a committee of this House in the last session studied thoroughly the matter of developing a new economic order and gave its support in practical terms to the liberalization of trade and greater stability of prices for goods sold by developing countries. To this end it proposed that a common fund should be set up for the purpose of creating buffer stocks and stabilizing prices. At the recent UNCTAD conference at Nairobi the Canadian government finally came up with a cautious approval of this project.

I hope the new Secretary for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson), whom I congratulate on his appointment, will as soon as possible tell the House in detail what is proposed by the government on the whole question of the new economic order, the common fund, and commodity prices, and of developments at the North-South Economic Co-operative Conference. These questions cannot be solved by rhetoric alone. We have had plenty of that. They require action.

• (1540)

A third subject which I wish to discuss is the proliferation of nuclear weapons manufactured out of plutonium which can be produced in reactors sold by Canada. This was discussed in the last session, and the Conservative and New Democratic opposition parties voted against the sale of reactors under the existing circumstances. The case against these sales grows stronger and stronger. The leader of this party the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), proposed that the whole question of the production of nuclear energy be the subject of an inquiry by experts in the field, to be made public to the people of Canada, and that until such an inquiry had reported there be a moratorium on the sale of nuclear reactors or other material capable of being turned into nuclear bombs.

Recently a royal commission in Great Britain reported on this subject. They urged the necessity for wide public understanding and the need for public debate. They proposed that a major commitment to fission power should be postponed as long as possible, and that a commitment to large nuclear programs should wait until there has been wide public understanding of the implications of a plutonium economy.

In particular they urged that a high level body be established in Great Britain to provide advice on energy and to enable more research to be put into alternative solutions. In connection with the so-called plutonium economy they drew specific attention to the dangers of plutonium being used by terrorists to blackmail society and the small amounts required for the making of nuclear bombs. I join my leader and many others throughout Canada who have urged a moratorium on the sale of reactors for distribution as potential sources of extracting plutonium until a thorough inquiry has been made. Prestigious voices in the United States have supported this proposal for a moratorium, including David Lilienthal, former chairman of the Tennessee Valley Authority and an expert in the whole field of energy.

I myself have recently had an experience which demonstrates the need for caution. One of the countries to which we are proposing to sell one or two reactors is the Argentine. I and two of my colleagues, the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald), and the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Duclos), recently returned from a trip to the Argentine. There could be little doubt about the instability of that country.

A military dictatorship has deprived Argentinians of their human rights; trade unions are virtually non-existent; the church and other institutions are under attack; many individuals are detained without trial; roughly 1,000 have totally disappeared and their families are unable to obtain any information about them. Shootings and assassinations are a daily event. The authorities in the Argentine do not deny that this state of disorder exists. They blame it on leftist guerillas. There seems to be widespread agreement among others that, in addition to left-wing guerillas, the "death squad" consists of right-wing elements who are determined to repress not only left-wing ideas but any democratic institutions which might be a source of opposition.

The government appears to be either unwilling or unable to control these terrorist gangs. While there is a vigorous campaign by the government to deal with left-wing guerillas no similar effort is made to restrain the right wing elements responsible, at the present time, for most of the disappearances and killings which have taken place. This has created an unstable society and one in which if the terrorists could secure plutonium and manufacture nuclear bombs, these could be used both within and outside the Argentine as a weapon of blackmail. As I said, the government authorities did not deny the breaches of human rights but justified this on the basis that a state of war existed. The Argentine has not signed the nuclear non-proliferation agreement, and although Canada has arranged for certain safeguards as a condition of sale, the safeguards are just as good as the recipients choose to make them.

We cannot enforce these safeguards. There are no effective sanctions. If governments or groups within the Argentine decide to disregard them, the threat of the misuse of nuclear weapons might spread among the nations of the world, and this is a threat to the survival of all of us. Canada should think again on this subject.

The central issue in the world today consists of developments in Africa. We must continue to hope for and assist in any way possible the granting of majority rule in Zimbabwe, but that is only part of the problem. There remains the continuing illegal occupation of Namibia, formerly German Southwest Africa, by South Africa. This situation flies in the teeth of the judgment of the world as expressed in United Nations resolutions. It will have to come to an end and should be ended by negotiations giving full independence to the majority, who consist of black Africans.

Another problem is the continuing curse of apartheid in South Africa itself. This evil system cannot continue indefinitely. There is one immediate development with which I wish to deal, and that is the effort of South Africa to obtain recognition from Canada and other countries for the so-called Republic of Transkei. This proposal is a patent fraud. Transkei is to be declared independent and made the national home of all Xhosa-speaking Africans. The Transkei's present population of about 1.7 million in a crowded, poor, and sparse country would increase to around 3 million.

An hon. Member: It is a beautiful country.

Mr. Brewin: It may be very beautiful but it is a very poor place in which to live and earn enough to eat, and with the added population there would be malnutrition and starvation. The Transkei cannot possibly support the added population which is supposed to go there. This is based on the artificial division of tribes or nations and requires the new citizens of Transkei to surrender their South African citizenship and all the privileges that go with it. Indeed the situation is even worse than this. Those capable of being employed in South African industry will remain in South Africa with a minimum of human rights while their families are transferred to the new Transkei. The South African government let it be known that arrangements will be made for black Africans to visit their relatives several hundred miles away once a year.

This is a wholesale denial of the basic rights of families to be united. The World Council of Churches which studied this matter condemned the manoeuvre of the South African government in creating the independent Transkei and called on its member churches to oppose the Bantustan policy, to withhold recognition of the Transkei as an independent state, and to withhold diplomatic relations with the Transkei that would imply recognition. I now ask the government to make clear in this House that Canada has no intention of granting such recognition. The south African government intends to declare the Transkei independent on October 26. I think our government should make up its mind by then and clearly declare what is its policy and decision on this matter.

I have only a short time available, Mr. Speaker, in which to touch on the few international issues affecting Canada. It is my belief, based on discussions I have had with people in different countries, that Canada can give real leadership. Despite all the weaknesses of the United Nations it remains the hope of mankind. We must persuade ourselves and our people not to allow disillusion ment to warp our judgment as to the importance of the United Nations despite its imperfections.

The basic interest of Canadians is to promote peace. Barbara Ward in the epilogue to her book "A Home of Man" states:

> We cannot defeat something by nothing. It used to be said that if you wish for peace, prepare for war. This phrase must be reversed and should be if you wish to avoid war you must work for peace. We have reached the point of talking together about the great common tasks of humanity—preserving our living environment, feeding the hungry, giving shelter to all our fellow creatures, treating with greater care and fraternal sharing the fundamental resources of water, minerals, energy, upon which our common life depends.

She asks if this is too vast a dream or too naive a hope, and answers that our planetary interdependence is as great as that of earlier states, that our knowledge is world-wide, and that we share equally our material existence. We can obtain security and peace if we understand the ultimate implication of the underlying unity of the scientific law first discerned by the Greeks, also of the underlying law of moral brotherhood and obligation most passionately proclaimed by the Hebrew prophets. We need a new fusion of vision and energy.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to congratulate the hon. members for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) and Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance) for the exemplary way in which they performed their duties as movers of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Both are promising backbenchers and I do not hesitate to say that they are brilliantly representing their constituents. They are obviously honouring them just like their predecessors, the Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé and Mr. Georges Lachance.

I also wish to join all those who, before me, deplored the untimely death of Mrs. Albanie Morin whose political career was short but admirable. To her family and her relatives I wish to offer my most sincere condolences.

I also want, Mr. Speaker, to comment briefly on the article by reporter Pierre O'Neil published in today's Le Devoir.

Apparently it has been said that I would leave the federal scene to be a candidate on the provincial scene if there is an election. I want to deny categorically such a rumour, and I want to say that I am very proud to represent the electors of Montreal-Papineau in the Parliament of Canada, that I am very proud to belong to the Liberal Party of Canada, that I fully subscribe to the policy of our leader and that, God willing, I intend to stay until my mandate is over.

[Mr. Brewin.]

I do not make these comments in particular because of the rumour of my move to the provincial level but because Mr. O'Neil reports that, apparently, and I quote:

> . . . he seems to take for granted that the decision of the Court of Appeal will not be in his favour . . .

I want to say this: I have never talked about this matter with Mr. O'Neil, and I strongly deny him the right to make such a statement. I find it indecent that he should so comment on the feeling I might have at this time about a decision of the Quebec Court of Appeal which concerns me.

I want to say this: I have no apprehension, no fear whatsoever. I am neither optimistic, nor pessimistic. My feeling, for the time being, is one of expectation and if I could qualify this expectation, I would say that it is impatient, no more, no less.

I am happy to participate in today's debate because I want to say that the Speech from the Throne was excellent. It establishes clearly and precisely the Canadian government's policy. With this speech, we know exactly now where the Liberal Party of Canada stands and we can find in it a multitude of proposals on the Canadian government's intentions for the coming months in the best interest of the Canadian people.

So, I find very disappointing and unacceptable the amendment to the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne moved yesterday by the leader of the opposition and seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner). I am sure the House will reject that amendment because it has to be rejected. It is indeed very symptomatic of the attitude of the opposition which is constantly criticizing, but unwilling and unable to propose an alternative.

If I read the amendment proposed by the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), I find that he would like the Speech from the Throne to be amended because it is a further example of the opportunism which has cost the present administration its credibility. He talks about opportunism . . . I think that instead of talking about opportunism by the government, he should talk more about the opportunism displayed by the leader of the opposition ever since he became head of his party, he who has made no concrete proposal as to how he would administer this country. He did nothing but criticize the government. Yet he has the nerve to declare before TV cameras—as he did again recently—that he does not intend to propose anything to the Canadian people. He is just standing there, hoping that the government's popularity will continue to plummet and that if we hold elections he will be able to get in by default.

I can assure the House of one thing: in spite of the difficulties this government may meet, I am sure that it is about to regain its popularity. The process is already under way and will improve in the coming months.

● (1600)

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has nothing to offer and will be defeated at the next elections precisely because neither he nor his pseudo-lieutenant in Quebec have any concrete solutions to suggest to the people.

I was dismayed to hear the member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) read his twaddle. I cannot understand why an experienced politician of his age cannot make a speech without having to read notes prepared by researchers from the Progressive Conservative Party.

An hon. Member: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Ouellet: And what is more I have the feeling they made him say things that he did not mean.

An hon. Member: That's it!

Mr. Ouellet: On hearing him speak, you have the impression that he feels very uncomfortable, very restricted within the Progressive Conservative Party and there is nothing new about that. All well meaning French-speaking Canadians from Quebec who have worked for the Progressive Conservative Party at the federal level have had to admit some day or the other that they were so restrained within that party that they had the feeling they were choking. I am thinking of the hon. Leon Balcer in particular. I am also thinking of the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. LaSalle) who had to leave at a certain time and came back for God knows why. Regularly Quebecers have felt choked up inside the Progressive Conservative Party. But when it comes to principles that party is always agreeable on the issues of bilingualism and the national capital, and the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) alluded to it earlier today.

When it comes to principles it is always fine but when it comes to implementing the basic principles to keep this country united the Progressive Conservative Party has always been reluctant. It was only able to criticize to policy of the government. It could only say: Well, we agree in principle. But when it comes to implementing those principles, nothing goes. The approach is bad, or the government is wrong in its way of implementing bilingualism in Canada.

So again I ask the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe who spoke earlier today what are the solutions his party would put forward to better implement bilingualism in Canada. He did not make a single suggestion in his speech this afternoon, nor for that matter did the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton who, of course, is not satisfied to see the federal capital expand on both sides of the Ottawa River, to see all those beautiful federal buildings finally up on the Hull side, truly making the national capital not only a capital standing on the Ottawa side but properly extending on both sides of the river.

I think that is the basic difference between these two major Canadian parties; the Liberal party always had the respect, the qualities, the representatives of the two founding nations of this country. This party, the Liberal party, was never afraid to give French-speaking people a chance to have access to the high offices of this country. And still very recently the Progressive Conservative Party had a unique opportunity to give a capable man a chance to become the leader of that party and to aspire to the high office of Prime Minister of Canada. But he was denied that chance, he was denied that possibility, going down by 33 votes, and I understand that the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe should feel bitterness following that decision. But that is an undeniable reflection of the unbendable, unacceptable and unspeakable attitude of the Progressive Conservative Party which never agreed in the past and, until proven otherwise, will never agree in the future to give Quebecers, French Canadians, a chance to find fulfillment, first in their party, and then in all Canada.

Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes at my disposal during this throne speech debate, I wish to refer to three measures that I should like to see implemented during this session. First, I want the injustice done to many industrial milk producers in Canada to be corrected as soon as possible. Second, in agreement with the provinces, I should like the federal government to patriate the Canadian constitution as soon as possible. Third, I wish it were possible between responsible parliamentarians to amend our rules of parliamentary proceedings which are obsolete in many ways and provide us with ancient tools to work with in these modern times.

First, with regard to the farm policy, the national dairy program as we know it has serious deficiencies. In many circles, the federal government is held responsible for the disastrous financial situation of a number of industrial milk producers in Canada. First, those affected are those who had their quotas cut down by some 20 per cent without any overproduction and also those who were encouraged to overproduce after being promised quotas that they never obtained. It is true that in 1975, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) had asked the milk producers to increase their production. But, mind you, at the time the Minister of Agriculture was speaking of a 5 per cent production increase. Yet, production increased by 17 per cent. Who is responsible? I say that it is primarily the milk supply management committee which is made up of producers, of representatives of the provincial governments and the Canadian Dairy Commission. It is a committee of 23 members including 11 producers (members of the various Canadian dairy federations), 9 provincial representatives and 3 commissioners of the Canadian Dairy Commission.

Now, the Canadian milk supply management committee, which is responsible for production control, did not reduce the marketing quotas before April 1, 1976, even though they largely exceeded the Canadian demand. Now, this year, this committee reduced the quotas to the level of the Canadian demand, which automatically reduced materially in some cases the income of several milk producers. Can the federal government be held responsible for this situation? Before blaming it for everything, let us consider what happened in the past few years. Under the federal dairy policy, the target price of industrial milk was increased every year. In April 1973, it was $6.45 a hundredweight, then it went up to $8.50 in April 1974, to $11.02 in April 1975, and it stands at $11.45 since April 1976. This is a marked improvement for milk producers.

Furthermore, if we refer to the 1972-73 dairy year, we find that the federal subsidy was then $1.25 a hundredweight. In April 1973, it went up to $1.45 and later to $2.01. In 1974-75 it was increased twice: first to $2.30 and then to $2.56, and in the present dairy year, it went up to $2.66 a hundredweight.

Once again, there has been a clear effort on the part of the federal government to help milk producers. But, more important, I am pleased to say that when I was a minister in the Trudeau government, I was associated with the decision that the Trudeau government announced in April 1975 through the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan): a long term dairy policy would particularly provide for an indexation formula of the price of milk. As it happened it was in keeping with that formula that the price of indutrial milk has been fixed this year at $11.45 from $11.02 last year.

These are examples that show that the federal government does take into account the interests of Canadian milk producers and that it does understand their problems. I think that the present difficulties on the international markets are due particularly to weather conditions that were extremely favourable to milk production in 1975 and which resulted in excess production and also in lower consumption of dairy products in Canada, following the increase in costs.

Those are roughly the main reasons behind the problems of some milk producers. I am quite concerned by this situation which I think is very serious especially for a group of young producers whose average age is 30 and who, not more than five years ago, have established agricultural industries; they were asked to reduce their production by several hundred thousands of pounds of milk, and most of them have respected the quotas which were supposed to bring them some form of security. Most of these young people were trained in technological institutes and regional agricultural institutions; some have taken the courses given under the auspices of the agriculture minister of the province of Quebec. These young people have entered the field of industrialized agriculture, they have planned five-year or more than five-year programs and they have entered into important financial contracts now, the cutbacks announced during these recent months nearly smother them and create nearly irreparable damages.

One fears that if this condition is not amended as quickly as possible by the authorities responsible for the dairy policy, at the federal and provincial levels and by the dairy boards, some 30 per cent of the producers of industrial milk will have to disappear within two years, which would be extremely serious and would jeopardize the stability of an industry of import not only to Quebec but to the whole of Canada.

Therefore, we will have to take our responsibilities at the federal level although we are not directly and primarily involved in this situation and, as I have said before, it is no use playing politics with this issue and denounce the federal government as the main culprit. Provincial authorities and dairy boards must recognize their shortcomings and more particularly those who represent the milk producers on the various agricultural boards and agencies. The fact is that a number of these representatives, Mr. Speaker, were representing whole milk producers, which form an industry which is far richer far sounder and much better organized and which emphasized, in terms of quotas and subsidies, the benefits and interests of whole milk producers, and did so unfortunately at the expense of industrial milk producers.

I believe that, in the interest of our dairy industry as a whole, we will have to give guarantees to all producers as well as the assurance that the past benefits they gained will be maintained. And by this I mean to say that I believe it to be vital for the federal government to take the appropriate action to give back to some dairy producers the quotas that they lost in the last few months and to reinstate them in the position that they held with respect to their production level of 1974-75. I believe it is urgent that the government should set back the production quotas to the production level of 1974-75 by means of subsidies to all producers, who would then be treated fairly, and also that he should urgently redistribute subsidized production quotas to those dairy producers who have invested tremendous amounts of money with the promise of additional quotas or to those who, without having any overproduction, either because of fire or cattle disease, have seen their production fall considerably below their recommended and approved quota and who have had part of their quota removed even though they had fallen short.

Here are the suggestions that I should like to make. I believe that in the interest of the Canadian dairy industry, we should give our milk producers assurances of survival, dignity of life in the farming community. I believe that the future of Canadian consumers does make it essential for farm producers to be well protected and for their income to be guaranteed, otherwise dairy production will go down and we shall have to rely on imports to feed the people of Canada. And I am convinced that we would then pay more for our dairy products than at the present time.

Secondly, I would like to speak briefly to the constitutional issue and the repatriation of the Constitution. I am doing so today on this very special occasion when the Canadian government has paid tribute to a great Canadian, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, and unveiled a monument in his honour in front of the Supreme Court of Canada building. You all know that in 1949, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, then prime minister of Canada, asked the Canadian Parliament to adopt a petition through which it obtained from British Parliament the right to amend the Canadian Constitution except in certain more controversial areas, such as the rights and powers of provinces, the jurisdiction with respect to education, the official duality of languages, the length of Parliaments. This was called at the time, and indeed, it is still called the partial repatriation of the Constitution. I would like to quote this excerpt from a book written by a former federal minister, the Hon. J. W. Pickersgill, and I quote:

—the title of the book is "My Years with Louis St. Laurent" and I quote from page 113 as follows:

> St. Laurent proposed that . . . the Canadian parliament should seek from the British parliament an amendment to the British North America Act to do three things: 1. to entrench the rights or privileges with respect to schools and the use of the English or the French language granted to any class of persons by the constitution; 2. to give the parliament of Canada exclusive jurisdiction to amend the constitution, except with respect to the minority rights regarding schools and languages and except in relation to provincial jurisdiction or provincial rights or privileges; 3. to give the parliament of Canada jurisdiction as well to make amendments relating to the matters which were not within its exclusive jurisdiction, but to provide that no such amendment would come into effect unless and until it was enacted as law by the legislatures of all the provinces.

[Translation]

As everyone knows, the first two proposals have been approved by the Canadian Parliament, and those first two objectives sought by Mr. St. Laurent have been approved and have now been enacted.

But the last objective he had in mind at the time has not been achieved. It is somewhat unfortunate, because it is clear that part of our constitution has not been patriated. The formula put forward at the time by Mr. St. Laurent entailed serious hazards and dangers, for there would have been a general outcry. Further on in his book, on page 121, Mr. Pickersgill states:

[English]

If that had happened, Canada would have been spared, since 1949, the continuing humiliation of having to ask the parliament of another country to amend our fundamental law. St. Laurent's proposal that no amendment affecting provincial rights or provincial jurisdiction could be made without the approval of all provincial legislatures was perhaps too rigid; but in fact, since 1907 the British parliament has not been asked to make such an amendment without approval of all provincial authorities nor is it likely to be.

Mr. Pickersgill ended the chapter on this subject by saying:

In the end, St. Laurent's formula of 1949 may prove to be the solution.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, here are some reflections on Canada's current situation. We are a nation with its constitution in another country. If we amend, that is if we patriate the constitution without an amendment formula, we will remain the only nation, not with an expatriated constitution, but with an unamendable constitution. Clearly, what is needed, both from the federal government and the provincial representatives, is goodwill to attain that vital goal, a truly Canadian constitution, a constitution that will be for us another great symbol of unity.

There was much talk about the Canadian flag. It was said that the flag was a divisive issue. The Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson, however, had the courage to give this nation a truly Canadian flag, despite protests from a few Progressive Conservatives and a few bigots. In my view, this Canadian flag is a token of unity in this country, and I believe the Right Hon. Pierre Elliott Trudeau will shortly demonstrate the same kind of courage as Mr. Pearson did, I believe he will give Canadians a truly Canadian constitution despite the protest from some Progressive Conservatives and some bigots. In this way, we will have a constitution we can proudly call our own, for the well-being of all Canadians.

And this much I can state: as a Quebecer, I have absolutely no fear of a Canadian constitution. I am certainly not afraid that such a constitution reduce in any way the rights and provileges already enjoyed by Quebecers. As for the utterance by certain Quebec quarters that the province of Quebec should have more powers, I am not opposed to granting certain extra powers. But I insist on one condition: if ever Quebec is given extra powers, I want to be sure that the rights and privileges of Quebec MP's are not reduced. Because the Quebec MP's would then lose their true raison d'être in Canada's Parliament, and we would soon enter into an associated state or special state situation, with second rate and second class Quebec MP's. That I want to prevent.

I will close my remarks, Mr. Speaker, on a third matter: parliamentary reform. We are speaking on this subject on a Friday afternoon. I find this inconceivable, since a vast majority of members of parliament who live in the remote corners of this country have to travel regularly every week-end to go and see their constituents in British Columbia, Newfoundland, Alberta and Prince Edward Island.

I think it is very important that we modify our parliamentary procedure in order to sit longer hours certain days of the week. The House should sit four days instead of five days a week. I am sure that there are a lot of ways in which we might improve the parliamentary procedure. After having studied the House procedure, a committee has made a series of recommendations. Our colleagues of the Quebec and Ontario provincial legislatures have attended committee meetings or a Liberal caucus and have made a series of very timely recommendations which, I hope, will be taken into consideration as soon as possible by Parliament.

[English]

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, nothing gives me greater pleasure than to speak after the hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet) and refute some of the things he said. I am thinking especially of what he said about the language issue and the Progressive Conservative party, which will form the next government of this country after the next general election.

An hon. Member: That will be a black day.

Mr. Coates: It will not be anything as black as the present day. Day in and day out as a nation we suffer the consequences of being governed by this government. It will stay in power until 1978, when it will be forced to call an election.

The hon. member for Papineau asks, what's wrong with the language issue? I will tell you one of the things wrong with it. The hon. member for Papineau and others like him, when the Official Languages Act was first mooted, travelled around the hon. member's province. Those who did not agree with him and his concept of bilingualism in Canada were called racists and bigots, and he included members of this House. That's what's wrong with bilingualism.

Mr. Dinsdale: That is why the country is divided.

Mr. Coates: If you speak your mind and say what the people you represent think, you are labelled a bigot and racist. Mr. Speaker, most members elected to this House are not racists or bigots. If they were, they would not be here. Most members seeking election are good Canadians who want to make Canada a better place for themselves, their children and their children's children. We must take the emotionalism out of the language issue, an emotionalism which makes people like the hon. member for Papineau and those of his mind say that if you disagree with the government's concept of bilingualism you are a racist and bigot.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: Let's face it; in the years since the Official Languages Act was passed we have learned that the government's concept of bilingualism is not workable and not acceptable to Canadians. The best evidence of that is that the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Richardson) recently resigned from his portfolio as minister of national defence. If the hon. member had to resign his portfolio as minister of national defence because he is concerned about what will happen in this country with regard to the Official Languages Act and bilingualism, I say there is something mighty wrong with the act and the government's concept of it.

The hon. member for Papineau also said that the Conservative party is a narrow party which is suffocating people.

Mr. Dinsdale: Now it is the only national party.

Mr. Coates: If you want to see a party which suffocates people you need look no further than the Liberal party. Many are leaving the Liberal party because they feel suffocated by it. The man who was runner up to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) at the last Liberal leadership convention, the late Robert Winters, felt there was no room for him in the Liberal party. After running second to the Prime Minister in the leadership race he felt that he could not be a candidate for the party in another election. Soon after the Prime Minister took office the then minister of transport, who was also deputy prime minister, left the party. He resigned his portfolio, left the party, and became a Progressive Conservative. Why? He felt suffocated in the Liberal party.

There is to be a by-election on Monday in Ottawa-Carleton. Why is it necessary to call a by-election? The reason is this: the previous minister of finance, the heir apparent to the Prime Minister, found there was no room for him in a Liberal party which suffocated him. He could stand it no longer, got out of politics and took up another occupation as a lawyer in Toronto. The hon. member for Papineau talked of suffocation. Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, there is no suffocation in the Conservative party. Let me give you an example of what I mean.

• (1630)

The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) spoke here earlier today on behalf of the Progressive Conservative party. He is a very willing and able member. As far as Quebec Liberal members are concerned, he is a devastating member. He put forward a Canadian concept which Canadians can agree with and live with. It will be implemented just as soon as a general election is held and this party becomes the government of Canada.

[Mr. Coates.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: There is no suffocation in the Conservative party. I say to a great many disenchanted Liberal members of parliament, come on over and join us.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Coates: You will find there is no suffocation here. You will be able to speak your mind, you can say what you think. You have the ability to make a better Canada, not only for us, but our children and their children. I invite you to come over.

I believe there are members opposite who would like to join this party. We need you. Canada needs you. We do not need a party which talks about bigots and racists and not about economic matters that concern Canadians. Canadians do not like the road we are going down. They want to get on the right road, and the right road is the road with Joe Clark.

Some hon. Members: Joe who?

Mr. Coates: You will find out next Monday night when for the first time in 74 years the constituency of Ottawa-Carleton returns a Progressive Conservative member of parliament. The very fine lady who will be representing that constituency will be sitting on this side of the Chamber. Canadians are not happy with the government. As a result, Jean Piggott will overturn a 10,000 Liberal majority and come here to show how disenchanted people are with the Liberals.

Mr. Cullen: Even Walter doesn't believe that one.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Yes, he does.

Mr. Coates: I was impressed with the statements made today by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe and the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) on the language issue. They made unemotional, sensible, realistic approaches to that policy, a policy Canadians will get when the Progressive Conservative party forms the government of Canada after the next general election.

There were times when I was unhappy with the Commissioner of Official Languages, Keith Spicer. However, I must say that he has shown realism in his reports with regard to producing an approach to bilingualism that will work. The sooner that approach is implemented, the better it will be for all Canadians. The sooner we get that issue out of the way, the sooner we can deal with other important and difficult problems.

Unemployment is increasing in Canada at a mile a minute. If we continue the way we are going now, one million people will be unemployed in this country by the end of the year. This condition will worsen with escalating energy costs. We have to sit down and work together. We must get the language issue out of the way so that people are not first concerned about an emotional issue, but about the bread and butter issues.

I wish to speak briefly on my part of this country, Atlantic Canada. In 1968, the Prime Minister inspired the people of Atlantic Canada. He convinced them that he had their best interests at heart. He talked about regional economic disparity and put in place the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. Millions of dollars were committed to that department in order to try to meet the hopes and aspirations of those in Atlantic Canada.

As I look at the unemployment statistics today and compare our area with the rest of Canada, even with the millions of dollars that were committed and with all the good intentions of the government, it has not worked out as well as hoped.

I do not fault the government for its good intentions, which I believe it has. I have always been willing to work with the government in trying to meet the hopes and aspirations of those in my area. I am going to suggest to the government how we might overcome some of the problems we are facing and some of the reasons why DREE is not working as well as it should.

I have no disagreement with the Prime Minister appointing Ministers of State. That is a realistic concept. A cabinet should be stratified because there are a great many difficult problems at different levels. Thirty people cannot come to an agreement as quickly as five or six. Therefore a stratified cabinet is the proper solution.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) are both here. They are deeply involved. I suggest it would be a wise decision to have a Minister of State appointed who would have one responsibility. That minister would look at every program designated to overcome regional disparity in Atlantic Canada. Following an indepth examination of those programs, he would then examine all government programs to see whether they are damaging the concept of the regional programs. Let me give an example.

The user-pay concept in transportation will destroy Atlantic Canada. There are no two ways about it. Transportation must be a development tool in Atlantic Canada if we are to overcome the disparity we face. The user-pay concept has never before been applied, and should not be applied now. Transportation has been and continues to be a curse to Atlantic Canada because we do not have the right kind of development policy.

The user-pay concept is not applied to the St. Lawrence Seaway which does not receive enough revenue from the tolls to pay the interest on its indebtedness. If that were to be put into effect on the Seaway, we might as well seal it off, as well as the whole St. Lawrence River, because there would not be a ship in the Great Lakes.

We must forget about the user-pay concept in transportation and have a realistic policy of development. We should use the railways for the development of both eastern and western Canada so that we can come closer to an equality of trade right across this nation. That is just one example.

Now consider energy rates. Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia are facing, and will continue to face, energy rates which are higher than in any other part of Canada. This is because those provinces are almost totally committed to the use of offshore oil for the production of the energy they require. Unless they are given some form of short-term subsidy we shall find a noose has been tied around the necks of industries which were established in their present locations only after the expenditure of millions of dollars of taxpayers' money. Mr. Speaker, it is absurd to use taxpayers' dollars to establish an industry and then allow energy costs to escalate to a point at which those same industries are put into bankruptcy, which is exactly what will happen unless the federal government recognizes that short-term subsidies are the only assurance of the continuing viability of a great many industries in Atlantic Canada.

I could give other examples of cases where federal programs have destroyed the regional programs established earlier to overcome one or other aspect of regional disparity. Something has to be done about this situation, and the best way of doing it is to make one minister responsible for the overseeing of all these programs. Part of his job would be to call public attention to cases where there is a conflict between the national and the regional program and to stimulate public discussion as to the manner in which such conflicts could be resolved. In effect, he would allow a regional program to operate, in the first place, and continue to do the job it was supposed to do. This can be done, Mr. Speaker, as long as we take the people of the area into our confidence, as long as "made in Ottawa" programs which are later found to be unworkable in the maritimes are not pressed upon the people of the region. In so many cases one finds that they are unworkable because no one in the maritimes was consulted as to whether they were likely to work or not, or because people in Ottawa have no conception of what they are up against in the Atlantic area.

My leader has indicated that if the party to which I belong were in power today we would introduce a short term subsidy program for the benefit of the people of Atlantic Canada so that they would not be called upon to face the horrendous energy costs presently being charged, costs which are likely to rise even higher in the months ahead. Let me give hon. members an example of what is involved. There are people owning electrically-heated homes in Atlantic Canada who are paying more for their power than for their mortgages.

Mr. Muir: Some of them are losing their homes.

Mr. Coates: Many are losing their homes. Moreover those homes are unsaleable because nobody in Nova Scotia wants to buy an electrically-heated house today, so the owner is saddled with a house which he cannot sell and which he cannot afford to keep. Yet there was a period in which those home-owners were duped by advertising agencies associated with the power companies into buying electrically-heated homes under the impression that it was cheaper to heat them that way than by any other means. Well, they have found out by now that there is nothing cheap about those homes. Many of them are built in such a way that they can be heated only by electricity; it is not practical to convert them to oil heating or gas by putting in a furnace. Something should be done about this serious burden which many people in my own province of Nova Scotia are being asked to carry today.

I am concerned about the government's attitude toward the development of Fundy tidal power. As the Minister of Manpower moves up the echelon of cabinet positions and gets closer to the top I hope he will see that greater impetus is given to the drive to utilize Fundy tidal power. The Minister of Finance was always a realistic and sympathetic proponent of Fundy tidal power, and I hope that with ministers like the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Manpower we can move a lot faster toward the day when we call tenders and begin to harness Fundy tidal power. When I watch those tides coming in and going out, reaching a height of 54 feet on occasions, it does not seem realistic to me that all this latent power should not be used to the advantage of this country especially since the engineering expertise is available to us whenever it is required.

In Nova Scotia we are at a particular disadvantage since we are committed to the most expensive energy-producing fuel which exists today, namely, oil. At the same time there is coal galore in our province. When it took office, the Regan government in Nova Scotia embarked on a policy of closing every coal mine which could possibly be closed. Today, it is thinking about opening coal mines. What a sad state of affairs! It may well be that the coal which would be used to produce power in Nova Scotia would not be any cheaper than the oil which is producing it today, but I must say this: If the power were being produced from coal, at least the billions spent on producing it would be staying in Nova Scotia and not going to Venezuela or some other foreign country.

I hope the federal government will wake up the Regan government and induce it to move into coal and coal mines a lot faster than it is doing now. I am not thinking only of coal mines. We might well take an example from South Africa where, by making use of the gasification process, they not only produce gas but also produce petroleum for use in their automobiles. If it can be done in South Africa, it can be done here provided we have the desire and the determination. That is what we are lacking today. We lack the leadership, the desire and the determination to overcome the adversity which faces some parts of Canada. The government needs to wake up, or else some new people are needed in the government, people with a desire to produce the programs the people want and need. An election and a change of government would do the country an awful lot of good.

Before I conclude I should like to make one comment on external affairs. It relates to the Taiwan affair. I was extremely disappointed over the government's attitude toward that small democratic nation.

● (1650)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Coates: It is nice to hear some people laugh, but I would suggest to you that democracy lives and thrives in Taiwan while the antithesis of democracy exists on mainland China. There is no freedom there for anyone at any time. I suggest to hon. members who have not been to Taiwan and have not studied the democratic system which exists there that they should read something about it, and perhaps they would not be so critical.

An hon. Member: How many parties do they have?

Mr. Coates: They have a lot more than they do on the mainland. They do not have marshalls and palace guards and things of that nature who have no respect for the freedom of the people or their lives, and that is the situation on the mainland where 800 million people are being controlled under the yoke of tyranny and totalitarianism. If that is what this government wants, that is fine, but I want to stick with democratic nations and peoples who are our friends, and have been our friends through war and peace.

The sooner this or another government wakes up to the fact that our best partners are those democratic nations of this world the better off and the happier all Canadians will be. If the government wants to know why its state is so low at this point in time I suggest it is because of situations that have developed in this country since 1974, such as the Taiwan affair, which destroyed and will continue to destroy the credibility of the government.

The final thing I wish to suggest is that we have another oasis of freedom in the Middle East in Israel. I hope the government will continue to assist that small nation in developing in the way it has, and to see that its boundaries are defensible and secure so its people can enjoy freedom of life, peace, and security. I am not critical about the government's policy as far as Israel is concerned, but I would refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe regarding the passport situation. This involved people travelling to Arab countries with stamps in their passports indicating they were non-Jews. That is a despicable thing to have happen to anyone in this country. I cannot understand how any government agency would be allowed to put such a policy into effect. Canadians are entitled to an explanation of how that happened, and an assurance that the people involved are no longer associated with external affairs. Canadians would then be a great deal happier about the situation.

My time has just about expired. Before I sit down I should once again like to urge the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration to assist in developing some kind of monitoring agency to see that regional programs in Atlantic Canada are made workable and effective in overcoming the regional disparity there. I hope they will make sure that national programs do not thwart the intentions of regional policies.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With only three or four minutes left until five o'clock it has been suggested that we call it five o'clock. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, the House stands adjourned until Monday at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(2).

At 4.56 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

APPENDIX "A"

UNVEILING OF STATUE OF RIGHT HON. LOUIS ST. LAURENT—SPEECH BY PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): We are honouring today the memory of a man who, in spite of staggering odds, served his country exceptionally well.

Nothing seemed to incline the lawyer Louis St. Laurent to politics and even less to mark him out for the highest office in government. Yet, at an age where others are already considering retirement, he acceeded to supreme power and pursued one of the most remarkable political careers in our history.

[English]

The unpredictability, the impassioned debate and the frustrations that mark political life could not have been attractive to this man of order and reason, of measured, regular habits. But when he entered the political arena the war was raging and a formidable crisis threatened the country.

It was only out of duty that Louis St. Laurent took the first step which would lead him so far, involve him for so long and demand so much of his energy and himself. It was out of duty that he responded the first time to Mackenzie King's call to succeed Ernest Lapointe as Minister of Justice and leader of French Canada. Later, again out of duty, he accepted the External Affairs portfolio that his leader pressed upon him. And finally, out of duty once more, he yielded to the wishes of Mackenzie King who saw him as his successor, and he became Prime Minister of Canada.

Thus, each of the major stages in his political career began in the austere and pure light of duty. The same moral purpose guided and directed all his actions, whether dealing with his French-speaking compatriots or the country as a whole.

[Translation]

He had a deep love for Canada and never questioned the concept of our Canadian identity, which explains his almost religious concern for Canadian unity. In that respect, he did not hesitate to jeopardize his prestige, his popularity and his political capital. And the people whom he trusted, proved him right. His courage and his devotion to duty were a lesson and a salvation for the whole country. Such broad and rigorous views guided his actions on the international level. His name remains linked to some achievements which safeguard the western world to this day and contribute to world peace.

A true Canadian, an exemplary citizen, a first-rate politician, Louis St. Laurent won world-wide recognition and acclaim. May this monument which I have the honour to unveil, as well as the square and spacious grounds which will bear his name, perpetuate forever the memory of the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent as well as the example of his remarkable virtues.

TRANSPORT

REASON FOR DELAY IN ANNOUNCING POLICY CHANGES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, involving transportation. On April 6 of this year, the Minister of Transport appeared before the relevant standing committee and promised a new Air Canada Act, a new transportation act, a new ports policy and a re-examination of the St. Lawrence seaway. A year before that, the former minister of transport announced there would be a regional third level air policy and on March 14, 1972 his predecessor promised sweeping transportation changes involving the CNR, Air Canada and the Railway Act amendments. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That because of the unprecedented delay in implementing these various obvious and important changes, the present Minister of Transport make a statement on motions at the first opportunity explaining to the House the reasons for this procrastination and giving the precise date when Air Canada officials who have not appeared before the relevant committee of this House during the past three years—at that time the 1972 annual report of Air Canada was discussed—will appear.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SOCIAL SECURITY

PROPOSED REDUCTION IN AGE OF ELIGIBILITY FOR OLD AGE PENSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in recognition of the fact that today is the Prime Minister's birthday—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —I would like to present a motion under Standing Order 43. Since three years from today the Prime Minister will be at an age when a certain proposal of mine might be of interest to him, especially if by that time he is unemployed,—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent):

That this House urges the government to proceed immediately to provide pensions at 60 for all those who are out of the labour market.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED APOLOGY TO DR. GALBRAITH FOR REMARKS BY MINISTER OF FINANCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the remarks of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) on CBC television last week in relation to Canada's economic future in which he referred to the economist John Kenneth Galbraith as a "gadfly" whose economic propositions are "too shallow", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

That this House direct the Secretary of State for External Affairs to extend apologies to Dr. Galbraith for the minister's extravagant cheap shots.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion can only be debated with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRADE

REQUEST FOR REDUCTION IN BEEF IMPORTS FROM AUSTRALIA—EFFECT OF CHANGE IN METHOD OF ISSUING IMPORT PERMIT

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my question was to be directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, but in his absence I will direct my question to the former minister. It deals with the status of the Canadian beef industry.

In view of the obvious reluctance or, indeed, failure or refusal of the Minister of Agriculture to implement a temporary embargo on Australian and New Zealand beef and veal imports—but rather, the government has opted for import permit controls—will the minister assure the House, and particularly the Canadian beef industry, that beef imports from those sources will cease or at least be reduced substantially? This is a very important question because comparing boatloadings from September to September from that source to Canada they appear to be up some 61 per cent. Can the minister comment on that situation?

Mr. Speaker: Before the minister does comment, it should be made clear that he would be doing so as the Acting Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and not as the former minister.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Acting Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member that the question is a very important one, and because it is and because it involves a number of different countries, including those to which the hon. member made reference, I do not think it would be appropriate at this time to go into it in detail, other than to say that all the aspects of the question are being examined both by the Minister of Agriculture and other concerned ministers. I hope that there will be some clarification within a very short time.

Mr. Wise: I wonder if the former minister would be kind enough to respond to my supplementary question. Can the minister confirm or deny that recent changes in the method of issuing import permits have actually made it easier for the importation of beef? This action must be viewed as an indication that even greater imports will result.

Mr. Jamieson: On the specifics of the question, certainly the intention was not to allow more beef in, as the hon. member has suggested, but to restrict imports. However, as I say, I believe the total picture will become clearer in the next few days as all of the necessary information with regard to shipments in transit and various related questions becomes known.

BEEF IMPORTS—REQUEST FOR ACTION TO REDUCE IMPORTS FROM AUSTRALIA

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, my question should normally go to the Minister of Agriculture. In his absence perhaps it should be directed to the acting minister or his parliamentary secretary.

An hon. Member: Nobody is there.

An hon. Member: Here is the minister now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hargrave: I have a question for the late Minister of Agriculture.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hargrave: My question is also with regard to imports of meat from Australia and New Zealand and with particular reference to the minister's response to my question in this House on Friday in which he said very clearly, and I quote: "As a result of government action no beef or veal will be allowed into Canada after Sunday night, October 17, unless by permit".

In view of the very real possibility that the use of this individual permit device could result in increased imports from Australia and New Zealand, will the minister now clearly indicate if he intends to use this permit device to restrict imports from Australia and New Zealand into Canada?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we certainly cannot be a dumping ground for beef from any country which has been denied the opportunity to ship beef into the United States. We have to make sure that we take similar action so that any beef which comes in, as of midnight last night, would have to have a permit. The quotas are being worked out and will be announced shortly, if there are to be quotas for beef, for instance, from New Zealand and Australia. I understand that the quotas the United States has placed on Canada, if they have not been announced as of today, will be announced later in a more firm type of statement than that which was made last week. Our officials met with United States officials last week to try to work out a proper program between Canada and the United States. It will be on beef and veal; ours will be on beef and veal. Live cattle will move between the two countries freely because they are not affected by the import quotas the United States has placed on our beef.

Mr. Hargrave: A supplementary question. In view of the fact that these imports from down under continue to have access to our Canadian markets at price differentials well in excess of the "six cent under" agreement and in view of the fact that our 1976 imports from down under will amount to 10 pounds to 11 pounds per capita, which is about 10 per cent of our total consumption, does the minister not feel it is about time he showed the Canadian cattle industry that he is concerned and able to act on behalf of this industry as the secretary for agriculture in the United States is apparently able to do?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member should remember that last year I did act on behalf of the beef producers of Canada and did establish import quotas from the United States and import quotas from Australia and New Zealand. If you remember, there was strong representation for me to lift those. I did lift them last December. We did have a supply-management program that we were trying to run for Canada and now the secretary of agriculture for the United States has seen fit to try to run a supply-management program in his own country.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR FORECAST OF LEVEL OF UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Can the minister tell the House whether the unemployment forecast for 1976 made by the Conference Board of Canada, which is 7 per cent, or that of the Toronto Dominion Bank at 7.6 per cent is accurate and if neither would he provide the House with the government's forecast?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I should like to study them in more detail. I think, as the Prime Minister said on one occasion, that what we need is more one-handed economists. We get one economist saying that, on the one hand, we have this and another economist saying, on the other hand, we have that: I do not like to play with figures. I am more interested in getting those Canadians who want to work, back to work.

UNEMPLOYMENT—REASON FOR FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO PROVIDE ESTIMATE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious from the answer that the minister has been in cabinet for some time. I should like to shift now to the Prime Minister. Since the white paper entitled "The Way Ahead" estimates a high level of unemployment throughout the rest of the 1970s, could the Prime Minister tell the House why the government in that white paper did not inform the people of its own estimates in percentage terms for unemployment in the 1970s? Related to that, would the Prime Minister confirm an outside estimate that we are currently losing $6 billion to $7 billion in output because of the current levels of unemployment?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the discussion paper to which the hon. member refers does indicate that there are pressures on the unemployment situation due to the fact that the economy will be growing more slowly and that the labour force will continue to increase at least until the early 1980s. For these two reasons we have made an estimate that the unemployment problem would be serious, and it is this that we wish to point out to all Canadians. I think the matter of exact percentages is beyond our power to state. We make estimates but I would not want the New Democratic Party to concentrate on the figures; I would prefer if it concentrated on the problems generally mentioned in the paper, and use whatever influence it might have on the various sectors of the economy to co-operate with the government in seeking a remedy to them.

Mr. Broadbent: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The government was not at all reticent about putting forth estimates on its anticipation of the levels of inflation in the past year, so I cannot understand its newfound reluctance to do so for unemployment. I should therefore like to ask the Prime Minister, if he expects the people of Canada to take his government seriously in terms of its commitment to deal with unemployment, why will the government not follow the example of the United States, Great Britain and other governments in the western world and tell the people directly what they anticipate unemployment levels to be in percentage terms?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I believe the whole basis of the question is ill-informed and unfounded. When the hon. member says we have given figures for inflation I ask him, where has he seen such figures? We have indicated the dangers of inflation and set guidelines in the controls program as to where we want the level of inflation to be; but we have not been making precise prognostications about either inflation or unemployment. We believe they are both serious problems.

Mr. Broadbent: Give us your target for unemployment, then.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we say unemployment will be dangerously high. That should be of sufficient concern to the hon. member that he would not want to have exact figures. Whatever figure I give him he will say is too high, and if he does not, he should.

POST OFFICE

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO RESOLVE PROBLEMS WITH UNION

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He is out of the House, delivering mail.

Mr. Dinsdale: I regret that he is not present in the House this morning, because I wanted to congratulate him on assuming his responsibilities. I wish him well in his attempts to establish une entente cordiale with the officials of CUPW. In his absence perhaps the Prime Minister or someone concerned about this vital subject will reply. In view of the vital importance of a reliable postal service to national unity and economic well-being, particularly to small businessmen whom the government supported strongly in the recent Speech from the Throne, can the government indicate what steps it is taking to resolve the current confrontation with union officials and continue an efficiently operating postal service?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member states a desirable objective. I am sure it is the objective toward which the minister is working.

THREATENED STRIKE—REASON FOR BREAKING OFF NEGOTIATIONS—PARTICIPATION OF TREASURY BOARD OFFICIALS IN EFFORTS TO SETTLE

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the importance of the President of the Treasury Board in these negotiations, and since one of the problems with the postal service is the divided responsibility in negotiations, can the President of the Treasury Board say if he is involved in current negotiations and, in particular, what steps he or his officials are taking to assure that the talks which have now been cancelled on the basis of the unacceptable demand of union officials, as a press release puts it, will resume? How is that problem being resolved? What unacceptable demand has been made?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I and my officials have been closely involved. There has been an extremely co-operative effort involving myself, the Postmaster General, officials of the post office and Treasury Board. Indeed, a series of encouraging and productive discussions has taken place during the last few days, including the weekend. We felt some progress was being made. I think that feeling was shared by the Post Office union people. The demand that broke off the talks was that all sanctions and disciplinary action planned against the people who took part in the illegal work stoppage a week or two ago should be cancelled. That was not a matter about which we were prepared to bargain.

Mr. Dinsdale: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Am I to understand from the remarks of the Prime Minister and the President of the Treasury Board that the talks have been resumed and negotiations are going on in the interest of a peaceful settlement, without a return to rotating strikes?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, talks had been resumed but broke off yesterday after the request made by the president of CUPW along the lines I just indicated. They have not been resumed since yesterday, although Post Office officials and Treasury Board people are prepared to return to the discussions at any time.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

INDUSTRY

CANADAIR PROPOSAL FOR LEAR JETS—REQUEST FOR TABLING LEE POOR REPORT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce whom I would like to congratulate on his new portfolio. Can the minister assure the House that he does not intend to ask the government to advance $150 million to $200 million of taxpayers' money to Canadair as front money for the Lear jet proposition?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we took no decision yet concerning this proposition which seems extremely interesting and which does not require direct financial intervention by the government. We are now considering it and as soon as we have some information on this matter we will give it to the House.

[English]

Mr. McKinnon: If the cabinet is soft-headed enough to approve this funding, can the minister assure the House that he will, first, bring forward supplementary estimates for debate to cover the provision of the funds, and, second, will he now table the Lee Poor consultative report which was commissioned by the government and which is understood to be firmly against this whole deal?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I did not say that we were committed; I said that we were now considering the proposition and that I did not believe that direct financial intervention by the government was required for the moment. As regards the report mentioned by the hon. member, I will get some information. In any event, we will seriously consider all alternatives before taking any decision.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

STANDARDS FOR RUST-PROOFING OF MOTOR VEHICLES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I would like to congratulate him on following his distinguished father, a former Minister of Finance, into the federal cabinet.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: My question is this. Is it the intention of the government to introduce immediately standards of rust-proofing to be met in the manufacture of all cars and other vehicles sold in Canada, so that in future the purchasers of these vehicles will not be subjected to the fraud which has been the case in recent years when people have bought vehicles in good faith only to see them go to pieces in a very short period of time?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the point of the remarks of the hon. member. As to the question he raises, I cannot agree that there is the sort of misleading attitude on the part of Canadian manufacturers that he suggests. The question of rust is one which has been very much in the news lately.

Mr. Paproski: Especially in the Liberal party.

Mr. Abbott: The safety branch of the Department of Transport has been actively engaged in reviewing accidents resulting from cars that are defective. As well, my department is constantly reviewing the matter of misleading advertising. The North American market for vehicles is so closely integrated that I think it important for the hon. member to realize we must take a broader view of this question than simply the one he suggests.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I regret to say that, judging by the minister's answer, he is obviously not going to deal with matters in the same straightforward manner that his father used to do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: I simply say to the minister that I can demonstrate to him very clearly by an actual example that if rustproofing is properly applied, cars do not rust and thereby become destroyed. In this case, will the minister get on with the job, cut down on the delays the government always seems to encounter in meeting matters of this importance, and get after the problem as though he were a businessman rather than a bureaucrat?

• (1130)

Mr. Abbott: I recognize that the hon. member's history in this House ranges back almost to the Fathers of Confederation. He is able to compare answers to all sorts of questions but the fact is that in giving a straightforward answer we cannot determine by virtue simply of the evidence presented in this House what happens to cars when salt is used on the roads without taking a fair attitude to the cost involved in completely rustproofing automobiles. What I am trying to say, in as direct a fashion as I can is that we have taken action through my predecessor and been of great assistance to people concerned over a rust problem which involved Ford cars. We are holding additional discussions, and I can assure the hon. member all the automobile companies are anxious to co-operate with us. I feel certain he can rest assured we are watching this situation very carefully.

Oral Questions

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

SUGGESTION BOARD PUBLICIZE NAMES OF COMPANIES FOUND TO HAVE EXCESS REVENUE

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Will he take immediate steps to ensure that the Anti-Inflation Board will begin without further delay not only naming all those companies found to have excess revenue, and the amount of such revenue, but also that the board will inform Canadian consumers of the names of products whose prices have been rolled back by those companies in order to get rid of excess revenue? I include in this all roll-backs which have already taken place and about which the consumer and the public at large have not yet been informed.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I would remind the hon. gentleman that in this regard the board is governed by a statute which was passed by this parliament. Subject to the provisions of the law, the chairman of the board has initiatives under way which we expect will result in publicity of the kind the hon. member has in mind.

PUBLISHING

EFFECT ON ADVERTISING REVENUE OF AGREEMENT WITH THE UNITED STATES ON DELETION OF COMMERCIALS FROM CABLE TELEVISION

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): My question is to the Secretary of State; I wish him well in his new post. Bearing in mind the belief by Canadian broadcasters and the CRTC that only a combination of Bill C-58, which is now law, and random deletion from cable TV of commercials placed in the United States will ensure that Canadian advertizing revenues stay in Canada, can the minister explain how accepting the U.S. government's request to end commercial deletion in return for ending their objection to the provisions of C-58 will support the government's policy to assist Canadian broadcasters?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the kind welcome extended to me by the hon. member. The question he poses is a hypothetical one and as such I do not think it should be answered at this time.

Mr. Symes: I hope the minister can give an assurance now that this request, one which we heard the Secretary of State for External Affairs talk about the other day, will not be acceded to. Is the government confident there is no loophole in the Act, specifically in section 19, which permits advertizing tax reduction on repeated one-year contracts with U.S. border television stations?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have the distinct impression that the question seeks a legal opinion from the minister.

Oral Questions

HARBOURS

ALLEGED REDUCTION IN TIME FOR IMPLEMENTING NEW POLICY—DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): A question for the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker. Has the lead time for implementing a new harbours policy been cut from some 15 months to six months? When will the necessary legislative authority be sought from parliament?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): We hope to introduce legislation at an early date. Until then, use is being made of the lead time in the sense that steps toward implementation, as far as this is possible ahead of the legislation, are being taken. I would point out that there is likely to be a fairly long period before all the steps necessary to rearrange the accounting and other responsibilities can be completed.

Mr. Fairweather: Why is the plan under way before legislative authority has been received? Surely, the minister would agree that this amounts to contempt of parliament.

Mr. Lang: No, Mr. Speaker. I say this because the things which are now being done are being done under authority which presently exists. There is nothing in the law which prevents us from moving, for instance, toward the establishment of local executive committees to assist port management. While these committees may look like forerunners of the port authorities contemplated in the legislation and while they may begin to do their work and in this way begin the implementation of the policy, I do not think we need to await the legislation in order to make those moves which are possible under existing legislation. We shall need the legislation because many things which will fit together well in the whole operation require legislative change.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE OF CANADIAN PRESS EMPLOYEES—GOVERNMENT EFFORT TO SETTLE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour and it arises out of a question asked on Friday by the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys in connection with the strike of 275 Canadian Press journalists. Can he tell us whether as a result of the consideration given by his department as to the reasons for this strike the government does not agree that the claims of these journalists are both reasonable and responsible and that something must be done by his department to bring an end to a situation which has become intolerable to these employees and to active journalists?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): I conclude from the remarks of the right hon. gentleman that we have his support in our efforts to get this unfortunate strike settled. We are doing everything we possibly can to settle it. For me to comment on the merits would not be particularly helpful in obtaining settlement, although I may have something to say about that personally at a later time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is later than you think!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why cannot the minister answer that very simple question—why his department, in dealing with this problem and in meeting with the executive of the publishers and the representatives of labour, has not stated definitely that the claims of the employees are reasonable and responsible? Why is the minister so uncertain, so willing to discuss a matter some time in the future, bearing in mind that the time for action is now, after almost a year's delay during which a contract has not been arrived at?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I appreciate the heroics the right hon. gentleman is getting into now—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I want the truth, not evasion!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): It may very well be that we have expressed our views. It may very well be that we have the strength of our convictions, too, but as most people in this House know, when one is trying to mediate a settlement it is not in the best interests of the employees and their families to go in for heroics.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That accusation by the minister deserves an answer.

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Speaking of heroics, there is such a thing as cowardice.

STATISTICS CANADA

ALLEGED BREACHES OF CONFIDENTIALITY BY EMPLOYEES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and it is further to my questions of October 14 involving Statistics Canada. Is the minister now entirely satisfied that there have been in recent years no breaches of confidentiality with reference to any data pertaining to community development or planning and that such data, not available to the general public, has never been improperly transmitted or sold to persons or companies whose position would be improved by its acquisition?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have no information to the effect that documents which were to be kept confidential by the commission were released to the public. I am to meet the chairman,

Mr. Kirkham, this afternoon and shall inquire into the matter and, if indicated, shall report to the House as soon as possible.

[English]

NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES DISCIPLINED FOR ALLEGED BREACHES OF CONFIDENTIALITY—POSSIBILITY OF BENEFITS FROM SUCH BREACHES

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): I wish to thank the minister for his answer, Mr. Speaker. Would he inquire when he meets with Dr. Kirkham how many Statistics Canada employees have been disciplined in one way or another because of commercial or extra-curricular activities which were in breach of conflict of interest guidelines and whether there have been any organizations made up of Statistics Canada employees or close relatives formed directly or indirectly for the purpose of dealing with consultants or other persons interested in obtaining the type of information which would benefit them and which is not available to the general public?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows me: if there are people who act that way, that is who use their positions and the confidential reports they receive for personal benefit, they will have to find a job elsewhere.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

POSSIBLE CHANGES IN STRUCTURE OF FORCES—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is intended for the Acting Minister of National Defence and it follows the lengthy questioning of the former minister of defence with regard to the changes in the infrastructure and in the relocation of the Armed Forces of Canada. Is the minister in a position to tell us at what point are those considerations? Is the plan before cabinet or is it back in the department? Would he say something to put an end to the great number of speculative stories which have caused a great deal of unrest in the armed services as a result of the possible changes.

● (1140)

Hon. Barney Danson (Acting Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the problem is before me and I am dealing with it now. I hope that an announcement will be made in the very near future.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I have some elucidation as to what the minister means by "the very near future", other than simply "sooner than later"?

Mr. Danson: Sooner than later, Mr. Speaker.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

DATE OF REPORT OF TASK FORCE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In April the minister promised that the report of the departmental task force on search and rescue would be reporting to him by midsummer. My question is: Has the task force reported to the minister and what action has the minister taken on the recommendation of that task force? I can assure the minister that this is a most urgent matter.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the task force did report and the government has been giving full consideration to all the issues raised in it. The fiscal decisions that are required are taking place these days and the results in terms of announcements, improved equipment and location of equipment, will be following soon.

DEPARTMENT RESPONSIBLE FOR OPERATION—DELIVERY OF EQUIPMENT NECESSARY TO PATROL 200-MILE LIMIT

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister did promise earlier that he would be tabling the report. When will he be tabling the report, and will the minister give us some information as to who will be co-ordinating the efforts of air search and rescue, whether it will be the Coast Guard or the Department of National Defence? How soon can we expect the extra hardware that will be required if the 200-mile limit goes into effect on January 1?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, that may all be part of the same announcement.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MEETING WITH MR. KISSINGER ON DELETION OF COMMERCIALS FROM CABLE TELEVISION—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In regard to reports concerning his meeting in Washington with Mr. Kissinger, it was reported that there was room for compromise. I should like to ask the minister whether that is with regard to cable commercial deletions, and where is the compromise? There either is deletion or there is not deletion. Was there a firm proposal from Secretary Kissinger or was there a firm proposal advanced by the minister? What is the status of the situation and what communication was there with the Minister of Communications before this statement was made?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): First of all, Mr. Speaker, the reference was exclusively to the commercial deletion aspect of the package. There were three or four separate proposals, not made to me directly but made previously during the meeting of officials prior to my meeting with the secretary, and I undertook to bring those back. It did seem to me in our discussions that there was room for looking at these alternatives or these options. They are being examined in Ottawa today and there will be a further meeting of the officials subsequent to that examination, but I do not know quite when. I did say that it would be within two weeks.

Mr. Nowlan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I thank the minister for his answer, but in these discussions is the chairman of the CRTC or officials of the CRTC involved; and who is going to make the announcement, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of Communications, or the chairman of the CRTC?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has identified one of the complications in this issue. My own view is that the CRTC is an autonomous, governing body in this matter, and therefore has clearly been involved in the discussions, so should have a large input into whatever resolution is found. Whether or not, because it does involve international relations, the government should also take a position, perhaps in concert with the CRTC or otherwise, is in fact one of the difficulties we are now trying to work out. As for who will make the announcement, I have no knowledge at the moment how that is likely to be done, but thinking about it immediately I would suspect it would be the CRTC.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lisgar on a supplementary.

GARRISON DIVERSION—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON DISCUSSIONS WITH MR. KISSINGER

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in relation to his trip to Washington during which he discussed various subjects with Henry Kissinger. I should like to ask the minister whether or not the topic of the Garrison diversion project in North Dakota came up in his talks with the Secretary of State; and if it did, would the minister inform the House as to the outcome of those discussions?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it did not come up in any detailed way because it was one of those subjects that had been discussed in great detail by officials and, of course, by the IJC, so for that reason there was no necessity for us to spend a good deal of time on it during the meeting on Friday. However, I did repeat Canada's concerns on the matter and the secretary undertook to bear those in mind as developments proceed.

GARRISON DIVERSION—DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES—NEED FOR STRONGER GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): A further supplementary to the minister, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister what his department intends to do over the situation that has developed whereby the International Joint Commission's report will be some seven to eight months late. Construction of the dam is going ahead almost as scheduled without any appreciable slowdown in construction. Certainly there is a great amount of fear in Manitoba—and there should be fear within the minister's department—that the diplomatic overtures he has been making have not been good enough and that a more positive approach will have to be taken with the President of the United States and also with Henry Kissinger himself.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Well, Mr. Speaker, I can only tell the hon. member at this time that I will be meeting with the IJC some time this week. I am perfectly well aware of the circumstances that he has outlined. I am not any the less concerned about them than he is, but I feel at the moment that the negotiations are best dealt with in the manner in which we are proceeding without any further declaration on our part.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Just to keep the record straight I think all hon. members would want to know that those questions were not really supplementary to the others. However, the hon. member for Lisgar was due to get the floor anyway.

STABILIZATION PROGRAM FOR COW-CALF PRODUCERS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Since the federal government has not acted on his stabilization program for the cow-calf producers in this country and the western provinces have had to act, is it the minister's intention to announce a program based on full cost of production, or does he intend just to go around the country making speeches about how difficult the matter is?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, by law we have to announce a price for finished beef by the end of the year. We will announce a stabilization program for finished beef by the end of the year.

STABILIZATION PROGRAM FOR COW-CALF PRODUCERS—REQUEST FOR PLEBISCITE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister listen to the pleas of the small cattle producers of this country and hold a plebiscite on a national marketing plan, since he supports marketing boards, or will the minister in this case continue to be dictated to by the Canadian Cattlemen's Association?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Canadian Cattlemen's Association would have some reservations about believing what the hon. member says to be the fact, that I am dictated to by them. If I did everything that they said, first of all I would do nothing for the beef farmers, if I were to follow the advice they gave several months ago; and if I followed their advice now, I would do many different things for the beef producers.

Mr. Nystrom: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would like the minister to answer my question and to cut out all the bull. Will he or will he not listen to the pleas of the small producer and hold a plebiscite on a national marketing plan.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that although some provinces force certain kinds of marketing legislation boards on the producers, this minister and this government is not going to force anything on them. If they want that type of thing there is an avenue that they can follow. If this House feels so strongly about it, there is national farm marketing legislation for the beef producers if they want it. All this House has to do is to act on their behalf.

INCARCERATION OF SHARON BETHUNE IN MEXICO—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs of which I have given him notice. It involves a young girl by the name of Sharon Lynn Bethune who has been held in a Mexican jail for over eight months and not been charged as yet. Would the minister tell us what steps this government has taken to make sure that this young lady is released and sent back to Canada?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I genuinely apologize to the hon. member. If he did give me notice, it does not appear in my notes for today. If he would not mind, I should like to reserve my answer until tomorrow.

SUPPLY-MANAGEMENT PROGRAM FOR BEEF PRODUCERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the minister's repeated reference to supply-management programs as being the solution to Canada's beef industry problems, is it the minister's wish to develop a supply-management program for Canada's beef industry, and would the minister be kind enough to answer simply yes or no.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the beef industry needs a supply-management program. It is obvious these producers cannot deal in the world free market under the present conditions and exist. The United States of America saw fit to try to impose supply-management programs on other countries, over 15 of them, which supply that country with beef. So if you think the beef producers can exist without that kind of program, explain it.

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is again to the Minister of Agriculture. Am I to understand from the answer he just gave that the minister is stating he wishes to introduce a supply-management program for the beef industry?

Mr. Whelan: Not unless the beef producers of Canada want it.

BEEF—LEVEL OF UNITED STATES QUOTA FOR CANADIAN PRODUCT

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the global quotas placed by President Ford on beef imports into the United States and the minister's indication last week that he hoped the quotas placed on Canada would not reduce our exports to the United States below the 90 million pound level indicated by Canada, I wonder if the minister can indicate what success the Canadian representations had in Washington last week, and if he knows whether our exports to the United States will be reduced below the 90 million pounds.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Government of the United States of America has not made an official announcement on what our quota is going to be. We do not know. We think it will be announced later today. I can say I think I am not optimistic that it will be 90 million pounds.

ENERGY

APPLICATION OF NOVA SCOTIA POWER COMMISSION FOR RATE INCREASES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question arising from a response from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to one of our colleagues from Atlantic Canada last week having to do with the energy situation. The Board of Public Utilities of the province of Nova Scotia commenced hearings today on the application of the Nova Scotia Power Corporation for what can be described only as exorbitant and intolerable rate increases. Can the minister indicate to the House whether or not his departmental officials are in fact monitoring those hearings and, if not, would the minister give consideration to having officials at least sit in and hear the evidence as it comes forth this week on this matter?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we will make it our business to monitor those hearings.

ANTI-INFLATION ACT

POSSIBILITY OF AMENDMENT TO REQUIRE BOARD TO PUBLICIZE RULINGS MADE AGAINST COMPANIES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and is further to the question asked by the hon. member for Windsor West in which he was drawing the minister's attention to the habit of non-disclosure in respect of price rulings coming from the AIB. As there is increasing resentment among Canadians that these rulings are being kept confidential, I am wondering whether the minister would indicate if he intends to amend the Anti-Inflation Act so that there is no question in the future that these disclosures will be required, not only the rulings but also the impact on the companies or persons concerned.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would be quite prepared to consider such an amendment, which of course would disclose the position of some companies in a competitive situation but not others. I hope the various companies to whom the Chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board will be directing his inquiries might bear that in mind; that is, that there is a feeling in the House represented by the official opposition, and indeed on this side of the House, that this information should be made public, so it might be advisable to do it by consent rather than by parliamentary requirement.

DATE OF TERMINATION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, this question again is directed to the Minister of Finance. Referring to the suggestion that Bill C-73 may in fact be amended, would the minister go further and indicate if he intends to make any other amendments to the present Anti-Inflation Act and, in particular, will he take up the undertaking given the House last Wednesday by the Prime Minister that the termination of that act will be definitively set at December 31, 1978, not representing so far as our side is concerned that we want it to run that long but we would at least like to see some definite termination to the act.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it may well be that I will be coming forward during the course of the session with an amendment with regard to an association bargaining situation and there may indeed be other situations where for the better operation of the anti-inflation program amendments will be required. In respect of the termination date, I think I should refer the hon. gentleman back to the statute again and the termination provisions which would of course require parliamentary approval before it could be extended beyond the specified termination date.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

WITHDRAWAL OF HOPPER CAR SERVICE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the action of the Canadian Pacific Railway in withdrawing hopper car service from all branch lines in Saskatchewan, and I believe as well in the province of Alberta, and in view of the fact that this withdrawal has caused a loss, particularly for those producers who deliver barley in carload lots and has the effect of reducing the volume of grain on the CPR lines as opposed to the CNR lines which are utilizing hopper cars, can the minister advise what steps he has taken to ensure that the CPR will re-instate hopper car service on its branch lines.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of any general withdrawal. There may be specific cases where weight problems lead to a change, but I will certainly look into the situation to determine what are the apparent reasons behind any withdrawal.

CUSTOMS

REASON FOR DELAYED CLEARANCE OF MEMBERS OF PRINCESS PATRICIA'S LIGHT INFANTRY AT WINNIPEG

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. In light of the very thorough and harsh customs clearance 155 members of the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry were subjected to in Winnipeg last week after having already been precleared by customs overseas, has the minister had an opportunity to investigate this matter and, if she has not, will she do so. Also I should like to remind the minister that the families and friends of the servicemen had been waiting for their return for six months and were subjected to a two-hour wait at the depot also.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, hon. members know that the inspection of our national defence aircraft in Lahr is generally carried out by Department of National Revenue customs officers posted in Germany. It was the case for the aircraft concerned. However, according to the practice in my department, we made a countercheck of this aircraft. We had to reexamine all the hand luggage of the 155 travellers, which took four hours. This was done for the security of the travellers and for compliance with the laws of the Canadian government, something which the hon. member cannot be opposed to. Moreover, two closer checks of two travellers were required because of fairly serious problems.

[English]

Mr. McKenzie: I have one supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it the routine practice of customs to put members of the Canadian Armed Forces through such vigorous customs checks after having been pre-cleared and, in the case of the Winnipeg incident, was there any contraband found that would justify the search?

Miss Bégin: Two switchblades, I gather, Mr. Speaker, are sufficient to justify the search.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

DATE OF TABLING HALL REPORT ON RAILWAY PENSIONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. It being understood that Dr. Noel Hall has submitted his report on railway pensions to the minister, a report which I believe is now being translated, can the minister say when he will be tabling this important document?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quite right. We have it now. It is fairly voluminous, so the translation is taking quite a long time, but after the long wait it will be ready in a couple of weeks.

THE MINISTRY

TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 41(2), I ask leave to table a copy of the correspondence between the former minister of national defence and myself. This correspondence has been asked for by the Leader of the Official Opposition. I sent my letter last Friday; unfortunately it has not yet been translated but, with the leave of the House, I am going to table both copies in English.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Friday, October 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Maurice Harquail for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Clark (p. 28).

Mr. Ross Milne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I join in the debate on the Speech from the Throne to speak about some issues which I believe to be of national importance and some which are of importance in my riding of Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe.

First, I should like to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the government on the Speech from the Throne. I thought it was a speech that referred to the many issues and concerns which constituents in my riding raised with me during the summer recess. I applaud the intention of the government to bring in legislation to deal with these concerns.

First and foremost, of course, is the concern about national unity. I was particularly pleased to see it set out not only as the first priority in the Speech from the Throne but also to see that the program will be maintained in its present form and extended even further. I am raising a question which surely many people are worried about, that is: Where has all our understanding on this question gone? Canada has been known all over the world ever since its beginning for its tolerance and for the way in which various groups in Canada have been able to get along together. I am alarmed, as I am sure is every member of the House and surely all responsible Canadians, at the harsh attitude being adopted by so many people at this time.

There are two or three points which I should like to raise at this time. I really do not understand—and I would like to be enlightened on this—why everyone seems to feel that it is only the federal government which has the responsibility for maintaining national unity and, in particular, why the Prime Minister should be the only person in Canada concerned about national unity and having responsibility for doing something about it. Surely, this is an issue that is the concern of everyone elected to the House, to the provincial legislatures or to municipal school boards—indeed, the concern of every Canadian.

I want to support very strongly the statement in the Speech from the Throne that institutional bilingualism will be continued with some sensitivity to its administration, that problems connected with it will be considered and that perhaps a different approach will be taken to the administration of the program. I think it is a natural progression of the original policy for us to speak at this time to provincial governments, provincial premiers and provincial ministers of education about introducing this program to the educational systems over which the provinces have jurisdiction. Judging from a widespread expression of opinion on this matter by many people, I believe it is generally agreed that this is how this problem should be handled. I hope people are not saying that this matter should be put off for another period of time so that we will not have to deal with it. I hope that all parents, school boards and departments of education see this clearly as a major responsibility and take it seriously, and that this policy will be implemented as quickly and effectively as possible. I really believe there will be two important results from this. First of all, graduates of the school systems will have a much better knowledge of both official languages than is the case at present, and, what is even more important, they will have a better understanding and a greater tolerance of their fellow Canadians than they do now.

I think that this country cannot stand much more of the type of conflict that has been experienced in the past year or so. Really, the Anglophones and Francophones will have to approach this issue with a fundamentally different attitude and a much better understanding of each other's position on this. One of the real problems is the acceptance of change, an understanding of the dynamics of change and how it comes about. An example of this lack of understanding was the recent air traffic controllers' controversy in which extremists on both sides did nothing to solve the problem but in fact made it worse. This matter has been referred to many times in detail. This time I want to touch on it briefly. I could not understand the position of the Anglophones who are opposed to even having a feasibility study done in this matter, no more than I could understand the most vocal people on the other side who thought this should be a question of policy without any prior study being carried out of the feasibility of such a policy or any prior undertaking to explain to the rest of Canada why it is so important.

In raising this issue I wish to say that I represent many Air Canada employees and I believe that the best way of solving this issue is to undertake a study to look at the whole matter from a logical point of view, airport by airport, and to examine such matters as density and mix of traffic, sophistication of control tower equipment, as well as many other such issues, and based on this study to come up with a policy decision.

During the last summer I spoke to many of my constituents on the matter of bilingualism and I am concerned about how poorly the Official Languages Act is understood. Many people raised this issue in the context of "shoving French down my throat", but when the policy was explained to the same people they agreed that it was entirely reasonable. It seems to me that one of the fundamental things that the government, that we as supporters of the government, and that all members of the House should do, because this policy was supported by each and every party, is to go out in the country and reassure the people regarding the Official Languages Act and explain it to them. I believe that once it is explained to them, acceptance of it will be widespread. I believe that the problem at present is the misconception of the policy. Surely, we have the responsibility to explain the Act and the policy.

I would be pleased if the government would also take a look at the implementation of the bilingualism program in the Crown corporations. I have been told that there is not much opportunity for language training in either of the official languages for employees of Crown corporations who wish to learn the other language to advance their careers. One of the concerns they have relates to the method of selecting people. People who do not have the capability in a second language have no opportunity to gain a standing in the other language. That is a situation which bears consideration, and I hope that in terms of the administration of the Official Languages Act the government will do so.

Any partnership, whether it is a business relationship or whatever, is really based on three things. It is based on understanding of the other person's point of view; it most certainly has to be based on an adjustment to that other person's point of view; and most important, it must be based on a very high level of communication. If anything should happen in Canada, there should be a greatly increased understanding of the hopes, aspirations and rights of other people, some adjustment in everyone's point of view to accommodate those things and certainly a good deal of communication between various language groups to make sure that the concerns of both sides are well understood.

During the summer the Olympic Games took place and the Queen was here to open them. During her stay she spoke at a banquet, and I thought that she stated the situation with regard to the language problem better than I had heard it stated before. I should like to review three simple statements she made which I thought were very important, and I quote from her remarks of July 24 as follows:

> There can be mutual enrichment only if each group has a secure and vital cultural life of its own to share with the other. It is important, therefore, for both French speaking and English speaking Canadians to maintain the integrity of their own language and culture.
> How Canada resolves her political and constitutional differences is her own affair, but how she resolves her linguistic and cultural problems matters to thoughtful people everywhere.
> The world, all too familiar with the tragic price of conflict between peoples of different race, language, religion and culture, can look to Canada for a better example and for a renewal of the human spirit. It can look to her for a practical demonstration of how two strong communities can live together in peace, drawing from each other's strengths, respecting each other's differences.
> That is why your words, Prime Minister, about the growing mutual awareness, curiosity and respect among French speaking and English speaking Canadians, bear a message of great hope for both Canada and the world at large.

Her Majesty's remarks were well received by all Canadians who heard them, and those who did not have the opportunity to hear them should review her remarks because what she was saying was that resolving this problem is one of the fundamental things which has to be done if we are to survive as a strong and united country.

I would like to comment briefly on one particular aspect of the economy, but first I want to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). I think Canada is fortunate to have a minister of his capability. He is one of the more courageous Canadians, one of the fairest and one of the most consistent. All the way through this difficult period in the economy he has demonstrated the type of leadership which is important to Canada and which will correct some of the economic problems we have. His actions have not always been the most popular, and he has not always taken the easiest stances, but I think they have been the correct ones.

I have been a strong supporter of the guidelines. However, I have one concern. I hope that if there is to be further revision of the program, it will be in the area of rewarding productivity or highlighting it as one of the major forces in the economy.

Many people have spoken and have used many facts and figures to support their view of the situation we face with regard to exports as well as the ability to compete inside Canada with people exporting to Canada. We have some real problems, and many of them could be solved by attaching more importance to productivity. The word "productivity" does not seem to have captured the interest or attention of organized labour or management. As I listen to various groups talk about it, management seems to be saying only that we should have a lower wage scale in Canada, and labour seems to be saying that it should have a larger share of the national economy. It seems to me that the aims of both could be realized by seriously striving for greater productivity. That is what is needed for us to remain strong in the years ahead in terms of having a viable manufacturing sector, particularly that part of it which is related to our export market.

The Speech from the Throne announced an intention to set up a collective bargaining information centre. I hope it will deal not just with compensation, the relationship of various groups and the broad economic conditions under which we operate but that it will also address itself sincerely to the question of productivity. Surely, emphasizing productivity in Canada at the present time is very important, and such things as workers' councils should be taken seriously because many people working in plants have some very good ideas as to how productivity could be improved.

There is another aspect which is equally important. No matter where we go we hear the statement that no one wants to work anymore. Quite often the people who are making that statement are having expense account lunches or drinks. If that statement is true, it is certainly true on the side of management as well as on the side of labour. This country needs to go back to a very aggressive marketing stance and a very aggressive industrial design position. We have had a few years of extraordinarily good times, and both labour and management have benefitted tremendously. Now, we have to realize that times are not as easy, and we have to go back to some of the fundamentals which enable companies to achieve success; that is, through high productivity, through good industrial design and through extremely strenuous efforts in marketing. This is particularly true in Canada where we depend so much on export markets for the well-being of our economy.

Compared with countries such as Japan, France, and strangely enough, Britain, our productivity is lagging. I understand that our productivity increase last year was in the order of 2 per cent compared with 6 per cent in Japan, 5 per cent in France and 3 per cent in Britain. We really must do something about that. I do not quite know why the measuring of productivity, which has been encouraged and used for many years in many European countries, has not really caught on in North America, and particularly in Canada. I suppose it has been a factor in the auto industry for a few years, but apart from that, it has not been a major consideration in collective bargaining. I hope in the future that both management and labour will see some of the perils which are down the road, because of the high return for labour and the lack of a superlative effort in marketing. I hope they will see where that will lead us. We should pause and look at productivity and effective bargaining. Perhaps the benefits of increased productivity could be shared between employees and employer and not, as in the past, go only to the employer.

I should like to make a few comments on agriculture, Mr. Speaker. I have said a number of times in this House that one of the fundamental objectives of this government should be that we be essentially self-sufficient in food. It may seem strange that I raise this issue at a time when we have a surplus of milk powder and are not short of beef cattle or other commodities, but there are one or two things that I should like to raise in a general way. The minister might like to give some thought to them.

I am concerned about our future inventory of farmers, Mr. Speaker. I understand that the average age of our farmers is over 55 years. There has been a tremendous increase in productivity in the last five or six years as the old concept of small family farms gave way to larger family farms which use larger equipment than has ever been used in eastern Canada. Fewer farmers are doing more farming, but how long can that be sustained unless young people become farmers? Through provisions of the capital gains tax this government was able to be of tremendous assistance to farmers in that they could keep a farm in production without attracting capital gains tax after the death of the owner.

Mr. Mazankowski: Who introduced capital gains tax in the first instance?

Mr. Milne: Mr. Speaker, I think it is a fair taxation measure and I should like to discuss its application to incorporated farms.

Through extension programs many provincial governments counselled farmers to incorporate and now, having done so, they find themselves on the wrong side of the proposition when it comes to capital gains tax at the time of the death of the owner. The difficulty is that most incorporated farms have associated with them some type of processing facility or trucking business, for example; generally speaking, such an operation is more than just an ordinary farm. I would argue the case that the land portion of an incorporated farm should have the same provision in the Income Tax Act applied to it as a non-incorporated farm when it comes to the capital gains tax. I do not argue that the associated business of the farm should escape capital gains tax; if that were so it would be logical for the small business to ask for the same extension.

I think if our national objective is to have an inventory of farmers and to keep ourselves self-sufficient in food, we should consider exempting the land portion of the incorporated farm from capital gains tax. The value of land, particularly in Ontario and I suppose the same situation exists around large metropolitan areas in other provinces, has always been high. It used to be, however, that while land on the periphery of metropolitan and urban areas was very costly, about 150 miles or 200 miles away land was substantially cheaper. A farmer could sell property near a large urban area and re-establish himself or his family in agriculture some distance away. That has changed and land some distance from urban areas has increased in price.

I think this is another case which should cause us to look again at the capital gains tax and consider whether money realized from the sale of land, which is reinvested in land for agricultural purposes at some other location but for the same farm family, could not also escape this tax. Sometimes when a farmer sells land near an urban area on which he may have a long term mortgage, by the time he has purchased another farm and has renovated it so that it is comparable to with the one he sold, he ends up with a substantial debt. Many farm families decide it is just not worth while and, as a result, the children do not stay in farming. I am not sure we can afford this loss, Mr. Speaker.

There are two other aspects of agriculture that I should like to mention at this time. The first is marketing boards. I am sure there are not many members in this House who support organized marketing more strongly than I do. I spent a number of years in rural extension work and I saw many poultry farmers go from boom to bust, back and forth. I saw many farmers lose their farms to feed companies because of the real relationship of what was being produced to what the market could bear. I strongly supported the concept of marketing boards because I thought at that time, as I am sure most people did, that it was right and proper that they should be producer boards. But in some areas, I think we should look carefully at the marketing board concept and make sure the board is representative of the entire industry.

The proposed national chicken marketing agency for broiler chickens would protect the producer as well as the integrated supplier in terms of feed, hatchery and processing. A loss in one segment could be offset by profits in other segments, but I would argue the case for the independent processor who seems to be left out of the plan. At the present time it seems he is the only one who is taking any real risk and he has no protection whatsoever. I can see the danger that he might disappear from chicken broiler farming, and I should like to be on record as being in favour of processors as well as producers having a role in the marketing concept.

During question period today the inquiries were predominantly related to the beef industry and meat coming into this country. There are two distinct trends evident in our society today. When you drive around the cities, the growth of the fast food outlet, and the tremendous increase in the number of steak houses is evident. I do not know why our beef industry does not gear itself to produce more for this market. I have been told that most of these steak houses want imported beef because of consistent quality and taste, and that the fast food outlets want it because we do not produce enough of the type used. Surely, the Canadian Cattlemen's Association could analyse the market trends and supply the type of meat preferred. Rather than the beef industry continuing to produce cattle of the type it has in the past while the consumer market is moving away from it, surely the producers should be looking at the trend more closely.

• (1230)

Mr. Speaker, may I raise another point of concern? The people in my riding are most concerned about Toronto International Airport which borders the riding. Hardly a week goes by without some controversy arising about the airport. The question is asked, shall the airport remain as it is; should another runway be built, or should a second airport in the Toronto area be built? In 1968, the government decided that instead of building a fourth runway at Toronto International Airport, it would build a second airport in the Toronto area. I submit that the building of a fourth runway should not be considered at this time, a suggestion strongly supported by all elected municipal councillors in the area, representatives in the provincial legislature, including the Premier of Ontario, and the four federal members representing constituencies surrounding the airport. We all want to know, what is to happen? What is to be the future of the second airport in the Toronto area?

I understand that the Ministry of Transport considered carefully several suitable sites and, having narrowed the choice to half a dozen, consulted the Ontario government as to which of those would be most suitable in the light of the growth the Ontario government forecast for Ontario. In the end Pickering was chosen. The government announced that it would proceed with Pickering airport. The intention was not to build the airport and then look for business; rather it was intended to build new facilities in accordance with demand. Unfortunately, the Ontario government later withdrew its support for the construction of Pickering airport. Now, all members from the Toronto area are concerned about the adequacy of Toronto's airport facilities in the future. Ten years from now will they be adequate?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the parliamentary secretary that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Does the parliamentary secretary have unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Milne: Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief. I hope the provincial government will quickly come to realize that, unless some decision is taken with regard to the second airport, in the years ahead it will be difficult to provide adequate air service in the Toronto area. I appeal to that government to keep the option of Pickering open. I am not sure if that airport has been accepted as a viable alternative for the future. I simply say that the question of air facilities in Toronto should occupy the attention of the federal and provincial governments and that some definite decision should be taken. Such decision will be most important for the economic vitality of the Toronto area.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, the opportunity to speak in the throne speech debate I feel is most important, in light of the performance of this government during the past few years and, more particularly, the amazing disregard shown in the Speech from the Throne for some of the basic problems facing the country today. I enter this debate at a time when economic and social depression afflicts many people in specific areas and, indeed, whole regions of this country. This is a time of economic instability when the people of those areas need protection and assistance more than ever. At a time when the government should be highly visible and active in guaranteeing those needs, we are faced with an abdication of leadership by this government. Nowhere is this more obvious than in the recently delivered Speech from the Throne.

The commitment of this government to regional development which, in my view, has always been more rhetorical than real, has disappeared almost entirely as a result of the total absence of leadership we see today. Neglect, insensitivity and inconsistency with regard to regional disparity haunts almost every move of the economic and social performance of this government.

In words that are now bitterly prophetic, the former leader of my party, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), warned of dangers ahead in the fight against disparity. Speaking on second reading of the bill which created in 1969 the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, more than seven years ago, he said that it might, in effect, allow other ministers to say "Let Jean do it" and not accept any particular responsibility for or even wash their hands of, the whole problem of regional disparity. I know it will bring him little joy to note that his words, to my mind, have come true with a vengeance. On occasions far too numerous to mention many members, not only on my side of the House, have reminded successive ministers of the department, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) himself, that the task of dealing effectively with regional disparities in this country will not be achieved solely by programs coming under the responsibility of a minister of regional economic expansion. I submit that the names of the ministers who have been given that responsibility in this government read like a roll call of those guilty of dishonour, neglect, missed opportunities, shocking insensitivity, ignorance and even indifference toward the chronic needs of our disadvantaged regions.

I believe almost every minister has important responsibilities which affect either the bias in our structure which perpetuates underdevelopment or the opportunities for some regions to break free of their dependence and become once again self-sustaining members in the Canadian community. I propose today to review, for hon. members of this House, the work of various ministries, from the standpoint of the way in which their performance has undermined and made almost meaningless the work done by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion under various ministers and numerous officials.

When I speak of an inconsistency of approach, perhaps I should say that no minister reflects this inconsistency better than does the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). There is little doubt in the minds of our poorer communities, east, west and centre, who should head the list. The minister has made it obvious to us, with his user-pay policy, that in no way is he prepared to support or even understand the concept of regional economic development. I am not sure whether in adopting the user-pay concept, the Minister of Transport is haunted by the ghost of the MacPherson commission report of the 1960s, the ideas of Hon. J. W. Pickersgill, who established the terms of reference of the new Canadian Transport Commission and then proceeded to become head of that commission, or by the ideas of the present head of the commission. Be that as it may, I believe that, in a basic way, the minister fails to understand how essential transportation policy is to this country's unity. It has been absolutely shocking to hear what the Minister of Transport has said both inside and outside the House about the responsibilities of his portfolio. If the minister had been in the position to exercise his user-pay policy during the tenure of this country's first government, the minister's own constituency would still be nothing more than a colony of prairie dogs. Fortunately, Sir John A. Macdonald did not adopt a policy of user-apay with respect to the railroads, railroads which the minister well knows have been basically important to the opening up and development of his own home area.

Mr. Goodale: You are distorting his position, David.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I should be delighted to hear the Minister of Transport speak about the way in which transport policy favours regional development initiatives. I say this as it was incredible to me that, not many months ago, the minister saw fit to make, as part of his package of restraints, 53 per cent of his restraint cutbacks at the expense of Atlantic Canada alone. Let the parliamentary secretary explain that as an aspect in support of regional development. When I think that in the past year we have had rail freight increases between Atlantic Canada and Ontario in the order of 85 per cent, I wonder how this minister or parliamentary secretary can in any way justify the statement that they are contributing to the alleviation of regional disparities, trying to bring the country together in a more united and equitable fashion.

● (1240)

I have only a relatively brief period of time to catalogue all the sins of omission and commission of the Minister of Transport because there are a number of other ministries that obviously must be traced as well. I will deal with as many as I have time for in the brief period available. I want to raise one I am sure is of interest to the hon. member opposite. I refer to the responsibilities and the performance of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie). The minister's pricing policy for fuel wiped out more family savings in a single winter in Atlantic Canada than the depression and prohibition combined. His contingency plan, in the face of maritimers selling their homes because they could not afford to heat them, consisted of attacking provincial administrations. A newsletter from the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council of a few months ago pointed to high energy prices as an obvious possible cause for continuing disparity.

It is a difficult point to argue when you know, for example, that a commercial firm in Charlottetown last winter paid twice as much for its energy, electricity, as its counterpart in Ontario. It is difficult as well to argue when a consumer in Toronto is paying 4.8 per cent of his income for energy costs compared to a homeowner in my province who paid 12 per cent of his income for energy last winter.

The minister persists in his myopic claim that the high prices are necessary to energy conservation, although consumption in Atlantic Canada is as low as two thirds of the national average. Somehow he is determined to make that disadvantaged region pay dearly for wasteful habits that are not of its own making. The lack of awareness and insensitivity of this minister is frightening. There was not a single mention of the Atlantic energy problem in the Speech from the Throne. As recently as last Friday, my colleague, the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), raised with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources what response will be coming from the federal government with regard to the urgent request from Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island for substantial temporary aid by way of subsidy in connection with their serious problems in meeting excessively high energy costs. The minister replied, and I quote:

> I have nothing new to add on this question. The matter is under continuing study at the present time.

That is the level of interest and action on the part of this minister. It is not untypical of a number of his colleagues as well. There are questions and issues that must be resolved. Some were raised by my colleague, the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates), who in speaking in this debate on Friday mentioned the need for action with regard to the continuing possibility and potential of Fundy tidal power. There was no mention of assistance to provinces trying to convert away from their reliance on petroleum for energy. The government of my province placed proposals before this government months ago, but still no reply. There was no mention of any initiatives to equalize the costs of electrical power for business and industry across Canada. There was nothing which might show some glimmer of understanding on the part of the minister that energy costs must not be permitted to widen the disparity gap even further. I will leave the Minister of Energy there, even though there is much more that could and should be said.

With the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), we move from an area of insensitivity to obvious flippancy. In February of this year, the Minister of Finance was asked what effective measures he was prepared to implement in response to the growing disparity in unemployment rates between the various regions. His answer to this House was that he had at least decided not to take the suggestion offered by someone that DREE be cancelled. What a farce. What insensitivity. Earlier this year, during the energy crunch faced by many disadvantaged regions, we asked the minister what differential in energy rates he was prepared to allow before taking remedial steps. Not only had he not given the matter consideration, he had no intention of doing so. When we consider some of the agencies under this minister's jurisdiction, such as the Federal Business Development Bank which has a lower loan loss write-off than even the chartered banks, we wonder what little difference it can possibly make with regard to the alleviation of regional disparities.

The minister has at least been honest about his attitude toward the poorer regions, insensitive as that may be. He was the one who went on record to admit, frankly and brutally, that his government was not going to do anything to help the areas of chronic depression during a time of government restraint. Indeed, he made remarks to suggest that it would almost be inappropriate to take into account the regional variations that exist within this country with respect to the government's overall restraint program.

I could and should say more about the Minister of Finance, but I want to move to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). The Minister of Agriculture was given a very significant message from, of all places, the other place. In a report from the Senate on the situation in Kent County, New Brunswick, the minister should have received a message, loud and clear. I had hoped he would be here to hear this message in case he did not hear it earlier.

The Senate report describes the stifling practices of the Department of Agriculture which attempt to force areas such as Kent County into the mold of national policies which are neither designed for, appropriate to or wanted by its citizens. The report exposes the "big or bust" bias which runs through the programs of Agriculture Canada, singling out the Farm Credit Corporation and the unfortunately or misappropriately named Small Farm Development Program for their discrimination against the small-scale farmer. It reports, and I find this almost hard to believe, the callous refusal of one of the officials of Agriculture Canada to grant a loan with the words that, and I quote:

Kent County is not profitable, there is no future there.

I hope the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of State (Fisheries) (Mr. LeBlanc) have an opportunity to discuss that report. I would be delighted to be a silent listener in that tête-à-tête. There is also the impact of this minister's supply-management programs to consider, and there was some discussion of that in the question period today, whose quotas lock the Atlantic region into a permanent status of net food importers.

The Senate study I just mentioned is backed up on this point by a report of the Economic Council of Canada on regional unemployment which points out how the need to bring in foodstuffs costs the region 11,000 jobs. What maritime agriculture needs, says the Senate report, and this is obvious to many people, is development, and not stabilization. Even though he is not here at this time, I trust that the Minister of Agriculture will have an opportunity to learn again these basic truths.

I leave the minister there with his homework to do and I turn my attention to the President of Treasury Board (Mr. Andras). We find a new minister there but, again, whether it is a new minister or an old minister we are dealing with the same old gang which took the view in December of last year as well as in the previous period of restraint five or six years ago, that the government could not reallocate moneys within the various programs and departments to ease the load on provinces which were suffering from high, chronic unemployment, because it was not something the government had either the imagination or the will to do. Frankly, with supporters like this, one wonders why the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) even bothers to stay at the job.

I want to mention the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) because I do not want him to feel neglected. I am sure he is aware of the attention drawn by Dr. Raynauld of the Economic Council of Canada to the large productivity gap which exists between workers in various regions of our country. Yet to my knowledge the hon. gentleman's department continues to give priority to productivity incentives for the high technology industries, not the labour-intensive needs of the poorer communities.

I would expect as well in his department a high priority in the trade division to finding markets based on the potential of those communities and I would have hoped—falsely I suspect—that prior to the GATT negotiations a special review would have been undertaken of those tariffs of ours and of foreign countries which would have a direct bearing on regional development. I regret, however, to say I have seen no evidence of either. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, even his colleague who formerly occupied that office and who had also been Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, fails to see regional economic expansion as part of his responsibility. This shows, I guess, the kind of watertight compartment in which regional development has finally been placed.

When we think of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), we recall what has been said about developing a population policy to encourage young people, the active and dynamic elements of our society. Is this policy to be related to a long-term program designed to alleviate regional disparity? Not a word about this aspect. How can the Speech from the Throne promise an immigration policy sensitive to regional needs when the minister's own predecessor admitted to me in correspondence last summer that there were no studies and, apparently, little concern with respect to the effect of immigration on local or regional economies.

There are so many other ministers, Mr. Speaker, that obviously there would not be the opportunity to spend a modicum of time discussing their shortfalls with respect to supporting the so-called basic commitment of the government to reducing regional disparity. When we think of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Buchanan), we wonder what input is taken into account in relation to public works expenditures as they affect regional development. I ask the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Faulkner) how much of the funding under his responsibility has aided research and development relative to the needs of small-scale technology in certain regions of this country or whether this aspect was even considered, much less given priority? I ask the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) whether the awarding of contracts has been related to the specific needs or potential of various areas in this country? There is a long catalogue of insensitivity, lack of awareness and neglect which involves every minister of the government. It is obvious no attempt has been made to exercise responsibility along the lines of the theme announced in successive Speeches from the Throne and in the course of speeches made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) himself.

Before I deal with the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Before I leave all the other ministers, let me say that in no way do I wish to excuse successive ministers of regional economic expansion or absolve the department from responsibility for the lack of commitment to regional equality. Under a minister who seems half-hearted at best about his task, afraid to speak out—

An hon. Member: Who are you talking about now?

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): —and a department which seems mainly concerned about protecting its own empire, I am not surprised that other departments have felt neither the urge nor the pressure to tackle disparity. The department has obviously failed to take the lead in co-ordinating the activities of other federal departments though the first minister himself stated on a number of occasions that such co-ordination was vital to the success of DREE.

Then again, there has obviously been lack of co-ordination with respect to the attitude of the department toward the various priorities established by the provinces. According to a study produced this year, there are today more than 200 different federal and provincial incentive programs for industry. Surely, one might expect DREE to take the lead in bringing some measure of rationality to these policies in place of the confusion and contradiction which presently exists according to the study I have mentioned. I wonder, too, why successive ministers have been negligent in building a commitment to regional development right across the country among rich and poor areas alike. I say this because in the absence of grass roots support the minister will never get the close co-operation from his colleagues which is vital to success.

I have no time to deal specifically, now, with the Department of Regional Economic Expansion; I know that some of my hon. friends wish to do so. However, I do wish to say to the minister—and I am glad he is present to hear these words—that his failure to indicate the prospect of any amendment of the Regional Development Incentives Act in the Speech from the Throne cannot pass unnoticed. As hon. members will recall, I asked him last week to explain this ominous silence. His answer to me that his officials were beginning to consider this particular matter showed, in my estimation, a shocking disregard for one of the basic programs under his jurisdiction.

What I have in mind, now, are not radical or major changes. Nevertheless, suggestions for changes have been made and need to be implemented. They have come from a variety of sources including the hon. gentleman's own Atlantic Development Council which has recommended streamlined procedures, post-incentive assistance, monitoring and other arrangements which might allow the government to take an equity position in certain new ventures. Economists, too, have studied the program and pointed out some of its defects, such as the capital bias of the grants system. I know the minister is aware of these comments. He did not take office last week, or a month ago, or six months ago. He has been hearing constructive comments and amendments almost from the time RDIA was put into effect, and that was to be expected. What is not expected is that the minister and his officials should adopt such a cavalier approach in face of the amendments which are obviously required if the program is to be successful. I believe the Atlantic Council when it said in its report that the RDIA program "does not appear to have any readily discernible effect upon the relative growth performance of the manufacturing sector in the Atlantic provinces." In these circumstances I would have expected more urgency in the minister's behaviour.

Some hon. Members: One o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, before lunch I had dwelt at some length on the failure of a series of ministers within this administration to support the over-all concept of the alleviation of regional disparities in this country. Perhaps members on all sides wonder why I have spent almost all my time in this speech dealing with this particular aspect. I have done so, quite frankly, because I took the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) at his word. I took him at his word when in 1968 he promised a Marshall plan for the maritimes. He told us that the perpetuation of regional inequality meant, to quote him, "that the unity of this country is almost as surely destroyed as it would be by the French-English confrontation". It is he who, in his almost complete failure to match rhetoric with action, has denied this government and the country the leadership, the sense of urgency, that would have required each single department and agency of his government to make regional development central to its responsibility and concern. It is true that regional disparity has been with us for some time. But from the time the Prime Minister assumed the leadership in 1968 he has on repeated occasions made that kind of commitment. I should like to quote from an article that he wrote in 1969 which appeared in the Atlantic Advocate. He said:

> That is why I have begun by trying to make clear the central place that regional development occupies in the whole thinking about the future of Canada—

No commitment could be clearer than that. In light of the commitments that have been made by the Prime Minister and referred to from time to time in speeches from the throne since he has occupied that office, it is inconceivable that there would not be a total commitment on the part of all departments. Yet obviously this has not been so.

I think we must learn at least two or three lessons from the experience that we have been through during the last seven years. Genuine and effective regional development cannot be compartmentalized. If this government has proved anything since it assumed office—if I may refer to my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Stanfield)—it is that "Let John do it" will not work. Neither will it work when we say "Let Marcel do it" or, for that matter, any other minister who might occupy responsibility for that department. I think Canadians have realized during the performance of this government that there must be a total approach to a realistic alleviation of regional disparities. I think it is clear that one cannot go somewhere unless one knows where he is going. What does that mean? Let me quote from a report of a few years back, 1971, of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council in their Fifth Annual Review of the Atlantic Economy. In their conclusions and recommendations they said:

> What is needed from DREE are specific goals and targets, benchmarks by which it may judge, and be judged, on its performance.

APEC was not the only body calling in the early years or since for some clearly defined set of goals, perhaps both long-term and short-term. It was not the only body which suggested it would not be good enough just to have some generally good intentions without a strategy to achieve those goals. Clearly, from the outset in 1969 until the present date we have not had that.

Third, I think it is quite obvious that regional policies and programs will be merely patchwork and inconsistent without an over-all national policy and framework. Perhaps the main reason we have not had an effective regional development experience in this country is there has been lack of an over-all framework of goals in terms of a national policy. The difference, quite clearly, in the approach of this government and the approach we are taking is summed up in the words of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) when he spoke in Charlottetown a little over three weeks ago and said:

> The problem is that regional disparity is an issue on the fringes of government policy-making, instead of being a preoccupation at the centre of government policy-making, where it should be and where it will be in a Progressive Conservative government. Regional disparity is not a DREE problem, as Mr. Trudeau would have it. It is a national problem. Concern for regional problems must permeate national energy policy... must underlie national transport policy... must inform the whole field of the federal-provincial relations, and must be a prime consideration in the formulation of the fiscal and economic policy of the government.

This is the intent; this is the spirit; this is the direction in which we must move if we are ever to deal with what the Prime Minister has referred to as one of the twin problems that threatens Canadian unity and, indeed, Canadian confederation.

Mr. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, may I open by joining others in this House in offering my congratulations to the new and young members of the House who moved and seconded the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) and the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance). Also, along with other hon. members I wish to mention our deep regret at the passing of our colleague, a marvellous woman with great dedication, sincerity and a very considerable degree of strength and firmness, all wrapped up in a great deal of charm. Of course, I refer to Madam Morin, our esteemed colleague from Louis-Hébert who left us recently and left a great deal of sadness behind her.

In entering this debate, may I say that it has not been my custom or style to emulate the bombast with which the opposition invariably fills Hansard on such occasions, so I think I shall allow the gibbering wit and witless jibes with which the opposition members approached the Speech from the Throne to stand for what they represent, an empty response to a comprehensive government program designed to strengthen national unity, enhance equality of opportunity and redefine the role of government in consultation and co-operation with the private sector so that we can as a society and as a nation better fulfil the present and future needs of our people.

As we say in the other official language, "gouverner c'est prévoir". The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) last week told us—or taxed us, indeed—with opportunism because we rejected what I can only call his myopic perceptions of the current problems of the country because we are determined to continue our search for durable solutions to the pervasive and complex problems, whether they be inflation, labour unrest, linguistic tensions or, as referred to by my hon. friend from Egmont (Mr. MacDonald), the problems of regional disparities. Certainly, the Leader of the Opposition is dazzled, I guess, by his own ambitions in that he proclaimed this very weekend that the government had lost the will to govern, presumably because we intend to propose to the House at this session an exhaustive series of co-ordinated measures to improve the social framework for public and private initiative, to raise the productivity performance of all the economic agents with which we have to deal, and to enable all individual Canadians to achieve higher levels of self-fulfilment.

An hon. Member: Anything would be an improvement.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has shown his true colours, and when the ultimate poll is in, I think in a couple of years, his remarks will be seen for what they are, a dull and pretty stark etching of what I can only describe as inveterate pessimism.

The functions of Treasury Board as a central agency are so varied and so pervasive that I could speak and expound on virtually all or every aspect of the Speech from the Throne. But as I have just said, the debate on the address provides members with the unique opportunity to show their true colours, and in order to show mine for what they truly are, I will confine myself and my comments, after some preliminary remarks, to an aspect of public service management which recently has caused some apprehension in the country, namely, the pensions of federal public servants and then I want to move on to an issue of grave national concern, which is the government's official languages policy.

The overriding preoccupation of Treasury Board, of course, throughout this session will be to ensure that the expenditures of the federal government do not exceed the growth trend of the gross national product and that substantial, visible and perceptible progress is made toward improving the efficiency, the effectiveness and sensitivity of the public service. I intend to be absolutely brutal with regard to wasteful spending practices and, indeed, very tough on the monetary control of overhead expenditures.

I know this may not please some public servants. For instance, they will now have to account for such things as the taxi slips they use in the course of their work. But they must understand that they are accountable to the public for every dollar they legitimately spend on such activities and, indeed, that effective monitoring is necessary to discipline the very few who in the past were not averse to taking a free ride at the expense of the taxpayers. I mention taxis, not because I expect great savings from the new procedure but because this is a highly visible example of the type of administrative overhead cost which we are determined to bring under tighter control.

On program expenditures, the government intends to pursue the efforts begun during the first phase of the restraint program to curb the growth of outlays and improve their cost-effectiveness, while maintaining and even improving the quality of public goods and services provided to Canadians. One of the great architects of this century, Mies van de Rohe, used to say "Less is more" when some customer objected to his ruthless suppression of unnecessary embellishments from contemporary designs. That, I think, is what I will adopt as my motto at the Treasury Board. But I want to say I am very convinced that public expenditures can be restrained in a socially progressive way and without paralysing program innovations and expansions.

