We must be grateful to the Laurendeau-Dunton Commission in its preliminary and subsequent reports for not trying to conceal the fact that the Canadian reality is still from the ideal from which it draws its inspiration. In its preliminary report the Commission dealt plainly with the crisis and the increasing perils which threaten Canada. A main point emerged: the ambiguity of the Canadian ideal resulted in Canada being defined until now in different, and even contradictory terms. Francophones have traditionally insisted on Canadian duality, Anglophones on Canadian unity, ethnic minorities, integration or diversity. French Canadians believed in equality; English Canadians held up the concepts of majority and minority; the other ethnic groups hesitated between multiculturalism and complete assimilation. Quebecers make up a community whose majority is composed of—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Edmonton West on a point of order.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I insist on the fact that the hon. member for Matane does not have the right to read his speech in the House. It is a rule established long before the protesting hon. members opposite came here. Further, I insist so that the hon. member whose representations I respect—

[English]

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) has no lesson to make to me.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) wants to interrupt me. I simply want to tell her that if she wants to quote us as an example, that is not a reason to disregard the Standing Orders. If she means that the hon. member for Matane or the Chair insist that we should have in this place prepared speeches on all occasions, then we have the Standing Orders. The assistant whip of the Liberal party can say in his lack of knowledge that we have the right to use and abuse speeches prepared by some researchers. If the hon. member for Matane—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): If the hon. member for Matane—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. The hon. member has set forth his views. In Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, citation 144, it is said that hon. members cannot read a prepared speech in the House. He can quote some notes from time to time and the Chair had the impression that the hon. member was doing so. If he reads from a speech, I hope he will simply follow his notes and continue his speech, but he should not read it.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): May I make a comment Mr. Speaker? The hon. member did not make any correction—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member did not make a single correction.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) on a point of order.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I find the points being made by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) to be phony.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: It is absolutely phony for that member to get up in the House and comment upon a member on the opposite side reading his speech when we witnessed a whole line of Tories reading their speeches this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the hon. member that he take the beam out of his own party's eye before he starts taking the speck out of somebody else's eye.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): This from the greatest reader in the House—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) rises on a question of privilege.

Mrs. Holt: Mr. Speaker, I feel that since I have been attacked here, and other backbenchers who have only been here one term are attacked—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Two terms.

Mrs. Holt: One term, two sessions. Mr. Speaker, it is wrong that we are insulted here. Maybe it is time there was new blood in this House; the old blood is running tired.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I would ask hon. members to curb their remarks and let the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané) continue his speech.

[Translation]

Mr. De Bané: Quebecers make up a community whose majority is composed of francophone Canadians. This Community has its own history, its own institutions, its own culture, its own way of life, its own values and its members are linked by unbreakable ties. We can therefore talk about a Quebec society or a Quebec nation. Each Canadian province has indeed its own people which differ from those of the next, but it is only in Quebec that it is possible to find a nation, in the sociological sense of the word. Whether we like it or not, Quebecers see themselves as Quebecers first, Canadians second. There are of course other nations in Canada, the Eskimos, the Indians. It is not the existence of a Quebec nation which is questioned here, but the principle whether every nation has the right to be necessarily independent, without consideration for any other nation.

The people from Quebec have always been nationalists. Before the sixties, Quebec nationalism was rather conservative, arising largely from a defence reflex and from an insecurity feeling which we must not be ashamed of. Any people in the world in the same situation as Quebecers would have behaved in a similar way. As for the new nationalism, its history is still too recent to enable us to place a final label on it. However, it seems much more dynamic than before, more open, in a word, more positive. One thing is certain, it is here to stay. All those who think that the mixing of ideas and initiatives which has taken and is still taking place in Quebec is a temporary phenomenon are making a big mistake.

We do not argue that each Quebecer as an individual is clearly aware of all those differences we are trying to emphasize. We do not contend either that all Quebecers unanimously agree on political measures to take. On the contrary, there are considerable differences of opinion. This is quite normal. However, the fact is that the Quebec society represents a separate entity and gradually, it understands that its full development requires a certain freedom and the presence of psychological conditions which are not present now.

One can always argue, through ignorance or to alleviate one's conscience, that within the present constitutional framework Quebec can act almost as it wants in areas under its jurisdiction and that it rests with it to assume all its responsibilities. This line of thinking, which reassures those who are concerned about possible changes, is deceitful. It is only true for legislative matters which undoubtedly are and have always been recognized by everybody as being under the exclusive jurisdiction of the province.

We are confronted by the following situation. On one hand, the Quebec society wants to assert its authority, find its identity, do what it wants within the Canadian framework. This movement is not only powerful but it is here for good. On the other hand, the basic law of the land, that is the Constitution, which should normally determine the rules of the game and to which we should be able to refer to whenever there is a dispute, is outdated, inappropriate, both in its form and its content and above all, it entirely ignores the existence of a distinct Quebec society.

As I am running out of time, Mr. Speaker, I should like to conclude my remarks with the following quote from Arnold Toynbee:

> If a generally happy future awaits humanity, then I willingly predict that there is hope, in the old world for the Chinese . . .

Mr. Speaker, I think that—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I think we should give the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané) the opportunity to finish his remarks.

● (2130)

[Translation]

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Speaker, I shall refrain from using unparliamentary language. No, let us continue to overlook what has just been said.

And now to go back to Arnold Toynbee. He said, and I quote:

> If a generally happy future awaits humanity, then I willingly predict that there is hope, in the old world for the Chinese, in the island of North America for the French Canadians. Whatever the future holds for humanity in North America, I am almost sure that those French-speaking Canadians, at all events, will still be there when the adventure comes to a close.

No matter how one envisages the Quebec fact, one realizes that there is no other solution for that people but to continue to endure and fight for its survival.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time is over.

[English]

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that these notes I have here are just to be of psychological assistance to what will be an extemporaneous speech.

● (2140)

First, I join with my colleagues in congratulating the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He didn't read that.

Mr. Jarvis: Second, Sir, I extend my sincere congratulations to you. I hope that we, your colleagues in this House, will be the benefactors of your wisdom, good nature, and understanding during the second session of the present parliament.

Mr. Rodriguez: He didn't read that, either.

Mr. Jarvis: I am all right so far, John. Third, I extend good wishes to the newly appointed Minister of the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc), who is combining that responsibility with the responsibility for fisheries. I came to know him when he was minister of state responsible for fisheries. I enjoyed that association and certainly respect and admire him. I particularly wanted to say that, because I think what I said reflects the views of most members of this House. More important, much of what I shall say tonight, and I shall confine my remarks mostly to the environment, could be interpreted by some as a personal attack on the minister. That is certainly not my intention. I wish to make that very clear.

I deplore the appointment of a minister responsible for both fisheries and the environment. The combination of these two responsibilities is, in my view, and the view of members in all parties, I believe, a regressive step. It is retrograde, that is, it is a step backward, not forward. I believe that this regression is emphasized when a government appoints a former minister of state responsible for fisheries as Minister of Fisheries and the Environment because, immediately, there is a perceptual problem. It is this. Such a minister will be perceived as being preoccupied with those responsibilities concerning fisheries, to the detriment of the challenging problems concerning his environmental responsibilities. He will be perceived in that light, accurately, I suggest, by many in this country. The jobs are conflicting ones, by their very nature. The hon. member opposite from the west coast should know that because, of all provinces of this country, British Columbia ought to be most concerned about the preservation of its delicate environment.

What I am tempted to say, at least in a moral sense, is that there is a conflict of interest. But I shall content myself with saying this: these two interests, fisheries and the environment, often by their nature are in an adversary position. How then can these interests be served adequately by one minister?

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) himself has been known to say, for example, with respect to the departments of agriculture and consumer and corporate affairs, that the adversary approach is a welcome one and healthy one. I have no quarrel with that statement but I would be interested in knowing how the right hon. gentleman could justify the combination of responsibilities for fishermen and for environmentalists under one minister as acceptable, welcome or healthy.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He misjudges the people of Canada.

Mr. Jarvis: I personally was not content to have a minister of state for fisheries on the one hand, and a minister of the environment on the other, within the same department. Although I may not have been content, at least that situation was far better than the present situation whereby one minister exercises dual responsibilities. Therefore I say to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment, through you, Mr. Speaker, that I reject categorically the wisdom of this particular appointment, without any reflection whatever on the hon. member who at present is undertaking these responsibilities.

I believe the opportunity to serve both interests has been weakened, and weakened seriously. I suggest again, because it demands our emphasis, that the present minister, because of his previous responsibilities, is perceived as being more preoccupied with fisheries than with the environment.

The problem is much more serious than a merely perceptual one. As is well known, the party for which I speak tonight has long adopted the position—

An hon. Member: The hon. member is wearing his glasses.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, I would welcome the intervention of the member from British Columbia with respect to the environment.

Mrs. Holt: Mr. Speaker, I regret rising on a point of order because the hon. member is making a favourite kind of speech, but just a few minutes ago a former Speaker of this House made a great scene in the House. The hon. member opposite had to put on his glasses to read his speech. The hon. member on my side already wore glasses.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, I hasten to assure the hon. member that, if I could, I would wear contact lenses; and if that would offend the hon. member less I would make every effort to do that.

Mrs. Holt: Mr. Speaker, nothing was said to the hon. member opposite, yet the hon. member made it impossible for us to hear the speech made by the hon. member on my side—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I think the Chair gave ample time to the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané) to finish his speech. Perhaps hon. members will afford the same courtesy to the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis).

Mr. Jarvis: I thank the hon. member for her intervention. I was about to quote the Prime Minister. I hope she will not object—because I would hate to misquote him.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: It's impossible to paraphrase the guy.

Mr. Jarvis: For some years it has been the position of my party that not only should there be two separate ministers fulfilling these responsibilities, but that there should be two departments, distinct and separate, one for fisheries, and one for the environment. We repeat that position. We see no reason at all to change our position in this regard. We made our views known some years ago and events since then have only reinforced our belief, namely, that this is a proper and justifiable position.

It is apparent to us that the government is either unaware of the basic difference of these two departments or, in the alternative, is so completely indifferent to their individual importance that it chooses to reject the national and international implications connected with the operations of these two units of the government.

Surely one need not be an expert to appreciate that the nature of fisheries is economic, social, and even cultural. On the other hand, one does not need great perceptual insight to appreciate that with respect to the environment we are dealing basically with scientific research. By their very nature, activities concerning fisheries and the environment should be distinct and separate from each other. In ignoring this fact the government has undoubtedly weakened both sectors, at a time, unhappily, when both should have been strengthened.

One might say that combining these two activities under one minister is justified in terms of restraint. If the government had so ordered its economic priorities as to indicate some justification for this unification of function that would have been fine. But those priorities have not been made known; they have not been forthcoming. It seems to me that, in the absence of such justification, and having regard to the size of the present cabinet, such alleged restriction in government spending can only be an excuse for this combination, not a reason. Only the government's unwillingness to embark on progressive action and to undertake its responsibilities in the fields of fisheries and the environment has led it along this course.

If I have time I shall return to this topic and deal with the very structure of the department. At the moment I want to deal with what the Speech from the Throne had to say about the environment. I suppose hon. members opposite would be only too happy if I said absolutely nothing about the topic, because that is exactly what the Speech from the Throne said—nothing. It said absolutely nothing about the environment. We heard of the necessity to place further emphasis on research and development of renewable energy resources, but nothing about measures to regulate exploration and development on federal lands. Again, no mention whatsoever was made of environmental concerns. Yes, we did hear about native peoples' land claims in the James Bay region, but nothing about environmental concerns in that important region. We even heard about our international responsibilities in terms of environmental protection, but nothing about our national responsibilities—and all this from a government which has professed over the years to be concerned about our environment.

In the throne speech of September, 1968, the government talked about the broad importance of the problem of pollution. In October, 1969, in his speech following the throne speech of that year, the Prime Minister spoke about the increasing concern with regard to the environment, about the ruthless destruction of a landscape and the useless pollution of air and water. He spoke of determination to overcome noise, noxious fumes, and the pollution from industrial waste, and said:

> First of all, we will never sacrifice, in the name of progress, a clean and healthy environment to industrial or commercial development.

The year 1970 was a vintage year for the environment. The Speech from the Throne had this to say:

> Pollution is a many-headed hydra and requires action in many forms. You will be asked to consider bills intended to deal with pollution in two of its aspects: in the ocean and in the atmosphere. More pressing than any single step or steps, however, is the need to co-ordinate and consolidate our efforts in an effective fashion. There will be proposed the establishment of a department to be concerned with the environment and the husbanding of those renewable resources that are a part of and dependent upon it.

This was welcome news for the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) who then was leader of the opposition.

The then minister of fisheries was absolutely glowing on October 15, 1970, when he said:

> Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words this afternoon about the establishment of a new Department of Environmental Affairs, and I should like to say at the outset that shaping our Canadian environment is the biggest challenge we face in the 1970's. It is a bigger challenge than unemployment. It is a bigger challenge than inflation. It is a bigger issue than pensions or skyjacking or the FLQ. To many Canadians it is a bigger challenge than all of our financial and social problems put together.

It was the first minister of the environment who said that exactly six years ago last week. Since then it has been all downhill. In 1972 there was just passing reference made. In 1973 there was one brief reference in the throne speech. In 1974 the only reference was a wish to enhance the environment of cities and towns. In September, 1974, there was an almost seeming obsession with the environment. We had an overwhelming two sentences in the throne speech devoted to this subject.

If we need to look for any further evidence of the government's disinterest in the Department of the Environment we have only to realize that there have been four ministers in 24 months. Nothing in this government changes more than ministers of the environment, except economic policy. Therefore one can hardly be surprised at the lack of policy direction which results from this constant changing at the ministerial level.

This is all the more tragic when one appreciates that the Department of the Environment appeared to have been created in 1970 in an air of responsibility, concern, and even optimism. For the first time we recognized the inter-relationships among water, air and soil pollution. For the first time we acknowledged the importance of environmental considerations in planning government programs.

The Prime Minister on October 9, 1970, said that the new department was intended, and I quote:

—to bring under the direction of a single minister the principal government activities relating to environmental quality in general, and pollution in particular.

Six years ago Canadians believed we were on the right track and the government was indeed concerned about this problem. I take no satisfaction in saying that perhaps the creation of the Department of the Environment was really little more than another of the Prime Minister's intellectual daydreams or, perhaps more accurately, his reaction to the situation in the 1960's when environmental concerns were the fashion of the day, a fad, an emotional reaction, and sometimes even over-reaction in the sixties, mainly by young people and community activists who found a convenient and sometimes temporary cause, who found activities that were attractive to the media and politicians alike. I do not say this unkindly because it was their idealism and enthusiasm and vigor that gave birth to the environmental movement of today. However, a decade later the same situation does not exist and the government, with a great sigh of relief, says to itself well, thank heavens, we need not worry about environment any more.

What the government has failed to realize is that environmental concerns have not gone away. They have, in a short ten years, matured remarkably. Community groups, instead of fishing rubber boots out of rivers, are working with research scientists in our universities. Whole new faculties of environmental sciences have sprung up. Protest marchers of the sixties now prepare educational video tapes, and work quietly but effectively with our school children, service clubs, and so on.

Pollution protest rallies have been replaced by national and international environment seminars. Pollution protesters have become planners, and I commend them for it. May I give two examples.

In my riding of Perth-Wilmot an environmental group formed by students at Northwestern Secondary School is involved in the concerns resulting from the planning of new hydro lines and highways.

On a national scale I point out the Canadian Wildlife Federation which, ten years ago, with a two-man staff, preoccupied itself with writing protest letters and briefs to elected representatives. Today that federation, at the national level in research staff alone has a staff of eight, including a biologist, an environmental scientist, and an economist, all with high academic credentials. In addition they have an impressive inventory of research people and are now preoccupied with the environmental planning process. They are able to challenge professional scientific reports on such difficult subjects as the MacKenzie Valley pipeline and the Garrison dam.

It is tragic that the government has not matured along with those it purports to represent.

I might mention that this department must preoccupy itself with environmental concerns. A few of these, in no particular order of priority, are coastal ocean petroleum drilling, shipping and the handling of hazardous cargo, environmental protection of the north, protection of the ozone layer and other atmospheric concerns, water quality and quantity problems, and nuclear waste disposal. Other challenges are found in the department's relationship to other governmental bodies, such as other departments and other governments.

In offshore drilling, for example, we find Energy, Mines and Resources responsible in areas south of the sixtieth parallel; Indian and Northern Affairs responsible north of sixty; provincial governments likely responsible within three or 12 miles off our coasts, and federal responsibility beyond these limits.

In terms of its responsibility with regard to relationships with provincial governments, the conflicts and the problems are limitless. At the federal level maybe we have assumed too much responsibility, for historic reasons which now have disappeared. Now certainly should be the occasion for this department to have the time and resources to examine whether other governments, particularly provincial governments, should become more active, or may indeed wish a more vital role in environmental matters.

There is one other matter. No department could welcome more the freedom of information policy than the Department of the Environment. I commend them in terms of the Beaufort report which they released to concerned municipalities. It would bring great credit to this department if they would pursue such a policy without the compulsion of the proposed legislation.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, there is a challenge to be faced in terms of the difficulties of melding what have been essentially individual approaches to particular resource issues into major environmental objectives and then fitting these objectives into national priorities.

I suggest to the new minister that this department need not of necessity be a homogeneous totally inter-related department. Some of the structural changes that I see in the department, in my judgment are not healthy and are not functioning well. I would point out to him as one approach that instead of looking for a homogeneous inter-related department, he might investigate—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Jarvis: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

BANK ACT—POSSIBILITY OF AMENDMENT FACILITATING APPOINTMENT OF WOMEN AS DIRECTORS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in the brief time I have at my disposal I want to demonstrate for the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) that I am about to speak extemporaneously without the aid of mirrors or eyeglasses. I will try to make a point in which she will be very interested, that is, the question which I raised on October 15 with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) in regard to faciliting the appointment of women as directors of chartered banks in Canada. I see my friend has stayed and will give me moral and actual support in the particular representation which I made to the Minister of Finance at that time.

The minister indicated in his response, in a positive but rather general way, that he would be giving some consideration to an amendment to the Bank Act which would allow women to be elected more easily as directors of our chartered banks. He also referred to the fact the amendments might also make it easier for other people in our country to become bank directors.

I see the parliamentary secretary is here representing the minister. I want to bring to his attention some information which he may in fact be possessed of already, but which I alluded to in my question.

A study was sponsored by the Advisory Council on the Status of Women and the Canadian Bankers' Association, and prepared by Marianne Bossen, entitled "Employment in Chartered Banks: 1969-1975." In 1975, 122,572 men and women were employed by all branches of the chartered banks in Canada. At least 72 per cent of these employees were women. Marianne Bossen reports that the position of women in the banking industry has improved both quantitatively and qualitatively since 1969. This is principally because of the rapid expansion of the banking industry in those years.

According to this study, some banks have introduced more enlightened policies and the measure of responsibility given to women at every level has increased. Be that as it may, the study notes that in 1975 no women earned more than $30,000 a year, whereas 442 men did; only three women earned more than $20,000, while 1,279 men did; 32 per cent of the women employed earned between $6,000 and $6,900, while 73 per cent of them earned less than $8,000.

The other statistic I should bring to the attention of the House is this: as of October, 1976, six women hold corporate directorships in chartered banks compared with a total of 220 men who are directors of Canada's five big chartered banks.

My colleague, the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), who is the spokesman for our party on the status of women, has this session brought forward a private member's bill which would have the effect of repealing subsection (2) of section 18 of the Bank Act thereby removing the necessity for a bank director to hold a prohibitively costly amount of stock in order to qualify. This is really the nub of the problem. The removal of that subsection would democratize directorships of the chartered banks, and I believe it is not asking too much to urge the government to consider bringing in the necessary amendment. The government would find all the opposition parties agreeable to making a quick disposition of the legislation.

[Mr. Hnatyshyn.]

I hope the minister and the government will not wait until the white paper on banking has been considered and we go through the whole rather tedious and lengthy process of considering revisions to the Bank Act now that the ten-year period has expired. I see the parliamentary secretary is ready to stand up and say that this amendment will be brought in during the present session. At least I hope that this will be the case.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, representations in favour of the bill to which the hon. member referred have not come only from the other side of the House. I am glad to tell the hon. member that similar representations have come from this side of the House, as well as from officials responsible for advising on the status of women.

The advancement of the status of women is a major goal of the government, as has already been shown in many ways. Laws which discriminated against women have been changed. A human rights code has been proposed to afford recourse to women when they are the victims of discrimination in areas where the federal authority can reach. As to the deplorable statistics about banks which the hon. member put on record, I am glad to remind him that banks are under federal jurisdiction and that this human rights code will cover banks. I hope the code will receive rapid passage.

I am not proud to remind the House that in 1970, when the Royal Commission on the Status of Women made its recommendations, there was only one woman in the SX category of the Canadian public service. But today there are 30. This has been the result of positive action to give women a fair chance. In order in Council appointments, women have also begun to get the recognition that simple justice requires.

The government has also campaigned actively to change public attitudes which have been a large factor in holding women back. How far the public attitude has progressed was shown by the genuine and healthy outrage felt toward the dinosaur attitudes of some conservative bankers. To their credit the bankers have quickly learned something of the consequences of writing off half of our population as possible directors of banks. The Canadian people simply will not accept rationalizations for the absence of women from bank boards.

The white paper on banking legislation proposes specific qualifications for directors in line with the general corporate law, and this may obviate the need for substantial, direct financial interest in a bank by its directors. This will help to open the door to many capable women who cannot now qualify. As the minister said in the House, we are ready to look at the question as the new legislation proceeds.

SOCIAL SECURITY—RECIPROCITY OF PENSIONS BETWEEN CANADA AND CERTAIN COUNTRIES—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight because of an unsatisfactory answer that I received to a question that I asked today about amendments in the proposed old age security bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You mean yesterday.

Mr. McKinnon: Yesterday. I should like to put on the record a bit of the history of this bill. On April 14 the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) announced that he was going to bring in legislation that would enable us to have reciprocity of pensions between Canada and some western European countries, including the United Kingdom. On October 13, as soon as parliament resumed, my hon. friend from Hamilton West asked the minister when he was going to bring in the bill affecting, among other things, residency and reciprocal agreements affecting persons who have earned pensions overseas. The answer then, believe it or not, was as follows, as reported at page 19 of Hansard:

> The bill is being drafted and I hope I will be able to table it in the House for first reading in the next few months.

Those are the words of the Minister of National Health and Welfare on October 13, almost exactly the same words as he used when on April 14 he was boasting that he was going to bring in this bill in the next few months.

This caused me to ask my later question about the bill, and it also caused me to include this subject in my speech on October 15 when I pointed out that, according to the minister, he said that the project had been discussed with his colleagues, if he remembered well, at the last federal-provincial conference held in June and no objection was made to the project either at the June conference or afterwards. He went on to say that consequently he thought we could undertake with confidence a study of this project.

As the days go by and the situation gets worse, not only does he not have the bill ready but the minister is talking about having a study of the project made. This is a very serious situation, Mr. Speaker. If one considers the twin devils of inflation and devaluation, particularly so far as people who came here from Britain a few years ago are concerned, one can realize the desperate circumstances in which they find themselves today.

I had some research on this subject done today and I should like to point out the following. A couple who came to Canada in 1965 on a pension of 100 pounds sterling a month would have drawn a cheque worth $301. The cost of living then stood at 80 in the consumer price index. Today that same pension cheque would be worth $161, barely half what it was worth in 1965, and cost of living on the same scale has gone from 80 to 150. This means that this couple would be able to buy only one third of the items they were able to buy 11 years ago.

What have these people done to deserve a fate like that? These are the very people that we maintain are the rockbed of our society, people who saved to pay into a pension plan so they could comfortably survive in their old age. What have we done to them? We have taken away two-thirds of the value of their pension.

The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) and I have been writing letters to the Minister of National Health and Welfare about this subject since the first day we came to the House. We have received nothing but procrastination and put-offs from him. First he blamed the British for not making their pensions convertible. Both the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich and myself wrote and asked the British government what was the holdup. The reply we received indicated that the holdup had resulted because the Canadian government was dragging its feet on this matter.

Let me go back to this set of tables to point out what has happened in the last four years since we came to parliament. Some four years ago this mythical couple had an income of $263 a month when the cost of groceries was $106. In only four years their cheques have decreased from $263 to $161, while the cost of their groceries has increased from $106 to $150. The cost of groceries has gone up about 50 per cent while the pension has gone down something like one third. It is absolutely impossible for these people to go on this way.

I was taken in on April 14 by the minister. I believed he was going to bring this legislation in, as he said, in a few months. We had a summer recess of a few months and it should have been the most simple thing in the world to get the bill ready. Now the minister says the bill is being drafted. I thought it was being drafted on April 14. When I was questioned by my constituents I said I trusted and believed the minister and thought the bill would be in probably the day we got back to parliament. Instead the government has spent the summer drafting a bill to amend the Historic Sites and Monuments Act. That is apparently the priority of the government, not the senior citizens, or the people trying to exist on pensions that have been cut in half at a time when food costs have increased 50 per cent.

The government is apparently very much concerned about spending its time contemplating the bill on historic sites and monuments, which was given first reading today, whereas the bill in respect of pensions, according to the minister, is being drafted, had he hopes to be able to introduce it in the House for first reading in the next few months.

Can the parliamentary secretary give any hope to these people that this year, perhaps before Christmas, they will be able to get a pension equivalent to the one they were getting when they came to this country ten years ago?

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) for this question. I think we all share the desire to get this thing out of the way. I do not think I can give him the assurance that it will be out of the way by Christmas, but I can certainly assure him that it will be within a few months, perhaps shortly after Christmas.

In announcing on April 14 the government's intention to amend the Old Age Security Act the minister indicated that one of its effects would be to enhance Canada's ability to enter into international social security agreements. As the act now stands it does not provide for international agreements, yet the several countries which have expressed an interest in having reciprocal social agreements with Canada have all insisted that the OAS program be included in such agreements alongside the Canada Pension Plan. This has complicated the whole issue.

It follows, therefore, that the negotiation of such agreements cannot be undertaken until the proposed legislation amending the Old Age Security Act has been enacted by parliament. I would add that, taken as a whole, the proposals formulated by other countries to date cover the whole field of social security as understood in Europe. In the Canadian context, international agreements could, therefore, involve programs which come under provincial jurisdiction, such as workmen's compensation and hospital and medical care insurance. Hon. members will be happy, therefore, to know that considerable progress has been made both in the drafting of the amendments to the OAS Act and in the necessary interdepartmental and federal-provincial consultations.

Several hon. members, both orally and in writing, have requested an indication of those countries likely to be involved in such negotiations. Our tendency would be to negotiate first with those countries which have been pressing Canada for agreements—the United Kingdom, Italy and the United States—since the highest number of potential beneficiaries residing in Canada would be covered by agreements with those countries.

France also might be included in this list, having shown some interest. I wish to emphasize, however, as the minister did in the House on April 14, that Canada is prepared, in due course, to enter into agreements with all interested countries whenever this is in the interests of Canada and of residents of Canada. In conclusion, I hope that within the next few months this bill will be proposed and will be put through the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Why not next week?

SEARCH AND RESCUE—DATE OF TABLING REPORT OF TASK FORCE—REQUEST FOR IMPROVEMENT IN OPERATION OF SERVICE

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, it is nice to note that there are two members on the government side here tonight. My topic concerns the unfortunate and tragic loss of 13 seamen some 60 miles off the southeast coast of Newfoundland and the slow reaction in response to the distress call of the motor vessel Gabriella, which prompted my question yesterday, along with that of my colleague from St. John's East. We request again, in addition to the many representations we made during the last session, that our air search and rescue capability be expanded and, more specifically, that elements of the force be deployed to the province of Newfoundland.

For too many months now we have been hearing the same answers from the minister. On December 5, 1975, the minister related to me in a letter that the review of the national search and rescue policy had been completed and that the necessary implementation documents were being prepared in consultation with the Department of National Defence, and that he expected that the revised policy would be ready for submission to Cabinet in April of 1976 following approval by himself and his colleague, the Minister of National Defence.

Then in April of this year it was noted in the minister's release that a Canadian coastguard task force had reviewed the national search and rescue policy and that the revised policy was expected to be ready for submission to cabinet by mid-1976. But here we are in late October, with winter upon us, and no progress, while we are concerned that a repeat of last year's incidents are imminent.

I realize that the implementation of a co-ordinated operation order must be thought out carefully. I realize also that the funding required for the expanded responsibility both in hardware and manpower will be immense. But I say as strongly as I can that there is no reason why part of the force capability cannot be deployed closer to the action. Notwithstanding the minister's reply that the coastguard facilities could not be everywhere awaiting an accident, which would be impossible, surely the almost five-hour period of reaction time from the mainland in the lastest incident, and similar experiences last year, would suggest that attention should be given to the stationing of helicopters in the province of Newfoundland.

Certainly when we consider that we are talking about lives, even with the argument that it would not be of any advantage to have an air search and rescue presence in Newfoundland, it is worth a try for at least a year to see what the result would be. Certainly the stationing of a crew in western central and eastern Newfoundland is worth while if it could prevent the loss of lives. I note the following statement in the minister's release:

> It has become evident that, in spite of the provision of additional resources, facilities and co-ordination capabilities over the years, the marine search and rescue organization is no longer adequate.

I hope the minister will discuss this with his colleague responsible for the Department of National Defence.

Time does not permit me to go into detail about the coastguard sea rescue capability but I am interested in an item in the release which states that one of the areas which will receive immediate attention is that dealing with a proposed voluntary coast guard auxiliary and that implementation guidelines would be available this summer. Here we are in October and there are no implementation guidelines.

I should like to make a suggestion to the parliamentary secretary to give to his minister. I think it is worthy of consideration and will have some merit in the planning.

The nature of Newfoundland lends itself to sea orientation, and I suggest that the minister should consider the establishment of an adjunct to the coast guard college to train our youth for careers in the coast guard to supplement the permanent establishment which will be created and, what is more important, to provide employment in line with the job creation thrust that is due to be announced. More than adequate accommodation is available—it was left to the province by the United States air force—as well as more than adequate classroom space, and all the other infrastructure support that is required. I understand, after checking with the staffing officer at the coast guard college, that they received far more applications than they have vacancies.

I hope the minister will consider this suggestion in line with the expansion of the coast guard, and I hope I will receive a positive response to my proposal for the immediate tabling of the task force report by the Canadian coast guard, and immediate consideration to deploy elements of air search and rescue in Newfoundland so as to ensure that the proper precautions will be taken to alleviate the situation, and proper action will be taken to prevent accidents from occurring in the future.

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I must say in opening my remarks that I appreciate the opportunity that I have tonight to reply to the comments made by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall). This first late tête-à-tête for this session will be followed, I am quite sure, by a number of similar occasions in the months ahead.

In reply to the question raised by the member opposite may I, Mr. Speaker, very clearly repeat the response given twice thus far in this session by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), the first time in reply to a question put to him on Monday, October 18, in the House by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), and the second just yesterday in reply to the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe. The minister indicated very definitely that an announcement was imminent in regard to the Canadian Coast Guard and search and rescue.

One must appreciate that because of fiscal decisions which are taking place, and the resulting decisions in terms of improved equipment and its location, the hon. member should bear with us and await the announcement that has been promised.

Again in the case of deployment of search and rescue forces I want to give the same assurance that was given by the Minister of Transport that it is our intention to deploy our search and rescue resources in the places where they are going to be most useful.

In conclusion I should like to congratulate the hon. member who raised the question, and I want to assure him that the government will give full consideration to his suggestion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): A motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

At 10.26 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DOCUMENTS RELATING TO ESTABLISHMENT OF URANIUM REFINERY IN SASKATCHEWAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the acquisition of options by Eldorado Nuclear Limited of land in the Warman, Saskatchewan area near Saskatoon for the construction of a uranium refinery, and in view of the veil of secrecy imposed on this project by the NDP government of the province of Saskatchewan and the Liberal government of Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

That this House direct the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to immediately table all documents relating to the establishment of a uranium refinery in the province of Saskatchewan, including agreements with the province of Saskatchewan, environmental impact studies and material relating to the operation and function of the proposed refinery.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion requires unanimous consent pursuant to Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROPOSAL TO PROVIDE WORK FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA SHIPYARDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that many of the shipyards in British Columbia have laid off up to 90 per cent of their work force because of lack of contracts and the industry is in its most depressed state since the great depression, and in view of the fact that Canada's 200-mile economic zone will be effective as of January 1, 1977, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House request the Minister of Supply and Services and the acting Minister of National Defence to present to this House within the next two weeks their proposals for a Canadian ship construction for defence and search and rescue in the new economic zone and that firm contracts be let for such construction at least prior to January 1, 1977.

Mr. Speaker: The provisions of Standing Order 43 require the unanimous consent before the presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO SECURE RELEASE OF SHARON BETHUNE FROM MEXICAN JAIL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, this matter was brought to the attention of the House by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that Miss Bethune, daughter of longshoreman Ray Bethune, has been incarcerated since February in a Mexican jail, and since her father has spent some $18,000 to obtain a hearing or a release, I move:

That the Department of External Affairs, after discussions with the Department of Justice and through the Secretary of State for External Affairs, protest in the strongest terms to the Mexican authorities that Miss Bethune be given an immediate hearing and, if innocent, be released from the deplorable jail conditions in which she is incarcerated, as a result of which she is subjected to indignities and conditions similar to those experienced by other Canadians, now and in the past, in that nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order. The terms of Standing Order 43 require the unanimous consent of the House before the presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL BOARD

PROPOSED JUDICIAL INQUIRY INTO COMPETENCE OF BOARD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask leave to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the lack of a full and ongoing survey by the Atomic Energy Control Board for possible radioactive contamination at Elliot Lake and other communities in Canada, the lack of disclosure of recent test results by the AECB in Elliot Lake and the threat to human health as a result of the negligence of this government agency, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That this House instruct the government to institute a special judicial inquiry into the activity and competence of the Atomic Energy Control Board.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion would require unanimous consent pursuant to Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF CRITICISM OF ACCOUNTING PRACTICES BY AUDITOR GENERAL

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to pose to the President of the Treasury Board: it arises out of yet another in the continuing series of specific criticisms advanced by the Auditor General in connection with the government's financial management and control practices. Having regard to the latest revelations in the public accounts of Canada, volume one, in connection with the government's accounting practices, may I ask the hon. gentleman whether he will provide to the House a full explanation with reference to this latest condemnation of the government by the Auditor General and will he, specifically, explain the questionable practice of including uncollectable loans to Crown corporations and foreign states so as to overstate the government's financial picture, all of which is tantamount to cooking the books by $7 billion, thereby misleading parliament and the people of Canada?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): The hon. member, in his excitement, has rather overstated the case; I think that in his own mind, he knows this. The loans to the Canadian National Railways, the Harbours Board and the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority represent investments in capital facilities which are of great importance. They certainly contribute in a vital manner to the transportation facilities of Canada. In every one of those cases it was hoped that those improved facilities would result in an increased economic return which would service the debt. In any case, the primary purpose of the loan has been served. Most certainly, one could not argue that. We had to provide harbours where they were needed. The new waterway was required and it has been beneficial to the country. I do not think anyone would argue that it is not important to maintain and expand the CNR.

[Mr. Symes.]

The issues raised by the Auditor General have been raised in earlier reports from his office and, as a result, it was included among the studies of the accounts of Canada carried out by the Treasury Board. As a result of that study, participated in by the public accounts committee, attempts have been made to rationalize those accounts with respect to these loans.

The Auditor General also makes comments about the loans to the Unemployment Insurance Commission which is a different matter altogether. It is not in the same class as the others because repayment is made in the immediate following year. So, Mr. Speaker, these are accounting problems that have been recognized for a long, long time which do not lend themselves to very easy or simplistic solutions.

Mr. Mazankowski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am certainly not one to argue with the professional views and opinions of the Auditor General. I think it is significant that he saw fit to include these rather questionable practices in his report. It is quite obvious from the remarks of the minister that—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a question, would he please come to it?

Mr. Mazankowski: My supplementary question is this, Mr. Speaker. Since the evidence of the Auditor General and indeed the answer of the President of the Treasury Board clearly reaffirms the fact that the accounting practices of this nation are out of control, and indeed are undermining parliament's authority and distorting the government's true financial picture—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: —might I ask the President of the Treasury Board whether he will now personally intervene to examine the progress of the implementation of the Auditor General's recommendations which were advanced in his latest report, and would he tell the House precisely what is happening to these recommendations? Because it is quite obvious from information that we have, and from information contained herein, that clearly the recommendations are not being implemented in accordance with the agreement that was undertaken by the President of the Treasury Board, and indeed by the former President of the Treasury Board. Would the minister undertake to clean up the mess that was left by his predecessor and his predecessor's predecessor?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I think I did reply in essence to the hon. member's question the other day when I indicated that we do, of course, take the recommendations and indeed the criticisms of the Auditor General very seriously indeed. We recognize the need for improvement in both the method and facilities of financial control and management. This is something that I am taking under my wing and to which I am giving very high priority. In due course, of course, the measures to implement corrective action on all these fronts will be made known to the House.

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which is supplementary to those of my colleague from Vegreville and it is directed to the same minister. As the minister has just agreed, these allegations are not new. The report of the public accounts committee of June indicated the problems. Therefore, would the minister agree that there is little use in our discussing in this House such things as televising parliament, reforming committee structures and strengthening parliament if the basic accounting of the country is so derelict that parliament has no control over spending?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, in candidly suggesting that there is a large area for improvement, I do not think it helps to be so grossly overstating the case as the hon. member is attempting to do now.

MEASURES TO CORRECT ACCOUNTING PRACTICES CRITICIZED BY THE AUDITOR GENERAL

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the throne speech promised that the government would provide the Auditor General of Canada with "better means of fulfilling his important function", if I am overstating the case would the President of the Treasury Board lay before the House all steps, including any new legislation necessary, which he is taking to put a stop to these sloppy practices? Surely this accusation of a $7 billion boondoggle demands an immediate and accurate answer in this House.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the legislation augmenting the facilities and strengthening and augmenting the independence of the Auditor General most certainly will be placed before the House in a very short time. The $7 billion boondoggle to which the hon. member refers really requires a great deal more analysis than has obviously been given it so far in suggesting any corrective measures that could be taken.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—REASON FOR FAILURE TO PROVIDE MEASURES TO ALLEVIATE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Considering that unemployment in the country is scarcely new, having run in excess of 7 per cent for the past 18 months, and considering that independent forecasters are saying that for 1977 it will average 7.6 per cent and the same forecasters are saying that this winter it will hit upwards of 9 per cent, would the Acting Prime Minister explain why, during the summer, the cabinet could not come up with one proposal that could be implemented this fall to bring down the rate of unemployment during the coming difficult winter months?

• (1120)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I refer the hon. member to the excellent statement made in the House last night by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration in which the general employment strategy of the government is laid out.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, it is because I considered the speech the minister referred to with great care that I asked the question. Let me now switch to the minister who made that speech yesterday in the House. Given the fact that early in his address he gives a pious commitment on the part of the government to achieve full employment, but when we get down to the details half way through the speech we find there is nothing new to come into operation until the next fiscal year, can he tell us, as the new Minister of Manpower and Immigration, whether he really is assuming the appropriate responsibility to the people of Canada by taking on the old indolent attitudes of his predecessor?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would commend greatly to the hon. member's attention the introduction to my speech where I paid glowing tribute to my predecessor for the tremendous number—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: —for the tremendous number of innovative measures that were introduced under his stewardship while in that particular portfolio. I remember one statistic, Mr. Speaker, regarding the LIP program, where 93,000 jobs were created over a very difficult winter period as a result of a program, not proposed by the NDP, but under the Local Initiatives Program. There was a myriad of other actions and steps taken by my predecessor recognizing the difficulties of unemployment without, hopefully, exacerbating inflation, as the hon. member's party seems to be advocating on almost a daily basis.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister knows that if every job which is listed as being available in Canada were taken up by the unemployed there would still be more than 600,000 Canadians looking for work, so I do not think he should be complimenting his predecessor. I would ask the minister if he takes seriously the contention he made in his speech that "at the beginning of the 1980's" we are actually going to have a shortage of labour in Canada. Does the minister take this seriously and will he please explain to the House why he believes that? Would he also explain how that would be of any consolation at all to the more than 700,000 Canadians who are now looking for work?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, once again I do not know where the hon. member was last night, but he obviously did not correctly read the statement. I indicated that we were more concerned with immediate problems of unemployment and pointed to the fact that in the early 1980's we would very likely face a shortage of workers rather than jobs. I indicated also that there was not a sufficient number of jobs available, hence the double thrust of the policy, namely, to help unemployed people, particularly the young, to achieve the skills to fill the jobs that are already there, and that in the interim we have to go down another road, and that is one of direct job creation in areas of the country where there is high unemployment and where community projects should be carried out so that we can move in these particular areas to help.

NATURAL GAS—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON PIPELINE FROM MELVILLE AND KING CHRISTIAN ISLANDS

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

As the federal government is the main shareholder in Panarctic Oil Company, can the minister tell the House whether the study on the right of way for the construction of a gas pipeline from the wells located on Melville and King Christian islands in the Arctic to eastern Canada has been completed, and whether he intends to present a report on the activities of that company with regard to natural gas?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the work has not yet been completed. It is still underway. There is a great deal of work to be done both in respect of the main trunk line and the gathering system from the wells which connect them with the main trunk line.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary.

I should like to ask the minister, since to my knowledge there are two proposed alternate routes, one west of James Bay or the Hudson Bay and the other east of the Hudson Bay, which would be in the province of Quebec, whether he has received representations from the Quebec government requesting, since this pipeline would serve eastern Canada primarily, that it be built on the Quebec side?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to make inquiries and to convey the information to the hon. member.

PUBLIC WORKS

LES TERRASSES DE LA CHAUDIÈRE—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Public Works I will direct my question to the acting Minister of Public Works. On Tuesday, October 19 the Minister of Public Works told us he was receiving a report from his officials on the Les Terrasses de la Chaudière project, and I am wondering if he could table that report or make a statement on it at this time?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I shall convey to my hon. colleague the question put by the hon member which I am sure he will take under advisement. As the hon. member knows, that type of report is subject to certain restrictions. Still, if those restrictions do not apply, the report will probably be tabled in the House.

[English]

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, I thank the acting minister for the reply. I am wondering whether in speaking to the minister he will advise him that 16 days have passed since the Minister of Public Works called for a report and does the minister not agree that the taxpayers of Canada are entitled to a full and open inquiry on this contract, as well as the negotiations and circumstances leading to the contract?

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, I shall bring the remarks of the hon. member to the attention of my colleague.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INCARCERATION OF SHARON BETHUNE IN MEXICAN JAIL—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON ACTION TO OBTAIN RELEASE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question which was put to him by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta and in respect of which I moved a motion today under Standing Order 43. What steps are being taken by the minister and his department in reference to the long incarceration of Sharon Lynn Bethune who is being held in deplorable conditions not fit for a human being in a Mexican jail and who is being held there even though her father has put up $18,000, more or less, in order to have her released, but has been unable to obtain her release at this stage.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will give the hon. member as much information as I possibly can on this question bearing in mind, as I think he will realize, that perhaps too much public discussion of this matter may not be useful at the present time.

The situation is that we were advised by the young lady's lawyer in the early part of this week that she would be released in a couple of days. The lawyer subsequently has advised our embassy that in fact he was misinformed and that the judge decided to wait until early next week in order to consider the matter. The most recent assurance we have had is that the case will be considered next week and, presumably, if it is disposed of and results in Miss Bethune's release she will be free to return to Canada immediately. We are taking all steps possible for us to take by way of representations and assistance but, of course, the hon. member will recognize we must do this consistent with the laws and practices of the country concerned.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact that this is one of the examples of Canadians being incarcerated in that nation—and I brought to the attention of the former Secretary of State of External Affairs a matter in respect in which he was most helpful—I wonder whether the whole ball of wax could be protested so that these people who are charged with offences can be at least brought before a court for a remand. It would seem that in that country one is assumed to be guilty until one has proven his innocence, and yet is never allowed to get before a court to prove his innocence.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, as I said at the outset, the question becomes whether or not the kind of initiative to which the hon. member referred will be beneficial in terms of the parties who are presently involved in a most unfortunate way. I can only repeat, and hope for his understanding, that we are taking all the steps which the best judgment we can put together concludes are in the interest of this particular Canadian citizen.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LOCATION OF DEFENCE RESEARCH LABORATORY—REASON FOR DELAY IN CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Defence, but in his absence I will direct it to the Parliamentary Secretary for National Defence. The former minister of national defence, the hon. member for Winnipeg South, announced in 1974 that the defence research laboratory in Suffield, Alberta would be moved to the Tuxedo area in Winnipeg. At that time the minister also announced that construction would start in 1975. So far only land has been acquired for the laboratory. I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary if he could bring us up to date and tell us whether this defence research centre will be moved from Alberta to Winnipeg.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for his courtesy in giving me advance notice of his question. I believe the hon. member did not quote the former minister of national defence quite correctly. In his statement in 1974 the minister referred to the establishment of a new research centre in Manitoba and the phasing out, not the moving, of the establishment in Suffield. To date the negotiations for land in Winnipeg have taken much longer than was anticipated, but they are now nearing completion and I am pleased to inform the hon. member that the new research establishment in Manitoba will be constructed in his constituency.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): As a matter of fact, the lengthy negotiations have somewhat delayed the phasing out of the defence research establishment in Suffield, so that process will not follow the original schedule.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PENSION ACT

POSSIBILITY OF AMENDMENT TO PROVISION RELATING TO PENSIONS FOR WIDOWS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In view of the introduction yesterday of a bill to amend the Pension Act which provides only for certain appointments to the Pension Review Board, could the minister disclose when he will introduce an amendment to the Pension Act to include widows of veterans who were receiving 48 per cent or less, since there is a large number of them?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, may I say in answer to the first part of the question that the bill which was introduced yesterday is, I feel, a very worthwhile bill. It has become necessary because of the work that we anticipate in the near future.

With regard to further amendments to the Pension Act which would allow us to deal with widows' pensions in a different manner, the hon. member might recall that this year we gave priority to prisoners of war, something that I was very happy to do in a year of restraint. It necessitated an increase of $10 million in our budget. With regard to veterans' widows' pensions, we have this matter under review. I cannot give the hon. member a definite date on it, however.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that there is an inequity in the Act in that it is stated that a widow of a war veteran who was receiving 48 per cent would get a full widow's pension but a widow whose husband received 1 per cent less, or 47 per cent, will get nothing. It seems to me that an inequity exists there which should be corrected as soon as possible by making a very simple amendment to the act. Would the minister consider this in light of the inflation which exists now and the resulting suffering which this causes veterans' widows?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Yes, Mr. Speaker, this is under consideration. We will certainly keep it in mind when we review the Act.

Oral Questions

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE OF CANADIAN PRESS EMPLOYEES—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Can he report to the House on his meeting with the Canadian Press management, and can he tell us whether progress has been made in reaching a settlement in this matter of a kind which the staff is seeking and to which I think they are entitled?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I did meet the publishers this morning. I thought it was a fairly productive meeting, at the conclusion of which it was agreed to accept my suggestion that Tom Eberlee, the Deputy Minister of Labour, be assigned on a special project basis as the mediator in an endeavour to resolve the dispute. This has put the matter on a more urgent footing. I spoke informally with some of the leaders of the Guild outside parliament and I indicated to them this particular conclusion reached at the meeting. They seemed to me to be quite satisfied with this report. So, I anticipate that the parties will soon be getting together under the aegis of the special mediator, Tom Eberlee and I hope they can come to some reasonable settlement.

ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL BOARD

DATE BOARD KNEW OF RADIOACTIVE CONDITION AT ELLIOT LAKE—REASON FOR FAILURE TO NOTIFY CITIZENS

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Will the minister tell the House how long the Atomic Energy Control Board knew that certain homes in Elliot Lake had unacceptable concentrations of radon gas, that at least eight homes were built on radioactive waste material, and why this information has not been conveyed to the residents affected and remedial action taken?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the investigation of the situation at Elliot Lake goes back many months, indeed back to the early part of this year. At that time the Ontario department of health made a number of surveys, particularly in schools and public buildings, and I am glad to report they were negative. Other samplings have been taken since that time right until very recently with respect to houses in Elliot Lake. Again, generally speaking, they were negative. It is only recently that this particular quartzite band has become an area of attention and houses on that particular band are now being surveyed. I can assure the hon. member and his constituents, and more particularly the constituents of the hon. member for Algoma, that the AECB will set up an office early in November. I think there will be three crews who will be directing their efforts to monitoring and investigating each of the houses on this quartzite band as well as other houses if it becomes necessary.

I invite all citizens of Elliot Lake to participate and to assist the Atomic Energy Control Board in this important activity.

SUGGESTED DELAY IN HOUSING DEVELOPMENT AT ELLIOT LAKE IN VIEW OF RADIOACTIVE CONDITION

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): I find it difficult to believe that the problem appeared suddenly overnight. I would think it is the result of negligence on the part of the board in monitoring the situation in Elliot Lake over the past 20 years.

I should like to put a supplementary question to the minister. In view of the fact that as late as two weeks ago the Elliot Lake town council approved the development of two new mobile home sites on land which may be contaminated, will the minister ensure that there will be a moratorium on housing developments until the AECB has surveyed the land for possible radiation hazards?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I can assure the hon. member that there have already been discussions between the AECB and the town council with respect to these new developments. Measures are being considered, including some design changes.

BILINGUALISM

FRENCH LANGUAGE TRAINING IN OTTAWA SCHOOLS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. It arises out of the assertion in the Speech from the Throne and the allusions in the minister's speech in the House yesterday concerning second language training among young people, specifically in relation to the four Ottawa school boards. Can the minister inform the House what is the intention of the government with regard to the extension of financial assistance for the special programs that were undertaken and which have proven to be of considerable value to the area?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the concern of the hon. gentleman in this regard. Unfortunately, we have not yet received any request for funding for these worthy projects. The school boards should, if they have not already done so, contact the provincial government, and I hope it would forward this request to us.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I thank the minister for that answer. In view of the fact that the boards are conducting what is in reality a pilot project on teaching methods which could be used in other parts of Canada and because of the particular pressure which exists in this area by reason of the concentration of the public service in the national capital, would the minister undertake to contact the provincial minister of education with respect to this matter so that the boards could know how much, when and by what method this funding will take place and what are the intentions of this government in this regard?

● (1140)

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, as I said in my speech in the House yesterday, that has been an extremely successful program, and therefore I would be happy to undertake to make sure that this contact takes place, if it has not already been made, to see what kind of response we might expect from the provincial government.

HARBOURS

SOURCE OF MONEY TO FUND TASK FORCE ON NEW POLICY—OPPOSITION OF PROVINCES TO NEW POLICY

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I am interested in pursuing with the Minister of Transport the evolving ports policy. The minister told us that the policy is going on under existing legislation, and I am wondering where the money is coming from because no funding was provided for the task force.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, officials working within the department on the task force report and the approved ports policy are working in the usual way through existing routes to move forward with those parts of the new ports policy which can progress before the legislation is passed. I would have to know to which particular expenditures the hon. member is referring in order to answer more specifically about sources.

Mr. Fairweather: As the premiers, I am informed, opposed the new ports policy, and as the throne speech in ringing terms said that we were assured that consultation means that the government will place before interested Canadians its assessment of the major problems we must solve together—a superb use of the English language—I wonder if the minister will put his policy where the government's mouth is.

Mr. Lang: We have already very much done so in this case, and have had extensive consultations with the municipalities, the ports and the users of the port facilities. As I read the objections from the provinces, they were almost solely based on the fact that our proposed ports authorities would be composed of various appointees, very fully representing the municipalities concerned, but would not have direct provincial representation. That is a matter of decision on our part, which I think is quite right, but which was objected to, apparently, by the provinces.

The provinces will be allowed a role and will be invited to participate in regional advisory committees. Of course, there will be constant discussions between the port commissions and provincial as well as federal authorities. However, I think it would be wrong to have direct provincial representation on the port commission. The port commission, however appointed, is meant to represent the direct, knowledgeable interest in the port and not to represent as such, different levels of government. I think that would be unfortunate. Therefore, I think it is wrong to place very much weight on the objection of the provinces in this regard. The full consent of the municipalities is indeed very often present.

Mr. Fairweather: I wonder if I could have what is called a final supplementary. Surely, in the case of a province like New Brunswick the minister must agree that the province itself paid substantial moneys—many millions of dollars—to fulfill an obligation which should have been a federal obligation, and that therefore New Brunswick has an obvious interest in the port commission of the city of Saint John.

Mr. Lang: Certainly, the province and the federal government have interests in the port of Saint John and will continue to make arrangements from time to time with that port, for example, where construction is desired which might not be possible without direct assistance from the provinces and the federal government in the future as in the past, but I think that the hon. member will appreciate that our objective in moving to a port commission for that port will be to have the most knowledgeable, actively understanding citizens of the area appointed to a port commission. They can fully represent and understand the interests of the province and work with the province. I do not understand why the hon. member would want the province to be directly represented on that board. I do not see the federal government being directly represented either. The federal government will simply appoint those good and outstanding people to manage the affairs of the port.

POSSIBILITY OF MOVING PART OF VETERANS AFFAIRS DEPARTMENT TO PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the honourable and eminent President of the Treasury Board. In the light of widespread reports to the effect that the Treasury Board is studying the transfer of a substantial segment of DVA to Prince Edward Island, can he indicate when this move will take place, and more specifically, if we may expect the move before November 8?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the responsibility for the implementation of decentralization in the immediate future devolves upon my colleague the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and I undertake to give him notice of the question so that he can respond when he is in the House.

Oral Questions

AIRPORTS

LACK OF MEDICAL FACILITIES AT TERMINALS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. On September 5 a medical colleague of mine from Oakville, Dr. Terry Riley, attended an Air Canada pilot at the Toronto international airport who had a heart attack, and Dr. Riley found the medical equipment inadequate for such an emergency. I recently had such an experience myself. In addition, apparently there have been 18 such cardiac fatalities in the past year. Would the minister undertake to look into this situation thoroughly and to provide some improvements?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, indeed. The Ministry of Transport together with the Department of National Health and Welfare have established new and higher standards for facilities and equipment at international airports. Steps are under way to put the equipment in place and to find space in the most convenient locations.

There will of course be complete discussions at all times about exactly what equipment should be available and how much of it at various locations at airports. I will very much welcome expressions of opinion from doctors—some of which we have already received—in assisting us in finalizing a policy position with regard to the nature of the equipment we should have.

STATUTORY HOLIDAYS

POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION ESTABLISHING HERITAGE DAY

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State. My question relates to a national heritage day, which was the subject of Bill C-208 of the last session. In view of the fact that we were told that one of the reasons for that bill not being passed during the last session was that the Secretary of State would be bringing in a comprehensive holidays bill, including a national heritage day, is such a bill being drafted, and will it be presented to this House fairly soon?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will this bill be before the House in time so that this day can be celebrated in February, 1977, in view of the commitments which were made to railway workers and others?

Mr. Roberts: I would like that to be the case, but I cannot promise that it will be the case.

[Mr. Andras.]

COMMUNICATIONS

ALLEGED SNUB OF UNITED STATES BY PROCLAMATION OF BILL C-58

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Communications. Since a meeting was scheduled for October 6 with United States FCC officials to discuss implications of Bill C-58, why did the minister choose to proclaim the relevant sections just two weeks before the scheduled negotiations? Was is not a deliberate snub on the part of Canadian officials to have Mr. Boyle, chairman of the CRTC, pull out at the last minute?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the reason that bill was proclaimed was because the time had come to do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Sauvé: I had made the necessary inquiries about whether there would be any available time on Canadian stations. However, the hon. member should know that these meetings with the FCC were designed to discuss things other than Bill C-58. Canadians do not discuss the proclamation or, indeed, the introduction of a bill with their United States counterparts. They legislate for their own needs, and this was not in any way a snub to the Americans.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ALLEGED LACK OF AVAILABLE TIME FOR ADVERTISERS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): It is interesting that the minister should state that there is available time on Canadian television for Canadian advertisers. However, on August 12 the Joint Broadcast Committee of the Association of Canadian Advertisers Incorporated and the Institute of Canadian Advertising, the very people Bill C-58 was supposedly designed to help, wrote to the minister and said in part that since timing is of the essence they are prepared to attend such a meeting within the next few days. The minister did not ever acknowledge the letter, let alone meet with those people. Is it not a fact that there is not enough time on Canadian television for this industry and for the clients it represents?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): I made a full inquiry with regard to available time on Canadian stations. I asked all those interested in the matter to write to me. I did not call a meeting on this subject, but I looked at all the replies I got from all advertisers concerned and from Canadian stations. I was satisfied that there was sufficient time available on Canadian networks, and that is why I decided to proclaim the bill.

TRANSPORT

USE OF FOREIGN NAVAL ARCHITECTS TO DESIGN EAST COAST FERRY REPLACEMENTS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Is the minister aware that consideration is being given to awarding a contract to a foreign firm of naval architects and designers, if, indeed, the contract has not already been awarded, for the design of replacements for such east coast ferries as the Abegweit, as well as ships chartered from a Swedish firm, which provide ferry service to and from Newfoundland?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the questions about design are in hand. I will look at the particular statements which have been made with regard to these facilities and provide the hon. member with the information.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister is not aware that Canadian designers who had been working on this particular project had their contract cancelled, after which the off-shore interest was shown. I wonder why the ministry would favour off-shore designers when there is a capability in Canada. He is destroying a Canadian industry.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is jumping to the wrong conclusion. The ending of certain phases of study does not indicate that the work has been switched to anybody else.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): But the contract was taken away from them.

Mr. Lang: That is right, but not necessarily switched to anybody else. It indicates, rather, that further time may be taken to examine the exact needs and the timing for expenditures which will be involved. These will be major expenditures; accordingly, we are reflecting further upon them.

POSSIBILITY OF SWITCHING GOVERNMENT LENDING PROGRAMS FOR PRODUCERS TO PRIVATE INSTITUTIONS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. What does the minister's department intend to do about a somewhat questionable report, prepared in part by the Department of Agriculture, recommending that federal government financing of programs such as the Farm Credit Corporation be discontinued and that farmers should turn completely to private lending institutions for long-term financing?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of following such report, if such a report does exist.

Mr. Murta: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I submit that that kind of report exists, and I think it was prepared in part by a United States American consultant. I ask the minister this: is the government considering any changes in its lending programs for agricultural producers?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, we have, in this country, one of the best lending programs in the world, and we intend to continue it that way.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

ATTITUDE OF CORPORATION TOWARDS SEPARATIST CANDIDATES

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question of national interest to the Secretary of State.

Could he tell the House and all sincere Canadians whether he intends to take action about the sacrosanct CBC and find out how it proposes to react to the crusade against Canada launched today by Mrs. Lise Payette in her capacity as separatist candidate in the election campaign now under way in the province of Quebec?

[English]

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's great concern and interest but am not sure if he is seriously asking me to take steps which would lead to preventing journalists, commentators or entertainers who work for Radio-Canada from entering political life. I hope he is not asking me to do that.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

POSSIBLE ACTION ON JUDGMENT IN RUDNICKI CASE—REQUEST FOR REINSTATEMENT OF EMPLOYEE

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question, which is a follow-up of the question I directed to the Prime Minister a week ago, is for the Minister of Justice. In light of the judgment rendered by a Supreme Court of Ontario judge which places in question the minister's own propriety and credibility as well as that of a senior public servant affectionately known here as the hon. member for "commerce capital", is the minister prepared to make a statement today as to any disciplinary action which may be contemplated as a result of the judgment handed down by the judge?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, at the moment I am not certain to which judgment the hon. member refers.

Mr. Oberle: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I suggest that the minister knows full well that I was referring to the judgment rendered against the government in the case of the wrongful dismissal of one Walter Rudnicki, a case in which the minister was intimately involved. Does the government intend ever to reinstate Mr. Rudnicki and take remedial action, in light of the allegations the judge underlined in his judgment?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the judgment has been obeyed by the Government of Canada. The question of re-employment is not a matter for me; it is a matter for the minister who reports for the Public Service Commission of Canada.

Mr. Fairweather: It is also a matter of honour and morality.

ENERGY

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DOCUMENTS RELATING TO ESTABLISHMENT OF URANIUM REFINERY IN SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Since the Saskatchewan Economic Development Corporation, acting on behalf of Eldorado, has now acquired options in the Warman, Saskatchewan area near Saskatoon for the establishment of a uranium refinery, would the minister, in the spirit of openness mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, now table all documents from the province of Saskatchewan relating to the establishment of this refinery, instead of keeping the matter wrapped in the kind of secrecy which would be appropriate to wartime?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I believe there have been preliminary discussions between Eldorado and the province of Saskatchewan. I am not sure that the discussions have yet moved to the point where it would be useful to table documents. I can tell the hon. member that when the time comes, I will be pleased to table them, provided we also get the approval of the province of Saskatchewan.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

REASON FOR FAILURE OF NEW MINISTERS TO COMPLY WITH REGULATIONS

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. As, in the five weeks since the cabinet shuffle, not one of the seven new ministers has placed a conflict of interest statement in the registrar's public file, can the Acting Prime Minister tell the House why the government has been so negligent about requiring open compliance by the new ministers with even the rather lax conflict of interest guidelines which apply to cabinet ministers?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will make inquiries into this particular question. I assume that it takes some little time for new ministers and existing ministers to arrange their affairs in order to comply. I assure the hon. member that all ministers are obligated to comply with the guidelines.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF MARKETING BOARD FOR BROILERS—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Since the government has announced a number of cross-country hearings relating to the establishment of a marketing board for broilers, and since thhe minister is the minister of consumer as well as corporate affairs, does he support the principle or policy which would create such a marketing board for broilers?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think that question should more properly be directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

An hon. Member: He doesn't know.

Mr. Abbott: The National Farm Products Marketing Council is under the statutary obligation to conduct such hearings. This policy was not decided on a day-to-day basis; it was decided some time ago. I do not believe that the holding of hearings necessarily will lead to the creation of a marketing board for broilers. The purpose is to hear evidence as to why it should or should not be set up.

POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF MARKETING BOARD FOR BROILERS—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture? Does the minister now support the policy and principle that such marketing boards for broilers should be set up, and is it now government policy that marketing boards for broilers should be established?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the National Farm Products Marketing Council has been requested by some provincial governments and provincial producer organizations to hold hearings. They are abiding by the legislation approved by this parliament and can do nothing except pursue their present course. They cannot refuse so to proceed, and they are doing this at present. By the way, the head of the consumers association said the price of broilers had increased by 100 per cent in the last four years. Our statistics show that it increased 13½ per cent in the last 3½ years.

PENITENTIARIES

BRITISH COLUMBIA—ACTION AGAINST THOSE INVOLVED IN HOSTAGE TAKING

Mr. Jack Pearsall (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Is any action contemplated against those inmates involved in the recent hostage taking in the B.C. penitentiary, New Westminster?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): They will be sent to William Head.

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, this matter was raised with the attorney general of British Columbia, because enforcement of the criminal law in that province is his responsibility. I am now informed that charges have been laid against seven inmates involved in the B.C. penitentiary disturbances.

• (1200)

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Not being satisfied with the answer I secured from the Minister of Transport to the question I raised, I wonder whether I might be granted permission to continue the discussion at ten o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: In accordance with customary practice, I suggest that the hon. member submit that to the table in writing in the usual way.

LABOUR RELATIONS

TABLING OF MEMORANDUM OF SETTLEMENT BETWEEN MEA AND ILA

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am tabling a document which is a memorandum of settlement between the Maritime Employers' Association and local 269 of the International Longshoremen's Association which will be referred to in a bill I will be introducing.

As hon. members know, Mr. Speaker, it has not been possible for a settlement to be reached in the much prolonged strike at the port of Halifax. It is, therefore, necessary for parliament to legislate on the matter. In view of the urgency of this matter, I am now asking for unanimous consent to consider the bill in committee of the whole rather than in a standing committee. Perhaps the House will also agree now that we continue the sitting until the bill receives royal assent, if necessary suspending the sitting for a while if this has not occurred by our normal time of adjournment.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps we ought to get to introduction of bills before considering the minister's suggestion.

[Later:]

Upon introduction of bills, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) put forward to the House a suggestion that the House give unanimous consent for the introduction, without notice, of a bill entitled "An Act to provide for the resumption and continuation of longshoring and related operations at the port of Halifax". Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we agree to its introduction, but with regard to all the other requests that the minister made, perhaps there might be consultation as the day moves on.

Mr. Speaker: I specifically asked only for leave to introduce the bill at this time. Once the bill is introduced and dealt with under orders of the day, the House might then be prepared to give other consents.

PORT OF HALIFAX OPERATIONS ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR RESUMPTION OF LONGSHORING

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-14, to provide for the resumption and continuation of longshoring and related operations at the port of Halifax.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read a second time?

Some hon. Members: Later this day.

Mr. Speaker: By unanimous consent, later this day.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we agree to the bill being called for second reading later this day. We shall probably agree to all the requests made by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro), but we would like to do that as we go along. In view of the thickness of the document which the minister tabled a moment ago, I suggest that it might be desirable that we let the House rise for lunch at 12:30 or some such time, so that members on the opposition side can study the document and consider the speech the minister will have made.

Mr. Blais: That is agreeable to the government, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE RESPECTING INTRODUCTION OF PUBLIC BILLS ON ORDER PAPER

Mr. Speaker: Under introduction of bills, the House has come to the moment where some 154 private members' bills have been drawn in keeping with past practice. I suggest to the House, if it is agreeable, and following past practice, that the House be deemed to have taken through introduction and first reading stage all private members' bills, taking all of them as having been introduced in the normal course. They were drawn in accordance with past practice. The list of bills introduced at this time will be printed in Hansard as if they had been processed in the normal way. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, basically there is no disagreement with what you say. However, it might be wise for us to ask ourselves whether all the bills that have been presented are within the power of private members to advance. I am certainly not rising to put Your Honour through the torture of having to go through the list of 154 bills; I emphasize that to you, Mr. Speaker. I am sure there must be some reason for parliamentary counsel to at least look at them, if he has not done so already. I wonder if it would be considered appropriate to put this item over until at least Monday, so that the officers at the table, and others, can look at them to ensure we do not have any problems down the road.

[Mr. Kaplan.]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member raises a very valid point of order. It is customary for the Chair to enter a caveat as to the procedural regularity or competence of bills. Therefore, the introduction of the bills in this manner is without prejudice to any arguments that may subsequently arise as to the procedural regularity when they are taken one at a time. Is that agreed and understood?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PORT OF HALIFAX OPERATIONS ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR RESUMPTION OF LONGSHORING

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour) moved that Bill C-14, to provide for the resumption and continuation of longshoring and related operations at the port of Halifax, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members for the unanimous consent which they gave. As Minister of Labour, it is always distasteful to me to take the time of this House to bring an end to a labour-management dispute. It should not be necessary for me to reiterate my faith in the free collective bargaining system. Canada's industrial relations system reflects our heritage of fundamental western values and our belief that the common well-being can be encouraged through free collective bargaining and the constructive settlement of disputes.

The state has assumed the task of establishing a framework of rights and responsibilities within which management and organized labour are to conduct their relations. That framework places the responsibility for resolving labour-management disputes clearly on the parties to collective bargaining. There are, nevertheless, times and situations when the government, as custodian of the economy and the defender of the public interest, must assume its responsibility. This is the case today in the dispute involving the Maritime Employers' Association and local 269 of the International Longshoremen's Association in the port of Halifax.

Parliament must be resorted to if we are to bring an end to the lock-out which has closed the port since August 8, 1976. Parliament must legislate an end to the dispute if we are to save the port and the city of Halifax from further crippling economic damage, the effects of which have already rippled through the community, resulting in lay-offs, lost income and lost business.

I have emphasized that the government is, and remains, committed to our system of industrial relations which rests on the principle of free collective bargaining. It might be useful, therefore, if I were to summarize briefly the sequence of events which have led to the present impasse, and remind hon. members of the extended efforts deployed over ten months to resolve the dispute.

The parties to the dispute, the Maritime Employers' Association, which acts for its member steamship companies and agents employing labour, contracting stevedores and terminal operators handling vessels in the Port of Halifax, and local 269 of the International Longshoremen's Association, representing some 650 workers, have been seeking to negotiate revisions to their collective agreement which expired on December 31, 1975.

The parties met in direct negotiations on a number of occasions prior to the expiry of their previous collective agreement. As these meetings were not successful, on January 2, 1976, I appointed Messrs. C. A. Ogden and R. L. Kervin, of Labour Canada's Halifax office, as conciliation officers to assist the parties in their deliberations. Numerous meetings were held with the parties during the next two months and the conciliation officers filed their report on March 4, 1976, recommending the next step in the conciliation procedure, the appointment of a conciliation commissioner to deal with the items still in dispute.

On March 17 of this year I therefore appointed Judge Nathan Green, Q.C., of Halifax, as conciliation commissioner in the dispute. Judge Green met extensively with the parties during the course of the following three months and filed his report, containing his recommendations on all issues in dispute, on June 24, 1976. On July 17 the Maritime Employers' Association notified my department of its acceptance of the recommendations contained in the report. However, the union rejected the recommendations "in part" and requested mediation assistance based on terms of reference put forward by the union.

On July 13 I appointed Mr. R. L. Kervin, of our Halifax office, as mediator pursuant to section 195 of the Canada Labour Code, with instructions to assist the parties but without placing any restrictions on what areas of the dispute were to be mediated. Mr. Kervin was able to arrange a settlement between the negotiation committees on August 2, subject to its ratification by the union membership. This settlement was rejected by the union membership through a vote held on August 5, 1976. It was following this rejection that the Maritime Employers' Association locked the longshoremen out of the port of Halifax on August 8, effectively closing down the operations of the port.

On September 17 I assigned Mr. W. P. Kelly, assistant deputy minister, Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, to this dispute to assist the parties in reaching a settlement. Mr. Kelly began meetings with the parties on September 20, assisted by Mr. Kervin, and on September 25 a settlement was reached and a memorandum of agreement executed by the parties, subject to ratification. The membership of local 269 rejected the mediated settlement by a 56 per cent majority.

Because of the threat to the port's reputation, as well as the serious economic effects resulting from the shutdown, I instructed Mr. Kelly to return to Halifax on October 4 and assess the situation following the rejection of the mediated settlement reached on September 25. Mr. Kelly resumed mediation sessions with the objective of developing a formal proposal of terms of settlement. On October 6 I joined Mr. Kelly and met with both parties and submitted a formal proposal setting out suggested terms of settlement.

The proposal, basically, involved the acceptance by both sides of the agreement reached on September 25, but reserving for further negotiation and arbitration, if necessary, four of the contentious items dealing with the dispatching of longshoremen. The parties were given until December 10 to reach agreement on the four contentious items of the rules of dispatch, and failing this I would appoint Judge Nathan Green to arbitrate the items and his award would be incorporated into the collective agreement effective January 1, 1977.

While the union membership accepted this proposal on October 8, although by a narrow margin, the Maritime Employers' Association rejected these terms and put forward their own conditions for the lifting of the lock-out. I found this turn of events most unfortunate and I felt—indeed, I still believe—that this proposal met the requirements of both groups and especially provided the employers the flexibility and stability of the work force it sought. I therefore suggested to the Maritime Employers' Association that they give the proposed terms of settlement careful reconsideration, but they informed me on October 13 that they would not accept this proposal as a basis of settlement.

At this juncture, Mr. Speaker, I see only two courses open to the government: to allow the lock-out to continue, in the hope that the pressure of economic strain on the parties will eventually lead to resolution of the dispute, or legislate an end to the lock-out and bring about a resumption of operations in the port while presenting a method for resolution of the dispute. If I have opted for the second solution it is because, having exhausted over the last ten months all procedures and good offices to resolve the dispute through mediation, it is now clear that the serious adverse economic effects of this dispute are such as to warrant legislative action.

Many members of this House are painfully aware of the adverse economic repercussions of this industrial dispute. I have received numerous representations from business and labour representatives, including important shipping interests, as well as elected officials at all levels of government, and of various political affiliations, to put an end to the dispute because of the severe adverse effects on the economy of the city of Halifax and of the province of Nova Scotia.

May I at this stage acknowledge the good intentions and assistance offered by members of parliament from the city of Halifax, and the assistance of the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) in efforts to bring this matter to a resolution. It has been estimated that the economic loss is now well over $1 million a week and that the number of workers laid off as a result of this dispute is close to 3,000. When I expressed gratitude to hon. members from Halifax, I should have added from the city of Dartmouth also.

That this situation can no longer be tolerated in light of the continuing deterioration of the port's reputation will be evident to all. Accordingly, the Halifax Port Operations Act orders the immediate resumption of longshoring and related operations. The longshoremen will return to work under the terms of the tentative agreement reached on September 25 with the exception of certain contentious items relating to the rules of dispatch. Immediately upon passage of the legislation, local 269 of the International Longshoremen's Association will draft rules of dispatch to cover the outstanding items for submission to and the approval of the Maritime Employers' Association. The proposed rules of dispatch must be submitted by local 269 of the ILA to the Maritime Employers' Association not later than December 10, 1976. If the Maritime Employers' Association agrees with the rules of dispatch as submitted, they will be incorporated into the collective agreement as of January 1, 1977, or as soon as practical after that date.

Should the Maritime Employers' Association fail to agree with the rules of dispatch as proposed, or should local 269 of the ILA fail to submit language on these rules of dispatch to the MEA by December 10, either or both parties may notify me and I will appoint an industrial inquiry commissioner to make a determination on the specific items in dispute. In such event, within 15 days following his appointment the industrial inquiry commissioner shall render an award prescribing rules of dispatch which will be final and binding on the parties and incorporated into the collective agreement, effective January 1, 1977, or as soon as practical after that date.

I must at this point, Mr. Speaker, explain why the bill before you departs, in two aspects, from the recommendations of my proposed terms of settlement. The first matter concerns the date on which I had proposed the rules of dispatch be incorporated into the collective agreement; that is, January 1, 1977. It has been brought to my attention by the legal officers of the Crown that we must guard against unforeseeable events. The severe illness of the industrial inquiry commissioner is one example of such unforeseen circumstances that would prevent the fulfilling of this obligation. Thus it is necessary to incorporate in the bill the wording "January 1, 1977, or, where in the opinion of the Minister of Labour that date is impractical, on a date after January 1, 1977, that is designated by the Minister of Labour as the earliest practical date".

The second change to the original recommendations concerns the person of the industrial inquiry commissioner. In my proposal, which was approved by the union, the commissioner charged with the determination of the four items in dispute was identified in the person of Judge Nathan Green, a provincial magistrate of the city of Halifax. Again, legal officers of the Crown have advised that the industrial inquiry commissioner should not be specifically identified in the bill, should unforeseeable events prevent this individual from accepting or from carrying out this assignment.

Having said this, Mr. Speaker, I wish to place clearly on record that the commissioner I intend to appoint is Judge Green, whose labour relations expertise and knowledge of the matters in dispute—he was, after all, the conciliation commissioner—eminently qualify him for this task. I also wish to assure all concerned that in my mind the date on which the rules of dispatch are to be incorporated into the collective agreement, whether by agreement of the MEA as submitted by local 269 of the ILA or as presented by the industrial inquiry commissioner, is January 1, 1977, and both parties have my pledge that I shall see that this is indeed the effective date, barring unforeseen circumstances of the nature I have just indicated.

In closing, may I emphasize that considerable efforts have been made in recent years to transform the port of Halifax into an efficient year-round harbour, and I look to both employers and workers, who have so much at stake here, to co-operate fully to ensure that the productivity of this port is such as to guarantee its competitiveness.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that with this understanding, and in full realization of the seriousness of the situation that confronts us, this House will give speedy and full approval to this legislation.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, there can be no question about the importance of the port of Halifax to the cities, harbour, the region and the nation. As the minister has pointed out, the port has not been in operation now for more than two months as the result of a lock-out. While I am generally reluctant to see parliament legislate men back to work, or on the other hand legislate the termination of a lock-out, I do not think there can be any question that the regional and national effects of the continuation of the tie-up of the port of Halifax fully justify this House of Commons and parliament taking action to open the port again on the terms outlined by the minister.

I think I should indicate immediately that as far as I and the colleagues in my party are concerned, we are prepared to see quick passage of this legislation. My colleagues from Halifax-East-Hants (Mr. McCleave) and for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) may well have some comments to make at the committee stage. There may very well need to be some questions posed for purposes of clarification, and it may be that we will want to suggest the reconsideration of some of the wording in clause 8 of the bill which seems to be rather unusual. But in terms of the principle of the bill and its importance, I do not differ in any way from what the minister has put forward.

I do not mean to suggest that the lock-out or the issues in dispute, between management and labour in this instance, are in any way frivolous or lacking in importance. It is obviously of the greatest importance to the cities there and the province, indeed to the whole country, that the port be efficient and competitive. There has, as the minister has indicated, been a prolonged period of inability on the part of management and the men to agree on rules of dispatch which those on the management side have felt, I am quite sure sincerely, are necessary for the efficient operation of the port.

I am not suggesting in any way that the lock-out or the discussions or lack of agreement have in any way been frivolous or that it ought to have been easy for the men and management to reach agreement. As the minister has indicated, Mr. Speaker, those on the management side felt that they were able to accept the proposal that the bill incorporates, with the exception to which the minister has called attention. It is my understanding that the reservations of management related simply to one aspect of the minister's proposal, and that was the duration of the period that the union would have to develop and propose rules of dispatch. Management took the position that a period of three months, to January 1 next, was unnecessarily long, and it is my understanding that had the proposal been for a shorter period of time it would have been accepted. I think I would have quite a difficult time trying to convince this House or people in the Halifax area that a proposal would be reasonable if limited to 30 days, and that it would be unreasonable and entitled to be rejected if extended over a period of three months.

We do agree, of course, that it is one thing for us to legislate to reopen the port of Halifax, and I agree that this does not necessarily mean the port will be fully utilized. I also recognize that there may very well be a period of some instability continuing over the period of three months, or perhaps longer.

But the proposal the minister has made and the bill which is now before us which incorporates this proposal hold out the promise that within a reasonably short period of time the problem of achieving a settlement of the rules of dispatch will be resolved. This does not promise to achieve this result as rapidly as those on management side would like, but for those of us who have concern for the port of Halifax it does hold out the promise of achieving a settlement respecting the rules of dispatch, if necessary by binding arbitration, within a reasonable period of time.

This, of course, is not the place to attempt to negotiate a settlement or a solution. I wish to express the hope that those involved in this dispute and in the operation of the port of Halifax, both on the management and the labour side, will use this period of time not only in an attempt to achieve agreement in respect of the rules of dispatch, but to get the port of Halifax back fully in operation, and that they will use this period of time to restore confidence in the port of Halifax which has received something of a setback.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, my colleagues from the Halifax area will wish to say something in connection with this bill at a later stage, and there may well be some questions to be clarified on matters of detail; but as far as I know, I am the only member of my party who will be speaking at this stage. I simply wish to indicate that, in the circumstances, we feel there is no alternative but to proceed with the bill, and to proceed with it as rapidly as possible through all stages.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), will be speaking for us on this bill and will indicate our readiness to go along with it. But because of the matters that are involved and the thickness of the document that was tabled, we think it would be a good idea to carry out the agreement made earlier and ask the House now to call it one o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is that agreed?

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I want to speak for only ten minutes during the debate, and my remarks will be of a very general nature. I think the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is a very sensible one and we should have an opportunity to study this measure, but surely that can be done after I have spoken, and perhaps my colleague, the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall). Otherwise, I do not intend to intervene in this debate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be better to call it one o'clock now and preserve the usual order. It is not going to take very long. Would it not be sensible for us to look at the material that was tabled?

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to be dictated to by anybody regarding my right to represent my area. If I am allowed to speak, I will speak, but if I am not recognized, I will not. That suggestion is totally unacceptable to me.

An hon. Member: Let us hear him.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I certainly am not going to be stubborn, but I thought the House had agreed to this during the discussion about proceedings on this matter. I am not trying to cut the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) off, or to prevent him from speaking. We want to hear him. Our contribution will also be about ten minutes on second reading, but it does seem to me to make sense to take a lunch hour now and look at the whole matter.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The Chair was under the impression that there was agreement, but there does not seem to be now. I recognize the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave).

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Thank you, Mr. Speaker; you have restored yourself to my favour. As a result, I am going to send down that old pair of black pants I used to wear when I occupied that position. Perhaps you can make them over to your own suitability. I am pleased to see you in the chair. I think you will contribute a great deal to this session and to the proceedings of this parliament.

This will be only the second occasion on which I have publicly made reference to the lock-out which has gripped the port of Halifax. After the lock-out started, someone from radio station CHNS in Halifax called to ask what my intentions were regarding the lock-out. I said I had none at that particular time; that was back in early August. He was the only member of the journalistic world in Halifax who called and solicited my opinion. That may seem strange, but those great figures who are always so prone to rush to get into public print in my part of the world have had their say and their words have been emblazoned on the pages of the Halifax Chronicle-Herald and Mail-Star, as well as on television and in radio newscasts.

Some time earlier, after meeting with my colleagues, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), the former leader of the opposition, and the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall), we determined that we would stay away from publicity on this matter, working behind the scenes to see if any resolution could be found of the issues.

I am not going to give the House a blow by blow account of the 30, 40, 50, 60 or 70 meetings, phone calls, etc., that we had in the interim, but I will sum up our position with regard to this legislation. I say this because of what you will find in dealing with the press in Halifax on a matter such as the hanging bill. Do you know who they went out and interviewed? They interviewed the dog-catchers all over Nova Scotia to find out what they thought about hanging. They would not go near a federal member of parliament, because he is the one who had to make the decision and that would be too direct an approach. That is really what I have to say about the press in Halifax in respect of this miserable business that has occupied us for some time and is occupying us in this place now.

My colleagues and I have talked to the people from the Halifax-Dartmouth port commission, we have talked to members of the Maritime Employers' Association, and we have talked to members of the International Longshoremen's Association, the chief disputants in this matter, as well as to others. There were times, I think the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) would have to agree, when it appeared that perhaps we had come close to helping him and Mr. Kelly solve a very difficult issue. Our only purpose was to try to be of help in seeing that the issue was solved outside parliament. We worked like hell trying to do that, Mr. Speaker. We came close at times, but we did not come quite close enough.

I made one promise to everyone I talked to, and that is why I am not mentioning names today. I said they could talk to me, the hon. member for Halifax, and the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East, without getting their names in the press in any way, shape or form. We told them we would honour their confidence and do our best to carry forward their points of view. We did this all through the piece and, as I say, we came remarkably close to solving it. We worked among the parties daily, and if we did not qualify for the title of statesmen in that posture, I do not know what we would qualify as. We tried, and we missed.

I just want to tell the House that after consultation with the parties concerned—I think I can mention two names, Mr. Masters of the Maritime Employers' Association, and Mr. Quinn of the Longshoremen, and you will appreciate that we speak to these people every day and sometimes twice a day—there is no way this lock-out can be ended unless we take action in parliament. When any labour dispute has to come into the House of Commons and the other place to be solved, that is a miserable solution, but I simply say it is the only solution that can possibly work.

I do not want to single out any of the people I have spoken to for this comment, but I am convinced that they are so exhausted by the process in which they found themselves, the lock-out, with all the pressures from every conceivable angle, that it would be impossible for them to reach agreement. There are too many feelings that can be tenderly bruised just by the sheer process and the fact that they have been fighting for too damn long. Too damn long has come to an end, and I say let us pass the legislation.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): One o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it agreed that we call it one o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At 12.45 p.m. the House took recess.

[Mr. McCleave.]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a good deal of interest to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) when he introduced this bill, and to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) who represents the area which is directly concerned with the lock-out.

Our position on this question is one which we have held for a long time, and our views have not changed. We believe in free collective bargaining between an employer and an employee or his union. We believe that it is wrong for a government to intervene directly very often. We hoped the government would never have to intervene in a dispute between employees and employers. We have been, we are, and we will continue to be, opposed to the views expressed by some members of this House, and certainly by many people outside the House, that there should be legislation requiring compulsory arbitration. We think that is wrong. We think that kind of policy which is used in some countries would embitter rather than help solve or lessen the differences between employees and employers.

Having said that, we accept the fact that when a dispute between employees and employers which leads either to a strike by employees or, as in this case, a lock-out by employers, continues for any length of time, it has such grave consequences on the community directly concerned, and indeed on the whole region, if not the whole country, that there comes a time when the government must intervene. We have had examples of this. I did not take the time to search the record for the years in which I have been here, but on a number of occasions in the 14 years I have been here the government has had to bring in legislation to end a work stoppage.

There were occasions, when Saskatchewan and British Columbia had NDP governments, when both governments found it necessary to bring in legislation to end work stoppages. We accept the fact that this can and does happen, and it has happened. It has happened in this case. The differences involved in this case go back even longer than the minister recounted to us earlier: they go back three or four years. Arguments and discussions have gone on at least that long in connection with the port of Halifax, and that is not surprising.

With regard to loading and unloading goods which are shipped by boat, there has been a veritable revolution in the past 25 years. Many products which used to be loaded and unloaded individually are now packed in containers and moved by new and modern equipment, large cranes and other equipment, and as a result the port of Halifax and all other ports require fewer employees than once was the case. The way in which employees are to be dealt with as a result of this containerization and modernization has been, and will continue to be, a matter of dispute between employees and employers for a long time. I say that as a statement of fact and it must be accepted.

This dispute has gone on for at least a year and there has been a lock-out for several months. The activities of the whole region are being very adversely affected. For that reason we agree with the minister that it is time the government acted. We feel that the proposal he has made, namely, that the employees and employers be told that work must begin as soon as this bill is passed, will give the two sides until some time in December to try to reach agreement between themselves on the matters which are still unsettled. Failing such agreement, an arbitrator will be appointed to look into the matter and to make findings and recommendations, and these will be binding on both parties.

As I said at the beginning, we are not enamoured of or enthusiastic about this kind of intervention, but we accept the fact that there is a time when governments have a responsibility to the community as a whole to act when the effects of a stoppage are too serious. We believe the time has come for the government to act, and that parliament should support the government.

Let me conclude by saying that we accept this principle with regard to this particular case. I hope there are no more cases like it, but if in the future there should be, we will take the same view as we have in the past. We will look at the situation as it exists at the time the matter arises. If we are dealing with this specific case, and if it is not a precedent for cases in the future, or the beginning of a permanent method of solving disputes put forward by the government, we are prepared to go along with this bill and to co-operate in ensuring its rapid passage.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I listened with much attention to the explanations given by the minister in his statement. I also watched the reactions of opposition members, and I realize that by general admission this is not the best procedure. But in the circumstances, it is time the government decide on some approach, especially since, under the legislation before us, the main interested parties would still have some time before them to think things over and look for what might be considered the best solution.

To my unfortunate amazement, there are still people who believe the remedy to labour-management problems is a work stoppage. This is rather strange, because the fact is that everything has been accomplished in our world through work. How can strikes solve problems? That is beyond me! For this reason, I suggest from time to time to the government they should try and come up with a labour legislation that would fit the workers involved, a comprehensive legislation to avoid the ever more numerous strikes that cause economic upheavals affecting everyone, even those who are responsible for deciding and legislating in the labour-management area. But the government appear to be reluctant. It would seem they are afraid of labour unions. Apparently, they fear they will lose the labour vote at the next election. The legislation before us is not in the interest of the people, but rather in the interest of the next election. We must strive for a fairer solution to the various problems now facing us. The only possible reason for a strike is an attempt to regain lost time in the race against soaring prices. But the right to strike is not basic to the current situation. It is something linked to various general illnesses, and it is becoming a tool of hypothetical efficiency. No one knows whether it will succeed or not. And generally speaking, strikes are aimed at the people who pay, rather than those who deprive. I shall deal with the main causes and the multiplication of strikes. First the workers say: Our wages are not high enough. Management replies: If we increase your wages, we shall not be able to make ends meet. Let us pause for a moment and examine the main cause, as we should. It is found in the financial system which deprives us of all sorts of things. It often happens that by abusing the means employed we contribute to preventing ourselves from achieving the objectives we have set, because of resulting clashes in labour relations. We have noticed agreements turn to disagreements. It is true: we have seen it happen. We can see it within the postal service: there was agreement and now there is disagreement.

Some negotiators persist in clamoring for reinstatement of their rights which results in a lot of contestation often based on misunderstanding and degenerates most of the time into confusion. I jumped on the occasion to point out to the House that the time has come for the government to act. This is no time for squabbles between political parties but time to try to find a real formula, acceptable first of all to the workers, because they need a decent wage to live, and also to management which has to be able to bank on normal activities in their field of operation.

So, in that atmosphere of constraints and industrial conflicts and others, with legislation permeated with timorous inspiration in the face of finance that dominates, it is difficult to find a solution at the present time that can be fair to employers and employees alike. Once again governments will have to become aware of their responsibilities and implement real legislation that does not smack of the domination of the profiteers, nor of the fear of what some unions might do, but legislation that is understanding, honest, humane, just and truly social, which guarantees an equitable distribution of profits and reasonable income to the workers.

With the group of experts governments have at their disposal, it should be possible to draft legislation that is clear in style so that the interested parties can understand it. It is worth a try. That is the price we will have to pay for peace in labour relations.

We evidently support the government's approach in this bill. I do not feel it would be possible to adopt another. We therefore support this bill and hope that it will be adopted soon, so that normal activities in the port of Halifax may resume.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on the motion for second reading. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Laniel in the chair.

The Chairman: Order, please. The House is in committee of the whole on Bill C-14, an act to provide for the resumption and continuation of longshoring and related operations at the port of Halifax. Shall clause 2 carry?

On clause 2—Definitions—"collective agreement to which this act applies".

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, I find this bill deficient in that it does not properly describe the locale of the dispute we are considering. The locale, in fact, is the port of Halifax-Darmouth. I regret that the full name of the port is not mentioned in the bill. Is it confidential?

I wish to ask two or three questions about the details of the bill. I join with the hon. member for Halifax and the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants in regretting the necessity to conisder the matter at all. At the same time, we recognize the importance of the government's action. We hope that both sides will do everything necessary to bring about a return of trust and confidence in the port of Halifax-Dartmouth.

If users regain their trust in the port, it will work immediately at about 60 per cent of normal capacity. It may take another two or three months to recapture 100 per cent of all the port's business. Restoration of confidence is most important to the port. We all hope that confidence will be restored within a week or ten days of the coming into force of this act and that the port will regain its previous stature in the shipping world. The question concerns us. I hope everything will be done to facilitate this process.

I would now direct my first question to the minister. Essentially, what services will the department make available to both sides? I am concerned about the question of dispatch. In other words, will the services of departmental officials be available to either side if they should need such services?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Yes, Mr. Chairman. Obviously if the parties want the department's help in resolving the matter voluntarily before the cut-off date, December 10, the department will respond positively.

Mr. Forrestall: May I ask another general question? I shall ask two or three specific questions when we come to the relevant clauses. In his statement to the press yesterday, the minister, in looking generally at difficulties at other ports in Canada between the MEA and various locals of the ILA, indicated that he would have to take a fresh look at labour relations and difficulties which have plagued the past history of negotiations between the ILA and the MEA. What did the minister mean; can he elaborate?

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

In the eyes of some, he left the matter dangling; he left the impression that it would be resolved in a judicial way. Some took the minister to mean that he would not consider the history of these relationships but would consider ways of imposing guidelines, restrictions or directions with respect to how the parties should conduct themselves in future. Will the minister elaborate on what he said?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Chairman, yes, I will. I welcome the opportunity to respond to the hon. member's question. In the department we are pleased because we have been able to resolve this year all those areas of concern which, if left unresolved, could have had a severe national impact in terms of tying up the country. Labour and management have entered into collective agreements and this has been an encouraging sign. I am talking about the railways, the towboats, the St. Lawrence Seaway workers and the grain handlers. All have settled. The grain handlers even agreed to voluntary arbitration, which is a leap forward, a new point of departure and an encouraging sign.

On the other hand, when one considers the history of the ports in terms of the collective bargaining process, one is not encouraged. Eighteen months ago I came to this House with legislation ordering men back to work in the port of Montreal, and here we are again with legislation to end the work stoppage at the port of Halifax. I have read the history of the involvement of competent mediators, both locally as well as nationally-oriented, who have lent their services to find some resolution of the difficulty, without success. I have reviewed the pattern of the efforts undertaken in Halifax; I think it is impressive. Yet we are still not able to resolve the difficulty. The result has been the port being closed for two months, a closure which has affected the economy of an entire region as important as Nova Scotia. Business was lost at the port of Montreal owing to the work stoppage. All this indicates that something is seriously wrong with the collective bargaining process between employers and the unions with which they deal.

Perhaps there is a fundamental lack of trust of the most basic kind, a lack of trust which does not enable the parties to enter into a contract without government intervention. That basic lack of trust is most serious. I do not know its precise cause. I only know that this continued history of breakdowns is injurious to our economy, particularly that of the regions.

If this history establishes a pattern of poor industrial relations between employer and employee, or vice versa, there may be a reasonable basis for an examination and investigation of the state of labour relations in this industry. It is an option that should be considered. I have not made any such determination. However, perhaps if some competent people set up as commissioners, who have an intimate knowledge of the industry and who would enjoy the competence of all those on the employer and employee side, would look into this situation and make recommendations, it may lay the basis for a resumption of the basic type of trust that is needed for the parties to arrive at any successful collective agreement which, as I say, is not very encouraging in this particular industry.

I might point out that we looked at the grain handlers situation. That seems to be a catalyst to a degree; it seems to encourage the parties to resolve their disputes without the constant necessity of government intervention. We started out looking at that process through the appointment of an industrial inquiry commissioner whom I have the authority to appoint under the Labour Code.

I was looking at that situation and expressing the frustration that many members have with regard to breakdown of the system in terms of resolving this particular dispute. I find it regrettable that parliament again has had to intervene. Every member of the House has expressed that sentiment during this debate. There must be a better answer for this particular industry.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—Longshoring operations to be resumed.

Mr. Forrestall: With regard to clause 3, Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister will take a moment to elaborate on subclause (3) which reads:

> Every officer or representative of a union shall comply with any order or request made pursuant to the collective agreement brought into force by section 4 that is applicable to him for the despatch of persons to perform longshoring or related operations at the port of Halifax.

The document the minister tabled today does not include the sections with regard to dispatch. I would like some clarification. Is the document that was tabled today complete? How does it dispatch persons during such a situation? Perhaps that is a better way to put the question.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Chairman, this clause refers to the collective agreement that was agreed to on September 25 and which has been tabled. It does include those sections relative to the rules of dispatch. However, the bill exempts the four sections upon which there could be no agreement and throws that option to resolution between the parties themselves up to December 10.

Mr. Forrestall: Those four sections have been removed?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): The bill removes them. Does that answer the hon. member's question?

Mr. Forrestall: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Clause agreed to.

On clause 4—New collective agreement.

The Chairman: On clause 4, I should ask hon. members to fill in the blanks as to the date of the tabling of documents referred to in that clause. Line 36 should read "October 22, 1976". The following line should read "document number 302-73". Shall the clause carry?

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 5 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 8—Injunction.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, I wish to pose one or two questions to the minister and his officials with regard to enforcement. Passage of this clause implies a request to the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia for an injunction. Why did the minister feel it necessary to extend the right to that injunction to July 1, 1977?

[Translation]

Mr. Olivier: Mr. Speaker, I shall reply to the question of the hon. member by saying simply that, according to the spirit of the bill, we would like everything to be over one day. In this case, it will end on July 1, 1977. Afterwards, we shall come back to what must happen, that is negotiation between the two parties. Ordinary labour legislation will prevail afterwards. This agreement will therefore be an 18 month agreement between the parties.

[English]

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, I am slightly uncertain, but I think it is quite unseemly for the House to determine the length of an agreement between two parties.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Just to elaborate on what my parliamentary secretary said, Mr. Chairman, the collective agreement dated September 25 that we are now inaugurating runs from January 1, 1976, to July 1, 1977. It is an 18-month agreement. We want to give the court authority for compliance for the duration of the agreement. The termination of the agreement that has been tabled is July 1, 1977.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, I wish to raise a question about the use of the word "shall" in the third line of clause 8. It seems to my colleagues and myself that this almost suggests instruction to the court. To that extent, there is a removal of any discretion as far as the court is concerned. I wonder why the word "may" would not be appropriate.

The final paragraph of that clause looks, on the face of it, as though it is rather gratuitous. The court would have the authority, in any event, to cite for contempt anybody who failed to comply with an injunction issued by the court. What is the purpose of spelling out the right to impose punishment for contempt, which is implicit in any event? Why does the bill virtually instruct the court to issue an injunction rather than simply authorize it?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the notice the hon. member for Halifax gave me with regard to raising this question. That gave me an opportunity to get hold of the legal advisers in Justice to assist me in answering. I am told that it is not interpreted in that fashion. It is not an instruction to the court as such, but an instruction under certain conditions, the conditions being set out in (a) and (b).

I am also told that we had a similar provision in the legislation ordering the men back to work in the port of Montreal 18 months ago. The courts were called upon, following that legislation, with regard to the issuance of injunctions against the union to comply. The section was not contested by the courts. Indeed, the courts acted under it. The opinion I have received from Justice is that it is an appropriate section and according to precedent.

I will now turn to the hon. member's question with regard to the gratuitous element in the last three lines of clause 8. Perhaps in a sense it does seem somewhat gratuitous, but even if it is, it is not offensive. Again, I can only say this is the precise wording of the section in the previous legislation, on which the courts acted without adverse comment of any kind.

● (1440)

Mr. Stanfield: Do those final five lines restrict the right of appeal? This section does designate the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia in relation to the issue of injunctions. Do those lines mean, also, that the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia is the court to cite or punish for contempt? Is that restrictive as far as the right to appeal is concerned? Would that be a reason for slipping that in there? Or am I unnecessarily suspicious?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I believe that subsection 6 sets out the procedures with regard to appeals—where they would lie. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would check to see whether it deals with his point. I think it might.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 9 agreed to.

On clause 10—Coming into force.

Mr. McCleave: Might I ask the minister, with regard to clause 10, whether the other place is standing by and, if so, whether it is expected that this legislation will be operative on Monday morning.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): The answer to the first part of the question is yes; the other place is standing by to act promptly after the bill leaves this chamber. I believe the legislation comes into effect 24 hours after royal assent, which means that it can come into force earlier than next Monday.

Mr. McCleave: It would come into effect, then, on Sunday morning; am I correct in that assumption?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Yes.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT AND SATISFIED SECURITIES ACT

MEASURE TO REPEAL SECURITIES ACT AND AMEND ADMINISTRATION ACT

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-8, to amend the Financial Administration Act and to repeal the Satisfied Securities Act be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, my colleague the parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan), will be speaking on this legislation.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the provisions of this bill would expedite the discharge of securities taken by Her Majesty in the form of liens, mortgages, hypothecs, privileges or other charges, once the debts for which such securities were taken have been satisfied.

The Satisfied Securities Act, the statute under which such discharges are now given, authorizes the governor in council to effect the discharge of a satisfied security through the passing of an appropriate order in council. This, however, is a cumbersome and time-consuming procedure. Recognizing that the elimination of the requirement to effect a discharge through reference to the governor in council would materially reduce the time required to obtain a discharge, this bill proposes that the authority to effect a discharge of security be given to the minister responsible for the administration of the security. Hon. members may be interested to know that the volume of such discharges has greatly increased because of the number of programs administered under the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

It is further proposed that the authority be included in the Financial Administration Act, with the Satisfied Securities Act being repealed. This would have the advantage of incorporating the authority to discharge securities in the major piece of legislation which deals directly with government financial administration while eliminating a small and insignificant statute.

The securities in question are those taken by Her Majesty, not those taken by Crown agents such as Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or the Farm Credit Corporation. Those corporations are empowered to execute a simple corporate discharge of mortgage. The bulk of the securities which would be discharged under the proposed legislation have been taken by Her Majesty to secure loans made from the Indian economic development fund and the Indian off-reserve and Eskimo housing program, and are administered by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

This is not the most momentous bill which parliament will be asked to consider this session, but it is an important matter of housekeeping and I look forward with great anticipation to dealing with this measure in the finance committee.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, there are aspects of this bill which the parliamentary secretary has not covered. It is one of those sleeper bills. Immediately after I had read it the first time, I was tempted to think it could be handled in the way such measures are often handled on a Friday afternoon, that is to say, dealt with in committee of the whole and passed through all its stages. Then an innate sense of conservatism and my instincts as a lawyer caused me to reflect further. I looked at the bill again, and I am satisfied that my second thought was superior to the first.

As Your Honour knows, after a good deal of struggle on this side of the House a committee has been set up to deal with statutory instruments. That committee has under its examination—and it can examine not only once but, if necessary, a second or third time—any instrument executed by way of delegation of powers and incorporated either in an order in council or some other statutory instrument.

Unfortunately, there has arisen a difference of opinion between members of the committee of both this House and the other place, on the one hand, and officers of the administration, on the other hand, as to what constitutes a statutory instrument, the more restrictive interpretation naturally being applied by the administrative officers.

As the Satisfied Securities Act provides, there would have to be an order in council passed to discharge any particular security in favour of Her Majesty regarding not only affairs dealing with Indian lands but, I suggest, also the parks department. I suggest that would have some interest as well.

I cannot agree with the parliamentary secretary that mere administrative convenience shall be the overriding consideration. I know it is difficult to have all of these orders in council cluttering up the landscape, and I also realize many other orders in council are having to go through. I remember, when dealing with the Immigration Act, often the admission to Canada of an immigrant, after initial admittance by ministerial permit, had to be validated by order in council, which was perhaps anything from five to six months after the event.

In this particular instance, not merely administrative requirements have to be met under the Satisfied Securities Act; the rights and obligations of subjects of the land must also be recognized. As long as the Satisfied Securities Act is in force, an order in council discharging the right of the Crown against any land held by a subject shall be subject to scrutiny by the statutory instruments committee.

As I have indicated privately to the minister, when we get into committee we want to get an answer to the question whether there is a guarantee that the instruments to be executed by any minister in any form authorized by the deputy attorney general—I am not too sure that the language of the new section of the Financial Administration Act is any more felicitous from a legal point of view than the provision in the Satisfied Securities Act—are not merely departmental documents but will also be subject to examination. Not only the parties themselves but the interests of the public can be satisfied by examination.

The proposal that is before the House in this bill merely means that a minister may execute the discharge of a security, in whatever form it is, and that it will then be sent out, say to a land titles office, where the discharge of the security is registered. Outside of that there is no other means of examining the document, whereas under an order in council, of course, the document is to be examined by the statutory instruments committee.

That is basically my point this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, and it is the question on which my colleagues and I will have to be satisfied in committee. Let me reiterate that this motion to give the bill second reading is not an acceptance of the bill. The motion is that the bill be read the second time and referred to the committee for examination. Then the bill is read the second time, after the report stage, if one examines our procedures. I would therefore recommend to the members of the House that the bill be read the second time and referred to the committee so that the committee can look into the judgment of what is the better legal position under either the Satisfied Securities Act or under this amendment to the Financial Administration Act.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I had thought that the first reaction of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) was the correct one. In fact, at that point I felt that he had stolen the sentence that I was going to offer, namely that this bill is so simple that we might as well take it in committee of the whole and complete the job this afternoon. I see that he has now been drawn away from that position; he feels that the bill should go to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. I have listened to his argument but he has not convinced me.

There are times around here when we demand the right to see more things, and so on, but there are other times when we complain about the place being cluttered with too much detail. It strikes me that this is a very simple administrative process that ought not to clutter the work of the committee on statutory instruments or any other body, and I feel that it would have been better just to finish the job this afternoon. Of course, this would require unanimous consent, so all I can say is that if we are prepared to agree to second reading of the bill, and if there is still a suggestion that it be dealt with in committee of the whole, we would agree with that as well.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Income Tax

INCOME TAX

MEASURE TO IMPLEMENT AGREEMENTS BETWEEN CANADA AND CERTAIN COUNTRIES TO AVOID DOUBLE TAXATION

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finances) moved that Bill C-12, to implement an agreement between Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany and conventions between Canada and Morocco, Canada and Pakistan, Canada and Singapore, Canada and the Philippines, Canada and the Dominican Republic and Canada and Switzerland for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is not a bill which we would recommend be considered all in one afternoon, all three readings, because it deals not only with the important treaty that has been entered into, subject to ratification by parliament, with the Federal Republic of Germany, but there are other treaties included for the elimination of double taxation between Canada and Morocco, Pakistan, Singapore, The Philippines, Dominican Republic and Switzerland. The treaties tend to follow the OECD model but there are important differences among all of them. With this bill, as well, I look forward to taking up these interesting matters when the bill reaches the finance committee.

I might say by way of background that the tax reform of 1971 brought an urgency to extending the network of tax treaties that Canada holds with countries around the world because of the imposition of a higher witholding tax, for one thing, and the revision of existing treaties that were in effect between Canada and a number of other countries.

I offer this substantial bill for second reading, Mr. Speaker, and look forward to speaking on it further when the bill reaches the Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs Committee.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I suppose this is the second slice of a whole series of bills of this nature which will come before this House and the other place arising out of the amendments to the Income Tax Act of 1971. The then minister, Mr. Benson, indicated that Canada would have to go through a whole series of changes to agreements to avoid double taxation with all of its partners who participate in this type of convention around the world. On this occasion we have some six or seven which extend wider application of what I think are common sense rules between the various countries which are our trading partners and with which we do have a great deal of trade.

Last year through Bill S-32 this parliament ratified agreements between Canada and France, Canada and Belgium, and Canada and Israel. I would suggest that possibly the government at this time in bringing forward Bill C-12 will have benefited from amendments brought forward by the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs as the result of the initiative of myself and my colleague, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) and it will arrive at a much more workable review of regulations as they appear, not in detail, at page 7 of this bill.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

The insertion of clause 23 in the bill points out the fact that there are a great number of vacua in the rules of this House dealing with a concept that was introduced when this House was considering the establishment of the Committee on Statutory Instruments and the Statutory Instruments Act. This House considered for the first time the concept and application of affirmative and negative resolutions. However, the House has never come to the point of establishing its practice with regard to either of those types of resolutions.

Unfortunately each one of these bills at the present time has to carry an elaborate procedure in a statute which has to be laid out, at least until the House has determined what shall be its rule. To this extent let me say as a member of the committee that I would welcome a reference to it by the House, because our procedures are archaic enough as they are now in that our standing committees must wait until there is a reference before any consideration is given and report back is made. I appeal to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), as government House leader, to inscribe such a motion on the order paper so we can clean up the Statutory Instruments Act and avoid the problem we had in respect of Bill S-32.

The parliamentary secretary might clear up another point for us. The explanation may be very simple. The title of this bill refers to an agreement between Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany, whereas all the others are called conventions. Would the parliamentary secretary please clear up the difference in that regard and tell us why the others are referred to as conventions between Canada and other countries?

I do not think there is anything further that can usefully be said at this time. Officials from the Ministries of Finance and National Revenue will undoubtedly explain to members of the committee the complexities, not so much in respect of the Statute itself, but the schedules, because there are some very difficult details of interpretation and specification which occur in these schedules that in fact lay down the rules so that double taxation may be avoided or attached. I agree with the parliamentary secretary that this bill should be referred to the committee for examination and report back to the House in due course. Perhaps before that occurs he will explain the distinction between agreement and convention.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the last bill had only one paragraph whereas this bill has 185 pages. I agree that the place for it to be dealt with in detail is in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. At this point I should like to indicate general agreement with the bill, the purpose of which is to avoid double taxation between Canada and the other countries mentioned in it.

If I have a particular interest in this bill it is because at least in the agreement with the Federal Republic of Germany, and I think this applies to one or two other countries as well, there are special references to pensions earned in either Canada or the other country. In a sense this is ancillary to an agreement under the provisions of the Canada Pension Plan signed between Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany some years ago. There are some aspects of that agreement which have not been satisfactory. In part they will be corrected by this agreement on taxation having reference to pensions originating in either country. I suggest to the parliamentary secretary who is now in the Department of Finance that this is why there is a need for reciprocal arrangements between this country and others with regard to pensions. He will recall from his former incarnation in the Department of National Health and Welfare that there is a proposed bill to deal with that situation.

I believe the agreement with the Federal Republic of Germany, which is Schedule I to this bill, is to be effective as from January 1, 1976, some nine or ten months ago, which makes it desirable to get the legislation passed as quickly as possible if it is satisfactory to all concerned. In general we believe the bill merits approval and we are prepared to give it second reading so it can be sent to the standing committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

CANADA DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING PREMIUMS, SHARE CAPITAL, ETC.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-3, to amend the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to propose amendments to the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act that in the main can be described to be of a housekeeping nature. This act, which established a system of deposit insurance, came into force about nine years ago and, apart from an amendment that came forward less than a year after, no changes have been made to this legislation. This indicates, I would think, that the deposit insurance scheme was well conceived; but after that length of experience it is felt that certain changes ought to be made to the act to make certain provisions more effective, to clarify others, and, generally to enable the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation to carry out its activities more efficiently.

Before mentioning some of the proposals contained in this bill it might be appropriate to explain briefly the deposit insurance scheme as embodied in the act and mention something about the operations of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, which I will henceforth refer to as "C.D.I.C.".

The main purpose of the act is of course to provide deposit insurance for the protection of persons making deposits in banks, and trust and loan companies against the loss of part or all of such deposits. The insurance covers each deposit up to $20,000. As of the end of 1975 the deposits held in 83 financial institutions were insured by C.D.I.C. This figure represents eleven banks, thirty-two federally incorporated trust and loan companies, and forty provincial trust and loan companies. The total of the insured deposits held by these institutions at the end of 1975 was just under $49 billion.

The act provides for the payment of premiums by the insured member institutions, and at the end of the last calendar year the deposit insurance fund and accumulated net earnings had reached a level of 99 million dollars.

It should be mentioned that, apart from the basic function of C.D.I.C. under the act of providing deposit insurance, it has other powers of an incidental or ancillary nature such as the authority to assist member institutions through the making of loans and the purchase of their assets. C.D.I.C. can also act as a liquidator or receiver of a member institution when appointed by a court and in such a case assume the related expenses.

The most important of the amendments proposed in Bill C-3 relates to the growth of the assets of C.D.I.C. and the rate of premium that should as a consequence be charged member institutions. The act now requires each member institution to pay an annual premium of one thirtieth of one per cent of its insured deposits but authorizes the corporation to reduce this premium if it considers the deposit insurance fund adequate having regard to all the circumstances. However, the annual premium cannot be reduced below an amount that, when added to the total of all previous premiums paid by an institution, would equal one sixth of one per cent of insured deposits. This existing formula for the reduction of premiums has proven inadequate because the rate of increase in deposits held by the institutions has been much higher than was anticipated in 1967. The result is that the premium payments are now enough or more than enough for the deposit insurance fund to maintain a reasonable growth rate.

The objective in deciding on the level of premiums that member institutions should pay is the maintenance of a fund of assets that is adequate in relation to the total of insured deposits. A good deal of thought has been given to the problem of determining when this equilibrium has been reached. There is no sure method of achieving this, but the approach embodied in the proposal is to authorize the board of directors to assess the growth rate of the fund at the end of each financial year, and where the fund is considered adequate having regard to all relevant circumstances to make rebates, subject to the stated limitations, in respect of the premiums paid for the preceding financial year.

I might note that the directors of the corporation are deputy ministers and other government officials, and not representatives of the institutions which are insured.

This bill deals with another matter that is also related to the fact that the deposit insurance fund is soon likely to be considered sufficiently large to meet present normal requirements and is expected to grow at an adequate rate. C.D.I.C. was created with a share capital of $10 million contributed by the government to get the corporation into operation. When the board of directors considers the fund adequate, it would seem unnecessary to continue this investment of capital in the corporation. It is proposed therefore to authorize the C.D.I.C. to redeem its shares and abolish the share capital structure. I may mention that the C.D.I.C. regularly pays a dividend on this capital equal to the rate of interest charged to Crown corporations on funds advanced to them.

A further amendment proposed in this bill concerns the definition "deposit". When the act was passed the board of directors was authorized to define that expression for the purposes of the act. When the act was amended in 1968 a time limit, March 27, 1969, was placed on the power of the board to alter the meaning of deposit which of course is of basic importance in the legislative scheme. Although the definition "deposit" is not found in the act, it is in reality part of the statute and this bill proposes to put it in a schedule to the act because of the numerous provisions involved in the definition. At the same time a few changes are being made in the definition for clarification purposes.

A relatively minor substantive proposal put forth in this bill is one giving C.D.I.C. the authority to guarantee the expenses of a liquidator of a member institution that is being wound up. Such expenses can now be paid by C.D.I.C. if it is itself appointed as liquidator, but it is felt that circumstances could very well arise where it would not be appropriate for C.D.I.C. to act as liquidator and where a professional liquidator would not wish to do so unless its fees were guaranteed.

The remainder of the proposed amendments are of a more minor nature and are for the most part intended to clarify existing provisions. Among these is a change in the provision providing for the designation of an alternate for a director who might be unable to attend a meeting of the board of directors. It was also felt that the provisions of the act regarding the subrogation of C.D.I.C. to the rights of a depositor paid off by C.D.I.C. should be clarified and strengthened. The proposal would accomplish this by specifically authorizing C.D.I.C. in its capacity as subrogee to maintain an action in its own name and by providing that C.D.I.C. can require a depositor who is being reimbursed to give C.D.I.C. a written assignment of his rights against the depository.

Those are examples of the changes proposed in this bill. It might well be that this bill could be combined for consideration by the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs with the first of the three bills we considered this afternoon.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, this bill is one that arises out of experience with the operation of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act since about 1967 when the act was brought into force for the first time.

I recall those periods when there have been some rather unfortunate incidents with deposit taking institutions which, not only with regard to deposits but with regard to deposit certificates, had engaged in some rather speculative ventures and of course went bankrupt to the almost total loss of the deposit. All along the way it has been felt that there should be some form of guarantee at least to a certain limit of the deposits of individuals with various types of deposit taking institutions.

I have always felt that we should have a definition of banking which includes all deposit taking institutions subject to a general bank act. I hope I will be able to prevail rather better than ten years ago in getting my views known to the members of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, to members of the House, and to administrative officials, because I think we have got ourselves into a series of pidgeon holes without creating an effective credit granting system in Canada, much of it outside the legitimate purview of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) who is held responsible for the banking policy of the government and for the economy as a whole. The present restrictions that are imposed upon him and on any minister of finance, I think, are quite wrong, quite unfair. There are some institutions in the financial world in this country operating with impunity, without any control or supervision. Of course changes in the Bank Act will attempt, with some band aids, to bring these people under some sort of mandatory supervision regarding their security and the protection of the public—not supervision and direction of their operations because there is a well established philosophical difference in that connection.

I must say that it is rather difficult for me to comment upon the purposes of a housekeeping type of bill such as this when, as a matter of fact, I was able to get a confidential copy of this bill just before 11 o'clock, even though it had been given first reading yesterday. It is rather difficult, when you are going to discuss a bill in the afternoon and you have received it just beforehand, a bill based on the existing act, to see where the amendments fit in and to make a cogent argument one way or the other. All I can say is that we will examine this in committee and by that time the Superintendent of Insurance, who is the officer of the Department of Finance charged with the supervision of the operations of this act, will be able to come forward with his assistants and explain to the members of the committee why these changes are wanted. We will then see whether other changes are required as well.

I am always mindful about the deposits of individuals and the interest they demand. I am glad to see that in the schedule which will be introduced in the bill there is a definition of the date of the deposit. I have a son who is an employee of a chartered bank. He always tells the story about an individual who came along storming some time between Christmas and the New Year insisting that the deposit which he put into a night depository some time on December 24 should carry interest for all the days that applied over the holiday and before the deposit could be handled. In any event, this bill defines exactly what is the date of a deposit. As today's rates of interest are very high, this becomes very important.

I am glad to see this bill and I hope that the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs will meet shortly to elect a new chairman. However, I am rather sorry about another matter and I will take this opportunity to say publicly that I regret that the minister saw fit to insist that the finance committee not undertake the trip that it had arranged after a great deal of difficulty. The dates for travelling were not determined totally by the committee. They were fixed by the host countries, which in two cases faced general elections.

I think it would have been of considerable benefit to members of the House if members of the finance committee, some of whom have considerable experience with the financial operations in this country, could have an intimate look at operations in other countries. I would have thought that the ministry would have welcomed a fresh approach from members who might have picked up fresh ideas. They are not the prerogative of the officials of the Department of Finance or of the Bank of Canada. I think it was the wrong decision and the committee should have been able to undertake its program.

In my experience over many years I think this committee's only ventures from the precincts of parliament had been two times to accept invitations to luncheon from the Governor of the Bank of Canada across Wellington Street. That is as far as the finance committee has ever gone.

I can assure members of the House that membership on all sides would have benefited greatly from examining the economic situation, trade patterns, and the banking systems in Sweden, Belgium, and Germany, as well as the operations of the money market in Germany and in Paris. They have many problems similar to the ones we are facing here today. Their solutions in many instances are different from ours. Some are succeeding more than others, but I find it rather difficult to understand why members of the House who are attempting to broaden their knowledge so that we can deal more adequately in principle with some of our problems in Canada should be denied that opportunity for one reason or another. I want to say that publicly at this time because I think it was a retrograde decision.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, this bill is going to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs and most of the details can be discussed there. Nevertheless there are one or two pieces of information which I should like to secure. We are not in committee of the whole but it may be that either the parliamentary secretary or the minister himself in closing this debate might be able to give us some of this information which I think would be useful to us before the bill is finally passed.

I gather from the statement of the parliamentary secretary, first, that one of the changes proposed is to alter the premiums which will be paid by the institutions which avail themselves of the services of the C.D.I.C. I for one would be interested in knowing two things about that. First, what losses have had to be met by the C.D.I.C., and how do those relate to the premium income which has been received by the C.D.I.C.? It is not always safe, on the basis of a fairly short experience of eight or nine years, to predicate a premium which is too low, and I would be interested in knowing just what the losses have been. Second, what reserves have been built up against a very serious situation which could develop if a number of institutions happen to get into financial difficulties at the same time?

Another question I want to raise is whether any thought is being given to raising the ceiling with reference to this particular program. It seems to me that, with inflation, it may be that the ceiling, which I think the parliamentary secretary said was $20,000, is probably too low at the present time in view of the dwindling purchasing power of the dollar over the past ten years.

Another question I raise is whether at the present time institutions such as banks, trust companies and so on, which can avail themselves of the C.D.I.C., are required to come under the provisions of this legislation if they are under federal jurisdiction? I can understand the difficulty with respect to bringing provincially incorporated institutions under the provisions of this bill, but it seems to me that if we are really going to protect the public some thought ought to be given to making it mandatory for all these institutions which come under federal jurisdiction to become depositors with the C.D.I.C., and I wonder if the government has done that. If it has not, is any thought being given to doing so? I think that would give the people of Canada a much greater sense of security.

The average citizen does not know—and I doubt if many members of parliament know—which financial institutions are depositors under this act and which are not, and it would give to the average individual a sense of security to know that at least all federally incorporated institutions which would be eligible to come under the C.D.I.C. are required to become depositors.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, nobody needs to worry because I am not going to speak for very long. However, I want to know from the minister or from the parliamentary secretary whether there are any women on the board of directors of the corporation. Certain of our national banking institutions have found it impossible to find, among 11,547,000 women in Canada, anybody with the capability of serving on a board of directors. I hope very much that there is a woman or women on the board of this corporation.

I myself have been proposing a change to another act, the Bank Act. The minister has been rather forthcoming about this. Surely in 1976 we should not be fooling around trying to teach bank presidents what their responsibilities are in this area. I hope that when the Bank Act is revised the whole matter of qualifications of directors will be looked at again. There is a qualification now with regard to capital stock which is quite outmoded, and I think The Canadian Bankers' Association hopes it will be changed. I hope that the government, as the bellwether of reform—or at least I thought it was—will in this particular legislation make sure that women are represented.

It seems to me that bank directors in Canada should be fully representative by the very nature of their office and by the very nature of section 18 of the act. I hope that in this statute the government will see to it that the directors of this corporation are representative of the wide spectrum of life in this country, which unhappily is not now the case in most of our banks.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): One bank, one director.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, before I disclose the selection of the directors of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation I want to—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Kaplan) may have the floor only with unanimous consent because he has already spoken. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Kaplan: I would like to thank all hon. members for this opportunity to reply to some of the points which were raised. I will be very brief.

Last night I had the opportunity to discuss the issue of there not being representation by women on some boards of directors of banks, and I had the opportunity to indicate the many steps the government had taken to advance the status of women by legislation, by the human rights code, within our public service, within order in council appointments, and by campaign to change public attitudes.

It was with some satisfaction last night that I was able to note that when it was brought to public attention that banks thought they could not find women capable of filling the job, public reaction was such that the conservative bankers themselves were brought around to recognizing that their posture on the matter was unacceptable.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Aren't all bankers Conservatives?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Not a Liberal among them.

Mr. Kaplan: The chairman of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, as appointed by order in council, is Gerard Gingras. The other directors are appointed by office. They are the Governor of the Bank of Canada, the Superintendent of Insurance, the Inspector General of Banks, and the Deputy Minister of Finance. Hon. members will be aware that all these individuals are men.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Shame!

Mr. Kaplan: We look forward to the continued process which the government has undertaken of positive action to advance women to important jobs within the government so that in due course—and hopefully sooner rather than later—there will be a woman serving as a director of this corporation.

I want to reply just summarily to some of the shorter questions which were asked and perhaps leave others until the bill is referred to and dealt with in the committee. All institutions under federal jurisdiction which accept deposits are obliged to be part of the Deposit Insurance Corporation, but provincial institutions may become members of the corporation if their province of incorporation permits them to do so and if the powers they exercise are substantially similar to the powers exercised by federal institutions covered by the insurance.

I am interested in the idea that the ceiling might be raised above $20,000, and I would want to be able to canvas that further with officials and discuss that in the committee. I want to reassure hon. members by pointing out to them that, as I noted, the deposit insurance fund is close to $99 million at the moment, and without any further deposits being put into it and without any further premiums being paid into it, it is now anticipated to be growing at the compound rate of over 13 per cent. That would be regarded by informed observers as an adequate rate of growth, and as we are submitting, a more than adequate rate of growth to maintain the deposit insurance fund at the appropriate level.

The annual report of the corporation indicates that there has been one claim against the fund other, of course, than the claims for the cost of supervising and auditing the accounts of all the institutions covered. That claim was in 1970. It was for something over $5 million and, at the date of this particular report, at the end of 1975, over $4 million of the $5 million disbursed had been recovered by the fund. Its operations have been secure. It deserves the confidence of the House. I look forward to satisfying members of the finance committee that a reduction in premiums is justified as well as a return to the Consolidated Revenue Fund of the $10 million which was contributed by the federal government to establish the corporation.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacFarlane: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Since we anticipate being called to the Senate shortly, at approximately four o'clock, I believe there is unanimous agreement for putting over the motion which would otherwise have been considered in private member's hour and recessing, or suspending the sitting, until that call to the Senate and, after we have been to the Senate, adjourning.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, that is agreeable to the hon. member concerned. I have consulted him about the matter. We agree, on the understanding that the notice of motion standing in his name will not lose its place on the order paper. I think that is the understanding at which we arrived.

Mr. MacFarlane: Yes. Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we agree to the suggestion, although it occurs to me that if we were to sit another 15 minutes we could clear the order paper of all the business the government has put before the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it agreed that we recess until the call of the bell?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am prepared to bring forward Government Order No. 5 regarding the Currency and Exchange Act, and at least speak on that legislation, if other hon. members agree. I do not intend to talk for 15 minutes. Perhaps other hon. members might like to reflect on the subject of international monetary reform which is implicit in that bill.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, with the greatest respect, if I may talk on the same point of order, since I am first on the hit parade, so to speak, which would automatically begin at four o'clock, I would not mind speaking until the arrival of the messenger from the other place and having my time subtracted from the total time I shall be allowed to speak on the motion on some other day. I hope that is agreeable. Perhaps the House leaders might consider my suggestion. At least I am here; I can make a speech, if it will make people feel better.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I touch on the suggestion of the Minister of Finance. (Mr. Macdonald) with respect to Government Order No. 5. It would be most inconvenient to consider that bill at present, the bill having come into the hands of hon. members only a short time ago. I presume it is a bill of some substance and ought to be considered after a modicum of preparation. In the circumstances that is not possible. I would not want to listen to the minister's speech unless the bill were in front of me and in front of hon. members. I wonder if the House would consent to the suggestion of the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane), the deputy government whip, that we recess for a short time. Perhaps it might be appropriate to ask the House again.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it agreed that the House shall stand recessed until the call of the bells?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At 3.47 p.m. the sitting was suspended.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have the honour to inform the House that I have received the following communication;

Government House,
Ottawa

22 October, 1976

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Jean Beetz, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 22nd day of October, at 4 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière Administrative Secretary to the Governor General.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour also to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has been pleased to pass Bill C-14, an act to provide for the resumption and continuation of longshoring and related operations at the Port of Halifax, without amendment.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[English]

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

● (1610)

And being returned:

The Royal Assent

Mr. Speaker informed the House that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bill:

Bill C-14, an act to provide for the resumption and continuation of longshoring and related operations at the Port of Halifax—Chapter No. 1.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock this House stands adjourned until eleven o'clock on Monday morning pursuant to Standing Order 2(2).

At 4.15 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, October 25, 1976

The House met at 11 a.m.

VACANCY

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have the honour to inform the House that I have received a communication notifying me that a vacancy has occurred in the representation, namely, Mr. J. Roland Comtois, member for the electoral district of Terrebonne, by resignation.

Accordingly, I have addressed my warrant to the Chief Electoral Officer for the issuance of a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

SUGGESTED COMPENSATION OF MR. BETHUNE FOR EXPENDITURES IN OBTAINING RELEASE OF HIS DAUGHTER FROM MEXICAN JAIL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that Miss Sharon Bethune, daughter of longshoreman Roy Bethune, has been released from a Mexican jail after eight months incarceration, and in view of the fact that a Mexican judge has signed release papers showing Miss Bethune is innocent of any charges, I move:

That the Canadian government take steps to compensate Mr. Bethune for any funds he may have spent to get his daughter released from Mexico.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion would require the unanimous consent of the House before it could be put. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

IMMIGRATION

SUGGESTED RETRACTION OF MINISTER'S ALLEGED DEROGATORY REMARKS CONCERNING IMMIGRANTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the inflammatory and derogatory comments made by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration concerning immigrants to Canada who, in fact, have made a very positive contribution to Canadian life, I move:

That this House deeply regrets the comments of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and urges him to make a statement on motions retracting his divisive comments on immigrants coming to Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be presented only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

PROPOSED JUDICIAL INQUIRY INTO ABANDONING OF "GABRIELLA"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43 similar to the motion put forward earlier last week. I do so in the light of new evidence which has now come to hand as a result of the coming ashore yesterday of a life raft with six bodies of the crew of the MV Gabriella, which means that all the 13 people who died in that tragedy died as a result of exposure, not from drowning. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

That the government order a judicial inquiry into the abandoning of the MV. Gabriella off the south coast of Newfoundland.

Mr. Speaker: Under the provisions of the Standing Order there must be unanimous consent before the motion can be put. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

SOCIAL SECURITY

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF PENSION RIGHTS FOR HOMEMAKER SPOUSES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my motion relates to a matter which is an urgent one to many Canadians and that is the reason I ask leave to move it under Standing Order 43. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House urges the government to bring in legislation that will establish pension rights for all homemaker spouses equivalent to the rights of those employed outside the home, and that the government commit itself to the taking of this action during the present session of Parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF MINISTER'S STATEMENT CONCERNING IMMIGRANTS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration regarding that most unfortunate, foolish and unacceptable statement of his which he made to a Liberal meeting. I understand he indicated in a statement attributed to him that immigrants who may antagonize native born Canadians should not be brought into the country. On what basis could the minister make such a statement, and to which countries was he referring, keeping in mind that with that statement alone he has destroyed any credibility of this government respecting immigration, and in fact has almost destroyed the work of the joint Senate and House of Commons committee which travelled the country seeking the views of all citizens regarding immigration?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I would have thanked him a lot more if he had taken the trouble, as most members of the press did, knowing my attitude to immigrants, to check what I said before spreading across the country a false and malicious statement. I most assuredly did not make that statement and, as has been my experience in talking to any group, I make certain that everything I say is put down on tape.

[Mr. Speaker.]

I indicated that we had benefited in Canada greatly as a result of the immigrant population. In many cases these immigrants came here not only to receive the many benefits of Canada but they have in fact been beneficial to Canadians. I said that my predecessor, for example, had indicated we were now in the process of screening out some people who would take jobs that ordinarily Canadians could handle. The point I was endeavouring to make was that we would have them feeling antagonistic toward immigrants if we brought in large numbers of immigrants to take jobs away from Canadians, jobs that Canadians could fill. That would have the effect of making Canadians feel antagonistic toward them, and that is the last thing that I want to see happen.

Then, I went on to reiterate that in many, many instances these people came in as entrepreneurs, not to take jobs away from Canadians but in fact to create jobs for Canadians. If the reporter present on that occasion had seen fit to report all of my statement, I think this unfortunate report would not have received the publicity it did. I want to say that I am particularly appreciative of CJOH in Ottawa, which took the time and made the effort to bring a cameraman and crew to my house because that station did not believe this minister of immigration would make that kind of a statement. The reporters at that station at least saw fit to seek an explanation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF POLICY AND ASSURANCE NO CHANGE IN REGULATIONS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister this, so that I can have it on the record and we will not have to come back again in order to determine which way this government is going. The Speech from the Throne has this paragraph:

You will be asked to consider amendments to the Immigration Act, designed to promote Canada's regional and urban development . . . and preserve Canada's reputation as an open, tolerant society which welcomes the energy and cultural diversity of people from all parts of the world.

Would the minister give us his assurance that this is the policy that he will follow, without favour to any country? I just want that assurance from him.

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, not only will that policy be followed, but actually I think for the first time in any piece of immigration legislation this will be incorporated into the bill as one of the objectives.

Mr. Alexander: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I thank the minister for that part of his answer which indicated that this will be incorporated in the bill. It is as a result of the probing and the statements made on this side of the House that such a criterion and principle with respect to reunification of families, non-discrimination and refugees is being incorporated in the preamble.

May I ask the minister one last question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the minister's questionable approach and the statements he said he did not make, will he assure us that there will be no further amendments to regulations under the Immigration Act? I accept the minister's statement but want him to come clean with the Canadian people. Will he give us that assurance?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Author, author.

Mr. Alexander: Why don't you go back to sleep. Mr. Speaker, will the minister assure us that no changes to regulations under the Immigration Act will be made between the present and when the new Immigration Act is introduced, unless notice is given to this House. Can he give us this assurance, so that we can travel on an even keel?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, to respond to the hon. member's question, I was rather hoping, for the sake of the future of Canada, that the stance and position we would take would be non-partisan. In my new bill I accepted something like 95 per cent of all recommendations which came from the special joint committee, which was made up of members of both sides of the House.

An hon. Member: That committee had a Liberal majority.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I thought the input came not from members and parties, but—

Mr. Alexander: Please answer my question.

Mr. Cullen: —from Canadians.

Mr. Alexander: Answer my question.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member will relax his back and stop giving me a pain lower down on my anatomy.

Mr. Alexander: Just answer the question.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I am trying to be my old self, and when I hear that kind of language, I react. Frankly, I do not foresee any changes in the regulations which would cause the hon. member consternation. I want to bring the bill before the House with as many of the splendid recommendations which came from the SJC as possible. I want not only to include their recommendations, but those of other citizens across the country who were unable to be present at the committee hearings. I think it will be a forward looking bill. The objectives spelled out in the Act will, I think, meet with the favour of all Canadians. I hope we can keep partisanship out of it, and let us keep the arguments good.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF COPY OF MINISTER'S SPEECH CONCERNING IMMIGRANTS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it is apparent that the pains are not only in the minister's lower back. In view of the importance of the matter, the context of the speech, the place in which it was made, at a Liberal meeting, and comparing it with the Speech from Throne, and bearing in mind the assurance the minister just now gave, is he prepared, he having said that his speech was being recorded in total, to table his speech in this House, to follow along the assurance he gave. I assure him he would have the consent of my party in order to do so.

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thought the speech was great, but I am not certain it is the sort of speech one would want to have printed or tabled in the House. The point I am trying to make, if I may complete my answer, is that controversy arose as a result of the questions which were brought forward. I had anticipated writing to the press a letter indicating precisely what the question was and in what connotation those statements were made. I would be happy to send out copies of it. There is nothing secret or private about it, but tabling it in the House will not, I think, add much. I will certainly send the letter to the hon. gentleman, to the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond who raised the matter under Standing Order 43. I thank him for doing that but I wish he had talked to me first. Most assuredly, my eminent critic who has a little pain and the opposition House leader will get copies, as well as any others who want them.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the interesting part about the exchange early this morning is that a Liberal party member said no to the very reasonable motion proposed earlier this morning under Standing Order 43. My question is this, and the minister has not answered it: Is he prepared to table that speech? Whether it is appropriate is not the question. Is he prepared to table that speech in the House, so that there will be no question about the context of the total speech, the minister having indicated to us that he took pains to insure that all his words would be recorded? Will he be prepared in those circumstances to table that speech? I am prepared to agree there probably are things in that speech given to a Liberal meeting which might offend the House, but it is quite important in terms of settling this matter once and for all. I think the minister would be anxious to do that.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to hide in that particular speech. I will discuss it with my House Leader. If he thinks it is the sort of letter which should be tabled I am prepared to table it. There is nothing secretive about it.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the minister conferring with his House Leader, but I want to know the minister's state of mind in respect of this matter. Is he willing to table the speech.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Oral Questions

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

ALLEGED EXCESSIVE INCREASE IN EARNINGS OF PROFESSIONAL GROUP—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance may I direct a question to the acting Prime Minister or the acting Minister of Finance. The annual report of the Anti-Inflation Board which has just been released shows that the average net income of those in the professional groups has risen from $35,700 to $40,600, an increase of $4,900 which is more than double the $2400 prescribed by the Anti-Inflation Board. I should like to ask the acting Prime Minister if this does not indicate a glaring loophole in the anti-inflation program and also what steps the government proposes to take in order to plug this loophole.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I will take notice of the question and I am sure the Minister of Finance will be happy to reply to the hon. member.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board has sought to explain this discrepancy by saying that undoubtedly some of the professional people worked harder during this year than during the base period, I should like to ask the acting Minister of Finance if it is the government's opinion that during the past year the engineers worked harder to the tune of $7,700, that dentists worked harder to the tune of $6,700, that lawyers worked harder to the tune of $5,100 and that public accountants worked harder to the tune of $4,200. If this is the basis upon which the government is allowing this very large increase in the incomes of professional groups would the minister undertake to provide the House with the data upon which they based their assumption and make that information available not only to the House but to the public.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to give an answer to the hon. member. Of course, it would be rather difficult to measure the output of every individual who works in the professions. The rule was applied to them. Of course if someone last year had greater output than in the previous year he should receive more compensation, just like any one else who worked overtime. Of course he could have earned more money than in the previous year. I do not know about the mechanics to measure that. I am sure the hon. member will appreciate that I cannot make any precise point about it. The only thing I am sure about is that Members of Parliament, while they worked harder last year, had no increase this year.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What about next year?

[Mr. Speaker.]

FAILURE OF SOME PROFESSIONAL FIRMS TO REPORT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, there are some 40,000 professional firms which were ordered to report and there are only 23,134 which have reported which means that 16,866 have not reported. In other words 40 per cent of the total number of professionals who were supposed to report have failed to report as of September 17, 1976. I want to ask what action the government proposes to take to ensure that the professional groups, who already are getting more than the prescribed guidelines under the Anti-Inflation Board, are not allowed also to ignore completely these guidelines by not reporting at all.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I understand that organized professionals must report to the board. I fail to see what means the board will take to compel them to do so, but I am sure the law will apply to them as it does to others.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR INCREASED FUNDS

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): My question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Can the minister tell the House whether representations have been made with a view to increasing the moneys allotted LIP so that other good projects, the so-called buffer projects, can be accepted? Could the minister also tell us whether he has asked Treasury Board for additional moneys so that more new jobs can be created since unemployment will be higher this coming winter?

[English]

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, once again we have an initiative shown by the federal government which has turned out to be singularly successful.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: As to whether I have received representations on the amount of money being increased, I think the number of different constituencies involved is now up to 187. So, yes, I have been receiving representations.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary.

Can the minister tell the House whether the study of the projects recommended to him will soon be completed and whether he will announce them so that the work on such projects as have been accepted can start in early November?

[English]

Mr. Cullen: The process is ongoing now. I am not too sure of the exact time when the statements will be made. I believe some are coming to my desk this week, however, for signature. I am not too certain of the particular areas in which they are.

STATISTICS CANADA

AUTHORIZATION FOR USE OF DATA OR FACILITIES OF ORGANIZATION BY EMPLOYEES FOR PRIVATE PURPOSES

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce involving Statistics Canada. Will the minister state unequivocally at this time whether any authorization existed or exists from anyone in authority at Statistics Canada allowing employees to perform any job or duty not connected with their responsibilities in StatsCan which involved permission to use StatsCan data or computer facilities for their own purposes?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as far as I know, no employee of Statistics Canada was authorized to use information he might have received at Statistics Canada. In the case recently mentioned in the House, I indicated what steps were taken and what penalties were inflicted. I could perhaps give a few more details. The chief statistician, at the time the incident occurred in 1974, notified the RCMP the very day she received the information, that is on a Friday, and the RCMP launched its inquiry the following Monday.

[English]

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister has had an opportunity to clarify the statements of the former city of Ottawa planner, Morris Jacobsen, that moonlighting Statistics Canada employees were operating with the written permission of the then chief statistician Sylvia Ostry, in contrast to Dr. Ostry's fuzzy reply which seized upon the interpretation of the word "reformating" while indicating that this was not the case. Has the minister had an opportunity to discuss the matter fully with all of those involved, or does he find it as complex as Mrs. Ostry who is quoted as saying she read the Globe and Mail article three times and found it too complex to understand?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I did not talk to Mrs. Ostry because she is no longer in the same office. I had two or three conversations with the new chief statistician of Canada, and I intend to meet him again today or tomorrow to get more information on the subject. But I was pleased with the one I got up to now, and if the hon. member wants to raise other points, I will always be very pleased to clarify, for the benefit of the House, any controversial issue.

POSSIBLE CHANGE IN PROCEDURE TO EXPEDITE RELEASE OF PUBLIC INFORMATION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): When the minister is having this meeting, would he indicate whether he will consider measures to reclassify or change the format of Statistics Canada so that information which is truly confidential can be looked after in a more efficient way and information which perhaps ought to be released to the public could be released with some expeditiousness, so that this type of situation would not be so apt to occur again?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of this technical problem. As the hon. member pointed out, I certainly share his view that confidential information provided by individuals to this government organization should remain confidential, so that the system may operate with the maximum integrity and confidence. I feel also that documents and information of a public nature should be released as soon as possible, so that an employee may not be faced with a dilemma, when in possession of information which, although already released to the public, remain apparently virtually unknown to the public as a whole. This is an extremely serious problem, but I repeat that Statistics Canada must operate without any outside interference and with maximum credibility, because this government agency has always enjoyed in the past an impeccable reputation, and it is essential, in the interest of all Canadians, that it continue to do so.

ENERGY

SUPPLYING OF HEAVY WATER FOR REACTOR IN PAKISTAN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I would like to ask the minister whether he thinks it was proper for AECL to supply heavy water to Pakistan for the repair of a broken reactor, given the fact that negotiations are still going on with that country about safeguards. More significantly and specifically, was this decision on the part of AECL to make heavy water available discussed with the minister?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think it was entirely appropriate for Canada to supply a very small amount of heavy water on a temporary loan basis while that particular reactor was in some difficulties. The question really amounts to this: if that heavy water had not been provided at that time, that particular reactor would not have been able to operate, which would have plunged one million or more people in Karachi into darkness. At the same time, the government has been trying to negotiate a new set of standards with the government of Pakistan. I am not at this time in a position to indicate the status of those negotiations, but they are going on. This particular amount of heavy water was made available without prejudice to those negotiations, and yes, that particular decision was discussed with me and, indeed, authorized by me.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED SALE BY FRANCE OF URANIUM REPROCESSING PLANT TO PAKISTAN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my supplementary of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but in his absence, I suppose I should ask the Acting Prime Minister. What protest did Canada make to France over its attempt to sell to Pakistan a process whereby the waste or the material from our reactors could be used for weapons? What protest did Canada lodge with France over its attempt to sell that technology to Pakistan?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I gather the hon. member is referring to the proposed sale of a reprocessing plant by the French authorities to Pakistan. Part of our negotiations with Pakistan has been to emphasize our opposition to its acquisition of a reprocessing plant, and undoubtedly the final result of the negotiations will be dependent upon what happens with regard to that particular item, although we have no indication at the present time that that decision has been altered. Our views on that question are well known to the French government, but I cannot recall whether a specific representation on the issue has been made to the government of France.

AGREEMENT WITH PAKISTAN FOR SALE OF NUCLEAR MATERIAL—POSSIBILITY OF DEBATE PRIOR TO RATIFICATION

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): I am sure the minister is aware that the government of the United States did take official action in protesting that sale to France, but will the government bring to this House, before ratification, for debate and discussion any agreement it proposes to sign with Pakistan with respect to additional provision by Canada of nuclear material or reactors?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): It is premature at the moment to decide or to contemplate that a successful negotiation will result. We hope that that will be the case, but it is not certain. Up to the present time, the government has taken the position that these agreements should not be brought before parliament for ratification before they are concluded. That has happened with respect to several others, and I think it should happen in this case.

Mr. Gillies: After Argentina and Korea?

[Mr. Gillespie.]

TRADE

CRITERIA TO BE USED IN SELECTING EXPORTER TO RECEIVE GOVERNMENT SUPPORT

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, but first I would like to congratulate him on being promoted to head by far the most interesting department in the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: As the minister told the Canadian Exporters' Association on Tuesday that in future the government intends to back only one exporter bidding on important orders, would the minister take the first opportunity on motions to advise the House what criteria will be used to choose the one exporter who will merit government backing, thus leaving all other Canadian companies wishing to compete for the business out in the cold?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I said that in some cases it could be that I will have to do that because sometimes we do not manage our affairs too well. For example, I know of one instance where two Canadians apparently were outbidding each other in Russia, and they left $2 million on the table at the end of the day. Everyone will be invited to compete, but it could be that in some instances when we feel that it is in the best interests of Canada, we will decide to pick one rather than have a situation where five or six Canadians will compete when there is only one British, French or German consortium. Perhaps I said that in some cases I would do that, but I did not say that in all instances I would do that.

Mr. Hees: Is the minister aware that after he finished speaking it was the very strongly expressed opinion at the Canadian Exporters' Association meeting that this country would stand a far better chance of landing these orders if the government advised all potential competitors for an order what assistance the government would be willing to provide and then let the interested companies bid for the order on the basis of price, quality, service and design? Any other procedure would create a bureaucratic nightmare which would do great harm to the exporting industry of this country.

Mr. Chrétien: I am very surprised that the hon. member said that the people there were not happy with what I said because in all humility I have to tell the hon. member that they gave me a standing ovation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: The standing ovation was due to relief that the minister had finished his speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: As the government seems to have decided upon this new policy despite the advice of the people who carry out the export business of the country, will the government make sure that the criterion for selecting those who receive this government backing will not simply be proximity to the Liberal Party, as so often has been the case in the awarding of DREE grants and other government favours?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR EXTRA FUNDS FOR CAPE BRETON AREA

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the announced intention of the Sydney Steel Corporation to lay off another 200 employees, and in view of the fact that this will greatly intensify the already disastrous unemployment situation in the Cape Breton industrial area, will the minister give further consideration to extra funding through LIP grants, which were so badly slashed by his predecessor?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there are areas in the country where this kind of thing has occurred after the figures were set. From time to time there is slippage in certain areas where all the money is not used or the programs end, and when that happens we try to help out in this way in regions which are in some difficulty. I cannot make a promise; I can simply indicate that we are aware of situations like this, and we do try to do some levelling out or to bring some equity to the situation.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—PROPOSED REVISION OF FORMULA TO GIVE MORE ACCURATE PICTURE OF UNEMPLOYMENT IN AREA

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): My supplementary is to the same minister. There is an over 65 per cent discrepancy between the figures used under the formula devised by LIP officials and the local manpower estimates concerning unemployment in all three ridings of Cape Breton Island. Will the minister consider meeting with the members from that area and the manager of the manpower office serving these areas to get a more accurate picture of the unemployment crisis?

● (1140)

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, my information is that the formula used for the distribution of funds to constituencies was basically the same as last year, with some modification designed to ensure that the funds were directed to areas of highest unemployment. I believe, but I am not certain, that there is a question on the order paper, the answer to which will spell this out in some detail. The question period would not give me the opportunity to go through all the ramifications but we in fact receive our information from the same area, Statistics Canada, when they are making up their projection.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—POSSIBILITY OF ERROR IN STATISTICS CANADA REPORTS ON UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Does the minister know that the criteria in the Statistics Canada report is inaccurate and could be out by some 25 per cent and that the department recommended fundamental changes in the information gathering system? There is a gross distortion and two years ago the department agreed that this was so and said that reforms would take place. Unhappily nothing has happened in the interim.

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am not familiar with the facts stated by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal, but I do know that each time we endeavour to get into this particular breakdown of unemployment figures on a constituency by constituency basis there are difficulties. You might have an individual registering at a particular manpower office who could well come from the environs. That makes one area look as though it has high unemployment whereas in point of fact that unemployment is created in the regions around. More important, it seems to me that we should go back to the original system of having members of parliament in the area figure out some criteria or pooling arrangement. It seems to me that members of parliament are probably as well equipped to cope with this as anybody and maybe that is an area we should examine again. Every time we suggest this, however, we are accused of using patronage or trying some other system. I have enough faith and confidence—

Mr. Fairweather: If you use all members it is not patronage.

Mr. Cullen: Very definitely; all MPs, Mr. Speaker.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ALLEGED SECRET LIST OF DOCTORS TO WHOM CLAIMANTS REFERRED—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF LIST

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Has the government secret lists of medical doctors to whom the staff of the Unemployment Insurance Commission must refer claimants when the opinion of an individual doctor is required in order to process claims?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the hon. member's question.

Mr. Towers: I will repeat the question, Mr. Speaker. Has the government secret lists of medical doctors to whom the staff of the Unemployment Insurance Commission must refer claimants when the opinion of an independent doctor is required in order to process certain claims?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I have confidence in the members of the medical profession of this country of all political persuasions; they are all good. I would not have any hesitation in referring these claimants to any doctor in Canada.

Mr. Towers: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Apparently the minister did not grasp the significance of the question. Are such lists compiled in Ottawa and on what basis are doctors chosen? Would the minister be prepared to table the list of medical doctors to whom the UIC refers claimants?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, in the last week and a half I have been dealing with job creation and immigration. I shall undertake to look at this situation, however, and see if the member's innuendo is correct. If it is, I shall do what I can to correct it.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

WITHDRAWAL OF HOPPER CAR SERVICE—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. On Monday, October 18, I asked the minister a question with respect to the withdrawal of hopper car services on branchlines of the Canadian Pacific Railway in Saskatchewan. The minister said he did not have knowledge of any general withdrawal but that he would look into the situation. Can he advise whether he has had an opportunity to investigate the situation and, if so, what steps he has taken to reinstate hopper car service on these branch lines?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have looked into the matter and as I suspected there has been no general withdrawal of hopper cars from branch lines by the Canadian Pacific Railway. There were some lines where track is lighter than the track required to carry fully loaded hopper cars and because elevator agents were overloading those cars the railway found it necessary to withdraw the cars. There are specific lines where that happened and in those cases the hopper cars have been taken off the lines.

Mr. Neil: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister would indicate where he obtained that information. Early this summer I received information from the CPR to the effect that the withdrawal had been general on all branch lines in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, for one thing it would only relate to those lines where the track weight supports only 220,000 pound and not 263,000 pound carriage. Branch lines in the heavier category would not be affected. I am reporting to the hon. member, however, the information obtained by my officials in checking, I presume, with the Canadian Wheat Board.

ENERGY

OIL—POSSIBLE USE BY UNITED STATES OF ABANDONED IRON ORE MINES IN NEWFOUNDLAND FOR EMERGENCY STORAGE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It is prompted by a statement made in Washington last week to the effect that a decision had been taken by the United States government on several locations for the storage of strategic oil supplies within the United States. They were said to be considering the use of using the abandoned iron ore mines at Bell Island, Newfoundland as a site which would satisfy the needs of part of the eastern seaboard of the United States. It was reported that no decision had been taken, however. Since the minister has visited this economically depressed town as a result of the abandonment of the mines, may I ask if he has consulted or has he used the pressure of his office and the government of Canada to get a favourable decision from the United States government and has he encouraged a favourable decision?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, many years ago, before I was ever a member of this House, I had the opportunity to go down this particular mine so I have first hand knowledge of the enormous cavern it represents in terms of emergency storage. As the hon. member knows, emergency storage is one of the key elements in our energy strategy for Canada. Having first determined that the Newfoundland government would support this particular facility for oil storage, I raised this question some months ago with Mr. Elliott Richardson a member of the United States cabinet with special responsibilities for energy, and I also talked to Mr. Frank Zarb, federal energy administrator. I put the case to them that there is a great facility here which is more than Canada can use by itself but we would be interested in it if they were to decide that they could use it as well. I think this is perhaps an opportunity for Canada and the United States to share some of those facilities. I am happy to hear that press reports indicated a not unfavourable response from the United States.

Mr. McGrath: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister if he has any means of expediting the decision of the United States authorities bearing in mind the fact that eastern Canada is just as vulnerable to another oil boycott by the Middle East and if the government of Canada, doing its part, will make a decision to store strategic oil supplies in this mine it could be the catalyst that would touch off favourable decisions elsewhere?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated that the Canadian government would be interested in some kind of participation. The hon. member must realize that particular mine would store something like 100 million barrels of oil or oil products or a combination of both. This is clearly beyond the economic ability of Canada to handle by itself but if the United States decided it fitted in with its strategic requirements I would hope we could negotiate for a portion of the particular facility. The hon. member would realize it would probably not be economic to go in with a very small proportion and that the only way it could be made economic would be if the largest part of the facilities were used.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REASON FOR USE OF CERTAIN LAWYERS TO OBTAIN RELEASE OF SHARON BETHUNE—POSSIBLE RECOMPENSE FOR COST

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Secretary of State for External Affairs but in his absence I will direct it to the government House Leader. It concerns Miss Sharon Bethune who was released last Friday from a Mexican jail after having been proven innocent of any charges. Can the minister advise this House why the Canadian consulate in that area would not use the two Mexican lawyers hired in the last months by the Canadian government but referred them to a Mexican lawyer who charged an awful lot of money to prove the girl innocent? Can the minister also tell the House whether the government is prepared to help Mr. Bethune with the excessive costs incurred in proving the innocence of his daughter?

● (1150)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not have the details to answer that specific question. The fact is, as the hon. member has pointed out, Miss Bethune has been released. She has been re-united with her family. That is a positive step. However, in this and other cases we fail to understand the long delays that are occasioned by retention in Mexican prisons; in this case the long period of time with a finding of innocence is particularly disturbing.

POSSIBILITY OF A TREATY WITH MEXICO TO PROTECT CANADIAN CITIZENS

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): When is this government going to start negotiating with the Mexican government in a similar way that the United States government has been negotiating this last while and are now at the point of signing a treaty with Mexico to protect American citizens while in Mexico? Is this government prepared to negotiate with Mexico so that these wrongdoings will not happen again?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the fact is these procedures that we find so unusual and so unacceptable are in accordance with Mexican law and practice. It was my experience as Secretary of State for External Affairs that we did make representations to the Mexican authorities through the ambassador and our embassy. We sought and received co-operation. The fact is, however, that these procedures are the result of a practice in Mexico. I doubt whether the American government will succeed in repealing Mexican law in any treaty. Certainly, we will secure the best possible treatment for Canadian citizens. I am sure the Secretary of State for External Affairs will be making further representations on this particular issue.

INDUSTRY

PROPOSED STEEL COMPLEX FOR CAPE BRETON—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In light of the severely high unemployment rate in Cape Breton and, as the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond pointed out, the closure of other industries, layoffs in the Sydney steel plant and the prediction that 200 more will be laid off by the end of the year, are the minister and his officials working closely with Premier Regan in order to try to bring a new steel complex to Cape Breton Island? Is the minister in a position to give a brief but encouraging report on these efforts the federal government is making in this endeavour?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, Premier Regan came to Ottawa a few weeks ago and met, I think, six or seven ministers and their officials to consider the project. Later on he met the businessmen concerned. We are now studying the proposition, but I do not think a decision will be made in the immediate future. However, we are very interested in the project of Premier Regan.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact the meat industry is entering its fourth year of operation at below the cost of production and there have been 29 ad hoc short-term policy statements with no long-term meat policy, will the Acting Prime Minister recommend to cabinet that the Minister of Agriculture tender his resignation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Oral Questions

AUDITOR GENERAL

IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF INDEPENDENT REVIEW COMMITTEE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, I will direct my question to the President of the Treasury Board. In light of recent criticisms by the Auditor General with regard to the government's financial mismanagement and poor control practices, will the minister advise whether the government will be implementing any of the 47 recommendations contained in the report of the Independent Review Committee on the office of the Auditor General. These recommendations were made to strengthen the Auditor General's department.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think I have answered similar questions, but I will repeat and elaborate. When the House sees the Auditor General's Act which will be before it very shortly, it will be seen that great progress is being made to that end.

AIRPORTS

VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON THIRD RUNWAY

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Will the minister advise the House at what stage the deliberations are concerning the so-called third runway at Vancouver International Airport?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, some further studies of an environmental nature were seen as necessary before any final decision was taken. In the meantime, a certain amount of regular fill that is available without impact upon the waters nearby is being obtained and arranged for pre-loading in the runway area. That is being done without prejudice to a decision about the runway.

Mr. Fraser: Has a definite decision been made to go ahead with a third runway, the details of which are still to be decided?

Mr. Lang: No, Mr. Speaker, quite to the contrary. I am saying that no decision has been taken to go ahead with the runway.

ENERGY

FUNDY TIDAL POWER PROJECT—POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF PILOT PLANT ON CAUSEWAY BETWEEN ANNAPOLIS AND GRANVILLE FERRY

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. As the minister is aware, a $3 million study has recently been completed on the feasibility of establishing Fundy tidal power and the same three sites as previously recommended have been endorsed again for the construction of causeways and the necessary equipment required to harness this amazing energy. In light of the fact that a fourth causeway is already in place, namely the causeway which exists between Annapolis and Granville Ferry, and in light of the fact the Nova Scotia government has indicated there will be an increase of 65 per cent for electrical energy in Nova Scotia, is the minister giving thought to establishing a pilot plant on the causeway already in place between Annapolis and Granville Ferry? If so, will he give the House some indication of his department's plans? Will he throw a little light on the subject?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it would be premature to give any undertakings of that kind at this time. Phase one, which was a joint federal-provincial, Nova Scotia-New Brunswick-federal government study into the potential of Fundy tides, particularly the economics of the Fundy tides, has just been completed. Phase two will be starting very shortly. That should be concluded very early in the new year. The study which has been done has, I think, confirmed the technical feasibility. It has indicated a range of indexing, and I want to emphasize the word indexing, of the economics of a number of alternative sites. Out of some 37 sites looked at, eight seemed to have significant potential. As the hon. member indicated, three or four of those eight have been chosen for further work.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

PROPOSED TRANSFER OF LAND TO REED PAPER COMPANY—PROTECTION OF NATURE RIGHTS

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, I wish to direct my question to the acting minister. In view of the fact that the Reed Paper Company and the province of Ontario are currently secretly negotiating the transfer of 16 million acres of forest land from the province to the company and considering that in this huge area of land there are seven major Indian reserves whose people have not been consulted about the proposed land transfer, I wish to ask the acting minister if the federal government has discussed this matter with the provincial government, especially with a view to ensuring that neither the treaty rights nor the livelihood of the native people in the area will be jeopardized?

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): In replying for the minister, Mr. Speaker, I can advise the hon. member that to the best of my knowledge there have been no discussions between the federal and provincial governments regarding this matter. However, I can assure him that the position of the federal government is that native rights, claims and interests are uppermost in our mind. If these are in any way threatened,

I can assure the hon. member and all other members that the federal government will become very active and involved.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Symes: Can the parliamentary secretary assure the House on behalf of his minister that the government will make representations to the government of Ontario on behalf of the native people and, if necessary, provide legal counsel and financial assistance to the Indians to prepare a case against such a huge land transfer.

● (1200)

Mr. Penner: There are regular consultations between the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Grand Council, Treaty No. 9. If such a development plan were to go ahead, the department would be active in a number of specific ways. Consultation will certainly continue, and if there is a request from Treaty No. 9 for legal counsel or other necessary services, we shall discuss the matter and provide the assistance where it is possible to do so.

ENERGY

FUNDY TIDAL POWER PROJECT—POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF PILOT PLANT ON CAUSEWAY BETWEEN ANNAPOLIS AND GRANVILLE FERRY

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): A supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, Mr. Speaker. In the light of the fact that the causeway is already in place and since there are gates in place to control the flow of water into and out of the Annapolis Basin, and all that would be necessary to harness this flood would be the establishment of a generator at the site, would the minister at least undertake to look into the possibility of making use of this available power immediately and give a report to the House.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I will take a very close look at that representation.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

RESIGNATION OF MEMBER FOR LANGELIER

Hon. Jean Marchand (Langelier): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Langelier on a point of order.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, it is with deep regret that I leave the House of Commons where I have lived hours of anguish, but also moments of enthusiasm and great joy.

I have been impressed in general with the working of this great institution and with the behaviour of its members.

[English]

I may be wrong, but I think I have found here many friends on both sides of the House and in several cases our friendship will last a long time, if not for ever.

I want to emphasize, Mr. Speaker, the admiration I have for the competence, the dignity and the impartiality with which you carry on your high functions. A man of such quality is very rarely seen.

I am leaving for a political climate which is probably more perturbed than the climate one finds in this honourable House. I am sure I will have all your sympathy in the battle I am going to fight.

Au revoir, good-bye, adios amigos, shalom, and long live Quebec dans un Canada uni!

[English]

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can equal the multilingualism of the hon. member for Langelier (Mr. Marchand), but on behalf of his friends on this side of the House I want to say that, even though we have had minor disagreements from time to time about particular aspects of national policy, we have all enjoyed his presence here.

[Translation]

We know that it is his belief in the principles of federalism which has led him to the House of Commons to fight for those same principles. Now he believes he has to make the jump onto the provincial scene.

[English]

I would not presume to say anything which might intrude upon the decision which the voters of Quebec will have to make in November but I think I can say on behalf of all my colleagues here that we esteem the reasons which brought the hon. member for Langelier into the House of Commons; we have enjoyed his combative presence here in this chamber and wish him very well in the challenges which lie ahead.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On behalf of my colleagues, Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for rising on a point of order instead of just walking out and leaving the place, so that we can say these few words of farewell to him.

As has already been indicated, his presence in the House has not gone unnoticed. In fact, I am reminded of another occasion when one prominent member said of another that the House would never be the same without him. We particularly appreciate the reference the hon. member made to the friendships he has formed in this House and he is perfectly right in saying that those friendships will continue. We support and approve the emphasis he has indicated he is taking into the battle in which he is about to engage, and whatever his future may be, on behalf of my colleagues I say to him: bon chance!

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, as I was listening to the hon. member who was giving his resignation speech a while ago, I thought he would follow the footsteps of his colleague, Mr. Langlois, and depart smoothly. But we are now talking politics and it is a good start for his electoral campaign to make such a fuss. As a Quebec member, I wish him the best of luck because I know he is taking on a very difficult job. According to the comments I received this week, he will have a lot to account for to the Quebec people as he will certainly have to face over there the same ultimatums he was presented with, here, in this Chamber. He has accepted a most difficult task, this is why he has my sympathy and I wish him good luck.

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I listened to my hon. friend and colleague with mixed emotions which I am sure are shared by all members, some of which have already been expressed. I certainly regret his departure from the House of Commons. If not the most colourful and dynamic member of the House, he has certainly been among the most colourful and dynamic. His rising to speak in this chamber always assured that the seats were rapidly filled in order to listen to his fiery and effective presentation.

On the other hand, it is heartening to realize that the hon. member still has a sense of purpose and the enthusiasm to enter the lists in the Province of Quebec, and that when other politicians may be thinking of retiring he is taking on a new challenge in his native province. In the more than ten years he has spent in the House he was worked effectively not only for his own constituency but for the people of Canada. He has held a number of very important portfolios through which he has had considerable impact upon the people and the institutions of the country. He can be assured that he is leaving the House with the knowledge that his contribution has been substantial. All I can say is, we wish him well and good luck in his new endeavour. It may be that, when he has completed his assignment in the National Assembly, we can look forward to seeing him back again in the House of Commons.

VACANCY

Mr. Speaker: It is my obligation to accept officially the resignation of the hon. member for Langelier, but before doing so I should like to add a few words and extend to him my personal thanks. The hon. member for Langelier is a very distinguished member of parliament who, in spite of his spirit, has always respected the decisions of a new Speaker, and I thank him for this constant cooperation.

[English]

The hon. member has distinguished himself by being a passionate and devoted fighter for the French fact in Canada, an endeavour which has stood him in good stead among his countrymen as well as among all members of the House, regardless of how heated the battle may have been. His clear understanding of that fact, and his passionate devotion to it, have served all Canadians during his time in this House. Certainly, his membership in the Quebec National Assembly will, I think, in that respect continue to serve not just that province, but the interests of all Canadians as well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for the riding of Langelier having given notice of his intention to resign his seat, it is my duty to inform the House that, after this notice has been entered by the clerk on the journals of the House, in accordance with clause 6(1)a) of Chapter H-9 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, the House of Commons Act, I shall address my warrant without delay to the Chief Electoral Officer to issue a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

[English]

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I want to raise a point of order at this time. I am sorry that the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) is not here. I was looking for him on Friday, but he was not here then either. This matter occurred on Thursday evening and relates to his activities in the House as chief government whip.

I want to bring this point of order to your attention because I think the actions of the hon. member for St. Boniface clearly reflect upon the responsibilities and duties of each and every one of the members of parliament, regardless of the side of the House on which we sit. I refer to the fact that the chief government whip—and this has been my observation—has been keeping an attendance record, I think particularly of members of the opposition.

I rise at this point because in his remarks last Thursday evening, as reported at page 347 of Hansard, during the course of a speech being made at the time by my colleague from Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie), he mentioned the fact that he had been keeping a record of attendance and could establish when members of our party were here or were not here. The implication in his remark, Mr. Speaker, is that if by chance a member on this side did not happen to be in the House of Commons at any particular time he was not performing the tasks for which he was elected. Personally I, and I think certainly Your Honour as Speaker of the House presiding over our deliberations, would be most anxious to make sure that there is no reflection cast on the carrying out of the duties and responsibilities of members of parliament. I say to the hon. member for St. Boniface, if he reads this record, that all of us are obliged to make our declaration, as is provided for, respecting our attendance and the carrying out of our responsibilities in order to receive our emolument as members of parliament. We all have responsibilities to our constituents.

The hon. member for St. Boniface's own colleagues have been saying publicly that part of our duties as members involves getting out to our constituencies. We have committee responsibilities. We have responsibilities as members of parliamentary delegations. The mere fact that we are not sitting in this House on a particular day or for a particular period of time should not, with respect, be interpreted as being some sort of abdication of our responsibilities as members of parliament.

The reason I raise this point, Mr. Speaker, is that it seems to me that as Speaker of the House, as the chief magistrate of the House, there should be some direction from yourself with respect to the keeping of attendance by any member for a purpose which is inconsistent with the rights and responsibilities of a member of parliament. If I may quote what the hon. member for St. Boniface said:

> I will prove that you are never here five days a week and I have got the records right here. Anybody who wants to see them I have them right here.

I say that those words are in fact a very serious reflection on the attendance of members of this House and on the carrying out of their responsibilities. I ask Your Honour whether you would please give consideration to making the direction that the chief government whip cease and desist from carrying out this schooltime attendance proposition of his. If he wants to keep attendance let him keep it of his own members. They have a lot to answer for themselves.

Mr. MacFarlane: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) would prefer to reply to that himself. I might say that the reason he was unavailable on Friday was that he was having a serious operation on his jaw. I hear some hon. members opposite laughing. It is not a humorous matter. We are not children here. We should be able to recognize a serious problem which occurs to backs, jaws, arms. That sort of thing does happen.

Mr. McKenzie: How was that recorded in the book? How are his actions recorded in the book?

Mr. MacFarlane: I might point out that the same kind of remark from the hon. member was the reason the whip made the reply he did. Possibly the interchange between the two hon. members should be discussed. I think the whip could set the matter straight, and certainly we should hear the total story.

Mr. Speaker: This point is raised by way of a point of order and it has been replied to. The hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) may have something to add to it. The fact of the matter is that reflections upon the personal performance of a member can scarcely ever be in order. I say "scarcely ever" only because it might be possible to convince the Chair that they could in some way be in order, but they are almost always totally irrelevant to the matter being debated, to start with, and possibly out of order on a number of other grounds.

While the Chair could never do anything to interfere with note-keeping by any member of the House—because after all that is a personal exercise for any member of the chamber to undertake—the use of it in debate would, in my view, be extremely questionable so far as any reflection on the personal performance of any member is concerned. I fail to see how that could be in order, in the first place, in terms of relevancy; and in the second place it likely would be very close to this kind of personal reflection upon the conduct of a member that has traditionally been ruled out of order. Therefore, while the practice cannot be prevented, I fail to see how it could ever be used at all in the course of debates in this chamber.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of bills. The hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) has a considerable number of bills to be introduced. He has indicated to the Chair that because of the number he does not wish to speak in explaining each bill. I think there are 16 in all. If it meets with the approval of the chamber at this time I will introduce them individually. I will not reflect on their procedural regularity, but will enter the same caveat as I did with respect to the list of private members' bills introduced, I believe, on Friday of last week. If that procedure is in order, I might call all 16 bills standing in the name of the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert). Is that agreed.

● (1220)

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Thursday, October 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Maurice Harquail for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, before beginning my remarks, I would like to tell the House how much I regret Mr. Marchand's (Langelier) departure. However, I am convinced that every one recognizes in him a dedicated man with an honest mind and very clear ideas. I am also convinced that with all those qualities, he will offer the National Assembly of Quebec what it might be lacking, that is a political judgment which goes beyond the boundaries of Quebec, but which considers and analyses its problem in the light of the international situation.

Mr. Speaker, I want want to congratulate both my colleagues the member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance) and the member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) for their answer to the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. The quality of their interventions has demonstrated how serious and efficient can be the participation of young members in this House.

Mr. Speaker, a year ago, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced to the Canadians the decision of the government to establish controls on prices and incomes. In his comments on the Speech from the Throne, the Prime Minister reiterated his faith in the anti-inflation program and his will to maintain it until 1978 if the economic situation of the country so requires.

I do not want to mention statistics here. It has been done several times and they indicate that in 12 months the dangerous inflationary pressure has diminished. Despite statements from opposition parties despite protests from unions and from certain businessmen who showed precious little enlightenment in spite of the importance of their role, I believe that price and income controls are accepted by most Canadians and that this three year program will succeed in breaking up inflation psychosis. I reiterate my support for the program, so much so that inflation still remains the most serious among the threats to the economic stability in this country.

I would now like to talk about one of those problems closely related to that of inflation: the employer-employee relations issue. Demoralizing effects of inflation do not affect only the economy; they also are a threat to the very nature of our institutions. Our collective bargaining system was seriously shaken by the inflationary wave of the last few years. Collective bargaining now takes place in a tense climate, and labour relations are suffering from it. Before price and wage controls, wage demands had become increasingly more contrary to the reality of economic growth, of productivity, unemployment and international competition.

In Canada, while the production increase was only 2 per cent and that of wages reached 18 per cent, the wage increase in the United States at the same time did not go over 9 per cent while productivity rose to 5 per cent. In West Germany, productivity went up by 7 per cent and wages by 8 per cent.

After having appealed without avail to the good faith of all Canadians, the government decided in 1975 to set price and income controls. While inflation has been reduced to a still unacceptable but more tolerable rate and the economic recovery is well under way, the fight is far from being won. The reduced rate of the productivity increase occurring at the same time as higher wage settlements jeopardizes the competiveness of our industries, reducing the attraction of this country for the establishment of new undertakings. At the present time, the needs of new investments is heavily felt but the climate of our labour relations is not propitious.

Thus Quebec Industry and Commerce Minister Guy St-Pierre stated at the beginning of October 1976, and I quote:

> Quebec has lost several industrial projects as a result of an unprecedented number of conflicts. It is impossible for me to ask for new capital with such results; the present uneasiness destroys our efforts.

At the level of industrial policy Canada is now leading for men-days lost as a result of strikes or lockouts. Thus loss of time due to work stoppages as a result of strikes and lockouts reached 1,183,080 men-days June last; there were 248 work stoppages which affected 190,197 workers. The increasing number of lost working days is prejudicial to all those concerned and impede a satisfactory development of the economy.

● (1230)

It is absolutely necessary to improve the atmosphere of our labour-management relations if we want to avoid increased social tensions and if we want to improve the productivity of Canadian industry and keep our competitive position on the international markets, thus attracting new investments to our country.

We must now consider the very important problem of labour-management relations and steer them along a new course. Labour-management relations should develop in a more cooperative less antagonistic context, especially when the anti-inflation program will no longer be applied. Consequently, it is incumbent on the government to create the atmosphere which can help us look constantly for new means to boost productivity and create better working relations.

The government was aware of that problem in the Speech from the Throne when it declared that the improvement of labour-management relations is an essential pre-condition to economic stability. The government still considers the collective bargaining system to be one of the best ways of ensuring fair wages and of determining the working conditions in a democratic society; it does not think that the solution is to be found in excessive restriction of collective bargaining rights. However, as the rules of the game of the present Canadian society are quite different from what they were a few years ago, the government thinks that it is important to develop better mechanisms for settling disputes.

Consequently, the government proposes to work with the provinces and with labour and business communities to develop a number of initiatives aimed at improving labour-management relations. It intends, among other things, to establish a collective bargaining information centre which will offer objective data on the economy and compensation to all parties. Consequently, as union members will have all pertinent data concerning the operations of such or such economic sector, they will be able to avoid making extravagant wage claims which do not take into account the economic situation of the enterprise, which threaten its evolution and even, in certain cases, its survival.

Employees should become increasingly aware that the possibility of permanent employment depends on the viability and profitability of the company and that, on the long term, constant increases in real salary can only come from better productivity. Moreover, the government aims at encouraging workers in each plant to participate more in decisions concerning their working conditions. We must realize that the situation of workers has changed; today's average worker is more educated and more socially aware than ever before and he is less and less willing to accept unconditionally his role as a worker.

In the last few years, the concept of industrial democracy has reached beyond collective bargaining of working conditions. The modern worker wants a more satisfying work experience, which means that he wants to free himself from monotonous and repetitive work, from the pressures of the assembly line, and wants to have some sort of motivation and a sense of personal achievement. On the other hand, management must be aware of this social evolution and be more open-minded in the future.

In view of the present economic situation, the techno-structure must take into account the new strength relationship between the various production factors. While in the past the capital factor was the main element in all decision making processes, in view of the increasingly stable capacity of our economy to produce the savings that it needs, this factor has been replaced by the manpower factor; to have the most positive effect possible, this manpower must be increasingly recognized. This is what the techno-structure must do; this is the challenge that it must face. Should we not think of making companies more aware of their responsibilities for employee training, employment security and quality of the work environment? Should we not also think of including, as part of new mechanisms to encourage motivation, an increasing participation of employees in company management and profit sharing?

The Conservatives will certainly rebel against this suggestion, but there have been interesting cooperative management experiences in certain European countries. In many areas, labour participation in the decision making process and the greater satisfaction provided by participation have caused important increases in production as well as qualitative and other product improvements. Many foreign labour leaders think of the labour participation tactic as a means of giving something to union members in addition to their usual economic gains. The governments have encouraged the adoption of participation plans to reduce labour problems and promote industrial peace and economic stability. Employee participation in Europe operates under two main systems: participation of representatives or dicrect participation. Participation through representatives provides for the election or appointment of a certain number of employees to boards of directors or other organizations in charge of making the decisions within the corporation so as to represent the interests of workers.

Direct participation gives the employee control over organization and execution in his immediate work environment. Nearly all employees participate in the activities of the corporation and the first areas to be affected are generally at the lowest level in the working environment—those that are usually the most important ones for the employees themselves.

In the mid 1940s Scandinavia set up employee participation plans in the form of boards of workers within the plant. Since then, such boards have been a standard in most European countries. That is how since 1952 all plants in West Germany employing more than 20 workers are compelled under the law to put a board of workers elected by the employees in charge of monitoring the implementation of all regulations, laws and collective agreements applying to the workers. Boards also participate in drafting corporate by-laws on working hours, job allowances, the conduct and welfare of employees. Since 1971, all hirings, layoffs and promotions require prior agreement from the board of workers, and management must give the board full details on finance, production, sales, investment, working methods, proposed changes to the plants and other matters important to the employees.

Of course, all participation plans did not have the same success and in certain cases the workers in fact acquired only a minimum power of decision-making. But one of the remarkable things about labour in Europe—except France and Italy—was the very small number of industrial conflicts reported in nearly a quarter of a century.

Although participation schemes have not been applied without involving some difficulties such, experiences suggest that it is possible to replace disputes by collaboration.

In our society, the main part of the dispute during negotiations derives from the perception held by parties of the negotiation process itself. Too much enphasis has been placed on what is called "distributive negotiations" in which each party is attempting to maximize its share. In such a situation, the gains made on one side are necessarily the losses of the other side. Such direct confrontation is toned down when parties are committed to an integral negotiation where both parties recognize they have common objectives and each one can help the other in reaching an end to their mutual advantage. Such a process assumes the sharing of information to allow for the exploration of common interest areas and the solution of common problems.

Although I have already mentioned it, I think it is important for me to repeat that confrontation should make way for cooperation. Both parties should realize that capital and labour are factors combining towards production. Each contributes to the productive process, each is entitled to a share of the product and each has an interest in business operation. One requirement for collaboration is consultation which should become the usual process and "emergency negotiations" ought to be avoided.

Basic issues such as the increasing anxiety brought about by the impact of automation and technological advances, cannot be resolved by a small negotiating team working under pressure for a few months every two or three years. We must wonder how collective bargaining, which is essentially a system used by opponents, could be adapted to make room for cooperation and increased consultation. The impact on collective bargaining of two related factors—namely constant and high job opportunities in the post war period and serious inflationary pressures—fanned the conflict between parties' interests and national interests. Under those conditions the competition between and within unions and employers caused negotiations to take place under a pressure which has, in its turn, resulted in higher wages and prices to an extent which cannot be totally explained by the present labour and market conditions. Consequently, public interest in collective bargaining is not restricted to reducing labour differences and its regrettable effect upon the community, as the public has become increasingly aware of the dangers inherent in the results of the collective bargaining process.

The challenge collective bargaining has now to meet is to preserve the advantages of a system which makes possible bilateral participation in the determination of working conditions, without imposing excessive social costs on the tax payers who would eventually refuse to assume them. The role of collective bargaining will become increasingly more complex as time goes by. It is not possible to return to the system where unions and management were left alone and free to settle their conflicts, without consideration for wider economic, social and political consequences.

Collective bargaining will inevitably take place in a general context of economic and political realities which will impose constraints. As a matter of fact, the Canadian economy will be confronted very soon with a serious demographic problem: from the '80s and thereafter, we shall have to see to the maintenance of our economic development, to choose between massive influx of immigrants and the implementation or promotion of a more advanced technology. Increased productivity will depend on the realization of either of these conditions. However, both organized labour and management will have to make great efforts to ensure that this transition is carried out as smoothly as possible. A massive influx of immigrants would certainly result in social pressures, while the implementation of a new technology would certainly entail problems for unqualified workers. If these two powers do not cooperate to cope with this forthcoming problem, both our economy and the Canadian perspectives will suffer.

Mr. Speaker, another problem that should be given priority by our government and the Canadian people is the establisment of a new constitution or its patriation. Both levels of government, federal and provincial, should agree as soon as possible on an amendment formula. We must not forget that the constitution of Canada was adopted in 1867, over one hundred years ago. When it was passed, some sectors were within the exclusive jurisdiction of one or other levels of government. Since then Canadian government and society have been constantly changing and this is why the provinces tried, through various means, to extend their jurisdiction without raising questions about the sectors which were put under their jurisdiction. But the federal government itself, through what may be called indirect means or through the courts, never did stop encroaching on provincial jurisdictions, much more according to the problems to be solved than according to the legislation.

Such evolution, which sometimes created tension between the federal and provincial governments, flows from the very nature of our confederative system. Thus we should now be more innovative in establishing a new constitution as regards the amendments that should be introduced so that it can meet the present needs and be in line with the future evolution of Canada. In the light of recent experience in areas such as energy, communications, transport, where we could see that the rules of the game had changed, we should all try to do our best to find a common ground, a simple and acceptable formula which would among other things make it possible for the federal government to take action in some areas of provincial responsibility when the well being of the Canadian society as a whole is at stake—and I hope the partisans of provincial power will not become infuriated by this. This is what the federal government did recently when establishing a single price for oil, and a similar intervention will perhaps be needed in the future for electric power if the provinces disagree. Such interventions should be possible under definite circumstances, which would ensure the respect and the integrity of provincial responsibility.

The amending formula must also provide for linguistic and cultural guarantees for French-speaking Canadians who—and this bears repeating—formed and still form the majority as the people who created this country. However, we must accept without discrimination that the former English-speaking minority grew in importance, particularly with the arrival of immigrants who, given the North American context, freely chose to join them. I think that the French-Canadian society which accepted this fact while giving in the most liberal manner possible the full rights of Canadian citizens, has the right to require from these same persons an absolute respect of their rights both in the area of language and culture. Therefore the amending formula must provide for such guarantees. Our former governments, without exception, were all defenders of individual and collective rights, of the equality of all citizens before the law no matter what their native language, religion or race.

Following recent and deplorable events, theories which are getting support seem to ignore the bases of the past policy, which I mentioned before, although it has succeeded in preserving our national unity. In a democracy like ours, there is place for any kind of theories and, incidentally, a member of the cabinet resigned recently to support a thesis which surely rallies a minority of Canadians but which is in total contradiction with the past and present policy of our government.

If I praise the courage of a man who takes such a decision in order to conform with his own integrity, I think at the same time that all members in the House, and I hope I am being heard from the other side, whatever party they belong to, who no longer agree with a policy on official languages granting equal rights to Canadians should rise and resign. Such a decision should not be taken for electoral considerations but rather for the consideration that each member has for himself.

As a Quebecer member, I reiterate my faith in Canadian society and the federal system; but it must be clear to everyone that this faith is not unconditional and that our people will only agree to participate in this great Canadian nation to the extent that they feel wanted and accepted with their own peculiarities, their own character as we, French Quebecers, respect and love our English Quebec brothers.

[English]

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in this debate may I congratulate the mover and seconder of the Speech from the Throne and also inject my personal regret at the departure of the hon. member for Langelier (Mr. Marchand) to his home province. I have formed one of those fast friendships with the hon. member while he has been in the House and have always admired his firy participation in the debates. It is my firm conviction that his loss here is definitely the gain of the province of Quebec. I am one Conservative who wishes for his absolute and complete success in the election to come because I think he has taken on a big job for the benefit of all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: Before saying a few words on the subject of the Canadian penitentiary system I want to deal with a very urgent situation which exists in the Yukon, and I am glad to see the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) in his seat because it concerns an area of the Yukon with which he is familiar and which he has visited. I am speaking of the town of Faro and the tragic situation which now exists there with the miners having been on strike since June 30. One would think that the work force at that mine would be on strike because of a dispute with management, but that is not the case at all. Management and the union negotiated a collective bargaining agreement in April of this year and agreed on the amount of increase in wages that all classifications of workers would be receiving.

Then, as required by law, the matter was submitted to the Anti-Inflation Board, which rolled back the agreed upon wage rate to 12 per cent in the first year. Management and the union together put a joint request to the AIB, because of the seriousness of the rollback, to have the AIB review their decision. The AIB did just that. Their decision to roll back the increase to 12 per cent was reviewed and the decision was to allow an increase of 14 per cent. But that was still less than half of what the workers and management had agreed upon, and the matter, at the request of both management and labour, was referred to the administrator of the AIB, Mr. Tansley. This gentleman rolled back the wage rate from 14 per cent to 8 per cent.

The steelworkers's union at Anvil have taken the position throughout that the rollback was much too severe and that it was inexplicable. Both management and labour were aghast when the administrator brought in the decision of 8 per cent. The union has been on strike since June 30. There were approximately 500 workers at that mine and well over 100 have now submitted formal, written resignations and they and their families have moved out of the Yukon. The union has been on strike against the Anti-Inflation Board for almost three months. Let me emphasize that they have been on strike against the Anti-Inflation Board, not against management. Management wants to go back to work. It is prepared to stand by the negotiated collective bargaining agreement. The union also wants to go back to work, but it certainly does not want to go back at 8 per cent, which has no bearing on historical relationships, even in the area, where Cassiar asbestos miners in northern British Columbia are receiving a greater increase than the 8 per cent set by the administrator.

As I understand it, there are three stated objectives of the AIB, and certainly we hear them often enough from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) and from members of the AIB. One is to contain the rate of inflation and reduce it, if possible, in the country. The second is to maintain production, and the third is to lower the rate of unemployment. All three objectives in this instance have been thwarted by the action of a board set up by the government. Production at that mine has ceased absolutely since June 30. Unemployment at that mine has gone up by the total work force of 500. It has had a ripple effect throughout the Yukon. It has put some 170 White Pass drivers out of work. It has cut their shipping schedule in half, and that has affected the work force in Vancouver, where the shipping originates and where it has its destination on the back haul. Other ripple effects in the Yukon have caused unemployment to climb alarmingly.

As far as containing the rate of inflation is concerned—because the biggest user of power in the Yukon is that mine and because section 10 of the Northern Canada Power Commission Act requires the system to be self-sustaining—the consumer will be expected to bear, unless the government introduces some relief legislation, the added costs of increased rates in order to pay for the revenue which is being lost because of this strike of the miners.

The other day when I questioned him in the House, the Minister of Finance said that the best thing the workers at Anvil could do would be to go back to work. To add confusion to the tragic situation created by the AIB, apparently with the full support of the government, we have a decision by the Canada Labour Relations Board, which falls under the jurisdiction of the minister, that the strike is a legal one, and the reasons given by the CLRB for declaring the strike a legal one is that the AIB interfered in the collective bargaining process. To my mind this surely is not what the government intends to happen with respect to the actions and activities of the AIB and the administrator. It is having the most serious and harmful effects on the economy of the Yukon. The economy of the Yukon is never going to recover from the three months of this strike. Revenues and wages are lost forever. The value to Canada of the production of that mine—which is not insignificant, I might add, as the minister well knows—is lost forever. It can never be made up.

All the Anti-Inflation Board has to do—and I am sure the government could urge upon the board a reconsideration of the matter—is to apply sensible standards in the north. I raised the matter when the legislation was before the House a year ago. You cannot apply southern standards to northern high-cost areas. You cannot apply the standards which exist in Toronto, Edmonton, Halifax or Vancouver to high-cost areas in the north. In the town of Faro a gallon of regular gasoline costs $1.25. Contrast that with the cost of gasoline in other localities in Canada. A gallon of home heating fuel in Whitehorse costs 64 cents. Compare that with fuel costs for home heating fuels in the rest of Canada. In Ottawa a two quart container of milk costs $1.09. Compare that with the $1.62 in Whitehorse. That was the price three weeks ago; it has probably gone up since then. In all fairness there is no way the guidelines set by the government under which the AIB operates should be applicable to an extremely high cost area such as the north.

Who is to blame the steelworkers for going out on strike against that AIB decision when we have to face these increased costs? People in the north cannot possibly bring up families and sustain themselves at a standard equivalent to similar job holders in the south on a wage rate approaching the same amount, and yet the administrator's decision to roll it back to 8 per cent actually sets the wage rate of those miners lower than a comparable worker in southern Canada receives.

Another stated objective of the AIB is to contain prices. I have already given some examples of food prices in the Yukon. There was a famous preliminary report published by the chairman of the Food Prices Review Board many months ago with respect to food prices in the Yukon and Northwest Territories, and one of the chief recommendations in that report was that a further study be made into the cost of food in those areas. We have not seen hide nor hair of any indication that that second report will be forthcoming.

When we referred to the AIB the question of Northern Canada Power Commission rates going up in the case of the Yukon in one year by 78 per cent, we were told that the AIB has no jurisdiction. When we complained about CNT telephone rates going up—they escape me at the moment, but they are far in excess of the guidelines set down—we were told that the AIB would not take jurisdiction to inquire into those rates. The NCPC intends to increase the rate for electricity in Fort Smith in Northwest Territories by 56 per cent, and yet the AIB does nothing about containing those prices.

It seems to me that the other function of the AIB is failing miserably in so far as the two jurisdictions in the north are concerned. I would be urging—if it were not for the fact that I think it offends my approach to responsible government in the Yukon—the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Allmand) to instruct his commissioner in the Yukon to intervene with some back to work legislation similar to that passed in this House last Friday. However, I do not want to do that because if any constitutional initiative does exist, it should be taken up by our own Yukon legislative assembly.

That is one solution, and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development might take that under consideration. I am not suggesting that he direct his commissioner. I am suggesting he make the suggestion to his commissioner that that kind of approach might be considered by the Yukon legislative assembly.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it one o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Nielsen: Just before the recess, Mr. Speaker, I was saying that the workers at Anvil are asking where the controls are. No one can blame them for striking against the Anti-Inflation Board as they have.

Just before I leave this subject, Mr. Speaker, I want to cite one example that comes from the constituency of my colleague, the hon. member for the Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth). Food prices at Giant Yellowknife Mines have increased by 100 per cent. Representations were made by the Steelworkers local 803 through their president, Sandy Hamilton. He wrote to the Anti-Inflation Board in May to complain that Dominion Catering had raised the price of their regular meals from $3 to $5, and for the special steak night from $3.75 to $7.50, a 100 per cent increase. In a statement to "The Miners' Voice" in October, 1976, he said:

> I question the merits of the Anti-Inflation Act if these types of increases are allowed to happen while the wages of workers are being tightly controlled.

In reply to his letter, he received a form letter from the AIB promising that they would investigate. Now he asks, "What happened to price controls?" Who can blame the miners of Anvil for going out on strike, not against management but against the AIB? Who can blame any consumer in these two northern constituencies for asking why the AIB does not step in and control price increases in power rates of 78 per cent in the Yukon and 56 per cent in Forth Smith? Where are the price controls? All that we have seen in these two northern jurisdictions is a policy of wage control, and wage control only. That is having a savage effect on the economy, in my constituency at any rate.