That conviction, too, will be one of the guiding principles of the Treasury Board in its attempt to find and stick to the middle road charted by the Speech from the Throne and, of course, to assist other departments and agencies in relying more on the private sector to achieve their social and economic objectives. To those ends, the Treasury Board will continue to extend its fullest co-operation to the Auditor General. Indeed, legislation will soon be introduced to clarify the duties and responsibilities of that officer of parliament and to provide him with better means of fulfilling his very important functions.

I will have more to say later in the session on the government's determination to bring down the rate of growth of the public service from 1½ per cent to less than 1 per cent in the next fiscal year, and similarly to contain the growth of the senior executive complement.

As stated in the throne speech, the government also intends to improve the working conditions and the collective bargaining system in the public service, notably to try to reduce the adversary nature of that process and to ensure an equitable relationship between compensation levels in the public as compared to the private sector. I do not intend to allow the public service to become the scapegoat. At the same time, I expect public servants to be aware at all times that they serve the government and that the government is accountable to the Canadian taxpayers for the work that they do, for the compensation that they get and for the conditions of employment they enjoy.

[Mr. Andras.]

The Treasury Board will continue to be a good employer and public servants who pull their weight will be adequately rewarded. Others who do not will find that the federal government is going to become a less comfortable environment. The Treasury Board will continue to honour all commitments made in the collective bargaining framework, but certainly it will insist that public service bargaining agents also honour their commitments.

These general policies in the management of the public service will apply to an area which, as I said earlier, has generated a considerable amount of public attention, and indeed criticism over the past year, namely, the pension arrangements that have been established for federal public servants. The government has taken these concerns most seriously, and it requested about a year ago that the Treasury Board secretariat undertake a general review of the public service pension plan, first to ascertain the facts, and at a later stage to determine what adjustments, if any, should be considered. The first stage of this review has been completed and I tabled a document this morning in the House which outlined the preliminary conclusions and many of the facts on which these preliminary conclusions are based.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A very good document.

Mr. Andras: On this occasion I will not attempt to summarize the document which has been made available to all in the House and to the general public. I would like to point out, however, that much of the recent discussion of the public service pension plan has ignored a major factor, perhaps the key factor, in trying to explain why public servants are receiving what we will admit are above average retirement benefits, that is, that the public servants themselves make above average contributions to their pension plan. In other words, public servants have themselves decided that generally they are willing to defer a higher proportion of their current income than other groups of employees in Canada. They will get more later, but they pay more now.

I want to make it quite clear that the document I tabled does not express the definitive view of the government on public service pensions, because that program, like others, is kept under continuing review. A number of developments will give us an opportunity to reassess its provisions in the near future. I am referring in particular to the comprehensive review of the pension policy which will be conducted jointly by the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Finance.

I turn now to another key element in the Speech from the Throne, namely, the government's official languages policy. By way of introduction to that subject, allow me to say that I deeply regret the untimely departure from the cabinet of the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Richardson) for whom I have considerable personal regard and whom I have known for a long time. I regret even more some of the reasons he put forward to explain his resignation from the cabinet.

I do not intend to comment on the government's often stated intention to achieve formal constitutional independence, the modalities of which have not yet been defined and can only be defined after detailed consultations with the provinces. All I can say is that there is no plot, no secret plan, no conspiracy afoot to bring the constitution home. The government has not operated that way, and indeed if it ever did I would no longer be a part of it.

Moreover, this government will never lock into the constitution the specifics, the details of any federal policy or program as opposed to the fundamental principles of law, for the simple reason that those kinds of specific details, policies and programs must be subject to continuous adjustment and improvement. But I do wish to state categorically that in my view this country will not survive if federal policies are designed, or perceived as being designed, to placate or to contain any particular region, province or group until such time as it achieves what some people have decreed as its proper place within the Canadian federation. That applies as much to Quebec on language rights as to the western provinces on resource policies, to Ontario on industrial issues or to the Atlantic provinces on regional development.

The conviction that Canada is more than the sum of its constituent parts, that the national interest is more than the lowest common denominator between the interests of various regions, is crucial to the continued existence of this country. As stated in the Speech from the Throne, that need not and should not lead to rigid uniformity, but it does require that all federal policies be designed to reflect and promote the interests of all Canadians wherever they happen to live. That has been, and will continue to be, the case for the official languages policy.

I also wish to state categorically that commitment to linguistic equality, like commitment to equality before the law, equality of opportunity and other democratic rights, cannot be meted out to the citizenry in great or small doses depending on whim and fancy. The ways and means to ensure these rights which are enjoyed to the fullest extent by all citizens should, of course, be under continuing review and should be continually improved. Laws can be changed, policies adjusted and programs overhauled, but equality is either recognized and proclaimed or it does not exist.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: Seven years ago in this House parliament did recognize and did proclaim equality of the two official languages of Canada. That historic act was promulgated with the support of all political parties represented in the House. The validity of the act was confirmed by the Supreme Court of Canada. It is the view of the government that there cannot, and should not be, any backtracking from the fundamental provisions of that legislation. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated a couple of years ago, in 1974, the determination of the government to make linguistic equality an irreversible fact of Canadian life by the end of this decade, and I endorse that goal without any reservation whatsoever. In my view we simply cannot afford the "wait and see" approach which has been suggested—I am sure with the best intentions—by the hon. member for Winnipeg South.

● (1430)

While listening to the speech made last Wednesday by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), I was relieved to note that he apparently shares the views of the government on this question, and I can only hope that his position is supported by all members of his caucus. However, I must take issue with his charge that the current uneasiness in the country about the official languages policy and program is attributable only to errors made in the course of their implementation, particularly in the federal public service. I suggest that the discontent and doubts recently expressed by many Canadians also reflect our inability as politicians to explain to these Canadians the true intent and nature of our languages policy and to demonstrate to them its essential fairness and reasonableness. I further suggest that in this respect English-speaking members on both sides of this House must take their full share of the blame.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: I do not want to be misunderstood on this issue. I am not trying to pass the buck. Errors have been made, and that must be admitted. They have to be acknowledged, and they are going to be corrected. But given the experimental nature of many of the programs devised to implement the Official Languages Act and the parliamentary resolution of 1973, I think it was probably inevitable that specific aspects of these programs might prove to be less effective three or five years after their introduction than was originally expected, and certainly a contrary situation would have been surprising. Even the best thought-out government programs must periodically be adjusted to take into account the lessons of experience, the change in circumstances or advances in human knowledge. As the former minister of manpower and immigration, hon. members may recognize that I speak on that subject with some experience and authority.

It also must be pointed out that in our efforts to convert the public service of Canada into a functionally bilingual institution, without hampering its effectiveness and without prejudicing the career entitlements of public servants already on strength, we could not rely on the experience of other countries since it was, by and large, a task of unprecedented magnitude which had to be tailored, and still must be tailored, to specific Canadian requirements.

Both my predecessor and I have indicated in very recent months that a comprehensive review of all linguistic policies and programs is under way, and the government has pledged in the Speech from the Throne that those programs which have been successful will be continued, while those which have not will be modified. I can already assure the House, for example, that language training programs will be improved, that the linguistic requirements of positions will be reidentified, and that language standards will be revised. As a personal note, I might say that I am as intrigued, as I think my predecessor was, by the concept of receptive bilingualism as opposed to active or complete proficiency in both official languages, because it may often correspond more accurately to the practical requirements of functional bilingualism in the public service.

The House will be informed in the course of this session of the government's decisions on specific issues in this area. However, in view of their often stated interest in and their criticism of the implementation of the Official Languages Act, I advise opposition members that in many areas we have not completed our review and I welcome and invite them to give us their ideas before we come to definite conclusions. Indeed, those kinds of suggestions will be more than welcome. However, no matter how much we adjust and readjust our program, we will not succeed in building a durable national consensus on official languages unless we manage to convince all Canadians—particularly, nowadays, English-speaking Canadians—that federal policies in this field do derive from fundamental principles of justice, equality and tolerance which should apply everywhere, in western Canada as well as in Quebec and in Ontario as well as in the Atlantic region. In that respect, the mere possibility of failure has frightening implications and for that reason I suggest that the task at hand should mobilize the elected representatives of all parties from all regions of Canada.

In recent months I have come to the conclusion that both parliament and the government have very much underestimated the need for facts and for public information on official languages policies, most particularly in English Canada. I do not think Canadians are more bigoted or intolerant—in fact, they are probably less so—than people anywhere else in the world. The mosaic of our nation indicates that to me. However, I do feel that because our French-speaking population—six million people, more than the combined population of the prairie provinces, most of whom are unilingual—is so heavily concentrated in the province of Quebec, it has been very difficult, as it was for me when I first came out of the west to parliament eleven years ago, for a great number of people to perceive the need for this policy, for the simple reason that they live in regions of the country where there are few French-speaking Canadians.

I think, also, that many people, particularly outside Quebec—and I think this is where we have fallen down—have not been made aware of the true and limited implications of the official languages policy for them because those implications are minimal. I think those people have too often been left with the impression that the policy grants special privileges to the French language and somehow diminishes the proper and necessary status of the English language in the federal government, and of course that really is nonsense.

However, the fact is that we have tended to take public opinion for granted on this issue. More often than not—and in Canada I believe it is necessary to correct this now—I think we have failed to recognize the normal anxieties of English-speaking Canadians. After all, they are not superhuman. We have neglected to repeat often enough and patiently enough the converse of what our French-speaking colleagues have been saying to their constituents for years. They have been saying, first, that the Official Languages Act entrenches the right of English-speaking Canadians to deal with the federal government in English, to work for federal departments and agencies in that language and to learn the other official language only if they wish to do so.

Second, they have been saying that the official languages policy has effectively recognized the distinct personality and the different needs of each region, so that in the four western provinces, for example, over 98 per cent of the federal public service positions require only knowledge of English from their incumbents for the simple reason that the need for a bilingual capacity in federal offices located there is minimal.

Third, through the whole the public service today only about 20 per cent of the positions are identified as bilingual, and 87 per cent of these are located in areas of the country where there is an obvious need for them. I am talking about the national capital region, metropolitan Montreal, northern and eastern Ontario and northern and eastern New Brunswick.

Fourth, the conditional appointment and language training programs for bilingual positions, which is the most expensive and the most often criticized aspect of our policies, were specifically designed to enable all Canadians from all parts of Canada to compete for jobs identified as bilingual even if the applicants were unilingual; and so on.

We have not got that kind of story across. We believed that the facts would speak for themselves, but unfortunately they have not. The fact that many Canadians still think that the government is trying to ram French down their throats is indicative of our failure to communicate these facts to the public because, I repeat, the Official Languages Act was adopted precisely to achieve and preserve freedom of choice for all Canadians with respect to our official languages.

Despite the fact that I am unilingual, for instance, and that my political roots are in Ontario, that I was brought up in western Canada and that I have lived in most regions of English Canada, these facts make me confident that the current disenchantment of English-speaking Canadians with respect to bilingualism can be dissipated. I certainly intend to give top priority to public information on that subject as part of my responsibilities. I am unilingual, and although I regret that very much, I do not have great hang-ups about it. I can honestly say that I have not suffered because of it since I came to Ottawa 11 years ago.

I think that is the way it should be, although I am very well aware that for some federal public servants, most of them French Canadians but more recently a certain number of Anglophones, unilingualism has been a handicap. I cannot claim to have a great facility for languages, but I can tell the House that I have tried, and still try, to acquire a receptive capacity in the French language. I know I shall never be able to make a resounding speech in Quebec like the Prime Minister or the hon. member for Langelier (Mr. Marchand).

Mr. Paproski: Or Joe Clark.

Mr. Andras: Or Joe Clark. I think we have to face the prospect that some ministers will always be unilingual, at least upon their appointment, and particularly those chosen from amongst anglophone members of parliament. I think the important thing is the politician's commitment to linguistic equality, not his linguistic proficiency. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that there is no doubt about my commitment nor the strength of it. The commitment is the important thing, and I think that applies to all Canadians. The really important thing is to understand and support the provisions of the Official Languages Act, not just the ability to speak both French and English, however desirable that may be. Still, perhaps because of the fact that I have not been able to acquire at a later stage—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Paproski: As they say in Ukrainian, d'accord.

Mr. Andras: May I convey through you, Mr. Speaker, my gratitude to the House. This leads me to look at the "youth option" recommended by the Commissioner of Official Languages and which, in the Speech from the Throne, the government has accepted in principle. I believe there is a lot of evidence that although they have some reservations about some of our linguistic programs, Canadians are particularly anxious that their children have the best possible chance of understanding their compatriots in the other language. Accordingly, we as a government are going to discuss with the provinces arrangements to increase the effectiveness of official languages training in the country's school systems.

My personal experience makes me particularly sympathetic to the difficulties faced by unilingual public servants—and I am talking about unilingual public servants of both languages. In undertaking my new responsibilities, I certainly intend to see that these difficulties are very carefully examined and that programs and procedures are reviewed in order to minimize them and, wherever possible, to eliminate them.

At the same time, I am taking steps to ensure that my unilingualism in the Treasury Board does not cause a reversal of the very considerable progress made under my predecessors to make French an effective working language within the Treasury Board secretariat. About 20 per cent or 30 per cent of the secretariat's internal working papers are currently drafted in French, and I intend to maintain the proportion. I think it is incumbent upon Treasury Board to be a leading agency in this area. It is my ambition to show how a unilingual minister can adjust to functional bilingualism in the public service of Canada. I am winding down to the conclusion of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, and unfortunately recent events require that I conclude on a more sombre note.

Passion has run high and tensions are mounting; pronouncements have ranged from the outlandish to the extravagant. Only last week I saw on the front page of Le Devoir an article by the editor in chief who is obviously dismayed about these outbursts on official languages and French-English relations. While he came down on the right side, his comments gave rise to the headline which asked whether Canada wanted to separate from Quebec. The notion entertained by some people that we should go through a replay of the battle of the Plains of Abraham over the Official Languages Act is an extremely dangerous delusion.

Our language development policy has nothing to do—and God forbid that it should—with the imperial rivalries between French and English of centuries ago. It stems from the concern for human rights and social justice which is surely a Canadian thing. It is a vital element of Canadian democracy. It is a necessary condition, and I say it is a practical requirement for effective and harmonious political association between two linguistic communities which simply cannot afford, in this day and age, to be "warring within the bosom of a single state", to paraphrase Lord Durham's famous report. Consequently, linguistic equality is one of the cornerstones of Canadian national unity.

To allow intercommunal conflict to develop over the language issue, as is currently threatened, would be a tragic case of self-destruction for this country. English Canadians could not win that battle. French Canadians could not be brought to defeat on the contemporary battleground occupied by the separatist movement in Quebec. Canadians of other ethnic origins—the third group, as we sometimes call them—could not escape unscathed from such a conflict, because at the very root of it is intolerance. Intolerance would be the dominant passion, and I suggest that Canadians of other ethnic origins are particularly vulernable to intolerance. All would lose, and what would be lost would be Canada itself, the country our forebears built up and left to us in trust, a country which I think it is our moral and constitutional obligation to pass on to our children, strengthened and united.

I do not want to be of the generation that would allow fractious and disruptive forces to undermine the life of this country. I do not ever want to hear my children or two grandchildren say or even have them think in terms of, "You knew it was coming; you knew why, and you failed to prevent it." Those sentiments should apply to everyone in this House. It has for many years been my overriding concern, as it ought to be the concern of all here, that because of inaction or irresponsible action we should deserve to have such an indictment levelled at us by those who placed their trust in us: I was going to say "placed their trust in the government," but I really mean parliament.

That is why the Speech from the Throne announced a series of co-ordinated measures to strengthen national unity, expand individual freedom and enhance quality of opportunity. That is why the government is pledged to promoting better understanding between French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians. Personal conviction, as much as political commitment and ministerial responsibility, compel me to dedicate myself to the promotion of that understanding and to the building of a national consensus on official languages.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I should like to mention that the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) will be making his final speech in this House at about 8.30 this evening. The hon. member has served Canada well in his distinguished military career, followed by his great career in the House of Commons where he has served since 1951. On behalf of all members I wish him well as he begins a new political career in the service of his province and country. May the good Lord look after him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak of Canada's role in the crisis of the United Nations. Judging by the throne speech, which devoted only four paragraphs to international affairs, not many Canadians appear to be interested in events beyond our borders. This myopic view of the government short-changes the Canadian public who have a right to much better leadership in pursuing a policy of enlightened internationalism.

We have a new Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) and I wish him well. It should not detract from the sincerity of my good wishes to him personally to express my wonder at how the nations of the world are to be expected to take Canada seriously when external affairs ministers are shifted because the government needs someone to find the way through the House of Commons. Is Canada's role internationally so unimportant, is the external affairs portfolio so simple that ministers can be switched in a political game of musical chairs?

The former external affairs minister was beginning to make his mark—especially as co-chairman of the north-south conference on international economic co-operation—after a two-year settling-in process, and I respected him. But how can we respect a Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who forces his external affairs minister to vacate his office for, of all posts, the House leadership, thus upsetting the continuity of foreign policy. I cannot imagine Lester Pearson ever doing such a thing.

Of course we must go on not only developing but implementing a policy of realism in our relations with the global community. As we examine our fundamental policy of pursuing peace, I want to emphasize that through the United Nations Canada can make a major contribution to world order and peace in the last quarter of this century. There is a desperate need for fresh leadership at the UN and the moment is ripe. Canada has a new ambassador at the UN, in the skilled William Barton, and we are about to take a seat again on the security council.

The UN itself is changing. Certainly, the major task of the UN is still the maintenance of peace, "to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war," as the founders of the UN expressed it. But the development of conditions of peace is now seen to require a wide range of activity: an equitable economic order, population control, an end to racial discrimination, a new law of the sea, a code of conduct for transnational corporations, protection of the environment, the development of human settlements. Global problems of the development of food, energy and jobs now dominate the UN agenda. A new Reader's Digest Gallup world public opinion poll reveals that the rich-poor disparity is now the dominant political fact on the planet. As Secretary General Kurt Waldheim puts it:

> We have come to see that the security of this world is linked to an equitable sharing of wealth, not just as an objective for the distant future but as a matter of urgency.

The UN is making progress in solving the deeply human problems of world development. But at this very moment countless people are about to give up on the United Nations. That is why I said at the outset that there is a crisis of the United Nations. It is being subverted by those who are more strongly motivated by racial hatred than by the peaceful development of mankind. Anti-Jewish hatred nearly wrecked the Habitat conference in Vancouver last June. The very existence of UNESCO is threatened by the adamant refusal of the Arab-Communist bloc to allow Israel to join it. Prominent scientists and academics have called for an end to anti-Israel discrimination or face the possible collapse of UNESCO.

All people at the UN must find ways to stop the spread of racism in the conferences and resolutions that give the UN its image. Racism will destroy the credibility of the United Nations as an instrument of peace. Already that credibility is being questioned as never before. How can the UN be a moral force to stop the escalation of violation of human rights around the world if it is corroded by hatred from within?

As a politician strongly in support of more Canadian involvement in the UN, I am concerned about the growing public reaction against the UN on many fronts. It is attacked because it cannot stop local wars now going on. It cannot even agree on a formula to act against international terrorism; it is paralysed in advancing disarmament and cannot stop the spread of deadly nuclear fuel reprocessing plants. The General Assembly has become a bear-pit in which newly liberated third world nations trample on the old, industrialized nations. The good will of the west in advancing economic development is undermined by the politics of hate.

The media, feasting on confrontation, have put across the message of the UN as a force to be tolerated rather than a force to be supported. The combination of stupidities within the UN and the media's concentration on its failures rather than successes has resulted in the lowest public confidence in the UN's 31-year history. How is it that every Canadian knows about the infamous anti-Zionist resolution passed at the UN and hardly a handful know what the new international economic order is all about?

I count it a good day if I have persuaded a voter not to demand a cutback in Canada's support of the UN rather than persuading him to support increased commitments. Canada pays 3 per cent of the UN budget. It has become all too easy to vent our frustrations over future shock by scorning the UN as incomprehensible and irrelevant—as if it were easy to find agreement among 144 nations.

Although there are times when any thinking person must despair at the abuses and misuses of the United Nations, we must not lose light of the great achievements of the UN. Sometimes I hear the accusation, "Name me one good thing the UN has ever done." I can name many. The UN helps the homeless. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees has helped 200,000 displaced persons resettle in Africa, and 216,000 in Asia. The UN bridges the illiteracy gap. The United Nations' Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization has trained more than 64,000 teachers and educational planners in low income countries. The UN fights famine. By providing technical assistance and research, the Food and Agricultural Organization is promoting modern agricultural techniques, better plant strains, better irrigation and soil management, better food processing, storage and distribution.

The UN brings milk to the world's children. The United Nations' children's fund has helped to set up 220 milk processing plants in 45 countries for cheap and sanitary distribution of this important source of protein. The UN helps provide clean water. Nearly 90 per cent of rural populations in developing countries drink tainted water—a leading cause of sickness and death. The United Nations' environment program has mounted a drive with other international agencies to deliver safe, potable water. UNEP also keeps track of pollutants in the oceans, the atmosphere and on earth to provide scientists with an accurate picture of our planet's health. The United Nations helps people help themselves. Last year the United Nations development program sent more than 9,800 experts to work on 7,600 projects in 144 countries and territories.

These are only the highlights in a long catalogue of United Nations' accomplishments that we too often overlook. Most people think of the United Nations as only the general assembly and the security council. But a vital part of the United Nations, where more than 90 per cent of its budget goes, is this world wide system of specialized agencies and programs. We cannot properly assess the United Nations' role and potential in building global strategies for peace by looking only at the skirmishes in the spotlight. The United Nations must be related to the sweep of history passing before our eyes.

The past 30 years has been one of the most dangerous periods in human history. It was a period of Promethean change during which we ran the risks of several world wide conflagrations. North and south, east and west, rich and poor, black and white, the powerful and the weak, came into contact with each other under explosive circumstances.

Science and technology made incredible strides, for good and bad. Atomic weapons and energy were born. Man landed on the moon. More than a thousand satellites were launched around the earth. Man further extended the power of his eyes with giant telescopes, spectroscopes, television, electronic microscopes and radars; the power of his hands with incredible machines and factories; the faculties of his hearing with sonars, radio and space telecommunications; the capacities of his brain with computers and automation. His knowledge has reached farther and farther into the universe and deeper and deeper into the infinitely small. Many of his inventions bore seeds of progress as well as of destruction. A world war was nevertheless avoided, and I believe that the United Nations has played an important role in building bridges and reducing tensions.

The changes of the past 30 years have revealed many limits and constraints regarding human life and behaviour on our planet: limits of population; limits of the environment, limits of growth, limits of resources, limits of the biosphere. These external constraints begin to demonstrate to governments that there are also limits to power. I believe that this first correct view of our planet and of human life on it, obtained in large degree through the United Nations and its specialized agencies, will finally bring governments to act in a more responsible and concerted way.

This evolutionary progress is the real value of UN work. With its 16 specialized agencies, 14 permanent programs and string of world conferences, the United Nations is working on the whole fabric of peace. The UN is helping us to know what we need to know to ensure a decent, peaceful and happy life of self-fulfilled people. National governments are learning that they must co-operate because of the physical and economic interdependence of the whole planet. The UN even in these early stages of its development, is one of the most astonishing instruments on earth. This is a time to praise it, not damn it.

As we consider a greater role for Canada in the global community, we must note the UN shift in emphasis from peacekeeping to international economic and social development. Peace is no longer defined as the absence of war; peace now means human development. Far from being different goals, peacekeeping and development should be intertwined in our total contribution to peace. Canada has consistently supported United Nations activities in maintaining peace and security. With 1,500 military personnel abroad in this capacity, Canada is the largest contributor of troops for UN peacekeeping. We can make an even greater contribution, in a military sense, by stepping up our efforts to end the arms race. Here the special qualifications of Ambassador Barton, formerly Canada's envoy to the UN disarmament committee, will be significant in intensifying Canada's work.

The UN Secretary-General considers the arms race to be "one of the most critical world problems that confronts us today." In a world increasingly preoccupied with the problems of social justice, hunger, poverty, illiteracy, disease, development and an equitable sharing of resources, world military expenditures have spiralled to $300 billion a year. By shameful contrast, the net flow of official development assistance is only $15 billion a year. The international arms trade has reached $20 billion—including Canada's share—conventional weapons are becoming increasingly more sophisticated and deadly, and the technological arms race threatens to produce even more horrible means of mass destruction.

While some 400,000 engineers and scientists are working on military projects which absorb some 40 per cent of the funds allocated in the world to research and development, important problems facing mankind and requiring the contribution of those scientists and engineers are being neglected. The continued "improvement" of nuclear weapons that could obliterate all human life many times over is a demonic spectacle.

Nuclear proliferation is sweeping the globe, and the nuclear club is no longer exclusive. Even countries that have not acceded to the non-proliferation treaty—Brazil, Argentina, Egypt, Israel, Spain—are on the point of obtaining giant reactors. The more nuclear powers there are, the less control there will be and the greater the likelihood that the atom will be used in violence. That is what has led the authoritative Stockholm International Peace Research Institute to issue a gloomy prediction. Within nine years, 35 countries will be able to make atomic weapons. The future is very gloomy indeed.

Despite the growing danger, two years of SALT negotiations produced no positive results and the long-awaited world disarmament conference is no nearer reality. Yet we cannot give up on disarmament. I think the time is right for Canada to push hard for a special session of the UN general assembly devoted to disarmament.

If a world disarmament conference is still an impossibility, then a special session of the UN is the next best thing, for a special session would put a world spotlight on disarmament and mobilize public opinion on the necessity of disarmament. It would stimulate international action to make disarmament more likely, especially the creation of better world security, including permanent UN peacekeeping machinery, and develop a comprehensive program on disarmament, reaffirming the goal of general and complete disarmament. If such a special session were successful, it could serve as a stimulus for convening a world disarmament conference.

Disarmament can only be achieved if confidence is increased among nations. The non-aligned and the smaller countries have an increasingly important role to play in building a spirit of international confidence. This task is directly connected to development, since there can be no confidence in a world situation in which 30 per cent of the world's population receives and controls 70 per cent of the world's income.

What is at issue—as the UN has repeatedly made clear throughout this second development decade—is the continuing validity of the economic system which has dominated the world since the great economic expansion of the industrialized nations a century ago. We cannot have a stable and healthy world unless the enormous disparity between the affluent nations and those millions in Africa, Asia and Latin-America who suffer from poverty, malnutrition and lack of hope can be reduced and eventually eliminated.

[Mr. Roche.]

Only this weekend the United Nations has again proven its value with the publication of a report, "The Future of the World Economy", which amasses a huge body of data to show that world resources will be sufficient to support a growing population and higher living standards without inevitable environmental damage. What is still needed is a reform of relations between developed and developing nations to share that economic growth. I will quote only one paragraph from this remarkable document to show that the mobilization of political will is our chief problem:

● (1510)

> To ensure accelerated development, two general conditions are necessary: first, far-reaching internal changes of a social, political and institutional character in the developing countries and, second, significant changes in the world economic order.

The debate on the new international economic order has opened a new chapter in international relations, in which the sixth and seventh special sessions of the general assembly, along with the adoption of the charter of economic rights and duties of states, have so far been the key points.

I am often asked what the new economic order is all about. It is not a club or an association or some sort of economic miracle. It is, rather, a process to provide rapid economic and social development in the developing countries which contain the majority of mankind. It is a determination to provide the basics of life—food, shelter, education, medicine and job opportunities for every human being. It is a plan to make nations self-reliant so that the people within them can find true human liberation in their own lives.

In short, the global reform proposed by the new international economic order embraces: eradication of mass poverty and unemployment; stable and equitable return for commodities; self-sufficiency in food; reform of rules governing international trade; and an increased share in industrial activities for developing countries. Further proposals include an increased flow of assistance on concessional terms based only on need and equity, and equitable sharing in the global economic decision-making process.

The response of Canada to this challenge has been splendid—in rhetorical terms. The speeches of the Prime Minister and the former external affairs minister have been impressive. So, too, is the government's one-year old strategy for international development cooperation, a 21-point, multidimensional policy which supports the main lines of the new economic order.

I unhesitatingly support this strategy because it begins the process of moving away from aid as the only expression of our humanitarian concern. The strategy makes a commitment to the reform of the international trade and monetary systems which are at the root of mass poverty. Canada's total policy includes increased aid to the least developed and a willingness to move forward on commodity agreements, trade liberalization and industrial co-operation. It is weak on specifics, but the direction of the policy is accurate.

The principal problem with the strategy, as I discovered in a tour of the country, is that few Canadians have ever heard of it. The government, preoccupied with the domestic economy, has not promoted it. The media have all but ignored it. The result is that Canadian public opinion lags far behind the reality of the interlocking nature of global problems highlighted by the special UN conferences on population, food and human settlements. For its part, parliament, in its usual inversion of priorities, devotes very little attention to international development.

There is, in short, scarcely any pressure on the government to implement its own strategy. The pressure is the other way—not to allow more imports from "cheap labour" countries; not to share the mineral resources on the continental shelf beyond the 200-mile economic zone; not to pay any more than we have to for third world commodities.

Our direct foreign aid, as a percentage of GNP, has been cut—the ironic victim of domestic restraint. Our bilateral aid is still heavily tied to Canadian business. Our role in the important negotiations at the fourth United Nations trade and development conference was marked by resistance to the third world rather than support.

What the government has signalled to the UN in the first year of this new policy is timidity and drift rather than the innovative action so desperately needed. What the government has signalled to Canada in the throne speech is that international affairs are not very important. I call on the new Secretary of State for External Affairs to involve Canada more deeply in the work of the UN. He is a practical man and undoubtedly wants specific suggestions. Here are some. First, reconstitute the subcommittee on international development which during the last session did such valuable work in opening up ways in which Canada can help bring about trade and monetary reform. Second, increase the share of CIDA's budget going to non-governmental organizations which are the only effective public education instrument we have. Boost the mere $35,000 the government provides the United Nations Association of Canada so that it can do the information job it is capable of. Third, involve more Canadians in international development by enabling CIDA to honour its matching fund program which currently is restricted to matching only 54 cents for every dollar raised privately. Fourth, demonstrate Canada's determination to reach .7 per cent of GNP in development assistance by raising our commitment at least as much as our defence budget which goes up by an inflation factor plus 12 per cent a year. Last, press for the creation of a minister of state for international development who would be able to give full time to the necessary watchdog function of CIDA and also raise the level of public participation in Canada's role internationally.

The demands of a new order and their implications for our way of life must enter the daily consciousness of Canadians. This is a job for more than government, but if government does not take the lead in helping Canadians understand what the United Nations is calling for, there is faint prospect that the changes required will be supported by the voters.

With the arousal of political will there is every reason to hope for a better future. The technology to make it possible is exciting. Recently, I visited the Wheat and Maize Improvement Centre in Mexico, one of the principal agricultural research centres in the world and home of the green revolution. Funded partly by Canada, the centre's work in developing new strains of maize, wheat, barley, sorghum and triticale has dramatically raised world cereal yields in the past decade with the prospect of greater gains ahead as the technology is applied.

The experts I talked with are agreed that the world has the capacity to feed billions more people than are now living. It is a strange world where the scientists give reasons for hope and the politicians despair. Perhaps we should all step back a pace and survey the wide scene as Barbara Ward did at the conclusion of "The Home of Man", written for Habitat:

> In this time of reassessment, in this age of questioning as intense as any since the great debates of the millenium before the birth of Christ, there is promise of an extraordinary and almost wholly unforeseen fusion of ideas which, separated and even hostile for many centuries, now seem capable of that mutual interpenetration which, in the nuclear as in the intellectual world, can release floods of new energy, new directions, new possibilities, new beings, new forms.

[Translation]

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to congratulate you and wish you great success in the office you have held in the House over the past year. The Sudbury constituents are proud of their elected representative, and we were able to appreciate your many talents during the first session of this Parliament. I wish also to congratulate the movers of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne for their excellent presentations.

In October 1974, I did not have the opportunity to take part in the Speech from the Throne debate, and I want to tell the House how proud I am to represent the Gaspé constituency in the Canadian Parliament. The people in the Gaspé constituency have given their vote to the Liberal party because they know that Liberal governments have always demonstrated their concern for economically poorer regions, and the development we have witnessed these past few years is surely evidence of this. My duty, ever since I have been their elected representative, has been to make sure that they are well provided for.

In the 1974 election, Gaspé was the only riding with two candidates only, one Liberal and one Conservative. In my opinion, this is an historical fact which must be brought before the House.

I am glad that the Speech from the Throne deals with the equality of opportunity for all Canadians. I would like to read again this excerpt which is very important for the regional development. I quote:

> While it is essential to national unity that all Canadians believe we have an equal opportunity to be fully ourselves in a cultural sense, it is just as essential to unity that we enjoy equal opportunities for individual and regional economic fulfilment.

To translate Canada's economic potential into real growth and equality of opportunity, we must be both clear-sighted in our recognition of the obstacles which lie in our path, and united in our determination to remove them.

On the economic level, the Gaspé peninsula which I represent benefitted from special agreements for the social and economic development of eastern Quebec. Signed in 1968, this general agreement for Canada-Quebec cooperation gave results which in some cases go beyond the estimated objectives.

The agreement contributed to the implementation of infrastructures which are very important for the development of the area. It is now a matter of launching programs to stimulate the establishment of productive occupations and consolidate jobs in traditional sectors. Negotiations are under way between both levels of government and the people in eastern Quebec, particularly Gaspé, request the signature of another special agreement or of auxiliary agreements to set up sectorial programs for the economic development of the area while maintaining the objective of job creation.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) must pay particular attention to the allocation of budgets for the coming years to favour economically deprived areas. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) must have at his disposal the necessary funds to meet his obligations with the provinces for the development of slow growth areas in Canada.

The government must not apply their budgetary restrictions in areas with low income or very high unemployment. I venture to suggest to the ministers, particularly to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), that air and road communications in Gaspé leave much to be desired and that there is room for some improvements. It is inconceivable that in 1976 Gaspé cannot yet boast a 6,000-foot runway nor the proper flight control facilities.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks on the fishing industry in eastern Canada and more particularly in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. I take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. member for Westmorland-Kent (Mr. LeBlanc) on his recent appointment as Minister of Fisheries and the Envionment and wish him the same success he had as Minister of State responsible for Fisheries and acting Minister of the Environment.

In the last few years, it has become increasingly obvious that the intensive fishing practised by foreign fleets off the Canadian coast, in particular that of ground fish on the eastern coast, would lead to a disastrous situation. The fish population, formerly abundant, have reached dangerously low levels. The very existence of the Canadian communities that depend on fishing for their livelihood is therefore threatened. The Liberal government, under the leadership of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), signed bilateral agreements with several countries which had access to our fishing areas thereby allowing Canada to extend from 12 to 200 miles off-shore its territorial sovereignity with regard to fishing. That decision is most important for the future of that industry in Canada. All members and all Canadians congratulate the ministers and their officials who participated in the drafting and the signature of the agreements between countries. In fact, Mr. Speaker, those agreements are being used as models by those countries which are now facing a similar situation. In extending the fishing zone to 200 miles, the government has shown a genuine interest in fishing industries in Canada.

Since 1974, the government has spent more than $130 million to support fishing industries and more specifically those on the east coast. The Department of Environment has a price support program for fishermen and for companies processing first quality ground fish. In addition, the government of Quebec also has several programs for fishing industries and a recent agreement has been concluded between the provincial government and processing plant owners under which employees are guaranteed a standard working week. With decreasing catches in the gulf, some plants can only give a few days of work to their employees every week. With the new Quebec program employees can look forward to a normal income every week. However we hope that all those programs will be temporary and that conditions will be normalized in a near future, let us hope before 1980.

Although the governments have implemented satisfactory programs to assist fisheries, prospects are not very encouraging because stocks of red fish and cod in several areas of the gulf have been seriously depleted, so that the quotas for those two species will be considerably reduced for 1977. In order to replenish those stocks, it is essential to restrict fishing in the immediate future lest the survival of fisheries be jeopardized in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Quebec fishermen will experience a difficult period as long as the stocks are not restored, because large trawlers operating in the gulf will have to fish elsewhere, more specially on the Atlantic coast. The government has given financial support to fishermen whose home port is in the gulf to compensate for the longer trips they will have to make as well as the problems faced by those who fish in unknown areas.

Since September 28, cod fishing in the Gaspé area and the north of New Brunswick is closed up to three miles from the coast. The quota of fish set by the International Commission for the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries (ICNAF) in area T4 has been exceeded. If we have reached the aim at the end of September, it is due to the exceptional quantities of cod taken earlier this year by trawlers from Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, more particularly in January, February and March. For the remaining of 1976 the minister has decreed that Newfoundland and Nova Scotia trawlers will no longer be allowed to catch redfish in the gulf and cod in the southern part of the gulf. That is not enough to preserve fish stocks in the gulf.

To share out equally the number of fish that can be landed in a season and to protect the fishing industry in Quebec and in northern New Brunswick, I recommend that the Gulf of St. Lawrence as a whole be reserved to fishermen whose home port is the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and that fishing for some species such as redfish and cod be prohibited in January,

February and March for the next two years. And I think that in the speech he made on October 14 the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) echoed my ideas, when he said, as reported in Hansard, page 64, I quote:

I also believe that in order to develop a sound management scheme for our fisheries, consideration should be given to such factors as the time of the year when fish can be most efficiently caught, and here the fishermen's knowledge should be utilized. Consideration should also be given to the seasonal variations in the quality of fish, as well as other biological factors relating to the spawning period. We cannot continue in our old ways and habits if we are serious in our intention to rebuild our fisheries resources, and this applies to all ships licensed to fish on our banks, whether they be Canadian or ships of other nations.

Mr. Speaker, I fully agree with that statement of the official spokesman for the opposition, when he says that the government should immediately take very drastic measures.

Lately, the government amended the unemployment insurance program for fishermen, and those changes should come into effect this fall. Fishermen will be able to draw their unemployment benefits during the first week of November instead of December, while the deadline remains the week of May 15. The main changes provide fishermen with supplementary benefits based on the regional rate of unemployment. Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the House that these changes to the Unemployment Insurance Commission Regulations will benefit mostly fishermen in the Gaspé Peninsula, Îles-de-la-Madeleine and even those in northern New Brunswick; congratulations to the ministers who introduced these changes!

In the last few years, grants available for building fishing boats of 30 to 75 feet have declined; I therefore ask the government to take the necessary steps to continue this program of grants to the fishing boat building industry to allow a rational renewal of the fleet, not grants to build new fishing boats but to renew old ones.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister and his government hold close to their heart the well-being of our people, particularly working families, the unemployed and non-organized people. He has demonstrated it in the Speech from the Throne and again in a special way in his speech to the House last Wednesday. This speech is well worth reading by all Canadians as it demonstrates that both the CLC president and the leader of the NDP are wrong to criticize the anti-inflation legislation without offering alternative solutions. The failure of the day of protest against the anti-inflation measures on October 14 is abundant proof that the Canadian people support their government in its fight against inflation.

The Prime Minister drew a very realistic picture of the impact the controls had over the Canadian economy. The workers from Gaspesia, whose income is one of the lowest in Canada, agree that the anti-inflation measures had positive effects on the area, the province and the whole of Canada.

My constituents are convinced that the anti-inflation controls are necessary and they already have contributed in reducing the inflation rate. Those who disapprove of this program are the leaders of large labour unions and the directors of big companies. This demonstrates the effectiveness of the program which benefits small wage-earners and hurts mostly those who want to taker over political power.

Many financial institutions in Canada as well as businessmen regrouped within the Canadian boards of trade have urged both the federal and provincial governments to reduce their expenses, without ever indicating clearly where these budgetary cuts should be made. When we travel from one end of the country to the other, we realize that our larger centers—such as Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver—are those which contributes most inflation. When considering budgetary cuts, the government must therefore make sure that all departments pay special attention to the projects which have been postponed for several years in the regions which are economically weaker and where the unemployment rate is the highest.

The right hon. Prime Minister said on his recent visit in Rivière-du-Loup that he was opposed to budget cuts in low economic growth regions by cancelling social measures. In the Gaspé region we live in an area where people are already in a position in which they cannot even contribute to inflation.

Mr. Speaker, I was delighted to hear in the Speech from the Throne that the government is also contemplating measures to make it easier for small business to gain access to financial assistance and other services provided by various departments, the Federal Business Development Bank and financial institutions in the private sector. Small businesses, managed by their owners, are the main job providers in many of our towns and villages in Gaspé. The economic structure in the Gaspé peninsula is heavily relying on seasonal activities, like agriculture, forestry, fisheries, tourism and construction. In order to make a decent living, a great number of Gaspesians have to be jacks-of-all-trades.

I therefore feel that those new assistance programs to small businesses are indeed very timely for the development of the Gaspé peninsula and all eastern Quebec. They tie in with the recommendations of the Gaspé Chamber of Commerce which states as follows in a brief dated May 1976, and I quote:

That the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, in cooperation with other departments, Gaspé businessmen and economic organizations of that area, set up a commission whose specific purpose would be to conduct research, to give initial impetus to the industrial and commercial development of that area of the province, and to achieve a just balance between the primary, secondary and tertiary sectors of our activities;

That more moneys in a future agreement between Quebec and Canada be assigned to the development of industry, and more particularly small businesses, with a view to making it more supple, more easily accessible, less prone to exporting profits and less susceptible to general stoppages which paralyze and check the economic activity of the whole community.

Despite numerous programs initiated by the federal government in the last few years to fight unemployment, rate of unemployment is still very high in that area. At a recent meeting of the Liberal party in Matane, the delegates proposed that the federal government implement a job creating program for several years and not only the winter months. I am proud of the new direct job creation program announced in the speech from the throne. It will be most beneficial to the Gaspé peninsula has a chronically high unemployment level.

This new job creation program should promote projects which are beneficial to the community. However, many organizations and municipalities do not have the financial means to purchase the required building supplies and equipment to carry out projects which are necessary to the community. I thus suggest that other federal departments cooperate with the Department of Manpower and Immigration and contribute to the financing of a portion of the building supplies required to carry out some projects. We hope that some departments will make additional contributions for the development of marinas and wharfs for traditional fishing, for the construction of breakers along our coasts, and for a number of other projects which could easily fall under the direct job creation program.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word about unemployment insurance. Indeed it is mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. I think it is very disappointing that some beneficiaries can hardly have their problems solved. There is certainly lack of communication between the commission staff and beneficiaries. I am sure that the staff is looking forward to help but the problem seems to be the amount of travelling claimants have to do to get information. It is unthinkable that some citizens of Gaspé have to travel 100 miles or more to settle an unemployment insurance problem. The commission will have to establish more extensive service in its unemployment insurance office on the north shore of Gaspé at Sainte-Anne-des-Monts. This is an urgent need for the constituency of Gaspé.

I should like to deal with another subject today, the parliamentary reform. We are aware that Parliament is the heart of democracy in Canada and that great progress has been made since 1968 toward concrete and positive changes to upgrade this institution which is imperfect and too close to tradition. Most hon. members want significant changes to make Parliament both more efficient and more modern and to give a new value to the role of parliamentarians. I am far from willing to sway from the principle according to which democracy must be safeguarded. But we can do it while accepting a careful planning of work for each session of Parliament, and the examination of bills can be made according to a fixed schedule, ensuring the good operation of a more rational and more efficient forum, while enabling a more humane and more intelligent participation by parliamentarians. Restricting the lenght of the speeches made by parliamentarians of all parties does not detract from the value of a debate. Very strict rules must be established in order take into account the fact that there are now four parties in this House.

Debates have become repetitive and stray more and more from the subject matter under consideration. We are here in Parliament to decide the fate of Canadians and we are wasting valuable time on debates which go on for months when they could be completed in a few days. The opposition must be granted the rights and the means to put their views forward in a thorough but not dilatory manner, thus eliminating every possibility of repeating the same elements of debate at the various stages of the legislative process. Debates must be restricted to the subject matter under consideration and the quality of speeches must be upgraded.

[Mr. Cyr.]

In a speech he delivered yesterday in Quebec City, the Leader of Her Majesty's Opposition said the following, and I quote from Le Devoir of October 18:

> Quebec City (by Lise Bissonnette)—It is quite clear, and Mr. Joe Clark said it in French in Quebec City: His party "will continue to refrain from proposing immediate or detailed solutions" to the present economic and language problems, regardless of all pressures.
> First, there is a "political reason" for this, he said; "the solutions of the fall of 1976 are not going to determine the results of the 1978 general election".

If the opposition leader tells the Canadian people outside the House that he will not put forward any solutions to the present economic and language problems, then why hold debates in the House of Commons if the opposition is only trying to criticize instead of proposing solutions? I infer from that statement that a Progressive Conservative may be defined as an economist who knows all the answers to the events of the past year.

Mr. Speaker, it is urgent to amend the procedures of the House, and particularly to find an updated voting system. It is ridiculous for parliamentarians to have to be called by a bell which sometimes rings from two to three hours before the vote is taken. What a waste of time and money for Canadians! Moreover, the whole staff of the House must wait for the vote to be over before moving on to other work. If this is what we call a productive system, Canada is in a sad way. The members of the Liberal causus have made representations to the committee responsible for studying the procedures of the House. We are in favour of negotiating the changes suggested by the official opposition. However, if it is impossible to reach a consensus, the federal government will have to act since the interests of Canadians are at stake.

In closing, I should like to congratulate in my own name and on behalf of my fellow citizens all my colleagues who have been chosen to perform very important duties within the cabinet. I should like to assure them of my full cooperation. To the hon. member for London West (Mr. Buchanan), Minister of Public Works, I wish much success in his new duties. He has already done very well early in his mandate by visiting several communities in eastern Quebec and northern New Brunswick. The efforts made by the minister to learn French since he came to Ottawa, that is since 1968, are worth mentioning in the House and should be held as an example before the other members. If all Canadians showed the same good will as the Minister of Public Works, we would not have any linguistic and cultural problems in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: How did you enjoy your weekend in Quebec?

Mr. Kempling: I had a very nice weekend in Quebec City, and it is nice to be back in the House.

Mr. Speaker, I want to add some remarks to those made by my colleagues in this debate. It has been said by several speakers in this debate that the throne speech was a rather sterile document, that in fact it did not indicate any real grasp by the government of the problems that we are facing. The gaps in the address, the obvious omissions, were apparent to all, I think. As one commentator I heard on the day of delivery of the throne speech said, it was blander than usual. That is as kind as one can be.

Rather than deal with the language and cultural problems, as the government did extensively in the throne speech, we should have heard what will be done about the high interest rates that are being paid by Canadians. No mention was made of how we will deal with the serious balance of payments problems or how we will go about reducing them into more manageable levels. There was some mention of productivity.

We are told in the throne speech that there will be more boards, more words, more discussions, more dialogue, more advertising and more slogans. But let us get right to the point. I do not believe that Canadian workers, per se, are less productive than workers in any other country. This has never been proven. I think our workers, given the equivalent in facilities and tools, are just as productive as workers in any other country in the world. I question the scale used to determine productivity, the methods, the formula or the process of weighing one economy against another.

Look at the taxation provisions and at the government's attitude toward depreciation provisions for plant and machinery. Look at the interest rates which must be paid by industry to acquire new machinery. Examine fully and carefully the restrictions placed on corporate profits and dividends, coupled with the high interest rates, and you will see the root of the problem.

Talking about productivity will not solve the problem. The government, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) know the root cause of low productivity on the scales we are using in Canada. Representatives of labour and industry have stated their concerns for years. All their words fell on deaf ears.

We lack commitment to a strong secondary industrial base in this country. The former minister of industry, trade and commerce, who is now the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), told our standing committee that he did not feel Canada could develop a secondary industrial base. He later took the course which we see used by many ministers—that being more dialogue and more discussion—and finally he stated that he was going to take a sectoral approach and develop an industrial strategy based on sectors. I think he stated we may end up with 18 or 20 different industrial strategies. This is just another idea to get away from the main point at issue here. This minister and his successor, the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) sat in their places and allowed—

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member referred to some positions I took in my former portfolio. I think he owes it to me and to the House to give a specific reference as to when, if at any time, in my former ministry I ever said that I was against developing a secondary industrial base for this country.

Mr. Kempling: I will undertake to go through the minutes of the meetings of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and I will provide the minister with the reference. We asked him specifically about developing a secondary industrial base, and he said specifically that he did not think it was possible, that he was looking at it from a sectoral approach and that we may end up with 18 or 20 different strategies. I asked the succeeding minister if he would follow the same route. He said he was not sure and that he had not yet considered it.

Mr. Gillespie: I hope you will have the good grace to apologize when you find out that at no time did I ever make the statement that I was against developing the secondary industrial base of this country.

Mr. Kempling: I will find the reference for the minister and let him have it.

Mr. Paproski: Right between the eyes.

Mr. Kempling: It is nice to see that someone opposite is listening. It is good to see that the minister is awake.

Mr. Lachance: Keep trying.

Mr. Gillespie: We don't like the big lie technique. You hope that if you repeat it often enough we might even believe it.

Mr. Kempling: Look at the 1974 election. The government said it would not introduce controls, yet it did so. We know all about the government's big lie technique. At any rate, this minister and the succeeding minister sat in their places and watched a provision put into the AIB legislation, through a regulation, which caused research and development to be grouped in the same grouping as advertising, sales promotion and donations to charity. While this provision has now been removed, it caused a pause in research, caused many projects to be stoped or slowed down and caused hundreds of industrial projects to be shelved.

In fact, when the people in industrial research called the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce inquiring about the AIB regulation, the people in the department were not aware that such a regulation had been put in place. We had one department imposing a regulation and another department not knowing anything about it. Perhaps the former minister would like to comment on that at some time because, as I recall, he was there at that time.

Today we hear much about technological advances in industry, yet we are looking at a working paper and proposed legislation to change the patent laws in Canada. If this legislation proceeds, it will have a disastrous effect on the development of advanced technology in Canada. It will make it difficult not only to import technology, but it will almost preclude Canadian inventors and innovators from the foreign market. If the proposed patent law is put in place, we will have no patent legislation in Canada in ten years' time because what it is suggesting is that we go along for a ten year period and at the end of that period reassess it. However, when we read the legislation we find that what the government really wants to do is eliminate patents altogether. If the proposed legislation is enacted, the only country in the world which will have similar patent provisions will be the Soviet Union.

We have heard comments from every quarter of the economy regarding cutbacks in research and development, and we have already seen an exodus of many research projects to countries which have more favourable economic climates and fewer restrictions. If we carry the bleak research prospects which now face Canadian industry and the proposed patent laws to a conclusion, the future is not at all encouraging. The people mainly responsible for putting together the proposed patent legislation are themselves deficient. As far as I can determine, none of them has any extensive knowledge of the practical or historical aspects of patents. They have decided they are going to change our patent laws, and without consultation with patent attorneys, patent agents or the Patent Institute they have written a new proposed patent act. I understand that they have even suggested they have a priority on this, which I find deplorable.

In concert with the winding down of research funding we find the Treasury Board has issued an instruction under the folio TB Circular No. 1976-2, and this document restricts government scientists from attending non-government sponsored scientific conferences. The circular states that only one person may attend. Earlier this month—from October 4 to October 8, to be exact—the Canadian Aeronautics and Space Institute held its tenth congress in Ottawa. Between 200 and 300 prominent scientists attended and more than 60 learned papers were presented. Even though the congress was held in Ottawa, only one government scientist was allowed to attend. I, personally, find this restrictive regulation deplorable. Anyone who thinks about it will realize that one scientist cannot possibly have the time nor the expertise for every aspect of aeronautics and space, and I hope the new Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Faulkner) will see fit to have this restriction lifted.

Let me turn for a few moments to the anti-inflation program. Our inflation has eased slightly this year, but let us put it in its proper perspective. Food and food prices are not inlcuded under the AIB legislation. The food cost figures which go into the consumer price index have dropped or have remained relatively stable. As we understand it, this is due to a drop in the price of imported products. However, if we remove food from the consumer price index and look at inflation in that light, we will find that our inflation rate is still 9.4 per cent, not the 6.5 per cent which the AIB is advertising. I think it is a fraud on the people of Canada for the AIB to take credit for a drop in food prices when in fact food does not come under their regulations. A drop in inflation from 12 per cent to 9.4 per cent is not as dramatic as a drop from 12 per cent to 6.5 per cent.

[Mr. Kempling.]

It is ironic that people in industry and in the scientific community can see many solutions to our economic problems, both national and international, but find they are restricted by government regulations and poorly thought-out policies or, in fact, no policies at all. At recent meetings of the OECD and the International Monetary Fund, and at the meeting called a few months ago by President Ford which was convened in Puerto Rico, the call was for stricter fiscal and monetary restraint. In fact, the IMF chairman at the conference recently held in Manila hinted strongly that unless some countries put in place monetary legislation or regulations to control the amount of money being printed, and unless they are prepared to help themselves, perhaps the IMF would restrict loans to those countries and not rush to their aid.

● (1600)

The same message was set forth in recent OECD releases and it was the theme of the conference held recently in Puerto Rico. In Canada, the printing of money in the past few years has been in the order of 12 per cent to 15 per cent annually and in the most recent period, if it has not been adjusted, it was 27 per cent on an annual basis. Because of high interest rates, serious distortions are occurring in our economy. The bank rate is at an all-time high and Canadian businessmen are being attracted to purchasing products outside Canada where interest rates are considerably lower. In fact, it is possible to finance inventory outside Canada at about half our rate.

The spin-off effect of this to the business community will be disastrous if it is allowed to continue for long. If a purchaser of manufactured goods can purchase them abroad at a price competitive to domestic production, and can finance his purchase at half our bank rate, why should he ever purchase in Canada? When you reflect upon the long term effects of this fact of business life, Mr. Speaker, you can see ahead a continuing trade deficit, a continuing balance of payments problem and a bleak future for any small and medium-sized Canadian manufacturer.

Clearly, interest rates must come down; we cannot allow them to continue at this high rate. I know of companies which can finance their inventory at fixed rates of exchange and fixed interest rates of 6½ per cent or 7 per cent offshore. They can take advantage of container shipping and bring goods in during the Seaway season for the best possible freight rate; but looked at in the long term, this spells disaster for many small and medium-sized manufacturers.

Many industries have reacted and are searching for ways to reduce operating costs. A company contacted me recently and laid before me a program they wanted to start but, because of Anti-Inflation Board regulations, they cannot. The program would increase productivity and stabilize prices and might, over a period of time, even reduce their prices. They wanted to install an incentive cost reduction program which would require the co-operation of all employees. It would not result in the loss of any jobs, but would increase productivity, improve efficiency and help keep the company competitive in the domestic market against imported competition. It was a simple program. They targeted for a certain number of dollars a day by which to reduce operating costs. Multiplied by the number of working days in the year, it gave an annual reduction. They proposed to share a portion of the saving in the form of an incentive bonus to employees. A portion would, of course, accrue to the management. The portion that would accrue to the employees could earn some of them as much as $1,000 a year more than they presently receive.

The Anti-Inflation Board stepped in and said they could not allow it; that there was a collective bargaining agreement which brought them under the umbrella of the AIB. They were told they could not adopt this type of program because it would raise the earnings of employees above the set level. In spite of the fact that the proposal would increase the productivity of the firm, improve its efficiency and reduce overhead, they were not allowed to adopt it. That is a deplorable situation, Mr. Speaker, and it is one of the inequities of the AIB program. The portion that the company would have retained would have driven their profits above the 85 per cent level and so it caused them difficulties.

There are many subjects that we had expected would be covered in the Speech from the Throne. We were speculating on its contents before it was presented. Maybe I did not look at it thoroughly enough, but I thought, in view of the difficulties facing the country and the expected day of protest on October 14, as well as the problems expressed to me by people in every walk of life and the business community in particular, that it would be a gung ho document. I expected it would give the people some hope for an end to their problems.

Instead, we were treated to a very bland document, one that fell far short of what the government is capable of. I think they are capable of producing a better document than that, for I have a great deal of confidence in some of the people in the departments. I do not have much confidence in many of the ministers, but some of the people in the departments are very competent and I think are capable of producing a document to give the people hope that in the years ahead their problems would be solved and they would reach the standard of living they deserve.

We got a disappointing document. The only thing we can look forward to now is the budget speech. If it does not have more in it than the Speech from the Throne, then there are serious times and trouble ahead of us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco).

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Paproski: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think, since the hon. member for Drummond (Mr. Pinard) has just returned to his seat, we would be glad to allow him to speak.

Mr. Brisco: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I believe we ought to thank the opposition whip for bringing that matter to our attention and allowing the hon. member for Drummond (Mr. Pinard) to speak.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his courtesy and understanding following a temporary absence of a few seconds. I appreciate it greatly.

First, I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) and the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance), the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They did their job with dignity and once again showed how well they can represent their constituents here.

I should also like to join with all those who paid tribute to our late colleague, Mrs. Albanie Morin. As we all know, she quickly won the admiration of all members in this House, and her death saddens us deeply. To her family and relatives, I extend my deepest sympathy.

With regards to the Speech from the Throne, I welcome the obvious fact that in that speech the principles that have always been the strength of the Liberal party are not only safeguarded but reaffirmed, especially with respect to bilingualism in relation to national unity, the quest for a formal constitutional independance, the reinforcement of the structure of Canadian agriculture, the fight against regional inequalities, respect for the collective bargaining, while at the same time promoting cooperation rather than antagonism, the protection of small businesses and respect of the private sector, and placing a great deal of emphasis on the fact that a notion of social conscience must accompany that of profit.

But today I should like to deal with two specific topics mentioned in the Speech from the Throne and dealing with individual freedom; first, a human rights bill, and second, the broadcasting of the debates of this House. With respect to a human rights bill, the speech from the throne states, and I quote:

> In a similar effort to remove obstacles to information and to equal opportunity, the Government will introduce a Human Rights Bill. The major effect of the Bill will be to prohibit discrimination on the grounds of race, colour, national or ethnic origin, religion, age, sex, marital status, or physical handicap. In particular, the Bill will establish the principle of equal compensation for work of equal value performed by persons of either sex. It will establish a citizen's statutory right to gain greater access to personal records in federal information banks and to correct that information when it is in error. It will also limit the gathering of personal information by the Government.

The Canadian Bill of Rights, for the recognition and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms, assented to on August 10, 1960, states, and I quote:

> The Parliament of Canada, affirming that the Canadian Nation is founded upon principles that acknowledge the supremacy of God, the dignity and worth of the human person and the position of the family in a society of free men and free institutions; Affirming also that men and institutions remain free only when freedom is founded upon respect for moral and spiritual values and the rule of law; And being desirous of enshrining these principles and the human rights and fundamental freedoms derived from them, in a Bill of Rights which shall reflect the respect of Parliament for its constitutional authority and which shall ensure the protection of these rights and freedoms in Canada:

Mr. Speaker, since December 10, 1948, the day of the adoption by the United Nations of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, there has been in many countries an increasing awareness of the necessity to legislate and create internal mechanisms to fight discrimination against individuals. In his speech for the Nobel prize presentation, Alexander Soljenitsyn said, and this is from a quotation previously made in this House:

A quarter of a century ago the creation of the United Nations raised great expectations for humanity. Alas, in an immoral world they also became immoral. These are not united nations but united governments where those who were really elected, those who imposed themselves by force and those who came to power through an armed takeover are all on the same footing. Because of the mercenary prejudices of the majority, the United Nations jealously watch over the freedom of some nations while they do not care for that of others. By an unofficial vote they refused to consider individual claims, the pleas of the individual, of ordinary people not important enough for that gigantic organization. The United Nations never tried to impose on governments, as a condition for admissibility, the Bill of Rights, the most significant document of its 25 years of existence, leaving the population at the mercy of governments they did not choose.

All Canadian provinces have enacted statutes respecting human rights in relation to discriminatory practices. Every provincial statute, except that of Prince Edward Island, contains provisions for the establishment of a human rights commission or, for Newfoundland, the appointment of a commissioner. The provinces have taken the lead in this field because discriminatory practices have tended to be more prevalent in matters under provincial jurisdiction in the areas of employment, accommodation and services and because so many more Canadians are involved in matters under provincial jurisdiction.

Existing anti-discrimination provisions of federal statutes and regulations are fragmentary. For example, part I of the Canada Labour Code, which deals with fair employment practices, applies to employment by organizations such as banks, railways, etc., under the jurisdiction of parliament but does not include employment by the Crown in right of Canada. There is no over-all body of law at the federal level to which persons may resort when they consider themselves to have been harmed by the iscriminatory practices of organizations or persons whose activities fall within the legislative authority of parliament. As well, there is no legislation providing for the establishment of standards on the basis of which personal information in government records is accurate, accessible to the individual and used only for authorized purposes.

[Translation]

On July 21, 1975, the Minister of Justice introduced in the House of Commons Bill C-72 entitled the Canadian Human Rights Act. In announcing the legislation, the minister said and I quote:

I believe that the government has put forth a comprehensive legislative measure for the protection of human rights and interests in Canada. This is a bill which should please all Canadians.

Devised to extend the Canadian Bill of Rights, this legislation has two main purposes:

1.—To prohibit discrimination in all matters within federal government jurisdiction on the grounds of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age, sex, marital status or conviction for an offence for which a pardon has been granted;

2.—To establish measures through which the right to individual privacy can be better protected consistent with public order and well-being.

The bill provides for the establishment of a Canadian Human Rights Commission as a vehicle for investigating and preventing discriminatory practices in areas under federal jurisdiction.

[Mr. Pinard.]

The commission would also develop information and research programs to foster public understanding of human rights and freedoms in Canada.

● (1620)

Finally, Bill C-72 authorizes the government to establish a series of guidelines providing that any file it possesses and which contains personal information about the nature, reputation, financial situation, health, living conditions and way of life of an individual be exact, put away in a safe place, open to the person concerned and used by others only with an authorization.

Mr. Speaker, on December 11 and 12, 1975, during a federal-provincial conference on the rights of man, Canada made an important step towards the ratification of three documents of the United Nations concerning the rights of man: a covenant on economic, social and cultural rights, a covenant on civil and political rights and the optional protocol accompanying it, all of them having been adopted by the United Nations in 1966; thus, the goals of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights became written down in international legal documents. It is fortunate that some paragraphs of the Throne Speech let us hope that legislation in this field will be introduced in the cause of this session.

As for broadcasting the debates of the House, the Speech from the Throne declares on page 4:

The Government and all Parliamentarians are concerned about the extent to which the average citizen is informed about Parliament. The Government wishes to provide access to the Parliamentary process for as many Canadians as possible. It will therefore seek approval to enable the proceedings of the House of Commons to be broadcast.

Mr. Speaker, to my mind, this suggestion justifies more than ever the necessity for important changes in the Standing Orders, I mean far-reaching reforms.

As most of my colleagues and particularly the preceding speaker, the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Cyr), and the hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet) who spoke on that subject Friday afternoon, I know that Parliament is the heart of Canadian democracy and that since 1968 serious efforts which brought concrete and positive changes have contributed to improve that imperfect institution and, as the hon. member for Gaspé said, an institution which sticks too much to tradition. It is really to be hoped, Mr. Speaker, that another important phase will be covered to modernize the House of Commons and make it more efficient and also to enhance the role of parliamentarians.

I do not intend to make an exhaustive or academic study of the activities of Parliament. Indeed since 1968, the members can increasingly take part in the drafting of legislation; as an example, between October 8, 1970 and February 16, 1972—because statistics are available—21 committees of the House of Commons were set up and held 900 sittings. They called 2,751 witnesses and the record of their interventions make up over 30,000 pages.

I proceed from the ideal principal that a careful planning of the proceedings of each parliamentary session and the passage of bills according to a determined agenda ensure a more rational and efficient tribune while making the role played by parliamentarians more humane and intelligent. I do not forget on the other hand that it is surely necessary to recognize to the opposition the right and the means to make its views known thoroughly but not in a dilatory manner and I would like to suggest substantial technical amendments which are however a safeguard for democracy.

The main grievances I have with respect to the Standing Orders of the House of Commons are as follows: First, unwarranted repetition of the same elements of discussion. Second, more often than not debates are impressed with partisan spirit rather than valuable or constructive criticism, hence we have far too many digressions in speeches. Third, we make improper use of the time and means put at the disposal of the opposition in the course of the various stages of consideration of bills in an attempt—often admitted—to prevent or unduly delay passage by a majority government; that is called "filibuster". Fourth, I find there is the highly abusive restraint of continual and too often useless physical presence in the House of Commons, making it impossible for the member to plan soundly and carry out effectively the diversified tasks which he or she could or should undertake. Fifth, a disorderly and overly exhaustive schedule of parliamentary business deprives the member from an essential and valuable presence in his riding and with his family. I submit that the implementation of the following principles is necessary if we mean to have a workable reform.

The first principle is that we must in fact

(a) recognize that tbe opposition is entitled to have the right and means to make its views known, in a thorough and immediate manner, by eliminating the opportunity to reiterate the same arguments at the different stages of the procedure, bringing back the discussion to relevant points and thusly improving the quality of the debate.

The second principle which, in my view, is valid is the following:

(b): Carefully plan the member's presence in the House of Commons to make a more effective schedule possible.

Lastly, the third principle that we should adopt if we wish to make sensible improvements is as follows:

(c) Establish a well ordained parliamentary schedule which would permit hon. members to carry out their political duties away from Parliament Hill and live a more normal family life.

Mr. Speaker, as a suggestion for the administration of these guidelines, I propose that the House adopt the following changes which are not restrictive in any way.

First of all, concerning the business hours of the House of Commons: in my humble opinion, the House should sit every day, except Monday or Friday, from 2 to 6 p.m., and then again from 8 to 10 p.m. This echoes the suggestion the hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet) made in the House last Friday to limit the number of working days in the House to four. Once again, and I do not wish to repeat what I have said, I want to practise what I preach, follow the guidelines and meet the grievances I indicated previously.

As to the vote, when possible I think it should be deferred to a fixed date and to a determined time, except for urgent matters. Speeches should be limited to 15 or 20 minutes for each speaker, except for the official spokesman or the first speaker of each party who would be allowed 30 minutes.

Concerning private members' hour, I propose that it be held every second Wednesday night, that is from eight to nine o'clock and from nine to ten o'clock, with the vote, if any, deferred to the day and date determined for that purpose. As to opposition days, they should be established according to a parliamentary schedule.

The debates relating to the Speech from the Throne and to the budget speech should be reduced to sittings of six days for the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne and five days for the budget speech.

Most important of all is the parliamentary schedule. Each session should end June 23 at the latest, the eve of Saint John the Baptist's Day, the day of French Canada, until the day following Labour Day, that is at the beginning of September.

Having regard to debates on government bills, I propose a standing committee of parliamentary leaders to determine a time schedule for the House and the committees with power being granted to the government to impose its decision whenever an agreement is impossible. Recourse to this closure rule should be debatable by only one speaker for each party with a 30-minute time limit in each case.

In addition, we should limit to 10 minutes the speech delivered by the mover of an amendment put a second time at the report stage and to 10 minutes the speech of the governments's speaker.

Mr. Speaker, failure to raise quorum should bring the adjournment of the House only after the bells have rung for ten minutes to call members.

I think it is absolutely ridiculous, as I noticed it happened once last year, that because there is one member missing in the House to have the quorum, the House should lose precious hours and adjourn until the next day to resume its business. I hope this unfortunate experience will not occur again. It is not the fault of one party in particular, but I think that a minor change in the Standing Orders would prevent a new occurrence of a ridiculous and obsolete situation. Upon noticing that there is no quorum, we should ring the bells for ten minutes to call the members. As for the question period, I suggest that government members should have the same privileges as those extended to opposition members.

Finally, I will say a word about the committee of the whole. The votes on the consideration of each clause should be deferred and held at the same time. On various matters, I agree that the Speaker should be severe and not hesitate to intervene when the discussion departs from the subject under consideration. I agree with the suggestions that a special committee be set up for second reading of all bills that are acceptable to all parties, and also that the order paper should be simplified and made easier to understand. As for the standing committees, their membership should be limited to a maximum of 20 and quorum reduced to seven.

Several changes, Mr. Speaker, were discussed by the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, committee of which I am a member and on which I sat for five days during the summer break before Parliament came back last Tuesday. Because there is pressing need for those changes, committee members agreed to submit them for discussion to their respective caucuses in the next few days. Those changes are not necessarily all included in those I have just mentioned, but several of them, which were discussed and met with the general approval of the committee, are among those I have just talked about. I believe circumstances will justify those changes and if they are well explained to Canadians the latter, in all logic, will see that they are in their interest and that they will in no way affect true democracy.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, that parliamentary reform is urgent, fundamental and necessary. We will soon know where we stand with regard to the attitude of the various political parties towards the negotiated changes. I trust petty politics will be set aside to achieve a procedure truly worthy of a Parliament at once modern, humane, efficient as well as interesting, because I have just included all speeches on parliamentary reform in my argument on televising our debates. It is important that our Parliament should also become interesting. Concerned about offering the Canadian public both objective information of the business of Parliament and reports interesting and worthy of responsible public men, I feel that this parliamentry reform would justify televising the debates of this House, as suggested in the Speech from the Throne.

[English]

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that others today have recognized the fact that this is one of the first occasions upon which, as Assistant Deputy Chairman, you have taken the Speaker's chair. I have been absent from the House and in my riding for a couple of days and this is the first time I have seen Your Honour presiding over our debates. I should like to extend my best wishes and those of Kootenay West.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brisco: Having said that, and bearing in mind that it is our responsibility to debate, discuss and comment on the Speech from the Throne, may I say in summary that all that needs to be said about it has already been said by our leader.

An hon. Member: Too narrow.

Mr. Brisco: I hear a comment from across the chamber to the effect that it was too narrow a speech. The only thing that is narrow is the vision of the hon. member who made that remark. As a relatively new member from British Columbia, I have reviewed the Speech from the Throne with some care. I must say that in an area of concern to many Canadians it caused me a great deal of agony and some soul-searching. I feel I am obliged to comment on one of the first points made in that speech:

> Since 1968 the policy of official languages, supported by all parties represented in parliament, has been based on the principle of equality and on the right of Canadians to speak English or French according to their own will. An essential consequence, agreed by parliament, is that the federal government provide services in the two official languages in the national capital and wherever else there is sufficient demand for such services.

I call attention to the use of the word "policy" in that statement. Mr. Speaker, that policy is not supported by this member. In fact, it is not supported by a large number of members who sit in this House. It is not the policy which we support; it is, rather, the principle. We have no difficulty living with the principle, but when we see a policy of the nature we have seen so far we cannot but recognize that it is divisive and the subject of bitter debate across Canada. How can I associate myself with that type of federal bungling? When I sit in caucus and listen to the comments of our Francophone members and compatriots, one of my greatest embarrassments is that I cannot understand what they say.

Miss Bégin: Don't you have simultaneous translation in your caucus?

Mr. Brisco: The hon. lady is trying to be funny in a moment of seriousness, and I resent that remark.

Miss Bégin: I wasn't trying to be funny at all.

Mr. Brisco: With the aid of our translation service I have an opportunity to listen to what the Francophone members of our caucus say, but I am not bilingual and I regret it very much. I regret the fact that the previous member for Kootenay West left such a lot of work to be done that I have not had time to devote myself to the study of the other language. Nevertheless, during my brief stay in Ottawa I have come to recognize at least some of the factors involved here.

I think it is incumbent upon me, as a westerner, to spend more time in the province of Quebec. I have heard those who say, "Don't go to Quebec because you will not be welcomed; they will not speak English to you." That is simply not true. Some of the most enjoyable days I have spent in eastern Canada have been spent in Quebec. Those who live there are fine, courteous people, no different in that respect from westerners. They happen to speak a different tongue. That is not the problem; it is a question of priorities. When the government thrusts into the face of the westerner matters which are not of immediate importance to that part of Canada, then it is in trouble.

It is not the principle, it is the policy that is wrong. Of course, there is nothing new in this. It is a policy of confrontation. Ninety-five per cent of the bills one could mention, bills introduced last session, had to do with confrontation—confrontation with labour, confrontation with industry, confrontation with the provinces. That is the history of the government's attitude. They know nothing about the word "consultation". They don't know what the word "consultation" means. I want those on the other side to understand that we in western Canada will do our best to solve the problem of bilingualism.

When the Conservative party comes to power we shall address ourselves to this question. We will never pull the fortunes of the country into wasteful programs. We will address ourselves to the situation as it really is. If there is one sentence in the speech in which the government shows some understanding of the problem, it is when reference is made to their readiness to spend a few dollars at the post-secondary level and in the area of post-secondary education, the area in which it will be most effective.

Canada is a diverse country, says the speech, and unity can result only from a recognition of that diversity. I am pleased the government is able to recognize that fact. They go on to say that unity can result only from a recognition of that diversity, and not from any attempt to impose rigid uniformity. What else is the bilingualism program but rigid uniformity? That is the government's problem—rigid uniformity and confrontation.

Enough of that, Mr. Speaker, I should like to move on. I notice there is talk of continued reduction of inflation and the creation of many more employment opportunities for Canadians, that they will continue to be the government's highest priorities. I find that very interesting. One of these high priorities was manifested this year with LIP funding to various provinces in Canada. Last year the riding of Kootenay West received $608,000; this year it is down to $297,000.

We will hear from the other side the story that that is part of the government's restraint program. The problem with this government is that it restrains in the wrong areas. On the one hand the government says it will address itself to job creation in certain areas and help resolve unemployment, which is standing at around 7 per cent. But what does it do for starters? It cuts back the very program that addresses itself to those people who can perhaps at times be classified as "unemployed unemployables". The LIP program is reduced by 50 per cent in Kootenay West; it is reduced by enormous sums in other ridings. Is that the government's instant solution?

An hon. Member: Let's hear yours.

Mr. Brisco: Did not the minister read the throne speech? Surely he knew what was coming. I wonder whether the voice I hear over on the other side, which seems to be grumbling in the background, would mind waiting until I have finished my speech, when I will be pleased to answer any questions. In the meantime, why doesn't he just pay attention for a change? I wait with hopeful anticipation, but with a great deal of doubt, suspicion and negative thinking, so far as the job creation program of the government is concerned.

There are some very capable people in British Columbia who have been involved in the Outreach program. I would think there is hardly a soul on the other side who has ever heard of the Outreach program, but it happens to be one of your babies. It was doing a credible job in Kootenay West and on the lower mainland, but the government cut it back. It was reduced on the lower mainland and eliminated in Kootenay West. Is that part of the government's job creation capacity? It is just an example of the record of an inadequate government. If hon. members opposite would listen to some of the experts for a change they might come up with something concrete that would carry itself through the scene. But unfortunately they plan, they scheme, they develop, and then they bring things to a halt.

Moving to another area, Mr. Speaker, I notice that the government indicates that it is going to support private industry in meeting greater international competition. What the government says is very interesting. It says it will modify substantially its industrial assistance program. I should like to refer to one area in which the government should modify its industrial assistance program. Let me start with DREE and with one particular DREE grant to the province of Quebec in which $5,970,000 was given to one industry to create 220 jobs. That is very commendable. It just so happens that this sum of $5,970,000 granted to one industry in Quebec is just a shade over the entire sum that this government has put into the province of British Columbia for industrial development. The DREE program has spent $5.7 million in British Columbia, and the government has the guts to come up with another $5.9 million for one industry in the province of Quebec. What industry is this, Mr. Speaker? It is SKW Electro-Metallurgy Canada Limited. The company is a subsidiary of a German company, which I wish I could pronounce but my German is as poor as my French, Suddeutsche Kalkstickstoffe-Werke A.G., of West Germany.

That gives a real indication of the government's intention to support private industry in meeting greater international competition, Mr. Speaker. It gives $6 million to a German firm to establish in Quebec at a time when Germany is probably the strongest economic nation in the world, second only to the United States. Yet this government, in its largesse and its woolly-headed thinking, makes a grant like that!

How does it excuse its actions to the province of British Columbia? What is the minister responsible for DREE saying to the province of British Columbia and to B.C. members of parliament? Last week it was, "Well, we are going to put in a mining program". Next week it will be something for agriculture and the week after that it will probably be something for forestry. The fact remains that the entire DREE budget for next year in the province of British Columbia is $10 million. Planning in the province under the DREE program requires more than $50 million, and I derive that information from the DREE experts, people who know their business. This government does not know its business. I should like to hear the minister explain by what stretch of the imagination he can justify a $6 million grant to a German firm to establish one industry in Quebec when at the same time he has spent less than that in the whole of the province of British Columbia ever since the DREE program was implemented.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the kind of tokenism that we have had from DREE, and it is what I mean when I talk of western alienation. That is only one of a hundred examples. Yet the government just does not hear. It does not get the message because it has its earmuffs on. I hope that by the end of the day the government will have a clear message from the ridings of Ottawa-Carleton and St. John's West.

I also notice that the government, in its wisdom, has said it will introduce measures to assist small business by improving local access to financial assistance and other services provided by the federal departments. Mention is made of the Federal Business Development Bank. What I should like to ask is, how small is small business? Is the government talking of a $100 million business, a $1 million business, a $50,000 business or a $25,000 business? Is it talking about the corner druggist who wants to establish in a small community that does not have a drugstore, or does it refer to some big industry?

I will tell the government one thing it does not know about small business—or perhaps one thing that it does know. Let me tell them that they are a bunch of cynics. I say that because when the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek) was given responsibility by the leader of this party for addressing himself to the problems of small business in Canada, what did we hear from the other side of the House? Hoots, jeers, roars and laughter. They thought it was the biggest thing since Mutt and Jeff; they really thought it was a laugh. They treated the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley with nothing but cynicism, and being a typically cynical government they now smilingly introduce their program for small business and to create a new, minor industry. The people of Canada will have the record laid before them as it unfolds—the promises of this government, the distortions of this government, the shallow rhetoric of this government. Whether it is small business, amateur sport, big business, DREE, transportation, health—you name it; the record is there and Canadians can surely perceive it.

While I am talking about the Federal Business Development Bank, businessmen in my community say to anyone who is looking for money, "You want us to bankroll you, and you say you have been to the Federal Business Development Bank. Well, we really cannot do much business with you if that is where you have been". The reason is that in British Columbia and in many areas the federal development business bank is regarded as a court of last resort. Surely the interest rates reflect it. If it is the intention of this government really to address itself to the serious problems in respect of funding small business, then I think it should do so at a greatly reduced rate of interest.

The next area which concerns me deals with safety. With Bill C-83 the government intended to establish a whole new bureaucracy which would cost the taxpayers millions of dollars for a woolly-headed bill in respect of gun control, a bill that was so idiotic and misconceived that the government really, I think, was afraid to introduce it for third reading. If it had meant that much to the government, the government would have continued the session for a couple of weeks in order to deal with it. But now we will never see Bill C-83 again. The government will bring in another mutton-headed bill of similar ilk.

Now we see that the government is to delve into another area. I wonder who the government is trying to cozy up to. An industrial safety and health centre is to be established to assist companies and workers in their efforts to identify and remove hazards. That sounds beautiful. It really is nice. But I think, Mr. Speaker, if you examine the record you will find that the provinces of Canada are well ahead of the federal government in this area and that the provinces have developed the expertise. If it is the federal government's proposal to complement the research and studies of the provinces, I have no difficulty with that; I support it. But if it is to be a repetition, a side-by-side bureaucracy to spend more taxpayers' dollars on a useless project, then what is the sense of it? I hope the government has its priorities squared away.

I note, also, that as a further element of the government's food policies, measures are to be introduced to make more farm-stored crops eligible for advance payments and that the government will also work with the provinces and farm organizations to strengthen the structure and productivity of Canadian agriculture. That is just like apple pie; it is just sweet words of rhetoric. We are to strengthen the structure and productivity of Canadian agriculture. Meanwhile, back at the ranch, unbeknown to this government apparently, there is a program called MSQ, "milk subsidy quota." They are now busy penalizing the farmers in the various provinces who produce our milk.

A couple of weeks ago, in the province of British Columbia, the dairies were out of milk because the farmers are being penalized for overproduction. What is happening? The dairy herds are being reduced. They do not like this penalty. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) now is taking away what he had given them. He is robbing Peter to pay Paul. Who is suffering? The dairy farmers and also the end purchaser. The local dairies have an excellent cheese factory in British Columbia. This year it has operated, I believe, for a total of three days. Why has it not operated for a longer period? Because this government wants to import a large proportion of its cheese. Because this government established an MSQ program which reduced the amount of milk, so that there are no milk by-products available to this cheese factory.

Of course, the government could not care less because this factory employs only 20 or 30 people. So why worry! If British Columbia happens to be short of milk for a few days, then I suppose it is assumed the milk could be obtained from Alberta. Alberta does not have any to spare. The MSQ program is a farce and a laugh, and there is not a farmer in British Columbia who would support this Minister of Agriculture.

First we had the Minister of Agriculture with egg on his face. Now we have him with milk in his veins, and finally we have him with some potatoes in his brain. He recognizes the fact that American potatoes are coming into British Columbia, but he is not prepared to impose any sort of a tariff because the potato farmers of British Columbia are facing ruin. He will look at the program in a few months' time to see what the imports were, and balance out what the farmers of British Columbia have left over in the way of potatoes. He has not told us what to do about the potatoes that are already there. He has not told us how to get rid of them or how to sell them. He is not prepared to protect the Canadian producer.

If he were prepared to protect the Canadian producer, he would have some answers for those people in British Columbia who grow tomatoes, tree fruits and soft fruits who see on the shelves those tomatoes, tree fruits and soft fruits from South Africa, New Zealand, Australia, Taiwan, Formosa, or wherever. This imported produce appears on the shelves at much lower prices. The farmers of British Columbia cannot compete with those prices. We will have smaller orchards, fewer producing farmers, a weakened agriculture, and when they have gone belly-up, then watch the prices of those canned goods from those foreign countries escalate in price on our shelves. Who will be to blame? Well, we know who is to blame. It is the ill-informed Minister of Agriculture who sits across the House and who today disposed of the cattle industry in a brilliant statement which in my view, and in the view of our agricultural critic, displayed his unfeeling and uncaring attitude toward the cattle industry of Canada.

In any event, the government carries on and talks about the fact that it is going into a position of co-operative restraint with the provinces on education, medical insurance and hospital insurance. "Co-operative restraint" is a beautiful phrase. That is a two-word summary of the confrontation of this government with the provinces of Canada and the issue of Bill C-68, a bill which this government in the last session had to get through the House by means of closure. They refer to it as co-operative restraint. What a laugh!

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the hospital board in my community does not think very much of the government's co-operative restraint, because already the pinch is being felt of the cutbacks of this government and those it has yet to implement which are already being felt by the medical system in British Columbia. However, the government dispenses with that little problem with two beautiful words, "co-operative restraint".

The government then goes on to talk about affordable housing. That is also very interesting. In British Columbia, in my riding, there is a very successful program called "rural and remote". A lot of AHOP homes are being built under the AHOP limits, but in my riding the AHOP limit is $33,000. With that limit of $33,000 one is lucky to find property on which to build under the program. If people do build, they are very lucky to be able to build within that AHOP limit. When they end up with a structure of 980 or 1,000 square feet, it really is not adequate for a family of four, five or six persons. Yet in another area of British Columbia, where the cost of construction is much lower and where the price of property is much less, this government, in its wisdom, establishes an AHOP limit of $38,000 so the homes have all the frills one could wish and are greater in dimension. They have one and a half bathrooms, a fireplace, a carport and a full basement. That is just great, but there is a mixture of priorities and again a lack of co-ordination with the province. In another area of the province the land is available if the federal authorities can get it from the provincial government. Houses are needed there. The government of British Columbia holds the land, but the federal government cannot address itself to securing any of that land for the construction of houses.

Another area of concern with these AHOP homes is the lack of a careful determination of the quality of occupancy of these homes. A vast majority of the tenants are good tenants, but there are also undesirable tenants who have no concept of the value of the property they occupy and in two years they make a brand new home look like a 60 year old shack. I suggest that some thought should be given to that problem, that perhaps what the government should consider is a rental purchase program so that the condition of a home can be checked after it had been occupied for some time to determine whether or not the occupant is a responsible buyer or whether we are in fact subsidizing a family which does not look after the property. Certainly I do not care to see good money thrown after bad. When we see some of the problems that arise with AHOP homes, it becomes obvious that the minister should take a second look at them.

Something else astonishes me in the Speech from the Throne and that is the fact that a total of only five lines, which in the view of the government constitutes a paragraph, is devoted to the largest single cultural, social and economic problem in Canada, namely, the native people. At the end of the five lines the government states that it will introduce some kind of bill dealing with James Bay. That is the kind of tokenism that we have learnt to expect from this government. No reference is made to a housing program for the native people, or to land settlements.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Brisco: I will try to be as brief as I can, Mr. Speaker. If the government attaches continuing importance to the aspirations of Canada's native peoples, as it has said it does, it could have devoted more than five lines to those problems.

Another area of concern is the fact that the government has also given short shrift to amateur sports. The only sensible move by the government was to appoint a responsible cabinet minister in the person of the charming and lovely hon. member for Skeena (Mrs. Campagnolo).

Mr. Goodale: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brisco: She is one of the few competent people in an incompetent cabinet.

Mr. Benjamin: You are neither lovely nor charming, Ralph.

Mr. Brisco: We had a critic of amateur sports long before the government created the ministry, namely, the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley. What did the government members do? They sneered at the hon. member and said this is a laugh. Since we are discussing the various areas of concern of the government let me refer to the Little League from Trail, British Columbia, who became Canadian champions this year. To the finals in Sherbrooke, Quebec, they defeated the Little League from Toronto. It could not have happened to a nicer team. Nevertheless, it is unfortunate in my view—and perhaps it shows up a problem which we have in western Canada as well as in eastern Canada—that some dissatisfaction was voiced by some of the parents of the members of the Little Leaguers. They came to me and told me that at a banquet for the Little League team on Saturday night, as well as during the entire time they spent in Quebec, all the programs, all the literature, and everything pertaining to the four anglophone teams was in French. They did not understand anything that was being said. Surely they could have been accommodated.

Miss Bégin: Are such programs in French in your city?

Mr. Brisco: In my city the principal languages are Italian, Russian, and English.

Miss Bégin: In Quebec it is French.

Mr. Brisco: I am sure that had the Sherbrooke team been in Trail we would have made an effort to establish a bilingual relationship instead of a unilingual relationship. I only point this out to show that this is a symptom of an underlying problem. The hon. member opposite cannot accept that. She is waxing eloquent about the problem.

Miss Bégin: Sherbrooke is a French speaking city.

Mr. Brisco: I suggest that the hon. lady withhold her remarks until I complete mine.

I notice also in the throne speech an indication that the government will address itself to the protection of children. I was fortunate enough to have been a member of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs during the period when we reviewed much of the literature and information concerning child abuse across Canada. I think it should go on the record that this issue was brought before the committee at the insistence of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie). I am sure that members on both sides of the House recognize his valuable contribution in bringing this issue to the attention of members of the House. I hope that an effort will be made to co-ordinate a system of review all across Canada so that a record can be kept of child abuse cases. In the case of a chronic child abuser, or the case of a family who abuses children moving from one province to another, contact can be maintained with them so that if new violations occur they can be controlled and a record kept in order that these people cannot escape the law by moving from one province to another. Of course this is only one aspect of child abuse; the others are more of a social nature.

[Mr. Benjamin.]

I note also that in the throne speech the government has addressed itself to nuclear arms in a very cynical fashion. Enough has been said on this subject by members of our party so that I do not need to comment on it more except to reinforce what has been said.

I note also that the government intends to take action in the matter of government secrecy. I have to laugh at that because recently in the press we have seen many references to government secrecy. We see that the former hope of the Liberal party, John Turner of all people, spoke about government secrecy and about how bad it is. By God, there is a fellow who should know. That white knight was the expert on government secrecy when he sat in the House. He was an expert on a lot of things. He was the fellow who led this country into the biggest periods of inflation we have ever known. He was the brain behind it all. But there he is in his ivory tower in Toronto saying, "Naughty, naughty. This government's income and price control is all wrong. If they had followed my direction, it would have been different". Bring this expert back. We would be pleased to deal with him.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Do you want him to continue doing that?

Mr. Brisco: It does not matter what he does; he suffers from a credibility gap that is as big as this House.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): Look at who is talking.

Mr. Brisco: I thought the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) would like a qualified and valued opinion, in view of the quality of my remarks.

● (1710)

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Haven't you got anything to say?

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if you would do something about the hon. member for St. Boniface. He is running off at the mouth, and I would like to wind up as quickly as I can.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): At least I say something; you don't.

Mr. Brisco: The government should finally get around to one area which is of importance to me and to the people of British Columbia. The government talks about equal opportunities for individuals, and regional economic fulfillment. That is interesting, but I would like to know what its idea of economic fulfillment is. I would also like to know what its idea of regional unemployment is. Is the government talking about a province, a county, a town, or a regional district?

In Kootenay West there are some urgent needs to address to DREE. We are interested in a mineral study, and a water supply from the Columbia River. We are concerned that the city of Trail and the city of Castlegar have to spend over $500,000 this year to put in water wells. We are doubly concerned when we see that the province of Saskatchewan has a water treatment plant coming up for Unity, Saskatchewan, under the DREE program. Of course the announcement was made by the former parliamentary secretary to the minister of regional economic expansion, which figures.

Mr. Goodale: A fine member.

Mr. Brisco: He was looking after his own back yard, and Unity, Saskatchewan, is to get a $500,000 water treatment facility.

Mr. Benjamin: They would't let me make the announcement.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): We can understand that.

Mr. Brisco: We are also concerned about the southern transprovincial highway. We are concerned about special ARDA for B.C. The lower Kootenay Band sits on some of the most valuable agricultural land in British Columbia. That is part of their reserve. On two occasions they addressed their concern to special ARDA. They wanted money to develop the hay land. They wanted money to establish a cattle farm. What did special ARDA say? It told them that they did not know what they were talking about; that they did not know anything about cattle or about farming and that they did not even have the proper land for the project. That pronouncement was made from an ivory tower in Vancouver, and nobody bothered to go out there.

Only recently, as a result of my own personal efforts, somebody came up there to look at it. That person had some sense of feeling and judgment, and wondered why nothing had been done. This is some of the finest agricultural land in the province, and he wondered why we were not developing it. The reason was that special ARDA did not think it was worth while developing.

In conclusion, the government says it is going to resolve regional problems. There is no way the members of this government will do that by sitting on their butts in ivory towers and not getting out into the areas and identifying regional problems. They have been talking about regional problems in the Kootenays, in the northwest part of B.C., in the northeast part of B.C., in Newfoundland and in New Brunswick, but thus far only in the Maritimes has the government been able to get out and identify these problems. The government expects the people from the areas affected to tell it what the problems are and then to sit back and wait for the government to act. We have gone that route so many times that we are sick and tired of it.

The riding of Kootenay West was designated for special funding for industry. That designation was removed last year, and there has been nothing to replace it. The government has not spent a dime in the province of British Columbia under DREE for the past year except to operate its office in Victoria. That is the extent of the concern of the government. That is the extent of the government's skill and management in regional development. The government has the power right now unilaterally to provide industrial incentives to the province of British Columbia without consultation with the province if it cannot get agreement. My feeling is that the province of B.C. would not be offended at that particular approach, but will the government take that approach? Actions speak louder than words. I will have an opportunity again in this House to discuss my concerns about DREE.

I have many more concerns about DREE policy. I am concerned about divisiveness, unfairness, the treatment afforded to certain areas, favouritism in other areas, the total ignoring of certain areas, and lack of planning. There will be opportunities to expand on those concerns, but I am serving notice that the government has an opportunity right now, if it wants to, to do something for the province of B.C. and unilaterally to introduce incentives for new business and industry. I do not say that that is the best route to take, and I do not recommend it as such, but it is a route, and it would do something for the economy of that province.

If the government is listening, the evidence should be clear in a matter of a few months. If it is not, hon. members will be hearing a lot more from me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, no!

Mr. Benjamin: I am pleased to note that my colleagues on all sides are anxiously waiting for my remarks. I want to dwell mostly on the questions of agriculture and national transportation, and the political positions of the Liberal and Tory parties on those matters, but first I would like to say that I feel inclined to repeat some remarks I made about a year ago.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Nystrom: Same old speech!

Mr. Benjamin: Since only the members of my own caucus chose to pay any attention to them, I will have to repeat them until we can get some hon. members on the government side at least to listen.

I will have to repeat what has been said by parliamentarians at all levels of government on many occasions. Many times, on occasions such as throne speech debates, hon. members have complained not so much about what was in the throne speech but about what was not in the throne speech. I am disappointed in the throne speech debate, and that is putting it mildly. I should have said the throne speech. Of course I am disappointed in some of the debate as well. I am disappointed in the throne speech for what it leaves out. It left out some things which would have received support from all sides of the House.

There was nothing in the throne speech for old age pensioners or veterans. In fact had the government decided to implement its anti-inflation program more fairly and equitably, even a year later it would have brought in measures to make the program not only seem to be fair but also actually to be fair.

The government should have announced in the throne speech that legislation would be presented to raise old age and veterans' pensions and armed forces and RCMP pensions by a minimum of $50 per month to make sure they received the minimum under the guidelines of $600 per year, but the government, some of the time with the aid and countenance of the Tories, feels that the people who cause inflation are those who are on pensions, on minimum wages, on low wages and on low salaries.

If we are to have a program to control inflation which is fair and equitable, it seems to me and to the members of the New Democratic Party that the program should start at the top and work down. However, with the usual organizational genius of the Liberal government we have a program which starts at the bottom and works up. It seems to me that the throne speech should have announced a $50 per month increase at least for old age pensioners. I thought it would have announced an intention to raise the minimum wage to $3 an hour. This would have given people a $600 a year increase which would come under the guidelines. However the government, with not a word of complaint from the Tories, let it be known that it felt it was the people on minimum wages who are causing inflation and so they should be held down.

I am proud to note, and I know the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) is happy about it as well, that the provincial government of Saskatchewan increased the minimum wage by $500-$600 a year. Now I should like to know if this government proposes to increase the minimum wage in the near future. The Liberals and the Tories seem to believe that the people on minimum wages helped cause inflation and so they have to be controlled.

I had hoped that the Speech from the Throne would mention a reduction in mortgage rates for people on middle and low incomes. If the government wanted to fight inflation and housing costs while at the same time doing something about unemployment it would have provided a substantial reduction in interest rates for low income people. This would have accelerated housing construction, which in turn would solve some of our unemployment problems. An interest rate of 6 per cent, 7 per cent, or 8 per cent for housing for low income families would have reduced the cost of housing and at the same time have increased employment.

Something that is dear to my heart, Mr. Speaker, and to the hearts of hundreds of thousands of people in western Canada is the strengthening and enlarging of the Canadian Wheat Board, but again it was not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. There was nothing about returning feed grains to the total jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board or putting flax, rye, and rapeseed under its jurisdiction.

Mr. Goodale: That was turned down in a vote by farmers.

Mr. Benjamin: The hon. member mentions that that was done away with. That was done with a phony stacked deck by the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, believe it or not. This is demonstrated by the three questions that were on the plebiscite. There was provision for the answer "no opinion", and the minister counted that as "against".

Mr. Goodale: There were not enough in that category to change the vote; less than 2 per cent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) has the floor.

Mr. Benjamin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I can hardly wait for the hon. member for Assiniboia to get into the debate.

Mr. Goodale: I am in it.

Mr. Benjamin: He is in it, but under false pretences—through the back door. Mr. Speaker, that kind of phony plebiscite will never convince me and most producers in western Canada that it was the fit and proper way to get the opinion of grain producers.

Like the majority of grain producers in western Canada I should like to see an announcement in the Speech from the Throne that the government will do away with the flexible tariff for the handling and storing of grain. I was hoping for an announcement that the country elevator grain handling system owned by the grain producers in the three prairie provinces, the three prairie wheat pools, and the UGG which constitute something like 80 per cent or 95 per cent ownership of the country elevator system, would be protected from the destructive nature of inland terminals and the unconscionable activities of outfits such as Cargill Inc.

I was hoping for something about the enlargement and rebuilding of our passenger train system, but there was nothing.

As I travel through the west droves of people tell me that the Liberals have little or no support there. That is not surprising. If I were political, which I am not, I would be encouraged when people in Saskatchewan, Manitoba, and Alberta ask me what the Tories are doing. They want to know why the Conservative Alberta government came out strongly in support of inland terminals. A fair number of farmers in the three prairie provinces who belong to the three pools of the United Grain Growers are unhappy about this. In fact in the brief submitted to the Hall Commission by the Alberta government they supported the concept of inland terminals on the basis of increased competition, improved grain handling, and further rationalization of the outdated elevator system. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the Alberta wheat pool will be glad to hear that their system is out of date.

The Alberta government wants incentives for the inland terminals. But who are those incentives really for, Mr. Speaker? I know Your Honour will want to hear this, even if my friends to my right and across the way do not. One of the outfits the Tories wanted incentives for is Cargill Inc. That company has been around since about 1881—as long as the CPR, and it is just as bad.

Back in the 1870's, 1880's and 1890's Cargill in many cases controlled the only elevator at major railroad stops, and so local farmers were often forced to accept the price they offered for their grain. Railway owners and grain elevators such as Cargill sometimes conspired to fix grain prices, and by the 1880's Cargill operated along major railway arteries in five states—North and South Dakota, Iowa, Minnesota, and Wisconsin. Even Cargill's official historian admits that—

An hon. Member: Stanley.

Mr. Benjamin: Even Stanley is not that old. Their historian admits that the company held monopolistic trading positions in southern Minnesota and South Dakota.

Let us go on about this outfit to which the Tories and the Alberta government want to give incentives. In recent years Cargill Inc. have gone into what is called in the United States "subterminals". In western Canada they are called "inland terminals". In recent years these subterminals have assumed a special role in the company's expansion. They are able to handle large volumes of grain in relatively short periods of time. These inland terminals are used by Cargill—and I want to impress this point on the hon. member for Assiniboia and my Tory friends—to bypass country elevators that are often under the control of local co-operatives. And, like other large corporations that are under monopoly capitalism, Cargill seeks to limit the commercial options available to the small producer.

I hope they go bankrupt, and I have already said that in Weyburn and Estevan. Unlike my hon. friends opposite and to my right, Mr. Speaker, on a matter such as this I do not leave my position in doubt. Their position is sometimes horizontal, sometimes vertical, and sometimes on both sides of the street at the same time.

An hon. Member: That's Joe Clark.

Mr. Benjamin: Joe Clark is trying to run down the middle of the road. He is trying to take it over. Mr. Speaker, to be fair, both Liberals and Tories like something else about Cargill. I am talking about transportation figures which show prominently Cargill's manipulation of the domestic market. Since World War II the company, to stay one jump ahead of competitors and to extract the maximum dollar for every bushel of grain it handles, has opened a new access route along the Mississippi River by widening the channel and by-passing the city of Minneapolis. Then the company bought cargo carriers, began using inland waterways, and exerted pressure through its lobbies, which are influential. By the way, this is the ninth largest privately owned corporation in the United States, with sales in the order of $9 billion. It is hardly a case for welfare—except when you hear the Tories and Grits talking. They want to give the company incentives.

The company took the lead in pressuring the U.S. Interstate Commerce Commission to restructure railway rates and regulations so that rail transportation would be more economical for the Cargill grain company—but not for farmers. It was concerned about grain companies.

The company rented locomotives, cabooses and track, and hauled grain. Perhaps the CPR is willing to rent locomotives, cabooses and track to Cargill and permit it to haul grain on the track. I suppose that is one way of getting around the Crowsnest Pass rates in Canada. In any case that shows the kind of thing this outfit was able to do. Yet the Tory government in Alberta says that this outfit should get an incentive. Of course many Liberals look with benign eyes on outfits like Cargill grain company which is presently in the process of constructing inland grain terminals at Melfort, Saskatchewan, and Elm Creek, Manitoba. Wait for it—it will not be long before they are in Alberta.

Let me direct attention to other aspects of this company's operations—I am talking about the company which Conservatives want to provide with incentives. For instance Cargill Incorporated was found guilty of an illegal squeeze that pushed wheat futures up to an artificial high on the Chicago market in 1963. It was found guilty. All it got was two years' probation, for all the good that did.

Later a senate investigations subcommittee under Senator Henry Jackson discovered a few things about this outfit in 1973. For instance it discovered how grain companies reaped profits through manipulation of the government subsidy program on exports. At the time of the Russian wheat deal subsidies had soared to 47 cents a bushel. Cargill bought wheat from United States farmers and sold it to its wholly-owned affiliate in South America, Tradex-Panama. Cargill collected the subsidy when it showed proof of shipment to its affiliate. The affiliate then sold the wheat to another affiliate in Geneva, which thereupon made a final sale for $2.20 a bushel, ten cents above the American price. Senator Jackson's investigators said that as far as they could tell the wheat never left the ship on which it was originally loaded. All transactions were on paper. And this outfit to which the Tory government of Alberta wants to give incentives ripped off the United States for 57 cents a bushel.

Cargill recently appeared before a U.S. Senate foreign relations subcommittee on multinational corporations. The committee was investigating charges that grain exporting firms tried to manipulate the world grain market and acted in collusion with other large corporations to set prices paid to U.S. farmers. One charge was contained in a memo from an agriculture department attaché in Europe which accused Cargill and three other major U.S. grain exporters of supplying false data to the European Economic Council in order to influence pricing decisions. The second charge was made by a North Dakota grain elevator operator who said Cargill and other grain export companies quoted him identical prices for wheat more than 90 per cent of the time. The operator called the practice collusion.

Tories and Liberals who welcome inland terminals and multinational grain handling companies like Cargill to Canada will appreciate the next example I am about to recite. It will make their free enterprise hearts happy. The United States department of agriculture, investigations division, uncovered possible short-weighing of grain at export elevators in nine states, and payments of gratuities to licensed inspectors in seven. They indicated that 49 separate investigations have been conducted into market irregularities in 15 states. Those investigations turned up unexplained "overages of about eight million bushels of grain at elevators in California, Illinois, Minnesota, New York, Oregon, Texas, Virginia, Washington State, and Wisconsin. The term overage refers to an excess of grain in an elevator over what should be there if purchases and sales records are accurate. Large overages might reflect deliberate short-weighing of grain taken from the elevators and sold.

Interpol had been looking into outfits like Cargill which the Tories and Grits would welcome to Canada. Interpol advises that most of the grain was stolen from poor countries. Every time somebody short-weighed a shipment to those countries some children did not eat.

That shows you the kind of outfit the Grits and Tories would welcome to Canada. That is the kind of outfit the Tories say should get incentives.

The assistant attorney general in the United States, Richard Thornburgh, who is head of the justice department's criminal division, stated that civil actions are being prepared against major grain exporting firms to recover losses incurred by the U.S. government as a result of short-weighing and misgrading of U.S. financed grain for export under Food for Peace and other plans.

Cargill was recently accused of and admitted to shipping American buckwheat into Manitoba on trucking backhauls. So far they have denied any intent to use the Crow rates to ship to Vancouver. But why any reputable company would ship buckwheat to Manitoba, the one province in Canada where buckwheat is grown, is totally beyond my comprehension.

In any case I have just given the House a short resumé of some of the company's dealings. I have much more to bring forward in other speeches during this session. I shall reveal more about this outfit which has entered western Canada with the aid and blessing of Liberals and Tories.

Let me now deal with some of the things not dealt with in the throne speech. The omission is understandable, both Liberals and Tories harbouring similar views on these matters. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) favours large clearing houses for grain. He agrees with the Alberta government. He says it would be more efficient to have one large house with respect to which the various companies would share the capital cost. He would allow the producer to determine with which house he would deal. The hon. member suggests that a large house would provide facilities for drying, cleaning, grading and so on.

I wish the hon. member for Moose Jaw would go to every shipping point in the three prairie provinces—it would take him a few years—every place where there is a wheat pool or United Grain Grower elevator, and explain to those farmers what they are supposed to do with the grain elevator they bought and paid for. Are they supposed to walk away and leave it sitting there? Well, the hon. member for Moose Jaw favours larger clearing houses. That's a nice word for inland terminals—terminals owned by outfits like Cargill grain company.

Now I come to freight rates, and on this subject the Speech from the Throne says something good.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benjamin: I note the following sentence from the Speech from the Throne:

For this reason, changes will be introduced to the National Transportation Act to protect against unfair freight rates.