While I have the time, I want to say a word or two about the Canadian penitentiaries system. I am glad to see the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) in his seat, because I am sure this concerns him. We set up a committee on October 6 because of the urgent situation that our leader thought existed in the country with respect to the administration of the Canadian penitentiaries system. He set up a special task force from among our own caucus to inquire into the Canadian penal system. The government, belatedly, saw that there was, in fact, need for such an inquiry. They decided to establish a subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

I had talks with the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) as to the establishment of this committee and our participation in it. We want to participate in an impartial inquiry that will produce meaningful results. We want to participate in the parliamentary process that will produce an in-depth inquiry, not just into the maximum security penitentiaries in the country, where most of the trouble is receiving the headlines, but into the whole of the system. For that reason we decided to place the objective of our special caucus committee on the shelf and go along with the establishment of a parliamentary subcommittee to inquire into the very serious problems which now confront the system.

When I first had those discussions with the Solicitor General, the members of the subcommittee were discussed as being four Liberal members, four Conservative members, and one each from the NDP and Social Credit. In further discussions with the Solicitor General the following day, he informed me that he was sorry if there was anything misleading, but he assumed in discussing those four, four, one and one figures that the Liberal party would have the chair. I went along with that after discussing it with my colleagues. It was done on the assumption that the subcommittee would be set up on the basis of five members from the Liberal party, four from the Conservative party, and one each from the NDP and Social Credit parties.

When the Solicitor General introduced his motion for the establishment of this subcommittee, I raised the matter of number of members. He reneged on the five, four, one and one figures. He would not give me a positive answer with regard to those numbers. He said, in effect, that the approval he got was for the normal representation in parliament. I hoped that what he meant was that it would be a simple majority for the Liberal party of five members, four from the Progressive Conservative party and one each from the NDP and Social Credit.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We'll see.

Mr. Nielsen: We will see when that committee is struck; I will have a word or two to say about that in a moment. We will see whether those discussions were held in good faith. We will see whether there is a genuine desire by the government to operate on the basis of good faith and conduct an impartial inquiry which is free from superimposition of a party majority on the committee. One of the conditions to which we agreed with regard to the establishment of a special parliamentary committee was that it would get to work immediately. We had our plans laid for going to the institutions in the Montreal area commencing last Monday. We feel it is vital, particularly in view of the reporting date established in the motion of February 28, that the committee get to work as soon as possible. We expect the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to meet tomorrow in order to establish that subcommittee. We expect to establish the itinerary tomorrow.

In our view, not only have we to visit all the maximum security institutions in this country, ostensibly where the real difficulties seem to lie, but such other institutions, to use the words of the motion that was passed, "as the committee deems advisable". Those include not only the maximum security institutions but some of the medium and some of the minimum security institutions. We believe that the five regional headquarters have to be visited, as well as some 17 maximum, medium and minimum institutions. A total of 22 meetings have to be held throughout the country, from British Columbia to the maritimes. We have between now and the end of February to produce a report.

We believe that arrangements should be made to hear the local guards unions and inmates committees where they exist. We believe that citizens advisory committees, where these exist, should meet with the subcommittee. We also believe that where prison inspection committees exist, there should be provision to meet with these groups. This is the kind of inquiry we envisaged we were going to conduct, and this is the kind of inquiry we believe the subcommittee should conduct.

There will be reluctance on the part of some individuals and some groups involved with the administration of penitentiaries, as well as the inmates of those penitentiaries, to meet in a formal way. Therefore, we covered that aspect of these meetings in our discussions with the Solicitor General. We felt that in addition to the formal part of the subcommittee's work, it should be made clear well in advance of our visits to these various areas of the country and various institutions that inmates, either as individuals or groups, or officials either as individuals or groups, should feel free to discuss with individual members of the subcommittee, or members as a party group of the subcommittee, their problems and their views as to the solution of those problems. It stands to reason that there will be reluctance on the part of some individuals to discuss their criticisms and problems in a formal way before the committee which records all of its proceedings. That reluctance might not be present if provision is made for this kind of informal discussion with individuals and groups.

Our prison system is in a mess. There have been uprisings, hostage-takings, murders and suicides. Deplorable conditions exist in our Canadian penal system. It cries out for some kind of solution. The best summation that I have seen recently with regard to the situation that exists is in an article by Allan Fotheringham in the October 18 issue of Maclean's. It is carried under the headline "Canada does not have to execute people any more. It just sentences them to neglect." He goes into the background of the establishment and growth or malformation of the penal system in Canada since it was set up almost 140 years ago with the building of Kingston. He criticizes the hypocrisy of the Liberal government—as he labels it—with respect to its approach. He says in the article:

The sadness is that the hypocrites do not realize they are hypocrites. The hypocrites are the Liberal members of parliament who give the impression they have abolished death from the land. When they voted to wipe capital punishment from the slate, they saved the lives of the 11 men on death row. That was the public, moral stance and the government felt cleansed. It prefers to ignore the cruel reality. As the custodian responsible for the Canadian prison system, the Liberals have to answer for the fact that more than 11 inmates die every year in our prisons. Since 1970 there have been 62 suicides in federal prisons. Another 18 prisoners have been murdered by fellow inmates.

Last Friday, in Kingston, another was murdered by fellow inmates. The article continues:

The Canadian prison system is a mess—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) says, "Hear, hear". He is in agreement with me.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Not with what you just said. It was with what you said before that.

An hon. Member: You are a little slow, then.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): You know how I voted.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

Mr. Nielsen: I appreciate that. I appreciate the reason the hon. member may not be as quick today as he was two days ago.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): When people are reading their speeches, I sometimes get a little behind.

Mr. Nielsen: But I am not reading my speech. I am quoting from a knowledgeable writer on prison reform. Not all members may have read this.

Mr. Crouse: They don't read Maclean's.

Mr. Nielsen: I am sure the Liberals read Maclean's. I am sure that is all they read. The author says:

There is a third similarity that tells you everything you want to know about Liberal priorities. The warden of Laval says his prison has 350 inmates too many. More than a decade ago, a federal commission of inquiry, coming after 300 prisoners had rioted at the B.C. pen, reported to the then justice minister, Lionel Chevrier, that "the prison was grossly overcrowded".

Mr. Speaker, I have gone back over the dates from 1963 to date and I have seen that figure reiterated by successive Solicitors General who were aiming at the target of no more than 450 inmates in any penal institution in Canada, and I note that this mark has been exceeded in almost every maximum security institution in the country. The writer of this article says:

What has happened? The population of 500 remains the same to this day. There have been 18 hostage-takings in that jail in two years. What really has happened is that Chevrier was replaced by Guy Favreau, who was replaced by Lucien Cardin, who was replaced by Pierre Trudeau, who was replaced by John Turner, who was replaced by Otto Lang, who has been replaced by Ron Basford—

He seems to have gone.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I must remind the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue only by consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nielsen: I thank hon. members. I shall bring my remarks to a close.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): He is here now.

Mr. Nielsen: I mistook another hon. gentleman for the minister.

Mr. Crouse: It is the way they comb their hair.

Mr. Nielsen: My hon. friend says it is the way they comb their hair. Well, during all those ministerial changes, to use the words of the article, "the overcrowding goes on and the riots go on and suicides increase".

Mr. Faulkner: Author?

Mr. Nielsen: The author is Allan Fotheringham of Maclean's magazine. Take it easy over there; you cannot be critical of Maclean's. The article is dated October 18, 1976.

So there are serious problems. I hope the work of this committee will be fruitful. We intend to put all our effort into it. We shall put the same effort into the work of this committee as we intended to put into our own special caucus committee which was announced by our leader. I believe the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) will be the chairman if my information is correct. But if we find the committee is being suffocated, if we find our inquiries are restricted, if we find we are prevented from hearing people whose evidence should be heard in the interest of coming up with sound recommendations to parliament, we shall go ahead on our own and come up with our own recommendations to parliament. We hope members on the other side will enter into this project, when the committee is struck, in a productive and impartial way as we intend to do on this side and as I am sure colleagues to my left intend to do.

No one expects prisoners to be happy, but if our prisons are to discourage crime, as they are supposed to do, they must command the respect of the inmates. Right now, our penal system is seen, by the inmates as well as by the general public, not as a well-oiled machine dedicated to the combat of crime and to the rehabilitation of prisoners, but as a monument of confusion, unsure of what it is after and certainly as one which is not accomplishing anything at the moment.

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to take part in this debate. At the outset I should like to add my good wishes to those already extended to the hon. member for Langelier (Mr. Marchand) and wish him well in his future endeavours in Quebec. I should also like, at this point, to congratulate the new Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Allmand) on his appointment. I wish him all the luck in the world. He faces a big challenge and many people across the country are counting on him. So far, relatively few requests have been made upon him but there was one made by my hon. friend from Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), the leader of our party, asking him to look into a situation at Cross Lake where the water supply was very bad. The people there had been seeking rectification of this situation for six years, through various former ministers, and I am very happy to note that the new minister saw fit to act promptly and rectify the situation. The people from Cross Lake send their thanks to him. I hope this is an example of the way in which the hon. gentleman intends to act in the future.

So, Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the minister on his new post and wish him all the luck in the world. Certainly, I shall offer him whatever help I can. Since he is not in the chamber today, I hope his colleagues will pass on my good wishes.

I should like to make a few suggestions regarding what I think the minister should do in the Indian Affairs department. First of all, there is the question of land claims in the Northwest Territories and Yukon in particular, and in general other claims by our native people all across the country. I think the minister should move a little faster in this area, especially in those constituencies in which the native people would like to sit down around a table and discuss native claims. I consider the settling of these claims, particularly in the Northwest Territories, northern development. I suggest that once these claims have been settled we can move forward a little faster and deal with those problems that are of everyday concern to our native people and which are not receiving sufficient attention at this time.

Indian affairs and northern development are both under the jurisdiction of one department or ministry, and many times these two departments come into conflict. Therefore, I suggest that the minister should give serious consideration to dividing the department so that Indian affairs stand alone. It is an extremely important department and, as I mentioned previously, the minister has a great challenge in changing the attitudes of departmental officials and improving the image Canada has in the eyes of the rest of the world in regard to our treatment of our native peoples. I suggest northern development come within the Department of the Environment, or with fisheries or some other department, where there will not be so much conflict.

I would also suggest that the minister immediately hire capable native people from all across the country for very important decision-making positions within that department. At this time I do not think he would be able to name more than five or six native people who are in decision-making positions in the Indian Affairs Department. I do not have the figures with me, but I would be very surprised if there are more than five or six.

Another suggestion that I think would be useful is that the minister offer early retirement to some members of the department who have been there a long time and may not be doing quite such a good job as would some younger person who might be more effective. This would make the department more responsible to the native people of this country. As it is now, a lot of times it seems as though the department is more the enemy of the native people than their ally.

I would also suggest that another healthy move for the department to make is for it to be more co-operative with native organizations from all across this wonderful country of ours. These organizations have a better understanding of what the immediate problems are on the reserves, in different parts of the territories, and so on. Thus, the department will be more effective. The millions of dollars allocated to the department are really not reaching those areas where they can be spent effectively, and the suggestion I have made would, I think, help see that this money does get to the grass roots level where it would do most good. The minister faces a very big challenge, and many people are counting on him. With a majority government, and working with native organizations, I think the minister is in a good position to do a lot more for our native people than has been done in the past.

Talking of the past, Mr. Speaker, and of the effectiveness of previous ministers of the department, I should like to refer to what I think is a very scarey situation having to do with the sterilization of native women in the Northwest Territories.

This example goes back to October 9, 1970, when the former leader of this party, Mr. David Lewis, the then hon. member for York South, asked a question of the then minister of Indian affairs and northern development as reported at page 16 of Hansard. It is now October, 1976, six years down the pipe, and still no answer has been received on this very important matter. Let me put the question on the record. The then hon. member for York South asked:

> Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development on a rather serious matter. Is the minister aware that a program of sterilization of native Eskimo women was apparently introduced in the Holman Island community on Victoria Island, that five women have been so sterilized and that some others are being considered? If he is aware, will he inform the House who authorized this unnecessary and inhuman program, in view of the availability of birth control methods?

The minister at that time was the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien), and he answered as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, I have no information on this problem. The hon. member was kind enough to give me notice of his question, so I have had an investigation made but I have not yet received any report.
> I am not aware that any authorization was given by my department. Health services in the Northwest Territories are under the jurisdiction of the Department of National Health and Welfare. I therefore asked one of my department's officers this morning to get in touch immediately with the representatives of the department of national health in order to determine whether any authorization had actually been given or whether the facts alleged by my hon. friend were correct.
> As soon as I obtain further information, I shall be happy to inform the House, but, at this time, I do not believe that such an authorization was given. If such action took place it must have been because of some local or individual initiative, rather than under a government policy.

So at that date the Liberal government said it did not have a policy of sterilization of native women in the Northwest Territories. Although the question was asked six years ago, there has still been no answer. I have good reason to believe that a sterilization program has been continuing in the Northwest Territories and that a lot of people have been sterilized. People in the north, as well as myself, are asking for answers to a lot of questions.

I do have a few figures before me, Mr. Speaker, but they cover only a small part of the Northwest Territories. As an example of what appears to be happening in the north, in Repulse Bay, out of 22 women between 30 and 50 years of age, 10 have been sterilized—a percentage of 45 per cent. In Chesterfield Inlet, out of 23 women between 30 and 50, 6 have been sterilized, for a percentage of 26 per cent. In Pelly Bay, out of 18 women between the ages of 30 and 50, five have been sterilized, or 27 per cent. In Gjoa Haven, out of 41 women between 30 and 50, 13 have been sterilized, or 31 per cent.

The numbers have been quoted in the Sunday Express and other newspapers. The question of the sterilization of native women in the Northwest Territories has been raised by the Inuit Tapirisat, the representative of the northern peoples of those parts. The question was also mentioned in the Sunday Express and in the Globe and Mail and was brought to my attention by Father Lechat, a well respected and well known man of the north. He is concerned about this problem and raises many questions about it.

I ask the government, which has not answered questions concerning this area as well as other areas, does this represent government policy? Is this, indeed, policy? If so, how many people have been affected by it? How long has this program been going on, and why is it being carried out? Are white people involved in it as well? Is the program being explained to people taking part in it? Do the women who have been sterilized know exactly what the consequences are? Do they understand fully what it is all about? Has it been explained to them in terms they can understand? I know these are difficult questions to answer.

I know of a white lady who discussed this question with doctors, friends and others experienced in the area. She decided, after consultation, to go through with the operation, but said sometime afterwards that if she had known exactly what its consequences would be, how it would change her, she would never have agreed to go through with it.

The government has not been able to say whether this is policy. I wonder if the government has the guts to undertake an inquiry, find out exactly what is going on and explain to the Canadian people what this is all about. When you couple what is happening with ideas put forward in a training manual for the correctional institute in Yellowknife, a manual which describes the native people as shiftless, lazy and goodness knows what else in unkind terms, you wonder how many sick people, including civil servants, in those parts are making major decisions affecting the people's lives. Therefore, I ask the government to look seriously at that program and let us know exactly what is happening.

I now touch upon another area of concern—housing. In March 1974—and the year was fairly exciting in this House, as I recall—the minister responsible for housing announced that 50,000 units in a five-year period would be built under the government's rural and native housing program. The program itself was under Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Unfortunately, the program has not worked. It seems that the program is in a shambles. It has operated almost for two years. I do not know how many houses were built under it, but I have not seen any in the north, the one place in which they ought to be built.

Housing everywhere is a basic human right. This being a cold country, housing programs should be given greater priority. We need good housing programs in all parts of the country. We need a super-good housing program in the north, where the climate is extreme. Housing is in short supply in many areas, including mine. Adequate housing can help us solve many of the social ills afflicting people in various parts of the country. Good housing helps to keep the basic family unit together. Good housing would keep our native peoples together and improve their health conditions. Good housing, and improvements in health, enable people to do better work and keep their jobs. I know of many in my constituency who could do good work, but cannot because they lack adequate housing. These people cannot hold on to better jobs because they have no place in which to rest and eat a good meal before going back to work. They have nowhere to enjoy life.

Good housing would help to curb alcoholism, which afflicts not only people of the NWT but people generally in northern countries. Good housing, again, is the answer. As well, adequate housing would allow people to work in home industries. They could support themselves by doing soapstone carving, needlework, and so on. Such activities can be carried on in the spare room of the home, if the person has one, the bonus being that the traditional way of life could be maintained. That is another point in favour of a good housing program.

A countrywide good housing program would help to create jobs in this country. It would support small industries, especially small construction firms. As I say, there are many arguments in favour of a good housing program. Therefore, I wonder why, since the program was announced almost two years ago, it has not worked as well as it should. I think the minister is obligated to find out why the program is not working and he should make the necessary corrections. As I said earlier, housing is a basic human right. The government should do everything possible to make sure that as many houses as possible are built.

I am led to believe that bungling civil servants are responsible for the rural and native housing program not working. I do not know if it is all the government's fault; perhaps people at the local level who may not be involved with the government are also responsible. No matter where the blame lies, the question should be looked into. The minister should find out what is wrong and get the show on the road.

I want to speak briefly on something called northern development, which is a pretty big topic. Having perused the Speech from the Throne, I find that again the north has been neglected. Important areas of concern for the north are not even mentioned. These questions concern not only northerners but people in the rest of the country. Major decisions affecting the north will affect the rest of the country. I am thinking of the Mackenzie Valley pipeline. The Speech from the Throne did not mention it. There was no mention of the Arctic Islands gas pipeline, and no mention of transportation systems, whether involving ships in the High Arctic, aircraft, better roads, better airports, better navigational facilities and more and improved weather stations.

No mention was made of environmental priorities for the NWT, and there was no mention of possible provincial status for the Yukon or the NWT. There was no mention of the government's thinking with respect to changing the status of the NWT, that is, for dividing it into two territories, one to be a province and the other a territory. No mention was made of native claims. No mention has been made of these things in recent Speeches from the Throne. I have listened to two or three, and we seem to be left out all the time. We do not particularly like that. Even though there are only 40,000 of us up there, we feel the north is very important to all of Canada. We believe some very important decisions will have to be made about that area in the next few years. There probably will be some pretty important issues arising in that area within two or three years, or even within a year and a half. It looks as if there is a move toward a minority situation in which we hear that the NDP will have a little more fun squeezing some things from the government.

There is no mention in the throne speech of the Mackenzie Valley pipeline. In looking at this situation, one wonders whether the large oil companies are very serious about building a pipeline there. I recall that when it was first mentioned, the Atlantic Richfield Company announced it intended to go ahead. However, from the figures I have been able to dig up today, it does not seem to me that there is enough gas or oil in the Mackenzie Valley to warrant a pipeline. I do not think they intended to build one in the first place. Even if they did, possibly it was more in the form of bluff than anything else to enhance their bargaining position with the companies in the east.

It has not been proven that there is enough gas in the Mackenzie delta to warrant the building of a pipeline. Even if it were built, the purpose would not be to move several trillion cubic feet of gas, but to tap the cold, clear ice water from the Slave Lake, Bear Lake and the Mackenzie because of the skunky water in the south and the fact that the people must have good clean water. So that would be one of the main reasons. The United States government would like to have a pipeline up there for that purpose. This is worth thinking about. I still think the oil companies are not very serious about building this pipeline and that probably it will never be built in any event.

There was no mention in the throne speech about the structure of what is called the NWT government, which is not actually a government but, rather, an administration. It is my opinion that there are far too many civil servants in the north now. It is a very large area—1,350,000 square miles. There are only 40,000 people, and every fifth one is a civil servant.

The budget for the NWT administration alone is between $150 million and $175 million, which does not include MOT, the RCMP or other federal departments, which would bring the figure up around $250 million. If we said we would have no government up there, but merely several government agencies—which was the situation in the past—there would be a guaranteed annual income of about $5,000 or $6,000 for every man, woman and child. This area could be maintained something like a park, so that it would be for the benefit not only of Canada but of all the world. We must protect the environment and beautiful places like that from resource exploitation and big industry, for the benefit of all people.

Previously in this House I have attempted something which did not work. I would like again to give it a try. I believe I have a few minutes left, and I would ask hon. members to agree that five or six minutes of that period be devoted to thinking for a while about the suggestions I have made concerning Indian affairs and northern development generally.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, along with the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth), I would be quite happy to think for a few minutes, if that is your ruling.

An hon. Member: Transcendental meditation.

Mr. Basford: I appreciate the suggestion of the hon. member for Northwest Territories. It would appear that the rules do not allow, for the moment at least, for a thinking period, although I realize that a number of members opposite need that sort of time to sit and think, judging from the speeches I have heard so far in the throne speech debate.

In entering the debate, I wish to join all my colleagues in the House of Commons in offering my congratulations to the two hon. members on my side who moved and seconded the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne in a manner and content that was a credit to themselves and to the constituencies which sent them to parliament.

This afternoon I want to touch briefly on three subjects. First, may I say that I read with a great deal of interest the speech made the other day by the official justice critic of the Progressive Conservative party, my friend the learned member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), and particularly his remarks with regard to, as it was known in the last session, Bill C-83. It is a favourite and irresponsible tactic of the opposition to clamour for the introduction of bills and then to proceed to obstruct their passage through parliament and into law. This is precisely what they have tried to do in respect of the measures that were contained in Bill C-83.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), on a point of order.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I would think the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford), who stands for the administration of justice in Canada, would come forward with a truthful statement. His party had to move 54 amendments to that bill in order to get it passed. There was no delay in the committee. I believe his own members would tell him that. I do not like such a misrepresentation to be made here now, or at any time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I suggest that the hon. member has risen not on a point of order but, rather, on a point of debate.

Mr. Woolliams: Let him stay with the truth.

Mr. Basford: I will stay with the truth. What I say is based on the truth. I will quote the evidence. Almost a year ago, on October 28, 1975, in the wake of shooting tragedies in this city and elsewhere, the then leader of the opposition, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), pressed the government during the question period to introduce proposals to restrict the availability of firearms. I note that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Clark), in his speech on the address in reply, never mentioned the subject. Last week, as a result of questions during the question period, it seemed to me the official opposition indicated that it would refuse to allow the reinstatement of Bill C-83 which contained the measures called for by the former leader of the opposition.

Mr. Woolliams: Absolute nonsense.

Mr. Basford: Let me provide further evidence. I would ask hon. members to recall who it was who, twice in this House, once on January 27 and again on June 6, 1975, called for legislation providing a minimum penalty for anyone having or using a firearm for any improper purpose. That person was none other than the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). Yet just the other day he affirmed his opposition to the reinstatement of the peace and security bill which provides for just such penalties as he called for.

● (1500)

Mr. Woolliams: He did not say that at all.

Mr. Basford: Yes, he did. The hon. member for Calgary North correctly pointed out in his speech that the bill raised many important issues other than gun control. These included provisions to keep dangerous offenders in prison and away from society, provisions to increase the capability of the police to combat organized crime, as well as provisions to provide police with increased powers to confiscate weapons in potentially dangerous and serious situations. The bill also contained measures to provide a more effective and protective parole system, measures relating to laws regarding the custody of inmates in our penitentiaries, something the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) was talking about only half an hour ago. Yet we are unable to make necessary changes in the law relating to day leave, statutory remission and other important custodial matters.

Mr. Peters: Because you want to put too many things in it.

Mr. Woolliams: Why don't you split it?

Mr. Basford: The hon. member asks why I do not split the bill. He wants to have an opportunity to defeat it in committee. All these issues were important in the bill last session, and all of them are important still. It seems to me that the public still has the right to laws which will assist society in protecting itself against violent crime and violent criminals. The public has a right to laws that will help reduce the growing death toll from the misuse and careless use of firearms. Surely something is very wrong with the law when it is just as easy to buy toothpaste as it is firearms.

Should there not be some change in that law, not only by means of increased penalties applied after a crime or tragedy has already occurred, but surely we have the responsibility and we must be just as concerned about preventing, in one way or another, or at least limiting such occurrences before they take place. How many times have we heard citizens talk about the stop sign or a red light never being put at an intersection until one, two or three people have been killed. When it comes to firearms, surely we should try to put in place some stop signs and some red lights before the tragic incidents occur.

Hon. members opposite do not have to take my word for it; they can rely upon statements that some of their own members made last session or they can take the word of such authorities as the Quebec crime commission. That commission, headed by Judge Jean Dutil, concluded its report on organized crime, which was released just two weeks ago, by saying that violence involving the use of firearms is so grave that it threatens the social peace of Canada. The report calls for strong measures to curb the incidence of gun-related crime, and for those measures to be instituted immediately.

This is precisely what we asked parliament to do last session in the bill. Hon. members opposite should ask the public how it feels about restrictions on firearms availability. The public has always, overwhelmingly, supported responsible restrictions on the availability of guns. I have every reason to believe that that public support has, if anything, increased recently. I would refer my friend, the hon. member for Calgary North, to his friend, the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), who recently conducted a survey in his riding. I have been somewhat surprised at the result, because judging by my mail, if opposition is strong anywhere, it is in Calgary.

The hon. member for Calgary Centre asked his constituents, among others, "Do you support the government's intention to control firearms?". The replies from Calgary Centre, next door to the riding of the hon. member for Calgary North, were 61 per cent in favour, 37 per cent not in favour, and 2 per cent undecided.

Mr. Woolliams: Let me point out that 89 per cent in your riding wanted capital punishment.

Mr. Basford: I suggest that the hon. member for Calgary North confer with his colleague from the next riding.

An hon. Member: Why don't you talk to your colleague, Simma?

Mr. Basford: I confer with the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) constantly. She is an invaluable member of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Woolliams: She is the greatest thorn in your side.

Mr. Basford: She indicated her support for the concepts in Bill C-83. The problems of criminal activity, as well as the misuse of firearms, will not disappear in spite of the fact that the opposition may well like them to do so. We have a duty to press forward with responsible and workable measures which will protect the public against violence and crime. I am very grateful for the hard work of many hon. members, including my friend the hon. member for Calgary North, who made constructive efforts in the committee last year, not only on the firearms measures but on all aspects of that bill. The Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs sat for 35 sittings, heard witnesses from all across the country and considered a large number of amendments proposed by the government and the opposition. It is a matter of real regret to me that that investment in parliamentary and members' time would now appear to have been wasted in terms of making parliamentary progress.

The Leader of the Opposition calls for leadership, yet nowhere in this debate, either in his own speech or in the speech of the official justice critic, the hon. member for Calgary North, is there any suggestion as to how parliamentary progress can be achieved with laws that are more protective of society in relation to guns, to dangerous offenders, to parole and to penitentiaries. The official opposition calls itself a responsible opposition. The Leader of the Opposition said yesterday on national television that it is not his responsibility to come up with answers.

Mr. Nielsen: You steal them all.

Mr. Basford: If we steal their suggestion, which I know is a claim they make from time to time, then as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) indicated, we cannot understand why they oppose them.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Because you pervert them.

Mr. Basford: It is the responsibility of the Leader of the Opposition and his colleagues to negotiate with the House leader on this side in order to make parliamentary progress. I ask the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker)—who unfortunately is not in the House, and for whom I have a good deal of personal and professional respect—who is the House leader of the official opposition, whether we have to go through another tragic shooting in Ottawa before he begins to assist our House leader in ensuring that this session parliament passes meaningful changes in the criminal law relating to the improper and careless use of firearms. If a meaningful version of Bill C-83 is not passed by this parliament, the responsibility will clearly lie with the official opposition.

Mr. Fairweather: Rubbish.

Mr. Peters: Nobody is going to pass it. If you want the legislation, bring it in.

Mr. Basford: I am glad that my remarks have so affected the sensitivities of hon. gentlemen opposite. Now I wish to turn to the areas of the Speech from the Throne relating to the further work of my department. The Leader of the Opposition said that he found little of relevance in the speech. It surprises me that such subjects as bilingualism, national unity, equal opportunity and the strengthening of individual rights are regarded as not relevant by the hon. gentleman opposite. Until now, in dealing with the question of individual rights and discrimination, the authority of the federal government to deal with discrimination in employment and accommodation has been limited. This may not seem important to the Leader of the Opposition. However, it does seem to be serious to many other Canadians—for example, to many women in Canada, to the physically handicapped and to members of many minority groups who have felt the heavy hand of discrimination in their daily lives. It also seems serious to me. In a free society like ours it is essential that we put into law and into practice a clear commitment to equality of opportunity and to protection from discrimination in areas of federal jurisdiction.

● (1510)

In the summer of 1975 a human rights bill was introduced by the government, and along with the advisory council on the status of women and other groups, I regret—

Mr. Fairweather: Are you going to blame us for that, too?

Mr. Basford: —that is was not passed last session, due to the pressure of parliamentary time and business. The new bill will have high priority in this session and I look forward to its early introduction and passage. While I regret the delay in its passage last session, that delay has provided me and members of the government with an opportunity to strengthen and improve our proposals through extensive consultations on the provisions of the bill with individuals, with the provinces and with groups concerned about discrimination. In particular, my officials and I have had extremely useful meetings with groups representing women's rights and the status of women, with associations for the physically handicapped and with a number of others.

As a result of those meetings I will be laying before the House a greatly strengthened piece of legislation which I hope will become a comprehensive federal anti-discrimination code complementing those already adopted and enforced by the provinces. The legislation proposes to prohibit, through the activities of a human rights commission, discrimination on grounds of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age and marital status, as well as physical handicap, with respect to employment. For example, if a handicap does not affect job performance, it will no longer be a permissible bar to getting a job. This is a new provision added after consultation with associations qualified to speak for the handicapped.

The legislation will contain certain provisions prohibiting the sending of hate messages over the telephone, a matter which has been the subject of news controversy for the last few days. As far as I can gather, these messages are put out mostly in the Toronto area and mostly by a group calling itself the Western Guard which breeds racial prejudice and bigotry. The group arouses anxiety in racial minorities and undermines the confidence of those minority groups in the protection they should be afforded under the law. Our measures are designed to provide an effective supplement to the provisions in the Criminal Code for combatting this particularly revolting—I think there is no better word to describe it—practice of tape-recorded, racially biased messages going out over the telephone.

Mr. Fairweather: Cowards.

Mr. Basford: The hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), whom I know has a very deep interest in these matters, asks, how?

[Mr. Basford.]

Mr. Fairweather: I said they are cowards; the members of the Western Guard are cowards.

Mr. Basford: I apologize to the hon. member. Of course, I agree that they are cowards, hiding behind this kind of taped telephone device to propagate their messages of hate and racism. I invite the hon. member for Fundy-Royal, who has a deep and abiding interest in these matters, to study the bill with great care, because obviously it is a delicate area in which to legislate. However, I think the proposals we are putting forward will deal with the problem on the one hand and will properly protect the right of freedom of speech in a free society on the other. This is a measure which the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) has also asked about many times.

Mr. Nielsen: When is it coming?

Mr. Basford: Very shortly. In addition, the provisions of the human rights bill have been strengthened with regard to the question of equal pay. Traditionally, those concerned about discrimination in employment practices have felt that the concept of equal pay for equal work would solve all our problems, and in the bill introduced last session the language employed to prevent this discrimination was the traditional concept of equal pay for equal work. After consultations with women's groups, I have been convinced that this language is inadequate to provide full guarantees against sexist discrimination on the job. The fact is that women are often not allowed to do work similar to that of men and they are hired and hived off into female work ghettos. Thus, they are often paid less, even though what they do is of equal value. To provide truly equal opportunity, regardless of sex, we have decided to accept the recommendation of the women's groups and to adopt the definition proposed by the International Labour Organization of equal pay for work of equal value as the governing criterion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: It would, therefore, be a discriminatory practice for an employer to maintain different wage scales as between male and female employees who are performing work of equal value. This measure is unique in Canadian law. Its enactment will mark a major milestone in the commitment of the government to the women of Canada to provide equal opportunities. Women's organizations can properly congratulate themselves for this achievement and now press for passage of this measure when introduced and for an equal response from provincial governments in areas of provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Nielsen: What about territorial jurisdiction?

Mr. Basford: The throne speech, in remarks related to the human rights legislation, also touched upon a second major aspect of the human rights legislation we will be bringing forward: the protection of rights to privacy with respect to information collected by the government. There are two main aspects to this. One is protection from harassment for information by government departments and agencies.

I share the concern of many people that we are a nation becoming addicted to information-gathering about individuals and small businesses without much thought about the need for it or about the cost and inconvenience imposed upon those individuals or small businesses in collecting it. That is a matter the Minister of State (Small Businesses) (Mr. Marchand) and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) have touched upon. Data collecting or information collecting should not mean open season on taxpayers' time or money. The new legislation would ensure that government demands for information are rationalized, co-ordinated and restrained to an absolute minimum.

The second aspect of this question relates to personal information solicited by the government and stored in government information files or data banks. I have already said that this legislation will narrow and restrain government access to information from the citizen. It will also broaden citizens' access to personal information about them in government files. It will give individuals the right to find out what federal government records contain personal information about themselves used to make decisions affecting them. They will have the right to examine and correct such information. They will have the right to know the uses to which the information is put and to prevent its use for purposes other than those for which it was intended. It will provide a major increase in the accountability of government to the citizen for the administrative acts affecting that citizen.

Having listened to the debate, I note it is agreed by all that there are some personal information records to which there should not be access. In the earlier legislation of which I speak, those exemptions would have been decided by government regulation. In the new bill, because of the delay in passage, we have been able to develop a legislative or statutory scheme setting out explicit criteria that any information records withheld would have to meet. These restrictions on access should be reduced to the minimum possible, consistent with our parliamentary system. We want to ensure the maximum access to personal information that the public interest will allow. Our aim is to secure to the greatest extent possible the right of the individual to know and to see the personal information on which decisions affecting him or her are made.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, would the minister accept a question?

Mr. Basford: I would prefer to do so at the end of my speech, if I may, Mr. Speaker.

The time has come to recognize in law that individuals have rights and interests in knowing what personal information is on official records, whether it is accurate and the uses to which it is being put. In this era of bigness of government, business and unions, many decisions affecting individuals are made every day by these big institutions on the basis of information stored in files and computers. The risk of erroneous decisions based on inaccurate or incomplete information is too great to ignore in a free and open society. The privacy of information provisions will not encompass the private sector nor, obviously, apply to the provincial sector at the moment, but I would hope that the legislation that is introduced could be seen as a model which can be adapted to the private sector and one which provincial governments would wish to emulate.

I should now like to touch on the Speech from the Throne, Mr. Speaker. To achieve the goals enunciated in the speech, of equality of opportunity and the enhancement and rights of the status of women, will take more than simply the enactment of a human rights bill and the establishment of a human rights commission. The Speech from the Throne contained additional measures designed to achieve this. There is the commitment to more and better day-care services that will free mothers to seek employment outside the home when they wish. There will be changes in the Canada Pension Plan to recognize that the housewife's work at home is an economic contribution to the family and society. This is part of our continuing commitment to improving women's rights.

I need hardly remind the House that last session parliament enacted the status of women bill which changed a whole range of our laws to give recognition to the equality of women; nor need I repeat my commitment to the goal of appointing more women to the bench, not as tokens but on the same basis as all appointments, namely, merit. I am glad to indicate that since my appointment as Minister of Justice my colleagues have been happy to accept my recommendation for the first woman member of a court of appeal in this country, Madam Justice Wilson of the Court of Appeal of Ontario, and the first woman of Chief Justice rank in the person of Associate Chief Justice Madam Gabrielle Vallée of the Court of Appeal of Quebec.

Mr. Fairweather: Tell Earl MacLaughlin.

Mr. Basford: Yes, I seem to be having more success in the appointment of judges than Earl MacLaughlin is having in the appointment of board members. But probably no area of the law touches upon the legal and economic rights of women more than the law relating to the family. I am convinced that if real progress can be made in the area of family law, it is the single most important thing that could happen to assure the legal and economic equality and status of women.

The Speech from the Throne refers to the Law Reform Commission report on family law, which I commend to members of the House. The commission emphasized that the basic concern underlying all family law reforms should be the support and preservation of viable family units. Any movement in this area must be done only with very carefully measured steps. This is the basis on which I am examining the proposals of the Law Reform Commission and others.

Some newspaper headlines have bandied about the phrase "divorce on demand". I have read the report. I do not see in it any proposals for divorce on demand. I do, however, see a number of very thought-provoking suggestions, and it is with this in mind that I call upon all interested groups and individuals across the country to read the commission's report and to let me hear their views on the proposals it contains. I intend to carry out, with them, formal consultations on the recommendations of the Law Reform Commission.

Let me speak specifically about two sets of recommendations mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. First, our commitment to the development of unified family courts in Canada. Mr. Speaker, this is an idea whose time has come: one judge in one court to deal with all family matters, federal and provincial. This would mean a saving in time and money, convenience to the parties involved and the creation through the aegis of such courts of a less adversarial context of winners and losers in which to resolve disputes. This would be a tremendous improvement in procedures relating to family law.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Does the minister have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Basford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker; I appreciate the courtesy shown by the House. I did not realize my time was up, but I shall conclude very quickly. In the unified family courts, procedures would be aimed at reconciliation and rehabilitation. I discussed this matter with my provincial counterparts at the conference of attorneys general in Vancouver in June which I hosted. Perhaps I might quote from the communiqué issued by that conference:

> Ministers agreed that priority should be given to the development of unified family courts with broad jurisdiction over all legal matters respecting the family unit.

There was some disagreement over the level at which such courts should be sited, but I am confident that this issue can be satisfactorily resolved and that we can get on with the business of reform in these particular courts which touch so many Canadians. I will be meeting, in the coming months, with ministers of the provinces in an effort to establish, where appropriate, unified family courts. Indeed, negotiations in this direction are already well under way in several provinces and I am confident that progress can be made such as was indicated by the attorney general for Ontario the other day in forecasting possible legislation in that province.

The Law Reform Commission also stressed that there are three economic functions to marriage, wage earning, home care and child rearing, and that the present law on matrimonial property really recognizes only the first, which is usually the contribution of the husband or the wage earning provision and does not recognize the two economic functions which are usually the woman's contribution of home care and child rearing. The commission recommended that the law should provide for the equal sharing of property acquired through the earnings of either or both spouses during the marriage. There would be some exceptions relating to gifts, inheritances, bequests or trusts. The recommendation affecting matrimonial property are of immeasurable importance to married women in Canada. It takes direct aim at the anachronism which exists in the law of most provinces and which was highlighted by the Supreme Court of Canada in its decision in the now famous case of Murdoch v. Murdoch.

Our ministerial discussions in Vancouver, in June, touched upon this particular subject, and at that time provincial attorneys general expressed the view that matrimonial property is exclusively a provincial matter. This is not a unanimous view. Obviously, the Law Reform Commission had different experts and different views on the federal role involved relating to matrimonial property. The conference did indicate the ministers agreed that provincial governments would be urged to press forward with reform of matrimonial property laws reflecting the concept of marriage as a partnership of equals. I understand, again from press reports, that the attorney general of Ontario plans to table some proposals in this regard very shortly.

I welcome such initiatives to be taken by the provinces and will continue to consult with them to that end. I would point out, however, that if it is their exclusive jurisdiction, they have a responsibility to act, and to act expeditiously. If the provinces do not move expeditiously to put in place meaningful changes in the law relating to matrimonial property to take account of the economic needs and the rights of both spouses, there will obviously be increasing pressure on this parliament to endeavour to try to implement the recommendations, in one form or another, of the Law Reform Commission's report relating to the disposal of matrimonial property. Canadian women should not have to wait much longer for provincial action in this regard. I hope that provincial attorneys general will take note of my remarks, that if it is their jurisdiction, as claimed by them, they should act expeditiously in this area.

We will go forward in the immediate future on three aspects relating to family law. The first is negotiations with the provinces toward the establishment in the provinces of unified family courts. The second is changes in the law relating to matrimonial property to better take account of the economic needs and rights of both parties. The third is formal consultation with those in the community across Canada regarding the other recommendations of the Law Reform Commission's report on family law.

I appreciate the courtesy of the House in allowing me to complete my speech. This is the last day of the debate on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. It has in may ways been a useful debate, providing members of parliament with the opportunity to put forward matters of concern to their constituencies and to put forward ideas for action. In the Speech from the Throne the government put forward a comprehensive and coordinated program for action by parliament and the country, The object of the debate within the time allotted in our rules gives the opposition a chance to show their disagreement with those proposals and to show that they deserve the confidence of the House. I have read the motions of confidence with great care, as well as the speeches from the opposition. In the essential task of the official opposition to show that they should be the alternative government they have failed to persuade this House or the country that it should not have confidence in the present government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Will the hon. member permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In view of the fact that the minister has taken 36 minutes, we must have unanimous consent for the hon. member to ask his question. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the government's intention with regard to a human rights bill to provide for the right of an individual to examine his own file and to claim rectification. That is good, but without the correlative right I wonder how useful it is. Where there has been a rejection by the government of a claim for rectification of a private record of an individual, will that individual have a right to an appeal, either to a court or an independent tribunal, to compel the government to make that rectification on the record?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I will answer the question very briefly. Obviously, in discussing a bill not before the House, I was speaking very generally. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), who has taken a deep interest in this whole matter, will see from the bill that there are methods by which a government or ministerial decision in this area is subject to review.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, will the minister accept one further question?

Mr. Basford: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nielsen: As Attorney General for the Yukon and Attorney General for the Northwest Territories, how quickly does the minister intend to act with regard to the establishment of unified family courts in those two jurisdictions which he knows are separate judicial jurisdictions?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, we are considering that within our department. At this time I am not able to make an announcement.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have tremendous respect for the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford), but he is more persuasive when he is on the highroad than when he is making a "cry-baby" speech about the fate of Bill C-83. The government is in charge of the timetable of this parliament. The government asked for prorogation of the last parliament. It ill behooves the minister to say that Bill C-83 is lost, when in the next breath he says that Bill C-72 was improved because parliament prorogued and he had time to consult.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: The problem with Bill C-83 is that the minister did not consult enough. He is very good at truth by degree. He knows his caucus opposed the bill in its present form. The minister had to bring in some 60 amendments to a tattered part of the bill. The minister also knows he could have had every one of the policies that he listed, had he accepted our suggestion to split the bill. He could have had in place now on the statute books all that part.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: Let us have a little bit of total truth, not truth by degree. I have no doubt about the future of our country. Yet the lack of will of this directionless government is cause for profound disquiet. As Oliver Wendell Holmes aptly put it:

> I find the great thing in this world is not so much where we stand, as in what direction we are moving.
> To reach the port of heaven, we must sail sometimes with the wind and sometimes against it, but we must sail, and not drift, nor lie at anchor.

This government will not reach the port of heaven, or even get within sight of the fairway buoys, if this Speech from the Throne is any indication of the legislation that is coming forward. It is a latter day tragedy. This government has allowed itself to drift. It is in the doldrums of indifference. The captain is unsure of what course to take, and the navigator, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), will not even share the charts with the public of Canada. We are entitled to know the direction the government is going to take and the purpose of its journey, but it is sealed because it is confidential and "eyes only".

As the Minister of Justice said, we are in the last few hours of this debate. I have found four or five topics which concern me and my constituents. I hope they will commend themselves to hon. members. These topics are the constitution, the faltering effort of the government to face the issue of freedom of information, problems relating to overlapping jurisdictions, an idea for improving the consultative process between government and management and labour, and, lastly, a personal proposal for solving an international irritant, namely, the ownership of Machias Seal Island at the mouth of the Bay of Fundy. I wish to use this as an example of something the United States and Canada might do together. Because I believe in short speeches, I can only highlight some of the implications of the policy areas about which I have spoken.

With regard to the Official Languages Act, which has been talked about by other people, I wish to restate clearly the commitment I made to it, for its splendid purpose, by my votes in this House in the past. I know I say this at some personal risk, but I think it is time some people in this country spoke out in favour of the reasonable sharing of what we have here. The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal) put the matter in historical perspective and we should be grateful to him for doing so. There is no need for Canada, which is a carefully constructed experiment involving recognition of fundamental rights in language and culture, to fly apart. It is time for conciliation, not for confrontation. It is time for the celebration of what we Canadians share together, rather than for the intoning of funeral dirges mourning our lack of will to go on.

I am fed up with Cassandras who are abroad in this land prophesying the end of our country. Canada will live long after those apostles of gloom have passed away. May I ask those who may listen to this statement, including our colleagues from Quebec, to remember that some people express such views at a certain risk, and when voices are raised or importunings are heard I ask them to remember that those who share the aspirations of this country are glad to do so, glad to stand up and say so. But can we not have the same language, that is, the truth, from one end of the country to the other, whether it is English or French?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: What irony, when the evidence is all around us that Canadians appreciate and treasure our heritage and want to guard it, that there should be those in various parts of the country who would tear down what we have built together and hazard the future of our nation with their narrow stridency. Mere lip service to the commitment of this country is unacceptable.

On the subject of the constitution I would say this: I may sound "preachy" today, but I believe that insolence and petulance are accurate descriptions of the tone of the exchange of letters between some premiers and the Prime Minister of Canada. For Canada's sake, let us cool down this issue. I admit that the government has a mandate provided by stark numbers—if that is all we care about—but I submit it has no mandate at the moment of will in favour of the constitutional debate. The whole debate seems to me to be arcane, characterized by intemporate bulletins lobbing from capital to capital and almost entirely misunderstood by the public which parliament is elected to serve.

A constitution cannot be the private property of some government or some constitutional lawyer advising the government. A constitution which cannot be understood by the people is nothing more than a lawyer's document fit to be hidden away in some file. I believe a constitution should be as clear as the beatitudes and, in its starkness, as eloquent as the Gettysburg Address. The rest of this debate is almost unbelievably out of touch with the mood and aspirations of the people of this country.

I am sad to say this, but I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who for one reason or another has lost the essential elements of good will and trust of the Canadian people, should put the constitutional debate into cold storage until the public of Canada has had the opportunity to say who will lead the country in the years ahead.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, we live in a time of increasing complexity and confusion, a time when the citizen who wishes to play a responsible role in our democratic system is confronted by an almost overwhelming tangle of bureaucratic red tape. My hon. friend from Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) will long be remembered for his efforts on behalf of a freedom of information act. This is the last part of the twentieth century, and we are still fiddling in this parliament. What worries me is that there may be another government diversion, that we may be faced with another white, grey or red paper postponing a decision the need for which is obvious. This question has been studied by parliament, by the Privy Council, by those who understand our system of government. It is time, now, for a freedom of information act and I very much hope there will be no postponement or diversion by way of green papers and the like. We already know all we need to know about the subject. The appointment of one more committee would be exceedingly disillusioning to those who are interested in this aspect of policy.

Another point I wish to raise has to do with the overlapping of jurisdictions. It seems to me that this is an impediment which hinders the wise governing of the country at every turn and prevents us from going ahead as we ought. Decision making is constantly hampered by the existence of overlapping jurisdictions, meaning that one must wade through a bureaucratic maze, searching from one level of government to the other, with the result that everyone's problem becomes no one's problem. I have a couple of examples which I could use to illustrate this contention. Many people will be unfamiliar with the part of the country about which I speak, but I will take that risk anyway.

The dilemma produced by these overlapping jurisdictions becomes apparent as it affects the coast of the bay of Fundy in a community known as Red Head which is literally eroding or sliding into the sea. Much the same thing is happening along the shores of the Kennebecasis River at Sussex. Citizens groups who are anxious, not for government hand outs but for policies which will help them help themselves, have been continually frustrated, and if I may say so modestly, I too, have been frustrated by the hours I have spent trying to find out which of the many agencies of government are responsible for ending this imminent threat.

The citizens' groups in these communities have organized themselves in an effort to prevent further disaster in their communities, but they need help and, as I say, I have spent hours trying to find out the particular department of the federal or provincial government with which responsibility lies. But the buck gets passed from one level of government to the next, from one the department to the next, and I hope that the new Minister of the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc), a New Brunswicker for whom we have the greatest respect, will be able to tackle this maze of shared jurisdiction and find a way through it for us. I must say, however, that I am discouraged at the prospects for action if the present system of buck-passing goes on. The government has simply not overcome difficulties of governing a complex system, so inertia, it seems to me, is too often the end result.

I wish to say a word or two about the consultative process. Just as serious is the government's failure to provide consensus policies brought about by co-operative consultation between the private and public sectors, between government, management and labour. Instead, what we have seen is an adversary system that has submerged the common interest. Governments used to be thought to speak for the common interest. Unhappily, in recent years, this has not been the case. Professor Paul Malles, a former senior member of the staff of the Economic Council of Canada, has some interesting things to say about ways in which we can facilitate consensus policies, in a pamphlet from the Conference Board of Canada which I am sure my colleagues will want to read. I think if we were to expunge the word "problem" from our vocabulary for a year or so, Canadians would be very much better off. In any event, the good professor suggests that our federal system, our diversified geography, climate and resources, and the limited organizational base for business and labour to speak with a collective voice, are realities of our country that make the road to consensus policies very long and difficult. But he suggests a road that we have to travel.

The challenges are clear. This government, I am sorry to say, has not met them. The alternative is more divisiveness and more unilateral intervention by government. The public has increasingly rejected this alternative. If I may quote Professor Malles, he has this to say:

> Canada's economic problems would be greatly eased if Canadians could somehow develop consultative arrangements that would encourage them to work together in unison, toward commonly agreed upon goals, harnessing the energies of all three of the social partners in a co-operative effort toward mutually advantageous objectives.

This consultation cannot go on if the elements of consultation continue to be hidden, where everything is marked "Secret" or "Confidential". The attitude is, "Don't let anybody see it. Be careful, the public might want to know". The trouble with this government is that they are afraid to share the decisions that have to be made for this country. Professor Malles cites consultative arrangements through institutions of consultation and negotiation between interested partners and government in Europe that are linked in one form or another to planning bodies set up by government. I believe that we must look toward similar arrangements in this country. I do not think that it is a matter of very much pride to Canada that almost every one of the western European countries have in place, and in some cases have long had in place, a much better system of management-labour consultation.

Lastly—you will be glad to know I mean "lastly," Mr. Speaker—through eons of time the oceans and remote breeding islands have sheltered and protected animals and birds which today are finding it increasingly difficult to cope with the encroachments of civilization. Machias Seal Island is a challenge to part of what still remains. Such is the excitement, beauty and uniqueness of the island that it has been studied and visited by world famous naturalists, photographers and writers. The United States National Audubon Society takes great interest in the safety of the birds. I am delighted to tell the House that Jack and Rita Russell, the light-keepers on this island, are committed conservationists. Mary Majka, of Caledonia Mountain, New Brunswick, is a naturalist who has embellished the life of our province with her dedication. These people are anxious about the future of this and other great breeding grounds of our natural heritage. Constitutional lawyers, cartographers and other experts in the foreign service of Canada and the United States are at this very minute engaged in a long and frustrating argument about title to this 15-acre island which is 12 miles south of Grand Manan and 9 miles off the coast of Maine. Machias Seal is the outermost of the islands forming the Grand Manan archipelago.

My own modest and personal idea, as a member of parliament, gleaned from others who have thought about this question is that we forget about the national sovereignty of Machias Seal Island and use the wonderful example of the Roosevelt Campobello International Park which provided for the first time an international sharing of title to land. The United States is joint owner of the Roosevelt Campobello Park, and I suggest that this island also be declared an international bird sanctuary. I suggest—and members might have to go to their dictionaries and look this word up, as I had to do—a co-imperium for birds; in other words, that sovereignty over these 15 acres be shared by the United States and Canada. The constitutional lawyers would all have heart attacks, the cartographers would have to fold away their maps, and the birds would continue to do what they have done through eons of time—breed and lay their eggs.

The United States and the Canadian wildlife services could contract out guardianship, protection and management of the islands to the private sector, to Nature Canada, the United States audubon society, and so on. I might also mention, for the British Columbians present, that this co-imperium might be an excellent solution to the irritant on our west coast, namely, Point Roberts where Canadians occupy the territory but it is part of the United States. In any event, surely our two countries should be able to work this out together.

A nation, St. Augustine said, is an association of reasonable beings united in a peaceful sharing of the things they cherish. I believe very profoundly that it is time we spoke about the things we cherish in this country. By doing this we determine the quality of our nation. We must take great care that we know what these things are that we share, and many members who have taken part in this debate have added to the knowledge of our shared inheritance.

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, I intend in these remarks to discuss three subjects of particular importance in the province of Quebec. The three subjects are immigration policy, the language question, including Bill 22, and the constitution. Firstly, though, it is highly relevant to refer to the population change in the constituency of Vaudreuil between the centennial census taken in 1971 and the census taken this year, just five years later. The population is exploding, having shot up from 119,000 in 1971 to almost 136,000 in 1976. This is recognizable both in the extensive new house building that one can see and in the new citizen statistics that are supplied to members. Areas such as Pierrefonds, Kirkland, Ile Perrot, Vaudreuil, St. Lazare and Rigaud have all seen impressive residential construction. This new home building is to be augmented by extensive development plans such as those on beautiful Ile Bizard.

Talking to house builders leaves the distinct impression that the majority of the families buying these new homes are English-speaking. This impression is supported by the new citizen statistics which indicate that in the last four years 85 per cent of the new citizens in this region list English as their language. On the island of Montreal, the population increase in the Vaudreuil constituency has exceeded 17 per cent in the five-year period of 1971 to 1976. Off the island, in the land area enclosed by the Ottawa and St. Lawrence Rivers and the Ontario border, the population increase has been even greater, almost 19 per cent in five years.

There are two key points to be made from these statistics. Firstly, it appears to give the lie to the oft repeated statement that the English are moving out of the province of Quebec. Secondly, it supports the contention of the government of the province of Quebec that federal immigration policy could negate the cultural and educational programs and planning in areas which are acknowledged to be 100 per cent provincial jurisdictions. Thus, it is absolutely essential, if only for reasons of orderly planning, that the provincial government participate actively in the formation and application of immigration policy. Let me try to make a more forceful illustration of this point. The federal government has, of course, already acted to avoid such an extreme case. It would be catastrophic in its consequences to establish an immigration quota for this year of, say, 200,000 persons and then to permit them all to establish in one of the big cities with its attractive labour market and high salaries.

Whilst the importance of participation in the establishment of immigration policy is more obvious in Quebec, for language and cultural reasons, it is equally important for good economic planning. The industrial growth of the province is a key consideration if the standard of living and the general prosperity is to advance at a rate adequate to satisfy our expectations. The manufacturing sector particularly must be developed to take greater advantage of the natural resources with which this province has been blessed.

From immigration it is natural to turn to the language question. This is undoubtedly the hottest issue in the country today, for two reasons, both of which are extreme: the government is shoving French down English throats and only the separation of Quebec can guarantee the preservation of the French language and culture. First let us look at what the federal government has done, or at least has tried to do. In 1974, at the executive level of certain key departments, the French-speaking representation was still under 10 per cent. In general, very little progress has been accomplished in the use of French as a working language. The total cost of bilingualism in the public service is about $135 million. A further $30 million is allocated to national defence. It is interesting, however, to stop at this point, to compare the implementation of language policies in the Department of National Defence with the public service generally. The hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Richardson), the recently resigned minister of national defence, said:

For promotion to the rank of major and above linguistic ability in a second official language is a factor.

He then goes on to describe how the scoring system determines relative merit based on "performance and potential". Thus, linguistic ability in a second official language, whether English of French, enhances an officer's position with respect to promotion to the rank of major or above in relation to a unilingual contemporary when all other factors are equal. As the hon. member for Winnipeg South said:

The department is endeavouring to establish an Anglophone/Francophone balance of personnel in the forces corresponding to the national ratio of the two groups.

It is this approach that I have personally promoted for the public service. It is not easy for a person who has passed his or her youth to learn a second language. It becomes substantially impossible when there is a force, when French is being shoved down the unilingual English throat. The English appear not to want it, so why force them. Keep the language courses available on a volunteer basis only and recognize the ability to speak a second language as the asset that it is when candidates are being considered for promotion.

That brings me to Bill 22, and since one of the major contentious issues in this bill has concerned education I should like to make reference first to federal involvement in this field. The federal government grants between $135 million and $140 million to the provinces for their second language programs. It is assumed that for a province to organize and maintain two parallel systems of education, where the language of education in each is different, is more expensive than if it had only one system of education for all its students. We are reimbursing Quebec for the extra costs it incurs in providing for the English minority and equally sophisticated system of education as that which it provides for the majority. Although great progress has been made in this respect in other provinces such as Ontario and Manitoba, Quebec more than any other province, achieves this objective. Quebec is the only province where second official language instruction is compulsory at the secondary level for both the Francophones and the Anglophones.

The government of Quebec does its best to assure good quality education for its students. An OECD committee of experts on education reported recently that Quebec is the only province of Canada where the objectives in education seem to be clearly defined. The province of Quebec is second after Ontario for its per capita spending in education, even though Quebec is not the second richest province in Canada.

Now I will comment on Bill 22 and repeat what I said two years ago, "People in the province of Quebec can well take care of themselves without Bill 22." However, the bill was promised and has been passed. Even after the adoption of Bill 22 Quebec is still, among all Canadian provinces, the one which treats the language of the minority, on her territory, with the most equity, the most liberalism and the greatest generosity. If the other nine provinces suddenly decided to show the same respect toward their own official language minorities we would witness a miraculous blooming across the whole country. The Montreal Gazette said:

Whatever the failings of Quebec's Bill 22, it still preserves a substantial place for English education in the province. Manitoba and Ontario should be prepared to do no less for their French minorities.

Let us examine the bill for a moment. The only real teeth in the law are in the section empowering the government to withhold subsidies, contracts and certain other advantages from companies not favouring French. Significantly, the law provides for fines in only one section, that is, for those failing to provide French on product labels, warranties, menus and wine lists.

The law states that all official texts and documents emanating from public bodies, the provincial government, its departments and agencies, municipalities, urban communities and their various agencies such as transit commissions, school boards, colleges and universities, must be in French, but adds that these may be accompanied by an English version. In the other provinces across the country the English version prevails over the French. Every individual has the right to address all these bodies in French or English. In cases where at least 10 per cent of the persons served by a municipal or school body are English-speaking, and this is the case for at least two-thirds of those bodies in the province, both French and English must be used in official texts, if this is already the practice.

The law states that no one will be employed or promoted in the public administration unless he has an appropriate knowledge of French. There could be unilingual English public servants in Quebec, provided they were not in direct contact with the public. Remarks addressed to the chair in any area of the public administration may be in French or in English, at the option of the persons addressing the remarks. This gives English-speaking Quebeckers a right spelled out at present in no law.

In education, the law states that pupils must have a sufficient knowledge of the language of instruction, French or English, to receive their instruction in the language. The law also says that the education minister may, in accordance with the regulations, set tests to ascertain that the pupils have sufficient knowledge of the language of instruction to receive their instruction in that language. Personally, I do no believe that there should be an entrenched right to choose the language of schooling when the child is not able to speak that language. However, on a non-legislated entitlement basis I am particularly happy to see the successful immersion schooling in our constituency today. However, there has been one contentious issue that looks as if it may be nearing resolution, that is, the division that can be created in an immigrant family. A family coming to this country has not expected the right to demand French schooling in the English provinces. Nevertheless, it has been possible for a family settling in Quebec to choose to send their children to an English school, even though English was not their language. It does not make sense to divide the children and the family by legislation which was not in existence when they made their decision to choose Quebec. The numbers are relatively few. Future immigrants will know the rules. A small change in the application of Bill 22 will remove this very emotionally charged and understandable issue.

Hand in hand with the discussion of immigration policy and language rights must go the discussion of jurisdictional responsibilities and our constitution. One cannot deny that the constitution was formulated and signed at a time when it would have been difficult to envisage the changes that have actually taken place since confederation. To name one aspect alone, the religious attitude, would suggest that our forefathers did not even think it necessary to contemplate and make provision for such a change.

There are extremely few in this country who are not firmly convinced that a revised constitution should be formulated and amendable in Canada. It is my personal conviction that changes in the constitution affecting immigration policy, communications responsibility and cultural sovereignty, are far from insurmountable obstacles. These are primarily emotional issues and good common sense is likely to prevail. For example, in the field of communications the federal government can hardly fail to recognize the impact of this highly-developed sector on education and culture. However, there is one acknowledged provincial area of responsibility that is looming as a major stumbling block to an agreement; that is, the effective level of control of resources. This question, probably more than all others, must be studied in its totally national context because of its major economic impact. Whether we discuss British Columbia lumber, Alberta oil, Saskatchewan minerals or Quebec hydro-electric power, it is questionable whether we can live in harmony as a nation if we are not able to recognize the national interest first. Surely no one province should be able to hold a gun to the heads of the other provinces. We are, obviously, going through a preliminary bargaining session. Advancing technology, the development of the third world, with its impact on our economy, and the good common sense of the Canadian people will surely lead our federal and ten provincial governments toward an accord. When we reach that long-awaited agreement, it is my hope that at that point in time we make the national declaration of our new and 100 per cent Canadian constitution. I am, personally, opposed to wasting any plane fare to pick up a piece of paper in England.

I will conclude by repeating an extract from last month's Observer:

One of our greatest possessions in Canada is our heritage of two peoples with two cultures and two languages. Our future and the future of our children will be immeasurably enriched if we can keep this country together; it will be deeply impoverished if we divide. We like to believe that we are a tolerant people, but we should never tolerate racial or cultural intolerance. And we would hope that Canadians might so act as to contribute to their pride in themselves and appreciation of our language and traditions.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, may I first express the traditional and very heartfelt congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, to those eminent persons who have occupied or reoccupied positions in the chair, and to the new cabinet ministers who might have a reasonably limited time to become accustomed to the glory that is temporarily theirs.

I sometimes think that perhaps a speech from the throne is an anachronism, but when I heard that strong, honest and extraordinarily eloquent speech by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) this afternoon I thought that makes us realize that this is a good occasion for speeches of this kind.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: However, the writers of the present speech seem to have really covered the waterfront. They appear to have left out very little except a cure for the common cold and the Ten Commandments. I am informed that since October 18 the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has been looking at the Ten Commandments and is going to have the Privy Council make a study of them and have them made available publicly. They will probably show up, in my humble opinion, as an annex to the anti-inflation program regulations.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): All ten of them?

Mr. Baldwin: Almost. If the items which show up in the Speech from the Throne sound vaguely familiar, they are, because they have shown up in so many other throne speeches. Inflation, unemployment, small business, competition, bilingualism, agriculture, national unity, labour relations, social assistance, transportation, federal-provincial relations and constitutional problems have, under the same or different names, been referred in such speeches for the last 100 years.

In fact, some of these problems were around on the occasion of the bringing together of the individual provinces to cause confederation. In most cases these are tough problems, conundrums which are related to the permanent characteristics of human beings as individuals and collectively as society. They will not easily yield to final solutions and are likely to be around for the next 100 years. I hope future governments will be more honest and open than the present one and will admit there are no miraculous cures but just present remedies for existing symptoms. The people seem to know this. They are pragmatic and instinctively more intelligent than their rulers. They recognize that the limitations, the accelerating distrust and the loss of faith in the manner of our governing stems from this.

It is a deep, angry and abiding aversion to the way we are ruled, rather than to acts of default, error and omission that turns the public off. It is the rigidity and over-discipline of political parties, particularly the party in power, a lack of effective rules in the House, which places the government, the cabinet and the civil service far outside the scope of meaningful public or parliamentary challenge. It is the enormous increase of delegated authority.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

I have here Canada Gazette 110, number 19, with 200 pages of nothing but regulations and orders in council. This is the kind of thing which the people of this country are faced with. Above all, it is the impenetrable veil of secrecy behind which bureaucrats and ministers are able to carry on their arbitrary powers free from adequate challenge. This has progressed to the stage where there is no longer a responsible government.

This is not only my view. I have here the editorial of July, 1976, from "Round Table" dealing with the situation in the United Kingdom. I quote from that article at page 216. It talks about the United Kingdom, but the only difference between the U.K. and Canada is about five years. It reads:

> The convention of ministerial responsibility has almost reached a point where it is but a memory with antique charm.

It is a ludicrous fiction to suggest at this point that the House of Commons can exercise any real control over the government on the principle that the members who sit in the executive council, the Privy Council, are members of the House of Commons whom their peers in the House can at any given moment eject from office. This is nonsense. It has happened twice in 50 years, and on both those occasions it was because we had a minority government and the minor party, which, for reasons best known to itself, saw fit at the time to act in this way because they said, "That is enough; we will put the government out." It was not a question of responsible government at all. Most individual members are now limited to the role of an ombudsman in respect of their own constituents or, as supporters of the party in power, waiting and scheming to come into the cabinet.

It is not an insignificant role, I do not downgrade it, it is a very important role; but far less than the proper concept and function that this House should have. In short, with very little real opposition from the public press or parliaments, power has slipped into the hands of the bureaucrats and whoever happens to be prime minister. They not only administer, but in most cases make policy, and I doubt if any government—certainly no government so far—has shown the capacity, the strength, the know-how or even the will to do anything about it.

There is only one place where the scales can be more nearly brought into balance, and that is on the floor of the House. If it can be done—and I am not sure that it can now—it will be only by reason of tremendous effort by members on both sides of the House. This side cannot do it alone. It will require the co-operation and the support of some hon. members on the backbenches on the other side of the House. Indeed, it may be asking too much at this time to overcome the inertia, the easy ride with the status quo and the unhappiness about having to challenge City Hall.

The major item in any package to bring this about is the right of the public to know the real truth about the actions of government and the concomitant duty of officials to disclose the facts. If anyone wants to take the time and trouble to go back over many years and review the inception of major programs in this country, either capital construction or social benefit plans, it will be found that in almost all cases they were launched with false statements as to their initial and continuing cost and their effect.

From the refitting of the Bonaventure to the quasi-welfare proposals of the UIC of several years ago, from federal contributions to Expo to the ill-fated hydrofoil project, there has been deception or lies or appalling ignorance or gross negligence and, sometimes, a mixture of all. I can say this without doubting the intrinsic value of many of these proposals. It is incredible that supposedly intelligent and conscientious people with access to the facts and statistics should have been allowed to peddle the propaganda which they did.

In my judgment, if there had been the opportunity for public access to the factual material, the various programs would have been tailored to reality and the enormous deficits and fiscal irresponsibility which constituted such a large element of inflation would not have occurred. If the officials and the ministers who put together these schemes had known at that time that they would be compelled by an adequate and working freedom of information law to publish the true facts, and had realized that the data would be subjected to contemporary scrutiny both in and out of parliament, it could well had been a different story.

It is an interesting sidelight that when we did find out something of the real horror stories behind many of these programs, it was as a result of the reports of the Auditor General. By the time the report came out into the open, the horses were gone, the door was locked and many years had elapsed. But bear in mind that it was only because the Auditor General had the right by law, under the pertinent provisions of the Financial Administration Act, to go to the public service and secure all the documents he desired and have access to the books of account. Without that right, the Auditor General would be in no better condition than we are, or than the public or the press. The Auditor General has his own freedom of information law and because of that, although often it is too late, we find out the facts.

I note with interest the words in the Speech from the Throne about freedom of information. They could mean anything, or nothing. If the government has in fact accepted the proposals made from this side of the House by myself and by my colleagues, and developed in the committee, and is prepared to produce a meaningful, workable, valuable freedom of information law with teeth, then I say, "More power to you. Go ahead with it." But I challenge them to do that. The members of all the opposition parties and, I believe, many members on the other side, want that kind of thing. I am authorized to say that when the Conservative party forms the government after the next election, if there is no valid freedom of information act produced by this government it will be enacted in the first session of such a Conservative administration.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: We have been hearing that we have no policy. I reject that. Here is a policy on a major issue which, in my opinion, is of equal importance with the other issues which have been brought up. What policy does the government have? I say that there is an opportunity for the government to let us know where they stand. I say to hon. members opposite that we are dealing with a major issue. People all over the country are aroused, and not only in this country but in other democratic countries, because of the events of the past few years. There are people all over the country, such as people from the organization called "Access" in this city.

I have travelled throughout Canada and have spoken in about 15 cities on this issue. There are large numbers of people who strongly support and demand that this measure be enacted. I say to hon. members, not as a threat but as a statement, that if it is not passed, this government is in even more serious trouble than I would otherwise expect it to be. If, as I suspect is the case, the top mandarins and one or two cabinet ministers who really run this country and flourish in the dark places of the secret society refuse to allow the parliament and the government to pass a law of this kind, then I have to say that the hon. gentlemen who form the government, this group of political dinosaurs, are really ready for the bone-yard.

Whom the Gods would destroy, they first make mad. To talk as they do in the Speech from the Throne about finding the middle way, to suggest that there will be consultation with different groups in the country, to try to find that way and then to deny to us, to the public and to the media, the facts and material on which we can evaluate the position of the government is like the prologue to a tragedy. People do not trust the government. They are cynical about its motives. They are fed up with being kept in the dark. That just will not wash any more. The public will live with honest disagreements. They expect that mistakes will be made. But they will no longer sit idly by and be hoodwinked by trickery and deception.

The Prime Minister and the government ought to realize that this is one of the main causes of the voters' disaffection with them, and the Prime Minister is kidding himself if he puts the blame on bilingualism and wage and price controls. The manner of governing and the way these matters were handled have touched the raw nerve of public indignation, and the details we now know make this plain beyond any reasonable doubt. The October, 1975, anti-inflation program was conceived in trickery, born in confusion and deceit and nourished on evasion, secrecy and blunders. There is no wonder that the public is unhappy.

At the time of its passage, the official languages bill was not ill-received in Canada. The anger and frustation of today has come about because it is now plain that the terms of the bill constituted a facade behind which the government had planned and had available from the beginning regulations to use abrasive and ill-judged methods of implementation, but hid the fact at the time of debate. I reject the contention of the Prime Minister and his friends that Canadians dislike the present government so intensely because they do not understand these programs. That is a gratuitous insult to the public.

The public understands only too well. If this government had been forthright and honest about all the details of the proposals, and if there had been public and parliamentary debate based on the truth, the situation would not have deteriorated to the present dismal state. But the trouble is that the government is congenitally incapable of being frank and open and the entire country is suffering because of it. With their track record in sensitive and potentially divisive and exceedingly difficult matters, how can the Prime Minister demand sympathetic understanding from people affected by the language policy, or expect wholehearted co-operation from trade unions, businesses and others who are whacked about by the anti-inflation program?

To be viable, effective and in the public interest, a freedom of information act has certain minimum requirements, and all the countless instances of government secrecy bear me out in this. There has to be a declaration of the right of the public to access to all government documents which, with certain exceptions, include computer tapes. These exceptions must be clearly and precisely described. All applications for disclosure must be dealt with simply and expeditiously.

Finally, any refusal by the government to give the information must be appealable to an independent court or tribunal whose decision is binding on both sides, and the onus ought to be on the government to establish that the document should not be released. With that in mind, I asked the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford), after he had completed his contribution to this debate, a question with regard to a collateral issue; that is, with regard to the right of people to demand access to their own personal and private files and, if the information in those files is incorrect, to demand rectification. That may be all very well, but let us suppose that rectification is refused. Many of us know—because we have seen illustrations from our own constituents—of people who have on record about them false, improper and incorrect information. The right which the Minister of Justice spoke of in his speech today is useless. It is of no value unless there is a final resort to an independent tribunal to compel the government—or a private corporation, when we come down to that stage—to make rectification.

The minister waffled on that. He talked about a review. A review by whom? By Messrs. Michael Pitfield, Gordon Robertson and Gordon Osbaldeston? They are inestimably fine gentleman, but not the kind of people I want to have to resort to in order to challenge the actions of the government. I am reminded of one of my early days in court, as a young lawyer, when I defended a man charged with bootlegging.

Miss Bégin: It shows.

Mr. Baldwin: I will suppress what I was going to say about the hon. lady. After this man was found guilty—most improperly, the evidence was not there—I told the JP that that could not be done and that the man was not guilty. The JP replied that it was already done. I said that I would appeal. The JP was half out of his chair, but he said, "All right, Mr. Baldwin, I will hear your appeal right now." That is precisely the system this government wants to adopt; it wants to hear its own appeals. That is not good enough for this House and it is not good enough for the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: There are other aspects of the requisition of the required elements of a freedom of information bill, but we cannot settle for less than the above. The sheer size of the civil service, both provincial and federal, makes it repugnant to our sense of fairness, justice and sound government to place in their collective hands the right, at their whim and without challenge or appeal, to remove document of public interest from the scrutiny of parliament, the public and the press.

What has been the reaction of the government so far through its spokesmen in the committees, in the House and in different parts of Canada? There are various objections, but the main bureaucratic resistance—and the government's spokesmen, acting on behalf of the bureaucracy, are making these apologies—is based on three things. The first is an unwillingness to submit to the jurisdiction of an independent tribunal. On that I have said as much as I need to say. The government feels it should have the right to have the last word and to have the final veto. I think it is unthinkable and unacceptable to leave to bureaucrats the opportunity to decide what documents in their possession should be made public. There is a refusal to produce working papers or so-called internal documents. Any exemption of this kind provides a bottomless pit into which all government data can sink out of sight. These are the kinds of objections which precipitate the leakage of documents, a demeaning and humiliating method of acquiring information.

There are some leaks that we know of. Governments leak documents purposely to try to manipulate public opinion. Sometimes people leak documents for revenge or for gain, but I am thinking of the genuine case of the civil servant, torn between conscience and the oath of secrecy, who knows that the government, in breach of factual information put before it, is ignoring facts and statistics and is going off in a direction which it thinks is more politically advisable but wrong. What is the position of the civil servant of that kind? Too often this leads to leaks. I suggest that the introduction of a proper freedom of information bill would eliminate at least 75 per cent to 80 per cent of leaks of this kind.

Finally, the third reason the government advances for refusing is that the government says our system is different. I have heard that argument advanced all over the world. I have heard it in Austria, France, Britain and Australia, and not too many years ago there was a case in the United States where some very eminent lawyers were arguing in the supreme court of the United States. They said, "We have a unique and distinctive system of government in the United States: We have the separation of powers: It is absolutely unthinkable that this material should be opened up to public survey." That was the argument made to the supreme court of the United States by the lawyers for Richard Nixon.

I have heard almost the same words repeated in this country time after time by government spokesmen. They maintain that we cannot have a freedom of information bill here, that we cannot allow an independent tribunal to make a decision on it because our system is different. This is a specious argument made by people who see themselves as Horatious standing at the bridge, defending the grounds of privilege and absolutism and the opportunities for vast patronage. This is the true reason why people on the government side are afraid to have a bill that will work.

The rights which we seek to obtain by legislation of this kind are not extravagant or improper. It was said hundreds of years ago that a people which means to govern itself must have the power that knowledge brings. It is their money that is taxed from them and spent by others; it is their property, their privileges, their well-being that is affected. Nobody, not even the Prime Minister, and probably not even the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey), acquires extraordinary gifts by being sworn into cabinet. No civil servant, no matter how high his rank or his experience, automatically obtains the mystique and the gift of divine wisdom.

There is the little story about James I speaking to the judges—a practice you will notice, Mr. Speaker, that has come down to the present day with the executive speaking to judges—that which concerns the mystery of power is not lawful to be disclosed, because to do so is to wade into the mystical reverence that belongs to who sit on the throne of God. I know there are a few of the bureaucracy who do not think they sit on the throne of God; but there are still about 10 per cent for whom the jury is still out.

Mr. Speaker, civil servants and others are subject to the frailties and faults of the rest of us. Because they are dealing with our affairs, they must be accountable to parliament on behalf of the people we represent. I recognize that the business of governing is complex and difficult and requires quick and effective action. I am not suggesting that parliament should govern. We cannot govern. That is for government. But government must exercise that authority on all occasions subject to the knowledge that they will have to account for it. The power to govern is a trust and, like any trust, there has to be an accounting. It is not enough to rely on the clumsy and blunt weapon of periodic elections, essential as they may be. This accountability has to be on a day to day, week to week and a monthly basis.

That is one side of the coin, Mr. Speaker. The other side is the right of people to have easy, simple and expeditious access to facts and information they are particularly interested in: their own files, as is suggested by the terms of the new human rights bill; data about the quality of the food they eat; the products they buy—are they safe or hazardous; information about immigration; environmental and pollution data; information about decisions of boards or tribunals that affect them; claims for social benefits; and the 1,001 things that intimately affect their lives. This will not come easily. People who wield power and great authority which others do not possess will not readily yield it. They will obstruct, argue and rationalize and offer specious and irrelevant excuses. This is a struggle which I suspect will be hard, tough and long, but it can provide a chance for members on both sides of the House, if they want, to bring about a renaissance of responsible government. It may be our last chance.

Mr. Speaker, we have no God-given assurance that our method of governing ourselves will be eternal. Surely no system can, or should, survive when it rests on a shifting foundation of political dishonesty and organized government lying. This applies to most democratic countries at the present time. This is the stage to which they have developed. If people understand that their representatives are unable or unwilling to look after their interests against the actions of big government, they are going to find some other way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with others in this House and pay my compliments to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. They have done a commendable job and everyone in this House appreciates their efforts very much. I should also like to express my appreciation for the opportunity to speak on the debate on the Speech from the Throne.

First of all, however, I should like to make reference to the passing of a colleague, Mrs. Morin, who loved her work in this House, who was highly respected and who in the past controlled the proceedings of this House many times. I should like to offer to her family my personal condolences and those of my family.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): My responsibilities to the people of Canada, in my portfolio as Minister of Veterans Affairs, have been varied and challenging during the past months. Today I am happy to say Canadian veterans are enjoying one of the most comprehensive programs for veterans to be found in the world. There are many things that we as Canadians should be thankful for today. One of them is peace and freedom, for which we paid no small price. Another is the natural bounty of this great land of ours. Another is the quality of life we enjoy thanks to our own endeavours and accomplishments. We are fortunate, as a nation, compared to most nations of the world today. But we have largely created our own good fortune by bending our backs to the task of building something valuable and distinctive.

According to the last census, there are still nearly a million veterans living in Canada. A major portion of these are married, and many of them still have dependent children. Accordingly, we estimate there are probably nearly two million Canadian citizens who are potentially entitled to one or more benefits under the various pieces of veterans' legislation. This year, its golden anniversary year, the Royal Canadian Legion has decided to organize a very special campaign known as Operation Service. It is aimed at making contact with every war veteran and ex-service person and their survivors, to make sure that they are fully aware of their rights and privileges.

The veterans' charter, one of the best in the world, represents tangible recognition of Canada's debt to those who gave their services and, in some cases, their lives for their homeland. Yet, astonishingly, large numbers of ex-servicemen, and probably an even higher percentage of widows, have failed to seek the benefits to which they are entitled. This has happened despite the ongoing efforts of the Legion, other veterans' organizations and the Department of Veterans Affairs to publicize the provisions of the veterans' charter.

I would like to tell the hon. members that today it is because of action such as Operation Service that I will continue to respect the voice of the national council of veterans' associations, and especially the Royal Canadian Legion who are always so essentially helpful to both me and my senior officials whenever we sit down to discuss matters such as benefits and hospital care for the veteran. These organizations talk sense and they talk both from the mind and the heart. My department will continue to press for changes in legislation which are in keeping with our times and with the spirit and intent of the veterans' charter. Also, Mr. Speaker, I should like to reiterate what I announced in the House of Commons on September 29—that casual earnings exemptions for more than 90,000 war veterans' allowance and civilian war allowance recipients have been increased by 50 per cent. Veterans and widows will now be able to accept additional casual employment to supplement their allowances and increase their well-being. In other words, it will give those who want to work the chance to do so.

Another important aspect to the operation of my portfolio, Mr. Speaker, is remembrance. This is the responsibility of all Canadians to those who fell in defence of our country, and it is our duty to remember and revere their sacrifice—soldiers, sailors and airmen who secured for Canada the freedom we now enjoy. I trust I have demonstrated to hon. members that my department is well aware of the obligations it has to those who so gallantly offered their services to our country in time of war. We will continue to honour those obligations. I would be remiss, Mr. Speaker, if I did not thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for the kind remarks which he expressed last Thursday.

As we start this new session of parliament I would like to take a look back at the summer months and a look ahead to what has been forecast by the Speech from the Throne. The past summer has been an extremely busy one for me and the other members of cabinet. As well as my travels to Prince Edward Island and my own constituency, it was my pleasure to travel during the summer months to Winnipeg and other parts of Manitoba, to Saskatchewan, to various parts of Ontario, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. On each of those occasions I had the opportunity to meet large groups of Canadians and discuss the situations and problems facing our country today, and wherever I travelled I found people very aware of the effort being undertaken by the government, and very concerned that solutions should be found.

The situations which seem constantly to come to the fore are bilingualism and the economy, and I feel both are well in hand. There are criticisms of the bilingualism program and the way it is being implemented. This criticism is useful and constructive to the government, provided it is founded on reason and not on prejudice. We must never forget Canada was founded by two races of people who vowed to work together in a unique type of country where all enjoyed linguistic and cultural equality. We must not deviate from that, for if and when we succeed in having a country composed of two races enjoying truly equal rights, we shall be unique among countries of the world and will a shining example to other lands and peoples. I have a belief that this particular program is widely, almost universally, supported by Canadians on principle, and while there may be small disagreements regarding implementation, it certainly will lead to a truly bilingual society.

Another area on which discussion has centred for the past year or two is the economy. It is now just over one year since the controls programs was implemented, and to my mind it is a success. On October 14, labour held its day of protest, and to all intents and purposes it could only be described as a failure. Large numbers of union members and labour in general stayed at work because they realized their relative position had improved a great deal in one year.

The rational and thoughtful people of Canada realize we cannot go on taking more out of the economy than we are prepared, through our productivity, to put back in. All segments of society must work together to defeat inflation, and it is unfortunate that one group, big labour, feels it must confront the rest of the country and demand more than its share from business, government and, indeed, from those on limited and fixed incomes who suffer most from the ravages of inflation. It sometimes seems that these disputes centre entirely on the basis of the person's own personal needs, while no thoughts are given to the well-being of the country or to other segments of society. At times like these it would seem more sensible to me if all the participants would take a long, sober look at what is happening and governed themselves and their organizations accordingly.

The anti-inflation program is working, and working well. The economy is proceeding along the path of a moderate recovery, registering about 5 per cent growth in real terms. The recovery is being led by increases in consumer expenditure, residential housing activities and export of goods and services. Business commitment has been weak, as can be expected at this stage of the cycle in view of the fact that not all companies are yet operating at full capacity.

We know where we stand at the present time with the economy. However, we must also look to the future. Bearing that in mind, I would like to mention briefly the general philosophy of the government as expressed in the Speech from the Throne, and the plans which have been formulated for the months and years ahead. Of particular interest to those of us in areas of high unemployment are plans to create a year-round, comprehensive, direct job-creation program directed toward areas of chronic high unemployment. Other programs will provide more job opportunities and improved employment counselling for young people. The government does not intend to compete with the private sector for the services of unemployed workers, but will create jobs in areas where its efforts will be a necessary supplement to private sector activity. As hon. members know, we have already enjoyed, in Prince Edward Island, the benefits of the community employment strategy. This new program should expand on the good work already undertaken by Manpower and Immigration.

Transportation is always an important issue on Prince Edward Island. In the Speech from the Throne the government said "changes will be introduced to the national transportation act to protect against unfair freight rates". This is a step which will fit into two areas of government policy, regional development and the competition policy. We on Prince Edward Island are very aware of the energy crisis and the problems related to our dependence on foreign energy. When he visited us last month, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) officially opened the Ark which is dedicated to the search for alternative forms of energy. In the Speech from the Throne, the government committed itself to——place further emphasis on research and development of renewable energy sources and on means of improving the efficiency with which energy is used in Canada, particularly the thermal efficiency of residential and commercial buildings.

Housing is another priority area of the present government. The goal of one million new house owners in the next four years remains a key element of the government's housing policy. In concert with other levels of government and the private sector, the government will work to increase the efficiency and input of Canada's total housing effort.

A while ago I mentioned regional development, a principle to which the government remains committed. This has, of course, been a dominant factor in Prince Edward Island life since the policy of regional development was undertaken. The government has, once again, outlined its commitments to small business, recognizing that these are the mainstay of Canada's economy. They continue to be our economic backbone. The government will provide measures to assist small businesses by improving access to financial assistance and other services provided by government departments.

The Speech from the Throne was an interesting and valuable document giving much reason for optimism across Canada in general and Prince Edward Island in particular. Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the privilege of speaking today.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, in my many years here I have not gone through a throne speech debate in which all four members from Prince Edward Island have taken part. Whether this intelligent and illustrious institution can stand such an operation, I do not know. However, it is a pleasure to follow my neighbour, colleague and friend, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald). It is tradition, and I do it very seriously, to congratulate the mover and the seconder of this address. I know both these men well, but perhaps the seconder a little better because I also knew his father who was an illustrious member of this House.

I rejoice with all members and all Canadians in the splendid measure of recovery of His Excellency. The mover described Her Excellency as an example to all Canadian women. I would use a somewhat different expression. I think this great, devoted and brave woman is an example to all Canadians. I was filled with pride during her reading of the throne speech. Over many months her supportive role to her husband and in the performance of her own important duties has earned for her great distinction. She is a credit to the nation; one of the greatest ladies we have produced.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: It is customary to extend one's good wishes to newly appointed or newly reshuffled cabinet ministers. This is a bit more difficult these days because one must check the morning paper every day to see who is still around. But I do wish the survivors well. In the lame-duck category in which they find themselves, they will need a plentitude of good will. I will be plenteously generous with them.

● (1700)

I am glad my old friend and fellow-islander, the Minister of Veterans Affairs is still in his post. I also hope that the move of a segment of the Department of Veterans Affairs to Charlottetown will take place while he is still minister so that we may both have an opportunity to attend the ceremonial opening.

It is hard to sort out the winners and losers in the kind of shuffle the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) engaged in a few weeks ago. But surely one victim was the man who least deserved it, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen). This distinguished maritimer, skilled debater, and splendid scholar was doing a good job as Secretary of State for External Affairs and was gaining confidence and international respect as day followed day. So he is withdrawn from the international scene, from the world of diplomacy, to what? To be the adjutant in the Prime Minister's last stand. If he were Demosthenes and Plato combined, the President of the Privy Council could not so function in this House as to make this government look good. While it might have been a noble gesture for him to know his true Grit loyalty it will, I fear, prove something less than a brilliant exercise in judgment. How cruel to expect him to avert the inevitable, to arrest the irresistible.

This government's caravan, with its cargo of disillusionment, dissension, decrepitude, and debility is on a downward course and while, from time to time, a square wheel is removed, another one is added and it is always hard to make useful salutary changes when plunging downhill. There are some who say the government is going nowhere. I disagree. I think it is headed for that well known destination described by Mackenzie King in a rare moment of candour as the "Valley of Humiliation".

The present government is passing through a phase well known to tottering administrations. I have witnessed it in my own lifetime and I have read about it in the history of Canada. The reaction is traditional: first, blame the press—and that process is certainly under way. The next is to make the same look different by indulging in some sort of cabinet shuffle, making the new look old and the old look original. The third step is to present to the people a Speech from the Throne which will offend none and attract all. Last—and this technique is, I must admit, a new one because of the development of the electronic media—spend millions of dollars on the principle that if you tell the people often enough they will eventually catch on and realize that the government is right and that they are wrong.

How futile is all of this! How many Canadians can recall today even 50 per cent of the glittering generalities contained in the Speech from the Throne—and most of them were more general than glittering? Mr. Speaker, these exercises, these tinkerings will not work, nor should they work. For as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) so rightly noted, the government is seeking not to change itself but to cajole the public into changing its perception of the government.

There is an old saying that Hell knows no fury like a woman scorned. I have not scorned a woman, but I have read this adage. And I would say that a government faces no fury like an electorate misled. What happened in St. John's West and Ottawa-Carleton is but a forerunner of what is to come. If it is too late to say repent, at least I can say "beware". And when the change does come it will not be because of any great difference in ideology or because the country is moving to the left, or to the right—I do not think those terms are very meaningful in Canada. It will be because the people are sick and tired of being poorly governed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: How long has it been since this great, prosperous and wonderful nation has had an efficient government in charge of its affairs? That is what the people are wanting. They are crying out for good administration. But, Mr. Speaker, you know my temperament. You know I do not want to indulge long in criticism, even of the gentlest variety. Being a man of great solace and solicitude, I know there is pain and anxiety across the way. I remember when I sat across the way and the omens were pretty clear; it was not kind to predict what we all knew, in our hearts, was going to happen.

On a much more positive note I would like to say how moved I was to hear the many tributes from all parties in the House and from Mr. Speaker which were tendered to the Hon. John Angus MacLean, then member for Malpèque and, prior to that, member for Queens—one of the last two dual ridings in Canada. For 11 years Mr. MacLean and I jointly represented the people of Queens which contains the City of Charlottetown, the cradle of confederation. A man of honour, wisdom, and ability he was a great colleague and I treasure the opportunity given me to serve as his running mate. I salute him as a friend and political comrade of nearly 20 years standing.

[Mr. Macquarrie.]

The relatively long recess allowed me the happy opportunity of spending a good many consecutive weeks in my home province—than which there is none more beautiful. Prince Edward Island, like the Atlantic region generally, is particularly sensitive to the dominion government's actions and non-actions.

During the last session I cautioned the then Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development against the imposition of fees in the Prince Edward Island National Park. This past summer has shown a striking decrease in visitors to the park. It has also placed heavy pressure on areas adjoining the park. I need hardly say that this makes for a serious environmental problem and increases the strain on the resources of the province and of its government. I am interested in the full story of last summer. How will the cost of establishing toll gates compare with the revenue intake from a reduced number of visitors?

Other members have discussed the gravity of the transportation situation, especially, but not exclusively, as it affects Atlantic Canada. The user-pay policy is as iniquitous as it is against the spirit of Canadian federalism. As my colleague, Mr. MacLean, once said in Charlottetown, the people of P.E.I. have learned that "Otto Lang" is two four letter words!

The whole great nation-building exercise which began in Charlottetown in 1864 was designed to do many things. One of the first was to share the inequalities and to make an effort to redress the imbalances of the extremities of the new dominion, with special provisions written into the original document to compensate for the special needs of certain areas. Almost immediately after the dominion was formed, further special arrangements, subsidies and the like, were provided for. I do not accept the suggestion of certain ministers that you must have policies that are universally applied all across the country. We have had it otherwise since 1867.

Since I am talking about our country's early days and its founding fathers, I should like to make one more plea for a little historical accuracy in today's constitutional discussions and posturings. It has now become popular to use the word "patriation". I suspect that this was the inspiration of some of the brains trust in the Prime Minister's office; I cannot imagine it coming from anywhere else.

Purists might shrink from either word, but if we must use this expression it should be "repatriation". Despite its name, one quite appropriate for the time, the British North America Act is the product not of British but of Canadian statescraft. It was made in Canada by Canadian leaders for the governance of a new Canadian state. As John A. Macdonald said, most of the decisions were made in Charlottetown, a city which I have the honour to represent.

I see the Minister of Veterans Affairs is not here now, but I must say I agreed completely with what he said about the principles of bilingualism. However, I know he will be pleased to recall, as I was, the historic note that among the fathers of confederation French was not the tongue of the majority. Nor was English. The mother tongue of the majority of these illustrious men was Gaelic, as it was of the ancestors of the Minister of Veterans Affairs and myself.

It is demeaning of the work of our founding fathers not to suggest that we are bringing home the constitution, where it was worked out by political men in political discussion in the finest exercise of political statecraft. So let it be "repatriation", if, Sir, you will pardon the reiteration.

Historically, governments have seen the need to make special arrangements for special needs and circumstances. The iron clad, rigid, universalist approach of ministers which has been revealed in recent years does not deal with a nation's basic need. It does not help hold the country together.

Apart from transportation, reference has been made by colleagues of mine to a very grave problem, the high electricity costs in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. On the "late show" last week, to a tremendous audience, I gave specific details of this problem and I know that the appropriate minister—because he was present—will be working on the matter. However, I must renew my plea to deal urgently with an urgent problem.

The answer, of course, in the long run is development of the Fundy tides, but a measure of assistance should be extended by way of a temporary subsidy to deal with a temporary but grave situation. In Prince Edward Island I am proud that steps have been taken by enterprising people in the field of technology to produce wind powered energy, but because of the imposition of stiff taxes on component parts it is difficult for islanders or other Canadians to convert to this form of energy. At a time when one minister is suggesting to Canadian to watch the use of depleting but popular forms of energy and to move to something else, you will find that minister's colleagues, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) and the Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin), making it difficult, through their interpretation of legislation and the legislation they present, for people to convert to this very obvious, useful and I think timely form of energy production. I ask for consistency in this regard as in others.

Since I know there are many great orators waiting to follow me and, since I usually do not take all the time that is allotted, may I finally make the plea, as I and my colleagues have done so many times, that on the matter of dealing with regional economic disparity let all members of the government be on the same course. There is no use in one minister who heads the Department of Regional Economic Expansion trying—and I believe most ministers have tried—to conquer this great problem in confederation, this grave disparity, inequity and inequality, if all his other colleagues in the government pay absolutely no attention to such a concept.

Recently my colleague, the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald), the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), and the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates) dealt with this problem powerfully and well and I support every argument that they made. It is a sham, a mockery, to talk about fighting regional disparity, as the Minister of Veterans Affairs has done, unless the whole government is geared in that direction. It ill suffices to have one minister dealing with the matter within a limited range of initiative if his colleagues do not grasp this central truth, that this country is not prosperous if any of its segments or regions are not partaking of the general prosperity and development.