That is excellent so far as it goes; I am only sorry that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) or the hon. member for Assiniboia have not risen in their places to explain what that language means.

Victor Mackie, a journalist in the Press Gallery, reports:

The intention is to charge a progressively higher rate by distance travelled.

That would rid us of an anomaly whereby it costs more to ship steel from Toronto to Regina than from Toronto to Vancouver. That is a laudable objective. It would receive the support of every member of this House, particularly those west of Thunder Bay.

● (1740)

The intention is to charge a progressively higher rate by distance travelled. The railways will be prevented from charging a higher rate for a shorter distance for the same commodity moved in the same direction over the same track,—

That is excellent. It is perfect. Now comes the hooker, the Otto Lang hooker.

—unless the Canadian Transport Commission grants an exemption for competitive reasons.

Those "competitive reasons" are what got us into trouble in the first place. There were reasons like the Great Northern, Union Pacific, the Panama Canal, and Japanese steel producers. It is because of those competitive reasons that many freight rates are lower from Toronto to Vancouver than from Toronto to Regina. Our Minister of Transport is going to keep that in his policy.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Is he your Minister of Transport?

Mr. Benjamin: I have news for him. There were two other objectives. The third one bothers me.

A third objective will be to eliminate those special rates which are below the amount needed to cover "basic charges," an official said. Railways will still be required to charge a rate which covers their expenses for a particular service.

That is more of the minister's user shall pay concept. I wish I had another 40 minutes to go into that. However, I will deal with it in another debate, possibly the budget debate or when the minister brings in some legislation.

Mr. Goodale: You will be impressed with the bill when you see it.

Mr. Benjamin: If this report by Mr. Mackie is accurate, I will not be impressed by the legislation that is brought in. I hope that Mr. Mackie's informant is wrong.

We have had more on freight rates in the past two or three years than we have needed. In fact we did not need most of it. We had threats to eliminate the "at and East rates"; threats, moves, demands and proposals to increase or eliminate the statutory Crowsnest Pass rates. Some Tories think that would be all right, for example the Alberta government. With friends like that, the Tories don't need enemies. They say the same as the Minister of Transport, let the producers get the benefit of the Crowsnest rate in another way. They recognize that statutory grain rates have been beneficial in making Canadian grain producers competitive, but they want the Crow rates' benefits applied in another way. That is what the Minister of Transport said, and it aroused the ire of every producer in the western provinces.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw said there was no doubt in his mind that in order for the grain industry to remain viable the producers would have to receive the benefits of these reduced rates in some form or another. If those are not weasel words, I have not heard any. I would like the hon. member for Moose Jaw, Mr. Hugh Horner of Alberta, the Alberta government, and all other Tories of western Canada to listen to a poll conducted by the Alberta Wheat Pool. Seventy-six per cent of its respondents, members of the Alberta Wheat Pool, which constitutes an overwhelming majority of the grain producers in that province, favoured retaining the statutory Crowsnest rates for grain with, if necessary, financial assistance to the railways from the federal government. That could almost be right out of an NDP leaflet, but it is not.

Only 19 per cent were in favour of increasing freight rates on export grain, but doing it in some other way, as the hon. member for Moose Jaw and the Alberta government have said. Only 5 per cent favoured increasing freight rates on export grain to a level that is compensatory to the railways, a favourite phrase of the Minister of Transport. He thinks the railway rates should be compensatory.

In my opinion there is no difference between the position taken by the Progressive Conservative party from the position taken by the Liberal party on the issues I have raised. In fact there was a convincing occasion the other night when our amendment seeking to end the government's program to fight inflation immediately because it is unfair and inequitable, a program which the Tories themselves criticized and said should be soon ended, was defeated. We did our best to help the Tories. We took "soon" to mean something like tomorrow. However, when our amendment was voted on, the Tories were in bed with the Liberals voting to keep the Liberal program which they have criticized so loudly for the past year.

The Speech from the Throne did not contain what the people of Canada want and need. Many more items other than the one I cited have been left out. I hope that for the welfare and good order of this nation the government will bring in legislation, although not mentioned in the throne speech, to accomplish some of the objectives and programs I have illustrated. With my background regarding grain transportation and handling, the whole issue of freight rates—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue only with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Benjamin: I thank my colleagues for their generosity. I appreciate having another minute or two to wind up what I have been saying.

The government should bring in legislation to restore feed grains to the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board, announce that flax, rye, and rapeseed will be under the jurisdiction of the board, do away with flexible tariffs for grain handling, announce and implement a national marketing authority for beef and beef products. The activities of multinational grain corporations in this country should be halted. In fact I would like to put in an amendment to the immigration bill saying that they be deported. It would be a favour to this country.

There is a need for legislation to establish national transportation. For too long Liberal and Tory governments have called transcontinental passenger trains those that begin in Montreal and end in Vancouver, leaving out the Atlantic provinces. Even though Newfoundland has been part of Canada since 1949 it still is not part of the national transportation system. In fact they do not even have the same gauge track. The minister's version of revitalizing transportation is reducing it.

In addition to bringing in measures to fight inflation in a fair and equitable manner, measures should be introduced to grant decent increases in minimum wages and pensions, increases for low income families in order that they can survive inflation and not be the victims of it. If the government did this, it would draw support from all quarters of the House. It would gain the support, and even in some quarters, the approbation of the Canadian population.

They have time to mend their ways—when I say "their" I mean both the Liberals and the Tories, because there is no fundamental difference between them. Well, there is a difference. The difference is that one is in and the other is out, and they spend their time trying to change places. But there is no fundamental difference when it comes to policy.

I get tired of protestations that there is some fundamental difference between Tories and Liberals because I find they both support the same philosophies, the same institutions which have got us into our present difficulties. When speaking in Western Canada, as well as elsewhere, I lose no opportunity to illustrate with words from their own mouths how the Liberals and the Tories stand with regard to various institutions, ideals, and philosophies, showing that there is no fundamental difference between them.

I am sad that the official opposition did not see fit to support our amendment the other night. However, I am not surprised. I expected it and they did not disappoint me. One can observe this pattern of behaviour over the past 110 years, and I predict that the people of Canada will see it over the next 110 years if those parties are around that long. Liberal behaviour will differ very little from that of the Tories.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me, and for the riding of Comox-Alberni, to have this opportunity of participating in this debate. Needless to say, the importance of the document we are discussing lies in the effect government policy will have on Canada and in particular on my riding, which is the playground of British Columbia.

I note the government's intent to obtain a better balance between money spent on public services and bilingualism and money spent to enable young people to learn to communicate in both languages. I trust this will be regarded by Canadians as an option, not as coercion, to strengthen the bonds of Canadian unity.

I congratulate the government on making funds available for young people to travel throughout Canada so as to understand better the various regions which make up our nation, because there is no more diverse country in the world than Canada, from the Pacific to the Atlantic, from Baffin Island in the Arctic to the 49th parallel. Canada is composed of a variety of regions. Perhaps the wonder is that in the 110 years since Confederation these regions have managed to stay together. I am sure this parliament would not want to be the parliament which witnessed the break-up of this unity.

Surely it is in the interests of Canada to strive for racial and for language harmony, knowing full well the consequences of intolerance and failure. I strongly fear that if intolerance becomes the accepted philosophy of the Canadian people, other minority groups such as the Chinese, the people of the Jewish religion, or East Indians, could become the targets of tomorrow. To my colleagues in Western Canada and in all parties in this House I appeal for leadership to preserve one Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific. There must be bonds of understanding. Surely this needs to be our goal.

I have a great fear when I receive letters from my riding such as the following:

> The time for liberation of western Canada will come. The federal political parties will only hasten the process by denying us honest representation. The flag of Canada has become the representation of a curse that hovers over western Canada. I personally reject it and now await another flag and government that will show us the path of honest representation and dignity.
> Yours truly,
>
> Freedom and dignity for > Western Canada

Mr. Benjamin: Is that letter signed?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, the letter is signed.

Mr. Benjamin: Might we have the name? The writer deserves to have it made public.

Mr. Anderson: The hon. member who spoke before me made reference to the DREE situation in British Columbia. I should like to point out to him that the province of British Columbia has designated certain parts of the province to come under the DREE program. As the member of parliament for Comox-Alberni I must say I would welcome DREE funds into my riding even though, in all honesty, I have to tell the House that Port Alberni, for example, enjoys the third or fourth highest per capita income in all of Canada. However, there are parts of the riding which could use these funds, areas where the natural resources in the way of lumber, minerals and so on, are limited.

It is not people like myself who designate where the DREE money is to go. It is British Columbia in agreement with the federal government, and the federal government has undertaken to go into North Vancouver Island by arrangement with the province. This was not forthcoming under the previous provincial government but we are hoping that under the new government, elected in December, 1975, some recognition will be given to the difficulties of the northern part of Vancouver Island.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I was going to mention a third point that the hon. member from the Kootenays did not mention in regard to DREE funding in the province of British Columbia. One problem is that in setting up new industries in British Columbia we find our labour rates are such that they tend to make these companies non-competitive not only in Canadian markets but also in world markets. If we are properly to utilize DREE money within the province, I think we should utilize it in a more progressive manner by funding small communities where, due to their size, there is not the capacity for putting in water or sewage treatment plants. DREE money could be used within the province in this way, not perhaps in the industrial sense but in the community sense.

I should like to refer to two examples of where this money may be used, namely, in the Tofino-Ucluelet area of Vancouver Island. These two communities are adjacent to Pacific Rim National Park. As the result of the establishment of Pacific Rim National Park the two communities of Tofino and Ucluelet have the very onerous responsibility placed upon them, not of their own choice, of providing sewage and water facilities for over 300,000 tourists per year who visit the Tofino-Ucluelet area and nearby Pacific Rim National Park.

So far as the Speech from the Throne is concerned, I applaud the government's initiative in attempting to improve labour-management relations as an essential pre-condition to economic stability. As a member of parliament from British Columbia it has become more and more apparent that better mechanisms for settling disputes are required. It is in the interests of both labour and management to settle disputes not in an adversary manner but in a spirit of co-operation.

It is a very sad fact—I trust the official opposition are aware of this—that in 1975 Canada had the worst record for lost productivity due to strikes of any western industrialized nation. In 1974 Italy had a worse record than Canada; however, we now have the most dubious distinction of having a worse record than Italy.

Greater participation by workers in decision making, a collective bargaining information centre, a national institution to improve the quality of life in the work place, are a small beginning. From a personal point of view I believe that profit sharing by employees is an invaluable tool to demonstrate that a company making a profit is in the best interests of the employee.

I should like to comment on the word "profit" for a minute because I know that in some parts of the House that word is a very dirty and misleading one. I submit that without profit there is not the money to generate new plants or provide for modernization of equipment. I would hope that responsible members of the House would not direct attacks on companies which generate profits because without those profits there will not be jobs for our children and the children who follow.

The government is aware of the need for careful conservation of vital energy resources to protect the public interest. New sources of energy, both renewable and non-renewable, must be explored, and further emphasis must be placed on research and development. Canada is richly blessed in coal resources. We are aware that during World War II the Third Reich perfected the extraction of petroleum products from coal. To my knowledge we have ignored massive research funds to utilize our coal resources in Canada. I believe it is the responsibility of the Government of Canada and of the provincial governments, as well as of industry, to direct their expertise in this direction.

We are self-sufficient in coal. We know the vast potential of the resource. Now is the time to ensure that the full potential of this resource is utilized for the benefit of all Canadians. As time goes on perhaps we should consider not only building a pipeline from the McKenzie Delta but also a pipeline for the movement of coal from one part of Canada to another. I consider that basically we have not utilized, or put sufficient money into research in respect of these resources. Canada is one of the richest countries in the world in respect of coal resources. I hope the minister will take cognizance of this fact. I trust that as we review the estimates of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce additional funds will be made available for the study of our coal resources and their potential use for Canada.

I approve also of the government's decision to conserve the food resources of the sea with a proclamation on January 1 regarding Canadian jurisdiction over waters within 200 miles of our coastline. This is the first step to aquaculture, the farming of the resources of the sea. We know that the ocean is the last frontier for future protein. We know that arable land is reaching the point of maximum utilization. We know that world population will double in the next 50 years. We also must know that management of the sea resources must be achieved if we are to exist.

With the 200-mile limit Canada is taking the first step to manage the resources of the sea. Responsibility for this vast new area also causes obligations. The Government of Canada must immediately state its priorities for search and rescue. Too long have we divided this responsibility among various government departments, with the result that no clear authority rests with a single administration. Ships capable of patrolling large areas of the ocean for extended periods of time must be constructed immediately. These ships must have helicopter capability. A coast guard academy should be established on the west coast to train sailors for west coast conditions. The Canadian coast guard, through the Department of National Defence, or independently, should be charged with enforcing, control of smuggling, excise, search and rescue, as well as water surveillance of our 200-mile economic zone. Failure to do this will doom any advantages in obtaining the 200-mile limit.

The Department of Fisheries must, in addition to salmon enhancement, be prepared to increase substantially its research programs in ocean biology. Sovereignty must be accompanied by utilization of the living resources of the Canadian coastline. We are not in a position to do this on January 1. Utilization of stocks not used at the present time must occur in the future. New markets must be sought and processing must take place in Canada. These are some responsibilities facing the Government of Canada.

During the first session of this parliament two bills reached committee stage and were due for third reading, Bill C-61, the Maritime Code Act, and Bill C-83, the peace and security legislation. I trust the two ministers involved will re-introduce their legislation as soon as possible. Bill C-61 makes the first tentative step to assert Canadian sovereignty over marine activity on Canada's coasts. Canadian coastal shipping must be encouraged if we are to develop a Canadian merchant marine.

Bill C-83, the peace and security legislation, has many important clauses to ensure added protection for the law-abiding Canadian citizen. The changes regarding habitual and dangerous offenders, earned remissions for prisoners, wiretapping, organized crime, and gun controls are all attempts to provide security for Canadian citizens. I believe Canadian citizens view with apprehension kidnapping, rape, hijackings, armed robberies, and all crimes of violence. Those who transgress the laws, especially in a violent manner, must do so with the knowledge that the law will be administered harshly.

An hon. Member: What about capital punishment?

Mr. Anderson: A deterrent is required, and where the deterrent is not successful, dangerous offenders must remain incarcerated until such time as no reasonable doubt remains as to their danger in inflicting future violence on society.

An hon. member across the aisle asked "What about capital punishment?" The hon. member is aware that I voted for the retention of capital punishment. I also supported Bill C-83 for the same reason, that is, that it contains deterrents. There are increased terms for those who use guns during the commission of a crime. I think it follows that one who believes there is a deterrent in capital punishment would also believe there are deterrents under Bill C-83.

One area of grave concern to me is not that we have too few safeguards to the law-abiding citizens but that the laws we have on the books are not being enforced. We in this House are aware that on October 14 many trade unionists ignored legal contracts and ignored provincial laws. Some members of the House, if not actively encouraging this action, expressed total and complete compliance with these illegal acts. Most Canadians are law abiding but I sense a feeling of frustration when certain groups in our society deliberately flout the laws of our country with impunity.

Are we not encouraging non-compliance with the law if we do nothing when illegal acts take place? If a pressure group has a grievance, real or otherwise, does the breaking of laws duly passed make them assume legality? Are we encouraging people to take the law into their own hands? If so, I believe we are doing the country a disfavour. Whether the law is federal or provincial I believe governments must ensure that those who take the law into their own hands must accept the responsibility for their actions. No; you cannot barricade public roads; you cannot condone illegal strikes, nor can you allow incarcerated prisoners to dictate to custodians how prisons will be managed. Dangerous precedents are being set if Canadians perceive that laws can be broken with impunity, without retribution.

● (2020)

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, there are many positive aspects of the Speech from the Throne. One which I have supported is an amendment to the Canada Pension Plan which would further recognize the value of the contribution made to the family and Canadian life in general, by both marriage partners, while one remains at home to raise children when the other works. Recent judicial decisions have emphasized the contribution the wife makes to the financial success of a marriage and I would trust priority would be given to changes in the Canada Pension Plan by this government. Why not?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacLean: —it is obvious that this occasion is non-partisan. Therefore in my remarks I will try to follow the trend that has been set.

My first words are to express my appreciation to colleagues in my party who have stood aside to give me the opportunity to speak on this occasion. I must tell you, Mr. Speaker, that it must be obvious to anyone that when our whip asks someone to step aside, that person has no other choice but to do so. Since I was given that privilege, I discovered by accident that it was 25 years ago, to the day, that I made my maiden speech in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacLean: It is a heartwarming coincidence for me that I made my first speech on October 18, 1951, having been first elected to this august Chamber on June 25 of that year, together with my desk mate, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacLean: I have seen many changes since then. The most immediate one, of course, is the change in the membership of the House of Commons. The only members who have been returned in successive elections since my deskmate and I were first elected in 1951 are ourselves and my former deskmate, the Right Hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacLean: There are others, of course, such as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) and, I think, maybe the leader of the Creditiste party, who perhaps have served longer terms in the House of Commons than I have, but not continuously.

I would like to speak now of other changes than those among my immediate circle of friends, and I speak to you all as friends because in this institution we make friendships that are life long, across party lines as well as within them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacLean: I want to speak now for a few moments of other changes I have seen, some of which I am happy with, and some of which make me less happy.

One of the changes that I have seen over the last 25 years is the rapid urbanization of our country. I realize that this urbanization is not necessarily due to the vital growth of urban centres but also represents, on the other side of the scale, a hemorrhage of the life's blood of the small towns in rural Canada.

I regret that our development as a country has been so uneven. Over the last 25 years there has been a lusty but sometimes malignant growth of our urban centres, especially of areas based on the rapid exploitation of non-renewable resources. It is obvious, of course, that a civilization, a culture, or an economy based on non-renewable resources is, by definition, non-renewable itself. I regret the prodigal squandering of our natural resources which should be the precious capital of a civilization as long as it lasts, for a continuing civilization and culture must be based on renewable resources to be renewable themselves.

Of course I am probably biased in this matter because by birth and a long life of experience I am a country man, vividly aware of the fact that we as humans are part of the web of life and that, if we forget that fact, we forget it at our peril.

I believe that this uneven development of our country is not entirely unavoidable or inevitable. Much of it has been caused by bias, often unconscious bias, in the whole apparatus of government at every level, based on the false premise that was instilled perhaps 40 or 50 years ago but which is no longer valid, namely, that the good life can be obtained only in an urban setting. Experience has proved the opposite to be true.

● (2030)

There was a time some decades ago when modern conveniences, modern communications and so on, were the prerogatives of the urban area, but that is no longer true. Technology has advanced to the point where those who live in rural Canada can enjoy all the modern conveniences, if they can afford them, that the urban dweller can, and have the joy and benefit and recreational facilities—and I mean recreational in the best sense of the word—and the experience, of living in the country. I believe that the highest and best quality of life is achievable more easily in rural Canada and in the small towns than it is in the large urban centres.

I do not think it is inevitable that modern technology forces us to the large urban conglomeration of society. This has come about, I think, because of a worship of giantism and an over selling of the benefits of large scale. In the process the human element has been lost, and I do not think it is good that that should be the case. I have from time to time been talking along this line over 25 years and, as far as I can tell, nobody has been listening, but as I said, I found by accident that I made my maiden speech in this Chamber exactly 25 years ago today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacLean: Perhaps I could be pardoned if I read a small quotation from it. As reported in Hansard of October 18, 1951, in the debate on the throne speech of that year I said on that occasion:

I maintain that if industry were brought to the outlying sections of our country the economy of the country would be improved, as would the social life in those areas. I would say too that children brought up in small towns and villages and in the country have an advantage over those brought up in the larger cities, who must live among the flashing lights and the ringing bells. The child of the modern city must feel something like a ball in a pin-ball machine. On the other hand a child living in the country either consciously or unconsciously comes to recognize that he is part of God's creation, a fact that stands him in good stead in later years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacLean: I recently made a speech along these lines in a different setting, and one of my friends congratulated me on the profound impression the book entitled "Small is Beautiful" had had on my thinking. The book is by E. F. Schumacher, and I had to confess to him that I not only never read the book but, up to that point, I had scarcely heard of it, and that I had been talking along these lines for 25 years. I suppose it is too much to expect or hope that Mr. Schumacher, the author of the book, had been reading some of my speeches.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacLean: However, I do not agree with the theory that over urbanization is inevitable or that the use in a prodigal way of non renewable resources to fuel that kind of industry is justified. I will do Mr. Schumacher the honour of quoting from his book in this connection:

First of all, and most obviously, there are the fossil fuels. No one, I am sure, will deny that we are treating them as income items although they are undeniably capital items. If we treated them as capital items, we should be concerned with conservation; we should do everything in our power to try and minimise their current rate of use; we might be saying, for instance, that the money obtained from the realisation of these assets—these irreplaceable assets—must be placed into a special fund to be devoted exclusively to the evolution of production methods and patterns of living which do not depend on fossil fuels at all or depend on them only to a very slight extent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacLean: In my humble opinion we have to develop a way of life ever conscious that we are ourselves part of the web of life and that we cannot escape that fact. I would like again to quote from Mr. Schumacher's book, "Small is Beautiful":

While many theoreticians—who may not be too closely in touch with real life—are still engaging in the idolatory of large size, with practical people in the actual world there is a tremendous longing and striving to profit, if at all possible, from the convenience, humanity, and manageability of smallness. This, also, is a tendency which anyone can easily observe for himself.

Today we suffer from the almost universal idolatory of giantism. It is therefore necessary to insist on the virtue of smallness. In my view small is beautiful.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacLean: I might digress here for a moment and deal with government experts. I have no objection to civil servants as individuals, but I think it is unrealistic for us as a country to take a person from perhaps the age of four, put him into a publicly supported kindergarten, put him through school and high school, which are funded publicly to a large extent, then through university and perhaps to a PhD degree, with a large contribution for that education from the public taxpayer, and then immediately make him a civil servant to direct us and to tell us what is best for us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacLean: I would like to see the day when one of the requirements to be a civil servant will be to have lived in real society for at least five years. Under the circumstances as they apply to us now, I believe to our disadvantage, we as a legislative body have been overawed unjustly by the governmental expert who is supposed to know what is best for the Canadian people.

I take second place to no one, regardless of his education or his qualifications, who is set up by his own peers, as to who is best qualified to say what is best for the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (2040)

Mr. MacLean: We as commoners should be more ready to assert our superiority over the technical advice given us by people who are supposed to be more greatly qualified and therefore in a better position to say in what direction our nation should go. After all, we should not break faith with the people we represent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacLean: We suffer from an almost universal idolatry of giantism. It is therefore necessary to insist upon the virtues of smallness. In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote briefly once more from the book "Small is Beautiful" at page 63 as follows:

> Take the question of size of a city. While one cannot judge these things with precision, I think it is fairly safe to say that the upper limit of what is desirable for the size of a city is probably something of the order of half a million inhabitants. It is quite clear that above such a size nothing is added to the virtue of the city. In places like London, or Tokyo, or New York the millions do not add to the city's real value but merely create enormous problems and produce human degradation.

At page 66 it goes on to say:

> As an illustration, let me take the case of Peru. The capital city, Lima, situated on the Pacific coast, had a population of 175,000 in the early 1920s, just 50 years ago. Its population is now approaching three million. The once beautiful Spanish city is now infested by slums, surrounded by misery-belts that are crawling up the Andes. But this is not all. People are arriving from the rural areas at the rate of a thousand a day—and nobody knows what to do with them. The social or psychological structure of life in the hinterland has collapsed.

This is where I quarrel with governments; not only this government—this is completely non-partisan—but every government in recent years. Due to the advice they have been getting they have not given enough concern or interest to rural and smalltown Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacLean: Any government that suggests such a thing of course has its suggestions turned aside by the argument that urbanization is inevitable and automatic; that we will have most of our population living in large urban centres in a very few years. They say it is true because of technology. Well, Mr. Speaker, we should not be slaves to technology—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacLean: On the other hand we should make technology our servant, give technology a human face.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacLean: I think it is false for us to assume that all the values of life can be measured in dollars and cents, or in economists' graphs. There are other things in life that are more important, that are equally important. The material side of life is only a prerequisite to enjoying life. I will quote again from page 70 of Mr. Schumacher's book as follows:

> The conventional wisdom of what is now taught as economics by-passes the poor, the very people for whom development is really needed. The economics of giantism and automation is a left-over of nineteenth century conditions and nineteenth century thinking and it is totally incapable of solving any of the real problems of today. An entirely new system of thought is needed, a system based on attention to people, not primarily attention to goods—the goods will look after themselves! It could be summed up in the phrase, "production by the masses, rather than mass production". What was impossible, however, in the nineteenth century, is possible now. And what was in fact—if not necessarily at least understandably—neglected in the nineteenth century in unbelievably urgent now. That is, the conscious utilization of our enormous technological and scentific potential for the fight against misery and human degradation—a fight in intimate contact with actual people, with individuals, families, small groups, rather than states and other anonymous abstractions. And this presupposes a political and organizational structure that can provide this intimacy.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that one of the greatest mistakes economists ever made is that they treated agriculture and our soil as just another economic value. It is more than that. Agriculture is more than an industry. Any nation that over urbanizes and neglects its soil, and has a large percentage of its people unconscious of the fact that they are part of the web of life, is in for trouble.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacLean: It may be a coincidence but the facts of history show that when civilizations became highly urbanized they collapsed. That may be coincidental but it is a provable fact that when civilizations neglected their soil and forgot they were part of the web of life, that humanity itself is part of the biosphere of this little planet, collapse was certain.

I should like to say it is a historic fact that when civilizations neglected their soil and treated it as if agriculture were merely an industry, without exception they collapsed and disappeared. Again quoting from Schumacher at page 95:

> Man, whether civilized or savage, is a child of nature—he is not the master of nature. He must conform his actions to certain natural laws if he is to maintain his dominance over his environment. When he tries to circumvent the laws of nature, he usually destroys the natural environment that sustains him. And when his environment deteriorates rapidly, his civilization declines.

The soil is a producer, directly or indirectly, of virtually all our renewable resources. Humanity depends upon that fact because we are part of the web of life. We should take a wider view of agriculture and not treat it as just another industry.

At page 105 of his book Mr. Schumacher writes:

> On a wider wiew, however, the land is seen as a priceless asset which it is man's task and happiness "to dress and to keep". We can say that man's management of the land must be primarily orientated toward three goals—health, beauty and permanence. The fourth goal—the only one accepted by the experts—productivity, will then be attained almost as a by-product. The crude materialist view sees agriculture as essentially directed toward food-production'.

● (2050)

> A wider view sees agriculture as having to fulfil at least three tasks:
> —to keep man in touch with living nature, of which he is and remains a highly vulnerable part;
> —to humanize and ennoble man's wider habitat; and
> —to bring forth the foodstuffs and other materials which are needed for a becoming life.

I am almost finished, Mr. Speaker. I cannot close without referring to my home province, Prince Edward Island. It was proud to be called a million acre farm. However, in the last few decades it has suffered as much as, if not more than, any other province from government policies which favoured giantism, industrialization, and the exploitation of non-renewable resources. Such policies were "in". Saskatchewan probably suffered as much as Prince Edward Island from such policies, until non-renewable resources like potash and oil were exploited in the province. Speaking as a Prince Edward Islander, I make no apology for the difficult times we have gone through as a province. I only regret that the resources supplied to my province by well meaning but ineffectual organizations such as DREE weve not administered in a way which will leave lasting benefits.

In Prince Edward Island our main resource is the soil; our second resource is the sea. We are in a highly favoured position since, in the long run, our resources are renewable. If we husband our resources wisely, if we are prepared to take the long view instead of acting according to expediency, we in Prince Edward Island will prosper as a living civilization, and areas which depend on non-renewable resources will look to us for help, rather than the other way around.

In closing may I say that, for me, the past 25 years are an experience I would not have missed for anything. On the other hand it is apparent that the sacrifice the member of parliament makes is not appreciated by the public at large. I do not know the reason for this. Perhaps it is the distorted image of this institution held up to the public of Canada by the media. Whatever the reason, the public ought to know that, generally speaking, members of any party make a great sacrifice when they agree to serve in this House. Usually they sacrifice the most productive periods of their lives in order to serve the best interests of Canadians, as they see them. But the public does not, generally, appreciate this.

I want to see the day when the public recognizes the sacrifice of those who stand for parliament. In every constituency several candidates present themselves for election to parliament. They are selected by our parties on the basis of character and standing. Our parties try to bring the best people forward. Out of three or four candidates only one is elected. If one were to be cynical, one could say that the elected one is the unlucky one. Usually he is in the most productive period of his life, which means he, or she, may sacrifice, for the sake of serving a few years, the opportunity for security. I include the families of members in my remarks, and I want to pay special tribute to the wives and families of members of parliament who accept, without reservation, the necessary sacrifices.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacLean: Such families become, in effect, one-parent families, because the father must serve in this Chamber perhaps ten months of the year.

An hon. Member: Or the mother.

Mr. MacLean: Or the mother, as the case may be.

Having said that, I plan to leave this place tomorrow, of course with many regrets. I remember the friendships I have made here over the years. I hope I shall have the opportunity to come back to visit my friends on the Hill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) and join with all members of the House in congratulating him on a graceful, thoughtful speech which exemplifies the man himself to all his friends and admirers in this Chamber and country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I have been a member of this House since 1962. During these past years I always found the hon. member kind and thoughtful, and most helpful to all members when they first present themselves in this House. Never can I recall his doing anything shabby, mean, or disappointing, so I join my colleagues in wishing him the best in every endeavour he may pursue—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): —except one.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): In the remaining moments I wish to outline what the government has in mind with respect to one of its major priorities as outlined in the Speech from the Throne. That is the very important area in our industrial relations system and how we hope to improve it.

● (2100)

I might indicate that what we have here is a 16 point program to improve our industrial relations system. Much of it is predicated on one underlying precondition, that is, that it involves discussion and co-operation between the government, labour and the business community. It involves implicitly the necessity for the acceptance of the labour movement as a legitimate body in this country for the purpose of consulting and for involvement in decision making in the country. It means not only should labour be accepted on an equal footing with the business community in Canada, but it is an absolute essential if we are to arrive at meaningful accommodations in terms of the realization of many of the points I am going to discuss.

As I indicated, all the proposals require the co-operation of labour and management. We intend to consult with labour and management and, in some cases, the provinces, in order to develop the necessary consensus which we will need. When these proposals are translated into legislation and programs, I hope with the full support and co-operation of labour and management, we will have gone a long way toward improving the climate and the performance of labour-management relations in Canada.

The government's proposals attack the problems on three fronts. First, we want to amend and improve the structure and process of labour-management relations. Second, we want to deal with substantive issues to improve the work environment. And third, we want to remove the contentious issues, to the greatest extent possible, from the bargaining table. I would like to deal with each of these areas in some detail.

Dealing with the structure and the process of labour-management relations, the first point of the 16 point program would be the constitution of a multipartite forum for consultation.

An essential step toward a more responsive and responsible industrial relations system is the development of a multi-partite forum for consultation and the exchange of information on the broad issues of social and economic concern. Such a forum would bring together representatives of government, labour, business, the farm community, consumers, possibly others. We do not favour a body with the wide-sweeping powers which has been advocated tentatively by the Canadian Labour Congress. The body proposed by the Congress would purport to manage all or major parts of the economy and would require a significant delegation of power by parliament, and this we are not prepared to do.

The multi-partite body we are proposing would provide decision-makers in the industrial relations field with the background information they need for making decisions that are in their own interest and in the public interest. Under the umbrella of such a national body we propose there would be a tripartite consultative body to deal specifically with labour-management relations.

It should be quite obvious, Mr. Speaker, that in pursuing the course the government is recommending to parliament we want the involvement and whole-hearted support of labour and management.

Second, we are proposing the establishment of a collective bargaining information centre. The need for such a centre was recognized by labour and by management at the first meeting of the Canada Labour Relations Council in July, 1975. Both parties recognized the need for a centre where they could turn for information on the economy and the various bargaining issues which was acceptable to both parties. Members on all sides of the House will agree, I am sure, that a collective bargaining data centre of this kind would go a long way toward removing some of the worst adversarial aspects of the collective bargaining system.

Considerable quantities of economic data are now available from various government and private sources. This is not the problem. The problem is that much of this information is unsuitable for collective bargaining. In our discussions at the Canada Labour Relations Council it was agreed there should be a single agency which would pull together these data and make them relevant and available to both parties. The government believes that the availability of such information, comprehensive and up-to-date, would improve the attitudes of the parties and would make them aware of what the economy can bear.

The kind of centre we have in mind would not duplicate existing data collection functions. It would act as a clearing house. It would encourage existing agencies to make their output more relevant and useful to the collective bargaining process. It would include information on rates of pay, employee earnings, conditions of employment, and fringe benefits. It would provide information on the state of the economy and the state of individual industries, including comparisons with other countries, particularly Canada's major partners. It would operate under the direction of a tripartite advisory board consisting of representatives of labour, management, and government. Its data would be available to the public.

Third, another change the government would like to encourage is to provide for greater worker participation at the plant level. To be quite frank about it, the umbrella organization, the national consultative council we are proposing, might not be seen as having much relevance to the worker on the shop floor. The consultative bodies would be more relevant to the senior labour leadership and to management. But there are important structural changes which could have immediate import for men and women workers at the production level.

We will work closely with Crown corporations to promote the introduction of worker participation at various levels of the enterprise. There are three such areas the government wants to pursue. One is an institute for occupational health and safety. The second is measures to improve opportunities for labour education. The third is worker education.

The fourth element is the constitution of an occupational health and safety institute. There can be no significant and lasting improvement in industrial relations as long as workers, in any place and in any industry, feel there is insufficient concern for their health and safety, or as long as health and safety hazards which can be identified are allowed to continue. The labour movement is concerned about this issue. Several of the provinces have introduced legislation and committed themselves to programs. We must move forward in co-operation with the provinces.

There is a demonstrated need for a national code; there is a need for the testing of potentially dangerous substances and conditions and industrial processes; and there is a need for a technical advisory service to workers, trade unions, employers, government and agencies, and the public. I anticipate full multipartite and provincial involvement in the development and operation of an occupational health and safety institute.

The fifth point deals with paid educational leave. In the field of education the government wants to explore the opportunities for individual workers and the opportunities for trade unions.

The opportunities for paid educational leave relate to the desire of workers to improve themselves in their jobs, or to develop their skills, or to prepare themselves for new careers. The concept is related to the need for worker sabbaticals so that they can regenerate themselves and prepare themselves for new opportunities in a flexible working life. Paid leave is now more or less a luxury which is afforded to some professional workers, notably teachers and doctors. The government believes that Canadian workers in all categories want to discover new career choices, and that Canada would be better off is we were to help make it possible. Therefore the government plans to undertake a fact-finding exercise which would discover present practice in Canada and other countries and attempt to assess the possible impact of educational leave on unemployment strategies and the relationship of educational leave to a flexible working life.

The sixth point deals with labour education. In the other area, labour education, the government recognizes the need for programs which would assist labour leaders and potential labour leaders to acquire a more comprehensive knowledge of the structure, goals, policies and responsibilities of the labour movement in the social and economic context of Canada. Canada is well-equipped with, and well-served by, university and private institutions for the development of managers and management skills. But we have paid only minor attention to the development of trade union leadership. There is a whole new generation of workers who have no knowledge of the contributions which have been made by the labour movement to the development of Canadian democracy, and who have no access to institutions which could help them develop collective bargaining skills. The government will be seeking the approval of the House for programs which will provide support to individual workers and to labour and educational organizations.

I would now like to deal with the second element of the government's proposals—improving the work environment. We are proposing many innovations in this area. I do not anticipate that I will have sufficient time today to give all the detail that hon. members will want, but there will be other opportunities during the debate and following.

I have already spoken of the need for a national code for occupational health and safety. The government is proposing a program to increase worker participation in determining the working conditions that affect the work environment. We propose that this could be achieved, in part, through the establishment and promotion of joint safety and health committees in the shop, under federal jurisdiction. The establishment of committees on a plant-by-plant basis would provide a means for sharing the responsibility for health and safety between labour and management. They would provide a recognized role for employees in the decision-making related to safety and health matters.

I think that hon. members will appreciate the potential for such committees. Besides their concern for health and safety, they would improve communications in the workplace, and given the co-operation and good will which I anticipate will be developed, they could be extended to other work processes and conditions.

Another area for improving the working environment is the area of basic minimum standards. A major irritant to good labour relations in any workplace is unjust dismissal. Organized labour has developed a code of practice in collective bargaining which provides for the protection of worker rights through a grievance procedure. The government proposes to extend to all employees in the federal jurisdiction the right of grievance against alleged unjust dismissal. This would not infringe on the right of dismissal for misconduct, incompetency or incapacity, and it would not impede lay-offs on a non-discriminatory basis when work is not available. The proposed procedure would include filing of a complaint and conciliation of the complaint by an officer of the Department of Labour or by arbitration where the departmental officer was unable to reach a satisfactory conclusion.

In addition to cases of dismissal without just cause, we would like to protect unorganized workers in other areas, including standards on hours of work, paid annual leave and wage protection. We are prepared to give consideration to proposals on flexible hours of work and we would like to move ahead with new proposals for wage protection, sick leave, bereavement leave, reporting pay and layoff and recall procedures. In order to update standards according to current needs and conditions, we will be asking the House to permit the improvement of standards through regulation, rather than submitting each proposal for amendment to the legislative process.

Closely related to the government's intention to improve the working environment through the upgrading of minimum standards is our proposal for developing a normative and voluntary code of good industrial relations practices. Such a code would provide employers and employees with a manual of good practices in all personnel-related issues. A move in this direction would help to reduce the divergence of views towards recurring labour-management issues. My department believes that the adoption of such a code in the United Kingdom was an important element in the acceptance of the social contract between government, labour and management in that country. Such a code could emerge out of the tripartite consultations which we want to resume in the very near future.

I have referred to paid education leave and support for labour education as initiatives for restructuring labour-management relations in this country. Paid education leave could also make a significant contribution to improving the working environment. This proposal originated in a convention of the International Labour Organization and it has the full backing of the Canadian Labour Congress.

The government has proposed the establishment of a national institution to improve the quality of life in the workplace. I will be perfectly candid and say that the concept of "quality of working life" is neither clear nor easily defined. But we do know that European experiments in industrial democracy and North American experiments in the humanization of work tend to show there is one factor which is common to all successful attempts to improve working conditions while maintaining and improving productivity. That common element is worker participation. What we are proposing to do is to study the full range of participatory mechanisms and promote their implementation in the private and public sectors, unionized or otherwise, in the federal and provincial jurisdictions.

We recognize some serious problem areas. Trade unions have been hesitant to participate in experiments in the reorganization work, particularly if the experiment poses a threat to collective bargaining. Management has been hesitant about any change that threatens its right to organize and assign work in the enterprise. These sources of disapproval have not been insurmountable elsewhere, and I anticipate a willingness on the part of both labour and management to join in a tripartite study of this whole question. The successful implementation of any proposals in this area will involve the federal and provincial governments, and the provinces will be willing partners. This is to be a national effort.

While I would not want to anticipate the direction which labour, management and the provinces would want to take, I think it is conceivable that we would want to start with the collection and distribution of data on experiments that have been conducted in Canada and elsewhere for the improvement of the quality of working life—we would include the monitoring of experiments in the field, we would include lectures, seminars and workshops on methods and problems, and we would establish technical and consulting services on the whole area of quality of working life. I would anticipate that the program would be administered by the Department of Labour, and the department would seek the advice of a multi partite committee including the provinces in determining priorities and co-ordinating programs.

Another of the substantive issues in the workplace is the pension and retirement issue. This has become a significant source of friction in labour-management relations. An interdepartmental task force is currently studying the relationship of private to public plans and the adequacy of coverage and benefits. The Department of Labour will be assessing the information that will be developed over the next three or four months.

I should like to move on now to the third major element of the proposals which has to do with the improvement of the collective bargaining process. The thirteenth point of the program in this area concerns the initiative toward broader-based bargaining. One of the first changes we wish to make is an improvement in this direction especially in some of the major federal services. I am thinking, by way of example, of the airline industry. A move in the direction of coalition bargaining would help avoid the kind of sequential shutdowns we have experienced in the past in this important public service. The Department of Labour has examined the collective bargaining process in this area and is now ready to initiate discussions with Treasury Board and the Public Service Staff Relations Board. We intend to propose that the parties concerned consider some form of voluntary coalition for bargaining purposes, but should this approach not succeed the government may wish to consider amendments to the legislation.

Many of our proposals are intended to diminish the adversary element in the collective bargaining process, but it is unrealistic to believe that the adversary element will disappear. It is an essential part of bargaining. What we want to continue doing, and do even better than in the past, is to provide for third party assistance in the resolution of labour-management disputes.

In conclusion I might mention our proposal for the improved training of conciliators and mediators. We are putting more resources into this area as a matter of urgency. It is considered also that the training available to conciliators and mediators ought to be improved and plans have been prepared accordingly. This would, of course, involve getting together with the provinces and making more resources available for the purpose. I might add that amendments to Part V of the Labour Code would provide a much better system for the resolution of many of the factors which cause delays in the processing of grievances. Those are some of the main elements and I would welcome any further discussion or information that my colleagues in the House might desire with regard to this particular program.

[Mr. Munro (Hamilton East).]

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, before I speak tonight I think I could render the House a service by bringing hon. members up to date on some very important events which took place today. First of all I will give hon. members the latest results in the Ottawa-Carleton by-election. With 300 of 422 polls heard from, the Conservative candidate has 21,685 votes, the Liberal candidate has 12,003, and the NDP candidate has 8,059 votes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: The communications are not quite so good from Newfoundland but it has come through officially that the Conservative candidate has been declared the winner.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: The NDP candidate has come second. I might say that that is the first time that an NDP candidate has made any showing in this area whatsoever. Third candidate by a long way is the Liberal candidate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I have just been given more recent results and I know hon. gentlemen opposite want to hear them. In Ottawa-Carleton with 322 polls heard from, the Conservative candidate now has 23,612 votes, the Liberal candidate has 12,979 and the NDP candidate 8,748. So we sing:

Happy birthday to you,
Happy birthday to you,
Happy birthday dear Pierre,
Happy birthday to you!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member would not want to complicate the job of the interpreters so I would hope that he would return to his text.

Mr. Hees: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I assure hon. members—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Minister of State is rising on a point of order.

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege. I was delighted to hear the "happy birthday" of the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward-Hastings, and since it is my birthday too I will take it as a great honour from him because there will be another woman in the House. We on this side will welcome her because we know that she is going to put a lot of fire under some of the old wood.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In view of the fact that the hon. member repeated the figures for Ottawa-Carleton, for the benefit of those who came in late would he not also repeat the figures for St. John's West?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I am so glad that I have been asked that question, because in Newfoundland the results are as follows—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for St. Denis is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I would not want to spoil the celebration of the hon. gentlemen opposite, but I hope that the hon. member will remember what one Mr. St. Laurent, a great Prime Minister, used to say, that he would rather win a general election than win a by-election.

Mr. Hees: Well, we just take it election by election. First of all we win the by-elections and then we win the general election. As my colleagues around me point out, it is obviously a great night for the nobodies. The latest results from Newfoundland are as follows: Crosbie, Conservative, 9,939; Mayo, NDP, 7,152; Innes, Liberal, 3,755.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having dealt with the really important matters this evening I will just speak very briefly on what led to these electoral disasters on the part of the government. At the end of the two day meeting of the Liberal members of parliament on September 8 and 9 the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was asked by the press what assessment he had made as to why the popularity of the government had sunk so low. He gave one reason and one reason only. He said it was simply because of the people's disenchantment with the anti-inflation program which he said, to use his own words, was "trampling on people's expectations".

In making such a reply the Prime Minister either had not listened to his members of parliament or, if he had, he had paid no attention to what they said, because the Prime Minister heard from his constituents, Liberal members heard from theirs, and we heard from ours exactly the same story, and that was that the people are becoming increasingly disenchanted with this government for two main reasons. By far the most important of these reasons is the Prime Minister's increasing habit of disregarding the wishes of the people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: He has had every way of learning what these wishes were because they were told him by his own members, by members of the opposition, and by opinion polls. Instead of listening to the wishes of the people he has initiated policies that are largely his own views. This growing elitism and paternalism on the part of the Prime Minister has infuriated a steadily growing number of Canadians, as expressed very clearly in the results of the two by-elections that have been held today.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have been informed that there might be a disposition not to see the clock because of the fact that there is only one vote tonight. This can only be done by unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent not to see the clock and to proceed with the vote at 9:45?

[Translation]

Does the House agree to vote at 9:45 instead of 9:30?

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, I am not in the habit of casting objections but, given the circumstances, I think I shall do so since my hon. colleague does not seem very much interested in the Speech from the Throne. Instead of speaking to the motion, he finds nothing better than reporting election results.

• (2130)

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order may I say that the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) was really only clearing his throat as he approached the substance of his speech. I hope you would put the question again because there was a consultation with the Government whip, with the House Leader for the New Democratic Party, and with the House Leader of the Social Credit Party for the purpose of permitting this debate to continue for the reasons given by Mr. Speaker. I think that despite the results of the elections, which were not decided in this House except indirectly, it would be a matter of common courtesy on the point of order raised by my friend to allow this matter to go ahead.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should just like to confirm that there were these consultations. I think it is a matter of courtesy that we should agree to let the member continue his speech.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, it is true that consultations have been held to allow the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) to go on with his very interesting speech. Therefore, we would like to continue until 9:45.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must abide by the Standing Orders of the House. Standing Order 38(4) says that on the fourth day the vote is to be called at 9.30. I really am in the hands of the House. I am ready to co-operate. I have invited unanimous consent.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Invite it again, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will put the question again and ask the members if there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent that I not see the clock and call the vote at 9.45? There does not seem to be unanimous consent.

Order, please. It being 9.30 p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to section (4) of Standing Order 38, to forthwith put the question necessary to dispose of the amendment now before the House. The question is on the amendment of Mr. Clark. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will pleased say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Clark), which was negatived on the following division:

OLYMPIAD FOR THE DISABLED

SUGGESTED SUPPORT FOR FUND RAISING ACTIVITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of a substantial deficit incurred by the organizing committee for the 1976 Olympiad for the physically disabled held earlier this year in Toronto, the Olympiad is embarking on a worldwide sale of precious metal commemorative medallions to honour Sir Ludwig Guttmann, the originator of organized sport for the disabled. In that funds generated will be used to offset the current deficit and to further the cause of organized sports for the disabled worldwide, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane):

That this House support and encourage the Olympiad for the disabled in their current fund raising program.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PROPOSAL FOR SETTLEMENT OF STRIKE OF CANADIAN PRESS EMPLOYEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move, under Standing Order 43, a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. Given the unanimous viewpoints being expressed from both sides of the House over the last few days, I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House urge the management of Canadian Press and the newspaper publishers of this country to accept the proposal of the Newspaper Guild so that this dispute can be terminated under equitable and just conditions.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43 such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED COMMITTEE STUDY OF HIGH INTEREST RATES AND PROFITS OF FINANCIAL COMPANIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that the current high interest rates are the main cause of price inflation in all areas, whether in the private or public sector, and also that Parliament should exert supreme authority in this country, something I have always held, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the House immediately entrust the Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs Committee with a special order of reference for the purpose of examining closely and in depth the disastrous consequences on our economy of the current high interest rates, as well as of the considerable profits made by banks and other financial institutions.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

REFERENCE TO RESULTS OF BY-ELECTION IN OTTAWA-CARLETON—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis):

PUBLIC WORKS

PROPOSED JUDICIAL INQUIRY INTO LEASE ARRANGEMENTS FOR TERRASSE DE LA CHAUDIÈRE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. On July 13, 1976 in Hansard at page 15286 the former minister of public works said that no agreement had been signed with the Campeau Corporation concerning Les Terrasses de la Chaudière project in Hull, Quebec.

In view of the fact that the Campeau Corporation under date of June 28, 1976 had an information circular in the hands of certain financial houses in Canada for the purpose of raising $148,500,000 and also the fact that only eight days after the minister's statement in this House the Department of Public Works had signed extensive documents of lease with the Campeau Corporation, and because the terms of the documents indicate a financing factor of approximately $50 million more than a reasonable estimate of cost for the area leased by the government, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens):

That all further progress on construction and financial arrangements cease until all matters pertaining to possible conflict of interest and the apparent excesses involved in the financial arrangements have been examined by a judicial inquiry.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. Such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROHIBITION AGAINST USE OF HOUSE FACILITIES BY NON-UNION MEMBERS OF CANADIAN PRESS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. Muir) and agreed to I understand by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro):

That this House agrees that no scab employees of Canadian Press be allowed to work in this House by using the press, diplomatic or any other gallery.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. Such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 could be presented to the House only with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

ALLEGED ERRONEOUS STATEMENT BY MINISTER CONCERNING UNITED STATES QUOTA ON BEEF—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of vital importance to members of this House as well as to Canadian beef producers arising from a statement by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) that the United States had agreed to allow a 90 million pound beef export quota for Canada, causing embarrassment to citizens on both sides of the border when it was found that the statement was not in accordance with the facts. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That the Minister of Agriculture make a statement in this House explaining why he used the 90 million pound figure and at the same time inform the House and beef producers what mechanism will be used to trigger the granting of import permits for Australian and New Zealand beef.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be presented to the House only with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Oral questions.

Mr. Muir: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I apologize to you and to my leader who will be the next Prime Minister of this country. With regard to the motion under Standing Order 43 moved by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville, I understood that there was agreement on the part of the Minister of Labour. I thought there was unanimous consent but someone tells me that some member of the Liberal party said no.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Muir: We have an identification. We know who said no.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before the hon. member goes further let me tell him that I heard "no" from both sides of the House with respect to the motion.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR TABLING ALL DOCUMENTS ON WHICH FUTURE ECONOMIC POLICY MAY BE BASED

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to ask which would normally be directed to the Prime Minister. He is not here, having found it prudent to leave the country. I should like to direct my question in his absence to the Minister of Finance. Now that we have received the document entitled "The Way Ahead" which is generally recognized as a document full of generalities—

Mr. Fairweather: And retreat.

Mr. Clark: —would the Minister of Finance be prepared to table in the House all of the documents which we assume have been prepared during the last six months by the group known as the DM-10 group, so that we can debate in this House all economic options facing this country on the basis of more than the platitudes included in the document entitled "The Way Ahead."

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, a great deal of preparatory work has been done on many aspects of public policy, as has always been the case, preceded by documents which have been submitted to cabinet. I do not know in this particular case why we should depart from the longstanding tradition under which cabinet documents and cabinet discussions themselves are accorded confidentiality. I think it is important in these particular discussions that hard alternatives should be discussed at the cabinet level, and for this purpose there should be a wide review of the questions which face the country and are before cabinet. The critical thing, which has always been so in our parliamentary system, is to what the government has committed itself. We have set out in the document "The Way Ahead" the analysis of circumstances which we think brought about the present situation in Canada, and an indication of the government's trends in the future. We would use this document for the purpose of discussions with Canadians generally and specific groups in particular, many of whom have asked us to put this kind of indication before parliament and the country.

REQUEST FOR REFERENCE OF DOCUMENT ENTITLED "THE WAY AHEAD" TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Many of us had been led to hope that there might be a movement away from that kind of secrecy because of the inclusion in the Speech from the Throne of the following words:

> . . . the Government will increase the number and range of internal documents available to the public.

We can assume that that is simply another empty promise in the Speech from the Throne.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, as far as we are concerned, that general document is simply an inadequate basis. I ask the minister, first, to reconsider his decision to hold closely information that should be available to the whole country—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With respect, perhaps the Leader of the Opposition might ask his supplementary question.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I ask the minister if he will not reconsider his decision to closely hold within the secret confines of the government documents prepared for the whole House and country. Second, I ask if he will please, in order that we may begin discussions in this House, the place which should be the proper focus of the discussions of the economic options facing this country, make an immediate reference to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs not only of the document of generalities entitled "The Way Ahead" but also of the other documents prepared by the DM-10 group in secret and so far kept from the people of Canada?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there have been no documents prepared for the people of Canada that have not been made public.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Indeed, the document "The Way Ahead" was prepared expressly for that purpose. If the hon. member is saying that cabinet documentation and cabinet proceedings should hereafter be made public—that is an interesting point. I take it that is a promise he would be making to Canadians if he ever became Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

● (1120)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): However, the parliamentary system and the system of cabinet government in Canada, as in the United Kingdom, has involved confidential discussions within cabinet. I think there are sound reasons for that which the hon. member might do well to study.

Mr. Fairweather: Your predecessor, John Turner.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I just point out to the hon. member for Fundy-Royal that in his proposals my predecessor specifically exempted this type of document from publication.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Although the man is in Japan, the spirit of evasion persists.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I ask the minister to answer my question. Will he give us an immediate reference to the appropriate standing committee of at least the document "The Way Ahead"? That is my first question. My second question is this. Will the minister seriously consider making available to the standing committee of parliament, to the representatives of the people here assembled, the documents that have been prepared for and by the group DM-10 so that the decisions as to the economic future of Canada will be taken by the whole Parliament of Canada, the people of Canada, and not by some secret little group which advises the minister?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would be quite happy to have a reference of "The Way Ahead" to the standing committee. I am sure that my colleague, the President of the Privy Council, will be pleased to oblige in this regard. With regard to the question of documents prepared for cabinet consideration, I think that I have stated the position very clearly to the hon. member. Under our system, changes in policy, including changes in law, are put before parliament and the country by the government from time to time. That is what we intend to do with regard to various changes in substantive law and changes in the economic policy. The hon. member should know, although he apparently does not, that no group of public servants by themselves has the authority to make any change in either the positive law or the policy of the government.

DATE OF TERMINATION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance. As we consider "The Way Ahead" document, and further to the minister's reply yesterday in which he hinted that the anti-inflation program may be extended beyond December 1978, although it was admitted that such extension would require parliamentary approval, and as such an extension would appear to be running contrary to the Prime Minister's undertaking in this House of last week that the program would not in any event go beyond 1978, will the minister once and for all remove this uncertainty by confirming to the House that he will propose an amendment to the Anti-Inflation Act which would have the effect of deleting from the Act any reference to its provisions being extended beyond 1978?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's statement that I hinted it would be extended is totally and completely false. The law is there. Termination is provided under the circumstances indicated in the law. There does not seem to be any necessity to bring in a change. The law will come to an end in accordance with its own terms.

Mr. Stevens: The Prime Minister made a clear statement at the Financial Post conference in Toronto, and I quote:

[Mr. Clark.]

The controls will expire before the end of 1978, and sooner if economic circumstances are favourable. They will not be extended. They will end.

In view of that statement, will the minister indicate why he declines to move an amendment to the present act to make it legislatively impossible, as far as Bill C-73 is concerned to extend the controls beyond 1978.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Because that is the current effect of the law, Mr. Speaker.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ALLEGED CHANGE IN REGULATIONS CONCERNING ELIGIBILITY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Will the minister explain to the House why the cabinet has recently decided to change unemployment insurance regulations in a way that will make it mandatory that unemployed Canadians will have to take LIP or related kinds of short-run employment as a condition for further UIC eligibility?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, that is not quite the way the system works. That is a slight bit of misinformation being given by the hon. member.

Mr. Broadbent: I would welcome a correction, then, as I am sure would others. I might say I have my information on reasonably good authority, the words of the minister himself. Now, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Would the hon. gentleman explain why, if men and women are to be compelled to take such short-run jobs, as I understand is the intention of the government, the government has decided that any earnings which come from such employment shall not be included in determining the level of future earnings for which the individual concerned would be eligible in terms of the scheme? I should like the minister to give a clear answer, because what seems to be involved here is a fundamental and serious change to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Cullen: Again, the leader of the New Democratic Party is wrong about the compulsion aspect, and because the premise is wrong I do not see there is any need to answer the latter part of the question.

Mr. Broadbent: Will the minister offer an assurance, then, that the government does not intend to change the Unemployment Insurance Act or regulations in such a way as to oblige Canadians, in order to be eligible for UIC benefits, to take employment under LIP, or related employment, without all the earnings they get from such employment being used to determine future levels of benefit?

Mr. Cullen: Rather than get into a debate on a bill which has yet to be tabled in the House, I think we had better wait until that point before I give the hon. gentleman the answers he is seeking.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN PRICE OF PORK TO AID PRODUCERS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Is he aware that pork is currently sold at 53 cents a pound in Toronto while production costs reach between 57 and 59 cents a pound? Then can the minister tell the House whether he will do something to improve the situation and help producers stay in business?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): It is true this price has become depressed, just in recent days, and we are very aware of it. We also know, as do the pork producers concerned, that price stabilization arrangements apply to that product and, if necessary, they will be used. By law we would be obliged to use them.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Is the minister aware that it may take five or six months to implement this price stabilization policy? Since it is the first time pork prices have been decreasing in the last three years, does the minister believe that this price stabilization policy will have concrete results the moment prices start declining?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: No, Mr. Speaker, because by law it has to be announced at the year end. An announcement might be made earlier, if desired—it could be done on a quarterly or six-months basis—but there has been no demand from producers, no representation that we should take immediate action. In any case, I think it would be highly unlikely we would be able to do anything before the end of the year.

PUBLIC WORKS

LES TERRASSES DE LA CHAUDIÈRE PROJECT—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT ON LEASE ARRANGEMENT

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. Has the hon. gentleman received the report requested of his officials regarding the terms and circumstances surrounding the lease-purchase agreement with the Campeau Corporation in connection with the Les Terrasses de la Chaudière project and, if so, will he table that report?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works): I have not yet received a report. I shall be meeting with my officials on the question this afternoon and we shall have a report at that time.

● (1130)

Mr. Huntington: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister whether he has made a request of the builder-lessor of Les Terrasses de la Chaudière project to cease financing and construction plans until the minister has had a chance to gain a clear understanding of the "unusual arrangement" surrounding this deal and satisfy himself that it is indeed in the best interests of the government and the taxpayers of this country?

Mr. Buchanan: No, Mr. Speaker, I have not. I have asked, as I indicated to the hon. member prior to the sitting of the House, for significant details of this, but it is my understanding that we are in a position where we are into a confirmed and binding contract. However, these are matters that I intend to pursue with my officials.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

DATE OF APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Is the minister prepared to announce the appointment of a new chairman of the National Capital Commission to fill the position that has been vacant since July 1 of this year?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not yet prepared to make that announcement.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INCARCERATION OF SHARON BETHUNE IN MEXICO—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is the one I asked him yesterday regarding Miss Bethune who is in a Mexican jail. I understand the minister has an answer for me.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The young lady in question, Miss Bethune, is going to be released either today or tomorrow. She will be turned over to the Mexican immigration authorities and is expected back in Canada within a few days.

Oral Questions

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

PROPOSED CHANGES IN TRIAL PROCEDURES—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice a question in light of his answer given on October 14, which seemed somewhat ambiguous. The minister said at that time:

—I am not in a position to say at this time whether any bill will be introduced—

As a result of that answer I asked him about the abolition of the jury system and preliminary hearings, and he assured me that there would be no abolition. What bill does the minister contemplate if he is not going to interfere with the jury system and preliminary hearings or with the right of an accused person to remain silent?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): A bill dealing with matters upon which the Law Reform Commission of Canada has reported, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand why the Minister of Justice is laughing because I regard this as a very serious matter. As I take the minister's answer, he said he was going to introduce some legislation to expedite trials in this country. What kind of legislation is he talking about, or is he playing ducks and drakes with the Canadian people and intends to interfere with the jury system and preliminary hearings? Let him come clean.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, at my request the chairman of the Law Reform Commission last winter put together a task force of people to examine the whole law relating to pre-trial delays and pre-trial procedures. Those proposals were discussed tentatively with my provincial counterparts, the attorneys general, and by our respective officials. No conclusions have been arrived at as to what, if any, federal legislation would be helpful or useful in dealing with the question of pre-trial delays and pre-trial procedures. Therefore I have not, of course, made any recommendation to my colleagues. I am not in a position to indicate when I will be in a position to make any recommendations; therefore I am not able to assure the hon. member when or if a bill will be introduced.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

PROPOSED CHANGES IN ACCOUNTING METHODS AND FORM OF PRESENTING ESTIMATES—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board. Given the fact that the state of the government's management and controls systems is significantly below acceptable standards of quality and effectiveness and the fact that the Auditor General, in testimony before the public accounts committee, revealed that unless the systems are corrected the day may very well come when a clear certificate of the accounts of Canada cannot be given, may I ask the President of the Treasury Board when he will be in a position to present to parliament an up to date progress report on the implementation of the recommendations of the Auditor General, as was agreed to in committee, in order that we might restore some confidence in the government's ability to manage and control the financial affairs of this country?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, there has been some discussion of this matter between myself and the Auditor General and I consider it to have been very helpful and constructive. As to the precise date when I will be able to do what the hon. member suggests, I can only say that it will be at the first possible opportunity. I want a little more time to digest some of the details, although I am aware of the need to move on this. Indeed, some action has been taken already with the appointment and establishment of a deputy secretary within the Treasury Board secretariat with the precise responsibility of monitoring and expanding financial controls and financial management, which is a step in the direction of the recommendation of the Auditor General. I share the hon. member's concern and I want to get at it as quickly as possible.

Mr. Mazankowski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Dealing specifically with the form and content of the estimates, might I ask the President of the Treasury Board whether the review has been completed, whether changes are contemplated and, if so, whether such changes will be incorporated in the estimates of the next fiscal year. Might I also ask the President of the Treasury Board whether he will be asking members of parliament for their suggestions and input regarding the form and content of the estimates. I ask this particularly because it is members of parliament who are charged with the task of scrutinizing and examining the estimates.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I am not certain about the possibility that we can change the form of the estimates in time for the tabling of the main estimates for 1977-78. I really want some more time to get into the details of this matter. Indeed, in one form or another I would very much welcome the suggestions of those members who have delved into this and are interested in and informed upon it. I will look forward to that kind of suggestion from them, although I cannot now give the exact form in which it should come.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON REQUEST OF NOVA SCOTIA FOR ASSISTANCE WITH COST OF ELECTRICITY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources with respect to the mysterious request for aid for electric power from the province of Nova Scotia, which has not been disclosed but which the minister says and has said for the last six months is being considered. I ask the minister, who is trying to fool whom? When may we expect a decision from the government as to how it is dealing with this mysterious request which has not been disclosed, particularly in light of the fact that the premier of Prince Edward Island has said that the minister has indicated that nothing is being favourably considered, and particularly in view of the fact that some important rate increase hearings are taking place in Nova Scotia which will be affected by any decision made by the government. When is the minister going to come clean in this?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I answered a very similar question from the hon. member's colleague, the member for Hillsborough, last week. I indicated that there was no change in the government's position; this matter is still under consideration.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. How does the minister expect us to take him seriously when I know that he does want to be taken seriously on this question? When is he going to give a decision with regard to this mysterious, unknown request? Would he also tell the House how he is getting along with his alternative proposal, which I judge to be his true position, that a study should be made of full integration and pooling arrangements. What is the minister's position there? Is he going to continue to fool around with the question, the same as he is fooling around with this other mysterious request, or can he report progress there?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I am very anxious to proceed as quickly as possible with a grid and power pooling study. I have received from the three provincial premiers letters which clearly, I think, can be said to be agreement in principle. However, the hon. member will realize that there are differences of view between some of the provinces, and it is those differences of view which at the present moment I am trying to reconcile so that we can come up with a particular term of reference for the study. I must say that the response I have received has been constructive and, indeed, I am optimistic that it may be possible to put together a term of reference in the very near future.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON PUBLICATION OF NAMES OF COMPANIES PARTICIPATING IN BOYCOTT OF ISRAEL

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the expression of support for the State of Israel by the Secretary of State for External Affairs during the recent visit of the Israeli foreign minister, is the government giving consideration to following the example of the United States Congress Department, which has published the names of U.S. corporations participating in the boycott of Israeli companies, by publishing the names of Canadian corporations which have complied with the requests or demands by Arab countries that any corporations doing business with Arab countries refuse to do business in or with the State of Israel?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will not necessarily be following the example of the United States Congress, and I do not think the hon. member would necessarily want to have us do that, but I will be making a statement with regard to the boycott, if not tomorrow then on Thursday.

AIRPORTS

REQUEST FOR IMPROVEMENT OF FACILITIES AT ÎLES-DE-LA-MADELEINE

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Transport.

In view of the importance the government and the minister in particular give with good reason to safety in air transportation, could the minister inform the House and the impatient community of the Magdalen Islands whether his department intends to take action further to my requests, representations and supplications, as well as those of the people from the Magdalen Islands, and authorize immediately the long required improvement of airport facilities at the Magdalen Islands in order to provide the population with a safe and adequate air service? May I remind the minister that the plane is the only transportation means to and from the Magdalen Islands during winter!

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that I have taken note of this and his previous representations with regard to the air needs of Îles-de-la-Madeleine. We are looking very closely at them and I hope to be able to give him and the people who live there a clear indication before too long of the plans for improvements to the facilities that we will foresee.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RHODESIA—PURPOSE OF PROPOSED TRANSITION FUND—SUGGESTED PARLIAMENTARY APPROVAL BEFORE PARTICIPATION IN FUND

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and is further to the minister's statement to the press in Washington last Friday. Will he inform the House if the proposed transition fund agreed to between himself and Dr. Kissinger is intended to help Rhodesia and her government improve her economic status, or is it to be used mainly for the purpose of helping white Rhodesians leave their country to settle in other countries including Canada?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to be able to answer the question. Before doing so I should emphasize, however, that there was no agreement with regard to this matter between Canada and the United States, for the simple reason that Secretary Kissinger indicated they were not ready as yet to indicate in detail what kind of proposal they were making. He made it clear that he would hope for Canadian participation in the fund.

As to the substance of the hon. member's question, as I understood it from Mr. Kissinger the objective of the fund is to stabilize or to help stabilize the economy of Rhodesia, and also to discourage a mass exodus, I think was the word I used at the press conference in this regard, of white Rhodesians following the establishment of a majority government in that country. In other words, the fund would be weighted, as it was explained to me, in favour of those who are going to remain in Rhodesia, or who are prepared to remain there and carry on their normal activities.

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, since there was no agreement, will the minister assure this House that before any specific commitment is made by Canada in this regard parliament will have an opportunity to debate the whole matter, preferably by way of a resolution introduced by the government in this House?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I do not know what is the appropriate technique, but I can certainly assure the hon. member that, in so far as I personally am concerned, I would be very glad to make available to the House, or to do it publicly, whatever proposals are put forward and to provide an opportunity to discuss them. I emphasize that this is premature at the moment because nothing has been transmitted between us other than the explanation the secretary gave me during my visit.

HOUSING

ALLEGATION CANADIAN DEVELOPERS MOVING OPERATIONS TO UNITED STATES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, of which I gave him notice last week, having to do with activity in the United States by Canadian housing developers. Is the minister aware of this exodus of Canadian housing equity investment capital and Canadian knowhow to the United States, and has he been able to determine the extent and amount of it?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the hon. member for his notice. Indeed, I have been aware of the situation for well over a year, almost two years, that is, that Canadian developers have been expanding their operations into the United States. I see nothing wrong with Canadian corporations becoming multinational corporations as long as that is not to the detriment of our Canadian industry. The housing starts and the activities of these same companies in Canada to date would indicate that it is not to the detriment of activity in the housing field here. Indeed, we are going at close to local records.

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Speaker, does the minister interpret the export of both Canadian equity money and Canadian knowhow and ingenuity, which normally would be invested and put to use in Canada building houses for Canadians, as a reflection of either a loss of market confidence in Canada or the result of the controls program? Could the minister be more specific as to why there has been this dramatic shift in the last several months of this housing activity from Canada to the United States?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is one of vital concern, I am sure, but obviously it deserves a much longer and more thorough answer than can be given during the question period.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF BANNING AEROSOL SPRAYS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State (Fisheries) and the Environment, to whom I extend my personal and sincere congratulations on the occasion of his additional Cabinet responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jarvis: It will come as no surprise to the Minister that my question arises out of the United States National Academy of Sciences' report regarding the imminent threat to our environment caused by the continued use of aerosol sprays containing fluorocarbons, and it is further prompted by their announcement last week of a phasing out of the use of these aerosol sprays that threaten our ozone layer. Will the minister advise whether he intends in concert, of course, with the provinces to ban aerosol sprays containing fluorocarbons and, if so, within what time frame will that ban or phase-out occur?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries) and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for his kind words, and I will be looking forward to his questions as the days pass. The subject he raises is one which can only be attacked in a global way since it is a global problem. He is right to tie it to co-operation between not only the provinces and the federal government but between nations. We have taken note of the recommendations of the United States Academy of Sciences. We have on the books, in the Environmental Contaminants Act, a provision which affords the possibility of acting very quickly. I am expecting a report from a committee which was set up sometime ago to look at this very question and which is to report within a matter of weeks. I hope to be in a better position to answer fully. I have also asked that the industry which is involved in this area be informed that we are looking at this problem with a view to replacing the use of fluorochloromethanes when the time comes.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, is the hon. gentleman aware that almost two years ago officials of his atomospheric environmental service were very anxious that action be taken at that time, and, in view of that, will he tell the House what discussions are scheduled with his counterparts in either the environmental protection agency of the United States or its food and drug administration officials? In this regard, will the minister now commit himself to saying that if we can act in concert with the United States we will do so without waiting to obtain an agreement with western European countries? Will he act at least in a North American context before he feels it is necessary to obtain a European agreement on the ban of aerosol sprays?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I would have to check the records as long ago as two years to see what was the recommendation of the officials of the department. Certainly we are in constant communication with United States authorities in this area and we know that we have to act in concert with them. I can certainly assure the hon. member that if the recommendations of the scientists to me are of such a nature that action on the North American continent is advised, then I would not hesitate to act. At the moment, we have in the law books the capacity to do it.

PATENTS

GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS WITH REGARD TO REVISION OF THE LAW

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Considering the representations which the minister has received from lawyers, businessmen and inventors from all over Canada relating to the negative effects which could result from the government's working paper on the patent law revision and the proposed law itself, is it still the intention of the minister to proceed with the law?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the paper was produced for the very purpose of gaining advice from the business community in particular, and I can assure the hon. member that we are not going to introduce a law which will be injurious to the country in this area. I can assure him that there will be no early introduction of such a bill in any event until we have had exhaustive discussions.

[Later:]

Mr. Grafftey: I have a supplementary question for the minister. I am fully aware that the minister has received from practically the same people the same representations that I and my committee have. I wish to ask him by way of a supplementary question whether, in view of the fact that it is the government's announced intention in the throne speech to encourage enterprise and individual initiative—I am sure the minister has heard that the proposed law could end invention and a positive patent law in this country—the minister will now shelve this law prepared by his predecessor and simply start a new one?

Mr. Abbott: No, Mr. Speaker. I must confess that I have not yet studied the matter as carefully as I am sure my hon. friend has. I am aware of the very wide number of representations, but until I have studied them and consulted my officials in this regard, I certainly do not intend to shelve the intentions of the department.

Mr. Broadbent: Don't be too candid over there.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

STANDARDS FOR RUST-PROOFING OF MOTOR VEHICLES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may be permitted to say that I re-read my answer to the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings yesterday and I must confess that I thought his criticism was accurate and that it was a rather fuzzy and waffling answer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Abbott: I thought of much more clever answers during the night, but I would simply like to say now that on reflection I agree that Canadian automobiles are subjected to heavy corrosive conditions. I think automobile companies are really failing to meet the proper standards in this regard. I intend to have early discussions with those companies.

TRANSPORT

RENT INCREASES FOR ACCOMMODATIONS FOR EMPLOYEES—APPROVAL OF ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the Minister of Transport conveyed the decision to raise rental rates for employees of his department living in accommodations rented by his department by as much as 300 per cent, can the minister indicate whether he has communicated with the Anti-Inflation Board to determine whether this is acceptable under their guidelines and, if not, whether he intends to do so before making a final decision on this change?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to look at any specific case that the hon. member has in mind. Generally, of course, where charges do not reflect full costs there is the possibility of raising those charges without contravening the guidelines. It is really a question of whether or not the taxpayer pays the difference. We have been examining some of these charges but I will be glad to look at the specific one to which the hon. member refers.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INVESTMENT IN UNITED STATES BY CANADIAN FIRMS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of a report by the Conference Board that Canadian firms led all foreign investors in the United States in the third quarter and in view of the fact that it was not just a day of protest by those firms but a year long investment strike in the country, I should like to ask the minister what action he will take to stop the strike of Canadian investment in Canada by Canadian firms.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, indeed that is a very serious problem. We are now in the process of studying the situation. The fact that productivity has decreased in Canada and that in some sectors salaries have increased more quickly than in the United States obviously alters our competitive position in that field. I trust, therefore, that Canadians will realize that by demanding too much of the Canadian economy, that type of problem can be perpetuated.

[English]

Mr. Nystrom: I should like to ask the minister whether or not he will be in direct communication with the striking firms and, if so, what will he be saying to them individually and what action will he be taking with them?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I can give no specific answer to the hon. member at this time.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR INCREASED FUNDS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board who, because of his experience, will surely appreciate its validity.

Because of the great number of able-bodied persons now unemployed, because LIP is intended to create jobs to reduce unemployment and because several MPs of my area—including the Liberal member for Lévis who said so in his speech on October 15—find that the moneys earmarked for LIP projects are quite insufficient, may I ask the President of the Treasury Board whether he is willing to recommend to his cabinet colleagues that additional credits be allotted the Department of Manpower so that more LIP projects can be implemented without delay?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I believe my colleague, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, will be elaborating on certain measures in the course of the debate in the Speech from the Throne, and I surmise that the hon. member will be quite satisfied with the information that my colleague will be conveying.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

REFUSAL OF DEPARTMENT TO RELEASE COPIES OF STUDIES TO MEMBER—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Science and Technology. First, I would like to congratulate him on his appointment and wish him well in his performance of his various duties.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kempling: The former minister instructed the deputy minister of the Department of Science and Technology to release to me upon my request studies that had been done on a variety of subjects. This was conveyed to me by the deputy minister and confirmed by the former minister. When I requested to see a series of studies that had been completed, I was told they could not be released without the permission of the person who had prepared them and that permission was not forthcoming. Will the minister review this matter and tell me whether or not a veil of secrecy extends over his department and whether his numerous staff members have veto power over a clear directive by the minister?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his good wishes. I will certainly review the matter he mentioned. I would have no difficulty in living up to an undertaking by my predecessor but I would like to look into it.

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION GOVERNING EXPLORATION FOR OIL ON GOVERNMENT PROPERTY

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Can the minister tell us whether or not the government intends to introduce legislation in this session to bring into effect the regulations governing exploration and development of oil on federal property?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, yes, and that was set forth in the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. Gillies: I raised this question, Mr. Speaker, because it was not quite clear in the Speech from the Throne whether or not the government intended to do it in this session. Are the rumours correct that major changes are being proposed in these regulations before they come forth at the next session?

Mr. Gillespie: I do not know where the hon. member is getting his information. I have stated the position of the government in the past. My colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and I made public the principles governing the new legislation and the legislation is now being drafted. It will be placed before the House in due course. Of course, all the parties will have an opportunity to put forward any proposals they may wish.

AIR CANADA

DATE OF APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN AND REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORT TO COMMITTEE—POSSIBILITY OF AMENDMENTS TO ACT

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question, and first and second supplementaries are to the Minister of Transport relating to Air Canada. I wonder if the minister could inform the House as to when it is anticipated there will be an appointment of a permanent chairman of Air Canada.

In view of the promises of the minister, could he tell us if it is anticipated that we will have amendments to the Air Canada Act this session?

Finally, in view of the fact that there has not been a reference of the annual report of Air Canada to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications since 1973, will the minister give a firm undertaking that this will be done in the very near future?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the question of the chairmanship may be decided in the very near future, although I must say that the acting chairman, Mr. Pierre Taschereau, has been doing a superb job in his role with Air Canada.

I am hopeful that the legislation which is now in a determined form can come forward, but that may depend upon the discussions the House leaders will have about how fast it can be brought forward. That might be a suitable time and vehicle with which to broaden discussion and include the annual report, but if that does not happen conveniently, I am prepared to discuss with hon. members on both sides of this House how we can best get the questions relating to Air Canada before a House committee.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

RESIGNATION OF MEMBER FOR MALPEQUE

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I want to take advantage of this occasion to make a brief statement. It is a matter of personal privilege for me to say that I am resigning my seat in this House effective midnight tonight in order to contest a seat in the legislature in my home province of Prince Edward Island, where I have been chosen provincial leader of the Progressive Conservative Party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacLean: While I consider my new responsibilities a great challenge, it is naturally not without regrets that I leave this chamber after 25 years' service. I will especially miss the honour of representing the people of the constituency of Malpeque, some of whom were also members of my former constituency of Queen's. They have done me the honour of electing me ten consecutive times to this chamber, thus making me their representative in one third of the parliaments elected since Confederation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacLean: I would like to record my deep appreciation to you, Mr. Speaker, and to all the members and staff of this House for the many courtesies extended to me on so many occasions. I will miss the many friendships I have been fortunate to enjoy among you.

I will, of course, miss working in the parliamentary associations in which I have been active, and I will miss my work as chairman of the Standing Committee on Management and Members Services and the close association this entailed with the Commissioners of Internal Economy.

Whatever the future holds, I hope I may be able to retain at least most of the friendships I have enjoyed here. Let me wish you all continuing good health and satisfaction in your respective responsibilities to our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I feel it a considerable honour to have the opportunity to speak on the question of privilege which has been raised by the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean).

I am sure that each and every member of the House shares the regret I feel at his departure from the House of Commons after such a long and successful service. He was in the House of Commons when I entered in 1953. He had been elected in a by-election, I believe, in 1951, and when I entered, I regarded him as a well established veteran of the House.

Since that time he has added lustre to the chamber by his industry, his integrity and by the way in which he associated on a personal basis with members of the House in all parties. As a minister he performed exceedingly well, and following his departure from the ministry he has served as a member of the opposition, on committees and in the House of Commons in an extremely effective way. However, I believe all of us will remember Angus MacLean mostly for his personal qualities, his readiness to extend friendship and his high integrity.

He is leaving the House to take on new responsibilities, and judging from recent events he does not require good wishes from me in order to discharge those responsibilities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues in the House I would like to join with the government House leader in extending our very warmest personal wishes to the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean). As the government House leader has said, during his 25 years in the House the hon. member has distinguished himself as one of the truly exceptional gentlemen of this House, and that is said in the most positive sense. He is a man of honesty, integrity and personal commitment to the well-being of his constituents.

In expressing wishes for continuing good health and personal happiness to the hon. member in the most genuine fashion on behalf of my colleagues I, of course, want to make it abundantly clear that we do not extend these good wishes into the political domain. I am sure the hon. member understands that. We wish him well as he returns to his native island. We hope the political success he confronts there is not at all commensurate with the 100 per cent personal success we wish him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to join in with the two previous speakers, on behalf of the Social Credit Party of Canada, to congratulate the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) for the beautiful speech he made last night. In the person of the hon. member for Malpeque, Mr. J. Angus MacLean, the House of Commons loses an extraordinary man, an every day man of duty and also a man respected by all. I know he will surely fulfill other as honourable functions and that he will be as devoted as he was in the House of Commons. Our wishes of success and good health be with him.

[English]

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we in my party, of course, have particular cause to appreciate the steadiness, the judgment, the integrity and the very good humour and sense of comradeship of Angus MacLean, the member of this parliament for Malpeque. He came to the House of Commons after a distinguished career as a bomber pilot, a career which won him the DFC. After a remarkable history of escape during the war he has served in this House as a respected member of the ministry of my colleague and predecessor the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). He has impressed all of us who have had the privilege of knowing him with both his very warm human qualities and his capacity to offer solid, considered judgments and advice.

• (1210)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I know I speak for all of us who have had the privilege of serving in the leadership of my party when I say there are few members whose advice has been more helpful during the quarter century of service of Angus MacLean than the advice of the member of parliament for Malpeque.

While we in this House of Commons may differ in the degree of force with which we wish him well in future endeavours, that enthusiasm is unreserved in this party, and what might be seen now as a loss for the House of Commons of Canada is very much a gain for the province of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Speaker: I hope hon. members will permit me to just add a word if I may. Not much can be added to the wonderful tributes that have been paid so deservedly to the Hon. Angus MacLean. May I only say that the Management and Members Services Committee is a recent addition to the roster of standing committees of the House and the work of that committee provides a service which potentially benefits or should benefit all members of the House. It benefits the Speaker of the House directly in the difficult decisions of attempting to strike a proper balance between those services which members require to fulfil their obligations and those which they deserve in terms of the financial burden of the estimates of the House.

For that committee to reach its maximum potential it really required in its infancy a chairman who ought probably to have come from the opposition side or at least have been able to demonstrate a very objective point of view, one who could bring to that post many years of experience both in and out of cabinet as well as a reputation for objective judgment and the respect of all of his colleagues. At the same time, that person should enjoy a reputation for a sane and sensible hand on the throttle.

I think we have all been deeply fortunate that we found such a chairman in the Hon. Angus MacLean. I wish to express my appreciation and that, I know, of all members for this latter aspect of a career which has been a great donation to the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure all hon. members would also want to know that, although Room 16 is not quite large enough to accommodate everyone at lunch, I have invited a few of the hon. members' close colleagues, the members of that Management and Members Services Committee, as well as some of those who toiled with him in the Privy Council when he was there, to join us for lunch immediately. Unfortunately, I cannot invite everybody but I thought all hon. members would want to know we are not letting the occasion go unmarked.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

TABLING OF COPIES OF REFERENCES TO THE ADMINISTRATOR

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table copies of references from the Anti-Inflation Board to the Administrator under subsection 17(2) of the Anti-Inflation Act.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Monday, October 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Maurice Harquail for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, as one who has been a member of this House for many years I do not recall a previous occasion when there has been such an outpouring of praise, and deserved praise, as that to which we have just listened. Angus MacLean served in my cabinet with distinction. Above all, however, as I look back over the years I see him during those dark days of war establishing a record, an Odyssey of gallantry and courage, that will be read by this and future generations with appreciation for what he did and the honour he brought to their country. It is on occasions such as this that this House rises to its greatest heights, when in the cathedral of devotion and appreciation we let those who have served know that they have that "something" that one can earn in the House of Commons, that is, the appreciation of one's fellow members.

Having said that, sir, it would be natural that I should refer to the events of yesterday, and I do so not having to gild the lily in any way. By-elections, such as that which took place yesterday, reveal something that was dealt with by the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) during his very able and eloquent address; namely, that members of the Liberal Party do not have to conduct a post mortem as to the reasons for what happened. They do not have to say "Who killed Cock Robin?" All they have to do is look at the empty seat.

I am in a particularly kindly humour today, Mr. Speaker. I am going to quote Humpty Dumpty with slight changes. I am not going to say "All the king's horses and all the king's men cannot put Humpty Dumpty together again" because that might annoy the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—the reference to the monarchy—so I will not do that. I therefore substitute: "All the multitudinous public relations men, speech writers, staff workers and $3 million worth of servants around the prime ministerial throne will not be able to put the Prime Minister together again."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1220)

Mr. Diefenbaker: I recall a famous occasion when the cabinet met at Meach Lake, so that nothing would be revealed. I can tell the government that nothing is less secret than such a secret meeting. I learned that over the years. The various ministers—the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) and others—all said, "I am not to blame; I didn't do it; I am not responsible." They were of one mind but did not designate the one responsible. I submit that possibly the answer was given by the Prime Minister, on one of his peripatetic pilgrimages undertaken to restore his image and that of the government, when he said in New Brunswick, the situation is such that many Liberals are not as proud as they used to be to be Liberals. That's saying a lot—that is my observation. Finally, he pronounced as his considered opinion that a lot are running for cover; a lot are tired out, worn down, out of steam. You cannot improve on that, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now, Sir, I must say a word about the new cabinet, about additions to it and repairs to it. I must refer to one minister particularly—I am sorry he has left—the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen) who now is President of the Privy Council. Sir, he is a parliamentarian of distinction. Just when he was getting used to his job and beginning to understand the intricacies of foreign affairs, he was demoted. I can hear him say with Cardinal Woolsey: had I but served God as diligently as I served the king, he would not have given me over in my grey years. Let me say this about the minister: It was not because of him that Canada is regarded by many countries as a fellow-traveller country. He maintained the principles for which this nation stood in the past, and I regret that he has given up the job. I know his genial successor will do his very best. He has a tremendous capacity for absorbing information and, in addition, for letting parliament know.

I was interested in the questions asked earlier this morning concerning secrecy. Mr. Speaker, the government opposite has an all-time record for concealment and equivocation. Although there is incorporated in the Speech from the Throne one of those generalizations concerning the expectation of the possibility of a hope for a change, I see not that repentance which should be evidenced by the government following the Rudnicki case. At one time those high in the echelons of the public service were servants of the people. They used to sign their letters, "I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant." They do not do it any more. They do not tell the people that they want to be their everlasting masters. That attitude was revealed in the Rudnicki case. Somebody took a document and stamped it confidential. Why, if all the papers marked confidential by the present government were not to be seen by those outside the cabinet who have eyes to see, there would be a great reduction in the amount of paper work in this country.

I recall being bitterly condemned by those who were then in opposition for having produced a document which the Department of Trade and Commerce, under the St. Laurent administration, had hidden. It contained information showing how seriously the economic conditions of Canada were being undermined. I did not get the document from the department: a member of the press handed it to me. I was condemned in 1958 for the horrible conduct of revealing its contents. In 1976, we are concerned about the Rudnicki case. Mr. Speaker, the government does not intend to appeal the decision; it is afraid to appeal.

An hon. Member: It knows it would lose.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We have seen the end, I hope, of attempts by the government to cover up with a rubber stamp.

Sir, what can one say about the new members of the cabinet? I like some of them very much; I will not deal with them all. Have you ever seen such musical chairs? Around and round they go; where they stop only the Prime Minister knows. I know how difficult it is for the Prime Minister to choose; but he will not have that difficulty in Winnipeg. I had hoped the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) would stay in the chamber. He was here a moment ago. Sir, there will be no difficulty at all in finding a successor to the former minister of national defence. It will be the genial member for St. Boniface who belongs, on the prairies, to a species rapidly becoming extinct.

An hon. Member: Don't count on that, John.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to answer questions, particularly from those who are not dry behind the ears.

I am delighted the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand) was made a minister. I have thought of him as a friend during these years. He was given the small business portfolio. If he had been given the Indian Affairs portfolio I could well have understood it; but, strangely, he was given the small business portfolio, he not knowing anything about small business. His first trip, I am told, is to be to the U.S.S.R. If he follows what they have done to small business he will be without a portfolio before he gets back.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, it is wonderful to see the way the Liberal front benches disappear when I speak. I regard that as a tribute at all times.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

• (1230)

With regard to the hon. member for Skeena (Mrs. Campagnolo), I think I outdid the Prime Minister. About five weeks ago, as a parliamentary secretary, she spoke at Duck Lake on the one hundredth anniversary of the Indian Treaty. I predicted it would not be long before she would be a minister of the government. I am glad the Prime Minister took advantage of my recommendation, if he did. She is working under the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde). I would have dealt with him had he been here, but he is absent.

As far as fitness and amateur sport are concerned, it was a government that I had the honour to lead which brought in the first legislation—$5 million a year—to encourage amateur sport. When the Pearson government came in, it was not long before that was out.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was not going to go across the whole field, but I want to say one thing about the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Abbott). His father and I came into the House of Commons at the same time. I always looked forward with expectation to the son following in the footsteps of his father. If he does, there will be no secrecy in that department because that is one thing his father did not permit while he held several portfolios in the government of Mackenzie King.

Then, there is the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts). I have for him especially kind feelings. He has shown himself well in the House. Of the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais), all I have to say is that at the rate he is going, it will not be long before Mackasey will be in again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Solicitor General (Mr. Fox), a young man whom I am sure will devote himself well to the problems he has, certainly inherits a position that requires on his part a great deal of effort to bring about responsible leadership in that department.

Having generalized in that way, I come to parliament because I never cease to wonder at this place. We saw an example today in the recognition given to the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean). I am very pleased to learn that television is going to be introduced—they do not say when, but they say it will be—because I had the honour of bringing that about in 1957 insofar as the opening proceedings of parliament were concerned. It was criticized at the time, but it has been followed ever since. Television in the House of Commons will increase the quality as well as the quantity of members in this place.

There is something to which I particularly want to refer. I see the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I am going to speak of him. We are approaching the Queen's twenty-fifth anniversary. We are getting ready for it. I think of members in this House who have given tremendous service but have never sat in the Treasury benches. In the United Kingdom, those who have become parliamentarians in their own right are honoured from time by being made members of Her Majesty's Imperial Privy Council, as it used to be called. I think that should be followed on this, the anniversary of Her Majesty.

I would like to see the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) made a member of Her Majesty's Privy Council in Canada. He would have been if he had remained premier of the province. All the premiers received it, and he was premier for years. He is a parliamentarian who has always given of his best with distinction.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The leader of the Creditistes, the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette), has been in the House for years. Today, he is in hospital with a serious illness. I would like to see him honoured in this way because at the moment there is little or no hope of either a member of the NDP or the Creditistes being seated on the Treasury benches. I know the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is listening, even though he is pretending not to be—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think of the devotion he has given through the years to parliament. Sometimes he is difficult. Sometimes he leads us along a rather unusual course. He is a parliamentarian who has been here for a long while. He first came here in 1942. He had a little break in 1958, but he came back thereafter. That was his sabbatical of four years. I would like to see him honoured.

No doubt there are others in the House who deserve to be honoured likewise. In addition, in the United Kingdom when a person becomes leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, it is not long before the honour is given. It should not be long in the case of the hon. member who today leads the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: As far as the debate is concerned, I am not going to express appreciation to the mover and seconder. It is a course I have followed through the years. That was done by my leader and what he said in that regard is acceptable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Nothing could be more acceptable than appreciation. I have read the various speeches. I have not been able to be here. I need not say the reason. However, I endeavour at all times to be present, in particular when a speaker is making his or her maiden speech. I like to see young members come into the House. I was away on in years when I finally won. As long as parliament is able to mobilize outstanding young men and women in devotion to those things that will make Canada even greater, I will always honour constituencies that send them here. So much for preliminary remarks. I do not expect there will be much disagreement. The minister himself is in the House, and I may say he is a politician for whom I have much admiration.

• (1240)

What about the Speech from the Throne? Well, it was a presidential one. In the United States they call it a State of the Nation Address. Mr. Speaker, in every part of this nation today people are asking: Why doesn't parliament do something? Is parliament simply a place in which the Prime Minister utters grandiloquent expressions which die as soon as they effectuate the result for which he hopes? Take the phrase "the just society". Do you hear it any more? Or "the land is strong". It must have been!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: "Participatory democracy". With whom? "Co-operative federalism". Now, there's an expression.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Gone. All gone.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What does it amount to? "If you don't agree to my bringing the constitution to Canada, I threaten you I will bring it back unilaterally." That is what the Prime Minister said one day. And a few days later he said he didn't say it. But I heard him. Here is another. "The opportunity decade". That's a pretty good one. Well, he will have to do it in two years and that will be the shortest decade in all history.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister described his government as a "government of the middle". There is a mistake. One vowel is wrong. It should be "government of the muddle". I occupy an objective position today. I hold no position in my party and I am therefore able to weigh governments of today against those which preceded mine. I have never seen a government so accident prone. If they don't get one, they create one. No one can deny that this is an absent-minded government. The more I watch it in action the more I believe the Prime Minister meant what he said—one time—when, asked what politician or political writer had guided him the most, he uttered the immortal words: The one I particularly admire is Machiavelli. All I can tell you is that Machiavelli said in effect: Fool people, deceive them, and then, from time to time, give them little gifts; but pursue your course and do not object to untruths. That is what Machiavelli said almost 500 years ago. But it is surely not a proposition to be accepted today. I am not going to discuss financial matters.

I want to deal with the constitution and with the reference to bilingualism. It is a strange thing. With this country in a position such as I have never known it in before—divided, fearful—with those who supported the Liberal party through the years deeply concerned and not afraid, when they write, to sign their names; in a year when above all else, leadership should be here in the House of Commons, we see vacation piled on vacation. I know it is very nice to have vacations. I only had two short ones. But when the captain leaves the bridge, what happens to the ship? It is always enjoyable to travel on luxurious yachts away from Ottawa. I might say, however, this criticism does not apply to the Prime Minister presently being in Japan or on the way there. I think that is a proper course for him to follow. But it is not something new.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the right hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired. He may, however, continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was there. I was received most hospitably by the Prime Minister of Japan who became a close friend of mine and gave me his most valuable picture in the room where he had me sit with his cabinet. And the Emperor and Empress had Olive and me to lunch. I do not wish to digress but I always recall a story which indicates the sense of humour of the Empress. It had been reported that I was fond of hunting and the Emperor said to me through an interpretor: "We are going to take you hunting." I said: "What kind of guns do you use—what gauge?" He said: "We don't use guns, we use a net and as the ducks come in we pick them off along the canal." I said: "That looks all right to me. What kind of ducks?" "All kinds", said the Empress. "Mallards?" "Oh, yes." "Greenheads?" "No," said the Empress, "they are redheads; they originate in Siberia." Mr. Speaker, anyone with a sense of humour like that is worthy of being quoted.

I do not intend to deal with inflation except to say to the House that when I was prime minister we had the lowest rate of inflation in all the world—1.1 per cent. My authority for this is the former President Kennedy of the United States who was never one of my particular friends. One of the reasons was this. When it became known that a corporation was going to raise the price, for instance, of bread, the head of that corporation was communicated with and an explanation sought. Increased costs, and so on, he might say. Our reply was to this effect: All right, you go ahead. But as soon as you do there will be an investigation by the Combines Investigation Branch and if you are right you will be right, but if you are wrong proceedings will be taken. Believe me, they did not raise their prices very readily, though the action taken did not make me very popular in some quarters not too far from Ottawa.

● (1250)

What is the government's record on inflation? They can argue about it until the end of time, but I will simply quote from the record. After nearly a year of wage and price controls which were imposed to lower inflation, is the Canadian economy more competitive than its leading rivals in the world? Not according to the International Monetary Fund. A survey on world inflation was produced by economists at Citibank of New York. These economists suggest that Canada has not benefitted as much as most other nations from the break in inflation during the past year, and that its price performance is worse than in the years 1970-1975 while several other countries are doing better than they were. Such a report cannot be denied, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

I am not going to deal with agriculture except to say that the farmers of this country are aroused as never before. Ask the cattle farmers and the dairy farmers what they think. I am not one who believes in mobocracy; I would be the last to approve the treatment given the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) when he had a milk bath. Nevertheless, what happened gives him a position in history, that of being the only one since Cleopatra who has had a milk bath. She regularly had a bath but in goat's milk. And the analogy, Mr. Speaker, stops there.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I want to say a few words on the subject of the constitution. Every time the Prime Minister finds himself in difficulties—and they are overwhelming today—he suddenly conjures up some system or plan—and this is a case in point—of pseudo-philosophical abstractions or threats. The constitution is not his private property. Nor should it be the political plaything of the Liberal party. It belongs to all Canadians. It was made by Canadians for Canadians, was sent to the United Kingdom, and they approved it.

Today the myth is constantly propagated by the Liberal party that somehow or other Britain is hanging on to what was determined upon as the course by the great leaders who brought about confederation. I am not going to go into what I believe should be the amendment formula, but I do say that any amendment formula should place all provinces upon an equal footing, regardless of population.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I opposed the Victoria charter for one particular reason, among others, namely that the premiers of Saskatchewan and Manitoba had agreed that Manitoba and Saskatchewan would never have an opportunity to voice their opinions or the actual determinations of their governments because provision was made whereby only two of the four western provinces with the greatest population have any voice. We in Saskatchewan will never have that, nor will Manitoba. As a result those two provinces, with the approval of the NDP, are placed in a secondary position.

Sir, I am concerned about what is taking place in my country. I do not have to apologize for this, and I thank the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) for his reference to me the other day in this connection. All through my years at the bar and on the campaign trail I have pointed to the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, that this is a nation with two cultures and that to endeavour to intimidate either of them cannot and will not be accepted.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was not popular at the bar and in 1921 or 1922 as a young lawyer I was warned over and over again. I undertook the appeal of the French trustees, Boutin and Ethier, who had been convicted of permitting the teaching of too much French in a public school. The case is reported and we were successful.

In 1957 and 1958 I told the people of the province of Quebec that they had not received their fair share of senior appointments, that the House of Commons, which is bilingual under the constitution, does not operate that way. It was my suggestion that brought about the simultaneous translation of the proceedings of this House. It was my recommendation and no one else's that appointed the first French Canadian governor general since Vaudreuil. I was criticized for that. Under my administration cheques and documents of that kind were printed in both languages. So don't start teaching me about the rights of the people of this country, whoever they are.

When I went into Quebec I said that the Liberals had preached over and over again how the Queen is of no consequence.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, may I ask the right hon. member whether he intends to carry on at two o'clock? He has spoken for nearly an hour already.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is for the House, Mr. Speaker. I should like to tell the House what my views are on the constitution; I do know something about it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being one o'clock the House will now adjourn until two o'clock p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, before lunch I had come to the point where I was going to deal briefly with the constitution. I will deal with it at greater length on another occasion, as I have already spoken longer than I normally do.

Our Canadian parliament is made up of the Queen, the Senate and the House of Commons. The one question that keeps recurring in my mind is why there is such an ungodly rush to patriate the constitution. Mr. King tried, Mr. St. Laurent tried, and when I was prime minister we had it except for two very small matters. We delayed for a couple of weeks and then there were objections raised on a couple of matters by the premier of Quebec and the premier of Saskatchewan. Then Mr. Pearson tried, without success.

What is the reason for this rush? Why not take a little time? Great Britain does not want the matter brought to the attention of parliament regularly when we require amendments, but we have never been able to agree as to what the terms should be. Until we do agree, what do we bring back? What will we have gained by unilateral action? The parliament of Great Britain might say that this statute is repealed, and then what will we have for a constitution? What will come back to Canada? It will all be repealed and we will have to start all over again. I do not think anybody wants that.

What is behind this? I am not one who normally wonders about these things, but I must say that I was greatly interested in a speech delivered by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on March 5, 1976, before the fifth provincial congress of the Liberal party of Canada. Let me read these words from this portion of the speech that was not distributed very widely and which has never been referred to. Let me read it without observation in order that I may conclude at the earliest possible moment. The Prime Minister said, and I quote from page 1:

—there is the division of powers that we have not been able to solve, there is the amending formula but most important of all there is what people call repatriation; basically this means that we are going to take away from England, the United Kingdom, this foreign country although it is a friend, the right to make laws for Canadians. It should not be very hard to come to an understanding on this point.

He goes on to say, after referring to Britain in rather unusual terminology, "this foreign country":

Do you think that the Queen of England will tell Bourassa: admit that Trudeau is right or tell me, admit that Bourassa is right?

I do not know how that arose. Then he rewrites history on page 2 by saying:

Every single Commonwealth country has done it. When the Westminster statute was adopted in England in 1931 it read exactly as follows: from now on the British Empire does no longer exist in those five countries, those five Commonwealth dominions. We will no longer make laws for them.

● (1410)

You were colonies before but in 1931 the English said: Well, South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, Ireland and Canada are now big enough to make their own laws. Canadians said no, we are not able to.

I am interested in the fact which he points out, that after the 1931 Statute of Westminster no longer were any of the countries colonies, and they were not at that time. He says they are now dominions, which answers once and for all the argument that the word "dominion" carries with it a connotation of colonialism. He went on to say:

What we are saying is that if we should not reach agreement, let us agree that from now on the English will not have the right to make laws for Canada. But this has to be done soon.

Then he said:

What we are trying to say is: Let us reach an agreement to bring back that constitution, let us do it without discussing the division of powers; we can always argue about it later; we do not need the Queen as an arbitrator, or Harold Wilson or the Pope for that matter. We are able to do it ourselves. This is what we are saying and I am adding, what if it did not work? You will have to make a decision and I think that there is even a resolution on this point. We should, perhaps, at that point, wonder if we should not do that on our own, if it will not simply be a matter of the Canadian parliament going to tell England: Stop making laws for us; we are going to discuss an amendment formula among Canadians.

The Prime Minister continued:

And I can see it coming, not too rapidly because we must not rush people too much but when we realize that it has been discussed for 49 years, I have the impression that we must not wait for another 49 years, because I will not always be there, at least me—

Then he went on to discuss separatism. He pretended that the Conservatives do not agree with the government and he said:

—Or even if the Tories do not agree with us and want to guide their campaign by saying: The Liberals should have left the constitution in England, so that the British could have kept on making laws for us—

That statement is repugnant to the truth. I hope that people who want the constitution to remain in England for a time will not defeat the majority. There is no one in Canada who does not want the constitution patriated. However, we still cannot agree on how it should be done. Then he said:

Now, since we are talking about England, I would like to say a few words about the Queen, as a transition, because next I would deal with the Olympic games—

He said he did not invite the Queen of England. Sir, let me say she is not only the Queen of England, she is the Queen of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: He said he did not invite the Queen of England to open the Olympic Games; it was COJO who invited her. In fact, it was not COJO which invited the Queen. The agreements among the various countries constituting the Olympic organization contain a provision that the head of state opens the Olympic Games, and the head of state in Canada during the Olympics was Her Majesty the Queen. Then he said:

It is not Pierre Trudeau who invited her. But I would not have been ashamed to invite the Queen, for she is the head of the country.

Now we come to the key sentence, in which he said:

If, one of these days, we abolish monarchy, she will not be the head of state any more, it will be someone else, in this case, Jules Leger, it will be someone I will appoint.

This is a very fine dissertation, and I read it to those in the Liberal party who can explain this clearly and definitely.

He said, in effect, l'état c'est moi. Louis XIV was never more impressive than was the Prime Minister of Canada who said, "it will be someone I will appoint". He went on to say:

It does not mean, according to the present constitution that he or she will be better than the Queen, but it will be another constitution, it will not be a monarchy any more, it will be a republican parliamentary democracy—

Now you see what the rush is all about. Through the years from 1940 to 1976 his dream has been that there is something wrong with the Queen of Canada. Indeed, two years before he became Prime Minister he said, pay no attention to the Queen; she is of no more importance to me than skating or snowshoeing. He has never denied that since, and I said this when he was here.

Let me read further from what he said:

—and instead of having the Queen as head of state, we will have Jules Léger in Ottawa or Hughes Lapointe here—

He meant, in Quebec. Then he went on:

I do not think that it would change very much our legislative methods but I do not want to enter this subject now. I only want to state clearly that I am not the one who invited the Queen . . . The COJO invited the Queen.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

I could read a great deal more. These words cannot be interpreted in any other way but that when the constitution, or whatever remains of the BNA Act, comes to Canada, he will be in a position, not someone else, to appoint a president.

An hon. Member: Peter the kingmaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All I say is that I want to hear an explanation. This part of the speech did not receive the widespread circulation that the rest of the speech received. I will pay this tribute to the Prime Minister, that he distributes regularly transcripts of everything he says. I read them with interest and file them as a former prime minister would anything in the nature of historical documents of that kind. I want this to be explained. He said he will be the Prime Minister who will appoint a president. He said it will be a republican parliamentary democracy, and that instead of having the Queen we will have Jules Léger or Huges Lapointe.

I should like to know whether this is one of the reasons the former minister of national defence—who has not told the whole story—apparently found it necessary to resign. It would be very nice if the government would table this speech in the House, because it is clear and definite. The Prime Minister said this transition will take place soon and that he will make the appointment. Is that the reason for his ungodly haste to bring back something that some people regard as a document that can be carried back? You cannot take a thing like that back. It is either a statute of the United Kingdom or a Canadian statute. We all agreed to that at the time of confederation, and it was the French Canadians who insisted on a monarchy in 1867.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am glad to hear the applause, because they are worthy of it. I want to know the government's interpretation of this speech. Are we to have a revision of the revision, as we have so often when statements are made and they arouse public opinion, and then the Prime Minister says he never made them? If all the denials of statements he made were factual, no member of the press gallery would have the right to lift his head, because every one of them has somehow or other recorded what the Prime Minister has said, only to find out that he did not say what he did say.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it is always a great occasion for anyone who rises to speak after the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). We extended his time so that he could express his views about the constitution, but he came back and read from a speech and asked all kinds of mysterious questions. He did not have any answers. I would like to point out to the right hon. member that I was really shocked a few months ago when a member of his party criticized Her Majesty the Queen.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Chrétien: I do not know why, but after the Queen delivered a great speech in Montreal on national unity, the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt), a member of the same party as the right hon. gentleman, dared to criticize the Queen after she had performed magnificently in Canada during the Games.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: I hope that some day the right hon. gentleman will sock it to the hon. member for Leeds for his discourtesy do the Queen. A Liberal member would never dare do such a thing. I am surprised that, in an effort to cover up, the right hon. member would rise today and try to appease the monarchists in Canada because some people on his side are giving a hard time to Her Majesty the Queen.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Chrétien: The right hon. member spoke about the trips of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I appreciate that the right hon. member spoke of the need for such trips, because it was a bit discourteous on the part of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) to make bad remarks when the Prime Minister of this land is doing his job, going abroad to represent the best interests of all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is the big question, is he doing his job?

Mr. Chrétien: I am very pleased today to go back into history, as the right hon. member likes to do. I see many happy faces opposite and hon. members wearing blue carnations. They are rejoicing because they won two by-elections. As Louis St. Laurent used to say, it is more important to win elections than by-elections.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: That was a Liberal saying.

Mr. Chrétien: A few years ago a great man, a one time finance minister and justice minister, once considered a potential prime minister, who after 13 years of Liberal government felt it was time to return to the practice of law, gave up his solidly Liberal seat and a by-election was called. There was a resounding victory for the Conservative party. It was a real shot in the arm for the new leader of the Conservative party and a great disappointment for the Liberal party. The right hon. member will remember very well that that minister was the late Hon. James L. Ilsley, a great minister. A little while later the Liberal government suffered a disastrous defeat in a by-election, this time in its stronghold in the province of Quebec. In the next general election the people of Canada were called upon to judge the two major political parties and what they had to offer to the country. The Liberals were returned with 192 members and the new Conservative leader, George Drew, and his Tories were crushed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: That is all history.

Mr. Chrétien: I am sure the same thing would not have happened if at the previous convention the Tories had elected the right hon. member for Prince Albert rather than Mr. Drew.

An hon. Member: They are all blushing.

Mr. Chrétien: We very much like the right hon. member. Of course, we would have preferred his speech to be a little bit shorter, but it is always a great pleasure for us to hear him express his views. I am just puzzled that with all his experience he is not able to enlighten us on his ideas about the constitution a little more than he did, because with regard to the patriation of the constitution we on the government benches wanted some of his views. When he was prime minister of this nation he tried to patriate the constitution.

An hon. Member: With the co-operation of the provinces.

Mr. Chrétien: I do not know why this would be a less urgent matter in 1976 if it was an important matter in 1961 when the Conservatives tried and almost succeeded. Almost succeeded! However, that is one of the problems of the right hon. member for Prince Albert; he always almost succeeded. He did not manage to patriate the constitution, but I hope that he, like me, wishes the constitution to be patriated now, and if it is patriated it will not change the fact that Her Majesty is the Queen of Canada. If some day the people of Canada want to change that system, they can. I will not be arguing for that. I think that Her Majesty often teaches Canadians great lessons. I was honoured to be with her when she came to Montreal for the opening of the Games. She did a fantastic job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: I invite every hon. member of this House to read the speech she gave in Montreal in which she praised—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Did you write the speech?

Mr. Chrétien: I do not want to get into that topic or to pretend that someone would force the Queen to say something. That is very insulting to Her Majesty the Queen.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Chrétien: It would be very improper for me to be so impolite to Her Majesty the Queen, and I hope that the right hon. member for Prince Albert will discipline the new member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: That is a very insulting course of action.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The Governor General did not like the Speech from the Throne, either. Who wrote that?

Mr. Paproski: Poor Gaby had to say a few things she did not like to say.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) has the floor.

Mr. Chrétien: I know that hon. members opposite do not like to be confronted with real facts. I am glad they rejoice so much at by-election results. We are better at general elections, and I would not be surprised if the new leader, who was so jubilant this morning, will carry on the old tradition of Manion, Bracken and Drew. I did not name the hon. member who managed not to be part of that tradition, the hon. member who spoke before me. His situation was very unusual.

Mr. Lefebvre: He is still the best one they have.

Mr. Chrétien: I think they would be well advised to take him back.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1430)

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should go back and speak about my new responsibilities. I am honoured to see one of my predecessors here to listen to me. I am pleased that he has taken the time to come here. I hope to be as flamboyant as he was, but more successful. This new job is not an easy one, as we are faced with many problems. Some of these problems are due to the fact—

An hon. Member: That we have a Liberal government.

Mr. Chrétien: Yes, because we have been successful.

An hon. Member: In what?

Mr. Chrétien: One of the problems is the level of salaries in Canada, and another is productivity. We are having problems because in the last three years we did not go into a recession as they did in the United States. A recession did not come because of our management of the affairs of the nation, but unfortunately our success has led some people to believe that we in Canada can afford just about anything. That is one of the problems, Mr. Speaker. In the last two years we have been free of recession, so people in many industries think we can pay any type of salary. That is one of the most serious problems confronting me in my new portfolio. Some industries in Canada are paying higher salaries than in the United States.

Mr. Grafftey: Because of inflation. We have to keep up with the inflation caused by you.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to get into an argument with the hon. member. Nobody can deny that in the last three years Canada has had less unemployment during the winter than the United States. For the first time in years we achieved that position, but now we are paying the price. Canadians had better realize that if they do not discipline themselves we will have to pay a high price in terms of our export position. The situation has improved in the last month, of course, and I think we will have a good export position. If we exclude the financial transactions we will be in a favourable position, but we will still have a big balance of payment deficit because in Canada we need a lot of capital for development. We need it because we want to build hydroelectric power projects, we want to build pipelines, we are looking for more oil and we are looking for more gas. We have all sorts of big programs and projects for which we will need more money.

To counterbalance that, Mr. Speaker, my department will take action and make decisions. I think it is very important to abolish form-filling and red tape, especially for small businesses. The Minister of State (Small Businesses) (Mr. Marchand) will have something to say about that. I think that in the last ten years the bureaucracies have asked small businesses to shoulder too much red tape. My colleague, the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo, is working with me and I have given him the task of looking into that matter. I hope he will be able to accomplish it in a speedy manner.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I found the remark of the right hon. member, in relation to the Minister of State for Small Businesses, somewhat improper when he commented on the minister's forthcoming trip to the U.S.S.R. later this month. I cannot go on that trip, so I think it is quite proper that he replace me as I have some very urgent matters to deal with at home at this time.

Mr. Dick: So has small business; urgent matters.

Mr. Chrétien: He works with me, and he is very good.

Mr. Dick: The minister of small businesses?

Mr. Chrétien: Yes, but he works with the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. If the hon. member were not so ignorant he would know that sales abroad will bring more business for the small firms in Canada.

The hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo, who is the first Indian in the cabinet, will be a very good administrator for small businesses. He comes from a town where there are a lot of small businesses, and to his great credit he has been very close to them. When I had the privilege of visiting Kamloops earlier this month, I found how happy they were that one of them had been appointed minister with special concern for small businesses. His responsibility within my department is to help in my endeavours, including export business, but in the internal workings of the department he will have special concern for the problems of small businesses. Sometimes we look at the picture in broad terms and forget the effect upon the small people.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why did you abolish the small business department that we set up?

Mr. Chrétien: I think I am entitled to finish my speech, Mr. Speaker, and I cannot relate what the hon. member said to what I am saying. I am speaking of the role of the Minister of State for Small Businesses, and I hope he will be able to make a contribution to the debate later in the week.

One of the reasons I decided not to go to the U.S.S.R. at this time is that I am very much preoccupied with the creation of jobs in Canada. When the Prime Minister asked me to take over this portfolio, I asked for a minister of state to help me because I think the job is big enough to be shared with someone else. My previous associations with the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo were good and I knew I could work easily with him. He will be doing some travelling.

My main preoccupation will be the creation of jobs in Canada. We have to develop a strategy to achieve this.

[Translation]

First, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that as early as next spring I intend to launch a big campaign for promoting exports across Canada. Hopefully it will be an education and information program for Canadian businessmen by the officials of my department, who are specialists in foreign trade. We hope that the best among them will be able to hold conferences across the country so that the very competent officials working abroad might educate Canadian businessmen and initiate them in foreign trade.

I think that the hon. member who has already been Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce did a somewhat similar job when his party was in power and I should like to insist on this because I think that at this time Canada has an extremely favourable potential in this area. Ours is only a small country with no extra-territorial ambition but on the other hand, we have a modern technology, which is acceptable in many countries. I must also say that, after my first contacts with the ministers who visited Ottawa since I have been here and after the tour I made in South America, I am convinced that such a program for initiating businessmen in exports will certainly be very useful and that it will have great results.

Mr. Speaker, I should also like to be particularly interested in the great projects which are being carried out in the world at the present time. When I visited Venezuela a few weeks ago, I realized that we Canadians are too often very timid when it comes to those so-called turnkey projects, that is extensive and comprehensive projects.

Too often in those projects, there is a lack of coordination and sometimes of government intervention. What is happening in today's modern world? Very often major decisions such as the great Venezuela railway or other projects of the same nature in Iran or Sandi Arabia are made by governments, and we are not adequately organized here in Canada. And if the department or even the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce does not intervene we often run the risk of missing our chance. That is why I would like to consider the possibility of establishing—and I have not yet submitted the project to Cabinet—some sort of corporation to deal with that problem and also form within the country many consortia that could really offer comprehensive projects entirely acceptable to interested countries.

There is another problem I would like to deal with, Mr. Speaker. Often in our domestic trade, businessmen do not always think in terms of the best interests of Canada and they cut their throats—if I may use that expression—in certain countries trying to get one another out of a contract. I think it might be necessary in the future for the government to decide on its own which Canadian businessman is better equipped to do a certain job.

In the records I have examined over the four weeks I have been in charge of the department, I realized that we often have three, four, five or six Canadian businesses vying to get a contract abroad while our competitors—be they English, French, German, Spanish or Americans—have only one in the race. And the fact that we have several Canadian competitors somewhat discredits the representativity of our businessmen. It might be appropriate in certain circumstances to take our responsibilities unilaterally and tell our businessmen: Don't go and cut your own throat abroad, think of the good of the country, and compete one at a time in different projects.

I would also like, Mr. Speaker, concerning those major projects—

• (1440)

[English]

I want to speak about certain turnkey approaches, and I should like to hear the views of the opposition on this subject. The government will need to encourage the inflow of more risk capital in order to stimulate the Canadian economy. We are suffering from huge balance of payment deficits and we must export much more aggressively. We need huge amounts of capital in order to develop oil and gas reserves, including the tar sands and hydroelectric power projects like the ones at James Bay and Labrador. We shall need huge inflows of capital, but if we want this country's economy to remain stable we need to export more of the products we make in Canada.

When I was in Venezuela I learned that Canadian technology can be applied more usefully in that country than can certain types of European technology. An example was the Venezuelan railway system. We are experts at building railways over rough terrain. We have built railways across the most difficult terrain in the world, in the Rockies, in the marshes, in the north. We know better than anybody how to build such railways, and the Venezuelan authorities with whom I talked recognize this. They want, in Venezuela, the type of railways we have in Canada. They do not want a fancy railway that travels fast; they need one that is ruggedly built, reliable and able to carry heavy loads.

An hon. Member: And slow.

Mr. Chrétien: It is better to go slowly and get to your destination than go fast and run off the rails on a bridge. The Venezuelans realize this. I am putting these ideas forward because I think they are in Canada's best interests. We need to sell more aggressively. Our sales should counterbalance the inflow of capital which we need, because, Mr. Speaker, we in Canada will always need capital. Ours is a huge country, extending 4,000 miles east and west and almost 4,000 miles from Windsor to the North Pole. This huge country cannot be developed with capital derived alone from the savings of Canadians. We need capital, but we need the proper climate in this land in order to attract it.

An hon. Member: That would be a change.

Mr. Chrétien: Yes, we can always improve. The hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden) knows that a great deal of capital is entering Canada.

An hon. Member: And a lot is going out, too.

Mr. Chrétien: Some is going out, that is true, but on balance capital is entering this country. This year we have a $5 billion deficit in our balance of payments to cover. Money is coming in; the trouble is that most of the money is coming in in the form of bonds and not as risk capital. A few years ago I heard members of this House saying that we should not encourage the entry of too much risk capital and foreign managerial talent; we should encourage more capital in the form of bonds. Now some hon. members take the reverse position. I say that we need risk capital in this country. Sometimes we obtain the benefit of managerial talent along with risk capital.

Mr. Dick: Any capital coming into this country, even as bonds, under this government is risk capital.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member will have his chance to make a speech.

Mr. Chrétien: I found it difficult to understand the hon. member. I stayed in the House for one hour, although not obliged to do so, to hear the right hon. gentleman opposite finish his speech. I had a cabinet meeting to attend, but postponed it to do the right hon. member the courtesy of remaining to hear him. I hope the hon. member opposite will allow me the courtesy of finishing my speech. I want to do my job well, but have not learned anything from the hon. member.

I consider my new job a great challenge. I was happy as President of the Treasury Board. I did not have to travel too much, I dealt mainly with ministers and members and did not receive nearly as many delegations as I am now called upon to meet. It is very pleasant to receive delegations five or six times a day, but it does interfere with your work at times. Still, I am carrying out part of the communications policy of this government and, as I say, I consider my new job a great challenge.

We can improve our situation. Canada has been fortunate in the past. We are an exporting country. All the same, during the last month I have been obliged to make drastic decisions in certain areas. For example, I had to impose quotas in order to protect this country's textile industry, and I have been criticized.

Mr. Jarvis: Trop tard, deux ou trois ans trop tard.

Mr. Chrétien: Perhaps it is a little late, but I have been the minister responsible for only four weeks. I was forced to make some decisions in the first five days of my new responsibilities. The government has imposed import quotas on beef. The people of Canada must realize that we cannot be a free trader and impose quotas at the same time. I often go out west; I am welcomed in the west, even in Alberta.

An hon. Member: You bet.

Mr. Chrétien: I'm always welcome in Alberta. My mother comes from Alberta; everybody knows that. There are some in this House who always talk about free trade, yet in the same breath they ask us to impose quotas on beef and veal. Well, we have done it. Some traders abroad were abusing our good will; we were being flooded with imports from Australia and New Zealand, and when the Americans imposed restrictions last week I had no choice but to act. As soon as we knew what the picture was, we moved very quickly. We knew there would be a price to pay. We knew we could not win on both fronts at the same time. We had to be very careful. This is a free trading nation. We export a great deal and would like to export more. At the same time, however, we have to protect Canadians in productive occupations, such as textile workers and beef producers. It is better for Canadians to continue working in the textile industry in certain areas than to remain idle. However, Canadians must realize that in order to do this we must impose a quota and therefore run the risk of some of those goods being a bit more expensive. I am willing to take that kind of risk.

• (1450)

If hon. members have concrete proposals and ideas, I hope they will pass them on to me. I would be delighted to listen to them. I ask hon. members on all sides of the House to help me in my new job, keeping in mind our common goal—the well-being of this nation.

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to participate in today's proceedings, a day when we have honoured one of our members who has been here for 25 years—a quarter of a century of service to parliament, to the country and to his constituency. Of course, it is always a pleasure, at least on this side of the House, to hear the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he rises to address this chamber.

I want to begin by extending, in a very non-partisan manner, my sincere congratulations and best wishes to members opposite who have been successful in obtaining new offices. I firmly believe, however, that those members, along with their colleagues, had better gain maximum enjoyment from their current activities as I rather suspect, along with the apparent majority of Canadians—particularly on the basis of the by-election results of last evening—that they will not be holding those offices indefinitely.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wise: I want to indicate that I will be moving an amendment to the Speech from the Throne at the conclusion of my remarks.

This throne speech, delivered in a most excellent and graceful manner by Canada's first lady, in complimentary terms can only be viewed as a vague and feeble attempt to revive the increasingly sagging fortunes of this government. It attempts vainly to repair the irreparable. It sends messages off in all directions and to all regions, but fails totally to offer any concrete solutions to the problems which it addresses, problems which for the most part have been accrued, and indeed have been caused, during this government's time in office.

Given the record of this government and the current mood of Canadians, which has been mainly fostered by the performance of the government, unfortunately I have come to the conclusion that the content of the throne speech is simply meaningless. In other words, it does not matter what the government now says; people simply do not trust the words or the print of a government which has previously deceived us and has provided such ample evidence of its worth that our citizens have developed an entrenched mood of dissatisfaction and disenchantment. You cannot, under any circumstances, hope to maintain the trust of people by completely ignoring their problems and wishes, or by continuously taking the attitude that governments are always right and the people are always wrong.

This throne speech adds insult to injury with respect to the agricultural industry. Like the last budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), it deals with one small agricultural item—unbelievable and unacceptable but, given the record of this government, understandable. There is only one paragraph announcing one commitment to agriculture, namely, "Measures will be introduced to make more farm-stored crops eligible for advance payments." This legislation is not new; it was promised by the minister over a year ago. It has simply been promised again. Let us hope that it does not turn out like the other few agricultural bills—introduced, given no priority at all, and finally passed months or perhaps a year later. Other references to agriculture in the speech are simply an example of the rhetoric. One is:

> The Government will also work with the provinces and farm organizations to strengthen the structure and productivity of Canadian agriculture.

In reality, this government will more than likely pretend to work with the provinces and farm organizations but will, in fact, accomplish next to nothing as it continues to mismanage the structure, to discourage productivity, to perpetrate instability and to generally shrink the scale of the agricultural industry. Farm input costs have increased so much in the last few years that credit is not only needed for long-term farm goals but is required for year to year cash flow. A few examples of these increased input costs include a rise of 47 per cent in fertilizer prices between 1975 and 1976, an increase of 17.6 per cent in building replacement costs, according to Statistics Canada, a 24.6 per cent hike in the cost of petroleum products for farm purposes, a 13 per cent rise in the cost of farm labour, and a 16.2 per cent increase in the cost of electricity.

Yet against this type of background farm credit has been reduced. The funds available to the Farm Credit Corporation in the current 1976-77 fiscal year have been reduced by the Minister of Finance from $300 million to $280 million. It is expected that gross FCC loan commitments will only total about $370 million this year compared with $641 million in the previous fiscal period a reduction of almost 50 per cent. This situation is having a disastrous effect among young farmers who cannot obtain the required credit sources. Is this the kind of action you would expect from a government which professes to care about agriculture?

Perhaps one of the main reasons for the low priority treatment given to agriculture is the obviously declining influence and importance of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). Until fairly recently, farmers generally were pleased with the minister. Given the fact that farm income has nearly always, characteristically, lagged behind others, and given the fact that input costs have risen beyond even the wildest imagination, they rejoiced to hear the minister tell their story. It made for great entertainment in hundreds of rural community halls and secondary school auditoriums across the country. But what is the situation today? The smiles have disappeared and the laughter has faded as farmers begin to realize what has been obvious in the House of Commons for months, that the minister cannot translate his wishes into legislation, nor can the minister act when he wishes to act. I believe he has even less influence in this government than he had a year ago. The federal dairy policy, which has created more unrest, instability and financial strife within the industry than ever before, is a prime example. In spite of all opposition warnings, the minister, or rather the cabinet, overreacted to the dairy surplus problems of the past year. Surely the minister must be aware that the dairy cow cannot be turned off and on with a toggle-switch.

Deficits and surpluses have existed before and they will exist again. We are still desperately in need of a long-term program. Where do we see any mention of such a program in the Speech from the Throne? My hon. friend from Joliette (Mr. La Salle) will deal with the dairy situation in more detail later today. The minister has failed to produce any kind of program for cow-calf operations. He has refused to implement a Canadian meat import law. He has done nothing about the unfair Canada-Australia-New Zealand meat agreement. What about the report of the beef inquiry commission? When is the minister going to act or, perhaps, more realistically, when will he be allowed to act? My hon. friend from Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) will later be offering some good advice to the government on this subject.

The stabilization payments for the 1975 apple crop amounted to a clear indication of cabinet interference with major agricultural legislation since they constituted a departure from the main thrust and intent of existing law. Because of the total failure of federal policies we are now seeing massive intervention programs by the provinces to bail out their own producers; for example, the recent program in Saskatchewan, at a cost of $30 million, and the program announced not too long ago by the Province of Alberta for a cow-calf program to which the provincial government had to contribute some $40 million.

Witness, too, the Quebec dairy subsidy of $33 million. The question of federal and provincial jurisdiction has arisen and we may soon face yet another jurisdictional clash. The provinces, however, are acting only to protect their own industries from almost certain ruin. The very fact that these programs have become necessary amounts to the ultimate condemnation of abortive federal policies.

I have made statements before in the House on the subject of federal income tax and the capital gains tax as they relate to farm ownership and farm transfers, but as yet I have received no significant response either from the Minister of Finance or from the Minister of Agriculture. Present federal regulations clearly discriminate against the transfer of family-owned farms incorporated or organized in partnership, or other kinds of family organizations. Since this discrimination seriously threatens the transfer of such farms to succeeding generations, I propose that the rules governing such transfers be the same, regardless of the type of organization, as long as the farms are family-owned.

As has been previously stated both by myself and by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the government should also consider the exemption from capital gains tax of the income received by a farmer or family-owned corporation where the money is invested in another farm within two years. This would allow a farmer, if the need arose, to buy one farm and sell another for the sake of a more efficient operation. Similarly, moneys from all forced sales should be given at least a two-year exemption provided they are reinvested in the industry. The utter disregard shown by the government for proposals in favour of reforms such as these has clearly demonstrated to Canadian farmers that the federal administration cares little for them and their needs. Small wonder that the popularity of hon. members opposite has fallen so low.

Over the past few months we have heard rumblings about a comprehensive new food policy for Canada. It was indicated in the Ottawa Journal of May 8—and this has been verified in ensuing investigations—that the key department in the development of such a policy is not the Department of Agriculture but the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Mr. Speaker, this situation is totally unacceptable. It is an insult to the Department of Agriculture and to the industry generally. If Canada needs a new food policy, its proper place of origin and development is within the Department of Agriculture, though let us, by all means, take account of input from all sources, particularly those representing the consumer.

The present and future livelihood of producers is totally dependent upon an equitable policy, and in these circumstances their advice and counsel on any such venture is imperative, particularly when it comes through their respective commodity groups. When we hear that policy papers have already been prepared for cabinet consideration, I fear for the future of agriculture, especially in view of the government's past record of secrecy and deliberate confrontation. We in the official opposition are working hard to overcome the distrust which has been built up, largely because of the actions of the government, between producer and consumer groups. We will not subscribe to proposals which will pit producers and consumers against each other. There has been too much of that. The present government has set a bad example. We intend to set a good one when we on this side come to power.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity to interject a few words on behalf of the maple sugar and syrup production industry, most of which is centred in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Darling: Don't forget Parry Sound.

Mr. Wise: I shall not forget Parry Sound-Muskoka. One could perhaps forget the riding, but never the member who represents it. In spite of the fact that many countries show a keen interest in importing this sweetener, production has declined by almost 50 per cent in the province of Quebec during the last 20 years. Increased prices have been insufficient to provide healthy revenues to existing producers or attract newcomers to the long-time tradition. Maple syrup production in 1975 was about 1.3 million gallons, 21.7 per cent less than in 1974 and 950,000 gallons less than during the years 1956-60. I hope I can prevail upon the government to check this decline and save this traditional and valuable industry. I would be very interested to hear what the government intends to do regarding this vital matter.

The pork producers, as represented by the Canadian Pork Council, constitute another group within the agricultural sector which remains unimpressed by government performance. They are still very upset over the tariff cuts on pork announced last May by the Minister of Finance in his last budget. I might say that the importation of pork and pork products increased by 110 per cent in 1975 as compared with 1973. Mr. Elder, president of the Canadian Pork Council, has been quoted as saying:

> Our pork prices are now set on a North American market basis. The cutting of tariffs as proposed will simply put an additional downward pressure on Canadian pork prices and further shake the confidence of Canadian hog producers, many of whom are currently considering whether to increase, or even continue in production. Producers with the support of a number of provincial governments are currently working in many ways, and at considerable expense through stabilization and marketing schemes to increase production following the recent production decline.

He went on to say that this cutting of tariffs will be interpreted by many producers as a further indication that the federal government is not concerned about the development and stability of the industry.

During the past two years I have spoken out on many occasions on dairy policy, particularly on the question of cheese imports into Canada. On this particular issue agriculture has been fighting a losing battle with industry, trade and commerce and likely the trend will continue. It is interesting to note, with all of the chaos and unrest that exists in the dairy industry today, particularly among the industrial milk producers in the province of Quebec, that statistics indicate that importations of dairy products have increased some 83 per cent in 1975 compared with 1973. This is only one example, however, of increased strife within the agricultural industry caused by ever-increasing amounts of agricultural products.

Let me take a look for a moment at the Statistics Canada figures on imports; I have them before me and I also have the percentage increases in 1975 compared with 1973. Berries, 370 per cent; apples, 58 per cent; honey, 211 per cent; jams, 74 per cent; chicken, 289 per cent; canned hams, 33 per cent. I think the largest and most significant percentage increase of an imported product is tobacco. The subject of tobacco is not only very close to my heart, because I have a large acreage in the riding of Elgin, but I know my colleague who represents the riding of Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles) is also extremely interested in this product. The increase in tobacco imports in 1975 compared with 1973 is a whoopping 1,086 per cent.

It is obvious that some restrictions, or at the very least increased tariffs, are required. Instead, the government is removing tariffs, such as that on sugar. This effectively removes any possibility of the revival of the sugar beet industry in southwestern Ontario. I regret that the Minister of Agriculture is not here because I would have been very interested to hear his comments regarding the removal of the tariff on sugar. I wonder whether he supports this measure, particularly when he has campaigned election after election on the promise to re-establish the sugar beet industry in southwestern Ontario.

An hon. Member: He only does that at election time.

Mr. Wise: That is true. Two production areas that are being adversely affected by the import situation are those of chickens and soybean production. In 1974, total importations of U.S. chickens into Canada amounted to approximately five million pounds, or less than one-tenth of one per cent of Canadian production at that time. In the same year, Canada exported to Cuba nearly 12 million pounds of Canadian-produced chicken. By 1975, imports of U.S. chicken had escalated to over 12 million pounds, and with literally no export of Canadian chicken this represented an increase of 250 per cent. Up to June, 1976, U.S. imports of chicken continued to swell and now total 22 million pounds, live and dressed. This in just under six months. At this rate, Mr. Speaker, imports may reach 50 million pounds this year, an increase of over 400 per cent compared with 1975, and represents 7 per cent of our total Canadian production. Since the vast majority comes into the province of Ontario, this represents 25 per cent of Ontario's total production and is ever increasing. Chicken producers are not happy with this situation, but to date the government has turned a deaf ear to their protests and representations.

Producers of broiler chickens are equally concerned about the increased importation of American broiler chickens. It has cut into the production quotas of Ontario broiler producers who were hoping to get back to regularity after having quotas reduced last year to 85 per cent of capacity in order to avoid a surplus or overproduction. There is a further danger, of course, that the broiler producer will be forced to accept a reduced return because of the necessity of cutting prices in order to compete with American imports, which due to climatic and other conditions can be produced at less cost, generally speaking at about 25 per cent less. This unfair competition is a serious threat to the Canadian broiler producer.

Soybean growers, too, are now facing the prospect of reduced returns for their product as a result of unchecked foreign competition. Mr. Otis McGregor, chairman of the Ontario Soybean Growers Marketing Board, said recently that producers can expect to receive substantially less for this year's crop. Much of this reduction is due to increased competition from the United States, which exported 2.2 million bushels of whole soybeans to Canada during the previous year in addition to soybean meal, oil and flour, for a total market value of $145.8 million. Canadian exports for the same period amounted to only $15.1 million.

A familiar and disturbing pattern is now obvious, one of increasing agricultural imports and decreasing exports. Tariff barriers are established by our competitors to hinder the export sale of our products, yet imports continue to flow at alarmingly unchecked rates into Canada. Our producers are not being adequately protected. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) is doing farm producers and the agricultural industry a disservice by allowing this situation to continue unchecked. The Minister of Agriculture is losing all credibility by failing to bring any significant influence to bear upon the government's position.

We know that farmers want to produce, Mr. Speaker, and they should be given every opportunity to do so with as little government interference as possible. By and large, producers will adjust and adapt to changing market conditions. Canadian producers welcome competition and can compete in any marketplace given similar circumstances. But Canadian producers cannot, and should not, be expected to compete in the marketplace against heavily subsidized foreign products and commodities. Farmers should be assisted by government to seek out and develop foreign markets. At the same time, farmers should be called upon to develop more aggressive sales programs, both here at home and abroad, for their produce. The quality of Canadian food production is the highest in the world and can fulfil, with no problem whatever, any advertising or promotion program.

Were some reference to any of the matters to which I have spoken included or even vaguely mentioned in the throne speech, Mr. Speaker, I might have been able to find some sign of hope or encouragement from the pronouncement. But, as usual, the agricultural industry has been completely ignored by this insensitive and unthinking government. From the point of view of the agricultural community and of those dedicated to serving its interest, this throne speech is totally devoid of merit.

As I indicated when I began my remarks some time ago, Mr. Speaker, I feel a definite desire, indeed obligation, to submit the following motion, which is seconded by my colleague from Joliette:

That the following be added to the Address:

"This House regrets that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to support the productive sectors of the economy, and in particular have not responded adequately to agricultural problems such as the distress of the industrial milk producers, the excessive importation of beef from Australia and New Zealand, and the lack of effective co-ordination between federal and provincial agricultural authorities.

● (1520)

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I should like, first, in my opening remarks to congratulate the new Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) and wish him well. He is going to need all the good wishes we can offer if he is to do anything with his new department. I do not say that because I have less than considerable respect for the personnel of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In the years I have been here, I have had many occasions to consult and work with officials of that department regarding various constituency problems, and I have always found the personnel most helpful and, in fact, a very able group.

The problem is not the result of the personnel or the department itself but, rather, because the department has to serve a government that has no conception of any industrial strategy or policy. The result is that the department has become kind of an Augean stable of the kind that even Hercules, like the present minister, was not able to clean up. Some of you may remember the story about the Augean stables which Hercules laboured day and night to clean, only to find the next day that it was just as filthy.

An hon. Member: It was Ulysses.

Mr. Saltsman: Well, the minister doesn't look very much like Ulysses.

An hon. Member: It doesn't matter, you are shovelling the same stuff over there anyway.

Mr. Saltsman: You are experts over there, so I am sure you have the right handle on it. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, for all his apparent enthusiasm for some of the ideas he intends to put forward and changes he intends to make in the department, will really wind up doing what previous ministers of trade and commerce on that side of the House have been doing for as long as I have been here, and that is jawboning. He thinks he can jawbone the department and its policies into success. It is quite obvious that as his hero the minister has picked the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees), particularly as an example of effective jawboning, when that member held the portfolio in the Conservative government. The difficulty is, of course, that the present minister does not have the same effective jaw as the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings and should not, therefore, try to compete in that league.

If we consider some of the things the minister said in his remarks today, we must ask ourselves whether he really understands anything at all about his job and the problem facing him. First of all, he starts out talking about facing some problems. Certainly that has to be the understatement of the century in terms of the problem facing this country today.

Let me put on record the kind of position we find ourselves in at the present time. Between 1968 and 1974 Canada experienced the lowest rate of growth in the volume of exports of any major non-communist, industrial nation. The latest 1975 figures have been excluded from this comparison since they are heavily influenced by the world's cyclical contraction. Over that period real exports rose by an average annual rate of 5.7 per cent in Canada, 8.8 per cent in the United States, 12.1 per cent in France, 13.5 per cent in Japan, and 7.1 per cent in Britain. Even in beleaguered Britain it rose 2 per cent more than it did in Canada. Moreover, only two other industrial countries aside from Canada saw the volume of their imports expand more rapidly than their exports. Over this period real economic trade trends were worse for Canada than they were for Britain.

Canada's trade balance, measured in terms of stages of fabrication, has over the past decade continued to shift in a direction politically unpopular at home. The merchandise trade surplus has expanded continuously in crude materials and fabricated materials. However, in the fully-finished end products sector—that is where the jobs are; the sector which accomplishes the bulk of manufacturing—the reverse has been the case. Canada's merchandise trade deficit on end products has widened in every year since 1968. Part of this deterioration may be traced to an adverse movement in auto trade, though growing deficits have emerged in other finished products as well. Even excluding the eight most important export commodities, Canada's trade balance in the remaining products has displayed a similar deterioration since 1968.

The point of some of these figures which I have gone over quickly is that we probably have demonstrated the worst expansion, in terms of trade among manufacturing or developed nations, in the world. We must ask ourselves how a country with the resources of Canada and with the people here could do so badly in trade. The minister summed this up by saying we are facing "some problems". When it came to solutions, the minister suggested he would welcome ideas from anyone. I suggest he will need ideas from someone else because he will not get them from that side of the House.

The Minister takes considerable pride in the fact that the government has appointed a Minister of State for Small Business. I do not oppose this; I think it is very nice to attempt to help small business, at least to the extent possible. That still does not deal with the central problem relating to our trade deficit. At best it is window-dressing, if you will, or public relations. Small business, like motherhood, is something that no one is against.

The government will not create jobs, in the kind of world in which we live, by assisting small business. Small business in many cases can perform valuable functions that often big business cannot perform. Those of us who know something about small business will know that these businesses are often heavily dependent on giant industry. Small businesses are not initiators, innovators or creators of the large number of jobs we require. They are ancillary and very important, and should be encouraged, but I think it would be like burying your head in the sand to think you can create the number of jobs this country requires by stimulating small business. I think every country in the world has demonstrated the fact that we live in a world in which we must have large industry. We must have large industry in order to be able to carry out research and marketing as well as the many other things associated with being internationally competitive.

We have some fair-sized industries in this country, but we have never quite developed the coherent or comprehensive kind of Canadian industrial structure to cause a presence in international competition. This is partly because of the presence of foreign ownership.

It is interesting to note that, as hard as those responsible for FIRA have tried, we have not been able to reverse this trend of foreign ownership by getting more Canadian businesses going when others are put up for sale. That organization has attempted to transfer ownership from foreign corporations to Canadian corporations. In spite of the good intentions of FIRA, the fact is that when you get down to it, for some reason Canadians have not been in a position to take over these businesses when they have been put on the market.

There have been some successes where Canadians have participated in the take-over of foreign corporations, but they have often occurred as a result of the government intervening and supporting the take-over and transfer of ownership. It is difficult to understand why Canadian entrepreneurs are in such a weak position and why the risk-taking that is occurring in other countries is not occurring here. Perhaps if we look back at our history we will find we have never had that kind of capitalistic society in Canada and that in fact Canadian entrepreneurs, with few exceptions, have been timid and heavily dependent on government.

Many projects in this country might never have got off the ground had it not been for public involvement or the government stepping in and, in fact, assuming the bulk of the risk. What does that say for us? I suggest it says that unless we can change the Canadian entrepreneur and the financial institutions, then the government of this country will have to play a much larger role in the development of industrial production. That is the way it has been done in the past, and that is the way it will be done in the future unless the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce adopts an attitude different from that of the ministers before him, an attitude of wringing their hands.

We can dissipate these problems by jawboning, by going out and assaulting the markets of the world as though we were the only ones who wanted to go out and assault the markets of the world. You must have something to offer the markets of the world, and the truth of the matter is that we are not in a position to do that. All the super-salesmanship in the world will not change that.

Whenever we talk about our being uncompetitive, the only ting that comes to some people's minds is that wage rates in Canada are too high. There are many other reasons why we are competitive and why our productivity is not high. One is the way our industries are organized and the way they compete or do not compete with each other. Productivity is not so much a matter of the guy who works at the lathe; it is a factor of industrial organization. We are not as productive as we should be, and we have to be productive. How are we going to be productive? Hon. friends on my right are listening with some interest and I am pleased to see that. One of them seems to be on the verge of standing up and making a suggestion. Perhaps he would like to say that the way to increase productivity is to get the government's cotton-picking hands out of the pockets of Canadians and away from businessmen who will show you how to be productive.

I see by the glint in his eye that that is the argument he was about to put forward. I wanted to save the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) the trouble of exercising himself to rise and ask a question, so I asked it in a rhetorical sense. I say to him: Is it really true? Because in fact this government has been more generous in terms of tax benefits than almost any other government I can think of. What more do businessmen in Canada want? They get low rates of taxation. The effective rate of taxation in this country is not that high or that devastating. This is not the reason people cannot compete.

I have had some experience, as have my colleagues in the House, trying to find a group of Canadian businessmen who are prepared to take the gamble of trying to persuade the banks of this country to stick their necks out. Unless it is a safe risk, with guarantees right down the line, you do not have that group of indigenous Canadian capitalists to do the job. Perhaps we will develop them some day; I do not know. But we do not have them now, and the truth is that we have not had them, with a few exceptions such as the E. P. Taylors and the Lord Beaverbrooks. To show you what Canadian ethics are, we drove them out of the country. We could not tolerate the likes of Lord Thomson.

Mr. McCain: You contributed your share to that.

Mr. Saltsman: I did not. In fact, I made a speech in the House in praise of Lord Thomson, if not for his tendency to accumulate money, at least for his integrity in admitting that that was the sole purpose of his endeavours. The man is gone now, but I have no animosity for Lord Thomson. As a matter of fact, I found him to be a rather nice fellow on those occasions when we met in London; so let that be on the record.

I think we are in the kind of position where jawboning, exhortations and launching assaults on foreign markets will not do any good. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is indulging itself in a fantasy. The truth of the matter is that the minister, whatever his good intentions may have been today in putting forward this program and speaking of the kind of things he is going to do, in fact does not have the power to do them. The reason he does not have the power to do them is that the government is without a policy, without a strategy, nothing is co-ordinated, everything is ad hoc. If you are going to make your economy competitive, you have to take a systematic look at all the factors that enter into being competitive, the factors that enter into the reasons you cannot trade and others can.

I was curious to know what the minister meant when he spoke about the export business and said that very often in export contracts Canadian businessmen compete for a job, and that that is very bad. I always thought the Liberal party thought competing for a job was a good thing. Now they are saying that when you do it on export contracts, it is a bad thing. Therefore, he as minister, and presumably his government, will have to decide which business is best for the job, to quote him exactly. If there is an overseas job to be done, instead of having a number of Canadian companies competing for the job, the minister will make a decision and say, "We think A should go rather than B".

As I sat in my place listening to the minister, I kept trying to figure out exactly how he is going to go about doing that. Is he going to sit down with them in his office and review the kinds of bids they are making, and say to them, "Look, fellows, you really should get together. Your bid should go, but the other two should not". If that is the case, I am sure the combines people would be very interested in such conversations, even though consortiums for export purposes are exempt from the provisions of the combines legislation.

If we are going to bring people together on that basis, and if the minister really thinks he can get them to collude and combine for export purposes and there will not be some kind of carryover arrangement for the domestic market, that is the company turns out to be reasonably successful in selling on the export market—I do not think it will be, but at least successful to the point that it will get a higher price than it might otherwise obtain—will there not be a spillover? Will someone not come to the conclusion that if it works there, why should it not work in the domestic market? I think they came to that conclusion a long time ago. The minister underestimates the amount of collaboration that takes place in domestic and foreign markets.

What is there about the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce that makes it so ineffective? I have pointed out in my remarks that I think they have some excellent people. My experience with the department has been good. When I come to them with a problem, I find people who understand, and more than understand. They are willing to really move on the thing. It is not often you can call a deputy minister on a Sunday and get some action from him, or have civil servants working halfway through the night on a deal because they know it is urgent and important. But that does not seem to be the problem. The problem is that the rest of the government's policies make it impossible for the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to be other than the Augean stable to which I referred. It is just a stable where they throw all the junk, saying that they have to try to compensate for all the disastrous policies they have in other areas and come up with some money to bail out an industry here, make a grant somewhere else, and do all those things which make up for the deficiencies in the policies of the government.

[Mr. Saltsman.]

Let us consider some of the things which happen in this country. First, the government—and not only this government but also governments before it—can never make up its mind whether it has to concentrate on the manufacturing industry, agriculture or the resource industry. Perhaps governments have not wanted to make up their minds because that would have involved making a value judgment or decision. Governments have never really done that. They say they will concentrate on everything, manufacturing, resource industries, agriculture and fishing. They want to please everybody, and let the investment go where it pleases.

There have never been any conscious investment policies. What is the effect of that? The effect is that Canada is a very attractive resource country, and if investment in Canada is left alone, by and large the bulk of that investment will go to the development of resources. That is a natural thing, particularly when many investors are foreigners, with plants in other countries, who are looking for iron ore, asbestos or other raw materials to satisfy the needs of their manufacturing facilities. That is what has happened.

The consequence of this large influx of investment has been to raise the value of the Canadian dollar. The raising of the value of the Canadian dollar and the maintenance of high interest rates which accompany that—and sometimes interest rates are used to stimulate investment coming in—has virtually killed the manufacturing industry. It makes imports cheaper, and exports dearer. Even if our productivity were as good as that of every other country, this policy of maintaining a high value on the Canadian dollar would be disastrous enough. However, when our productivity is not as great as that of other countries, the consequence of maintaining the Canadian dollar at a higher level than the value of our chief competitor, the United States, for example, is virtually to ensure the destruction, or certainly the crippling, of the manufacturing industry in this country.

Our dollar is based on productivity and, after all, that is what a floating exchange rate is supposed to do. A floating exchange rate is supposed to reflect the differences in productivity between one country and another, and on that basis our dollar should be in the region of 90 cents to 94 cents to the American dollar, certainly not at a premium to the American dollar.

The hon. member who preceded me pointed out some of the difficulties with which he is familiar in the agricultural sector, and what has been happening to some agricultural producers. Surely part of the problem, in terms of what he was describing from his experience, also arises from the high value of the dollar. Whether we talk about chickens or machinery, it is the same kind of thing. If our dollar is higher than the American dollar, it is cheaper to go to the United States and buy chickens there. Certainly the Americans will not buy chickens from us, all other things being equal, if our dollar is more expensive, if they have to pay more for it or if their currency does not buy as much in Canada. Yet the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is expected somehow or another to go out and sell Canadian products and have nothing done about the value of the Canadian dollar. That is an impossible thing to do. Little wonder they have to go back to the stable the next day and find it just as full as the day they left it. We have this kind of policy.

The Minister referred to his concern for the unemployed, and I am sure his concern is genuine. But how is he going to achieve full employment in Canada, with the kind of policies this government has been creating? He made one reference which I thought deserved at least a tag line or a credit line for the NDP. He said something along these lines, "We did not go into a recession. We have done better than other people." In my view, the only thing that saved this country from one of the most serious recessions we have ever had—certainly, one which would have been more serious than in the United States—was the fact that over the years the NDP has had some influence in forcing some welfare policies on the government. Without those support programs in this country, without unemployment insurance, without the various grants which are available, and without old age pensions, we would have been so flat that we would have made the thirties look like a picnic. Those are the only things that saved the government—not its cleverness and not its policies.

It is the fact that we have instituted support programs which maintain purchasing power when the inadequacies of the government show and it is not able to do anything about developing an industrial strategy and creating jobs. Unfortunately, while that prevents some of the worst hardships falling on people, it is not what this country wants. The people of this country want jobs. The result of operating these kinds of policies is that we have perhaps avoided a desperate recession, but at what a cost! We have spent money on unemployment insurance and on welfare policies, and lost dignity in many cases. All this could have been avoided by the creation of jobs and the adoption of adequate policies.

One has to ask why, in the face of close to one million unemployed in this country, the government maintains two measures which by everyone's judgment contribute to the loss of exports and the diminution of jobs. The two measures I refer to are high interest rates and the high valuation of the Canadian dollar, which are government policies. Those things do not happen by accident; the government wants it that way. Why does the government do this? I presume it is because it has come to the conclusion that we might have a little more inflation than we have now if we were to move the other way; in other words, in order to have full employment we might have extra inflation. However, now that this whole business of inflation has become less of a real issue than it has become a political issue, the government has brought in its measures under the Anti-Inflation Act. It is quite clear that the Anti-Inflation Board has had a very minor effect, if there has been an effect at all, on prices in the industrial sector.

The figures which show that our inflation has decreased are related to what is happening internationally, but more particularly they are related to some stabilization in the price of energy and a very considerable drop in the price of food. Those are the significant factors in the drop in the increase in the cost of living. If we move away from high interest rates and from a high valuation of the Canadian dollar, one of the initial consequences, because we import so much from the United States, will probably be to raise some prices in this country. I say some prices, but in my view, if it is done in a determined and phased way it should not have any significant inflationary effects. However, we have a government which is scared and whose whole life, if it still exists, seems to hang on success in demonstrating that it has licked inflation or brought it down significantly.

This government is terrified to make any kind of trade-off in favour of creating employment in this country, getting jobs for people or improving our export potential, because these things might show up as a percentage point on the inflationary scale. They have tied their success so much to the Anti-Inflation Board that they are willing to jeopardize every other policy in order to make it look good. I think it is disastrous for this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Saltsman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and may I thank my friends and colleagues in the House. I shall only take a few moments to conclude my remarks.

I take the minister at face value. I have known him for many years and I have no reason to doubt his sincerity. He has said that we really have to do something; that he is going to welcome ideas and he is going to welcome proposals. I do not pretend, and I am sure no other member of the House pretends, to possess the kind of expertise that the minister may have in his department. But what we do have is a kind of overview, and ability to look at what is happening over there. It is our job to be critical, to try to understand what is happening—because everyone is deeply concerned over what I think is a disastrous record in terms of job creation in this country.

There may come a time when we do not have to worry about job creation. It is said that in the 1980s the big boom will be over and then we can turn to capital-intensive industries. At the moment, however, this generation needs jobs—now. At the same time, the government has to make a deliberate choice with regard to creating those jobs. It is going to cost us in some other areas; it may mean that some large resource developments may have to be deferred. So be it, if that is what has to be done.

The greatest service the minister can offer in his new capacity is to bang the table in the cabinet room and say that his department cannot operate unless it gets some kind of plan, some kind of industrial strategy, some kind of industrial outlook which puts all the policies together in such a way as to improve our competitive position.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (York East): Mr. Speaker, I think you can see, by the show of supporters here for myself and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien), that despite our minor setback of yesterday we are indeed a united party, undaunted and willing to follow the leadership of our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) into the next election to battle hon. members opposite. Before I get to the meat of the matter, Mr. Speaker, I should like to take a moment to congratulate Your Honour upon your appointment. From knowing you for many years, I know you will pursue your duties with the utmost diligence and impartiality.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Collenette: It is really a pleasure to take part in the debate this afternoon. The Speech from the Throne and the legislation to be enacted in this session of the thirtieth parliament will, to be quite candid, make or break the Liberal party, the party I represent, the government I have supported for two years and the government I will continue to support.

There has been much rhetoric in this debate concerning the evils of inflation, the anti-inflation program, the problems of implementation of the Official Languages Act, the continuing energy crisis and countless other problems that afflict Canada. In my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I would like briefly to lay before the House the facts as they pertain to the economy and then relate those facts to the political climate which I believe has caused a great amount of uncertainty within the country.

It will be my contention, Mr. Speaker, that the basic problems facing Canada are not overly economic, not necessarily social, not even necessarily linguistic, not cultural, but political. I shall fly a trial balloon for restructuring the parliamentary system as we know it, then conclude with some remarks on the question of national unity and bilingualism.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, let us take a quick look at the economic situation. With the introduction of the anti-inflation program, the inflationary psychology which gained significant momentum in late 1974 and 1975 has, at last, been broken and therefore one can say the policy has been a success. There are those on the other side, especially members of the New Democratic Party, who contend that the anti-inflation program has not been successful in bringing down the rate of inflation but, rather, the huge slide in food prices has been the main reason for a drop in the consumer price index from over 10 per cent to a 6½ per cent annual rate, based on the August figures.

These critics argue that food prices do not fall within the purview of the anti-inflation program and, therefore, the program has had little real effect on the inflationary rate. This is false, since transportation and distribution costs, which do fall under the program, are built into the cost of food products at the retail level.

I think the main success of the program so far has been, as I mentioned earlier, the breaking of the anti-inflation psychology. The exorbitant wage demands that we saw manifesting themselves over the summer of 1975 have, of course, been drastically affected by the program. These labour costs would have worked their way through the pricing system and resulted in huge price increases in 1976. As a result, the rate of increase of retail prices has been significantly curtailed, but not enough, Mr. Speaker, for us to say that the program should be abandoned at this particular time.

The Prime Minister talks about continuation of the anti-inflation program until 1978. I am not so sure that we can wait that long, because the main advantage of any statutory program of wage and price controls is its immediate shock value and as the program bites into more and more sectors of the economy and into personal incomes its popularity diminishes. In addition, any protracted period of controls will drastically restrict business expansion. The program should be wound down over the summer of 1977.

I think it is fair to say, Mr. Speaker, that over the past two or three years, when every industrialized country in the world has been beset with the problems of rapid inflation and high unemployment, Canada has weathered the storm as well as any other nation, with the possible exceptions of West Germany, Sweden and Norway. It is true the economy has not grown. It is true that Canadians, for the first time since the depression, have seen their living standard remain at a standstill. But there has been no decline in the standard of living in this country such as that which has been witnessed in Great Britain, France, Italy and Japan.

Economic recovery is under way and I have no doubt that within two or three years, as the Speech from the Throne indicates, Canada will once again achieve prosperity, although the rate of growth of Canadian prosperity will in no way match the doubling of disposable incomes that we have seen in the past 20 years. Those days, I believe, Mr. Speaker, are gone forever. However, the Canadian people should be told that there is hope for a more gradual betterment of their life in both a material and a spiritual sense. This is borne out by the economic projections we have before us, not only from domestic bodies such as the Economic Council of Canada but also from external agencies such as the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development.

While the standard of living in this country has been marginally affected by inflation and unemployment, we have seen the terrible eruption of many social problems and a trend toward general disrespect for the traditional values and institutions of Canadian society. I think it is not an exaggeration to say that there is great hostility in the land. Much of this hostility is directed toward government at all levels but, of course, is more noticeable in the hostility toward the federal government and the leader of that government who is our Prime Minister.

This is something of which we on this side of the House are fully cognizant. Liberals are engaged in an exercise of searching among ourselves and among our ideas so as to put into proper context the degree of criticism that faces the Prime Minister and the government. We are trying rationally to analyse the reasons for the government's unpopularity and to bring forth concrete policies which respond to the concerns and the frustrations of Canadians.

It appears, Mr. Speaker, that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) does not have the inclination nor perhaps, if the truth be known, the ability to apply himself rationally to the issues which are causing disquiet among Canadians. As we saw in one of the most cliché-ridden and transparent speeches this House has heard from a party leader, certainly in my two years here and perhaps a lot longer than that, the Leader of the Opposition shows a complete lack of insight as to the forces which make this country tick. He talked of Canada as being, and I quote:

—above all, a partnership and the essence of a partnership in this country is to establish a basis of mutual respect and trust. That is broken down in Canada. It is not an accident that it is broken down. It is not due to impersonal forces from abroad, it is broken down because of now nearly a decade of the practice of this government of taking unpredicted unilateral actions and unilateral decisions.

● (1600)

How facile! What rubbish!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Really!

Mr. Collenette: However, I agree with the Leader of the Opposition that mutual respect and trust in the government of Canada has broken down. But it results not from the unilateral actions of the Liberal government; rather, it is, I believe, due to the failure of the parliamentary system as we know it in this country to operate effectively.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: What not blame the weather, or moon spots?

Mr. Collenette: Not only is mutual respect and trust breaking down but, indeed, I believe the country is in danger of breaking up. It is breaking up because this House is not truly a representative one. The concept of a representative parliament on the British model has served this country well for 100 years. But the pace of social and economic change and the regional diversities of the country have led to a situation where parliament, this body of which we are all honourable members, no longer reflects the will of the people.

We, as Liberals, have argued with some pride that we have been the one and only national party in this country. It has been clear for a long time, and I believe the Prime Minister gave official recognition to this point in his speech in Toronto a few weeks ago, that our party can no longer make that claim. Our condition in western Canada is feeble—that is being polite.

By the same token, the Progressive Conservative party is still principally an English-speaking party with scant representation from the province of Quebec and, in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, unlikely to increase that representation at any future election. Yet 25 per cent of those casting votes in the province of Alberta in the last federal election voted for the Liberal party, and 19 per cent in the last federal election voted for the Progressive Conservatives in Quebec. The resulting number of seats gained from that vote distorts the real meaning of democracy. So in this House we have two large parties that are not really national at all, and two minor parties—the Créditistes with almost all of their support from Quebec, and the New Democratic Party which is made up of a few industrial seats in Ontario and British Columbia, and a small rump of agrarian radicals from the prairies.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Fancy calling Stanley Knowles an agrarian radical.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): By "agrarian", the hon. member means down to earth.

Mr. Collenette: There have been many, both inside and outside this House, who have said that the Senate should be resurrected—that is, if it ever was alive—so as to reflect the more regional points of view. One suggestion is that lists of nominees for Senate appointments be prepared by provincial governments. This, in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, would handcuff the administration of national affairs in Canada much as it has in France, the United States and Australia where bicameral legislatures exist. I believe it is essential for the efficient government of a country that there be one national decision-making body—in our case, parliament. However, I believe the method of election of members to parliament could be radically changed to reflect the true sentiments of the people of this country.

There have been many arguments over the years for a system of proportional representation in government. I believe that is perhaps the one answer to solving present Canadian problems. We have to overcome the dilemma of, in effect, having a one-party state as a result of an electoral system that creates a terrible bias by the "winner take all" theory in each constituency. West Germany could, perhaps, be used as a model for any mixed or proportional representation system.

I would put before the House the following suggestion. When the British North America Act is patriated, it should include structural change to the parliamentary system which would continue to allot seats to each province in proportion to population as we now have it, with the same constitutional guarantees that were made to Quebec and to Prince Edward Island, but stipulate that only half the seats in any particular province would be filled by direct election. The remaining 50 per cent of all members in each province would, as in West Germany, be elected by means of a preferential proportional voting system. For those who wish to pursue this idea in depth, I would like to draw attention to the excellent summary of Geoffrey K. Roberts in his book entitled "West German Politics."

It is precisely because parliament does not accurately reflect the views of all parts of this country that regional frustrations have tended to be expressed by the provinces, and with this expression of regional frustrations the power of the provinces has grown inordinately, so that there is much duplication of government in addition to a tendency toward distortion of national fiscal policy by wanton provincial borrowing both from domestic and foreign sources. The notion of equal strength of provinces and the central government as expressed by the Leader of the Opposition and by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) is contradictory. Any continuing devolution of federal powers, whether it be to Quebec or to Alberta, will fracture this country beyond repair, and in only a very few years. I urge and challenge the Leader of the Opposition to come to grips with patriation of the constitution, to put aside his parochial views and, if he can, try to think of the national perspective. This may be difficult to do, because the Leader of the Opposition often appears but a mere handmaiden of rabid provincial interests who pull strings from Edmonton.

Finally, I want to say something on the question of national unity, bilingualism and the encouragement of French immersion courses in English-speaking provinces.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, many English-speaking Canadians born in Canada forget too easily what a minority group is up against. Simply ask a newly-arrived immigrant in Toronto if it is easy to be accepted by the majority. Put the same question to some of our Jewish friends. The answer will be a loud No. New Canadians must suffer hardships by reason of their language and cultural differences; they face discrimination by reason of colour or religion.

Generally speaking, immigrants accept those hardships. They feel it is the price to be paid for acceptance in this country. But the same does not apply to French-speaking Canadians. They are more than a minority, they are part of a minority ranking as an equal partner in this Canadian nation. This is a hard fact of Canadian life, recognized by all parties in Parliament —except the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and his friends.

However, moderate Francophones who are the majority in Quebec must constantly fight on two fronts. They have to fight the separatists whose arguments appeal to the emotions of their fellow citizens. They also have to fight Anglophones who, imbued with a racial superiority complex, make little effort to acknowledge the French fact in their daily lives.

Recent developments have been helping the Parti Québécois and the separatists.

The Official Languages Act is the mortar that binds this country together. Within its terms is enshrined the legal right of Canadians of both languages to be served in their own language by their national government throughout the country. Whenever possible, I feel it is the people's wish that the government provide that service. This was the crux of the air traffic control conflict. If safety and bilingualism are compatible, why deny the implementation of bilingualism in that sector?

A majority of citizens in my riding, and certainly in this country, react favourably to the linguistic and cultural dilemma faced by our French-speaking partners. Only those who are misinformed are unable to accept the inevitable, namely that our country is made up of two founding peoples with two official languages.

[English]

The initiation of French immersion courses in Ottawa, with significant federal financial assistance, has achieved a measure of success almost embarrassing to the government of Ontario, which has substantial jurisdiction over education. The success of this and other programs across the country probably prompted Mr. Spicer to advocate increased bilingual education of young Canadians in Canadian schools.

Following Mr. Spicer's sensible recommendations, and in keeping with the sentiments expressed in the Speech from the Throne, I have a suggestion to make to the newly appointed Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) who, incidentally, is sitting in this House now. He will, I believe, make a tremendous contribution to national unity in his new office. When federal-provincial authorities this winter discuss the renewal of agreements whereby the federal government pays a share of post-secondary education, I believe the government should make, as a condition of its financial support, the requirement that those seeking entry to all university degree programs should be proficient in a second language. The second language need not necessarily be French or English; it could be Italian, Greek, Ukrainian or just about any second language.

This would encourage the children of new Canadians whose mother tongue is other than French or English to pursue their cultural heritage. At the same time, they would be credited with skill in another language for purposes of university entrance. The children of English-speaking parents would, I believe, opt almost exclusively for French as a second language, and children of French-speaking parents would opt almost exclusively for English studies.

I have noted in Toronto during the past few years, on the radio and the other media, expressions of hostility aimed at the Official Languages Act and the undeniable fact of this country's two founding languages and cultures; yet English-speaking parents, especially those in the largely defined middle-class, are among the first to demand French immersion courses in their children's schools. In metropolitan Toronto there are waiting lists of English-speaking students wanting to get into French immersion schools. It is noteworthy that the Ontario Minister of Education, Mr. Wells, recently said it was his aim and the aim of the government of Ontario to ensure that French immersion courses are offered by every school board in Ontario where there is a demand. That is certainly a start.

The time has come for the moderate people, who are the majority in Canada, to come forward and speak the language of reason. This is not the time to remain silent.

Particularly for the Anglophones.

What is at stake is Canada as a nation. It is also the principles of justice and democracy which have served us so well for more than a century. For myself, I do not intend to remain silent.

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I wish to begin by commending the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the throne speech, the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) and the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance), on their forthright comments and, in particular, their brevity in speaking. That was surely a most worthy example for all of us in this House. Also, I wish to record my deep and sincere appreciation for the courage and determination shown by their Excellencies the Governor General and Madam Léger in their very able presentation of the throne speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hargrave: It is my intention this afternoon to make some very specific remarks relating to our Canadian cattle industry. Before doing so, I hope it will be appropriate to make a few brief references to my home constituency of Medicine Hat. Approximately half the population of the federal constituency of Medicine Hat live in the city of that name and in the nearby industrial town of Redcliff. The mayor of Medicine Hat, Ted Grimm, recently announced a new population figure of 33,220, an increase of 17 per cent over the past two years. He said that in his opinion this rapid rate of growth had peaked and that the city was now in a consolidation phase of more modest growth.

At the same time, the mayor of Redcliff, Alf Dutton, can rightfully be proud of an annual population growth of 10 per cent over the past six years to a current total of 2,991 at the June census. These are satisfying growth figures. I should know, because after many years of no growth or, indeed, periods of population shrinkage, these figures are indeed satisfying to those of us in my constituency. They are mainly the result of our recent petrochemical and fertilizer development which is just now coming on stream.

The petrochemical industry is very important to the joint communities of Medicine Hat and Redcliff. The day after the throne speech was presented, Premier Lougheed of Alberta reminded all Canadians of this fact. In a brief reference in his state of the province speech, the premier made it very clear, and I quote:

> Petrosar is a reality but one thing it won't be is an approved purchaser from the Alberta Petroleum Marketing Commission.

He also reminded us that this Alberta position was clearly spelled out on May 16, 1974. Last weekend, at our Quebec City caucus, I had a most interesting conversation with a Quebec lawyer on provincial resource development. We were generally agreed that Alberta and Quebec held somewhat similar views as to the development of non-renewable resources within our provincial boundaries. As I said, we were agreed on this. However, just as we parted company my Quebec friend said, as a very profound afterthought, "The only trouble is, you people in Alberta have too much."

It is not my intention today to make any apologies for my premier or my province. However, I do suggest that the rough justice of the 1930s on the prairies has finally been somewhat tempered two generations later. I also suggest that our at-home non-renewable resource development is necessary to compensate for the present-day transportation inequities. Our resources must be developed wisely. We in Alberta are very conscious of this and we will be ever mindful of the non-partisan wisdom all of us were privileged to hear last night from my colleague, the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean). After all, land and its resources are not something you inherit from your parents; they are things you borrow from your children. We should never forget that.

During the summer recess, at various meetings, visits and travels in my constituency the topics of conversation raised by my constituents nearly always involved at least one or all of the following topics: the obvious bilingual issue, the international political footwork of the government during the Olympics, the capital punishment, peace and security package of legislation, and the government's controls policy. There were very few purely local issues raised with me, just these very serious national and international ones. It should come as no surprise to all members that there were the usual salty comments about the decline in popularity and credibility of the Trudeau government. Running through all these constituency chats was a distinct undercurrent of suspicion and distrust of the direction in which Canada is heading.

Finally, after four years, the left of centre emphasis on legislation that began in the two-year minority parliament is being seriously questioned, if only because of the staggering costs that are now so apparent, surely, to all Canadians. Yesterday's by-elections' results must surely be the final proof, if any were needed, of this personal assessment.

I now wish to turn to agricultural matters and to the Canadian beef cattle industry in particular. No Speech from the Throne in recent memory contained less reference to agriculture than the one now under debate. Only 42 words were used to discuss strictly farm matters. It seems "consultations" are finally to be held with the provinces and farm organizations to "strengthen the structure and productivity of Canadian agriculture". Surely the major disappointment must be that Canada's beef cattle crisis was completely ignored, and this in the face of continuous and massive offshore beef imports and another pending beef war with the United States triggered by President Ford's beef quota announcement on October 9.

Let us examine our current cattle situation. The two major components of our cattle industry, cow-calf and the feeding sectors, continue to be seriously depressed with market prices well below actual costs of production. Fat steers have been losing from $50 to $125 per head since early spring. The same situation generally holds true in the U.S.A. An expected upturn in fed cattle prices in both countries did not develop because of three factors—abnormally high steer numbers in the beef pipeline, the excessive level of beef imports from Australia and New Zealand, and continuing high domestic feed grain prices which contribute so much to sustained high costs of feed lot gains.

The North American beef cattle industry is in serious trouble, essentially because we have too many cattle, especially cows and steers. There is only one outlet for this abnormal production—consumers in the United States and Canada. The cost of moving surplus beef offshore is prohibitive and only accentuates the truth of the fact that no other country in the world can afford to buy North American cattle or beef even at today's depressed producer prices. We must continue, literally, to eat our own surplus on this continent. I must add that we are doing a pretty good job of this. Canada's beef consumption, per capita, is up by five pounds compared to the same period last year.

After a seven-year build-up in cow numbers—43 per cent for beef cows—our national breeding herd began to decline in the fall and winter of last year. But last year's record high calf crop is still in the beef pipeline. Cow numbers will continue to decline this fall and winter, but there is no indication of any shortage of breeding cattle or, of course, feeder cattle. Last August, the U.S. Beef Industry Council summed up the whole situation very succinctly by saying:

> Everything comes down to having 10 per cent to 11 per cent more beef production this year than last . . . we have to work extra hard to move this large supply.

There are two issues currently before our Canadian cattle industry. Each is highly political and their successful resolution is indispensable if the present cattle crisis is to end. First, there are the offshore beef imports from Australia and New Zealand. I consider this issue to be the most important one in the short term. Second, there is the Canada-U.S. cattle and beef trade which I consider to be more important in the area of long-term policy determination.

While these two issues have an obvious common denominator—cattle—they are separate and distinct and must be discussed separately. With regard to the offshore imports issue I would say this: in the face of current record high supplies of North American beef, the last thing we need is a massive increase in imports of beef from "down under." Accumulated imports for the first nine months of 1976 are now up by approximately 55 per cent over the same time-frame in 1975. Some 145,118,000 pounds of frozen carcass and boneless beef entered Canada as of the week ending October 2, 1976, an increase of about 50.9 million pounds compared with 1975.

With the unlimited access to our markets presently enjoyed by Australia and New-Zealand, year-end totals will make up approximately 10 per cent or 11 per cent of total Canadian beef consumption. Further complicating this issue, such imports have been priced 15 cents to 25 cents per pound below the prices of equivalent imports into the U.S. markets and right now they are still coming in up to 15 cents below those prices in spite of the one-sided "six cents under" rule agreed to by Canada on June 11 last.

Why should a pound of Australian or New Zealand beef be worth less than a pound of Canadian beef? This so-called "six cents under" rule was a sell-out by our Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and its minister at the time. Apparently, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) was a party to the deal.

My questions in the House on July 7 and July 8 stated the cattlemen's position in no uncertain terms, and the former minister of industry, trade and commerce said he would take them as notice "to find out the basis of the conclusion which was drawn". Of course, the minister never did respond in the House to the questions I raised. On July 16, in anticipation of this lack of action, I wrote a personal letter to the minister asking for a proper explanation. Two months later he did respond in the course of a lengthy letter which sought to justify the "six cents under" rule. He said, in part:

> During recent years the Canadian boneless beef market has been based on an export equivalent, a term with which you, as a cattleman, are familiar. The price for boneless beef and cows in Canada has been determined by the level at which boneless beef, cows, or both, could be sold in the United States.

I am indeed familar with the term "export equivalent", but I am amazed that the minister's senior staff would be so naive as to advise him that Canadian market levels are always at this export equivalent. Our boneless beef market is determined by the dominant U.S. market, but in actual practice it floats between a Canadian export floor and a U.S. import ceiling. Our minimum boneless beef price will be the United States price less tariff, less freight, less other expenses, plus or minus the dollar exchange. Our maximum price would be the United States price plus tariff, plus freight and other expenses, plus or minus the dollar exchange. This means, of course, that depending on the relative domestic supply situation in each country, our prices can be above or below United States prices.

There is no reason that Canada should always operate at the export floor level. The "six cents under" rule simply means that Canadian producers are paying the tariff and transportation charges on equivalent volumes of Australian and New Zealand beef imports. This is a considerable amount of money. Hon. members may be familar with the current round of questions in the House on this issue.

In spite of the statement by the Minister of Agriculture as reported at page 103 of Hansard of October 15, that no beef or veal would be allowed into Canada after Sunday night, October 17, unless by permit, one fact remains clear: nowhere has the minister stated he intends to restrict, reduce or, hopefully, temporarily stop Australian and New Zealand beef imports into Canada. The minister's individual permit device is merely a diversion which indicates no intention whatever of "federal action to protect beef markets", to quote the heading of his news release of October 13.

The Canadian cattle and beef market continues to remain the only major market in the world without protection against offshore imports. United States cattle producers have their meat import law and we saw how effective it was last October 9. The minister refuses to consider the counterpart of that, a Canadian meat import law; he says that our Export and Import Permits Act will accomplish the same results. But nowhere has he acted to use this legislation that is presently on the books. I say to this House that it is completely irresponsible for the Minister of Agriculture to suggest that these imports do not compete with our fed cattle markets. He has said this consistently all through the summer.

While our frozen carcass imports generally supplement our domestic cow-beef supplies, these frozen, boneless cuts do compete directly with our grade A fresh beef supplies. Witness last week's sudden market strength in the United States that was due mainly to a sympathetic reaction by U.S. cattlemen and the entire industry to their prompt quota action on offshore imports. The same market increases could occur here if similar action were taken with respect to offshore imports of beef.

Before leaving this item, Mr. Speaker, it should be pointed out that in 1975 Canada had a deficit trade balance with Australia and New Zealand of some $113,034,000. Historically, Canada has been a net exporter in its trade with these two countries until the last few years. Our main export commodities to Australia and New Zealand are manufactured products. It now seems highly probable that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is deliberately using this trade deficit as a trading lever for further manufactured goods in our trade with these two countries—at the expense, of course, of our Canadian cattle industry.

I should now like to deal with the second major cattle issue, the Canadian-United States cattle and beef trade. As I intimated earlier, this is the more important in terms of long-term policy development for Canada's cattle industry. Recent developments in our cattle and beef dealings with the United States have become headline items, starting with the firing of United States Secretary Earl Butz and the subsequent imposition of meat import quotas by the United States. This, of course, is recognized as a highly political issue in that country, with both parties trying to attract the farm vote in the final stages of their election campaigns.

Let me take a quick look at the cattle and beef trade with our trading partner, the United States. The following figures are from the Department of Agriculture's blue book of statistics on livestock marketing, and they are for the last week of record, October 2, 1976. These are the cumulative totals from January 1 to October 2, 1976, a period of some nine months. Canada's imports of beef amount now to 17.8 million pounds; one year ago the corresponding figure was 9.4 million. As for imports of slaughter cattle, which includes both cattle and slaughter calves, imports amounted to 147,804 head; last year the corresponding figure was 65,653 head.

Now the other side of the coin, our exports to the United States. We exported 71.8 million pounds of beef, compared with only 14.5 million pounds last year. As for cattle, which includes four categories, slaughter cattle, feeders, beef breeding cattle and slaughter calves, we exported 231,936 head this year, compared with 34,065 head in 1975. It is of interest to note that during the last week of record, ending October 2, 5,837 head of slaughter cattle and calves were imported into Canada. I repeat, that was in one week, Mr. Speaker. Most of these cattle came into either Ontario or Manitoba. The point is that right now, in spite of heavy imports of United States fed cattle, in our total trade balance with the United States we have a substantial positive trade balance in dollars, number of head and pounds of beef. We should not forget that at the negotiating table with the U.S.A.

Several weeks ago our agricultural minister made some statements on CBC radio concerning offshore imports. He took the occasion to sort of brag about this healthy Canadian trade balance with the United States. Surely, in view of recent developments, this was not a very prudent thing to do—to rub it in, if you like, or to flaunt it in the face of United States cattlemen and politicians in the heat of their presidential campaign. Canada cannot afford even remotely to consider another cattle and beef war with the United States. Our memories cannot be that short.

While I have always strongly supported the concept that we must remain a vital part of the North American cattle and beef market, I quickly add that this concept must be fair both ways. Right now, the United States meat import law and their 10 per cent ad valorem duty on our processed meat exports gives a clear advantage to the United States at the negotiating table. I suggest that Canada's cattle industry is much better off in the North American market, even if we have to negotiate these unfair items, than risking the total loss of the United States market which must be considered inevitable if our cattle industry moves in a supply-management direction. Let us not forget, Mr. Speaker, the 100,000 Canadian cows that were absorbed by the United States market in 1975, or what they would have been worth in Canada without that market.

Yesterday afternoon unofficial United States sources suggested that our U.S. quota will be 80.4 million pounds of beef for the whole of calendar year 1976. I stress that this figure comes from an unofficial United States source. This, of course, is considerably short of the minister's figure of 90 million pounds. With the actual figure now approaching 74 million pounds as of today, it becomes more important than ever that Canada act immediately to restrict Australian and New Zealand imports before our own surplus starts to back up when the United States quota is filled, perhaps early in November.

I have been somewhat critical, Mr. Speaker, of the government's direction, or lack of it, in our cattle industry, particularly under the agriculture and industry, trade and commerce ministers. I trust that the members of this House will recognize that these are truly objective comments, even if it is the way I see it.

In concluding these throne speech remarks, I wish to record, again as I see it, three short-term policy recommendations and four long-term policy considerations relating to our beef cattle industry. I shall deal first with the short-term items. First, there should be immediate and even retroactive action on the Australian-New Zealand meat import issue by the establishment of a Canadian meat import law or by making the import permits act really work. Second, if federal political action is necessary at the producer level, let it be limited to a stop-loss stabilization approach as provided for by the minister's own Bill C-50, but not a top-loaded plan.

• (1640)

Third, let those provinces already operating their own programs—they are British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec—continue until a federal stop-loss policy becomes operative. You must remember that a number of these provincial plans are based on individual five-year contracts, so it would be extremely difficult to superimpose a federal program on them. At the same time, and in addition to the last item, let us have an announcement now as to what the fed cattle support price is for 1976. Surely this is long overdue; it has been promised by the minister practically throughout the year.

Let me turn to long-term cattle policy considerations. First, we should not be recommending supply-management for Canada's beef cattle industry. If this development ever comes into being, it must be as a result of a request by Canada's beef producers only, and not by federal government promotion. Second, we should strive to preserve the North American market concept that recognizes the two-way flow of both live cattle and beef with nominal tariffs only between Canada and the United States. Third, we should recognize and eliminate the east-west inequities that currently exist—I am thinking here of transportation costs—resulting in a gradual but definite shift in Canada's feeding industry for cattle and hogs from western Canada to Ontario and Quebec.

Fourth, we should decide now that Canada can, and should, go all out to produce cattle and beef in vigorous competition with the United States, even if it means moving to a net export position. I am sure that is the position we now have in Canada. Finally, Mr. Speaker, surely our Canadian cattle industry has had far too many ill-advised, short-term, ad hoc government policies, both federal and provincial, with absolutely no clearly defined long-term policy objectives. The single exception here, of course, is the obsession of the Minister of Agriculture in respect of supply management for our cattle industry. This is an approach which I cannot accept. Surely the time is overdue for politicians to think and plan in terms of the next generation of cattle producers, rather than in terms of the next election. Promises of federal subsidies might win a few votes and lose our cattle industry.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Maurice Harquail for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. John Wise.

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne and the speech by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) dealt largely with the problems facing this country and the choices which are open to the Canadian people, at a time when Canada no longer seems able to maintain a precarious balance between economic growth and the distribution of national wealth, through traditional means. My obvious interest in federal economic policies which has led me, ever since I was elected to this House, to sit on the Standing Committde on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, on the Standing Committee on Regional Development and on the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, might also induce me to expound in this debate the principles of what may be the foundations of economic democracy in Canada today.

However the resignation of the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Marchand) on June 30, the rulings by the Quebec Supreme Court and the Quebec Court of Appeal in the case against Air Canada, and more recently, the resignation of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) are issues which, to say the least, must be tackled. Therefore I feel I ought to deal exclusively with the first part of the Speech from the Throne, namely the part entitled "National Unity". In this connection, I must say that, because of the crisis Canada is facing today, this part of the official prose cannot be said to be erring on the side of audacity, still less by the boldness of major reforms which the problems our country is facing now would warrant, in my opinion.

Those who, at the time the Official Languages Act was adopted on September 6, 1969, believed for a while that bilingualism was once and for all with us, forever part of the Canadian structure, lost their remaining illusions when the former minister of national defence made public his letter of resignation. In this letter, he stated, quote:

> . . . it seems to me that most Canadians would consider it prudent to continue for some time longer with the bilingual experiment before agreeing to entrench increased language rights, for all time, in the Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, there is nothing new in this statement; it is only the extension of a vision of this country which dates as far back as the Treaty of Paris of 1763, at a time when James Murray was cleverly administering the Test Oath, controlling British immigration and the imperial economy. This vision which the former minister is echoing again was more rudely expressed in an infamous report, both in its excessive and racist approach. Lord Durham wrote in February 1839, and I quote:

Do French Canadians constitute a nation? . . . I do not know of any national feature which marks and maintains a more desperate inferiority . . . It is to extricate them from their inferiority that I wish to give Canadians our English character . . . I want it in the best interest of educated classes whom language and custom barriers keep apart from the great empire to which they belong . . . I am even more in favour of amalgamation in the interest of lower classes . . . If those people try to improve their condition by speading out into the neighboring country, they will necessarily come into closer contact with an English population; if they prefer to stay put remain where they are most of them will become labourers working for English capitalists. Wrongs generated through hardship and dependance would simply be aggravated and increased by feelings of a jealous and rancorous nation which would separate the working class from the owners of wealth and the employers of labour. These people have no history and no literature. Their nationality prevents them from enjoying the pleasures and the civilizing influence of arts.

For the royal observer, French Canadians were reduced to a state of inferiority, poverty and dependence. To improve our lot, the British lord suggests that we become good English workers, working in English for English capitalists under English peace and English civilization.

● (1650)

Those words did not fall on deaf ears, Mr. Speaker. Manitoba's joining Confederation made it possible to follow that advice. Need I remind the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Richardson) how the French language lost its official status in Manitoba? A little more than a year was enough. All the steps which were taken from February 4, 1889 to March 28, 1890, coincided in fact with a number of others to close the French-speaking Roman Catholic schools.

On February 4, 1889, a report by the committee on the printing of the proceedings recommending that the Votes and Proceedings no longer be printed in French was adopted. On February 11, a resolution amended the rules of the House so that motions would no longer be put in both languages and the bills would not be printed in French. On March 7, it was decided that the notices concerning private members' bills would be published in the English journals only. On March 20, Bill 43 was passed to abolish French juries. On March 22, Bill 70 was passed. It was entitled "An Act to provide that the English language shall be the official language of the Province of Manitoba". Finally, on March 28, 1889, a second report from the committee on printed material was passed which recommended that minutes and statutes be printed in English only.

Strengthened by its success and the speed with which action had been taken in the case of the courts and the legislative assembly, the government of Prime Minister Greenway decided then to tackle the school system. Besides, according to the liberal philosophy of the times, cultural and linguistic freedoms were to exist only to the extent where they were supported by a majority. The French speaking group in Manitoba which represented half the population in 1870, had gone down to one third in 1890. Having dwindled to a minority, it was easy to abolish the French sector of the school system since, according to that same so-called liberal philosophy, the majority had all the rights.

Of course, at the time, the case went before the courts. An appeal was made to the Governor General who took the case before the judicial committee of the Privy Council in 1894. The judicial committee recognized the claims of the French speaking group and sent the case back to the Governor General. But an ultimatum delivered by the federal government to the government of Manitoba in 1896 remained a dead letter. The Conservative government was defeated and Laurier came into power on November 19, 1896. A compromise was reached which left only a semblance of rights. In some cases, a teacher may teach in French and in English in those schools where there is a great number of Francophones. And with time, the number of Francophones in Manitoba went down gradually. In 1951, French was the mother tongue of 7 per cent of Manitobans. In 1961, 6.6 per cent and in 1971, 6.1 per cent. Hopelessly left to themselves, these Francophones are on the verge of assimilation. A projection of those figures over a longer period leaves no doubt as to the trend of the curve. In 1931, in Manitoba, the rate of Canadian-born Francophones adopting English as their mother tongue was 12.1 per cent. In 1971, it was 35.5 per cent.

Without batting an eye, the former Minister of National Defence goes on to say:

As years go by . . . bilingualism proves its merit, or disproves its worth, as a Canadian ideal.

There we are, 140 years after the Durham report. The member for Winnipeg South refuses to entrench the linguistic and cultural duality of Canada. Without blenching, he equates the rights of individuals with the programs aimed at having them respected. As far as he is concerned, the recognition of a right is inseparable from the administrative means of ensuring its respect. I ignore what concept of civil liberties is involved in the reasoning of the former Minister of National Defence, but how can we not recognize today that if there is so many problems to be encountered on the road to bilingualism, it is partly because certain provinces in Canada have contrived as early as 1870 to abolish all the rights of the French language, without realizing that one day the country might well be torn asunder unless the indefeasible rights of its citizens get to be guaranteed by law.

History, at least the history of Manitoba, shows that once the French language has been eradicated from public institutions, the rate of assimilation of the French-speaking community is greater and, as a consequence, its size tends to decrease.

So this is how some people with a certain amount of blunt straightforwardness see their responsibility with respect to the freedom and the rights of one of the communities which has been endeavouring since the 17th century in this country, despite difficulties, hesitations, half-successes, to build a society a little more tolerant, a little more pluralist, under conditions where the choice of values has to remain the responsibility of the individual and where the state must refrain from opposing diversity and dissidence either by constraint or by intimidation, or even less by omission.

But if Canada, as it is now, is to have a future, the absolute respect of the cultural rights of its citizens will have to be its unremitting task. Each of us is part of the natural or historical community in which he grew up. Each individual is a living system of behaviour, values, knowledge, ideals and dreams. The cultural right is the power everybody has to remain what he is, unadorned and unadulterated. Wanting to get rid of your origins is to kill your originality. Against the assault of a state, an economy and a dominating culture which levels behaviours and erase specific characteristics, the right to be oneself, to be different, the respect of diversity do not represent, whatever the former minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) might think, a threat for national unity throughout Canada. A nation which fails to formally recognize in its political structures the right to cultural freedom does deserve to survive and it is its citizens' duty to do their best to give themselves the political structures which will ensure their own protection, with all their limitations and yearnings. Absolute respect for cultural differences cannot break up or impede the growth of a state; on the contrary, abusive centralism can do more to create oppositions and tragedies.

If national cohesion must exist in Canada, it will paradoxically be a cohesion of differences, not similarities. This will be a country where the economy, peace and civilization will not be exclusively English. To think that French-Canadians can lend themselves much longer to bilingual experiments before they may be assured that their rights are definitely safeguarded in the Canadian political structure is to attach very little importance to the lessons that the French-speaking community is learning from the crisis in air communications and at Air Canada. A Canadian federal state which strives to be a "liberal" democracy must entrench in its Constitution the respect of the linguistic and cultural freedoms of its citizens.

The passing of the Official Languages Act in 1969 was a first step toward the explicit and formal recognition of the English and French language rights in federal institutions. When one tries today to measure how far we have gone, one is surprised to find that the results are still so little and people are so reluctant. There were loud cries about French power, the invasion of the public service by French-speaking bureaucrats, the violation of the merit principle. What is left after all those denunciations and scarecrow frights?

In the Department of External Affairs, there are no French-speaking bureaucrats in senior official positions. In the Department of Communications from 1974 to 1976, the number of French-speaking people at those same levels varied by eight tenths of one per cent. The percentage of French-speaking technocrats in the scientific and professional category did not vary in three years. In the Privy Council, from 1974 to 1976, the number of French-speaking employees decreased in both categories by 2.4 per cent in senior official positions and 16.4 per cent in the scientific and professional category. In the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, French-speaking civil servants occupy 7.1 per cent of the senior official positions and 6 per cent of the scientific and professional positions. In the Department of the Environment, they represent 7.1 per cent of the personnel at that level.

From 1974 to 1976, in the Department of Finance, the number of French-speaking senior executives dropped from 9.1 per cent to 7.1 per cent. In the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the proportion varies between 11 and 13 per cent. Even in the Department of the Secretary of State, in the scientific and professional category, in the last three years, the number dropped by 12.9 per cent.

As far as the Department of Transport is concerned, the number of French-speaking employees decreased in those two categories. It fell from 8.5 per cent in the executive category in 1974 to 6.2 per cent in September 1976. In the scientific and professionnal category, it went down from 13.1 to 12.2 per cent.

Those figures show, Mr. Speaker, that still very few French-speaking civil servants made it to the top. There is no way the progress made so far can be said to be preferential treatment; indeed, it has been so slow that one might wonder if in the present context it will be possible to create that "critical basin", that "cultural density" needed to channel present trends with regard to Francophone participation in the Public Service, so that the ratio of French-speaking civil servants will be equal to that of French-speaking Canadians.

To solve those problems a review of the first part of the resolution passed by Parliament in June 1973 is needed. Appearing before the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, on April 29, 1976, the Commissioner of Official Languages made those comments and I quote:

● (1700)

> As a ball-park guess, I would surmise that a good three-quarters of the money that goes for "bilingualism", in effect, protects the careers of unilingual Anglophones. When you look at double banking, language training, and, even, translation, much of it is to protect Anglophones. The one comment I would like to make to some people, who are not enchanted with the whole idea of language equality, is that one can criticize the program because one thinks it is unfair, or because one thinks it is a waste, but one cannot really do both at once . . .
> Language courses cost a lot of money, and, if you want to belly ache about discrimination and rumour monger about terrible scandals against English-speaking in the Public Service, then, get ready to pay for it. I think Parliament bent over backwards, in June, 1973, when it guaranteed that unilinguals would have exactly the same rights as bilinguals, in applying for bilingual jobs. That resolution of June 1973 was necessary politically. But I just point out, since we are all looking at a bit of cost-benefit and value-for-money analysis after the program has been going for 5 or 10 years, that sooner or later I think we are going to have to look at the long term payoff . . . The June 1973 resolution should not be considered as a permanent panacea.

We should therefore, Mr. Speaker, amend as soon as possible the provisions of this resolution so as to grant to recognized bilingual applicants only the advertised positions classified as bilingual, subject to competition. It is with such a reform only that we shall be able to create bilingual districts without at the same time suppressing the desired effects.

Mr. Speaker, three major factors have influenced the development of various linguistic groups in Canada. The most basic factor is of course the language spoken by the immigrants. But everything has contributed and still contributes to give the English language an ever increasing importance in Canada: the increasing number of ethnic groups who choose almost exclusively English as their spoken language; linguistic mobility and differences in the birth rate which prevent us from maintaining linguistic balance.

From 1871 to 1951, nearly 80 years, the French-speaking people made up nearly 30 per cent of the Canadian population. Today, they constitute 28 per cent only, and if the differences noted in 1971 between the mother tongue and the spoken language prevail until the year 2000, population experts foresee that the French-speaking people will then make up 23 per cent of the Canadian population and it is outside Quebec that the decrease will be more noticeable. Without drastic initiatives, there will of course remain centres of resistance in northern New Brunswick and the northern part of Ontario adjacent to Quebec, but elsewhere there will remain only marginal sub-groups.

Even in Quebec, the attraction of English is ten times that of French. In 1971, in Montreal, 66 per cent of the population was French-speaking. If the same conditions prevail, in the year 2000, only 59 per cent of the population of Montreal will be French-speaking. The assimilation rate of English-speaking people in Quebec is five times lower than that of French-speaking Quebecers. Even bilingualism has a marked assimilating effect among French-speaking people outside Quebec and New Brunswick. It will therefore be necessary for the federal government to define the elements of a demographic policy for Canada during the debate on the amendments to the Immigration Act announced in the Speech from the Throne. We cannot accept that a government supposedly anxious to preserve the stability of relationships between the main communities in Canada go on ignoring the effects of immigration on the linguistic imbalance.

At the same time, this population policy would only be successful insofar as it is supplemented by a much more dynamic policy of assistance to French-speaking minorities, a much better funded policy that acknowledges the fact that Francophones outside Quebec are in danger of being assimilated before long to the English-speaking majority. In the past 40 years, the assimilation figures have, generally, more than doubled. At this rate, 25 per cent of the Francophones in New Brunswick will be assimilated by the year 2000 and for all the other provinces, the percentage will exceed 60 per cent. This policy of increased assistance to Francophone minorities must be based mainly on a cultural policy which is tragically lacking.

The Massey Commission on National Developmnt in the Arts, Letters and Sciences submitted its report more than 25 years ago. At that time, that is in 1951, none of the great modern mass media had appeared on the scene: the CRTC, the CBC, cable television, none of these media which directly influence our personal values, shape our collective behaviors and social perception, existed then. Culture as we see it today is no longer restricted to the so-called classical arts. It encompasses even more every aspect of life in society and of the individuals which live in it.

Along with the conventional arts there are today the cultural environment, communications, regional development and popular culture, the economic aspects of culture, the cutural industry, its manpower and the whole network of influences and exchanges which the Massey Commission could not imagine in 1951. Twenty-five years later, we must try to define a cultural policy which takes more into consideration the linguistic balance that Canada tries to achieve and assigns a special role to communications in the definition and perception that the Canadian society may have of itself.

The goals of pursued by the federal government are not inconsistent with those of the provinces, especially those of Quebec, provided an attempt is made to steer clear of constitutional technicalities. Consequently, the government should set up without delay a commission whose terms of reference would be to define the terms and conditions of a cultural policy in accordance with the linguistic duality of Canada. Furthermore, the government should review the whole concept of the legal safeguard of linguistic rights. The Victoria Charter proposed to restore all linguistic and cultural liberties in the public institution that had progressively abolished them in the English-speaking provinces.

However, as its fate is still uncertain, the federal government should reaffirm its determination to see to it that English and French have equal status, rights and privileges in all institutions and in all matters under the jurisdiction of the federal government and Parliament. To this end, it must exercise its authority pursuant to section 91 (1) of the British North America Act and entrench in the constitution of the federal Parliament section 2 of the Official Languages Act. The federal Parliament has every power to amend the constitution but such powers are subject to the concept of power sharing, as set out in sections 91 and 92, to the office of Governor General and to the linguistic rights, as defined in section 133. Nothing in the wording nor in the philosophy restricts the power of the federal Parliament to provide a constitutional and a legal safeguard to the equality of both languages within federal institutions. This should only prompt even more the provincial governments to agree to append the provisions of the Victoria Charter on individual rights and liberties to a patriated constitution.

Mr. Speaker, I therefore intend to urge my colleagues in the House to take part in the debate on the repatriation of the Canadian constitution, so that the linguistic and cultural rights of the two great Canadian communities be constitutionally and legally safeguarded.

The government announced its intention of introducing a Human Rights Bill. According to the text of the announcement, the major effect of the bill will be to prohibit discrimination on the grounds of race, colour, national or ethnic origin, religion, age, sex, marital status or physical handicap.

Well, as one can see language is not mentioned in the list of guaranteed rights. We strongly maintain that linguistic discrimination must be penalized and repressed in the same manner as racial discrimination; why prohibit discrimination on grounds of religion and not on grounds of language, whether it is Spanish, Ukrainian or French? Therefore we must make sure that adequate amendments will be introduced at the right moment. At the same time, is it proper to repress linguistic discrimination in national bargaining units.

The government cannot assert on one hand they want to protect civil and public liberties while accepting on the other hand that their partners in the collective bargaining process openly indulge in language discrimination; the judgement made by the Public Service Staff Relations Board on March 12, 1976, following the grievances of Jean-Luc Patenaude against the Canadian Air Traffic Controllers Association creates a precedent which we must prevent from repeating. It is unacceptable that duly elected labour representatives, such as Mr. Réal Vaillancourt, an executive member of Local 1751 of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, still have to resort to legal procedures so that their union may obtain the right to work in French in the province of Quebec, not in Winnipeg, but in Montreal itself, where there are still mostly French-speaking people, so far as I know.

As long as employees of the federal public service or agencies or Crown corporations will be discriminated against without any action whatsoever being taken against the people responsible, any hope of seeing both language groups work peacefully and closely together within the same working unit will be pure utopia. It will therefore be necessary to amend sections 39 and 42 of the Public Service Staff Relations Act in order to give language rights in staff relations the same protection as guaranteed by law to race, national origin, color, sex or religion.

On the other hand, in view of progress made and difficulties encountered since the Official Languages Act was passed, we must without further delay review, extend and adjust the legislation so it will reflect current conditions.

First of all, the studies which are made by the Official Languages Commissioner on progress and problems encountered by each department or agency trying to reach the goals defined in the act and which are submitted to the Privy Council, must be followed up by Parliament. Too many annual recommendations from the commissioner have been laid to rest and too many departments have given more priority to administrative efficiency than to the fulfilment of this obligation. We therefore suggest that any report to Parliament under that legislation be referred to a Commons committee for study and recommendations to be tabled within twelve months.

● (1710)

It is essential to find procedures for reviewing and implementing the recommendations given to Parliament by the Commissioner of Official Languages. The present situation of Air Canada gives us an example of the shortcomings of the legislation in that respect. Each year for the last five years, the commissioner has issued recommendations which unfortunately fell somewhat short of being likely to bring the operations of the company to the level of equity sought under the statute. Therefore we must now proceed to the following stage and reinforce parliamentary control.

On the other hand, the fabric of public services in Canada is such that its exploitation must be left partially to the private sector, as is the case for telecommunications and air transportation. This situation has its advantages but requires special controls and monitoring from the federal government. This is why our system has organizations which are responsible to see that these undertakings—which are part of public services or manage them and constitute, de facto or in right, a sort of monopoly in a region or even in the whole country—conform to the same standards of linguistic equity as the one being imposed on corporations and Crown companies.

Why should Air Canada have to enforce the Official Languages Act on the Montreal-Paris flight while CP Air would not on the Toronto-Milan line? CP Air and Bell Canada operate monopolies under the guarantee of organizations responsible before Parliament. These concerns have licences to operate in the public interest and in return for profits. Strangely enough the Official Languages Act does not apply to these undertakings and yet the linguistic rights of our citizens must be protected, whoever administers these services.

It is only fair therefore to restore the balance and extend enforcement of the Official Languages Act to monopolies which in fact or in their own right operate or offer public services. So we will move an amendment to the law, which will ensure that the same quality of service and equal access be readily available to both linguistic groups.

The one goal of these reforms, amendments and initiatives is to buttress an overly delicate balance, restore confidence among the majority of French-speaking people—particularly in Quebec on the eve of elections—through determination of Parliament to establish firmly in the political institutions of the country the conditions without which this debate night very well end up in an open conflict.

Court proceedings had to be initiated to secure implementation by a federal corporation of an Act that was meant to be the foundation of the Canadian political structure, and the distinct safeguard of the linguistic rights of French-speaking Canadians.

The concepts nurtured by the various parties to the proceedings against Air Canada and the Federal Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) in recent months are best described in the ruling made by the Chief Justice of the Quebec Superior Court on April 6, 1976, in the case of The Protestant School Board of Greater Montreal vs. The Minister of Education of the province of Quebec.

Justice Jules Deschênes wrote, and I quote:

> This event (Canada's change of allegiance from the French to the British Crown) has been labelled a "transfer" by overly modest French-speaking historians, while English-speaking historians, undoubtedly more realistic and relying on military facts, called it a "conquest".
>
> For two centuries our two communities have been pursuing on our common territory the conflict of these two concepts of history. The Official Language Act is just another episode. The battle was transferred from the Plains of Abraham to the National Assembly and then to the Court of Justice: the stake is still the same . . .
> We are indeed going through a major turn in Canada's and Quebec's history. There are no longer any winners and losers, vanquished and conquerors, but two communities called upon by an historical accident to permanently share one part of America. Each has its own traditions and culture which it is determined to preserve. A majority here and a minority there, either of them knows the delight of power and the fear of intolerance. The only difference is that among

French-speaking people, the latter has been a longer experience while the former is still a new one almost with the appeal of the unknown.

The Hon. Jean Marchand's resignation, the responsibility which my colleague, the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané), and myself have assumed in the current conflict, and on the other hand the views upheld by the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Richardson) and his supporters must be seen in the context of a situation where there is no future for this country if cultural and linguistic freedoms are not guaranteed in an intangible way.

Depending on the choice made by members of this House during the constitutional debate, we will have a measure of the will of the majority and of their belief in the rights and freedoms without which no political balance can ever be guaranteed in this country. Such is the lesson we must draw from the history of Quebec and Canada.

The dissolution of the National Assembly in Quebec and the decision to hold a general election have given me an opportunity to review the role, responsibility and manner in which I can best at this stage help in defining and safeguarding in this country's political institutions the cultural duality which is particular to our society.

At a time when within the party and the caucus to which I belong some views inconsistent with my idea of the structure of our country have been stated by a resigning minister and at a time when I believed in the Official Languages Act to the point of handing my resignation to the caucus as the result of legal proceedings instituted to obey to the letter and the spirit of the law, I cannot resign my seat in the House in the belief that I could fight more effectively outside to protect the rights and freedoms of my fellow-citizens which the federal system is to provide if such a system is to survive.

Therefore, I will not seek a seat at the Quebec legislature in the next provincial election. I would like to thank the individuals who have shown their confidence in me and who have invited me to join their ranks during this campaign. I hope however that under the present circumstances, to be able to continue to cooperate with representatives of all the parties to develop those resources of tolerance and democratic spirit without which the essence of all our freedoms will be questioned.

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I wish first of all to mention that the mover and the seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne carried out their duties very well. Their assignment was simplified due to the fact that the Speech from the Throne for this session is rather a summary of good intentions. Unable to spend lavishly, the federal government seems mainly determined to allay fears and do away with the sources of dissatisfaction. Apparently, it is trying to sum up all the criticisms which have been directed to it especially over the past year and to appease everybody. In this period of inflation and unemployment which often reach a record high, it was normal to direct the legislation towards a more equitable sharing of responsibilities.

The main objectives may be summarized as follows: Equality of opportunities (probably the only possible form of equalitarianism), national unity, the rights of the individuals and the function of the state, which are the main themes to come out of the speech which the Governor General of Canada and his wife delivered at the opening of the Second Session. I am pleased to join with hon. members who have preceded me in this debate to offer them my best wishes. These objectives of "national unity" and "equality of opportunities" are very praiseworthy, and all Canadians certainly share these aspirations. It will be important to draft legislation taking into consideration all the elements which in the past contributed to delay the realization of this "national unity" and of this "equality of opportunity".

I think it is in order to mention here that the concern of French Canadians is to ensure in French Canada the conditions which are necessary to its survival at a time when it is ever more urbanized, increasingly transformed to become the industrial and manufacturing community it is today. They are concerned about whether there will be real sharing of power between Canadians from both linguistic collectivities in all spheres of life in our country, in the business world, in government and in the public service or whether this sharing will only be symbolic.

I am glad to note that the government puts forward programs designed to teach both official languages in all schools in Canada, in agreement with the provinces. The hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) who is confined to bed in hospital, often suggested this means of understanding between Canadians of goodwill in this House. It would be advantageous to have in the provinces, both for English-speaking and French-speaking Canadian people who would like to benefit from this, French and English teaching facilities for youth at all levels and in every place where they are justified by school attendance.

It would also be beneficial for national unity to overcome the geographic barriers that tend to separate our two cultures by granting travel subsidies to serious artists, more generous credits to the National Film Board. From coast to coast there should be a comprehensive service of French TV and radio so that the million French Canadians living outside Quebec as every other Canadian may have access to French culture.

When there will be better understanding among people we shall be able to prevent control towers from becoming Babel towers to the point that some fanatics consider the use of French in the air as a safety hazard. It is absolutely ridiculous. The province of Quebec is not the only territory in the world where French is spoken. There have always been landings and takeoffs in several French-speaking countries such as France, Belgium, Switzerland to mention just a few. "The French aeronautical terminology is at least as rich if not richer than the American terminology in the same field." This opinion was not voiced by people in aviation but by Canada's ambassador in Paris, Mr. Gérard Pelletier.

I am pleased to see that French Canada finally dares express its feelings and the rest of the country listens, still with some surprise but more and more carefully. I wish that French voices will not become too harsh and that English ears will become really friendly so that Canada will have a bright future.

Let us not forget that very few countries have, as their official languages, those that are among the greater vehicles of though in the world. Canada can consider itself as very privileged to use, as its official languages, two of the most international languages of our time. Obviously, it is as vital for our unity that Canadians may benefit from equal opportunity for individual and regional economic development. That objective of equal opportunities constitutes a whole program and if equal opportunities are really to be given, the government will have to get used to studying the problems of poverty, unemployment, debts and strikes in a slightly more realistic light, otherwise that allusion to equal opportunities will be no more than an illusion. In March of 1975, the Canadian Welfare Council published a report on the children of the poor in Canada. Several conclusions, though they are not new, deserve to be mentioned.

Canadians love to think that in our society all children have equal chances to reach as high as their aptitudes would have them. Though they start out in life in very different circumstances we deceive ourselves into believing that all children, rich or poor, can achieve success. The facts are altogether different. To be born in poverty in Canada does not mean that one will necessarily remain poor to the end of his days, but it does make it most probable.

To be born poor means that one's chances to finish high school are reduced, that the possibility of going to university are slight. To be born poor means that changes are greater that as an adolescent one will be considered a delinquent, that one will be sent to reform school. When one is poor, the die is cast: one will have to fight to go up in life. To be born poor is unfair for a child. Of the 6.76 million children under 16 years of age in Canada at the time of the 1971 census, 1.66 million were poor. That report describes those children. What kind of life do they have today? What can they hope for the future? How does one grow up deprived of food, toys, clothes and outings? How does one grow up branded by poverty?

It is important that we Canadians understand the effects of an unfair distribution of the national income on the unfortunate people who live below the poverty level. It is no less important to understand that the numerous hardships suffered by poor children can be removed. There is no reason for children to grow up in poverty in Canada, for there is no reason for poverty to exist in Canada.

Census data show there is a large number of children living in poverty in every Canadian province. The greater percentage is found in Newfoundland where nearly half the children (45.3 per cent) come from families who live below the poverty level. More than a third of the children in Saskatchewan (38.4 per cent), Prince Edward Island (37.3) and New Brunswick (34.9 per cent) are also living in poverty. Even in the rich provinces of Ontario and British Columbia, with the lowest percentages, more than one out of six children come from families who live below the poverty level.

The chains of poverty which shackle poor children are the result of a long process which often starts even before they are born. A working paper on health prepared by the Canadian government in 1974, says at the outset: Health is the bedrock on which social progress is built. It may be true, but health and poverty seldom go together. As regards poor children, it would have been more relevant to point out that their future prospects are jeopardized because of their bad health.

You know very well that I could quote excerpts from a number of reports on poverty in Canada. I mentioned the report on poor children to show that there is much to do if we really want all Canadians to enjoy those equal opportunities mentioned in the speech from the throne. However, a part of the speech, held my attention, the one dealing with the assistance to small businesses. The area which I represent includes many family businesses which cannot expand normally for lack of funds to develop and update their equipment. Nevertheless, there is a supply of manpower made up of strong and vigourous young men of whom nearly 30 per cent are paralysed by chronic unemployment and who would much rather improve their standard of living and enrich at the same time with manufactured products or any other economic contribution the province of Quebec and Canada as a whole.

I did note also in this same speech that a job creation program is considered for the areas affected by chronic unemployment. I should point out that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) missed a fine opportunity to help the unemployed by providing under the 1976-77 LIP program enough money for the approval of more projects. Last year, in the riding of Kamouraska-L'Islet, an amount of $1,090,000 was appropriated by the Department of Manpower and Immigration, which enabled the members of the project selection committee to make it possible for a large number of workers to earn enough money to support their families, while carrying out useful community projects. This year, the amount appropriated is cut down to $427,000. It is easy to understand that the number of unemployed who want to do this type of work will be greatly reduced. This is a good opportunity to add that there will not be any equal opportunities for the large number of unemployed in our region.

I also find there will be an information centre on collective bargaining. I hope the legislation will be amended so as to prevent an increase in the number of disastrous strikes that are prevalent nowadays. The last statistical report on strikes indicates that there were 238 work stoppages affecting 190,197 workers. It is time the government decided to amend the legislation to encourage the workers and prevent the economic disruptions resulting from strikes. Generally speaking, strikes are directed against those who pay workers a salary rather than against the system which deprives them of normal living conditions.

Economically speaking, labour unions seek salary increases and shorter working hours, but the cost of living goes up, nobody is much better off and the real losers are the pensioners, the underprivileged and other people on fixed incomes. Excessive salaries can even cause unemployment because businesses will have to cut their staff in order to maintain labour costs at a reasonable level. Between inflation and unemployment the governments of western countries never really had an option nor have they found a way to cope with that dilemma.