It is shocking in the Atlantic region and in certain other regions to see that the gulf, instead of narrowing, is widening. There are lots of reasons for conflict within confederation. They are not all over culture, language, and political labels. They are over the lack of fairness, the lack of the use of governmental machinery to distribute the wealth of the nation to all its people. That surely is what a dominion government is for. That surely is the challenge to those in power in a dominion government. That is what I ask, that is what I urge, and that is what I put forward as one of the great priorities, not for my region alone but for the whole country. There will then be in this land a degree of equity and regional equality, and our citizens will not suffer if they do not live in a province that has great mineral wealth or other attributes of great economic success. If this message and it alone can get through, something will have been accomplished in all these long years of pleading, arguing, and trying to give a helpful direction to a sometimes helpless government.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): First, Mr. Speaker, may I join those who have congratulated the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. I might say to the seconder that I too served in the House with his father. I had a very great affection and high regard for him, and I am sure that the son will do equally as well, if not better.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Francis: Along with those who have expressed their deep sorrow at the loss of Madame Morin, may I also express my sorrow. I do not believe there is a single member of the House who did not regard her with the very greatest affection.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Francis: On October 10, 1974, a little over two years ago, I participated in the previous debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. I have taken the trouble to look back at what I had to say then and it seems to me that these subjects were of interest. There was the problem of amending the law concerning the Public Service Staff Relations Act. The Finkelman report had been laid before us a few months previously, and subsequently a committee of this place and the other place laboured at some length and produced a report. I understand there was reference in the Speech from the Throne to having legislation placed before this House before very long. I welcome it, Mr. Speaker, but it is long overdue.

• (1720)

At that time I also mentioned problems of the National Capital Commission, as did other hon. members. A joint committee of the other place and this House is reviewing these matters. I note that the position of chairman of that particular commission has been vacant for some four months. I hope the government will move promptly to name a replacement.

There was also in my speech an earnest plea for the creation of a ministry of the public service. In no respect have I changed my views. I hope that the government will see fit to reconsider and give some recognition to my suggestion.

I also spoke about bilingualism. At that time I was concerned about complaints I was receiving about public servants who had been moved from Ottawa to Hull and the application of Bill 22 to them. I no longer hear that kind of complaint; I hope this is a good sign. However, the policy of bilingualism in the public service of Canada is in need of drastic review. I welcome references on the subject in the Speech from the Throne and look forward to the presentation of measures in the period ahead.

The Commissioner of Official Languages has told us what a good thing it is to have our youth educated in schools in the two official languages, instead of spending much greater sums of money on an adult education program. Again, I welcome references to this topic in the Speech from the Throne. At the risk of being tedious I suggest that some of us brought forward such suggestions sometime previously. Our suggestions were not as welcome, at least not welcome in the way similar suggestions emanating from the language commissioner and others are welcome today.

I hope there will be a major expansion of grants for second language training in Canada. This of course will involve consultation with the provinces, because education is a provincial matter. The federal government will want to make sure that its funds are actually spent for the purpose.

This past summer a report was brought down concerning language teaching in the public service. The Bibeau Report on language training had some refreshing things to say, and I pay tribute to Professor Bibeau for an honest job. He said that too many positions have been designated as bilingual without regard to the actual need to use a second language. Many such positions should not have been designated as bilingual. This has been especially true in the national capital region. In particular, the requirement that every supervisor of two or more persons in the national capital should be bilingual was extreme and unnecessary and should be removed.

I am sure that hon. members on the other side of the House will contend that the application of bilingual policies in the public service was a factor in the recent by-election in the Ottawa-Carleton constituency.

An hon. Member: They hated the government.

Mr. Francis: Well, there is no doubt that the voters intended to convey a message, and there is no concealment of that fact. A victory of 11,000 votes two years ago was turned into a defeat by 16,000 votes in October, 1976. What were the voters saying? That is the question.

Let us put aside the campaign for a moment. I believe that a large number of faithful supporters of the party were turned off from the day of the nominating convention. I believe that the successful candidate at that convention was not adequately briefed about the implications of the language policy in the public service. He was not made aware of the deep distrust which many voters in this area feel, not only with regard to the application of the policy but with regard to the government's intentions concerning the policy.

In many ways the National Capital Commission region, 40 per cent of its population being Francophone, is a microcosm of Canada. National issues are often sensed here before they are sensed in other parts of Canada.

The credibility of the Liberal party is at stake. Just what does our party stand for in the application of bilingual policies? For that matter, what do the opposition parties stand for, because they have given us no indication in this debate or any other debate of what they would do if they were in power—and this applies to the NDP as well as to the official opposition.

An hon. Member: Better start reading, Lloyd.

Mr. Francis: Speaking to the Liberal party in Toronto recently, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) faced squarely the implications of what the Gallup poll has been saying about my party. We all know what the implications will be for our country if my party is reduced to one representing French Canada, with a handfull of seats outside French Canada, and if the Conservative party is to represent English-speaking Canada, with a small number of seats in French Canada. We know what the implications will be for our country, and we should all let that knowledge weigh on our consciences. The Prime Minister threw out a challenge to our rank and file. He said that if, recognizing the grave threat to national unity, we were to sit back and allow this to happen, Canada would be destroyed and we would feel guilty for the rest of our lives.

Speaking in this debate the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) said that there was a heavy responsibility on English-speaking ministers to explain the government's policies. Many have said that the solution is to hire better communicators. Mr. Speaker, it is not just a problem of communication; it is not just a problem of the rank and file, the "grassroots", to use an expression I do not like, doing its job. It is not just a question of English-speaking or French-speaking ministers doing their jobs. There is, I submit, an even deeper malaise in our party.

The President of the Treasury Board also said something about throne speech debates: they come from the heart, without restriction on subject matter.

I intend to speak about three speeches delivered by government backbenchers; I am referring to the members for Matane (Mr. De Bané), Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal) and Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier). First I would like to point out that within the Liberal party, there are two different standards. When a French-speaking government member criticizes the policy of the government—he is free to do so—nobody objects. But when an English-speaking member dares criticize the bilingual policy, some people say: He is against bilingualism, he is against Quebecers and French-speaking people, he is even supposed to be narrow-minded. With this attitude, he will remain a backbencher for a long time. That is true, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

I now return to the speeches to which I referred. In many ways they are different; but in many ways they are appallingly alike. They all speak of ancient wrongs. Some of them go back centuries. They demand immediate measures to rectify ancient wrongs. Not one of the three referred to Bill 22, or to the efforts of people such as the former hon. member for Langelier, (Mr. Marchand), or to the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) to tell Mr. Bourassa that our efforts to sell bilingualism outside Quebec are seriously impaired by his repression of minority language rights within Quebec. I am told that at least two of these there have spoken on other occasions against Bill 22. Careful reading of their speeches leaves me under the impression that all three really accept the bill. They feel that Quebecers have somehow failed to communicate Bill 22's true meaning to English-speaking Canada. Perhaps they too should hire better communicators.

What truly frightens me is the use of statistics by both the hon. member for Matane and the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont. By picking and choosing this department and that department they draw highly inflammatory conclusions. They both refer to the percentages of Francophones in senior management posts in the public service, and infer that no progress has been made in advancing the careers of Francophones. They nowhere refer to the fact that while the percentage of Francophones across Canada is 27 per cent, the percentage of Francophones in the entire public service is over 27 per cent. They nowhere refer to the fact that of 1,122 university graduates hired in 1975—out of whose ranks future managers are likely to be recruited—no fewer than 333 were Francophones, or nearly 30 per cent. There is no mention of the distinct progress made in the over-all levels of management within the last three years—something like 18.5 per cent, according to Public Service Commission statistics, for Francophones in management categories. That figure has gone up to 20.6 per cent.

Distinct progress is being made. But, if one were to read their speeches one would gather there has been an absolutely dismal denial of opportunity to Francophones in the public service. When they pick out this department and that department they do not mention the Secretary of State's Department, for example, the House of Commons staff, or the mint, all of which have high percentages of Francophones at all levels. Indeed, when some activities of the Mint were moved to Winnipeg, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) insisted on a quota of at least one third Francophones for all posts.

When, however, 400 positions in the same Department of Supply and Services were moved to Matane we could well ask what guarantees if any were provided for Anglophones? The hon. member for Matane cited statistics presumably from the Bibeau Report to the effect that Francophones are not permitted to work in French. A very important part of the answer to that problem is the creation of units working in French.

[Translation]

The government clearly intends to set up units to encourage French-speaking civil servants to work in their mother tongue. However, if the government intends to pay bonuses for bilingualism, we must consider the results. For example, will those working in French-speaking units receive bonuses for bilingualism? Evidently not.

[English]

Let us just think of what the effect of a policy of bilingual bonuses is. Are we going to pay the people who take their training at government expense for that very modest achievement in bilingualism to which Mr. Bibeau referred? Are we going to say that everybody in a designated position will get a bonus for speaking two languages when it has been very clear that a large number of the designated positions do not use two languages? How can the hon. member for Matane and the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont suggest that the government immediately take measures for bilingual bonuses and then complain that the government does not undertake policies to encourage the greater use of French? French language units are the means by which there is a direct encouragement of French language work in the public service, and one policy works against the other.

In fairness to the hon. member for Matane he implies that he does not really believe in the policy of national bilingualism. He refers to a two-nation solution. On page 351 of Hansard of October 21 he is quoted as follows:

> That is one of the reasons why I think the concept of a bilingual Canada is a faulty political solution to the cultural problems that must be posed in different terms. An analysis of the destiny of French Canada and English Canada in North America and their quest for identity finally always boils down to two national communities with close historical links pursuing their future in an independent way.

I would like to know how many members on this side of the House agree with these views. I, for one, do not.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont was responding to statements made by the former minister of national defence giving his views on entrenching language rights in the constitution. The member's emotional response in the light of the dreadful historical background of Manitoba is understandable. He and others, however, come dangerously close to a doctrine that the rest of us are guilty of heinous crimes by reason of our ancestry. There is no conceivable way by which I, or any other living Canadian, can atone for the sins of the Peace of Paris, General Murray, Lord Durham, or the government of Manitoba in 1890.

What I am prepared to do, and what others are, I am sure, prepared to do, is look at today's situation in a fresh light and to try to do what is fair and just, with full respect for human rights and cultural values. The argument of "cent ans d'injustice" simply proves too much. It can be, and has been conjured up to say, that because of the terrible wrongs of the past, other wrongs are justified today. Can't we rise above this level and just once try to forget the past?

I want to say that I am not impressed by the argument of the former minister of national defence, and I have read his statement very carefully. I for one am quite prepared to discuss and consider entrenchment of language rights in the constitution, but on a basis of full equality for the English language minority in Quebec as well as for the French language minority outside Quebec.

My colleague from Ottawa-Vanier refers to the million French-speaking Canadians living outside Quebec. He argues that they are in constant danger of assimilation, that their pre-eminent status in relation to other minorities has not been sufficiently recognized, and demands special programs on their behalf. Indeed, he goes much further. At page 286 of Hansard of October 20 he is quoted as saying:

> And so it is that the French-speaking minority in Canada, whether implicitly or explicitly, demands a special kind of protection, greater than that of official equality, in order to defend itself against the risk of anglicization . . .

What are the limits of "a special kind of protection, greater than that of official equality"? It seems to me that demands on this basis are capable of being escalated indefinitely. It is this aspect of vague, escalating and never-ending demands that has irritated many Canadians, particularly those whose origins are neither English nor French.

In the city of Ottawa and in this region we have made very substantial gains in protecting the rights of the French minority. I welcome in my own constituency the Ecole Champlain. I welcome a French language secondary school and regret that it was not established many years before. We have made progress; we have done things. A speech which does not give due recognition to the fact that there is some good will and good faith on behalf of a majority in the community is a disservice to those on whose behalf the hon. member presumes to speak.

I am coming to the end of my speech, but I wish to make one further point. The Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, the so-called Laurendeau-Dunton Commission, grappled at length with these problems. At the time I did not appreciate the contribution which they made, but I hereby wish to pay my tribute to them. The solution was that Canada should be a bilingual and multicultural nation. To me, Mr. Speaker, it makes a lot of sense.

Each of the three speakers to whom I referred made numerous references to Canada's "bicultural" character. I really wonder if any one of them has accepted multiculturalism, despite some references to it. Their references on careful reading are not sympathetic to multiculturalism. This is a great pity. The new Canadian communities are not likely to be attracted to the French language if they are not made welcome, and the record of Bill 22 in denying them the basic human right to choose one official language of Canada for their children is deplorable.

I for one would have liked the Prime Minister to have named a special minister of the cabinet with an exclusive responsibility for multiculturalism. In saying this I mean no disrespect for the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) who is a very much overworked man with a large range of duties.

I am concerned that there is an obligation on our party to define just what we mean by our bilingualism policy. There is an equal obligation on parties on the other side of the House.

I think certain questions must be answered. Do the speeches coming from a number of Liberal backbenchers actually represent policy of the government of the day? I do not think they do. But the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts), speaking in this House, cited two of the speeches with approval. He did not in any way criticize them although he certainly gave a pretty sharp blast to the former minister of national defence.

In the present atmosphere the tone of the speeches has contributed to a serious deterioration in relationships between English language and French language communities. The doctrine of guilt by ancestry is a terribly dangerous one to espouse.

The suggestion that the Francophone minorities want something more than official equality is, I submit, something which will take a lot of explaining and a lot of professional communicators to have accepted in this country.

The doctrine of bilingual bonuses in the public service will create a great deal of difficulty in the light of the excessive designation of bilingual positions. There is the need to encourage units working in French and the fact that so many people learn their second language at government expense. It will be difficult to persuade others who did not learn a second language at government expense that those who went to expensive language training schools should also be paid extra bonuses for having succeeded in their modest degree of bilingualism in the courses.

I think the hon. members of this House are entitled to ask the Secretary of State, the Prime Minister and those who speak for the government, when the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont said as recorded at page 132 of Hansard on October 20 this year that the resolutions on official bilingualism should be amended so that only persons who are bilingual at the time of appointment can succeed to designated positions in the public service, whether or not this is government policy. I think there is an obligation on the Secretary of State to make this clear. The Secretary of State presumably read this speech to see whether or not this is government policy. If hon. members want to know why there is concern, confusion, and discontent in the public service, they only have to look at this kind of speech.

There are many reasons why the voters in the by-elections on October 18 expressed their displeasure. In part it was a general frustration after 13 years of government by one party, in part the concern about decentralization, about the immense complications of collective bargaining. But I think fundamental to the issue in the Ottawa area is a grave concern about where we are going and what we are doing in the field of language policy. We are entitled to more than platitudes. I hope that in the period ahead government spokesmen will issue clarifications of the government's position which will assist all of us in defending a policy which I believe is essential.

I believe in bilingualism in the public service across Canada. I believe in the rights of Francophone minorities across Canada and of Anglophone minorities in Quebec. I believe in the measures that have to be taken under the constitution for the protection and achievement of these goals, but I believe we have heard in this debate in the House a number of extreme positions that have done nothing to set the record straight.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, in taking this opportunity to reply to the Speech from the Throne I should like to commend the mover and the seconder of the Address in Reply, the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) and the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance). I would also like to say how pleased I was to hear the Governor General read part of the Speech from the Throne. I commend him on his recovery and I wish to pay a special tribute to Her Excellency, Madam Léger, for the excellent job that she did and for the clear and articulate way in which she read the major portion of the Speech from the Throne.

I should like to point out as an aside, Mr. Speaker, that for us commoners who, of course, are only allowed to stand at the bar in the other place and hear the Speech from the Throne—and some of us are reasonably interested in the contents—it was very difficult to hear it, apart from Mr. Speaker himself and some of the staff, because of the constant noise that was going on. I hope that in the future when the Speech from the Throne is read those hon. members who wish to visit back and forth will refrain from doing so and will stay in their own rooms, or in the Chamber here, so that all this noise can be avoided. To my mind this is a discourtesy to the Governor General and, in this case, to Madam Léger.

It becomes more difficult with every throne speech that this government delivers for those of us in the opposition to respond. It is virtually impossible to respond in specific terms to a throne speech that is simply a mishmash of generalities and theories. I suppose that there is some purpose in this kind of approach to legislation, however. If and when any bills flow directly from the throne speech, no one will be able to tell whether or not they represent the views expressed in the speech. I do not imagine it makes any difference though, because the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has been trying for a very long time to walk down both sides of the street at the same time.

That would be a difficult thing to do, even in the best of times, but it must be especially trying at a time when the Prime Minister is looking over his shoulder to see which of his cabinet ministers is packing his bags. It seems to me that someone could set up a lucrative business ghost-writing letters of resignation for Liberal cabinet ministers. And, since it would not require any more training, that same person could even draw up some new Liberal economic policies. Just as in the case of the resignation letters, the dates could be typed in later.

I could learn to live with these zero content throne speeches and budgets—and in fact we have had to learn to live with them because that is all we have been getting over the past eight years—but I become pretty concerned when I hear the Prime Minister propose two conflicting solutions to a serious problem, usually within the space of a day, or an hour in some cases.

His answers to questions about the future of the anti-inflation program are a good case in point. On the one hand the Prime Minister butters up labour, management, and all the rest of us by saying that economic controls could very well be lifted well in advance of the target date of December of next year. Then, almost in the same breath, he says that we might have to get used to the idea of controls well beyond the cut-off date. The Prime Minister says that controls could become a fact of life into the distant future, and in fact he has stated that some form of control over our economy could become a permanent aspect of our society.

While the Prime Minister might think that that is the easy way out of a tight corner, to try to confuse us by showing both sides of the coin at the same time is simply ludicrous, Mr. Speaker. All you have to do to get the Prime Minister talking out of both sides of his mouth is to ask what we can expect in the way of post-control economic policy. What comes out is a real side-show, with the Prime Minister in the role of Edgar Bergen, and the Finance Minister (Mr. Macdonald) in the role of Charlie McCarthy. When I buy tickets to a side-show, I do so in the full knowledge that I am going to be entertained. But when I ask a serious question about a very serious matter affecting our country, I do not want to be entertained; I want to be informed. I want a straight answer. Anybody can answer a question by saying that it will either be this or it will be that.

When I think of the Prime Minister's dexterity in answering questions I am reminded of a story circulating at the present time about U.S. presidential candidate Jimmy Carter. Apparently Carter has acquired some of the Prime Minister's expertise in fielding questions. Carter likes to compare himself to past figures in U.S. history who have acquired fame. It seems that when Carter was a little boy his father came into the House one day and said, "Somebody has been snipping off the tops of the peanut plants, and I have to ask you—did you do it?" Carter replied, "I cannot tell a lie, father; maybe I did, and maybe I didn't".

Another example of the Prime Minister's tightrope act concerns the controversial bilingualism program, a program that was supposedly designed to unify the country but has instead become the most divisive policy ever inflicted on our country by any government in our history. The Prime Minister has been saying lately that the government is planning measures to modify or soften the impact of the bilingualism program. And yet, only two days after the throne speech, one of the most respected members of the cabinet resigned because the Prime Minister is committed to an entirely different approach to bilingualism.

The Prime Minister is committed to the formula whereby French is to be enshrined in the constitution on an equal if not superior footing with English, with Quebec having a veto over any future proposed amendments to the constitution affecting language or cultural rights. This would give Quebec effective control over the constitution in perpetuity, tying the hands of all elected governments into the future. We now know beyond a shadow of a doubt why the Prime Minister is so anxious to patriate our constitution that he would consider acting unilaterally to get it over here and under his control. I am deeply concerned about what he could do with the constitution, considering that he has a passive and acquiescent majority in this House.

I fear for the future of our country, Mr. Speaker. I have to say that the government's misrepresentation of the true purpose of the bilingualism program has been underscored by the resignation of the minister of national defence and by the statement that the minister gave to the press outlining his reasons for leaving the cabinet. The minister pointed out, among other things, that the government's bilingualism program has been a failure, and that it would be a serious mistake to entrench French language rights in the constitution and give Quebec a one province veto over future amendments to our constitution. My own view is that, as much as I would like to see the British North America Act here in Canada, I would rather leave it in Britain for a while longer than risk the dangers inherent in having it brought to Canada only to serve as the personal political instrument of the present Prime Minister and the premier of Quebec.

There is another example of double-talk in the throne speech, Mr. Speaker, that I would like to comment on. This is not the only example of double-talk in the speech; in fact this document is filled with them. I refer to the statement on immigration policy, to wit:

> You will be asked to consider amendments to the Immigration Act, designed to promote Canada's regional and urban development goals, promote family unity, achieve a balance between immigration levels and employment opportunities, and preserve Canada's reputation as an open, tolerant society which welcomes the energy and diversity of people from all parts of the world.

That is a very high sounding and impressive phrase, but I would call it mere puffery. There is no explanation in the speech as to what this particular phrase means, any more than there are explanations elsewhere in the speech for other such phrases. All we can assume from this is that a silly statement uttered some time ago by the former minister of manpower and immigration did indeed represent government policy.

The minister suggested that we might have to consider ways to compel immigrants to settle in rural and even remote areas of the country as a condition of being allowed to come to Canada. We are told that this would greatly reduce the flow of immigrants to our cities, help populate rural areas and even the less desirable areas of the northern regions. How the government could possibly connect this policy with the high-flown phrase "open and tolerant society" we will probably never know. Telling people where they can or cannot live is certainly not my idea of tolerance or openness. It brings to my mind the countries of eastern Europe, and it would be a very serious mistake to allow this government or any other Canadian government to have the power to decide where our people can or cannot live.

If that is to be a part of the future immigration policy of Canada, perhaps it is time for us to ask ourselves some serious questions about where we are going. If we give our government the power to force immigrants to live in certain specified towns, areas or regions, that same power can be brought to bear on Canadians already living in the country. If anybody doubts this, I ask him to consider the stupid and tragic situation in Montreal and other parts of Quebec with regard to the issue of education. The new law regarding what language the children of immigrant families in Quebec can be educated in reflects the thinking of the Communist countries of Europe, and I doubt very seriously that any of the thousands of Italian immigrants in Montreal write to their friends and relatives about the open and tolerant situation in Quebec.

That reference to family unity in the statement on immigration policy has me puzzled, but I suppose it was just thrown in to give the statement a nice homey touch.

Speaking of homey touches, let us consider the way the government tried to squirm out of the commitment it made to the provinces back in 1969 to share the cost of provincial medicare programs. I do not have to remind hon. members about what a shock it was when the Prime Minister caused a bill to be introduced in this House earlier this year which would allow the federal government to dishonour that commitment. In the federal-provincial first ministers' conference held in Ottawa in the first week of June of this year the Prime Minister said that this was the dawn of a new era in federal-provincial fiscal co-operation. What a farce! It was the dawn of a new era of federal government cop-outs.

In the throne speech we are told that extensive discussions between the federal government and the provinces have resulted in a new framework for the sharing of costs and for making social service programs more responsive. The plain fact is that the provinces have been left holding the bag, and the federal government is concentrating in areas in which it can extend federal control over programs which rightfully belong under provincial jurisdiction.

The public treasury is thus being used to extend federal control without at the same time resulting in an improvement in the level of services. I believe that the government plans to bludgeon the provinces into accepting a universal, federally controlled and financed medicare scheme, and possibly a universal hospitalization plan, and I have no doubt that that is the real significance of the small paragraph in the throne speech dealing with this matter.

There is a veiled reference to the intention of the government to seek extension of the Canada Pension Plan to involve housewives, but no clear commitment. I hope we will soon hear of some concrete steps being taken in this direction. I am a firm believer in the need for and the justice of extending old age security benefits to widows and spinsters from age 60, with a means test, and for including housewives in the Canada Pension Plan. In too many cases these people are forced to turn to welfare programs to see them through those difficult years until they qualify for the old age pension. This is downgrading, and it is poor economics.

By simply extending the universality of the old age pension plan, we would remove a load from the shoulders of municipal agencies whose primary function is to serve the short term needs of the disadvantaged. That function does not at the present time fall within the sphere of operations of other agencies.

Hon. members will note that I specifically mentioned spinsters and widows and not male persons. I did so because I feel that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) might be willing to go one step further, and I am quite sure that if legislation to this effect were brought in, it would certainly be welcomed by the great majority of Canadians.

As a small businessman of some years standing I have a particular interest in this type of economic activity. I do not require the services or the assistance of a government agency at this point as far as my own business is concerned because, when I last checked, it was being operated reasonably well. Some people tell me that it is being operated even better than when I operated it. It is operated by my two sons, and it is quite a prosperous business. However, there are thousands of small businesses in Canada today which could do with some assistance by way of low or fixed interest loans, preferably from a government agency or a government sponsored private lending institution.

As other hon. members have said about this particular subject, small businesses in Canada are our largest single employer, and if we are going to be really serious about tackling the unemployment problem in a meaningful way then we have to tie our efforts in with Manpower. I am one of those who at times has taken great exception to the unemployment insurance rip-offs in the past, and I still keep a sharp eye on the unemployment figures and also UIC payouts. However, I firmly believe that the average Canadian would rather work than collect UIC benefits, and since it is the government which must find jobs for these people I suggest we start looking in the right direction, and the sooner the better.

We can start by easing the pressure on those who are already employing people. We are burdening small and medium size businesses with excessive paper work and regulations. The additional paper work inflicted on businesses by the Anti-Inflation Board has been the straw which broke the camel's back in many cases. That is not only poor economy; it is also stupidity. Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m. this day.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, prior to six o'clock I was pleading the case for the small businessmen across Canada and pointing out how necessary it is that we give serious consideration to providing every kind of help, financial and in other ways, to this very important part of our economy.

In the United States assistance to small businessmen is much superior to what we offer in Canada. The essence of the Canadian economic system of private enterprise is free competition. Only through full and free competition can free markets, free entry into business, and opportunities for the expression of growth and personal initiative and individual judgment be assured. The preservation and expansion of such competition is basic not only to the economic well-being but to the security of this nation. Such security and well-being cannot be realized unless the actual and potential capacity of small business is encouraged and developed. It is the declared policy of this party that the government should aid, counsel, and protect in so far as is possible, the interests of small business concerns in order to preserve free and competitive enterprise.

We should have an act in many ways following the American small business act which is utilized to assist in the establishment, preservation, and strengthening of small business concerns. This would improve the managerial skills employed in such enterprises, with special attention given to small business concerns located in all rural areas where there are high numbers of unemployed or people on low incomes, or to concerns which are owned by low income individuals. Private as well as public managerial skills and resources should be mobilized in order to reach these objectives.

In Canada at the present time we have the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, the federal Business Development Bank, and the General Assistance Adjustment Board under the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. One plan which supplies working capital for small business is the general assistance plan which advances loans. This is restricted to manufacturers who have been threatened by foreign imports, however.

I feel we should aid small businessmen not only to get money for equipment so that they can expand but to obtain working capital. They should be allowed an opportunity to get off the ground, that is, they should not have to pay back the principle or interest for the first couple of years so that they may generate some cash flow.

The interest charged the businessman should be 1 per cent over prime for the bank and 1 per cent for the agency which guarantees the loan. At the present time the maximum loan is $25,000. This is a joke, Mr. Speaker. In the United States the maximum is $100,000. With the way costs are today it might be feasible to go higher than this, and in certain cases as high as $300,000. In the Small Businesses Loans Act, 1970 revised statutes, chapter 10 sets the limits on the total assets of a borrower at about $50,000, which is ridiculous.

The relevant act in the United States provides much needed and excellent services for the borrower such as managerial training and feasibility studies. Feasibility and market studies enable a businessman to know where he can sell his product and also whether it is a viable enterprise. He is also given information which will probably enable him to avoid possible pitfalls and errors of which he may not be aware. The United States government has provided a fund of $6 billion for this project for the small businessman.

Our chartered banks should be induced to provide more risk capital for small businesses, say up to $500,000. Banks should be willing to accept security on a much lower basis, say one to three, rather than as in some cases at present, two to one in their favour. Expansion of our Canadian banking system will not improve until banks are influenced to make the types of loans which are available in the United States.

I have had many letters, Mr. Speaker, as I am sure have many of my colleagues, from frustrated businessmen who want to know how they can qualify for the so-called small business loan at a preferred rate of interest. I have a file here and I could read off the names of businessmen who want to expand and are unable to do so. I have figures provided by the Minister of Finance which show that his department has made loans under the Small Businesses Loans Act to the end of June this year of $5 million. That may seem like a great deal of money, Mr. Speaker, but it probably means no more than 200 or 250 loans. Spread across Canada, that is not very much.

In the past couple of weeks I have had requests from businessmen who want to expand their operations. They qualify for loans, having the proper assets and so on. They were not able to get these loans at the preferred rate. The reason they were given was that their credit rating was too good. The bank stated that these loans were for those whose credit was not as good. I am sure the bank would not even recommend a loan to a businessman or prospective businessman if there was not a possibility of it being repaid.

These people were finally able to negotiate with the banks in their home towns, but at a higher rate. I believe the so-called small business loan interest rate is 10½ per cent. One man was able to negotiate a loan at 11½ per cent, and another at 12 per cent.

I wrote to the Minister of Finance last week as well as to the Minister of State (Small Business) (Mr. Marchand) asking what the new plan will be and whether the government is going to do more than pay lip service with regard to providing money to small businessmen at the preferred rate.

The other night I saw a television report on the new minister responsible for small business visiting in Russia. I presume he will be contacting many small independent capital businessmen there to find out how they proceed. However, if he wants to talk to the most progressive of those, he will have to go to Siberia.

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) wishes to ask the hon. member who has the floor a question. This can only be done with consent.

[Mr. Darling.]

Mr. Darling: When I am finished, Mr. Speaker.

More than 50 per cent of the salary and wage earners in Canada are employed by small businesses. If all small businesses in Canada closed their doors at the same time, the economy would come to a standstill. Large corporations and their workers are protected from the vagaries of market conditions, bureaucratic harassment, cash supply, and other matters. The unionized workers are protected by their unions, and by our labour laws. The large corporations have batteries of lawyers to run interference for them, but not so the small businessman and his workers.

Big business has assets and productive capacity to use as collateral for loans. Small businesses very often have to borrow on faith, and there is never enough of this faith to go around. In the United States they have the small business administration to make loans to small businesses, and also to advise and train people in small business or who want to start up a small business. We need something like that in Canada. There is too much disparity between lending institutions, and between regions, with respect to the availability of small businesses to obtain loans for operating expenses, and to finance expansion.

Without a set government program of loan assistance or guarantee, lending institutions in Canada would rather lend large sums of capital to large corporations, against secure collateral, than to lend small sums to small businesses which often cannot offer blue ribbon collateral. In my view we must recognize that there is another kind of blue ribbon collateral; the initiative, resourcefulness, and determination of the small business entrepreneur in Canada. If we support the people who are presently providing the largest percentage of jobs in our country today, then they will be able to create still more jobs. This would be better than trying to solve the problem by paying out still more unemployment insurance, grants, welfare, and all the other government stop gap measures.

A large percentage of the chronically unemployed in Canada do not have the specialized skills and talents required by most of the large corporations. Small businesses do not require these specialized skills and rare technical talents for the most part. The only place where these unskilled unemployed can be absorbed is in small business, and that can only happen if the small business community is healthy and can grow.

Our leader spoke last Thursday in Winnipeg to a gathering of approximately 1,200 people, outlining some of the things this party will do after he is elected Prime Minister in 1978. He stated, and I quote:

> —I place considerable emphasis on the role of small and medium-sized entrepreneurs. We all know the Liberal and socialist bias toward bigness and bureaucracy. I do not share that bias.
> It is worth noting, too, that economies such as the United States, Japan and West Germany—all of which have achieved productivity performances as good or better than our own in recent years—all have a larger small business component within their economy than we have.

Each of these countries have governments with a genuine commitment to the small business sector and who support that commitment with concrete and positive policies . . . Tax policies that encourage—not discourage—the development of small family or employee-owned businesses and which permit such businesses to be passed along to new generations without prohibitive tax penalties . . .

On the available evidence at least, there is no indication that the Trudeau government has given even serious study to these successful policies of other countries. Its preference here—as in so many other areas—is for the quick and the cosmetic . . . name a Minister of State and hope that no one watches long enough to see whether he actually does anything.

I think my time is up, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed an honour to join those who have spoken before me in this debate to express my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. I also wish to pay my respects to the memory of the hon. member for Louis-Hebert, an Assistant Deputy Speaker, for her very fine and courageous contribution to this House. It will be remembered for many years to come.

This debate has almost come to an end. I listened closely to the remarks of the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling). I commend him for his attention to and thorough work on the policies relating to small business. I wish he would have done the same with regard to the whole question of national unity and bilingualism. If he had, he would not have made the remarks he did before the dinner recess.

As I understood the hon. member this afternoon, he expressed the hope that the constitution would not be patriated to Canada if the language rights of English speaking Canadians would not be protected, as indicated in a newspaper article published last week in Montreal. He insinuated that it would be the intention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to patriate a constitution that could endanger these language rights. That was a very unfortunate statement by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka. He would not have made that remark if he had read the letter which the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) sent to the editor of the Gazette that same day in which he stated, in essence, that it was erroneous to suggest that under Article 137 of the BNA Act English language rights could be abolished by a single act of the National Assembly of Quebec once the proclamation had been effected, and that Article 30 of the draft proclamation was most explicit concerning language rights. The letter went on to say, and I quote:

Article 30 of the draft proclamation is most explicit concerning language rights currently existing in the BNA Act:

"English and French are the official languages of Canada, but no provision in this Part shall derogate from any right, privilege or obligation existing under any other provision of the Constitution".

I shall quote one further paragraph from the letter:

"The provisions of the draft proclamation respecting English and French language rights were designed to supplement existing constitutional rights at the federal level and not to replace, abrogate or lessen existing rights in the British North America Act at the time of patriation."

How can a credible opposition claim on a Sunday, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has done in the course of a CTV interview, that the country should calm down over the bilingualism issue, when on Monday a member of his own party makes an irresponsible statement of the kind to which I have referred? How can people have confidence in an opposition which behaves in such a way? This is a real sham but, as I say, I am sure the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka would not have made the statement he made earlier if he had read, or had an opportunity to read, this letter from the Acting Prime Minister. I would hope that when he returns to his riding, when he goes back to Ontario—

An hon. Member: He is in Ontario now.

Mr. Caccia: —when he talks to people in his part of the province he will urge the government of Ontario to adopt bilingualism as New Brunswick has done, that he will become a proponent of a policy designed to secure national unity, to demonstrate that French Quebec made a mistake in moving toward unilingualism with Bill 22. That is the attitude I hope the hon. member will adopt for the sake of the nation.

Mr. Darling: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): You cannot reply. You have had your say.

Some hon. Members: Nonsense!

Mr. Darling: The hon. member is taking me to task. I would point out to him that I am not against bilingualism. I have never stated that I am. For the benefit of the hon. member for Davenport Mr. Caccia let me say I have taken French lessons—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This is debate rather than a point of order; at the same time the interruption did give an opportunity to the hon. member to make his position clear.

Mr. Caccia: It is good to hear that the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka is in favour of bilingualism. He could demonstrate this attitude in practice by refraining from insinuating that the Prime Minister wants to patriate the constitution with the thought in mind of reducing the language rights of the Anglophone community across Canada. I wish the hon. member well with his immersion courses.

An hon. Member: That is more than you have going for you.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): No, he can speak French fluently—Italian, French and English.

Mr. Caccia: The Speech from the Throne is rich with exciting goals. It speaks of national unity, the subject which has been engaging much of our attention today. It deals with employment. It deals with labour management relations. It deals with collective bargaining information centres. It brings up the question of industrial safety and the establishment of health centres. It deals with the question of testing new methods of improving working conditions. It has to do with promoting competition in the market place, with placing emphasis on research and development in connection with renewable energy sources, and with means of improving the efficiency of energy use at home and at work. It speaks of a new social services act to help the aged, the children and the handicapped. It has thoughts on promoting partially subsidized day-care through a system of fees relating to income. It envisages improvements to the Canada Pension Plan, including the indexing of family allowances. It speaks of setting a goal of one million new homes over the next four years.

Other topics in the Speech include the amplification of Canada's role in the world in connection with shaping a new international economic order, for example, changes in the Law of the Sea, environmental protection, human settlements, food production, population growth, the control of nuclear armaments, and economic development. These are the issues of our time, Mr. Speaker, and these issues are dealt with in the rather fine document we are considering, perhaps one of the best ever produced by a Liberal government within our memory.

Mr. Epp: That is quite likely.

Mr. Caccia: I wish the opposition would deal with some of these issues and put forward alternative approaches which might be taken with respect to them.

I shall devote the limited time remaining to me to only one or two of these topics. I shall deal, first, with the subject of renewable sources of energy because it seems to me that this is a matter of particular interest to Canadians today. At present, far too heavy an emphasis is being laid on research and development on the nuclear side, as well as on the development of non-renewable sources of energy as we have known them so far.

Far too little of the total budget—I believe less than 1.5 per cent—is devoted in the field of energy to renewable resources such as solar, wind and tidal power. The present approach of cutting up the research and development pie has to be changed. I was most impressed to learn last May that the U.S. Senate had appropriated an amount of well over $300 million to be expended on renewable resource research and development. This is not ten times—which is usually the ratio between performances south of the border and our own—what we allocate to this kind of research and development, but is well over 100 times what we spend, if the reports in the newspapers are correct.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that our present approach to research and development is too timid and too one-sided. We are endeavouring to discover how we can economically store energy in one medium alone—in water. Out of all the projects I have seen or heard about throughout the country, nine out of ten of our demonstration projects try to find out whether and at what costs we can store solar energy in water. Surely there are other alternatives which need to be tested and demonstrated. This is one of the suggestions I should like to put forward in relation to the trend of our present research.

There is another aspect in the field of renewable sources of energy which is very significant to our over-all energy conservation policy, that is, whenever it is planned to introduce systems of heating by means of power from the wind, the sun, or other such sources, we become very conscious of the need for conservation principles—anything which will reduce heat losses in the structure to be built. The two processes, solar heating and conservation, are closely related.

In regard to energy conservation and thrift in the consumption of today's energy resources, I find it rather unfortunate that there has been a lack of support on the part of hydro companies in Canada for the concept. Ottawa has been urging Canadians and other levels of government to reduce their consumption of energy. This has been done in a variety of ways and I hope that we have given a good example. Nevertheless it is rather discouraging to find hydro utilities today, from Yellowknife to Halifax and Vancouver, charging rates per kilowatt hour which, instead of rewarding thrift and saving of energy on the part of the consumer, result in the consumer paying a lower per kilowatt hour if he consumes larger quantities of energy rather than smaller quantities. In other words, there is no incentive toward lesser consumption on the part of the consumer. There is a flat rate up to a certain ceiling, which varies from area to area, and then above that ceiling, as consumption increases, the rate declines. If hon. members are interested in a detailed breakdown of rates in major centres I have this background information available.

I suggest that uniform electricity rates, something we do not have now in any given area, would reward the careful consumer and provide an incentive to save which is much greater and more significant in the eyes of the average consumer than the sort of rather costly advertisements that are sometimes published in newspapers by public utilities like Ontario Hydro. On October 18 they placed an advertisement in the Globe and Mail which attracted my attention and has prompted these remarks on my part.

Returning to solar energy, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make the following observation. We need to develop a technology in the field of solar energy that is suited to the Canadian climate. In this way we will create new jobs and a new industry, not only for Canada but eventually for developing countries that are suffering serious trade deficits because they have to import oil. This would benefit their technology and allow them to capture the energy stored in the sun, energy that is available free of charge, which is non-polluting and renewable. In this way they would be able to reduce their dependence on imported oil and thus achieve more readily a healthier economy than they have at the present time.

I am told that in the United States large companies like Corning, Phillips, Owen-Illinois, to mention just a few, are planning to open up markets worth millions of dollars, creating new jobs and developing a new industry in this field, in the hope that they may capture one day not only their own market but foreign markets as well.

It is true that in the U.S. climatic conditions are more advantageous than ours, but there is really no excuse, particularly on our prairies where there is an extensive number of hours of radiation through the year, for us not to develop technology in this field. In this regard I was very impressed to observe on the roof of the legislature in Winnipeg last month a set-up made possible by the co-operation between the federal and provincial governments, whereby solar collectors manufactured by companies in different parts of the world will be tested during the next 12 months or so, and the results of these tests, which are designed to determine the quality of this equipment, be made available to the public.

I also suggest that we need tax credits. Canadians who change their heating systems in their homes, not only by improving insulation—on which we have already removed sales tax—but by making use of wind power and solar energy, should be rewarded. This would apply to those who renovate existing homes or build new homes. Use of these energy sources is, in the end, to the benefit of everyone.

We need a special program by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to encourage manufacturers in Canada to enter this field and compete in developing an industry, rather than our becoming importers of products developed by other countries such as Holland, which I understand is very much interested in this field, and by the United States.

Responsibility for solar energy is presently dispersed among three different departments, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Ministry of Science and Technology and the National Research Council. We need to bring these responsibilities under one minister. I am glad to see the Minister of Science and Technology (Mr. Faulkner) turn round and look in my direction as if to indicate that this makes some sense, in theory at least, to him.

I should like to close this subject by referring to the Ark which was inaugurated a few weeks ago by the Prime Minister in Prince Edward Island. This is an experiment in the utilization of solar energy and it carries the following inscription:

> The Ark—an early exploration in weaving together the sun, winds, biology and architecture on behalf of humanity.

I think it appropriate to put that quotation on record because it contains a statement of policy and also poetry. It seems to me that in solar energy we can bring together once again hope, policies, and poetry for the good of mankind. We have arrived at the point in our development where we do have the technology to harness solar power which is available to us daily, as we are all aware.

In the remaining time I should like to move on to another subject, namely, the statement on employment policies contained in the Speech from the Throne. I should like to refer to the very fine intervention made by the minister the other day. I should like to congratulate him on the speech he made because quite clearly it is a first step in the right direction. It shows the intention of the government to begin utilizing better our economic resources, namely, funds available through unemployment insurance, plus those available through general taxation, in an innovative manner. First, we would need to base our actions on the experience of preceding years and I hope his announcement will be regarded as the first step towards an employment strategy.

It will be a strategy when it contains certain elements of flexibility which the policy does not yet seem to contain. We can speak of a strategy when there is flexibility in our approach to institutional training. At present our hands are tied in relation to the provinces when it comes to the matter of spending money for the training of the unemployed. Our hands are tied by long-range agreements which do not permit us in periods of high unemployment to change the direction of our spending; we cannot decide that, instead of having institutional training programs, we could better serve Canadians with direct job creation. We do not have this flexibility now. Therefore I urge the minister to look at the nature of these long-range agreements with the provinces, and see how we can regain that flexibility which will enable us to have funds available when they are needed for direct job creation. I am speaking of times when the government concludes that direct job creation is a better answer for the reduction of unemployment. At present such flexibility is not available.

In order to have a strategy we must overcome our hang up, or the idea that we have to trade off inflation against unemployment. In the past decade we thought that we could have either high unemployment or high inflation, but not the two together. In the 1970's we have learned that both can exist together at the same. We can have high inflation, plus high unemployment; yet we still seem to think that if we reduce unemployment we may increase inflation. I do not subscribe to that economic theory, Mr. Speaker. I think we can reduce unemployment if we embark on proper policies and programs, particularly those related to direct job creation, without affecting the rate of inflation.

In order to have a strategy we need to know the effect of current programs such as the Community Employment Strategy. We must know the effect of other current training programs. What is the over-all picture? How do specific and specialized measures fit into the over-all scheme?

Our approach must be much bolder to unemployment insurance utilization and job creation. The minister mentioned this aspect the other night in his speech. I am glad. But it seems to me that we have reached the point at which the concept underlying the aims of the unemployment insurance fund needs to be changed.

I suggest that in Canada we need a system of employment insurance; second, we need unemployment insurance, as a position on which to fall back. I am sure Canadians would be willing to pay premiums to create jobs for unemployed Canadians. That concept is not far removed from that mentioned by the then Minister of Manpower and Immigration in 1974 when he addressed the Vancouver Board of Trade.

Having mentioned government policies in the field of manpower and employment, he said, if I remember correctly, that "if we can have unemployment insurance in Canada, why not employment insurance?" I think those were the words of the then minister.

We also need in connection with a strategy of manpower and employment a specific and clear statement relating to those who find it difficult to remain in the labour force, namely, older workers, and injured workers. I mention in particular older workers because they feel their skills are becoming obsolete, or because their waning strength does not allow them to work as vigorously as they did in preceding decades, making it necessary for them to look for lighter jobs. We must be concerned about them. We must be concerned about the injured, whose numbers are increasing in industrial centres across this country. In times like ours they find it particularly difficult to re-enter the work force. It is hard for them to become engaged in meaningful activity, to be gainfully employed; yet they need employment, for the sake of their families, and for their own sakes.

Since my time is running out I will conclude by saying a few words about the performance of the Anti-Inflation Board set up by our government. Canadians perceive clearly that measures implemented by the Anti-Inflation Baord and the administrator have affected wage and salary settlements. This much almost everybody in the country knows. But we have failed to convey the message that the performance of the Anti-Inflation Board is exceedingly fine in relation to profits, dividends, excessive revenue and, in some cases, prices. I urge the government to make certain that in coming months the Anti-Inflation Board will make known to all Canadians its fine performance in relation to that side of controls.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, in the closing minutes of the throne speech debate I wish to draw the attention of the House to some of the problems facing Canada, problems which are the direct result of the government's lack of leadership and lack of sound policies.

The Speech from the Throne reminded me of the 1974 election campaign. In that campaign the Liberals made promises left and right; after they were elected with a majority government they did not fulfil those promises. We are seeing that process repeated. This evening I shall criticize the government and recite a litany of government errors and inaction. Then I shall try, through constructive criticism, to suggest alternative policies which I and my party think will put Canada back on the road to a healthy economy in which most are employed and enjoy a decent standard of living.

My first point concerns the infamous anti-inflation program which the Liberal government imposed on the people of Canada. We in the New Democratic Party have been persistent and consistent critics of this program, not because we are against controls, not because we do not want to see inflation limited in this country, but from the simple point of view that we think this program is unfair and unworkable. I fail to be convinced by the arguments of my Liberal colleagues opposite that the situation in 1975 was different from the situation in 1974, and therefore was the reason why the government did an about-face and implemented controls to which it was so violently opposed less than a year ago.

We heard from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and from his cabinet colleagues that inflation was a world-wide phenomenon which could not be controlled merely by policies taken in Canada, and that no matter what policy this government followed it would not affect the prices of imported goods. In addition they said that if wage and price controls were imposed they would come down harder on the worker and that there would be inequities in the program, that it would create a bureaucratic nightmare, and that it would not only disenchant labour but would cause skepticism in the business community.

I fail to see that that situation has changed. In fact what the Liberals said against controls in 1974 is just as valid today in 1976. I think the Liberal members of parliament, many of whom were elected on the coat tails of the Prime Minister in 1968 and are currently down in the mouth because of his unpopularity, should look not just to their leader and point the finger of blame, but should look at themselves and at the kind of statements and promises they made to the Canadian electorate in 1974, and realize that now the chickens are coming home to roost. They should realize that they could not deceive the public in 1974 and expect to get away with that without repercussions.

There is a lack of trust in politicians by the people of Canada and much of that lies squarely on the shoulders of the Liberal party and the way they deceived the electorate by campaigning against controls in 1974 and imposing them in 1975. At least the Conservatives are consistent. It is the Liberals who do an about-face and try to get away with it. I think the Canadian electorate in 1978 will pass judgment on that kind of political manipulation.

The anti-inflation program certainly has been effective in controlling wages. The unorganized find that their wages have been limited to an average of 7 per cent. We were told of course that this program was designed primarily to help the unorganized, those people not in unions, fight the ravages of inflation. Yet they have gained the least in terms of wage settlements. Organized labour has been able to obtain average wage settlements of about 11 per cent. The inequity is that they have not been based necessarily on the productivity or profitability of the particular industry in which workers find themselves. However, their wages are now arbitrarily set by the Anti-Inflation Board, or, more frequently, rolled back in an arbitrary manner by the administrator. I know my Liberal colleagues like to tell us that already they have controlled wages, or that they have kept prices rising at a slower rate than before the program was established. That of course is based on the assumption that wages are the primary cause of inflation.

In most industries today the wage component, especially in the manufacturing area, is somewhere around 10 per cent of the total operating cost, so one cannot automatically make the equation that because wages go up prices will spiral. When one looks at the Consumer price index one finds it has been increasing at a significant rate, especially when one takes out the food component which of course the anti-inflation program does not control.

I shall not bore the House with the figures but the cost of housing, energy, and other things is rising at a rate of 10 per cent or better. If there has been a moderation in the consumer price index I am prepared to substantiate that it is not basically because of the anti-inflation program but because of changes in the world economy and market conditions especially as they relate to food.

We also claim that the program is unfair. The latest report of the Anti-Inflation Board gives a further example. We were told that under the program there could be an increase of 8 per cent in the first year, 6 per cent in the second year, 4 per cent in the third year, 2 per cent for productivity, and a 2 per cent adjustment for catch-up, with a dollar limit of $2,400 per year.

The figures have come in with respect to professional incomes. We find that a great percentage of them are double the $2,400 limit. The point made by the opposition is that of course if a doctor, lawyer, or engineer sees more clients or works overtime he will be compensated. However, their compensation in proportion to the kind of compensation a worker can get for working overtime is away out of line.

We have also found from the Anti-Inflation Board report that about 40 odd per cent of the professional firms have not as of now reported to the board. Therefore one is even more suspicious of the loopholes which exist. I would challenge any supporter of the anti-inflation program to come to my riding and explain it to a group of very dissatisfied workers, mostly retired or semi-retired gentlemen in their fifties or sixties, known as the commissionaires, the men who hand out parking tickets. They had a magnificent wage increase of from $3.90 to $3.95 an hour.

Mr. McKenzie: I would like to be on the record, Mr. Speaker, as accepting the challenge.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of my constituents I would point out that the member who is accepting my challenge and defending the program is a Conservative. He believes this program is fair.

As I was saying before my challenge was accepted, these commissionaires negotiated a wage increase of from $3.90 to $3.95 an hour. The Anti-Inflation Board considered that their wage increase was excessive and rolled it back. Then the employer also changed their hours of operation and denied them the amount of overtime they could have in any one month.

The sum total of these two decisions by AIB and the employer is that these gentlemen are now earning less than they did when they entered the negotiations! These are the kind of people who fall victim to this very unfair program.

The hon. member can come into my riding and try to explain to the paper workers who were on strike for six months the rationale behind the Anti-Inflation Board's decision on the kind of roll backs that were applied. I do not think he would have much success in convincing them of the justice of this program.

What we are saying is that this anti-inflation program as it is designed is not fair and, if there is success at moderating inflation, it is only marginal and basically the result of conditions over which the government does not have control. The program should come to an early end.

The other great problem facing Canadians, and where the government has again failed so miserably, is unemployment. I was speaking this afternoon to a group of West German trade unionists who are visiting this country. They asked me about the employment situation in Canada and were shocked to hear that we had an unemployment rate of 7 per cent, or over some 700,000 unemployed, whereas in most modern European countries an unemployment rate of 1 per cent to 4 per cent is considered horrendous. We lived with high unemployment in this country for too long, to the point where I believe governments and the general public are accepting it as the natural condition in Canada. In my party we reject that complacency. We argue that not only does unemployment degrade the man who cannot find work, not only does it bring hardship to his family and demoralizes both his family and himself, but in terms of crude economic costs to our economy it cannot be tolerated year after year.

When we tolerate that kind of unemployment at levels of 7 per cent, it means that the Canadian economy is losing each year some $7 billion in lost productivity. Add to that $1 billion in federal tax money to supplement the unemployment insurance program, and we can see the tremendous cost of unemployment to our economy. Rather than recognize this as the primary problem, the government continues its attack against inflation. Meanwhile the unemployment figures continue to mount and our economy continues to suffer in the way I have described.

We are growing rather tired in this party of the kind of band-aid approach the government takes toward unemployment. At the urging of many Conservatives and right-wing editorial commentators the government got on the bandwagon of cut-backs in government spending. Of course where did it begin cut-backs but in the meagre programs which exist to aid the unemployed? The Opportunities for Youth Program was scuttled, the Local Initiatives Program budget was cut in half, and people who were already in desperate straits took little solace from the fact that they could even get temporary employment through these programs.

Now with great fanfare the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) unveils a great new employment strategy. What it turns out to be is just renaming the band-aid programs we had in the past, such as OFY and LIP, and putting them together on a year round employment basis. But in light of the $7 billion cost of unemployment to our economy, in light of the human tragedy to the 700,000 unemployed, do we see great new sums of money put into the employment program? Not on your life. All they do is take the money that was saved by the cut-backs to the original programs and shove it into this new program. So we are no farther ahead; it is just a lot of fancy footwork which this government is so used to performing. It is puffery instead of substance, and we will continue to have high unemployment in this country as long as we have that kind of half-hearted approach to this very serious problem.

If we are to be serious about employment and getting people back to work, then we have to be courageous enough to infuse the massive amounts of money that are needed on a short-term basis to recoup this long-term financial loss, in terms of lost productivity, in terms of taxes collected from workers who are working rather than being handed out payments via unemployment insurance and welfare. If we are serious about getting Canadians back to work, then the government should make a commitment and live by it. Just as it made a commitment to reduce inflation to 8 per cent, 6 per cent, and 4 per cent over the next three years, likewise let us see a commitment to reduce unemployment by a certain percentage over the next three years.

Let us see some kind of massive employment program in co-operation with the provinces in terms of public works, in co-operation with the municipalities which have projects which they want done but cannot find the money to do. Let us see massive intervention in the economy in the way that capital is allocated, in the way that industry plans its expansion. Let us see some government involvement in terms of Crown corporations where private industry is unwilling to expand or invest.

What I am saying is that, if we continue in the traditional way, the unemployment problem will get worse and we as a country cannot stand indefinitely the kind of financial loss this means, nor the loss in terms of human dignity and well-being. Those are some positive suggestions I can make. Time limits me from making others.

Now I would like to turn my attention to another area in which I find the government lacks policies. It has to do with matters concerning environmental and industrial health. On the issue of environmental health I know there is a jurisdictional problem between the federal government and the provinces. However, there should not be a hesitancy on the part of the government to show some leadership and to set some examples in terms of federal legislation and activity to protect the environment.

There are two concerns to which I would like to address myself this evening and over which the government has direct control. One concern has to do with native people, and the other is the issue of uranium and the problems of radiation pollution. First, on the issue of native people, there is a growing problem of mercury pollution among native people in northwestern Ontario and also in northern Quebec. This pollution has already destroyed the economic viability of two reserves in northern Ontario, Grassy Narrows and White Dog, which I had the privilege of visiting in September. Mercury pollution from the Reed Pulp and Paper Company polluted the English-Wabigoon river system to the point where all commercial fishing had to be banned.

Then of course fishing, which was the livelihood of the native people of that area, was no longer possible, and those people were reduced to receiving welfare and to receiving handouts of frozen fish from the provincial government. The provincial government did not take action against the polluter, Reed Paper Company. The provincial government dragged its feet in terms of meeting the request of the native people that sports fishing in the area also be banned. Many natives were still acting as guides to sports fishermen, eating polluted fish and showing symptoms of mercury poisoning. No action was taken.

Then, to the amazement of all Canadians, the province of Ontario last summer met with the federal government, and both governments came up with a proposal to solve the mercury pollution problem in the English-Wabigoon river system. The proposal was to create a national park. This was without consulting the Indians to see whether this was what they desired. This was without any attempt by the federal government to use the clean water legislation already on the books, to take action, to try to restore the environment of the area and compensate the people involved.

No, they decided that they would establish a national park along that river system where the water is polluted. Perhaps they will call it "Mercury Pollution National Park". I do not know how it could be successful or who would want to go there, but the real problem is that, once a park is established, hunting will not be allowed, commercial fishing will not be allowed, nor the gathering of wild rice for commercial sale, which was a mainstay of the people there. Instead they will be limited to a life of perpetual destitution because there will be no more than a handful of jobs as park personnel. Meanwhile the problems of the people there will not have been solved. That is the kind of cynical and unrealistic thinking and action which take place when the government becomes serious about environmental cleanup and the health of native people.

Another example is the situation at Elliot Lake, where there is a very large uranium mine. Uranium comes under the jurisdiction of the federal government, and in particular, the Atomic Energy Control Board. There has been negligence on the part of the government and that board in supervising the disposal of radioactive waste. We have seen that at Port Hope, and it now looks as though the problem will be of even greater magnitude at Elliot Lake, yet there has been no ongoing survey of the situation. There have been no public hearings and no public releases of the information already gathered, but rather an attempt to cover up and keep the people in darkness regarding the dangers of radiation pollution in that area.

In addition to that, of course, is the problem the miners face. Working in the mines, they face the possibility of lung cancer and silicosis. Here again there is a lack of leadership on the

There is some concern that hyperactive children may have emotional disorders as adults. Hyperactive children may be at high risk for teenage alcohol and other drug abuse. The characteristics of these children, including, impulsivity, short attention span, attention seeking behaviour, low tolerance to frustration in the face of social and educational difficulties suggest that this group may become abusers of alcohol and other drugs in their teenage years. One study suggests that there may be a relationship between hyperactivity and subsequent alcoholism. A higher incidence of alcoholism and hyperactivity amongst the biological parents than the adopting parents of adopted hyperactive children was found in this study. In addition it was observed that hyperactives have a high incidence of hyperactivity and alcoholism amongst their relatives.

With respect to other types of anti-social behaviour, there are reports of cases of explosive personality characterized by aggressiveness with a "hair-trigger" temper. In these cases the explosive personality was preceded by hyperactivity in childhood.

While there are few follow-up studies of hyperactive children, most of the evidence indicates that there is a relatively poor outcome for these children. There is usually a high incidence of anti-social behaviour and contact with police, and many have become institutionalized as delinquents or become psychotic. Follow-up studies suffer from lack of comparison groups, small samples and inadequate analysis of behavioural pathology. The incidence of alcohol, and drug abuse in particular, has not yet been examined in detail. The study being supported by the Department of National Health and Welfare will address itself to some of these concerns.

Hypersensitivity reactions, commonly known as allergies, to foods have been described in the medical literature for centuries. In fact hypersensitivity reactions have been observed in humans following exposure to pollens, dust, certain chemicals and, in a few isolated cases, to some artificial food colours and additives.

Food allergies of various types affect 30 to 40 per cent of the human population while milk allergy in children alone range between 10 and 20 per cent. Individuals hypersensitive to foods will have symptoms ranging from rash to anaphylactic shock and even death. A person hypersensitive to milk, for example, may upon ingestion of milk or after eating milk-containing foods, develop nasal stuffiness, hives, eczema, migraine headache, nausea, diarrhoea, or even a serious attack of asthma.

The range of foods to which people can be allergic is almost limitless. The most common causes of food allergy are milk, grains—especially wheat—eggs, fish, shellfish, fruit—especially strawberries—chocolate, nuts. In addition to natural foods, food additives such as tartrazine, parabens, vegetable oils, protein additives, caffeine, cyclamates, flavors, etc., have been implicated in allergic reactions. The symptoms elicited vary from chronic and generalized urticaria, anaphylactic type of reactions, contact dermatitis, hives, itching and edema.

This belief in the relationship of food additives and hyperactivity has evolved primarily as a result of clinical studies conducted by Dr. Benjamin Feingold, a San Francisco physician. He recorded a marked clinical improvement in 50 per cent of hyperactive children treated with his "salicylate free diet" (also called the K-P diet). This treatment permitted a discontinuation of all drug therapy and resulted in a substantial improvement in scholastic achievement in these children. The diet given to the children contained no food additives or foods such as tomatoes, potatoes, cucumbers, squash, jams, nuts and virtually all fresh fruits, that naturally contain salicylates.

These initial clinical studies, as Dr. Feingold agrees, were empirical in nature, and although beneficial effects were observed it is not possible to draw definitive conclusions from these data. Strict adherence to these diets necessitated a dramatic modification in family lifestyle to accommodate the child's needs. Therefore, it is unclear whether the improvement in the children was due to the diet or to the additional care given the children in these particular circumstances. In addition the severely restrictive diet has been criticized by many nutritionists as being nutritionally inadequate. It is worth pointing out that in Canada the addition of food colours to baby foods is specifically prohibited under the Food and Drugs Act.

Other investigators have designed projects with the purpose of determining whether a relationship exists between food additives and hyperactivity. In a pilot study, conducted by Dr. Esther Wender of the College of Medicine at Utah, six of eleven children demonstrated an initial behavioral improvement. However, the report states that of the responders, five out of six showed a return to pre-diet behaviour over the challenge period even though diet was continued. Conclusions from this particular study spring mostly from impressionistic observations and do not lend themselves to statistical analysis.

An important preliminary attempt to investigate the hypothesis is the study designed by Connor of the Pittsburg School of Medicine. This study involved 15 children diagnosed in accordance with the American Psychiatric Association's definition of hyperkinetic reaction of childhood.

In this study statistically significant difference was found between the K-P diet and baseline measures on both parent and teacher ratings, as well as between the special diet and the control diet based on teacher ratings, but no significant difference between the special diet and the control diet based on parent ratings.

Dr. Connor concludes that "the special diet may reduce hyperkinetic symptoms" but warns that:

—it would be hazardous at this point to draw too many conclusions from this experiment, given the small size of the sample and the lack of complete consistency in the results. Any thoughtful observer will understand that a major intervention into dietary habits of a family will produce behavioral effects, regardless of the specific diets, a phenomenon well understood in the management of such conditions as juvenile diabetes. The results would have been substantially clarified if it had been possible to have objective measures of function uncontaminated by the psychological factors which are bound to operate in the family-school-child system. At this point the results point to the need for considerable further investigation.

It is important to point out that there was no direct evidence that the use of any of these additives had caused any ill effect to humans. However, in several cases the animal studies conducted on the compounds suggested that it would be prudent to discontinue their use. There are at present 344 food additives listed in the regulations.

Health Protection Branch will continue to examine old and new food additives and, in the light of the best scientific evidence available, take whatever action is considered necessary to protect fully the Canadian consumer.

In view of increasing public concern about food additives, the department is continuing to review and, if necessary, modify present policy and regulations on all food additives, pollutants, pesticides, etc. as resources become available. In this regard the department has completed a review of its policy on pesticides and heavy metal pollutants and has modified the regulations to reduce or eliminate tolerances for some pesticides. New, stricter regulations are being drafted to control the amounts of heavy metals in foods.

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) made some reference to the government not taking any interest in the health of Canadians or Canadians not being healthy. Looking at the other side of the House that probably seems to be true but I can only wonder with whom he is comparing Canadians in terms of health and health standards. The whole world agrees we have one of the healthiest populations on the globe. I wonder whether he is comparing us with a country like India, for example, a country which certainly has a great many health problems but little problem with food additives.

At first glance I am tempted to agree with the motion of the hon. member for Athabasca. Upon closer examination, I am not. If he is suggesting that the Canadian government undertake research to examine the relationship between food additives and hyperactivity, then in fact this is already being done, as I will point out in my speech. If on the other hand, the hon. member is suggesting we should duplicate research already being undertaken in other countries merely in order that we, in nationalistic pride, can say that Canadians are involved in the area, then I completely disagree.

Science is international in scope and it would not be prudent for each country to duplicate the research of other countries. The costs for a complete understanding of the causes and treatment of hyperactivity are enormous and might be related to many factors which have not been identified. Surely we should not waste our resources in vain duplication of effort, but ought rather to engage these in areas which are not already covered but which show some promise.

Certainly with a new condition such as hyperactivity, the most urgent research needed is on the causes, but that involves a much wider list of possibilities than just food additives.

Today there is an increasing public belief that foods and food additives may be a major cause of hyperactivity in children. However, there is some evidence that hyperactivity in children may be a manifestation of an allergic reaction. A child may be allergic to certain foods or components of foods. For exemple, it is known that some individuals are allergic to the food colour tartrazine, others are sensitive to certain analgesics, particularly aspirin. The Health Protection Branch is currently assessing the magnitude of this problem and possible courses of action to alleviate any potential problem in this regard.

Hyperkinesis or hyperactivity is the term used to describe a syndrome in children whose unusual behaviour becomes a major problem in the home and at school. These children may be described as being constantly active, flitting from one object or activity to another, restless and fidgety; exhibiting voluble, uninhibited speech, disorganized thinking and impulsivity. They are irritable and aggressive, have a short attention span and are easily distracted. This is how parents and educators describe children classified as hyperactive. Available evidence suggests that these behavourial characteristics may lead to other social problems such as mental illness, delinquency and alcoholism in later life.

Statistics on the incidence of hyperactivity in school children vary considerably among investigators. This variation stems primarily from the lack of agreement among scientists on either terminology or definition of the syndrome. For example, school authorities report the incidence of hyperactivity in children to be as high as fifteen to twenty per cent, while psychiatrists estimate the prevalence to range from four to ten per cent.

Little is known of the etiology of this syndrome. However, perinatal brain damage, genetically inherited metabolic disorders, accidental poisoning in infancy, environmentally associated psychologic disorders and hypersensitivity reactions to foods or food components all have been implicated as possible causes of hyperactivity in children.

Abnormal brain waves in some hyperactive children have been related to physical brain damage and/or damage due to hypoxia during birth; however, the relationship between brain damage and hyperactivity is unclear.

Hyperactivity occurs four to ten times more frequently in male than in female children. Consequently, genetically inherited metabolic disorders have been considered as a potential cause of hyperactivity. It should be pointed out that similar sex ratios have been recorded for many congenital syndromes in medicine but no firm evidence exists that the sex chromosomes are involved in the transmission of these abnormalities. Whether the hyperactivity syndrome is genetic or sex-linked is not known, because of a lack of knowledge of inheritance patterns involved in hyperactivity.

Some investigators have associated hyperactivity in children with accidental poisoning by chemicals such as lead but the clinical evidence to date is inconclusive. It is known, however, that hyperactive children have a greater tendency to accidental poisoning in the home, presumably due to their intense restlessness.

chemical must meet. The food additive must be safe for continuous use. Based upon all available toxicological data, the food additive must have been found by properly qualified scientists to be without appreciable risk for human consumption. If the use of the additive is considered to constitute a hazard to the health of the consumer in the amounts which may be present in foods, its use will not be provided for under any circumstances.

The use of a food additive must be effective and its primary effect must not lead to deception. Provision for the use of an additive will not be granted if its use results in deception regarding the merit, composition or value of the food.

Although it has been shown that an additive is safe and its use will not result in deception, provision for such use will be granted only if one or more of several criteria are met. For example, the food additive must improve or maintain the nutritive value of a food. This may be accomplished by the addition of a food additive to preserve the natural vitamin content of a food.

Although added vitamins, minerals, and amino acids serve the same purpose, they are not presently classified as food additives. The additive must improve or maintain the quality or acceptability of a food. Preservatives, emulsifiers, stabilizers, antimicrobial agents, filtering agents, and thickening agents are examples of food additives which improve the quality or acceptability of the food. The additive must improve or maintain the quantity of food. This may be accomplished by the direct addition of substances to preserve the nutrient value of foods. For example, anti-oxidants preserve the natural vitamin content of food, while anti-microbial agents are used to prevent microbial growth, thus decreasing food wastage due to spoilage.

These principles of safety, lack of deception, and benefit to the consumer are consistent with those enunciated by the Food and Agriculture Organization, the World Health Organization, and the U.S. White House Conference on Food, Nutrition, and Health.

I would like at this point to summarize the data toxicologists require when evaluating a food additive or a pesticide before a maximum level of use or a tolerance is established in foods.

They require that the chemical be tested—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): On the Liberals and the NDP.

Mr. Maine: —on at least two species of animals for both short-term and long-term or lifetime studies. During the course of these studies daily observations of the general appearance and behaviour of the animals are noted. Weekly observations are made on bodyweight and food consumption. Initial and subsequent observations are made on haematology, urinalysis, enzyme activity studies, and organ function tests. At the end of the study all appropriate organs are carefully examined.

Reproduction studies are also required. Observations in the parent animals should include fertility, length of gestation, loctation index and tumour incidence. In the offspring the following data are required: stillbirths, litter size, foetal malformation, newborn weight, sex ratio, rate of growth, and 24-hour, five-day and 21-day survival data. If there is any indication of embryotoxicity, then further teratogenic studies are required.

After all these data have been carefully reviewed, the highest level of the chemical in the diet of the animal which caused no harmful effect is determined. This level is divided by 100 and the resulting figure is the amount which is permitted for human use; that is, if 100 parts per million in the diet of the rat caused no ill effects, then one part per million would be permitted in man's diet.

Let me explain the term "the acceptable daily intake" as it applies to food additives and to pesticides. Expert committees of the World Health Organization and the Food and Agriculture Organization have established over the years "acceptable daily intakes" for a large number of food additives and pesticides. This is defined as "the daily dosage of a chemical which, during an entire lifetime, appears to be without appreciable risk on the basis of all facts known at that time." It is expressed in milligrams per kilogram of bodyweight.

The two following examples relate the acceptable daily intake of food additives to the actual amount which is being consumed in Canada. Sorbic acid is an antimicrobial preservative which may be used in such foods as bread, cheese, pickles, jams and pie fillers. Assuming that it is used in all of these foods and assuming that one individual were to eat a reasonable amount of each of them in one day, then the intake of sorbic acid would be approximately 200 milligrams.

The acceptable daily intake for sorbic acid suggested by the World Health Organization is 1750 milligrams for a 150 pound individual. Sodium nitrite may be used in preserved meat and preserved poultry. Again making the assumption that all preserved meats contain this chemical and that one ate these foods every day, a person would be ingesting approximately ten milligrams of sodium nitrite per day. WHO has suggested that a 150 pound individual could safely consume approximately 60 milligrams per day.

Once a chemical is on the list it does not mean that it is there forever or that it is forgotten. Health Protection Branch is constantly examining the world's scientific literature, as well as conducting its own research on the toxicity of these additives.

When one realizes that 85 per cent of all the scientists who have ever lived are living today, and when one knows that the techniques and instruments used by these scientists are becoming increasingly sensitive, it is not surprising that new facts regarding some of these additives are becoming available. These scientific facts are carefully evaluated and, when appropriate, action is taken to prohibit the use of a certain additive. Since September, 1964, when specific food additive regulations were introduced, some 26 food additives have been delisted. Included were several food colours, non-nutritive sweeteners, flavouring agents, antioxidants from stabilizers, bleaching agents in flour and so on.

cherries are either bright red or a crimson colour similar to the colour of the jacket worn by the hon. member from Nova Scotia opposite, or bright green. We know that cherries are neither bright red nor bright green. We are used to seeing chocolate cake depicted in advertisements as dark brown. Is chocolate really so dark? Years of advertising have convinced us that that is how it should look. Similarly we think that lemon pie should be a bright yellow colour, whereas only the skin of the lemon is bright yellow.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but must inform him that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Frank Maine (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to comment briefly on the use of chemical additives in Canadian foods. The major fact responsible for the inreasing use of good additives has been the development of the prepared convenience food and the snack food type of product. "Instant" has become a magic word, and the family of "instants" now includes coffee, tea, chip dips, dressings, hot cereals, soup, potatoes and even breakfast. We now have such convenience foods as cake mixes, frozen pies, TV dinners, dehydrated potatoes, frozen fish sticks, brown-and-serve rolls, powdered breakfast drinks, dessert mixes, dessert toppings and so on.

In spite of the consumers' concern regarding the high cost of food, there appears to be an increasing interest in more sophisticated, more flavourful, more exotic foods. Certain consumers are avidly buying and eating frozen pizzas, frozen Chinese dinners, frozen shish kebab, asparagus hollandaise style, breast of chicken à la Kiev, and broccoli au gratin, to name only a few.

I understand that people generally have more leisure time today and have developed a marked preference for informal dining. We are apparently spending more time around our TV sets, or on the patio around the charcoal grill. These trends have rapidly increased the demand for snack foods—pretzels-popcorn, cheezies, onion-flavoured crackers—

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Please, no commercials.

Mr. Maine: —bacon-flavoured potato chips, cheese dips, barbecue sauce and soft drink mixes. Many of these products depend upon the use of food additives.

Mr. Paproski: What about holopche and perohee?

Mr. Maine: Foods are being shipped greater distances and are being stored for longer periods of time. Consequently there is a need for food additives to prevent or retard spoilage. In addition, there is a trend toward buying convenience foods, for which additives are necessary.

I should like to discuss the role which food additives are playing and will continue to play in the processing of foods. While the use of chemicals in our foods has greatly accelerated in recent years and has been given increasing publicity, their use is not new. Faced with the uncertainties of climate and rainfall, and of hunting and fishing, primitive man had to learn how to preserve his hard-won food. Thus it came about that methods of drying, salting, and smoking were discovered. Hence the use of chemical additives in foods probably began when man first learned that meat could be preserved by the addition of salt.

A committee on food additives was convened in Rome, in 1956, by the Food and Agriculture Organization and the World Health Organization. This committee was given the task of drawing up general principles governing the use of food additives, and it concluded that, provided a food additive is safe when consumed over a lifetime, its use could be justified when it served one or more of the following purposes: the maintenance of the nutritional quality of a food; the enhancement of keeping quality or stability with resultant reduction in food wastage; making foods attractive to the consumer in a manner which does not lead to deception; and providing essential aids in food processing.

It perhaps should be also mentioned that the committee pointed our certain situations in which the use of food additives would not be in the best interests of the consumer and should not be permitted. These were as follows: (a) to disguise the use of faulty processing and handling techniques; (b) to deceive the consumer; (c) when the result is a substantial reduction of the nutritive value of the food. These principles are being used in Canada when assessing the justification for the use of food additives.

Perhaps at this point I should say what a food additive is, as defined by our regulations. A food additive is any substance including any source of radiation, the use of which results, or may reasonably be expected to result in it or its byproducts becoming a part of or affecting the characteristics of a food but does not include: (1) any nutritive material that is used, recognized or commonly sold as an article or ingredient of food; (2) vitamins, mineral nutrients and amino acids; (3) spices, seasoning, flavouring preparations, essential oils, oleoresins and natural extractives; (4) agricultural chemicals; (5) food packaging materials and components thereof, and (6) drugs recommended for administration to animals that may be consumed as food.

This rather clumsy definition encompasses the chemicals which are added to foods as colours, stabilizers emulsifiers, preservatives, anti-caking agents, non-nutritive sweeteners, bleaching agents, pH adjusting agents, and for other purposes.

Before accepting a food additive for inclusion on a permitted list in the Food and Drug regulations, officers of the Health Protection Branch have developed certain criteria which the simply waiting to see the results of that project before we take action.

The hon. member for St. Boniface seems to be rather uneasy today. He has been quiet ever since the former minister of national defence resigned—in the hope that if he were quiet and good he might fill in the blank.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): The hon. member is not even on the subject.

Mr. Yewchuk: Obviously the hon. member has given up hoping—

• (1610)

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I remind the hon. member that he should speak on his motion. It must be important, otherwise he would not have brought it forward. Let him speak on his motion instead of speaking about everybody else and his dog. If he feels his motion is important, let him speak on it and stick to the notes he is reading.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I am sure the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) wishes to discuss an important point, and that hon. members will hear him.

Mr. Yewchuk: I should be interested to know to whom on his side of the House the hon. member opposite referred when he spoke of everybody and his dog.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member can be sure that I was looking at the opposition side when I said that.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I can only conclude that the hon. member for St. Boniface will not make it to the cabinet and has reverted to his old, noisy self. I suggest that he should not give up hope, because he may yet be appointed to a cabinet job.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Go back to your notes.

Mr. Yewchuk: As I said, the Americans banned Red Dye No. 2 on January 19. They have also looked seriously at nitrates which, in certain experimental conditions, have been suspected of causing cancer. On January 28 the Minister of National Health and Welfare called that conclusion premature. Since then the matter has lain dormant in this country, maturing. That, at any rate, seems to be the minister's position.

On September 22 the U.S. Federal Drug Agency banned Red Dye No. 4, and another food, colour, carbon black; both food colours are suspected of having carcinogenic qualities, or qualities which produce certain types of cancer. Soon afterwards the Canadian Department of National Health and Welfare announced that Canada has no immediate plan to ban these dyes and that available information suggests there is no serious hazard connected with their use. That was the conclusion of the minister. He found there was no serious hazard; on the other hand the Americans concluded that there is a serious hazard and banned these food colourings. We must ask ourselves, who is right and who is wrong, or, who is to take the necessary action out of concern for the health and welfare of Canadians?

I suggest, if the minister has no immediate plan for action, that he had better have some long range plan in this area. I doubt if there is any such plan. In any event, when there is a dispute about the meaning of "available information", the public should always be given the benefit of the doubt. The expression, "There is no serious hazard," when applied to our food supply is contemptible, to say the least.

Cyclamates, better known as artificial sweeteners, have been totally banned in the United States for a long time. Cyclamates were banned in Canada as well but are still available in this country on prescription. Here again Canadians are exposed to a danger to which Americans are not exposed.

Clearly Canadians tolerate more readily than the Americans the possibility that there may be dangerous additives in food. I am concerned about that. I think it is a great mistake to consider chemical additives to our food supply as "innocent until proven guilty." That is a fine principle in legal proceedings. But I would sooner consider chemical additives to our foodstuffs as "guilty until proven innocent." If we approach chemicals from that point of view we are much less likely to be sorry, for we have been sorry for past negligence.

In this country we need a coherent approach to the entire field of food additives. We should not tolerate this business of doing a little here and a little there, or reacting to what the Americans are doing. We should not simply sit back and watch our American neighbours, that is, watch without reacting. We need a commitment that the evidence others have gathered will be reviewed, and that there will be a proper evaluation supported by scientific studies carried out in this country. They should be carried out under conditions found in this country. After all, conditions here are not the same as in the U.S. We can do better than merely keep in touch with what is happening in American research, which is what we have done so far. As reported in Hansard for last November 14, the minister indicated that that is his official policy at the moment.

What the department is doing would be laughable, if it were not so serious. In 1976 the Department of National Health and Welfare was sending letters to the food industry asking for information on which to base a list of permitted food colours. I understand the department sent out letters on or around July 16, 1976, to all parts of Canadian industry concerned with food colour; those letters requested information from the industry on which to establish a list of safe additives. I am concerned at such an approach because it suggests that the government is not overly concerned about research and establishing its own research program. It is simply asking industry for opinions.

Let me return to the questions of colouring and flavouring. As a result of many years of commercialism, people think that with the increase in the addition of colouring and flavouring to food. The graph was identical to the one showing increases in the amount of general crime in North American society.

● (1600)

This matter was raised again in the House and on November 14, 1975, and as reported at page 9068 of Hansard the minister replied:

> I must report to the hon. member that up to this stage there appears to be no scientific evidence on which we could act in support of the thesis he has been promoting.

If we look at the action taken by the United States we will see that they were sufficiently convinced to order studies into these matters. A panel of 29 specialists suggested there was sufficient evidence to relate hyperactivity to food additives and found that the evidence was sufficient to merit further investigation. This is rather contrary to the position taken by our minister.

Perhaps it would be useful to define hyperactivity. Children of pre-school and early school age have great difficulty paying attention to what is happening. They move about too much in school, disturb classes, and are subject to temper tantrums. Their intelligence is not any less, but because of their inability to pay attention their ability to learn is severely affected. We should give further consideration to this problem.

A great deal of concern has been expressed by the public over the past number of years, although the minister seems to be impervious to it. This public concern is expressed in such newspaper headlines as "U.S. Will Examine Artificial Colouring"; "U.S. Panel Finds Role of Cyclamate in Cancer Unproved"; "Preservatives linked To Cancer"; "Food Dye Banned in U.S. Under Study in Canada"; "U.S. Bans Colour Additive"; "Government Decision Soon On Use of Red Dye." Mr. Speaker, the United States has already banned the latter's use.

The United States seems to be much more responsive to the possible dangers. When dye of one kind or other, or an additive of one kind or other is suspected of causing hyperactivity or being related to cancer or any other problem the U.S. authorities seem to take immediate action not only to ban the use if there is a connection with a serious effect, but also to do careful "double blind" scientific studies to prove or disprove the effects.

Dr. Ross Hall of McMaster University recently stated that some five years ago the World Health Organization recommended that Red Dye be banned. He says that from a biological viewpoint the dye should have been banned years ago. He maintains that it is very dangerous, but that manufacturers prefer synthetic dyes such as Red Dye No. 2 to natural ones because of their chemical superiority. The Minister of National Health and Welfare is not here today, nor is his parliamentary secretary nor anyone else connected with the department either directly or indirectly. I think it is a shameful reflection of their interest that there is no representative to listen to debate on this very important subject.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I want to point out to the Chair that the hon. member is wrong. The member representing the department in this matter has gone to the telephone and will be back immediately. These things do occur.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see the hon. member has been cajoled to come back to the House. Obviously he was not interested enough to stay to listen and he should, as he has only started in his new job.

Mr. McRae: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I am very interested in this subject. I left the floor for about two minutes because I had an emergency telephone call. I hope we will not have these remarks flying back and forth. The department is interested in the whole area of food additives, as is everyone in the country.

Mr. Yewchuk: I seem to have struck a rather sensitive chord on the other side, Mr. Speaker. I am talking about hyperactivity, and it seems to be very well demonstrated.

Before I was so rudely interrupted I was referring to a statement made by the World Health Organization, concerning Red Dye No. 2. At the time they were indicating it should be banned, five years ago. The Minister of National Health and Welfare was saying in a recent news report that it was premature to ban it. It appears that the minister thinks he is better informed than the World Health Organization and the other experts who expressed the concern which resulted in the United States banning use of this dye.

I have to say that on the subject of food additives my patience with the government is becoming rather thin. Obviously it does not care. In face of steadily mounting evidence that particular additives are possibly or unquestionably harmful to human health, and the increasingly more positive view that additives have combined effects at which we can only begin to guess, the minister has done nothing but stall. In this he has been supported by those members who sit behind him. I should like to illustrate this with a few more examples.

At the present time the United States is funding a double blind study into the relationship between food additives and hyperactivity in children. In Canada, in typical Liberal fashion, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has sent an observer to see what they are doing. That is the extent to which he is willing to concede that there might be a problem. He is not sufficiently concerned to do something in this country but has simply sent an observer, such as the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay), or one of the others, to see what they are doing and what they come up with. As a Canadian I am not satisfied that he is showing sufficient concern about this problem. It is certainly not the kind of concern that the Canadian people want their government to demonstrate.

The United States has a project in Oklahoma which is trying to determine the relationship between mood and food in adults. We are not doing anything like that in Canada but are Agriculture" from letting those people use the legislation Canada provided for them. I am surprised at that. Am I not supposed to defend the legislation that the best producers of our whole society used to increase their productivity 100 per cent per capita in the last 10 years when in the rest of the world the figure is 30 per cent or 40 per cent per capita? When legislation from the most democratic institution in this land is passed, and we are told not to use it, that is wrong. What in the world are we talking about?

That is what the consumer critic for the official opposition is suggesting in his questioning. On the one hand he wants to help broiler producers. Then he says we should not help them because we would be using the legislation parliament passed. There is no other institution which goes through such exercises or holds public hearings. Unions market their labour. Do they have public hearings before they are franchised as a union? No, and I know because I was a member of a union. However, they are marketing their labour, and farmers are marketing their products.

Hon. members opposite should ask the new member for Ottawa-Carleton what she thinks about supply management. She has written me letters and told me that she could not run her business successfully if she did not have a supply management system. When anything like that is suggested for farmers, that is ungodly, but the Canadian Wheat Board was foisted on us, without a vote and without an expression of opinion, by a Conservative government which said to farmers that they must deliver by quota, according to the number of acres and so forth. Farmers were told that that is how they must supply the market; that they must not rush in and deliver their products.

They were told that they were not to plug the elevators so that those out further in the country would not be able to supply the market. They put some fairness and equity into the system, and that is all I want for farmers. I do not want to take away the incentive to be creative.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: I know why the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton said what he did, because I know his mother-in-law.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): She likes you too, Gene.

Mr. Whelan: If I were running against the hon. member, I think she would vote for me because she has a farm background.

I am not going to say any more, but I promise that as far as this minister is concerned any constructive suggestions coming from any member of the committee will be considered. If we can make this legislation better and more workable, that is what we want to do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

[Mr. Whelan.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Four o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills, private bills.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think there is an agreement and a disposition in the House that the matter to be dealt with today is the motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk), Notice of Motion No. 6, and that all the rest shall stand.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): That is agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

EFFECT OF ARTIFICIAL FOOD ADDITIVES ON CHILDREN AND ADULTS

GOVERNMENTAL EXAMINATION RECOMMENDED

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should take independent action to examine the relationship between artificial food additives and hyperactivity in children as well as between additives and behavioural changes in adults.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I want to talk about this subject in parliament because it is a matter which shows what we already know about hon. members in the government at the present time. It is a matter which shows nearly total neglect in so far as the health of Canadians is concerned.

Today we have somewhere in the vicinity of 3,000 to 4,000 chemicals added to our food supply and which are consumed nearly every day. I think it is quite safe to say that in the vast majority of cases the chemicals have not been adequately tested to convince me and many other Canadians that they are safe for human consumption.

The matter to which I particularly want to refer today deals with artificial colouring and flavouring, and it was brought to the attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) for the first time in this House on October 20, 1975. At that time the minister refused to acknowledge that there was a problem in relation to these additives. It was again brought to his attention on October 24, 1975. It was pointed out that somewhere in the vicinity of 7 per cent of North American children were suffering from a condition known as hyperactivity, and that certain researchers in the U.S. had related hyperactivity in children to artificial colouring and flavouring in food. Further, other researchers suggested that not only does this artificial material perhaps cause hyperactivity or over activity in children, but also that perhaps it has a relationship to crime or criminal activity among adults. I saw a graph indicating a very parallel growth—nearly identical—on the record today. For instance, hon. members on the other side have referred to beef production. What in the world do they think President Ford is trying to do in the United States for his beef producers? He is trying to run a supply-management system by means of his meat import law. He tried it with the economic might of the United States and he hoped that people would co-operate. He said, "So much of that meat from your country can come to my country etc.," but they did not live up to that agreement.

People are asking. "What is Whelan trying to do with this legislation?" Let us go back to the inception of the Canadian Wheat Board Act. Who put it into force? It was a man after whom they called buggies out west for a while—it was R. B. Bennett. There was no vote after 1935 until the late forties on whether or not they really wanted the Canadian Wheat Board set up. That was the Canadian Wheat Board which was imposed on the farmers in Canada. Then there was the Canadian Grain Commission.

The hon. member for Battle River is circulating a petition against the supply-management of beef. Let me tell him that I cannot do it to the farmers of Canada unless they want it, because it is not in the legislation. He is using scare tactics. I can tell him that there would be nothing but chaos on that market in the foreseeable future. Even the Canadian Cattlemen's Association is saying that perhaps by 1981 we will get out of trouble. Last year at this time when I put quotas on the U.S., Australia, and New Zealand, they told me to lift the quotas, free the market and let it operate in its own fashion. Now they tell me to get back and do something. Every editorial in the agricultural papers is saying it is time the government acted. Last year they told the government to mind its own business and stay out of action.

The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton has dairy farmers in his riding and I know exactly how many of them in his area are in trouble. Let me say that I do not distribute that quota to the people—it is the provincial marketing board which distributes it. We are putting a program into effect now and if producers do as we tell them to do—which we tried to tell them last year—there will be more fairness and equity. We are trying to put right some of the injustices that occurred.

To say that this legislation will be rigid is nonsense. Anyone can tell that this legislation is broad enough to include most producers. When I am accused of not having consulted agricultural producers before coming out with this legislation, let me suggest that hon. members opposite should read some of the farm newspapers nudging us before the throne speech to bring in an advance payment program. They asked "Where is the advance payment program of the Minister of Agriculture, the one he talked about three or four years ago?" It is unfair to say I have not consulted anyone about this program. They thought probably that we would not do anything about it, and now they are surprised it is in place. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton should read some of my speeches that come to his office and he would find a record of the times when I spoke about it to different farm groups in this nation.

I said that I wanted to put Canadian agricultural producers, regardless of whether they were grain producers or producers of other foods, on an equal basis so that they would not have to rush their crops to market to pay the bank an 11 per cent or 12 per cent interest. Hon. members opposite are saying we will freeze them in. If they want to sell their commodity somewhere else, they can pay in cash, but they will have to pay the interest on that if they do not sell their commodity or deliver the product on time. They must pay in cash above the exempt $500 on the total loan, or 10 per cent, whichever it happens to be.

Hon. members who have spoken have said that they agree with the principle of the legislation, but then I have never heard so much pessimistic talk about what it is liable to do or not do. I just do not understand, with the little bit of trouble we are in in some areas of agriculture—and I say little because I compare those troubles with the troubles of other nations of the world—how can hon. members be so pessimistic? We have a tremendous production entity called agriculture in our country. I cannot be that pessimistic. I think even my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson), is a little pessimistic. He should thank God that we have a tremendous wheat crop because the production facilities in the U.S.S.R., for example, are about as unpredictable as the weather. Who knows what will happen next year in the U.S.S.R.? What incentive is there for its people to be productive?

The hon. member for Battle River talked about land use and suggested I bring in a bill with regard to land use. We do not have that authority. That is under provincial jurisdiction, and the hon. member should know that. He has been a member of this House long enough to realize that.

Hon. members opposite are asking us to co-ordinate some kind of land program. We have a complete land map of Canada. We are always redesigning it with regard to urban encroachment, but we do not have control at the federal level. If we walked in and made demands with regard to land we would be called dictators, but that is difficult to get across to the public. The public thinks we have that authority, but that is wrong, wrong, wrong! All hon. members have to do is check my record in municipal politics and they will find that I was involved with some of the first plans and zoning for any rural municipal corporation in the province of Ontario. I realize the importance of land.

Some weeks ago, I believe before the House adjourned, I remember the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) asking me what I would do for the broiler producers of Canada. He said that they were going broke. Then when the broiler producers decided to do something themselves and we did not spend money on them, the hon. members suggested that that was immoral and wrong and that they should follow the legislation passed by this parliament for them. The head of the consumers' association wrote a letter to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) saying that he should "stop that Minister of orderly marketing purposes, but I think there are people in the agricultural community who, unlike some of their colleagues, do not necessarily agree that it is best.

We have had problems in regard to milk quotas in my part of Ontario. We have had a dreadful situation in regard to the milk producers in eastern Ontario, indeed in all parts of Ontario and in Canada. I do not have to tell the Minister of Agriculture about that. He knows all about it. He has received letters from me in respect of it. The minister said that he had warned the milk producers what would happen. If he did, then that message did not get through to the milk producers of Ontario, at least in my part of Ontario according to what I am told.

Another problem in regard to this part of the program—and I know you, Mr. Speaker, have an interest in this because of the nature of your constituency—is the problem which faces the farmer when he attempts to obtain an advance from the government under any act or statute in respect of compensation for herds affected by brucellosis and a number of other things. There are always complaints that payments are not high enough, and only producers know that. But what concerns me is the complaints that one receives that payments are not made quickly enough. I am not suggesting that all the bureaucracy is putting stumbling blocks deliberately in the way of the financial stability of agriculture, certainly not, but I hope that if an arrangement is made under this stature, whatever payments are to be made under it will certainly be carried out and facilitated at a much better rate than is the case now.

The reason I rose in this debate—and I listened to colleagues whose constituencies are basically agricultural in nature—is that my constituency not only has a large agricultural area but has more than that. There are small businesses, farm equipment dealers, feed dealers, stores and shops, artisans, tradesmen and professional people in the smaller towns of eastern Ontario which I do not want forgotten in terms of their dependence upon the agricultural industry. If the agricultural industry is to proceed properly, we must take into account the difficulties and the rather unique risks to which they are subject, the physical risks of farm production and storage, bad weather, disease, pests, price risks, imports from other countries, etc. This statute will advance that kind of stability. I imagine that there will be questions about it on second reading and, as the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise) said, subject to the answers to those questions and to the input which we receive from farm organizations which have not yet had the opportunity to study this statute in detail, our party is prepared to support it.

In closing I should like to say that I hope the Minister of Agriculture does not look upon himself merely as the defender of agricultural interests in Canada. I do not think he does, but when I read his speeches—and I get them by the bale in my office—sometimes I think he does. I hope he will look upon his responsibilities as part of the over-all responsibility that the government has collectively to provide stability in the agricultural industry, and that takes into account the responsibilities of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. If in the speeches I find that from time to time the Minister of Agriculture has become defensive, it may well be because perhaps the attitude of the government which he serves—and he serves agriculture in good faith, I think, although he may well be misguided—is such with respect to agriculture that he must feel his neck becoming a little red. However, it is important that we not lose the essence of the collective responsibility and that he should realize that while he is Minister of Agriculture he also has responsibility to the consumers in Canada, as does the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs have collective responsibility also to all agricultural producers in Canada. Part of their responsibility is to create an atmosphere of understanding between these two groups, and unfortunately—I say this with regret—that has not happened thus far.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I should remind hon. members at this time that the minister's speech will close the debate.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that it has already been mentioned that I am supposed to catch a plane. Perhaps I should not tell anyone at what time I am to catch it because I will not be allowed the 40 minutes to which I think I am entitled in which to answer all the questions that were put to me. I was asked to go to Toronto with the Prime Minister of Jamaica, and I have to be at the airport at 4.15 p.m.

I should like to put a couple of points on the record. First and foremost I should like to reply to the point made by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). I realize that my job as Minister of Agriculture is not just to be responsible to the agricultural producers of this nation. My responsibility is to the total Canadian society. Also, as has already been mentioned by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Malone), I am responsible to a great many people outside Canada who benefit from our food aid programs, and I must ensure that our producers are able to fulfil our commitments which we as a government made to aid other people in the world.

On listening to the hon. member for Battle River one might think we were not doing anything with regard to distributing food in the world. Let me point out that in this regard we are doing more per capita than any other nation in the world, not only in actual food aid but in per capita dollars from Canadian taxpayers who are paying into those programs.

I have been making notes of some of the things that have been said this afternoon, and unfortunately I find it would take much longer than the time I have today to answer all the questions that have been put, but I intend to do it in committee. However, if we stick only to the bill in the committee, it will be very difficult to answer all the questions and to reply to the character assassinations by innuendo that have been placed

I think groups generally have supported the principle of this bill, and all speakers on this side have said that we support what the bill is trying to do. However, as I have pointed out, there are a few things we want to know. There should be equity between western and eastern producers with regard to advance payments, but the department has not been able to detail how this is going to be achieved.