I was surprised to see that the speech from the throne did not mention improvements to the tough working conditions of a very large number of farmers, particularly milk producers. My colleague for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) mentioned in the House last Thursday, October 14, the depressing situation in which a great number of milk producers, of whom several are unfortunately headed for bankruptcy, find themselves. Production quotas were reduced and farm incomes were cut by more than 20 per cent while costs are still going up. The hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet) last Friday call the attention of the House to the causes of the hardships of milk producers, adding that the federal government was not the only one responsible—and I think he is right—but also many representatives of milk federations, and I would like to quote from that interesting speech as follows:

> Provincial authorities and dairy boards must recognize their shortcomings and more particularly those who represent the milk producers on the various agricultural boards and agencies. The fact is that a number of these representatives, Mr. Speaker, were representing whole milk producers, which form an industry which is far richer far sounder and much better organized and which emphasized, in terms of quotas and subsidies, the benefits and interests of whole milk producers, and did so unfortunately at the expense of industrial milk producers.

And he added:

> I believe that, in the interest of our dairy industry as a whole, we will have to give guarantees to all producers as well as the assurance that the past benefits they gained will be maintained. And by this I mean to say that I believe it to be vital for the federal government to take the appropriate action to give back to some dairy producers the quotas that they lost in the last few months and to reinstate them in the position that they held with respect to their production level of 1974-75.

I agree with the hon. member for Papineau and I hope that the government will try to find a satisfactory solution to that very complex problem.

In an article about the food crisis, I read about the fact that the scarcity of some products is due to so-called production planning and organization on the part of the government. Who benefits from such measures? I quote that article:

> On the pretext that certain wheat stocks had not been sold in 1970-71, the government paid a subsidy of $6 an acre to western producers to make them stop growing wheat. Stocks were quickly exhausted and speculators had a field day. It is indeed from this moment on that consumer prices started to increase. We have only to remember that at that time bread cost 24 cents.
> The meat price control ordered by Nixon administration is another obvious case of scarcity caused by so-called production organisation government action.
> Since this control did not apply to the prices of products involved in the production of meat, the price of raw materials went up while the price of their product was frozen—several farmers found it less unprofitable to kill all young chickens, to sell their sows while they were expecting a litter and to get rid of their young calves. The same phenomenon happened in Quebec in the fall of 1974!
> This price freeze provoked a scarcity of meat in the following months, especially beef.

If we consider how the price of a gallon of regular gas is split up, we note that one of the main reasons for the price increase has been federal and provincial taxes, since 31 cents out of the price of every gallon go to the federal government, 19 cents to the provincial government, 27 cents to the oil companies and 7 cents to the gas station operator. It is easy to conclude that the true oil sheiks are in Canada rather than in Arabia.

It is easy to see that the multiplication of all sorts of taxes in a corrupt financial system is one of the main causes of price increases. I hope that during this session, the government will prevent legislation aimed at getting back some order in the financial and fiscal systems.

[English]

Mr. Alan Martin (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to spend some time this afternoon discussing certain aspects from the four main captions under which His Excellency the Governor General outlined the program of the government for the second session of our Thirtieth Parliament. These are national unity, equality of opportunity, individual freedom, and the role of government.

First let us talk about national unity. This is a term that undoubtedly means different things to different people. For my part I intend only to discuss my understanding of what it is all about and the degree of importance that I see should be attached to the term.

The people who have inhabited that area of the North American continent that lies north of the forty-eighth parallel made a series of independent decisions over the course of the past 100 years or so that have had the effect of pulling together, in the process fabricating a nation that has become known as Canada. The first of these decisions was carried out in 1867 when Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia laid the initial cornerstone of the new country. The most recent decision was taken in 1949 when the province of Newfoundland came on board.

These individual decisions were not made as a result of victory or capitulation following the devastation of a war, but were made freely by the elected representatives of the people who inhabited the various semi-independent areas of this northern half of the continent.

The desire to unite was prompted, presumably, by the hope of greater ultimate benefit to be gained from the new potential that would be available through the mechanism of some form of national identity. At the same time unification was seen as a means of seeking a much needed degree of some protection through the close association of friendly and to some extent like minded neighbours for those aspects of their individual way of life that the inhabitants of each area most cherished.

In simple terms, I see that as the background of this nation, a genuine desire to forge something strong and meaningful yet something essentially different and distinct from the other great nation established 100 years earlier on the same continent.

In my view, the term national unity in Canada must be looked at in the context of what brought us together in the first place. National unity to Canadians may indeed be something different from what it may mean in the context of the United States of America and the citizens of that country or, indeed, the United Kingdom and its citizens, or even of other larger and more distant countries such as the U.S.S.R. and India.

National unity to me means first a national identity with which we are all proud and honoured to be associated as citizens and are also prepared to defend when and where necessary. Second, a national identity promotes and encourages diversification among its peoples in all aspects of their lives. After all, Canada and diversification must be synonymous simply by virtue of our vast geography, if for no other reason, spread as it is over the second largest land mass on the planet. Third, a national identity denotes a country where respect and privilege are accorded all its citizens in line with the understandings that have been incorporated into the very fabric of the nation. I speak specifically here to the issue of the two official Canadian languages, a basic tenet of our Canadian heritage and culture since the birth of the nation in 1867, and long before, a fabric which was reinforced at more recent date by the agreement of all political parties in the House of Commons through the passage of the Official Languages Act, an act which ensures the ability of Canadians of either official language group to be able to interact with their national government in either of the two official languages, an act which, I repeat, was passed and agreed to by all members of the House of Commons regardless of political persuasion—

• (1740)

An hon. Member: Not by all members.

Mr. Martin: —an act introduced by a Liberal government to reinforce, 100 years after the birth of the nation, a basic provision of Canadian confederation.

The fabric of all great nations is tested from time to time. I could not help being impressed earlier this month during a brief visit to the city of Winchester in England, the original capital of that great land for a period of several hundred years until, I believe, the move was made to London some time in the thirteenth century. Wandering around the city I came across a very large statue of King Alfred, erected by the people of Winchester in 1901 to commemorate "1,000 years since the birth of the nation." My mind could not but reflect momentarily on the tremendous upheavals and accompanying difficulties of all sorts, including major internal and external wars which have faced and which still face the people of the United Kingdom. Yet the basic fabric has, somehow or other, held together, not for 100 years but for 1,000 years; ten times as long. It is interesting to note the strong but at times tenuous form of national unity which is depicted in the long history of that great country.

[Mr. Martin.]

On the other hand, there is a country like India, a country I was privileged to visit one year ago as a member of our Commonwealth parliamentary delegation. In terms of its nationhood, India is barely a quarter of a century old. The pressures of diversity, highlighted in such areas as language—there are some 17 official languages—geography, culture, and religion in this young nation are so great, and are coming so early and at such a furious pace as to threaten the very ability of the country even to develop a fabric which could be termed national unity. Yet a sense of unity does prevail in India even during the present troubled times.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, the fabrics of great nations have always been tested and will, I suggest, continue to be tested many times over in the future. Look at China at this very moment. Look at our great and respected neighbour to the south, the United States of America, which just two years ago was at the height of Watergate. Some say the Canadian fabric is being tested today, and perhaps this is so. I somehow doubt, however, that the rulers of India, the United Kingdom, or even of China would have much sympathy for our problem, if indeed it is serious enough to be called that in terms of the world-wide context of national internal problems.

If we do have a problem in relation to national unity in this country, what is it? The answer to that question would, I suggest, elicit various responses from individual Canadians ranging from a complete disclaimer as to the existence of any real problem whatsoever to the exaggerated and overly excited claim that the nation is about to fall apart.

Some western Canadians claim that Canadians living in central Canada, that is to say, Ontario and Quebec, do not understand or care about them; some central Canadians feel that western Canadians with their vast supplies of much needed energy resources lack an adequate degree of nationalist fervour in their handling of such resources; some Ontario Canadians wonder why other Canadians do not go along with their particular way of thinking and living; some Quebec Canadians cannot understand the inability of other Canadians to understand their particular problems and aspirations more fully in such areas as language and culture. Finally, some maritime Canadians long for a way to share a larger portion of the Canadian economic pie without at the same time disturbing their more genteel and unhurried way of life.

Incorporated in the problem faced by Quebec Canadians is the matter of language. Whether or not this is the most serious problem which faces us in the context of the testing of our national fabric being made at this time, I really cannot say. Certainly the matter of language rights is perceived by many Canadians of both language groups as being serious at this time. Indeed I suppose one could argue that it was the underlying factor in the by-election upset in the nation's capital yesterday. Some people seem to be fearful that their rights are being eroded; others seem concerned that their particular rights have never been adequately acknowledged and are thus effectively non-exercisable.

If language rights in this great country are really a problem, we should be so lucky, first that we are dealing only with two official languages and, second, that such a golden opportunity is provided through our nation's fabric for developing a comprehension and understanding of two different cultures rather than insulating ourselves behind the closed doors of a single culture and tongue. Our task as Canadians has always been, and remains today, to take up the challenge and make the most of it. For 100 years we have pussy-footed around the education of Canadian children with respect to coming anywhere near an adequate level of teaching a proper comprehension of both official languages. As a nation we have hidden behind the provincial prerogative to determine what will and will not be taught our youngsters in all areas, including that of the two national languages.

Ten years ago we found ourselves in the ridiculous position of having to embark on a necessary but costly program simply to ensure that Canadians occupying key positions in the nation's public service would be able to converse adequately with other Canadians whom they are appointed to serve. And this was the situation almost exactly 100 years after the formation of the nation.

I am delighted to see reference in this Speech from the Throne to something which many of us have felt to be an urgent need for a long period of time—it was a fundamental part of my maiden address to the House some two years ago. I refer to the intent to use national persuasion to encourage the provinces to give greater and more adequate attention in future educational programs to the teaching of the two official Canadian languages and the historical and cultural backgrounds which support them. Only in this way can we get at the guts of the issue and avoid similar discussions 100 years hence.

If language rights and usage are indeed impediments which are affecting the fabric and national unity of our country at this time, then I suggest the present government and the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) are in a far better position to implement modifications in existing programs and to draw up new and more effective programs than would be a government under a Conservative banner which has had little experience and even less success in this century in dealing with this sensitive issue as a government in power, particularly since it does not include in its base any meaningful representation in terms of members from the 28 per cent of the Canadian population which is most deeply concerned.

I wish to express one last point on this matter of national unity. Regardless of our various interpretations of the term and just what it means to each one of us, I think most Canadians would agree that it continues to be an objective towards which we must strive relentlessly, at times experiencing setbacks of one form or another, as has been the experience of all great nations, but always possessing a sense of determination and perseverance that will make us the pride—not only of our own citizens—but also of those who even today watch us with such envy from various corners of the world. In my view we must mature in our sense of understanding of our fellow citizens, whether or not we share the same street, the same colour, the same religion, or the same one of our two official tongues.

Next, Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak briefly on the second topic covered in the throne speech, that of equality of opportunity. A number of important thrusts have been indicated by the government in order to promote individual and regional economic opportunities. The first of these is to continue the program to bring the rate of inflation in Canada under control. I find it a completely unproductive exercise in October, 1976, to argue whether or not controls should have been introduced, and whether or not the Liberal or Conservative timing would have been the more appropriate. The essential point is that the rate of inflation in Canada has come down dramatically in the past 12 months and has exceeded the government's target for this first year of controls. I happen to share the opinion that this dramatic fall would not have occurred without specific government action this time last year.

I suggest that the vast majority of Canadian electors are supportive of government action taken one year ago to control the devastating effect of the inflationary curse that was prevalent across the country. Yes, some Canadians have felt the brunt more than others; there has been some inequality in the manner in which the burden has fallen. However, by and large, the Canadian people—as distinct from some national organizations with vested interests—look upon this example of government leadership with a sense of relief and general support. Something indeed had to be done or no equality of opportunity could possibly have existed for Canadians, and the entire economic future of the country would have become seriously endangered.

The opposition of the Conservative party to the controls program at a crucial time in the economic history of the country, after having advocated controls some 14 months earlier when the situation was far less serious, is indeed strange behaviour by a group of elected representatives who wish within the next two years to hold themselves out to Canadian electors as a viable alternative to the present government. No degree of double talk or fence shifting by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) will get him or his party off that hook.

Some other specific thrusts in the throne speech include a welcome commitment to bring growth in the public service down below one per cent per annum from an annual rate of some 4 per cent over the recent 10 year period. Additional support is indicated for private industry in meeting increasingly tough international competition. Small business growth will be promoted. Job creation programs will be reviewed in order to provide more meaningful assistance in areas of chronically high unemployment. Improvements will be sought in labour-management relations. The Canada Pension Plan will be expanded to recognize more fully the working partner whose energies are devoted to the home. The goal of one million new homes over a four year period will be maintained as basic housing policy.

In the area of individual freedom one aspect where I would have liked to see more attention is in the justice system. At the present time I feel that there is much too long a period between the time of apprehension of an accused and the commencement of the trial process. This works to the detriment of the Crown and society in cases where otherwise guilty persons go free, and also to the detriment of the innocent person who has an unwarranted charge hanging over his or her head for too long. Furthermore, I would encourage the government to consider policies that would render more concern for and assistance to the victims of crime and their immediate families.

I welcome the likely introduction of a bill to bring the duties and responsibilities of the Auditor General more in line with the needs of an organization now spending in the area of $40 billion per annum. In the area of adequacy of financial controls over government expenditures, I would urge implementation of the recommendation which came last year from the Auditor General for the creation of the position of chief financial officer within the public service.

I support the increasing trend toward making more government documents available to the public, and I look forward to the introduction of a human rights bill at the federal level. I believe a move to enable broadcasting of the proceedings in the House of Commons to take place would be most definitely in the public interest, whether or not many Canadians were to avail themselves of the opportunity to participate in our proceedings as spectators in their own living rooms.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on the role of government in Canadian society. I tend to agree completely with the government's proposal to follow a middle road in this area between two extremes. Certainly a review of the United Kingdom situation today, where one recent media estimate placed the share of Gross National Product being directed to government at 60 per cent, is a clear indication of how far not to go. In our own case all levels of government in Canada are accounting for some 43 per cent of the Gross National Product, with the federal share at about 20 per cent. It is my opinion that all levels of government must collectively remain below the 50 per cent level in order not to discourage further new and innovative entrepreneurial activities. Consultations with provincial governments should include discussions designed to ensure that over-all government participation in the Canadian economy does not exceed a predetermined share of the Gross National Product over the long term.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak a few words on the subject of leadership. Some Canadians express the view that there is little or no leadership being exhibited on the federal scene at this time. My only response is to ask these same Canadians to review the achievements of the government over the past two years, to examine the specific proposals contained in this throne speech, and to consider whether or not the state of the economy today would have been in as stable a condition as it is without the kind of leadership that has been so clearly demonstrated by this government and by this Prime Minister.

On the other side of the coin, Mr. Speaker, we have a group of elected representatives occupying the role of official opposition who are so devoid of policy and purpose that they sent their recent candidate out on the hustings with the message, "Simply elect me and watch some policy evolve over the next few years". It may have worked yesterday in Ottawa-Carleton in a by-election. However, it will never work in the next federal election when Canadians will want to look with a critical eye on those policies being placed before them by a party that is seeking their majority support as against the proven record of the government party in power.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the continuation of strong and responsive government over the next two years under the capable leadership of the Prime Minister will ensure his and our return with perhaps even a larger mandate for the Thirty-first Parliament. A viable alternative will simply not be available if the existing situation across the floor of this House is any indication. The memory rests long in the minds of Canadians of the last time the nation gambled; I refer to the period 1957-63. They are not likely to risk a similar move again unless we on our side drop the national ball completely—a most unlikely development in my view. May I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would like at first to take this opportunity to greet a personality who is a very close friend of mine. We have the pleasure of having in the gallery this evening the young and dynamic mayor of my parish of Crabtree whom I would like to greet at the beginning of my comments. He is a nice guy, Joe!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I have no doubt.

Mr. La Salle: He is surely one of the best, Mr. Speaker, surely one of the best.

An hon. Member: The best.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make some comments on the throne speech. I know that as usual it is a well meant statement. Since 1968, I have heard several throne speeches, but somehow I have the impression that it is one of the last such speeches presented by this government. That is indeed what some people have been saying today.

I noticed in the Speech from the Throne a word about consultation on matters related to inflation controls. I also noticed that funds would be made available for day care centres, that greater efforts would be made to help the small, average and large farming business. However, there is something that greatly concerns us, I shall come back to that later. Amateur sport will benefit from new funds. I have a lot to say on this issue. There is also mention of good intentions on the part of the government concerning improvements to be made in the areas of unemployment insurance, immigration, external affairs and finally, constitutional independence.

I said a while ago, that since 1968, I carefully read and listened to speeches made in this House. I will not allow myself to be too critical of the throne speech since it is a book of intentions and I prefer to wait for the actual proposals that will be made by ministers.

● (2010)

In my own riding as everywhere, Mr. Speaker, people are concerned over the pitiful economic performance of the government. They talk about unemployment, inflation, confrontation, arrogance and the dairy industry which is having a very rough time at the moment. So, as I have said, in my circumscription and elsewhere throughout the country, people are worried and disappointed and no valid solution seems to be in sight.

During the last cabinet shuffle, attention was given to amateur sport and physical fitness, and a minister of state was appointed. I would have welcomed the opportunity to congratulate her and wish her the best of luck in her new mandate, considering her pleasant personality as official critic in amateur sport. I must admit I am looking forward to having excellent relations with her.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Beware!

Mr. La Salle: I am aware and carefully measure my words!

May I add that I was very pleased to hear that statement: the appointment of a Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport. As a matter of fact, I had made such a recommendation three years ago and later on asked the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) a number of questions on the importance of creating such a department. I am therefore very glad that the Prime Minister saw fit to adopt these recommendations. He was certainly a little long in taking this decision, but what is done is done, and I am glad a minister of state has been appointed. Of course, I should have preferred the creation of a full-size department with a budget and all what this implies. This is nevertheless a first step in an area which is becoming increasingly more important in our society.

It is stated somewhere in the Speech from the Throne that in the aftermath of the highly successfull Montreal Olympics, and the gratifying results achieved by Canadian athletes, federal support for selected amateur sport and fitness programs will be further augmented. But what does this mean exactly? We shall certainly have the opportunity to obtain more complete information from the minister. In fact, I could never hide from you my interest in physical fitness and amateur sports, in view of the sort of life we are living today: shorter work week, longer vacations or more holidays, it is obvious that the people of Canada need healthy recreation. If we make a more in-depth study of some countries that went even further than we did it is also obvious that we were right two years ago to include in our electoral program the creation of a ministry of physical fitness and amateur sport. As recently as two years ago we committed ourselves to this and I can ensure Canadians that with the advent of a Progressive Conservative government, we will establish a national policy for physical fitness and amateur sport.

An hon. Member: It has been done already.

Mr. La Salle: If it has been done, precious little has transpired so far. I agree to give the benefit of the doubt to the minister of state involved and I hope that during the weekend she will have the opportunity to spell out her objectives. In any case I think it is urgent now to establish a real national policy for physical fitness and amateur sport. The responsibility of a responsible government is to establish a policy enabling every Canadian to practice a sport according to his taste and talents. The government should not be expected to steer Canadians towards any form of sports but should offer them the opportunity to practice the sport of their choice.

But to do so, we must first undertake a study of our institutions and facilities while keeping in mind the legal aspects of what comes under provincial jurisdiction. I remember that in answer to some questions I had put to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) I was always told that it came under provincial jurisdiction. To implement such a policy I think that both the study of our present facilities and the motivation of the people concerning the access to a form of sports make us believe that there are provincial jurisdictions and that we should not interfere.

So if we pretend to be serious about a national policy, we must immediately consider—I hope the government will not hesitate to do so—convening a federal-provincial conference at that level and urge the provinces to attend. I suppose we could reach an acceptable consensus and then gather the provinces and make them aware that we expect full cooperation and generous assistance from them.

We know that a genuine national amateur sport policy must first be set at the primary level of our school, and we know that those schools fall under the jurisdiction of provincial departments of education. And to encourage, attract and interest the provinces, funds would have to be found to launch such a policy. The need does exist. Canadians are behind in the area of physical fitness.

If a healthy nation is a happy nation, we have a lot to do, and I dare hope that the government will not be content with reminding us that it spent a few additional million dollars during the Olympic games. Given the enthusiasm we saw last summer, the motivation we experienced in the past few years because of the Olympic games in Montreal, we must not stop there. And if we consider the marked interest that we witnessed last summer, we are already looking forward to Canada's participation in the 1980 Moscow games.

So we must prepare for it. We must use existing facilities to the maximum. And I think we could consider some sort of very special training in 1979 to prepare Canadian athletes for an absolutely exceptional Canadian representation in Moscow. All that is part of a strategy, of course, but first we need to implement that national policy here through this government and in Parliament. I now come back to the importance of cooperating, negotiating, consulting with the provinces and defining together what kind of policy could be implemented to use all our facilities to the maximum and secure the agreement of the provinces on the renewed interest which this government would like us to believe exists.

So on that I say once again, Mr. Speaker, how satisfied I am to see that they finally understood the importance of putting a person in charge. Not knowing what the funds will be, it is difficult to further commend the government but in the light of the statements that the minister responsible will want to make, I want to say to the House that they can count on our cooperation with respect to the setting up of a genuine amateur sport and physical fitness policy.

We know perfectly well that better physical fitness for Canadians means fewer sleeping pills, and I think we understand more and more the importance of physical fitness. There is no limit agewise, and I think Canadians, both young and old, would be very anxious to benefit from a well conceived policy which respects, as I said, the provincial jurisdiction over recreational activities planning. But for once, we will be asked to vote for credits for the provinces which have expressed their intent to do something in this field, and I would think that the federal government, if they really mean something when they talk about a real policy, will also be generous when the moment comes to give the needed credits to meet the needs of a society like ours today.

So on this matter, Mr. Speaker, I will limit myself to those few remarks to assure the government that we the members in the official opposition are prepared to act objectively and to be very positive on a matter of such vital interest as is physical fitness for Canadians as a whole.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot help making some comments on the agricultural situation. Numerous farmers live in my riding and, following the dreadful effects of the dairy policy announced last April, again I have to return to the charge. I do not remember how many times I raised questions on this matter, how many times my colleague the official critic did, but we are still waiting for the government's answer; the situation has been unbearable since last spring. Last week I asked questions to the minister and to the Prime Minister. Their negative answers make me believe that the government does not intend to help, for the moment, a particular category of citizens, namely milk producers.

Mr. Roy (Laval): It was done this afternoon.

Mr. La Salle: The hon. member for Laval said that it was done this afternoon. I hope that tomorrow's newspapers will bear good news for milk producers. And I look at my friends opposite who come from Quebec and who are all smiles this evening. I imagine the minister announced something very important.

I was not in the House this afternoon, because I had to attend other meetings; nonetheless I must say that this government let our milk producers suffer for too long. They put them in a situation bordering disaster. Unless this piece of news the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Roy) gives me willingly is a short-term remedy, I do not know what the minister said this afternoon, and for that reason, I must deeply regret the failure of the government to act in this direction and to recognize that the situation has become unbearable for milk producers throughout Canada, and I hold the government responsible for that policy of reducing a production they encouraged three years ago.

Finally, I understand that the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Corriveau) does not want to hear anything about it anymore. He made himself enough representations and got so many negative answers that he must not feel like raising the matter again. But all the same, on behalf of the milk producers of my riding and of all Canadian milk producers, I must implore the government to be more humane than it has been up to now. I venture to think that we will get some answers on this matter, and if the government continues to implement the policy it put forward, it will be a real disaster for an entire group of Canadians and it will cause the disappearance of one of our main agricultural industries.

Mr. Speaker,—

An hon. Member: What is your policy?

Mr. La Salle: What did you say?

The policy is to remove immediately the penalty imposed upon the milk producers and to remove immediately the levy on milk powder exports. Both measures have burdened our dairy producers, and I think the hon. member who is asking me this question knows it. I know that members of the Liberal party have made representations to the government which turned a deaf ear.

I must say it again, I must call for a short-term solution, and I think that the hon. member for Laval agrees with me. But like many others, he could not get a positive answer from his own government, and I have every reason to say that this government is responsible for the present situation, for the present disaster and for the unbearable situation of our dairy farmers. I will restrict myself, Mr. Speaker, to saying the simple truth in this House. I know that my time is running out.

Mr. Roy (Laval): Would the hon. member for Joliette allow me a question?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Will the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) accept a question at this time?

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I don't want to lose any of my time; so, if the hon. member for Laval wishes to ask me a question when I am through speaking, I shall be pleased to answer him then.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Joliette has the floor.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: I say now that I shall be pleased to answer any question anyone wants to put to me then.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Joliette has the floor and I would suggest we listen to him.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: To my mind, Mr. Speaker, at this point in time, it will not be difficult to answer my friends across the way because we have asked for answers for a long time now without getting them.

I shall now speak of a most important matter, Mr. Speaker, that of bilingualism. My colleague from Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) made a brilliant speech last Friday. Should I remind some of my colleagues in this House to read again the important speech he made and his rebuttal? It answers fully the question of bilingualism. So, I have no wish to take up any of the time allotted me to repeat the remarks, which were very much to the point, made in this House by a very competent man.

But I should not want to close my remarks without asking my friends opposite who seem to want to put questions to me and who wonder today: How come two by-elections were in our favour last night?

I cannot help repeating the criticisms levelled at the government in my constituency. In 1974, when the government went to the people and tried to make us look ridiculous because we favoured price controls in an attempt to check inflation, the leader of the government before us today promised that they would never resort to such a policy.

Mr. Speaker, I say today that this government was elected in 1974 under false pretences. I say, Mr. Speaker, that if the people of Canada have now lost confidence in the government, it is because they blame it, with good reason, for having deceived them. You cannot deceive a people and deceive businessmen as the government did, and you cannot deceive labour as the government did in 1974. Today, Canadians are starting to wonder. I know that my friends opposite are asking themselves some questions today. They are unhappy and I understand them. When a government makes such a promise in order to get elected and makes an unacceptable reversal six or seven months later, the Canadian people know what is going on. What we have witnessed last night, Mr. Speaker, will be repeated throughout the country, because the Canadian people did not like being deceived in this way. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, the government has lost the confidence of the people, it is losing a minister every three months, and it is losing every by-election. I say to this government that if it holds by-elections, we shall defeat them one by one each month. They should stop asking: What is happening to us? They should stop trying to review a particular policy and to make believe that the lack of popularity of this government is due to some division in the country on the bilingualism issue. The terrible economic performance of this government and the fraud of 1974 are the two causes of its lack of popularity, and I think that the public did the right thing last night in the Ottawa-Carleton consitituency, as well as in the riding of St. John's, Newfoundland, and, a year ago, in the riding of Hochelaga, which was an uncontested Liberal stronghold at the time; this drop in popularity started a year ago and we expect this government to have enough of a sense of honour to resign. We are ready to face the challenge of running Canada properly.

Mr. Roy (Laval): May I ask a question, Mr. Speaker?

• (2030)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Will the hon. member for Joliette now accept the question from the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Roy)?

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Certainly, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Joliette would allow me a question regarding the elimination of that levy, I would ask him how he would dispose of milk powder surpluses which are now piling up in warehouses?

Mr. La Salle: I am pleased to answer such a question, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member is asking me how milk powder surpluses would be stored. If the hon. member for Laval would consider what happened, he would recognize that his government was too weak to compete with the European Community, and in order to secure new markets for all kinds of products, the European Community was allowed to subsidize their producers on the European side to force our dairy producers to pay for storage and milk powder. We never accepted that, and this government, in order to save the dairy industry, must store these stocks and develop a long term policy for a period of three to five years because it is unthinkable to develop short term policies in this area. Therefore, had the government taken their responsibilities, they would never have applied to dairy producers the milk powder export levy. They would have acted as the Americans did five years ago. They would have supported dairy producers and we would now have a healthy dairy industry. Again, I blame the government in this regard.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson).

Mr. Saltsman: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman).

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, under the rules of the House which state that a question of privilege should be raised at the earliest opportunity I should like to raise a question of privilege particularly now that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Abbott) is in the House. My question is in regard to the debate that took place this afternoon in which the minister intervened and took some exception to my pointing out that it was Hercules who cleaned out the Augean stables. He insisted that it was Ulysses. I have had a chance to check Greek mythology since that interjection. The records show that I was correct and that the minister's knowledge of Greek mythology is somewhat deficient.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Standing Order 17 states:

(1) Whenever any matter of privilege arises, it shall be taken into consideration immediately or at a time appointed by Mr. Speaker.

The hon. member for Trinity.

Mr. Flynn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Flynn) on a question of privilege.

Mr. Flynn: Mr. Speaker, this is the time to bring up a question of privilege. The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) raised his question of privilege which you heard and you were correct in that. I should like now to hear the minister's rebuttal.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. That is not a question of privilege. The hon. member for Trinity.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, if there are any more interruptions I think the time should come off the Liberal side.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. That is not a question of privilege. The hon. member for Trinity.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Trinity has the floor.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, in joining in the debate on the Speech from the Throne I should like to limit my remarks to issues directly concerning the labour force.

For most families the single highest expense concerned with being employed is the cost of child care. This was recognized in the last budget when income tax deductions for the cost of child care were doubled. The announcement in the Speech from the Throne that the government will help provide more day care services by encouraging provincial governments to adopt a new system of income related fees carries this thrust further and is an important step in adapting to the changes in Canada's labour force.

From 1971 to 1974 the number of day care centres in Canada doubled and the number of spaces in centres more than tripled. Nevertheless, in 1974, fewer than 3 per cent of the children of working parents under three years of age, and fewer than 9 per cent of the children between the ages of three and five, attended day care centres. Alternative types of care, such as matching the school hours of children with the working hours of one or both parents, relying on another adult member of the household, or the brothers or sisters, or neighbour or friends, or leaving school-age children alone after school—are estimated to provide for about four fifths of the care of children of working mothers. While some of these arrangements are undoubtedly adequate and may even be preferable to paid care, there is no doubt that there are many parents who would choose a professional day care service if it were available and affordable.

The measures proposed by the government to increase the availability of partially subsidized professional day care will also give parents more choices and options in the care of their children.

The measures announced in the throne speech and described yesterday by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) to improve labour management relations and industrial safety, are urgently needed. Canadians are very concerned, and rightly so, about the loss of productivity due to strikes. What is not generally realized is that more work days are lost as a result of industrial injuries than strikes. Canadians concerned about productivity, and particularly about our competitive position in world markets, generally think in terms of time lost from work stoppages due to strikes and lockouts. Certainly these figures give cause for concern, 1,183,080 days lost in June according to labour Canada's recent report, or 62 man days per 10,000 days' work. It is important to find ways of ensuring peace in the life of a labour contract as well as more effective ways of negotiating contracts, but it is also important to keep in perspective that time lost because of industrial injuries still exceeds time lost because of strikes and lockouts.

● (2040)

The proposed collective bargaining information centre with its emphasis on providing clear, useful information, in the context of the state of the economy, including comparisons with other countries, particularly Canada's major trading partners, should go far to remove one very basic cause of conflict between labour and management. It is natural that labour and management will have different views on dividing up the pie, but now there is often disagreement on the size of the pie, with labour and management each bringing in different figures and neither believing nor accepting the other party's figures. If at least there is agreement on what is possible, there is a more appropriate base for negotiation.

The causes for industrial conflicts, strikes, and lockouts are usually complex; wage demands are seldom the only issue. Questions of general working conditions and unsolved grievances are often extremely important and may in fact be the more serious underlying cause of a dispute apparently about wages. It has been a great disappointment to me that, since controls were introduced, labour did not make more use of the opportunity to bargain over non-monetary issues. One Canadian survey of employee job satisfaction in 1968 reported that nearly 20 per cent of those surveyed expressed low job satisfaction for reasons connected with pay or advancement, but nearly 30 per cent expressed low job satisfaction for reasons such as recognition, use of skills, etc.

Inflation certainly introduced new tensions into labour-management relations. There has been a trend toward contracts of shorter duration; there have also been more instances where union members refused to ratify contracts negotiated at the bargaining table. As inflation is brought under control, and as people begin to have more confidence in the economy, these problems should be reduced.

Compared with other industrialized countries the number of strikes in Canada and the percentage of workers involved is not high, but the length of time needed to settle conflicts is excessive. When measured by the average number of working days lost per worker, the figure is over 17 days during the 1968 to 1972 period, or more than triple the time lost in some western countries.

One factor in labour unrest seems to be the extraordinary duration of negotiations. Of major negotiations in the past few years, only 15 per cent were settled within three months and 20 per cent required closer to one year of negotiations before settlement was reached. The duration of negotiations would be less of an irritant if settlements were achieved close to the expiry date of the previous contract—in fact opening negotiations at an early date often eases the situation by allowing issues to be resolved in a calm, orderly way. But the tendency toward protracted negotiations long after a contract has expired understandably creates frustrations and often contributes to the bitterness of disputes. The measures announced by the Minister of Labour last night to improve arbitration services and improve training for conciliators and mediators may be important measures in restoring labour peace.

Some of the conflicts we have seen in recent years have occurred in situations where collective bargaining is relatively new and where the parties lack experience. The proposals for labour education may help reduce the problems inherent in this kind of situation.

But, important though it is to improve the collective bargaining process, we still have to deal with the fact that far more days are lost as a result of industrial accidents than as a result of industrial disputes. A chart published by the Occupational Safety and Health Directorate of Canada Labour shows that since 1969 the number of man days lost due to strikes and lockouts has been considerably lower than the number of days lost due to work-related injuries. In 1969 a United States Department of Labour survey indicated that 71 per cent of all workers considered occupational safety and health a higher priority than wages. With changing economic conditions since 1969, the priorities of workers both in the United States and Canada have probably shifted, but I am under the impression from talking with workers in many fields that concern about factors affecting health is at a high level now.

Government, management, and labour representatives working with health and safety professionals have made considerable strides in developing and furthering occupational health and safety. In the past century many obvious hazards have been eliminated. However, increasingly workers are exposed to potential hazards such as noise, radiation, vibration, ultrasound, and so on. Chemical usage has experienced considerable growth. Over 500,000 chemical products are currently used in industry and each year, in the industrialized nations, 250,000 new chemicals are invented, or synthesized, of which about 3,000 are put in production. The United States has developed occupational health standards for only about 400 of these chemicals. Toxic research and information generally lag behind the introduction and use of chemicals in industry. Recent reports indicate that environmental carcinogens may be more numerous and ubiquitous than previously suspected.

Occupational health was identified as a priority area by federal and provincial deputy ministers of health in June of 1975. The important thing now is to find ways for all the interested parties, federal, provincial, and municipal health authorities, and labour and management, to combine their efforts.

Canada lacks universal reporting and recording systems and, hence, a data base for numerous aspects of occupational health relating to accidents, injuries, disease, and death. Development of a national code will be an important tool for planning further progress.

Finally I wish to congratulate the government on its courageous decision to include in human rights legislation the principle of equal compensation for work of equal value performed by persons of either sex. Between 1951 and 1972 the labour force grew by 70 per cent. A large part of this growth in the work force is due to the number of women working or actively seeking work. In July, 1974, Statistics Canada estimated the growth in participation for these years, that is, 1951 to 1972, as being 157 per cent for women, compared to 46 per cent for men. This influx of women has affected very little the pattern of women entering the so-called traditional female occupations. Even though women make up only about a third of the labour force, 72.2 per cent of all clerical workers and 60.1 per cent of workers in service occupations are women.

● (2050)

The so-called job ghettoes, that is, the jobs done mainly or only by women, have traditionally been badly paid. There are many reasons for this, but perhaps it is more profitable now for us to look at solutions and corrective tools than to deplore history. When the principle of equal pay for work of equal value is established by law in the federal public service, Crown corporations and so on, they will have to do their job evaluations differently. I know that many senior public servants fought hard against the inclusion of this principle, but really the technical difficulties that it presents in terms of updating and modernizing job evaluations are not insuperable, and the benefits in terms of greater mobility and job satisfaction for both men and women surely outweigh the difficulties.

The Canadian Classification and Dictionary of Occupations prepared by the Department of Manpower and Immigration in consultation with Statistics Canada aims to provide:

—a standardized terminology of occupations and a code that can be used by employment offices in interviewing, counselling and placing applicants and by employers for recruiting, promoting, transferring and job classification purposes.

Universities, research organizations, and other institutions are also encouraged to use CCDO to obtain statistical data. Therefore this is a major work of reference.

It is a very useful work for industrial type skills which are easily measured. It is less useful when applied to personal service occupations, and these are the occupations which have a disproportionate number of women. For example, foster mother is included in the same unit group (6149) with butler, tattoo artist, child care attendant, locker-room attendant, and cabana boy. The DPT code (data, people, things) for grading occupations according to the skill content required in dealing with data, people, things, uses a digit from 0 to 8 in each of the three categories (data, people, things) to indicate the skill required with 8 being "no significant relationship" and 0 the highest requirement. On this scale a dog trainer's DPT number is 227. The implication is that the dog trainer needs a high level of skill to deal with data and people and a low level to deal with things, whereas a foster mother's DPT code is 637 which implies that she needs very limited skill in dealing with data, less skill in dealing with people than the dog trainer, but she is equal with the dog trainer in terms of handling things. One might well question even the last one as one thinks of the complexity of domestic appliances today. However, this is a rating which does not take into account the qualities of heart and mind that a successful foster mother needs to provide not only for the physical needs but also for the emotional and intellectual needs of a young child.

The discrepancy probably does not represent so much a downgrading of caring, nurturing functions so much as it represents difficulty in measuring. When a dog is sent to obedience school the criteria are clear and it is easy to measure whether the dog trainer has achieved results. It is much harder to measure a child's development.

The SVP in this dictionary is the specific vocational preparation. The code for a foster mother is 3. That code number indicates the training for the job is to be accomplished in a period of more than 30 days and less than three months. In other words the factors of life experience and suitability are not included in the SVP, which might be all right if they were included in the coding for general education, but a foster mother's requirement is not high there either.

I have dealt at some length with the example of a foster mother. However, it is merely one example in which personal service occupations are not highly rated.

Men who might wish to enter these occupations and who might find satisfaction in working with people are, of course, deterred now by the low pay and prestige. A more sophisticated evaluation of personal service occupations, especially the para-professional occupations in the health and welfare field, and some updating, would not only benefit the women now in these positions but would also make it possible for men with talents and abilities in these areas to move to them.

In closing may I quote from the Director-General of the International Labour Conference who said last year:

It can indeed be maintained that the success or failure of modern societies will depend on how they solve this key problem of the inter-relationship between employment, remuneration, working conditions and environment, education, health and leisure.

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, since first being elected to the House of Commons roughly four years ago I have had the opportunity to take part in all three debates on the Speeches from the Throne. Therefore it gives me great pleasure to keep my record intact by once again taking part in this latest episode beginning the second session of the Thirtieth Parliament of Canada.

I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate two capable backbenchers on the government side, the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) and the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance), for moving and seconding the Address in Reply to throne speech. It is very easy for me to understand their enthusiasm toward a government Speech from the Throne oozing with promises, pretty phrases, and vague generalities aimed at perhaps not all segments of our society, but certainly at a great number of Canadians from coast to coast.

The unfortunate fact of the matter is, however, that if these gentlemen followed the progress of their government's legislative policies in respect to the throne speech, they will surely lose their initial enthusiasm only to have it replaced by wonder and awe at how their peers could have the nerve to stray so far from throne speech promises when introducing and implementing consequent policies.

I, too, was enthusiastic when I first heard a throne speech delivered with such majesty and tradition during my first days as a member of parliament back in January of 1973. It did not take long, however, for my enthusiasm to turn first to surprise, then to dismay, and eventually to anger when I realized that the promises made were mere political rhetoric with very little consequential follow-up. The fact is that nearly half of the promises enunciated in the last throne speech in 1974 never materialized.

For example, what happened to the new consumer credit legislation, including the disclosure by lenders of effective rates of interest on loans?

An hon. Member: It's coming.

Mr. Jelinek: In every throne speech it is coming. Hopefully by the next throne speech there will be a new government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jelinek: What happened to the total revision of bankruptcy laws to help the consumer debtor, to the improvement of urban and inter-city transportation services, to the legislation to provide for an efficient port system, to the measures for government intervention in cases where a Canadian company may be prevented by its foreign ownership from fulfilling export orders, to the revisions to the Public Service Staff Relations Act, to the human rights legislation, or to the provisions to broadcast the proceedings of the Commons? I know the latter is back in the throne speech. What about the guarantees for the domestic control of uranium mining, and on, and on, and on? Promises, promises, promises! All of these were vivid, definite solutions proposed by the Trudeau administration in the last throne speech over two years ago, none of which were introduced, let alone materialized. Surely the government cannot say it has had no time to introduce legislation dealing with the great promises it made on that uneventful day in September, 1974.

● (2100)

We all know that the last session of parliament was the longest in the history of Confederation, and perhaps one of the reasons for the lack of popularity the government is experiencing today is that the Liberal administration did not see fit to make further futile promises prior to this last Speech from the Throne. I suggest, based on past performance, that anyone who believes the sincerity of the government's promises must surely be over-optimistic and unrealistic. I further suggest, again on the basis of past performances, that a great many of the government's promises to the public at large are made with the knowledge that it is intentionally misleading the electorate.

I hear snickering from across the way. What better example could there be than the now famous Liberal flip-flop on wage and price controls? Was that misleading in the 1974 campaign, or not? In an attempt to conceal the inefficiency of the government in this and other regards the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) now stirs up, by way of diversionary action, what I believe to be the most divisive issue in Canada, that of bilingualism.

I am all for bilingualism and the principle behind it. But why stir up this subject on a regular basis with phony issues? To me it is beyond comprehension. The principle of bilingualism was accepted by all parties in the House, and if it were left alone in the hands of the people the nation would be better off for it.

I should like to give an example of a nation which has more than two official languages. I am thinking of Switzerland. Do we ever hear of any problems relating to language issues in Switzerland? It is left in the hands of the population in that country. Mr. Speaker, I realise that members opposite on the government side are getting a little flipperty so I shall change the subject and deal briefly with a matter which members before me have already documented in some detail, namely , the cabinet shuffle and the continuing resignations from the cabinet. I should like to touch on the two new sub-ministries which I am certain have been formed in the hope of making a smokescreen to conceal the government's inability to cope with the massive problems relating to small business on one hand, and physical fitness and amateur sport on the other. Ironically these are two areas with which I have been closely associated at different times as spokesman on behalf of our party.

It was nearly three and a half years ago, when government spending was at a far lower level and the inflationary cycle had not yet begun to spiral, that I recommended for the sake of a physically fit nation, as well as for a semblance of order leading up to the Montreal Olympics within the amateur sports world, that a sub-ministry for physical fitness and sport should be established. The response I received at that time from the then godfather of the Canadian Football League, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), was simply incredible bearing in mind the action taken by the government in these times of restraint. I believe he had just finished sticking his nose in where it didn't belong, that is to say, into professional football, when he found out about my suggestions, and recommendations.

Perhaps Your Honour would allow me to quote from a speech given by the minister to the Sports Federation of Canada on March 16, 1974, part of which was in response to what I had said. Talking about the lack of a fundamental amateur sports program, he said:

> I am aware of the concern felt by the hon. member for High Park Mr. Otto Jelinek, concern for these very same matters. Unwittingly, I think there is a very strong recommendation for a Canadian Ministry of Sport. How surprising, to me at any rate, that a man with Mr. Jelinek's credentials as an accomplished athlete should be endorsing the creation of—and I say this with some trepidation because of my own experiences—what appears to be a rather relentless bureaucracy.
> Consider for a moment such a ministry with all its possibilities. It is true that I have in my department two deputy ministers—one for Health, and one for Welfare—but can you imagine for a moment the problems for a minister of sport? He would need to hire a hall just to meet with his deputy ministers. There would be the deputy minister of ballooning, the deputy minister of bowling, the deputy minister of trotting and it would go on and on—

Mr. Flynn: Mr. Speaker, he is speaking, and I should like him to be more explicit about which minister he is speaking and why he is speaking—

An hon. Member: Who?

Mr. Flynn: —on which sport he is speaking and to what he is speaking, because he is alluding to all different sports.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. That appears to be a matter of debate rather than a point of order.

Mr. Jelinek: I believe the hon. member could not have been listening to what I said earlier. As to what he has just said, I am sure the translators must have found it difficult translating the mish-mash that came out of his mouth.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Flynn: I do not think the hon. member understood what I said at all. I understood perfectly what he didn't say and I would like to have him explain now what he intends to say.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I do not believe an argument as to facts gives rise to a legitimate point of order. I still ask hon. members to exercise restraint. I believe the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek) should be allowed to continue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jelinek: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I see that not even the hon. member's own colleagues can understand what he is talking about. I was quoting from a speech delivered by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. This was in response to my recommendations to him some years ago when he was knocking the feasibility of establishing a sub-ministry of physical fitness and sports.

● (2110)

After these rude interruptions, Mr. Speaker, I should like to continue quoting the minister. The minister said:

There would be the deputy minister of ballooning, the deputy minister of bowling, the deputy minister of trotting and it would go on and on, and the way things are going now you would definitely need two deputy ministers of football, one for the offence, and one for the defence.

He concluded as follows:

My fears are that the author of the P.C.-Jelinek paper with this ministry of sport idea, at any rate, may be skating on very thin ice.

That, Mr. Speaker, is one more example of an absolute flip-flop by the government, and a typical exemplification of the arrogance demonstrated by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. A simple conclusion leads me to believe that the minister was either attempting to mislead the public or that he is losing seniority and the high regard in which he is reputed to be held by the Prime Minister. Indeed, I feel very sorry for the new Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) (Mrs. Campagnolo) who has to work under the Minister of National Health and Welfare who is totally opposed to a sub-ministry for fitness and sport. A minister who spends over $2,000 on football speeches to make in the House of Commons in the midst of an inflationary cycle in Canada does not know what he is talking about.

We do not have to stop here when discussing inconsistencies by the government, and more specifically by this same minister. We know that in his former capacity as minister responsible for sport, which he knew very little about, he refused to honour a $500,000 grant promised by his department to the organizing committee of the 1976 Olympiad for the Physically Disabled because of South Africa's participation in these games which took place in Toronto earlier this year. His reasoning was his government's policy regarding apartheid in South Africa. Yet the inconsistency exists in the very fact that this same government has personnel within the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in Africa for the sake of promoting trade.

Now, no one is arguing the merits of that situation, but it is the double-faced standard that upsets me no end and which the government is demonstrating by recognizing South Africa, on one hand, in respect to trade and not recognizing South Africa, on the other hand, in respect to disabled youth. Yet today in this House a double inconsistency, if I may use that phrase, occurred when the House unanimously supported my motion to support and encourage current fund raising programs for the disabled in Canada as well as abroad, including naturally those in South Africa as well. Needless to say, I was most pleased with the results. However, one must take it that the government was either sleeping, or simply ignorant as a whole, or that it has changed its policy regarding apartheid in South Africa. I look forward to some specific policy coming from the government side in this respect, their having unanimously approved support for the disabled athletes around the world, including those in South Africa. I only hope that some semblance of consistency develops in this respect, and indeed in many other important issues that the government continues to confuse rather than clarify.

I would be remiss, Mr. Speaker, if I did not at least touch on the subject matter that I am responsible for on behalf of my party, namely, a part of our economic process that must surely form the backbone of our economic way of life. I am of course referring to small business.

We all know that the small firms sector of our economy has been generally ignored and bypassed by all levels of government, and to this end I welcome the Prime Minister's decision to segregate the government's responsibilities to small business from that overwhelming Ministry of Industry, Trade and Commerce by creating a new sub-ministry responsible for small business. Again, I believe that the formation of this sub-ministry is simply a smokescreen by the Prime Minister to pacify the unsuspecting small business community which, as a result of its widespread individualism, lacks a strong enough voice in government.

We know that the government confers from time to time with such representative groups as the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, the Chamber of Commerce, as well as the Canadian Manufacturers Association. All three organizations are exceptional ambassadors for their specific communities in respect to small business, but their representations alone are simply not strong enough. My suggestion to the small business community, for the sake of having a stronger voice in Ottawa, is that it rally behind the idea of having these and other interested groups approach the government as a unit on behalf of small business in order that they do not get trampled under in the stampede for power by big unions and big industry, which in fact represent only a minority of the working force in Canada.

When the government is in consultation with labour, for example, it is basically dealing with the Canadian Labour Congress whose membership totals somewhere around 20 per cent of the total labour force. And when the government is in consultation with business, it is naturally talking with the major industries and multinational corporations, which again represent far less than 50 per cent of the business community.

There is no doubt about the fact that the small firms sector is by far the largest and possibly the most important sector of our economy, responsible for employing well over 50 per cent of our labour force. This is the sector that has continually been bypassed by all levels of government while at the same time it is taken for granted it will abide by the horrendous bureaucratic regulations established for big industry.

I believe it is time for all governments to allow small business the freedom it deserves while at the same time making the specific legislative changes that are required. Looking at statistics and our economy as a whole, there is no question that the government has not only failed to implement policies which would encourage a healthy and expanding small business sector in the economy, but has perpetuated policies and practices harmful to this sector. To this end I have just introduced a private member's notice of motion for consideration which reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government consider the advisability of implementing programs to assist the development of small business in this country, consisting of such positive initiatives as:

(a) Allowing tax credits for investment in small business:

(b) Providing assistance in the formation of small business export consortia;

(c) Changing government tender practices so that small business supplies a portion of government purchased goods and services;

(d) Reducing the government paperwork burden imposed on small business.

In other words I am asking for some form of comprehensive policy on small business. A small business sub-ministry has been established, but no small business policy has ever come forth from the government. The time has come for this to take place. Some of these proposals which I put in my motion are in existence in other countries; they are not new ideas. They work very well in Japan, the United States, Belgium, West Germany, and other countries. But our small business minister is not visiting those countries on his first trip abroad. He is going to the Soviet Union. Perhaps he is going to study the free market system, but I do not know what he is going to study in the Soviet Union as the government's representative for small business.

It is strange indeed to note that the government has failed to come up with any such policies in the past. As a matter of fact a Liberal policy on small business is non-existent. This forces the small business community to abide by the bureaucratic rules and regulations established for the sake and benefit of large, and usually multinational, corporations, corporations which are able to cope with such rules and regulations vis-à-vis the small businessman who is unable to do so.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I will repeat what I have said so often before in this Chamber, something that I believe is imperative for our democratic way of life to survive. If we want the small business firm sector to survive within our society, as indeed we all do with perhaps the exception of the NDP, then immediate action by the federal government must be taken. The small business community is what the free enterprise system is all about. It is what this country is built on and what this country can prosper by. Other countries which presently are more fortunate than Canada in respect of unemployment, inflation, productivity, and other areas by which the standard of success is judged, have all concentrated their economic energies toward their small firm sector within their industrial way of life.

We cannot and we must not allow the Prime Minister of Canada to change the free market system in this country. If the Prime Minister believes the free market system does not work, as he so clearly stated a year or so ago, then may I remind him that if indeed free enterprise is having its problems in this country, that certainly has nothing to do with the system itself, but rather with the strangle hold that he and his government have had on that system for the past decade or so. Sending his newly appointed Minister of State for Small Business (Mr. Marchand) to the Soviet Union as his first official trip abroad is not a step in the right direction toward preserving free enterprise.

Perhaps the federal government will finally take the necessary steps to reverse its trend toward centralization and make the legislative changes so vital to the survival of the free market system and society as we know it. If, however, the government is persistent in allowing free enterprise to suffer by its unwillingness to cope with the problems associated with it, which I believe to be the case as the government has had enough time to change its theories and philosophies, then I know the electorate as a whole will follow yesterday's trend in the by-elections and, at the next opportunity, elect the appropriate representatives who will be committed to preserving the traditions that have made this country the great place it is.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not take part in this debate to be strictly political.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: This will be the first time.

Mr. Whelan: I would be remiss if I were not just a little bit political. Some of the things that have been put on the record by speakers in the last couple of days have not been as factual as they might have been. I do not know where they got their facts, but—

An hon. Member: Your colleagues aren't going to like this, Gene.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: I have an advantage over most members of the House, Mr. Speaker, in that they are making the noise but I do not know what they are saying.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: The throne speech made little direct reference to agriculture.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: Some hon. members have made a tremendous noise about that. I think that is all you can say about it. Their contribution in the way of constructive criticism has not been very great judging from what I have read and heard. Agriculture continues to hold a very high position on the government's list of priorities.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Even you don't believe that, Gene.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, anyone today who can read in either of the official languages, and the press releases from the Department of Agriculture are in both official languages, knows that the list of things we have done in the last year is this high, Mr. Speaker. These documents I hold are not lengthy but rather single sheets outlining what we have done for the different agricultural groups in Canada.

An hon. Member: It's a good thing we don't have plumbing all across Saskatchewan.

Mr. Whelan: I would challenge anyone to point out a time in the history of Canada when a government reacted more to the needs of agriculture in this country than has this government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Your press releases are used across Saskatchewan.

Mr. Whelan: As I said, we did not make a great play about agriculture in the throne speech. That was not an oversight or an omission because the facts speak for themselves. We should remind ourselves of the fact that in the last four years the farmers of Canada have been better off than they have ever been before in their lives.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You come out to Saskatchewan and tell them that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: You are beginning to talk like the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

Mr. Whelan: Just ask all those lawyers who are members of parliament who own land in central Canada, eastern Canada, and western Canada, and they will tell you how much their land values have increased, and how well off they have become. They can tell you how much their share crop in respect of wheat has brought them. They can tell you about these things if you want them to do so.

During the last session there was a very heavy load of agricultural legislation. Those bills are now law and we are working hard toward their implementation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: It is obvious that food provides a tremendous amount of energy. Just listen to the amount of noise we are getting from the other side.

An hon. Member: They are well fed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Whelan.]

Mr. Whelan: Due to the fine progress the House made on agricultural matters in the last session there was not much carried over into this new session.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: Why are you laughing, Gene?

Mr. Whelan: Following the 1972 election we did not hold up agricultural legislation like they did, yet they try to make out today that they are the farmers' friends. The records of this House show how friendly they were. Some of the statements put on the record in the last couple of days would indicate what kind of friends they are to agriculture. The people involved in agriculture in Canada know the real facts.

There was not much of a carryover, but that is not to say we will not be bringing forward agricultural legislation this session, because we will. The throne speech mentioned one important item, namely, measures to make more farm stored crops eligible for advance payments. This will make the cash advance system, which has been of great assistance to prairie farm grain growers over the years, available to farmers in other parts of Canada and in respect of crops other than grain.

When hon. members opposite were in power they made out they were friends of the farmer, but what did they do? What did they do about advance payments to make farmers equal across Canada? They did nothing at all about it.

● (2130)

An hon. Member: Bring in the cheese.

Mr. Whelan: A true national cash advance system will go a long way toward completion of a comprehensive farm income stabilization plan for Canadian farmers. It will give farmers the opportunity to obtain cash against farm-stored crops rather than having to sell their crops at distress prices at harvest time, and that involves many crops right in the area of Perth-Wilmot. The hon. member who represents that area should be concerned about that; he should not jeer because it will help an awful lot of farmers in his area. If we put the program into proper use and perspective, we will help him right out of this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: It will ease the problem—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Flynn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We have heard our Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) trying to explain very carefully the many agreements we have made across Canada, but members of the opposition are not willing to let him tell his story. I think he has much to say and we should let him say it without interruption.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I wish to inform the hon. member that the minister has the right to make an uninterrupted speech.

Mr. Jarvis: Do it straight this time, Gene, without laughing.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Whelan: —I had some reservations about coming into the House tonight—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: —but as I was saying, this program will ease the problems of farmers who need cash but cannot market their crops because the marketing system is temporarily clogged by everyone trying to sell their produce at the same time. As I said, it will round out the stabilization package which now includes the fully revamped Agricultural Stabilization Act, crop insurance, the Western Grain Income Stabilization Act, and the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: Together with other legislation on the books, such as the Farm Credit Act, these measures are providing Canadian farmers with the finest legislative framework to be found anywhere in the world, and I challenge anyone to deny this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: This also provides consumers with the assurance of a continuing supply of high quality food at prices they can afford.

Mr. Hargrave: Especially beef.

Mr. Whelan: I will talk about beef a little bit later, but there is no denying that never in the history of the purchasing power of Canadians could they buy more beef and more food products—practically any food product that is available; you do not have to mention only beef—that are produced in Canada, for an hour's wages.

I mentioned the other legislation we have to protect farmers, legislation that was passed last year and in previous years by this parliament. The farmer needs this kind of protection even if some members opposite do not think that he does. Letters have been sent to my colleagues in cabinet from an association to which some people used to belong—I do not know if they still do—asking me, for instance, to withdraw beef from the stabilization legislation, to take it out of the act because farmers do not need it. That is what they said. That is not what they are saying now. When I had legislation last year to put import quotas on the United States, 100 per cent on the last year's average, and I had it on Australia and New Zealand, who in the hell asked me to take it off?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: The same people are saying to me now to put controls on Australians and New Zealanders. I ask them to ask their leader if he believes that we should not be part of the Commonwealth? If they want to condemn the Commonwealth, to throw it out and to say they are not members of GATT, they are not our trading partners and we should treat Commonwealth countries differently than the U.S., then let their leader say so. They are saying that the United States is closer to us than Australia and New Zealand; they are saying, "Abolish the Commonwealth." Get your leader to say it too. We are trading partners with Australia and New Zealand.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: I am not saying that everything has gone perfectly well with them, but when we lifted the quotas on the United States last year some suggested that we keep quotas on Australia and New Zealand, that we treat them differently than the United States because we are part of the North American beef trading market. But the North American trading market belongs to 37 other countries in the world, not just Australia, New Zealand, Canada and the United States, as some of them tried to implant in the producers' minds, which I say is dishonest because that market never belonged only to the North American producers. They know as well as anybody that we have been deficient in processing beef for years and we have always had to depend on imports. They say we should cut off our trading partners. I am surprised to hear that from the good old Tory Conservative party. I am surprised to hear them suggest we should get out of the Commonwealth. That is what they are saying.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I think the minister will want to take the first opportunity to retract the rather unfortunate statement he just made with respect to the allegation that we want to get out of the Commonwealth. I realize he is making the point that beef is cheaper. Tonight we understand that bull is free.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. This is more a point of debate. I suggest that the minister should be allowed to continue.

Some hon. Members: Retract.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, in my opinion, did not have a point of order. He only contributed to the beef surplus with a little more bull.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: You are a bunch of rabble rousers.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): There is the rabble. The minister is roused.

Mr. Whelan: I wish I had been in external affairs. I would know how to use those fine words a little better.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: Not like some former civil servants or bureaucrats, people who come to parliament to tell us old parliamentarians how to run the country.

● (2140)

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There are two comments which have been made, and I think the minister was responding a little bit too generously perhaps to some other comments which were being made.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Sit down.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I think we are entitled to hear the point of order of the hon. member.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): First, the minister did not retract a completely untrue statement which was made.

An hon. Member: Prove it.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I think that ought to be done, if only to set the record straight. I think we are all prepared to accept that in the enthusiasm of the moment the minister could have overstated the case.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I wish to inform the hon. member that that is not a point of order. It is a point of debate, and I suggest that the minister continue his remarks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: I hope all these interruptions are discounted from my time.

Mr. Nowlan: Your time was up as of last night.

Mr. Whelan: It could be that I will not have enough time because it is obvious that hon. members opposite do not want to hear facts or to hear what I want to say. I think I am entitled to put what I want to say on the record, but they seem to want to discourage democracy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: This old Minister of Agriculture and this old politician does not get discouraged; all he wants is his rightful time, even if it takes an hour tomorrow with all these points of order which are being raised.

In Canada we have a tough climate and widely differing soil conditions. We have enormous transportation problems caused by the great distances involved in getting crops to market. We must compete with farmers in other countries for export markets, and we must compete against the same foreign farmers for our markets right here at home. Our farmers need help and encouragement, and they are getting it from this government. That does not mean we are supporting inefficient farmers. None of our legislation is designed with such a purpose in mind. We have the most productive farmers in the world, and we want to keep it that way. However, that does not mean we should stand by and watch our farmers wiped out by weather disaster, a sudden temporary surplus, or by competition from a foreign treasury. The aim of the government is that industrious and efficient farmers should have the assurance of a decent living in return for their labour and investment, nothing more, nothing less, and most of them ask nothing more and nothing less.

The young farmer should also have the longer term assurance that if he borrows the thousands of dollars required to start farming today, he will be able to make a living from agriculture for many years to come.

In some areas problems exist. Some of our agriculturalists who are well established say, "So what, let them be destroyed". This Minister of Agriculture does not believe that that should happen, and that is why we need the Agricultural Stabilization Act this year more than any other year in the history of parliament.

I am not suggesting that we do not have agricultural problems. There have always been problems, and there always will be problems. I attended a meeting tonight, and one of the delegates asked me how things are going in agriculture. I said that today we solved two problems but that tomorrow we will probably have three new ones. That is not uncommon in a country which deals in world markets, and so on. However, this is a country which is different from many other countries. I do not know of a country in the world which would not trade its problem for ours.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: As Minister of Agriculture representing this government and the farmers of Canada I have visited countries in different parts of the world. Sure, we do have problems, but they are very small when compared with the problems of farmers in other parts of the world. They are so small, they are hard to measure. There is hardly a ruler which would measure them. I am thinking of the problems of farmers in countries in the Balkans, in other parts of Europe and so on.

The only serious challenge we have is to do our job well, and because of that we end up with surpluses. We should count that as a blessing. I said last year in this House, and I will say it again, that if I were in the U.S.S.R. or in some other country they would not be saying that I should be fired; they would be giving me a medal because I would be the leader and the person responsible for the most efficient group of agricultural producers in the world, producers of surpluses and the envy of countries such as China and Russia.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: Some hon. members have great compassion for that great food machine to the south of us. That public corporation called the CBC, funded by this government to the tune of $400 million in subsidies, tells us what a great system the United States has, that F.D.R. and everyone since has poured billions and billions of dollars into agriculture, much more per capita than we ever thought of pouring into agriculture in Canada. We are told about the great machine built by that great free system way back under F.D.R. Hon. members may remember that he paid farmers to kill pigs, not to grow crops and that sort of thing. This Minister of Agriculture and this government do not do that.

As I said, we should count these surpluses, as I count them, as a blessing to our country. Canada is one of only four or five countries in this world which are net exporters of food. We are one of four or five countries which do not have to depend on someone else to provide us with that most vital commodity, food.

The delegates who were here tonight informed me that they would be buying from us again this year to feed their people. Only 5 per cent of our producers is involved in agriculture. In the countries represented by those delegates one third of their population is involved in agriculture, but they cannot grow enough to feed themselves. Our surplus food provides billions of dollars and feeds thousands of people in the developing countries. We provide food aid second to none in the world. We are not even second to our big neighbour to the south, even though some of us like to brag more about them than about our own system. This country provides more food aid for needy people in the world per capita than any country in the world. So let them talk about the great food machine to the south!

For the Canadian consumer there is an assured supply of nourishment which is better than any other country in the world. The people have buying power here, and the social services in our country are second to none.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: I can show hon. members letters about the beef problem we face. A little earlier I talked about how I was condemned as a trade restrictionist when I put quotas on imports. I did not hear anyone say that of the President of the United States or of the acting secretary of agriculture in the United States when they triggered their meat import law to protect the beef industry in their country, but by God, last year when I did, people said I was a trade restrictionist. Everything in the book was wrong in the beef industry, and all they asked me to do—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I think the Minister of Agriculture should be heard.

Mr. Hargrave: I don't think so.

• (2150)

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco).

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the speech we have listened to would indicate that the minister has an ego bigger than his head, and in view of the fact that his remarks are so inflammatory, I think we have heard enough from him.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): That is not a point of order. The hon. Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, if the remarks I have been making are inflammatory it must be that truth makes fire.

In the production of food, surpluses tend to depress prices if they happen to occur in those commodities for which there is no possibility of international sales. It is also wasteful to produce food for which there is no demand. That is one very good reason for better planning of production. Energy is scarce enough without wasting it on unwanted products. Agricultural products can waste in the sun and waste in the cold. Without planning you can just produce them and hope somebody will buy.

When I speak about the supply management system, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that that is what the President of the United States is proposing for U.S. beef producers now. He had a quota system for them and he has triggered a meat import law. I should like to ask some of the hon. members if we have the opportunity later in this session, or perhaps in committee, what they think the President means when he says, "You can ship so many million pounds, and you over there can ship so many million pounds, and you down there can ship so many million pounds." If that is not a supply management system I should like to know what it is. He said, "Our market can absorb so much and no more". The President of the United States of America told us that if we shipped an excessive amount of beef to them they would immediately face us with that agreement we made between the secretary of agriculture for the United States of America and myself last December. I can tell you this, Mr. Speaker, there was no such discussion that took place before President Ford announced what he did this year.

Right now there are difficulties with the beef and dairy sectors. Both are in world surplus positions much greater than many people can imagine. When you attend meetings, as I have, as the representative of this government, with the Latin American ministers and listen to them tell how they were financed by the Latin American Bank and by world organizations to enter the beef business and now cannot sell a pound of their beef, you know it is a world problem.

To whom does the North American market belong? Not to the big farmers of Canada and the United States as a lot of our so-called experts and beef breeders would tell us; it belongs to North American farmers plus 37 other nations of the world.

Let us face facts, Mr. Speaker. This year in Canada we exported more beef than we imported. Our balance of trade is about 50 million pounds of fresh beef plus 67,000 head of cattle more sent to the United States than we ever shipped to them before. The balance is in our favour. When they wanted North American market prices—we still have North American market prices. We have market prices Omaha based that are still higher in Canada than they are in Omaha. Let them be honest. Let them tell the beef farmers that that is what they asked for and that is what they got. Tell them that even with the imports of beef they received 10 per cent to 25 per cent more for their cows this year than last year when we did not have the imports of beef from Australia and New Zealand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Other, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister but the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue if he has unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, if the minister could finish by ten o'clock we would be very pleased to allow him to continue.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, if they want to suppress agriculture in Canada I am willing to let them.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) was not up to the challenge of speaking a little longer to finish off his remarks but I am quite prepared to deal with some of the issues he raised. It is clear to everyone in this Chamber that the minister has failed miserably in carrying out his mandate as minister of agriculture and he will pay the price in the next election.

I want to start off in the traditional way by complimenting those members on the government side who moved and seconded the Address in Reply to Speech from the Throne. The mover was the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail), and I think we would all agree that he is going to amount to something in this parliament. He is unique in that he is the only Liberal to be elected in a by-election during this parliament. We realize that from now until the end of this parliament no more of his party will be elected, so I want to compliment him and say that notwithstanding—

Mr. Flynn: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Flynn) on a point of order.

Mr. Flynn: Mr. Speaker, with all due deference to the hon. member I do not think our member was the only one elected in a by-election so he is giving incorrect information. This is a distortion of information and he should give it correctly. If he just got up to tell off the minister, he is wrong.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Hon. members will be recognized on a point of order but not for debate. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn).

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Flynn) apparently has a hearing problem. I said that the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) would be the only Liberal member elected in a by-election during this parliament.

I should like to call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

FLOODS—GOVERNMENT REACTION TO PETITION FOR CONTROL MEASURES ON RIDEAU RIVER

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this debate is to move to another subject, one that I raised on the fourth day of this session of parliament. It concerns the flooding that has happened on the Rideau River and the efforts being contemplated by the government to combat the difficulties that residents in my constituency and elsewhere have experienced as its result.

On October 15 I inquired of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Allmand) if he had had an opportunity to review the petition sent to him by some 550 residents on the banks of the Rideau River concerning flood control, maintenance of water levels on the Rideau, whether he had had an opportunity to consult his officials, and what he intended to do about the problem. The minister indicated he had not seen the petition although I know it was sent to him. Perhaps he has seen it now, and he has received correspondence with respect to this matter.

I am talking of most serious conditions, Mr. Speaker. In the spring of this year thousands of dollars of damage was caused to those people who live along that river. I do not think one can say, and I am sure the minister will not say, that people built there, therefore they must suffer the consequences. I do not think the minister would say that, in the circumstances.

The difficulty exists, perhaps owing to the failure of the ministry to deal with it. The primary area of flooding that concerns us is the stretch of river between Burritt's Rapids and the Long Island locks. As the House may be aware, there was extensive flooding during the spring run-off period of 1976, resulting in the considerable property damage to which I just referred. In several years during the past decade there has been severe flooding on that river. The petitioners feel that this flooding could have been averted if the authorities had exercised proper river level management.

The residents of the area contend that the off-season water levels of the past few years have been left higher than in previous years. They contend that not only have water levels been left higher, but that there is a facility for controlling the water at Long Island. They are as mindful as any of the importance of preserving the area's wild life and marine life. They live along the river. But they feel that since water levels have been lowered in the area north of Black Rapids, without damaging wild life and marine life, the same could be done in the area of concern to them.

They are asking for the maintenance of the water level, and for flood control on the river. They object to the high water levels maintained between the two areas mentioned, water levels which have resulted in the flooding to which I have referred. They contend that by lowering substantially the water level of a portion of the system, a greater catch basin could be created to accommodate the spring run-off.

A recently created federal-provincial-municipal organization known as COORTS has been brought together for the development of the entire Rideau-Trent-Severn system. People concerned about water levels in the area say that if those levels are to be controlled it is necessary to activate the provisions of the agreement and understanding arrived at, and apply them in the particular area of concern.

I have asked for an answer to my question and I brought it forward again for debate this evening because it is important to many of my constituents who have suffered damage as a result of the flooding. I submit that, in view of the history of the area, unless something is done similar difficulties will again arise. I hope that the representative of the ministry will be able to announce what steps are being taken. I also ask the parliamentary secretary, who has considered the matter, to bring to the attention of the minister the questions I have placed on the order paper relating to this matter, which is important to many people, many of whom have invested their life savings in homes in this area.

The Rideau is a beautiful river, Mr. Speaker. It can be made more beautiful, deepened and widened, not just for boaters, but as well for all those who indulge in recreation along the river. But when this is done I hope the people who live in the area and have invested their life savings in it will not be forgotten.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) for bringing this matter to the attention of the House. I like many who live in and around Ottawa, have always appreciated the value and beauty of the Rideau River. Many of my closest friends live along the river; as a result I am familiar with the difficulty to which he referred.

On October 14, 1976, a petition addressed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Allmand) was presented directly to the department. The petition contained more than 500 signatures.

The petitioners object to the flooding on the section of the Rideau River between Burritt's Rapids and Long Island which they state is because of the high water levels maintained on this section of the river during the winter.

In 1976 the worst flooding on record occurred along the Rideau River between Smiths Falls and Ottawa. The break-up was very rapid due to abnormally high temperatures followed by rain. Considerable damage was caused, and officials of the department immediately began assessing what, if anything, could be done to alleviate the problem in the future.

The petition requests that the water be lowered to provide a larger "catch basin", and assumes that marine and wildlife would not be seriously affected. The petition also states that damage due to ice is increased by high water levels.

There has been insufficient time to review the petition as to what effect a lowering of the water level by three feet, as requested, would have on wildlife and the surrounding water table. It is known that in similar situations along the Trent when water levels were lowered for construction purposes, fish and aquatic mammals were killed and nearby wells have gone dry. The uplift of ice when spring freshet commences is often more severe with lower river levels and usually there is more damage caused to docks and bank protection. Officials have calculated that the amount of storage provided by such a lowering would have delayed the high water levels in 1976 by about a half day but would not have reduced the maximum levels reached.

The minister has asked that the petition be studied in detail. Game and fish authorities have already been asked to give their advice. An opinion has also been requested from an independent engineering firm as to what effect an all winter lowering would have on ice build-up. The clearing of ice jams in the Ottawa area is a municipal operation assisted by canal procedures to flush away the broken ice. Similar co-operation would be given the upstream municipalities if they wished to provide a similar service on a co-ordinated basis.

The control of water in a watershed has many ramifications besides maintaining levels for navigation. They have an effect on the water level in wells, fish and marine life, and the quality of the water itself. Departmental officials are constantly trying to improve the art to accommodate as many users as possible with minimum adverse effects. Precipitous action might have unexpected and undesirable results. It is for this reason that this complex problem requires detailed multi-disciplinary study.

ENERGY—REQUEST FOR SUBSIDY TO ATLANTIC PROVINCES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured and delighted that the minister is here tonight to answer my humble question. I will leave aside the preliminary recitation I made to him and the answer he gave to me.

I was impressed, indeed shocked, that on an issue so vital to the people of Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia the minister could couch his answer in such heavy layers of complacency and casuality. For many, many months the premiers of the two provinces have been presenting an urgent case for special action to provide some measure of relief for the people of Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia.

I know that the whole country, indeed much of the whole world, faces a grave energy crisis. But the situation in the two provinces is especially acute and painful. We have no great hydro-electric capacities. In Prince Edward Island our electricity derives from oil-fired turbines and one need not be an expert to know the effect of increasing oil prices.

In seven minutes I would not presume to attempt an in-depth discussion of the nation's energy problems. But it is beyond question that the Government of Canada is deeply involved in, and in large measure responsible for, our current energy crisis. I can and should, Mr. Speaker, draw to the attention of the House and the minister the very grave situation in which the provinces of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island find themselves.

I hear from constituents a depressing account of their difficulty in paying their monthly electricity bills. One lady says it costs her more for electricity than for her rent. Phenomenal increases seem the order of the day. In my modest constituency office in Charlottetown, the increase is revealing. In July, 1975, the bill for electricity was $2.86. In August of 1975 it was $3.23. One year later, July, 1976, it was not $2.86 but $11.88. The bill for September, 1976, was $27.05. This is a sizeable increase for a small office with dome lights. But think of the effect on our processing plants where our fine agricultural products are frozen or otherwise processed. With our transportation costs and other deterrents to which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is adding further problems, we have trouble enough already trying to compete. If the costs of energy are to be so disparate, what is our future?

What processing plant will locate in Prince Edward Island in the face of staggering energy costs such as these? How can we really move in the direction of economic expansion and overcome regional disparity? It is for this reason I was so appalled by the minister's lack of anxiety over the matter. My hon. friend from Egmont rightly pointed out that DREE cannot accomplish anything, let alone economic miracles, if other government departments work against its aims and objectives.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. Is it customary to remind hon. members that their time has expired?

Is it agreed that the hon. member may pursue his speech?

Mr. Macquarrie: I do not believe I have exhausted my seven minutes. I think Your Honour is wrong in your calculations.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I am sorry, and I wish to apologize to the hon. member. I was mistaken as to the amount of time available to the hon. member. He still has a few more minutes to go.

[Mr. Macquarrie.]

Mr. Macquarrie: I appreciate that. I have been here for 20 years and have made many wrong moves, but I have never over-extended my time. I say to the minister, whom I like and respect, and for whom I still have hopes: what plant can operate in Prince Edward Island, processing our fine fish or our fine agricultural products, if electricity costs are so exorbitant as to drive it completely out of the Atlantic area? How can he justify those energy costs when our most important minister, the minister for DREE, is seeking to establish and consolidate these very industries? My hon. friend from Egmont touched recently on these points, as I have done for years. There is no logic in one minister dedicating himself to enhancing and supporting the deprived areas of the country if all the other ministers vote against him.

One of the principal contributors to economic disparity is the excessive cost of energy in Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia. In Prince Edward Island, or Charlottetown, the average salary is $8,100 and the average energy bill is $980, or 12 per cent of the earnings of a household. In Toronto the average salary is $11,000 and the average energy cost per household is $525, or 4.8 per cent. In Edmonton, that wonderful city in the west, the average salary is $11,000 and the average annual energy bill is $305, or 2.7 per cent. One more shattering statistic reveals that electricity cost per kilowatt hour in Charlottetown is $4.35, in Toronto $1.76, and in Winnipeg $1.58. We love the westerners and we love the Ontario people, but this is a disgraceful situation. With figures like these we scarcely need to dilate upon the question of regional disparity. The statistics are all too painfully eloquent and poignantly revealing.

I plead with the minister—and I am honoured by his presence here tonight—to energize himself and to listen to the two premiers, although I think in this case Mr. Regan is more aggressive than Mr. Campbell. As my own leader recognized some weeks ago, temporary aid is absolutely essential. This we must have, and beyond this some major long range moves are overdue.

There are a number of areas in which the Atlantic region can be assisted by the dominion government. The first, I would say, is to stop studying and to start doing something about the Fundy tides. As a Presbyterian and religious man I say it passeth my understanding, in an age when we talk learnedly about renewable and non-renewable resources, that the Fundy project is so casually regarded by the Government of Canada. It is the one great eternal source of energy. So long as the earth, the sun and the moon endure that energy is there.

But why do we want so long? The great French philosopher Montesquieu said that to govern was to foresee. I invite the government to show foresight and to do something lasting and effective in the struggle against regional economic disparity which has been a part of the confederation process and reality for over a century.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I very much welcome the opportunity of replying to the eloquent member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), a man who has entertained us and held us spellbound on many an occasion. I wish I had the kind of budget that would solve the problem that he has set out for us tonight. I wish I could help everybody in all parts of the country. Although there is a tendency to see the problem solely in terms of Prince Edward Island—I do not kid myself; I realize it is probably more serious in Prince Edward Island than in other parts of the country—the problem of increasing electric energy costs exists in other parts of the country as well. Indeed, not so very far away from here you will find electricity rates which are comparable to those in Nova Scotia.

The federal government had a choice to make when the Arab OPEC nations increased the world price of oil. It could have gone immediately to the world price, as some European countries did and as Japan did, or it could have made the choice that it did make, which was to move up in measured steps toward the international price.

As a result of that, the taxpayers of Canada have subsidized very substantially energy users in Canada. In the maritimes alone that subsidy assistance by the end of this year will run very close to $1 billion since the oil price increase went through. More particularly, I think it is important to recognize that automatically, as a result of the last price increase in Canada, there was a shift from the federal treasury to the treasuries of the provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and P.E.I. I am talking about the federal-provincial equalization payments. This automatic shift, which resulted purely from the increase in the oil price, is comparable to the increased cost of oil generation in the province of Nova Scotia—in fact it is a little below—and it is a little below but very close to the cost in P.E.I.

Let me go on to say, Mr. Speaker, that there are many who argue that a subsidy is not the answer, that we must look to longer term solutions. Quite frankly, that is where I am placing my emphasis. I would draw the hon. member's attention to the report of a speech that appeared in the Friday, October 8 edition of the Chronicle-Herald headlined, "Energy Subsidy Would Only Delay the Crunch". The speech was by Dr. Peter Wilson, director of the Atlantic Industrial Research Institute, Nova Scotia Technical College. He had this to say the previous Thursday:

A direct subsidy would also postpone the energy saving decisions which would inevitably result from higher prices.

● (2220)

I think it is important that we look at things like the Fundy tides. Indeed we are, and we are participating with the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. I have seen the first stage of phase one, and the three different projects have been identified. I do not think we should kid one another. Is the hon. member saying that we want Fundy tidal power at any cost, or regardless of the cost, even if it is two or three times the cost of alternative sources such as hydro from Labrador, and nuclear power? I would ask the hon. member to look very seriously at that question.

The other point I want to make is that I am very much impressed with the initiatives of the Premier of Prince Edward Island in respect of renewable energy projects. I have them on my desk, I have been looking at them, and I have been out to see the sites. I think he is taking a very positive and constructive approach to this whole thing.

HOUSING—POSSIBILITY OF ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR REHABILITATION OF EXISTING UNITS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question has to do with the Atlantic region as well, particularly Newfoundland. On Friday I asked the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) a question regarding the rehabilitation program in two areas, one under NIP and RRAP, and the other under a special application for Newfoundland veterans presented to the minister by the provincial command of the Canadian Legion.

The Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program is, to my mind, one of the best projects ever devised by the government, but for some reason or other there are not enough funds going in to help the many thousands of people who need help. For example, in the province of Newfoundland in the rural areas there are 43,265 people in the lower income bracket earning between $5,000 and $10,000 a year who own their own homes. It is obvious that, with the cost of living and their incomes, their homes are going to continue to deteriorate. They cannot afford to maintain them, install proper heating, proper electrical systems, or the insulation in respect of which the government suggests we are saving a million dollars a year in energy.

The majority of people living in small Newfoundland communities own their own homes. Most of these are old homes built in accordance with the standards of the time. A great many of them are 30 to 50 years old and were built without any of the facilities that today are taken for granted. A high percentage of these homes are without inside water, inside toilets, baths or showers, without central heating and, indeed, with little or no insulation.

The provincial planning task force on housing in Newfoundland knows that with regard to facilities our housing stocks in the province lag well behind those in the rest of the Atlantic region. Many of those homes are owned by low income and welfare families who do not have the financial resources to make the necessary improvements or generally upgrade their homes to minimum standards of safety and comfort.

I have raised this subject on a number of occasions since the program came into effect. For example, last year with the number of homes that needed repairs in Newfoundland we only received $600,000 under the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program in respect of rural and native housing. I understand this year there will only be $700,000. The number of loans has increased and grants have gone up to $3,750. They could be increased to $10,000, but what good would it do, as no one is getting anything as a result of a lack of funds? I hope the very fine parliamentary secretary will give me an answer in that regard.

If I have a few more moments I should like to refer again to a survey done by the provincial command of the Canadian Legion on behalf of veterans, a survey which was financed by the government two or three years ago. The survey was done in an excellent manner. We found there were 2,075 veterans or widows who require repairs to their homes but because of the restricted allowances on their pensions they cannot afford them.

Yesterday I saw it reported in the newspapers that the government says it is saving $1 billion on conservation of energy. With the high price of fuel—to which reference was made in the previous question—the high price of electricity, the high price of heating homes, the many thousands of homes owned by Canadians in the lower income brackets, think what the saving would be in energy, fuel and the cost of heating oil if these homes could be insulated and repairs done, and think how much money these people could save, money which they cannot afford to put into repairs, insulation, and maintenance of their homes.

I hope the parliamentary secretary will be able to throw more light on the subject and will be able to say more than was disclosed by the minister last Friday.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) has raised a question about the progress of the Residential Rehabilitation Program at an opportune time. I am pleased that he has done so since this is one of the most successful programs currently in operation under the National Housing Act. I might tell the hon. member also that this is of particular interest to my riding in which I can identify three areas falling under RRAP. We had some difficulties with the budget this year, but we succeeded in finding the money and solving most of the acute problems there.

The capital budget allocation of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, in designated areas and for non-profit projects for 1976, was set at $37 million early in the year. The performance of this successful program has been such that, by September 30, more than $29 million had been committed, or 80 per cent of the total allocation. Such has been the success of the program, in fact, that funds were reallocated to it at the beginning of this month.

The budget allocation for residential rehabilitation under the Rural and Native Housing Program is $12.1 million. Of this, $6.6 million had been committed by the end of last week.

Three years ago a grant under Part V of the NHA was made available to the Newfoundland-Labrador Command Royal Canadian Legion to provide financial assistance for a survey of conditions under which veterans in the province of Newfoundland were living. The survey was completed in May, 1975, and a report submitted to the provincial government and to the minister. A meeting was held in January between representatives of CMHC, the Newfoundland Housing Corporation, and the Canadian Legion. It was indicated at that time that, since a special NHA program is not available to veterans, about half the units surveyed could fall under the rural rehabilitation program. In September, a provincial order in council designated all areas in the province, except urban areas, for residential rehabilitation under this program. Negotiations are under way with the provincial housing agency for its delivery, and a meeting is being held in St. John's tomorrow morning to select the high priority areas in which the program would have immediate applicability.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

At 10.30 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

REQUEST FOR DELAY IN CONSTRUCTION OF PIGGYBACK TERMINAL AT WINNIPEG—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on an issue of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the statements made by the Minister of Transport last Friday in Winnipeg promising to review the proposed location of the new Canadian National Railways piggyback terminal because of the economic disadvantages to the CNR and the harm to the surrounding residential community, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Stewart):

That this House direct the Ministry of Transport to request that the CNR halt further construction of the new terminal until an independent inquiry can be established to review the whole matter with a view to selecting an alternative site.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTED STUDY OF THE NEED TO RENOVATE CERTAIN WHARVES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Due to poor maintenance, many wharves built by the federal government along the St. Lawrence River have fallen into disrepair. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That this House recommend to the federal government that a survey of all wharves be conducted to determine precisely which ones should be renovated without delay to be used when we have our merchant marine.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, it requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

SUGGESTED CANCELLATION OF PROPOSED FRENCH LANGUAGE STATION IN BROCKVILLE AREA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to persons living in my constituency and in the general area of Leeds and Grenville counties, arising out of a recent announcement by the CBC that it will use the last available FM radio channel in the area for the almost immediate construction in Brockville, Ontario, of a 3,000 watt FM French language transmitter with a maximum radius of under 30 miles. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That in view of the fact that the area to be served is well over 98 per cent non-French speaking and that such CBC action will prevent future establishment of any private FM station in the Brockville district, the House requests the government to take immediate steps to cancel such plans in the interests of common sense and proper expenditure of taxpayers' money and, finally, that the government adopt a clear policy of placing any new CBC French or English radio or television stations only in areas where a reasonable percentage of either language in the minority actually exists.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE CONSTITUTION

INQUIRY CONCERNING PROPOSALS FORWARDED TO PROVINCES—MAINTENANCE OF LANGUAGE RIGHTS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. In light of this morning's story in the Montreal Gazette relating to constitutional amendments, will the Acting Prime Minister advise the House if any new proposals, information or documents which would have prompted this story have been put forward by the federal government to the provinces since those documents tabled in the House on April 9?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the importance of the question asked by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. I read the story in the Montreal Gazette this morning; obviously, as the hon. member knows, the story is inaccurate. If I may respond directly to the hon. member's question, there has been no further documentation or proposal made since the Prime Minister tabled copies of his letters to the premiers respecting the patriation exercise of April 10, 1976, to which a draft proclamation was appended. This draft proclamation is falsely drawn upon to support the allegation that the draft proclamation itself removes existing guarantees with respect to language rights.

I think Article 30 of the draft proclamation is explicit and states that English and French are the official languages of Canada, that no provision in this part shall derogate from any right, privilege or obligation existing under any other provision of the constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: This language in the draft proclamation clarifies the situation perfectly and indicates that the report in the Gazette is false. One can only hope, in view of the anxiety that report will create, that similar publicity will be given to the correction.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Acting Prime Minister for his explanation, given the many great inaccuracies contained in that story. Nevertheless, having said that, in view of the confusion and dangerous misunderstandings which this article could create in the minds of many Canadians on the language rights issue, as the minister mentioned, can the government affirm that in the event of patriation of the constitution, however achieved, the existing guarantees in the British North America Act for language rights will not be withdrawn or weakened in any way?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, that is clearly the policy of the government. That is the proposal that is contained in the draft proclamation which was tabled by the Prime Minister in the House. Therefore, there is no equivocation in replying positively to the hon. member's question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

DATE OF CONFERENCE WITH PREMIERS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Can the Acting Prime Minister advise if any date has been set for further constitutional discussions between the Prime Minister and the premiers as proposed by the premiers following the termination of their meeting in Toronto on October 2?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, no specific date has been set for a future discussion between the Prime Minister and the premiers of the provinces. I shall be tabling later today copies of correspondence between the Prime Minister and Premier Lougheed of Alberta who acted as chairman of the premiers' meeting on this question. In that correspondence it will be seen that there is an acceptance of a future meeting with the premiers, but no specific date has yet been set.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

LEGISLATION LISTED AS INDICATION OF GOVERNMENT PRIORITIES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister as well. Considering the message the people of Canada sent the government via two by-elections on Monday can the Acting Prime Minister possibly explain the priorities of the government as indicated in the 11 bills filed yesterday, almost all of which are housekeeping or include such gems as the Historic Sites and Monuments Act amendment and an act respecting diplomatic and consular privileges.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Are these the real priorities of the government?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the priorities of the government have been set forth in the Speech from the Throne.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: The list of bills of which notice was given yesterday, of course, includes bills that will be brought forward, hopefully in the course of the session. Each of the bills, of course, does not carry the same priority. I hope that the hon. member realizes there are a number of extremely important bills in the group of which notice was given yesterday.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Acting Prime Minister knows that Speeches from the Throne have as much bearing on the actions of the government as quotations from the Old Testament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The Acting Prime Minister said that there are priority bills in the list. I looked at it with care and I found no more than two. I repeat, nine are housekeeping bills. Can the Acting Prime Minister explain to the House and through the House to the people of Canada why there is not one bill on unemployment, not one bill on housing, not one bill on energy, not one bill with anything of real substance?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that bills relating to the subjects that he has mentioned will be brought forward. I hope that when they do come forward within a relatively short time the hon. member will stand up and draw the attention of the House to the fact that we are meeting the priorities in the Speech from the Throne.

● (1420)

Mr. Broadbent: Will the Acting Prime Minister assure the House that the bills of substance to which he has alluded will be brought forward in time to provide a few more jobs at least for some of the 700,000 who are now unemployed before Christmas?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

REQUEST FOR FUNDS FOR REHABILITATION PROGRAM AND THAT REGULATIONS FOR PROGRAM BE TABLED

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

Considering that the funds earmarked for RRAP have already practically run out, would the minister advise the House if additional monies will be made available for this program this year or, at the very least at the beginning of next year, so that the rehabilitation of all those units may be carried out as soon as possible?

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. If I understood the hon. member correctly, his question refers to the rehabilitation and renewal program, which we call RRAP. Funds have been reallocated from other programs within our budget so that this program can continue to the end of this year and, of course, it will be renewed next year because of its high degree of success.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Following the decision of the Department of Urban Affairs, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation set up regulations concerning this program. Would the minister table those regulations before the House so that hon. members may read them?

Mr. Danson: I can see no objection to that, Mr. Speaker.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE OF CANADIAN PRESS EMPLOYEES—SUGGESTION MINISTER RECOMMEND ARBITRATION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. As a late report indicates that the hon. gentleman intends to meet with Canadian Press employers on Friday, would he confirm that this meeting will take place and will he tell the House whether he intends, also, to meet with the guild and the publishers? Further, does he intend to recommend that the sensible course of arbitration should take place immediately to end this long and costly dispute?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): I am happy to advise the hon. member that I am meeting with the committee representing the publishers on Friday. I do not anticipate meeting with the guild prior to that time because I have already met with them and I think they are aware of what I am doing; that meeting may well take place subsequent to my meeting with the publishers. The hon. member might agree with me that if I and my department are to try to mediate this dispute and attempt to resolve it I should not indicate at this stage what my own feelings are in the matter.

Mr. Hees: In view of what the minister has said, may I urge him very strongly, in the interests of fair play and of bringing this dispute to a quick end, that he should consider carefully and favourably the idea of introducing arbitration.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I am happy about the hon. member's progressive attitude.

Oral Questions

PENITENTIARIES

KINGSTON—ALLEGED BOMB THREAT IF INMATE DEMANDS NOT MET

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Solicitor General? Having discussed this matter with the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands who is gravely concerned about affairs occurring in Kingston, may I ask whether the Solicitor General can indicate whether he has contacted penitentiary officials in Kingston with regard to a threat by a woman caller to a radio station to blow up a public institution if inmate demands were not met? If so, what action, if any, is being taken by the officials to ensure the security of the citizens of Kingston?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, this matter has been referred to the provincial authorities. So far as the question of inmate activities at Millhaven are concerned, I had a meeting with the regional director and with other regional directors yesterday afternoon and it is our intention to come back to a situation of normalization as soon as the situation allows it at Kingston.

Mr. Nielsen: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister did not direct his reply to the action being taken to ensure the safety of the citizens of Kingston, which is concerning not only the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands but all of us. Can the minister say whether there has been any approach by the local police to the RCMP for assistance in investigating the incident or assisting them in any other way? In answering that, can the minister also say what are the inmates' demands and what response has been given to those demands by the authorities?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated earlier, the provincial police in Ontario and the municipal police force have been made aware of the situation, and if they require the assistance of the RCMP in their investigations we will, of course, be pleased to provide same.

PERFORMING ARTS

POSSIBILITY SOME GOVERNMENT WORK GIVEN TO PRIVATE FILM MAKERS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. I know that some time ago he was quoted as saying that both the Progressive Conservative Party and the New Democratic Party are in trouble and that frankly one or the other would disappear. I hope that that is not the quality of insight that he brings to his department but I do want to congratulate him on his appointment.

The independent film producers have for some time been asking the government to delete sections 9 and 11 from the National Film Act. Since the government indicated in its Speech from the Throne that it has the intention of releasing some government work to the private sector, would the minister tell the House whether that will have top priority in this particular area, so that the film producers will have some competition?

[Mr. Munro (Hamilton East).]

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, so far as the second part of the hon. member's statement is concerned, we are considering that matter actively at the present time.

Mr. Friesen: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister whether he will ensure that they will be able to compete in all areas for government contracts, not just for the bits and scraps that they have been getting up to this time?

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, it is not our intention to confine them to bits and scraps.

Mr. J. M. Has the minister any explanation as to why it is that the aerospace industry in the Atlantic provinces, specifically Nova Scotia, having been offered a $6 million part of that program over a six-year period, now in fact finds that their program is $600,000 over the same period of time?

RECIPROCITY OF PENSIONS BETWEEN CANADA AND CERTAIN COUNTRIES—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. On October 13, as reported at page 19 of Hansard, in answer to a question from my colleague from Hamilton West, the minister said that the bill to negotiate reciprocity of pensions between Canada and several countries, including the United Kingdom, "is being drafted and I hope I will be able to table it in the House for first reading in the next few months". This is also the exact wording that he used over six months ago when he announced the plan. My question is: Has the minister made no progress at all in drafting this plan during the past six months?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF JOINT CANADA-UNITED STATES MANAGEMENT OF FISHERIES RESOURCES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. During the minister's meeting with United States officials in Washington on Friday last were any discussions held by him, or prior to his visit by his officials, or by fishery officials, on the possibility of establishing a joint Canada-U.S. fisheries management commission to manage stocks in all Canada-U.S. boundary areas? If so, would he be prepared to table the United States and Canadian proposals; and since the government has indicated that it will declare a 200 mile limit on January 1, 1977, or in approximately 73 days, was any agreement reached on the joint management of this resource?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will try as briefly as I can to answer what is a very complex question. There were very detailed discussions between myself and the United States Secretary on this matter. Prior to my going to Washington there were also talks between officials and there have been follow-up talks which were held yesterday. They covered most of the questions the hon. member has raised in a general discussion fashion. As things stand at the moment, the Secretary and I have agreed that it would not be possible in the period between now and the issuing of our order in council, which must come at the end of October or shortly thereafter, to achieve a final and ultimate resolution of the various issues. What the officials are now seeking is some kind of interim arrangement that will permit Canada to proceed on or about January 1 with this 200-mile declaration and the United States, I believe, in March 1977.

In the meantime there will unquestionably be issues left unsolved. What we are seeking is an interim arrangement while discussions are proceeding toward what we hope will be a mutually satisfactory solution over time. However, the hon. member is very experienced in this matter and I think would agree with me that this is not something that is going to be settled in two or three months.

INCARCERATION OF ANDRÉE LECLERC IN INDIA—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Raynald Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, I am directing another question to the Minister of External Affairs.

Following a telegram which I recently received from the family of Marie-Andrée Leclerc from my constituency who has been jailed in New Delhi in India since July 9 without any charge being laid against her, I would like to know whether the Canadian government has contacted the Indian authorities. If so, what happened? If not, I would like it to intervene as soon as possible for the sake of freedom and basic human rights and to enable this young Canadian to obtain justice.

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is regrettable, of course, that no more rapid action has been undertaken in the case of this young lady. However, I am advised that our high commissioner in New Delhi has now been officially informed that Miss Leclerc is being detained under what is known as the Maintenance of Internal Security Act. The reason for this is that the crimes she is alleged to have committed occurred both in India and abroad. The allegations regarding the criminal acts are under investigation. We have been advised that Indian authorities have decided to keep Miss Leclerc under judicial remand until the investigations have been completed, at which time any justifiable charges will be laid. This is the maximum amount of information we have been able to obtain to date.

COMBINES

ALLEGATION OF COLLUSION BETWEEN OTTAWA "JOURNAL" AND "CITIZEN"—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the new Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact that the people of the city of Ottawa have been denied any daily English-language newspaper at least twice in the last week, on Friday and again on Tuesday, because of a pact between the publishers of the Ottawa Citizen and the Ottawa Journal that one will not publish when the other cannot publish, will the minister investigate to see whether this is a violation of the Combines Investigation Act, since it appears to be a blatant example of non-competitive collusion between two corporate giants?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is my constitutional responsibility simply to bring the hon. member's question to the attention of the director of Combines Investigation. That is all I can do.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, if the minister finds that this kind of policy is not covered by the act as drafted, will he assure the House that when he brings in new legislation soon a provision will be included in the act that will cover policies of this sort that are taken against the community interest and are hard on the people of Ottawa and the small business community in this city?

Mr. Abbott: The hon. member's point will certainly be considered.

MULTICULTURALISM

DATE OF APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN OF CONSULTATION COUNCIL

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour, the minister in charge of the demise of the multicultural department. Will he please advise the House when he plans to name the chairman of the Multicultural Consultation Council? Do we have to wait until 1978, and why is he waiting so long?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is obviously more excessive in his language than I would have anticipated, having already advised him that a prospective chairman is seeing me tomorrow when we are going to talk about the matter.

Mr. Paproski: You mean only one guy has applied?

An hon. Member: You want a job, Steve?

Mr. Paproski: You have to be out of your mind.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I trust that the hon. member, knowing that the man in question comes from Edmonton, would not want any more applicants.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to advise the minister that there are Polish, Italians, Portuguese, German and others besides Ukrainians applying for the job.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Is the hon. member applying?

Mr. Paproski: If the price is right.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

SEARCH AND RESCUE

REASON FOR DELAY IN ANSWERING DISTRESS CALL OF DUTCH FREIGHTER

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of National Defence, notice of which I have given. Yesterday at approximately 10 a.m. the air-sea rescue centre in Halifax received a distress call from a Dutch freighter 60 miles off the southeast coast of Newfoundland. Some five hours later a helicopter arrived on the scene. In the interim 13 of these seamen had died from exposure. Why did it take five hours to get a rescue helicopter on the scene, since it would appear that the delay was a major factor in the loss of these 13 lives?

[Mr. Nystrom.]

Hon. Barney Danson (Acting Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think some of the facts of this tragic case should be cleared up. An aircraft from the base in the maritimes was off the ground within 18 minutes of receiving the alert, and was on the scene within two hours of receiving the alert. In addition a Labrador helicopter was there shortly after that and able to save one man. Unfortunately, someone had ordered the ship to be abandoned in an 80-mile an hour gale with 40-foot waves—a tragic situation. We were able to rescue one man, but unfortunately in that time frame and those waters others are presumed lost. The armed forces searched with a high degree of efficiency, as is usual to them. They were off the ground and in the area as quickly as it was humanly possible to accomplish such a feat.

REQUEST FOR IMPROVEMENT IN OPERATION OF SERVICE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the tragic and urgent nature of this matter I would direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Transport who shares responsibility in this area. On September 29 a Newfoundland trawler went aground in the same area, and were it not for the bravery and initiative of the residents on shore 14 Newfoundland fishermen would have lost their lives as there was no helicopter in the area. My question to the minister is, how many more people have to die before you will do something about it?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO ENABLE "HOWAY" TO RESUME PATROLS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment whom I wish to congratulate as he is about to take on greater responsibilities.

In view of the importance of our patrolling efficiently our coastal waters, is the minister aware that the Howay, the fishing patrol ship on the west coast, is still standing idle in the port of Victoria for total lack of funds to operate and, if so, what does he intend to do to get it back into action and ensure our presence in those waters?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity to speak with the crew of the Howay some time in August. I found them eager to take over all patrol operations to meet our obligations. That vessel is affected by a lack of funds, which situation is general in view of the extraordinary expenses incurred in the last two or three years in the field of vessel operations. We are trying to use the funds as best as we can to meet our needs. There is no doubt that because seasonal fishing activities have slowed down in some areas off the Pacific coast the need for patrols was less severe. Still, five days ago I authorized the transfer of funds, within my department, to enable the use of those vessels; perhaps not that of the Howay immediately, but at least in the weeks to come, and I am doing everything I can to give that priority the importance it deserves.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary.

In light of the answer of the minister, I should very much like to know why that vessel is still in port, why it is not on patrol?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, it is not unusual for some of our ships to lie at anchor in the port.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

DATE OF TABLING REPORT OF TASK FORCE—REQUEST FOR IMPROVEMENT IN OPERATION OF SERVICE

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for St. John's East of the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that there may be a recurrence of the epidemic of loss of lives as a result of the lack of capability of the Canadian Coast Guard and the Department of National Defence, I wonder whether the minister would now be able to table the report of the committee of the Coast Guard task force and realize that again we will have an epidemic of loss of lives because of the lack of capability. What action does he intend to take in the immediate future so that we might avoid further occurrences as the fishing season opens and as the weather gets worse.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I must say I appreciate the tone of that question compared to the completely impossible attitude of taking advantage of the serious situation shown by the hon. member for St. John's East.

Mr. Speaker, I answered that question about the imminent announcement of the additional facilities in the area of the Coast Guard, but of course all hon. members who look at the question reasonably will understand that in cases of disaster at sea we will always count on the assistance of all existing vessels and people in the area, private vessels always forming the most likely and immediately on the scene assistance. The attempt to make it sound as though the Coast Guard facilities in a particular place should always be exactly there awaiting the accident is of course a completely impossible suggestion. Notwithstanding that we have said that we want additional facilities. We are going to be getting the additional facilities and that announcement will take place soon.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, in view of the reasonable answer would the minister assure the House and the people of Newfoundland that there will be a reasonable deployment of the air, sea and rescue forces in Newfoundland, which is closer to the scene where all the unfortunate incidents are occurring, and would he take immediate action to deploy part of the air-sea rescue squadron, or the capability, to the province of Newfoundland.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that it will be our intention to deploy the available forces in the places where they are most useful and that the analysis of where the problems arise and where the services are deployed can be made once the announcement is made.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

REASON FOR DELAY IN MONITORING ACTIVITIES OF MARKETING BOARDS

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Could he tell the House what is the current status of efforts by the Anti-Inflation Board to get provincial and federal marketing boards to agree to co-operate with it and allow the Anti-Inflation Board's efforts to monitor their activities to go on pursuant to indications given by the government a month ago that the board would be doing this. Further, could he say why there has been what appears to be such a delay in getting this useful work underway?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to press the inquiry with the Chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board.

TRANSPORT

TRANSCONTINENTAL PASSENGER TRAIN SERVICE—SUGGESTED FREEDOM FOR COMMISSION TO MAKE REPORT

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the Consumers Association of Canada, the Canadian Railway Labour Association and Transport 2000 have today publicly stated that the parallel consultative study of the Ministry of Transport might interfere with and undermine the ability of the Canadian Transport Commission to enunciate a preferred plan for transcontinental passenger trains that would be in line with the spirit exhibited in the summary of findings from 15 hearings in 14 cities, between Montreal and Vancouver, will the minister assure the House that neither he nor his ministry will interfere with the CTC by coming out with the minister's own report resulting from the parallel study and thus ignoring the 195 briefs submitted to the CTC and to influence the report of the CTC itself. Will the minister ensure that the CTC is completely free to ignore any or all of the parallel study if it is so inclined.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there is certainly no need for anyone to fear any interference with the CTC's move toward a preferred plan and a final recommendation to us on all transportation services by rail. It was, of course, our purpose in setting this forward to have good rail service developed in Canada in a very positive way. That was stated in the January 29 statement. I think it is wrong to refer, in the exact terms used, to parallel studies as though they are competing. There certainly is no intention to preempt or move ahead of the CTC in its work.

What our work has been about has been the preparation of the ground so that after the necessary decisions are taken we will have as full an appreciation as possible of the provincial positions in relation to their interest in services and the kind of services that will complement rail services. In addition, we also will have as full as possible knowledge of the problems which may be created for the working men involved in the operation of the trains. Our objective after the CTC recommendation is to follow with as swift an action as possible so that we will have improved quality of rail transportation service where it is continued in Canada.

CONSULTATION WITH LABOUR ON RAILWAY PASSENGER TRAIN POLICY

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. The minister in his announcement earlier in the year said that the parallel study would consult with the carrier, labour, the provinces and others. I am informed by railway labour that they have not been consulted. If the minister has full confidence in the CTC and wants to reassure all concerned that the parallel study is not designed to get the kind of report that he and his ministry want, will the minister request the CTC, after it has received the parallel study by MOT, to hold further hearings at least in Ottawa at which interested parties may examine, comment upon and if necessary refute the parallel study by Transport Canada.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am a little surprise that the hon. member is now in his second question suggesting that I interfered with the procedures of the CTC. The CTC is fully able to take care of its own procedures. He will notice that the CLC compliments the Canadian Transport Commission on the manner in which it summarizes the proceedings. I may say also to the hon. member that he should check with his sources again, because they will confirm that there have been meetings between my officials and representatives of labour. I do not know whether the single labour party to whom he referred was involved but certainly there were representatives involved.

AGRICULTURE

MILK—POSSIBILITY OF FARMERS BEING CHARGED FOR NEW QUOTAS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

First of all I should like to thank him on behalf of the producers in my region for the improvements which have been made under the release we received yesterday.

Now, may I ask the minister whether the allocation of these new quotas will be made free of charge or whether producers will have to pay a certain amount of money to obtain them?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the whole distribution of the quotas will have to be worked out with the provincial marketing boards concerned. It is not our intention, if it can be worked by any means, that they would have to pay for it. We do not want them to have to pay a high price. If the boards who administer that quota within a province figure that the Producers should pay a nominal fee, that will be up to them.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Considering the importance of this issue and the fact that a lot has been written about it over the past few months, may I ask the minister whether he will take the necessary steps to ensure that the allocation of these new quotas is made on the basis of the criteria mentioned in his release, criteria of which I fully approve.

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, that is the whole intent of the program.

COMMUNICATIONS

POSSIBLE CHANGE IN POLICY OF DELETING UNITED STATES COMMERCIALS FROM CABLE TELEVISION

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications. It arises out of the exchange on Monday between my colleague from Annapolis Valley and the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In light of the fact that the Secretary of State for External Affairs hinted last Friday following his meeting with Secretary Kissinger that the piratical policy of the CRTC in requiring Canadian cable companies to delete commercials from United States programming might be ended, can the minister tell the House whether that is, in fact, the government's intention and, if so, what policies, if any, it intends to substitute for the deletions policy?

● (1450)

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I can hardly agree with the view of the hon. member that these practices are piratical because they are engaged in with the knowledge and acquiescence of everyone concerned. Bill C-58 was an attempt to deal with that problem in part, but hon. members opposite were quite reluctant to support that bill. However, we are trying to deal with it because it is important to protect the broadcasting industry, which is very fragile in this country. The Americans have requested a delay in the implementation of the commercial deletion requirement. That request is being considered and is the object of many discussions between the CRTC, FCC and those concerned.

SUGGESTED ELIMINATION OF POWER OF BROADCASTING COMMISSION TO MAKE POLICY DECISIONS

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): In view of the fact that in a democracy major policy decisions which will have a tremendous impact upon our relations with our neighbours, upon our cultural development and upon the ability of our citizens to see and hear what they would like should be made by elected representatives and not by an appointed body which is virtually responsible to no one for its actions, does the government intend to introduce amendments to the Broadcasting Act which would curtail the ability of the CRTC to make these policy decisions without the approval of parliament?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): The Minister of Communications takes full responsibility for the CRTC; therefore, I think it is quite unfair and unjustified to say that the CRTC is answerable to no one. The CRTC should be free from input at the political level to go about its regulatory functions, and nothing is going to be changed in this respect. However, it is not improper for the Minister of Communications to discuss in a general manner questions of policy, and this is done from time to time.

The legislation which I will be introducing in this House during this session will also formalize the ability of the Minister of Communications to give policy directions to the CRTC, and I think the hon. member will find that that will improve the situation with regard to this question.

HOUSING

POLICY TO MEET NEEDS OF NATIVES—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. I gave the minister notice of this question in the fear that he might have forgotten that he has a mandate in the area of native and rural housing.

Can the minister tell this House today whether he has a mandate from the cabinet to develop a policy which would address itself to the real needs of native people in urban centres in this country in their attempts to obtain some form of shelter, and if he has such a mandate, when will he announce a policy?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, certainly there is a mandate with regard to a rural and native housing program. It applies to all low income Canadians in rural areas. We also have a mandate for urban dwellers, but not specifically for natives. It is for all low income Canadians. We do not discriminate between native and non-native Canadians.

Having said that, we are making special efforts, and on a crash basis, to work with native groups to improve their ability to acquire housing for their own purposes. A special work is now going on with groups in Winnipeg and in other parts of the country, and CMHC has instructions to proceed with this on a high priority basis. The work is with the native peoples themselves so that they can help themselves, for that is what they wish to do. I believe I have their confidence in this, but I am as impatient as they are.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR INCREASED FUNDS

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pose a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration with reference to the amount of money allocated under this year's LIP to Cape Breton Island. I wrote to the minister some time ago, but in view of the urgency, I would like to raise this question at this time.

In view of the fact that the allocation for each riding, including the riding of the government House leader, as compared with the amounts allocated last year, has been slashed by 50 per cent and more, and in view of the fact that the unemployment rate there is between 25 per cent and 30 per cent at the moment—and, unfortunately this winter it will get worse—would the minister do his utmost to have this year's funding raised to at least the apportionment of last year?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the support of the hon. member for a fantastic program. Perhaps he can convince his colleagues that we should not always be chastised for spending more money at the government level when we have a good program. When we have to do some cutting, we get no credit for that, but frankly, nothing but blame. I think it is an excellent program. It has done a fantastic job, and I appreciate the support of the hon. member for this program.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Muir: I cannot say I appreciate the minister's verbiage because he gave no answer to my question. However, would the minister advise who the idiots were who devised the formula which was used for the apportionment? Surely, neither he nor his predecessor would want to take credit for that. When can we get some more money?

Mr. Cullen: I can say that the initiative did not come from politicians.

AIR CANADA

THE EXPANSION POLICY OF THE COMPANY—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport.

Given the fact that only 128 of the 1,600 pilots employed by Air Canada are French-speaking and also that last week Air Canada decreased by 46 the number of its pilots based at Montreal while the number of positions was increased by 42 in Toronto for a total of 717, can the minister tell the House if he is prepared to investigate this matter to determine what reasons have led Air Canada to proceed to such a transfer from Montreal to Toronto and, at the same time, inform us about the conditions and objectives which the expansion program and the recruiting and hiring policy of Air Canada Corporation are aimed at serving?

SPORTS

INQUIRY IF POLICY WILL BE ANNOUNCED SOON

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport, but first let me congratulate her for her new portfolio. I would also take the opportunity to offer her my most sincere cooperation.

The question I want to ask her is the following: In view of her new responsibilities and of the government's intent as stated in the Speech of the Throne to allow additional funds for training Canadian athletes, will the minister announce to the House in the near future whether the government really intends to bring forward a national policy on amateur sport and fitness and, if so, with a view to achieving such a policy, does the minister intend to arrange a federal-provincial conference to make this policy as successful as Canadians expect it to be?

[English]

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for his welcome to this branch. In the first instance he asked about a national sport policy. The fitness and amateur sport branch is working on such a policy at this time, but as I am sure the hon. member can imagine, that this is a rather complicated operation with which I shall be dealing in the very near future.

As to a federal-provincial conference, it is my intention first to go to each of the provincial capitals to visit each of the ministers of education and recreation and others involved in amateur sport so that I can learn the philosophy of the provinces separately before I consider embarking upon a federal-provincial conference.

CUSTOMS

DELAYS AT BORDER CROSSING AT DOUGLAS, BRITISH COLUMBIA—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the many complaints and delays of up to three hours, which have become commonplace for motorists returning to Canada from Blaine, Washington, at the border crossing at Douglas, British Columbia, I would like to ask whether the minister will conduct an immediate investigation into the gross understaffing which has left over half the gates unmanned at peak traffic periods and caused these wasteful delays.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have already answered a host of letters of complaints from Canadian citizens relating to traffic tie-ups on the border at Douglas, as suggested by the hon. member. I explained in these letters that some strikes in British Columbia forced citizens of that province to buy in the United States the food which is necessary to everyday life. Of course, we were not informed by the strikers. This has created a stranglehold in our services which we are now beefing up with supplementary staff for the next social crises which could force people to make such displacements to the United States.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PRISONER OF WAR BENEFITS—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON SETTLEMENT OF APPLICATIONS

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, it is always nice to break the ice of a new session, particularly after 80 tries. My question is directed to the Minister of Veterans Affairs and such are the circumstances I have not only given him notice of it once, I have given him notice twice. Could the minister advise of the likely date that all present applications by world war II services and merchant navy personnel for the prisoner of war benefits approved a few months ago will have been decided upon? Could the minister also advise approximately how many claims remain to be processed?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the claims received to date amount to approximately 7,000. As of last September 4,500 were processed. We anticipate that all claims will be settled or looked at by the end of November.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Presenting reports of special committees.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

PRIVILEGE

MR. COSSITT—REMARKS OF MINISTER OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE IN YESTERDAY'S DEBATE

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege resulting from remarks made in this House yesterday by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) concerning me. They were remarks not just merely inaccurate but, instead, gross distortions of the facts and the truth, and they cast reflections upon my conduct as a member of this House which I am certainly not prepared, nor do I think I should be, to tolerate. They also cast uncalled for and unjustified aspersions on all members of the official opposition in this House.

I should like to refer to page 212 of yesterday's Hansard and to paraphrase as briefly as possible the objectionable words used by the minister as he addressed himself to comments made by the speaker who had preceded him in the debate, namely, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). The minister said he was really shocked that I had dared to criticize Her Majesty the Queen. He said he did not know why, but the hon. member for Leeds dared to criticize the Queen after she had performed magnificently in Canada during the Olympic Games.

Mr. Chrétien: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cossitt: He also said he hoped that some day the right hon. member for Prince Albert would sock it to the hon. member for Leeds for his "discourtesy" to the Queen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cossitt: The minister also said that Liberal members would never dare do such a thing, and that he was surprised that in an effort to cover up, the right hon. member for Prince Albert would try to appease the monarchists in Canada because some people on his side were giving the Queen a hard time.

Mr. Speaker, I have never at any time criticized Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cossitt: I have never at any time shown discourtesy to the Queen, nor do I ever recall at any time any member of the official opposition in this House—to use the words that the minister used—"giving the Queen a hard time." That is a thing, incidentally, that I cannot say with such certainty about those opposite.

On July 29—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) raises what could certainly promise to be a scintillating disagreement with the minister, but it is essentially a disagreement. I waited to see if the hon. member was about to raise a question of privilege which might in any way raise unparliamentary language or an allegation that was in any way contrary to precedents and parliamentary practices. If there is nothing more than disagreement regarding the interpretation of the minister's words, then the hon. member has a matter of debate and not a question of privilege. If the hon. member has a question of privilege, would he please develop it.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, in view of what the minister said, I feel I should make one thing very clear, namely, that on July 29 this year I issued a statement, and as part of its contents are what the minister is basing his remarks upon I feel it only right and fair that I be permitted to read the pertinent extracts of that statement which clearly show what this situation is.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I feel—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The debate in which we will shortly be engaged and in which the minister was speaking last night is a debate upon the Speech from the Throne and the address in reply thereto. It is a debate in which the rules of relevance are customarily relaxed to the point that members are entitled to speak on a rather wide variety of subjects. If the hon. member for Leeds has a disagreement with the minister, which he obviously has, and wishes to expound his side of the story or his version of what the hon. minister was referring to in debate, he is welcome to enter the debate and do so.

Whether the hon. member has a question of privilege on the remarks the minister made last night is a separate question altogether. I have listened to the hon. member's remarks, and he has not in any way attempted to develop a question of privilege within the classic definition. He has a question of dispute and disagreement with the minister, however, and I invite him, as I am sure all hon. members do, to enter the debate and make his point that way.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

HOUSE OF COMMONS

VACANCY

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received a communication notifying me that a vacancy has occurred in the representation, namely, the Hon. J. A. Angus MacLean, P.C., member for the electoral district of Malpeque, by resignation. Accordingly, I have addressed my warrant to the Chief Electoral Officer to issue a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

STATISTICS CANADA

ALLEGED BREACHES OF CONFIDENTIALITY BY EMPLOYEES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, last Monday the hon. member for Central Nova asked me a question. I was ready to reply yesterday, but he was not here. With the permission of the House, may I reply to his question now? It is not too long, but touches an important issue.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a response can only be made at this time with the unanimous consent of the House. It cannot be followed with a supplementary question. Does the House agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Chrétien: The chief statistician has advised me that one case of possible breach of the confidentiality provisions of the Statistics Act has been investigated by the RCMP in recent years. The investigation was conducted in 1974. The investigation concluded that there was no breach of confidentiality. Similarly, the investigation concluded that there was no evidence to support prosecution under the Criminal Code.

The RCMP report did suggest the existence of a conflict of interest situation and unethical professional conduct. This unethical conduct involved moonlighting on the part of four employees who were offering consulting services which consisted of the preparation and sale of tables of non-confidential, publicly available statistics. This moonlighting was uncovered in its initial stage. Appropriate disciplinary action was taken by Statistics Canada management against three of the employees. The involvement of the fourth employee was so limited as to not warrant disciplinary action. If the hon. member has more information, he should convey it to the RCMP.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I say that we are grateful to the minister for answering the hon. member's question today. The minister acted with promptitude. However, I would not want any minister opposite to think that on every occasion we shall grant unanimous consent for making a statement which ought to be made by a minister on motions, by virtue of the substance of the matter. I wish to indicate through you, sir, to the ministry that the procedure of motions is important, as is the right to ask supplementary questions. I would not want, through this practice, to deny the House the use of such procedure.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I agree entirely. I saw the hon. member for Central Nova rising to his feet for recognition. I had agreed to reply to him. I had agreed to convey right away the information sought, in order to avoid any delay in answering.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer which arose from my earlier question. I wonder if I could address one more question to him. Would that be appropriate?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Why not?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We face a serious difficulty in this situation. Frequently, ministers, I think in good faith, or often in good faith—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: —indicate that although they do not have immediately available information sought by way of a question, they will undertake to return to the House at the earliest moment with the information. If they do this on the following day, the Chair is put in a difficult position. Having recognized the original questioner on the previous day, the Chair faces pressure from other members who also want to rise. This difficulty is not capable of easy solution. Although we try our best to cope with the situation, I do not think we should embark upon a question period every time a minister attempts to do what the minister has done.

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. House rule 35 in the Standing Orders reads:

No member shall speak disrespectfully of Her Majesty, nor of any of the Royal Family, nor of His Excellency or the person administering the Government of Canada—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cossitt: I think, since the statement has been made in this House that I did that very thing, I should be permitted to say to this House what I really did say. Having consulted the Chair for advice prior to this sitting, I understood it would be in order to say what I really did say and quote verbatim. I think any other course would be most unfair—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member surely knows that there is no allegation that the hon. member in this House, during the course of debate, made any allegation which was disrespectful to Her Majesty. That is the content of the rule. I think the hon. member should clearly understand that if he proposes to seek the floor on a question of privilege, he ought to develop a case for a question of privilege which comes within the classic definition. If he, on the other hand, raises a question of disagreement, or one for debate, as he has, he is welcome to enter the debate and raise his point. There is no appeal from rulings of the Chair. I made the ruling, definitive and clear, on the point. I do not think the hon. member ought to press it further.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, it would be most unfair to leave the impression—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, surely I can say—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, in the name of fairness, it is my democratic right to be heard. I don't know why I should not be heard under this rule—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I am rising to speak under this rule—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Tuesday, October 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Maurice Harquail for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. John Wise (p. 220).

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, when I began speaking in this debate I had the dubious honour of following the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) who had put up an incredible performance in this House. His performance last night put me in mind of the Russian parliamentary delegation which was present in our gallery earlier this afternoon. Having reviewed the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture, it seems to me that his only appropriate comment was to this effect: if he were in Russia, he would be awarded a medal. I do not quite know how to take that remark, except that if he were prepared to go to Russia I would be prepared to cast a medal—to make sure he goes over.

I was complimenting the mover and seconder of the motion. I have come to know the seconder reasonably well. Although so far he is the youngest member ever to have been elected to the House, I notice he has aged considerably in trying to support the contents of the vacuous document we are now debating. I extend to him my congratulations.

For many of us in this House, yesterday was day of particular consequence. I am referring to our colleague who resigned his seat, effective midnight yesterday, the previous member for Malpeque, the Hon. J. Angus MacLean. I join in the expressions of tribute to him. We have always considered an indication of Mr. MacLean's superior distinction the fact that he married a Saskatoon girl, who has been with him throughout his years in Ottawa and has been a wonderful helpmate.

Mr. Goodale: I will accept that.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I congratulate the hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner) and the hon. member for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell (Mr. Ethier) for being appointed to their present positions. I look forward to seeing them display the same impartiality and competence as was displayed by our late colleague, Albanie Morin, who we all miss greatly.

I was amazed to note, when the by-election results of the two constituencies recently contested at the federal level were made known during the course of the present debate, how apologists on the government side attempted to explain the results. We in the Conservative party are magnanimous in victory. We will not sit back and take for granted last Monday's victorious results. We know that victories down the line will mean ultimate victory in 1978.

● (1520)

I see my good friend, the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Martin) in the chamber. I was very interested in his speech. It was what I call a traditional Liberal speech; that is to say, the idea is to try to convince people that black is white. The hon. member for Scarborough West and the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette) both made rather interesting speeches, but they were in fact apologists for this government.

There are a number of myths that have been perpetrated by the Liberals and by the government with regard to not only these by-elections but the role of the Liberal party today. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had a soul-baring in Toronto in which he in effect discussed at some length and with some candour the difficulties facing Canada today. Unfortunately, I am inclined to agree with the ever-growing number of people in Canada who interpret the Prime Minister's remarks about difficulties in Canada as being confused about the difficulties of the Liberal party. This has been the case as long as I have been observing the political scene in Canada. Liberal governments from the time of Mackenzie King have tended to regard the Canadian future and well-being as "if it is okay for the Liberal party, it is okay for Canada."

It is rather unfortunate that an attempt is being made to read into the results of the by-elections some sort of apology for the government, saying that the only reason the Conservative party had any success is that there is some sort of English backlash. I cannot think of anything more foolish or foolhardy for the government than continuing that course of action. If we look at the results of the by-elections, particularly in Ottawa-Carleton, we see that the results substantiate that there was not an English backlash. In Cumberland township, for example, where the home polls of the Liberal candidate were located, out of 18 polls the Conservative candidate won no less than 10, and the Liberal 8. These facts must be put on the record to demonstrate that in the case of the by-elections last Monday, what bound the people together was not a backlash one way or another but a common bond of dislike for the government of the day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: It is even more incredible to contemplate those who speak in support of the government. It is alleged that there is some sort of difficulty with regard to the unity of our country. As far as this party is concerned, and in particular our distinguished Francophone members, there is a unity that the Liberal party could well emulate. This party has a sense of unity and a degree of competence much ahead of the government party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The Liberals are attempting to perpetrate the myth that they are the only party with the competence to govern.

Mr. Martin: That is right.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I would expect the hon. member for Scarborough West to agree, because his future depends on it. However, if we are going to look at competence, we should look at the length of the last session of parliament, the longest in the history of confederation. The incompetence of the government was tangibly demonstrated when, even with a majority, they did not bring forward any sensible body of legislation. They could not get it through. It was their incompetence which caused that session to last as long as it did. It is something that is very important, because the Liberal party is now being universally rejected by the people of Canada.

Looking at the Speech from the Throne, it is fair to say that that document is a continuation of the soul-baring of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Oberle: A mea culpa.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: My good friend, the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) says that it is a mea culpa, if a document can be described in that way. If confession is good for the soul, this document is very timely. We had a philosophical approach to the very serious problems as the government saw them. We had an admission of the fact that the government has not dealt with those problems as they ought to have done, that they would try to mend their ways and act in accordance with the demands and requirements of the people of Canada.

After bringing forward that document, at the first opportunity for the government to bring forward a slate of bills to indicate the kind of leadership they say they are going to give they bring in a list of legislation that was referred to in the question period today as a bit of a joke. If this country is in the difficult straits that are indicated in the Speech from the Throne, why lead off the list of legislation that has to receive immediate attention by this House with a bill relating to Historic Sites and Monuments Act amendments? That is an indication of the paucity of legislation and ideas of this government. When I think of monuments, I think of something that stands still. When I think of something standing still, I think of this government. Therefore, it probably is appropriate for this government to bring in Bill C-2.

Yesterday the Minister of Agriculture spent a lot of time talking about his wonderful record. He is a modest fellow. Every time he visits my constituency he converts more and more people. Unfortunately, for him, he converts them from the Liberal party to other parties. The Minister talked about the absolute lack in the Speech from the Throne of any meaningful reference to agriculture. The Speech from the Throne is supposed to be an indication of the priorities that a government places on the legislation to be dealt with in a session. Therefore, the amendment of my colleague, the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise), seconded by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle), really hit the nail on the head. It points out that this government, according to legislation which the Speech from the Throne declares it will bring forward, has absolutely no interest in the agricultural industry of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The only legislation the Minister of Agriculture talked about during the course of his speech was a bill respecting advance payments for crops, which apparently he will be introducing within the next week or so. It is timely to remember that when this advance concept was brought in by a Conservative government, it was subjected by ridicule by those who occupy the treasury benches today and their supporters. At that time such a scheme was regarded by members opposite as being unmanageable and it was criticized accordingly. Now, in 1976, we find the government grasping this legislation to its bosom and putting it forward as its sole contribution to assisting the agricultural community, and extending the principle to one or two other groups.

● (1530)

The people of western Canada have reacted to the Speech from the Throne as one which does virtually nothing for the average person out there.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: In the west today there is great apprehension concerning the future of agriculture in Saskatchewan. The Minister of Agriculture is a great joker. He has said that things were never better for the farmer, that the farmer never had it so good, the implication being that he need do nothing for them. The fact is that serious problems are facing farmers today, particularly those in western Canada. We are all grateful for the bumper crop this year, as well as for the high grade of the yield, but situations of this type often cover up serious, long term difficulties. Crops may be better, but everyone who is familiar with western Canada and, particularly, with Saskatchewan knows that costs have been rising while prices have been falling.

The cost of farming operations has risen dramatically over the last three or four years. This is all right when you have a bumper crop. It is all right when prices are high. But the cost of machinery and pesticides continues to rise. As I say, costs have risen dramatically. Five years ago, the cost of starting a grain farm of average size was in the vicinity of $50,000 to $60,000. Today, in order to get into business something like $150,000 is needed. How many people in Canada realize that an investment of this magnitude is involved? How many appreciate the return which is necessary in order to support it? Today, people are prepared to pay up to $500 per acre for better quality land. The Minister of Agriculture would do well to consider these things when assessing the situation in the west.

I am glad to see the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) in the chamber this afternoon. He is expert at playing broken records. I am glad to see him here because we want to cut down on American humour in Canada, and when the hon. member speaks Canadian humour is supreme.

I want to give a few examples of the cost increases to which I have referred. In 1976 the cost of machinery is up by 15 per cent compared to last year, and it is expected it will rise by a further 10 per cent in the coming year. This figure is ahead of the AIB guidelines. I want to know what action the government has taken to curb increases of this kind which affect the net income of Canadian farmers. It is true that the price of fertilizer is falling, but next spring I expect it will go up again. The cost of fuel, pesticides and other supplies needed to operate a farm can amount to $50 per acre. Nevertheless, the minister does not seem to appreciate the situation. He appears unaware of the serious problems on the horizon. If his sole gesture toward the agricultural community is to be this legislation, one sentence, or at the most a short paragraph in the Speech from the Throne, this confirms my impression that he should move to some other portfolio, possibly finance or consumer affairs. It would be better for him to employ his talents there than being Minister of Agriculture presiding over the disintegration of a great industry.

Many people in western Canada were disappointed to find there was only one reference to transportation in the Speech from the Throne. This is a further validation of the allegation—I say "allegation", but I believe it is a fact—which we in this party have been making for a long time. It confirms, also, the allegation made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Richardson) when he handed in his resignation—that the party opposite does not care about western Canada. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) will understand this in the next election.

I do not propose to deal with the transportation issue in much detail at this point, but I would remind you, Mr. Speaker, that in the course of the last election we heard the most elaborate promises on the part of leading figures in the party opposite with respect to transportation and a great new age for transportation in Canada. Indeed, they almost made me believe that at last a Liberal government really intended to do something in that area. I remember the statements made by the Prime Minister in Edmonton, as well as his speech in Cornwall, promising to put substantial amounts of money into urban transit. In Edmonton he referred to a wonderful concept of transcontinental trains. He was going to establish a new corporation. He was going to expand the existing transcontinental system. Provision would be made to allow passengers to place their cars aboard trains for transportation across Canada. The transcontinental service was to be made extremely attractive.

What do we find? The present Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), unfortunately—and I say "unfortunately" because this is a minister who comes from the west—is now presiding over the destruction of the passenger train service in our country. All of these are examples, Mr. Speaker, of the "black is white" theory that the government is following today.

I think we should hear from the minister in some detail in this regard. We have tried to draw him out in the question period and to give him every opportunity to do so. He should rise in his place in this House and tell us what legislation he has in mind. What about the promises that were made in the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications last April, for example, when the minister said quite specifically that he was going to introduce legislation in a number of areas, if not immediately, then early in the new session? When will the minister tell us what he has in mind?

As for Air Canada, I want to know when amendments to the act will be brought in and what their nature will be. What is the government going to do in the area of a national transportation policy? I also want to know about a ports policy and the promised change in the institutional framework. I want to know about how the St. Lawrence Seaway financing is going to be dealt with. So many promises have been made by the government that it is hard to keep track of them. You almost need a filing cabinet in your office to locate them.

[Mr. Hnatyshyn.]

Mr. Nystrom: Or a computer.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Only the NDP could afford a computer. The government has been suffering in the public opinion polls, and I think for a very good and valid reason. I think the government's credibility is very much at stake, as my leader pointed out in a very forceful speech. I think this can be traced to any number of issues that have arisen during the course of the government's mandate in this parliament. It extends from the fiasco of the 180 degree shift by the government on the question of wage and price controls. People were amazed when the Prime Minister went across the country saying, "Zap, your wages are going to be frozen". I am sure the hon. member for Assiniboia will remember seeing, on television in Saskatchewan, people sitting on blocks of ice. We will all remember the government's turnabout.

I also think the Prime Minister made a very serious mistake regarding the difficulties of the air traffic controllers, and as a result his credibility has suffered. The Prime Minister has been going around this country trying to promote himself and his party as the party of unity. He made a cold and calculated decision to raise the issue to the national level before the Canadian people when he took national television time to deal with it.

I share the agony of this whole situation with the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal). I am a Canadian and he is a Canadian. I resent the Prime Minister trying to make political capital out of that kind of issue. I resent the Prime Minister of this country trying to suggest that he is the only person who can patriate the constitution. I suggest this kind of approach only demonstrates something that the Canadian people are beginning to understand more and more, namely, that this Prime Minister is less concerned about the issues we are going to face and about giving leadership than he is with his own personal place in history and in hanging on to power at any cost.

I see that you are coming to your feet, Mr. Speaker, so I will conclude my remarks by saying that Canada will survive and become stronger after 1978 when the party of which I am a member becomes the governing party and brings a sense of reason to the governing of this country.

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, may I commence my remarks by congratulating the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. May I also thank hon. members on both sides of the House for the kind best wishes they have offered me in my new capacity.

Were I once again a private member, I could spend a good deal of time today making glowing references to the Speech from the Throne and taking a few minutes to justly attack the last speaker, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn). I can only say to him that were he to commit his speech to the form of an advertisement, my department would have to take a very serious look at it under the misleading advertising provisions of the legislation.

For a very few minutes, Mr. Speaker, I should like to talk about the work of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I have been minister for only one month, and therefore it is only proper that my remarks should be brief since my knowledge of the department is limited. However, I should like to deal with one aspect that has been frequently discussed recently in newspapers, namely, the apparent conflict, as some people view it, between the businessman and the consumer. They are wondering how my department can have the title of Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I have attempted to say that someone with some business experience and also some legal experience should not necessarily be denied this position as being completely unfit to serve the consumer. However, the point I should like to make is that this department has some 29 acts within its compass, ranging from competition, bankruptcy, packaging and labelling, textile labelling—a whole variety of areas concerning both the consumer and the business community.

What could perhaps be described as a common thread between these acts is that they deal with the marketplace and there is a genuine coincidence of needs within the department. The task of the department really is to make the marketplace as fair and as efficient as possible. It is not to act as a regulator or as a policeman but, rather, to permit growth of a vigorous and powerful free enterprise community and to see it thrive. At the same time, the department must make certain that the powerful in the marketplace cannot crush the weaker yet efficient members as well.

The emphasis of the department in past years has, it is true, been on the consumer. This has been occasioned by the fact that it is the consumer who is in the weaker position in the marketplace. The need for protection of the consumer is greater than that of the business operator. The fact is that the pendulum may have swung from "Let buyer beware", closer to "Let seller beware". Nonetheless, I suggest that the department takes an even-handed approach in general to the marketplace. I think that even the most vigorous advocate of free enterprise would not wish us to return to the day when P. T. Barnum could exult in the fact that a sucker is born every minute, to be exploited.

The role of the government in the affairs of Canadians is not a new issue but an old one. The fact is that government has played a larger and larger part in our activities, whether it be in regulating agriculture or regulating transportation and communications. There is a large place in the marketplace for government, but it is the underlying philosophy of this government that the marketplace shall not be destroyed or weakened by government but will, hopefully, be enhanced in its efforts. It is in this respect that we in the department are concerned with the introduction of the second phase of the competition bill.

● (1550)

[Translation]

Doing this, I shall only continue the work which has already been accomplished by my predecessors. Each one contributed in his way to this difficult task over the years. I want to mention particularly the work done by the hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet) who succeeded in having the first part of the competition policy adopted. Thanks to his patience, his skill, his kindness and his working capacity, he succeeded where others failed.

[English]

He demonstrated, under considerable difficulty, at the committee stage what can be done by firm but conciliatory attitudes. I hope that in the months to come as we introduce phase II of the competition policy I can do at least partially as well. The prospects in that bill have aroused considerable concern among all sectors of the economy. I have already had discussions with businessmen and with consumers. There are very difficult policy choices involved, for industry, we know, must be subjected to competition, yet many today are protected by tariff walls, and it is the job, in devising a competition policy, to ensure that industry is able to thrive without damaging less powerful members of that community.

The complaints I have received from small business operators, particularly in the small retailing field, concern the inability of these retailers to purchase in the same advantageous manner in which the large giants of the industry may do. It serves to illustrate my point when I say that here is an example of the difficult choices we have to make in devising the act. We do not wish to eliminate the real efficiencies and advantages conferred by size in purchasing, yet we must deal with the question of how the small retailer or a collection of small retailers may take advantage of volume purchasing.

Therefore, I think that in the next few months this is going to be an important bill which parliament may deal with, and I hope I can serve to persuade my colleagues on all sides of the House of the benefits of this legislation and that it is passed without further delay. It has been a long time arriving.

Mr. Woolliams: How do the people react?

Mr. Abbott: The people are reacting very positively so far, and I am sure when they see the bill they will react even more positively.

In addition to the competition bill, I hope at a very early stage to introduce legislation dealing with consumer credit. As all members are aware, there has been tremendous growth in this form of borrowing. It is important that in Canada today we have uniform legislation and that we give adequate protection to the borrower to ensure that he or she receives all the information required to make a responsible decision in this area. Therefore, I hope, again, that this legislation will be viewed not as restrictive to those borrowing in the business community, for that is not its intention, and that it will not simply be regarded as a bill designed only to help the consumer, but will be recognized as a valuable piece of legislation that will help the whole marketplace and, of course, the individual consumer.

In addition to this measure, I am hopeful that we will bring in some long overdue legislation which died on the last order paper, concerning bankruptcy and insolvency. Hon. members are aware that we are doing studies on the question of trademarks, and perhaps before the end of the session we will be introducing legislation in this area as well.

As I indicated, Mr. Speaker, I do not feel that my term in office would justify a lengthy speech and I know you will be relieved to learn that. However, I do want to complete my remarks by dealing with a subject which I think is close to all of us, and that is the question of national unity.

All members on both sides must ask themselves occasionally what accidents of fate brought us together in this place, and for what purpose. So many frustrations, absences from home, demands on time and energy and criticism at every turn surely make this a valid question. For most of us it is a privilege superior to any other that may be extended to a Canadian. But as Canadians drawn from every point of this country, we surely have an obligation not only to make the parliamentary system work but also to convince Canadians from all provinces that Canada is a country worth preserving. It seems almost beyond belief that citizens in a country so uniquely blessed should question whether it is worth preserving as a nation. Surely there are few, if any, members here who do not believe there must be a supreme effort made to preserve our national unity. This is the fundamental issue which lies at the basis of this country's national existence.

Speaking as a Liberal partisan, in what is, I hope, the better sense of the term, I do not support this party and this government because it is always right. I do not support the Liberal government because I have always been in agreement with every policy. I can even look across the floor and see members who would do a very good job as ministers in any government. The real reason I support the Liberal government is that it has at the core of its justification for existence the determination to maintain the unity of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Abbott: In doing so, we may have made mistakes. Programs created may need to be changed. But if we on this side desert the basic philosophy that has been our true strength, then not only the Liberal party is doomed but so is Canada. It is not simply because we are the party of Mackenzie King and Mike Pearson, but because we are also the party of Laurier, St. Laurent and Trudeau.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to have the opportunity today to follow the new Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Abbott). As the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) said, he knows him better than I do and he knew his father. I know the minister will smile at this, but some years ago when I was vice-president of the junior chamber of commerce of Canada, I travelled with Mr. Abbott Sr. and got to know him pretty well. I should like to relate this one incident as I think it will start off my address in the proper atmosphere.

[Mr. Abbott.]

We were driving from Saskatoon to a place called Tisdale. This was in the forties. The federal government, which was then Liberal, had just called an election following a budget in which it had taken the tax off soft drinks. It was a hot day and we stopped in a little village to buy soft drinks. Gordon Blair, who was a member of this House, was with us. We asked for soft drinks, and the young lad at the counter said they would not cost as much that day because Mr. Abbott had taken the tax off. Gordon Blair said that Mr. Abbott was with us in the car. Looking at Mr. Abbott Sr., the young lad said, "If he is Abbott, I am Mackenzie King". He did not realize that he was really looking at Mr. Abbott.

The minister, in his remarks, referred to unity. I am certain that the Liberal party has made a contribution to unity and I am confident that every member of this House of Commons since confederation has basically stood for unity. In fact, the Progressive Conservative party was the party of confederation that brought this country together.

• (1600)

When I hear a line like that, saying that they have some monopoly on unity, I wonder whether there is something wrong at the present time in their own caucus. Perhaps they are bothered not only by the fact that there is disunity in the caucus but also by a feeling that they are perhaps bringing about some disunity across this country. Having said that, I wish to address myself and the House to some of the vital legal concerns of the Canadian people as to the trend being followed by this government, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) and by others influencing him in reference to the administration of justice.

Before doing so, I wish to incorporate all the congratulatory words used in this debate by others with regard to both the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Both hon. members, namely, the one from Restigouche and the one from Lafontaine-Rosemont, did credit to themselves and this chamber, and tried to do credit to the government in their very thoughtful and able addresses. Congratulations to both hon. members.

Now I wish to deal with three subjects. The first concerns a bill that was introduced and then dropped from the order paper. Both the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General presented jointly or in partnership last session a bill, namely, Bill C-83, which died on the order paper because the Liberals let it die. It was entitled "An act for the better protection of Canadian society against perpetrators of violent and other crime". It contained amendments and, therefore, changes to the Criminal Code in five fields.

I wish to emphasize that. It did not investigate gun control alone. It legislated also in respect of dangerous offenders who under the Criminal Code are still called habitual criminals. It contained wiretapping legislation to abolish the 90-day notice necessary to be given to the subject after a judge has given authorization to wiretap the subject's telephone. Then it allegedly gave the provinces jurisdiction to conduct special crime inquiries in reference to crime going on within that particular province's borders, on which the Supreme Court of Canada ruled and in respect of which they now have jurisdiction. Then there were the changes in the parole procedure.

So although this bill is referred as the gun control bill, it dealt with five phrases of amendments to the Criminal Code. The government called this legal criminal conglomeration of amendments "the peace and security package". Later it became erroneously known as the gun bill. This is only part of the story. This bill contained 73 pages, 39 pages of which dealt with the use, the storage, the licensing of guns and ammunition. The remainder of the bill dealt with the other four matters I mentioned.

In particular, that portion of the bill dealing with wiretapping gunned down the right to privacy and to civil rights enjoyed by all Canadians during the lifetime of this nation. The Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs sat 75 hours, held 38 meetings and heard briefs from many national organizations. I might say at the outset that the bill was a bad bill. Even the government member on the committee recognized the flaws in the bill. Finally, the government brought in 54 amendments. Perhaps one or two of them might have been ours. These amendments were approved, but basically, and tragically, the bad features of the bill still remain.

I shall direct my words to that part of the bill which cannot be accepted, condoned or approved. On second reading we moved a motion that the bill be separated so that the gun control amendments could be considered apart from the other four amendments to the Criminal Code. The government refused to accept that motion. The minister spoke against the amendment and the Minister of Justice voted against the amendment, as did all government members.

The minister was trying to ram this multi-conglomeration through parliament, hoping that the people would see the little bit of good that was to be done and overlook a devil of a lot of bad. Apart from the many bad features contained in definitions and other technical parts of the gun control legislation, the government designed a new form of procedure to legislate criminal law, not by parliament but by order in council. This is unacceptable. The legislation of criminal law must be precise. It must be concise and free from ambiguity and, above all, it must be known to people as legislated by parliament, rather than made in a secret chamber by a known or unknown body, such as the federal cabinet.

I listened to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Abbott) who referred to the late Mackenzie King. When there is an attempt to deal with legislation by order in council, this is what one of the fathers of that party said in this chamber:

> Now let us come to another point which I wish particularly to stress, I refer to the right set out in Magna Carta that no man shall be dispossessed of his rights without the lawful judgment of his peers under the law of the land; not the law as made by the governor in council, not the law as made by some unnamed and as yet unexisting body, but the law of the land as known to everyone. It is an essential principle of liberty and freedom that the law of the land should be known, that it should be so known that every man as he runs may read. The law should not be something which is to make its appearance in the Canada Gazette after some board or governor in council, not parliament, has passed a regulation; it is something that should appear in the statutes of the country.

At the time of the committee hearings, the members of the Progressive Conservative party knew that the government members were going to try to ram through the bill, and the only amendment I could make which was acceptable to the committee and the minister was that these numerous orders in council must be referred to parliament for discussion and debate in this House. But that does not stop the cabinet going ahead now, and it does not stop this or any other cabinet in the future legislating criminal law without the approval of parliament. It does not prevent the cabinet making orders in council as they see fit, or even object to the same. The minister, the government, and some members of the media appear to have failed to appreciate the inherent dangers in such a practice when it affects one's civil rights and liberties in this country.

Let me turn to another feature of Bill C-83. This deals with wiretapping. I am glad to see the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) in the House, because I know he will agree with what I say. I know his views. I know he believes in the perpetuation of civil rights. We find totally unacceptable the fact that the government would call for the abolition of the 90-day notice which must be given to a subject whose telephone is being wiretapped by the police, as authorized by a judge, so that the person may be made aware that his or her private rights have been interfered with. I shall not quote the section of the Criminal Code to which I refer. It is section 178.23(1), which states that the Attorney General of a province or the Solicitor General of Canada shall give notification within 90 days which, if necessary, can be extended by a judge if the investigation involves syndicated crime.

The concerned committee members of the opposition managed to move an amendment to this abolition of notice so that the extention or the abridging of time must not go on indefinitely. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) and myself took a very dim view of the subject I am now discussing. The government would not accept anything short of a maximum five-year period. I am totally dissatisfied with this procedure. It is very interesting to note that 556 wiretapping permissions were granted in 1976, that only one was refused and that there were two cases of refused extensions. There were only two cases where extention of time was refused.

I am concerned about solicitor-client conversations being bugged, because communications between a barrister or solicitor and his client are privileged and must be that way if the liberty and freedom of the subject is to be safeguarded. A case in my own city was brought to my attention by a trial lawyer. That case is now before the courts. In that case a conversation between the trial lawyer and his client was bugged. The Crown was able to determine the defence, and the privilege of communication between the solicitor and his client was usurped. I am therefore concerned about the bugging of professional people's private communications.

I am concerned about private industrial communications being bugged. For example, with regard to exploration and development in the oil industry there is a necessity for secrecy. That is also true in the manufacturing and patent industries. I am concerned about the private communications of public servants being bugged. I am concerned about all private conversations being bugged unless proper authorization has been granted in accordance with the terms and conditions of the Criminal Code.

A time period longer than 90 days simply increases the wiretap powers of the police and removes essential safeguards from citizens. This 90-day notice serves as a safeguard against excessive bugging. The government does not need to extend the 90-day notice because at present the courts have full power to do it anyhow. If notification is repealed altogether, how would section 178.21 have any effectiveness? This provision allows courts to award punitive damages when convicting accused people for unlawful interception. If this were ever to be the case, proper authorities could illegally intercept private communications and the supposed victim would not be aware that he was being observed, because the observation itself would be concealed. The only reason the lawyer to whom I referred knew his telephone was bugged when he was talking to his client was that his client received a notice; otherwise he would not have known. A victim cannot assess the legality of surveillance unless he is notified. Surely he is entitled to that privilege. Only then can the criminal process be initiated.

As I understand the Criminal Code, derivative evidence—and that means evidence which is derived from this source—obtained from illegal wiretapping would be a crime in itself and not admissible under the code. Under the bill the government is trying to bring in, that illegal bugging, although an offence under the Code, would be made admissible against people. That, of course, is contrary to what I understand to be the common law of this country and the civil rights of Canadians. We find legislation suggested in this form unacceptable. When persons here and in the media describe it as gun legislation, they have not read the bill. The nickname is partly correct, though, because the legislation would gun down Canadian civil rights. It would be contrary to the common law and to the Bill of Rights of this country.

Let me deal with another question. At the moment my greatest concern, and the greatest concern of all trial lawyers and those who understand the question of civil liberties, has to do with the recommendation of certain people that we abolish preliminary hearings in criminal cases and abolish the jury system for certain kinds of indictable offences. This week I asked the minister a question in this House and he responded as follows:

> I made a speech in Vancouver in which I said that we do not intend to interfere with the jury system, the right of the accused to remain silent, and the protection against self-incrimination . . . but I am not in a position to say at this time whether any bill will be introduced relating to that matter.

What kind of bill is he going to bring in? One on plain white paper? If he is not going to do the things he has been talking about, for what reason does he need a bill? The other day I asked him to come clean; that is why he has been nicknamed Mr. Clean. I asked him to give answers and not to pussyfoot around. I told him we wanted to know because in the committee we were faced with that monstrosity, Bill C-83, and we may be faced with another monstrosity. It seems to me that this government and this Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who before becoming leader of the Liberal party and Prime Minister had the image of a man standing for civil rights are bent on destroying civil liberties as we understand them in the common law of this country.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Woolliams: Somebody said "nonsense." It was that Liberal member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale).

Mr. Goodale: I did not say a word. Get your facts straight, Eldon. You are dead wrong.

Mr. Woolliams: I am sorry if it was not the hon. member. It was his friend, if that makes any difference, but I will not name his constituency.

Mr. Goodale: You don't know it.

Mr. Woolliams: The minister said that he was not in a position to say whether the bill will be introduced. The suggestion to reduce the number of jury trials and abolish preliminary hearings for the purpose of expediting trials is not the answer and has been rejected by the leaders of the criminal section of the Canadian Bar Association.

In accordance with the recommendations of the Law Reform Commission, we should set up family courts to take out of the jurisdiction of superior courts in the various provinces such matters as divorce and property settlement. That would expedite trials because it would get rid of trial dockets in many centres. Much of the time of superior courts is taken up with divorce work, property settlements and matrimonial affairs. In large urban areas like Toronto or Vancouver we should increase the number of judges to take care of the backlog of cases. These two suggestions would solve the problem without interfering with the private and civil rights of Canadians.

The proposal to eliminate trials by jury, and preliminary hearings, is based on a working paper which I understand was prepared by officials of the Department of Justice. That is rather shocking to me. It is also based on a Law Reform Commission study of pre-trial procedures. The Minister of Justice states that the paper is based on a system of complete Crown disclosure before trial, by which prosecutors would be obliged to disclose, by way of a pre-trial hearing, all of the case against the accused. Through this recommendation it is hoped that many pre-trial and trial delays can be eliminated. However, that is really the very purpose of preliminary hearings. A preliminary hearing is a vehicle by which defence counsel can determine the case against a person. Then when he gets before a judge and jury he can present his case properly. If there are to be any changes leading to fewer preliminary hearings, they should be made with reference to very unimportant charges. I am against any changes with regard to charges which could result in long-term imprisonment.

I seriously question whether one can eliminate the delay and backlog in the system by implementing these new recommendations without affecting the fundamental rights of accused persons. The defence uses the preliminary hearing as a vehicle to find out what the Crown has against the accused and to help in preparing the defence. To eliminate the preliminary hearing would be to revert to the system where a person is guilty until proved innocent. If there are to be any major changes in preliminary hearing procedures or in trial by jury procedures, I want the Minister of Justice to restate the promises he made to the Vancouver judges. I think I should put on the record what he said, because we cannot drag it out of him in the House. He said the following:

> But let there be three things made very clear. Firstly, that any changes should not tamper with the jury system.

Thank you, Mr. Minister of Justice.

> I need no lectures on the importance of jury trials . . . Secondly, I firmly believe that we should not change the basic principles of presumption of innocence and the Crown's onus of proof. Thirdly, I agree that we should not remove the right of the accused to remain silent.

The choosing of 12 ordinary persons to form a jury represents a safeguard and a buffer and is one of the most fundamental parts of our freedom. I wish to quote a Toronto lawyer, the ombudsman of Ontario and a friend of mine, Arthur Maloney, as follows:

> Of all the institutions contrived by imperfect man for his own safety and security the jury stands out like a beacon whose glare, far from diminishing, has become more dazzling over the long centuries of its history.

I might add to that, over the long centuries of our judicial history. By even courting proposals such as the reduction in the number of preliminary hearings and jury trials, the Minister of Justice is plunging too far, too fast and too dangerously. The right to be tried by a jury of our peers is as old as Magna Carta. That was one of its terms, and must not lightly be put aside. The right of an accused to remain silent is a fundamental right. One would think that in 1976 it would not be necessary to mention that. The Globe and Mail supported me in that. I do not always have Geoff Stevens of the Globe and Mail behind me.

● (1620)

We must stand on guard at all times, Mr. Speaker. There has been some suggestion that the Crown would be able to examine the accused on evidence that the Crown, in its opinion, could substantiate. One of the old cases which re-establishes this rule and which the Supreme Court of Canada supports is Ibraham v. The King, (1914) Appeal Cases, 599, a judgment of Lord Lumner which is supported by Canadian courts. At page 609 he said:

> It has long been established as a positive rule of English criminal law, that no statement by an accused is admissible in evidence against him unless it is shown by the prosecution to have been a voluntary statement, in the sense that it has not been obtained from him either by fear of prejudice or hope of advantage exercised or held out by a person in authority.

These rules only apply, of course, when statements are made and given by the accused to people in authority. But a new practice is growing up whereby those in authority—and this is more dangerous than ever—the police, the Crown, arbitrarily place the accused person in a mental hospital for the purpose of observation and treatment by either a psychiatrist or psychologist and obtain by this method a statement which the police would not be allowed to admit in evidence. These are medical people and not people in authority and an accused will often place confidence in doctors.

I have cases right now where there is some question of the mental stability or mental capacity of the accused. A person was placed in a medical hospital, and not only was he interrogated by the psychiatrist, to whom he gave his whole confidence but, as I was told by the Crown's psychiatrist, he had a blackout. The psychiatrist told me that when you have a blackout and are questioned by a psychiatrist or a psychologist, you try to fill the vacuum. Suppose the person being questioned by a psychiatrist or a psychologist fills the vacuum and says, "I might have done it; I could have done it; I do not know." What effect might that have upon a jury? Mr. Speaker, the police cannot get evidence in like that, so why should it be brought through the back door by medical people hired by the Crown, with the accused ordered to be there by the judge? I say this is very dangerous, Mr. Speaker, and, of course, it is not only dangerous but the law is not very definite on it.

There are many cases, Mr. Speaker, and one which concerns me is an old one which I think was mentioned in the Vallaincourt case this year in the Supreme Court of Canada. It is Regina v. Roadhouse (1934) 61 Criminal Cases of Canada, 191. Last, but not least, is the Vallaincourt case (1976) 1 Supreme Court Reports, 13. A very distinguished Montrealer, Professor Kaufman, in his book "Admissibility of Confessions" had this to say:

> These statements are suggestive of guilt and the point of law is raised that this evidence was inadmissible because the accused, being in custody and handed over temporarily for treatment while police officers remained in close attendance (without, however, so far as the evidence shows, hearing the statements) the doctor must in law be regarded as a person in authority.

But the court disagreed and said:

> Ordinarily a person in authority is one engaged in the "arrest, detention, examination, or prosecution" of the accused . . . Dr. Shaw stood in the same position as the wife of an arresting officer if the accused had been taken to his home for first-aid treatment at her hands, administered under the circumstances disclosed in this case. The doctor was not deputized by the police to act on their behalf nor was he performing any function—

The Statement made to the doctors was therefore admitted as evidence. I say this is a dangerous process, Mr. Speaker. If in this speech I have left any impression at all, I hope it is that the liberty and freedom of the subject is all-important. I think this House knows where I stand on crime. Certainly, those who commit—

Mr. Benjamin: You are against it.

Mr. Woolliams: I am certainly against the wrong kind of evidence. It is better to let one guilty person go free than to hang ten innocent people or send them to jail. I say the Minister of Justice should look at this matter.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who believes that the only evidence that should be admitted is on the test of truth. When a person is induced, or falsely or fraudulently encouraged by psychiatrists or psychologists to try to fill the vacuum of things they do not know are the complete truth, that should be disregarded as evidence.

In the matters that I have mentioned today, if the steps that this government seems to be taking are to be the funeral of liberty and freedom and the end of the fundamental right to be tried by a jury of our peers, then I would not think this Minister of Justice would even want to be an honorary pall-bearer at that funeral.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I want to say a few words on the subject of food and agriculture. I see the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) sitting by, anxiously waiting to pick up some valuable information to take back to his constituents.

I wish to introduce something a little different this afternoon. I want to speak about what I think is going to be a real problem, not only today but in the future, in the area of food and agriculture. I, for one, believe that by the end of this century we will have a real crisis in the shortage of food and protein in the world community. All we have to do is look at some of the population statistics. The world's population is about four billion, and we are unable to feed them all. Some say that about 16,000 people die of starvation every day, while thousands of others die of diseases connected with some form of malnutrition.

If present trends continue, the world's population will probably double by the year 2000. If we cannot feed the people now, how will we do it a few years ahead unless the programs of this and other governments change radically? I think we must realize, however, that this country obviously cannot feed the hungry of the world. We would be misleading ourselves to think we could be the food basket of the world community. I think we do have a role to play, however, in helping to feed other people by maximizing food production in this country. Our prime object as a nation, however, must be to help other countries to become self-reliant, to be able to feed themselves. We must provide the proper technology and know-how to enable them to produce their own food in quantities sufficient to feed their own people.

We not only have to be concerned about the problem of food in the world, but about the problem of food in our own country. Many people think that we have no food problem in Canada because we produce efficiently and no one goes hungry. But it is not quite that simple, Mr. Speaker. A study produced by the Food Prices Review Board about a year ago pointed out that about 70 per cent of old age pensioners in Canada suffered from a lack of calcium in their diet. Yet we recently had a surplus of various milk products. Before it folded, that same board said that about 40 per cent of the hospital days in Canada could possibly be linked to bad nutrition.

An hon. Member: And alcohol.

Mr. Nystrom: Alcohol too. Think of the junk foods—children in school drinking Cokes and Pepsis, eating hot dogs, hamburgers, chips, candies, chocolate bars and all kinds of really junky foods. I am glad the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport (Mrs. Campagnolo) is here, because I know she is concerned about this. If we had sensible policies and proper programs we could get rid of the Coke machines and other things in the schools and provide milk and fresh fruit and vegetables instead.

If the Food Prices Review Board is right in saying that about 40 per cent of hospital days are connected with malnutrition, just think how we could bring down the cost of medicare and hospital accommodation through a good program of nutrition. Many diseases and health problems could be prevented. We will not have good policies in this country, however, unless we devise a comprehensive food and agricultural program, one that is integrated and takes into account the interests of the producer and the consumer. We need a farm program which will guarantee farmers a decent income and make sure they are able to stay on the land. At the same time, we need a program which will encourage the production of food for the consumer at the lowest possible cost, so that all the people of Canada can afford to buy good food at reasonable prices.

Ahead of us I see many serious difficulties. I see a crisis facing this country in the future. I see, as does the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin), the threat which large, powerful corporations in the agricultural field pose to the way of life of farmers and the existence of orderly marketing, farm organizations and individual farms. I see a crisis ahead to do with the use of our farm land.

Let us consider our land. We are one of the few countries of the world able to produce a massive surplus of food if we put our minds to it. If we grow all the food we can, we shall contribute to the well-being of the world's peoples, fortify our rural economy, allow farmers to prosper and set this country on its feet economically, because the end result of this process would be full employment. Mr. Speaker, we have one half of 1 per cent of the world population, and 3 per cent of the world's arable, food-producing land. What is to happen to that land? There is little control over the land in most of Canada. Every day much of our good land goes out of production. Just look at the statistics if you want to see what is happening. They are terrifying.

This country's urban centres cover 0.4 per cent of the nation's land surface; and remember most of our land cannot be used for farming. Only about 4 per cent of it is suitable for farming. Most of our urban centres, our cities, suburbs and factories, highways and hydro lines are built on this country's prime farmland. Most of the urban expansion in Canada gobbles up good, arable farmland. If this country's urban population doubles, the amount of good, available farmland will be reduced by one-third. I repeat, if the urban population of Canada doubles, and it will double in not many years, and if we do nothing to preserve our farmland, our available farmland will be reduced by one-third. When that happens, we shall run into serious difficulties.

The Agrologist magazine said a short time ago that, given our present eating habits and technology, we could feed up to 50 million people in this country. On the other hand, if we begin to reduce the quantity of available arable land, it will not be long before we may not produce enough to feed ourselves and we shall need to import some food.

As I said, only 4 per cent of our land surface can be used for farming. That is to say, 164.15 million acres of land can be used for farming. At present we farm 107.8 million acres. In most cases only the prime agricultural land is in use. Marginal, less productive land, is not generally in use because it is more costly and less economic to farm. Every time this country's population rises by 1,000, the extra 1,000 people consume, for houses, schools, highways, and so on, between 360 acres and 1,700 acres. When you extend our urban regions, good farmland disappears. That lost farmland will not produce food in future. Therefore, why do we continue this process? Land does not grow on trees, Mr. Speaker; once it is paved over, it will not grow food.

I ask, why is this happening? The reason is that these matters are determined by the workings of the so-called free market. Around the major cities in almost every part of this country developers exercise absolute control over how they will dispose of land. Little has been done in this country to protect our farmland, to make sure it is used only for farming and not for the expansion of cities, highways and factories. These, where possible, must not be built on prime farmland. Mr. Speaker, 96 per cent of this country's land surface cannot be used for farming.

The present situation has arisen because of the federal government's abysmal record in leadership. It has done nothing to preserve farmland and has not brought forward an adequate farm policy which could serve this nation in future. So far as I know, only two provinces have acted to preserve farmland. One is my native Saskatchewan, which introduced a land banking program which is working well; the other is British Columbia—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nystrom: —which has legislated the preservation of farmland for farm use only. The attitude of the other provinces with Liberal and Conservative governments and politicians has been that governments, provinces and municipalities should not interfere with the free enterprise system. They think that this country's future should be left in the hands of developers and speculators. That is not good enough, Mr. Speaker, if we want to grow enough food for our own people and help other people in the world. We must face the question squarely. I do not see how any Liberal can argue that the federal government has shown leadership in this area. The question is most serious and will become even more serious within 20 or 25 years unless we act.

If we are to grow enough food in future, we must make sure that farmers remain on the land and earn a stable income. I heard the suggestion not long ago that our farmers are prosperous now that grain prices are high. Mr. Speaker, such prices are not stable. Prices for the grain producer were high, but the price has recently fallen by $1.04 per bushel. Prices are lower than they were three months ago. The price of other farm commodities is also falling. Also, we all know of the difficulties of the cow-calf producer. Many of them are going bankrupt. Many mixed farmers face hard times.

You see, in my constituency and the constituency of the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre, a great deal of rural poverty. Some farmers in my riding do not have in their homes water and sewer facilities and the other modern amenities which we in this House take for granted. The same can be said of farmers all across this country—in Quebec, New Brunswick and other areas. Their story is the same.

I bring these problems forward to show that our stabilization legislation is not the only answer If it were, farmers would not be forced to leave the land. Too many decisions affecting the land are made by big concerns. In the process, the small producer is forgotten. Companies like Cargill, about which the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre spoke, are moving into this country and exercising ever more control over the food industry and food prices. The dominance of such companies poses a threat to our Canadian way of life. Do we want control of this major industry, agriculture, concentrated in fewer and fewer hands, or do we want to maintain our present way of life? Do we want to maintain what most farmers favour, a system of orderly marketing, wheat pools, co-operatives and marketing boards which give the farmer some clout in the marketplace?

Let us examine some of our other difficulties. Some time ago the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), who is responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, put feed grains on the open market. By so doing he took away some of the foundation for stable farm income. He allowed feed grains to be traded on the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, thereby giving the exchange with which the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Richardson) is connected influence over the price the farmer was to receive for that product. The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre documented how large, multinational corporations involved in the grain business are moving into this country's prairie provinces. He told the House what would happen if they build huge inland terminals. I ask, where does the Conservative party stand with respect to these large inland terminals being either constructed or proposed on the prairie provinces? The effect of these terminals will be this: smaller elevators all over the prairies will be closed and more and more power and wealth will be concentrated in the hands of huge corporations.

What is going to happen to rural society with the abandonment of rail lines? What is going to happen to the consumer if nothing is done about the immense power of some of the processors, retailers and wholesalers in this country? What will happen as corporations get larger and have more say about the price people pay for food? I need only refer to the last report of the Food Prices Review Board which pointed out that there are four large retailers in this country, Weston-Loblaws, Safeway, Dominion stores and Steinbergs. They control a very large proportion of the retail food markets in Canada. In places such as the prairies, between 80 and 90 per cent of the market is controlled by three or four of these large corporations. Is there any competition when these large corporate giants get together? I suggest there is not.

If the large corporations such as Cargill Grain, Continental Grain and a number of others south of the border continue to move into the producing sector, what will happen to the price of food in this country? Food is too important to be left to the private sector. Food is the right of all Canadians. The price of food should be controlled by those who produce food and by the people who consume it.

More assistance should be given to the farmers, particularly those with small farms and those who want to begin farming. There should be marketing boards for farm commodities, so that the producers can have some clout in the marketplace with regard to the remuneration they receive. One need only look at one area to see what I mean. I refer to the cow-calf producer. Recently, in my constituency, I talked to farmers who had sold young calves in the marketplace for as low as $20 and $30. What happens at the retail and when a person is buying this beef a Weston-Loblaws, Safeway or a Steinberg store here in Ottawa? That drop in price which the producer is suffering is not being reflected at the retail end when someone is purchasing it.

It is a real crime for the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) to get up in this House time and again and give us the same old baloney about agriculture and how difficult it is to do anything for the cow-calf producer, even though he has not produced any program for them. The provinces had to act unilaterally to provide assistance for cow-calf producers. Alberta put $40 million into a plan. Saskatchewan put $32 million into a plan in order to stop cow-calf producers going out of production. However, the Minister of Agriculture refuses to put any money into a plan to try and help cow-calf producers. It is not just the cow-calf producer who will suffer. It is not just the fact that the small farmer will be put out of business. In the long run, it will be the consumer who will suffer.

Farmers will sell their cows more and more rapidly as the price of beef to the producer drops. In a few years there will be a shortage of beef in this country. Prices will skyrocket as the retailers and wholsesalers have a virtual monopoly. The consumer will be ripped-off, having to pay very high prices. The government will then have a real problem. If cattle and beef are left on the open market and the price of these commodities is controlled by speculators, huge corporations, packing houses and retail companies, there will be a real problem. What we need at this time is a national beef marketing agency or board that will stabilize the price of beef in this country. The Minister of Agriculture says he is in favour of that. I would like to see him give some leadership in promoting this idea.

The minister should hold a plebiscite to determine whether cattle producers in this country want a marketing agency. If such a plebiscite were held, I believe the vote would be a resounding "yes." The hon. member for Assiniboia may have some large ranches in his constituency. However, if he visits my constituency he will find that the overwhelming majority of farmers want a beef marketing agency. I need only refer to a meeting that took place in northwestern Saskatchewan a few days ago. The group of farmers who gathered there angrily demanded a national marketing board for beef. Organizations are being formed in my constituency by ordinary farmers, not the huge cattle ranchers. They do not believe the Canadian Cattlemen's Association speaks for them. They want a national marketing agency. They want some protection in the marketplace. Why should the price of their labour be determined by Canada Packers, Burns, the huge retail stores in this country, or speculators in the United States? Why not a marketing board for beef so that the farmers have some clout and some say about what they will get for their commodity? The farmers should get some benefit for their labour.

I sometimes become rather annoyed with the Canadian Cattlemen's Association and their political organs such as the hon. member for Assiniboia, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt and some of the Tories who a few years ago said they did not want any government involvement or interference, that they were free enterprises in a free market. Now the price of cattle is falling and these same people in the Cattlemen's Association want some support. They say they are suffering in the so-called free enterprise economy which they fought so hard to preserve. Support should be given to the small beef farmer now. At the same time, we should ensure that he has a marketing agency or board when times are good as well as when they are bad. Let us have some consistency in the cattle policy of this country.

There is something else I want to mention before my time runs out. A very important issue will soon be debated on the prairies. A few years ago the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board took domestic feed grains out of the purview of the Wheat Board. He promised the western farmers a plebiscite on feed grains being taken out of the Wheat Board. Recently he announced that a plebiscite would be held. It may be late, but he says it will be held. We do not know what question will be asked, or who will have the right to vote. We want the minister to give the prairie farmers a chance to have all grains produced on the prairies under the purview of the Canadian Wheat Board.

There will be a real fight on the prairies. Huge businesses, the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, the Liberal party and many of the Conservative party will support keeping feed grains on the open market. There is going to be a fight. It is going to be one of the biggest fights we have seen on the prairies. I should like to quote from the Globe and Mail. On October 15, the Globe and Mail carried an article entitled "Grain marketing plebiscite called crucial test confronting farmers". I quote:

● (1650)

A forthcoming plebiscite on Canada's grain marketing system is shaping up as one of the most crucial tests ever to confront the private grain industry, according to R. S. Ennis, president of the Winnipeg Commodities Exchange.

The president of the Winnipeg Commodities Exchange made it clear he was attempting to influence farmers to vote for a continuing role for the private grain industry. "In the coming year it will be necessary for each one of us to make the benefits of free marketing known to the public."

The Winnipeg Grain Exchange is going to be involved in this campaign. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that my party will also be involved in the campaign, but on the other side. We believe the government should know why it should place all prairie grains within the purview of the Wheat Board. If the hon. member for Assiniboia does not agree, he can debate this issue with me in my constituency any time he wishes. I am absolutely confident that the wheat pools in Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba, together with the UGG, the National Farmers' Union, the Federation of Agriculture, as well as the governments of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, would agree that all prairie grains should come under the purview of the Wheat Board.

Mr. Woolliams: Give the farmers a chance to vote.

An hon. Member: What about Alberta?

Mr. Nystrom: I don't know about "Peter the Red" in Alberta or some of his boys, but I know where the premier of Saskatchewan stands. I know where the premier of Manitoba stands. I know where the farm organizations stand. I also know where some of the Liberal farm organizations like the Palliser Wheat Growers stand. They stand on the other side, fighting for grains to be on the open market. I ask this question: Why should food be speculated with like dice in a casino?

Mr. Woolliams: Why should farmers have to take less than the market price?

Mr. Nystrom: Why should food produced by the farmer be under the control of speculators?

Mr. Benjamin: Parasites.

Mr. Nystrom: Why should not the farmer, having produced that food, reap all the benefits along with the consumer, the latter having the advantage of a lower price at the other end? This is the important issue we are facing in the west. It is one which has been with us a number of years, one which we believe we had disposed of until the Minister of Transport began to play around with the power of the Wheat Board.

I remember my grandfather telling me stories a few years ago about the days before the Wheat Board. He told me that in the fall of the year farmers would sell their grain because they had to pay taxes, buy clothes for their children for the winter and meet a number of other seasonal expenses. So they would all go to the elevators to sell their grain. They didn't have any clout; there was no marketing board. The price would fall to a few cents a bushel. But in the winter months the speculators who had purchased that grain were able to sell it for much more than they had paid. Today, Mr. Speaker, we have a Wheat Board which ensures that there is a uniform price paid for wheat and we in this party want to put all grain under the purview of the board.

Thus, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin):

That the amendment be amended by inserting therein, immediately after the words "Australia and New Zealand", the following:

> "the need to put the marketing of all prairie grains under the sole jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board".

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first I wish to congratulate the movers of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. We must recognize that our colleagues from Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) and Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance) are excellent members devoted to their ridings. Furthermore, they have proved both in the House of Commons and in committees that they are outstanding parliamentarians.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to deal with two themes. I am personally interested in the first one, namely the situation of French-speaking minorities outside Quebec, and the second may perhaps interest more particularly those who are set on the question of "bilingualisation" or the learning of a second language, namely the problems we are now facing in Canada when it comes to learning the official languages and the important role of the federal government in this area. How far can we in the federal government go in the field of education without transgressing section 93 of the British North America Act?

Mr. Speaker, as parliamentary secretary, I had the opportunity to travel throughout the country this year. So, I met Canadians from both the east and the west. In addition to fulfilling my official duties, I tried to urge those people to give me their reactions or to tell me how we should build Canada.

As all hon. members, I had the opportunity to read erroneous quotations, in Vancouver, Edmonton, Ottawa, Halifax, Quebec City or in other places. I would like to read some of them and, surely, they will not surprise anybody. Here is the first erroneous quotation:

The federal government is shoving French down English throats.

The second erroneous quotation:

Bilingualism is a goal of the Liberal party alone.

The third erroneous quotation:

French Canadians outside Quebec are just picturesque. They mix with the English-speaking majority at a frightening rate.

The few remarks I was quoting, Mr. Speaker, were not concocted by some biased newspapermen, but actual comments from Canadians. We are certainly faced with a problem of a national nature. Intolerance, bigotry, even empty gibes often verge on a mild form of racism. The Larousse dictionary defines racism as follows: "A system asserting the superiority of one racial group over the others, urging in particular the segregation of the latter within a country, or even aiming at the extermination of some minority".

Evidently, many Canadians are ignorant of this country's history. More disturbing still, the majority of Canadians, both in English-speaking provinces and in Quebec, are not aware that there are outside Quebec nearly one million Canadians having French as their mother tongue.

● (1700)

I am pleased, Mr. Speaker, to speak about this group of French-speaking Canadians who live outside Quebec and who often have to make the best of difficult situations. There are one million of them, responsible for the future of a united Canada and respectful of the rights of minorities. These people—who, unfortunately, are too often forgotten—exist and I am one of them. According to our ability, we can and we wish to render great services to our country, if we are allowed to do so. We have proved our perseverance and our strength while respecting others' rights. We have fought for our rights, we have overcome a law which prohibited education in our mother tongue, we have survived although we were refused education in our language subsidized by public funds; we have struggled with firmness and today, longing for better understanding, we continue to fight in our quest for legislation which is supposed to promote justice.

French-speaking Canadians are not just another ethnic group. As co-founders of this country, they are on equal terms with the English-speaking majority. Canada's identity is altogether different from that of any other country. Canada is a nation which gathers together two cultures, each of whom can, thanks to its heritage and its ancestral characteristics, work in conjunction with the other to obtain results of the highest quality. There is a third group in Canada which plays an increasingly important and active part in every aspect of Canadian life and which is of neither French nor English origin. I am of course referring to Canadians from various ethnic groups who have deliberately chosen to leave their home country to find a better life and a more promising future. Of their own initiative, these people have decided to adopt our country. According to dictionaries, the word "adopt" is defined as follows: to choose and use as one's own... to accept. That is precisely what these people did: they considered opportunities for a better future in Canada, they knew what they would find in Canada if they came over, they accepted her for what she is worth and made her their own country, that of their children and of future generations.

True, most of these new Canadians, after starting their new homes, have predominantly gravitated toward the English language; it is also true that they were not always made aware of the presence of French-speaking Canadians, nor exposed to the French language or culture. For reasons which are readily understandable, many Canadians have come to place French-speaking Canadians with the Danes, the Ukrainians, the Germans, the Italians, the Japanese, and many more. I noted, especially in western Canada, that majority ethnic groups often refer to the following argument: Would it not be more logical and more profitable for the English-speaking majority to learn Ukrainian for instance instead of French? Such reasoning does not recognize that the federal government is the government of all Canadians; that it must look after the whole country and it must legislate according to national interest. For that reason, the central government does not meet only the needs of a particular city or area, it must answer the needs of the whole country. Nothing prevents Canadians from speaking several languages. But that is not the responsibility of the federal government. Indeed, we favour them by our multicultural policy.

However, the federal government as the government of all Canadians tries to meet national needs with its official language policy. That is where our responsibility lies and why we have an official language policy. I wish to come back to those erroneous quotations: The federal government is shoving French down English throats. No need for me to dwell on that false concept from which so many conflicts spring. The federal government does not impose French on anyone. Unless you are a federal public servant whose position requires both French and English, you do not need to learn either French or English. Some civil servants are bilingual now but the people they serve are not.

It is precisely because of the decision no longer to impose English on French Canadians that some ten years ago the government put forward its official languages policy. So there is no such thing as imposing or forcing anyone to learn a second language. Let us say simply that the immediate objective of the Official Languages Act is to make the government bilingual, not the citizens it serves.

When the Liberal government introduced the Official Languages Act in 1968, we got the support of all parties represented in the House of Commons. We may discuss the way to implement the policy but the principle of bilingualism remains unchanged. Of course, the government must continue to seek new and better formulas. Personally, I am convinced that we must absolutely turn our priorities toward the survival and expansion of French-speaking minority groups in Canada.

If, on the one hand, considerable amounts of money had to be spent to make the federal civil service bilingual, in many cases allowing unilingual positions to become bilingual, I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, of the importance for Canada to turn our national priorities toward the survival and expansion of French-speaking minority groups in Canada. However considerable, the amounts of money spent to date on federal and provincial programs were justified. On the one hand, a civil service with an English-speaking majority had to be changed to make it receptive and hospitable to French-speaking and bilingual Canadians. On the other hand, we must support the learning of the second language in schools. We must now—and time is running out—provide serious assistance to French-speaking minorities outside Quebec.

Here is an erroneous quotation: "French Canadians outside Quebec are just picturesque. They mix with the English-speaking majority at a frightening rate". PQ members repeat it every day. If there no longer exists a French-speaking minority in English majority provinces in a little while, what is the purpose of spending millions of dollars to put up a bilingual service if there are no Canadians speaking French? It is therefore very important for me to emphasize services to French-speaking minorities outside Quebec so as to ensure their survival and development. French-speaking minorities outside Quebec are for the most part bilingual. Their motivation for becoming bilingual at an early age is essentially an economic one and a social reality. However, I do not think I am wrong in saying that when English-speaking unilinguals learn a second language, their motivation is essentially cultural, and consequently much weaker.

Millions of dollars have been spent in an attempt to help unilingual senior civil servants become bilingual. The figure of $300 million a year has been mentioned. Only 1 per cent of this amount is used for the promotion, survival and support of French-speaking people outside Quebec. Considerable amounts have also been spent with the help of the provinces to promote the teaching of both official languages in our schools. For nearly six years, the federal government has been contributing substantially to the education of official language minority groups and has also been supporting financially the teaching of a second language. Mr. Speaker, six years is not a long time.

We must not forget that, in the past, in the provinces inhabited by large groups of Canadians whose mother tongue is French, these groups did not have equal opportunities for education and that, consequently, until 1968, most of them, or 85 per cent, dropped out of school without finishing the tenth grade. This was not because they were more stupid or not as motivated, it was simply because they did not have access to the funds which would have allowed them to continue their education in French language private institutions or even in the English language public system of that time which was not designed to meet their needs.

Mr. Speaker, we have had French language high schools in Ontario for only six years. Since then, the number of students in Ottawa itself and throughout the province has tripled. Later on, I shall quote figures concerning the number of students enrolled. Since education is so important for any society and because of the difficulty faced throughout our history by French-speaking minorities outside Quebec, I would like to give a more recent and more encouraging picture, at least as concerns my own province, Ontario.

● (1710)

Mr. Speaker, I gathered recent statistics about school attendance for the French-speaking minority in Ontario and about the number of pupils in English schools who study French as a second language. In the elementary, the number of children attending French schools in Ontario is steadily decreasing. That is probably due to the declining birth rate and also, I am afraid, to the rate of assimilation into the English-speaking majority, which is rather worrying. In 1969-70 there were 90,397 French-speaking children in elementary schools; that number is down to 77,568 for the academic year 1975-76.

At the secondary level, figures are a little more encouraging, and vindicate the education policy of the province of Ontario in opening French secondary schools since 1969. That year, the French high-school population was 21,590; now in 1975-76, it is 31,442. Those high school graduates are naturally moving up to post secondary or university education.

At the high school level, we witness an encouraging increase in attendance at post-secondary institutions by the francophone minority. The Algonquin Community College, with 6,000 students, records a marked increase in francophone registrations for the school year 1974-75. As a matter of fact, full time students attending courses given in French now account for nearly 22 per cent of the college population.

At the university level, four institutions are providing courses in French. They are Hearst College, Université Laurentienne, Ottawa University and St. Paul's University. There were 5,132 francophone students attending these institutions in the school year 1974-75, which represents 37 p. 100 of the total incriptions in these institutions. The projections for 1977-78 indicate 5,836 students, or 41.1 per cent.

It is encouraging, Mr. Speaker, to realize that the francophone minority in Ontario is seeking in increasingly larger number a more complete education and therefore greater competence.

As regards the number of English-speaking students registered in elementary schools, statistics show renewed interest in second language learning in Ontario. It is interesting to note that 569,756 students or 39.1 per cent of the school enrolment took French courses as a second language in 1971 and that progressively that number rose to 651,669 in 1975; in other words, 46.9 per cent of English-speaking students registered in English schools took French as a second language.

In high school, the situation is not so encouraging. Where 243,135 students registered for French courses in September 1971, which represented 42.3 per cent of the Ontario population, in 1975 there were only 195, 234 students or 32.3 per cent of the total secondary school enrollment. Obviously then the secondary level registered a sharp decline in second language learning.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the figures I just quoted show the seriousness of the school policy as regards French-speaking students at the secondary level in Ontario; they also show the seriousness of parents who steered their children towards elementary shools that give second language training. Yet it is alarming to realize that at the secondary level there is growing apathy towards learning a second language and that the students, because of a very permissive system, drop the second language option, be it English or French.

An important factor in the motivation for learning a second language is certainly the lack of leadership in our Canadian universities. In fact, in recent years Canadian universities have dropped either French or English as a prerequisite for admission to their institutions. Let us hope that Canadian universities will soon realize the merits of language training and that as a prerequisite they will demand language proficiency obtained at the secondary level.

When considering the role of the federal government in the field of minority group education, the problem is considered in relation to language policies, policies which are part of Canadian everyday life. Moreover, those language policies must be considered not only in relation to their effect on equality of learning opportunities, but also in relation to social and professional mobility, as well as to relationships between populations.

In Canada, English is the mother tongue spoken by 60 per cent of Canadians, French by 27 per cent, and a variety of other languages by 13 per cent. Moreover, French-speaking people are not limited to the province of Quebec. Indeed, French-speaking people are also found in New Brunswick, Ontario, Manitoba, Prince Edward Island, Saskatchewan and Alberta. Finally, in certain provinces like New Brunswick, Ontario, Manitoba and Prince Edward Island, there are regions where French-speaking people are the majority.

To this main linguistic division, English-French, we must add linguistic differences of people of Indian or Eskimo origin as well as differences stemming from very diversified groups who wish to maintain contact with their initial cultural background. This category is made up of about three million people. Therefore we must add multiculturalism to the official bilingualism. No need to remind the House that the Confederation was based upon an agreement between two distinct linguistic communities referred to in section 133 of the British North America Act.

Since 1969, the federal act on the implementation of both officials languages has strengthened the bilingual character of Canada. Indeed, this law stipulates that English and French are the official languages of Canada and possess and enjoy equality of status and equal rights and privileges as to their use in all the institutions of the Parliament and government of Canada. The option so selected consists in admitting that Canada is in a position to enable both languages and, consequently, both English and French culture to take part in the economic, social and political life throughout the country. To these ends, the federal government established a generous help program for the provinces to enable them to offer teaching in the minority language, and the teaching of the second language, English or French, according to the case. Federal assistance amounts to about $100 million a year.

According to Canadian practices, the provinces are responsible for the implementation of the federal programs of assistance to bilingualism. Consequently, the establishment of policies on bilingualism is made in different ways and is based on different structures. This question of assistance to bilingual teaching gives a good illustration of the difficulties and the ambiguities we notice when the federal government is prepared to give credits, and the provinces, for constitutional reasons, want to avoid even the appearance of a communication with Ottawa.

In view of the sensitive nature of those relations, it is hard to say whether the objective of assistance to bilingualism can be achieved through education. I recognize, like many others, the merits of that hope and the willingness to achieve it. But the fact remains that the implementation of bilingualism in schools is not uniformly successful. One recognizes readily that immersion programs in kindergartens, primary and secondary schools are successful. However, one must admit that there is an insufficient number of organized courses, that there is a shortage of qualified teachers in that field. In this regard, worthy efforts are being made by granting bursaries to 5,000 teachers to enable them to get the proper training. Since 1973, efforts have been made to train teachers; those efforts should considerably improve the quality of their training for that profession.

I am of those, Mr. Speaker, who have often criticized the use the provinces made of federal funds earmarked for the official languages program. With several others, I share doubts about the use made of those funds and I recognize the constitutional limitations that restrict the federal government in its role as watch dog over the setting up of those programs and the spending of the funds.

French-speaking Canadians residing outside Quebec often deplore the lack of administrative and educational structures; they often call to our attention the powers of local school boards, seldom willing to set up French language schools or training courses in the second language; and finally, we often see a position through which the authorities want to "bilingualize" the institutions of these francophone Canadians, a situation which is not likely to help them keep their mother tongue nor, the way I see it, is it likely to encourage them to learn English.

It goes without saying that bilingualism is one of the most important political problems of the Canadian federation or Confederation, a problem which, in spite of the advancement achieved, can have a critical impact on the education policy. The main problem lies in that while French is considered to be the equal of English as one of the two official languages, that position remains nonetheless quite unequal.

And so it is that the French-speaking minority in Canada, whether implicitly or explicitly, requires a special kind of protection, greater than that of official equality, in order to defend itself against the risk of anglicization. Francophones, particularly those residing outside Quebec, maintain not without reason that the constitutional French-speaking element of the Canadian federation is an essential part of the creation and maintenance of separate national identities. Indeed, without the strong attachment of the French-speaking community to its language and its culture, such a national identity would have been absorbed in the greater context of English-speaking North America. That is enough to justify the need to take measures which promote a French culture in Canada with the support of the federal government, since it is the only way to create a national Canadian spirit comprising both cultures.

Expenditures earmarked for second language courses should aim mostly at preserving the French language in every part of the provinces with a high percentage of Francophones. In this regard, I readily endorse a recommendation contained in the examiners' report on the organization for Economic Corporation and Development (OECD) concerning the need to establish in Canada a national education council. In their report, published in August, 1976, the OECD examiners proposed the establishment of a national education council subsidized by the federal government and responsible for the development of French culture in Canada.

I urge hon. members to obtain a copy of a study I commissioned to Mr. Henri-Georges Belleau, of the research section of the Library of Parliament, dated October 15, 1976. I want to thank and command Mr. Belleau for his well-documented and very interesting paper. I had asked Mr. Belleau to do research on two points. First, I had asked him to summarize the OCED report on educational policies in Canada and then to examine the following question: How far can the Federal government go, as far as educational matters are concerned, without infringing the BNA Act? I would like to read into the record the conclusions of Mr. Belleau's study. I quote:

> We have seen that the federal government does not deal directly or officially with educational matters. The involment of the federal government is by means of grants and transfer payments for post-secondary education; in addition, training courses are provided by the Department of Manpower and Immigration . . .
> Finally, as far as the training in a second language is concerned, we should aim to maintain the French language as a living language in all areas of the provinces where there is a well-established French-speaking community. Besides, the OCED investigators would recommend the creation of a national council financed by the federal government, which would promote the development of the French culture.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, if one wishes to maintain, develop and promote a Canada in which the French language will not be used extensively only in Quebec and considered elsewhere as a bit of folklore, we will have to try and support French-speaking communities outside Quebec that will show a common will to respect, promote and maintain the survival and growth of their language. If French to be used exclusively in Quebec and English in all other part of Canada, we are shifting dangerously towards a separation. What is the use of the federal governement promoting this pan-Canadian institutionalized bilingualism if in fact the bilingual services are not needed?

Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who have faith in the future and who sincerely think that we can build a country respectful and proud of its history, of its various elements and of its differences. We are not talking about a uniform Canada, we are talking about a united Canada.

[English]

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate, but the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), the constituency adjoining my own, seconded by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) has moved me to say a few words and suggest that we on this side of the House will be unable to support the subamendment. I feel it is not at all in keeping with the amendments presented by my party and, in effect, would destroy the effectiveness of our amendment, which cites the lack of co-ordination between federal and provincial authorities involving the management of our agriculture in general. In particular, it detracts from the very serious problems faced by the beef industry as a result of excessive imports of beef from Australia and New Zealand. This beef problem obviously is one of the most important questions facing farmers both in western Canada and all across the country. Indeed, it affects the farmers in Australia, New Zealand and the United States.

In his subamendment the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville cites the need to place the marketing of all prairie grains under the sole jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board. Surely this is something which should be decided by the producers. I might remind my friends that the wheat pools, the UGG and the NFU do not necessarily speak completely for their rank and file. Certainly, many farmers have shown their opposition to having feed grains placed under the sole jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board.

Some time ago a plebescite was held relating to rapeseed. At that time the growers did not wish to have their grain under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board. We may feel it was an incorrect decision, but it was their decision. I think we, as members of this House, must be aware of the very important fact that the growers should be the people who make the decision as to whether or not their grains should come under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board. The problems of the Wheat Board are great. It is easy for the Wheat Board to sell on world markets and satisfy the growers and all segments of our country, but the problem is different when the Wheat Board must be a buyer and a seller within our country.

What about the problems we experienced in respect of feed grains in 1969 and 1970? How would they have been solved? So I suggest this is not the way in which the feed grain, rapeseed or flax situations should be solved without a plebescite of the growers.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being 5.30 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to section 4 of Standing Order 38, to interrupt these proceedings and put forthwith the question necessary to dispose of any amendment or amendments now before the House.

● (1730)

The question, therefore, is on the amendment to the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment to the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those in favour of the amendment to the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Nystrom) which was negatived on the following division:

The House met at 11 a.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

STATISTICS CANADA

PROPOSED MINISTERIAL INQUIRY INTO ALLEGED BREACHES OF CONFIDENTIALITY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the importance of a full and complete briefing for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) concerning the situation at Statistics Canada, particularly since the report in the Gazette this morning goes beyond his statement in the House yesterday, and since it is of the importance of the integrity of Statistics Canada, and to remove the shadow over public servants employed there, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce institute a full ministerial inquiry into all of the facts and circumstances surrounding the alleged breaches of confidentiality at Statistics Canada and that he make a statement on motions at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such motion can only be presented to the House with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

COMBINES

SUGGESTED ACTION TO END COLLUSION BETWEEN OTTAWA "JOURNAL" AND "CITIZEN"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House urge the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to take whatever action is necessary to end the apparent collusion by the management of the Ottawa Citizen and the Journal.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

SUGGESTED INQUIRY INTO ABANDONING OF THE "GABRIELLA"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the tragic loss of 13 seamen from the freighter Gabriella who died from exposure within 60 miles of the southeast coast of Newfoundland and the apparent failure of the air-sea rescue centre at Halifax to provide an immediate response to the Gabriella's distress call, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall):

That the Minister of Transport order a judicial inquiry into the abandoning of the MV Gabriella with the loss of 13 lives.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can only be presented to the House with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL BOARD

REQUEST THAT BOARD MAKE PUBLIC FINDINGS RELATING TO RADIOACTIVE LEAKS AT ELLIOT LAKE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask the unanimous consent of the House to deal with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Since a very serious situation concerning radioactive leaks has been disclosed in Elliot Lake, the Atomic Energy Control Board being determined to maintain tight-lipped secrecy with respect to possible health hazards to residents of Elliot Lake, and since the citizens of the community have a right to know the measures which have been and will be taken to assess the situation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources instruct the Atomic Energy Control Board to make its findings on the present situation public and also to call a full public inquiry as to the scope of the radiation hazard not only in the town of Elliot Lake, but also the surrounding district.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be presented to the House only with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY

SUGGESTION THAT GOVERNMENT INDICATE MINISTER RESPONSIBLE FOR AGENCY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43. Because of the serious, internal confusion in CIDA concerning which minister is in charge of this $1 billion agency, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald):

That the government immediately clarify this situation and reassure the public of Canada that CIDA's operation is being scrutinized daily, by stating which minister is in charge and responsible to parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Such motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can only be presented to the House with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO PROVIDE INCENTIVES FOR CONSTRUCTION COMPANIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the shift in housing activities, in the form of money expenditure and ingenuity, from Canada to the United States, and in view of near zero vacancy rates in rental accommodation in most large urban centres that reflects most drastically on native and low income families, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House direct the Minister of State for Urban Affairs to introduce legislation immediately that would entice Canadians to channel Canadian equity capital and know-how back into Canada, to provide shelter for Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 such motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PROPOSED COMMITTEE STUDY OF REASONS FOR ALLEGED AFFRONT TO PREMIER OF QUEBEC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, the urgency being the effect on the outcome of the election campaign in the province of Quebec, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal):

That the government cause to be brought immediately before the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts, the responsible officers of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for the purpose of explaining the circumstances leading to the recent affront to the premier of the province of Quebec, the response of the officers to that action and the intentions of Radio Canada to prevent similar future interference with free communication in publicly financed television programming.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

STATISTICS CANADA

DATE ON WHICH PREVIOUS MINISTER BECAME AWARE OF COMMERCIAL ACTIVITIES OF CERTAIN EMPLOYEES

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Further to the information conveyed to this House yesterday by the minister, I should like to ask him in the interim, particularly in view of reports which appeared in the press, if he has become more aware of the details of the commercial or extra-curricular activities of the Statistics Canada employees as they relate to Statistics Canada data, and can he now say when his predecessor in office at the relevant time became aware of what was going on in this respect?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I did not really talk to the newsmen in the same precise terms I used in the House, I merely stated, in substance, what I had said. I did not want to name any names because I want to protect the reputation of the people who have been penalized and who, according to the RCMP itself, had not committed any criminal offence. At the time, Statistics Canada management had informed the then minister about the inquiry made by the RCMP. As far as I can see, I believe everything has been conducted according to standards prevailing in the administration. If some people have supplementary information, I would ask them to communicate it to the RCMP who, in such circumstances, always carry out their duty properly.

[English]

MEASURES TO PROTECT CONFIDENTIALITY OF INFORMATION AND INTEGRITY OF EMPLOYEES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): I again thank the minister for his answer. Has the minister had the opportunity, since assuming his latest portfolio, to have a general briefing on the operations of Statistics Canada? Is he satisfied at this point that the House has all the information to which it is entitled, and that all proper and necessary action has been taken to protect the confidentiality and integrity of this important department as well as the integrity of the overwhelming majority of the employees there?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, since my appointment to this department I have had many opportunities to meet with the Director of Statistics Canada, Mr. Kirkham. I am satisfied that Statistics Canada takes all necessary action to protect the confidentiality of information. Mr. Kirkham told me that he, also, was satisfied but that he would do everything possible to ensure that the integrity of this agency of international standing be protected.

[English]

Mr. MacKay: Will the minister agree that the sale of data for private gain of statistics derived from confidential sources on an organized basis is a matter of grave concern, and will he undertake to have answered with as much dispatch as possible, the several questions which I will be having placed on the order paper today?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, first of all let me state that I am satisfied, following the RCM police report, that the information which the penalized employees have used was not confidential. It had already been made public. I shall endeavour to answer all the hon. member's questions, as I did this week. I shall answer all the questions in today's order paper.

[English]

DATE ON WHICH CHIEF STATISTICIAN BECAME AWARE OF BREACHES OF CONFIDENTIALITY

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A supplementary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce—I realize the minister has not had much time in which to look into this. Could he inform the House when the then Chief Statistician of Statistics Canada was first informed of the activities which have been the subject of questions for the last couple of days?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I do not know exactly all the dates and all the details. I am satisfied that, at that time, the official mentioned by the hon. member acted diligently and warned the police as quickly as possible, and the RCMP reported there was no criminal act under the circumstances. The director imposed the penalty which was required for a little indiscretion on the part of the officials involved.

[English]

STATUS OF INVESTIGATION INTO BREACHES OF CONFIDENTIALITY—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is not really the answer to the question, though I can understand the problem the minister may have with respect to it. Can I assume from his answers today that the investigation is proceeding, that he is expecting to be more fully briefed as time proceeds and that we may expect a full statement at the end of this briefing?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I made a statement to the House yesterday and I am satisfied. I have been briefed. The first day these questions were raised I asked the director to come to talk to me. I waited until the hon. member for Central Nova came into the House before making my reply. I am satisfied. I do not want to continue on the basis of innuendos. If there are any allegations of criminal conduct, the RCMP will investigate them but I do not like this business of throwing innuendos around. If you have any accusations, have the guts to stand up and make them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The question is a very simple one. Has the investigation been completed or is it still being carried on within the department, and is the minister satisfied, if it has been completed, that he has all the information?

Mr. Chrétien: These incidents arose two years ago and I think the matter was handled properly at that time. On the facts I have, I do not intend to carry on. As far as I am concerned, I am satisfied. It was two years ago. Some penalty was imposed. If hon. members have any new information, let them give it to me. I am here. I will defend the integrity of Statistics Canada, as is my duty, and I am very surprised that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton should try to cast some doubt upon it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL BOARD

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF BOARD'S PLAN TO TEST FOR RADIOACTIVE LEAKS AT ELLIOT LAKE

Mr. R. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In his absence, might I direct it to the acting minister? In view of the disclosure that many homes in Elliot Lake are subject to radiation leakage and that unacceptable levels of radon gas have been found, will the minister offer the House details of the proposed testing plans by the Atomic Energy Control Board so that we might have a clearer idea of those plans than was supplied by the hon. member for Algoma to the Globe and Mail?

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Atomic Energy Control Board will be making an announcement on this matter very likely today.

Mr. Symes: I welcome that statement. I hope the announcement will meet the questions the people of Elliot Lake are asking. Can the hon. gentleman assure the people of Elliot Lake that during the investigation by AECB an opportunity will be provided to the general public to come forward with constructive criticisms and suggestions and that the findings of the Board will be made public?

Mr. Dupras: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

ENERGY

SUGGESTED REVISION OF STANDARDS FOR RADIOACTIVE CONCENTRATIONS FOR CERTAIN COMMUNITIES

Mr. R. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that current standards for acceptable radiation levels are based upon the effects of radioactive concentrations on the general public, would the government consider amending those standards for communities such as Elliot Lake where workers already are subject to higher radiation levels in the mines, where some waters are contaminated, and where many homes may contain excessive radioactive concentrations in their foundations?

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I will take this last question as notice.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR MORE CONTROL OF INTEREST RATES—POSSIBILITY OF MEETING WITH GOVERNOR OF BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

In view of the increases in interest rates we have witnessed in the last five years, and as it seems that interest rates will go up by another ¾ of 1 per cent within a month, and in view of the fact that this is one of the major causes of the runaway inflation we have had in recent years, can the minister tell us whether he will do something to see to it that interest rates are lower in Canada in the near future?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have no suggestions to make at this time with regard to interest rates. As the hon. member knows, interest rates depend on the market and the monetary policy of the government. The monetary policy is set by the governor of the Bank of Canada, after consultation, and its aim is to reduce the level of inflation in Canada. That is why I cannot propose to the House, for instance, an increase in the monetary supply to reduce interest rates.

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Before discussing with the Bank of Canada the new formula the minister will be introducing, can the minister tell us whether he will be meeting the governor of the Bank of Canada with a view to lowering interest rates, so that the situation can be more normal in terms of our American neighbours?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I met the governor this week to discuss this matter and others as well, but the fact is that we have a higher level of inflation than the United States. With such a level of inflation, it is inevitable that there should be a difference between interest rates in Canada and in the United States.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

ROLE OF COMMISSION IN LES TERRASSES DE LA CHAUDIÈRE PROJECT—ALLEGED CONFLICT OF INTEREST

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Public Works has apparently left the House, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. As minister in charge of the agency, the National Capital Commission, that negotiated Les Terrasses de la Chaudière project for the Department of Public Works, has he satisfied himself that there are no conflicts of interest involved in the deliberations and negotiations leading to this "confirmed and binding contract"?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the role of the National Capital Commission was merely that of acquiring the land, from Quebec Hydro I believe. The negotiations were conducted by the Department of Public Works, and I can assure him that my colleague, who has been very open with all the information, will be very pleased to answer any question respecting the negotiations themselves.

Mr. Huntington: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps the Minister of State for Urban Affairs would take the time to examine the minutes of the various committees whose deliberations led up to this contract. I would ask him whether he is aware or has taken the time to become aware that at least two members of the various NCC committees studying and ruling on this project were at one time or the other acting for and on behalf of the Campeau Corporation during committee deliberations?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I wish I had time to read all those minutes. I am not aware of that but I will check into it.

SOCIAL SECURITY

POSSIBILITY INFORMATION SUPPLIED PRIVATE FIRMS BY DEPARTMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare which arises out of a challenge thrown out by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce regarding knowledge of information being given out by government officials. Perhaps the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce would listen. Is the Minister of National Health and Welfare aware of any information that at any time came from members of his department? I ask that particularly because of the fact that after I received my first pension cheque I got a letter from a firm of funeral directors offering me their services.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Don't feel boxed in.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, my seat mate suggests and hopes that my colleague does not feel boxed in in this situation.

[Translation]

Various allegations on this matter were made in the past, and all our investigations indicate that the information gathered by non-governmental agencies do not seem to flow from any governmental source. Last year, an allegation was made about a certain American company; we investigated and it was found that the information gathered by those private agencies did not come from the department or the government. In fact, in the last case we analyzed on this matter, the company concerned agreed to add a specific note indicating that governments were not the source of information concerning the lists of individuals to which it sent information.

FISHERIES

REASON FOR DELAY IN ASSISTANCE TO IRISH MOSS HARVESTERS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, on July 16 of this year the Prince Edward Island Fishermen's Association requested assistance for Irish moss harvesters whose loss of income they suggest threatens severe economic depression in the area. It now appears the very earliest they will receive a response is mid-November, four months after their initial request. Will the Minister of Fisheries explain why his department has been so slow in responding, why it took a month and a half before his Halifax office was even requested to report, and why it has not been resolved under which program the assistance could be offered?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries) and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept all the allegations contained in the hon. member's question. Certainly, if there has been slowness it has been because the whole market for Irish moss, which is the issue here, has been extremely complicated. Officials have met with the Prince Edward Island Fishermen's Association. In fact, I am expecting a report now, which report has to be looked at and a recommendation made, as the law requires, by the Fisheries Prices Support Board. Then a decision will be made. The market conditions for that product are extremely difficult.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, as the minister well knows, both the market and the amount of crop available in the last year or two have declined quite substantially. In light of investigations that have been made by his department, and particularly the concerns expressed by the minister about the whole marketing situation, can he indicate whether action is being taken within his department to accelerate both its research in terms of the yield of the basic raw material of Irish moss, as well as the substantial measures that could improve marketing information on behalf of his and related departments?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, because of the newness of the industry a lot of basic information has not yet been compiled, for example, possible licencing conditions, best conditions for harvesting, etc. We have a lot of work to do. This is a new area and we still do not have the answers to some of the questions asked by the hon. member.

COMBINES

ALLEGED COLLUSION BETWEEN OTTAWA "JOURNAL" AND "CITIZEN"—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of a statement made yesterday by the executive editor of the Ottawa Citizen who said that the publishers of his paper and the Journal were forced to coordinate their strategies, and added:

> It's like having the Ottawa Rough Riders play the Montreal Alouettes. The players compete viciously on the field, but the men who own both teams are directors of the Canadian Football League. They sit in the same offices to make sure the league is profitable and well-run.

In light of that, may I ask the minister whether he has obtained some advice from the director of the Combines Investigation Branch and, if he has, can he tell us what action is to be taken?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the hon. member is recommending that we go after the football league or after the newspapers, but the fact is that he can ask the question he asked yesterday in four or five different ways every day but I have to give him the same answer. I said I had a statutory obligation to bring his question to the attention of the director and the director, if asked, will conduct an investigation. Beyond that I am following the long-standing practice of not commenting further on the matter in the House.

● (1130)

Mr. Nystrom: In view of the apparent collusion, as admitted by the editor of the paper yesterday, which admission I quoted, I should like to ask the minister whether he is asking the Combines Investigation Branch to perhaps expand its investigation to include all FP and Southam newspapers?

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I will simply direct the member's question to the attention of the director. No doubt he will be interested in the hon. member's further comments today.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROHIBITION AGAINST UNITED STATES SUBSIDIARIES TRADING WITH COUNTRIES ENGAGED IN BOYCOTTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It has to do with legislation now before the United States Congress prohibiting United States subsidiary companies from trading with countries engaged in discriminatory boycotts. The legislation in question would wipe out U.S. oil imports from Arab countries. Of course, that is the business of the United States and not ours but it could also stop up to 35 per cent of Canadian oil imports. When the minister was in Washington recently and met with the Secretary of State, was this matter taken up and was there a protest on the part of the Canadian government against the all too frequent attitude taken by the United States of endeavouring to pass legislation that is extra-territorial in its effect and which results in economic difficulties, particularly for those companies that are Canadian subsidiaries of United States companies.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the legislation to which the right hon. member is referring is the bill which did not, in fact, get final passage before Congress rose and the session ended. Therefore, this legislation referred to in the article is not law in the United States. The hon. gentleman is quite right. There was considerable concern for obvious reasons about its possible extra-territoriality and when I met with Mr. Kissinger originally in New York at the United Nations, I made clear to him that had the bill passed we would certainly have taken, I suppose the appropriate word is, a dim view of it and would have had to take some action. For the reasons I mentioned, the adjournment of the Congress, that has not been necessary, but we are keeping a very close watch on this legislation which has extra-territorial implications for Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I realize the situation, but the legislation is still before Congress, although held in abeyance because of the adjournment. However, there is every indication it will be passed. Arising out of that, I wish to ask him about the strong opinion he expressed during the recent visit of Foreign Minister Arat of Israel in connection with the boycott being repugnant to Canada and that a new Canadian policy on this matter will come out of cabinet shortly. Has the cabinet made its decision, and what is the nature of the legislation the government has in mind in this regard in order to meet a situation which indeed is repugnant to Canadians in general.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, for the very reasons the right hon. member mentioned a few moments ago in relation to the United States situation, legislation is an alternative which might be extremely difficult to implement. Insofar as the policy with regard to boycott is concerned, I am glad to tell the hon. member that I will be making a statement on motions on this subject within the hour.

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY

MINISTER RESPONSIBLE FOR AGENCY

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the deputy Prime Minister. As it has been announced that the former Secretary of State for External Affairs is retaining his chairmanship of the North-South Conference on International Economic Co-operation, I wish to ask whether the minister can now confirm that consideration is being given to his also retaining parliamentary responsibility for CIDA, a $1 billion agency, and that the rationale for such a move would be to ensure consistency in government policy so that the work of CIDA and the North-South Conference is harmonized.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, it is true, at least for the time being, that I am carrying on my responsibilities as co-chairman of the Conference on International Economic Co-operation. The Secretary of State for External Affairs is responsible to parliament for the operation of the Canadian International Development Agency.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR RECONSTITUTION OF COMMITTEE ON INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister assure the House that he is giving daily scrutiny to CIDA which spends $2.7 million a day and is also giving consideration to the reconstitution during this session of Parliament of the sub-committee on international development so that the government's office of strategy can continue to receive parliamentary attention.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on the first part of the question I have in fact been spending a good deal of time during these last weeks looking into and examining CIDA's operations. It is conceivable that I will be anticipating putting into force some changes, but it would be premature for me to say so at this time.

On the question of the establishment of the committee, I have had some representations on this question. On the face of it I do not see any reason why not, but if the hon. member will have a little patience I would be glad to discuss it with him and others to see how it could be done.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REASON FOR FAILURE OF MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE TO RELEASE REPORTS ON MEAT PACKING PLANTS

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It has to do with governmental secrecy and the right of Canadian consumers to be properly informed. Has the minister's department communicated with the Minister of Agriculture to ascertain why he would not make public reports relating to unsanitary conditions in Canadian meat-packing plants when the same reports relating to these plants have been made available in the United States under its Freedom of Information Act.

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am unfamiliar with that matter but I will take it up with the Minister of Agriculture.

Perhaps while I am on my feet I might refer to an analagous question raised by the hon. member in respect of motor vehicle safety in relation to the motor vehicles branch of the Department of Transport. I understand that the statistical facts being collected by that department perhaps will be more widely circulated. I suggest that the hon. member ask the Minister of Transport about this. I am afraid I have no information on the point he raised about the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, whether or not the minister has information, the fact is that the information relating to unsanitary conditions in Canadian meat packing plants made public in the United States in the interest of consumers was not made public in Canada. Will the minister assure the House that he will communicate with the Minister of Agriculture, and assure the House and Canadian consumers that in the future such reports will be made public in Canada in the interest of Canadian consumers who should have access to such information as is the case in the United States.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I can certainly assure the hon. member that I will consult with the Minister of Agriculture and if the hon. member's point appears as valid as his convincing manner seems to make it we will follow the example of the United States.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER WILL CONTINUE RESPONSIBILITY FOR CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which is supplementary to that of my colleague from Edmonton-Strathcona. It is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I wonder if the minister can advise us whether it is the policy of the government that CIDA will continue to report to and through the Secretary of State for External Affairs and not any other minister.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that certainly is the policy at the present time. I cannot say for the long-term future what the likelihood will be. As you know, a number of suggestions have come—some, I believe, from hon. members opposite—about having a minister with special responsibilities in that area, but nothing of that nature is in place at the moment.

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY

POSSIBILITY MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR AGENCY WILL BE CHANGED

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have another supplementary question for the Acting Prime Minister. Is the question of shifting responsibility for CIDA under active consideration now by the government and can we expect an announcement on that matter in the foreseeable future?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the question of the organization of the government, as the hon. member knows is the prime responsibility of the Prime Minister. Certainly, I can assure the hon. member that no consideration is being given to this question by the government as a whole. What is in the mind of the Prime Minister will have to be disclosed on his return from Japan.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: No one knows. Even you don't know what goes on.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

ALLEGATION OF BIAS IN PROGRAMMING—SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. Is the minister aware of the often expressed criticisms of bias in the programming of the publicly financed Canadian Broadcasting Corporation? Has he investigated the veracity of one of the reasons given by Lloyd Robertson for his recent resignation, and how does he reconcile this with this week's well publicised action of Radio-Canada in Quebec?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am not sure which of those facts the hon. member is asking me to investigate.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REPORT ON INCOME DISTRIBUTION—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO AID LOW INCOME GROUP

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Has the minister had an opportunity to study the OECD report on income distribution which indicates that the bottom fifth of Canada's population has one of the lowest shares of total income of the country of any of the OECD countries and if he has, can he say whether the government is contemplating any measures to correct that deplorable situation?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I share the hon. member's concern about that particular report. I have asked my officials to give it close study and analysis to indicate the extent to which they would agree with the conclusions.