In general, my main objection and concern are with regard to the two crops that mean a whole lot to the economy of the farmers in the area I come from, and we are a little unclear as to how these farmers can benefit under this bill.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I indicated to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) a few moments ago that I should like to say something about this bill. I do so because a large part of my constituency, certainly in terms of area and interest, is agricultural and the people in that area depend very much on the agricultural policies of the government.

One thing which concerns me, because of the policies of the government in part, and because of certain other circumstances perhaps in smaller part, is that fewer farms are being occupied by bona fide farmers. I see a change in the agricultural industry. I do not express concern for that merely in political terms but also in terms of the community.

What seems to have happened in respect of agriculture in my constituency, and in Canada to a great extent, was exemplified by the charade we saw this morning during the question period. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) asked whether or not the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Abbott) would mind at some stage going over and chatting with the Minister of Agriculture to underscore the truth of the division between those two responsibilities. For some reason unknown to me, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs got up in the full glare of the press gallery, marched over and sat down beside the Minister of Agriculture, and shook hands with him! It was a charade. I understand it was intended as a joke, although perhaps a joke in poor taste.

I do not blame the Minister of Agriculture who received the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, but perhaps it was symbolic as well because it seems to me, as an observer of the attitude of the government and the way it functions, that it functions on the basis that it assumes there will be some conflict and that there must necessarily be some conflict between the interests of the consumer and the interests of agriculture. If I am right in that assumption—and this is the information I receive from agriculturalists as well as consumer groups in my constituency—I think the assumption is wrong and that the government should act in terms that there can be some real basis for understanding between those two important communities in Canada.

I have never said and do not say that the agricultural industry in Canada is not in all its parts basic to the prosperity of the nation. I have said publicly, here and outside the House, that people in this country must understand that food and the food industry do not begin at the refrigerator door and that there is much blood, sweat, tears, and investment which go into that industry in its basic form, namely, at the farm inside the farm gate, before food finds its way to the consumer's table or cupboard.

I have followed parliament and the development of government and governmental responsibilities ever since I went to university in this city, and as I look back over the history of recent times there seems to have been an assumption that there must be a dichotomy or division. I say with some sadness that perhaps the attitude of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and the attitude exhibited this morning by the government House leader in the discussion we had on the rules of the House, indicate that the leaders of the government in the House of Commons do not believe in the principle of collective responsibility. It was perhaps since 1968 that this breakdown has occurred. Coincidentally that year was the year the Prime Minister became leader of his party.

The concept of collective responsibility is a very important practical element in the matter of understanding and shows itself in many ways, but particularly in the way in which an attitude of confrontation has developed.

The farmers face many risks, not the least of which is the weather. Some of my colleagues have said that in terms of weather perhaps 15 per cent may be added ultimately to the price of any commodity. In other words the Canadian farmers are faced with this atmosphere and climate which we have by the grace of God. If you believe, as I do, that the government's job is to create an atmosphere in which business, including farming, can operate properly, then that point alone places an additional degree of responsibility on the government. That is why, like my colleagues who represent much deeper agricultural interests than I do in terms of size and the nature of the business, I am concerned about the lack of interest in agriculture and the dearth of any initiative in respect of agriculture in the Speech from the Throne.

As I understand it this really is a bill to help agriculturalists finance their operations in respect of the crops covered by the provisions of the legislation. In that sense it is a good initiative. However, it raises some questions in my mind. The hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles) spoke of the corn producer in southwestern Ontario. There is a large corn industry in the sense he mentioned, in eastern Ontario. It is subject to the weather and to all the other vicissitudes and so on which other members have mentioned in respect of crops which interest them.

I would hope, either in committee or elsewhere, the minister could answer the question which was put and which interests me concerning whether the Corn Council would constitute an organization or whether it is necessary for a producer's group to be established. I am also concerned that the legislation does not seem to cover independent producers who may or may not belong to this organization. There may be a reason for this which I hope will be explained. Perhaps it is necessary for

With respect to the tobacco grower, I personally do not see how at the present time he can benefit from the bill at all because tobacco grown on the farm, cured and packed for sale, is not in a condition to be stored on the farm. The only way to store it is to send it to a processing and packing plant, have it redried to proper humidity, packed in hogsheads and stored. This has been done by the Ontario Flue-Cured Tobacco Growers Marketing Board, I believe since 1964, when they entered into an agreement with certain processing companies whereby it was processed, packed and stored at a flat rate. The committee that the board set up at the time really had the control of it, and whether the act would recognize that the farmer still retains control through his committee of the marketing board is something we will have to find out.

Even prior to this the tobacco growers set up a co-operative, the Ontario Flue-Cured Tobacco Growers Marketing Co-operative, and they have a plant right near Kingsville where the minister lives; I think he knows all about it. They operated there for a year or two. The co-operative bought the tobacco and paid money for it on the exchange. I am sure that tobacco that was stored in this manner would not qualify under the bill because the farmer no longer owns it and therefore does not control it. I ask the minister to explain in some detail, when he has the opportunity, precisely how the tobacco grower can benefit from this plan.

I suppose one immediate criticism of the bill is that of discrimination. For example, the corn growers—the other group I want to talk about in some detail—of southwestern Ontario were one of the major advocates of this type of legislation, an advance payments plan similar to that of the Wheat Board in the west. Now that Bill C-2 has arrived, these corn growers will find themselves ineligible because they have not set up a corn marketing agency.

This is a pretty important crop in southwestern Ontario. I do not have to remind the minister of that; he is right in the centre of a big corn growing area. Actually, the crop has been grown throughout southern Ontario since the advent of the new early-maturing hybrids, seeds that are now available in Ontario. Corn has become a crop all through the province. In 1975 the crop was 130 million bushels. In 1976 the estimate is about 125 million bushels, down a bit. The figures I have quoted come from the Ontario Corn Council. The value of the 1975 crop was estimated to be about $320 million. I suggest this is an indication of the size of the industry, and a significant number of farmers have a lot of money at stake and certainly would benefit from this legislation.

As I have said, however, they have no organization that would really qualify under the bill, as I read it. This council is an organization comprised of representatives of all facets of the industry, such as the growers, elevator operators, brokers and so on. I would doubt that they would qualify, so I repeat that we should find some way in which these individual farmers can receive some of the benefits of the legislation.

Another comment with respect to corn that I want to make is that the formation of a corn marketing board or agency in southern Ontario was discussed a good number of years ago, but the plan was never put on paper in a concrete form that could be presented to the growers for a vote on it. Therefore I repeat that there is simply no organization for them.

I do not know whether it would be fair to accuse the government of trying to force farmers to bring themselves under marketing agencies or marketing boards. Could these marketing agencies be the forerunners of compulsory supply management on a general scale? Or is this simply a means whereby the government is trying to appear helpful while really doing next to nothing? For example, producers will have to ask themselves whether advance payments are worth the bureaucratic cost of marketing agencies' administration, especially since these costs will have to be borne by the producers themselves. No wonder the government has limited its liability to $200 million.

By and large farmers—I do not need to tell the minister this because he is one himself—are rugged individuals and they like to have control of their product, especially when it comes to selling it. They like to be able to decide when is the time to sell or whether to hold their crop till next summer. So for a third time I return to the suggestion that we find some way whereby an individual, without belonging to an agency, can participate in this plan.

At the federal level the grains and special crops division of Agriculture Canada will administer the program. It is not expected that more manpower will be required, I suppose because the paper work and the detailed work of administration will be done at the local level, at the agency, as the bill provides.

The bill defines what are crops, and it is interesting to note that they are grains, oil seeds, root crops and so on. I should just like to make reference to two provisions of the bill which are a little confusing and unclear, to say the least. In the interpretation section "crop" is defined as "grains, oil seeds, root crops and such other field grown crops as are prescribed." However, when we come to the application of the bill, clause 3 provides that "This act applies in respect of crops grown in Canada" period. So evidently there is no limitation.

When I asked the departmental officials about this, the grains division could not give a definite answer as to whether potatoes would be eligible. I do not see why they would not, but that is the answer they gave. They said that apples were eligible, but not strawberries. As a result there should be a complete listing to clear the matter up. The minister, either in the bill or perhaps by way of regulation, should give a listing of what products are eligible.

The maximum advances set out in the bill, $15,000 for individual producers, $30,000 for partnerships, and $45,000 for three or more partners, are the same as on the prairies. In the Wheat Board area a producer can apply for an advance payment at his local grain company. The company is allowed to pay the producer one half of the total advance applied for on the spot, a good feature. The remaining half is forthcoming after the Wheat Board has checked the application for accuracy. This might also be incorporated in the bill or put in the regulations.

raise in committee, and we certainly want to voice at this time our objection to the government for failing to pay greater and needed recognition to the agricultural industry. Take the situation which has allowed the beef industry in this country to go into its fourth year operating at below the cost of production. We should stop and recognize that the meat industry is the third largest manufacturing industry in this country, a business involving nearly $3 billion. Yet the federal Department of Agriculture has failed to take the initiative it ought to have taken to find markets, to cut off imports from the oceanic countries that are literally making Canada a dumping ground for beef. The minister might respond that he has already done so, that he has put on some quotas—

Mr. Whelan: I put them on last year.

Mr. Malone: Then he cannot go out to Western Canada and tell the farmers with a clean conscience that he has done anything to protect the meat industry when he recognizes that they are now in their fourth year of operation at below the cost of production. Otherwise it is not possible to gather together 300 ranchers at two day's notice in a protest meeting about what's happening to the meat industry. We know what has happened.

It is obvious to those on this side of the House what has happened to the Minister of Agriculture. He may well have a good conscience in terms of what he wanted to do in the agricultural industry, but he has lost his power in cabinet because at least twice, and probably three times, this summer there were policy pronouncements that something was to be done for the cow-calf operator. They never naturalized. Deadline dates came and went telegrams were sent by premiers to the minister, and there were never any responses to them. The truth of the matter is that the minister has failed to get his policies past his cabinet colleagues. In other words he has failed as a minister to demonstrate the importance of agriculture to the whole country, and that is obvious today when we look at the Speech from the Throne and notice the insignificant amount of attention given to the industry which built this country, the industry which is still the backbone of Canada, the industry which is still among the greatest of exporting commodities that we have in terms of helping to improve our balance of trade position.

Whatever feeling we may have on this side of the House that these is some acceptability attached to Bill C-2, that this is a bill the minister has not goofed up as much as some of the others, we have to chastise him most severely for his failure to recognize that the agricultural industry has been underplayed and underscored. Everyone in this House and everyone in Canada traditionally eats three times a day—I would suspect the minister may do so even more than that but we must recognize that if we are to have a productive land, if we are going to use slogans like "The Land is Strong" it is high time agriculture was given its proper place in our society.

I would hope that at the next opportunity the minister has he will be announcing policies that will deal with international sales of food products such as might be a stimulus to the agricultural producers of this country, encouraging them to produce to their maximum capacity with full assurance that the government will play its proper role in seeing that those foodstuffs are sold to the Third World nations and help alleviate what has been an obvious and most critical problem—four-fifths of the world suffering from malnutrition. The fact that there has been so little mention about agriculture in the Speech from the Throne underscores the government's failure to recognize Canada's most important resource, agriculture, and those engaged in it.

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make some comments about Bill C-2, particularly with regard to two specific products which are produced in large quantity in the area which I represent and about which I think I have some knowledge. What I have to say will be directed to the bill, supplemented by a few questions to the minister which I know he will take the opportunity to answer either here or in committee.

Bill C-2 authorizes the federal government to guarantee loans to producers in advance payments on their farm stored crops. Those advances would give producers some operating capital for the following crop year, that is, the producer would have some money for seed, equipment, etc. Once his crop has been sold, the producer would repay the loan with the interest on it being paid by the federal government. The bill before us extends to the other producers of Canada advantages which the Canadian Wheat Board producers have enjoyed since 1957. Bill C-2 has been modelled on the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act of 1957-58. However, there are certain differences, which will be pointed out later.

Under the terms of the bill before us, advance payments will be paid out by a producer organization. Bill C-2 defines an "organization" as an organization of producers. However, the intent of the government is that the producer organization be a marketing agency. Thus the bill is rather misleading. Would there not be some way to ensure that individual farmers might receive the benefits of this legislation? I suppose, on reflection, that the administrative difficulties of doing so might be too great; the department is obviously expecting that the organizations referred to would be responsible for the book work and the administration. One of my hon. friends suggested that the banks be involved in this type of program and the minister might well give that suggestion some thought. The problem as I see it is that certain farmers are going to be disqualified from the benefit of this legislation, as I shall point out later.

Presently there are only about 12 marketing agencies which would qualify immediately under the provisions of this bill. These are provincial agencies, such as the agencies for B.C. apples, Ontario wheat, Ontario white beans, and the Ontario Flue-Cured Tobacco Growers Marketing Board, of which I am a member. These agencies are generally centred in B.C. and Ontario. This leaves many producers and many areas of Canada out in the cold and ineligible for advance payments.

I challenge the minister to stand in his place and clearly demonstrate what kind of a program he has for the sale of crops in the international market place. It is my belief that if anything is weak in our society today it is the failure to sell aggressively agricultural products in the international market place.

We talked about the minister's inability to recognize the major problems of agriculture by introducing only this one bill, Bill C-2. The assumption that must go with that is that Canada has a lot of land and therefore agriculture is really an unimportant industry. In truth, only about 13 per cent of Canada's land area is agricultural, nearly one half of which is limited to permanent pasture. Only 7 per cent is suitable for cultivation, and subsequently, field crop production. The real restriction lies in the fact that only 2.4 per cent of Canada's land area is of excellent quality, namely class one and two soil. Most of the urban growth is taking place over these top two categories of soil. Now, the data shows a very different situation. The case is not .4 per cent out of 100 per cent, but rather .4 per cent out of 2.5 per cent, or approximately 20 per cent of our best land has been destroyed by urbanization.

During the past five years 200,000 acres of Ontario farmland were removed from agricultural production for other uses. At Ontario's present rate of farmland destruction, one half of the present foodland will be out of production by the year 2000, and 100 per cent destroyed by the year 2025.

Canadian cities now cover more than 9,000 square miles, most of which were once the very best of a food-producing resource. In the five years between 1966 and 1971, Canadians lost four and a half million acres of prime farmland to urban growth.

It is important to note that of the major cities on the prairies, Winnipeg, Regina, Saskatoon, Lethbridge, Red Deer, Edmonton and Grande Prairie are all built in the middle of old geological lakebeds. That means that every major prairie city except Calgary and Medicine Hat is built on silted out soil; a prime resource for food production. Nearly one half of all land used for urbanization is from the top one twentieth of our food resource land. The reason for this phenomenon is a natural one; towns and cities sprung up and flourished in those areas where the pioneers were able to maintain productive and profitable agriculture.

At the present rate of farmland destruction in Canada, our remaining 24 million acres of class one and two soil could be reduced to as low as nine million acres by the year 2000, at which point Canada could suffer a significant food shortage. To destroy such a vast amount of a non-renewable food-producing resource is morally wrong when four fifths of the world suffer from malnutrition.

Moreover, we need to bear in mind that the world's population increases by 70 million people per year. Therefore the farmer will have to increase his present production by more than 60 per cent before the year 2000 just to maintain our current miserable level of inadequate food supply. I would like to repeat that. Therefore the farmer will have to increase his present production by more than 60 per cent before the year 2000 just to maintain our current miserable level of inadequate food supply.

These are only two sources of food; they are fertile soil and water. In the temperate zone it takes 20,000 years to produce an inch of topsoil. Farmland should obviously be considered as a non-renewable resource. More than 80 per cent of Canadians live on land that is zoned or restricted. Cities have zoning departments to plan and organize growth. Note, however, that planning is practised only when land is treated as a commodity, but void of consideration on resource land. Why has food production become second rate to housing and industrial development? Why does the Minister of Agriculture permit continuence of the use of black soil for backfill for houses and factories, when at the same time the world's greatest need is for food to stave off conditions of malnutrition?

Some will choose to cling blindly to the false position that we have ample farmland. Those who previously took such views have left an unfortunate example but a valued lesson etched in history. The Coliseum in the Roman City of Thysdrus with its 65,000 seats is a conspicuous remnant of a mismananged land. So is much of North Africa, Tunisia, Ceylon, of the Indic region, the slopes of Peru and the City of Jericho, Southern Russia, etc.

It is too easy to conclude that agriculture is secondary to civilization, that industry and commerce are all-important to an advancing culture. The truth is that every human achievement to which the current technology world bears witness is based on successful agriculture, be it domestic or foreign. People who are hungry do not concentrate on cultural advancements as long as there is not enough food. I simply want to underscore, Mr. Speaker, that it is an absolute shame that in a land such as Canada with the food producing capacity we have, with farmers who have the managerial skill, the technical know-how and the willingness to produce in this country, we find only this one bill being placed before us in the second session of the Thirtieth Parliament.

I think it is an incredible mistake that we have been so late in our history coming forward with some piece of legislation showing a federal initiative in terms of the protection of agricultural land. It is one thing to talk about advance crop payments but how can we have any crops at all if we don't have any soil to grow them on? The federal government for example, confiscated 88,000 acres for Mirabel Airport, and talks about confiscating land by the thousands of acres for an airport north of Toronto, all on prime agricultural land. The truth of the matter is that we will not even need an agriculture minister if we are going to wipe out the one resource that produces almost all are food. The fact of the matter is that he only needs to stay around to the year 2,030 at the rate of our present destruction and there won't be any soil, and we won't need him at all. That might be the only advantage attached to the rate at which we are destroying our own farmland.

I just want to underscore that while we don't find fault with the principle of Bill C-2 we have some serious questions to

I hope this sort of thing will not happen under Bill C-2. I hope changes will not be made unless they are announced well in advance. We all recognize that change must come from time to time, but I hope they will not occur in the sort of circumstances I have mentioned in which people face awkward and then uncomfortable situations. Indeed, Department of Agriculture officials at levels below the minister make rulings such as the one which denied purebred status to registered animals. I am not convinced that the minister is aware that that change took place. Yet that decision cost one farmer in my home province nearly $500,000 when his purebred herd was destroyed because it had brucellosis.

To turn to other aspects of Bill C-2, let me say that the advance payments program will not really encourage the production of crops in this country. As I said before, if we are to take our agricultural industry seriously and make it produce even more, we must sell our produce aggressively on the world market. If we do so, our farmers will produce as never before and make a good living. Our present system is less than satisfactory. The ups and downs of the market are often governed by the size of crops. When there is a scarcity, prices go up; but when there is an abundance of produce, as there is at present, it tends to depress the world market. This, in turn, tends to have a depressing effect on the farmer.

Advance payments will not provide the farmer with more money than he would earn from the sale of crops. They are simply an advance of the money he would earn, paid to him at an earlier date. The truth of the matter is that a man cannot operate in that kind of climate.

We on this side of the House are prepared to approve in principle Bill C-2, but we will want to have many details cleared up in committee, because some matters have yet to be specifically dealt with, one of them being consultation with other farm organizations. We shall want to know more about the mechanism through which advance payments will be paid. In other words, is there to be another bureaucracy established, or will the government allow the private sector, which already possesses the necessary organization and structure, to conduct this business?

I forewarn the minister that approval in principle by members on my side of Bill C-2, an act to facilitate the making of advance payments for crops, is by no means to be construed as an indication that we on this side of the House, or farmers across this country, will allow the government to become more involved in agriculture; and I am particularly referring to any supply-management system in respect of beef. In that regard I would like to respond to one of the answers the minister gave in this House in reply to a question by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga). I quote from page 147 of Hansard for October 18, 1976 where the Minister of Agriculture is reported as stating:

—it is obvious that the beef industry needs a supply-management program. It is obvious these producers cannot deal in the world free market under the present conditions and exist.

If there has ever been an example of something in which lack of consultation has taken place, that has to be one of the clearest examples that could be placed before this House.

About two weeks ago, on two days' notice, 300 ranchers gathered in the city of Lethbridge to protest any intentions the minister might have in relation to a supply-management system. On October 22 of this year in the town of Stettler 800 ranchers gathered. They were attempting to disseminate across the four western provinces, on very short notice, a petition which we intend to table in this House. One of the main points of that petition is that we do not want a supply-management system in the beef industry.

I hope the minister will soon recognize that any approval of Bill C-2 and the government's involvement with advance payments on grain is by no way a licence to consider that the Department of Agriculture can go forward and manage all parts of the agricultural sector.

The petition that will be circulated for a very brief period of time has caught on like wild-fire in my province. People from other provinces have started to telephone to see where they can get this petition. What they are saying is that they do not want a supply-management system for the beef industry. That underscores one of the real cautions that we must have with regard to government involvement in industry of any kind.

In the beef industry, there were 29 ad hoc short-term policy pronouncements in a two-year period. That surely is good reason to recognize why the industry is presently in trouble. If supply management is not working well in the poultry business, and not working well in the dairy business, and the minister should be well aware of that, surely it cannot be a program that will work well in the beef industry which operates on a three and one half to five year cycle.

Advance payment on crops is not nearly as important as increasing the amount of foodstuffs. That ought to have been within the programs and obligations of the Minister of Agriculture. His thrust in this legislation ought to have been to recognize the world need for food. In light of that recognition there should have been more than 48 words in the Speech from the Throne related to agriculture. There should be more than Bill C-2 coming before us to give us something that talks about a guarantee to farmers that, if they produce at their maximum, they will be justly rewarded for their production.

There is nothing more urgently needed in world society today than an increase in the amount of foodstuffs. It is abundantly clear that in a year like this, when there has been a surplus of grain and cereal grain production in Canada, one thing that is required is an assurance to farm people that this will not depress their prices. However, no sooner did they raise a bumper crop than the price began to plummet. That came at a time when the Anti-Inflation Board was holding all other people in this country to essentially a 10 per cent increase. However, this group of people, the most important people in our society, have to run the risks in the market place, not because the market is weak but because the Department of Agriculture is failing to sell their product abroad.

and, at best, to 17 million acres. The minister should realize it is not enough to bring in ad hoc or short-term policies, or policies that affect only one sector. We should have an over-all agricultural policy that would help meet the worldwide demand for food.

This bill falls far short of what is needed. It will give an advance payment to farmers, and I have no argument with that; but it does not take into consideration the increased crop production of this country. When we stop to consider that four-fifths of the world's population is suffering from malnutrition, and that every year there are 70 million more mouths to be fed, surely the minister should encourage farmers to produce to maximum capacity. I know he will make the response that our farmers are efficient and have increased their production faster than the non-farming sector of the country. Of course, I do not disagree with that. The minister makes good speeches in this regard. But the fact is this country is falling far short of its capacity.

This year we have abundant crops from the Atlantic to the Pacific. But the Soviet Union, Australia, America, and other major wheat producing countries also have abundant crops. It simply does not make sense, in a year of abundance, to depress prices or be discouraged about finding an outlet for our crops on the world market. The truth of the matter is that Canada's major failing is that it does not sell agricultural products abroad aggressively and forcefully. This country puts agricultural products on the shelf and hopes a buyer will come.

I feel that the Department of Agriculture is under the important obligation of encouraging farmers to produce to the absolute maximum. The department should adopt the attitude that we can sell aggressively on the international market, that we cannot tolerate any longer people living in dire poverty. I challenge the minister, who I know will speak shortly because he wants to catch a flight away from here, to tell the House how he intends to sell food products abroad and how the performance of the agricultural industry, one of this country's major industries, compares with that, say, of the automotive industry.

Let us consider what is happening in the field of meat. We know that the meat industry is one of the three largest in Canada. It is a $3.5 billion industry in Canada, ranks second in the cost of materials used—it spends about $3 billion on materials—spends about $6 million a day on livestock, and employs nearly 33,000 people. Yet when you compare that industry with General Motors or any other industry of the same size, you note that its product is not being sold as aggressively on the markets of the world, markets which obviously have a tremendous need of food.

There is not even full consultation with our producer groups, with farm groups in this country. My colleague for Wetaskiwin has justifiably said that there is no reason at all to seek the establishment, through Bill C-2, of a new organization or structure through which advance payments could be paid to farmers. There is no reason at all for any new bureaucracy.

[Mr. Malone.]

The necessary mechanisms already exist in the private sector in the form of banks which have the personnel for administering the program and for keeping records of transactions which take place. But the government must take the responsibility for the payments.

I should like to underscore three things which ought not to happen as a result of the passage of Bill C-2. First, we feel that farmers do not need, as so often happens when the government passes a law, any extra burden of paperwork. When the government passed its anti-inflation program, one of the biggest complaints of small businessmen was that they were overburdened with paperwork. I hope that will not prove to be the case following passage of Bill C-2.

Second, and more importantly—I hope the minister will lend a careful ear—I hope the payments will not be late, as is traditional when payments of this kind are made through the Canadian Wheat Board.

One of the things that frustrates farmers is that they expect money to come in, but then realize that they can place no dependency on the federal government as to when the payments will be made. If we are to operate a really efficient agricultural industry in this country and maintain it as one of our largest industries, we must make such payments predictable. We must let the farm producer and manager have some clearly defined idea as to when these sorts of finances are to be made available. We must give our farm producers a sense of assurance; they must know that there is a guaranteed period within which advance payments will be made.

Third, if I may raise another point relating to what may happen after the passage of Bill C-2, I hope that this government or this minister will not, as has been traditional, permit a change of the rules in mid-stream. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) should make particularly sure that once the rules have been established they are not changed without due announcement.

I will underscore my concern by relating an example which will show how the Department of Agriculture inflicted a tremendous injustice on certain people in this country by changing certain rules without notice. I am alluding to what happened within the health of animals branch in relation to cattle suffering from brucellosis and Bang's disease. At one time it was held that any animal termed as "registered" was considered a purebred. Then suddenly a case involving diseased cattle ended up in courts because the Department of Agriculture lawyers said that "registered" no longer meant "purebred" animals.

One farmer in my province who owned a purebred herd, a herd registered as sixteen-seventeenths Charolais, was not able to collect. He lost a $500,000 herd because a change had taken place without announcement. The final statement of the judge presiding in the trial was, "I have done my duty; I have ruled in accordance with the law, but I do not believe I have done justice." That is how the judge felt about rules being changed without notice.

seems to me that this has to be the solution, particularly when we have agricultural commodities in the cyclical position in which many of them are.

If in good years when a farmer has a high income he is allowed to put a certain amount of that money away into his own stabilization account, which would be non-taxable, when the cycle turns down he would be able to draw this money from that account. It would then become taxable, but it would take away the apprehension we see in the cattle industry, in the hog industry and in a number of other agricultural industries. When there is an aggregate stabilization plan, the farmer is at the beck and call of the aggregate situation. It could be that this year the western grain stabilization plan will be kicked off because the price of grain may drop a small amount. However, that may not be true because the volume this year is substantially increased and the aggregate income this year may still be very high.

In conclusion, I think the best answer for prairie farmers is not to give them more credit. Even though the situation with regard to advanced payments is not really credit, it still could amount to an interest payment for him. The answer has to be individual income stabilization, and not aggregate stabilization. In the committee we will have many questions to ask about this bill. We will be asking why banks cannot make these advance payments directly to farmers. There will be a number of other questions which I have asked in my speech and which have been raised by other hon. members on this side of the House.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the honour of following the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) and to reiterate some of his excellent remarks. In speaking about Bill C-2, an act to facilitate the making of advance payments for crops, one thing that can be granted to the minister is that he has not fouled up the farming industry as much this time as with most of the other legislation he has brought before the House.

There are some questions about this bill, however, even though it has not done the damage we have witnessed in other legislation put before this parliament. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin noted that one of the very serious concerns we have about the bill is that it speaks about an "organization" being established to administer the funds in the advance payments for crops program, extending beyond the traditional Wheat Board system that has been the practice. But what is the rationale for establishing a whole new organization, a whole new bureaucracy to administer financing to a group of people in the major regions of the country, when the banking institutions are already equipped to handle such an obligation? No response has been forthcoming from the minister, but when we get into committee of the whole I hope he will recommend that we use the existing mechanisms of the banks and treasury branches, etc., to finance the program rather than establish a new bureaucracy.

We do not disagree with the bill in principle. One objection that we make most strongly, however, is that it is the only piece of legislation to flow from the Speech from the Throne. I think it is an insult not just to the Canadian people and not just to the Canadian farmer but to the whole world that there were only 48 words on the subject of agriculture in the Speech from the Throne. No greater problem faces humanity today than the need for food. We know that there are only two sources of food: one is soil and the other is water. Four-fifths of the world's population suffers from malnutrition. We know that 12,000 children each day die of starvation. This means that 12,000 died yesterday, today another 12,000 children died, and 12,000 will die tomorrow. That is the average death rate due to lack of food. That the Speech from the Throne devoted only 48 words to agriculture, and this is the only bill to be brought in as a result, is a shame, Mr. Speaker.

Previous speakers have mentioned the lack of consultation between the government and producers, and this fact cannot be underscored enough. The minister claims there has been consultation with various producer organizations, but he has not established which organizations were involved and investigations on this side of the House have not revealed any consultations. The organizations deny any consultation with the minister in regard to Bill C-2. Obviously, any consultation should come before the enactment of this bill into law, and not as an afterthought.

Clearly, this is the only bill affecting agriculture that will flow from the Speech from the Throne and, clearly, the minister has failed to recognize the serious problems affecting agriculture today. Where is the legislation in respect of soil conservation? The minister well knows that a promise was made to the provinces a decade ago that the federal government would undertake a soil mapping program. This was to establish and unify a soil classification program from coast to coast, indicating areas of rich and poor quality soil—but it has never been completed. The only classification that exists was done more than 30 years ago, so the promised program is long overdue. If we are to have a productive agricultural industry, one of the most important aspects is preservation of present agricultural land, but the minister has taken no steps to establish the promised soil classification and mapping program.

In 1978, Mr. Speaker, the International Soil Science Conference will bring some 3,000 soil scientists to Edmonton from all over the world. The last conference was held in Moscow. As these scientists look at what is happening to agriculture in Canada, they will realize that as a country we are not paying enough attention to this valuable resource. You cannot grow crops unless you have soil, Mr. Speaker. It is all very well for the minister to speak about advance payments for crops in Bill C-2, but he is missing the major point about what is happening in agriculture—that you cannot grow crops if the soil disappears.

There are 24 million acres of class one and class two soils in Canada today. At the present rate of destruction, that figure will be reduced, at worst, to 9 million acres by the year 2000 hundred thousand dollars may be a significant amount to carry.

The final difference is that whereas grain producers market their produce through the Canadian Wheat Board, there is no requirement in Bill C-2 that producers must market their crops through the organization. Presumably they are free, as they are today, to choose their own marketing channel. One wonders what is the purpose of setting up a number of producer groups if, first, they are not necessary to the act as a marketing channel and, second, the banks could perform the lending function more efficiently and more directly. There seems to be little point in getting producer organizations involved in the extension of advance payments when banks are perfectly well equipped to provide loans under the government guarantee.

When we look at the experience with cow-calf grants, we see that farmers in western Canada today go to their district agriculturalists to pick up a form which provides a government guarantee; then they go directly to the bank for the loan. This seems to be a very efficient manner of getting a grant or a loan, but under this proposal the farmer will have to belong to an organization. He gets word from the organization that he is eligible, and the organization then borrows the funds from the bank and turns them over to the producer.

Why involve the organization at all? It seems to me that an amendment could be proposed here to clarify the position and to make it much simpler by allowing the farmer to go to a bank, declare his interest, declare the amount of crop he has, provide the necessary security and get an advance with a government guarantee that if he fails to produce the crop there is some security beyond the collateral he has put up for his loan. So I question the whole procedure advocated in this bill. If in committee we are not satisfied with the answers to these questions, I think it would be logical to propose an amendment to make this a much simpler procedure.

In clause 5(A)(b)(i) of Bill C-2 there is mention of a named buyer. Does this mean that the individual producer must provide the details of the future sale of his crops in order to obtain an advance payment? If so, what would be the implications of this requirement? I have visions of a producer being forced to give the details of his sale well in advance of actually making that sale.

When we look at the case of rapeseed producers in western Canada, we see that many of them sign contracts in advance of seeding to supply to a crusher so many thousand bushels of rapeseed, and the price is set then. But we are talking here about many other commodities the future marketability and price of which we do not know. The price may fluctuate, and if producers tie themselves into a contract they could then get a very much lower price than if they allow the market to work as it will and take the best price possible for their commodities. This is where the advance payment comes in: it allows the farmer to hold on to his commodity until such a time as he can get the best price. But why put this clause in the bill whereby producers must provide the details of their future sales by naming a so-called named buyer?

I must also express my disappointment about the fact that we have this mysterious term "organization" in the bill. Has the minister contacted these organizations and asked whether they are prepared to take this bill under their wing and set up the required mechanisms to put in place the advance payments to the farmers? I have been reading the farm journals and I have been talking to a number of organizations, and none of them has mentioned that they have been asked whether they are prepared to set up this type of arrangement.

As a westerner, I am very familiar with the problems of the prairie farm economy. By and large, these problems are the same as those which plague farmers right across Canada. While it is true that realized net income for Canadian farmers is up 8 per cent over last year, there is a continuous spiral in the cost of farm input—the costs of fertilizer, petroleum, electricity, operation and depreciation are up 15 per cent over last year—and this gives farmers little reason to be happy with their position.

We just heard from the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) that the situation in the export market does not look very bright this year. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) recently returned from the Soviet Union. He said there has been a tremendous crop in that country and that the Soviet Union may not be prepared to provide a market this year. This causes farmers some concern, because they have been getting reasonable prices for their grain for the last couple of years. This year there was a tremendous crop of high quality grain, but things do not look good with regard to a market. They are still faced with these high costs.

Mr. Whelan: They have the grain stabilization program.

Mr. Schellenberger: I have here a table of the Canadian farm input price index and we can compare the index for a number of commodities. We can take the period 1974-1975. The fertilizer index was 161.9 in 1974. In 1975 it jumped to 204.6. While we realize the necessity of the increase in the price of petroleum, petroleum is a major input for farmers and that index has risen from 144.8 to 173, an increase of some 30 points on an index of 100. The index on farm buildings has risen some 24 points, farm machinery from 153 to 178—and we can go on through electricity, hired farm labour, and feed costs. They are all substantially increased. Looking at the same figures for the first two quarters of 1976, we see that they have again increased substantially in every case but fertilizers. So the farmer in Canada is looking at the price for his product, then he looks at the cost to bring that product to market and there is much apprehension.

The minister mentioned that we have the Western Grain Stabilization Act, and perhaps this gives some farmers some comfort, but not very many. I still believe that even though we passed the Western Grain Stabilization Act, the best way to cause farmers the least apprehension about their future is to set up an individual stabilization account for each farmer. It

It would seem that the feed grain policy of this government has had the effect of the producer's barley being sold on the open market at upward of $1 less than what it has been trading for on the world market. In a Cargill Grain Company Limited newsletter it is suggested that the Wheat Board has been selling the new barley crop at very respectable prices with premiums over corn. In effect, the Wheat Board has been selling in excess of $2.30, while sales on the open market are at $1.90, which is much less than its real value.

The article in the Western Producer goes on to say that dry weather in Europe, and weather concerns in the United States corn belt, have combined to increase export feed grain values, and that barley had risen in value at Thunder Bay to $2.78 a bushel. It was considered that there would be a bumper crop of wheat which might be present in the world, but there was not a bumper crop of barley.

The policy of the Minister in charge of the Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) of pricing barley on the Montreal market in relation to Chicago corn has obviously caused a great disservice to western producers. It has meant that somebody has been able to buy a substantial amount of barley at about $1.95, when in effect the selling price was closer to $2.75 or $3. It is not altogether clear who owns this barley, whether it is the Eastern Feed Grain Board or whether it is the brokers and exporters who may well reap almost $1 or $1.50 for it on the open market.

That policy has probably caused the western producers losses of up to $100 million to $200 million, and it has perhaps caused the loss of foreign currency and foreign exports of an equal amount. In effect, it is an attempt to say that two products which are not alike, are alike. In effect, the feed grain policy of the government which tries to equate corn and barley in the Montreal market is not functioning, and in the end it can only lead to losses for everyone concerned and may well bring substantial windfall profits to the people who are fortunate enough to buy barley at this reduced price. That is all I have to say about this bill at present, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, as I rise to speak on this bill today I welcome the proposed legislation because I think it provides greater equity between the Wheat Board area and the growers of crops who do not come under the Wheat Board. This legislation should help the rapeseed grower in particular because in the past he has been unable to get an advance on his crop since it did not come under the jurisdiction of the Wheat Board.

One of the principal questions that has been asked by various members who have spoken on this legislation is about the mysterious wording in which it is couched, specifically the definition of the word "organization". The bill defines "organization" as an organization of producers, and that is as clear as it gets. I suspect that the organization to which the minister refers means such organizations as the Agricultural Federation of Canada, the Rapeseed Growers of Canada, and the potato associations in the various provinces. However, this is unclear. I suppose we will only get a clear definition of this word in the committee, unless the minister, in concluding the debate, clears up this matter.

It is probable that the producer groups which could gain the greatest benefit from these advance payments at present do not qualify because they do not belong to any organization. Let me refer, again, to the rapeseed growers in western Canada, many of whom do not belong to any organization. They grow rapeseed as a cash crop, a crop that has had a good quota in the past. As a result, if markets for this commodity decline, the only way in which they could qualify for an advance is by joining an organization.

Before this legislation becomes acceptable, a number of questions must be answered to satisfy the legitimate concerns of many of the farmers who will be affected. The first question is: If there is no existing organization and producers are forced to set one up in order to qualify for advance payments, who will cover the costs of the expenses incurred in setting it up? The second question is: Who will cover the administration expenses of such organizations? The third question is: What happens to the independent farmer, of whom we have many and who want no truck or trade with producer groups? Will he lose out because of his independent status? The fourth question that comes to mind is: What crops are really covered by this legislation? The bill states that root crops and other field crops will be covered, but I think it should be stated more specifically.

While there are similarities between Bill C-2 and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act of 1957, three major differences separate the two. The first is that the administration of advance payments for grain is carried out by only one organization, namely, the Canadian Wheat Board. Because a number of organizations will be entrusted with the implementation of Bill C-2, there is greater latitude for inequities and inefficiencies, in my view. The disparity in the size of the various organizations and the financial resources available to them are only two of the problems which they will be facing.

The second difference is that while the Canadian Wheat Board is not liable for advance payments made by it, the organizations expending advance payments under Bill C-2 will be liable. Although this liability amounts to only 10 per cent of the actual advance, it is a significant risk because many of these organizations are small. This risk may be particularly onerous for new organizations which will have to be set up to reap the benefits of this act. Under the Advance Payments Act, the amount of money that is still owing to the Wheat Board is not really significant when you consider that over $1 billion has been lent, and of that $1 billion only about $9,385,-000 has not been refunded by producers. But when we read further, we find that by January 31, 1976, everything other than another $4 million has come in, which leaves a balance of $3.8 million to be collected. This is a credit to the farmers of Canada. They have been able to deliver the goods that they promised to deliver to the Wheat Board. The $3 million to the Canadian Wheat Board may not be a significant amount. On the other hand, when it comes to an organization, a few their products shall be marketed through the marketing board. There seems to be substantial reason to believe that an element of supply management and government control over the products encompassed by the bill could be instituted through the application of this legislation. I would be glad to hear the minister explain this point.

I hope the minister will explain that this legislation will not act as a back door for marketing boards and supersede the right of the producers to decide through a plebescite whether or not they desire marketing boards. We have heard a good deal about the plight of agriculture in the last few days. It would seem that there will be leaner times in the immediate future.

Yesterday's Globe and Mail reported the observation of the Anti-Inflation Board that food prices are going down. I think it can fairly be said that most of the decline resulted from prices at the farm gate and not, as has been suggested by the AIB, in the retailing and processing or distribution end of the business. For instance, the outlook for sales by the Wheat Board does not appear to be good. Certainly on the Chicago exchange the world traders indicate they feel that what they think should be the price of wheat has shown a drastic fall in the last year. Perhaps media sources and worldwide communications tend to exaggerate the effects of drought and natural disasters and the expectation that food sales and food exports will always continue to rise.

Indeed, with the anticipated rise in world oil prices in the immediate future we can anticipate that world trade in food products may drop. Certainly it can be said that the world can only consume the most that it has in its worst year. There are bound to be periods of surplus far into the future. Indeed, if there were not, it is obvious that many people would starve when the inevitable natural disasters reduce the world supply.

Exports of agricultural products are an important source of foreign exchange and have a great effect on the standard of living of Canadians. Generally speaking, we have exported more agricultural products than we have imported. This has not always been the case. Should world trade drop, we would find severe competition from American grain growers who seem to have increased their efficiency substantially more than the western Canadian farmers. The structure of the western grain industry, which provides nearly all the exportable surplus of food from this country, has changed substantially in the past eight years. Many people have left the farms, which means that productivity is dependent on greater use of machines. However, with the expected and, indeed, inevitable rise in farm costs both in respect of machinery and fuel there may well be a relatively greater rise in the cost of production in Canada than in some of the other exporting countries. Indeed, we hear a great deal about how much higher prices are in Canada than in the United States in respect of comparable commodities, both in relation to production and transportation. Agriculture is no exception. Certainly, our cost of production and transportation will be higher than is the case in respect of our neighbour to the south.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

Canadian agricultural policies in many instances appear to help denude the farms of manpower. It is true that farms are not as attractive for most people as are alternative jobs in towns, villages and cities. Many agricultural policies projected by the federal and provincial governments seem to have hurried the change-over from labour-intensive agriculture to capital-intensive agriculture. This has promoted the holding of larger farms and perhaps more immediate efficiency, but it also raises the question of whether or not this is important in relation to strong agricultural industry. Much of the efficiency of agriculture during the past 25 years can be attributed to relatively cheap oil and gas and the attendant input of fertilizer and herbicides made from oil and gas. With the projected rise in prices of these inputs, agriculture could face some rather severe adjustments and in the long run there could be relatively higher prices for food for the consumer.

I should like to turn to a few comments about our present agricultural policy which I think deserve attention. There is an editorial in the Western Producer of October 7 under the headline, "It's time to make changes in two-price wheat policy". This article points out that since 1973 Canadian millers have been buying wheat from the Wheat Board at $3.25 per bushel for Canadian consumption, with the difference being made up by the federal treasury when prices were between $4.75 and $5., and the farmers contributed to the program when world prices were above $5.

Now, wheat prices have dropped drastically. In September the selling price of No. 1 CW red spring wheat at Thunder Bay was $3.43, almost $2 less than a year ago. It seems likely that it will go even lower, given the amount of wheat on hand throughout the world. It is pointed out than an immediate review of this two-price system should be instituted. The Wheat Board has said it has sold large volumes of grain on international markets for future delivery, but it is not altogether clear whether this grain is in the hands of the importers or whether it has merely been sold to brokers and will have to be resold on world markets some time in the future.

Certainly, the farmers of western Canada face greatly reduced prices. The minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board has announced that he asked the Canadian Federation of Agriculture to ascertain what is the proper floor for wheat sold to Canadian millers, and that they stated they need cost-plus, and so on. I think it is important that this be done immediately.

I would also like to point out what I think has prevented the sale of a considerable volume of Canadian barley abroad and has reduced the sale value of Canadian barley to the producers by perhaps $100 million, and which has perhaps prevented the increase of foreign currency by that amount. I refer to the policy in respect of barley sales into the eastern market. In the Western Producer or October 7 it is reported that Cargill Grain Company and the Palliser Wheat Growers' Association suggests that farmers should hold their barley off the open market, as selling prices will be much higher.

like the federal Liberals, seem totally unconcerned about the future or the well-being of the farm community. Having heard some of the speeches made by hon. members to my right, I am not convinced they are prepared to offer effective policies to help farmers in the uncertainties they face today. Simply providing advance payments to certain crop producers is not enough to alleviate those uncertainties. Adequate stabilization of farm income should be the first priority of the Minister of Agriculture. The same message should be passed along to hon. members to my right. They, in turn, could tell the provincial government of Ontario what is needed to help farmers.

I should like to reiterate a number of points which have been made by speakers before me of which I trust the minister has taken note. To begin with, there was little or no consultation with farm groups while this bill was in course of preparation. Then, again, the bill comes to us without the customary explanatory notes, so we are left up in the air in some respects. Further, I would ask the minister this question: When will payments be made? No dates are specified in the bill, and I would point out that payments made by government are invariably late—witness, for example, crop insurance payments.

I have another question: What happens to a producer if he has accepted a payment and fails to find a market for his produce? Neither the Liberals nor the Conservatives appear to be willing to endorse the provision of adequate marketing measures to ensure there will be a market for particular crops. Neither, it seems, is willing to institute a system whereby a fair price and a fair market are ensured.

In conclusion, let me say I am sure the ambiguities we find in the bill will be ironed out in committee. One may be forgiven for thinking that farmers generally are likely to be thankful for anything they can get. At the same time, the government should not delude itself into thinking that this bill alone will solve the many problems facing farmers. I congratulate the minister on having brought forward this measure. To date I have not received much reaction from the farmers in my community, but next week I intend to discuss the legislation with them to get their views. I hope their criticism will be constructive, and I undertake to pass it on to the minister.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie).

Some hon. Members: One o'clock!

Mr. Ritchie: May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At 12.55 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, when I called it one o'clock I was somewhat discomfited by the comment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that that was the best speech I had made. I should like to say that I hope to do a little better.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I think I said "the most effective".

Mr. Ritchie: I welcome the introduction of Bill C-2 which appears to provide a vehicle that might help producers of grain who find themselves in a position of oversupply, as some certainly will in the future. The introduction of this bill is an indication that the government anticipates surpluses building up in the very near future in various fields. We do not need to look too far ahead to anticipate severe build-ups of some of our export grain. As a matter of fact, this appears to have already occurred with wheat.

Before passing judgment on the feasibility of covering in this program much of our storing crops, as the minister calls them, I should like to hear from tthe minister a more detailed explanation of how the program will be administered. He mentioned that the Wheat Board has indicated a very low level of default and that the program showed a very small amount was not recovered. However, the minister, not being from western Canada, is perhaps unaware that the Wheat Board, through the permit system, has pretty well absolute control over the disposal of grain from the farm. A producer must register with the Wheat Board at the beginning of the crop year his acreage, and extensive aerial photography can easily disclose any discrepancy between what is actually under cultivation and what the Wheat Board permit indicates is being cultivated.

In this way any great discrepancy in acreage is fairly readily checked and at least gross excesses can be covered. As a matter of fact, it is illegal to sell wheat outside the jurisdiction of the Wheat Board in most instances, and indeed there are very few avenues for the sale of feed grains, oats and barley not covered by Wheat Board permits. About the only avenue is farm to farm sales, which usually are not in large quantities.

As the minister said, this bill covers many different products. Most are not under the rigid control that the Wheat Board exercises over the movement of western wheat, oats and barley. Therefore, I will be interested to hear from the minister in detail during committee stage how he intends to cope with many of these products, each with numerous marketing avenues in which growers may be very loosely organized through their growers associations. The minister mentioned the word "organizations" a good many times. For example, does he have reference to the Canadian Seed Growers Association, or the Canadian Forage growers; and how will he police this provision? I suggest it is a different matter from policing it under the auspices of the Wheat Board, with their rigid and far-reaching legal controls on grains.

There is also another effect that we have to consider, and that is, is this a back door to the industry for marketing boards and supply management? I think it is most important, wherever supply management or marketing board policies are introduced, that the producers be made fully aware of the consequences and that a plebiscite be held on whether or not

PUBLICATION "CONSERVATION CANADA"

Question No. 330—Mr. Herbert:

1. How many copies are printed of the publication Conservation Canada?

2. What is the cost per copy?

3. In the Autumn 1976 edition, what is the estimated cost saving if the format had been bilingual pages with only single reproduction of the photographs?

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. 37,025 copies were printed of the most recent issue, Autumn 1976.

2. 25.3 cents per copy.

3. It is estimated that bilingual pages with only single reproduction of the photographs would result in an additional cost of three cents per copy. Such a format was used prior to June, 1976. Cost of printing at that time was 28 cents per copy.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ADVANCE PAYMENTS FOR CROPS ACT

MEASURE TO FACILITATE MAKING ADVANCE PAYMENTS FOR CROPS

The House resumed, from Wednesday, October 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Whelan that Bill C-2, to facilitate the making of advance payments for crops, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I am going to speak very briefly. That is not because the bill is unimportant; It is extremely important. However, I am not able to be here this afternoon. We in this party believe that Bill C-2 is long overdue. The farmers of Ontario, eastern Canada and in some instances western Canada, have been waiting for as long as 18 years.

As the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) said in the House on Wednesday, producers of wheat, oats and barley in Canadian Wheat Board designated areas have been able to receive advance payments for their crops since 1958. I might add that to the best of my knowledge it was the CCF government in Saskatchewan which pushed for this back in the fifties. Why have crop farmers had to wait 18 years to receive somewhat the same benefits? I hope other farm related legislation will not have to wait the same length of time to be introduced.

It was interesting to note that the Minister of Agriculture went on to discuss other programs which he claimed provided stability to farmers. Specifically, he referred to the Agricultural Stabilization Act. I remember, and farmers across the country also recall, the debate surrounding Bill C-50 in the first session of this parliament. That bill amended the act so that producers could receive 90 per cent of the last five-year average rather than 80 per cent of the last ten-year average. We argued then, and farmers since then have expressed their dissatisfaction with the fact that the Agricultural Stabilization Act as presently written does little or nothing to take into account present production costs. An historical average offers no price protection at all unless it is fully and fairly indexed to production costs.

As a brief aside, I would also like to comment on the remarks made by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise) in last Wednesday's debate. He suggested, and I agree, that Bill C-2 is simply piecemeal legislation which will not resolve the major problems of the farm community.

At the same time, I would be interested in hearing the hon. member's comments on the stabilization plan introduced by his colleagues at Queen's Park. The provincial plan is much along the lines of the federal plan in that it would provide minimum support for named commodities at 90 per cent of the average for the last five years. The provincial Conservatives, raise questions in the House of Commons. Others of us have used different forums, which all members know exist in Ottawa, to make representations as members of parliament. The hon. member chooses one forum; we choose others. That does not say we are any less concerned or diligent in the efforts or representations we make on behalf of the people of Newfoundland with regard to this very vital issue, particularly on behalf of our fishermen. We are just as diligent. The facts will show that we are just as effective.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that aspersions like this should not be cast by the hon. member against those of us on this side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I regret the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Rompkey) has taken the time of the House on a matter about which he has demonstrated an unusual degree of sensitivity. I refer to the fact, and it is a fact, that the hon. member has been conspicuously quiet in this House since this matter was first raised, at the commencement of the year, as the first of four disasters we have had since January. What prompted my question today was an announcement made outside the House yesterday, on behalf of the government, by the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador.

In view of repeated representations made in the House by members on this side, and in view of the fact that a petition was presented to the House with some 40,000 names on it, a unanimous resolution presented to the government by the Newfoundland legislature, and a very serious tragedy occurring last week in which 13 lives were lost, surely it is not too much to expect the government to make such an announcement in the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Both hon. members, for whose contribution I am grateful, realize, I am sure, that there is a difference between them that does not constitute a question of privilege.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. With regard to the question raised by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey), I want to make it clear that no plants are under detention. I did not want to create the impression that there are plants operating which do not meet our inspection criteria. Every plant in Canada under CBA inspection that is shipping beef is operating according to our rules and regulations. Consumers in Canada have the safest meat in the world.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 87, 284 and 330.

I beg, Mr. Speaker, that the other questions be allowed to stand.

KEDCO PRODUCTS LIMITED

Question No. 87—Mr. Cossitt:

Did the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs communicate on June 21, 1976 through their Sherbrooke, Quebec Office with Kedco Products Limited, Box 340, Brockville, Ontario, entirely in the French language and, if so (a) for what reason was this document sent in French only to an English business operating in an almost entirely English speaking area (b) how is this consistent with the government's policy of ensuring that every citizen of Canada can expect communication with the government in the official language which is their mother tongue (c) will steps be taken to immediately rectify this situation by sending a similar document in the English language?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): On June 21, 1976, the Sherbrooke, P.Q. office of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs forwarded a Notice for Trustee Discharge to Multi-Advertising Specialties, P.O. Box 94, Brockville, Ontario. This document was in the French language only and was relative to the bankruptcy of a Mr. Léo Bérubé, 209 Bellevue, Sherbrooke, P.Q. (a) It is by error that the document was sent in the French language only to an English business firm operating in Brockville, Ontario. (b) The original document relative to this bankruptcy was sent to Multi-Advertising Specialties in Brockville, on June 10, 1974 and was a bilingual notice of bankruptcy. (c) On July 15, 1976, an English version of the document sent on June 21, 1976 was forwarded to Multi-Advertising Specialties, P.O. Box 94, Brockville, Ontario.

parliamentary secretary to the House leader, followed the development of this issue as it arose from time to time. I was particularly attentive to replies made by parliamentary secretaries relating to information sought. I never heard any parliamentary secretary even attempt to announce a question of policy or attempt to reply to any question seeking information about government policy.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is nonsense.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, if that is nonsense, I invite the opposition House leader to indicate where that has taken place.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I will.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) in a question asked for information. He obtained that information.

Mr. Nielsen: No, I did not.

Mr. Blais: Perhaps he is not satisfied with the reply he obtained yesterday. He forgot to mention that the problem relating to Dorchester had been sorted out. Evidently, the precautions referred to yesterday by the parliamentary secretary had been taken. The result was that the hostage-taking incident was completely deflated.

Mr. Nielsen: But my question was not answered.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I am serious about this matter. I am not trying to enter into a partisan political discussion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Smile when you say that.

Mr. Blais: I readily accept the honourable effort the opposition House leader made to justify the position of the right hon. member for Prince Albert. I sympathise with the opposition House leader's attempt to defend a losing case. As a practising lawyer, I have often been in that position. It is a most frustrating and difficult experience. However, I think we are taking up valuable House time on a point sorted out on a number of occasions previously.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have the matter under very careful consideration. Regrettably, one of the most interesting aspects of the question so far as the Chair is concerned is this: it is a well recognized principle of the operations of the House that although members of the House have the right to put questions during the question period, there is no corresponding obligation to answer. The failure to answer, or the quality of an answer has been ruled as not being a ground for a question of privilege. The quality of an answer, the failure to answer, the quality of performance—or content, if that is the right description—which may lead to any continued failure to make an answer are matters of long-time political responsibility, not technical responsibility, under the procedures of the House.

If, therefore, there is no obligation to answer questions put, it is difficult to say that a mere attempt to answer on the part of a parliamentary secretary, acting minister or another acting in his stead is not an adequate response when no response is required by the rules. That, to me, is an interesting procedural aspect of the matter which was not raised in today's discussion. In any case, to get back to the procedural point raised by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), obviously it is a matter of great concern. The Chair must always recognize that there are occasions when the niceties of procedure simply do not enable the rules exactly to fit the kinds of tensions and difficulties that can arise from the practices of this House.

While the technical requirements of a question of privilege may not apply to this particular situation, it is like others that arise from time to time when the intense interest in the debate at least signals to us that we have an area of deep concern which touches all members of the House and raises great concern on both sides in respect of the rights of members to seek information through the question period, which all defend as not only a vigorous exercise but one that sets us apart in terms of quality from some other parliaments of the world, and one about which we can be justifiably proud. Certainly, all of us want to do everything possible to ensure that the question period in this House of Commons continues to have the vitality for which it is famous. Therefore, the points that have been raised and discussed so vigorously are not lost.

Whether there is a procedural answer to the problem is very difficult for me to say. However, I do say to the House that I have no obligation to carry on in this matter because there is no motion associated with it. I do want to assure the House that I will continue my interest in these remarks today to see whether some solution can be found in the near future to clarify the status of parliamentary secretaries in this regard.

MR. ROMPKEY—REMARKS OF MR. McGRATH DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. William Rompkey (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a question of privilege. It arises out of remarks made by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) during the question period with regard to search and rescue operations in Newfoundland. I wish to point out that there is more than one forum for making representations in Ottawa as a member of parliament. The hon. member may choose the forum of the House of Commons. That is a legitimate way to make representations. I give him full marks for the way he makes use of that forum: his constituents will, too. However, let him not give the impression that that is the only way in which a member of parliament makes representations.

We on this side have been diligent in making representations, even though they may be made in different ways. My colleague, the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker) is a parliamentary secretary and, therefore, is unable to

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I realize that the question raised affects the privileges of all members of the House. By coincidence or design, it affects my own personal privileges as they relate to the question I raised yesterday.

The deputy prime minister, the government House leader, has made a critical attack on the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). I was a member of this House when my party was sitting on the government side, hon. members opposite were sitting on this side and the deputy prime minister was sitting in the opposition gallery. I can compare the conduct of the two ministries and say that there is no foundation for the attack by the government House leader on the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert. I say that from my point of view.

Today, the government House leader convicted himself with the very words he uttered. He said that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) should not be burdened with questions, but that they should be directed to individual ministers or acting ministers. It has long been the custom and invariable practice in this House—and I am sure it still is—that when ministers are away, acting ministers are appointed. Yesterday I directed a question to the Prime Minister. My words will be found on page 538 of Hansard for yesterday. I directed a question to the Prime Minister, or to the acting solicitor general who was sitting in the House. The acting minister was the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Allmand). My question concerned a life which was in danger in Dorchester penitentiary. I asked my question yesterday, Thursday, the day when there is normally a cabinet meeting in the morning. It would be a callous cabinet indeed which would not have discussed the danger of the situation in which a prison guard had been taken hostage. That knowledge was fixed in the minds of cabinet members, but not in the mind of the parliamentary secretary.

In our system, sir, where ministers of the Crown are accountable the principle of responsibility of ministers is paramount. Parliamentary secretaries are not accountable. They are not responsible for the actions of the government and they are certainly not privy to cabinet decisions. Therefore, they cannot answer properly and informatively questions such as the two I raised yesterday which were answered by the parliamentary secretary. Indeed, the very answers will disclose how irresponsible and non-accountable parliamentary secretaries are—and I do not say that in any denigrating sense in this case.

In substance, the parliamentary secretary responded to my questions by saying, "I can assure the hon. member that we are taking all necessary precautions." That, essentially, was his reply to my question concerning the Farris recommendations, or the inquiry into the riot involving the hostage-taking incident in the B.C. penitentiary which eventually resulted in the death of one of the hostages. I wanted to know if the policy of controlling the situation from Ottawa was being followed in the Dorchester incident, because Mr. Justice Farris had found that that control from Ottawa of the B.C. penitentiary situation was a major, contributing factor to that death. He felt that the responsibility should be left with the administration of the prison on the spot because the people who were there could see what was developing and deal with it. The parliamentary secretary answered my question by saying, in so many words, "I can assure the hon. member that we are taking all necessary precautions."

The acting solicitor general would have known if Ottawa was in control or if Dorchester was in control. The Prime Minister or any member of the cabinet would have known, the cabinet undoubtedly having discussed the matter at the regular Thursday morning cabinet meeting. It would be a callous cabinet that would not have discussed it. For those reasons, sir, I submit that the general question of privilege raised by the right hon. gentleman is valid and should be dealt with. My own question of privilege which is involved in this matter illustrates that the original question of privilege as raised has substance and should be dealt with. We should not have parliamentary secretaries who are not accountable or responsible for the ministry answering questions such as the ones I raised.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be brief. The question raised concerns the responsibilities of parliamentary secretaries in replying to questions. As the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) indicated, previously he sponsored the Parliamentary Secretaries Act. He is on record as recognizing the right of parliamentary secretaries to reply to questions in the House, in accordance with section 3 of that bill which includes the following language:

> The parliamentary secretary . . .to a minister shall assist the minister in such manner as the minister directs.

It has been the practice of this House for ministers, when they are to be absent from the House, to direct parliamentary secretaries either to take notice of or reply to questions relating to information sought by members of the opposition. Yesterday, information was requested by way of a question. That information was supplied by the parliamentary secretary. No one denies that a parliamentary secretary cannot, in replying, state questions of policy. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) argued that in effect the parliamentary secretary represents in this House, in the absence of the minister, the minister who has responsibility for that particular department.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): No.

Mr. Blais: The minister must accept responsibility relating to the administration of his department. Mr. Speaker, that has been the practice in the past and it has been accepted. The opposition House leader quoted the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Roberts), as he then was; he is now Secretary of State. It is clearly indicated, according to the words quoted, that the parliamentary secretary has a responsibility within the confines of his minister's responsibility. Those are the responsibilities which a parliamentary secretary in this House has accepted. In the previous session of this parliament, I, as

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I shall continue, Mr. Speaker. You must forgive me; it is sometimes too difficult to restrain myself. In any event, he is the heir apparent to that sagging carcass of a government over there. He had something to say in the same debate. He was a prestigious member of the government. This is what he said on the same subject as reported at page 1061 of Hansard:

> Then this whole question could be aired, as it should, because it involves the rights of private members who, despite the fact that they are appointed parliamentary secretaries, have no responsibility in the ministry, do not take that oath and owe responsibility to their ministers alone and to the Prime Minister.

They do not take the oath, Mr. Speaker. That is a vital difference.

An hon. Member: Wrong.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I refer to the cabinet oath. The right hon. member for Prince Albert was correct. I have here the report of the debate in this House on April 8, 1959, when the right hon. member participated on the question of establishing the position of parliamentary secretary. In answer to a question from the hon. member for Kootenay West in the course of the debate, the right hon. member, then prime minister, said:

> The hon. member for Kootenay West asked whether the parliamentary secretaries are to be given the status of junior ministers—

Not regular ministers, Mr. Speaker, but junior ministers, bearing in mind that in our system we have a single level of ministers. With respect to his intentions at that time, he said:

> —and without any qualification in this regard I say that they are not.

The facts are that under the Standing Orders of this House, in accordance with all parliamentary precedent that there is, in accordance with the report that was made years ago by Sir Grant Murray and referred to in the debate by the right hon. member for Prince Albert back in 1959, out of the mouth of the former member for Ottawa-Carleton, out of the mouth of the present Secretary of State in this government—such as it is—all those statements label as absolute trash and nonsense that which we just heard from the government House Leader.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I am very happy that the right hon. member for Prince Albert raised this question. It is a matter that has plagued this House—and the more ministers travel, and legitimately—

Mr. McGrath: The more ministers resign.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): —the more ministers, by their responsibilities, are taken out of this House, the more important it is that members of the opposition, if they are to exercise their right in the question period, obtain authoritative answers from either an acting minister—not a parliamentary secretary—or from the head of government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

Mr. MacEachen: No, sir; that would destroy our system for political purposes.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I add that there is some value and some problems attached to being a parliamentary secretary. My predecessor—and I believe Your Honour as well—has stated that they occupy a special position, and that is a position which deprives them of certain rights in the question period and certain access to the question period. That question has been debated in this House before. But, sir, when a prime minister asks a member to serve as a parliamentary secretary he gives him a choice, that is to either accept or reject. If he accepts, then he is bound by the strictures of the office. If he rejects, then he has all the freedom which the rules and traditions and you, sir, give to members.

That does not take away the clear delineation of responsibility, ministerial responsibility and collective ministerial responsibility. I think the right hon. member has raised an important matter and I am very happy to be associated with him in this debate. He was the instigator of this privilege to enable backbenchers to get some training. It does not lie in the mouth of any parliamentary secretary, any minister, any government House Leader or the government whip—who always has something lying in his mouth—to suggest that in order to provide a training ground for parliamentary secretaries they must step into an area where, by tradition, by practice, by precedent and all reasonable understanding of the parliamentary system, they have no right to be.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has been endeavouring to get the floor. We are faced with two very serious difficulties. I think all hon. members realize that, first, the point was raised by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) as a question of privilege. The Chair is relieved of having to decide at the moment whether there is any validity to the question of privilege, because the right hon. member said he did not have any motion to conclude his remarks; therefore, no action is asked of the Chair.

We are having a very interesting discussion about the position of parliamentary secretaries. We are doing it, however, on what is now well recognized as a non-question of privilege which has no motion attached to it. It is, therefore, at least very difficult for the Chair to let it go on very long, and in any case it is difficult to take action on. Whether the question could be resolved now, or in some other way, I am not sure. Certainly, the debate is very enlightening; but I do not want to prolong it, on the basis that it is essentially a non-question of privilege.

The hon. member for Yukon has been seeking the floor, and if he has anything to add I would be very happy to hear him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that the principal participants in this discussion are more than able to look after their own interests in the debate, without support from either side, and I would appreciate being able to hear them.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I was just going to say, before those jackals went at us—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): —that if it is the desire of the government leader in the House of Commons to give parliamentary secretaries a greater role in the work of this House, I suggest he should set a better example. He could set an example by referring directly to the question of privilege which was raised by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), rather than engaging in his own polemics with respect to a matter which is rather important to this House and which has been raised before.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I do not know whether it has occurred to the government House leader, but the Standing Orders of this House—which govern our proceedings—have something to say about the role of parliamentary secretaries in these proceedings. I shall refer to those rules because, the matter having been raised, I think it is important that it be settled. Standing Order 15(3), at page 10 of the Standing Orders, reads:

On statements by ministers, as listed in section (2) of this Standing Order, a minister of the Crown may make a short factual announcement or statement of government policy.

That Standing Order does not refer to parliamentary secretaries.

Mr. Blais: We are dealing with the question period.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Let me finish. Standing Order 39(5) of that rule reads as follows:

Before the orders of the day are proceeded with, questions on matters of urgency may be addressed orally to ministers of the Crown—

Again, not to parliamentary secretaries.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Proceeding to Standing Order 40(3), we read the following:

The member raising the matter may speak for not more than seven minutes.

This is where the parliamentary secretary is allowed to make a parliamentary response, in the adjournment debate, and that is the only place he is given authority, under our Standing Orders, to answer for anything, policy or otherwise, whether parliamentary secretaries like it or not. Standing Order 40(3) continues:

A minister of the Crown, or a parliamentary secretary speaking on behalf of a minister, if he wishes to do so, may speak for not more than three minutes.

That is what the Standing Orders say. The reason the parliamentary secretary is singled out particularly with respect to the adjournment debate is that that was the place where the Procedure and Organization Committee, in advancing these rules in the context of the law as it existed—as explained by the right hon. member for Prince Albert—determined parliamentary secretaries could take part in that capacity. The committee, having singled that out, it is my respectful submission that the omission with respect to other responsibilities is very clear: they have no responsibilities in those other areas. Why ought they not to? The right hon. member for Prince Albert referred to that, and other members who will speak will refer to it. But there is a very good reason, Mr. Speaker. One of the more distinguished members of the House of Commons who told us why parliamentary secretaries have no responsibility is the present Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts), at that time the hon. member for St. Paul's. On November 5, 1974, a question was raised in this House and the Secretary of State, who unfortunately is not here and perhaps could contribute to the further understanding of the point put forward by the government House Leader, said as reported at page 1062 of Hansard:

● (1220)

There is a difference between the position of a parliamentary secretary and that of a minister. Ministers are collectively responsible——for the presentation of government policy and programs; they speak with many voices.

Not individually, as the government House Leader said, but collectively responsible.

Of course, that is the problem with this government, Mr. Speaker; it speaks with many voices. He went on to say:

Parliamentary secretaries are not part of the government; they are not part of the collective responsibility of the government; they are not bound by the obligation to speak with a common voice, as are members of the cabinet. Governmental responsibility, in so far as it exists, exists within the confines of the responsibilities of the minister whose parliamentary secretary one is. Outside the bounds of that responsibility the parliamentary secretary does not participate, nor does he have special access to the decision-making process of government.

That is why we do not ask him questions, Mr. Speaker. He does not have access to the decision-making process of the government. The hon. member went on to say:

Within the bounds of their departmental activities they do not have that right—

Another distinguished member of the government who left to occupy the board rooms of Bay Street—the barefoot boy from Bay Street, the former member for Ottawa-Carleton—had something to say about that. You will recall him, Mr. Speaker: he is the one who suddenly found his tongue with respect to freedom of information at the Canadian Bar Association meeting.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He is the one, as well—of Canada realized exactly the arrogance to which we are subjected.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I say, sir, that you, as the protector of the privileges of parliament, have a duty in this connection. I will not move a motion today; I will give consideration to it. But I hope the Prime Minister will not be cowardly enough to disappear again when a motion comes up.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I know that it has been the custom in the House to extend additional consideration to the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker).

Mr. Diefenbaker: Never, at any time.

Mr. MacEachen: But I believe it is really going too far to permit him, under the guise of a question of privilege or a point of order, to make a direct, personal attack on the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I do not believe that, if he has the respect for parliament that he alleges he was, he would behave in this way, in the absence of the Prime Minister and on a matter in which he introduced all sorts of preliminaries. It is true that the Prime Minister had to leave the House. He had to leave the House to meet Cardinal Slipj, the primate of the Greek church—

Mr. Diefenbaker: He left because he was afraid.

Mr. MacEachen: —with whom he had an appointment at twelve o'clock.

Mr. Gillies: Which is more important?

• (1210)

Mr. MacEachen: I understand that Cardinal Slipj saw the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert earlier in the week, and I am sure the right hon. gentleman was quite punctilious in keeping his appointment with this person.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: We are accustomed to receiving these little homilies from the right hon. gentleman about parliament and how it ought to operate, but his views about the operation of parliament were fully disclosed when he was prime minister of Canada and attempted to bring under his own control all the aspects of government and failed to recognize the principle of ministerial responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I want to remind the right hon. gentleman and all hon. members of the House that when persons are sworn into the ministry under the principle of ministerial responsibility, those ministers—and not the Prime Minister—are responsible to the House of Commons for the administration of their portfolios. No prime minister, under the principle of ministerial responsibility, can substitute himself for a minister with respect to responsibility to the House of Commons.

Hon. members opposite have totally misunderstood that principle because they have increasingly attempted to ask the Prime Minister questions which ought properly to be directed to ministers who, under our system, are responsible to parliament. This is not the responsibility of the Prime Minister. The right hon. member for Prince Albert has never understood that—not today, and not when he was prime minister of Canada. But as government leader in the House I advise the Prime Minister to leave it to his ministers to answer questions in the House and, in the absence of a minister, to leave it to the acting minister or the parliamentary secretary to deal with these questions.

I believe it is an abuse of our system of ministerial responsibility to attempt to substitute the Prime Minister for every minister in the House and to make him responsible for every particular item which ought to be the responsibility of the minister concerned. As far as I am concerned, that is the philosophy I will support, with the Prime Minister, in his conduct in the House.

The right hon. gentleman said that he had asked the Prime Minister for an answer on a question of policy and the answer was given by the parliamentary secretary. With respect to parliamentary secretaries, I believe they ought to have a role in the House, and I believe that the right hon. gentleman ought to be among those in the House who would encourage parliamentary secretaries to participate and to gain experience in the House of Commons during the question period. However, he has conducted a vendetta, really, against parliamentary secretaries, and particularly against the present Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin) when she was parliamentary secretary to the secretary of state for external affairs.

If the right hon. gentleman expected an answer on a question of policy on the orders of the day, then, again, he misunderstands the rules of the House of Commons, because questions of policy are not to be answered in reply to questions on the orders of the day. Mr. Speaker, you have frequently ruled, and other Speakers before you have frequently ruled, that the question period is not an appropriate occasion to seek statements of policy from ministers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the statement we have just heard from the government House leader is the worst pile of trash I have ever heard with respect to this important question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): If it is his desire—

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

REASON FOR DISCONTINUANCE OF LOANS TO NURSING HOMES

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): My question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the fact that CMHC is no longer lending moneys to organizations for the financing of nursing homes, and the construction of many of these facilities is being delayed or cancelled because of this fact, would the minister reconsider this policy?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, CMHC was never really in the business of lending funds for nursing homes. There were some extended facilities for senior citizens' housing projects. This has been suspended because a lot of that work comes under provincial ministries of health. We do work in close co-operation with them, however, and are reasonably flexible in extending our facilities to accommodate the residents. The difficulty we have is partially one of jurisdiction, but also of budgets. If we get into another area of health care in which we are not expert, we will not have funding for housing for many more senior citizens in this country.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DIEFENBAKER—CONDUCT OF PRIME MINISTER DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Stick around, Pierre.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I want to deal with him, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Don't go away, Pierre.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have been watching the Prime Minister in the last ten minutes or so and—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —his whole attitude implied that he realizes what he did here today. Instead of staying in the House, not having his canoe available he leaves the House because he realizes what he has done.

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: You are wasting the time of the House.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Today I tried to ask a question that is of deep concern to Canadians everywhere, regarding the serious situation in penal institutions in which inmates are taking it upon themselves to punish sexual wrong-doing as they see fit. They have their own set of values in this regard. I asked the Prime Minister a very simple question, namely, whether, having regard to what happened in Millhaven and the hostage occurrence in Dorchester, in the absence of the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) he would direct or suggest that those who have committed sexual perversions should be placed in one institution where they will be away from the danger of kangaroo courts, and also have treatment available to them. This is a question that people across this country are asking.

What was the attitude of the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau). I have been here under three prime ministers, and I have never witnessed a more degrading and contemptuous attitude than the one he showed here today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: He turned around to a parliamentary secretary in order to reply to a responsible question from a member of this House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I heard a "moo" over there, Mr. Speaker. It just shows the degree to which he and others over there are being cowed today. Parliament lives if respect is shown to it. There was no respect today on the part of the Prime Minister.

An hon. Member: So what's new?

Mr. Diefenbaker: As I have said before, I know something of the position of parliamentary secretaries. It was my government that brought in the legislation to provide for parliamentary secretaries being so designated, rather than as parliamentary assistants which was the previous designation to give them a position in the House. That was the reason for the change. A parliamentary secretary has no authority or right to answer on questions of policy, because he is not a member of the Privy Council or of the cabinet. However estimable are those who hold that position, they have certain duties that they can perform, but not to assume the position of a minister of the Crown. So far as the Prime Minister's attitude today is concerned, he will be applauded by his friend, Castro.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: Even your colleagues are ashamed of that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Never have I seen this House treated as contemptuously as we were by the Prime Minister today. We recall 1956, when those occupying the treasury benches followed a similar course—and we know what happened.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have risen on a question of privilege and I shall give consideration to making a motion. But when you have a Prime Minister who treats the House and members of parliament with that attitude, it is time the people

Oral Questions

LOTO CANADA

POSSIBILITY WINNING TICKETS NOT SOLD—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ENSURE TICKET PURCHASERS OPPORTUNITY TO WIN

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board who I believe answers for Loto Canada. In view of the revelation that three million dollar winning tickets in the olympic lottery were not sold, can a similar situation arise with regard to Loto Canada and is this in the spirit of the legislation?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, for some time yet Loto Canada will still be under my responsibility, the first drawing to take place in December. The point raised by the hon. member was very carefully considered by the Loto Canada Commission. Of course the problem of unsold tickets remains and we have to find an effective way of protecting ticket buyers, making sure that profits from such lotteries go to those who buy tickets. I will get the necessary information in order to give a precise answer to the hon. member, but I already talked with the head of Loto Canada, Mr. Cousineau, and he will give me his views about what should be done in case the minimum number of tickets to be sold is not reached.

INDUSTRY

TEXTILES—DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF NEW POLICY—SHORT-TERM RELIEF MEASURES

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It arises from the fact that, because of the government's failure to develop a long-term textile policy for Canada, one of the companies in my constituency has already been forced to close down part of its operations with a resulting loss of 25 to 30 jobs to the area. In view of the fact that, throughout Canada, many textile firms were enticed by the Pepin textile policy to open up plants in many small communities and are now facing such a critical situation that thousands of jobs may be lost, can the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce give the House a firm date for the announcement of a new textile policy and can he indicate whether he is contemplating any short-term relief for companies that are already being forced to lay off workers while they are waiting for the government's announcement?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would read the few press releases that I have been publishing about that for some time, he would notice that I made drastic decisions to restrain imports in some areas where textile people asked me for some action.

[Mr. Basford.]

I met the textile industry advisory council and we discussed an approach to settle the problem. It is an extremely difficult issue. We cannot completely close our barriers in Canada because our country is exporting a lot of commodities. But in cases where it was obvious that we were flooded by foreign commodities, I have made at least one dozen decisions in the last five weeks, and I hope that the hon. member will take time to read press releases about this.

[English]

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, there seems to be no shortage of press releases coming out of the minister's office, but lay-offs are continuing to take place. May I ask the minister specifically when the new policy will be announced and whether he can give us a date for that at this time? Is he contemplating taking any further action between now and that time to stop the continuing lay-offs of workers as a result of the fact that the company's profitability is being badly damaged by the continuing imports.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should have read the statement I made. I imposed quotas on many products that were flooding the market. It was action rather than speeches and an attempt to develop policy that would take years. I just did what I had to do, that is all.

POSSIBLE EXTENSION OF BENEFITS TO ADOPTIVE PARENTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. As the minister is probably aware most adopting agencies demand that one of the adoptive parents, usually the mother, take a period of time off work in order to give the new child the maximum possible care. While this condition is of obvious benefit to the child, it can and often does present a serious financial hardship to the parents, and indeed can be a disincentive to adopt. In order to overcome this and to help ensure care and attention to otherwise unwanted children, would the minister look into the feasibility of following the recommendation of the June policy statement of the Canadian Labour Congress and amend the Unemployment Insurance Act to have adoptive parents eligible to receive moneys similar to maternity benefits?

• (1200)

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her concern expressed both in the House and to me personally. I do not wish to raise any false hopes, so I think it would be more appropriate for me to say that no change is anticipated at present. I think the needs of the adoptive parents are indeed legitimate, but the unemployment insurance program is not, in my opinion, the proper vehicle to support incomes of parents who choose to adopt.

into the loss of 13 lives from the motor vessel Gabriella in light of charges made by the owners of this vessel that these lives were lost as a direct consequence of an inefficient response to the distress call, and that if helicopters had arrived on the scene sooner lives could have been saved.

● (1150)

Hon. Barney Danson (Acting Minister of National Defence): I really do not want to make any Gilbert and Sullivan opera out of anything as serious as this. Such an inquiry I understand has been instituted by the Minister of Transport. I, in my present acting position as Minister of National Defence, am deeply concerned as is the government where lives are at stake, whether they be Newfoundland lives or Dutch lives or anybody's lives, and we will continue to do our best; that is what the armed forces are doing now to see how we can reduce the response time.

FISHERIES

CLOSING OF REDFISH FISHERY—ACTION TO PROTECT GROUNDFISH RESOURCES FOLLOWING PROCLAMATION OF 200-MILE ZONE

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment if the redfish fishery in the Gulf of St. Lawrence was closed to everyone including boats of under 100 feet in length. He did not answer my question directly. I hope he will do so today. Second, in light of the fact that over-fishing in all ICNAF areas has reduced our ground fish resources to a point where Canada has sufficient catching capability to take care of the total allowable catch, based on 1976 figures, what steps is the minister taking to protect this resource in our 200-mile economic zone for Canadians and when can we expect an announcement of the quotas for all areas that will be made available effective January 1, 1977 for Canada's fishermen? Will he make this information available to the House.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the quota for redfish in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, so far as I know, and I have not had a chance to check this again, is taken. The second question the hon. member raises is a very important one concerning whether or not there will be access to the Canadian 200-mile fishing zone in 1977 when the extension of jurisdiction takes place. It is a very simple posture to take, that there are no fish surplus to our needs, and therefore we should refuse access to all foreign nations. First of all, there are species which we hardly fish, which are surplus to our needs and they are competing with stocks which we want to preserve for the food of the ocean in the area. Second, if we want international co-operation outside of 200 miles where certain fisheries are important for our interests, it is very important that we have a co-operative approach with those foreign nations which could damage the Canadian fishery in the zone beyond 200 miles.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, yesterday and again today I put a specific question to the minister. I asked him if the redfish fishery in the gulf is closed to everyone, including boats under 100 feet in length, and he still has not answered that question. I just want a simple yes or no answer, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, the vessels over 100 feet in length were asked to leave the gulf some time ago in order to leave some fish available for those vessels which had no alternative. In fact, because of very heavy fishing by the large vessels during the first three months of 1976 the gulf problem was acute. Second, so far as I know the gulf fishery is closed for redfish. I said to the hon. member that I would check again and this I will do.

CONCERN OF MUNICIPALITIES OVER PENALTIES IMPOSED FOR VANDALISM—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. I should like to ask the minister what action if any, his department has taken in response to the countless recommendations made by the Canadian municipalities across Ontario in which they express their concern over the increase in vandalism and the punishment being handed down by the courts to offenders.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure I could point to very many specific recommendations which I have noted lately from municipalities in that regard. I have received a great number of representations from municipal councils about gun control of late to which I would like to respond. With regard to sentences meted out by magistrates and judges related to vandalism, I think it would be proper to suggest that the Attorney General of Ontario instruct his Crown counsel to seek appropriate sentences and to argue for appropriate sentences in the courts.

Mr. Scott: Mr. Speaker, I want to remind the minister that this is far removed from gun control. This protest was initiated by the town of Trenton and was mailed to all municipalities in the province of Ontario. It does not refer to gun control but rather to vandalism which is far removed from the use of guns. Has the minister taken any action in respect of vandalism and the laxity of the courts in dealing with offenders. This involves hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Mr. Basford: Well, Mr. Speaker, I think the Criminal Code provisions relating to vandalism are adequate. If there is a feeling that sentences being meted out are too low, the solution to that is for the Crown counsel who are Ontario Crown counsel to argue for higher sentences when someone is being prosecuted.

REASON MINISTER REFUSED TO PUBLISH REPORT ON UNSANITARY CONDITIONS IN MEAT PACKING PLANTS

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question, directed to the Minister of Agriculture, involves secrecy in government and the right of the consumer to be informed. The Minister of Agriculture was asked to make public certain information regarding unsanitary conditions in Canadian meat plants and he refused to do this. Why did he refuse to make public information relating to unsanitary conditions in Canadian meat plants when this information was obtained in the United States under their freedom of information act? Why did the minister take this course of action and can he assure the House that he will mend his ways in the future?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think that if the hon. member checks the information available in the United States he will find that the report of their inspection service was very limited. In conjunction with their veterinary inspection service we inspect our plants that export to the United States and we do the same thing in their plants. We have an agreement with them and we do not make anything public that they do not want made public. We are conducting negotiations with the United States at the present time.

Our own inspection service is a much more detailed service in Canadian plants. The other day I made a document public, covering the official information service in Canada, to CP and one of the other press associations, but I never saw anything reported about it in the papers. Whether they wanted to say that we were not releasing public documents or not, I do not know, but we are trying to develop a proper formula for making this information available which will not cost the public too much. If anyone wants a copy of the document they will have to pay the cost of it. As soon as it is published, we will make it public as soon as possible.

I want the hon. member to realize that we are making public some documents that can be made public at the present time. We have a long-standing arrangement with the people concerned that nothing should be done that is damaging to them. We have to make sure that the government will not be sued because some document may be released and a person's business destroyed overnight when something has already been rectified.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO ENSURE PUBLICATION OF REPORTS ON UNSANITARY CONDITIONS IN MEAT PACKING PLANTS

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question which I will now direct to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The facts are that there were unsanitary conditions in Canadian meat plants and the Minister of Agriculture refused to make this public in the interest of Canadian consumers. Will the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, in the interest of the Canadian public, which has a right to know, immediately contact his colleague the Minister of Agriculture to ensure that in the future the consumer will be protected and that this information, in spite of what is happening in the United States, will be made fully public?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can wait till the end of the question period to speak to the minister. I will go over and speak to him right now.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

POSSIBLE DEPLOYMENT OF HELICOPTERS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, now that we have had this display of cheap theatricals perhaps we can continue.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: I should like to ask a question of the Acting Minister of National Defence. Yesterday the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador, who has been conspicuously silent on the issue of search and rescue, made a statement in Newfoundland to the effect that the Department of National Defence will be deploying search and rescue helicopters in the province at the week end. The news media have been unable to confirm that. Is it the intention of the government to so deploy helicopters to the province of Newfoundland, and when will those helicopters be put in place?

Hon. Barney Danson (Acting Minister of National Defence): First of all, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I am delighted to reply to a professional actor. My colleagues from Newfoundland particularly have spoken to me and my colleagues on a number of occasions about search and rescue needs and have shown intense interest in the matter in the place where it counts. I must say that no such announcement has been made by the government. So far as the Department of National Defence is concerned, we are looking at feasibility studies to see how we can best reduce our response time in this situation, which came to my attention at the time of the tragedy involving the Gabriella.

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO LOSS OF LIFE RESULTING FROM ABANDONMENT OF "GABRIELLA"

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, the minister has confirmed that he does not even rank as an amateur. Now that he has put on his usual little display in the House, I ask him whether he is now in a position, as one who aspires to be Minister of National Defence, to order an inquiry consultation with Quebec manpower and immigration authorities?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, at first the movement was heading towards Montreal and the province of Quebec. From our experience in settling those people, we noted that Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba offer more employment and housing opportunities. As concerns our activities related to immigration and our programs for refugees, we are still consulting the immigration service of Quebec. As to the procedures concerning the settlement of Chileans in Canada, the Quebec service never expressed its disagreement on this matter.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO PENSION RIGHTS FOR WOMEN—ALLEGED OPPOSITION OF ONTARIO—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare—he seems to be engaged right now—regarding his premature announcement dealing with amendments to the Canada Pension Plan which seems to have placed him in a little difficulty. In the light of the objection by the Province of Ontario and, later, by the Ontario Status of Women Council, regarding this proposal, one which would give pension rights to the partner in a marriage who remains at home to raise children while the other partner works outside the home, is it the intention of the minister to abandon the course he has projected on the grounds of apparent inequities involving those who cannot afford to stay home and the subsidization of others who have a choice of entering the work force? In other words, his proposal would hit the poor who are least able to take advantage of such a policy. And, if not, how can he possibly proceed bearing in mind the veto power of the province?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I regret to note how misinformed my hon. colleague seems to be on this matter and on the objective of this policy which aims at ensuring women greater economic opportunities in our society; it is endorsed by all the provinces, except Ontario which asked to study the matter further. Of course Ontario virtually has a right of veto under the Canada Pension Plan. However, I have the firm intention of bringing this proposal before the House, then it will be incumbent on the provinces to decide whether they want to endorse it or not. We committed ourselves very strongly and explicitly to the promotion of women's rights and we do not intend to backtrack in this regard.

● (1140)

Mr. Alexander: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I may have been misinformed, but I want to indicate to the minister that the Ontario Status of Women Council believes that this is the wrong way to approach the matter. I wonder whether the minister has been advised of their objections and thinks that there is any merit in them inasmuch as there is a certain amount of inequity, because the poor will be hit very hard if the minister does intend to proceed. However, I do not think he can unless he has the approval of the provinces involved. Is he aware of the concern of women about this particular proposal of his?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I shall have to repeat in English what I just said. I cannot understand how badly informed my colleague is as to the purpose and objective of this particular proposal. It is aimed at ensuring greater economic opportunities for women and the government is not going to backtrack on its commitment in this respect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: This particular proposition has the endorsation of all the provinces except Ontario, which wants to review the matter further. As far as the views of the Ontario council referred to are concerned, I hope that once it has discussed this matter with other advisory Councils across the country, it will also change its mind and not be purely inspired or advised on this subject by the Ontario government. I think it will realize that this amendment is really aimed at improving the lot of women in this country.

IMMIGRATION

STATUS OF WORKERS ALLEGEDLY IMPORTED BY OTTAWA "JOURNAL" FROM UNITED STATES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. My question relates to the labour dispute at the Ottawa Journal. I recognize that labour relations in a case such as this come under provincial jurisdiction, but in view of reports that certain persons have been brought in from the United States to operate some of the equipment in the plant of the Ottawa Journal would the minister in charge of immigration look into the matter and ascertain whether work permits have been given to these individuals, and if so, why?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, first of all I will check it out to see if it is true, and if it is true we will check them out.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would it be possible, Mr. Speaker, to get order over there among that orchestration of howlers who make no contribution other than by interference?

PUBLIC SERVICE

POSSIBILITY OF STRIKE BY PRISON GUARDS—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PROVIDE SECURITY

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board on a related subject. Will he inform the House as to the status of negotiations with the Public Service Alliance of Canada with respect to the negotiations—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Cheap contempt of this parliament!

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Nielsen: Could the minister enlighten the House as to the status of the negotiations between the Government of Canada and the PSAC negotiating on behalf of the prison guards and inform the House whether a strike of prison guards is imminent, as reported in this morning's media?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): I am in the process of getting the most recent information available and I shall try to pass it on to the hon. member on Monday.

An hon. Member: It may be a little late by then.

Mr. Nielsen: Can the minister tell us whether any provisional plans are now being made, in view of the imminence of a strike by the PSAC, to provide for the security of the penal system in Canada should the guards actually go off duty?

Mr. Andras: I should like to include a response to that question in my answer on Monday.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

REQUEST MINISTER TABLE LETTER TO PRESIDENT OF TREASURY BOARD CONCERNING LONG-RANGE PATROL AIRCRAFT CONTRACT

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Supply and Services a question about government aircraft contracts. On March 1, 1976 the hon. gentleman wrote a letter on the subject of his knowledge and recommendations with respect to the LRPA contract to the then president of the treasury board. Would he table this letter?

NORTHROP CONTRACT—AUTHORIZATION FOR PAYMENT OF OUT-OF-COURT SETTLEMENT

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the same minister concerning the Northrop contract. Bearing in mind the restrictions imposed by the Financial Administration Act, will the minister tell the House by what authority various government departments and the government-owned company of Canadair were authorized to pay a figure in excess of $9 million in an out-of-court settlement to the Northrop Corporation last July?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to correct the hon. member's statements. We did not pay $9 million in damages to the Northrop Corporation. We handed over about $6 million that we were holding back. Therefore the amount of damages is not $9 million. Besides, it followed a recommendation from the Department of Justice and a decision of the Treasury Board.

[English]

Mr. McKinnon: Can the minister further enlighten the House as to the selection of the donors of this $6 million among the various government departments and Canadair? Was their respective liability decided on the principle of "each according to its means" or of "each according to its culpability"?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, that six million dollars, as I said earlier the $6 million was money which was being held back on the contract pending settlement in court or between lawyers. It was the money that was held by the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY WHETHER CHILEAN IMMIGRANTS DIRECTED TO WESTERN CANADA—CONSULTATION WITH QUEBEC

Mr. Louis Duclos (Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Could the minister tell the House, first, why does his department automatically direct to western Canada the immigrants from Chile, even though they could easily learn French and, consequently, improve the linguistic balance of the country if they could settle in the province of Quebec; and, second, could he indicate whether such a policy was developed after the Atlantic region. We hope we will be able to do it. However, we cannot at the same time do this, build up the infrastructure and help all the small industries which also expect our consideration and support.

We would very much like to be able to achieve all this simultaneously.

Mr. Frank Maine (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. With regard to his visit to Japan, did any discussions or negotiations result in further advancements in the area of science and technology with respect to exchanges of information, people or programs?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the economic framework which was agreed to by both countries, there is a provision for exchanges of technology, also for joint ventures, particularly where technology is important. Of course, we did discuss particular applications of technology, either by way of interesting the Japanese in the continuing development of the tar sands—

TOHO LEAD AND ZINC REFINERY—POSSIBILITY OF CLOSURE AND RESULTANT LOSS OF EXPORT TRADE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Did the Prime Minister or his officials have talks while in Japan regarding the possible closure of the Toho Lead and Zinc Refinery as a result of a strike of miners at Cyprus-Anvil Mine in the Yukon arising from a ruling by the administrator of the Anti-Inflation Board rolling back a previous decision of the board? Since 65 per cent of the refinery's total supplies come from Cyprus-Anvil, is Canada likely to lose this export trade?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Neil: Since Toho has advised that it will either have to close its mine or get low grade ore from Australia or the United States, would the Prime Minister intervene in order that a more realistic settlement might be arrived at so that the miners may go back to work enabling the mine to resume production to the benefit of our export trade in lead and zinc?

Mr. Trudeau: I find it a little extraordinary that the hon. member should be suggesting to me that the ruling of the AIB and the Administrator should not be upheld.

PENITENTIARIES

SUGGESTION SEX OFFENDERS BE PLACED IN SEPARATE INSTITUTIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Solicitor General may I direct my question to the Prime Minister? It has to do with the recent murder, in one penitentiary, of a prisoner who had been convicted of sexual offences and also with the holding as hostage of a man from Saskatoon who was responsible for the diabolical murder of four children. There appears to be general feeling in the penal institutions that individuals who commit such sexual offences are anathema to the general run of inmates, and I am wondering whether or not the Prime Minister would give consideration to ensuring that sex offenders such as those I have mentioned are placed in a separate institution so as to remove them from the danger of lynch law or kangaroo courts, however understandable the revulsion other prisoners may feel with respect to their offences, thus enabling treatment to be given more easily to this group of individuals who sooner or later will be released and who, in the absence of treatment are likely to constitute a continued threat to society.

Mr. Art Lee (Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General): I should like to advise the right hon. gentleman that I shall be glad to bring his representation to the attention of my minister when he returns next week. With respect to the prisoner involved in the Ontario prison, Mr. Hardy, he was offered segregation but he had refused it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I directed my question to the Prime Minister, not to a parliamentary secretary—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

list of the gifts the Prime Minister had taken to Cuba and Venezuela and a list of the gifts he brought back. That question was not answered.

Mr. Paproski: The government gave two DC-8s.

Mr. Reynolds: I also want to know the cost of the gifts he took, and the cost of the ones he received. The Prime Minister's office refused to answer the question. Now that the Prime Minister has returned to the country, I wonder if he can assure me that if I put my question back on the order paper, his office will answer as to the cost of the gifts he took on his South American tour and the cost of the gifts he received.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not remember the answer; I probably saw the question if it was placed on the order paper. I would imagine that it is a question of common civility and courtesy. You do not reveal the price of gifts that you receive from another.

Mr. Paproski: There were two DC-8s, for some Cuban cigars.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: That was a cheap shot.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, perhaps it is futile to talk of common courtesy to hon. members opposite.

Mr. Reynolds: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the answer the Prime Minister just gave me, I wonder if he can explain what he meant in the throne speech debate when he talked about the freedom of information act.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN MINISTER AND ATLANTIC PROVINCES ECONOMIC COUNCIL ON EFFECTIVENESS OF DEPARTMENT'S ACTIONS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. It has to do with the meetings this week in Halifax of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, meetings which the minister attended. I am sure he heard there, and saw reported in the press, numerous comments with respect to the situation concerning the capability of DREE to increase the productive capability of the Atlantic provinces. I am thinking particularly in terms of the increasing decline in expenditures made under the Regional Development Incentives Act. Since suggestions were made about the way in which the Act is being administered and about the amount of money being expended under the Act, can the minister say if he held conversations, there, with APEC officials, or reached conclusions either in terms of amendments to the Act or in terms of the decreasing amounts of money spent since 1970?

[Mr. Reynolds.]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, indeed I had an excellent meeting during my visit to Halifax early this week and I would like to advise the hon. member that he should not rely entirely on press reports to judge the department's efficiency. Of course, critics were made concerning the Department of Regional Economic Expansion's programs, particularly the business assistance program. But, on the whole, the conference yielded positive results and some excellent suggestions were made. I shall consider them and act on them.

But I must insist that, when the hon. member suggests an increased decline in expenditures in the Atlantic provinces, he is wrong. As a matter of fact, we are receiving less money directly under the industry incentive program. This is due to the state of the economy in Canada in general and in the Atlantic provinces in particular, in connection with the manufacturing industry.

On the other hand, I can say that our activities within the general development agreements, whereby investments are made in the future of these provinces and the development of their resources, have resulted in expenses which have considerably increased over the past few years, and hopefully we shall be able to keep on increasing our expenses and investments in these areas. This is the result of long term planning which, I feel, is in direct response to the ideas and opinions put forward by APEC, many other organizations, hon. members of the opposition in the House and hon. members of the government's side. We are involved in long term planning. We shall certainly witness the results in a couple of years.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, since, as the minister well knows, four-fifths of the expenditures under his department in the Atlantic region are directed toward infrastructure and not toward regional development incentives programs and since it has recently been suggested by the Council of Ministers of the European Economic Commission that they should relate any infrastructure expenditures under their domain within a two-year time frame to some productive side in terms of industrial expansion, can the minister indicate whether any serious consideration is being given to re-ordering the priorities in view of the very serious and increasing problem of unemployment throughout the whole of the Atlantic region.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, we are very concerned with this situation and with the need to create long lasting jobs to industrialize the Atlantic provinces.

It is clear that our efforts in relation with the infrastructure are precisely aimed at creating conditions in the Atlantic provinces which will make it easier to attract more investments in the manufacturing and industrial areas.

We now have projects under study. Some are already known to the public, others are not but will probably get known. But as I said earlier we can face up to large industrial projects in

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member would agree with me that as an elected member of parliament he perceives himself as representative of the people in his constituency and that includes organized workers. We perceive ourselves in the same role. We want very much the co-operation of the labour movement and the business community. Many of the proposals have such intrinsic merit on their own, however, that it would be our job, I hope with the co-operation of the opposition, to see many of those initiatives undertaken as soon as possible.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, one of the problems with the minister is that he does not represent the constituency that his portfolio indicates he represents. That is one of the difficulties with the minister. The minister expressed confidence that labour will return to that council which they left recently. I wonder if he would outline his reasons for that confidence, especially in view of the fact that the Canadian Labour Congress has not even answered his invitation. How can he be confident of that?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, to be Minister of Labour one has to be an optimist and I am an optimist.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs who was the former secretary of state for external affairs so I welcome him even temporarily, back to his former position. In view of the fact—which I am very pleased to note—that Canada joined all nations of the United Nations except the United States in repudiating the so-called independence of the Transkei—

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Oh, come on! Oh, what nonsense!

Mr. Brewin: What nonsense? It is certainly a fact whether you like it or not. I should like to ask whether Canada presented some reservation of that vote and what was the nature of the reservation?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member pointed out, Canada has opposed this particular form of political cosmetic as a way of dealing with the problems in South Africa. On the question of the reservation made at the United Nations, however, I have not been able to get the necessary information since I received notice of the hon. member's intention to ask this question. I shall get the full information for him, however, and either transmit it to him personally or in the House at the first opportunity.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, would the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs assure the House, since the so-called independence has been described by the World Council of Churches as a patent fraud and it has now been repudiated almost unanimously by the United Nations, that Canada will not officially deal with the organization which has been so repudiated?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that follows conclusively from thee position Canada has taken on this matter. We will avoid any possible activity which would confer any validity upon this so-called political development, or this so-called political improvement.

ENERGY

OIL—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO DEAL WITH POSSIBLE INCREASE IN WORLD PRICE

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources may I direct my question to the Prime Minister? It has to do with reports in the press that the world price of oil as posted by OPEC countries will probably rise between 15 per cent and 20 per cent. I hope the Prime Minister will not reply that the question is hypothetical, because I am talking about the prospect of this happening. My question is this. Given the fact that the government sets the domestic price of oil in this country, what plans has the government in mind to accommodate an increase of this dimension in the world price of oil in the domestic price level?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that there is an agreement between the provinces of Canada and the federal government on a two-phase increase in price. The second phase is beginning on January 1. If we have to accommodate to higher world prices, we will reiterate our policy of tending toward the world price in Canada, and we shall have to have another meeting between the provinces and the federal government to arrive at another agreement.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

GOVERNMENT EFFORTS TO SECURE CO-OPERATION OF THOSE CONCERNED WITH PROGRAM FOR LABOUR

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. In the throne speech the government conceded that successful economic measures demand co-operation between governments, workers and so forth, and to that end the government will launch a major series of consultations. When the minister made a speech yesterday in Montreal to the International Federation of Chemical and General Workers' Union, he delivered a stern warning. Was he indicating in that speech an apparent readiness to proceed without the support of organized labour, contrary to the loftier rhetoric of the throne speech?

[Mr. Milne.]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, what I was indicating was that there are many initiatives in the fourteen point program we have which have such outstanding merit in terms of being for the benefit of organized and unorganized workers in this country that if we do not achieve co-operation from those who represent labour and from spokesmen for the unorganized, then we would have to proceed anyhow because I believe the program to be to the benefit of all the workers of this country. That does not mean I am not hoping to obtain the co-operation of labour. I—and indeed, the government—do hope to obtain it.

Mr. Muir: The throne speech talks about co-operation with workers, so are we going to carry on this policy of confrontation with workers, whether organized or unorganized? Since the people, who now represent by votes 2.2 million workers, do not apparently get along with the government, is the minister looking for others who are more likeable, and if so, is the government going to decide who should represent whom?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): No, Mr. Speaker. I can allay the hon. member's fears. I am still endeavouring to obtain the co-operation of the labour movement. I have been talking at least unofficially with various leaders in order to obtain that co-operation. There is no doubt that it would be far more effective and speedier if we could open up as quickly as possible, now that the protest is over, some useful consultation and we are endeavouring to do that.

Mr. Muir: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the minister's strong words in Montreal and since the minister has said he will not be deterred by business or labour opposition, may I ask if the government is going to set up a tripartite effort by unionizing their hacks in Ottawa and then sitting down with their bagmen from Toronto to solve the problem?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I do not know to whose bagmen the hon. member refers.

METHOD OF ESTABLISHING TRIPARTITE COMMITTEES TO DEAL WITH PROGRAM FOR LABOUR

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I can hardly believe that of the hon. Minister and I should like to put a further question to him. Following the questions asked of the first minister, concerning the speech, the minister indicated that the details of the 14 point program he referred to—for which he has almost broken his arm patting himself on the back—he said that the elaboration of the program would be left to tripartite committees. This is what he said. I wonder how the minister intends to come to this elaboration and fleshing out by tripartite committees if labour does not join to make up the parties. What does he intend to do? Is he going to make an end run around the leadership of organized labour in Canada? Is he going to deal with someone else or how is he going to do it?

HEALTH

DELAY IN SUPPLYING SWINE INFLUENZA VACCINE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that this government has so badly mismanaged the supply of swine flu vaccine to provincial health departments as to render a mass vaccination program extremely difficult at this date, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger):

That this House express its displeasure at the large waste of public resources entailed by the failure of the government to supply A/New Jersey '76 vaccine to the provinces for delivery in mid-September as originally promised by the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

SUGGEST REVIEW OF BOARD'S DECISION ON TEACHERS' SALARIES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a question of urgent and pressing necessity. As the majority of the Anti-Inflation Board's decisions concerning the legally binding teachers' salary agreements arbitrated in British Columbia in 1975 have been handed down, and as the AIB has ordered the school boards and teachers' associations of British Columbia to renegotiate the 1976 agreements, something that cannot legally be done, thus creating chaos in British Columbia's educational system, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke):

● (1110)

That this House urge the Minister of Finance to order a review of these decisions.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDUSTRY

SUGGESTED STUDY OF EFFECT OF CLOSING LINERBOARD MILL AT STEPHENVILLE, NEWFOUNDLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, the threat of closure of Labrador Linerboard Mill in Stephenville, Newfoundland next year threatens the livelihood of some 1,000 citizens both in the plant and in woodcutting operations, but more particularly it will affect the economic and social structure of that part of the province.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

That the matter be the subject of immediate priority of the Department of Manpower and Immigration, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to determine the alternatives necessary to revitalize the operation of the mill, and that immediate discussion be initiated with the province of Newfoundland to assist in alternative planning.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROPOSED REINSTATEMENT OF BILL C-83 TO DEAL WITH GUN CONTROL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ross Milne (Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Hon. members will be aware of a tragic shooting in Brampton earlier this week where there were two murders and one suicide. This was the second tragedy in this city in recent months, and this particular one was caused by a person who had purchased a high powered rifle immediately before the act, allegedly specifically to commit the act.

Mr. Speaker, if parliament is to regain effective control of government spending then the practices that Mr. Henderson described must stop immediately. I am here tonight in an attempt to find out what the government's intentions are with regard to the office of the Auditor General and government spending. To allow a continuation of government spending without complete details beforehand would be tantamount to giving a blessing to continued uncontrolled government spending.

For the record, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make mention of the fact that in its references to the Auditor General there is no mention whatsoever of Crown corporations and how the government intends to bring about more effective control within these corporations. Air Canada is a prime example of a Crown corporation which is plagued by poor financial administration, and incidentally is audited by a private firm on contract with the government. When one takes into consideration that there are eight Crown corporations and public instrumentalities of which the Auditor General is neither the auditor nor joint auditor, then, Mr. Speaker, I say that the government is abrogating its responsibility and should take the necessary action to rectify the situation.

The government has a moral obligation to the people of Canada to deal effectively with the financial fiasco it has created. When the Auditor General stated that the present state of financial management and control systems of departments and agencies of the Government of Canada is significantly below acceptable standards of quality and effectiveness, I am sure that he expected action from the government to change this state of affairs. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, in replying to a question from the chairman of the Public Accounts Committee as to whether or not the Auditor General could assure parliament that the financial statements of the government are accurate, the Auditor General replied:

> We feel very strongly about the fact that unless the systems are corrected the day may well come when I cannot give a clear certificate on the accounts of Canada.

With that statement in mind I can only re-emphasize my earlier comments that the government should make clear its intentions with regard to the office of the Auditor General.

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) has expressed concern about this matter on several occasions. He raised it in the debate on the Speech from the Throne. He also asked a question on October 25 which the minister answered and, within the format at that particular time, stated that there would be legislation. I should like to reiterate his comments dealing with the implementation of the Wilson Committee recommendations when he stated that a new auditor general's act will be tabled in the House very shortly.

The legislation has now been drafted after very careful consideration of each of the recommendations contained in the report of the Wilson Committee. Some of the proposals contained in the report are complex, and required extensive consultation among the parties involved, including the Auditor General of Canada. I can assure the hon. member that the legislation will clarify the duties and responsibilities of that officer of Parliament and will provide him with a better means of fulfilling his important function.

I am happy to say that the legislation fully reflects the spirit of the Wilson Committee report and that the consultations that I have mentioned have produced what are felt to be significant contributions to the quality of the legislation. I am convinced that, following the parliamentary review of this bill—and I hope the hon. member will participate—all members will agree that we will have the most modern and comprehensive law concerning the role and responsibility of a parliamentary auditor which is in existence anywhere. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, since I have mentioned that the legislation will shortly be presented to the House, I am sure you will agree that further discussion of the details of the new act should be deferred until that time.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.15 p.m. availability of the proper vaccine for adequate protection of the Canadian population against influenza.

We appreciate very much the presence in the Chamber at this late hour of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde). I am sure he will shed some light on this subject.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) for giving us an opportunity to discuss this subject. I wish that he, as an able medical doctor, had been consulted by the CBC in which case the corporation might not have included an irresponsible statement in its program on the subject last Monday.

This afternoon I tabled the most recent report of the National Advisory Committee on Immunizing Agents. These recommendations relate to the 1976-77 influenza immunization program, and I have accepted them in their entirety. They have been transmitted to the provincial ministers of health for their information and I have expressed my hope the provinces will look upon the committee's recommendations with favor.

It will be noted that the recommendations are substantially the same as those presented following the committee's meeting in June. The only essential differences are specific recommendations for the use of bivalent vaccine in children suffering from chronic neuromuscular disorders, cancer, and conditions involving biological defence mechanisms. While routine vaccination of school children is not recommended, special formulations of the vaccines are being prepared for those under twenty years of age with specific chronic illnesses. In reviewing its recommendations the committee endorsed the utilization of vaccine, both bivalent and monovalent, as supplies become available. The committee gave due consideration to alternatives to its recommended program, especially the question of stockpiling monovalent A/New Jersey vaccine and its utilization if further evidence of "swine influenza" activity became available.

The committee did not consider stockpiling to be a viable option for a variety of reasons: first, because influenza caused by a new virus spreads throughout the population with great rapidity and the possibility of receiving a sufficiently early warning by the isolation of virus from the first case is very remote. Secondly, laboratory identification of the virus takes a minimum of ten days and further time will elapse to investigate the case in order to ensure that it has been spread from person to person. A third important factor is that it has been estimated a minimum time lag of five to eight weeks is likely after a decision to mobilize stockpiled vaccine before the vaccine can be administered to all those wishing to receive it and they have had time to develop protective levels of antibody.

All lots of influenza vaccine sold in Canada must be approved by the health protection branch on a lot by lot basis. No lot will be released unless it meets the high Canadian standards required of all vaccines. I can assure all hon. members that there will be no weakening of these standards. The first lots of vaccine were approved for distribution today.

[Mr. Haidasz.]

AUDITOR GENERAL—IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF INDEPENDENT REVIEW COMMITTEE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, during the course of my remarks in the debate on the Speech from the Throne I stated that I had serious reservations about the section in the Speech from the Throne having reference to the Auditor General. The Liberal government has all too often in the past totally ignored the recommendations of the Auditor General and continued on its spending binge. We on this side of the House have advocated the strengthening of the office of the Auditor General for quite some time; however, to date little action has been taken. Now that the government is devoid of any new ideas it is blatantly embracing a Progressive Conservative policy when it promises the following in the throne speech:

> You will be asked to consider a bill designed to clarify the duties and responsibilities of the Auditor General of Canada, and to provide him with better means of fulfilling his important function as a servant of parliament.

Naturally, Mr. Speaker, we hope that its intentions are sincere. However, when I asked the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) on October 25 what the intentions of the government were in regard to implementing any of the 47 recommendations contained in the report of the independent review committee on the office of the Auditor General he gave me a very non-committal answer. I contend that in light of the recent criticisms by the Auditor General with regard to the government's financial mismanagement and poor control practices, this government should make clear to this House its intentions in regard to the report of the independent review committee on the office of the Auditor General, and indeed its intentions with regard to past recommendations of the Auditor General.

To be more specific, Mr. Speaker, the government could add a lot of credence to its pronouncement on the Auditor General of Canada if it were to take to heart the Auditor General's statement that parliament has lost effective control over government spending. This government must take the action to guarantee detailed financial statements of every government department, Crown corporation, and agency, and prior to actual expenditures being made. By "detailed" I mean something more than a general review. The day has come when members of this House will no longer accept financial statements that are chock full of miscellaneous and other headings to gloss over expenditures.

In a recent column in Maclean's the former Auditor General, Maxwell Henderson, wrote:

> It is the attitude in the top echelons of the federal public service that explains why our M.P.s are given so little hard information about government spending. At the same time, cabinet has little patience with parliamentary questioning. It upsets the political and bureaucratic timetables, even though it seldom alters the government's intentions. This is why more and more frequently now the Trudeau government provides to the House of Commons only the bare minimum of information about its proposed spending.

ment, but simply common sense and justice for our Canadian growers.

One more example lies in the dairy industry. This has been mentioned previously. It is important to the area I represent, parts of Norfolk and all of Haldimand County, which is noted for dairy production, primarily fluid milk, but also industrial milk which is used in the production of cheese.

Perhaps the matter of cheese production is more important in eastern Ontario and Quebec than in my area. However, I might point out that at the same time as dairy producers were being asked to take severe cuts in their quotas, cheese was pouring into Canada, and I use the word pouring advisedly, in direct competition. When we consider that it takes ten pounds of milk to make a pound of cheese, we can easily see the effect this importation had on milk production in Canada.

Time and again my colleagues rose in this House to demand some action with regard to the importation that was damaging our cheese industry.

I was not going to mention any more examples, but there is one other about which I wrote to the minister several times. I refer to bulk honey brought into Canada from Argentina. This is repacked by, I believe, Billy Bee in Toronto. It is not sold directly as a product of Canada, but the advertising indicates that it could well be a product of Canada. The poor consumer could not make a distinction. After making an investigation, the minister claimed that the action of the importer of honey from Argentina was within the law. People in my area who produce honey still have serious reservations about this.

The general theme that has run through all of the remarks tonight has been one of tariff protection to save Canadian agriculture. If we destroy the will and the ability of the Canadian farmer to produce agricultural food products, we are ultimately doing a disservice to the Canadian consumer. If you think this is not true, just look at the number of auction sales throughout rural Canada. A number of farmers are selling out, going out of business. Some are selling their land to developers. Some are moving into the cities to get a job that pays decent money because the government protects other industries but will not protect agriculture. If we allow this trend to continue, the Canadian consumer will be at the mercy of importers from foreign countries.

The present tariff policy will not do any favour to the Canadian consumer in the long term. If the government is bent on a cheap food policy, then let all segments of the economy bear their fair share of the cost. Agriculture is staggering under the burden of producing cheap food. Let us take the burden of cheap food off the backs of the farmers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger).

Mr. Schellenberger: Mr. Speaker, there are only a few minutes remaining. Rather than break up my remarks, may I call it ten o'clock?

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HEALTH—SWINE INFLUENZA—REPORT OF ADVISORY COMMITTEE—REASON FOR DELAY OF MASS IMMUNIZATION PROGRAM

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, as you are aware I have raised twice in this session of parliament important questions concerning the status of mass immunization against swine influenza.

The health authorities at various levels of government, and indeed most Canadians, have an important health decision to make this fall—to vaccinate or not to vaccinate, or to be vaccinated or not be vaccinated. To be specific, one must decide whether to give a vaccination for protection against a possible outbreak caused by the A/New Jersey/76 Virus, better known as swine flu.

The federal government has taken the initiative and given leadership to the provinces in sponsoring an ambitious, bold, and great undertaking in the field of preventive medicine. It is by preventive medicine and health care that the economic burden of illness will be lightened and the tragedy and waste of disease and death reduced.

Influenza has apparently plagued mankind throughout history. However, the great influenza pandemic that swept the world in 1918-19, commonly known as the Spanish flu and today referred to as swine flu, killed 20 million persons, outnumbering World War I fatalities by more than two to one.

In February, 1976, a new strain of human influenza virus identified as A/New Jersey/76 and called the swine flu virus was isolated in a few outbreaks among U.S.A. army recruits at Fort Dix, New Jersey. This virus infected about 500 people and took the life of one recruit. Moreover, the outbreak at Fort Dix was a mixed outbreak of swine flu and A-Victoria-3-75 viruses.

On previous occasions when a new major antigenic variant of influenza A virus has been recognized in the human population it has subsequently given rise to a world-wide epidemic. From past experience and present knowledge, it was only prudent to develop a mass vaccination program to protect Canadians against the new strain of influenza virus, especially since the World Health Organization on April 8, 1976, had issued a world-wide alert against a possible swine flu outbreak and urged national health ministries to prepare contingency plans. This program is not without its problems and critics, but action must be taken and problems explained after proper consultation, or else confusion, doubt, and damage to health might follow. That is why I asked questions on October 15 and 27 about the current status of the mass immunization program, and especially about any precautions taken and the

This problem is of great concern to the Automotive Industries Association of Canada, Manitoba division, because of the unfair treatment accorded Manitoba manufacturing and distributing companies and its inflationary influence. Ultimately it means all businesses in this area in the automotive and farm replacement parts market and finally all consumers supporting those businesses will be adversely affected.

The Automotive Industries Association of Canada, Ottawa, Ontario, which represents the 2.8 billion replacement parts industry in Canada made up of more than 700 member companies and 250,000 people employed by those companies, supports our position fully.

The letter ends with the words:

We believe this situation warrants your consideration and attention.

The letter was forwarded to me by Mr. Dan McKenzie, president of the association in Manitoba. I should appreciate it if the minister would give the matter his immediate attention. The difficulty for the Manitoba division of the association is serious.

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak briefly on Bill C-15 and wish to place special emphasis on the effect on Canadian agriculture of the operation of the customs tariff, a theme developed by previous speakers.

I am concerned about the methods with which we implement tariffs of a temporary nature, that is, increase duties on certain commodities in order to meet an emergency in Canadian agriculture. At present, I submit our system is too cumbersome. Approval for an increase in tariffs necessary to protect a Canadian farm crop is too long in coming. As always, it is too little and too late. It is too late to protect Canadian agriculture. This applies especially to the Canadian farmer producing fruit and vegetables.

In spring and early summer, when our home-grown produce comes on the market, similar produce from the United States and Mexico still flows into this country and destroys the market for our own farmers. At any rate such foreign produce undermines the market for the first crop harvested by Canadian farmers in the spring. Protection is too little, and comes too late.

Present policies have a disastrous effect on Canadian farmers. They destroy the farmers' will to compete and produce food in Canada. What I mean is perhaps best illustrated by the fact that it took the government a long time to curb the importation of Oceanic beef. I will not go into the subject in detail, since it has already been elaborated on, but it took the government two or three years to enforce, not a tariff but a quota. I say this to show how long it takes the government to act in a time of difficulty for agriculture.

I respectfully suggest to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), or senior officials of his department, should have some input with respect to any decision to impose temporary tariffs for the protection of agriculture. Right now our procedures before the Tariff Board take too long.

Let us examine the effect of tariffs on some Canadian products to illustrate the irreparable damage which has been done in many cases. As hon. members know, I come from an area which produces tobacco. In the tobacco industry we employ strippers—that term has been used several times recently. It carries no moral connotation. Strippers are merely people who strip the leaf from the tobacco after it has been cured. In the last few years the importation of leaf tobacco into Canada has increased by some 1,086 per cent. This has been happening at the same time as Canadian farmers have been producing the same quality of tobacco, at prices just as attractive. The Ontario flu-cured marketing board cannot understand how the government can permit the importation of leaf tobacco which competes directly with our own tobacco in our own markets.

It is true that there is now in place a specific duty of 15 cents a pound on leaf tobacco coming into Canada. That was of some use a number of years ago when tobacco sold at 30 to 40 cents a pound. Now it is selling at 90 cents to $1 a pound. Therefore 15 cents is not much of a barrier against the importation of leaf tobacco.

The effect on the tobacco farmer is simple. We have been forced to cut our production by 50 per cent. This represents a drop in income to the Canadian tobacco farmer of about 50 per cent. When you look at the effect of the whole economy in the tobacco growing area, it becomes serious. I also remind the government that the total take in excise tax, both federal and provincial, is well over $1 billion. Therefore the federal government and governments at all levels should do something to protect this industry which is so lucrative for the Department of National Revenue.

Let us look at the lack of protection for the apple growing industry. The County of Norfolk is noted for its apples. I always compete with the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker) and the B.C. apples. In any event, we grow pretty good apples in Norfolk County.

The apple growers have been under duress caused by a dumping of apple products. I refer specifically to the dumping of apple concentrate by Italy a year or two ago. With the addition of a little water you had reconstituted apple juice which was sold all across Canada in direct competition with that which is produced here. This was also mentioned by my colleague, the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain). The apple grower is certainly drastically affected by poor management of our tariff structure.

In the same vein a similar type of competition was experienced by tomato growers who supply canning factories in Ontario and, in fact, throughout Canada. The health of that industry has been severely damaged. Tomato paste has been imported from Mexico which is easily reconstituted into catsup, tomato juice, and other such products. We are not afforded protection. As everyone knows, there is an abundance of cheap labour in Mexico.

There is no need for a permanent tariff. We simply have to make an application of a tariff to give our Canadian producers fair competition with imported products, nothing that will damage our relationship as signatories to the GATT agree-

It is very easy to set out some great pattern of world trade and demand the elimination of tariff barriers for commodities and manufactured or semi-manufactured goods, but it is very difficult in a country like this to go to the people with such a suggestion. I have talked to groups in my constituency who are very conscious of the problems in other parts of the world. They tell me they are willing to lower their standard of living in order to help those other countries. That is a problem I wrestled with for a while, Mr. Speaker. I admired that spirit, but it seemed to me that if there are individuals in the country who are willing to lower their standard of living for the sake of others, they can. There are many non-governmental agencies to which one can make donations or give some assistance or aid in order to develop other parts of the world. Because we have the kind of democratic system that promises opportunity to its people, I doubt whether it is possible to go to the people and say that we are initiating a trade policy which is going to reduce the standard of living of Canadians.

I think one of the problems of the world is that too few nations are moving toward the kind of democratic system that gives people a real choice in the kind of government they have, and in the policies of the government. If the situation were otherwise, and if democracy seemed to be spreading throughout the world, then we would have more cause to be optimistic about the world trading picture.

I feel we will need a tariff policy for many years to come and that no country can yet afford to destroy its own industries in the hope that this will somehow benefit other parts of the world. If we destroy our agriculture we will not strengthen Chad, Somalianor Mali, but we would certainly give a great boost to the Common Market and our neighbour to the south. Those areas would then be much freer to trade in the world.

When we are competing with countries at least as sophisticated and in many cases more industrialized than Canada we must be cautious and make sure that our agriculture can compete. There is not much point in having lovely rural areas if they are deserted and unproductive. The food shortage will catch up to the world, and I am sure we will be called upon to play a far more important role in feeding the world than at present. It would be a grave mistake if we were to allow agriculture in this country to decline to the point where we could no longer play that role.

This concludes what I want to say on the subject of customs tariff although I have not touched on areas like manufactured goods and a variety of other things. We must be very conscious of the primary industry of this country, however. I represent a constituency in a province where most of the primary industries are in trouble—lumber, agriculture, tourism. Coal mining is the one bright spot but even that has had some unfortunate strikes, partly brought about by inequities in this government's anti-inflation program. It might be possible to be cheerful and optimistic if only one primary industry were in trouble, but when the trouble affects almost all of the primary industries then the province and, I suggest, the country are in a dangerous situation indeed.

I suppose to many poorer nations of the world Canada appears safe, secure, solid and substantial. But I know that many businesses, many industries, are merely hanging on. Their ability to remain in operation and provide employment to Canadians depends on this bill. I ask the minister to review and consider carefully some parts of it because we cannot afford to lose more; particularly in agriculture we cannot afford to lose more than we have already lost.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to participate in the debate on Bill C-15, an act to amend the customs tariff. I wish to show how the government is discriminating against a Manitoba industry, the Automotive Industries Association of Canada, Manitoba division. May I quote a letter I received recently from that association. The association says:

> We wish to draw to your attention a serious problem working against the best interest of the citizens of Manitoba and of Manitoba industry engaged in the automotive replacement market.

The association points out that it is discriminated against

> . . . in such a way that the result is manufacturers and distributors are placed in a position of being non-competitive with similar businesses located elsewhere in Canada. The current action of the customs and excise division if continued may also result in Manitobans paying up to 20 per cent more for the same products being sold at lower prices in other provinces. The highly inflationary effect is obvious as is the adverse effect on Manitoba industry.

The letter goes on to say:

> The problem arises from customs and excise in Ottawa, and enforced by that same department in Winnipeg, unilaterally and without any advance notice to the importers, placing interpretations on the customs act, and administering the automotive and tractor sections of the act, in a manner contrary to what was done over the previous 40 years and, with some minor exceptions, contrary to what is being done in other areas of Canada. By refusing to allow entry into Manitoba at the import duty rates being allowed elsewhere in Canada and claiming up to 15 per cent additional import duties on shipments cleared in the Manitoba region, customs and excise places importers based in Manitoba at a disadvantage and causes rapid escalation of prices. Additional duties are being claimed on goods of a kind not made in Canada as well as those that are, over and above what has been the traditional rates for many years.
> The current situation is obviously unfair. Attempts to have the situation corrected through contact with local customs and excise officials as well as those in Ottawa have produced no results and not even acknowledgement that an unjust situation exists.

I find it extraordinary that the department would not even acknowledge the existence of a problem this big. I continue quoting:

> We are, therefore, appealing to our member of parliament, the press and other media, to assist in getting immediate action to correct an unjust and discriminatory situation.

I hope the minister will pay particular attention to my representation this evening. The association went to great lengths in an attempt to get action. It asks for immediate action to correct an unjust and discriminatory situation. I continue quoting from the letter:

> Detailed documentary evidence is available from several manufacturers and distributors in Winnipeg to fully support the foregoing statements.
> We are asking for your understanding and support and your assistance in bringing this to the attention of those concerned in Ottawa to rectify this situation immediately.

people will begin to wonder who actually owns the farmland and the farming resources of this country.

To some extent we have a beef industry in the north Okanagan as well as a dairy industry, and there have been continuing problems. We have been hearing about competition from offshore beef which has been permitted to come into the country. That price has been kept down so that the government can suggest that its anti-inflation program is really working, but it is working at the expense at one of the primary industries of Canada, which we cannot really afford to have disappear.

The federal government encouraged the dairy industry to increase production in British Columbia, and the producers there reacted in a most extraordinary fashion, to the point where production almost exploded. Then the federal government changed its subsidy program overnight into a program of penalty, and producers were left with surpluses of milk which they could not sell except at a price which really was a penalty. That would have put them out of business in a very short time, and some then turned to hog production because one thing you can do with surplus milk is feed it to pigs.

It is even more inexplicable to lower the duty on hog production and to allow competition at a time when the dairy industry very much needs protection for those who could go into that as a side interest to use up some of their surplus milk. We have heard a great deal about this strange development in the hog industry. As I listened to the minister announce that change, I could not understand because the timing was most inauspicious.

I would like to change the subject for a moment. We face an extreme paradox when we discuss customs and tariffs at all at a time when in world forums we are discussing, along with the other nations of the world, the new international economic order. There has been passing reference to it and some mention of free trade, and I noticed that the speaker who preceded me entirely rejected free trade as being a possibility because he comes from a part of the country where economic development is essential. The economic development of his area has not kept pace with the central or western parts of Canada.

Yet a variety of spokesmen for the government have committed themselves to the new international economic order. I spent a week at the United Nations, and the subject was discussed there to some extent. We know that a group of nations gathered at Manila in January and February of 1976, and they set out a Manila Declaration and Program of Action. The group has been known as the group of 77 because 77 nations gathered there. They made enormous demands of the developed nations of the world. When I was at the United Nations I learned that that group has now grown to 115. That group is asking for a complete restructuring of world trade.

I have travelled widely and have visited some of the countries which we call underdeveloped. I know the appalling need and the vast range between rich and poor, and I have seen misery at first hand. One cannot but have some sympathy for those nations that are now rejecting the old aid programs and demanding instead a complete restructuring of the world's trading patterns.

An article in "The Canadian Business Review," Volume 3, 1976, entitled "The New International Economic Order And Its Implications For Canada" makes some telling points. It states:

> The Canadian government has indicated in broad terms an acceptance of the need to establish a New International Economic Order.

Our spokesmen have been seriously involved, and the former secretary of state for external affairs who has been—I would not want to use the word "demoted"—who has been shifted to House leader was co-chairman of the North-South conference. This is another international conference which goes along more or less continuously with the UNCTAD conference which is held from time to time. Perhaps the terminology is poor but the north represents the developed countries and the south the underdeveloped countries. However, this conference has bogged down, and I think one of the problems is that few countries in the world have the democratic process which we appreciate in this country. It is here that tariffs and customs come into play. It is easy to advocate the total restructuring of the economic system of the world but it is not so easy in a country such as Canada.

The article states at page 20:

> Nevertheless, the proposals for the establishment of a New International Economic Order are of great significance for Canadians. Canada will be directly affected by any major attempt at restructuring the system through which international flows of goods and services, capital and technology take place. Perhaps more than any other developed country, Canada's own interest in the reform of the international system is ambivalent.

We play a dual role. In some ways we are a developed, sophisticated, industrialized nation, but in certain areas of Canada we are underdeveloped, undeveloped, and primitive. We have vast areas that cry for development, for job opportunities, for a status they do not have because the industrial area of Canada is concentrated mainly in the eastern provinces.

How can and how does a country which is a democracy go to its people and say: we are asking you to give us your permission to introduce policies on trade that will lower the standard of living in the country as a whole? I simply do not believe that is possible.

I think it is one of the problems of the world today that so many nations, particularly those that form the group of 77, do not themselves know anything like the democratic process where they must seek the will of the population before making trade decisions. Certainly that is not the policy in that other great trading bloc, the Soviet Union, the communist countries of eastern Europe, and mainland China. Again some sort of reference to popular elections, an opposition, and a parliamentary system where it is assumed governments will alternate from time to time—unfortunately in Canada they have not alternated frequently enough in the last few years—this type of system is unknown in many countries of the world.

to blackmail the agricultural industry in the north Okanagan can call a dock tie-up in the fall of the year when the fruit crop is moving to market and, if there is an interruption of even one year, a market can be lost and it can take many years of persistent negotiation to get it back again.

I have always had the greatest regard for the B.C. fruit producers for the way in which they have aggressively marketed Okanagan apples around the world and the way in which they have continued to hold a place and to develop a product that is second to none anywhere in the world, one that can compete with the very best quality and at the highest possible prices. This aspect of agriculture in British Columbia is not always understood even by British Columbians. I am referring to the fact that in so highly competitive an industry you cannot simply produce a poor product and ship it out cheaply. It would not pay any longer because the costs all the way along the line have risen so sharply that you must produce the sort of product that can command a price which would cover the cost of the production and shipping.

Therefore the industry needs in effect a kind of protection, particularly against a process we know as dumping, which still goes on and against which we have developed machinery which is not quite sophisticated enough as yet. It seems to take a little too long to trigger the formula that will put barriers into place with respect to such products as cherries, which are an important crop in the region, where we are in competition not with underdeveloped countries in the far corners of the world but with the United States next door.

This problem has been referred to by a good many other speakers in the course of the evening and we must always keep in mind that the U.S. can produce virtually everything that we can produce, bring it on the market a little earlier, and cream off the top price at the beginning of the season. They can then shore up the shortcomings by dumping on the Canadian market at a lower price than that for which they produce their products, thus providing a floor for the industry back home. This is one aspect of which we must be careful. We have heard other examples.

My colleague, the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker), has already mentioned the problem with potatoes and the type of potatoes known as stripper potatoes. I have had various people in the last day or two ask me what a stripper potato is. There is nothing immoral about it at all, it is just a little lower grade, but it is the kind of potato which, if moved across the border to British Columbia, provides competition that is too stiff for local producers, and yet we can grow excellent potatoes in the dry valleys of British Columbia, as we do, and process them.

Again another factor enters here which has really nothing to do with tariff and customs, although that is closely related. There are several federal programs that have failed to reach British Columbia in any significant amount. One of these is the DREE program where we find that some agreements have not yet been entered into with British Columbia, and for the last several years virtually no funding through that program has been available for industries in British Columbia in the agricultural region which have wished to start up or expand. In most cases it is a question of expanding or replacing worn out facilities. It is not just the prices in the agricultural industry, not just the price that can be obtained for the goods produced which is the problem there.

The price of money is one of the things which is of paramount importance to agriculture in B.C. When every other part of Canada can be developing processing facilities with grants from the federal government—not just low interest loans, but outright grants—these have not been available to the agricultural producing areas of B.C. for many years. Any co-operative or individual who has wanted to increase processing facilities has had to go to the regular money market for all of his needs. So we have the whole question of interest rates on loans as opposed to federal government grants, and the problem continues to exacerbate the situation of the agricultural developers and growers in British Columbia.

The brief goes on to talk about the B.C. Land Commission and the need to retain as much land as possible for agriculture. I do not think anybody denies that basic truth, but the brief goes on to say:

> In addition to preserving all existing farmland and doing everything possible to encourage all available agricultural land to be in full production, we propose that the provincial government create a new program designed to convert Crown land now unfit for agricultural use into usable farmland. This program could include terracing hillsides, reclaiming land that did not disturb natural wildlife shelters, irrigating otherwise useless land, and in general, making as much land now considered marginal or useless for farming as productive as possible.

On the surface that is all very worthy. The next line reads as follows:

> If this program provided meaningful jobs at union wages, we believe the program could really benefit our province for years to come.

The point made there is that if such land which is not now under production were brought in at that price, with all the necessary things which it is suggested would be needed, then it could never pay at the prices which are currently obtainable for agricultural products. It would have to be used for some other purpose. It would have to be sold for housing tracts or industrial development. It would have to serve some purpose other than agriculture, because by the time the agricultural potential of the land has been created at disastrous labour costs, in effect it would be prevented from serving an agricultural role.

One of the difficulties which besets the farmer, and one of the reasons why he must keep a close eye on tariff and customs provisions of the federal government is his enormous investment or accrued value in his farm. If the farm was developed by his grandfather and handed down to him by his father, and if it was developed years ago when land was worth relatively little and could be cleared for very little, then he finds himself holding on to an asset so valuable that in effect he cannot begin to obtain through agriculture anything like a good return from it. This is a problem which is becoming more and more acute in British Columbia, and it will not be long before carefully because it did not at all illustrate that we were winning the battle with inflation in Canada even though we might have had some lower food prices here at that time. What it illustrated was the degree to which European agriculture is protected and the level of the support, in the sense that people in those nations were willing to pay in prices as well as in subsidy for their extremely progressive and highly developed agricultural industry.

My NDP opponent did not seem to realize that, although we have many Canadian farmers and they are progressive and aggressive, they were in direct competition with European agriculture in respect of almost everything they raised.

I am afraid our geography is taught very badly in our schools, by and large. Europe looks very small on the map and our students have a tendency, because of the size of Canada, to assume that the populations and density of Europe are so great that the entire continent involves buildings, pavement, and parks and that there could not possibly be any room left for agriculture. However, I have been to the lovely continent of Europe and have been impressed anew with the size, scope and prosperity of its agriculture. This summer it seems to have had a bit of a set-back entirely due to a rather marked shift in the weather. It is a little too early to say whether or not there is a shift in climate as well, but certainly there has been a shift in the weather.

I was in Europe again about a year ago. I went there entirely on my own. It was not in any way an official trip. My wife and I spent some time in West Germany and observed again the marvellous productivity of the German farming community and the large herds of red and white cattle. We were able to travel from there by bus through Switzerland.

Although I had read a good deal about the Brown Swiss and had seen that breed of cattle I had no idea how many Brown Swiss could be accommodated in Switzerland until I travelled through the valleys there. One could see very clearly in the course of those travels why the Canadian dairy producer has such a difficult time disposing of his surplus milk powder anywhere in the world once the dairies of Europe begin to cut the price.

Sometimes I believe many Canadians live in sort of a fairyland in regard to agriculture in the world today. There is an assumption that somehow we should be able to compete and develop utterly in isolation, without an awareness of the kind of competition which could come not from the developing countries of the world as much as from the most highly developed parts of the world. We are in agricultural competition with such countries as Japan, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa. One might think that the competition would come from the more primitive regions of the world, but that is not the case.

We are in competition with the developed, sophisticated people who seem to be light years ahead of us in preventing our products from moving into their countries as compared with their products moving into this country. This has been one of the features of international trade that has always left me rather breathless.

I have visited the northern island of Japan which has a fruit industry comparable to the fruit industry in several regions in Canada. No apple of ours can find its way into the market over there. They will not run the risk of obtaining a codling moth with a box of apples from Canada, so they manage very effectively to keep our product out. We have never developed a good excuse for keeping their product out of this country. The same argument is applied by Australia and New Zealand occasionally. It is much easier to have the ubiquitous Granny Smith apples showing up in Canada than to get a Canadian Macintosh, Spartan or Red Delicious appearing in Australia or New Zealand. I have always wondered at the injustice of that and why it is that we accept exclusion from other markets that are in competition with us and, at the same time, we do not exclude the products of those countries here.

I represent an area that is part of a very large and diverse constituency. Part of it is one of the garden areas in Canada which still produces a significant fruit crop and, some vegetables, and still has a fine dairy industry, but particularly in vegetables the production is not as good as could be hoped. Yet there is a dream, a hope, and a great deal of romantic feeling about the whole agricultural industry in the area.

I have just received a brief prepared for the government of British Columbia by an organization that calls itself the North Okanagan Aid Society. I will get in touch with these people because I would like very much to talk to them. I have read their brief to the British Columbia government and in some ways I scarcely know where to begin to talk to them about a variety of points which they made. To start with, of course, I think the brief has been sent to the wrong government. If they were truly interested in some of the key and significant factors in agricultural development in British Columbia, the brief should have been directed to the government here in Ottawa. It should have been directed to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) because it is here that so many decisions are made which weigh so heavily upon the agricultural industry in my home province.

But when the group preparing the brief refers to agriculture, they say that they urged the British Columbia government to develop programs to encourage agricultural producers of all kinds, such as producers of vegetables, fruit, grain, etc—all these can be produced in the Okanagan—to have their crops processed and sold in British Columbia, the surpluses to be sent to other markets only after the needs of our province have been met. One can see immediately that the persons writing that have not taken a very close look at modern marketing in agriculture because, if we know one thing in the Okanagan about markets, we know that you cannot enter them and leave them, and re-enter them and leave them.

If you have a market, you have to maintain it and ship to it each year, and you have to be certain that you can guarantee arrival. This is one of the reasons that we are so vulnerable to strikes in the essential services, because anyone really wanting to take off from their traditional economic base into some sort of meaningful development.

On the other hand I think that part of Canada's industrial strategy has to consider the various sectors of the economy and how they can become more efficient without being overly dependent upon continous tariff and non-tariff protection. The practical way, it seems to me, is to do this on a sector by sector basis, and establish time frames such as five to seven years in order to accomplish these goals.

The most respectable argument for protection is always the one made by Alexander Hamilton, when the United States was beginning its nationhood, and that is the protection of infant industries. One of the reasons that John Turner can say, now that he is out of the House, as he said the other day, that under confederation the province that has profited most has been the province of Ontario is that in Canada, and especially in central Canada, part of our trouble has been that infant manufacturing industries have never fully grown up because they have been overly protected. Therefore they have been relatively inefficient in international competition.

In this connection I think most Canadians would welcome a change in the United States-Canada auto pact that would allow Canadian consumers to buy cars without having to pay the 15 per cent tariff duty. It makes little sense for cars produced in North America to have a $300 to $700 differential as between Canadian and U.S. prices, especially since the tariff is not really protective of Canadian jobs. The pact should, of course, make sure that Canadian jobs in the automobile industry are protected, but I see no relationship between that and the tariff duty as it is now applied.

I liked what Mr. John MacDonald, the head of the Canadian Export Corporation, said the other day at a meeting of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, which I wish I could have attended. Mr. MacDonald said:

> There are opportunities in the Atlantic provinces to capture the opportunities opening up in international markets. The value added to the primary products of your forestry, agricultural, fisheries and mining resources should not be lost to the secondary manufacturing capabilities of foreign countries. Those capabilities should be established here, the plant, the equipment, the skills, the management and marketing expertise.

To which, Mr. Speaker, I say Amen. One of the great opportunities to help the Atlantic region, and especially Nova Scotia, is for the Canadian government to go the extra mile to make sure that a new international steel complex is located in Cape Breton, Nova Scotia. It could at one and the same time reverse the historic "have-not" role of Nova Scotia in Canada's confederation; and equalization payments, for example, could disappear within the next decade or two. With the shortages expected in Canadian steel capacity in the 1980's this could make a real contribution to our balance of payments situation that could be critical. This is the situation because as much as 60 per cent to 70 per cent of the production of Cansteel will be exported and thus earn important dollars for the Canadian economy.

For those members who are not familiar with Cansteel may I say it is a consortium of steel companies including Dofasco of Hamilton, Ontario, and two of the largest European producers, one German and one Dutch, plus National of Pittsburgh which, with the province of Nova Scotia, are studying in depth all the technical, financial and marketing aspects in respect of the establishment of a new steel complex in eastern Nova Scotia on Cape Breton Island. They have been involved in this for a year and a half now since Cansteel was organized, and the decision concerning whether or not to go ahead should be made by May next year.

Despite the present uncertain conditions in respect of world steel markets and the large capital financing that would be necessary, there seems to be a strong possibility that the effort could be successful. Traditionally from the 19th century on steel plants were located near raw materials such as coal, iron ore, limestone or dalomite, and at sites inland. Later closeness to markets became strategically important. It seems to me there is now a trend back to locating near available raw materials, especially coking coal and tidewater with depth.

The consortium partners would buy much of the semi-finished slabs and billets that would be produced, and hopefully we could produce some other finished products besides rails, given the fact that there would be a sort of captive market for a majority of the semi-finished steel. The government must seize the opportunity it has in this case and encourage such a development in every feasible way. It would appear now that there would be available from the Cape Breton Development Corporation three million tons of good coking coal at internationally competitive prices.

Iron ore, and generations of steel-making skill are available in the Cape Breton industrial area. There is access to deep tidewater and there is easy access to limestone and dalomite. To make it a success, however, the federal government must be deeply involved and committed. Given the return of the present member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen) to his duties as House Leader and deputy Prime Minister we know that co-operation from Ottawa will be guaranteed.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, as I sat and listened to this enlightening debate on customs tariffs I have been reminded of the election campaign of 1972 and of one particular all-candidate forum where my Liberal opponent read out a list of food prices from various places in Europe. He read the list as proof that the Liberal government of the day had solved the fight against inflation. He was followed by my NDP opponent who told the Liberal candidate not to bother the meeting with any list of agricultural prices in Europe because Canada is a great country with aggressive and progressive farmers and we did not need to hear any such list at all. It struck me that they had both missed the point.

I told my Liberal opponent that the list he read was the most important thing he had said all evening and that, rather than being overlooked, it should have been considered very inadequate to allow us to build a viable manufacturing sector based on selling goods in the large market extending from Trois-Rivières in Quebec to Windsor in Ontario, within which region some two thirds of all Canadians live.

Simultaneously the American tariffs on many goods, as well as their more sophisticated manufacturing sector based upon economies of scale related to larger markets, their greater technology and access to finance, all hindered our development. An additional sore point with some people in Atlantic Canada is that many home grown family and partnership farms and businesses, both in primary and secondary manufacturing, were bought out by larger corporations which often proceeded to close them and supply the maritimes from their central Canadian factories or plants. In doing so they were unimpeded by any federal attempt to intervene, as for example, by a fiscal tool such as a high capital gains tax for selling maritime-owned businesses in order to keep these industries' jobs in the maritime provinces.

Having made that brief, if simplistic, historical incursion into our economic history, and while I do believe the world we are moving into in the 1980's and 1990's is going to be one which will demand greater liberalization of trade between countries, and while believing that Canada has to take a lead in promoting the lowering of tariffs, I must express a caveat.

The free trade model recently proposed by the Economic Council of Canada as a policy option for Canada during the latter half of the 1970's is, in my opinion, a dubious proposition. The modern extensions of Ricardo's model are predicated on an institutional framework that bears little resemblance to the existing international political economic order.

For success, the free trade model requires a laissez faire political and economic system, that is, passive government, truly competitive markets, small, powerless and passive trading firms, unimpeded flows of labour between countries and within national boundaries, free flows of capital and non-managed, flexible exchange rates—no dirty floats. Only when these institutional conditions are met will all the participants in international trade experience any improvements in their real standards of living.

Within the framework of our own confederation we have had free trade, indeed an economic union, between the provinces, but the Atlantic provinces have still suffered. Likewise if you look at the divisions between the rich and the poor sections in Italy, we can agree that free trade even within a country is sometimes injurious to one section of it, or at least plays little role in closing the employment and income gap between national regions. I also believe, and more so after listening to Prime Minister Manley of Jamaica today, that we in the better off countries have to open our markets in a preferential way to Third World countries.

Some would argue that we have a comparative advantage that should be exploited in high technology industries. Indeed a perusal of Canada's trade figures reveals that the country may not even possess a comparative, that is a relative, advantage in high technology industries. Moreover, not only have the high technology manufacturing industries, with few exceptions, performed poorly in foreign markets, but they have also been slipping in the domestic market. Thus it would appear that the strength of Canada's trade advantage resides in the resource sector, a sector that would not likely experience large gains because of free trade. As a result the movement to free trade would, it seems to me, reinforce the Canadian image of hewers of wood and drawers of water.

Obviously in the short run per capita incomes have increased through development of our natural resources and staple products, but we have paid a high price for it. We must now intelligently and vigorously pursue a policy of increased processing of Canada's natural resources, but this move would be inconsistent with free trade in the textbook sense. Furthermore, the regional repercussions of the closing out of a substantial segment of the manufacturing sector—for example, textiles in Quebec—are even more serious than I have indicated.

A substantial decline in employment in the manufacturing sector, compensated by a sharp increase in the share of aggregate employment accounted for by the service sector, could result in a marked deterioration in the productivity potential of the economy. Indeed it is possible that the initial productivity bonus stemming from specialization could be completely offset within four to six years by a lower trend growth in over-all productivity.

Up to now we have assumed that the transition which would occur in the industrial structure as a result of the move toward free trade would be orderly, but the massive industrial restructuring that would be required to maximize the potential benefits from free trade could not in fact take place in an orderly manner, even if we were looking at a relatively long adjustment period. Canada's post-war economic history suggests that this is so for many of our industries that have been protected for a long period.

Moreover, some suggestions that Canada should even go it alone unilaterally in establishing free trade, strike me as being completely unrealistic and could be catastrophic in the consequences of such a step. Canada has to operate within the context of negotiating under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. At the present time the various countries of the world are engaged in the tedious but important meetings of GATT that are referred to as the Tokyo round of negotiations. It is our belief and hope that a great deal will be accomplished in the liberalization of trade policies for Canada and, indeed, for the world at these meetings.

I would especially hope that the Third World countries would be given special concessions by the developed countries which have controlled the GATT system in the past because they carried out much of the world's trade between themselves. We in the developed world must continually remind ourselves that there are some two billion human beings on this planet, flesh and blood like ourselves, who have to be encouraged with aid both of food and fibre, and also technology and capital, but including trade arrangements that would give them a chance sible for allowing to go through cabinet regulations which reduced the duty on certain fish products. The processed fish industry is having problems disposing of its product on the various markets, including our Canadian markets.

Some of the items on which we have had reductions are sugar, fresh and processed vegetables, fish products, prepared food products, biscuits, crackers and cereal foods, all of which have had a reduction in duty when coming into this country. These products should be manufactured by Canadians. More Canadians would be employed and there would be a better income for agriculture. The program is contradictory.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCain: You either want employment in Canada or you do not, and I suspect the Minister of Finance is on a collision course in this and other fields. If agriculture is to be more and more vulnerable, there will be more and more unemployment.

I wonder how many members are acquainted with farm friends who have spent $100,000 on farm equipment recently, $50,000 for grain storage, or $75,000 for potato storage. This creates work in the industrial areas of Canada. However, if the farmer is to have increased competition from foreign sources, he is not going to require commercial storage. He will not be able to afford any tractors or combines built in central Canada or the northern United States. In fact he will not need them.

The Minister of Finance should look at the remarks placed on the record when the predecessor of this bill was introduced. The Minister of Agriculture should also look at the remarks made at that time. Statistics were placed on the record which indicate that both urban and rural Canada are economically worse off by virtue of the influx of cheap food. The employment picture can be improved if agriculture can improve its financial position.

It is high time the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien), in co-operation with the Minister of Agriculture, examined the programs of the EEC, of the United Kingdom, Australia, Japan, and the United States. It is high time the President of the Treasury Board seriously considered the amounts of money which would be required to maintain the agricultural industry in a spirit of confidence comparable to that in the United States. These are figures which you cannot get, and to which no one has given consideration.

Not many months ago the Minister of Agriculture told us that our farmers had the benefit of the best programs in the world. That is not the case. Look at Agricultural Production in the United States and read "Agriculture Abroad", another publication of the Department of Agriculture in Canada. Read about the Swiss set-up. Read what is said about the American set-up. Read about the programs available for rice, sugar, cotton, peanuts, all of which are eligible for continued assistance and subsidy because the government feels it is desirable that these crops should be produced on an economic basis—and this does not mean the exclusion of imports.

We have seen apple exports from Nova Scotia excluded from the U.K. by virtue of a high-handed, unnegotiated structure in the form of EEC. We have seen market after market disappear because we have negotiated, not with the idea of sustaining a healthy agricultural industry but apparently with the idea of supporting scissor factories and similar enterprises.

In conclusion let me say there is a pertinent and dramatic parallel between the peaks of prosperity in the economy of Canada as a whole and the prosperity of Canadian agriculture. The curves do not coincide precisely, but in virtually every case the peaks of the Canadian economy as a whole come very near, in time, to the peaks of prosperity of Canadian agriculture. Any minister of finance who passes a bill which endangers the economy of agriculture endangers the total economy. He might say to himself that only 7 per cent of the people of Canada work in agriculture, but at the same time he had better look at the vast spending capability of the industry to the benefit of urban Canada, in the main.

This measure is a backward step, a detrimental step. It is bad for Canada as a whole and dangerous for agriculture not because of the size of the individual reductions but because it is a symptom of a policy which has remained in place for ten years and which has hurt agriculture in a serious way. Surely the minister can reconsider. Surely cabinet can sit down together and help this group of people which is so important to Canada in the long range, including of course the metropolitan consumer.

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, economists have vigorously argued the case for free trade for about 200 years, so when the Economic Council of Canada last year reaffirmed its support for free trade it was simply falling in step with a long tradition of economic thought.

As Professor Paul Samuelson has written in his best-selling economics text book:

> Unhampered trade promotes a mutually profitable international division of labour, greatly enhances the potential real national product of all countries, and makes possible higher standards of living all over the globe.

The basis for such conclusions rests upon the principle of comparative advantage, first stated in 1817 by David Ricardo, an English stockbroker, economist and self-made millionaire. Considering the institutional environment of that day, and judged by Britain's priorities, Ricardo's theoretical and actual support for free trade seemed justified. Indeed Britain used the free trade doctrine to its advantage during the peak period of its colonial power in the latter half of the nineteenth century.

The maritime provinces have always been, in theory advocates of free trade for historical reasons. The economies of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick both flowered in the days of reciprocity with the U.S. prior to confederation.

There has always been a traditional grievance that central Canadian manufacturing industries were over-protected by the tariff, forcing maritimers and westerners to pay very high prices for the goods produced by those industries. As the same time national transportation policies were—and still are—the farmer? Often the farmer is kicked in the teeth; should he not sometimes get a pat on the back?

Certain agricultural chemicals are not so listed because they were not used for agriculture 50 years ago, or even 20 years ago. Now such chemicals are needed in the agricultural industry. Because certain chemicals have only recently become available, farmers must deal with a great deal of red tape before they can bring them into this country. These items have been mentioned in letters sent to the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Agriculture, and the minister concerned with the collection of duty. This has been going on for 15 months, Mr. Speaker. There was plenty of time to include such items in this legislation, and allow them to come in duty free, but they have not been included.

We restored the duty on scissors, reduced the duty on agricultural products, ignored the items of importation which are problems to the producer, and we expect the farmer to be happy and to improve our balance of trade. We are indeed in the midst of a strange psychology.

I submit, in view of the statistics which have been pointed out, that a great many inequitable trade situations should be resolved with the United States as far as agricultural trade is concerned. If you look at the duty on beef into the United States in its various forms, it is inequitable. The duty on the potato structure is inequitable. The duty on grapes and wines is inequitable.

Grapes and wines are a prime example of an agricultural commodity which has been detrimentally affected by a change in the policy of duty applied to imports of agricultural products. All those in southern Ontario who voted for Liberal members have got for their thanks a situation with regard to duty in which wine and wine concentrates can be imported into Canada at a price which makes it virtually impossible for the wine industry and the grape industry of Canada to thrive. How would you like to ship a few thousand tons to France? Give it a try some day.

Instead of putting on a reasonable duty through this piece of legislation to protect the grape grower, we are buying surplus grapes in southern Ontario at a cost of something over $1 million. I commend the government for recognizing their financial problem. We will probably do something about processing them and end up spending $330,000.

We will use public funds to subsidize grapes because we have a duty policy which allows concentrates and finished products to come into Canada in competition with our products. The government is dipping into the public purse to correct it. I agree it must dip under the present circumstances. However, I disagree with it permitting the circumstances to arise where it is necessary to dip into the public purse to correct an obvious oversight.

If you were to order wine in government premises anywhere in Ottawa where it might be available, would you get Canadian wine? I wonder whether the grape grower is getting that much support from the Government of Canada, the Minister of Agriculture, and the Minister of Finance. If I am not mistaken there is a great deal that is foreign and you have to take it without asking.

A classic example of a situation in which there is often a surplus is the potato. The Government of Canada should take note of this example. You cannot get potatoes into the European Economic Community unless there is a drought or shortage to the point of causing great hardship. However, we happen to have a piece of paper which says that following their mid-August decision to suspend the customs external tariff on fresh and chilled cabbage, cauliflower, peas, carrots, celery and potatoes until the end of September, the EEC ministers agreed to prolong this suspension with respect to all these vegetables until the end of the year.

This is one of the very first times that Canada is shipping table stock potatoes into the European Economic Community. They have always had enough of their own and, at times, a surplus. They have not dumped that surplus of potatoes in Canada, but in markets that traditionally belonged to Canada and the United States. They dumped them at prices which scarcely covered the cost of packaging and freight. However, we have no such program.

The Scandinavian countries today say that they are going to ship as many potatoes as they can ship properly, but they are going to protect their consumers and producers by not letting out too many. The ministers of the European Economic Community are going to let some potatoes in, but not too many. They are going to protect their farmers.

Time after time the Australian government has passed regulation after regulation because a particular agricultural commodity was being hurt. We had an extensive market in Australia. However, because a particular Commodity was in competition with a product in Australia, the door was shut forthwith. For some reason or another Canada, as a party to GATT, cannot do the same to anybody else. We can be excluded from markets world-wide without any call for compensation whatsoever. However, when our market is cluttered with dumped produce, no action can be taken because it would contravene our relationship with GATT. It is high time we put ourselves in a different position with GATT.

There are close to a million tons surplus of potatoes on the North American continent, 400,000 pounds of which are in Canada. I hope that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Agriculture, and the Minister of Finance will co-operate in their search for markets and duty concessions so that the Minister of Agriculture and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) will not again have to dip into the public purse to bail out the potato farmer. If not, he may have to be bailed out in the same way as the grape farmer and the pork producer.

It is indeed a strange and wonderful structure in which we find ourselves today. It would be utterly impossible for any conscientious individual with any relationship to the farm community to allow this legislation to pass by without castigating the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) who is equally respon-body was thoroughly and completely deceived, particularly the farmer.

An hon. Member: But you people forced the election.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, no opposition party can force an election when the government wants to stay in power.

An hon. Member: Where were you in 1974?

Mr. McCain: Please shut up and listen, and perhaps you will learn.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McCain: The government introduced legislation in this House which it knew no party on my side could possibly support. It was done, with the malevolent intent to bring an election upon the people of Canada.

An hon. Member: You're sore because you lost.

Mr. McCain: The very principle involved in that legislation demanded that every opposition party should vote against the government, and no one knew this better than the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when he authorized the introduction of the legislation.

An hon. Member: And you blew the election.

Mr. McCain: Well—

An hon. Member: You lost, and you will continue to lose.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, there are none so blind as those who will not learn or listen.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Right on.

Mr. McCain: Our agricultural industry can improve this country's unfavourable balance of trade. Let me relate some figures to demonstrate the trade deficit which Canada experienced in relation to the United States.

In the five-year period 1966 to 1970 inclusive Canada incurred, on average, a trade deficit in agriculture of $320 million with the United States. In 1971 that deficit rose to $371 million; in 1972 to $449 million; and in 1973 to $672 million. Do not forget that around this time the oil deficit made itself felt, as well. In 1974 the agricultural deficit rose to $1,048 million. In 1975 that agricultural trade deficit with the United States had risen to $1,095 million. And, Mr. Speaker, here we are, setting in motion today the very mechanism which will make that balance of trade even less favourable.

I grant you that so long as our grain is in such great demand on international markets, we shall continue to have an over-all favourable balance of agricultural trade. But if we continue on our present course we shall erode that favourable position because we shall see imported the agricultural commodities which ought to be produced here in this country. And our position is being eroded. The government's policies are causing that erosion.

Earlier today the hon. member from British Columbia discussed the flower growing industry. Mr. Speaker, the Canadian flower growing industry was doing well in Canadian and United States markets. Then came the change in the energy climate. The Canadian government's energy policy drove up the cost of heating greenhouses and other installations used for raising flowers. Consequently, the industry was placed in a difficult economic position. Now, since energy is cheaper in the United States than in Canada, the raising of flowers and shrubs in Canada has declined.

Similar factors have affected costs within our agricultural industry. Let me give you some figures, Mr. Speaker. I am about to refer to a little booklet put out by Agriculture Canada entitled "Canada's Trade in Selected Farm Inputs, 1945-75." Let us see what has happened to the costs of imported items used in agriculture.

The cost in imported agricultural chemicals rose by about 80 per cent in the period 1971-75. The import costs of fertilizer materials increased by 340 per cent. Baler twine had risen by as much as 450 per cent by 1975. Although the cost of that item is down somewhat, costs have still risen by about 300 per cent during the relevant period. Imported tractor and implement tires rose by 160 per cent; combines for grain, by 90 per cent; farm loaders, by 105 per cent; tractors, by 100 per cent; used tractors, by 300 per cent; tractor cabs, by 225 per cent—and so it goes.

How can the government approve legislation of the kind we are now debating which cuts the ground from under the agricultural industry which contributes so much to this country? Further, this bill does not correct inequities which were imposed against the intent of legislation applying basically to agricultural imports. Rulings and regulations have been handed down which go contrary to that intent. The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) this afternoon cited examples. One could cite others, equally valid.

Materials handling equipment necessary on the farm is not eligible for import duty free, as originally intended. The reason is that such equipment resembles implements used for other purposes. Therefore, it is dutiable. And, once duty has been paid, it is almost impossible to obtain a return of duty, even though the equipment was supposed to be allowed in duty free. If you want to buy ventilation equipment for vegetable storage today, you will be asked to pay duty on it. duty has been remitted in some instances, and in some circumstances such equipment is allowed in duty free on the basis of a former remission. But why not correct that situation? If you are going to reduce duty on farm equipment and so allow our farmers to be more productive, why not correct the situation with legislation, instead of leaving it in limbo, so to speak. You are only inviting some person to impose some fresh ruling in future.

At present no manufacturer in Canada makes ventilation equipment for farm buildings. The Government of Canada says that if you bring in ventilation and temperature control equipment for grain, it is duty free; but if you bring it in for any other reason, it is dutiable and taxable. I submit that this policy is in error. Why not do something to the advantage of imposed upon those who produce at less than the cost of production.

The pork industry is an example, Mr. Speaker, and it is singled out for particularly harsh treatment. Since 1972, when many of us arrived in this House for the first time, it experienced a cycle of major losses and the provinces had to come to the rescue. There was then a rather short cycle of profit, but it did not recover its capital losses and has not repaid the loans which were necessary in the low cycle. As a result of an over abundance of meat of all kinds on the Canadian market, it is now in a very depressed condition and is not protected by any automatic plan to contribute to the welfare of the producers, as would be the case in other parts of the world. It must suffer cycles of no duty, plus cycles of low prices. This is just shortsighted economics not just from the point of view of agriculture and the pork producer but for Canada as a whole.

I think it is interesting to note that according to the document we are studying, duties will be dropped or will continue to be reduced on between 30 and 40 agricultural items. Let us examine what happened between 1972 and 1975 on these items. I do not include oranges, orange juice, and the kinds of fruit that we must import but only those we produce ourselves. The government claims not much harm has been done since the initial reduction, but if it would relate the statistics to the imports of such products from 1972 to 1975 it would realize that except for three agricultural items produced here, only cranberries, green beans, and carrots have had a favourable change in their trade position. All the other items, apples, blueberries, cherries, peaches, pears, plums, strawberries, beans, cabbage, potatoes, etc. were imported in greater quantities in 1975. There is absolutely no indication that this trend has changed or will change in the figures for 1976.

There have been many complaints about unemployment in this country. If we are going to adopt tariff policies which will result in increased imports of food—and the trend is very clearly established—then we are putting ourselves in the position of eliminating jobs rather than creating them. We are just adding to our own hardship.

Perhaps one item that should be given some careful consideration is sugar. Not that Canada produces much sugar but it has been the subject of gossip by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). We have to call it gossip, Mr. Speaker, because nothing concrete has ever come of it. On several occasions the minister has said that we should have a sugar industry somewhere in his own area. In spite of that, however, this particular item of business with which we are dealing proposes to reduce the duties on sugar to the point where it would be impossible for Canadians to produce it. During the recent world shortage of sugar I submit that Canadian consumers paid more for it, and sacrificed their desire for it to a degree that would have been unnecessary if there had been a sugar policy to support the industry at its historical levels. I submit also that in the long run the consumer would have paid less for sugar in Canada, as was the case in the United States where they had a sugar policy.

[Mr. McCain.]

Mr. O'Connell: Statistics prove the opposite.

Mr. McCain: Let us have the statistics then, and see if they prove anything of the kind.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Sure they do.

Mr. McCain: I know what the price of sugar was in Canada during that shortage and what it was in the United States; it went much higher in the United States than it ever did in Canada.

Mr. O'Connell: You are suggesting the long term.

Mr. McCain: I am suggesting the long term, that is right, and I submit that in the short term they paid enough to cover ten years if we had a sugar policy here.

As world demand for food increases and as world demand for sugar increases, Canadians may be very sorry that we do not have a sugar policy. We have not experienced the only high price in sugar that we are going to experience. For the sake of the consumer we need a sugar policy, and for the sake of the farmer we need a sugar policy.

In response to a question in this House the Minister of Agriculture stated that he was consulted about the reduction of duties on agricultural products but that it was so small it did not make any difference. That is a shocking statement to the world of agriculture, Mr. Speaker. Let us examine two or three agricultural items besides sugar where lack of a policy has been detrimental to the national industry.

Let us take the apple industry. In Europe there is an automatic program which guarantees a farmer a specific return for his product to cover a fair wage for himself and his help. We have no such automatic program, so when surplus apple juice appeared in Switzerland about 18 months ago it landed in Canada unprotected against dumping, unprotected against an unfair market price, and of course our apple industry suffered greatly. Do we want to become dependent upon Europe for our apple juice? In the long run it will be expensive. I submit that riding down inflation on the backs of the farmers is about as short term as any policy the government could conceive. You cannot financially ruin the pork and beef industry and the apple and apple juice industries, and expect fair prices tomorrow on the consumer shelves. You can quote all sorts of statistics to justify yourselves, but God help us when the consumer must reap the harvest, must bear the brunt of what you have done. You will need half a dozen Plumptres to justify your existence.

The government has played both ends against the middle most deceitfully. On the one hand Mrs. Plumptre told the consumer what a great country he lived in and how low prices would be under the Trudeau administration. On the other hand, the Minister of Agriculture tried to convince farmers that, if they voted for the government, they would be in Utopia. The government called an election in 1974, and every-his beliefs and for the manner in which he pursues them with persistence for the good of the country.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): It is unconstitutional.

Mr. Andres: Much criticism has been levelled at the position of the members in the other place, and the very usefulness of the other place has been brought to attention. The hon. member has made some valid points.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Name one.

Mr. Andres: He made some valid points in defence of his proposal to abolish the other place. We could well look after things in this House, as he said. I concur in many of these valid points. Nevertheless I believe the hon. member has missed a very important aspect of our society, namely, our freedom. I should like to bring one saying to his attention, namely, that the price of freedom is eternal vigilance. This is something that we should all keep in mind and understand. Members of the other place stand there vigilant when we in haste, and sometimes with some political expediency, move in a rational or an irrational manner. It is the members in the other place who bring us back to our senses. I appreciate the other place and the reason for which these people were appointed.

Much has been said about democracy and about the fact that the abolition of the other place would be undemocratic. But words must be followed by action, and I believe very firmly in the democratic process. At the same time I recognize fully that democracy is a cumbersome form of government. However, it is a government that represents the people. In my view the abolition of the other place would be another step toward the loss of this protection of our freedom. If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre were successful with his proposal, I would not be a bit surprised if before long he or his kind were to introduce another bill, but this time a bill to abolish this place—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Not Stanley, he would not do that.

Mr. Andres: However, I do not think the hon. member will be successful as he has not been in 30 odd years. Even though he thinks he has made some progress on this issue, I submit he has not because in fact the other place has been strengthened in the few short years that I have been here, during which time I have come to appreciate and respect what the other place stands for and to appreciate the diligence of the members of the other place in their committee work. I feel it is an honour to have an Upper House which is our bulwark for freedom.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andres: Much has been said in our various provinces and other countries about the abolition of an upper house, but let us not forget that in some other countries elected representatives have been abolished and totalitarian governments reign. I hope we will never see that day in this great country of ours where we enjoy freedom. I hope we will never have that type of dictatorship or totalitarian regime.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being six o'clock and the hour for private members, business having expired, I do now leave the chair until 8 o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that Bill C-15, to amend the Customs Tariff, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, the reason given by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) for his failure to renew certain of the reduced duties was that this was designed to create employment. That is a very logical and proper reason, but let us consider one of the industries which will be badly hurt by the lack of protection from duty, namely, the meat packing industry.

The meat packing industry has annual sales of over $3.5 billion. It is third largest of all manufacturing industries. It ranks second in the cost of material used, amounting to almost $3 billion. The materials are produced locally, Mr. Speaker. It spends $6 million every day on livestock and employs a total work force of nearly 33,000. Salaries and wages amount to $337 million annually; it contributes $20 million annually in taxes, and spends $20 million for fuel and electricity. I think these credentials establish that if any industry should be protected for reasons of employment and contributions to the economy, it should be the meat packing industry.

If we do not protect the producers of the raw material in that industry, employment is affected, and I submit that the items which have been reconsidered because of their employment capability rank well below the meat packing industry. This does not say anything about the hardship that will be

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): I will be brief, Mr. Speaker, because I do not want to kill the legislation introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Besides, that would be a lack of courtesy on my part if I wanted to kill his bill, and I want to congratulate him for his stubbornness. Every year since I have been in the House of Commons, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has introduced this bill aimed at doing away with that famous old institution—the Senate.

Today, I believe he is just asking for his bill to be referred to the committee for a more thorough study. This is my opinion is very reasonable, for hon. members who have opinions about the Senate could make them known before the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Speaker, when we question the people, we get surprising answers. A while ago, I heard someone who probably wants to become a senator try to prove the usefulness of the Senate. I assure you that 98 per cent of the people consider the Senate an absolutely useless institution. I am surprised that the Senate still exists in the federal government because all the provinces have decided that it is a useless institution. The proof of this is that one by one they have all eliminated their second chamber. As someone said earlier, the last province to do so was Quebec. And what fights and discussions there were before this old monument could be eliminated in Quebec! All other Canadian provinces had already done away with their legislative council. People said about Quebecers: Quebec is the most royalist of all the provinces of Canada since it is so attached to its legislative council.

Another reason for my surprise is the fact that the federal government has always more or less shown the way to provinces and that I now realize that it has been given a lesson by all the provinces and that it has not learned from it. Today we are wondering simply what is the usefulness of the Senate. Indeed, all citizens wonder about this. In my opinion, to be fair to the population, we should simply hold a referendum throughout Canada to ask the opinion of the people. Indeed, are we not supposed to reflect the opinion of the people? The government would like to anticipate all the wishes of the big financiers. On the social level, it seems to me that we should be more interested in the opinion of the people.

If by chance this bill were sent to the committee and if a referendum concerning the Senate were suggested, the population could decide if it needs it and if it wishes to keep this old monument. In that case, it would be renovated and kept as other old monuments. But I am convinced, as hon. members all are, that if there were a referendum, 80 per cent of the population would vote to abolish the Senate. This is why I rose in support of the bill introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. In fact, what does being a senator mean? We say it is an honorary title. It is not even an honorary title, Mr. Speaker, it is a dishonorary title because half of the defeated members are appointed there to hide their shame. And it is called an honorary title. Nevertheless, in my opinion an honorary title should be granted to a great scientist.

If a great man stands out in society, such a title would give him the opportunity to perform his scientific work or any other important task for 10 or 12 more years. This is not what we do. Right after his defeat, a member is appointed to the Senate.

That is called an honorary title. What is the population expected to think of such a gesture? If only the members of the Senate were elected, they would at least have a few responsibilities. The House of Commons has all the responsibilities as things are, because its members alone are elected and they are accountable to the people. Because the senator is not elected, he has no responsibility; yet he enjoys all the privileges of those who are elected and who have responsibilities; worse still, he has a right of veto on all the House of Commons does.

Mr. Speaker, the right of veto the Senate has today it did not get from the people. I say those who are truly responsible are those the members of parliament who are elected by the people, who are sent here to work for the people. Moreover, they should not shift their responsibilities on civil servants. Today, there is another type of senator, the civil-servant-senator who does the work of the MPs, who takes over their responsibilities though he is not elected at all.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people has had enough of these irresponsible groups, of the groups they cannot meet, and who do not care about their opinions. Some people say that senators represent an area, but it is not true. The only thing a senator represents, is his seat in the other place, that's all.

He is like a civil servant. What does he represent? His office, this is all he represents; he has no other responsibility. Those who have the responsibility are those who have been elected by the people. When there are blows, they get them while civil servants laugh at us because they have been given absolute control.

It is about the same with the Senate. They have a right of veto over all our work while the people gave them no authority. We could have an elected Senate, which would be responsible and smaller, as suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), a Senate with 25 or 30 senators. This would be enough; fewer senators would sleep in the Senate, that's all. If we want to keep this monument, let us make it smaller, but at least let us have elected senators and let us have them take responsible actions before the people of Canada. This is ultimately why I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that this bill should be referred to the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs so that at least hon. members can go before the committee and speak about this matter.

Mr. Wm. Andres (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to enter the debate this afternoon. I do not wish to be unduly long, and in fact I shall try to be brief. However, first I should like to commend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for his perseverance in putting forward

That was even before the hon. member's time and a good deal before mine. They came up with a lot of things that they were going to do for Canada, and very prominent in their list of promises was reform of the Senate.

The Liberal party has now gone so far that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has shown the greatest generosity in saying that if a Progressive Conservative senator would retire, "I will be glad to consider putting a Progressive Conservative in his place." We have such a large contingent over there that I thought that was a very generous gesture! The Prime Minister said in the throne speech in the last session, as reported at page 44 of Hansard for October 2, 1974:

> Hon. members opposite talk about partisan appointments. This is a serious matter which I have already had the opportunity to discuss several years ago with the authorities of opposition parties, and I had then suggested and I repeat my suggestion today, that if indeed the senators of the Progressive Conservative party, of the Tory party, who wish to retire from the Upper Chamber, refrain from doing so because they do not want to be replaced by Liberal senators, I repeat what I told several years ago to Senator Flynn who, if I am not mistaken, represents the opposition party in the Senate, that, for my part, I would readily appoint Progressive Conservatives to replace the Progressive Conservatives who voluntarily retire from the Upper Chamber.

I interpolate that in the case of those who die, of course, there will not be that treatment. Apparently Prince Edward Island is excluded because when a Progressive Conservative senator did retire voluntarily he was succeeded by a member of the Liberal cabinet of Prince Edward Island. I have no special feeling about that.

I think one way to reform the Senate is to make it a more useful body. I noticed that when His Excellency the Deputy Governor General was reading the prorogation speech it pointed out how often this Chamber met and how less frequent were the sessions of the Senate. I think more legislation could be introduced and processed there. I think the present government is often quite contemptuous of the Senate in tossing legislation over to them, giving the senators two or three hours to deal with matters of great national emergency. I think that is very bad.

I want to reiterate what has been said many times, Mr. Speaker. The Senate in its committees has done, in my opinion, excellent work. Today I was looking over the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee study on relations between Canada and the Commonwealth Caribbean. I had that in mind because a very distinguished Jamaican is visiting Ottawa and I will have the honour of chatting with him tomorrow. That is an excellent and careful study which reflects balanced, wise, and helpful judgment. It is highly regarded by leaders in the whole of the Commonwealth Caribbean and has given us great prestige in that someone has given thought to an important matter. I think what that committee has done in many areas of foreign affairs has been very useful.

The hon. member who preceded me spoke about numerous other studies which have been very helpful. I think the Senate should take advantage of its more informal procedures to deal with more issues. I have often thought it would be an excellent thing for the hon. member who moved this bill to accept an appointment to the Senate. They are more casual about procedure there and he would be of great help to them on many matters.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Macquarrie: Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Isn't he my friend? Why does he suggest that?

Mr. Macquarrie: I think it is also because I am a friend of the Senate. He could join an ex-colleague. I used to hear a former member for Assiniboia wanting to abolish the Senate two or three times a session. He now sits over there as Senator Hazen Argue. The hon. member would also have other friends. Senator Eugene Forsey not only became a senator but a Liberal. He was not always so. There would be lots of opportunities for him.

Perhaps one of the flaws in our system is that we are occasionally a little casual about improving our rules of procedure. As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) has stated, we all know very well that while, strictly speaking, and in terms of the constitution, this second body has an absolute veto, it keeps its position in our structure by not using it, or as Senator Forsey has said, by not acting like madmen or fools. I think it would be wise to reform the Senate by removing that veto or making it applicable for a limited time. To have an absolute veto that they do not use for political reasons strikes me as not being a very good structure. I think some improvement in that regard could be made.

I think the hon. member's bill will not get support. While there are many things we could do to improve the life of the Canadian people, I doubt whether the destruction of the Senate tomorrow would really benefit many Canadians. It would do very little for the people who were disbanded, even if they were pensioned off, as has been suggested.

• (1740)

To write off the long-established Senate of Canada and say it is useless and makes no contribution is, I think, with all due respect, a bit myopic. I know it is a good subject for humour. I remember discussing the dear old chap who was there until he was 104 years of age and who was accused of never having made a speech in his life. That was contradicted. He said he made two speeches, one the day he came there when he denied that his appointment was a result of political corruption, and one on the day when he was congratulated on his 100th birthday. But he always obeyed the bell. It is such a gentle bell over there. It is so different from ours that it almost makes one have longings.

The hon. member has given us an opportunity to debate an old chestnut. I admire his tenacity and respect his views, but I hope his drastic, destructive action will not be supported by this Chamber.

Mr. Anderson: That number, 104, relates to the number of seats allotted to the various provinces as they entered confederation. As a member from western Canada, I feel somewhat relieved that there are 24 senators from western Canada in that chamber. If we ever did get into a bind, they would be there. I hope we shall never get into a situation where they are needed, but I cannot prophesy what will come about in the future. Even the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, with his great wisdom, cannot prophesy the future except, possibly, that he will be here for another 34 years, which might be not so much a prophesy as a statement of fact.

Although I disagree with the hon. member's bill, I hope that some time in the future discussion can be held as to the role of the Senate, so that not only members of this House but the people across Canada will have an opportunity to consider the operations of that body. As things are, very few Canadians really understand its purpose and function.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre probably expresses the views of the majority of Canadians when he states that the Senate should be abolished, not because those who hold such views are basing them on any personal knowledge of the subject; their attitude arises, I suppose, from the failure of the Senate to do a very good job of justifying its existence. Nor have we acknowledged sufficiently the importance of the investigations which the Senate has carried on to help this House in innumerable ways. Senators have been able to do a great deal of work with which we would otherwise be saddled.

These things should be made known to the people of Canada so that they would have some basis upon which to determine the value of the Senate and its place in the constitution. Is it to be regarded as a body of men who merely sit over there in their latter years, waiting for the grim reaper in very comfortable conditions, or is their expertise and experience being used for the benefit of the people of Canada? I have already referred to the aid they give to the House of Commons. Might the abolition of the Senate only create an extended form of bureaucracy brought about by the need to find others to carry on research or committee work?

There might be ways in which the operation of the Senate could be improved. However, let us not, in the words of the old saying, throw the baby out with the bath water. Let us make the Senate a productive body and then give the message to the rest of Canada.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I have memories of participating in debates on similar motions in recent years.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member took part in one in 1867, didn't he?

● (1730)

Mr. Macquarrie: I once told the hon. member who moved this bill that if I were 74½ years old I might give careful consideration to supporting the measure, but for the next 17 years I think I will tend to oppose such a very drastic move as he is suggesting.

My hon. friend was doing a little back patting when he said how well he had done over 34 years and how many Senators had gone to their reward. But he should be a little more humble. Not only is the other place still there but it has grown before his very eyes. He has been hammering away at it and it has gone from 96 to 104, so I do not think he can claim to be all that effective, sir.

I think it is a bit drastic to look at an institution and, because we find it imperfect, to say that we must throw it out. That is the kind of pessimism that says we are incapable of improving an institution. Many years ago Walter Bagelot said that if the House of Commons were an ideal place then you would not need the other chamber. As much as I love this institution, I doubt I would go so far as to say it is ideal.

On the other hand I would also doubt that there is not some need for this second look, that sober second thought. The preceding speaker's remarks had certain little subtle implications concerning the founder of our country when he used the word "sober". I can only recall what Sir John A. Macdonald himself said—"that the people of Canada prefer John A. drunk to George Brown sober." He seemed to have been right for a good many years.

Mr. McRae: Neither of them went to the Senate.

Mr. Macquarrie: No, they did not. The question of a second Chamber is a serious one. The American founding fathers spent a great deal of time on this matter. Thomas Jefferson used a rather homely metaphor when he was asked, "Why do you need this second Chamber?" He used to pour his tea into a saucer, as was the custom in those days. He saucered the tea into his mouth and said, "It's a little cooler that way".

I was much impressed when I got the chance to visit the great city of Brasilia, with all its interesting and magnificent buildings, and I discovered that their bicameral legislature meets in a building that looks very much like a cup and saucer. It is a very futuristic city; I am not an architect, but that is what it looked like.

I was talking the other day to a very prominent member of the NDP who told me that he had been over to London to visit the Westminster Houses of Parliament. He went into the gallery of the House of Lords and heard there the finest debates he had ever heard dealing in a fundamental, philosophic, yet very practical way with the great problems that the British were facing. Hon. members have no doubt read excerpts from the House of Lords debates which appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail last week. Those are the debates my NDP friend heard.

I believe we should not forget the capacity for infinite improvement. We should have hope enough to think that we can reform. Reform has been in the air for a long time. In 1893 the first political convention in Canada was held in Ottawa. It was not a leadership convention but all of the Liberals who could get to Ottawa came to a great big meeting.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Give me another 34 years and see what happens.

Mr. Anderson: I hope the hon. member is here for another 34 years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Anderson: The hon. member lends a distinction to this House which would be sorely missed if he were no longer here. The only facetious comment I will make is that I assume the hon. member at the time of confederation spoke even more strongly against the creation of the Senate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I was not around at that time.

An hon. Member: Come on, Stanley.

Mr. Anderson: The hon. member has raised a very interesting point, one that many Canadians perhaps consider to be a fault in the way the Senate has been set up, in that it is not an elected House as is the House of Commons. That is the way the Senate was set up originally. We have a great deal of debate in this House by its elected members. If the Senate were an elected House, surely they could speak with power similar to that of the elected representatives in this House. Although it is undemocratic to appoint someone to the Senate in the manner the hon. member spoke of, it would cause a gigantic kerfuffle between the two Houses if both were elected and both had the power of elected members.

Senator Eugene Forsey, commenting on the role of the Senate, said that unless the Senate takes leave of its senses and throws out a bill which a large majority of the people ardently desire, the question of abolition of the Senate will remain purely academic. The Senate knows it does not have enough political clout to do anything of the sort. In other words, the Senate may be undemocratic in the sense that it is not elected, but by the same token it realizes it is part of the process. It knows it does not have enough political clout to override the views and wishes of the House.

On the question of more power for the Senate, Senator Forsey covered this very well when he said that if you gave it more power there would be more power to make a nuisance of it, which is not what it should be. Making it an elected body would certainly do this. He said an elected Senate would claim to be just as representative of public opinion as the elected Commons, and would proceed to throw its weight around.

● (1720)

Many people in Canada do not understand the Senate. They regard it as a rest home for retired politicians—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And for defeated politicians.

Mr. Anderson: —a rest home for people who deserve well from the community by reason of their outstanding services. But let us go back in history. As the hon. member said, Sir John A. Macdonald, when the functions of the Senate were under discussion, said it was a chamber for sober second thought. I have always thought this was an amusing phrase, coming from Sir John A. Macdonald, and I wish I were sure whether he was being facetious or not. The Senate does perform a function in overseeing legislation. I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) would admit that very useful amendments have been brought forward by the Senate with respect to legislation which had passed through the Commons.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Very few.

Mr. Anderson: But this is not the only important function of the Senate. A number of very useful reports have been made by that body or its committees. I think in particular of the study on poverty in Canada carried out under the chairmanship of Senator Croll. I believe the hon. member would agree that a great many members of the Senate have distinguished themselves in business and private life. Many of them have acquired great experience in municipal affairs, as provincial politicians and as politicians at the federal level. This knowledge and experience shows itself in reports such as the one to which I have referred.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre glossed over the fact that the Senate was brought into being for a specific purpose. The maritime provinces and Quebec felt there had to be a chamber where representation was not based simply upon numbers of population. It was evident even in those days that the population of the Maritimes was not likely to be substantial compared with, say, that of Ontario. In the early days of confederation it was feared in Quebec that the population might be greatly exceeded by that of Ontario, and that the strength of the representation in the Commons would be greatly diminished if the population of Ontario rose disproportionately. For this reason a proposal was adopted which ensured the presence of a guaranteed number of senators from Quebec, supposedly to look after the interests of that province.

Mr. Speaker, the Maritimes' population certainly has not increased proportionately with the rest of Canada. The hon. member tells us there is no longer much concern about the need for regional representation based on population. I am not so sure. I do not know anyone who can guarantee that the situation which the builders of our institution had in mind so long ago could not arrive, at a point in our history, where strong regional interest was involved, perhaps in the Prairies, perhaps in the Maritimes. When Quebec, the Maritimes and Ontario entered confederation they were allotted 24 representatives. The basis upon which these seats were allocated remains unchanged to this day.

The hon. member says that 104 people seated in the Senate is too many; that their maintenance is too heavy a burden for the taxpayers of Canada to pay. But as I understand him, he is not directing his criticism to numbers. What he is saying is, abolish the Senate whether it is 104, 50, 25 or 5.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

True, it was prepared before he had any notion that he might be summoned to that other place. In that memorandum he said that the Senate of Canada is the most undemocratic institution in the world. He went on to point out that it has unlimited veto power; it can say "no" to a decision of the House of Commons not just once or 100 times, but a thousand times. He said it in typical Forsey language, and I think he was right. The Senate as we have it in this country is as undemocratic as it can possibly be. Senator Forsey did not mean, and I do not mean, that the persons now in the Senate are undemocratic in their approach to things. What we are talking about is the structure, the constitutional provision which allows the will of the elected people to be overridden by those in the other place.

Sometimes persons who discuss this question with me say, "But you fellows in the House of Commons make mistakes now and then; it is good to have somebody else giving those matters sober second thought." It is a plausible argument; but by what right do those individuals in the other place have the authority to reject what we do? I point out that some in the other place have tried to get in here, into this House. Perhaps they ran for re-election and were defeated. In other words, the public said they did not want those persons in the Parliament of Canada, but they got in through the back door.

I suggest, also, that there are many more conflicts of interest in the other place than have been identified in this place. I think it is particularly unfortunate that matters involving banks, financial institutions and company incorporations are dealt with in that body which has the same authority as we have but which includes many persons with an interest in a number of those institutions.

It is sometimes argued that there are good persons over there, men and women who do good work on committees. They do. Some of their committee reports have been quite useful. They have gone into their subjects very thoroughly. However, I do not see why we should maintain 104 persons on the full pay that goes with being a senator and all the pension benefits that are down the road so that 15 or 20 can do good committee work. There are many professors, academics, businessmen, trade unionists and other people around the country who can be seconded for the kind of committee work that needs to be done. As I say, maintaining 104 for the work that 25 or 30 of them will do is surely not common sense.

I do not see the argument for reform that persons sometimes put forward. In fact, it often happens in the debate that takes place on this bill of mine. Some members will say that this member goes too far, that there are things wrong with the Senate, but let us reform it. Once in a while they start a debate on Senate reform in the other place, but they never finish it. The only reform that seems to have any logic is to provide for the senators to be elected in some way. If we were to do that, if we were to give them the moral authority of being responsible to the electorate, we would add to the stresses and strains of government in this country to no end. We have enough difficulty now in the conflict between the executive and parliament and between the parliament of Canada and the various legislatures without adding another conflict of two Houses with equal authority in terms of their being elected. I think the best answer is to look at the possibility of a unicameral parliament, namely, one House which can be responsible to the people of this country and do this nation's business.

At one time in our history several of our provinces had an upper chamber, but they were done away with one by one. The last one was that in the province of Quebec. How did they get rid of them? In some cases they pensioned off those who were there. That might seem to cost something at the moment, but the cost would be quite minimal compared with what it costs to maintain the Senate in perpetuity. Another argument that is sometimes used is that we have always had it, and therefore we should keep it. That argument keeps us doing a lot of things. I have had members around here ask me about certain reforms that ought to be made in this place. I sometimes have to say I have been through that half a dozen times over the last few decades. It just seems to have been around here for some time and that is why we keep it. That is no argument for the Senate.

It has been argued that the Senate is a place of sober second thought. The people who do the sober second thinking about what goes on here are the people of Canada, not some individuals who, as I have already said, are responsible to no one. There are those who still trot out the argument that in some way the Senate protects minorities. Sir, it does not protect anything. Certainly it does not protect minorities. Minorities are protected in this House where we are responsible to the various groups in the country. The other place where minority rights are protected is the courts.

All told, the case is a good one for revising what the Fathers of Confederation came up with 109 or 110 years ago, and doing away with the other place. My bill proposes this. It is very precise as to the changes that should be made to the constitution. It even has in it a precise date when it should come into effect, namely, July 1, 1977. In other words, Their Honours can have another seven or eight months. I know that the possibility of that happening is not great. However, I do think it is a serious question which we ought to be discussing in these days when we are concerned about the structure and nature of the Parliament of Canada.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this bill which proposes the abolition of the Senate will at least receive the approval of this House this afternoon, so that it can be sent for study to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for his tenacity in bringing forth this bill over a period of 34 years. It certainly indicates one thing: although they keep replacing the senators who came in during the hon. member's first years in the House, he may be winning one battle in that they are no longer here. However, the hon. member no doubt sees they are being replaced by other people. Although the hon. member's tenacity is there, he is not gaining too much headway.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

MEASURE TO ABOLISH THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order No. 1, in the name of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin). Shall the order stand at the request of the government?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved that Bill C-202, to amend the British North America Act, 1867 (abolition of the Senate) be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, if members of the House were prepared to proceed immediately to a vote on this matter I would, of course, withhold my speech, but it has been indicated to me that there are one or two who have views other than mine.

Sir, the purpose of this bill is quite clear. It would, among other things, change section 17 of our constitution, the British North America Act, to make it read:

● (1700)

There shall be One Parliament for Canada, consisting of the Queen and the House of Commons.

In other words, the clear purpose of this bill is to abolish the Senate. I am sure this bill does not come as a surprise to hon. members. I have not counted the number of times I have introduced it. Before I drafted the actual bill I used to bring in motions and resolutions of one kind and another; therefore, I suppose it can be said that since the time I came here I have been arguing for the abolition of the other place.

Someone said to me a while ago that I was not being very effective, that I had been arguing for the abolition of the Senate for 34 years and it is still there. I replied that perhaps I had almost succeeded. Out of all the members who were over there when I first came here and called for the abolition of the Senate, only three remain. So in one way or another we have got rid of most of them. The job is almost done. True, there are quite a number of vacancies in the other place. Perhaps they could just be left. Those vacancies could act as a sort of carrot to induce certain persons to behave, but perhaps we could get rid of the other place in that way.

Seriously, Mr. Speaker, I hope that some day—and I do not see why this should not be the day—the House will at least let this bill go to the appropriate standing committee for discussion of this matter. Not all members of the House agree that the Senate ought to be abolished. But surely in these days when questions are being asked about parliament, democracy and democratic institutions, it is a reasonable proposition that we, in the elected House of this parliament, should look at the provision of 1867 for another place and decide if that place should continue. It is my strong view that it should not.

When I ask that the bill be sent to the appropriate committee, I admit that there are arguments both ways. In fact, there are so many arguments and there is so much to say that we can hardly make a decision in the space of one private members' hour. That is why I plead seriously with the House. I submit that instead of talking this proposition out, the House should allow it to go, either as a bill or as the subject matter thereof, to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for study by members of that committee.