Mr. Orlikow: In view of the claims of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance that one of the major purposes of the Anti-Inflation Program was to protect the poorest people in this country, would the minister care to indicate what he intends to do as a result of the figures published by Statistics Canada which show that for 1975 the income of the lowest fifth of the population in Canada has dropped to less than 4 per cent of the gross national product?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Since that was for 1975, during three quarters of which one had the rapidly rising increase in settlements in favour of other people in the work force but not on behalf of those who are not in the organized sector, I would say that the prices and incomes program has proved effectively capable of preventing the situation of that group from being exacerbated further. Going back to the fundamental question, it does remain a basic policy of this government, as it has been of Liberal governments in the past, to protect this particular group in the community, and we will continue to be active in that respect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INDIAN AFFAIRS

JAMES BAY PROJECT—INQUIRY IF INUIT HAVE ASKED FOR FINANCIAL AID

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Can he tell the House whether the Quebec Inuit Association sent him a request for financial support to finalize the agreement with the government of Quebec concerning the James Bay power development. If so, can the minister indicate whether this request was agreed to?

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, as far as I know I have not received demands for additional moneys, although I did receive a request from the Association of Northern Quebec Inuit to help them with their negotiations with Quebec. I met them a couple of weeks ago and I will be meeting them again this coming Monday.

FINANCE

SALE OF GOLD BY INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND—EFFECT ON EMPLOYMENT AND GOLD RESERVES IN CANADA

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Does the minister agree with the policy on the sale of gold by the International Monetary Fund which has contributed to depressing the price of gold and which in turn, has caused considerable unemployment in our gold centres as well as running down the value of our own reserves?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): In general terms, we have approved the policy of the International Monetary Fund to conduct gold auctions for the purpose of generating additional funds to assist the less developed countries, particularly those in the group with a per capita income of less than $200 a year. At the Manila meeting, however, on behalf of the government, I did express some criticism of the manner in which the auction was being conducted which, in our opinion, may well be yielding less from these sales than if they were conducted in a more flexible way. I urged upon the executive directors of the International Monetary Fund a more flexible policy which would maintain the price of gold both in the interest of the developing countries and the interest of Canadian gold producing communities.

SUGGESTED DISBANDING OF INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Can the minister tell the House what role he envisages for the IMF in the future, or should the IMF be disbanded, as many people seem to think?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): No, it should not, Mr. Speaker. In the course of the current session I will have the opportunity of introducing amendments to the Bretton Woods Agreement Act which indicate the role that the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank will continue to play. Of course, gold has been replaced by special drawing rights as an international asset in addition to currency reserves in some countries, and we think the fund will continue to play a significant role in assisting countries with balance of payments difficulties.

PENITENTIARIES

BRITISH COLUMBIA—TRANSFER OF INMATES TO MEDIUM SECURITY INSTITUTIONS—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON PRECAUTIONS

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Solicitor General. As a considerable number of inmates from the British Columbia penitentiary have already been transferred to the Matsqui institution at Abbotsford following one of the more recent hostage-taking incidents, can the Solicitor General tell the House whether the report is correct that prisoners from the same penitentiary are being or will be transferred to the medium security prison in Mission, British Columbia?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): The answer to the hon. member's question is, yes. There are a number of people in the British Columbia penitentiary who have already been classified as medium security risks but because of insufficient installations they had to be incarcerated in the B.C. penitentiary. However, as space becomes available at Mission, some of the inmates who have already been classified as medium security risks will be transferred to the Mission facilities.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Speaker, since the prisons at Abbotsford and Mission were not built to house the type of inmates who were involved in the riot at the B.C. penitentiary, can the minister inform this House, and the residents of Fraser Valley, what steps are being taken to ensure that the same thing will not happen in these institutions as has happened in New Westminster and to ensure protection for the residents of those communities?

Mr. Fox: As I pointed out in my initial answer, only inmates who previous to the disturbances in B.C. penitentiary were classified as medium security risks are being transferred to Mission.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

THREAT OF SMI COMPANY IN NEW BRUNSWICK TO MOVE TO UNITED STATES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, and I want to get it in before the minister resigns to run in the Quebec election.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fairweather: It has been going on every day, and I wanted to catch up.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: What about the former member for Malpeque?

Mr. Fairweather: There is a difference between Mr. MacLean and Mr. Marchand—one is leaving a rising ship, the other is leaving a sinking ship.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: Now, let us get back to regional economic expansion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fairweather: There is a legal strike against SMI Industries in New Brunswick which operates with federal DREE funds and the company has threatened to move to the United States, then sell its production back to Canada. I wonder if the minister will consult his colleague, the Minister of Labour, and point out to management that this is a grossly unfair labour practice and is unacceptable to the federal government which has participated in the operation of this company.

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say to my friend, the hon. member for Fundy-Royal, that I have no intention whatsoever of leaving my position to run in the provincial election. I feel I still have a lot to do here in Ottawa in this department which is entrusted with responsibility to assist the economy of each province, particularly in my province of Quebec.

● (1150)

In the particular case that to which the hon. member referred, I can say that our department is following all those situations very closely. When a corporation that we assisted under a DREE plan gives an indication of its intention to move away from the region under the conditions that the hon. member pointed out, then I think in the past we have been active in making sure, if it was still under control to some extent as a result of our grant offer, that this corporation is made well aware of our intention to step in.

FISHERIES

DESTRUCTION OF REDFISH BY SPANISH AND PORTUGUESE FISHERMEN—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I would direct my question to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. At the present time Canadian ships are not permitted to carry out fishing operations on codfish or redfish on Flemish Cap, an area some 800 miles from Halifax, while Portuguese and Spanish trawlers are still fishing there for codfish and throwing hundreds of thousands of pounds of redfish back into the sea. Can the minister explain this anomaly and inform the House whether any steps are being taken by the Portuguese, Spanish or Canadians to halt this dangerous destruction of fish or to harvest this incidental catch which is not being utilized at present by the Spanish or Portuguese?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries) and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the reason some Canadian or foreign vessels are fishing or not in one or other place is that we may have fished out the quota we had under the ICNAF agreement. In the case of the Portuguese and Spanish vessels, some of their quotas under the international agreement have not been reached and this has to be kept in mind. The question of discards is serious, however—maybe not as serious as the hon. member indicates—and we have told both the Spanish and Portuguese governments that under the new jurisdiction, as of January 1, this will not be tolerated.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DISCUSSIONS WITH SPANISH AND PORTUGUESE GOVERNMENTS ON DESTRUCTION OF REDFISH

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The wastage is something like 75,000 pounds of redfish per five-hour troll by actual count from a Lunenburg captain. Since Flemish Cap is something like 800 miles from Halifax, and in an area which will be beyond our jurisdiction when the government declares the 200 mile territorial limit, would the minister undertake to bring this matter to the attention of the Spanish and Portuguese governments in the interests of conserving our valuable fisheries resources for the future use of all mankind?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the action the hon. member suggests has already been taken. My colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment has indicated that subsequent to the declaration of the 200 miles where we have control, it will also be in a sense an illegal act.

An hon. Member: How are you going to enforce it?

IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY IF VALDES FAMILY WILL RECEIVE LANDED IMMIGRANT STATUS

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Considering the assumption that the order of prohibition is withdrawn and that Mrs. Valdes submits to the deportation order by going to London, and considering that Mr. Valdes is sure to have regular employment, can the minister assure the House that Canada will welcome without delay the Valdes family to avoid undue school delay for the children.

[English]

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am not certain that I got the full thrust of the translation of the hon. member's question. In looking through the various avenues that have been open to this particular family and the abandonment of the family by the father on occasion, we have endeavoured to be as compassionate as possible in this particular case. I understood that an application for an order of prohibition was before the courts and I have not been advised whether that has been withdrawn or dismissed but I shall look into it.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

REQUEST FOR DEPLOYMENT OF HELICOPTERS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of National Defence. Yesterday on television Admiral Boyle said, and I paraphrase him: "I am a taxpayer of Canada and I think there is a limit on how much you can spend on search and rescue." The same sentiment was expressed by the minister's predecessor when he said that deployment of existing search and rescue capability would not be cost effective. I ask the minister, whom I know has a big heart, if this is government policy; if not, will the minister, as an interim measure until the government can get its new search and rescue policy announced, order the deployment of at least one of the armed forces helicopters to eastern Newfoundland?

Hon. Barney Danson (Acting Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to correct an answer I gave yesterday in the House with reference to the Labrador helicopter arriving on the scene of the tragedy some two hours after notice was received by the Rescue Co-ordination Centre; it was actually four hours, forty-one minutes later, at 1345 hours. There was a total of three fixed wing aircraft and two helicopters deployed on the mission. I wanted to correct that information which was not complete when given to me yesterday .

With reference to the other question the hon. member raises, I have not seen Admiral Boyle's statement. Certainly this government, as my colleague the Minister of Transport said, has been examining the situation very thoroughly. One must realize that you cannot have an aircraft or ship in every place at every time. I would think in that context we have to find the most cost efficient way and the most humane way to handle these situations. We are examining all options and they are under active consideration by the government as my colleague has indicated.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question to the Acting Minister. If these armed forces specially equipped helicopters can be used to ferry the Prime Minister around the maritimes on political tours, surely it is not too much to ask the minister if he will order the deployment now of one of those helicopters to provide some umbrella of protection to fishermen in eastern Newfoundland. That is all I ask.

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, these options are already under examination and the government will be making a statement very shortly.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

EFFECT ON ECONOMY OF YUKON OF STRIKE AGAINST BOARD RULING BY MINERS AT FARO—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I address the Minister of Finance because he is responsible for the Anti-Inflation Board, the Minister of National Revenue through whom the administrator of the AIB reports to parliament and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development from whom I shall solicit an answer, he being responsible for the economic well-being of the people of the Yukon. These ministers are aware I am sure of the strike which has been in existence by the steel workers at Cyprus-Anvil Mining Corporation at Faro since June 30. The strike is against the AIB which rolled back a negotiated agreement to 12 per cent, then increased it to 14 per cent but it was rolled back again to 8 per cent by the administrator. Can the minister tell the people of the Yukon what steps the government is going to take to break this stalemate which is negating all three objectives of the AIB and is causing gross unemployment and total lack of production as well as an increase in the inflationary rate in the Yukon as a whole?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think I should point out that parliament has passed a law which is as applicable to this work force as to other work forces across the country; that the work force can of course choose to strike against that particular law of parliament. In carrying out the prices and incomes program, I do not think the government should be compelled to abandon that law because of the viewpoint of a particular local. Under those circumstances I do not think there is anything the government can do. It seems the far more sensible thing for that work force to do would be to go back on the job.

NORTHERN CANADA POWER COMMISSION ACT

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT TO RELIEVE CONSUMER OF BURDEN OF INCREASED RATES

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Will he assure the people of the Yukon that he will bring before parliament the Northern Canada Power Commission Act for an amendment to section 10 so that the consumers of the Yukon will not have to bear the increased cost of power which is going to be made essential as a result of the lack of revenue to that corporation because of the strike which has been under way for almost three months now, due to AIB action?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, my predecessor set up a task force to examine ways in which power rates could be relieved in the Yukon and Northwest Territories. I understand that task force will report to me in a week or two.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. MacEachen: With your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, may I say a word about the business of the House. I must absent myself from the House soon and may not be present to respond to the question put by my hon. friend. Tomorrow it is my intention to interrupt the debate on the address in reply, to deal with a bill which is to be introduced by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) concerning the port of Halifax. Assuming we get consent, we would proceed with that bill tomorrow. On Monday we would conclude the debate on the address in reply. On Tuesday, I hope to call the bill dealing with the James Bay Agreement and, following that, the customs tariff. May I add that if we conclude the proposed labour bill tomorrow before the end of the normal business day, I would consider, with all hon. members opposite, calling bills falling into the category described yesterday by the leader of the New Democratic Party as housekeeping bills. We might do some useful housekeeping late tomorrow afternoon.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to co-operate with the government with respect to the bill which he indicated the government intends to call tomorrow. I imagine there has been, or will be, some discussion with respect to it. May I assume from what the minister said that he has now departed from that wasteland of legislation which he mentioned yesterday, the Historic Sites and Monuments Act, the bill respecting diplomatic and consular privileges, etc., and that he is really serious with respect to government business in the first part of the session.

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, indeed, Mr. Speaker. I draw to the hon. member's attention a variety of additional bills on the order paper dealing with fishing and recreational harbours in Canada, the Pension Act—

Mr. Clark: The National Anthem.

Mr. MacEachen: —and the making of advance payments for crops. The hon. member should cast his eye beyond the National Anthem.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He is casting his eye to the government side. He wants to be over there.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in connection with substantial legislation which the government will place before the House, may I ask the minister the question which was addressed yesterday to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) but not worded in such a way as to elicit the answer we seek. Can the minister say if the bill to amend the Old Age Security Act, as forecast by his colleague last April, will be before the House some time soon, say this year?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, that is the intention: some time this year.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is that in this calendar year, 1976?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Or in this fiscal year?

Mr. MacEachen: I was thinking of the 12-month period from this moment.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, can the government House leader say if he intends, on behalf of widows and war veterans, to introduce legislation with respect to the Pension Act and war disability pensions? Will amendments be introduced?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, there is a bill on the notice paper dealing with the Pension Act. I hope it can be dealt with quickly.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STATEMENT OF POLICY ON INTERNATIONAL BOYCOTTS

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, before beginning my statement may I, at the outset, apologize to the various spokesmen opposite for the comparatively short time they have had my statement. I was under the impression earlier this morning that it had been distributed. It appears there was some mix-up. I take full responsibility and hope hon. members will understand. I apologize.

Mr. Fairweather: Make sure this is the last time this happens.

Mr. Jamieson: The hon. member opposite says, make sure this is the last time this happens. I think he should note, in all fairness, that this is the first time this has happened.

Mr. Fairweather: That is why I think it will not happen again. That was exactly the tribute I was paying.

Mr. Jamieson: Thank you; Mr. Speaker, the government has clarified its position in relation to international boycotts and has strongly affirmed its opposition to discrimination and boycotts based on race, national or ethnic origin or religion. Accordingly, the government will take measures to deny its support or facilities for various kinds of trade transactions in order to combat any discriminatory effects which such boycotts may have on Canadian firms and individuals. These measures will not, of course, apply to any boycott accepted by Canada but will clearly apply to such discriminatory aspects as there may be to any other international boycott.

The type of transactions against which the government will take action are those which would, in connection with the provisions of any boycott, require a Canadian firm to: engage in discrimination based on the race, national or ethnic origin or religion of any Canadian or other individual; refuse to purchase from or sell to any other Canadian firm; refuse to sell Canadian goods to any country; or refrain from purchases from any country.

While Canada seeks friendly relations with Arab states and with Israel, Canada also reserves the right to respond to commercial policies of other nations according to its own practices and values. Consequently, the Canadian government will deny its support or facilities, including the support of its trade missions abroad, in the case of any transaction involving boycott undertakings of the type described above.

Given that in many parts of the world, including the Middle East, denial of Canadian government support for a particular transaction imposes very serious handicaps, such as those relating to contact with foreign officials, market information and Canadian government financing, it is considered that denial of such support will be an effective deterrent to co-operation with discriminatory provisions of an international boycott.

Canadian firms may decide nonetheless to agree to certain boycott clauses and forgo Canadian government support for the projects concerned. All Canadian firms, however, whether they accept boycott clauses or not, will be required to report all instances of their complying with boycott provisions. Information obtained from such reports will be made available to the public.

The government recognizes that Arab countries consider their boycott of Israel to be a legitimate economic weapon in view of the continuing state of war between Arab countries and Israel. Canada, however, seeks to improve its relations and to develop its trade in peaceful goods with all nations. Any discrimination against Canadian firms or individuals is contrary to Canadian concepts of fairness and the government is determined to ensure that any such discriminatory aspects are not in any way supported by government programs.

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, the statement by the government with respect to the Arab boycott is overdue. Opposition to any boycott which is pursued on grounds of racism or prejudice should be a principle of foreign policy. It should not be a last minute position drafted in a context of ambivalence. And, ambivalence there is in this statement. The first paragraph of the statement contains the following statement:

These measures will not, of course, apply to any boycott accepted by Canada . . .

I am sure the minister will want to clarify that sentence, by saying if Canada is about to indulge in a boycott against certain nations and, if it is, which nations they are. There is clear ambivalence at the end of the statement, which reads:

. . . the government is determined to ensure that any such discriminatory aspects are not in any way supported by government programs.

● (1210)

I just wonder whether this does not add a new perception to the programs and activities of CIDA. I am sure the minister will want to clarify this point a little later and explain if CIDA and our trade missions are going to be involved in such a boycott or if this is a veiled threat.

The new Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) should not be held responsible for the procrastination of this government in coming forth with a statement about the Arab boycott. In fact, no other minister has been as open, forthright and co-operative with the opposition. This augurs well for the future. I recognize that and I commend him for his attitude.

However, I say to him through you, Mr. Speaker, foreign policy is more than the drafting of pragmatic statements by pragmatic people. It must be the elaboration of principle on behalf of the nation. The people of Canada care more about bread and butter issues, inflation and unemployment, than they do about foreign policy. Nevertheless, foreign policy affects the way in which a nation weighs itself and what a nation stands for.

[Translation]

I understand the necessity for the federal government to protect the commercial interests of Canada and to maintain friendly and business relations with Arab countries now that they are playing a new and decisive role within the world economic community. I do understand also the need for the government to seek information and to evaluate the political and economic consequences of a decision whose importance shall not be minimized. But mercantilism should not be the only rule of a country which is concerned with morality. Now the Arab boycott is one of those cases where Canada cannot but stand firm as far as principles are concerned. It is in the international community's interest that our action discourage measures which might unduly and unjustly affect the interests of Canada, of Israel and of Arab countries themselves.

[English]

The statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) of May 8, 1975, to the effect that this type of practice is alien to everything the government stands for and, indeed, to what in general Canadian ethics stand for did not prevent, for example, the Canadian Export Development Corporation, a Crown agency, from allegedly conniving in the boycott when being called upon to account for its actions and without being ordered to stop circumventing the government's stated policy.

Instances have been cited where this Crown corporation is alleged to have insured loans to Canadian companies dealing with Arab countries and complying, willingly or not, with the boycott against Israel. I ask the question, and I am sure the minister will answer it later, have those incidents been investigated? In any event, to date no denial has been given.

Unrestrained opposition to an Arab boycott is the only position a government of this country could take. Anything else I consider to be a major sellout in principle and in fact. The people have the right to nothing less. The issue of principle in foreign policy requires commitment, international consistency and skill. As Canada moves closer to membership in the Security Council, the minister and the government must assure themselves that their international consistency, both as a cabinet and within the External Affairs Department, is sufficient to protect principle. The delay that accompanied today's statement must leave many Canadians cause for concern.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I join with the spokesman for the official opposition in saying to the minister that it is regrettable it has taken so long for the government to make any kind of statement on a very basic principle, the question of boycotting of Canadian companies by Arab countries or any other country on the basis of race, religion or colour. There is a strong feeling among many people in this country that part of the reason for the delay has been the fact that senior officials in the department are hostile toward the state of Israel. I refer the minister to press reports which have detailed the situation.

The minister said "the government will take measures to deny its support or facilities for various kinds of trade transactions in order to combat any discriminatory effects which such boycotts may have on Canadian firms and individuals." All the minister is saying is that the government will apply to Canadian companies doing business outside Canada what is now the law in Canada. We have federal and provincial fair employment practices legislation which prohibits discrimination against Canadian citizens on the basis of race, colour or religion. The government is now prepared to apply the same principles to Canadian companies doing business outside Canada.

The minister went on to say he would do this by refusing the assistance of the government to companies with regard to "contact with foreign officials, market information and Canadian government financing". He states that "denial of such support will be an effective deterrent to cooperation with discriminatory provisions of an international boycott".

The bulk, if not all the business done by the Canadian corporations with Arab countries is done through multinational corporations whose head offices are in the United States, Great Britain, Holland or South Africa. They do not need Canadian government assistance to make contacts, obtain market information or financing, although on occasion they have added icing to the cake by using Canadian financing. Therefore, we do not believe that this kind of action by the Canadian government will have a serious effect on cutting back, let alone preventing Canadian companies from dealing with Arab countries.

The minister said, in the last paragraph of his statement, that "any discrimination against Canadian firms or individuals is contrary to Canadian concepts of fairness". However, he avoided saying that the Canadian government will take legislative action to prohibit that kind of transaction. There will be no legal sanctions against doing business with Arab countries and Arab governments. As far as we can tell, the corporations will simply ignore the feelings expressed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson).

We do not understand why the government of Canada does not enact legislation similar to that now before the United States Congress, and I believe it would be supported by all opposition parties, prohibiting Canadian companies from doing business which requires a boycott by Canadian companies of countries recognized by the United Nations and Canada or of discrimination against Canadian citizens on the basis of race, colour or religion. I urge the minister to give very favourable consideration to bringing in such legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, first I commend the minister for apologizing because his statement was late. I would, however, address one critic to him. We hope this will not happen again and that if the minister has some difficulty asserting himself within his department, which I do not believe, he will also try in the future to send us his statements in French. If we are to have bilingualism in Canada, I think we should try at least to begin in the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, what strikes me first is the lead paragraph of that statement which reads as follows:

● (1220)

[English]

The government has clarified its position in relation to international boycotts and has strongly confirmed its opposition to discrimination and boycotts based on race, national or ethnic origin or religion.

[Translation]

Unfortunately I realize that the government has followed inconsistent policies in external affairs. Today it has stated that it is against a boycott of countries on racial grounds, but in various circumstances in the House and through its former Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) at the United Nations, it has supported resolutions for an international boycott on racial issues.

I am referring to South Africa and Rhodesia. Canada has supported the boycott.

Mr. Speaker, the members of the Social Credit Party of Canada do not believe in economic blackmail such as a boycott to which countries can resort one against the other because no country in this world up to now has succeeded in having an efficient boycott. We remember quite well that some countries advocated an economic boycott against Germany, but to no avail. An economic boycott was declared against Cuba but to no avail. The same was once done against South Africa, again to no avail. In Rhodesia, which was supposed to be boycotted by the United States and Canada and where American companies could not do business, I personally saw some heavy equipment worth millions of dollars from well known American agricultural companies which were doing business while the United States were officially boycotting that country.

Mr. Speaker, economic boycott is nothing but a sort of blackmail, and when a country includes this in its foreign policy, we eventually discover that this same country carries out its trading through the back door of its warehouse, through the back door of the country or through another country.

All of this, Mr. Speaker, to say that we fully support the statement the minister made this morning to the effect that Canada will not participate in this type of international economic blackmail and will not support any boycott against Israel or any Arab country. We therefore support this statement and ask the minister to be consistent from now on when he talks about economic boycott on racial matters.

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Before directing my question to the minister, Mr. Speaker, I want to state in all fairness, following the statement made by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau), that we have indeed received the French text, in excellent French as a matter of fact. We have received this text, I have it before me and it ought to be on the desk of the hon. member for Shefford by now. I should not like to cause prejudice to the minister by saying that he does not favour bilingualism, because if there is someone in the House who favours bilingualism, it is indeed the minister responsible for external affairs.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

[English]

The questions I should like to put to the minister arise from the opening remarks I made. First, I am disturbed by the sentence to which I drew attention, indicating that the minister is contemplating boycotts. He said these measures would not apply to any boycott accepted by Canada. I should like to know what criteria would guide the government when the moment comes to decide whether a boycott should be exercised against one nation or another.

Mr. Jamieson: Perhaps I can assuage the hon. member's concern by putting that, in a sense, in the past tense. The object of that line was to make it clear that we were not now rejecting the boycott of Rhodesia which was approved by the United Nations and to which Canada subscribed. I suppose there could be similar circumstances in the future—I am not anticipating any at the present time—and this is specifically designed to cover a situation where the United Nations, through the Security Council, did impose a boycott to which the members, including Canada, subscribed. The words to which the hon. member referred are meant to deal expressly with such a situation.

Mr. Wagner: Is it the intention of the government to deprive a country of aid which it has been receiving from CIDA, should that country become part of the boycott?

Mr. Jamieson: I cannot conceive of a situation where aid through CIDA would be involved. There might be one where a Canadian company was supplying goods or services in some form or other. But the mere fact that CIDA funds are involved would clearly prohibit such a company from subscribing to the boycott. It is certainly not the intention that foreign aid would be affected in any way. This is expressly designed to cover commercial transactions of the kind carried out in normal international trade.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, I have two questions for the minister. He has just told us that CIDA is not involved. With regard to that final sentence of his this morning when he referred to the withdrawal of Canadian government programs from countries supporting the Arab boycott, may I ask what government programs he is contemplating? I suggest that in offering a veiled threat he is doing nothing to calm the already troubled waters?

Mr. Jamieson: I do not see, looking at the document, that there is any reference to withdrawing support from countries. It uses the words "any discrimination against firms and individuals". Possibly the hon. member could read that into it but, once again, I say there is no intention and no thought of involving any CIDA operation. The type of program to which the statement makes reference covers government financing of various kinds which, contrary to the view expressed earlier by one member opposite, form a substantial part of doing business in many areas of the world, including the Middle East. It means the kind of assistance which our people in the field provide abroad; in short, anything of a commercial supportive nature would not be available in the circumstances I have outlined.

Mr. Roche: I should like to ask the minister whether he would address himself to the underlying reasons which caused the boycott in the first place. I refer to the spread of racism which is severely affecting the United Nations today and which has put the United Nations in crisis. May I ask what the Canadian government is doing, not only by way of imposing a boycott but constructively and positively, to use its good offices to help the United Nations stop the spread of racism which is so seriously impairing international relations?

Mr. Jamieson: I can only reply in a general way to that question today, but I would be glad to let the hon. member have specific instances of occasions in which we have spoken out against racism in all its forms. Certainly, at the United Nations this year, if the hon. member would do me the honour of reading my speech, he will see I made some strong comments in that direction. We have participated in a number of discussions in the UN and elsewhere making known our views against racism. We have made our position abundantly clear. We have, of course, simultaneously rejected out of hand any effort to link racism with Zionism.

• (1230)

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that once a boycott has been set in place by a group of nations it is not likely that they will withdraw from that position, and that only sufficient warning as to what the position of the Canadian government will be could have any real deterrent effect—and with all courtesy to the minister I doubt that this somewhat milk and water statement by the government today will be a very effective deterrent—I want to ask the minister two questions. I will ask both questions now to save the time of the House.

First, is the government prepared to make it clear to companies operating in Canada and to Canadian companies that, in the event of a boycott, the Canadian government will introduce legislation making it illegal to join in a boycott that is based on race, colour or religion?

Second, is the Canadian government prepared to make it clear to any nation, particularly to the Arab nations at this time, that Canada will not allow this repeated type of international blackmail to go on and will take retaliatory measures, measures that will be fairly draconian? It seems to me that unless the government is prepared to take action along those two lines we are liable to find ourselves in a very unfortunate situation and it will be too late then to issue any warnings. I think the Arab nations ought to know in advance, and that companies in Canada ought to know in advance, that if they co-operate in such a boycott the government proposes to move and to move very firmly. I would ask those two questions of the minister.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I think I have no problem replying in the affirmative on the principles about which the hon. member has queried me. I think there is within the statement—I regret that he does not feel it is as strong as he would have liked to see—a clear message which I think will be carried to companies in Canada that we do intend to take the kinds of actions to which the hon. member has referred. In other words, we will act.

On the other issue of retaliation—I believe that was his word—regarding foreign countries, this is a somewhat more complex question. Without going into it in detail, may I say I would assume that our leverage or our capacity to retaliate may vary substantially from one country to another. It also seems to me that there is something in the questions put by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) in particular, and also by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche). For example, on the question of foreign aid, this is presumably one form of retaliation that might be possible. But would it be appropriate to cause the ordinary people in certain countries that are participating in boycotts undue suffering as a result of the action of their government? I am not at all certain that I can be as firm on the second point about our reaction to the actions of foreign governments as I can in terms of Canadian companies.

In the case of Canadian companies, the situation is clear. If a company expects to get any form of assistance from the Canadian government—and I repeat that the record shows that assistance is most valuable and in many cases essential—then they must be prepared to forgo, denounce or not take part in any kind of boycott conditions contained in a contract.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Two members on both sides of the House have been seeking the floor for some time, the hon. members for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) and Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) on my left, and the hon. members for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance) and Windsor West (Mr. Gray) on my right. I think that will fairly cover all parties and conclude the questioning.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask two questions. First of all, by what legislative authority does the minister propose to require all Canadian firms to report transactions that violate the intent of the statement the minister made? If the minister has not such legislative authority, is he proposing to bring in legislation requiring the reporting of such transactions?

Second, I ask the minister whether the government has considered legislation of the kind the United States Congress is now considering prohibiting such transactions and if they did consider it and decided against it, what were the reasons?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, on the first part of the question, I am advised by officials that the necessary authority does exist to require the reporting procedure. I would ask the hon. member to give me a day or two to get that information in terms of specific action. I am not quite sure to which legislative authority the referrence is.

On the question whether we considered legislation, this is an alternative at which we have been looking. Both I and the government concluded that at this time legislation was not necessary, and also that it would present enormous complexities and problems. Therefore the use of this technique that I have announced this morning is the most effective means through which to proceed. I should say, as the hon. member undoubtedly knows, that the bill in the United States came in for a considerable amount of criticism and opposition. I do not want to anticipate the U.S. legislative process, but I understand from what are usually referred to as reliable sources that it will also undergo considerably more debate when it is reintroduced, presumably in the new session in 1977.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to thank the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) who wanted to correct something which I think was perhaps a mistake. I left my office at 11:45 and still did not have a French copy. However, I think the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe is right. I would like to say to the minister that we, on this side, are assured of his full cooperation on the matter of bilingualism, and we hope that in the future, the French copy will get to us in time.

[English]

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) is welcome so far as it goes. I have a question for him which I have divided into three parts to save time. First of all, if a company can do without the services of the government, that the minister has mentioned, I take it that the government is proposing to parliament no other sanctions if that firm continues to comply with the Arab boycott? Second, if Canadian banks are demanding proof of compliance with the boycott from Canadian firms selling goods to Arab firms before making payment to them under letters of credit, I gather the government is not intending to take steps to prevent the banks from engaging in this procedure, even though they are federal institutions? Third, when will the banks have to begin reporting to the government compliance with the boycott, and in fact how soon will the withdrawal of trade services outlined by the minister begin in order to put into effect the measures contained in the statement, which as I have said is welcome so far as it goes?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, let me answer the third question first. I think this is purely a mechanical problem which I could answer immediately by saying that it may take some short period of time in order to convey the gist and effect of the statement to the various agencies and parties concerned. On the question of banking, the banks are, of course, included in so far as direct transactions go. I would have to look into the implications. I believe the hon. member asked about the situation where the banks themselves ask a client whether he has conformed to the boycott. Is that what he asked, just for clarification?

Mr. Gray: Whether they are asking for proof of compliance before making payment on letters of credit to firms doing business in Arab countries.

Mr. Jamieson: I would have to look at that in detail to find out exactly what was what. The hon. member said he wanted to save the time of the House by asking three questions. Would he just tell me again what was the first question?

● (1240)

Mr. Gray: With the permission of Mr. Speaker, I asked whether the minister could confirm the impression I gained from his statement that there are no sanctions the government is proposing to parliament if firms continue to engage in condoning and conforming to the boycott beyond the withdrawal of trade support services and financing, which in many cases these firms do not need in the first place?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, the assumption is essentially correct. If a Canadian company chooses to make arrangements entirely on its own and it is a private transaction, then no sanctions, as he called them, would be imposed. I should point out, however, that such firms, whether they seek government assistance or not, will still be required to report the fact that they have, indeed, complied with the boycott, and that information will be published.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Lafontaine-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, in light of the minister's statement on the position the Canadian government intends to take with respect to the embargo called against Israel by the international Arab community and, in a similar context, of Canada's negative vote in committee alone with Israel against the United Nation's resolution on the decade for action against racism, to be consistent does the minister intend to reconsider the implications of that resolution which, incidentally and unlike previous ones, does not make reference to Zionism, and eventually change Canada's vote in the General Assembly when that issue will be discussed, particularly if one considers the desire expressed in the Speech from the Throne to engage Canada further into cooperation and international representation, among other things, in the quest for a new international economic order?

[English]

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I presume that the hon. member is referring to the vote in a UN committee a couple of weeks ago. The reason Canada voted against that resolution was that there was an implicit continuing relationship in that resolution of a linkage between racism and Zionism. I have said that we will not support such resolutions or participate in any activities that even remotely tend to support that proposition. As for a change in our position, I cannot tell the hon. member at the moment because I have not addressed myself specifically to it, or to what we will do in the general assembly. However, if the circumstances are not different, and if there is not a good logical reason for us to give support, then I do not see us changing our position. I should emphasize at the same time, however, that this whole position Canada is taking, and to which I am very firmly committed, is designed to help us get human rights activities and anti-racist activities moving at a very high level in the United Nations. We feel that cannot be achieved successfully, if it can be achieved at all, as long as there is that which we reject, namely, a linkage of racism with Zionism.

JUSTICE AND LEGAL AFFAIRS

TERMS OF REFERENCE OF INQUIRY INTO OPERATION OF PENITENTIARIES

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move, seconded by the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts):

That the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs inquire into the system of maximum security institutions maintained by the Canadian Penitentiary Service and such other institutions as the Committee deems advisable, including:

(a) the adequacy of security procedures and arrangements, custodial facilities and correctional programs pertaining to such institutions,

(b) the special problems faced by staff and management in the administration of such institutions,

(c) the need for, the role and composition of Citizens Advisory Committees attached to such institutions,

(d) the need for, the role and composition of Inmates Committees in such institutions, and any other matter that the Committee may consider relevant to the proper administration of such institutions, having regard to the recent disturbances that have taken place in the British Columbia, Laval and Millhaven Penitentiaries; and to invite the views of interested parties and the public on these matters;

That the Committee have power to travel from place to place within Canada;

That the Committee have power to retain the services of advisers to assist in its work, and that it also have power to retain the professional, clerical and stenographic help it may require;

That the Committee submit their Report not later than February 28, 1977.

I should like to add that I have consulted the opposition parties in this regard and there is an understanding that the standing committee would consider, we hope favourably, the possibility of establishing a sub-committee to hold this inquiry.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understand that the minister is presenting such a motion without notice and therefore it will require the consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent that the motion be presented in this way at this time.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I have something to say on that point.

Mr. Speaker: Either there is unanimous consent or there is not.

Mr. Neilsen: I was on my feet, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I must determine whether there is unanimous consent. This is a debatable motion, of course. If there is unanimous consent I will put the motion, but if there is not unanimous consent then we cannot discuss it.

Mr. Nielsen: There is unanimous consent that the motion be presented.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent that the minister present the motion at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion presented by the minister.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to adopt the motion without debate on certain understandings we have reached with the Solicitor General, namely that the whole committee will not be dealing with these terms of reference but that a sub-committee will be set up by the standing committee which will consist of 11 members, including five Liberal members, four members from this party, one member from the New Democratic Party and one member from the Social Credit Party. We also have an understanding that the standing committee will meet forthwith early next week, hopefully in order to strike that sub-committee and that we would not be confined in our inquiries solely to the maximum security institutions. There is also an understanding that certain research assistants will be allowed to travel with the sub-committee in order to accomplish its work, and that if we find we cannot finish in a thorough and in-depth manner as is contemplated by this motion, the work of the sub-committee by February 28 there would be no difficulty in extending that deadline in order to allow a full, complete and thorough inquiry.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, the understanding I have with the opposition is that this matter would be referred, hopefully, to a sub-committee by the committee. I cannot give directions of that nature to the committee. My understanding also is that the composition of the sub-committee would reflect the normal composition of committees of the House.

Mr. Nielsen: As a matter of clarification, Mr. Speaker, in my discussions with the Solicitor General we talked about numbers. We discussed the composition of the sub-committee, which we hoped would be set up by the standing committee, and it was suggested it would consist of 11 members, five from the Liberal Party, four from this party and one each from the NDP and Social Credit Parties. That was my understanding of our discussion.

Mr. Fox: Then, there has been a misunderstanding because my understanding was that the sub-committee would reflect the normal composition of the membership of the House.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Wednesday, October 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Maurice Harquail for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Speaker: It being one o'clock this House stands adjourned until 2 p.m. this afternoon.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I believe the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) spoke on the subamendment on which we voted last night, so the debate is concluded on that subamendment. The hon. member will be allowed 30 minutes on the main motion, and I will recognize him after the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) has spoken.

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I have had cause to address the House as Secretary of State, and I would not like this moment to pass without indicating my great appreciation for the letters of congratulation which I have received from many hon. members. I should like to refer in particular to the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette) who in his speech last Wednesday was very generous in his compliments to me and indicated the range and challenge of the position which I hold, which is indeed a difficult one. I would like to single out, also, the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) for his welcome, and in particular the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) for his generous remarks. I have received a flood of letters of congratulations and best wishes from members from all parts of the House, and I would like to thank them for supporting me in my first few challenging days in office.

Since becoming Secretary of State I have travelled a great deal in Canada and many times I have come across that phrase of frustration, of anger, sometimes of bitterness which I am sure many members who visited their constituencies over the summer encountered. I refer to that terrible phrase, "We don't want you to ram French down our throats". I want to say that as Secretary of State I have no difficulty in associating myself with that sentiment. I have no trouble at all, so long as the people who say that are equally prepared to say " . . . and we do not want to ram English down the throats of French-speaking Canadians".

If one can make that kind of leap of the imagination and take oneself out of one's linguistic boots for a moment and put oneself in the place of those Canadians who speak the other official language, and say, "It is not my intention to impose on others limitations and restrictions on the use of their language, as I do not want them placed on me," then I think one can begin to grasp the essential thrust of the official languages policy of this government which has been supported on all sides of this House. The official languages policy does not impose obligations upon citizens; what it does is conserve, protect and guarantee language rights.

The official languages policy takes nothing away from English-speaking citizens and nothing from French-speaking citizens. What it confers upon French-speaking people are the same rights that English-speaking people accept for themselves as naturally as the air they breathe—it ensures the use of French for French speakers. In fact, the Official Languages Act is a bill of language rights, not of imposition; it is something that seeks to guarantee opportunities, not to restrict them.

The official languages policy has three basic principles. The first is that a Canadian citizen should have the right to receive services from the federal government in whichever of the official languages he uses. The act confers that right. The second is, it asserts that whether one is an English-speaking Canadian or a French-speaking Canadian, one should have the opportunity to travel this country from coast to coast and have access to one's own cultural community. That is why the government is establishing French-speaking radio and television stations from one end of the country to the other, and also English-speaking radio and television stations within the French-speaking parts of the country. The third principle is the hope that the provinces will provide opportunities and facilities wherever practicable for education in the minority official language of those citizens who wish it.

Those are the three essential strands of the official languages policy, and not one of them limits any opportunity, ability or capacity presently held by Canadians. What they do is expand opportunities for Canadians to live a full life in whichever of the official languages is theirs. In other words, the official languages policy is about equality. That is a basic drive in our country.

Most people who came to Canada were seeking to escape the closed structures of Europe. They came because of opportunity and because they wanted to live in a society in which there was equality, not a society of rank and privilege. With the official languages policy we are trying to ensure linguistic equality. We are trying to ensure that French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians will have equality of use of language in the civil service, and that whether they be French-speaking or English-speaking, Canadians can look forward to a career in the civil service. We are trying to ensure equality of service to citizens who deal with the civil service and the public bodies of Canada, so that whichever is their official language they will be served effectively and quickly in that language.

We are trying to encourage the provinces to provide equality of opportunity for all groups in the educational system so that no one will be deprived or disadvantaged if they wish to maintain their official language and at the same time advance in the educational system. We are trying to ensure equality of access to cultural expression so that the cultures based on those official languages are generally available. The theme is that of language rights based on equality, not of imposition or control. It is an attempt to ensure that no Canadian, no matter which language he uses, will be forced to learn and use the other official language if he does not wish to do so. This is the principle which underlies the attempts we are making.

It is because I believe so strongly in this principle that I regret the position taken by the former minister of defence, the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Richardson). He contends that the time has not necessarily come when we should consider these principles of linguistic equality as part and parcel of the essential fabric of our country. He is concerned that if these principles in some way become entrenched in the constitution, Canadians may regret it and they may wish to have more flexibility in order to remove, alter or amend them. I would say to him, Mr. Speaker, that the time has not only come to make this commitment, but the time came in the 1960s. Through the will of parliament we made our fundamental commitment to equal language rights at that time.

It is not true, as the hon. member asserts, that the policy of bilingualism has created tensions over language in this country. That is, indeed, the reverse of the facts. The policy of bilingualism has been an attempt to deal with tensions in our society, tensions which have long been within the history of Canada and tensions which, if it had not been for the government's response, I believe would have led to the shattering of our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roberts: One cannot say to French-speaking Canadians, as the hon. member for Winnipeg South would say, that 370 years after the arrival of the first French-speaking Canadians, that 200 years after the Quebec Act which protected language rights, that 100 years after confederation which protected language rights, and that seven years after the Official Languages Act, which protects language rights, as a society we have not determined whether these principles of language rights are essential to the fabric of our society. We cannot say that these essential principles are still something we may wish to consider or to reject—that they are in doubt. If we let pass the opportunity to assert our fundamental acceptance of these principles, it seems plain to me that our country will not be able to continue.

Think for a moment in terms of basic human rights. I cannot believe that the former minister of defence would say yes, there have been experiments with the principle of free expression, freedom of speech, freedom of association; yes, those things were started hundreds of years ago and they have been confirmed in various acts of parliament; yes, they have been considered important by Canadians for many, many years but, of course, we do not want to have them protected in any special way in our constitution; we do not want to make these the essential fabric of our country, because we may wish to change or amend them; we do not want to lock these principles into our constitution. He would not say that, nor would any member of parliament.

I would say the time has come, Mr. Speaker, to accept language rights in this country and to give them the same status and importance that we give to other fundamental human liberties. To try to put the argument to French-speaking Canadians that we should wait to see if these are principles that we are going to accept reminds me of Shaw's St. Joan: "How long, how long, oh Lord, before thy kingdom is ready to receive its saints?" I would say: "How long, how long, oh Lord, will it take Canadians to accept and protect the language rights of French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians as essential to this country?"

I put it in terms of language rights and linguistic equality; I do not like the word "bilingualism" because I think it is inherently ambiguous. When one talks of a bilingual society, one could mean a society in which some citizens speak one language and some citizens another. One could mean a society in which all citizens are expected to speak both languages. The phrase in itself confuses some people. I think many people feel it means that some Canadians are going to be forced to learn the other language whether they want to or not.

● (1420)

I have been told the story, I hope it is apocryphal that there are farmers in Saskatchewan who sincerely believe that some day the RCMP will knock on their door and say, "Your number has come up in the computer; it is time for you to go and learn French." That is the kind of attitude which the word "bilingualism" might be taken to imply. I stress "linguistic equality," and "language rights." We are not trying to impose anything on anyone. We are trying to guarantee to those who speak one of the official language their ability to maintain their language, maintain their culture and maintain their life in that language.

I think most members of the House of Commons and most people in Canada accept, fundamentally, the language policy which I have described. That does not mean there are not questions about its implementation; I am sure there are. Indeed I, myself, have questions about the implementation of some of the programs which have been designed to give fulfilment to those principles which I have described. We have tried a variety of approaches, many of them experimental. Some of those experiments have worked more successfully than we expected. Some of our experiments have worked rather badly, or less successfully. But it is true beyond doubt that the number of bilingual positions in the civil service has expanded greatly in the last five years, that our exchange program in many ways has been successful, and that our youth programs—on which I shall touch later in my speech—have been extremely successful.

Members of the House of Commons are certainly aware of the experimental programs undertaken in Ottawa-Carleton. Those programs were so widely accepted that there was considerable opposition to any suggestion of their being withdrawn. But some of our programs have not been as successful as we would have liked them to be. We shall look at those. There are some methods which we can look at again. We can assess their effectiveness and, if they are not effective, either make them more effective or dismantle them.

Many members have spoken to me about such things, for instance as the regulations which apply to labelling. On my trip out west I heard criticisms about labelling. I heard that the sometimes rigid, overzealous application of regulations in relation to labelling has been an outstanding grievance. I said out there, and I repeat it in the House, that I think in this area there are nits we should not pick, that there are changes which could be made and which should be made. I know that my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Abbott), will be looking at the labelling regulations to see if any improvements can be made, to see if he can ameliorate the application of the rules and ensure that they apply only when they will effect, in substance, improvements and not simply outrage and irritate people.

There is also the question of the designation of bilingual positions in the civil service. My colleague, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras), spoke about that in his speech in the House. I might simply repeat two things he said. First, may I repeat what he said as reported at page 159 of Hansard for October 18, 1976:

> —I can already assure the House, for example, that language training programs will be improved, that the linguistic requirements of positions will be reidentified, and that language standards will be revised.

It is not effective, in the pursuit of increasing our capacities to use both official languages in the civil service, to create unrealistic objectives. I also wish to draw hon. members' attention to one more paragraph in the speech of the President of the Treasury Board where he mentions unilingual public servants. We must be sensitive about the problems they face, sympathetic to their needs, their desires, goals and ambitions. The President of the Treasury Board cited his own experience. He said, as reported at page 161 of Hansard:

> My personal experience makes me particularly sympathetic to the difficulties faced by unilingual public servants—and I am talking about unilingual public servants of both languages. In undertaking my new responsibilities, I certainly intend to see that these difficulties are very carefully examined and that programs and procedures are reviewed in order to minimize them and, wherever possible, to eliminate them.

I associate myself as strongly as I can with the statement of my colleague. It is important, when we seek to achieve justice for those who are both French-speaking and English-speaking, that is, for those who are bilingual—that we do not do this at the expense of justice and sympathy for those in the civil service who are unilingual.

I think we should again look at and make people more aware of the kinds of appeal provisions which enable the Commissioner of Official Languages to review problems which have arisen in the civil service to do with promotion in relation to bilingual positions. In addition to being willing to look again at the implementation of programs, we are prepared, as a government, to expand efforts on what is commonly called the "youth option". I am not too fond of the word "option" because it implies "either or"—it implies that increasing our emphasis on extending language training to the youth of our society might be a replacement for some of our other programs, the diminution of what we are already doing in other areas. I do not see the programs which we are about to undertake as replacing others.

We have, as a government, already been active in this area. I cited briefly the experience in Ottawa-Carleton with experimental French immersion programs which have been extremely successful. Some people think that is easier to do in the Ottawa area, perhaps, than in other areas of the country. If one goes to Calgary one will find there, as well, experimental immersion programs which have been extraordinarily successful. One finds classes of children in the primary years, happily, easily and cheerfully talking to each other in French as if it were the most natural thing in the world, and benefiting from that experience in the other language. These are experimental programs, but they are certainly not unique. We have embarked upon a variety of programs which are directed basically at younger people. We are trying to make it easier for the next generation to acquire second language skills; easier than it was, perhaps, for many of us.

The bursary and fellowship programs which were established in my department are oversubscribed in every province. There has been a significant increase in the number of elementary school children enrolled in second language instruction across Canada. More and more students are studying French, and for a longer time. The enrolment of children at the elementary level in French second-language programs across Canada has been increased by over 25 per cent during the past five years. The most dramatic increase has taken place in British Columbia, where the enrolment is up almost 200 per cent. In other provinces, between 1970 and 1975 one finds French second-language programs increasing dramatically. For instance, in Newfoundland enrolment increased by 52 per cent; in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, by more than 120 per cent; by almost 25 per cent in Ontario; over 20 per cent in Saskatchewan; and, as I said earlier, by almost 200 per cent in British Columbia. Clearly, much has been done in the past, but much more remains to be done.

Hon. members, I am sure, are aware of the commitments which the government made in the Speech from the Throne. I draw to their attention again the belief of the government as expressed in these words:

—that a better balance should be established between the money spent to introduce bilingualism in the public service and the money spent to enable more Canadians, particularly young people, to learn to communicate in both official languages.

That does not mean we must diminish our efforts to improve the bilingual capacity of our civil service. It means we must do more to extend our efforts to younger Canadians.

—the government intends to discuss with the provinces arrangements to increase the effectiveness of training in both official languages in the school systems across Canada.

I am sure the provinces will welcome our desire to be helpful in this area and I am sure we shall receive their full co-operation. I would not want hon. members to have exaggerated expectations about what can be done immediately. The limitations are not necessarily financial; there are limitations of human resources. We cannot, with a wave of a magic wand, increase these services and extend them immediately to every point where it is desirable to have them. But that is the kind of effort we intend to make in the very near future.

[Translation]

I must say that, however important it may be to put the accent on expanding our youth programs, this entails no reduction in our support for institutional bilingualism. It is very important in our view, not only in substance, but also for symbolic reasons.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal) who spoke Wednesday, underlined the fact there is still a lack of francophones at the executive level in a number of departments. We have not yet reached the point where there are equal numbers of francophones and anglophones in the public service. It is no easy thing either to tell francophones, after 110 years of confederation, that equal opportunities in the public service are always for tomorrow, never for today. It is important however to maintain our efforts for a bilingual public service in Canada.

[English]

There can be no wavering, although we may find more effective ways of doing it. We may be able to save money and stop the wastage of money. But on the commitment of ensuring that French-speaking Canadians have equal opportunity within the civil service, and that we should expand our ability to serve the public in both official languages, there can be no diminution and no pulling back.

[Translation]

I must also say a few words concerning the situation of francophones outside Quebec. Bilingualism is not a policy directed to Quebec francophones only it is also for French-speaking Canadians outside Quebec.

Yesterday I noted, as I hope this House did also the remarks by the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier). It is important in my view for us in government to give our support to the French-speaking community outside Quebec, to be sure to protect them against assimilation. It is not only a question of giving education safeguards, nor giving TV access to culture. It is important to try and maintain a French language context in those communities, in order one may live in one's official language, albeit a minority one. It is also important to guarantee that not only for the benefit of francophones outside Quebec, but also for anglophones within Quebec.

[English]

If I could put this policy which I have just described in a larger context, I would describe it as one of our many policies directed toward overcoming divisions in Canada and bringing us together. Language rights are not the only problem in Canada. It is an important problem, but not the only one. Many people in the Atlantic provinces are perhaps more concerned about the problem of lagging economic development. Many people in western Canada are concerned about their sense of alienation or isolation from the decision-making centres of eastern Canada.

There are a variety of problems which face this country. We have developed programs, sometimes successfully but not always, which try to overcome regional disparities in this country. We think it is important that the Atlantic provinces be given equality of economic opportunity to that which exists in other parts of the country. We have tried to develop policies, perhaps not always successfully, which take into account the concerns of citizens of the western provinces. We have tried to develop a transportation policy which provides equality of access to communication and transportation in this country. We have tried to design these policies to overcome barriers between Canadians. They have been designed to bring Canadians together. Therefore, our language policy must enable Canadians to come together. All Canadians should be allowed fully to live with their language without being in the position of second-class citizens.

Our official languages policy helps to protect fundamental human rights. It attempts to overcome divisions which would otherwise lead to explosive grievances based on real injustice. It is on that point I would like to repeat my earlier comments on the remarks of the former minister of national defence, a man whom I respect greatly, a man who is extremely sincere in the statements he makes, a man who perhaps reflects the feelings of other Canadians. However, I say to him that the official languages policy is not something that creates divisions in this country. It is something which helps us to overcome these divisions. That is its real importance of the policy. Our official languages policy enables us to try to overcome what would otherwise be real grievances and bitter frustrations over the situation of languages in this country. It is in that context we should perceive our policy of official languages.

I have discussed our official languages policy thus far in terms of the protection of rights. I would like briefly to discuss one or two other aspects. I suggest that a policy of protection of our official languages creates the kind of structure in which a multicultural society can thrive. It is trite to say that in the United States they have a different idea of their country, one which is an assimilation or melting-pot. That is what a melting-pot is, an assimilation. The protection of our two official languages establishes a basic structure which accepts and encourages the importance of diversity of cultural point of view. I suggest that a bilingual country, in the sense of having language rights, is one which would be more open and tolerant with regard to a variety of cultural expression, something which makes Canada a distinctive and valuable place in which to live. It helps strengthen our unique multicultural society.

We do not look upon the acceptance of these two major international languages in Canada as a problem or limitation, but as a splendid opportunity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roberts: On language rights it often seems that Canadians are like the man running along, who stumbled on an opportunity and picked himself up, dusted himself off and ran unheeding on his way as quickly as he could. The existence in Canada of these two major languages—the only developed country to have them—provides us with an economic resource. We should look at the advantages they bring to Canada as a trading nation in the decade to come, and realize the potential of the English-speaking market to the south and the Common Market in which the two major languages are English and French. The language facility that we have is a great advantage; it is an opportunity to be exploited, not a fact to be condemned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roberts: The existence of these two languages gives to Canadians who wish to take advantage of them a cultural opening. In addition to the sense of uniqueness and identity which they provide to this country, they help us to withstand the pressures of cultural absorption by the United States. There are economic advantages which this facility can provide us with in the future. There are so many good reasons for supporting the official languages policy that it is clear opposition to it must be based to a very considerable degree on a misunderstanding of what we are seeking to accomplish.

It will be my primary task over the next few months, as Secretary of State, to try to dispel the misunderstandings. I will be making an active effort across this country to try to explain our language policy perhaps better than we have explained it in the past. I hope members of all parties will join me in this effort and will attempt to explain what we are trying to do, why it is essential as a basic protection of language rights, why this policy holds no threat of imposition on Canadians, and why it provides our country with a splendid opportunity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to inquire whether the minister would entertain a question.

Mr. Roberts: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The minister's time has expired. This can only be done with unanimous consent. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member may put his question.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I did not want to interrupt the flow of the minister's speech. Part way through his speech the minister mentioned the three priorities or aims of the government. One is an increased role in education under his department. As the minister knows, education is a prerogative and responsibility that has been assigned to the provinces. Can the minister tell the House in what way the government will protect the integrity of provincial responsibility in this area and still assume a more active role in education?

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member, not only for not interrupting the flow of my speech but for putting the question. It is true, of course, that education is in the field of provincial jurisdiction. I met with the provincial ministers of education in Halifax last September and I did have some informal discussions on this question. We are not seeking to impose our views on the provinces, but I do find them disposed to go along with us in the provision of these services, these facilities. We, in turn, are anxious to encourage the development of this capacity and we shall be glad to offer our encouragement and assistance. There is no conflict.

• (1440)

Mr. Stanbury: Would the minister permit another question? The hon. gentleman, who I am sure will make an outstanding Secretary of State, made reference in his speech to a program we have not heard about for a year or so—the youth exchange program. Taken together with a reference in the Speech from the Throne, the expression of a desire "to enable young people from various parts of the country to learn more about one another," may we be encouraged to believe that the youth travel and exchange program which was so inexplicably and, I might say, inexcusably abandoned a year or so ago, will be reinstated?

Mr. Roberts: I share the hon. member's concern on that subject. This is a matter I began to consider as soon as I became Secretary of State. While I am not prepared to make any specific commitment at the moment, I can assure him this kind of program will be the object of sympathetic regard on my part.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the intervention of the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) because I wish to speak for a few minutes on the bilingual issue. It is one which is shaking the foundations of our country. Nothing I shall say today has not already been written in the Toronto Star in the last few days.

When a western minister, one of the few from western Canada, resigns because bilingualism is too encompassing, and when on the other hand, another cabinet minister leaves to join the provincial political field in Quebec because bilingualism is applied too easily, it seems time to inquire whether or not the policy was fundamentally in error from the start. Yet the bases of bilingualism are not being examined or debated at the national political level, despite the enormous groundswell of popular opposition and the indifference of French Canadians in Quebec. A policy which arouses only mild enthusiasm among the minority it proposes to help, while giving rise to intense hostility among the majority, deserves careful scrutiny. Yet political parties have been unable to carry out any examination of the principle of bilingualism.

The government blames the backlash which has developed in English-speaking Canada on bigotry or red-necked racism. I do not believe this is justified. In my view, Anglophone Canada can be considered one of the more tolerant societies in the world. After all, every society has its own expressions of intolerance. There are plenty of irritants around. But if one examines the causes carefully, one finds that the principle of bilingualism is offending many people.

Inherent in that principle is the assumption that there are two founding races in Canada and that these two founding races occupy, somehow, an elitist position compared with other races. No account is taken of the fact that the Indians were here long before either of the two founding races arrived. Then, again, in my riding many people who came from eastern Europe would consider themselves a founding race because they were the ones who cleared the forests in that area and made a productive part of Canada out of the wilderness.

All these so-called ethnic groups lived through a period in which they were not accepted as first-class citizens in English-speaking Canada. Today, we seem to have adopted a founding race concept which belittles those whose original language was neither English nor French, marking them as somehow different. The idea that there is one founding race, let alone two, makes it difficult to apply the concept of equality in a democratic and fairly egalitarian country. It seems important to me that the idea of equal opportunity should seem to be real, even if its application is not always possible.

During the original debate on bilingualism in 1969, I made the point that the civil service should represent the regionalism which is a fact of life in this country. It is of little help to have a civil servant who speaks both languages but who is totally ignorant of the part of the country he administers. As a western Canadian, it has been my experience that many of the civil servants with whom I have been in contact have no concept of the nature of our problems in the west.

The idea behind bilingualism was to help those Canadians whose mother tongue was French but who did not hold nearly their share of the total civil service jobs available. Today, English-speaking Canadians fear compulsory bilingualism will bar them from the top positions in national politics and the public service. Nor can their fears be dismissed as groundless. I might mention the joke about the lifeguard from Victoria who eventually managed to get a job at 24 Sussex Drive because, although he could not swim, he was bilingual.

I am indebted to a columnist, Mr. Robert Nielsen, for some interesting figures which appeared in yesterday's Star. He drew attention to some pertinent statistics derived from the 1971 census. The census found that 14,470,000 Canadians speak English only, that 3,879,000 speak French only, and that 2,900,000 speak both languages. It also found that the language most often used at home was English for 14,446,000 people, French for 5,546,000, and some other tongue approximately 1,600,000.

From these figures it can be inferred that Francophones comprise about 1.7 million of the nearly 3 million Canadians who speak both French and English, or 60 per cent. Thus, they have a 60 per cent start when it comes to filling the bilingual jobs in the federal civil service and in Crown corporations such as Air Canada or the CBC, although they comprise only 26 per cent of the population. In other words, a French-Canadian has four times the chance of getting a job in the senior civil service, compared with a Canadian who grows up in an English-speaking home.

When one considers that all federal supervisory jobs are scheduled to be bilingual by 1978, it is evident that French-Canadians have an inside start, especially since it is not easy to train adults to become proficient in a second language, as we have all observed, judging by the problems which have beset the federal government's language training program. Perhaps the disadvantage suffered by English-speaking Canadians is even greater than the figures I have quoted suggest, since many of the uniligual English speakers live in British Columbia or the maritimes, and the farther away one lives from the seat of government, the less chance exists of getting into the civil service. This is a fact of geography and I am not suggesting that any one person is to blame for it.

Western Canadians, in particular, point out that though they are able to join the civil service, the RCMP and the armed forces, application of the bilingual principle makes it impossible for a great many of them to occupy positions of seniority. Mr. Speaker, when the majority of the country feels dissatisfied and disadvantaged in the competition for jobs in the civil service, the armed forces or the RCMP, it surely spells great trouble for us all.

What about the minority which bilingualism was supposed to help? The program may have made it much easier for French Canadians to take jobs in the civil service—indeed, I believe it has done so—but has it accomplished its goal of swinging their loyalty from the province of Quebec to Canada as a whole? I do not blame anyone; if I were a Quebec Francophone I would feel much the same way. But it would appear that French Canadians are building their defences in Quebec through Bill 22 which establishes French as the official language in the province. I can understand the purpose of Bill 22, but it is extremely difficult to suggest that it is in keeping with the principles of the Official Languages Act, which itself imposes an unwanted degree of bilingualism on the rest of the country.

Political writers and thinking Canadians, particularly western Canadians, are wondering where all this is going to lead. Will it lead to the break-up of the country? Writing in the Toronto Star of October 12, 1976, Richard Gwyn suggested that the "two nations" idea is once again respectable. Bilingualism, which was to be the government's response to the problem, has proved to be a cure as powerful as the original disease. Perhaps it is bigotry, perhaps it is unwarranted fear, but the concept of support for bilingualism has collapsed in English Canada today. Even the premiers of the provinces seemed to be heading toward a form of two nations when they agreed in Toronto that they should have an expansion of jurisdiction over culture, communications and immigration. If a province can have control over immigration, control over who shall enter or leave the province, then in effect it is largely an independent state.

It seems to me that the English-speaking premiers realized that only the province of Quebec would tug away jurisdiction in the fields of culture, communications and immigration. Surely this is "two nations by the back door", whether you want to call it that or not. Many English Canadians have already, unfortunately, separated themselves from the province of Quebec, and certainly this is very true of western Canadians. On the other hand, in Quebec Mr. Bourassa seems to have gained popular support for Bill 22.

Will confederation return to the two nations concept? I do not know. I believe that bilingualism, without some modification of the present policy, has ceased to be practical. The idea in the throne speech of more education in both languages might be helpful, but that is far into the future. Many of us who went to school did have some opportunity to learn a second language. Perhaps the teaching standards in those days were poor compared to the standards of today, but in many instances a kind of resentment was built up.

I should also like to mention a program referred to by the Secretary of State, the aim of which is to transport our youth from one part of the country to another for educational purposes. I know one instance where this worked in reverse In my riding, a certain school band conceived the idea of going to Scotland to compete in a music festival. They made great efforts to apply many times to the Secretary of State for a grant, but found no grants were available. Therefore, the children and parents had to pay their own way, raising $640 apiece. While in Scotland they met a group from Quebec, students of approximately the same age and attending the same kind of school. These students had had their way paid. So in this instance the program worked in reverse.

I know of another instance where a school band made a visit to Holland to play at one of the towns that the Canadians had liberated during the war. They were royally received by the burgomaster and given a town banquet. Then the external affairs people swarmed around them and said what a great thing it was for Canada that they had made the trip. In their opinion, this was only adding insult to injury.

The resignation of the former minister of national defence and the response to his going has certainly indicated that there are large numbers of western Canadians, at least, who view the present bilingualism program as unworkable. There is no evidence in the throne speech that the government intends to modify or to change in any way the workings of this program. This, as much as anything, is aggrieving the Canadian public, and the government, unfortunately, has indicated no real initiatives to deal with this vexing problem.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, as I stood up to make a few remarks I heard the hon. member across the way say, "Oh, no.". Of course, I expect him to say that because this afternoon I shall try to unmask this throne speech for what it is.

Mr. Hopkins: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) was looking at me, then he need not have bothered. It was not I who said, "Oh, no". In fact, I said nothing. I may put in my earplugs, however.

Mr. Rodriguez: The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hopkins) has just confirmed what we have always suspected, Mr. Speaker—that he is mute.

It is a sad commentary on this government's latest throne speech that it is only one more piece of evidence of the government's complete inability to deal with the real problems facing the people of Canada. In fact, the throne speech shows how incapable this Liberal government is in even understanding what the problems are. Let me refer to the throne speech and to a section that really intrigues me, that dealing with so-called manpower policies. I would like to put on the record an extract from that section:

> In pursuit of the goal of a higher rate of employment, it will be necessary to improve the efficiency of the labour market and actively hasten the return of unemployed workers to productive effort. Adequate income is a prerequisite to human dignity; and the government believes most unemployed Canadians would much prefer to secure that income through worth-while work than through public assistance. In some cases, and locations, this goal can be achieved only through direct job creation by governments.

How can this government be so callous, Mr. Speaker? How can they simply assume that the Canadian people are so gullible as to accept that garbage? Have we in this House forgotten that only six months ago the government told the Canadian people that they were cutting back on one direct job creation program, the LIP program? This was one program that at least created jobs at the local level and met a specific community need. Yet the hon. member for Cape Breton-East

Richmond (Mr. Hogan) had to go to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and beg him to do something to change the way the LIP grants were calculated in his riding which, due to the government's policies, has a very high unemployment rate. The same unemployment rate exists this year as last winter. It is an area that will be hit with another 2,500 unemployed because the Sydney Steel Corporation will be laying off another 2,500 workers before the end of the year. Yet this callous government has the gall to put before this House a throne speech that says it is going to introduce a direct job creation program!

In my own riding of Nickel Belt there was last year, according to the government's own figures, an unemployment rate of 8 per cent and we received $350,000 from LIP. This year we are told we have a 7.61 per cent unemployment rate in Nickel Belt and we are going to get only $121,000 from LIP. It is said the government is creating 15 jobs. That certainly is a lot! The hon. member opposite is from the northern part of Ontario. How can he be so phony as to tell the Canadian people that this government is creating jobs?

An hon. Member: If you don't want the 15 jobs, I will take them.

Mr. Rodriguez: We want five times 15 jobs. You talk about this in the throne speech, but you do not put up the jobs. Either put up or shut up. This throne speech is just a lot of rhetoric. Let us not forget that last summer the government cancelled the OFY program and sent 30,000 jobs down the drain. At least the OFY program kept youth unemployment down to about 14 per cent, but last summer it was up to 20 per cent. There was a loss of some 30,000 jobs. These were direct jobs in the community that went down the drain. How phony can you get?

An hon. Member: They were just freeloaders.

Mr. Rodriguez: The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen), from the Conservative party, calls them freeloaders. I hope Hansard will report what he said. He said there were 30,000 freeloaders with jobs.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Nickel Belt has the floor for the purpose of making a speech. I suggest we all listen to him.

Mr. Rodriguez: This government has shown its strength. It is wonderful how it is so strong with unemployment and family allowances and so tough when it comes to the weak and the disabled. In a show of strength, this government turned around and cancelled the summer student employment program. Obviously, since the government was unable to deal with the problem of student unemployment, it should at least get the facts straight instead of hiding them from public scrutiny. Let me quote again from the throne speech:

> You will therefore be asked to approve a comprehensive, year-round, direct job creation program, directed particularly toward areas of chronic high unemployment. Other programs will provide more job opportunities and improved employment counselling for young people.

This government has the awful gall to even print that, or else the Liberals think the Canadian people are extremely gullible, or write such trite nonsense after having just practised the complete opposite in the last six months to a year. Surely, any analysis of youth unemployment was paramount in planning job opportunities in areas of high unemployment, but thanks to this government we no longer have accurate figures on which to base future plans and programs. Here is another quotation from the throne speech regarding manpower policies:

> You will be asked to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act in ways which will permit insurance funds to be used to maintain the income of Canadians being trained for new jobs, and to help employers retain workers who might otherwise be temporarily laid off.

This is an absolute abuse of the unemployment insurance fund. In a recent study entitled "New Directions for Manpower Policy", Barbara Goldman, of the C. D. Howe Research Institute, wrote:

> Canada gets a real pay-off from training only if the trainees can find steady employment. Otherwise, training is simply another form of income support, and there are, in many cases, other, more effective ways of providing income support.

What is the point in paying employers out of the UIC fund to keep workers on the payroll, when there is no work for them to do?

An hon. Member: Would you rather have them laid off?

Mr. Rodriguez: What is the point of paying employers this money to keep people on the payroll, when there is no work for them? That is absolutely silly.

An hon. Member: That is not what it says.

Mr. Rodriguez: That is what it says; I just read it. The hon. member reads with his usual Liberal prejudices.

An hon. Member: This is typical socialist wind and double-talk.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, you can always tell when you have touched a sensitive note with those people.

An hon. Member: Like the Tories and the Wheat Board.

Mr. Rodriguez: In the same article, Ms. Goldman quotes Seymour Brandwein, who happens to be the director of the office of manpower program evaluation, employment and training administration of the U.S. Department of Labour, as saying in 1976:

> To the extent that economic growth generates new jobs, training programs should be a tool for developing the skills and performance needed to sustain such growth and for equipping workers of limited skills or other background to fulfil the opportunities offered by such new jobs.

This proposal or blind statement in the throne speech seems to me to mean nothing more than the prostituting of the unemployment insurance fund for the most callous of political purposes, and that is to keep the unemployed from being reflected in the unemployment rate in preparation for an election in a couple of years. This government is made up of the most cynical group of people I have ever come across. At least with the Tories we know where we stand, or at least we know where they stand. The Liberals are prepared to say anything to any group at any time to get the votes which will keep them in power.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: At last we agree.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, when the official opposition starts agreeing with me, I begin to wonder about the position I am taking.

The proposal to use unemployment insurance funds to subsidize companies which are considering lay-offs is nothing more than a scheme to use UIC funds to subsidize the companies. Such a scheme will not be used to the benefit of the working people: this was clearly shown in April by the economic review of the Department of Finance. That review said that during the session the number of persons employed "did not decline in line with cut-backs in output". The review said that instead of lay-offs, "average hours were reduced" and "experienced workers were put on general maintenance duties rather than being laid off". This phenomenon which the government described is called labour hoarding, and business did it to keep their skilled work force together.

Now the government has cleverly come up with a method that will allow it to use UIC funds to pay these businesses for doing what they would have done anyway.

An hon. Member: Another subsidy.

Mr. Rodriguez: Yes, another subsidy. The government said in the throne speech that the "international trading environment will profoundly affect our economic performance". Indeed it will, Mr. Speaker. The fact of the matter is that the economy of Canada is resource-based and the bulk of our exports, approximately 71 per cent, is raw materials. Our major trading partners are very happy with the situation. A perfect example of this is our relationship with Japan. We have a trade surplus with that country, yet they are quite happy. They are happy because only 3 per cent or 4 per cent of the goods we export to Japan are manufactured goods, whereas their total exports to Canada consist of manufactured products such as electronic equipment, cars and cameras. Inherent in that trade surplus is the number of jobs created by manufacturing from Canadian raw materials. No wonder they are happy with the situation and do not want it changed.

Coupled with that is the growing mechanization of the resource sector of the economy, resulting in greater productivity with fewer hands required. We have a prime example of that situation in northern Ontario where our economy is resource-based. In fact, we are losing our population, as this House well knows, and as a result of that loss of population we will lose one of our federal seats in this House.

It is absolutely important that we realize where the problem lies. The development of selling resources and buying back finished products is not accidental. In the past, these resources were handy and appeared to be inexhaustible. The pick-up artists in the business community and in government, federal and provincial, exploited them for all they were worth, all the time locking us into a long-term pattern of development which is so startlingly dramatized by our trade relations with Japan.

The pattern has a certain vicious life of its own. In trying to balance the dollar value of imports with the dollar value of exports, we must sell more and more of our resources. Because these resources are not handy any more, vast sums of capital must be found to explore and develop them. It is on this point that the mining corporations in Canada have replaced the banks as the worst bitchers in the country. It is part of the pattern that they now howl for government to give them more, and greater tax concessions to further the pattern in which we are hewers of wood and drawers of water.

The Liberal government is not prepared to tackle this problem because it means taking on the corporate elite of this country, the Steven Romans, the Zimmermans, the Grubs, and so on, where the power of the boardroom decides the fate of governments. I mentioned Roman. He is a Tory. He used to be a Liberal. Now he is trying to be on both sides of the fence. That is the reason the throne speech avoids facing this problem like the plague. Instead, the government talks about training Canadians for non-existent jobs. The government, instead of dealing with the problem, comes up with band-aid solutions such as this throne speech talks about. Equally laughable, in spite of the seriousness of our predicament, is this gem from the throne speech:

> In pursuit of the goal of a higher rate of employment it will be necessary to improve the efficiency of the labour market and actively hasten the return of the unemployed to productive labour.

There has been a conspiracy in this country in the last year and a half among government and its cohorts in the boardrooms across the nation: they entered into a conspiracy to find a scapegoat for the mismanagement of the country. Together, they concocted a mythology about the Canadian labour force, and in co-operation with their media arm they propagandized the public. Here is the scenario from their combined points of view: Canadian workers are less productive than their United States brothers and sisters, yet want more pay for less productivity. Furthermore, Canadian trade unions are too powerful and are primarily responsible for the high inflation rate in Canada.

It is time this unholy alliance was unmasked. It is time for us to look at that mythology, to look at that lie which has been propagated for the benefit of protecting this government. We should look at some of the recently released and corrected figures regarding productivity between Canada and the United States which reveal that between 1969 and 1974 the annual productivity rate in the U.S. was 1.9 per cent, whereas in Canada it was 2.8 per cent. It led one bank economist to declare that Canadian wages have risen more rapidly in the last 20 years but so has productivity. We have held our own against the United States, and gained against Europe. He further declared that industry complaints of the last few years have not been accurate.

Furthermore, I offer as testimony the remarks of no less a raving socialist than Mr. Larry Thibault, chief economist for the radical Canadian Manufacturers' Association. This is what he had to say:

The labour force is first-class. It's a case of using it more effectively.

Yet it is this first-class labour force that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and this government set about destroying in 1970. Have we forgotten the Prime Minister facing his opposition and declaring that he didn't care if unemployment went up to 6 per cent; he was going to hang tough and defeat inflation? Have we forgotten those good old days when unemployment was 3.8 per cent and inflation was 4 per cent? Who fought inflation on the backs of the workers? Who proved the Keynesian theory inoperable?

Mr. Speaker, I get a charge out of the old-line parties in this House when they talk about the power of the trade unions. I ask, do the trade unions have any control over the investment policies of the multinational corporations of this country? Do they have any control over the fiscal and monetary policies implemented by this government? Who decides the deployment of the Canadian work force and equipment in this country? Do the workers decide that?

Mr. Nystrom: No.

Mr. Rodriguez: Who sets the productivity levels in this country? Does the trade union movement participate in productivity levels? Whose decisions were responsible for the fact that Canadian plant capacity is operating at only 84 per cent? Whose decisions are these? Who is behind the removal of Canadian capital? Is the trade union movement responsible for Canadian capital going out of this country to be invested in the quick-buck areas of the world? Are the workers responsible for an Income Tax Act which institutionalizes maldistribution of income?

Mr. Nystrom: No.

Mr. Rodriguez: Who is responsible in this country for the redistribution of wealth? I ask, Mr. Speaker, is it the trade union movement? Of course not. These questions bring me to another hilarious aspect of the throne speech which deals with employer-employee relations; in other words, industrial democracy. Here is what the throne speech says:

It is also intended to encourage greater participation by plant workers in decisions affecting their working conditions.

Mr. Speaker, have we forgotten the one department of this government which has direct responsibility for large numbers of workers, the Post Office? Have we forgotten the fight that the Canadian postal workers had to get a technological change clause put into their contract, and the six-week period they were on strike, which caused great hardship to the Canadian people, in an effort to get this government to recognize the right of the workers? We had that great friend of labour, the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) who is now going off to save the Quebec Liberals. It took them six weeks of strike to get the technological change implemented. Then, after having the technological change implemented, the government abused it. The Post Office Department, directly run by the minister, turned around and abused section 29 of the collective agreement time and time again, and implemented technological change in Vancouver, St. John's and northern Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, these are not my words; it is clearly documented by E. B. Jolliffe, deputy chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board, in a written decision he handed down on July 28, 1976. He castigated this government for its abuse of article 29 of the collective agreement. He said the government has not lived up to its responsibility to implement that section of the agreement. This is the government that talks about industrial democracy. They have awful gall over there. Shame! When we in this party talk about industrial democracy, we are talking about participation by workers at the plant level in every decision affecting the welfare of employees. The workers must have a say; the workers must have equal control over investment decisions and over the deployment of resources and the international behaviour of the corporations.

An hon. Member: Equal with whom?

Mr. Rodriguez: Equal with the corporate boardroom, which you know about. We have always assumed that these Liberals supported the free enterprise system. We heard it today from the mouth of the big editor in chief of the Ottawa Citizen, who said it is like a football game: they fight on the field, but when they are in the club, boy, they can make decisions to make things work. We had suspected it, but now they are telling us.

The workers must participate meaningfully in every way. They must be an integral part of the corporation, and as such they should share responsibility for the destiny of the corporation. I do not mean the kind of industrial democracy which the hon. member for Verdun outlined to the postal couriers in Toronto in a speech, with his offer to workers to participate, and at lunch time he would have Muzak piped in and pool tables and a sauna provided so the workers would be happy. That is the way to treat cows; it is not the way to treat human beings who are intelligent and sensitive and who have potential.

This government does not know anything about that. The present corporate concept of a responsible worker is one who punches in at nine and punches out at five. He punches out "X" number of units, does what he is told without question is never sick, and minds his own business. Incidentally, he does not go to the bathroom, either. I suggest that we are faced with a work force that has a more inspired self-image and is increasingly demanding an active role in the workplace. Workers are better educated now and have quickly become well versed in industrial relations.

If there is to be industrial peace in Canada, then the trade union movement will have to be accommodated in a meaningful way by the corporate sector. This government has a leadership role to play in making sure that comes about. They must not let the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) dilly-dally and shilly-shally and sit on the fence on this issue. He cannot say that this is the responsibility of management, while management says it is the government's responsibility. That is the game they have been playing all along. The time has come for this government to be unmasked; they cannot hide behind that approach any longer.

Let me say a few words, Mr. Speaker, with respect to the recent demonstration by labour against the government's so-called wage and price controls program. Let us not forget that the Conservatives proposed such a program in 1974 and the Liberal Party of Canada ran their election opposing it. As a matter of fact, I happen to have one of the campaign leaflets of the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Faulkner), who has just been demoted from Secretary of State to Minister of Science and Technology. I want to read from it. On the inside is a picture of the hon. member, minus his beard, and headlined beside it, "Wage and price controls . . . What's wrong with them". The text reads:

> Wage and price controls are an administrative monster—once born it grows like a cancer and is impossible to stop.
> Wage and price controls cause shortages.
>
> Wage and price controls misguide the public. They draw attention away from those factors which do affect inflation—productivity, supply and demand, rising importations, tax rates, energy costs, etc.

Finally, at the bottom, in large block letters:

> Think about it? Avoid wage and price controls! Vote Liberal. Vote Faulkner.

Right across this country, from Sudbury all the way to Vancouver and all the way to the east, Liberals put out material such as this. In other words, this government deceived the working people of Canada, they lied to the electorate. In a free society such as ours the government must be held accountable for their deceit. To keep their freedom it was absolutely incumbent on Canadians to protest last Thursday by the most serious, non-violent means possible. I supported that protest, and suggest to those who talk about broken contracts and illegalities that they ought to consider seriously that it is in the face of a sheepish citizenry that despotism breeds and thrives, that when a government lies to its citizens it has broken faith with them and it ought not to expect anything less than the most vigorous response.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in the debate on the Speech from the Throne outlining the federal government's legislative program for the second session of the thirtieth parliament of Canada, I should like to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne for their very thoughtful and constructive contribution to this debate.

I also wish to congratulate you, sir, on your appointment and also to express my congratulations to the newly appointed ministers, parliamentary secretaries and other officers on their appointments. I offer them my co-operation and wish them success in carrying out their duties for the greater good of Canadians in all parts of Canada.

I truly believe that the present session of parliament is shaping up into the most important and, indeed, most crucial session of our parliamentary career. At least, I believe it is so in my case since I was first elected to the House in 1957. At this moment in our history, each and every one of us should avoid intemperate words and shallow remarks, and instead offer our sincere and best advice to the government which is challenged today by serious economic and social problems threatening the survival of our country. We should be positive at all times in our response to the government's comprehensive program which was designed to strengthen national unity and improve the quality of life for all Canadians, to build a harmonious society and a united country which will better fulfil the needs and aspirations of our people.

Along with many members of the House, I welcome in particular those initiatives announced in the Speech from the Throne which are evidence of the federal government's determination to give enlightened leadership, strong government and unwavering confidence to the Canadian people who are impatiently awaiting our best efforts in these difficult times. The Canadian people today want to be fully and clearly informed about the future. This is, therefore, not the time for half-measures, hesitation or petty politics. Already there has been too much rhetoric and hot air in this House and outside of it on many national issues. It is time we dealt with the big problems, especially those of inflation and the high rate of unemployment.

In dealing with inflation, the government found it necessary in October of 1975 to introduce a temporary program of direct control of incomes and prices. During the past year, most Canadians have co-operated with the government to restrain their demands on the economy, and as a result the inflation psychosis which gripped many Canadians has subsided.

● (1530)

I am also very happy that the provincial governments signed an agreement with the federal government and joined us in this national effort to control the dread disease of inflation. That is why today we are relieved to learn that the cost of living or the consumer price index, rose at a significantly lower rate during the past year than the year before. The true fact is that the consumer price index rose at the rate of 10.6 per cent in October, 1975, and last month it had dropped to 6.5 per cent. This has benefited everyone in Canada, particularly those on low incomes. The fact is that the increase in the cost living is declining and that Canadian workers, under the anti-inflation guidelines, have been allowed increases in income greater than the increase in the cost of living.

This real gain in income of approximately 4 per cent over the last year has also increased our purchasing power. The anti-inflation program is working and that is why, as we enter the second year of the program, Canadians can expect a further reduction in the rate of inflation. I agree with those Canadians who advocate the removal of controls sometime in 1977, however, because the main advantages of the program are being achieved and it is rough justice which I do not believe can be tolerated too long. We, therefore, welcome the discussion and studies undertaken to lay the groundwork for the removal of controls without the renewal of inflation. Such objectives will be more easily achieved by the government's announcement to limit the rate of growth in government spending. The Bank of Canada's decision to reduce the rate of money supply will also help to contain inflation.

I believe that in these days public sector employer-employee relations should be regarded as an essential element in fighting inflation. Along with improved labour-management relations in the private sector, and measures to increase productivity, the post-controls strategy should study the effect of high interest rates on the consumer as well as on business expansion. I believe that the present high interest rates on loans for business expansion, especially the high interest rates on first and second mortgages, are a deterrent to an increase in the economy, and add to inflation.

I receive many representations from the people in Parkdale, Mr. Speaker, and I believe that other members of the House receive similar representations, to the effect that the money supply policies in Canada must be reviewed. The current high interest rates of 3 per cent to 4 percentage points more than in the United States are costly; they prohibit business expansion and in many cases reduce the ability of Canadians to buy their own homes. High interest rates for first and second mortgages definitely contribute to the difficulty of acquiring a house, especially for a workingman who wishes his family to live quietly and peacefully rather than be closed in a high-rise apartment building.

At the same time, agencies like the government's foreign investment review agency should extend their activities to not only preserve but also produce more jobs for Canadians. In the final analysis, the responsibility for decisions about the right kind of strategy for the post-controls period will rest on the shoulders of the government and parliament, which will be asked to approve the new programs. In this process, however, all sectors of the Canadian economy should be consulted.

In this process of consultation we are happy to learn that labour will not be forgotten. The Speech from the Throne announced measures to improve labour-management relations in Canada. I believe there is complete agreement that improvements in the collective bargaining system are urgently needed to avoid so many costly strikes, loss of productivity and increased social unrest. We, therefore, welcome the initiatives of our government to establish a collective bargaining centre and encourage greater participation by plant workers in decisions affecting their working conditions, upgrading of skills and job safety, with security and adequate pensions.

In particular, I enthusiastically approve the federal government's decision to establish an industrial safety and health centre to assist both companies and workers to identify and remove hazards. I hope that all provincial governments will follow the leadership of the federal government and to do their share in their respective fields of responsibility.

Industrialization and swiftly increasing technology, with its resultant new products, are radically altering the environment and exposing man to growing amounts of harmful pollutants and dangerous products. Today we are faced with the great problem of environmental diseases which were unknown 30 years ago. Among these environmental diseases we include cancer caused by various chemicals and substances such as asbestos, vinyl chloride and even chlorinated water when combined with certain pollutants. Other environmental diseases include birth defects, mercury poisoning, respiratory disorders, and deafness. The proposed industrial safety and health centre should be able to identify health hazards quickly and recommend changes and strict enforcement of regulations, or help establish new regulations and prevent new toxic substances from entering the environment by adequate testing and screening out dangerous chemical compounds before they are used in products or manufacturing processes.

I believe that the federal government should give serious consideration to special toxic substances' regulations, making it the responsibility of manufacturers to prove that all their products are safe before they are put on the market. This national industrial safety and health centre should also deal without delay with industrial noise which is causing occupational hearing loss, now the third most common industrial disease in Ontario. Mr. Speaker, deafness is a silent, invisible, painless epidemic which today afflicts more Canadians than are sick from cancer, venereal disease, blindness and multiple sclerosis put together.

As a physician, I greet with satisfaction the initiative of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) to tackle the problem of alcohol abuse which is costing our economy about $1 million every day but is, above all, causing untold harm to personal and family life and contributing to 3,000 deaths in road accidents. It is costing the country $360 million every year in health and hospital expenses. Alcoholic cirrhosis of the liver, a complication of alcoholism and a leading cause of death among heavy drinkers, has become the fastest rising killer in the over-25 age group in Canada, thus putting this disease ahead of lung cancer and suicide.

I am disappointed, however, that no substantial effort has been made to fight the ravages of heart disease and arteriosclerotic complications, the leading cause of morbidity and mortality in Canada, which has reached epidemic proportions. I urge the Minister of National Health and Welfare to organize a concerted campaign to fight this crippling disease.

The bulk of representations made in my constituency office consists of representations for adequate housing at affordable prices. Adequate accommodation at affordable prices is necessary to a stable society. The ownership of a home for his wife and children is the goal of the workingman, or of most workingmen. He would sooner own a home than be squeezed into a tight and crowded apartment building. It is, therefore, particularly important to provide this much needed shelter at a reasonable price. Unfortunately, the relatively cheap mortgage money under the federal government's Assisted Home Ownership Plan is only available to those whose monthly payments are not more than 25 per cent of their total income. This means that because of the great increase in the price of houses, less than 30 per cent of Ontario families in 1974 were eligible for this program. Therefore, other programs should be devised to meet the needs of the majority of our population.

I believe present mortgage interest rates of 12 per cent are too high, and the required down payment is beyond the capacity of many people. Surely, more could be done, indeed must be done, in a country as rich as Canada to reach the desirable social goal of home ownership. Surely, government at various levels could help eliminate some of the barriers to home ownership, such as the high price of land. We need less red tape in the approval of developments and provision of serviced land, a simplified and unified building code, lower charges for registration, reduced costs for developers, builders and buyers and, especially, mortgage rates at reasonable levels. In a just society we should strive to provide a decent house at a reasonable cost for the workingman.

We also welcome the federal government's new campaign to assist small business by appointing a special minister of state to develop better programs for this important sector of our economy. The proposed assistance in reducing paper work, providing easier and larger loans and more consulting services, will strengthen the position of small business and provide more jobs and greater economic growth. Moreover, as Canadian subsidiaries of large foreign corporations have great advantages over their Canadian competitors, some tax advantages or incentives should be forthcoming to Canadian-controlled companies.

Many Canadians are impatiently awaiting either a new or a thoroughly revised Immigration Act. Modern Canada is a country of immigrants or descendants of immigrants, shared with Canadian Indians and the Inuit people. Therefore a just, sound and farsighted immigration policy, administered under a new Immigration Act, would contribute immensely to greater national development, family unity and the cultural enrichment of our country.

No Speech from the Throne includes all the proposed legislation the government intends to bring before parliament. I therefore urge the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) to reintroduce the legislation knows as Bill C-83 in the previous session, an act for the better protection of Canadian society against perpetrators of violent crime. Many members considered this legislation a necessary precondition to the legislation amending the Criminal Code with respect to murder.

[Mr. Haidasz.]

In view of the make-up and nature of the population of my constituency, Parkdale, I am greatly interested in the proposed legislation on human rights. The purpose of this legislation is to prohibit discrimination on the grounds of race, colour, national or ethnic origin, religion, age, sex, marital status or physical handicap.

Mr. Friesen: Or party affiliation.

Mr. Haidasz: In particular, the human rights bill will establish the principle of equal compensation for work of equal value performed by persons of either sex. It will also establish a citizen's statutory right to gain greater access to personal records in federal information files and to correct that information when it is in error.

I urge the Minister of Justice to review the bill he brought forward in the last parliament. I urge him especially to make a study of the unfair sections and bad effects of Quebec's official language act, often referred to as Bill 22. Along with many Canadians, I am not in accord with some of the principles embodied in the act, in particular the one restricting the freedom of parents to choose the language of education for their children. It is contrary to the letter of the Canadian charter of human rights which our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), when he was Minister of Justice, presented to a federal-provincial constitutional conference in January, 1968. I wish to draw the attention of hon. members to that charter, especially page 27. As for education it speaks of > —guaranteeing the right of the individual to education in institutions using as a medium of instruction the official language of his choice.

Bill 22 also appears to go against the spirit of international declarations and covenants on human rights which Canada has ratified.

I welcome the Prime Minister's commitment, as set out in the Speech from the Throne, that grievances from public servants through the Commissioner of Official Languages will continue to be reviewed and that the government will ensure maximum fairness and effectiveness in the implementation of the official languages policy, especially in finding a better way of spending taxpayers' money, by introducing bilingualism in our schools. I am sure we all agree that the great majority of Canadians are dedicated to the strengthening of bonds between Canadians speaking our two official languages and those belonging to our many different cultures. I firmly believe that multi-culturalism can only thrive within the framework and harmonious atmosphere of official bilingualism.

We must not allow fear, prejudice, misinformation or discrimination to dominate our reason and passion. We must, rather, display tolerance and understanding; otherwise all Canadians would lose, and all Canada would be lost, this great country, the envy of the world, which our predecessors built up and left to us in trust—a country which it is our moral duty to pass on to future generations, strong and united.

Mr. Sinclair Stevent (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz), I could not help but observe what is happening in this House as we watch a government disintegrate. We now find that there are some 40 representatives who have been in or are in the cabinet. Ten hon. members opposite are ex-cabinet ministers. We have 29 ministers in what I call the outer cabinet, and one, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in the inner cabinet.

An hon. Member: That is 25 per cent of the Liberal caucus.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Goodale: That was a cheap shot.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, may I continue? I join with others in extending my sincere compliments to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I would also like to compliment my leader for his effective and worthwhile comments last week in this debate. Perhaps I should make no comment about the contribution of the Prime Minister. Why embarrass his followers any further?

• (1550)

I rise today to address this House on matters of great concern to me. I refer to the fragile state of our economy and the continuing deception and duplicity on the part of the government by their omission or commission on issues vitally important to this country. The Prime Minister, in his remarks to this House, devoted considerable time to defending his administration's wage and price controls program. It was difficult for him to claim any victory, however, without twisting the cost of living figures a wee bit. That, I suggest, is exactly what he did. What he did not do, at least to any real extent, was address himself to this nation's worsening position in foreign trade, our rising unemployment and our net real growth.

Let me begin by noting a few conspicuous distortions in the Prime Minister's remarks on the controls program, and briefly mention what the government has failed to tell us about Canada's place in the world markets. Sitting in Canada, unless you travel or wish to invest in a foreign country, it is often difficult to realize that we are literally sinking as a nation as far as our dollar's buying power is concerned in relation to many other nations of the world. Sure, we are very rightfully, disturbed about regional differences in Canada, and I suggest that more and more people agree that such regional differences should be eliminated as far as possible. However, are we really achieving something worth while if we allow the nation in general to sink lower and lower in terms of our real worth and value in relation to other nations?

When this government initially took office, we were proud number two among the world's nations as far as per capita income was concerned; close to being number one, number one being the United States. Where are we today? We are number seven. The Americans have held their position at number one, but under this administration we have sunk to seventh in the world. When we deal with this topic, I draw hon. members' attention to the fact that two years ago the government spoke of the relationship of inflation here at home to international conditions abroad. In that Speech from the Throne in September, 1974, we recall how they painted a picture that somehow we had become tangled up in world conditions, that inflation was an international phenomenon and that somehow we in Canada would have to wait until that phenomenon changed internationally before we could do much about it in this country.

It is very interesting to note, if you read that throne speech, that the government very clearly predicted that international food and commodity prices would fall and return to what they called a normal level. That was the message two years ago. However, rather than take the crest out of the inflation that they anticipated with a controls program that could have been instituted in July, 1974—and, incidentally, as was suggested at that time by my party—this government chose to wait. The government waited a full year before they instituted a controls program. I suggest they instituted it at the wrong time and have delivered an administrative monstrosity in their program.

Strangely enough, we sat in this very chamber and listened to the Prime Minister now attempt to take credit for the fall-off in prices that only two years ago they predicted in their throne speech was going to occur. He takes credit because he is trying desperately to justify the controls program that was instituted in his own caucus and in this House on the people of Canada.

Much has been made in this House and elsewhere of the fact that the annual rate of change in consumer prices fell from 10.6 per cent in October, 1975, to 6.5 per cent in September, 1976. However, almost all this improvement resulted from the decline in food prices. It is the farmer who has taken the brunt of the government's anti-inflation program, yet it is the government that is now attempting to take the credit for any fall-off in prices that we are now experiencing. Let me be specific.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Explain yourself.

Mr. Stevens: I have been asked to explain myself, and I will do exactly that. I ask the hon. member to quieten down and listen to a few figures. The annual rate of increase in food prices decelerated from 12 per cent at the start of the controls program to a negative 15 per cent in September, 1976. That is how the farmer is being hurt by this Trudeau administration. Remember, food prices are only affected in an indirect way by the anti-inflation program. The area of consumer expenditures more directly affected by the controls program, non-food items, has shown only a minor improvement, decelerating from 10.2 per cent in October to only 9.3 per cent in September, 1976. The claim that the consumer price index figures show inflation to be under control is more than just premature; it is sheer nonsense. Clearly, the government is trying to declare victory in the fight against inflation on the basis of faulty statistics.

The government argues that lower agricultural prices have been passed on to the consumer because the profit margins of distributors, processors and retailers are controlled even though food prices at the farm gate are not. Hon. members will recall that in addressing this House, both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) made this point quite clear. I wish to read into the record what the Prime Minister stated on October 13 as reported at page 31 of Hansard:

—what is important to the worker's wife when she goes shopping is that, because of price controls, she has more purchasing power this year than she had in 1975 before controls. Apparently it does not suit the CLC or the NDP, or for that matter the Tories, to tell that to the Canadian worker and to his wife. I wonder why. Perhaps the opposition will tell us why during the course of this debate—

I welcome that invitation by the Prime Minister. The truthful answer is that his figures are dead wrong. They are dead wrong according to the figures of October 12 by the Department of Finance. Before getting to those figures, I want to show what the Minister of Finance stated, as well as indicate that the Prime Minister went on to say that 60 per cent of the cost of food was made up of such items as distribution costs, profits and other related matters. In the same debate, on October 14, the Minister of Finance said the following:

—as a result of the work of the Food Prices Review Board, and what now seems to be forgotten, is that up to 60 per cent of the cost which the consumer pays for his food arises from the costs of transportation, processing and distribution of food products.

That is the figure. Let us remember it. The Prime Minister said it was about 60 per cent. The Minister of Finance was a little more honest. He said "up to 60 per cent". What are the actual facts disclosed by the Minister of Finance in his own paper which he tabled, entitled "Status report, the anti-inflation program and the economy". I refer to the first page, wherein it is stated:

● (1600)

Depending on the item, from 30 per cent to 55 per cent of the price the consumer pays for food is accounted for by transportation, processing and distribution activities which are controlled under the anti-inflation program.

I have never seen such a contradiction, in one week, between a statement made by the Minister of Finance, earlier by the Prime Minister, and then refuted by the very paper which the Minister of Finance had previously submitted to the House. Our consumer price index is made up of many items in different categories, but about 30 per cent relates to food and, as we know, food prices at the farm gate are not controlled. Yet this is the area in which the sharpest decline has taken place. Nowhere has this administration thanked the farmer for allowing prices to fall as a result of market action—by as much as 20 per cent in the case of beef. Nowhere has the administration singled out those who are the chief inflation fighters in Canada, namely, our farmers. Nowhere does the administration give any credit to the marketplace as being the chief ingredient in lowering prices in this country. There is no mention of that truth.

There is no mention of another observation made in the paper to which I have referred. At the present time, a vicious price war is going on among the grocery chains, and any suggestion that they are abiding by the anti-inflation program is not true. In some cases they are running their businesses at sharp losses, which means that food prices are lower than they might otherwise be. But the situation I have described will not last and prices, as far as the food element is concerned, will begin to increase. Let us not allow the administration to say prematurely that somehow controls are having an effect on prices. That has not been demonstrated.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that I prefaced my remarks by commenting on the government's duplicity with regard to issues vital to the well-being of this country. Another example of such duplicity is the flip-flop during the election campaign. You will recall that the Liberal party energetically campaigned against wage-freezing and price controls. They went from riding to riding stating that such a program would be detrimental to the economy. Yet little more than a year later, without a mandate, they brought in the very controls against which they had campaigned.

The Prime Minister stated in his speech that inflation was down to 6.5 per cent. But look at the facts. Even if the administration succeeds in reaching the goal of 4 per cent, what will it have achieved? It will have brought the level of inflation back to where it was in 1971. Isn't it ludicrous to create a problem through irresponsible monetary and fiscal policies and then expect this House and the people of Canada to congratulate the government for returning the nation, as far as inflation in concerned, to the state it was in in 1971 when most of the problem arose? I have already referred to the Prime Minister and to the Minister of Finance, but perhaps in all fairness I should not dwell exclusively on those two—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): "Characters."

Mr. Stevens: However, I should point out, in all fairness to the Prime Minister, that the record seems to deteriorate from the time John Turner took over as minister of finance in January, 1972. When he took over from Edgar Benson, inflation was running at 4.9 per cent. When he left, it was 10.6 per cent. During his 44 months in office, the cost of living jumped by 38.5 per cent and the dollar, if one assumes it to be worth 100 cents in January, 1972, was worth only 72 cents when he walked out.

At the time John Turner was given the mantle in January, 1972, there were 544,000 people out of work. When he left, 732,000 were unemployed. In spite of all his huffing and puffing, in spite of all the measures he took to facilitate employment in business, only 69,000 jobs were created in the manufacturing sector from December, 1971 to December, 1975. In 1972 there was a surplus of $700 million in our current account balance. In 1975 there was a deficit of almost $5 billion. In the aggregate, since John Turner took over, the nation has had a current account deficit every year. Including the projections for 1976—a deficit estimated at $4.5 billion—our current account balances will have aggregated approximately $11 billion in the red.

To put it another way, last year and this year Canada will have the largest current account deficit of any country in the world. So let us not laugh at Great Britain, or at Italy or at other countries which have deficits until we have taken a good look at ourselves. Consider Britain, for example, a country almost totally lacking in natural resources such as Canada has exploited for so long. Is it not remarkable that we should be running a greater current account deficit than that nation, despite all its troubles?

This is a situation which the administration must take to heart. It is one which must be challenged and reversed. But let me get back to our wonder boy, John Turner. Frankly, the biggest wonder about John Turner is that he was allowed to stay on for as long as he did. When he got the job as minister of finance, real growth in this country amounted to 6.6 per cent. When he left, it was .3 per cent and on a per capita basis it was negative. In terms of real growth, the ground we lost under John Turner as minister of finance now costs this country $5 billion a year, or almost $200 per person. In addition, there are some 200,000 more people out of work as a further consequence.

Consider the record with regard to federal government restraint. During the period in which Turner was minister of finance, spending by the federal government jumped 99.8 per cent. To put it in another way, it took us 105 years to reach a federal spending level of $17,004,400,000. John Turner doubled that figure in 44 months. In the aggregate, Mr. Speaker, under the budgets that he brought into the House, $113 billion of taxpayers' money was spent, or at least borrowed. Is it not sheer hypocrisy that the same John Turner now righteously speaks at various club meetings about excessive government spending?

What did he do about excessive government spending when he was in office and could do something about it? The fact is that he ran. Since the time that he ran, he has not even had the courtesy to tell the House or the people of Canada why he ran. At least the most recent ex-minister, the former minister of national defence, has attempted to explain to the Canadian public the reason for his defection from the cabinet. Not so the former minister of finance. We thought that Edgar Benson was bad, Mr. Speaker. In fact, many things about Benson appeared to be undesirable so far as his handling of the finance portfolio was concerned. But let me assure the House that compared with John Turner's spending habits, Benson was a Scrooge.

However, there is some hope, Mr. Speaker. We now have a new Minister of Finance, a man who we all know hopes to be prime minister. In fact, I understand that is the main reason he took the job of Minister of Finance. He is prime minister-in-waiting, if you like. Meanwhile, we in the nation have to wait for some economic policy. Perhaps it is too early to judge the record of the Minister of Finance, though to date that record seems to be one of lurching from indecision to indecision. As we know, the Minister of Finance has tabled a working paper entitled "The Way Ahead", obviously looking for a program for the post-controls period.

As an old Osgoode Hall classmate of the minister, may I suggest that it is not necessarily innovation that is needed to solve our problems, but primarily a policy that gets back to some sound fundamentals, to some basics in terms of fiscal and monetary matters. If the minister does not want to take Conservative precedents, let him look at the government of Louis St. Laurent and the then finance minister, Walter Harris. I say that because it is of interest to note that in the year 1955, the year the minister of finance and I graduated from Osgoode Hall, inflation in this country was one-tenth of 1 per cent, real growth was 10 per cent and unemployment was 4.4 per cent.

In the interval, the figures for real growth and inflation have just about been reversed. We have ended up with 10 per cent inflation, rather than 10 per cent real growth; we are in a position where we had virtually no real growth in the economy last year. I can only suggest to the Minister of Finance that he may find that the government of Louis St. Laurent was doing something right, and what I suggest they were doing right was that they were following responsible fiscal and monetary policies.

I notice in the throne speech that the government seems to have discovered the marketplace. The government has found that there is such a thing is private initiative. The government has even become alarmed recently at its own level of spending. I welcome this "Johnny-come-lately" approach, though I notice that Canada's greatest problem, that of foreign trade, is virtually ignored in the throne speech, as it was in the speeches of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance.

Frankly, Mr. Speaker, we have been living beyond our means for some time, yet the government has done little to correct the problem. Canada's credit rating around the world has been jeopardized as international bankers have become alarmed at our increasing deficits, our rising foreign debt, our high inflation and lack of productivity in industry. We need, and in fact have needed, this credit, in international terms, to keep afloat. The present administration has been balancing its international accounts by adjusting our monetary system so that the provinces, municipalities and corporate concerns in this country have become big borrowers in international markets.

For example, last year it is estimated that Canadian borrowers took down one-quarter of the total amount borrowed internationally by all the countries in the world combined. Imagine, Mr. Speaker, a country with the resources we have in Canada having to beg and borrow all over the world to cover our huge trade deficit! In this connection, I think the House would be interested in a speech made only last week by Dr. Peter Campbell, vice-president and director of Wood Gundy Limited. He made a speech in Montreal pointing out the magnitude of our foreign borrowing in international markets. He also pointed out that this foreign borrowing was encouraged by some of the moves made by the former minister of finance, John Turner, whom we all recall withdrew the withholding tax with respect to provincial borrowings and corporate borrowings offshore.

The fact is that if you review the figures put forth by Dr. Campbell, you discover that in the first nine months of this year the total amount of foreign borrowing by Canada was almost $7 billion. That is the amount that the corporate, municipal and provincial sectors have borrowed offshore or in the United States, which means that almost 50 per cent of the total debt incurred by those various sectors was actually borrowed from outside Canada. The reason I mention that is that in 1972 the total financing at the federal, provincial, municipal and corporate levels was only $6.6 billion. In short, in the first nine months of 1976 we have borrowed more outside this country than the total borrowing at all levels of government in Canada in 1972. Incidentally, in 1972 only 21 per cent of that amount—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to inform the hon. gentleman that his time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. There is no unanimous consent.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, first let me congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply on their very fine efforts. I am pleased to see the tone of optimism and confidence that marks the Speech from the Throne that has opened this second session of the thirtieth parliament. It reflects, in my view, more of the underlying reality of Canada and its future prospects—in spite of the problems it obviously continues to have—than the tone of pessimism about our future that marked the Prime Minister's interviews at the end of last December and his more recent speech to the Liberal party caucus conference in Toronto.