Although I said there are arguments on both sides, and I do recognize that, so far as I am concerned all the arguments are on one side. I believe in democracy. I believe in this country being governed by the people and I think we have devised the right way for being governed by the people, namely, government by elected representatives who pass the laws and discuss the issues which concern a land such as ours.

Perhaps 109 or 110 years ago it seemed appropriate, in a day when the House of Lords was an important institution in the United Kingdom, that we in this country should also have a second body to look at what is done by elected representatives in this chamber. Surely Canada has grown up. Surely democracy has grown to the point where there is no case for the proposition that a group of men and women responsible to no one should have veto power over what is decided by those who have been elected by the people of this country. I emphasize that once a person is appointed to the Senate he is responsible to no one, not even to the prime minister who named him. He is there until age 75. Some of the members in the other place were appointed when the time limit was life itself. They are living out their appointments.

The concept of a democracy which does not go all the way does not, in my view, fit into our thinking today. If we believe that the people have been right to enjoy responsible government, the only persons who should have a say in the making of our laws should be those who are responsible back to the electorate, the people of Canada. I am not suggesting that all the things the Senate does are wrong and all the things this House does are right. I am not suggesting that mistakes are not made in this place. But, sir, every three, four or five years we have to go back to the electorate, back to the people of Canada for their verdict as to whether we should carry on. At the same time, we have this archaic set-up in which a group of 104 men and women—assuming all the places are filled—have the unquestioned right to veto and defeat any decisions made in the House of Commons, and they do not have to answer to anyone. To me that set-up is as undemocratic as it can be.

I am not the only one who makes extreme statements of that kind. I have in my possession, although I do not have it with me at the moment, a memorandum on the Senate which was prepared a number of years ago by Senator Eugene Forsey.

will be able to bring home to the cabinet the importance of many of our western products. I am counting on her to do that.

I have endeavoured to examine the various schedules in Bill C-15 to find out exactly what is being changed, from what it is being changed and to what it is being changed. I challenge any hon. member within half an hour to 45 minutes to decide what is being done. In some cases I suggest that nothing is being done. On page 6 of the bill we see references to cabbage, onions, green peas, rhubarb and green onions, all of which are fresh vegetables grown in my riding and in the lower mainland of British Columbia by small farmers and market gardeners who want to stay in business. I find that the duties set out are little, if anything, different from the duties set out in the book by Michael P. McGoldrick, entitled "Handbook of the Canadian Customs Tariff and Excise Duties." I made an attempt to go through that and compare it with schedule I of this bill, but it was quite a challenge. I should have liked another couple of days to go over it item by item to see if changes were being made and, if so, in what direction. If I found anything, I found it is not being done in the direction of protecting Canadian industries.

● (1650)

This government prides itself on having taken measures to encourage Canadian industry to develop—the Canada Development Corporation and the Foreign Investment Review Act. That is fine. But with Canada's natural industries the government is doing just the opposite; it is destroying some of our most important industries, those on which Canada has counted and on which we should continue to count for our survival.

The beef industry is being driven out of business. Now the fruit and vegetable producers will also suffer through the failure of the government to take adequate measures to have the tariffs change as the season progresses, first from the south up the Pacific coast to British Columbia, and then east and into the next big fruit and vegetable growing area, the Niagara peninsula.

I hope the minister will take note of my remarks and that appropriate changes will be forthcoming in committee whether it be the standing committee or a committee of the whole House. It disturbs me to think of second and third generation Canadians who have put their energies and finances into these important industries now being driven out of business because of rising input costs. Even water for irrigation is becoming more and more expensive on the peninsula where I live. So are fertilizers and transportation. The charge on the ferry from the island to the mainland has doubled within the last six months. This, of course, will affect the cost of transporting goods. But even on the island we should be able to maintain these industries instead of watching them disappear.

I conclude where I set out, Mr. Speaker, by saying that the unfortunate effects of this legislation will be to destroy many of Canada's natural industries—I choose my words carefully in saying "Canada's natural industries"—because it does not provide the protection they so desperately need.

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) introduced this item of business to the House it was with a high degree of confidence that it would go through without very much, if any, consideration. One reason it has to be considered, however, is the minister's remarks as he explained and justified the bill, I think they bear repeating, just to brush up his memory a little bit. As reported at page 466 of Hansard for October 26, he said:

> The principal provision of this bill will continue, until June 30, 1977, a number of the temporary reductions which were first introduced as an anti-inflationary measure in the budget of February 19, 1973, and which had been scheduled to expire on June 30 of this year. Several food products have been added to the list of items on which temporary tariff cuts were in force prior to June 30. These include fresh pork, ham, bacon, macaroni and other pasta products. In addition, deeper cuts than those previously in force have been made on certain canned meats.

In view of the fact that the pork industry of Canada is again in a low income cycle and is about to go through the process of losing between $10 and $25 per carcass, this is certainly an unkind bill, Mr. Speaker. The statistics and market trends were on hand the day this bill was introduced, so it should have been withheld and revised.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCain: When one considers the number of pork producers there are in Canada, I think I should read a little further. The minister said:

> I should mention, however, that tires, tubes and scissors—

Let us not forget the scissors.

> —have been dropped from the list because it was judged that the tariff reductions previously in force were causing serious problems for Canadian producers and adversely affecting employment in Canada.

Is the minister not aware that the pork industry employs people, Mr. Speaker? Is he not aware that pork producers are losing money they cannot afford to lose?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz)—Health—Swine influenza—Report of advisory committee—Reason for delay of mass immunization program; the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie)—Auditor General—Implementation of recommendations of independent review committee—Government position.

It being five o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's earlier one. This is the problem. I assume it is a combination of stupidity and unwillingness on the part of the government to recognize this problem of the growing seasons varying across Canada, and failure to recognize the west—I am surprised that there are no voices on the other side objecting to this—which has caused the government to ignore these industries.

It just so happens, to choose one particular fruit, that strawberries come to season on the west coast earlier than they do in the east, for obvious reasons. They come to season even earlier in California and New Mexico. But what happens? The strawberries from California and New Mexico are imported into Canada under favourable conditions, but when they come into fruit on the west coast there is no protection for them and they have to compete with strawberries from the United States and Mexico. The same thing happens with tomatoes. Our agriculturalists on the west coast are closing up shop for this very reason. If this government has any intention of providing us with long-term, home grown food, they are not going about it in the right way with these revisions to Customs Tariff.

Flowers, I insist, although one of the pleasanter things of life, are still a part of life even though they are not food. Our Christmas holly is being undersold in the eastern market—which is a big market—simply because that particular product is not protected by tariffs at the right time.

I think, also, of the intervention of the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker) when he was speaking on October 26. He was speaking of the amount by which imports to the United States and elsewhere of various agricultural products have increased over the past few years. I would like to quote from page 472 of Hansard for October 26 as follows:

—in 1975 Canada imported 370 per cent more berries than in 1973. Some 58 per cent more apples were imported in 1975 than in 1973, 200 per cent more honey, 74 per cent more jams, 294 per cent more chicken, 33 per cent more canned ham, and 1,086 per cent more tobacco—

I will not go into the question of tobacco, but here we have natural Canadian industries which are being driven out of business. I just do not understand what this government is trying to do. I am fearful to reach the conclusion that it is deliberately trying to drive Canada into the import business rather than the export business. For example, I have here a letter from the former minister of national revenue, dated June 27, 1975. I had been raising this question for three or four years. The letter deals with plants, flowers and the horticultural industry and says that seasonal duties do not apply to cut flowers nor to plants, and that the value of the duty of these goods is determined in the same manner as for other imports into Canada; that is, duty is collected on a fair market price or the selling price, whichever is lower. It also says that fair market value under Canadian customs law is the open market selling price of like goods in the country of export at the time of shipment to Canada.

All right; but there are no seasonal duties imposed to protect the Canadian industry. Surely there are enough specialists in the Department of National Revenue and in the Department of Finance to determine the level which would guarantee the survival of Canadian food-growing industries. The hon. member for Battle River and the hon. member for Vegreville talked about the beef industry. Vegetables have to go along with beef. There is cabbage and there are potatoes; I do not want to look into the potato business to find out how many potatoes are being imported into this country when there are perfectly good potato-growing areas here. We have them in my own riding. There are also areas for growing apples, tomatoes and cherries.

This government has to look both longitudinally, from the west to the east, and latitudinally so that it will know the differences in climate in this country. Here, in the east, there are recognizable differences; there is snow on the ground in the winter, and there are bright, hot and humid summers. But the growing season starts earlier in the west, and as soon as the government realizes this I hope it will protect the industry which is the backbone of that area.

I assume some help is given to the agricultural industry in the Niagara peninsula, but that does not help the industry in British Columbia. The pricing of goods on the eastern market, which is a big market, is a complex thing. There are freight rates and duties, and these matters must be taken into account in determining the price on the market in the east of products coming from as far away as British Columbia. For example, the Christmas holly growers on the west coast have been complaining about transportation costs. The Department of Transport has changed the manner in which freight rates are calculated. They used to be calculated on the basis of weight, but now it is on the basis of volume. Surely hon. members recognize that a large package of holly weighs very little but takes up much space. This underlines the transportation problem as goods come from the west coast.

In addition, the cost of fertilizer has gone up. With regard to greenhouses, I am sure the cost of glass has gone up. The cost of heating has gone up. We have a benign climate on the west coast, but it is not totally benign; we have to provide heat from time to time; we have to heat our greenhouses in order to bring on products so they can reach the market in time.

Another matter which is of concern in my riding is the nursery industry. Nurserymen have been complaining to me about the different ways their products are imported, and about the lack of protection they get one way or the other. For example, imported, potted plants for starting come in untaxed if they are in pots. If the nurserymen in my riding can grow from seed and want to pot their plants for selling, and have to import these small pots so that the plants may be sold in suitable containers, the containers themselves are taxable; but potted plants with the same kind of plastic container are not taxable. This is grossly unfair. The containers are not always available in Canada, and some of them are not of the quality required for proper merchandising.

I cannot help asking why this is so. It demonstrates neglect of the west, for one thing, and I hope that with the presence in the cabinet of a British Columbia member, the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) (Mrs. Campagnolo), we undertake to review this tariff item with a view to reducing or removing it on these pieces of equipment, because they are in wide use and the demand is indeed growing.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on Bill C-15, the adjustments to the Customs Tariff, I should like to limit my remarks to an appeal to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) to remove the customs duty on some specific cultural items. Since the announcement of the federal government's official policy of multiculturalism five years ago this month, we have witnessed increased activity by ethnocultural organizations, particularly in respect of folkloric presentations. Encouraged by the federal government not only to preserve but also to develop one's cultural heritage, and above all to share it with fellow citizens, increasing thereby an appreciation of the cultural richness and national identity, these ethnocultural organizations—I must emphasize that they are non-profit associations—have gone to considerable expense to provide national costumes, rare instruments and other objects for festivals, exhibits, lectures and other cultural activities.

Also, these same ethnocultural organizations either visit other countries or receive visiting cultural groups either on their own initiative or in a spirit of co-operation as directed by cultural agreements between Canada and other countries such as, for example, the recent Canada-Japan cultural agreement. It therefore behooves us to support these ethnocultural organizations, especially those of a non-profit nature, when they request the removal of the customs duty on imported articles unavailable in Canada. I refer in particular to unique and expensive national costumes for dance ensembles in Canada. These are subject to duties under tariff item 52305-1 which carries a duty rate of 22½ per cent ad valorum under the most favoured nation tariff applicable to importations from many countries.

If the costumes are made of 50 per cent or more, by weight, of man-made fibres not containing wool or hair, they are subject to duty at the rate of 25 per cent ad valorem under tariff item 56300-1. Also included are tariff items 53305-1, 56805-1 and 61105-1. I should like to emphasize to the Minister of Finance the fact that the articles concerned are authentically national and are unavailable in Canada. They are hand-made by artists or skilled craftsmen, and incorporate traditional or artistic characteristics that are typical of the geographic region where they are produced. Naturally, they are expensive. A national costume of this kind may cost $500 or more, and when a dance group of 24 people has to use these costumes the cost to their sponsoring ethnocultural organization is great. Surely we should be able to grant these organizations relief at least from customs duty.

I have made similar representations to the Minister of Finance and to the Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin), not only the present ministers but their predecessors, since 1969 according to my records. So the excuse that the appropriate officials do not have an opportunity to study this problem is not valid. This afternoon I urge the Minister of Finance not just to recognize the problem and approach it sympathetically but, above all, to grant favourable consideration to a legitimate request for the long-awaited duty-free entry of such cultural items.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my intervention this afternoon is directed toward the thesis that the long-term effect of the proposed tariff revisions will be to destroy many of Canada's natural industries. I shall be directing my attention to the following industries, namely, the market garden industry, the horticultural industry, and the nurserymen, because they are not provided adequate tariff protection. The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) who preceded me in this debate drew attention to the fact that the purpose of these revisions is to lower food costs. These are short-term effects. The long-term effects—and they will not be all that long—will be to drive some of these food producing industries, and I have mentioned one in particular, straight out of business because they are not getting the protection they need.

To set the tone for this intervention I will go back to a motion under Standing Order 43 which I have been introducing regularly in the last four years, in the hope that I will get this message home. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that on the vernal equinox each year since I have been in the House I have made it a practice to present to members of the House daffodils grown in my riding. The snow is still on the ground here. It is more than a symbolic gesture, it is a meaningful one. It was the Minister of Finance who simply said that it was very nice to receive these daffodils. I asked if he had gone beyond that, beyond the daffodils, to the real meaning. I should like to read my motion as it is recorded at page 12043 of Hansard of March 23 of this year. It reads as follows:

> That the Minister of Agriculture, in consultation with his colleague, the Minister of Finance, undertake a review of the regulations relating to the imposition of seasonal tariffs affecting fruits, vegetables and flowers imported into Canada so that the fruit, vegetable and flower growers in the garden riding of Esquimalt-Saanich, and elsewhere in the garden belt of Canada, shall be able to continue their commercial operations and provide those of us who have to spend so much of our lives under the snow in the east with the symbol of spring which the daffodils now available to hon. members so graphically provide.

That part of the message went completely over their heads. They were so overwhelmed by receiving the daffodils that they did not see beyond them. For four years now that gesture of mine has been intended to save an industry. It is an industry which feeds us. The thrust of the revisions is to destroy it. The government is killing that industry, it is trying to make us buy our vegetables and fruits overseas. I find this completely unacceptable.

I do not think it is necessary for me to go into a summary of climatology or geography to explain my point to this government. They ought to be able to follow the matter of the latitude and of the sun coming farther north during the springtime. Eventually, in the summertime when the sun is in the northern hemisphere, we have our growing season. Of course, on the west coast we have an earlier growing season, but farther south in southern California they have an even losing a golden opportunity to strengthen an industry that needs some confidence and stability at this point in time, agriculture which is still one of the primary industries in this country.

We have had ad hoc policies and interventions by this government, particularly by the Minister of Agriculture who asserts that he is the friend of the farmers, which have caused loss of confidence, created uncertainty within the industry and driven producers out of business.

So far as the pork industry is concerned, this particular measure does not augur well for the industry because the tariff reductions on pork and pork products have a rather devastating impact on the pork industry. There are two things that bear noting. First, there was absolutely no consultation with the pork industry in regard to this cutback in tariffs. Second, this move, being unilateral, did not provide a trade-off of existing tariff arrangements with the countries that were affected. It seems to me that as an old horse-trader you usually try to get something to barter. Certainly you do not give something away without getting anything in return. But really that is what has happened. We have given away a protective device, which quite frankly was really a reciprocal device, and we have lost our competitive position. In its response to this measure, the Canadian Pork Council points out that this was a unilateral decision, taken without any consultation or knowledge on their part.

What has happened to the pork industry? Mr. Speaker, pork gradings in Canada have declined by 8 per cent in 1976 over 1975. In western Canada there was a decline of 17 per cent. Prices have fallen dramatically. For example, the price in Alberta in the first quarter of 1976 was $68.63 per hundred, dressed. The price in Edmonton this week was $43.45, and in Calgary it was $43.46. What other industry or sector of our society has been subjected to this kind of reduction in income?

Mr. McCain: Not the scissors industry.

Mr. Mazankowski: Certainly not the scissors industry, as my hon. friend says. It is interesting to note that in his speech the Minister of Finance pointed out that measures had to be taken to protect the tire, tube and scissors industry because it was judged that the tariff reductions previously in force were causing serious problems to Canadian producers and were seriously affecting employment in Canada.

● (1620)

We have a situation in which the scissors industry is regarded as being more important in this country than the livestock industry. That is a shame, Mr. Speaker. We have just come out of a situation in 1971-72 when the price of hogs was from $25 to $30. The interesting fact is that in the United States the number of hogs is on the increase, and our imports for the first seven months of 1974 represented 20,269,000 pounds; in 1975, 55,478,000 pounds; and for the first seven months of 1976, 90,905,000 pounds.

That is what has been happening in the pork industry. The confidence of this industry, which enjoyed a bit of stability for a couple of years, has now been rocked. This measure serves neither the best interests of the pork industry nor of the consumers of this country. Our negotiators either have done a bad job or have been given ill-founded directions by the government. We are treated, by this bill, to a reduction in the production of the agricultural producers without a corresponding reduction in the input required to produce the product.

In conclusion, I should like to deal for a moment with a specific example. I had an exchange of letters with the previous minister of finance on this particular item. It has to do with the portable corrals, steel corrals, partitions, stalls, and so on, manufactured in the United States and sold in Canada in great quantities. There is an agent in my constituency who sells well in excess of $100,000 worth of this equipment a year. It comes into this country under tariff item 44603-1 which is described as stall panels, cattle gates, alley chutes for cattle, and so on.

I bring this matter to the attention of the House because there is an increased use of steel panels and corrals in the cattle industry both in the production of cattle and, perhaps more importantly, in the handling of cattle. This equipment is also used to a great extent by agricultural fairs and exhibitions. These items are now subject to a tariff of 17½ per cent when they come into this country. The item includes alley chutes, gates, creep-feeders, loading ramps, portable feeders, and bunks, all used in connection with the production of livestock. I want to place this before the House because in most cases machinery and equipment which is used for agricultural purposes is not subject to tariff. I know there are exceptions, but generally speaking there is no tariff on machinery of this nature.

Moreover, I believe it is interesting to note that we have a fairly close balance in respect of agricultural input between Canada and the United States. As a matter of fact, a document which was put out by Agriculture Canada, entitled "Canada's trade and selected inputs, 1974-75" points out that the United States remains Canada's principal trading partner in agricultural input, accounting for 85 per cent of Canada's exports and 84 per cent of Canada's imports in 1975.

The previous minister of finance indicated that a number of Canadian manufacturers were producing this type of equipment. If they are producing this type of equipment, I would hope they would come forward and try to capture some of this business which is available, because to date the dealer in my constituency is unable to find any source of supply on a continual basis and is therefore unable to meet the demand. I might say that the demand is not only in the agricultural industry of western Canada; this company has been selling across the country.

The 17½ per cent tariff is an added input. If there were an industry in this country producing the same type of equipment, I would say by all means it should be protected. But if there is not an industry in this country which needs protection, then certainly the tariff is simply an added cost to the already increasing cost of input in respect of the production of livestock. I would hope the minister and his officials would capacity to produce. This leads us to the high import sectors such as fruit and vegetables. This is where we get into trouble. There is nothing in the government's agricultural policies which encourages the production of vegetables and fruit in this country. I realize we are limited by climatic conditions, but the imbalance becomes more disturbing year after year. We are presently importing some $500 million worth of fruit and nuts, and between $265 million and $300 million worth of vegetables. Our exports are insignificant.

As a Canadian from the west, where agriculture is the primary industry, I am deeply concerned about our increasing dependence on imported food products. First of all, I think it is politically unwise for us to become so dependent on imported products to feed ourselves. Second, I am concerned about the fact that an important industry in this country is being destroyed. The Minister of Agriculture alluded to this in his speech in Calgary. One of the things I admire about the Minister of Agriculture is that he must have 12 stock speeches, six of which he uses in front of consumer groups, whilst keeping the others for use in front of producer groups. Nevertheless, he said he was concerned that imported food products were accounting for an increasingly large portion of total retail sales in this country.

He pointed out that of $18.3 billion in total food sales in Canada in 1975, almost $6 billion worth, or 32 per cent, came from outside Canada. In 1975, that figure was about $4 billion worth, representing 25 per cent of total food sales. In 1973, imports amounted to only $2.5 billion, or 18 per cent of the total. Thus, in a period of three years we have increased the proportion of imported food from 18 per cent to 32 per cent, almost double.

What bothers me is the fact that legislation such as we are dealing with today serves only as a further incentive to increase the proportion of imported food in relation to the total food dollar spent in this country. Canada certainly has significant production potential within the agricultural industry. I do not believe we have tapped the true resourcefulness of our farmers and growers. My criticism, Mr. Speaker, is directed not against them but against government policy, since there is no question that given the proper incentive, growers could reverse the trend which is now being experienced. This is alluded to in an article that appeared in the Globe And Mail on Saturday, July 10, entitled "Serious gap between output and potential in Canadian agriculture and food production". The article was written by James Rusk. I want to read it into the record because I think it summarizes the plight this industry finds itself in today:

● (1610)

Agriculture and food production in Canada is "in serious trouble and very sick," according to the president of the Agricultural Economics Research Council of Canada, Gordon MacEachern.

The gap between achievement and potential in food and agriculture production is widening, he told the annual meeting of the Canadian Feed Manufacturers Association in Toronto.

"Over-all, agricultural output has seriously declined in absolutes over recent years.

[Mr. Mazankowski.]

For example, as of the first quarter of this year, Statistics Canada reports the index of agricultural production has steadily declined by about 20 per cent from earlier 1970-71 levels.

This, of course, has been a turbulent period, but the rather favourable incentives for crops have not resulted in a significant response to date."

This recent growth pattern comes on top of one of the slowest growths—if not the slowest—in output of any developed or developing country during the period since 1962, a rate of 1.25 per cent a year in farm output, well below that of Canadian food demand.

"This slows growth in agriculture and food exports in volume terms and an increase in volume of imports."

Canada has maintained a net export position for only a few commodities, such as grains and oilseeds, but even in these its output and export performance has remained more or less static.

"Our poor output and export performance stands in marked contrast to that achieved by our neighbours to the south, particularly in the last four to five years, but even longer."

Canadian cost-price structures relative to competitors show that Canadian agricultural and food production has suffered a serious decline in competitive position in the past three to four years.

That results to a large degree, Mr. Speaker, from the unfavourable political climate and the inward-looking kind of agricultural policy that we have in this country. We are committed to contraction of our agricultural potential, rather than expansion. As I said before, one way in which we could counter the requirements for energy that we will have to import into this country is by increasing our productive potential and capacity and, indeed, our export position in agricultural products.

While we have measures here which are designed to reduce the price of agricultural products, one significant fact that bears consideration is that the inputs which are necessary to produce agricultural commodities continue to increase. I would like to cite a government document entitled "News and Features" put out by Agriculture Canada and dated May 28, 1976. This document reviews the increase in agricultural inputs in this country during 1976. It predicts that the price of petroleum products will be up by 25 per cent, that fertilizers will be up by 10 per cent to 15 per cent, that agricultural chemicals will be up 10 per cent to 15 per cent, that manpower will be up 15 per cent, machinery 10 per cent, and interest rates on farm financing will be up. No prediction is made, but we all know that interest rates in this country have continued to increase. Hourly rates for mechanical repairs have increased by an average of from $12 an hour in 1975 to $14 in 1976. The only commodity cited which has dropped in price is baler twine; this was $18 to $20 a bale and it is down to about $10 from a year ago. That is the only decrease.

At the same time, cash receipts in the agricultural industry in 1976 have increased by a mere 1.1 per cent, according to Statistics Canada. This has resulted in a tightening up of the cost-price squeeze which has been a problem for farmers and producers in this country for generations, causing a number of producers to go out of business.

As my colleague from Battle River pointed out, beef producers are going out of business by the dozen. The productive potential of agricultural products in this country has been lost. We are failing to improve our balance of trade by utilizing a potential which should be utilized. Most importantly, we are that industry. The government applied export restrictions on the movement of beef to the United States at that time because the price was approaching 60 cents on the hoof. However, this government certainly did not bail out the beef producers when the price on the hoof dropped significantly below the production cost of the animal. The minister refused to bring forth a cow-calf program to assist that very important sector of the beef industry. The provincial governments had to assist in an attempt to bail out the cow-calf producer.

The hon. member dealt in detail with the beef import situation which is now affecting us and which is driving the price of our products dramatically below the cost of production. He also referred to the fact that the government fails to recognize this when it simply refuses to institute a beef import law similar to that of the United States. He pointed out it is the only country that does not have protection for its producers.

It is significant to note that in spite of our small population, Canada is the fourth largest importer of beef in world trade channels. What a shame, Mr. Speaker. That is really unbelievable for this country, yet it is allowed to happen under this administration. We have the capacity, potential and know how, but because of our stupid tariff and agricultural policies this country, with only 22 million people, is the fourth largest importer of beef in the world. As I say, it is a shame.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: It is obvious that our agricultural policy is not being formulated by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and his departmental officials; it is being formulated by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the Department of Finance and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. This minister has lost his clout. He had a little clout when he aided the Liberals in southwestern Ontario, but he is finished now. The minister has been a total letdown, a total failure. I do not blame the Minister of Finance. He represents an urban constituency with a different community of interest. I am sure he defends that interest very well. However, the Minister of Agriculture has not defended the welfare and the interests of farmers and producers in this country. For that, I am sorry.

Those involved in agriculture are not being well served by this administration. My friend looks me straight in the eye. He knows this and I am sure he feels badly about it. He represents an area where there is a very significant beef industry. I would welcome his participation in this debate, because I know he speaks with sincerity and dedication. He might have some influence with the Minister of Agriculture and other ministers who formulate agricultural policy. The effects of this bill will be harmful to the producers and to agriculture in general.

Trade is a very serious problem in this country. We should be preoccupied with improving our trade picture, particularly in the area of agricultural production and processed agricultural products. Above all, we should address ourselves to improving our agricultural trading position with the United States. This bill certainly militates against that objective; it does the exact opposite; it invites more imports, resulting in a price reduction for our producers at a time when costs of production continue to increase. That is the kind of war against inflation in which this government is engaged. Look at the record. Every newspaper in this country refers to Canada's poor prospects in terms of its merchandise trade. I quote from the August 17 edition of the Ottawa Citizen:

> Prospects for Canada's international trade and balance of payments are poor, particularly since the full impact of increased energy prices and imports is still to be felt, a study released Monday by the Conference Board in Ottawa says.

● (1600)

It goes on to say:

> The outlook is for a substantial and increasing over-all trade deficit in energy beginning in 1977 and continuing into the 1980s.

Agriculture is one of our prime renewable resources. Surely that is the ace in the hole when it comes to improving our balance of trade position. We have the capacity. All we need is a healthy political climate. I should like to call attention to an article which appeared in the Financial Times of September 27. It reads:

> Canada's share of world exports expressed in U.S. dollars dropped by about one-third to 3.8 per cent in 1975 from 5.4 per cent in 1970. But in the same period, imports as a percentage of spending on goods in Canada rose to 32.9 per cent from 26.1 per cent.
> Thus, while Canadian exporters were losing their share of international business, foreign exporters were occupying more of the Canadian market, producing an obvious "scissor" effect.

One way of reversing the trade imbalance is by vigorously engaging in the production and sale of our renewable resources. In 1975 Canada's trade deficit amounted to something like $1.5 billion, and in 1974 it was in the order of $200 million. It looks as though for 1976 it will amount to about $100 million. The picture in relation to agricultural trade is more favourable, but if it were not for the export of grain and grain products, the state of the industry, from the point of view of exports and imports, would be bleak, not to say sick. For example, look at the agricultural trading pattern in 1975. We imported $2.891 billion worth of agricultural commodities and we exported $3.9 billion, which resulted in a favourable balance of about $1.1 billion. But if we exclude grain and grain products which account for $3.1 billion, we find ourselves in a very sorry position.

Take dairy products, a field in which we obviously have potential for increased production, judging from the surpluses which have arisen. In 1975 we imported $58,323,000 worth, while exporting only $36 million. In 1974 we exported products worth $71 million, and imported $78 million. In 1973 we imported almost $90 million worth of dairy products, and exported only $65 million worth. Thus, over a three-year period we find ourselves in a disturbing net deficit position.

Consider the case of poultry and eggs. In 1975 such imports were worth $32.7 million, and we exported $19 million worth. In 1974 imports were valued at $24.5 million, and exports $24 million. In 1973 imports were valued at $19 million, and exports at $17 million. We have the capacity to maintain at least an equilibrium in trade in the products we have the splitting apart. The fact is that this government is pulling it apart: by putting into effect policies which could deprive hundreds of thousands of people of their livelihood, the government is splitting the country apart. There are in Canada today 100,000 beef producers. Virtually every beef producer is in danger of losing his livelihood because for a long time he has been forced to operate and sell at below the cost of production.

This government has no farm policy and no long-term food policy. Under this government one sees only policies of dislocation in the marketplace, policies introduced in an attempt to justify the anti-inflation program. In the long run, food costs will have to be higher if Canadian producers are not to be driven out of business.

In April, 1976, there were about 300,000 more feeder cattle in Canada than there were in April, 1975. This increased population was brought into being because the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board had initiated a program called LIFT, which should have been called "Goof." The minister's program was designed to entice farmers of this country to seed grainland back to grass. The government established programs across the country for encouraging people to increase their cow herds. The result was 300,000 more feeder cattle in the country compared to the previous year. But almost immediately after the government decided that there should be an increase in cattle herds across this country, the economic situation in the country changed. Even though Canada produced domestically enough beef for this country, the government opened the gates and we became the dumping ground for the cheaper, grass-fed beef of New Zealand and Australia. That policy causes tremendous difficulties, because there was an increase of 90 million pounds of frozen boneless beef being shipped into this country.

The story used to be that Australian beef could not compete with Canadian beef because it was not the same quality. At one time such beef from Australia was raised essentially in the interior of that country. They used to slaughter five-year old animals which had been grass-fed and not fed on grain. Such animals did not find their way into the restaurant trade; they were used in the manufacturing trade. But the case is altogether different now. The beef entering Canada today is of a different quality. It is obtained from younger animals which have been fed by different methods. Such foreign beef competes directly with that produced in this country.

I underscore these facts because there is no long-term food policy in Canada. The rancher today cannot begin to manage his affairs for the long term owing to this government's policies.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, whose allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, may I at the outset of my remarks associate myself—indeed, echo his words—with the remarks of the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Malone). He spoke forcefully on issues confronting the beef industry. He spoke with a high degree of sincerity and a knowledge which it is evident the government does not possess. I am pleased to note the presence in the Chamber of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). The representation of the agricultural community in the Liberal caucus is slight. The hon. member for Battle River gave us an overview of the difficulties of this country's beef industry. Those difficulties are real. The beef industry makes up a significant portion of the agricultural community and is a significant part of our entire economic community.

I also agree with the hon. member's assessment that this government's attack on inflation is tantamount to an attack on the food producing sector in our society. I agree that something must be done quickly if we are to reverse the present trend and not allow the large-scale importation of food products to destroy the viability of our agricultural industry. It is unfortunate that the government tried to use reduced food prices as ammunition in its fight against inflation. The route it has chosen has injured our producers. This bill will have the effect of lowering the price to producers of agricultural products. It raises the prospect of increasing the importation of food products into Canada. Altogether, this has a detrimental effect on our balance of trade and on a very important industry in this country, agriculture.

This bill sets out to create serious problems for the pork industry, the producers of pork and pork products, as well as the fruit and vegetable industry. This government's attack on inflation has been an attack on the producers of this country. As the hon. member pointed out, the whole thrust of this government's war against inflation has been against our food producers. When it talks in glowing terms about reducing the price of food by 3.1 per cent over last year, it simply means that its war on inflation is being fought on the backs of the producers. Its actions clearly confirm that fact.

In 1973 inflation was raising its ugly head and becoming a very serious issue. A food prices review committee was established. That was a standing committee set up by this House of Commons to review the price of food. Other items were contributing very seriously to inflation at that time, however, this government singled out the price of food as being the major component in the inflationary factor. The Food Prices Review Board was established. It, too, singled out food as being the major culprit in fanning the fires of inflation, not to mention anything about the cost of input, such things as labour, transportation and the advent of the user-pay concept. Dramatic increases were taking place at that time, but this government singled out food as the major item contributing to rampant inflation.

In the fall of 1973, when the price of beef went to extraordinary high levels, we saw this government move in and take action, one of the first of many interventions in the beef industry which, I might say, was the beginning of the end of that it is saying to the heavily populated cities of the country that the government is willing to trade off the producing regions for political gain.

From August, 1974, to August, 1975, Canada imposed import controls on live cattle and beef, but the controls permitted an inflow of 100 per cent of the previous five-year average. This did not give any protection at all to the producers. It is important to notice the price difference between Canada and the United States in regard to the importation of oceanic beef. From August, 1975, when import controls were suspended, it was noted that oceanic cattle were entering Canada at 10 cents to 12 cents per pound cheaper than the same quality of beef going to the United States. This unfavourable price spread persisted throughout the balance of 1975, and worsened in 1976. By April, 1976, Canada was allowing beef to be imported at 16 cents to 17 cents per pound cheaper than beef of identical quality being shipped to the United States. In May, 1976, offshore imports of beef and veal were running 40 per cent ahead of 1975 levels, and by October imports had increased by 60 per cent over the previous year.

This government has the audacity to go around the country claiming that the Anti-Inflation Act is working because food prices have decreased, yet it fails to recognize that anyone who has entered the fourth year of the beef marketing system is selling livestock below the cost of production. I have sympathy for anyone who has to buy a basket of food today. One of this country's objectives should be to produce food as cheaply as possible. That cannot happen as long as the kind of long-range policy we have drives people out of production. We are faced with depressed prices in Canada. Canadian cattlemen will almost certainly be forced to greatly reduce their herds, and in the long run we will have either lost a major producing industry, we will pay higher prices for meat, or even import almost all our meat.

On June 11 Canada imposed what has become known as the infamous six-cent under rule whereby the government unnecessarily made an agreement that oceanic beef cannot be sold in Canada at a price discount greater than six cents under identical quality beef being sold in the United States. This forced Canadian beef prices to floor levels, and will continue to do so as long as the rule is in force. The obvious result is that the government's action has dangerously eroded our trading relationships in beef and veal with the United States. Anyone who has had the experience in recent months of talking to farmers and ranchers in the United States will recognize that this has a very serious and detrimental effect on our traditional trading pattern of two-way trade with the United States.

I think it is very important to underscore the difference between Canada's trade with the United States and that of the oceanic countries. The first difference in our trade with the United States is that it is a two-way trade; not only does Canada export to the United States but we also import. The two countries are producing at about equal cost and have an almost equal standard of living. There is quite a difference when you compare that with oceanic beef with regard to which almost every other beef producing country has established a set of protection quotas. Canada has become a dumping ground.

As an indication of how serious this situation is, let me say, Mr. Speaker, that ranchers today are gathering at meetings all across the country to protest the actions of this government. Nothing can underscore their concern more than the fact that 300 people gathered in Lethbridge two days ago on two days' notice. Mr. Speaker, I repeat that 300 ranchers gathered on two days' notice to voice their concern about what is happening to this country's producers. In my province, Alberta, virtually every day meetings are held in local auction marts and community halls. Ranchers are protesting. They want to know what they can do. They know they are about to lose their farming and ranching businesses if the government's present import quotas are not changed. In my constituency a meeting was held on October 22. Eight hundred ranchers showed up from across Alberta, parts of British Columbia and parts of Saskatchewan to learn what was happening in the marketing of beef and veal.

There is great concern on the part of ranchers because exports from New Zealand increased by 139 per cent this year, and from Australia by 10 per cent. Mr. Speaker, we have literally become a dumping ground for cheap meat so that the Prime Minister can tell the people of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and southern Ontario that the anti-inflation program is working. He tries to demonstrate the truth of his assertion by saying, "Last year your food bill rose 10 per cent. This year it has risen only 6.2 per cent." The number of items which have actually decreased in price is small. You will find that one such decrease has occurred in a product which the government has allowed to be imported into this country in order to keep food costs down. I am referring to meat. While it is creditable to attempt to keep food prices down, it is not creditable to try to aid one part of the country at the expense of another. That is what is malicious about the present government's actions.

Let us consider some of the facts laid before the House on Tuesday by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker). He said, as reported on page 472 of Hansard, that Canada has a cheap food policy, something the producer regions of this country know. Mr. Speaker, it is apparent that the government considers those in the producer regions as politically expendable. It does all it can to provide cheap food, despite the injustice such a policy may occasion to a certain part of the country. For example, in 1975 this country imported 83 per cent more dairy foods than in 1973. We imported 370 per cent more berries than in 1973, 58 per cent more apples, 200 per cent more honey, 74 per cent more jams, 294 per cent more chicken, and 33 per cent more canned ham.

In 1974 Canada imported 5 million pounds of chicken from the United States. Figures up to June of 1976 show that Canada imported 22 million pounds of chicken from the United States, or 400 per cent more than in 1975. Small wonder that Canada seems to be eroding at the seams or macaroni and other pasta products. In addition, deeper cuts than those previously enforced have been made on certain canned meats . . . The temporary reductions proposed in this bill affect imports of consumer goods valued at about $1.6 billion in terms of 1975 imports.

The following is the important part:

Close to half of these are in the food sector, about $727 million worth.

So we see that while ranchers and producers on the prairies enter their fourth year of operating at below cost of production, this callous and insensitive government is willing to consider them politically expendable simply to give the appearance that the Anti-Inflation Board is working. In other words, the idea that we have cheaper food because the AIB has been successful is simply a fabrication. The truth of the matter is that any cheap food we have in this country is here because we have imported it at considerably cheaper rates, and in the process of doing that we are literally destroying whole regions of Canada and the production which takes place in those regions. What is happening is that the sense of power of this government has caused it to feel that it can write off an area of Canada.

In terms of seats, the Liberal government does not have much power from the prairies, so it feels it can write off the prairies. The government knows that there are more members from Montreal and Toronto than there are from all three prairie provinces combined, so it imposes an import quota which allows this country to bring in cheap food. That is literally destroying the backbone of the economy of the prairie provinces. Similar statements can be made for the Atlantic provinces.

To some extent I sympathize with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) because I realize the bind he is in within the cabinet. In response to a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) with reference to the 6-cent under clause on frozen meat from Australia and New Zealand, the minister responded by saying that new negotiations will take place. He said he hopes the result will be that meat shipped to Canada will be sold at a price no different from the price of meat shipped to the United States under the quota system which has been imposed.

It is interesting to note that when he was speaking to the Cattlemen's Association here just two days ago, it was admitted by one of the top economic authorities of the Department of Agriculture that the department had never favoured the 6-cent under clause. The truth of the matter is that the minister obviously lost out in cabinet. Perhaps with good intentions the minister was trying to protect our agricultural industry, but so it would appear that the AIB was working, farmers, ranchers and producers of apples and other products were simply sold down the river.

Since 1969 Canada has imported about 7 per cent of its domestic consumption of boneless beef. Traditionally, these imports were of low quality and did not compete directly with Canadian products. After 1974, however, following a period in which the government encouraged ranchers to increase herd sizes, there was a growing importation of medium and high quality beef in direct competition with domestic production. The nature of that activity placed us in direct conflict with our traditional trading partners, namely, the United States of America.

Because of lack of policy in respect of quotas of meat coming in from other countries, Canada has become almost an enemy of the United States in the area of trade in meat. Anyone who talks to the producers, farmers and ranchers of the United States knows they are angry at Canada for dumping meat on a run-through from oceanic countries to Canada and then forcing the meat of Canada to be dumped into the United States. Canada, a country that has the capacity to produce enough domestic beef to meet its requirements, is the only nation in the world with no controls over the quantity of imports. All other major beef producing nations impose effective import controls. I think it is absolutely shocking that Canada, as a major meat producing country, is the only country without import controls.

Let us look at some examples, Mr. Speaker. The United States, the world's largest importer of beef, imports nearly 30 per cent of the beef and veal in world trade channels; however, the United States has laws that limit imports to 7 per cent of domestic consumption. If we look at the United Kingdom and the European Economic Community, we note that this group represents the second largest importer of the world's beef. The imports are very closely controlled, however, by means of a complex system of fixed duties, variable levies, ad valorem duties and quotas. In July, 1974, the European Economic Community banned beef and veal imports by way of embargo. Japan is now a major importer of world beef, ranking third behind the European Economic Community and the United States, yet Japan exercises control over imports through state buying agencies, a 25 per cent ad valorem tariff, variable levies and quota allocations. Early in 1974 Japan virtually placed embargoes on all imports of beef and veal until September, 1975.

In 1975 and 1976 Canada literally became a dumping ground for the world's beef and veal surpluses, a situation to which no other country has to date been exposed. I think it is despicable that this government goes around the country praising its anti-inflation program, saying that the AIB is working, when it is driving almost 100,000 farmers and ranchers in this country into a loss situation. The Minister of Finance, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien), and the Minister of Agriculture have to bear responsibility for the 100,000 people who are now entering their fourth year of selling livestock at below the cost of production.

In spite of our small population, Canada now ranks the fourth largest importer of beef in world trade channels. In 1976 Canada ranked first on beef imports, on a per capita basis. Here is a country with the capacity to produce all the beef we need for domestic consumption, yet we are the fourth largest importer of beef in the world. This makes a sham of the government's policies, and Bill C-15 fails to pay any attention to this situation. One of the obvious injustices of Bill C-15 is which is now reduced to 10 per cent. In that year there was a tariff of 10 per cent on extracts of meat and fluid beef, not medicated, while now there is no tariff on it.

We can also see that in 1973 there was a 17½ per cent tariff on prepared cereal foods in packages not exceeding 25 pounds weight each, which is now reduced to 10 per cent. That year there was a tariff of 12½ per cent on prepared cereal foods, which is now reduced to 7½ per cent. There was a 20 per cent tariff on pot, pearl, rolled, roasted or ground barley, which is now reduced to 10 per cent. Also, there was a 50 per cent tariff on rice, cleaned, which is now reduced by 50 per cent to 25 per cent.

The point I am trying to make is that the claim that the Anti-Inflation Board is working because food prices are down is an absolute fabrication which should be challenged. The fact is that there are 100,000 cattle producers in this country who are entering into their fourth year of production and selling their meat at below the cost of production. In my constituency alone we have 17 ranches going out of business, going into disposal sales because the government has failed to recognize the importance of giving protection to the producers of this country. Instead, it has opted for political gain and is taking the short-circuit of assisting the mismanaged economy by importing cheap foods into this country, and fails to declare a long-term, self-sufficient food policy for Canada.

Tariff rates are down on virtually all foodstuffs. If you look at tariff rates on foodstuffs, one thing that becomes obvious is that those rates have been reduced on practically all foods. I think that proves that the Prime Minister's claim that the Anti-Inflation Board is working because food prices are down is incorrect. It is simply an admission that a province which is totally represented by Progressive Conservative members of parliament is politically expendable in the eyes of the government, even though most of the meat produced in this country comes from Alberta. The government thinks it can solve the problem by importing cheap foods, no matter what harm this does to our producers—because it is the aim of the government to try to stay in power at whatever cost.

On page 6 of Bill C-15 there is a list of vegetable products on which the tariff has been decreased. The list includes cabbage, onions, green peas, rhubarb, green onions, asparagus, and the list goes on and on. This simply underscores the fact that the government has failed to recognize that in helping the consumer—and I appreciate that consumers want to have food which is as cheap as we can produce—it really will not help them because this short-term policy will cost the consumer considerably more money in the long run. That will happen in one of two ways: if beef prices continue as low as they are for another year, ranchers will have no alternative but to go out of business and sell their operations. When that happens, Canada will have lost a very important industry and a valuable commodity for our export market. It also means that we will become dependent on food produced in other countries.

In today's Globe and Mail there are some quotations which underscore the position the government has been putting forward and clearly demonstrate some of the false, inaccurate and malicious statements which have been placed before the citizens of Canada. The article reads in part:

> Food prices have dropped for the fourth consecutive month and now are an average of 3.1 per cent lower than a year ago, the Anti-Inflation Board said yesterday.
> In its monthly food price survey, the board reported significant decreases in the prices of beef, pork, eggs, poultry, fresh fruits—

We cannot deny that; those are facts, and there is nothing to say other than that they are accurate. But that statement fails to point out that those decreases are to the advantage of certain regions of Canada, while other regions are going bankrupt as a result of the policy of this government. I would like to quote further from the Globe and Mail article as follows:

> Board vice-chairman June Menzies told a news conference the board can claim some credit because food prices are controlled at the processing, distribution and retail levels, though not at the farm gate.

I believe June Menzies should be asked to resign her position for making that statement. It is not a case of food prices being held down only at levels after the farm gate; the fact is that with the tariff structure of this country as it applies to food, we keep importing food and that has a most significant effect. With regard to the beef industry in this country, 90 million pounds of cheap, grass-fed beef is coming in from oceanic countries, and this is competing at an unprecedented rate with our producers. Obviously, when a person in a responsible position suggests that the Anti-Inflation Board is working because it is controlling prices beyond the farm gate, that person is failing to recognize that thousands of ranchers are being driven out of business.

The sale of cows and breeding stock from this country is up considerably from a few years ago. Canada is running into a very dangerous situation, such that within a few years, as has been quoted by noted authorities, farmers may be selling beef at $1 a pound because of the shortfall which is being created by lack of long-term policies which would give us a constructive and ongoing beef industry. The article goes on to say that fresh vegetables rose 8.9 per cent, and coffee 18 per cent. If we consider various food items other than those related to meats—basically beef, poultry and pork—in fact most food prices are increasing. The article continues:

> The food survey said a continuing decline in beef prices is expected to reverse within the next month due to recent increases in live cattle prices.
> Dressed hog prices fell 20 per cent in the last month but retail pork was only 3.7 per cent cheaper in mid-October—

I claim that statement to be absolutely false. If we check with cattle associations across the country, we will find that there is no valid reason to believe that the consumer will enjoy a cheaper price for beef, and the producer's efforts will not be rewarded with a good price for his livestock. I would now like to quote the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). As reported at page 466 of Hansard, he stated:

> Several food products have been added to the list of items on which temporary tariff cuts were enforced prior to June 30. These include fresh pork, ham, bacon,

I should like, first of all, to demonstrate that much of what is being changed in our Customs Tariff Act has been taking place in an attempt to promote political ambitions in Canada. I believe it is important as a background that we begin to realize that agriculture has been a very important aspect of all cultures and civilizations. No culture has ever advanced without a deep-rooted respect for, and easy access to, agriculture and agricultural products. But once industrialized, this nation tended to treat agriculture with cynical disregard.

The Canadian food producers have been the victims of a malicious ploy by the Liberal government, not as the national government but toward the central regionalization of this country. In desperation, to patch up its own economic mismanagement it has divided Canada for selfish, political reward. The facts are that there are more members of parliament in the city of Toronto than in the whole of the province of Alberta. Moreover, there are more members of parliament from Toronto and Montreal than there are in the three prairie provinces. That all links together with the Customs Tariff Act when we note that 78 per cent of the beef production in Canada comes from the three prairie provinces, and most of it from the province of Alberta.

With 19 Conservative seats in the province of Alberta, this government, filled with the venom of politics, has decided to sacrifice one region of this country for the glut of continuing in political power. The government claims that the anti-inflation program is working because food costs are down. The truth of the matter is that food costs in this country are not down, and any comment in that regard is simply a fabrication of the facts. The truth is that food costs in Canada are up. What is happening is that the government of today is importing into this country cheap food from countries which produce food at less cost, to give the appearance that food costs generally are down. In other words the government of Canada is sacrificing the producers of this country for the consumers. The only reason food prices appear to be down is the callous and calculated attempt by the government to willingly destroy the livelihood of 100,000 beef producers by the import and export quota regulations for the selfish reason of trying to prove the Anti-Inflation Board is working.

I should like to point out that the situation has become so desperate as to cause grave concern and problems among the producers of this nation. Imports of pork have risen dramatically in recent years since 1973 when we imported into Canada 215 million pounds. In 1975 we imported 453 million pounds, or an increase of 110 per cent. In October of 1976 we increased our imports by another 82 per cent over 1975. It must be noted that at the same time our exports of pork are down 7 per cent.

The point I am trying to make is quite simple. The government of the day is of the opinion that it must justify the anti-inflation program to the Canadian public, and in a malicious and calculating way is attempting, at the expense of the producers, to prove that the anti-inflation program is working.

[Mr. Malone.]

I have in hand a collection of speeches and policy statements made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and cabinet ministers. The material is quite weighty and bulky. It is an attempt to demonstrate what the government is saying across the country, namely, that the anti-inflation program is working and the proof of it is that food prices are down.

Let us take a look at how the government has destroyed our pork industry. For example, in 1973 the export of Canadian fresh frozen pork amounted to 696 million pounds. By 1975 it had decreased by more than 1 million pounds. In 1973 exports of fresh frozen pork bellies amounted to 76,890,000 pounds. In 1975 that had decreased to only 16,562,000 pounds. In 1973 we were exporting hams, not cured, totalling 370,368,000 pounds, and by 1975 that, too, had decreased to 255,244,000 pounds.

What is happening, in fact, is that the government, in an attempt to establish that the Anti-Inflation Board is working, is deliberately trying to import cheap food into this country. I should like to show hon. members some data which is related to the beef industry. Imports from Australia are now up 10 per cent over last year, but imports from New Zealand have increased by 139 per cent. When we take a look at the amount of fresh frozen beef that has arrived in Canada or which is en route to Canada, we see it totalling 90 million pounds of boneless frozen beef coming from the oceanic countries. Incidentally, that is the amount of meat coming to this country at a time of domestic over-production.

The problem is that while on the one hand the government is trying to establish that the anti-inflation program is working and is spreading the message in Vancouver, Montreal and Toronto that food prices are going down, at a time when we hear the Prime Minister speaking in Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, southern Ontario or on the national news about food prices being down, when a year ago they were rising at a rate of over 10 per cent and this year they have risen at a rate of only 6.2 per cent, we find that he has written off the producers of this nation in order to make a political gain in the highest populated areas. The claim that the anti-inflation program is working is based solely on the fact that food prices are down, as the Prime Minister states, but he fails to tell Canadians that literally thousands of fellow Canadians will go bankrupt while this government struggles to hold on to political power by dishonest means.

I should like to quote from the budget papers of May, 1976, which give a clear example of what is happening with regard to the importation of cheap food into this country. It demonstrates the fallacy which lies in the claim that the Anti-Inflation Board is working. If we compare 1973 with 1976 we find there was a 50 cent tariff on fresh pork in 1973, while at present it is free or there is no tariff on it coming into the country. In 1973 there was a 5 cent tariff on edible meat of all animals, while at present there is no duty on it. In 1973 there was a 15 per cent tariff on canned pork, and now it has been reduced to 10 per cent. In the same year there was a 15 per cent tariff on canned hams, which is now reduced to 10 per cent. In 1973 there was a 15 per cent tariff on canned meats,

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the government House leader the plans of the government for its business for today, tomorrow and into next week, if he could look that far ahead for us.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to lend my vision to the hon. member at any time. As the hon. member knows, today we will continue with the Customs Tariff, and if it were finished we would, while the Minister of Finance is here, deal with the currency exchange bill today. Tomorrow we would begin with the advance payments for crops. On Monday, regardless of the progress been made on other legislation, I would like to begin the second reading debate on the borrowers and depositors bill.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): With regard to the vision, I am prepared to give a year's pass to Laurier House to the government House leader. I did communicate with him with respect to opposition days. I made a suggestion which he requested. I wonder if he has had an opportunity to consider the dates I suggested to him, or would he like to consult further in respect of the statement?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for making the suggestion. I have looked at it, although not thoroughly. I believe it does represent a good planning guide for the future. I will attempt to stay within its limits, but reserve the right to make changes as circumstances warrant.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Tuesday, October 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that Bill C-15, to amend the Customs Tariff, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I think it is a matter of tremendous urgency and importance that we have the opportunity to speak today on Bill C-15 to amend the Customs Tariff. The fact is that this is not the normal kind of adjustment in respect of the Customs Tariff Act. What we really are seeing in this country is the use of government legislation and government amendment by order in council to make the kind of policy changes that are in fact dividing the country.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

FINGERPRINTING OF EMPLOYEES—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF PURPOSE OF PROGRAM

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I have a question and hopefully a very short supplementary for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration arising from the program being conducted by his department of fingerprinting and investigating some hundreds of UIC employees, outlined in classified UIC documents as being for the purpose of protecting the government from embarrassment by the release of information. Would the minister explain this situation to the House, and state if it is indeed government policy to use public servants for the purpose of withholding legitimate information from parliament or the Canadian people to actually protect the government?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member usually has questions on pools or a pool of questions, and I don't want to get in over my depth on this one. I also do not want to permit him to build a dung heap out of a few bird droppings. I would say to the hon. member that I will look into the allegations that he is making, or the representations that he is making, but it would seem there is no difficulty getting information out of my particular department, either legitimately or illegitimately, at least so far as the hon. member is concerned.

Mr. Cossitt: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister agree at the same time to look into whether it is now government policy to infringe on the democratic rights of public servants beyond the usual customary, acceptable restrictions, and also whether it is now government policy to misuse and abuse the Official Secrets Act to withhold information from parliament for what are really out and out political purposes?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, there must be three or four questions in there.

[Mr. Whelan.]

Mr. Cossitt: Just yes or no.

Mr. Cullen: If all the questions of the hon. member could be answered in that way I really would be in over my depth.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT

POSSIBILITY OF JAPANESE INVESTMENT IN ATHABASCA TAR SANDS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister which relates to questions that have been asked of him previously concerning his trip to Japan. I wonder whether the Prime Minister would inform the House if he had any discussions concerning possible Japanese investment in the development of the Athabasca tar sands and, if so, what conditions have been attached to such development?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there were no negotiations on this particular investment. The subject of Japanese investment in Canada and the various ways in which we would welcome that investment was, of course, discussed and so set out in broad terms within the economic framework that was signed by the Prime Minister of Japan and myself.

GOVERNMENT ATTITUDE TOWARDS FOREIGN INVESTMENT

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Prime Minister can clarify in general terms if his government has altered its policy with regard to general investment and now welcomes foreign investment in particular as far as tar sands development is concerned.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there would be no alteration of our policy on foreign investment if we were to welcome it. We always have welcomed it. We indicated that we welcome it only if it provides substantial benefit to Canadian citizens. I am sure that is a point of view the hon. member would agree with.

FISHERIES

REDFISH—CLOSING OF FISHERY—ACTION TO PRESERVE STOCK

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. The minister has informed the fishing industry, I believe as of October 4, that action has been taken to close the redfish fishery in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. This poses two questions. First, is the redfish fishery closed to everyone, including boats under 100 feet in length; second, in view of the wasted by-catch of small, immature redfish by shrimp fishermen in the gulf, which is reported to be as high as 50 per cent of the catch by some fishermen, has the minister any plan to prevent the continued destruction of this species?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the redfish quota for the gulf was taken and therefore the fishery had to be closed; otherwise there would have been no quota left for next year. One of the problems with this fishery is that this fish matures in 12 to 15 years; therefore it is a rather long replacement stock.

The other question raised by the hon. member, a very serious one, was about the incidental catch in the pursuit of the shrimp fishery. Experimental fishing has been done this summer and the reports I have received verbally from my regional director in Halifax indicate that it is not very conclusive or promising. However, we are assessing the situation to see whether we can improve the technique.

FUNGICIDAL EBDC CHEMICALS—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PROTECT CONSUMERS FROM HARMFUL EFFECTS

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I should like to express my sincere sympathy to the minister on the recent loss of his mother, Madame Laura Lalonde.

With regard to the indirect but serious toxic effects of the fungicidal EBDC chemicals, reportedly causing cancer and fetal abnormalities in research animals, does the department consider the attempted disposal of affected food to be adequate public protection, or would it consider a complete ban on this family of agricultural chemicals, including agreements with other countries on imported foods?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there has been an extensive research program carried on on this particular subject by federal and provincial agencies and these results are being evaluated at the present time. When the evaluation is completed we will decide on which of various alternatives to take. This could include a complete ban, or it could include additional tolerance restrictions which we might impose. We have already imposed some further tolerance restrictions but these might be even further restricted. Again, the use of EBDC's could also be restricted to certain crops. We have not made a final decision yet as to which of these alternatives will be retained.

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—POSSIBLE REIMBURSEMENT OF PRODUCERS FOR LOSS IN VALUE OF QUOTA

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

The minister stated yesterday that the Canadian Dairy Commission does not set any value on milk quotas. In order to prevent the Federation of Milk Producers from being tempted to have those quotas paid by their members, would the minister consider compensating producers forced to sell their herd as a result of a 20 per cent reduction, according to the value of lost quotas? We would thus avoid this race for quotas which we have unfortunately known in the past years?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the program that we announced just recently should overcome the statement that in the first six months of this calendar year companies exceeded the income guidelines to the extent of some $70 million, can the minister tell us how many companies were involved, what action the government proposes to take to deal with those companies and whether or not he will undertake to ensure that the AIB does not allow those companies to remain in anonymity as is the case with 19 companies which exceeded the guidelines to the extent of $3,300,000? There is no reason at all why all the companies ought not to be named. The public has a right to know which companies have exceeded the guidelines. The Anti-Inflation Board has no reservations at all about giving the names of unions and employers who in its opinion have exceeded the guidelines.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): What the hon. gentleman is saying, in effect, is that even though someone has abided by the law he should be punished anyway. This seems to be a new and interesting doctrine to be advocated in a democratic country. With regard to those cases where quarterly examination of company reports has indicated that there may be excess revenue on the year, this has been drawn to the attention of the firms concerned and they are being required to govern their pricing policies in such a way that excess revenue should not be produced. Of course, whether or not there is excess revenue has to be determined on the basis of revenue over the whole year and this will be done at the close of the year when a figure can be arrived at.

With regard to reporting, I would remind the hon. member again of the requirements of the law passed by parliament in terms of the publication of confidential information with which the Board is naturally complying.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I ask the minister a question with reference to the 96 companies who reported for the last two and a half months of last year, so that is final? Does he consider that an undertaking to reduce profits in the future constitutes the recovery of moneys which they took from the consumers of this country in excess of the guidelines laid down by the Anti-Inflation Board?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The Board has several options under the law. It can recover the money on behalf of the public treasury, a course which would not necessarily do the consumer any good at all. It seems to me to make far more sense either to require the company to hold its prices down or to reduce its prices in order that the consumer would have the benefit of those lower prices. That is the purpose of the program.

PENITENTIARIES

DORCHESTER—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON HOSTAGE-TAKING

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister or for the Acting Solicitor General on a subject which was probably considered at this morning's cabinet meeting—if it was not, it should have been. It is a subject of deep concern to the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North. I should like to ask what the current situation is with respect to the hostage-taking incident at Dorchester

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Penitentiary, the degree of danger to the life of the guard and what steps the government is taking to bring an end to any such danger, should it exist, and it likely does.

Mr. Art Lee (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): I am advised that the minister and the Commissioner of Penitentiaries have been in touch with the regional office for the area in which Dorchester Prison is located. I believe it would be inadvisable at this time for me to comment on the status of the situation in view of the fact that negotiations and discussions are going on. But I can assure the hon. member that we are taking all necessary precautions.

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO DEAL WITH HOSTAGE-TAKING

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Prime Minister, not to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General. I should like to ask the Prime Minister, so that we in this House might have some understanding of what really lies behind statements which are made by ministers of the Crown, whether there is any real connection between what the Solicitor General said prior to the taking of the hostage at Dorchester Penitentiary in relation to the hard line he outlined as being the intention to take in connection with any hostage dramas which might take place at the penitentiaries. We have seen a proliferation of hostage dramas across the country and unless we are more realistic about handling them we shall see more and more. What does the government propose to do to indicate to inmates in penal institutions that by taking knives and putting them at the throats of guards they are not going to get all kinds of concessions, such as television time and all the rest, for the inmates in those institutions?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I understand the hon. member is making a representation. I shall make sure it is drawn to the attention of the Solicitor General.

DORCHESTER—FREEDOM OF ACTION FOR LOCAL OFFICIALS TO DEAL WITH HOSTAGE-TAKING INCIDENT

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question based on one of the findings and recommendations of the inquiry by Mr. Justice Farris into the hostage-taking incident at the B.C. Penitentiary in which Miss Steinhauser was killed. One of the recommendations was that the situation be controlled at the local level by the administration and that the government have the confidence in their administration to permit that. That was not done with the B.C. incident and contributed to Miss Steinhauser's death. Can the Prime Minister assure the House that the incident now taking place in Dorchester is being controlled on the spot by those best able to deal with the situation minute by minute, rather than being controlled in Ottawa and the administration at Dorchester having to seek clearance for everything that they do at the Ottawa level?

Mr. Art Lee (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I can advise the hon. member, as I stated

On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, I took great pains in explaining to the private as well as the public sectors in Japan that we have no intention of parting with our raw materials unconditionally. Quite the opposite is true: while the Japanese were interested in getting the assurance we would supply them with raw materials, we were eager to discuss guaranteed markets. The debate was pursued rather in that vein.

TEXTILES—INQUIRY IF PRIME MINISTER DISCUSSED QUOTAS WITH JAPAN

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary.

Considering the importance of the textile industry, particularly in Quebec, did the Prime Minister mention the problem of Japanese textile exports to Canada during the discussions which were held in Tokyo? Did he request and obtain the assurance that Japan will fully respect its quotas, thus avoiding further disturbance of the domestic market by shipping to Canada goods directly competing with the Canadian industry?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this question was raised along with the general discussions held within the frame work of GATT but the trouble the hon. member is complaining about does not come from Japan but mostly from other countries. Japan has on the whole complied with the quotas that we have set and our problems are due mostly to other eastern countries.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

SUGGESTION MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE PAY COST OF PUBLISHING WORKING PAPER, "THE WAY AHEAD"

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Will the minister take under immediate and serious consideration whether the Minister of National Health and Welfare, in his capacity as a member of this House, should be personally charged with the expense involved in the preparation, printing, publishing and distribution of a blatantly political press release relating to a purely partisan speech made by the minister in Montreal on Tuesday last. This press release contains not one word about the activities or policies of his department, but was printed and distributed by public servants. On this side of the House, such a publication would be put out under the auspices of our political party and I believe the Liberal Party has even more funds for that purpose. Does the minister not believe that moneys voted by this House for the information services of the Department of National Health and Welfare should not be wasted or misused for such blatant political purposes?

● (1440)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): I note the hon. member's vehemence and his political comments and, I suspect there would be very little to them. But I will take the question as notice.

Mr. Lawrence: Would the hon. gentleman request that the Liberal Party of Canada reimburse the public treasury since obvious political references to the Liberal Party were made in the very expensive paper called "A working paper: The Way Ahead—A framework for discussion"? I refer the President of the Treasury Board to the obvious partisan references in that presentation.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

REASON NO ATTEMPT MADE TO RECOVER EXCESS PROFITS FROM CORPORATIONS AND NO REPORT TO ADMINISTRATOR

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance regarding the release by the Anti-Inflation Board of information to the effect that 96 companies have exceeded the income guidelines by a total amount in excess of $9 million. In view of the fact that employers and employees who have exceeded the guidelines have been reported to the Administrator with the result that moneys have been recovered and fines imposed, I ask the minister why none of the 96 companies have been reported to the Administrator and why there has been no attempt to recover the $9 million, apart from some nebulous commitment to lower prices so as to avoid excess income in the future.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): In the case of the firms against which the Administrator has made orders, I might point out that those are firms which either refused to comply with the judgment of the Anti-Inflation Board or specifically requested that the matter be referred to the Administrator so that an order could be made against them. In those cases, because they had either refused to comply with the judgment of the Anti-Inflation Board or sought to have the order made, they were declared to be in violation of the law. The violation is in refusing to comply, not in the initial excess.

In the case of the companies in question, the Board has, by negotiation, arranged compliance programs under which excess funds would, in appropriate cases, be returned to the consumer in the form of lower prices or the freezing of prices until excess costs had used up the profit. In those cases, the companies had co-operated with the Board and no reference to the Administrator was therefore required.

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ENSURE COMPANIES EXCEEDING PROFIT GUIDELINES NAMED AND EXCESS PROFIT RECOVERED

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I am sure the tender touch with which the companies have been dealt with will not escape most observers. With reference to way or the other that the Act is going to be passed, the amendments which are going to be made, and then give effect to the direct employment strategy program.

INDUSTRY

GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO MAKE PRODUCTS MORE COMPETITIVE ON EXPORT MARKET

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I would first like to welcome him back to the House—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: —and tell him that in his absence three more of his members slipped away and more are expected to follow their example.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: As the government's answer to unemployment, as given to the House last Thursday by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, is a combination of a make-work program and all employees in a plant going on short time as opposed to a plant layoff, will the Prime Minister take the first opportunity on motions to outline to the House what plans the government has for making our products, particularly our manufactured products which provide the jobs, more competitive in the international market and so able to provide more jobs of a lasting nature as opposed to the make-work type envisaged by the government in its latest program.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will try to sort out the chaff from the wheat of the hon. member's question and give it serious consideration.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I will make it very simple because the Prime Minister is probably a little tired and can handle just so much at one time. Has the government specifically given consideration to lowering taxes on manufactured products sold in the export market as a means of making them more competitive, able to sell in greater quantity and to provide more jobs?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I would be prepared to discuss this with the Minister of Finance, but it is not clear if the hon. member is suggesting that we lower the tax just for goods as they cross the border for export and not lower them for Canadians. If this is his suggestion, it certainly worries me a little bit.

PUBLIC WORKS

CLOSING OF BRIDGES ACROSS OTTAWA RIVER—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ALLEVIATE PROBLEM

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works.

In the last eighteen months, the five bridges across the Ottawa River have been systematically blocked, completely or partially, because of a total lack of previous agreement between the authorities of the National Capital Commission and the Department of Public Works who are responsible for the renovation and maintenance of those bridges.

[English]

Does the minister intend to set up a co-ordinating committee to bring to an end the indignation, frustration and mounting irritation of 60 per cent of the western Quebec work force which must cross the Ottawa River twice daily to and from their jobs or does he intend to once and for all pave the Ottawa River in order to unite both sides?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the latter thought may be very sound, but I think the one prior makes better sense and I would be happy to look into it.

TRADE

ALLEGED GUARANTEE TO JAPAN OF SOURCE OF RAW MATERIALS—POSSIBILITY OF SAME GUARANTEE TO COMMON MARKET

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister.

While I welcome him back with joy, might I be allowed to mention also just how much we appreciated the charm and graciousness with which Mrs. Trudeau represented us in the land of the rising sun.

Mr. Speaker, according to news releases coming in from Tokyo, the right hon. Prime Minister would have guaranteed the Japanese industry secure supplies of raw materials from Canada. As a similar assurance could not be given the industrialists of the European Common Market, has the right hon. Prime Minister or some member or other of his cabinet obtained from the Canadian provinces the assurance that this guarantee will be respected and, if so, what raw materials are we speaking of and which provinces were consulted in this regard?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has in fact read those reports in a newspaper, I can tell him unequivocally that the paper reported very inaccurately what happened in Japan.

few months. I wish to direct my final supplementary question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Since he is absent, may I direct it to the parliamentary secretary? Given the fact that Reed Paper Company has applied to DREE for a grant to finance a sawmill and kraft pulp mill operation at Red Lake and Ear Falls, both locations being in the disputed area, and in light of assurances of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development that all treaty rights and obligations would be respected by this government, will the minister, or the parliamentary secretary, guarantee that Reed's application will be suspended until land claims and native peoples' rights have been fairly and thoroughly dealt with?

Mr. Ed Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I will take the hon. member's question as notice.

HOUSING

POSSIBILITY OF DEDUCTING MORTGAGE INTEREST FROM INCOME TAX—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State responsible for Urban Affairs.

Considering that the conditions made available at the present time by the government do not make the purchase of a house financially interesting and that the interest rates on loans offered by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are really too high, could the minister inform the House whether he would be prepared to recommend that the mortgage interest paid by a Canadian taxpayer on the purchase of his first house be deductible from his personal income tax?

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, no. I would indicate to the hon. member that the rate paid by purchasers of moderately priced homes in Quebec and elsewhere in the country is equivalent to 8 per cent. These programs, through the lending of the private sector which is assisted by the federal government, have already increased this year by some 80 per cent. We expect close to a record year for housing starts and sales of units to those with low and moderate incomes. Indeed, the programs are successful and working more effectively than others anywhere in the world.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

POSSIBLE LOSS OF REVENUE TO PROVINCES AS RESULT OF CHANGE IN BENEFIT PROVISION—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the government's proposals to change the UIC Act, it appears that certain provinces are concerned about losses which they may incur in benefits and they now seek compensation one way or another, because of the possibility that they may need to add moneys to their own provincial programs. Have any provinces indicated this to the minister in terms of compensation and how does he intend to deal with this matter?

• (1430)

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I believe some provinces in the Atlantic area have expressed concern about the possible loss of the revenue that would come to the unemployed as a result of moving, for example, from the eight week to the 12 week period. Some of them suggested that funds lost in that way might be turned over to the provinces. However, I am satisfied that our direct employment policy, aimed as it will be at areas of high unemployment, will more than compensate for the funds it will require.

MANPOWER

DATE OF IMPLEMENTATION OF PLAN TO CREATE EMPLOYMENT—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): The minister indicated that this employment strategy which has recently been introduced will require consultation with the provinces. Can the minister now advise when this consultation process will be completed? Also, can he advise whether he will be able to implement this strategy, particularly the Canada works end of it, prior to April 1977?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, one of the first initiatives I took was to meet with the ministers in the various provinces who have responsibility for labour and education in the proper perspective of Manpower to discuss with them our direct employment strategy policy. I indicated to them the extent of it and that there would in fact be consultation with them. I expect we will commence our discussions with regard to programs on a consultative basis probably early in January 1977 with a view to implementing them in approximately April of that year.

SUGGESTION AMENDMENTS TO ACT NOT PASSED BEFORE PROVINCES CONSULTED ON PLAN TO CREATE EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): In light of the fact the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Commission Act are part and parcel in terms of the employment strategy and because of the necessity that there be consultation in order that there shall be no inequities, can the minister now assure the House that amendments to the UIC Act will not be brought forward until such time as the consultation process has been terminated? Can he assure the House of this?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker. I think it is proper that we know one think the hon. member is not very well advised to accuse me of trying to play politics about that.

POSSIBILITY MOVING VETERANS AFFAIRS TO CHARLOTTETOWN TRADE-OFF FOR DEFENCE BASE AT SUMMERSIDE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, there has been no official announcement with respect to this important move and no clarification as to which minister is responsible. However, reports indicate some trade-off could have been made by the government with respect to the establishment of one federal department in Prince Edward Island and with respect to the loss of a major part of a defence establishment, also in Prince Edward Island, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if there have been conversations with the premier of Prince Edward Island or his officials about a possible trade-off. If there were not, can the Prime Minister give an assurance to this House that the federal government has not given consideration to either removing or substantially reducing the defence establishment at Canadian Forces Base, Summerside?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce made it very clear that he is the minister responsible for this stage of our decentralization policy. I should add that he is a very able minister.

An hon. Member: He is resigning next week.

An hon. Member: He is going to run in Quebec.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member asks me if there is to be a trade-off as a result of this decentralization. I would say there is no truth to that at all and I am surprised that the rumour exists, unless it is the pure invention of the hon. member. I would think, as a member from Prince Edward Island, he would be thanking us for this.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I have learned from long experience, Mr. Speaker, never to thank this government for anything. The possibility of a trade-off is on the front page of this afternoon's newspaper. If it is not true, I would think the Prime Minister would want to clear the air and say that there have never been any conversations as reported on the front page of this afternoon's newspaper. In addition, I would think he would want to give concrete assurance to the people of Prince Edward Island in view of the importance that he and I both know CFB Summerside represents to the economy of Prince Edward Island. I would hope the Prime Minister would give that clear assurance in order to dispel the fears that are reported in today's media.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I can certainly give that assurance. Neither the minister responsible for decentralization nor I, myself, have spoken to Mr. Campbell, the premier of Prince Edward Island, about this matter. As far as I am concerned, if what the hon. member says he read in the newspaper is actually in the newspaper, it is a lie.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED OPPOSITION TO TRANSFER OF LAND TO REED PAPER UNTIL NATIVE LAND CLAIMS SETTLED

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Given the fact that the federal government has funded Grand Council Treaty No. 9 in northern Ontario for research work on and preparation of land claims in that area, and in light of the fact that these claims include the 18,000 square miles of land which Reed Paper Company is attempting to secure from the government of Ontario, will the minister assure this House that until all native peoples land claims are settled, any land transfer by the Ontario government will be opposed by the federal government?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I cannot say that at this time, but wish to inform the hon. member that officials of my department will meet the chiefs of Grand Council Treaty No. 9 tomorrow, in Toronto, to discuss what we might do together to resolve difficulties resulting from that licence.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the native peoples can take much solace from the minister's answer. May I ask the minister the following supplementary question: In view of the admission of the minister in the House yesterday, that his predecessor had consulted with the Ontario government concerning the proposed land transfer to Reed, can the minister explain why his department, at the very time it was funding Indian land claims research in the area, did not have the common decency to inform the native people of the area of the plans of Reed Paper and the Ontario government?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, contrary to what the hon. member says, the Indians in the area would like us to discuss solutions with them before we go firing off on our own, as suggested by the hon. member. That is what we are going to do tomorrow. We will discuss any solutions to the problem with them, rather than listening to the hon. member.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR DISCLOSURE OF DECENTRALIZATION PLAN

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. I should like to preface it by expressing the pleasure of my party at the fact that the government is acting on decentralization of the functions of the public service in the country. I would like the minister to confirm that there will be a major policy announcement regarding the Department of Veterans Affairs and public servants employed by that department made outside this House immediately after question period ends today.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, that question should more properly be addressed to my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am still responsible for the federal government decentralization program, and I am glad to see that the Leader of the Opposition maintains the stand he had himself included in his program. I hope he will speak to his neighbour right across from me and to his other neighbour as well, for I am sure the member for Saint-Hyacinthe agrees with that decentralization policy. This afternoon, the Minister of Veterans Affairs is to make a statement in Charlottetown because I think this is the most appropriate place to make it at this time, since this is a place which really needs the help of the federal government.

As to the policy itself, I have already made statements and speeches about it in the House. If anybody wants me to make another statement, Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to do so, and I would then quote statements of policy the member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark) made when he ran for the leadership of his party.

[English]

Mr. Clark: I think in passing it might be helpful if the Prime Minister would indicate to the House just what minister has responsibility for what functions and who carried what in the most recent shuffle.

I would like also to indicate to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce that it is not on this side of the House that there are disagreements which cause ministers to resign.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: My question relates to an elaboration of the policy statement made by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in his former capacity, and assuming that there were factors involved in this particular decision other than the four provincial by-elections in which the Liberal Party is in trouble in Prince Edward Island, and I wonder if the minister might tell us when we can expect, on motions, a full statement which will not deal with the generality of the principle of decentralization, but will instead tell us precisely what guarantees of consultation there will be with public servants and with other groups involved, and when we can have an indication of the master plan, which we presume exists, indicating the other departments which are now being considered for decentralization and the other parts of Canada to which it is intended to decentralize.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we consult provincial governments. Every time the unions concerned were consulted, I myself stated that I thought, as it had been noted by the opposition last year, that decentralization was one of the government's priorities. If I have to repeat my speech I shall do so, or else send a copy to the hon. member. In any event I believe the program is continuing. The Prime Minister was kind enough to ask me to pursue the program I had launched a year ago. Progress is being made and I shall be pleased to inform the House more fully in the coming weeks, because I see that some members have a short memory which needs to be refreshed.

[English]

Mr. Clark: I think we on this side of the House can survive without a repetition of the minister's speech, but we would like to have an indication from the government of precisely what plans are in place now regarding which aspects of which other departments are going to be moved to what other locations in Canada, and we would like to have that as soon as possible so that we and the people of Canada can have some assurance that this is in fact following some general plan and that it is not in response to political emergencies the Liberal Party faces in particular parts of the country.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF STAFF REDUCTIONS IN ATLANTIC REGION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of extreme urgency and pressing necessity so far as the employees of the Canadian National in the Atlantic region are concerned.

In view of the fact that the CN is continuing a policy of cut-backs and lay-offs of their employees, affecting trainmen, engineers, telegraphers, CN police, customer relations officers and CN-CP Telecommunication employees with many years of service without due and timely, or indeed decent notice, causing great hardship to these employees and their families, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North:

That the Minister of Transport cause an immediate investigation to be carried out into the operations of the Canadian National Railways in the Atlantic region to determine why these employees with so many years service are being treated in such a cruel and callous manner by this Crown corporation when, at the same time, the throne speech pays lip service to job creation in regions of chronic unemployment.

SUGGESTED CONTINUATION OF SUBSIDY TO NORTHLAND NAVIGATION PENDING STUDY OF OPERATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43. It concerns the end of the subsidy to Northland Navigation on the Pacific coast which is to come about in three days. Given the fact that the west coast transport subsidy to Northland Navigation in Vancouver will be ended, thus cutting off effective communication for 16 northwest British Columbia communities with the loss of hundreds of jobs in an area of high unemployment, and that this action is being taken with the minister's knowledge that an in-house study prepared for the Canadian Transport Commission asserts that an up-grading of existing equipment and service could lead to a quick phasing out of existing subsidies, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the Minister of Transport extend the existing subsidy for a further year and immediately make public the CTC report in question so that the members of this House and the British Columbia public can engage in an open and accurate discussion of the alternatives available.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to put a question of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the importance of the principle of decentralization of departments and agencies of the Government of Canada to those areas which benefit, but also to public servants and their families who are affected thereby, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

SUGGESTED CHANGE IN POLICY TO PERMIT BROADCAST OF CONSUMER ANNOUNCEMENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, under S.O. 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to discuss an urgent matter.

Considering that the CBC refuses to broadcast advertisements designed to inform the consumer, and I am referring to the French advertisement sponsored by credit unions and the Consumer Protection Board under the slogan "Le gros bon sens"; considering also that the privately owned TV network saw fit to air those advertisements which are partly free, thus recognizing the importance of informing the consumer; and finally, considering that the state network gets subsidies from public funds and that its audience is entitled to the same services, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle):

across the way can come up with valid, constructive and well reasoned suggestions for modifications to the legislation, the Minister of Agriculture for Canada will be the first to accept those ideas and try to incorporate them in the legislation so that this bill can be, in fact, the very best bill possible for Canadian farmers all across the country.

One other point hon. gentlemen across the way made had to do with the matter of interest charges. I shall not deal with that extensively because the answer is already on the record in the intervention made earlier today by the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. I suppose the point opposition members are trying to make is that somehow this legislation treats farmers in eastern Canada, and farmers who are not grain producers in the Wheat Board area, differently from the cash payment legislation relating to specific grain, which legislation has been on the statute books for some time.

The point is that there has been an effort in both pieces of legislation dealing with grain and other crops to treat producers in exactly the same way, especially in relation to interest. If the advance is repaid in the normal fashion as contemplated by the legislation and as has been demonstrated by our experience with the grain legislation, then of course interest is not payable. But in a case where the advance is in default, or where the producer chooses to repay it in terms of cash instead of the delivery of crop, then of course the advance does begin to attract interest.

It is probably important once again that members know the history of that particular provision which really results from the experience with the grain legislation. Originally the cash advance legislation dealing with grain did not contain a provision calling for the payment of interest. It was upon the recommendation of farmers and farm organizations that that provision was put in, in order to avoid what otherwise would be an abuse of legislation if an advance were taken with no intention of delivering the grain but rather in order to have the advance as an interest-free loan to be used for other purposes.

Farmers and farm organizations in western Canada perceived that as an abuse of the legislation, and recommended that the cash advance legislation relating to grain should be changed to recognize that problem. The amendments were made to the legislation a considerable time ago. Obviously they have been very well received and very widely approved. The legislation the Minister of Agriculture is now presenting is of course legislation which follows upon exactly the same principle. It does not specifically relate to grain, but of course expands the principle so that it will relate to a number of other crops across Canada whether they be produced in western Canada or in any other part of the country.

I think the principle the Minister of Agriculture has put before the House in the form of this particular legislation is very good; it is sound. This is a principle which I think farmers in parts of Canada who are not used to the grains industry on the prairies will welcome when they see this kind of provision, and I know producers across the country are very anxious to see this legislation proceed through the House of Commons and the Standing Committee on Agriculture so that the advantages of cash advances for crops, other than grains, will become available to farmers across the country.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate on Bill C-2 I cannot help but note that the hon. member ended his remarks by wishing the bill very speedy passage through the House because of the great need for this legislation across Canada. There would have been a great deal more speed had he not recited all the little goodies he thinks his great idol has brought before agriculture in Canada. He even went so far as to suggest that it was a great stroke of business to change the Wheat Board Act so that the final payment cheques would not go out in the same year. He did not say that the reason that happened was that they were paid out on October 1 of one year because there was an election on October 30 and they wanted to make certain that the farmers knew who was paying out the money. It kind of backfired that time.

Then he went on to suggest that the speakers on this side of the House who held up the grain stabilization bill in 1971 would rue the day. He did not say that any astute statistician or mathematician who studied the facts should come to the opposition members and thank us because the price of wheat was so low that in no way could we have been wrong in holding up that piece of legislation in 1971.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Horner: I will permit a queston in due course, but not right now. You had 25 minutes to speak and have allowed me only five. At the time of the stabilization bill the price of wheat was so low that there was no way the farmer could benefit from stabilization at that low price. When it was passed in the last session, at a time when the price of wheat was $5 a bushel, the concept was different. All farmers who participated in the grain stabilization program should be truly grateful for the Conservative party and the work it did. I might mention also in all fairness the assistance we received from the NDP on that particular point. They like to claim all the credit, and I think I am being over-generous in giving them a little.

The interesting thing about Bill C-2 is that this is the first piece of federal legislation which also assists the Alberta treasury branch and says that the Alberta treasury branch will be considered as a bank. There have been many debates before in this House of Commons and I have often argued in respect of similar legislation that the Alberta treasury branch should be included.

I well remember when a former minister of agriculture, my friend's predecessor, the then hon. member for Medicine Hat, and I argued that point. He was unreceptive to it. So I want to thank the minister. He has learned from the errors of his predecessor. However, he has not learned the lesson in respect of his grand design about controlling everything. This piece of legislation smacks of a little bit more control being sought by the federal government. Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being six o'clock this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

Mr. Goodale: Amendments have been approved by the House, the pool is now fully effective and is sanctioned by law. This is a subject we considered earlier, this spring, in debate.

Other changes include the new quota system, the block shipping system, the producer-election of the advisory committee to the Wheat Board which has now been formalized by an amendment to the Canadian Wheat Board Act, a poll among rapeseed producers about the preferred method of rapeseed marketing, the purchase of 6,000 grain hopper cars for the exclusive use of grain movement in western Canada, a boxcar repair program, the Mants Report on boxcar allocation procedures, the appointment of port co-ordinators for Thunder Bay and Vancouver, and the Snavely Commission on the cost of transporting grain by rail, and the Hall Commission on grain handling and transportation.

I could not leave this extensive, important and impressive list of achievements relating to western agriculture without referring specifically to a measure which members on the other side of the House would prefer to forget because they fought it every step of the way. They know it will be to their continual discredit that on the floor of the House of Commons they battled the Western Grain Stabilization Plan, which was a plan brought forward by the government in an attempt to alleviate the effects of those recurring "bust years" in grain incomes, a plan which has been well received by grain producers and farm organizations, and one which the opposition knows very well has received a warm response from western Canadian farmers. They would prefer not to see it on the statute books because they know it will stand there as a credit to this administration, and to their discredit, because they tried to block it and prevent it becoming law.

An hon. Member: Tell us about operation LIFT.

Mr. Goodale: The hon. member across the way likes to refer to operation LIFT. I have noticed something very curious about the opposition—

Mr. Horner: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with Bill C-2. I have sat here with a great deal of patience listening to the hon. member making an election speech as though an election were coming up, reciting all the Liberals have done. I believe that at this point, so early in the session, some degree of relevancy to the subject matter before us for consideration should be adhered to. I can well understand that as the session proceeds into an election year, maybe in 1977, members opposite will want to trot out all the little goodies for which they have been responsible, and send their speeches home to their constituents. But surely after only a few days of the session have elapsed, we can stick to the legislation before the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I think the hon. member might have strayed a bit, but he was referring to the bill—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): —and he should be allowed to continue.

Mr. Goodale: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wish the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) had been in the House earlier today to hear the speeches of his hon. friends in connection with this bill. Most of what they had to say had nothing to do with the measure at all.

Mr. Horner: Two wrongs don't make a right.

Mr. Goodale: They referred to a number of extraneous matters, and the comments I have put on the record deal with the western grains industry, with legislation relating to grain, and with many of the points which members opposite raised, especially the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar who tried to convey to the country the impression that somehow there had been no activity affecting western agriculture. I believe the last I put on the record a few moments ago completely answered the point the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar was trying to make, and demonstrated that western agriculture has received a great deal of attention in the House of Commons, and will continue to receive attention.

Some hon. Members: Get back to the bill.

An hon. Member: Otto's little boy. Did Otto approve that speech?

Mr. Horner: Filibustering the first piece of legislation from that side.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. I think the hon. gentleman should be allowed to continue his speech.

Mr. Goodale: I can understand the sensitivity of hon. gentlemen across the way when it comes to the subject of western agriculture because they know, as I have demonstrated just now, that the list of achievements which I have placed on record is an impressive one. Canadian farmers regard it as impressive, and members opposite would rather not have that list repeated because it demonstrates their complete ineffectiveness. They would prefer not to have these things on record because they know it inures to their continuing discredit in western Canada.

Bill C-2—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Goodale: —expands upon a principle which has worked effectively over the past few years, with some amendments, in the interest of western agriculture. It is a principle which farmers generally would like to see extended to other aspects of agriculture, and the Minister of Agriculture is now responding to that concern.

Hon. members across the way have made a number of comments suggesting that the Minister of Agriculture should listen carefully to what goes on in committee and accept suggestions for modification. I have read Bill C-2 and believe it to be sound, but one thing is clear about the position taken by the Minister of Agriculture when it comes to the proceedings of the standing committee. The minister is very receptive to ideas which come forward. I am sure if hon. gentlemen realistic and positive way to overcome the very considerable difficulty they were experiencing at that time.

What has been done in the period since those dark days of crisis that western agriculture was facing? I think of such things as expanded credit facilities and the long-term Government of Canada guarantees for the Canadian Wheat Board which have assisted that particular institution in western Canada to pursue more vigorously and effectively world markets for Canadian grains.

Mr. Towers: Don't forget LIFT.

Mr. Goodale: It is significant too that in that period, beginning in the early seventies, the Canadian Wheat Board was encouraged by the government and the minister responsible to pursue vigorously as we in Canada had never done before international markets for barley and feed grains. We are now a significant exporter of those particular grains and it is because of those efforts in the early seventies to win, keep and service those markets that we now have these very important markets for western Canadian feed grain producers.

We have as well the annual commitment by the government of Canada of $10 million toward a new market development fund to enhance grain marketing opportunities at home and abroad. Farmers and their organizations, as well as others, have taken advantage of this fund to develop and find new marketing opportunities.

We have as well new research facilities. I know my hon. friends opposite are very interested in this subject and we have joined in discussions on this question in the Standing Committee on Agriculture previously. Obviously research is an important matter in the field of agriculture and in this area we have seen some important developments, such as the new crop science division at the University of Saskatchewan in Saskatoon which is doing significant work in the field of agricultural research, in addition to the normal research facilities of the Canadian Department of Agriculture. I think as well of the new protein-oil-starch pilot plant in Saskatoon which will shortly be doing important new work in developing new ways of processing our grains and oil seeds.

Then there is the two-price wheat program which was the subject of debate in previous sessions of this parliament. This was an important measure which, long after the hubbub of debate in the House subsided, has established very clearly its relevance and has paid dividends to western Canadian agriculture.

In the same period that we have been working on these matters, we have also substantially increased the level of available cash advances to the western grain industry and have improved the ways in which those advances can be repaid. This, of course, refers to the amendments discussed in this House and approved by the House of Commons in previous sessions of parliament, under which legislation the available level of cash advances was increased to $15,000, with the repayment terms for farmers being made more broad and flexible, so that if farmers wished to avail themselves of the legislation cash advances could be more tailored to their particular needs and to the way they ran their farming operations. That is probably a small, technical change which has taken place during the last few years, but an important one, one that shows the general upgrading and improvement of facilities available to western agriculture.

Of additional interest are the improvements in the timing of Canadian Wheat Board final payments and adjustment cheques. Often times in the past it seemed that these cheques would come at an unfortunate time, or at least not at the right time so far as the planning of a farmer's income and tax position was concerned. Amendments to the Canadian Wheat Board Act have corrected that particular situation and prevented the rather unfortunate development which occurred a couple of years ago when some farmers were perhaps caught by surprise and received two final payments in the one taxation year. In some cases this served to defeat their tax planning. It is, of course, the intention to make that income position as certain as it possibly can be, and changes in the Wheat Board Act have been passed by this parliament to deal with that particular aspect. I think as well of the implementation of the deferred cash ticket option for grain producers on the delivery of their grain so that, again, they can exercise greater control over their income position.

In another area I would mention the development which began to take place four years ago with the provision of reliable production and marketing information for producers to be placed in their hands in the spring, well in advance of seeding time. It is important that a farmer should be able to take advantage of that information to plan his production and marketing for the coming year. Because of a practice which has been implemented by the minister responsible for the Wheat Board, with the co-operation of the Department of Agriculture and the Wheat Board, information is compiled, prepared, and distributed to each farmer in the prairie region early in March each year so that he can have the best information which is available to production and marketing experts, and farmers can them make their own decisions based on the material they have.

Determined efforts have been made to remove the long-standing inequities which have existed in our system of domestic feed grains marketing in the past. This has been the subject of extensive and sometimes heated debate in the House, and it is important to remember that the government has now for many months been endeavouring to find that important national consensus as to the proper shape of a domestic feed grains marketing policy which will, with equity and effectiveness, meet the needs of grain producers and others engaged in agriculture in both the west and the east.

I think of another achievement which is significant in the establishment of a separate marketing pool for malting barley effective for the crop year 1975-76. This again has been the subject of discussion in the House of Commons earlier in the session.

Mr. Horner: It was last session.

government brought in advances for farm stored grain, there was concern that it might be abused. I am sure both ministers will hasten to agree that the application of that program has been exemplary, to say the least.

I am glad to see the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Richardson) in the House. I know he is very interested in the problems of the west. I hope he will be vocal and tell this House what can be done for the west, what cabinet failed to do in the past, and about the many petitions which he made on behalf of western Canada which were turned down. I am sure the hon. member will perform a very useful function in the remaining days of this parliament.

I did not intend to speak very long. However, I did want to express in the strongest possible terms the concern of my colleagues and of people in western Canada with regard to the paucity of agricultural legislation, the absolute disregard the government has shown with respect to the agricultural industry. We are not led to believe the government has any interest in bringing forward legislation to improve the position of Canadian farmers.

It is not good enough for the Minister of Agriculture to continue to use the hackneyed phrase "things were never better for the farmer". The minister knows in his heart that is not the case. He knows the problems of the farmer are more serious than ever before. The farmer looks to the years ahead with apprehension. He does not have a sense of security with regard to government policies. He cannot look to the future with any degree of certainty.

The government must look seriously at farm input costs and assistance to farmers. Farming is a very substantial business. As I pointed out previously, for someone to get into any sort of farming operation in western Canada, he requires something in the vicinity of $150,000 to acquire a reasonable amount of land and equipment. It is difficult for someone earning a salary in the city to conceive of the amount of capital investment required to get into farming. The farmer looks ahead with apprehension because he knows the substantial amount of money that is required to get into farming.

There are many aspects of the law with regard to taxation and capital gains that this House must study. The government should bring in legislation to minimize the impact of death in a family and the turning over of the family farm to children or families of farmers who are no longer capable of, or interested in, carrying on the business of farming.

These are some of the concerns people talk to me about in my constituency and have discussed with my colleagues. I hope that the Minister of Agriculture, who I see is making notes, will reply to us about some of these concerns and that we will be able to get some very detailed consideration of our suggestions in committee. This may improve the effectiveness of the legislation which in principle I think we all heartily endorse, and for which we commend the minister on bringing forward at this time.

Advance Payments for Crops

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should like to spend a few moments in this debate this afternoon discussing the general principles of Bill C-2, the cash advance legislation. I am interested in the tenor and tone of the debate up to this point since it has been, to this stage at least, dominated by westerners. I think it is all very well and good that those of us from that great part of the country should have the opportunity, as we do frequently, to put our particular concerns and points of view on the record on matters affecting agriculture, an industry very much germane to our way of life and to the economy of western Canada.

I think we should also consider the very important point that the legislation before us this afternoon is legislation that applies to farmers generally all across Canada, the expansion of something that has been available in western Canada with respect to grains for some considerable length of time, and has been very well received and approved by the farmers of western Canada.

The argument has been made, with some merit, that a principle that is so effective and well received should in fact be expanded and become available to producers in all parts of the country, so far as that is possible. In presenting this bill to the House the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is attempting to respond to that particular desire.

I was interested in the remarks of my hon. friend, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn), and the concerns he had about agriculture which he outlined in his concluding remarks. He particularly referred to the farmers in the western context, and that is a valid expression of concern. I think some of the same points apply to farmers in all parts of Canada. However, I think the tone he struck in the last few moments of his remarks might have been a little misleading in that they implied that very little had been done or was now being done to respond to the concerns of farmers.