At the end of 1975 the Prime Minister spoke about the failings of the market system. Now the Speech from the Throne and the government's working paper places Canada's future primarily in the hands of the same market system. They commit the government, not to replace it but to make it work better, with pledges of due attention all the same to social costs and concerns. The Prime Minister's speech in Toronto a few weeks ago had in it a note of pessimism and doubt about the future of the Liberal party, as well as the more important issue of the very future of Canada.

However, none of this kind of concern and pessimism is at all evident in the Speech from the Throne, which is as much a statement for which the Prime Minister and his government take responsibility as any speech they may make directly in their own names. For example, the Speech from the Throne says that "Canada has better reasons for confidence and optimism than has virtually any other nation; that the fundamental reality that will guide our deliberations is that Canada is entering upon a decade of opportunity".

As Dickens wrote in "The Tale of Two Cities" about another turbulent period of history over 200 years ago, "It was the best of times, it was the worst of times". Many would say the same thing about our own times. However, they are likely neither the best nor the worst. The reality is likely somewhere in between. Perhaps that is why the government in the throne speech opts for the middle road in its policy direction. If such a term is reassuring to many, at the same time it can raise questions as to exactly what it means in terms of government leadership and action.

If the tone of the throne speech is one of relative optimism, confidence and serenity, I think there could be more in the speech in the way of words of clear and passionate commitment by the government to the ideals and objectives it wants to achieve or wants to see Canadians strive toward. If there was a major threat to Canadian unity, one as great as any since the conscription crisis, as had been earlier suggested by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), one could have expected the speech to have more of a tone of absolute commitment to preserving Canada as a united country from sea to sea.

Speaking of commitment, I wish the throne speech had expressed as strong a commitment to greatly reducing unemployment as the one it expressed to continuing the fight against inflation. We have had some significant progress in the past 12 months in the fight against inflation, but we have seen little progress in the fight against unemployment which has remained stuck at the 7 per cent level for all too many months.

The throne speech speaks of the government's desire to create new, year-round direct employment programs. This is welcomed, but I seem to recall a similar announcement earlier this year when it had to answer those who said there would be harmful effects for hundreds of thousands of Canadians when the cutbacks of eligibility for unemployment insurance and other limitations it proposed in the last budget went into force, especially in the less developed regions of the country.

I hope the direct unemployment programs proposed in the throne speech will be soon set up and will be successful. However, unless the government departs from the objectives stated in the speech, of much less government intervention and a restriction on future growth of government, one cannot expect such direct employment programs to create enough jobs to make a real dent in current unemployment figures. These programs will be useful but they cannot be a substitute for satisfying jobs in the private sector, producing goods and services which add to our exports and generally add to our economic wealth and gross national product.

There must be more attention shown by the government to getting the economy moving than the government appears as yet ready to do from the words of the throne speech. The time has come for action to deal with our high interest rates, the high value of our Canadian dollar which makes our exports more expensive in world markets than those of our competitors, as well as action on certain specific kinds of tax cuts and measures to improve productivity.

The Speech from the Throne and the government's working paper point to the contribution the market system has made to our country's development until now and which it can make to its future development. Both documents explain why the government has decided to take what it describes as a middle road between greater government intervention and relying primarily on the private sector. However, these documents convey the message that it will in fact be relying more than ever on the market system and private enterprise as a means of allocating resources and of enabling Canadians to achieve their personal objectives of growth and well-being.

The throne speech talks about examining government programs to see which ones might be handled by the private sector. I believe all government activities and programs should be reviewed on a continuing basis to ensure they meet current needs and that their costs are in line with their benefits. However, we should not forget that the government has become involved in providing many kinds of services because of the unwillingness or inability of the private sector to provide them at all or to provide them at a cost and with a degree of access satisfactory to Canadians generally.

The government must make sure that it takes no decision to turn any of its current activities or programs over to private enterprise without making certain that the quality of the service and its availability to Canadians will not suffer. It is argued by some that the handling of activities by the private sector that are now carried on by government will enable better indentification and distribution of the economic costs. However, Mr. Speaker, there are social costs as well as economic costs involved here.

For example, market forces do not, and cannot, do a satisfactory job of ensuring product safety or preventing products from being sold that cause injury or death. Consumer protection legislation in the area of food and product safety has a cost, but there is also the often greater cost to the individual and his family and to the entire community arising from harm caused by unsafe products. There is also the matter of defining product quality.

Economic costs cannot be the only factor to be taken into account in assessing the impact and desirability of government regulations and programs. There are considerations of health, safety and social justice to be borne in mind. The benefits of the regulations and programs may well be found to outweigh their costs when all of these aspects are taken into account.

Over a year ago the government made promises similar to those made in the throne speech to the effect that there would be less government intervention and a review of government activities to see which ones could be reduced or turned over to the private sector, if not eliminated completely. These promises were a major component of what the government said was to be a comprehensive "attack on inflation", according to the white paper with which it launched the controls program. But since then on several occasions I have asked how that review promised in the white paper was to be carried out, by what department and also what minister would be in charge of this effort. There have been no answers or any indication that the work has even been started.

Before one can become too enthusiastic about the possible useful results of most recent proposals which are similar to those in the anti-inflation white paper of a year ago we should, I think, have some answers as to how they are to be carried out, by whom and over what period.

There are a number of topics which quite properly are specifically mentioned in the Speech from the Throne; bilingualism, the fight against inflation, human rights legislation, and so on. However, one has to say that the speech is also notable for what is not specifically mentioned in it. There appears to be little directly stated in it for the Canadian consumer. In fact, I do not think the word "consumer" is to be found anywhere in the speech. It can be argued that the Canadian consumer will benefit from a successful fight against inflation, and that the second stage of the competition policy mentioned in the speech will have important though indirect benefits for the consumer, at least over a period of time.

As I have said, while there is direct specific reference to programs, for example for business and labour, there is no equivalent specific mention of programs for the consumer. The current throne speech does not mention a "comprehensive overhaul of consumer credit legislation" as did the October, 1974, speech, even though the press reported that late last year the then minister of consumer and corporate affairs was ready to introduce a bill to achieve this. That bill has not yet had first reading, even though the proposal for it was mentioned publicly before the 1974 election and was part of the election platform itself. The present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Abbott) has made reference to it in a recent speech outside the House.

It is, therefore, puzzling that the government as a whole, the cabinet, has not seen fit to make specific reference to this legislation in this throne speech. It is also puzzling that the speech makes no mention of a "total revision of bankruptcy law" and "improved safety of consumer electrical products", which were found in the speech of October, 1974. Both of these items were also part of the 1974 election platform.

The bankruptcy bill, with its important provisions giving new and higher priority for wages owed to workers in case of bankruptcy of their employers, at least received first reading in the last session and some study during that period by the Senate. This throne speech, however, gives no hint as to the government's intention about this bill for the current session. Also, improved safety of consumer electrical products did not surface publicly, at least anywhere during the last session.

The new throne speech does promise stage two of the new competition policy which would thereby complete the process of reform of our competition law which I began as minister before the 1974 election with the stage one bill, a bill that became law in January of this year. I think it should be of concern to consumers that nothing is said about the stage two bill finally making class action rights available for consumers and for small businessmen as well.

These rights are important to consumers who are harmed by uncompetitive or unscrupulous business activity contrary to our combines legislation. The right to sue through class or representative action should have been adopted as part of the first stage legislation. This had been my own announced intention. The government should commit itself now to putting it into the second stage bill, along with a general trade practices jurisdiction. The latter step is needed to help stop the building up of conflicting and overlapping provincial trade practice legislation, which is coming to mean differing standards of protection against the same kinds of unscrupulous business practices for consumers, depending on where they live. Overlapping and conflicting provincial legislation also means harmful and unnecessary uncertainty for business as to the rules it must follow. In any event, the government should make a commitment to introduce the stage two legislation as soon as possible.

A major concern of both Canadian consumers and producers, food policy, is almost ignored in the throne speech. It is skipped over in a couple of brief and opaque sentences to this effect:

> As a further element of the government's food policy, measures will be introduced to make more farm-stored crops eligible for advance payments. The government will also work with the provinces and farm organizations to strengthen the structure and productivity of Canadian agriculture.

There is nothing in the speech about developing a comprehensive food policy covering all elements of the food chain from producer to consumer. Yet there have been growing expressions of concern by Canadians generally about the seeming confusion and conflict in the government's present approach to food policy. There is the awareness of the world's need for food and the fact that Canada is one of the few countries with the potential and capability to be an exporter of food. There were hints before the throne speech from government spokesmen and, in fact, more than hints, that food policy was to be a major thrust by the government in the new session. It is, therefore, surprising and disappointing that so little is said about this in the throne speech we are debating now.

The speech conveys the impression that there already exists a government food policy which is comprehensible, comprehensive, and working well. That there is not yet this kind of policy is demonstrated if one looks only at the evidence provided earlier by the egg marketing situation and more recently by the industrial milk situation. Surely the time has come for the government to commit itself to a parliamentary review of its existing food policy. More important, surely the time has come for the government to work out and present proposals for a comprehensive national food policy covering all elements of the food system from producer to consumer. This is something that deserved specific reference as a government commitment as much as any of the other subjects mentioned in the throne speech.

The all too brief reference to food and agriculture raises as many questions as it answers. Increased productivity is a commendable objective, but in the light of the surpluses we have had, first in egg production and at least until recently in dairy production, the problem in our agriculture is certainly not one of surplus. Instead, it is one of how to find ways that meet the needs of the world and Canadians for an adequate supply of reasonably priced nutritious food.

[Mr. Gray.]

Efforts to improve productivity in secondary manufacturing deserved mention in the speech no less than that given to productivity in agriculture. A specific statement of a thrust in this direction should have been in the throne speech in light of the justifiable concern both of the government and Canadians generally during the past year about declining productivity and, therefore, our competitiveness in world markets.

But to return to agricultural policy, surely the time has come to examine some of the basic assumptions of one of the key elements of the food policies we have, that is to say, the extention of supply management to more and more basic commodities. Many began, as I did, by being favourably impressed by the concept and supportive, as I continue to be, of what its proponents held out to be its basic objectives—fair income for producers and a steady supply for consumers at fair prices. But the government's efforts in supply management to date, especially in dairy products, have satisfied neither producers nor consumers. One must ask, after observing the developments over the past year or two in that industry, whether the supply of some of these kinds of products is capable of being managed at all, at least in the manner that has been pursued by the government.

At the very least, if there is to be a workable system of supply management, it requires a capacity for forecasting, foresight, planning and managerial competence that has not yet been demonstrated to a degree sufficient to justify having the government continue to base its efforts mainly on the present kind of programs. Also, a workable system of supply management must provide the consumer with the right to participate in it, not just in an isolated, minority way but as someone involved in the real decision-making of a process that affects the price the consumer has to pay for the commodity covered. This kind of consumer involvement has not yet been adequately established.

Developments in the industrial milk situation show that in recent months the government's program for it has brought increasing prices for consumers and reduced income for producers. Also, instead of even providing stable production it has created, first, an almost unmanageable surplus, and within less than a year the prospects of a shortage, of a lack of sufficient product, to meet consumer demand. The government's supply-management efforts have created instability of supply rather than the stability its proponents have promised. If the process of supply-management is to continue and to be extended, the government must demonstrate to Canadians generally the ability of the supply management concept to work fairly and efficiently in the interest of both consumers and producers.

Canadians as consumers and as workers also want to be reassured that the anti-inflation program is operating equally fairly and effectively on the price side as the wage side. No amount of talking about the decline in the consumer price index will help persuade the Canadian consumer and the Canadian worker that the anti-inflation program is both effective and fair unless the Anti-Inflation Board also begins giving publicity to its decisions on prices equal to the publicity it gives to its decisions on wages.

The board, by stating its decisions on the prices in the form of informal advice and guidance rather than formal rulings, has been able to say that the confidentiality provisions of the act prevent it from telling consumers what it has accomplished by way of specific price rollbacks. But in my view nothing in the act stops it from stating as a formal ruling, which is something the act does allow to be published, its agreement to the compliance plans it accepts from a company found to have excess revenue—rulings which set out the price rollbacks and the names of the products in question. The board apparently is now taking the position that the act does allow it to release the names of companies found to have excess revenue, but has not yet started doing this.

The same authority, in my view, also allows the release of the names of the products in question. Consumers have a right to know the names of the products involved so they can take advantage of the price rollbacks. This is particularly so if they paid too much for these or other products of that company in the first place, thereby enabling it to build up the excess revenue in question. Arguments that to disclose this information would harm the competitive position of companies are largely nonsense. If the information on price rollbacks is made public by the board at the same point in time that the company advises its customers of the price changes and thereby puts them in effect, that company will not be harmed competitively. And even if a competitor finds out beforehand about the price cut and reduces its own price to match it, well, so what? Surely the objective of the anti-inflation program is to encourage wider and wider general reductions in price levels.

In any event, the public interest and the need to confirm to the public the fairness and credibility of the anti-inflation program must be an overriding consideration. Also, since the compliance plans which the board works out with manufacturers and wholesalers do not cover the ultimate retailer of the product for which price cuts are agreed to, the retailer is not compelled to pass them on. Also, the program does not apply in a mandatory way to firms with less than 500 employees. So at present the only way to help make sure that the price reductions in question are passed on to the consumer is for the consumer to know about them and, therefore, be able to demand the reduction from their retailers; in other words, to set competitive pressures in motion to make up for the gaps I have mentioned in the application of the AIB's compliance plan.

The government says in the throne speech that it wants to encourage the market system to operate actively and to operate better. For this system to operate properly, information about products and their prices must be widely available to consumers. One way for the government to show its sincerity about what it says about its new reliance on the market system is for it to compel the Anti-Inflation Board, by amendments to the law if necessary, to disclose to consumers the names of products for which the Board orders rollbacks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: Concern has, I think, justifiably been expressed about the approach of the administrator of the Anti-Inflation Act to his jurisdiction. An argument can be made that a worth-while amendment to the law is one which says the administrator cannot reduce rulings on wages appealed to him below the level set by the Anti-Inflation Board. However, whatever flaws there might be in the administrator's present jurisdiction, at least it provides a mechanism through which someone can review some of the rulings on wages made by the Anti-Inflation Board and can cut them back if he thinks they are too high. Where is a similar mechanism for prices? There is nothing available along the same lines for reviewing the board's decisions or private advice on prices.

I think there could be practical ways worked out for having a form of appeal from the board's decisions on prices, especially if all its advice to companies has to be cast in the form of rulings which can be published. There are ways of doing this, such as giving groups like the Consumers' Associations or the Canadian Labour Congress the capability to make appeals, or setting up an office of consumer ombudsman.

The recent Gallup polls indicate a paradox, such that along with a significant reduction in the cost of living there has been a growing lack of support for the anti-inflation program. It is true that the proportion of the total labour force that took part in the so-called day of protest was small—but a million Canadians were involved and that is still a lot of people. Most of the labour force may well have, quite correctly, decided to respect their contracts of employment and also that taking part in the protest was not the best way to get the government and parliament to change the anti-inflation law. However, this does not mean that they are all fully satisfied with the way they see the anti-inflation program being administered. Many of those who stayed at work may be ready to express their concern about it at the ballot-box at the first opportunity, unless in the meantime they are convinced that the program is operating fairly and evenhandedly on both wages and prices.

The government has not set out in the speech, or so far in the debate, exactly how it intends to carry out a process of consultation on new strategies for the post-controls society. However, it appears to me from the words of the speech that, unfortunately, while the government intends parliament to have a role in the process, it does not intend that role to be the central one. Surely parliament, and especially the House of Commons, must be the focal point of the consultation process on strategies and policies for the post-controls period, and I believe the best way for parliament to provide that focal point is through a special parliamentary committee on national goals. You will recall that I proposed such a committee in speeches, first in North Bay and later in this House last March. I suppose it is somewhat flattering that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has taken up this proposal.

However, I hope that his support for it has not weakened the government's ability to see its merits and to agree to put it into effect. Such a committee could provide a public forum for the presentation and discussion of points of view of both regional groups and interest groups. It could be a forum of a kind not available in any other way. I hope the government will confirm its confidence in the parliamentary process by agreeing to the creation of such a committee in the near future.

This government, as is the case for every federal government, has an overriding obligation to strengthen and preserve national unity. This means efforts in the economic and social sphere. It also means confirming the ability of Canadians to deal with it in either of our two official languages. I believe in the importance and value of this policy. My belief in it was formed long before I entered the House of Commons and long before it was recognized and adopted by parliament as the official policy of the country. In my view, there is a quiet and moderate majority of Canadians which already believes—or at least which can be persuaded to agree—that the kind of Canada worth preserving is one that recognizes having both French and English as official languages as one of its greatest resources. It is a resource that helps give our country its distinctiveness. It helps our country effectively to present itself and its products to the world. It is important, as well in terms of simple justice so that Canadians, whatever their origin, can use one or the other of these two languages to communicate with their national government and their fellow Canadians.

But at the same time I think this quiet and moderate majority of Canadians expect the government to develop and apply measures to implement this policy which are both fair and reasonable and effective in terms of their costs. Therefore, to call for the application of the official languages policy in ways that are fair, reasonable and cost-effective is not the same thing as questioning the policy itself. I am glad the government has finally recognized this, as is evident from what is said on the subject in the throne speech. Steps along these lines referred to in the throne speech will, in my view, justifiably strengthen support for the federal official languages policy across this country.

I believe that there is much that is encouraging in the throne speech. While I have made some critical comments about it, they are intended to be of a constructive nature. I believe the speech, in general, is worthy of support.

To conclude, let me say that this is a time of concern for those who, like myself, want to see the government continue in office. In this connection, it may be of interest to recall part of what I said when I spoke in the debate on the throne speech which opened this parliament two years ago this month. I will not repeat those words here, but for those who, like myself, want to see the government operate in such a way that it will have the majority support of the Canadian people in the next election, the words I referred to may seem even more relevant today than they were two years ago.

We are at the mid-point of the government's mandate. It is, unfortunately, a point of decline in public support, judging by current Gallup polls and by-election results. To win back that support, the government has chosen what it calls the "middle road". The middle road for a Liberal government must not be just another term for small "c" conservative policies or a "do-nothing" policy. If there is a balancing effort between private initiative and the market system—and community support for individual needs through government effort—it must result in action of a kind that has in the past meant electoral success for Liberals.

To achieve its objectives, the government must use the remaining time at its disposal to show itself to be a government that is truly compassionate and concerned—one that is people-oriented as well as being a government that is effective and efficient. It must be a government that is, in fact and not just in appearance, truly concerned with the individual Canadians and their needs, their hopes and aspirations for a better life. There is yet time, although it is growing shorter, for the government to convince the Canadian people, through its actions, that it deserves the kind of support the Canadian people gave it in 1974.

I, for one, am continuing my efforts, as must all those on this side of the House, to have the government operate in a way that justifies its receiving that kind of support. I believe that the government, on balance, continues to be better than its alternatives. However, the throne speech by itself is only a collection of words indicating potential, indicating intention. Therefore, I say that all of us on this side of the House must confirm our commitment to translating and developing those positive policies indicated in the throne speech itself, and those not mentioned but no less needed, into meaningful action in the interests of all Canadians.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Maurice Harquail for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, may I begin by expressing my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Harquail) and the seconder (Mr. Lachance) of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and also congratulate the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) on his excellent speech. With facts and figures I believe he exploited the government's lack of credibility and its inconsistency in addressing itself to the real and serious problems facing this nation. I also appreciated the remarks of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) who as usual made a vigorous contribution to this very important debate.

I think the remarks of the three previous speakers reflect the concern of most members of this House. Many of us have trouble in believing in the sincerity of this Speech from the Throne and the working paper which set the stage for the post-controls period. If we could place any confidence in the government to do all the things it proposed in the Speech from the Throne, we might have some hope that the nation could be led out of its current social and economic dilemma. In my view, however, this sudden about-face is yet another characteristic example of this government's erratic leadership since it took office in 1968.

The 12 innocuous bills which the government placed before this chamber today for consideration proves that it is either unable or unwilling to transform the platitudes expressed in the Speech from the Throne into reality. This government has waffled and wavered; it has been inconsistent; it has been devious; it has improvised, and it has been less than frank with the Canadian people. One year it leads with its left, and the next year it leads with its right. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has strained the good will and good nature of a vast number of Canadians. He has caused apprehension, concern and uncertainty by his pronouncements of last December, and now we are told the only hope for this country is reliance upon the free enterprise system. Just last December we were told it was not working; it was dead.

That sort of inconsistency is like a fairy tale, and that is unfortunate because running this country is a serious business. Are we really to believe that this government is genuine when it speaks of reasserting the role of the market system in a free enterprise economy, or is that merely a political gesture devised to overcome its current unpopularity? I hope Canadians will not again be hoodwinked and taken in by this ploy. Perhaps the results of last Monday's by-elections are an indication that Canadians will not be sloughed off with pious platitudes.

In my view, Mr. Speaker, the government is not worthy of regaining the kind of support that the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) predicts. I believe it has lost the will, the capacity and the competence to govern. What was dished up to us in the Speech from the Throne and the post-controls document was an ingenuous and slick public relations pitch—perhaps more slick than we have ever witnessed in this country.

This effort to improve the image of the government has taken many forms. The Prime Minister and his cabinet have taken on a new profile of modesty and humility. We should pay attention to the jargon in the document and the way in which it has been distributed. The ministers have all stood in their places and given their respective sales pitches in an effort to merchandise this sudden turnabout.

Even the word "Liberal" is being downplayed during this debate. We have heard so much about the "middle of the road" that we are surprised they have not changed the name of the Liberal party to "the middle of the road party." This government has been swerving from shoulder to shoulder so long that it could be charged with being under the influence. The problem is, we do not know whose influence it is under, whether it is John Kenneth Galbraith, the DM-10, Keith Davey or the spirit of Mackenzie King.

The government has shelved its propensity for bigness and is committed to the philosophy that small is beautiful. It uses clichés such as "balanced growth", "quality of growth", "individual initiative" and is pledged to provide more government information. Mr. Speaker, this is the most secretive government in the history of this country, so it could hardly go any other way. Even the former minister of finance attested to that.

We have a hollow commitment to improve the lot of small business in this country, but most of us who have any experience in that field know that the actions of this government over the past eight years have done more to erode the confidence of small business than anything else. It has created a climate of uncertainty which has consistently affected the health and stability of small business, starting with the tax reform measures in 1971-72, overregulation, the way in which the Unemployment Insurance Commission has been functioning, the postal service, the impact of strikes and the competition from government programs. All these things have contributed to an unhealthy climate in the small business world, and we do not see anything in the Speech from the Throne to reverse the trend.

The public service has also been mobilized in this operation image, and this gives rise to the question of whether the government's motives are real and genuine, or illusory and deceptive. In that connection, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote from an aricle by Stephen Duncan in the Financial Post of September 11. One section is entitled "Pulling out the stops", and it reads in part as follows:

> Party stalwarts outside Ottawa are thrashing over fresh policy ideas. And, as two recent events in Ottawa suggest, the civil service is being recruited and mobilized to help the politicians.

The first incident is a directive sent from Treasury Board Secretary Gordon Osbaldeston to the deputy ministers of each department, asking them to contribute to an "image . . . of a cost-conscious public service." That is part of a government strategy (Osbaldeston's letter says) aimed at maximizing "the visibility and the public's awareness of restraint in government." Included was a request for lists of government programs that had been cut, and others that had been thought up, but never even submitted to Treasury Board for approval.

The second was a meeting of about 50 civil servants called together recently by the Privy Council office and the Prime Minister's office. They were told to itemize programs that had been initiated to improve service to the public. They were also asked to prepare lists of programs that were planned and could be announced immediately. And they were told to get working on new, innovative programs that could be announced in the near future.

Some good ideas and policies may emerge from all the activity. One of the problems plaguing the Liberals for the past two years has been the lack of a steady flow of really fresh ideas.

But the implication that policy planning now seems to consist of grabbing for new ideas almost at the last moment is unsettling. One well-placed civil servant terms the exercise "government by gesture".

His view (and it is a common one in Ottawa in the days leading up to the new session of parliament) is that the government, strung by unpopularity, will react with gesture rather than substance in the months ahead. The focus, that is, is on the image.

● (1700)

That summarizes the spirit in which documents were produced to this House this week. If the contents of this article are true, we must question the propriety of senior civil servants engaging in such partisan activities. Obviously if we are to be governed by gesture, by an administration concerned only with the short-term political interest, by a group concerned with grooming rather than governing, concerned with its image rather than with the real concerns of Canadians, there will be no joy for anyone.

I turn, briefly, to another area of concern to Canadians. I submit that Canadians have lost confidence in the financial control and management exercised by the Government of Canada with respect to its departments and agencies. I note with dismay that neither the Speech from the Throne nor the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) provide much hope for significant improvement in this area. One would think that considering the government's desire to be all things to all people, it would place high priority on this important area of our parliamentary democracy.

Surely the restoration of confidence in our system, the restoration of people's belief that taxpayers' money is being wisely and prudently administered, is at the core of the very foundation on which responsible government can continue to exist. It is true that we have seen a commitment regarding the introduction of a new Auditor General's Act, but before we become over-zealous about it we must see precisely what the objectives of the bill are and if the recommendations of the Wilson report will be followed. For example, will the legislation define the right to report on expenditures when value for money has not been obtained? Will it include the provision for the appointment of an accounting officer with respect to each appropriation? Who will be given responsibility for accounting in a proper manner, and for properly administering funds voted under an appropriation? At present not only do senior levels of the public service administer policy; they play an increasing role in the formulation of policy. In short, we want to know how many of the 47 recommendations will be included in the legislation? How many other recommendations previously advanced will be incorporated in it?

People's concern over the mismanagement of the country's finances has not grown up over night. It has grown at a dramatic rate since 1968, at a rate commensurate with the government's deliberate actions to reduce the effectiveness of members of parliament, its propensity for secrecy, its distortion of the rules, and its attempt to downgrade the role and effectiveness of the Auditor General. It is little wonder thoughtful Canadians have become deeply concerned. They are especially concerned about the dramatic increase in government spending, particularly at the federal and provincial levels, spending which takes up over 42 per cent of the Gross National Product. In the United Kingdom that figure now approaches 60 per cent.

In the July issue of the Parliamentarian, Right Hon. Edward du Cann, chairman of the Select Committee on Public Accounts in the U.K., wrote—I quote from page 153:

It is not necessary, I hope, to argue the need for control. Government expenditure is, I believe, the largest single inflationary influence in the United Kingdom . . .

I am in no doubt that firm control should be established, and by members of parliament in general . . .

Canadians are concerned that parliament has lost control over the handling of the nation's finances, that it cannot scrutinize as well as it should government expenditures, and that we are being governed by order in council. Above all, people are concerned because the state of the financial management, and control systems of government, its departments and agencies, is significantly below acceptable standards, quality and effectiveness. We obviously all have legitimate reason for concern, Mr. Speaker.

In a minute I shall quote from the proceedings of Public Accounts Committee, issue No. 52, dated March 30, 1976. Before doing so I wish to pay tribute to the outgoing chairman of the public accounts committee, and committee members, who have effectively examined government control and management systems in this country. Unfortunately the public and press have not given them the recognition they deserve. I think the House ought to commend them for the work they have done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: I shall now quote the words of the Auditor General, Mr. J. J. Macdonell, as recorded at page 52:22 of the committee proceedings. He said in part:

I must apologize that some of this is fairly technical, but we feel very strongly about the fact that unless the systems are corrected the day may well come when I really cannot give a clear certificate on the accounts of Canada. I hope it does not come.

Mr. P. Lafferty, of the Auditor General's office, told the committee about lack of control. As recorded at page 52:18 he said in part:

. . . I would like to point out two concepts of control which are not being observed in the departments. The first is the segregation of duties and there is a fundamental principle, that an auditing student learns within his first week, that you segregate duties down into the clerical level. The broad concept is that there should be careful segregation of duties so that, without unnecessary duplication of effort, one staff member, one element of a system, maintains an effective independent control upon the integrity and accuracy of another. It is this fundamental concept of one clerk, or one element of a system, balancing with another that does not exist in most of the cycles.

I list here the words: It does not exist in the expenditure cycle at two levels.

It does not exist at the clerical level, where there is a lot of repetitive checking . . .

It also does not exist in the signing of documents. Cheque requisitions, in many departments, are signed by one official who has, virtually, an unlimited spending authority, to spend the money and approve his own requisitions and this directly contravenes Treasury Board policy.

At page 52:20 Mr. Lafferty is reported as having read the following words from the Auditor General's report:

These fundamental weaknesses result in incomplete or inaccurate financial information and in inadequate protection against fraud and error.

At page 52:11 Mr. Macdonell, the Auditor General, is reported to have said:

What worries me quite a bit is the fact that if there is fraud occurring there is really not much evidence of important ways by which it can be detected. To me, this is the major weakness.

As recorded at page 52:6, Mr. D. L. Meyers talked about financial controls and audit mechanisms. He said in part:

● (1710)

The chapters on financial control and internal audit deal with control problems within the accounting system. The problem here is not one of knowing what should be done, or agreeing to it. Indeed, the principles have been applied for many years in large organizations, both public and private, and are enunciated in the Treasury Board Guide on Financial Administration. It is more a question of failing to recognize the significance and the need for adequate internal control, and giving it the priority required at the department level.

An example of this is the photocopy of a cheque which I have attached to these notes. Please note that this cheque is blank as to the amount and the payee, but has already been signed—in this case, to improve operating efficiency. The rule here is simple, and to the best of my knowledge not disputed: blank cheques should not be signed. Yet I was personally able to obtain this example after my first day of reviewing controls in a cheque-issue branch responsible for the preparation of 2,000,000 cheques per month.

He goes on to say:

Departments clearly break the fundamentals of internal control: in segregation of duties, accounting control, effective supervision, and internal audit. In the context of a lack of effective budgetary control and management reporting, this not only leaves a strong possibility of error but also invites fraud, with little possibility that either would be uncovered.

What more glaring examples of waste, incompetence, and weak financial management could we have illustrated? There are many examples of non-compliance with the Financial Administration Act. Anyone who reads the report of the public accounts committee will find examples of waste, weak financial administration, and failure to comply with Section 26 of the Financial Administration Act. For example, and I quote:

For the fiscal year 1974-75 nearly $1 million was spent by the Government of Canada for unused Crown-owned or leased accommodation. At the end of the same year approximately $3.8 million was expended on a new pay system which had to be suspended because it was deemed unworkable.

It later states:

Your committee, however, was most concerned with the action taken by the National Energy Board during the 1974-75 fiscal year. The funds appropriated for its operations by Vote 50 had been exhausted before the fiscal year end, and instead of attempting to obtain additional funds through supplementary estimates, the National Energy Board arranged to have $90,000 of its operating costs charged to the operations of the Energy Supplies Allocation Board. Furthermore, no subsequent attempt was made by the officials of either Board to correct this arrangement.

Having received evidence from all parties concerned, your committee has concluded that the action taken by the National Energy Board clearly contravened Section 19 and subsections (1) and (3)(a) of Section 26 of the Financial Administration Act and was illegal. Your committee strongly disapproves of the arrangement of funds made by this Board and recommends that disciplinary action be taken immediately by the minister.

As I said, this did not happen overnight. The government has whittled and chipped away at the parliamentary system. It has scuttled the effectiveness of the Auditor General. It has impaired the ability of parliamentarians to scrutinize effectively, analyse, and challenge government expenditures based on a philosophy of easy come, easy go simply pass the mistakes on to the taxpayer. However, I and many other taxpayers are getting fed up with the government's incompetence and maladministration.

I want to turn briefly to an area of the Speech from the Throne which I find rather fuzzy. It has to do with the review of our government's spending programs and the possible transfer from the public sector to the private sector. The review procedure is not clear. The criterion is not established. We in this party feel that this is yet another opportunity to engage the services of more consultants as a result of the review, and probably more consultants following the recommendations stemming from this review.

We would like to see an independent review agency which would appraise and evaluate government programs on a continuing basis as to their efficiency and effectiveness. The agency should be independent. It should have the power to initiate an evaluation on its own. The results, and indeed the recommendations, would be made public. Such an agency would have the authority and expertise to examine fully the effectiveness of ongoing government programs, their efficiency, and indeed have the power to recommend changes in the structure of any major government undertaking. Such a mechanism is certainly not unrealistic given the fact we are now spending well in excess of $40 billion annually. It could serve as an effective check.

This party would also like to see a review of our existing Crown corporations, some 60 in number. This party is committed to that. I am surprised that the government, with its new middle-of-the-road philosophy, did not propose that. Some studies on this have been done by important people. Doctor Alan Blair, an associate professor at Carleton University, engaged in a study and evaluation of 11 Crown corporations. During the course of his evaluation he found conclusive evidence that over half of them could be disbanded without any detriment or loss to the public interest.

We feel there is room for an evaluation of our 60 Crown corporations. Some were established with a specific purpose in mind many years ago. That specific purpose has now passed. In the interim, there must be more effective measures to scrutinize the operations and control of Crown corporations.

Crown corporations are not accountable to parliament in the way they should be. For example, Air Canada has not been before a committee of this House since 1973. Surely with a major Crown corporation of that size it should be mandatory that it appear before an appropriate standing committee of parliament once a year to review its operations and annual report. This government does not believe in the function and real role of parliament.

In conclusion, parliamentary authority and control must be restored if the institution of parliament, and indeed politicians are to regain the confidence of the Canadian people. Now is the time when parliament should be strong. Canadians suffer from failing hopes. They are deeply concerned about the future and generally have a lack of confidence in those who are in charge of Canada's destiny.

We have many problems, social and economic. We have problems of national unity. There is cynicism, there is mistrust, there is apprehension, and there is irritation in this country. One basic and fundamental way of meeting these serious challenges is to restore and reinstate the supremacy of parliament.

I sincerely regret that the initiatives proposed in the Speech from the Throne are less than satisfactory. They are initiatives of gesture rather than substance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I first want to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply. Having performed that task, I know how difficult it can be. I also want to congratulate the new ministers and wish them well in their portfolios.

The Speech from the Throne provides an excellent opportunity for members to speak on subjects that are of concern to them and their constituents. This tradition is one of the best in the House of Commons. Any of us can get up during these few days and get things on the record that we would like to have put on the record.

I should like to take my few minutes to direct attention to the indication in the Speech from the Throne that there will be amendments to the Immigration Act during the present session of parliament. The new minister—and I wish him well in that difficult portfolio—indicated the other day that we could expect a new act during this session.

Generous immigration policies have been good for Canada. But for the last several years in reaction to what was possibly—and I use that word with a question mark—an overly-generous system between 1969 and 1972 we have over-reacted and made immigration too tough and too difficult. I believe we are doing this to our detriment and to our loss. I want to take this opportunity to make that opinion very clear.

I was a member, and a pretty regular member, of the special joint committee on immigration policy which produced the report with the orange cover. It was an exhaustive study. We heard hundreds of witnesses, I guess, and the committee produced 178 paragraphs of recommendations about what the government might incorporate in its new immigration policy, which presumably will be presented to parliament in the coming session. It was a good report. Who can argue when members of the committee suggest we should reform the provisions governing the prohibited classes? Who can argue against many of the reforms suggested by the committee in a variety of ways? As I look through the headings I see "Mental Retardation", "Mental Illness", "Epilepsy", "Contagious Diseases" and "Moral Turpitude."

Of course we have to reform those parts of our immigration policy which are obviously outdated and out of touch with reality in 1976. But in our approach to this question there have been errors. We have fallen for the statistical approach. I recall that during all this debate we have been talking about population and population growth. I, personally, do not believe in scientific government. I never did. Scientific government did not build this country—bloodless, scientific government administered by bureaucrats.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stollery: We completely abdicate in this approach to human issues the tradition and history that built this country. It is not often a member has the opportunity to quote himself, but I was looking recently through the debate on Bill C-58. I spoke in that debate. I was describing the Canada that I know, and I said at that time:

> Surely in the House of Commons of Canada I should not have to emphasize our unique Canadian experience—two founding peoples pioneering a country on the very edge of the habitable world, in spite of snow and ice and everything possible against us, and succeeding in establishing Canada. Canada is a remarkable country because it should not ever have existed.

We exist in spite of the trials our forefathers went through when they came to this country, and they did not do it by scientific government. Yet people tell us, "This group will go here, another group will go there, and this is what the population will be," and so on. I find this whole approach which we seem to be following in the area of immigration, baffling.

Goodness, will any member of that committee forget the charts with which we were presented illustrating the dire consequences ahead of us in the year 2,000, the predictions as to what the birth rate might be? I recall similar predictions 20 years ago concerning the province of Quebec. I remember it being said in Toronto that Quebec was a francophone province, that New Brunswick was a francophone province and that, bearing in mind the birth rate in Quebec, it would not be long before there would be a third. Today we all know that Quebec has the lowest birth rate in Canada, something which presents a big problem both for Quebec and for the rest of Canada.

All this was conveniently forgotten when officials of the department presented us with all those statistics in favour of having a new act and restricting immigration. They implied that if we did not have this new act we would have no control over policy. Meanwhile those of us who follow immigration matters find that the departmental officials have managed to cut immigration under the existing act by some 25 per cent by using regulations which never come before the House of Commons—I do not know whether they even go before cabinet.

I was looking through some of the quarterly statistics a while ago. One set of figures which immediately struck me referred to immigration from Portugal—4,370 immigrants were admitted in the first quarter of 1974. Remember, this was the year when they said we would drown with immigrants if we did not do something. Well, we did not do very much in the House of Commons but they managed to do something in the immigration department because the number admitted in the same quarter of 1976 was 1,272. All in all, immigration from Europe was cut from 20,205 to 12,616, practically in half, through the use of regulations which none of us ever got to see or which, at best, we saw only after they had been approved.

This is an important subject because this country is finding itself today in a crisis. We all know there is a crisis over bilingualism. We all know, if we are honest, and I know members opposite know the same thing, that there are many people in this country who are asking themselves if it is worth while making this country work, and if those people are successful we need not bother having a House of Commons because we won't be coming here. And we were elected to make this country work.

I think that areas like immigration are part and parcel of a seige mentality that has overcome Canadians. Some Canadians are saying that the barriers should be raised, and in raising the barriers we must remember that in areas like immigration we are dealing, after all, with an interchange of people and ideas. The same barriers must also go up in the area of bilingualism. We must remember the two things are part and parcel of the same issue.

A bilingual Canada cannot exist in a vaccum; immigration policy must be an essential part. If we start to restrict immigration, to say that for various scientific reasons we are restricting entry, we will have to take the consequences. Let me tell this House that at no time in my life have I seen our chickens coming home to roost the way they have been coming home during the last few months. Never before do I remember responsible Canadians asking themselves whether Canada is going to survive. I think that is a pretty fundamental question for this House of Commons, and if we do not face the issue we are making a very serious mistake.

Just to emphasize to what point we have come in this country, the kind of person who came here in a spirit of adventure and initiative, who came to find opportunities in Canada, cannot come any more. No longer can a young man or woman of 21 years of age set off for Canada, not knowing exactly what they want to do or what the future may hold for them. They can no longer work in Canada or work their way across the country. That is a thing of the past.

I was born in this country, Mr. Speaker, but I am sure many of us have spent a lot of our youth travelling around the country. This cannot be done any more because there is no work. Immigrants have no status, they cannot get a work permit. We have effectively put a stop to the enterprise of people; we have told them that they cannot come to Canada any more and I think this is a very serious mistake.

If the government is proposing to present a new immigration act, let me say at this point that I am not certain that we need a new act since we can cut immigration back 25 per cent under existing regulations. I see my time is running out, Mr. Speaker, but as a member of this House who has great admiration for his colleagues on all sides, may I say that under the present policy I would not be able to come to Canada myself. I feel that there is something fundamentally wrong.

Mr. Friesen: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) would entertain a question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That can only be done with the hon. member's consent. Would the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Stollery: Certainly.

Mr. Friesen: I served on the special committee with the hon. member for Spadina, and together we drew up a report that was tabled in the House. His remarks today sound strangely different from what he said in committee and I am wondering whether he has changed his view about immigration into Canada from what he said in committee about the volume of immigrants coming to this country.

Mr. Stollery: I wish the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) would refresh his memory, because if he did he would remember, first of all, that the meetings in which this matter was discussed were supposedly in camera, and I did not think that they should be mentioned in the House of Commons; secondly, I was one of the members who signed the minority report of the committee, and I think that speaks for itself.

Mr. O'Connell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, reference has been made to a minority report of the special parliamentary committee. I think correctly we ought to agree that there were dissenting views, but I do not think it is possible to present a minority report to this House and there was not one. I just clarify that for the purpose of the record.

Mr. Stollery: On the same point of order, the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock made the statement that I agreed with something. As the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) has pointed out, I did not completely agree and I signed what was in effect a statement, with some other members of the joint Senate and House of Commons committee on immigration.

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I want to commence my fairly short remarks with a compliment to those who moved and seconded the Address in Reply to this latest Speech from the Throne on the way they discharged their responsibility.

I have been reading various Speeches from the Throne since I came to this Chamber and I must say that this latest one struck a different note. I noticed, or seemed to notice as I reflected upon it, a strange lack of enthusiasm for this Speech from the Throne in its reception. This was noticeable in the galleries and it was noticeable among the public generally. I would say that the country at large has demonstrated about as much enthusiasm for this latest Speech from the Throne as the turkey does for Thanksgiving. I think there is a reason for this, Mr. Speaker.

As a comparatively junior member I have been struck by the fact that there is something that distinguishes this latest Speech from the Throne from most of the others, and it is that very little concrete mention is made of what the government plans to do. I was interested to see the list of bills which the House leader presented. I know that other speakers have made reference to this as well, but I cannot help but mention that the first bill in the list of bills to be dealt with was that tremendously vital and important item, the Historic Sites and Monuments Act.

I think the government must have in mind erecting a couple of monuments on a particularly memorable site, perhaps the site where the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stood when he told us that he had wrestled inflation to the ground. That year the Prime Minister did about as well in the battle against inflation as General Custer did at the battle of Little Big Horn—in fact perhaps not as well. Or perhaps the government is going to erect a monument at the place where the Prime Minister stood when he came back from his meeting with President Nixon and said he had made a tremendous breakthrough with the United States. Judging from the state of current U.S.-Canadian relations I think he was rather optimistic in describing it as a tremendous breakthrough at that time.

I should like to confine my remarks fairly specifically to the subject of freedom of information and to urge the government to consider seriously some initiatives in this regard. Before getting to the main matters I want to talk about in this respect, let me say that as a member of parliament from Atlantic Canada I find that there is a strange lack of priority given to DREE, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, which is very disturbing particularly in view of the critical situation that has developed in Atlantic Canada as a result of the government's failure to provide proper economic leadership and a national energy policy. This situation has exacerbated the economic difficulties which DREE was originally conceived to combat.

Of course I am bound to say in all honesty that under this government in recent years the whole country has become economically disadvantaged, and perhaps it is not fair for us to expect too much in the Atlantic area. Nevertheless the fact remains, as those of us who come from Atlantic Canada know, that we are facing a terribly delicate situation. We need assistance from the federal government on a temporary basis, as well as some long-term guidance, so that we can begin to create a national power grid or some kind of power pool involving some of the provinces adjacent to us which have greater power resources. This could have been done a long time ago.

We would also have expected and would have liked to have seen some indication in this Speech from the Throne that the government recognizes the need to give special priority to the Department of Fisheries, give it as it used to have, status in its own right. Instead, where we once had a separate department for fishing and, one for forestry, we now have no forestry department at all, although this is one of Canada's most important resources, and we still have the Department of Fisheries effectively merged or submerged in the greater Department of the Environment.

We also note in Atlantic Canada, where unemployment is very high, that the government is considering re-uniting the Departments of Manpower and Unemployment Insurance—I gather in the same arrangement that existed in past years when we had the National Employment Service. I think on balance that is probably a constructive thing to do, but one has to reflect upon the many millions of dollars in administrative costs, and the wasted effort that has been the end product of this very poorly conceived experiment of starting a separate entity called Manpower divorced from the UIC. It did not work, and probably will not work unless there are further modifications made, because employers for the most part do not use the services of Manpower because, for various reasons, it has not been effectively co-ordinating the resources and needs of the private sector and the services it was designed to provide.

There is another matter which concerns me very much which I should like to mention before I move into the freedom of information part of my speech, and that is the sorry state of transportation. I have quoted the following before in the House and I think it bears quoting again. I will go back to 1972 at page 808 of Hansard for the date of March 14 when the then minister, now the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson), said at that time that he agreed with those of us on this side of the House who said:

> —that a reorganized structure is necessary in order that members and the country generally can obtain more information, and obtain it more easily, about all aspects of transportation. With this objective in mind, I propose to bring before the House in the next session three important pieces of legislation on which work is proceeding at the present time. The first of those is a bill designed to reconstitute Air Canada as a separate Crown corporation, thus divorcing it, as it were, from the CNR. I will also introduce a Canadian National Railways revision act and a companion piece of legislation covering amendments to the Railway Act. Hon. members will know how involved and far reaching these changes are; they have been asking for them for the last two or three years.

That takes us back to at least 1970. The minister went on to say:

> These changes have entailed a great deal of work, which is still proceeding. I believe, however, that these bills are essential and I will bring them forward as soon as they are ready.

That is a good many years ago and we can only presume that, in the interim, despite the very excellent Estey report of last year which dealt with this very subject of divorcing Air Canada from the CNR or well as other things not much progress has been made by this self-proclaimed dynamic government since 1972 on what would appear to be a fairly straightforward, non-partisan piece of legislation.

That is not the worst of it. The present Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) appeared before the Committee on Transport and Communications, and he promised on April 6 of this year a new national transportation act, a new ports policy, and a re-examination of the St. Lawrence Seaway.

Then we have to remember that, a year previously, his predecessor announced that a regional third air policy would be coming soon. The only reference to transportation in this present throne speech mentions that there are to be changes introduced to the National Transportation Act to protect against unfair freight rates.

An hon. Member: What's wrong with that?

Mr. MacKay: There is nothing wrong with it, I want to say to my friend opposite, but it is too bad the government would not give us a little bit of action and less verbiage. They are all swank and no knickers.

Let me now move to the topic of freedom of information. In our highly developed and technical society information, or rather its possession, has become a tremendous source of power, if not the prime one. At the turn of the century Max Weber asserted that the source of bureaucratic power was the "knowledge of files". That is even truer today than it was in his time. Modern governments are really hugh information processing machines. As the importance of information grows so does the need to make it available to the public.

If opposition members of parliament, indeed all members of this House, are to criticize constructively and realize what is going on in this most important of all institutions, and if journalists are to report accurately the facts, and if ordinary citizens are going to make effective use of their right to express themselves freely, then it is absolutely essential that they be given free access to all government information, with the exception of matters involving national security and individuals' personal records.

The parliament of this country should immediately consider and pass legislation that embodies the following principles: government information is gathered and compiled utilizing public funds, therefore it belongs to the public; the government must prove that it is not in the public interest to divulge certain types of information to the public rather than the public having to prove that they have the right to the information; up-to-date indexes of all the various government reports and studies should be readily available in public libraries and in federal buildings, to a much greater extent than is now the case; the government should be required to provide the requested information within a stipulated period of time; and a person or group who is denied information should have the right to apply to an impartial tribunal.

I want to mention a couple of incidents, perhaps three, that I think should be brought forward in the context of these remarks. Kenzie MacKinnon, a Nova Scotian law student, spent the summer working with Ralph Nader's consumer affairs centre studying the working of the U.S. freedom of information act. Apparently a CBC television program requested access to government inspection reports on Canadian meat plants. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) felt that this report was too technical in nature, and he went on to say it was such and would be prone to misinterpretation by parties not familiar with individual plants or the nature of the procedure carried out. He said this could result in a firm being subjected to unjustified commercial pressures in the public arena.

Since all Canadian meat plants that export to the United States must be cleared by U.S. inspectors, Mr. MacKinnon applied to the United States Department of Agriculture for the information. Under the U.S. freedom of information act he got the information for no charge, after a ten days' maximum waiting period. Mr. MacKinnon quotes the report as making the following statements:

> The trolleys and chain suspending apparatus for beef carcasses were not being cleaned, and exhibited rust and grease.

Then he says the tunnel through which beef and pig carcases were being moved "was not maintained in a sanitary manner". Later he states:

> Fixed objects of wood that were improperly cleaned were contacting product surfaces. Overheads were deteriorating and some overhead structures exhibited evidence of rust, corrosion and excessive grease.

If we had a proper freedom of information law in Canada perhaps the Minister of Agriculture might have been encouraged to improve the sanitary conditions of our meat plants instead of acting as a public relations man for the meat packing industry.

I want to deal next with the Walter Rudnicki case. In September, 1973, as this House knows, the then Minister of Urban Affairs, and the president at that time of CMHC, Mr. Teron, and other CMHC officials, met native leaders to hear a brief on the needs for a Métis housing policy. Mr. Rudnicki set up an ad hoc group to prepare policy proposals. Mr. Rudnicki distributed policy papers at meetings with officials of the native council in order to get some feedback and because the minister and Mr. Teron had agreed to keep in close and continuous consultation with them. Apparently when the minister found out that policy proposals had been shown to the native people before he had seen them he hit the roof. He told Mr. Teron that either he had to go or Mr. Rudnicki had to go. Mr. Rudnicki was dismissed for violating his oath of secrecy regarding Cabinet documents. Mr. Rudnicki's secretary was also hounded out of the civil service.

Mr. Rudnicki sued in court for wrongful dismissal. He won his case and won $18,000 in compensation. The judge did not accept Mr. Teron's version of the events, which is a pretty polite way of saying he considered him less than honest. Judge O'Driscoll, who heard the case, referred to Mr. Teron's definition of what constituted a Cabinet document as "absolutely astounding". There were indications that the disclosure of documents was used as a pretext to get rid of Mr. Rudnicki who was too innovative an activist for the CMHC.

There is a third case that concerns me, and this is something I have referred to before in this House. It involves a couple of RCMP staff sergeants who, in my opinion, were dealt with in a very, very unfair manner.

An hon. Member: Shoddy.

Mr. MacKay: Yes, shoddy is a good word. There has been much opportunity for the government either to have justified their dismissal or to have made some sort of reparations to them. They were hardly run of the mill officers. They were both outstanding police officers, Mr. Don McCleary and Mr. Giles Brunet. I have had the opportunity to look at many documents involved in this case. One thing I found most outrageous was the memorandum from the officer in charge of the legal branch, Inspector D. K. Wilson. It deals with the subject of Sergeant Giles Brunet.

● (1750)

First may I set the stage by saying that when these men tried to protect themselves against what they considered a lack of natural justice, and when they attempted to get any kind of a hearing and were unsuccessful, they had a counsel, Mr. Arthur Campeau of the Ogilvy Cope firm in Montreal, I believe a very outstanding lawyer, contact the Solicitor General. Correspondence was exchanged, and so on.

Then we come to something I find very incredible. I refer to the memorandum from the man about whom I spoke previously, Inspector D. K. Wilson. I am very concerned about the tone and the Alice-in-Wonderland quality of it.

One line of this memorandum on page 7, which is dated December 3, 1973, states:

> It is not surprising either that there is at least the allegation, if not the fact, of influence peddling between the lawyer and the Solicitor General.

That, to me, is an incredible thing to have been said by a responsible man high up in the RCMP. If any member wants to see the entire memorandum I will be glad to make it available to him. It is difficult to believe that a man that high up in the RCMP would accuse his minister of influence peddling because this minister was courteous and understanding enough to listen to representations from a very eminent legal counsel who intervened on behalf of these two fine RCMP officers. That, to me, is an indication of a very sick attitude. I want to bring it out again at this time in the House of Commons.

I suggest it is obvious to just about everyone in the country that a freedom of information law is needed. It goes almost without saying. It is as true today as when the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) first brought it up. Incidentally, the hon. member for Peace River told me that he had discussed this very subject with the members of the current Russian delegation visiting Canada, and he was told that the situation is about the same there as it is here.

[Mr. MacKay.]

The government is taking only baby steps toward this objective. Members of the government are dragging it out as much as they can. The throne speech tells us that the government intends to present a policy paper to the standing committee. The issue has been discussed, re-discussed, and discussed again. Now is the time for good legislation. I am very surprised that the present government has not jumped on this idea. This is not a party that is known to nurture along an idea, to fight battles for it. They leave this to the opposition parties. But the Liberal Party has the great ability to grab upon an idea when the time has come, and claim it for its own. There is no doubt about that. In fact after listening to the well paid public relations men of the government, it seems that members of the government are able to convince themselves that they originated the idea, fought the battles, and led the troops to victory themselves.

With the exception of the former finance minister, John Turner, who unknown to us all, until he left, had fire in the belly over this issue for years, the Liberals have not responded in their usual manner. They have not jumped upon the issue. Does this mean they have lost their touch, one more example of the downhill slide? This may be partially true, but I suggest there may be other reasons.

It has been proven that secrecy is fundamental to this government, that it is an essential part of its nature, perhaps even its true nature. This does not mean that the government is not willing to generate information. It is more than willing. In fact since 1972 the number of information officers has increased from 570 to over 1,000. The government in engaged in producing public relations pap, making reports two of three times longer than they should be, or glossing over a lack of substance with sheer weight of words.

It is not unrelated that, as a government becomes more secretive and hides more real information, it will turn out more false information, misinformation, or non-news. One reason I suggest the government ought to reassess its policy is that everything can be explained to the people on the single condition that you truly want them to understand. Lately the government has not shown that it really does want them to understand. One reason why the government will not be more open is that there is a feeling that the public is not competent to judge its behaviour. We have seen that indicated very clearly in the government's handling of the wage and price controls program.

The government has managed to alienate both business and labour. When these groups justifiably criticized the incompetency of the administration and the unfairness of the application of the regulations, did the government consider the possibility that there may be serious faults in the program? Of course not. The Prime Minister has told us that the Canadian public did not understand the program, and so he decided to spend a million or so of their tax dollars to innundate Canadians with snappy little ads telling them the error of their ways. That is his philosophy. If the government had any respect for the Canadian public it would quit wasting its money and come up with substantive changes in the program.

The other reason why the government will not move forward in respect of a freedom of information law of course, as has been demonstrated, is that there are things the government does not want to disclose. I want to point out at this time that the business of obscuring language is a mask beyond which stands out the much greater business of plunder. As time goes by we must watch very carefully that the special interest groups close to the government do not profit excessively by this relationship. That is another reason why we must have more freedom of information.

I suggest that, if all the facts were before this parliament, some of these gigantic projects that are making news, with allegations of hundreds of millions of dollars being spent unwisely at a time of restraint, might never have gotten off the ground in the first place, and we would all have benefited.

In one of his essays Montaigne relates the answer that a worthy Roman gentleman gave to the builders who offered for 3,000 crowns to alter his mansion so that his neighbours could not overlook him, as they then did. "I will give you 6,000", he said, "if you will make it possible to see into it from every side". It is as characteristic of this government to build a mansion into which no one can see, as it was of the above gentleman to has his conduct open to the public.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being six o'clock I now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in this my first address as the new Minister of Manpower and Immigration I want to pay a particular tribute to my predecessor, now President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: Although I have had an all too brief acquaintance with this new department, I have come to realize the very heavy burden placed upon the minister in this department.

When one realizes that my predecessor held this portfolio for four years and that he did so in such a competent and capable fashion, one knows that this represents a significant contribution to the service of the people of Canada. I do not know how many of us can appreciate the countless hours of time and effort that had to go into the development of a new immigration policy and legislation, and I wonder if any of us can appreciate the tremendous amount of time required to consider the direction in which the department should go, the changes that should be made to the Unemployment Insurance Act, and the new employment strategies directed to helping unemployed Canadians. Couple this with the minister's responsibilities as a member of parliament for a very busy and active riding, his regular duties as a member of the cabinet, and the day to day problems that are bound to arise when one is dealing with unemployment insurance and immigration, and one can appreciate the heavy workload that the minister carries. Partisanship aside, I think all members in the House appreciate the contribution made by my predecessor. He has handed me a very difficult act to follow.

It is appropriate for me in this debate to comment on the very high calibre of the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply. As one who was given this honour a few years ago, I know the sense of responsibility that one feels when called upon by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to move and second the Address in Reply. I may say that the calibre of the speeches is definitely on the rise.

The government's key priorities have been outlined in the throne speech. One priority is the new immigration legislation. This is the product of more than three years of intensive work by my department, a major consultative process, of an invaluable study by a special joint committee of parliament composed of members of the House of Commons and the Senate. The bill that I shall shortly present to parliament will spell out the fundamental objectives designed to shape a forward looking immigration policy for this country. It will eliminate the outdated provisions of nearly a quarter of a century, and establish a solid foundation for a policy geared to the needs of all parts of Canada and able to rise to contemporary challenges, both domestic and international.

Another key priority will be the amendments to the unemployment insurance legislation. These will merge the commission and the Department of Manpower and Immigration into the new commission and department of employment and immigration.

Amendments will also allow us to take a more positive approach to unemployment problems through resource allocation. As the House knows, these amendments will change the five phase benefit structure to a simpler three phase structure, will set the minimum entrance requirements at 12 weeks, and will permit experimentation with the use of unemployment insurance funds for programs of training, worksharing, and job creation.

● (2010)

The changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act will result in a government saving of about $110 million next fiscal year. I am only referring to the government's saving on this aspect, not that of the employee and employer. The purpose of the amendments is not to save money; it is to let us and the unemployed utilize some of the funds now required for income maintenance to held provide jobs, incomes, and training. We are convinced that the income that goes with the dignity of work is preferable to the income that arrives in the form of an unemployment insurance cheque.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, there is no other priority more important than helping Canadians find a job. Today, our remarks will concern a new employment strategy aimed at creating what the Canadian unemployed wish and require: the dignity and the personal satisfaction given by a real job as well as a higher income than unemployment insurance. Today, the main difficulty is to increase regularly the number of jobs in the private sector. But in the next four years, the number of jobs could not increase too rapidly in relation with the number of Canadians seeking employment. Furthermore, we know that at the beginning of the 1980's, when the flow of young people seeking employment will have decreased, we could be in a different situation, that is we could have a shortage of manpower rather than a lack of job opportunities.

[English]

We must therefore look toward a strategy that will help to fill the employment gap over the next several years. It must be a strategy compatible with the restraint of expenditures, moderation in the increase of the money supply, and the avoidance of massive inflation-stimulating deficits. It must not be a strategy of major monetary or fiscal stimulation, vast programs of public construction or public service expansion, or major tax cuts; these would be incompatible with our need to reduce inflationary forces and to remove wage and price controls. Our basic aim is to reduce unemployment progressively over the next five years, without generating yet other problems.

It is my purpose today, Mr. Speaker, to outline the essential elements of a strategy that meets those basic criteria. The strategy is based on two fundamental premises: first, that the vast majority of Canadians need and want work and that there is work to be done, and second, that although income maintenance is essential for Canadians who want to work and cannot find jobs, our present substantial expenditures on income maintenance can be made more productive.

Our currently high unemployment rate is due to several factors such as regional differences, the particular problems of young workers, lack of skills, weak markets; employment disadvantages, and seasonality. Some unemployment is due to behavioural factors, but the problem facing most people is a simple lack of jobs or the skills to fill the jobs that open up.

There is no single cause underlying our unemployment rate and there is no single solution. But selective solutions must be pulled together into a single strategy. Our employment strategy alone will not cure unemployment. What it will do is to help keep unemployment down, and allow us to reduce unemployment progressively over the next few years in a way consistent with the removal of wage and price controls.

There are three broad thrusts within the strategy itself. The first is a comprehensive job creation program squarely based on community priorities; the second consists of youth employment and employability measures, to ease the transition from school to work for the young people who make up half the unemployed; and the third is a group of selective presentive measures to reduce the loss of work and hasten a return to employment.

The strategic approach that we are taking relies on a variety of programs being effective. Individual programs in the strategy will necessarily be changeable and flexible from year to year; the program mix appropriate for 1977 may not be the best mix for the circumstances of 1979 or 1980.

The essence of the strategy is to get public work done and public benefits produced by people whose energies and talents are temporarily surplus to private sector needs.

We all recognize that a permanent private sector job is what Canadians most want, and that we must help them find it. But we must also recognize that when private sector jobs do not exist in sufficient numbers we have an obligation, both to the unemployed themselves and to the Canadian community, to make sure that people can have work and the incomes that go with work. From the point of view of both society and the individual concerned, work is far better than just giving people a cheque. The cost of unemployment is not just a loss of so many dollars or so much output. Much of the cost comes in failed career hopes; lost opportunities and eroded skills; in family stress, and in growing dependency on the working members of the community.

In 1977-78, the first full year of our five-year employment strategy, we plan to invest in the neighbourhood of $350 million beyond our regular expenditures on manpower programs. Over that five-year period much of the incremental funding for the employment strategy will come from changes in the unemployment insurance legislation. In the first full year savings to the government from the legislative changes will be about $110 million, but future savings will be even greater. Because unemployment insurance savings will rise as unemployment declines, we are looking at costs and resources averaged over five years. It is generally expected that, if parliament approves the changes I shall propose to the Unemployment Insurance Act, reduced government contributions to the unemployment insurance account will offset the extra costs of this employment strategy.

I shall deal first with the comprehensive job creation program. Because unemployment is at an unacceptable level we are allocating, as I said, about $350 million in expenditures in 1977-78 on special employment measures. Of this amount the largest single element will be a $200 million "Canada Works" program that will generate jobs for some 61,000 participants.

The program will be year-round, lasting up to 12 months when warranted, with projects tailored to local unemployment conditions. Funds will be allocated primarily to high unemployment parts of the country. Projects will be reviewed and recommended by ministerial advisory boards in constituencies, groups whose membership will change from year to year. The projects themselves will be subject to federal and provincial determination of broad priority areas. In parts of the country where the local tax base is inadequate, provision will be made for financial assistance with the cost of materials.

Investment in the Canada Works program will be adjusted to changing circumstances from year to year but the program will always operate on the basis that its role is to provide employment only when the private sector cannot. Wages will be based on the provincial minimum wage so as not to disrupt the private labour market. They will not exceed locally prevailing rates for the skills involved. Project workers will be helped and encouraged to return to permanent jobs in the private sector. Project and selection controls will ensure that people are not drawn into the labour market simply to participate in the program. We will generally require project sponsorship by an existing community organization or group to ensure that real needs are met and the project is competently managed. The private sector—both firms and organizations such as chambers of commerce—will be invited to participate actively by sponsoring non-profit projects of community benefit.

A small portion of the $200 million for the Canada Works program will be set aside for temporary local employment emergencies—a natural disaster or failure of the main economic support of a community. We have developed emergency techniques in the last two years and have learned to respond quickly to such local disasters as the fires in Springhill and Main à Dieu in Nova Scotia.

The year-round program will be accompanied by a new program designed to supply jobs for about 21,000 extra students next summer. This program, "Young Canada Works", will have many of the same basic features as the year-round program. Some $30 million will be allocated largely to high unemployment areas. Project applications will be reviewed by the ministerial advisory boards. Projects will be up to 14 weeks in duration and sponsored by community organizations, including the private sector. Wage levels generally will be kept down to the minimum provincial wage levels. The range of potential projects will be the same as for the year-round program, but will be oriented to the interests and aspirations of young Canadians. The emphasis will not be so much on "doing your own thing," as on doing something of solid community value—such as fire prevention programs or environmental improvement.

The third new job creation element will be a Summer Job Corps in which we will invest up to $10 million. The Summer Job Corps will provide employment opportunities for students in activities related to federal government priorities. Projects will be sponsored by federal departments and agencies. Students may work on such projects as cleaning up rivers. For the most part, the work will be out of doors. None of it will be within federal departments themselves. Students will work in a structured environment under trained leaders, in any one of a dozen priority areas.

We will also continue, as part of the job creation component of the employment strategy, the existing summer student employment and activities program at a cost of about $25 million. Those funds will provide for a variety of initiatives by federal departments to create employment for young people; for example, cadet corps, and student-run summer manpower centres.

The Young Canada Works program, the student summer programs, the Summer Job Corps, and the main Canada Works program will all provide additional worth-while employment opportunities for young people, allowing them to gain valuable experience, while at the same time helping them to meet financial demands. But these programs, in themselves, can only partly respond to the long-term problems of youth employment in Canada because many young Canadians lack work skills and experience rather than job opportunity.

I now come to youth employment and employability. The second main thrust of our employment strategy is directed as much to the employability of youth in the private sector as the first is directed toward creating employment. Young people today have employment problems of a kind unknown to us 20 years ago. The problem is only partly a lack of jobs; in large measure it is the vast gap which exists between the world of school and the world of work.

Increasingly we see the tragedy of the young person who emerges from school, diploma in hand, but who cannot get a job because he or she lacks something called "relevant work experience." Young people today acquire knowledge of immense value in our schools and post-secondary institutions. But too often, employers tell us, students are not accustomed to the day-to-day realities of work, and are not able to translate text book knowledge into practical accomplishments. They cannot be hired until they can do so, yet they cannot get relevant work experience without being hired.

One remedy is to expand and strengthen what we can do to provide counselling and job connections for secondary and post-secondary students. We are proceeding vigorously with the publication of a full range of career counselling materials called "Careers Canada" and "Careers Provinces" for use in our Manpower centres and in co-operating school systems. We are developing, for possible introduction next year, a computer-assisted counselling program called "Choices". And we will strengthen and expand the Manpower counselling and job finding centres we now have on post-secondary campuses across the country. Over the next three years, we intend adding up to 18 new centres to the existing 70.

Better counselling information and techniques and a greater availability of counselling services will help, but they will not provide experience, and therefore can only be part of the answer for our young people. Counselling provides direction; "co-operative education" provides experience.

With the co-operation of the provinces I plan to give greater impetus to this concept of co-operative education which could successfully bridge the gap between school and work but which has been developing far too slowly in Canada. "In term" means simply that the teaching institution arranges with local employers that work and study will alternate in some sensible way. We know of over 80 such arrangements current in Canada. The young Canadians who have participated in them have had far fewer problems in the labour market, are far more certain of where their career interests lie, and are often hired by the very firms for which they worked as part of their training.

I have communicated with provincial ministers and offered to join with them to encourage and promote the development of more co-operative education. It is not an expensive proposition. No wage subsidies are involved. Most of what cost there is goes into setting up such programs rather than maintaining them. We will offer to share with provinces the costs of starting co-operative education programs, not perennial subsidies for the programs' duration. I am convinced that, as these programs get established, the advantages to employers, students, and post-secondary institutions will be so great that no further financing will be required.

We are also interested in taking this concept a step further for youth with serious job placement problems. As soon as possible I plan to initiate a program which will help young Canadians gain a foothold in the job market. That program, called the Job Experience and Training program, will have a substantial winter component and a smaller summer portion. It will be based essentially on the very successful experience that we have had in the last two years with chambers of commerce and boards of trade on a pilot project basis.

Next summer chambers of commerce and boards of trade across the country will be asked to arrange for the placement of students identified by co-operating school authorities as drop-outs or potential drop-outs for whom serious employment problems are anticipated. They will be given exposure to a work environment and employment counselling that will facilitate their return to school or their entry to the labour market. The chambers will be given a modest grant, and participating employers will receive a small wage subsidy. In the winter young people who encounter severe and continuing difficulty in getting and keeping jobs and need work experience will be provided with nine weeks of partially subsidized employment in the private sector, preceded if necessary by a brief training period. The result, at a very modest cost per hard-to-place young person, will be the acquisition of experience without burdening any firm because the government will, if necessary, help to compensate for the young worker's low initial productivity.

Next year we expect to invest a total of $11 million on these particular measures to help young people find rewarding and productive employment in the private sector. I am convinced that measures to improve career counselling and career choice, and to help young people blend schooling and experience, are among the most productive we can mount. If the programs are as successful as I hope, I would like to see them take an increasingly large place in our over-all employment strategy.

Next may I speak about preventive measures. The third major element of our employment strategy is the development of new and the strengthening of established preventive measures. The federal government now is investing well over half a billion dollars in the training and retraining of Canadians to increase their employability and income. Most of this very productive training is carried out in provincial institutions. Our first step will be to increase our manpower training budget for next year, with an emphasis on the expansion of industrial training. For some years we have been increasing the proportion of our industrial training, because of its high productivity and relatively low cost. In the past five years our funding of industrial training has increased 500 per cent, from $10 million to over $51 million originally planned for next year. We will increase that by $19 million to a total of $70 million in 1977-78.

These training opportunities will particularly benefit young workers, women returning to new careers in the labour force, native people, and the many Canadians who each year find that they must acquire a new occupation to earn their daily bread.

With the expansion of industrial training and the introduction of the job experience and training program, the government is responding to suggestions from a number of quarters. As suggested in the government's working paper, "The Way Ahead", this is an area in which industry can assume a role that might otherwise be left to a government institution. I hope that business will accept this responsibility willingly and that the results will warrant expansion of co-operative business-government partnerships in human resource programs.

No comprehensive employment strategy for Canada would be complete without the provision of a more adequate level of opportunities for the many Canadians who are, in one way or another, seriously disadvantaged in finding and keeping jobs. Although my department already has a number of programs that provide a good deal of assistance to people with severe employment disadvantages—the Outreach program, intensive counselling programs, the Local Employment Assistance Program, and our developing community employment strategy—we can and should do more for the Canadians who are hardest hit by unemployment regardless of the state of the economy.

Accordingly, we are carrying out a major review of existing programs for the handicapped, with a view to promoting various measures to facilitate their integration into the labour market. I do not expect this to result in the imposition of hiring quotas or other artificial devices in the private sector. I expect that, in co-operation with the Public Service Commission, measures for handicapped people may be developed to expand their opportunities in the public service, improve their access to services, and provide leadership in showing what can be accomplished. Later in this session of parliament I hope to announce some new measures we will undertake and to suggest ways in which the private sector can join in these developments.

Today I can announce that we will expand the Local Employment Assistance Program by more than 40 per cent through the addition of some $6 million to the budget for next year. Over the last three years this program has proven to be highly effective as a means both of providing employment to serious disadvantaged workers and enabling them to progress to future employment in the private sector.

There are some innovations such as work sharing and occupational training. Thus far I have been dealing with programs in the context of a strategy for the next five years. Now I would like to touch on several innovations we wish to introduce in the new unemployment insurance amendments. We hope these will greatly strengthen our unemployment insurance program and make it not only the essential protection for unemployed workers, which it is now, but also a positive instrument in promoting a healthier and more productive labour market.

The first of these measures we call "work-sharing". We plan to introduce next fall, on an experimental basis, the concept of work-sharing during temporary economic downturns that has been so successful in a number of European countries. The idea is quite simple.

At present when markets slacken temporarily, firms cut back their production and their work force. The people who are made jobless claim unemployment insurance, search for other work, or take training to get into new occupations. Typically there are major losses involved in this process—people's work skills erode when they are idle, spirits are depressed, and they lose the habits and patterns of work that are so important to personal and family stability.

Work-sharing avoids that problem. For instance, instead of laying off 25 per cent of the workers, a company and its employees agree that the available work will be shared and all of them will work a 30-hour week instead of a 40-hour week. The government pays unemployment insurance benefits for a quarter of the week to all the workers, instead of paying for the full week to one quarter of the workers.

Despite the extensive European use of these work-sharing programs and their apparent benefits to individuals and companies, the system has not yet been tried in Canada and we want to make sure that it will work here. After experimentation and assessment next year, we may find voluntary and temporary work-sharing arrangements are measures we wish to develop widely for use in short-term, non-seasonal slowdowns.

The work-sharing experiments will be developed and carried on by a very small but highly effective service, the Manpower Consultative Service, which my department has operated for a decade, and which we shall expand for this purpose.

The Manpower Consultative Service brings together companies, workers, and unions to develop an action plan for overcoming a variety of employment problems. Such problems may range from an impending shutdown, resulting from difficulties occasioned by technological change; problems associated with high turnover and chronic absenteeism; to simple problems of anticipated shortages of skilled workers. Although too little known, the Manpower Consultative Service is one of the most effective preventive tools we have. It eliminates, before they arise, many employment problems that workers and companies would otherwise face.

Another new productive use of unemployment insurance lies in the field of occupational training. Our plan is to encourage unemployed people who lack job skills to use their idle time to take training and prepare for the new jobs that will develop. Naturally we shall not train people who already have marketable skills; we shall train only for skills that we believe will be in demand. Unemployment insurance will partly replace our regular training allowances and thereby free funds to provide for additional industrial and institutional training.

We also plan to experiment with direction job creation projects in which unemployed Canadians receiving unemployment insurance will be offered the chance to participate in community service projects. We would, of course, maintain job counselling and job search activities so that they could move to regular private sector jobs that became available. But in the meantime they could protect their job skills and enhance their feeling of participating in activities of community value.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), right off the bat I must accuse him of plagiarism. Obviously he has dug up some Conservative policies and platforms of the fifties. All of this was implemented years ago. Six of these schools were established for technical and vocational training. It is unfortunate that the program was not continued by the Liberals. However, I congratulate the minister this evening on reviving this very successful Conservative program. I am sure it will be very successful.

I am familiar with the technical school that was established in Manitoba by the Diefenbaker government. I checked figures there. It has trained many Canadians, young and old, to a profession. In this it has been very successful. The minister is to be congratulated for continuing this Conservative program, even though there was a ten year lapse.

Tonight I would like to take the opportunity to extend my congratulations and best wishes for good health to His Excellency the Governor General, and Madam Léger. Their presence and participation at the opening of this session of parliament served to re-affirm our continued support of the monarchy which makes Canada such a unique nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKenzie: At the outset I believe I would be remiss if I did not take a few moments to extend my belated birthday greetings to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and to assure him that we on this side of the House spared nothing to make sure he got a resounding birthday message from the people of Ottawa-Carleton and St. John's West. If the Prime Minister were to call a general election for his next birthday I am sure the voters of Canada would be even more generous in their greetings and present him with an early retirement.

I will never cease to be amazed at what the Prime Minister will do to divert public attention away from the real issues facing Canada. A year ago the Prime Minister announced on Thanksgiving Day that his government had a well prepared contingency plan to fight inflation. Now, a year later, as the economic health of Canada continues to deteriorate, the Liberal government has come up with another act of governmental showbiz to cloud the issues.

What I am specifically referring to is the decision of the Prime Minister to send his cabinet around the country selling bilingualism. This is a red herring that the Liberal government is using in its desperate attempt to make as many people as possible overlook the poor state of the economy.

At the present time there are approximately 750,000 Canadians unemployed. This gets us back to the minister's statement tonight. The government never acts when it sees trouble on the horizon. Instead of acting when there are 200,000 or 300,000 unemployed, it waits until there are 750,000. It has to be absolute, complete, total disaster before its members say maybe they had better do something. Then what they do is dig up an old Conservative program because they have no ideas of their own. They are completely bankrupt of any original ideas. At a time when approximately 750,000 Canadians are unemployed, surely one has to wonder whether their priorities are totally mixed up, or are they confused? Under the guise of promoting national unity the Liberals have angered and frustrated many Canadians. This folly must stop and the government should start concerning itself with the key national problem—our economy.

● (2040)

As a member who came here first in 1972 I have to admit that even after nearly four years I still have a difficult time determining when the Prime Minister and his government are telling the truth and when they are not. When the Prime Minister publicly admitted in Saint John, New Brunswick, that the Liberals had lied on the controls issue during the 1974 election I was not at all surprised. It served to reinforce the question: when are the Liberals telling the truth and when are they resorting to falsehoods? For example, in the Speech from the Throne the following passage appears:

> ... the government will continue to practice fiscal restraint. The control of inflation will remain the single most important condition for economic stability in Canada, even after price and income controls are removed. Determined restraint in fiscal and monetary policy is essential to the long-term control of inflation.

These are worthy goals, Mr. Speaker, but looking at the record I find myself wondering when the Liberal government began to practice fiscal restraint and to control inflation. This is but one example of the doubt it creates. To say there is a credibility gap would be an understatement.

It is deceitful on the part of the government to pretend that bilingualism is now the burning issue of the day when no serious attempt has been made to restore health to the economy. Anyone taking a close look at the government's economic record would be bound to agree that ministerial priorities are confusing, to say the least. The last significant legislation introduced by the Trudeau administration was the controls program last fall. For almost 12 months the country was without any economic accounting, and the budget which did come down in May took no initiative in the economic field. Instead it left responsibility for restraint to the provinces, and responsibility for growth stimulus to the United States. Yet the government still acts as though our economy is in fine shape. Who are the Canadian people to believe?

Prior to last May's budget there were four events which had serious impact upon the economy. First was the resignation of finance minister John Turner who will be proven to be the most irresponsible minister of finance in Canadian history because of the way he allowed government spending to run rampant. There was the about-face of the Liberals on the controls issue, and, of course, the Prime Minister's speech on his new society. Last I should mention the way in which the controls program was, and still is, being handled. Each of these events damaged confidence in the economy at a time when inflation, industrial disputes, and a worsening balance of payments deficit were only further testing the system. When such reputable groups as the Economic Council of Canada, the C.D. Howe Institute, and the Canadian Chamber of Commerce all share the view that our economy is in a mess we can be sure they are not exaggerating. It is small wonder the government is using diversionary tactics to take people's minds off the economy.

Government spending presents a greater threat to the future of Canada than any other which faces us. With a projected federal spending deficit amounting to $6 billion I am of the opinion that the Prime Minister and his cabinet should be explaining to the Canadian people how they intend to solve present economic problems rather than gallivanting around the country spouting rhetoric on the Liberal-created issue of national unity. Wastefulness and bureaucratic incompetence only bring us closer and closer to bankruptcy.

The annual report of the Auditor General presented last December confirmed a deeply rooted belief held by many Canadians that the Liberal government is the biggest culprit in bringing about the growth of inflation. In his last report the Auditor General served up columns of shocking news, horrible stories of mismanagement, bumbling, over-spending—black comedy at the expense of the taxpayer. From all the reports of financial mismanagement it is evident that the Liberals have lost their grip on government spending. Policy objectives are not being reached. Millions are being wasted because of official sloppiness, poor communications, and abrogation of responsibility. These have all become the trademarks of the Liberal Party of Canada.

People cannot fail to be concerned about what the Auditor General has to say with regard to the government's financial habits. In the face of the combination of high inflation and high unemployment which has sent the economy staggering, the government can no longer ignore the cry for better financial control in Ottawa. In his report the Auditor General stated, and I quote:

> The present state of financial management and control systems of departments and agencies of the Government of Canada is significantly below acceptable standards of quality and effectiveness.

Soon after that statement appeared in the Auditor General's Report, the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse), in his capacity as Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, put the following question to the Auditor General:

> Since the Auditor General is so critical about the financial controls in government departments, how can you assure the House that the public accounts and financial statements of the government are accurate and reliable?

The Auditor General's response was:

> We feel very strongly about the fact that unless the systems are corrected the day may well come when I cannot give a clear certificate on the accounts of Canada.

I contend, Mr. Speaker, that this gives us a clear indication of the financial fiasco the Liberal government has led us into. The financial implications are such that one must wonder aloud why the government is employing accounting procedures which it would not accept were they used by a business or by a private citizen. Revenue officials have little patience with an individual whose books are not clear and accurate, yet the government is using methods about which the Auditor General has serious reservations.

The Liberal government has become a spending machine without a control centre. For the record, I should like to call attention to a few examples in support of that statement. The Department of National Defence, at the time of a national housing crisis, lost $214,000 on unoccupied housing in Halifax where there was a severe housing shortage. The Department of Supply and Services wasted $3.8 million on a computerized government payroll system which proved unworkable and had to be abandoned. The federal government paid $4.5 million for offices it did not use. The federal government has developed a bizarre practice of making loans to itself and then counting the loans as assets.

Those, Mr. Speaker, constitute but a tiny sampling of the gross financial misdeeds of the Liberal government. This is why I have serious reservations about the section in the Speech from the Throne which states:

> You will be asked to consider a bill designed to clarify the duties and responsibilities of the Auditor General of Canada and to provide him with better means of fulfilling his important function as a servant of parliament.

My reservations stem from the past performance of the Liberal government which has failed to act on the recommendations of the Auditor General to put its financial house in order. Again, this goes back to my comments that it is difficult to determine if the government is telling the truth or using deception. Judging from their past performance, however, one can only assume that the Liberals are being less than sincere.

We on this side of the House have for some time been in favour of strengthening the office of the Auditor General. Time and time again our calls for implementation of his recommendations have fallen upon the deaf ears of the government. To date, little if any action has been taken on the report of the independent review committee with regard to the office of the Auditor General. Yet we are now asked to take seriously the government's pledge to assist that office. I hope members opposite are sincere in their intentions, Mr. Speaker, motivated by the way in which government spending has gone out of control, that this is not just political window dressing in a further attempt to con the public into thinking the government is actually serious about fiscal restraint.

A Progressive Conservative government would be committed to the idea of being prepared to be completely accountable to parliament for all government spending. At the present time the control of supply by the elected representatives is not respected by the Liberal government. It has reached the point where spending estimates are presented in a form that cannot be readily understood. The public accounts are insufficient enough to let the government get away with unlimited spending.

● (2050)

Let me point out that it was the Liberal government that in 1969 changed the rules under closure and put an end to the proper examination of federal government spending. Now liberals have trapped themselves. They do not even know what is going on today. They are under the complete control of the bureaucracy. Not only are parliament and the public unable to assess the value or purpose of much of the government's spending, but even the cabinet, treasury board, department heads and program managers are unable to judge the worth of what they are doing. It is no wonder that the Auditor General has publicly stated that parliament has lost effective control over government spending.

It was somewhat refreshing to hear the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) a former cabinet minister, say to this House last week, as reported at page 83 of Hansard:

> Whether the government is able to proceed down this middle road will depend in some part on how this parliament can control government spending.
>
> The point I am going to make is that we do not now control government spending—

Then the hon. member for Scarborough East went on to say:

> In my view it is urgent that we find new means of controlling government spending—

It is so ridiculous, Mr. Speaker, under the present committee system to examine the estimates after all the money has been spent. I suggest this is one of the most irresponsible actions of the government. Reviewing spending estimates after the money has been spent is an absolute joke. As I was saying, it was refreshing to hear a former Liberal cabinet minister come to grips with the evils of increased government spending and take a positive stand by offering what in many respects sounded like Progressive Conservative proposals.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has proposed certain action to be taken if we form the government. For example, he has called for the strengthening of the committee system in parliament by giving the committees investigative powers so that public spending might be better scrutinized. The actual record of the Liberal government, compared to its performance, can only lead one to conclude that it is a government that cannot be trusted, Mr. Speaker. Only a change in government will alter the trend of financial mismanagement.

There are, of course, other areas where the government has created a breach of faith with Canadians because it has said one thing and done another. Freedom of information is a perfect example of the double standards of the Liberal government. My colleague, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), has done an excellent job of bringing this issue into the public forum and has shown leadership in the effort to make government more open. This is indeed a healthy move at a time when there is growing cynicism with government. Even the former member for Ottawa-Carleton has been crusading for freedom of information.

It would seem to me that the emphasis on freedom of information in the throne speech is another example of the Liberal government's attempting to use an issue for the sake of political expediency. It is interesting to note that the government has hit an all-time high in the use of terms such as "top secret", "confidential", "restricted", and so on to cover even the most trivial government documents. Yet it now expects us to believe that it is suddenly going to be open.

On September 7 Gordon Robertson, secretary to the cabinet for federal-provincial relations, said this in the course of a speech:

> Most of the articulate argument in favour of increased access to government documents comes from special interests—the media, members of parliament—

He says members of parliament are a special interest group. We are here to represent the people.

> —the pressure groups, and the academics.

What I find amazing about that statement, Mr. Speaker, is that an employee of the federal cabinet is insinuating that members of parliament are a special interest group. As elected representatives of the people I am sure that my colleagues share my feeling that an employee of the Liberal government should have more respect for parliament than to insinuate that it is just another group that is after government documents. I wonder what the real attitude of the Liberal government is on freedom of information.

I should like to take a few minutes, Mr. Speaker, to touch on the subject of bilingualism. For too long the Liberal party has used bilingualism as a political device to claim that it was the be all and end all of national unity. All too often in the past the public has been led to believe that this nation could only be united under a Liberal government. I share the sentiments of my leader who, on October 13, said that the manner in which bilingualism has been implemented has caused some concern among Canadians.

I can understand this concern among Canadians. The two ministers who spoke today, the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts), and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), came to Winnipeg and said that western Canadians are shoving English down the throats of the citizens of Quebec. That is all they said; they did not qualify it. I say that is a lot of nonsense. I find very little support for Bill 22 under which Canadians are being denied the right to learn English in the province of Quebec. That could only happen under a Liberal government. As I was saying, the Leader of the Opposition said there was concern among many Canadians, both French speaking and English speaking, but that there is no reason to call them bigots or racists.

Many moderate and reasonable Canadians are growing apprehensive about bilingualism because they doubt the motives of the Liberal government. As the Leader of the Opposition has said, a government without trust cannot govern, because trust in a federal and diverse country like Canada is elemental to national unity. This government no longer has that trust, Mr. Speaker. Many Canadians have become apprehensive about bilingualism because of such things as the Liberal attitude on Bill 22 in Quebec, the practice of having middle aged civil servants take costly and unnecessary language training, rather than develop long-range programs, use of a quota system at the expense of the merit system, a bilingual labelling and packaging act which is hurting many businesses, and finally, over-all implementation of bilingualism.

I can only concur with my colleague, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner), who said:

> The principle of bilingualism is only valid when it means the same to Canadians as the principle of fairness. This government has somehow managed to divide the two principles in the minds of many Canadians. That is the single, greatest tragedy of the present government. That is the single, most gnawing doubt that attacks the very gut and fibre of our country. There the record of this government is a record of failure.

The Secretary of State and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration also stated in Winnipeg that they were not shoving French down the throats of Canadians. I attended one meeting where the Secretary of State made that statement and I pointed out to him that this is what was happening. The government is forcing French television channels into areas where they are not needed or not wanted, as was the case in northern Manitoba, British Columbia, and St. Thomas, Ontario.

Yesterday the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) related how the CBC was cancelling out an FM radio station in his area in order to bring in a French channel, and his area is 98 per cent English speaking. If I were a government member I would not be trying to shove an English channel down the throats of the citizens of Rimouski if they did not want it. I am sure Rimouski is about 98 per cent French speaking and the people there want French radio stations and French television stations. I say that the Liberal government is shoving French down people's throats in implementing the bilingualism program.

Some of the members of this party have attended CRTC hearings to oppose the introduction of these channels in areas where they are unnecessary. I hear a lot of rumbling on the other side, Mr. Speaker. Let them get up on their feet and say something about this. I am complaining about the implementation of the program on the part of the government. If that program, which was introduced in 1969, is so terrific, why was it brought back into the House of Commons in 1973 to be re-endorsed? And hon. members are still talking about it. That program is an absolute, complete and total failure, and 20 years from now we will still be talking about it and there will still be dissension.

● (2100)

The government does not know what it is doing. A Progressive Conservative government would not use bilingualism as an emotional political issue, because we want to make Canada a better place. When the former minister of national defence had to resign over the government's language policy you can be sure the Liberal government is not acting in the best interests of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKenzie: Would the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) kindly get up on his feet? You are always mumbling and rumbling over there.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: O.K., Joe, you are on.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I have to wait until the hon. member sits down. The only point I wish to make, Mr. Speaker, is that the only thing I said was that the only thing the member knows is how to read, because that is what he is doing, reading.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. There is no point of order.

Mr. McKenzie: I know exactly what I am doing, Mr. Speaker. I am speaking for the people of Manitoba.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Keep on reading, because that is what you are doing.

Mr. McKenzie: You are not speaking for the people of Manitoba. You are an absolute mouse. We never hear anything from you at all on any issue—nothing. You were challenged to go on the radio station with me to discuss Liberal policies.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): When?

Mr. McKenzie: They could not get you to show up. They can never get a Liberal to show up on a radio station in Manitoba to discuss Liberal policy.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am speaking to you and not to the hon. member opposite. If I was not with him on that radio station, the only reason was that I realized my responsibility was to be in this House and not on a radio station shooting my mouth off on things I know nothing about. I would rather be here representing my constituency than be away when I should be in the House. I have the best record of being in the House every day of the year, while the hon. member is away half the time.

An hon. Member: That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I can bring out the record any time.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. Boniface is here representing the Liberal party, he is not here representing the residents of the constituency of St. Boniface. I am here representing my people, and his remarks about me only being here part of the time are incorrect. I am here five days a week.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I will prove that you are never here five days a week and I have got the records right here. Anybody who wants to see them I have them right here.

Mr. McKenzie: And that record is about as phony as everything else on that side.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I am looking at it now, Mr. Speaker, and I will show it to him any time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, we come back on the same plane every Sunday night. I am a five-day a week member.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): We can check the record because you are never here.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, that is a red herring and obviously this member is nothing but a Liberal puppet. I have lost my place here now. Mr. Speaker, the government has let the Canadian people down, but rather than dwell on partisan matters I would like to say that we on this side of the House are not going to sit around complacently and allow the government to defeat itself without our offering positive and constructive alternatives for Canada. That would be doing the country a grave injustice. The Progressive Conservative party is going to be ready to form a government which will give leadership in every field, and a distinct alternative to the present government.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, it would be a very positive sign if the government would repent and change, but we all know better. It will not do that, yet I know that in a short time Canadians will have the opportunity of restoring confidence and faith by joining their fellows from Ottawa-Carleton and St. John's West, giving Canada a Progressive Conservative government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Matane): Mr. Speaker, I was very concerned about certain themes which were brought up during the debate by a good majority of members as well as by certain ministers. The first assertion that worried me is that which some members used to try to give a restrictive interpretation of the Official Languages Act. A great number of members—especially those who are English-speaking—and certain ministers said that the sole objective of this act was to allow citizens of this country, and particularly the francophones, to communicate in French with the federal government.

If this is my reason for being here, I can assure you that this type of fight does not interest me in the least. Indeed, we must consider the fact that a mostly bilingual minority, especially the French-speaking group outside Quebec, will always have a tendency to use the language of the strongest group, particularly when this language corresponds to the real dynamics of the community, and it is not the offer of linguistic services which can go against what we can still call the basic law of economic means. There are those who want to weaken this law to the point of a caricature so as to allow us to communicate in French with the government and to receive a reply in French. It is certainly not worth it to fight for objectives so subtle and insignificant.

The second theme which has often been brought up concerns the inhuman implementation of the Official Languages Act. On this subject, I would like to recall that the implementation of the Official Languages Act was negotiated with the Public Service Alliance, the union which represents civil servants, and unless I am mistaken, I have not often heard the union complain about the implementation of the act, since it was done with its full agreement. On the other hand the commissioner of Official Languages himself has concluded after many investigations that if there are in fact some terrible examples of implementation, the percentage of such occurrences under this policy is really insignificant.

The other theme which was often touched upon concerns the fact that the implementation of this act has been much too rapid. I would like to quote a few figures to show that, since the statement made by the Right Hon. L. B. Pearson about 15 years ago, far from being rapid, advances concerning linguistic equality have been extremely slow. It is therefore useless to put on safety belts since everything is happening at a very slow pace.

In 1976 a mere 12 per cent of federal civil servants are working in their mother tongue which is French. If you look at French-speaking Canadians, there are six times as many—almost 75 per cent—who can work in their mother tongue. If we look at the National Capital area only 7 per cent of the positions require French proficiency while in this city which is supposed to reflect the language duality of our country, more than 66 per cent of the positions require English proficiency only.

In fact, according to a study made by the Treasury Board in 1975, the majority of French-speaking Canadians working in the National Capital area must do so in English. In the province of Quebec, more than 40 per cent of the positions require English proficiency. I am not even talking about French-speaking persons who must work exclusively in English in the province of Quebec, which is true for 12 per cent of those in the so-called technical category. Of course there is even worse: like the Air Canada repair workshop where the use of French has always been completely forbidden.

[Mr. De Bané.]

I wish to quote a few figures about the development of the situation in 1974 and two years later, that is today. At the Agriculture Department, in 1974 only 5.6 per cent of the management was French-speaking and today, in 1976, it is 5.3 per cent. At the Canadian Livestock Feed Board, the Francophones were 3.4 per cent in 1974 against 3.5 per cent today. In the Customs and Excise Division of National Revenue we held 26 per cent of management positions two years ago and today 20 per cent. In the Taxation Division 9.5 per cent of the management were French-speaking three years ago and, today, 6 per cent. In the Consumer and Corporate Affairs Department, 14.8 per cent of the management was French-speaking in 1974 and today this figure has dropped to a mere 9 per cent. Two years ago the Communications Department included 10.9 per cent of French-speaking scientists and today they are even less than that. The Canadian Transportation Commission had 16 per cent of Francophones two years ago and today they have 14 per cent. At National Defence, the percentage of French-speaking employed in a managerial capacity was 4.3, now it is 4.2; to put it another way, out of 24 members of management there was only one French-speaking Canadian. In the Environment Department with 53 management positions two years ago, ten were held by French-speaking persons. Today there is one more Francophone and 11 Anglophones, so this obviously reduces substantially the percentage of French-speaking employees. At Energy, Mines and Resources, quite an important department, two years ago we had 24 English-speaking and two French-speaking members of management. Today the management of that department boasts 31 English-speaking and still only two French-speaking members. At the Department of External Affairs, there were eleven positions two years ago, one French-speaking employee; today, the situation is the same. At the Department of Finance, only two out of 27 management positions were held by French-speaking persons. Today the situation is exactly the same. At the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, French-speaking employees represent 13 per cent of the personnel. At the Department of Urban Affairs, they represented 18 per cent of management two years ago and they have now shrunk to 6 per cent.

The B and B Commission pointed out the limited involvement of French-speaking employees at the intermediate and higher levels of the public service, the almost exclusive use of English as a working language and the gradual acculturation of the French-speaking civil servants. And some dare say today, notwithstanding these public figures, that we are going too fast. So much for that when it comes to language equalityin Ottawa; I am just as concerned about the situation in the province of Quebec where, according to some members, French unilingualism is the order of the day.

A French-speaking person wishing to take up a career in major industry in Quebec faces a dilemma. He feels he will often have to choose between his own promotion and the gradual loss of his linguistic and cultural identity. Even more, this person deeply feels he is alienated.

More than half the managerial staff of large firms think that a French Canadian who succeeds in a big company should be more English than French. And the firms which are prepared to appoint French-speaking Canadians to key positions always require at least three conditions: the candidates must be perfectly fluent in English, they must accept to be transferred outside Quebec and they must carry out their activity exactly like their English-speaking fellow employees, that is they must think and act in English.

If we look at the average income derived from work by salaried people in Quebec according to the ethnic origin, we notice that French Canadians rank just above the natives. Even more, with equal instruction, French Canadians earn less than other groups. It is to French Canadians that education benefits the least and the gains they have when going from the elementary to the secondary and the university level are even less than those of other groups.

Inside large Canadian manufacturing industries, we see fewer and fewer French Canadians as we go up the hierarchy. In Montreal, French Canadians make up 60 per cent of the staff but only 17 per cent of the executive, which is of 83 per cent English speaking. Ninety per cent of Canadian immigrants in the Montreal region adopt English as their new Canadian language and send their children to English schools even though they live in a province and a city where French is the language of the majority.

When the French-speaking population will have dropped to the rank of a minority in what is the only French-speaking metropolis in North America, something which may happen at the turn of the century at the rate we are going, future prospects will be irreversibly jeopardized for the French-speaking community of North America. We cannot therefore think of French Canada's future without first solving this problem. The present solution is untenable in the long run because it entails the genocide of the French speaking people.

In Quebec, blue collar workers come from the local labour force but three quarters of the positions with an annual salary of over $25,000 are taken up by administrators with English-speaking background. In Quebec, with the exception of Montreal, 30 per cent of the executives are English and they hold 80 per cent of the higher ranking positions even though they represent only about 7 per cent of the labour force. More than 96 per cent of French-speaking executives are bound by contract to be bilingual, whereas half of the English-speaking employees are not compelled to know French.

The case is even worse in Montreal, where 86 per cent of the English-speaking persons earning more than $25,000 a year are unilingual. The B and B Commission has reported that the English-speaking minority in Quebec earned the highest wages in all of Canada. Nowhere else do English-speaking workers earn as much as in Quebec. As noted in the report of the commission on the status of the French language and linguistic rights in Quebec, a royal commission set up by the Quebec government under the chairmanship of Mr. Jean-Denis Gendron, and I quote:

> Even though they are relatively few in number, the English-speaking residents of Quebec succeed in giving their mother tongue a usage status equal in importance to that of French. The balance is in favour of English as soon as we consider the numerical importance of linguistic groups or note the appeal of this language for the third group.

And to quote the report of the same commission, on page 25 of the first volume:

> It is nonetheless clear, according to our data, that the vast majority of English people in Quebec (660,000 out of 788,000) are not obliged to use French. We will get many other confirmations, but this first confirmation is significant for it is quite a good indication, on the numerical viewpoint, to what extent, in view of the public and private institution we have referred to, Anglophones can live together with Francophones without any contact with them. It is obvious then that francophones bear the cost of their language when the moment comes to set up the necessary contacts between both communities, particularly in labour relations.

Mr. Speaker, individually, within each generation since 1760, thousands of French Canadians join or try to join the English population of North America. In other Canadian provinces and in the United States, over two million are now totally integrated into the Anglo-American mass. Within the very borders of the province of Quebec, that individual assimilation process has been going on for two centuries, but with a great deal of difficulty, because French Canadians always made up and still make up the majority of the Quebec population. They always kept sight of the fact that they represent a community, a society, nay, a separate nation.

Now, the latter, as such, has been living a self-contained existence for three and a half centuries in the St. Lawrence Valley. We are beginning to realize both in French and English Canada that we must immediately give up our illusions of yester years. Canada will not be populated by a French-speaking majority as Quebec had long hoped for. On the other hand, the survival of French Canadians as a distinct community in Quebec is an accomplished fact. Any realistic policy must rest on the realization that two major groups or two nations now co-exist in Canada. Such is the wish of history.

The political philosophy of French-speaking people in Quebec is no longer that of a group who, having survived linguistically, would be contented with a minority status. Therefore two conclusions must be drawn: first, the need to put an end to the misconception on which the association of French- and English-speaking Canadians within confederation has been resting up to the present day and, second, the need to grant official recognition to the national rights of French Canadians.

Yielding to the will of the nation which had conquered the St. Lawrence Valley, the descendants of the vanquished in 1760 had to accept their fate as a minority group. The few concessions which their leaders gained concerning the use of French, the preservation of civil rights in Quebec and the protection of Catholic schools made this acceptance easier. It remains nevertheless that French Canadians were permanently reduced as a community to a subordinate position in the country built by the conquerors of 1760 and their heirs.

Each time they were convinced by their leaders that their unfortunate condition was solely due to the ill will of a few English Canadian extremists. They were only too willing to believe that sooner or later all Canadians would show the same patriotism and have the same ideals. French Canadians thought that one day English Canada would no longer be English Canada. It seems that most of them thought that soon English Canadians would at last share their views.

Many French Canadians even believed for quite a long while that the community they belonged to was itself mainly if not solely responsible for their misfortunes. Supreme humiliation, the people who have been brought into subjection are generally inclined to feel they are themselves responsible for their unhappy fate and to accuse themselves publicly of loosing because they were not bold enough.

The time has come for English Canadians to realize that the French Canadians of Quebec will never be assimilated. On the contrary, since they have been better educated and better prepared for their modern tasks, French Canadians, far from giving up the fact that they want to live as a collectivity, a willingness that the former generations maintained with the few means they had, want to give it another dimension. The French-Canadian nation is buoying with new social, economic and political ideas. It is no longer a question of surviving, of building up a new human environment where it can fully develop and where it can offer to all its members all those possibilities of promotion which up to now had not existed.

To the worries and distress of most of the peoples of the earth in this era of violence, both physical and symbolical, we must add those of a people which strives for its survivance and its development. Now that it is fully self-conscious, it feels, deep in itself, that it must accomplish an uncommon destiny, but the conditions of this accomplishment are not always obvious.

For more than ten years, I have been involved in all the great battles which marked the life of Quebec in Ottawa. I passionately lived through the whole evolution of this linguistic and ethnic duality which claims to be the very essence of our great country. One day, the crisis bursts out, the blow is hard. The next day, you wake up all alone, disarmed, reduced to nothing, contemplating a national catastrophy in which all our hopes for unity and fraternity were destroyed. The national unity of Canada is now greatly threatened. It hurts, it really hurts when you see yourself a prisoner, unable to guide your own destiny, the prisoner of a play written in advance.

I realize more and more that our behaviour shows a false confidence, it contributes to create a situation which is in fact artificial because we try with all possible means to evade a sometimes unduly disturbing reality. Canada is built up of two different nations, cultures, languages. Consequently, unless we want the state to split up, it is very urgent that we recognize that socio-political reality and adapt to it quickly as long as it is still time.

From the cultural point of view, some want to subjugate the French-speaking Canadians by bringing the French-speaking majority of Quebec to the condition of the French-speaking minorities in other provinces, where the differences of languages, laws, origins, traditions are not recognized as a sufficient basis to justify and preserve a real autonomy which at the same time could be legally and practically recognized in a constitution which would respect the sociological reality.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I wonder why my colleague, who has a certain experience and knows the practice of the House, insists on reading his speech.

Mr. Duclos: This is not a rare occurrence in the House!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No, but we must listen and be objective. Some newly elected backbenchers still insist they are entitled to read their speeches.

Mr. Duclos: This is not so!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Duclos: This is not so! Why did the hon. member not rise earlier?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): There may be standing orders, but they are antiquated. They are outdated. We should not read from notes in this House, but I believe this is done every day, and I would allow the hon. member from Matane to go on with his remarks.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Edmonton West on a point of order.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I insist that the hon. member put his views forward without reading from notes. I have known him for a long time, and I insist that we shall have—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Duclos: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Montmorency on a point of order.

Mr. Duclos: Mr. Speaker, I would simply remind the hon. member for Edmonton West that on both sides of this House we are on equal footing. Whether we have been elected in 1974, in 1972 or 1968, there should be no difference. I speak as much for my opposition colleagues who were elected in 1974 or 1972.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. This has degenerated into a debate, and I do not believe there is a bona fide point of order on either side. I would therefore allow the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané) to go on with his remarks.

Mr. De Bané: Such a constant attitude of wondering about one's destiny may be interpreted as a sign of good health. It is an indication in any case of a will to live, which is, of course, an essential condition for the survival of any community. However, there is the risk that it may dampen energies.

A community cannot wonder indefinitely about its identity and its destiny. It must hold on to a core of certainty, cling to certain answers. There is now a strong feeling that French Canada must make important options. It must take up difficult challenges, which requires a great deal of lucidity and courage. So, it has become obvious that French Canada cannot count on the support of Quebec or Canadian Anglophones. The latter are totally indifferent to the problems, unaware of their importance or unwilling to do so. They do not understand or pretend not to understand how vital the problem is to the whole French-Canadian community that barely makes up 2 per cent of the population in North America.

That is one of the reasons why I think the concept of a bilingual Canada is a faulty political solution to the cultural problems that must be posed in different terms. An analysis of the destiny of French Canada and English Canada in North America and their quest for identity finally always boils down to two national communities with close historical links pursuing their future in an independant way.

On the other hand, the French Canadian never feels at home in a English-Canadian nationalism, while the English-Canadian, particularly if he is a second generation Canadian of non-British origin, remains irremediably impervious to French-Canadian nationalism. I still believe that the only political formula likely to provide both national communities with the required relative autonomy and guarantee them the conditions of cultural self-determination would be to entrench in a new constitution the concept of two nations and their association in a renewed confederation.