It is probably useful to bear in mind some very recent history in this regard that might clear the waters that unfortunately, and perhaps inadvertently, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar tended to muddy. In trying to bring about that clarification I will deal specifically with the areas he was discussing, namely, the concerns of farmers in the prairie region which he and I both have the honour to represent in this House. I should then like to direct some specific remarks to some of the points which were raised earlier in the House having to do with agriculture on a broader scale, that is, within the national context with which this legislation deals.

It is important to remember some of the rather significant changes that have been brought about, particularly having to do with the grains industry in western Canada in the last four or five years as this government has attempted to respond to the concerns of grains producers. You do not have to think back very many years, Mr. Speaker, to the period between 1968 and 1971 when the grains industry of western Canada was facing nothing short of a crisis situation as far as the incomes of the grain producers were concerned. The government was faced with a challenge in assisting producers in a take place within the area designated. That, at any rate, is my interpretation. I ask, how will this bill affect a product which is traditionally traded across provincial borders, that is, traded interprovincially? Perhaps the minister will answer such questions during the committee stage. Will this bill apply to those products which customarily are traded interprovincially?

No doubt the government has in mind the best interests of farmers; unfortunately the government's intentions are by no means contained in the language of the bill. The two are entirely different. Mr. Speaker, a bill which empowers the minister to regulate, to choose the agencies to which money is to be paid and to lay down all the regulations which may be necessary for the administrator, is not satisfactory. It is contrary to the principles we espouse.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I feel obliged to speak briefly on Bill C-2 which provides for advance payments with respect to crops other than those administered by the Canadian Wheat Board in its designated area. As my colleague said, it is nice to see the two ministers opposite who share responsibility for the agricultural industry sitting next to one another, conferring and doing their best to pilot this bill through the House. That, of course, immediately brings to mind something we have often discussed in the agricultural committee, the division of responsibility in certain fields of agriculture between the minister responsible for the Wheat Board and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). We all know of the difficulties connected with the administration of agricultural policy. However, the division of responsibility leads to duplication and overlapping, evident especially in legislation and programs relating to all agriculture in Canada.

I remind the minister that he was not able to listen to part of my speech in the throne speech debate. I had hoped, when he introduced the legislation, that he would refute the implication in the Speech from the Throne that this is the only legislation we shall see during the present session of parliament relating to agriculture. He did not deal with that matter when he spoke in the throne speech debate.

As I said previously, the Speech from the Throne is little but a philosophical exposition of what the government intends to place before parliament for dealing with various aspects of the economy and other matters. The particular bill we are now debating is, I submit, the only agricultural bill to which the Speech from the Throne makes reference. This bill attempts, inadequately, to continue a principle advanced originally by the Conservative government, the principle relating to advances on farm stored crops. If this is the total extent of the agricultural policy of the government, I am apprehensive about the importance it attaches to the Canadian agricultural industry.

I am glad the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board is here. I know he is aware of the circumstances. I hope he is planning action to meet some of the problems being faced in western Canada.

There is a possibility that net farm income in Saskatchewan will drop by some $200 million this year, notwithstanding the fact that we have had an exceptional yield of high quality. Farmers in Saskatchewan face increased costs that are phenomenal. Machinery costs are increasing far in excess of the guidelines laid down by the Anti-Inflation Board.

I appreciate that an attempt is being made here to extend the application of advance payments for farm stored crops. I hope that the government does not believe that, because it has made this gesture, this completes its responsibility to the farmer.

Problems also arise with good crops. Grain is stored in rather unsatisfactory circumstances on farms. We hope the system will be able to sell this grain. I hope there is an aggressive sales plan and that the government will be able to obtain a good price. A record grain yield has led to some grain being piled on the ground, in machinery sheds or other temporary storage. What steps is the government taking to ensure proper and safe storage of grain in western Canada needed because of the substantial crop yield we have this year? We are extremely grateful, if not to the government certainly to the deity, for the blessings we have had bestowed upon us this year.

I hope the minister will accept some of the constructive suggestions being made on this side with respect to this legislation. I ask him to tell us why there is a limitation on the application of this bill, as pointed out by the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain), with regard to organizations which are apparently the only entity qualified to receive assistance under the provisions of the act. This will be somewhat of a restriction on the effectiveness of it.

I hope that in committee we will gain an understanding of the application of the bill. I trust the minister will be receptive to a full discussion and suggestions from interested farm groups, producer groups, and members on this side.

I am concerned about the fact that early in this session we are dealing with this particular piece of legislation. It is certainly an important bill. However, it is the only suggestion from the government side with regard to a policy providing for a viable agricultural industry in this country. It causes many of us on this side to be concerned about the priorities of this government at a time when the agricultural industry is and will be facing increased input costs.

In order for someone to get into farming today, he must have substantial backing. The minister should look very closely into this. I hope the minister will discuss this with the members of the Standing Committee on Agriculture and be open to suggestions regarding amendments to the Farm Credit Corporation Act in order that improvements can be made in that legislation.

In terms of the application, granting, and repayment of credit, I am sure that everyone will agree that farmers are superior to almost every other segment of society. They are the most trustworthy and have the best record with regard to repayment of their obligations. At the time a Conservative

It is somewhat difficult to understand where this bill would begin, where the price stabilization legislation would begin, or where either would leave off. There are some crops that you cannot store so it would be difficult to apply the bill to them. The marketing of potatoes, pears, and other fruit for processing, and indeed the marketing of most of the vegetables that grow in the early part of the season, would be outside the limits of the bill. Yet the intention of the bill is to relieve the farmer of his bank loan. Unless a price stabilization board is established immediately no relief will be available to the farmer under this bill.

Under what circumstances will payments be made to the farmer? This is not set out. There may be a regulation to cover this, of course. I think the minister should be ready to answer questions like this when the bill comes before committee, and if he has the information it could shorten the proceedings. Apparently the bill will not cover processing crops, but is there a special reason for this?

Let us assume the farmer is in arrears or default under the terms of the bill. What supplementary aid will be available to him? As I understand it, such default is defined as a legal obligation under this legislation and would impair any credit he might seek in succeeding years when it is time to plant. Is it the government's intention that he may receive the aid necessary to avoid default, or is he to be left in that position? Is there a relationship between this bill and any assistance he might receive under some other bill? I do not think the principle should be applied in such a way that the farmer does not get the help he needs. Will the market price be a factor in triggering this, or is this to be left to regulation?

It is interesting to watch the minister responsible for the Wheat Board standing guard over the Minister of Agriculture. Frankly I do not know which minister is infringing on the other. I thought the Minister of Agriculture was not his usual, bombastic self when introducing this bill on second reading. Perhaps he needs someone in the House to hold his hand. The minister's demeanour may be significant. Perhaps it has something to do with the policies he has espoused. I am glad to note both ministers sitting together. Perhaps the Minister of Agriculture needs help.

I wonder if this bill is part of the minister's policy to coerce farmers not presently organized into joining organizations which meet with his approval. If that is his intent it is deplorable, and such policy is deplorable. As was mentioned, in Prince Edward Island there are multitudes of farm organizations which do not qualify as marketing agents and which, by virtue of the language of the bill as printed, will put their farmer members at a disadvantage.

The minister's intentions in this regard should be made clear. As well, how will the program be administered? Will it be administered perhaps with the help of provincial governments, as well as that of banks and the staff of the Department of Agriculture? How will this be done? Certainly it would not be proper to allow only card-carrying members of organizations of which the minister approves to benefit from the legislation. That would not be in the best interests of democracy.

The government's incomplete program has forced provinces to establish their own programs for helping farmers. I was interested to note that when this bill was brought forward for second reading today, the headlines of one newspaper alluded to the expense the province of Ontario would be put to in providing support for its agricultural sector.

An hon. Member: Have you seen the bill?

Mr. McCain: We are told that the province is to spend some $70 million. Apparently the Liberal leader of Ontario says he will support the bill. I have not seen it. The leader of the Ontario New Democratic Party also approves the bill, so please do not be so critical. After all, if hon. members opposite are at one with their party colleagues in Quebec, they must also be at one with their party colleagues in Ontario. They are sending reinforcements to Quebec; perhaps they ought to send some to Ontario. Try that little twist.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Send the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. McCain: I deplore the government's defaulting on its responsibilities in agriculture. Perhaps that course should be described as disgraceful. During the last ten years pretty well every minister in the Trudeau government has tried, on behalf of the government, to evade financial responsibilities connected with agriculture. If the government had not evaded them, British Columbia and Alberta would not have found it necessary to embark on a subsidy program. Other provinces of Canada would not have found such subsidy programs necessary. Pork producers, cow-calf operators, and others producing in the field of agriculture would not have found it necessary to approach their respective provincial governments for subsidies. Therefore it is clear that provincial governments are shouldering the responsibilities of the federal government. The provinces are staggering under the burden of subsidies, a burden which it is the ultimate responsibility of the federal government to shoulder.

I submit that if the benefits of this legislation are to be available only to card-carrying members of organizations acceptable to the minister, it represents a further default on the part of the federal government and is contrary to principles of Canadian democracy.

The regulatory provisions are an important part of the bill. The language is not clear. What is the precise meaning of clause 14 (a) which reads:

for determining, in relation to any crop, what is a significant portion of the crop in any area represented by an organization:

Other parts of clause 14 are equally vague.

We are debating a short bill, Mr. Speaker, an incomplete bill which purports to deal with a principle. I can only say that the drafting has been faulty. It is not clear.

Let me deal with another vague point. The bill says, in so many words, that the marketing of the product concerned shall where interest is referred to here. If there is a payment in cash rather than delivery of the goods, the interest comes into being, and the hon. member may recall—and I ask him to confirm this—that there were actual demands in the west for this kind of provision because it was felt that it was an abuse for someone with no intention of delivering a product to take the advance and then later repay in cash and try to have an interest free loan, which is not an advance against delivery. I am sure the hon. member will recall that in the western case.

Mr. Neil: If that is the explanation, I accept it. I would have hoped that the Minister of Agriculture would have made this explanation initially. I can see the reason for it, but on the other hand if an individual farmer is in a position to pay in cash for a loan he has received, either by a cash advance from the Canadian Wheat Board or under this particular bill, I do not think he should be penalized for it. However, I think this is a clause we will discuss in more detail when we get into the committee stage of the bill.

As I said, it appears after reading the bill in some detail that we will have to spend considerable time in committee listening to representations from members of various organizations and producers to determine what their feelings are with respect to this bill. Quite frankly, as mentioned a few minutes ago, if the organization is to be the lender and has to do all the administrative work with respect to the loan, it seems to me that it would have been much simpler if the bill had contained provisions for the producer to borrow directly from the bank and to have the loan guaranteed by the federal government, because a bank is set up to lend money. Banks have the facilities and the staff to process loans; organizations do not, and the cost an organization would be put to as a result of handling the administration of these loans would have to be passed on to the producer.

It seems to me that in the long run if we consider the interest which is paid by an organization to a bank, and if we add to that the cost to the organization of administering the loan, the total cost of the program will be in excess of what it would cost if the producer borrowed directly from the bank. I would suspect as well that members of organizations will be reluctant to disclose the yield of their crop to the organizations because those organizations are usually made up of fellow producers. Certainly the producer organization would have to satisfy itself that the borrower will not default, and it would be necessary therefore that the borrower disclose the extent of his production to the organization.

● (1700)

In summary, Mr. Speaker, while I am in agreement with the basic principle of the bill I think we must take a good hard look at it in committee. I think we will have to request producer organizations and others for their input. I would suspect that after the committee meetings a number of amendments will be advanced to make this bill more satisfactory to the producers.

[Mr. Lang.]

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I think the greatest favour we could have done the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) today would have been to allow this thing to slide through immediately after his remarks. However, I think he needs the comments of the members of the House.

Aid to marketing has been pretty well neglected, with few exceptions, during the past ten years, and the principle of intended support to the agricultural industry is certainly espoused by every member of the opposition, regardless of party. The method by which the principle is to be adopted is of great concern, however. I wonder what percentage of the agricultural industry is organized. There has been a great deal of publicity about labour organization, and if my memory serves me correctly statistics show that 30 per cent of the labour force is organized and 70 per cent is not. But what percentage of farmers belong to an organization that will qualify them as producers entitled to the benefits of this bill?

Mr. Whelan: Over 80 per cent.

Mr. McCain: Certainly commodities have been named which are not eligible, and there are large numbers of other items which are not eligible. A small percentage of potato farmers are organized and could take advantage of this legislation, but unless potato farmers, corn farmers, and other agricultural producers can exploit their membership in the Federation of Agriculture or some such organization as a means of using this bill, its benefits are not available to them.

In the case of the Price Stabilization Board, historically if there were not an organization per se which had the marketing, managing, and financing capability, there was provision in the legislation to allow the provincial minister to become the administrator of such a program in co-operation with the Government of Canada and perhaps the banks. Under this bill, however, there seems to be no opportunity for agriculture to organize to take advantage of advance payments. If this deficiency is not corrected before third reading I am afraid the minister will come in for a great deal of criticism.

Mr. Whelan: Prince Edward Island has a marketing board.

Mr. McCain: I do not argue that, but let us carry it one step further. Let us take the point that was made earlier that if the farmer pays the organization in cash then he is subject to interest charges. That was my understanding of the explanation. The Marketing Board of Prince Edward Island is not marketing potatoes. If that organization were used, the farmer would sell to the licensed dealer, who in turn would pass over the cash to the organization. He would not be operating within the literal limits of this bill, however, He might be operating within limits which the minister could call acceptable, but he would not be operating legally as the bill is written.

There are potato organizations in New Brunswick to which potato farmers belong. They are not agents through whom the farmer can market his crop and pay his bill in kind rather than cash to avoid interest payments, however. I think the minister should give this matter serious consideration.

will have to establish a granary system. We will either have to can commodities which cannot be stored for long periods of time, or freeze dry them or process them in some other way. Even potatoes can be freeze dried and can be processed into other forms, and in this way stored for long periods of time. This can only be done with proper storage facilities such as granaries. I suggest that Canadian farmers have not been sufficiently well off in the last ten years to be capable of developing a granary system which would provide long-term storage on their farms, with or without cash advances. If such a system is to be established, the government will have to provide some assistance such as has been provided for the storage of grains through terminal elevators and the country elevator system with the capacity to store a whole year's crop.

I do not see any mention in the bill of an effort being made to provide an orderly marketing arrangement either in this country or on a world basis. Therefore unless the provisions of this bill relate to grains which are not now covered by the Canadian Wheat Board cash advances, such as rapeseed, farm organizations as well as other agencies and even marketing agencies in Ontario will have to take some action with regard to some of the commodities that are named. They will have to make an input into those commodities before this legislation proves useful.

The sum of $200 million has been mentioned. I assume that this would cover cash advances on rapeseed. If that is so, then this should have been stated in the bill. I suggest to the minister that when he speaks about paying back cash advances within a year from September, some farmers might find difficulty with it. What do you do with a tomato crop, with potatoes, cherries, apples, or any other commodities which cannot be stored for longer periods of time? I think there are provinces like British Columbia which have some fruit storage facilities which could handle the situation for that period, but in most cases we are talking about two or three weeks.

When we are talking about perishable fruit and vegetable crops, we are talking about getting them on to the market. How long can you keep pumpkins, squash and so forth on the farm? They may be kept in a cellar for a little while, but they cannot be kept in a field or in a barn for very long. On the farm there is not a 12 month storage facility. We are talking about a couple of weeks. Many of the advantages in the cash advance programs which come under the Canadian Wheat Board cannot, as I understand it, be applied to root crop commodities and other commodities with which we in eastern Canada may be involved.

I look forward to the discussion in the committee. I certainly do not see anything which warrants a long debate in the committee, and I am not particularly interested in delaying the Minister of Agriculture. We may get on to something much more important if we allow this to pass. However, I would be very surprised if farm organizations are not interested in appearing and finding out just what they will be able to do if they are to participate in this $200 million. If nothing else interests them, it will be the sum of money we are going to put into this, and I hope that if the Minister of Agriculture has a brotherly love relationship with the Minister of Transport, and if he will turn this amount of money over to rapeseed producers in western Canada, then he should say so, and if not, I think some farm organizations will be very hard pressed to find out how they can take advantage of it.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my remarks in connection with this bill will be relatively brief. I have had an opportunity to examine the bill in some detail, and it is obvious to me that the bill was not presented to or discussed with various farm organizations before it was prepared and submitted to this House. It is an unusual bill. As the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) said, it is either a simple bill or a complicated bill. It is typical of other bills we have been dealing with over the past several years. It is filled with inconsistencies, and it is difficult to interpret.

Looking at the bill it appears that an "organization" is the lending agency, as far as the bank is concerned, and there is a general description of an organization. It means an organization of producers. I look forward to getting a more detailed explanation of what organizations are entitled to participate, because it seems to me that there are very few organizations which have the staff, the administrative capacity or the bookkeeping facilities to handle loans under this legislation.

Certainly if widespread use is made by producers of the provisions of the bill, there will be many loans to process, there will be considerable bookwork and people will be required to make certain that the loans do not go into arrears, and when an administrative structure has to be set up to do this kind of thing, it will be costly.

The hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise) spoke about the question of interest. There were also some comments made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and by the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, I gather, suggesting that the producer would not be called upon to pay any interest. I was hoping that, when the hon. member for Elgin completed his remarks, the Minister of Agriculture or the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board would have stood up and given an explanation.

However, if we examine clause 7 on page 6 of the bill, it says, and I quote:

> Where a producer repays all or part of an advance made to him by an organization by direct payment to the organization under clause 5 (b)(i)(B) or (C), no interest is payable on the first
> (a) $500, or
> (b) 10 per cent of the advance,
> whichever is the lesser, so paid by him, if the advance is fully repaid without default.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member a question. I wonder if the hon. member will agree that a few years ago in the House we inserted exactly this kind of provision into the western bill on cash advances, and that in effect if the product is delivered as originally agreed upon, no interest is paid, as is apparent in the first part of the clause

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I was sorry to see the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) leave because I had the notion, when one of my colleagues was making a few comments, that he would explain this bill, if that is possible. I am surprised that none of the western members have indicated that this bill may be a bill to provide cash payments for rapeseed because it was not possible to do it in any other way. That might be what this bill is all about. If it is, then the Minister of Transport could probably tell us that better than the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan).

Mr. Whelan: Why?

Mr. Peters: The minister asks why. I am sure there has been some monkey business in the past about rapeseed. Perhaps there is a wish to provide for cash payments and this is really in the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board rather than the Department of Agriculture. Possibly it could be explained in that way.

I am sorry that the Minister of Agriculture has not referred this to the farm organizations so that there would be some feed-back.

Mr. Whelan: It is a false statement to say that they did not know anything about it.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister's comments. I have been a little worried about the Canadian Press representative in the gallery because, after seeing the bill and having listened to the minister and the remarks made by members of the opposition, I am sure he would have one hell of a time writing about the bill. This is either the most complicated or the most simple legislation we have had. It either does not say anything or it says everything.

If we are talking about grain crops we are talking about growing crops, we are talking about much of agriculture in this country in which over-production is easy. Perhaps we are talking about a food bank in which to hold the crops produced in the current year so that the producer will be able to continue in business in the coming year. This may be the beginning of such a program. If so, it is over-simplified and is not the kind of legislation that would allow the kind of impetus that would make this possible.

I think the minister will agree, because of the remarks he made at the World Food Conference in Rome, that we are prepared to over-produce in this country if markets are provided on a long-term basis, or if we produce for an export market in commodities where there is a world need. But we will not accomplish that through a cash advance program. We will have to establish a granary operated by the government in which the farmers would be able to place their crops, and then the nation as a whole would be in a position to carry out the kind of commitment Canada would be making toward a world food bank.

I find that one section of the bill eliminates cash advances for those crops under the Canadian Wheat Board which would have been excluded in any case and which are covered under other legislation. It is indicated that the crops concerned are grains, oil seeds, root crops and other field grown crops that are prescribed. I have not heard any farm organization, apart from rapeseed producers, asking for cash advances. I have not even heard producers of potatoes, who have been in trouble for many years in the Maritimes and in parts of Ontario, asking for a cash advance.

There is a season when potatoes are sold and the producers want a reasonable return on their product. They must either be sold in the crop year or disposed of for uses other than table use, or else a cash advance would be of no great advantage. Where it would be of advantage is on those commodities that can be stored beyond the normal sales period. Many of them can be held for considerably less than 12 months. For those crops that can be held longer than that, cash advances would make sense because they would permit the farmer to prepare for the next year's crop without having received the full return for the previous crop. That was the reason for cash advances being paid in western Canada in the years when wheat sales were almost nonexistent. The cash advance was paid so as to provide the farmer with enough money to produce the second crop. In all cases we wrote in protection which allowed the Wheat Board to collect the advance when the sales were made, and if the sales were not made in the second year, then the cash advance could be paid out again on the second crop. This could go on for several years, as has been the case on a number of occasions.

I can see the advantages of this bill with respect to rapeseed and other oil seeds in western Canada which come under the Wheat Board. I do not know why efforts have been made to put these commodities in the same position as grain under the Canadian Wheat Board. It may be that Ontario has specific problems in the same field which would warrant cash advances. But it seems to me that cash advances are being offered to farmers who are not in a position to take advantage of them. It is mentioned that these farmers must form an organization, but the word organization is so undefined that one does not know whether it involves a marketing agency. Is a marketing agency going to take possession of the stock, and is the minister really thinking of bringing in another bill? I certainly hope he is thinking of bringing in a bill which would enable farmers to store crops against future deliveries.

It seems to me that whether we make an advance to a farm unit or to an organization, we are really talking about crops that can be stored from one year to another, crops which in times of abundance can be stored in a granary for future consumption not only by Canadian consumers but also for world consumption. This would even out the ups and downs which take place in various countries because of unpredictable weather conditions. There may well come a day when many of our crops will have to be stored, not so as to gain a higher price but so as to provide for the hungry people of the world. Canada can play a role in such a situation.

If we reach a degree of sophistication which will allow us to provide a guaranteed supply for international consumption, we was that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) saw fit to pay an indirect tribute to my right hon. friend from Prince Albert by saying that the advance payments policy went back to the year 1958 when my right hon. friend was Prime Minister of Canada. Now, 18 years later, the Minister of Agriculture is still hanging on to the coat-tails of the Prime Minister of that day, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), proving the worth of a policy which has stood the industry in good stead over the years.

The problem is that the Minister of Agriculture does not seem able to perceive the depth of the policy which the then Prime Minister, the right hon. member for Prince Albert, was seeking to implement. The government of that day brought in this policy in an effort to alleviate the plight of farmers in those years because of the indiscretions of the previous Liberal administration. Advance payments, however good the scheme may be, do not take the place of good, sound policies of administration involving trade, etc.

I was somewhat concerned this afternoon to hear the Minister of Agriculture, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave), say he was referring to supply-management as implemented by the President of the United States. I was wondering whether this devious Minister of Agriculture was trying to implement further control over agriculture in Canada through the presentation of this legislation.

Mr. Whelan: R. B. Bennett was accused of doing that when he started the Wheat Board.

Mr. Towers: It is a good job there is a Conservative government every few years to bring in and put in place policies which will stand the industry in good stead. The hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise) mentioned the fact that the bill has come to us without notes or explanation. This concerns me because, if one turns to the back page, one finds that the whole bill appears to be tied up in regulations. Why cannot these regulations be spelled out in the legislation itself rather than being left to the Minister of Agriculture and the governor in council?

There will be a great requirement for adequate administration if this program is to work. I am reminded of a story I read long ago. I believe it was in "Uncle Tom's Cabin", one of the slaves had to weigh his cotton at the end of the day's work and, if his cotton did not weigh up, he did not receive his rations. I fear that this is what the Minister of Agriculture will do by regulation, that is, he will demand that there be producer marketing boards or producer groups in control of the producer if the producer is to qualify for any payment.

Reference was made to the Canadian Wheat Board and to the distribution of advance payments through that medium. The key to the success of that program is the permit book. I would warn all producers who become involved in this program to ensure they do not lose any of the freedom which they are justly proud of at the present time. They will have to exercise a great deal of good judgment when they enter this program because, as good as the program may be, all commodities do not fall into the same category as grain. I think, for instance, of the man in Prince Edward Island who two years ago had to destroy his whole crop because he could not find a market for it.

What happens to the producer if he has taken the advance payment and does not find a market for his produce? This is the reason I say there must be regulations spelled out to deal with situations and circumstances which are bound to arise because there is such a differential between the movement and sale of grain and the movement and sale of other perishable farm products.

The hon. member for Elgin referred to the situation when the repayment is made in the form of cash rather than through the sale of produce. From my reading of the bill, if a producer decides to make the repayment in cash rather than in produce he would not have to pay interest on the first $500 or 10 per cent of the advance payment. I ask why the producer of perishable and other farm produce should be treated differently than the grain producer? In last year's Bill C-10, which was brought in by the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, it is particularly spelled out that the producer and each such shareholder, partner or member, jointly and severally guarantee repayment of the full amount in default, together with interest thereon at the appropriate prescribed rate per annum from the date of the making of the advance payment, in the event of a default by the actual producer. There would seem to be an inconsistency here. I do not know the reason for it.

Perhaps the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board and the Minister of Agriculture are still not communicating in an effort to bring in policies that are consistent. For the life of me I cannot understand why there should be a differential here. Therefore I believe there will have to be a fair amount of dialogue in respect to this bill prior to its passage.

The government really is not guaranteeing that there will be an adequate price for the product when it is sold. It would be far better if the producer did not have to rely on advance payments. He would be better off if he could finance his operation alone. It would be far better if the government would provide for reasonable markets and a reasonable return.

The Minister of Agriculture seems to be an inward rather than an outward-looking Minister of Agriculture in regard to attempting to provide markets for agricultural products. I have reservations about the benefit of this legislation because it seems the only benefit that will accrue to the producer is the fact that he will not have to pay interest on the advance. That is what it amounts to, Mr. Speaker.

While this legislation may help some producers, and I do not deny that, it does not take the place of an adequate marketing system whereby the producer is ensured a fair price and a fair market for his produce. Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the opportunity to be heard in this debate. I look forward to an opportunity to debate the bill in committee.

To conclude these brief remarks, Mr. Speaker, I want to indicate my party's support for the intent of this legislation, though I have many reservations, only a few of which I have had the opportunity to mention. I am certain many others will be advanced by my colleagues who are to follow me in this debate. But let me signal to the government and the minister that this bill will not clear committee stage as far as we are concerned until we have had ample opportunity for consultation with and input from farm groups and farm organizations, and from those producers who have no representation at all. If the government refuses to consult, then we in this party must ensure that those consultations and input do in fact take place.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a few brief remarks on the bill before the House today. The first thing I want to do is to agree with the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise) that the bill as drafted is rather complicated and fails to answer a lot of questions. Once we get to the committee stage we may be able to get some of the answers from the minister and make final judgment.

The other thing that I wanted to emphasize, Mr. Speaker, and the hon. member for Elgin has already talked about it, is that the minister should consult more closely with the farm organizations. It seems to me this is a very important part of governing people—seeking consensus from various organizations relative to one's portfolio. It seems to me the knowledge farm organizations have of this bill at the moment is not very great.

As far as the bill itself is concerned, we support the principle, the intent of the bill to make cash advances available to more farmers for more products. It is something that we in this party have talked about for many years as likely to be of some help to a number of farmers in Canada who are not eligible under the present cash advance program which is restricted to the Wheat Board area in western Canada. There are a couple of things, though, that I do have some concern about after looking at the bill very quickly.

I notice there is a ceiling limiting to $15,000 cash advances to any one person or operator. I understand the maximum number of people working in a unit can be three, which means that in some cases larger co-operative farms would be excluded from this legislation because, as I understand it, they only qualify for a cash advance when not more than three people are participating in the operation of a co-operative farm. Now there might be six or seven families participating in the running of a farm and it seems to me this is one of the areas we should examine in committee to see whether or not we might amend that clause in the bill.

The other question that occurs to me is whether or not the cash advances pertain to corporations, to companies such as Heinz, which might be involved in a certain aspect of farming. Would they qualify for an interest-free cash advance when they really do not need one? Or is the scheme limited to the ordinary producer, the ordinary family farmer? These are some of the things that cross my mind as I take a quick look at the bill.

The other point I wanted to make is that a bill such as the one before us today, albeit it is going in the right direction, is by no means the answer to the problems farmers face. Many people say: "Well, things are very good; out in the prairies the price of grain is very high; farmers are doing well; they do not have many problems." But farm income historically goes up and down like a yo-yo. It is about time the government brought in more adequate farm income stabilization programs covering not just prairie grains or certain crops in Ontario but all farm products in this country so that farmers would enjoy support and stability of income. In this way more people would be staying on the land and there would be greater production of food in this country. All we need to do is look at the statistics concerning farmers leaving the land.

Farmers are still leaving the land at a very alarming rate and we are not going to keep them on the land just through an expansion of the cash advance program. What we need is a farm income stability program. We could use the model in British Columbia as one very good example brought in by the provincial NDP government. That is something that could be copied here in Ottawa at the federal level.

If the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) really wants to keep farmers on the land he has to resolve some of the other problems such as the problem presently afflicting cow-calf operators. The federal government should be paying a lot more attention to this problem and coming forth with a program costing tens of millions of dollars to support cow-calf operators, to fill some of the gaps in some of the provincial programs that are already in existence. That is one way of helping the ordinary farmer in this country.

Another point, and I know the minster shares my views on this, is that we should be looking at the feasibility of a national marketing agency forecast to help the cow-calf operator, to give him some security and some collective process in the market place. These are things we have to look at in the long term if we really want to help the food producer in Canada. Cash advances are only a very small part of helping producers. If we want to help the farmers, we have to keep them on the land, and we will keep them on the land by guaranteeing them an income. If we fail to do this farms are going to be larger and larger and agro-business will become more and more powerful. In the long run this will hurt not only the small rural community but it will hurt the consumer in the price he pays for food at the receiving end.

Rather than go on at length at this time I should like to hear some more spokespeople from the Liberal side, perhaps the minister responsible for the Wheat Board, answering some of the questions that have been raised, before participating at the committee level in terms of asking precise questions about the way in which this bill would apply to the various produce groups across Canada.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate on Bill C-2 let me say how pleased I application. It appears on the surface, at least, to extend to some degree a similar program presently in operation, for example in the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board, to the producers of farm stored crops throughout the rest of Canada.

However, in no way does this bill extend the advance payment program to all producers. For example, producers of most, if not all fruit crops, and the producers of most vegetable crops will not be covered. Nowhere in this bill do I see any opportunity for them to be included.

Mr. Whelan: Why won't they be included? Even tobacco growers are.

Mr. Wise: The minister asks why they won't be included and mentions tobacco. I cannot for the life of me see how in the world producers of flue-cured tobacco would ever take advantage of this bill. However, that remains to be seen and I shall be anxious to get their comments on it.

The throne speech made some mention of the government's intention to communicate with farm organizations and farm groups. We on this side of the House, particularly in this party, have always maintained that consultation on agricultural legislation with farm groups and farm organizations is of paramount importance, indeed essential. In my discussions with farm organizations yesterday and today none of them indicated that they had even possessed a copy of this bill. In reality, Mr. Speaker, the government does not discuss. It pretends to discuss, and in fact continues to ignore.

Not having had an adequate opportunity to review this bill, and not having had an opportunity of seeking the views and advice of producers, we are at this time unable to uncover many of its shortcomings. However, some questions are obvious; for example, the definition of an organization. For many crops, perhaps a hundred or so across the country, there is in one form or another a marketing board, a marketing agency or a marketing commission. On the other hand, none of these exist for other crops. Producers of grain corn are a case in point. Will the corn council constitute an organization and meet the requirements of the act to qualify, if, of course, the corn producers wish to participate?

What in the eyes of the government will in fact constitute an organization? Will producers who for some reason or other do not have a so-called organization be excluded? Another example is the definition of a producer. Who will constitute a bona fide producer? Will he or she be obligated to produce a certain volume of produce, or will that produce have to have a certain dollar value to qualify?

Another section of the bill that concerns me is clause 5, which provides:

> The Minister may give a guarantee to an organization under this Act only if
> (a) he is satisfied that the producers to whom the organization proposes to make advances have produced a significant portion of the crop in question in the area represented by that organization, and that the making of those advances will facilitate the orderly marketing of that crop in that area;—

This provision would make one wonder whether, if in the opinion of the minister certain market or other conditions did not exist, any advance payment would be made available to the producers. It also seems to indicate that producers in certain areas may not in fact be eligible for the scheme. I asked an official in the Department of Agriculture, in the particular division that I would expect to administer this bill, who is going to finance the interest charges? His reply to me was, "The government". Clause 7 indicates that only a partial exemption of interest payments would be permitted by the government, namely, interest on the first $500 or 10 per cent of the advance, whichever is the lesser. This really means a maximum of $500. I see the minister in charge of the Wheat Board shaking his head so perhaps we will hear some clarification from him or other members of his party.

Mr. Lang: There is a total exemption.

Mr. Wise: So far as those producers under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board are concerned, when it comes to advance payments the interest charges are in fact picked up. This particular bill, as I read it, provides at the present time that only a portion of the interest charges will be picked up to a maximum of $500.

Mr. Lang: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Wise: Normally I would, Mr. Speaker, but I have only a few brief remarks to make and I am quite certain the minister will pose his question later. Let me just say that if that is the case, then this bill really discriminates against the producers.

Mr. Whelan: It is not the case and I said it was not.

Mr. Wise: Well, the minister will clarify the situation at the end and this will resolve our difficulties. However, it appears from reading the bill, and it appears to the farm organizations and farm agencies involved, that the bill is discriminatory in nature since it does not provide the same benefits and assistance to producers outside the jurisdiction of the Wheat Board.

Mr. Lang: That is wrong. Do not mislead.

Mr. Wise: These are a few questions which come to light immediately. My colleagues and I will be raising many others during this debate and also in committee. Given the experiences of the past, when the government operates or offers a plan, be it to farmers or to other sectors of our society, this in itself is reason for caution and concern. We intend to question the amount of financial assistance, both the total and the maximum amount given individuals and partnerships. This must be done to assess fairly this program's usefulness and effectiveness.

We are concerned as well, Mr. Speaker, again because of experience, about delays in making the advance payments themselves. When the government says that payments will be made soon, this provides small comfort or satisfaction to producers. Ask the producers who have yet to receive payment for livestock losses under Bill C-28. Payments to Ontario wheat producers are always late, usually long overdue.

ducer organization applying for a cash advance represents a significant portion of the crop for the area in question. On this point my department will take appropriate measures to guarantee that such organizations do, in fact, represent a significant portion of the crop in that area. The organization must also indicate that making such advance payments will facilitate orderly marketing of that crop.

It must also satisfy the government that it will repay the money borrowed to make advance payments. The act covers all the possibilities of producer default, but the experience of the Prairie Grain Advance Program indicated that there is a very small percentage of producers who ever default on the advance payments.

In the case of producers the portion of the crop on which an advance payment is made is to be stored by the producer, either on his own premises, on another farm or commercially, providing the grain is stored in his own name. A producer cannot receive an advance if he is in arrears or in default for a previous advance.

Applications for advance payments must be made before a set date and must include all relevant information as required by the act. The maximum amount advanced in any crop year to one producer eligible under the act is $15,000. Multifarmer units can receive a maximum of $30,000 or $45,000, depending on the number of parties involved. These levels have been established similarly to those under Prairie Grain Advance Payments.

Yet in all cases the amount of an advance payment possible under this act cannot exceed one half of the unit market price payable for that crop in that crop year. For example, if Ontario wheat is selling at $3.50 a bushel, and I use this only to show what we will be lending, then the payment can be up to $1.75 a bushel in the first year.

The logic behind Bill C-2 is not new for Canadian agriculture. The act would ease the cash flow to farmers of storable crops when they need it most. However, there are many other similar programs in agriculture which provide stability to farmers.

In addition to the Prairie Grain Advance Payment Act, mentioned previously, we also have the Western Grain Stabilization Act which helps to protect western grain farmers from large, unexpected declines in returns from the production and sale of their grain. Such drops in the market are caused by factors beyond the control of both the farmer and the government.

Furthermore, the Farm Credit Corporation makes available large amounts of money to producers to assist them in establishing and developing sound farm enterprises. The Agricultural Stabilization Act provides a miminum support level for named commodities under the act at 90 per cent of the previous five-year average. In addition, other commodities can be designated for support if the need arises.

We also have a Crop Insurance Act which provides Canadian producers with insurance in the case of crop damage or failure. Most farmers use this program every year. The Agricultural Product Co-operative Marketing Act is designed to encourage and protect co-operative marketing of Canadian agricultural commodities.

All these measures are meant to help farmers cope with the many risks and uncertainties of agricultural production. However, consumers as well benefit from these various programs because the market will be supplied in a much more orderly fashion.

In Bill C-2, by providing Canadian producers of storable crops with a way to ease their cash flow problems, the government is stabilizing crop production levels. This in turn will ensure year-round availability of Canadian food products at reasonable costs to Canadian consumers.

Instead of having to depend on imported food products, we will assist Canadian producers by providing controlled atmospheric temperature storage where it will be possible to store fresh vegetables as long as eight months. This will enable us to supply many of the commodities it is now necessary to import.

A good example of this is cabbage. According to research conducted in my department over a period of years, cabbage that has been stored for several months is in as good a condition or better when removed from storage. This is also true of potatoes, several million dollars worth of which have been stored in the last two years. The province of British Columbia has used the largest share of money available for this; however, other provinces are now participating in this program.

Up to this time it has been necessary to borrow the money required to finance this operation until the commodities have been sold. When this bill becomes law, producers of storable crops will have the same type of program that has been available to western farmers under the Canadian Wheat Board Act. This is a step forward, something I have been promising for some time. It will be beneficial to many farmers in all parts of Canada, as well as Canadian consumers who will be able to purchase these Canadian products. Therefore I strongly urge my colleagues in the House to support Bill C-2, and I trust that it will receive approval and speedy passage in the House.

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, in responding to, or perhaps more accurately participating in, the debate on Bill C-2, I feel obligated once again to mention the fact that the bill, which provides for advance payment for crops, is the only piece of agricultural legislation referred to in the Speech from the Throne. It is another indication that the government cares less about the building or maintaining of a strong agricultural industry in this country. The title of this bill should more accurately read, "advance payments with limitations to only some farm stored crops".

Bill C-2 is the latest example of the government's action to provide more piecemeal legislation to another sector of agriculture. It is an open admission that the government is totally lacking an over-all agricultural policy. On reviewing the bill it is obvious that it is poorly drafted. There are no explanatory notes, and no one seems to know much about it, particularly its and 3 of question No. 22, would the hon. member please see the answer given on October 26 last to question No. 21.

ADVANCE PAYMENTS FOR CROPS ACT

MEASURE TO FACILITATE MAKING ADVANCE PAYMENTS FOR CROPS

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture) moved that Bill C-2, to facilitate the making of advance payments for crops, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have promised for some time to bring in a program that would help relieve financial pressure on producers of storable crops in Canada. Bill C-2 was written with that purpose in mind.

Advance Payments for Crops

Since 1958 producers of wheat, oats and barley in the Canadian Wheat Board designated area have been able to receive advance payments under the provisions of the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. The program has worked very well and western grain farmers have benefited greatly. The act has improved the cash flow to grain farmers particularly after the critical harvest period and when low Canadian Wheat Board quotas restricted deliveries. Western grain farmers face delivery restrictions after harvest, but they have the benefit of the PGAP program under which they can receive interest-free advance payments on undelivered grain.

Wheat, oats and barley sold to the Canadian Wheat Board in its designated area are the only three crops in Canada for which this privilege is extended. Yet all other grain producers and producers of storable crops face the same market glut and storage problems that hit western grain farmers during the post-harvest period. Most storable crops produced in Canada are not subject to the marketing quota controls and price pooling schemes available for wheat, oats and barley. As a result, markets for these crops are often depressed, particularly during the months immediately following harvest.

Producers have incurred most of their total production costs by harvest time and they must then find money to pay off their debts. Often they will rush to sell just enough of their crop to cover their production costs. Accordingly, market congestion or depressed prices result, and a lot of people count on it. This can needlessly depress returns to farmers during this period. In addition it can result in loss of efficiency in marketing and loss of profitability. This is why producers of storable crops, including producers of wheat, oats and barley in regions other than the Canadian Wheat Board designated area have requested a similar opportunity of receiving interest-free advances.

The objective of the Advance Payments for Crops Act, known as Bill C-2, is designed to extend the existing program for wheat, oats and barley in the Canadian Wheat Board designated area, to all other storable crops such as Ontario wheat, white beans, tree fruits, cole and root crops, tobacco, soybeans, horticultural crops, et cetera, in the rest of Canada including those in the wheat board designated area.

The act will provide the legislative authority for the federal government to guarantee the repayment of advance payments on storable crops. In addition it will guarantee the interest on such advance payments when they are made in accordance with the provisions of the act.

The government proposes in Bill C-2 that, where a producer organization intends to make an advance payment to a producer out of money borrowed from a bank for that purpose, the government will guarantee repayment of the advances, including the interest being charged. In case of producer defaults, we would not be liable for more than one half the price of applicable crops.

The grain and special crops division in my department will administer the act. In order to receive a guarantee from the government, my department must be satisfied that the pro-

DISPOSAL OF GOVERNMENT PRINTED MATERIAL

Question No. 39—Mr. Cossitt:

Since January 1, 1974, did the Department of Supply and Services authorize the destruction or disposal of government printed material and, if so, in each case (a) what was its nature (b) for what reason was it destroyed or disposed of (c) what was the quantity destroyed or disposed of (d) what was the cost to the taxpayer (e) what was the total value of such material?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Prior to March 2, 1976, the publishing functions for the Federal Government were the responsibility of Information Canada. Since March 2, these functions have been integrated into the Department of Supply and Services. (a) and (b) Publications which have become outdated, redundant or spoiled and which were initially produced on behalf of customer departments. No record is kept of the quantity or value of destroyed printed materials as a result of normal operating procedures. (c) No quantity figures are kept on destroyed printed material. It should be noted, however, that all destruction and disposal of printed material on the part of the Publishing Centre was, and will continue to be effected in accordance with Treasury Board authority 667239, April 6, 1976, Section I, Article 68 and Section II, Article 34; the Auditor General's representative is notified in advance of all impending actions to destroy. (d) $52,402; (e) $52,402.

NOTE: Records indicate that Information Canada destroyed $160,708 of printed material from January 1, 1974 to March 1, 1976.

*PRIVATE RAILWAY CARS

Question No. 22—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answer to Question No. 4,777 of the First Session of the 30th Parliament, which stated in part that the Minister of Transport travelled at public expense by private railway car from Ottawa to Saskatoon from August 20 to 24, 1974 and from Ottawa to Regina from August 27 to September 1, 1975 and that the purpose of the trips are unknown since the Minister made the trips in question, what are the reasons justifying the answer, on his behalf, stating the purpose as unknown?

2. Will the Minister make public (a) the purpose of each trip (b) the names of all others on board at any time (c) the number of miles travelled and the cost involved at the stated price of $1.95 per mile (d) any stops made by the Minister en route and the purpose in each case (e) the number of personnel on duty to operate the services in the cars?

3. Will the Minister make public this information and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Allan. J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, this has been quite a week for the House of Commons, and quite a week for Quebec.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And quite a week for the Liberal party too.

Mr. MacEachen: Again I have to confess to mixed emotions in bidding farewell to a friend and colleague who has been in this House for almost 15 years. During that time we have fought together in many political wars. I can only admire his grit and tenacity in marching off to yet another battle.

The hon. member has forged for himself a special place in this Chamber, and, indeed, in the minds of individual Canadians across this country. He is a politician of tremendous heart and eloquence, as befits his Irish ancestry. In the finest sense of the word, he is a populist politician whose primary dedication has always been for the welfare of those who, for one reason or another, may be less able than others to enjoy the full benefits of life in this country.

The hon. member has also been in the vanguard of another cause which he has articulated in this House and outside consistently throughout the years, that of unity and understanding in our country. It is a cause he has fought for with the emotion of a true believer, and it is this belief which is now taking him from Ottawa back to his native province.

All of us in the House will miss him. We will miss his participation in debates, and the House itself will be much poorer for the loss of this fighting Irishman from Verdun. We, on this side of the House, wish him great success in the forthcoming campaign, and I want to wish him an early return back to the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this point of order not as a member of a party but as the only Independent member in the House of Commons. Being independent I can speak frankly, because I do not belong to any party which is represented in the place where the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) is going to do battle. I have learned to respect this man greatly, and have had excellent rapport with the hon. member for Verdun. I bring him the best wishes of the people of Moncton, one of his former home towns, or at least a former home town of the Mackaseys, his parents. I recall the occasion when he answered my first question in the House of Commons, about two years ago. It so happened that I did not hear him, and read his answer in Hansard, where the interpretation put on what he said was "soon." May God bless him.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps I may be allowed to add a personal word of tribute on the retirement of this very senior and distinguished member of the House of Commons who has served his country faithfully for some 15 years.

It is difficult to add anything to the eloquent tributes paid so glowingly to the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey). If any one thing may be said to characterize his performance in public life, it is this: despite his ascendancy to a position of great power he never forgot the common man with whom he had worked while he was rising to heights of power. He never forgot the kind of people who had elected him to the House of Commons. His touch in that respect carried him to great performances, particularly in two of the four important portfolios he held with such distinction.

As minister of labour, when there was great labour strife, he displayed his remarkable touch with the rank and file and organizations involved; he repeated that performance when he was postmaster general, when similar kinds of difficulties arose. As long as his touch with the common man permeates his work, all of us will continue to benefit from his distinguished service. I am sure we all wish him well.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

[English]

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 39, 136, 286, 291 and 639.

all concerned to see one Canada, united from one end of the country to the other.

An hon. Member: With the exception of '68, Bryce.

Mr. Mackasey: There are exceptions to what I am saying. There is bound to be the odd separatist in this House, and I am sorry. I want to say that I do believe we can have a country where each other's language is respected, regardless of what it is. I intend to fight for the minorities in Quebec, and I hope that all members of the House will fight equally as hard for the minorities in New Brunswick, Ontario, Manitoba and elsewhere.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to this point of order I must note a certain irony: it took the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) almost as long to make his announcement as it did for him to take his decision. My colleagues on this side of the House wonder what we are getting into when every second day we have to stand up and bid farewell to another former minister of the government.

I should say, Mr. Speaker, that while there have often been disagreements with the hon. member for Verdun, particularly when he served in ministerial capacity and while he engaged in a lively form of debate in this House of Commons, we all very much enjoyed his presence and his contributions to the debates of this House and to the government of the country. I think it is fair to say that on this side of the House we had a particular regard for the fact that the hon. member for Verdun always stood out from his colleagues as a minister who had a particular interest in the ordinary citizens of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I am sure that that quality will continue to stand him in good stead. We naturally will not intrude in the decision to be made in the province of Quebec in the impending election. I think I can speak for my party and the House, however, and say that we will watch the progress of the hon. member for Verdun with interest and we will miss his presence here in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party I am happy to join in these words of farewell to our good friend, the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey). I have noticed during the years that the appellation we like to use for persons for whom we have a great deal of respect is "a House of Commons man". We can say that of the hon. member for Verdun, and I am happy to do so. His debating style has been most interesting. Many of us have had the experience of hearing him speak in strong support of something that we stood for, and we have had the experience a few days later of hearing him tear us apart.

Mr. Goodale: He was right both times.

[Mr. Mackasey.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Goodale) kept quiet yesterday. I think he should—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Goodale: My answer to that is no.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member should be careful not to say no when we are saying kind things about the hon. member for Verdun.

Perhaps I could note that the hon. member came here first in an election that was held on my birthday in 1962. There must have been something in the stars. During these years he has been a very active private member; he has been a parliamentary secretary, and he has been a cabinet minister holding four different portfolios. Now that he is leaving and we cannot do him any harm in his party I do not mind saying that we in this party felt there were times when in him we had a little bit of a voice in the Liberal cabinet.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): One must not feel he has to explain what he says but I did not mean we told him what to say. He had a labour or a peoples point of view, of which there is far too little in that cabinet of millionaires.

So, Mr. Speaker, we shall long remember the hon. member for Verdun and his contribution to the work of this House. We look forward to his participation in the campaign he is entering, and certainly welcome the balanced emphasis he is trying to make. On behalf of my colleagues I wish him the very best.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Social Credit Party of Canada and its members, I echo the words just spoken by the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey). I heard him last night on television and once again I noticed his straightforward speech, which I always enjoy. To my mind, he has left his stamp on the House of Commons just as he probably will tomorrow in Quebec.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the province of Quebec has need of such men as he, who can speak frankly, without dodging the issues. I feel the province of Quebec has need of men of experience who, as I said a moment ago, will speak frankly and, with Irish blood in their veins, for Irish blood never cools down. I have several Irishmen in my riding and in order to respect the truth they often choose to give up their place to others.

We of the Social Credit Party at the federal level—the same does not go for the Ralliement des créditistes at the provincial level—wish considerable success to the hon. member for Verdun. We noticed that our discussions with him were open, honest: when we needed him when he held portfolios in the House of Commons, his replies were always prompt, energetic and above all pleasing to my constituents.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I certainly do not want to delay this any longer.

Some hon. Members: Then don't; sit down.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: However, I did want to raise a novel point as a result of the remarks made by the government House leader and by the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway (Mrs. Holt). I think the position stated by the government House leader and by the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway is that the opposition somehow caused its own difficulties in losing the question period yesterday.

Mr. Speaker, you know that it has been the practice in this House for you—and today was a good example when you recognized no less than, I think, three backbenchers of the government party, if not more, and one for a motion under Standing Order 43—to recognize that each backbencher, on whatever side of the House, should be entitled to ask questions. In view of the admission made by the government House leader that the opposition has rights with respect to the question period—and I am sure that is unanimous—and in view of the refusal on the part of backbenchers on the government side to allow us to proceed with the question period yesterday, I would think that Your Honour would want to consider, among other things, in future refusing to allow government backbenchers to ask questions during the question period. They obviously do not want to support the question period.

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your position on this question, and I want to be brief and refer only to the procedural aspect of the question.

The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) has treated us to an interesting excursus on what might be called the legislative history of the rule if we were dealing with a statute. I suppose we can refer to it merely as the history of the rule. The fact is that in our tradition of interpretation such history is not relevant when we are confronted with a rule which covers a situation. How the rule came to be there is not a point which is relevant. It is only a question of what the rule means, and even if we admit that the legislative history is relevant, none of the quotations which were given to us by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton indicate that the committee had in mind this particular problem. It is clearly an unusual problem, one which was not in the mind of the committee when it deliberated on its rules, and nothing the hon. member read or said covered the situation at all.

In other words, there is a complete gap, and again we are in a situation where we have a rule which was adopted and which covers the situation exactly. The interpretation may not be palatable to members of the opposition, but the fact is that the rule covers the situation, and I submit that in such a case Your Honour has no choice but to follow the clear meaning of the rule.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, I sincerely believe that we have heard enough on this subject. Could there not be unanimous consent that this matter be referred to the appropriate committee now and that this stupid debate be halted?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Whether in the form of a reference by unanimous consent or a request, I certainly have asked that the matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, and I am sure that that standing committee will reflect on the question.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

RESIGNATION OF MEMBER FOR VERDUN

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, in rising on a point of order I am conscious that I am infringing on the time of the House and I appreciate its indulgence. I am rather flattered that the House has taken an hour and a half to delay my resignation from the House of Commons. I am not sure of the reason, of course.

Mr. Prud'homme: We like you.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: This House is a House of debate and the debate just concluded was so spirited that I have almost changed my mind and might possibly reconsider my decision.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: I just want to say very briefly, Mr. Speaker, that I wish to thank you for the courtesy that has been extended to me for 15 years by the Chair. Sometimes it required a great deal of patience on your part. I want to apologize to any enemies I may have made because of my particular type of debating, and I want to say that I am conscious I am leaving the highest court in Canada. As I listened to the excellent debaters from all parties I have been aware that there have been some very great debaters in the 15 years I have been in this House, not the least of whom have been the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) who was the former leader of the New Democratic Party, the present House leaders and, of course, the great Mr. Pearson, and the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

I am not going very far, Mr. Speaker, but to another arena to continue showing something that has been important to me in my 15 years here, and that is, concern for national unity in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: I know that I speak for all members of the House of Commons without exception when I say that we are

S.O. 43

So far as Standing Order 43 is concerned, it has become completely emasculated as a result of governmental action.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: No matter what the motion has been, with one or two exceptions there has always been that chorus of noes. Now today, the government finding itself embarrassed by what happened yesterday—

Mrs. Holt: It is you who are embarrassed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —instead of admitting its mistake, instead of being clad in sackcloth and ashes, politically speaking, decided to put the blame on the opposition. Imagine members of this government condemning the opposition for its failure to live up to true parliamentary procedure when the government itself has been the prime reason for the degradation of this House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: It could never have been anticipated that a situation such as this would arise, and it is as the result of experience that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton has raised this question. If the rule is allowed to stay in its present form, whenever a motion is put to the House under Standing Order 43 and a vote takes place, the government can keep its members out and thus deny us the opportunity to have a question period.

● (1530)

As a result of the experience of yesterday I think a very decided improvement can be made to make Standing Order 43 uphold parliament rather than undermine it. I do not think what happened yesterday will ever happen again because apparently in the intervening 24 hours the Liberal members got together, and they all with one accord today said no. They are taking no chances any more, and I do not think this question will ever arise again.

However, I do point out the tremendous danger there is to this institution if the correctness of the ruling you made yesterday, Mr. Speaker, is upheld as it should be on the basis of the rules as they are, for it will mean that any time the government decides it wants to do away with our hour, or whatever period it is for the question period, it will simply allow a vote to take place; the Liberal members will not come in, the hour will be gone, and we will be denied almost the only surviving right members of the opposition have in parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I am going to ask the co-operation of hon. members. There has been a rather full discussion on what is essentially a very straightforward question of procedure. I will not fail to recognize hon. members who want to participate in the discussion, but it is, after all, a procedural matter. To this point it has been given a rather exhaustive treatment. Unless hon. members have a new and different point to raise which might bear on the deliberations of the committee on this question, I ask them to refrain from further discussion in order that we can get on to other matters.

Mrs. Holt: Mr. Speaker, I gather you are anxious to cut this debate short, but I feel that there has been a reflection on many of us with regard to the voting yesterday. It has been said that we are contributing to the degradation of the House, and that requires an answer. The events of yesterday are relevant to the principle of this debate. Hon. members opposite were the authors of their own misfortune, and today they are paying for it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Holt: But what upsets me—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Holt: I have the right to speak in this House; I was elected to this House, as were all of you.

I am very concerned. Yesterday hon. members opposite yelled at some of us asking, "What about widows and orphans?" That is the type of fakery which went on in this House yesterday, and I object to that. I am a responsible member who cares about all widows and orphans, but not exclusively—

Some hon. Members: How did you vote?

Mrs. Holt: —not exclusively the widows and orphans of public servants, not to make them into a special class with 100 per cent pension. They are now highly paid. I care about the widows of teachers, laborers, clerks, and hon. members opposite were trying to indicate that I do not care, that we do not care.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are a number of difficulties with regard to casting reflections on what took place yesterday. One of the most serious dangers is that of raising the subject in debate. The motion was before the House yesterday for decision. It could have been debated at that time. One of the things I am not going to do is permit a re-opening of the debate on that motion. That could have taken place yesterday. If there is a further contribution to be made with regard to the procedural decision, I will welcome it; otherwise, I ask hon. members to let us get on to another subject.

Mrs. Holt: I just maintain that it is relevant to the debate, and because of what they created themselves hon. members opposite want to change the rules of this House. They were the authors of their own destiny, and now they weep. If they have a complaint, they should look into a mirror and see who caused the situation whereby the question period was lost.

Hon. members on this side of the House are not the ones who are degrading the affairs of the House. We care about Canada. The degradation is their own doing. Hon. members opposite seem to think that we should play games here, and I resent that. I do not have enough time in my life to waste on that sort of activity.

should be stated clearly that his contention that it was the fault of the opposition that a vote was taken yesterday is completely false.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): When the yeas and nays were called, it was clear that the yeas had it and it was so ruled from the Chair. There was a recorded vote only because the Liberal members stood and asked for it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As for the challenge that I received from the President of the Privy Council on whether there was urgency to the motion that I moved yesterday, I suggest that the position of widows on 50 per cent pensions is always urgent, but it was made particularly urgent by a speech made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) the day before in which he proclaimed that the government was doing all sorts of things to establish equality between men and women. I felt that if that position was going to be taken, it was time to carry it all the way and to provide for equal treatment for widows on pensions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I appreciate and welcome the response that you made to the case that was presented by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. I think we are agreed that the question period should start at 2.15 p.m. and end at 3 p.m., and therefore that if a motion under Standing Order 43 is going to be debated or voted upon, it should be put over until some later time. I was a little concerned when Your Honour said that if the matter were under debate, that debate would have to end at 2.15. But later you chose different words and suggested that it should be interrupted at that point. It seems to me that under the rules a motion that is allowed is one that can be debated according to the rules of the House, and to say that an interruption at 2.15 means an indefinite postponement of that debate would, I think, be a mistake.

I believe there was sheer logic in the indication of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton that when a motion is proposed under Standing Order 43 and it is proposed prior to 2.15, if it is under debate or under a vote at 2.15 it should simply be postponed until the question period and the routine proceedings are out of the way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I agree with the stand Your Honour took yesterday that by the time 2.15 was reached the bells were ringing and you could not interrupt the ringing of those bells. But it does seem to me that for the future, even if we have to consider this matter in the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, there should be some understanding that the clear right of members to move motions under Standing Order 43 should not wipe out the clear right of this House of Commons to have a question period.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I invite the President of the Privy Council to get back to the mood that he used to have and to his feel for parliament and, once he has it, he will take a much different stand from the one he took today.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not want to restrict the discussion unduly but there has been a tendency among the first three contributors to this very interesting discussion to make extensive reflections on the events of yesterday. That may have been a necessary part of their presentations, but in any case it had to be permitted in order to hear out the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), and therefore I permitted it with the other two members involved in the discussion. We should be clear that what we are discussing is not the events of yesterday—that issue was decided yesterday, the decision finalized, and is not to be the subject of further comment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: There is a clear conflict and some indecision which I am sure all hon. members had failed to anticipate, once a matter goes to a vote, and indeed should a matter in theory be under discussion at 2.15, as to what should take place at 2.15. I do not share the same indecision about it in respect of a vote, but certainly if it is under discussion, it poses some questions that are unanswered.

Surely the best way to resolve this now that the situation has arisen, and may again, I suppose, however remote that chance may be, is to invite the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization to examine the proposal put forward by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton at the earliest opportunity to see whether the committee has any recommendations for a change in rules which might clarify the matter. Otherwise we might await discussion and deliberation by the committee. If the committee has no report or recommendation to make, then perhaps the point could be rediscussed in the House, but the matter should go to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization by way of the suggestion of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton to see whether or not there is disposition in the committee to come up with a clarifying amendment to the rule.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the only reason I rise is the observations that were made by the Acting Prime Minister and House leader (Mr. MacEachen) in which he endeavoured to explain away the hibernation of the government yesterday in failing to utter the regular "no" which has become so orchestrated that no exception can be made to it. I sat here yesterday and I watched the government, as I do with an interest which is completely objective. It was very interesting. Everybody looked at everybody else over there. The one who was to say "no" did not say anything. There they sat, that strong and silent group. And then no one raised the negative voice.

Mr. Clark: He has forgotten that.

Mr. MacEachen: The solution is well within the control of the members of the opposition because if they wish, as a matter of repeated practice, every day to propose motions under Standing Order 43 then they must accept the full implications of taking that step so frequently. In my view it is a clear abuse of the intentions of Standing Order 43. Standing Order 43 states:

A motion may, in case of urgent and pressing necessity previously explained by the mover, be made by unanimous consent of the House without notice having been given under Standing Order 42.

If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) felt that the question he proposed yesterday was of urgent and pressing necessity, so urgent and pressing that it ought to be brought in with the possible putting aside of all the other business of the House to deal with this matter of urgent and pressing necessity, then that is his responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Every hon. member who moves these motions must take that responsibility and must take the chance that he will see his actions terminate in the procedure that followed yesterday.

I may say, as hon. members know, that the use of Standing Order 43 in this way is a relatively recent development in the House of Commons. It came about as a result of changes to the Standing Orders which removed the debate, presumably a procedural debate, normally held on a question of urgency with regard to proceedings under another Standing Order. There was written into that particular Standing Order that the Speaker would make a ruling on the question of urgency, without hearing from any hon. member of the House. Then, of course, an escape was sought from that change in the Standing Orders and members began using Standing Order 43.

Now hon. members rise every day in the House in order to draw attention to public issues by using Standing Order 43, and they expect that members on this side of the House will place themselves in an unenviable position by refusing unanimous consent. In other words they wish to protect themselves from the results of their own actions and decisions. Yesterday the House gave unanimous consent to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to put his motion, and the motion was put. Hon. members on this side of the House—

Mr. Clark: You were absolutely asleep.

Mr. MacEachen: —for reasons quite obvious decided to vote against that motion. We had the vote in the normal way and the motion was defeated. After hon. members found that they had lost the question period they came to us crying for special concessions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I say we are quite prepared to follow scrupulously the Standing Orders as they now stand, and if hon. members use Standing Order 43 they have to take their chances.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the position stated a few moments ago by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker).

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But before I get to the specific point raised by the House leader of the official opposition I should like to comment on some of the things just said by my hon. friend, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen). I felt a certain sense of pleasure when he came back to this position because I have long had the notion that he is one member on the government side who has a bit of a feel for parliament. I did have that notion, but I think I am losing it. It is not like the President of the Privy Council to stand up today and say that members of the opposition in exercising their rights under a rule clearly provided in the book are abusing their rights.

Mr. Clark: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The interruptions from the other side are only holding up the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey), but there is lots of time. There was a time, Mr. Speaker, when there was not a specific provision in the rules concerning when motions under Standing Order 43 would be put, and I think there was some abuse of that rule at that time. It was to correct that abuse that the Committee on Procedure and Organization made the changes which provide for a specific time when members can use that rule. I suggest it is not like the President of the Privy Council for him to say that those who avail themselves of a rule that has been worked out in recent months are showing a disregard for parliament.

• (1520)

Mrs. Holt: Who is showing disregard?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): All that my friends opposite are doing is to delay the time when the hon. member for Verdun will be able to get to his feet.

An hon. Member: Sit down then.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The procedural questions involved are unduly interesting this afternoon for some special reason which I find hard to understand. But, be that as it may, they are still straightforward procedural questions and I know there are some hon. members who want to make contributions to the discussion. So I invite all hon. members to make their contributions procedural and brief.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, although responses from hon. members in their seats answered another point that the minister sought to make, I think it ing Order 15(2) than was given yesterday, but which does not involve a contradiction to yesterday's ruling.

My first point is this: while Standing Order 15(2) states that the House shall proceed to the "ordinary daily routine of proceedings" at 3 p.m., or noon as the case may be, it states with equal force that "not later than 2.15 p.m., or 11.15 a.m., as the case may be, oral questions shall be taken up." The time 3 p.m. was inserted for the protection of the government, and 2.15 p.m. for the protection of the opposition parties, under the operation of the rule. It is surely anomalous that the one figure should be given full and blind applicability in all circumstances while the other should be inconsequential in circumstances which may frequently arise.

My second point is that in a case of doubt it is possible for us to go beyond the wording of the rule provided appropriate recognized guidance exists. In the case to which I refer we have the words of the preamble to the second report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization presented March 14, 1975, the report which introduced these rules. The preamble reads:

(5) It is the view of your committee that the first hour of each sitting should normally be devoted to oral questions. It is recognized that some members believe that there is a constructive purpose in retaining proceedings pursuant to Standing Order 43 at the beginning of a sitting. There is a consensus, however, that most routine proceedings ought to be taken up at a set time, but after oral questions. There is a consensus that statements by ministers and responses thereto ought to be limited. Your committee is of the view that questions of privilege and points of order raised during the oral question period, unless Mr. Speaker considers it to be a most grave matter, ought to be taken up after the oral question period.

I draw attention particularly to the words "but after oral questions". That paragraph really sets the framework for subsequent interpretation, indicating that our whole procedure has been framed around the question period as the central feature of the parliamentary day, and it is important we should consider the matter in that light. It is obvious from the records of the committee and in the context of the paragraph I have read that the word "normally" was inserted to show that the committee intended the question period to last approximately an hour, as was fast becoming the practice at the time, but that it recognized that proposed motions under Standing Order 43 would sometimes take a few minutes. It was clearly not the intention that anything should arise which would have the effect of totally cancelling the question period.

The reason for inserting a preamble was made clear by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) who drafted the rules for the consideration of the committee. He said in the committee on March 4, 1975:

I think we understand what it is we want to do, but it may well be that other members and Mr. Speaker may not understand the intent. So we would want to draft a sort of preamble to the actual rules to make it quite clear what the intent is and the spirit in which the rules are to be interpreted.

There followed a brief exchange on March 10, 1975, which makes the spirit and intent clear:

MR. BLAKER: My understanding is that it is a time factor. It is 2.15 p.m., come what may.

To this, the chairman, now the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp), replied, "Yes".

The whole intent and spirit of the rules was that there would be a question period from 2.15 at the latest, until 3.00 p.m., come what may. The preamble was part of the report which was concurred in unanimously and without debate by the House, and is therefore a guide, as was intended, to the interpretation of the draft Standing Orders presented at the same time. That committee, of which I was a member at the time, and am now, operated in good faith, and I hope this continues to be the case.

Therefore I suggest that the starting time of 2.15 or 11.15 is as inviolable as the 3.00 p.m or 12 noon finishing time. It seems to me that if we are to give both boundaries their proper place, then if a motion under Standing Order 43 is put to the House, any debate, or any division, must be deferred until after question period and routine proceedings.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that you find this a reasonable and acceptable interpretation of the rule which the procedure committee recommended to the House, and I hope if there is any discussion other members of that committee will confirm the spirit of our deliberations.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is, of course, a matter of serious concern. Before we hear from the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) on the subject, I want to say at the outset that it was not proceedings pursuant to Standing Order 43 which displaced the question period, it was a vote.

It is certainly clear in my mind in any case that, had the matter been discussed rather than voted upon at once, the debate would have had to conclude at 2.15 because no proceedings pursuant to Standing Order 43 could pre-empt the 2.15 starting time. But against that interpretation is the fact that once the division bells ring, whether they ring at five to six or at five to ten at the hour of adjournment, they continue until the whips advance from the end of the Chamber. Nothing can pre-empt that either. This practice has been established many times. Therefore in the singular situation in which a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 was not only put but was to be decided upon by a recorded division and the members were called in, then the 2.15 time limit could not have been adhered to, but had the matter been under debate at 2.15 it is clear that the debate would have stopped. The difficulty about getting it started again is one of some procedural interest, but there is no doubt in my mind that it would have stopped at 2.15.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have had no notice of the point of order raised by the hon. member who has just taken his place. It is a serious point of order, one on which you made a ruling yesterday, Mr. Speaker. I certainly believe the ruling was sound and is within the understanding of the Standing Orders. The hon. member talked about the difficulty in which the House finds itself. I think the difficulty is one created by members opposite themselves.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You forced the vote, Allan.

view of the fact that Canadian National Railways has announced a decision to reduce staff across Newfoundland, which will not only reduce its ability to provide rail transportation, but is happening in spite of continual denials that this action would take place, would the minister cause an inquiry to be made into the reasons for this decision, which will be effective January 24, 1977, so that we can be informed as to the necessity for the action?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will look into the question of statements that have been made and then contradicted by action. The question of Canadian National operations is, of course, largely for its management in a broad way, but I would be interested in having discussions with the province of Newfoundland and with other interested people on the whole question of transportation in Newfoundland both by rail and road. This is a vital issue in the province, one with which I am very much concerned.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF POLICY ON SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I will direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that last week a motion under Standing Order 43 received the unanimous consent of this House in encouraging and supporting the Olympiad for the Disabled in their fund raising activities for the purpose of defraying the deficit encountered as a result of the government's withdrawal of promised funds because of South Africa's participation, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether he would clarify to the House his government's policy in respect of South Africa in view of these contradictory positions, including the fact that personnel of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce continue to operate out of that country?

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that the hon. member and others will realize that it would be inappropriate to try to get the minister to outline the general policy of the government during the question period. The question would have to be more specific.

Mr. Jelinek: Then, in order to make it simpler for the minister, Mr. Speaker, since contradictory positions have been taken by the government would the minister indicate to the House whether or not the government recognizes South Africa as a state in all cases, or whether it recognizes South Africa as a state in respect of industry, trade and commerce and does not recognize South Africa in respect of the Olympiad for the Disabled?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the question of sporting contacts between Canada and South Africa is an extremely important one. It bears very directly upon the forthcoming Commonwealth games that we hope to host in Canada in 1978.

Mr. Paproski: In Edmonton.

Mr. MacEachen: In Edmonton, Canada, in 1978.

Mr. Paproski: Edmonton, Alberta.

Mr. MacEachen: Briefly stated, the government of Canada does not encourage but does not prohibit the exchange of athletes between Canada and South Africa. We do, however, attempt to discourage such contacts by withholding financial support for athletic contests either in Canada or in South Africa in which South African athletes participate. The purpose, of course, is to underline our opposition in this way to the policy of apartheid which is followed in these sporting contacts, which was raised in the case of the Olympiad for the Physically Disabled for purely cosmetic reasons.

OLYMPIAD FOR THE DISABLED

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO SUPPORT

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my final supplementary question to the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport). In view of the fact that this House now supports and encourages the fund raising program by the Olympiad for the Physically Disabled as a result of the Standing Order 43 motion which it passed, can the minister advise what specific and positive steps she intends to take on behalf of this worth-while cause?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure that the hon. member and all hon. members of the House will be pleased to know that some $450,000 has been allocated to the disabled in this country for the development of sporting activities for them. So we are dealing with this in a very positive way.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to rise on a point of order with respect to the proceedings which took place in the House yesterday afternoon surrounding the motion under Standing Order 43 which was moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

• (1500)

It has become clear that a number of members were taken by surprise in a number of ways and we have been left with a situation which potentially nullifies the assumption which is in the minds of all members of the House that the question period is a vital and indispensable part of our proceedings, and one with which no group in the House ought to be able to interfere. I assure Your Honour that I am not raising any question as to your ruling. Indeed, to do so would be improper. But I do suggest there is a way out of our difficulty though it requires a slightly different emphasis on the wording of Stand-

[English]

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I indicated that the final responsibility rests with the province and the municipality, and they have a committee at work on the question. We are prepared to co-operate with them in every way, particularly through the presence, not so much of governmental officials but representatives of Canadian National, assisting in the actual plans being developed. At the same time we have other work proceeding on the question of urban transit and commuter traffic particularly involving airports in the Montreal region, where we have a direct interest in our jurisdiction to see that airports are conveniently served. This work is ongoing and will lead to results from time to time.

HARBOURS

CHURCHILL—APPOINTMENT OF RESIDENT PORT MANAGER

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Grain shipments through the port of Churchill have set an all time record with the movement of 28.4 million bushels of wheat and barley this past year. I must say little of the credit for that goes to the minister as he tried to scuttle the complete operation. I now ask the minister what action is being taken to ensure that a full time resident port manager will be named for the port of Churchill so as to guarantee that the maximum percentage capacity of this port is used in the handling of as much as 40 million bushels of grain within its 88 day shipping season?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Well, Mr. Speaker, the search is on for the appropriate manager. I thank the hon. member for referring to the fact that a record was set, as I had predicted when earlier in the year he suggested that my efforts to help the port would be inadequate.

Mr. Horner: The record was set in spite of you, not because of you.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Following the advertisement for a port manager there were 17 applicants. Three were interviewed; none was successful. When will the minister be appointing a port manager now?

Mr. Lang: When we are assured, Mr. Speaker, that we have a good port manager. On the last occasion when the hon. member expressed his silly concern about the port we found a manager who within a very short time got the situation in hand, and we appointed a chairman to the port commission who also did a good job. In that way we have taken those steps that ensured this good year for Churchill, and we will continue to do so.

POSITION OF CORPORATION ON RENEWAL OF CONTRACT OF MRS. LISE PAYETTE AFTER QUEBEC ELECTION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State which is supplementary to that asked earlier by the hon. member for Bonaventure. I was not clear from the answer of the Secretary of State whether the Secretary of State was conveying to the House of Commons the position of the president of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation or whether he was expressing the view of the government as to the action that should be taken in this matter. Is it the position of the president of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that the position stated by the Secretary of State should be followed?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Leader of the Opposition for putting the question in those clear terms. I was reporting to the House information that I have received from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

EFFECT OF SALE OF TIMBER LAND TO REED PAPER ON NATIVES AND PROPOSED PARK IN ENGLISH-WABIGOON RIVER AREA

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the proposed sale of 19,000 square miles of Ontario timber to Reed Paper, what steps is the minister taking to protect the way of life of the indigenous population by using federal legislation such as the Clean Water Act and other environmental national acts to prevent abuses by the Reed Paper Company similar to those of the past? What are the implications of the Bernier-Reid memorandum for the development of, "Mercury Polluted Park" in the English-Wabigoon river watershed, as proposed by the former Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development? Is it still being considered?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I would have to examine the statutes referred to by the hon. member to see whether they will give us any leverage or enable us to take action to prevent some of the things that might take place. Respecting the proposed national park, that is still in the works and is being examined closely.

REDUCTION OF STAFF AND SERVICE IN NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In

Mr. Forrestall: Then, in God's name do not wait until next January when people on fixed incomes have to go through the cold winter months. Will the minister at least not agree there is no reason, as pointed out by the distinguished member for Halifax, why this decision cannot be taken on the request from the province of Nova Scotia prior to the end of this year? Can it not be taken within the next two to three weeks?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I ask the hon. member to reconsider some aspects of the situation. I ask him to reconsider the assistance that has been given already to the citizens of this province, as well as the equalization grants in particular which were made necessary as a result of the situation. I also ask him to urge the government of Nova Scotia to introduce measures of conservation.

TASK FORCE ON MEASURES TO CONTROL FOREIGN EXCHANGE—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to welcome the Prime Minister back from his trip across the Pacific. In his absence, I will direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. Has he yet received a report from the so-called task force that went across the Atlantic Ocean to study procedures implemented by some European governments designed to block the outflow of domestic currency by imposing controls on foreign exchange?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not received any such report.

INQUIRY IF MRS. LISE PAYETTE'S CONTRACT WILL BE RENEWED FOLLOWING QUEBEC ELECTION

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State.

Last Friday, I asked him a question hoping to find out what the CBC would do with regard to Mrs. Lise Payette after the Quebec election of November 15. According to the reply of the minister on that day, it seems clear he did not understand my question. In light of the details given since especially the very words of the statement made by Mrs. Payette last Friday, and I quote her from memory: "As of this morning, I consider myself a Quebecer separated from Canada", could the minister tell the House whether the CBC will renew its contract with Mrs. Lise Payette, that anti-Canadian, after next November 15?

[Mr. Gillespie.]

[English]

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member asked his question last week, I understood he was asking me to conduct an investigation which I was not prepared to do. Of course, as he knows from listening to the reply made by my parliamentary secretary in the House last night, I am informed that because of the provisions in the Broadcasting Act, which places a mandate on Radio Canada and the CBC to strengthen national unity within this country, it is extremely unlikely that the CBC would envisage the re-employment of Mrs. Lise Payette in the circumstance that she is defeated in the election and wished to return to Radio Canada.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REQUEST THAT COMMUTER FARES NOT BE INCREASED AND SERVICE IMPROVED

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

As the CN has decided to increase the rates on its commuter trains by 25 per cent in the Montreal region as of January 1 next, and as we have received numerous complaints from our constitutents in this regard, my question is as follows: Does the minister intend to meet the officials of the CN to discuss this matter in the hope that they might accept to postpone or at least reduce the planned increase until such time as the situation has been reviewed one more?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I gather that the hon. member will have missed the announcement a couple of days ago by my parliamentary secretary and my colleague, the Solicitor General, at a public meeting in the province of Quebec to the effect that I had written to the president of Canadian National Railways asking him, pursuant to a request by Mr. Mailloux of the government of Quebec, to postpone the envisaged rate increase at least until July 1, 1977 so that the province will have time to have its committee work go forward and put in place a plan for commuter service in the Montreal region, which as the hon. member knows we see as being primarily a provincial and municipal responsibility.

[Translation]

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary. What is important, naturally, is not so much the letters as the acts. I therefore ask the minister whether he intends to meet the municipal authorities of Metropolitan Montreal in the near future to discuss with them what means should be taken to improve the public transport system without penalizing the consumers too much for such improvements?

TRANSPORT

FERRY SERVICE BETWEEN YARMOUTH, N.S. AND PORTLAND, MAINE—DISCONTINUANCE OF CARRIAGE OF HEAVY TRUCKS

Miss Coline Campbell (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Is the minister able to tell the House whether he is aware that as of November 1, 1976 a very serious and grave situation will exist in that the Lyon Ferry Company will no longer carry heavy trucks between Yarmouth and Portland, Maine? If so, is he in a position to tell the House whether alternative arrangements will be made to ensure the continuation of this vital economic link to the southern end of the province?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have been very much aware of the proposed discontinuance of this service. We have been holding discussions with the province of Nova Scotia and with the Canadian National Railway concerning the possibility of an alternative service being put in place. There have been certain complications in relation to the rights and position of the existing operator. Those have delayed the positive announcement of alternative service, but I am optimistic this will be possible very shortly.

POSSIBILITY OF SUBSIDIZING FERRY SERVICE BETWEEN YARMOUTH, N.S. AND PORTLAND, MAINE

Mr. Jack Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the minister a supplementary question. Has the government offered to subsidize a portion of the cost of operating the Lyon service between Portland and Yarmouth?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is largely our view that this is not necessary and that the service can in fact be operated on a self-sustaining basis.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: A good part of our discussion with the province has been with regard to the question of the nature of service that could be self-sustaining. We have found in the past that where we put in large subsidies, a great deal of misuse of service occurred.

REQUEST FOR LIST OF CANADIANS HELD IN MEXICAN JAILS—SUGGESTED PROTEST AGAINST CONDITIONS UNDER WHICH PERSONS HELD

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the House leader a serious question in light of the fact that he was the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As the government, through the appropriate ministers, is responsible for justice for all citizens not only in Canada but elsewhere, will the minister make suggestions to the present Secretary of State for External Affairs to provide a list of Canadian prisoners held in Mexican jails and what charges, if any, are pending; what they are subjected to while awaiting trial or release? Will he recommend on a high level an investigation and supply this information to the House for the protection of Canadian citizens, a number of whom create a large tourist trade for the nation of Mexico?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think it will be possible through the Canadian embassy in Mexico to provide the hon. member with the names of persons who may presently be detained in Mexico and the state of their detention or forthcoming trial. I believe that information is usually gathered by the embassy and can be made available.

Mr. Woolliams: I thank the minister. I would also ask the minister to suggest that the present Secretary of State for External Affairs through the appropriate ambassador or official, and in the strongest terms if necessary, object to the conditions which Canadians, whether charged with proper charges or phony charges, are being subjected to while incarcerated in Mexican jails, which I have seen personally.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I understand the hon. member's concern in this regard. Last week, in replying to a question from him, I expressed similar concern and our difficulty as Canadians in understanding why these long delays take place. In so far as I am aware, Canadian citizens are treated in this respect in exactly the same way as citizens of Mexico. In other words, it is a uniform law and practice that is applied in Mexico. Travellers from Canada to that country, particularly young travellers, are warned against the possible effects if they are found with drugs, which is a very serious offence under Mexican law. Notwithstanding the fact that it is the application of Mexican practice and Mexican law that results in these situations, I still think it is appropriate for us to express concern at these long delays in rendering decisions.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON SUBSIDIZING ELECTRICAL COSTS IN NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I will have a supplementary as well. Does the minister agree with the comments made by the President of the Privy Council in his capacity of Acting Prime Minister that in fact the door is still open to a favourable decision with regard to the request for an interim power subsidy and assistance for the province of Nova Scotia?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had been following my comments over the past several weeks, in particular answers to questions put in this House, he would not have to ask me that question. I made it very clear that in fact that is the situation.

ly does not seem to be in the best interests of the Canadian taxpayer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Imagine that government doing anything which might assist the United States! It is so contrary to their basic principles as to be shocking! I wonder whether the minister, representing a western constituency—

An hon. Member: Not any more!

Mr. Diefenbaker: —indeed, he belonging to a party which is rapidly following the buffaloes to extinction, would he once and for all think about Canadians and realize that the effect of any such increase would fall heavily across the country, and particularly upon the western farmer? Can he not stand up for the Canadian farmer and for westerners as a whole rather than some other nation.

Mr. Lang: I am surprised to find that right hon. gentleman apparently confirming the view, which was apparent in his earlier question, that it is right to subsidize the passage of American goods through the seaway. I think that is quite wrong. I have no problem as a Canadian, and as a westerner, about saying that such a course does not make a great deal of sense. He has repeated his comments about the political problems one might encounter in the west. His record in predicting my demise over the past years is so bad that it must be compared with his comments about my being able to speak for the west. I can, and do speak for the west.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: I am quite prepared to speak to the west about the fact that a transfer of the deficit to the taxpayers is not a very good way of going about operating a number of things in this country. A lower tax burden is important to all of us, as is the spending of tax dollars on a transportation system in the most effective way. I say to the right hon. gentleman that the patchwork of subsidies which in weakness his government used to maintain and support is nothing but a producer of ineffective transportation and has proved a costly waste of billions of dollars of the taxpayers' money.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: There are none so blind as those who cannot see. I say to the minister—

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Having regard to the fact that his views are contrary to those of the Canadian Council of Agriculture and of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, I ask the minister whether I am not justified in the prophecy that after the next election he will not be back?

Mr. Lang: That prophecy has been made by the right hon. gentleman several times before concerning past elections and it will go the same way as the previous ones did, bearing in mind the support which he knows I have and which made him so fearful a few years ago when he thought our constituencies were to be joined. However, I do understand the position taken by users of the service. They always prefer, with regard to the particular use of a particular service, that it should continue to be supported by the taxpayer. The point is, though, that Canadians taken together can understand that, by and large, it is better to have a system under which the taxpayer does not bear that burden with a resultant excessive expenditure on transportation above what is in the interest of this country. We have to organize transportation, it being so important to the west, in a way which makes best use of the dollars spent upon it, and that is our intention.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

EFFECT ON NATIVE POPULATION OF GRANTING OF TIMBER RIGHTS TO REED PAPER—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): In view of the record of the Reed Paper Company in poisoning the waters of the English-Wabigoon River system with mercury and destroying the livelihood of native people in the area, and in view of the memorandum of understanding between this same company and the Ontario government giving Reed Paper timber rights to some 19,000 square miles encompassing at least seven major Indian reserves, will the minister state unequivocably that the federal government will do all in its power to nullify the proposed agreement if, in the opinion of the native people concerned, their treaty rights, health and native economy will be jeopardized by the granting of further timber rights to this company?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): If there is any infringement of the rights or treaties of the native people we shall be glad to help them and, if necessary, to provide them with legal assistance.

Mr. Symes: Has the minister made representations to the government of Ontario expressing the concern felt by the native people of the area? Will he tell us the amount of financial support which those people can expect in presenting their case?

Mr. Allmand: I have not made representations myself to the government of Ontario but my predecessor did. He met with one of the Ontario ministers during the summer just prior to my appointment. I cannot tell the hon. member what amount of money we would be prepared to give these Indians to put forward their case but we do have a policy of providing funds and assistance in circumstances such as these.

give assurance that the unfair discount of six cents will not be exceeded?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, since the agreement concerning the six cents was renegotiated with Australia and New Zealand, no evidence has been presented to me to show that meat from those countries has been sold in Canada outside of that agreement. Previous to that agreement it had been sold in Canada for as much as 31 cents per pound less than it was selling in the United States. I believe the facts will show that. No evidence has been presented to me to show that Australia and New Zealand have broken the agreement from the standpoint of price. New negotiations will take place; I hope the result will be that meat shipped to Canada will be sold at a price no different from that of meat shipped to the United States under the quota system which has been imposed or, I should say, under the supply-management system imposed by the President of the United States.

SPORTS

REASON FOR MINISTER MEETING PROVINCIAL MINISTERS—SUGGESTION DEPARTMENT FAVOUR TRAINING OF GYMNASTS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport.

To a question I had asked of the minister last week, she answered that she would tour the country to meet her provincial counterparts. Would she be prepared to reveal today in the House what is the actual objective for this tour and those meetings with her provincial colleagues?

[English]

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I anticipate the meetings commencing in December, at which time I will be happy to provide the hon. member with an agenda.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

In light of the pronounced interest shown a few months ago by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) in Canadian football, and in light of the problems the gymnasts anxious to master this form of sport are facing now, does the minister intend to make a proposition to the provinces to meet this need properly?

● (1430)

[English]

Mrs. Campagnolo: I shall be very interested in the needs of athletes all across the country, but at this time I do not have a complete list of the specific areas I shall be dealing with. I would welcome input from the hon. member on this subject.

HEALTH

SWINE INFLUENZA—REPORT OF ADVISORY COMMITTEE—REASON FOR DELAY OF MASS IMMUNIZATION PROGRAM

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare, or the acting minister, whether a report has been received from the national advisory committee on immunization with regard to swine influenza, and, in particular, any advice concerning changes in the mass immunization program for Canada and the reason for any further delay in mass immunization?

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the minister is away due to the death of his mother. He has not received a report as yet but we expect a report later this week. We are very disturbed by the CBC report which was entirely false. The advisory committee on immunizing agents has put out a press release making it clear that this information was premature and false and indicating that its suggestions will be very much in line with those made at the two previous committee meetings.

TRANSPORT

POSSIBILITY OF INCREASE IN TOLLS ON WELLAND CANAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. It has to do with the threat made about a year ago by the minister and also by the President of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority that the government of Canada could determine unilaterally whether to increase the tolls on passage through the Welland Canal. Having found out now that this cannot be done unilaterally, according to the legal opinion given by the law officers of the Crown, could the minister now assure the House and the country that there will be no increase in tolls, such an increase having been condemned by the Canadian Council of Agriculture and also by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): It is clear that any action would first require consultation with the United States, something we would have wished in any case and which we always intended. Some time would therefore elapse before any action followed. It is a fact, however, that receipts from tolls no longer cover operating and maintenance costs. It does seem important to the government as a matter of policy that a higher proportion of the charges involved, and the real cost of operating the seaway, be borne by those moving goods through the seaway rather than by the taxpayer. The fact is that a higher proportion of benefit falls upon Americans using the seaway and, this being so, the Canadian taxpayer is in effect being asked by the right hon. gentleman to continue subsidizing American goods moving through the seaway. This certain-porridge. I indicated to him that the neighbourhood improvement program and the RAP program were in fact now being instituted, and the hon. member seemed to be unfamiliar with them. When asked questions about the NIP program and the RAP program all he could say in response was that we should spend more money in that area. He did not indicate to what extent tax deductions should be made; he did not indicate to what extent the government should carry the deficit and he did not indicate to what extent the government would be forced to go into the market to borrow money. This, of course, would push up interest rates and if I can believe the hon. member and his party they would like interest rates to come down. Increasing government borrowing is going to push up interest rates. I thought it was the height of irresponsibility, not knowing the figures or the amount of money he was talking about, to suggest the government should lower taxes and in that way increase the amount of the deficit and increase the borrowing that the government would have to do.

Mr. Broadbent: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Would it be correct to infer from that modestly stated answer of the minister that the government has no intention in the next few months of increasing the supply of housing to provide homes and jobs or of reducing taxes for average and low income people as two sensible proposals or two methods of reducing the level of unemployment?

Mr. Cullen: I can see the headlines now, Mr. Speaker. That is the way the hon. member will probably interpret my answer. In point of fact, when I listen to my colleague, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, I know we have met every goal and every standard set for us by the Economic Council of Canada. We set record rates in the building of homes. This is, after all, important and until this government took power no other government had introduced low-cost housing for senior citizens.

DAIRYING—SUGGESTION NEW QUOTAS BE OBTAINABLE WITHOUT CHARGE

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

The most recent information bulletin released by the department to announce the adjustments in the 1976-77 dairy program states in part:

No transfer of the new quotas will be allowed between producers before April 1978.

Is the minister aware that the Federation of Dairy Producers is sending out forms urging previously penalized farmers to buy new quotas of 37 cents a pound of fat?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if the forms are the same ones about which I have been informed, the local marketing boards are sending them out. I do not believe the Canadian Dairy Commission is.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Should the minister discover that these allegations are true, will he make sure that penalized producers obtain their new quotas without having to pay an overcharge?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Dairy Commission does not put a value on quotas. Local, provincial marketing boards puts a value on quotas, although some of them do not. The province of Manitoba, for instance, puts no value on quotas; the province of Ontario puts a limited value on quotas. Personally, I think no value should be put on quotas.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE BEEF QUOTAS APPLICABLE ONLY TO MEAT IN TRANSIT TO CANADA ON OCTOBER 17

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a further question to the Minister of Agriculture relating to last week's news release announcing the Canadian beef counterquota on all imports, of 17.5 million pounds, for the balance of this year. In that release the following statement appears: products bona fide in transit as of midnight, October 17, 1976, will be permitted entry up to the limit of individual country allotments. Does the term "bona fide in transit" mean ships in the process of loading, as was the case after the "six cent under" rule was announced last June? In other words, can the minister give assurance that only loaded ships on the high seas, ships originally destined for Canada and not diverted ships, will be allowed to unload at Canadian ports?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it means what it says. Bona fide orders would be accepted. No ships destined, say, for the United States could be diverted to Canada. They could not be; it takes time to make sure that orders are bona fide and were confirmed before the government's regulation was put in place. We want to make sure, if any meat is shipped to Canada, that only the allotted amount goes on the market. Any excess over that amount must be held in bonded warehouses. We also say in that same release that it must be released in an orderly fashion. These topics are still being discussed with both New Zealand and Australian officials.

BEEF—APPLICABILITY OF SIX CENTS UNDER AGREEMENT TO MEAT ENTERING ON QUOTA

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question relating to the application of the "six cent under" agreement? Since imports from down under up to now have not been in accordance with this agreement, may I ask, with respect to imports entering Canada from Australia and New Zealand under this new quota, does the "six cent under" agreement still apply, and will the minister ti, during the period from December, 1971 to September, 1976 when the project went into receivership, can the minister explain to the House how Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for two years during that period seemed to be placed in the position of a second mortgagee? Can the minister assure the House that mortgage funds for this project were not used for any other purpose other than those for which they were intended?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): This is the very case, as I understand it, for which the Hamilton Spectator has already apologized. Court action is taking place. If there are any irregularities, certainly I want to be the first to know about them, and I will check into this. However, I can give the hon. member no assurances at this time, particularly as the matter is before the courts.

Mr. McGrath: My question is based on an article in today's Hamilton Spectator, which is not the subject of any court proceedings. In today's Hamilton Spectator there are very serious questions of impropriety raised. Would the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, who has the responsibility here, order a public inquiry?

Mr. Danson: I think my hon. friend knows I cannot go by the statement in this morning's newspaper. Certainly, I will look at the allegations made and make any necessary inquiries. As I am sure my hon. friend realizes, we certainly look for any discrepancies or anything which is out of order, and I would be the first one to want to find out.

LIMITED DIVIDEND PROJECTS—MEASURES TO ENSURE MORTGAGE MONEY USED FOR PURPOSE INTENDED

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister. In view of the fact that section 15 of the National Housing Act, dealing with limited dividend housing, lends itself to abuse, would the minister indicate what safeguards he has in force to ensure that federal mortgage money is directed toward the purposes for which it is intended?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there are agreements under section 15, to which the hon. member is referring, and we go to great lengths to see that those agreements are in keeping with the spirit of the Act to begin with, and also to see that they are maintained within the letter of the law.

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Since CMHC inspectors are the eyes and ears of the minister's department, what precautions does the minister plan to take to ensure that inspectors are not placed in positions of conflict of interest?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all they are very good eyes and ears, and I am not aware of any situations in which there are conflicts of interest. Those situations are checked at all times, and if there is even a suggestion of a conflict of interest, I wish the hon. member would speak to me privately, and I will look into it.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO REDUCE LEVEL OF UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In rejecting the proposal put forward yesterday that 3 per cent be regarded as constituting virtually full employment the minister sarcastically said that for the government no such 3 per cent would be permitted and that the government wants full employment, presumably down to zero per cent. Oddly enough, that comes from a government which has allowed 7 per cent unemployment for over 18 months.

I would like to ask the minister why he will not submit to the House specific measures to bring down unemployment even to the 3 per cent level, over perhaps the next four year period.

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, when we are talking about the unemployed, we are talking about people, not chattels, and percentages are not particularly effective.

● (1420)

REASON FOR REJECTING CERTAIN PROPOSALS TO REDUCE LEVEL OF UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the minister continues to assume that sarcasm constitutes an adequate answer in the House. Would he also explain to the House why he summarily dismissed two practical proposals to increase the supply of low cost housing and a tax reduction for low and medium income people, two important steps to deal with unemployment, describing them as cold porridge when the government will not offer any porridge at all before 1977? Why does he reject these practical proposals out of hand?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Once again, Mr. Speaker, sometimes the questions asked by the hon. member warrant nothing more than sarcasm but this is a legitimate question that deserves a more serious answer.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: I did not say that it was cold porridge. I said most of the things I read in the report presented by the hon. member on behalf of his party seemed to me like warmed over eventually eliminate rail service in that province but also reflects misleading answers given to questions asked of responsible officials in that they denied such action would take place.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the Ministry of Transport issue an order that a stay be placed on reduction of staff and that an investigation be made into CN's future activities in the province of Newfoundland.

Considering that the government of British Columbia on June 23, 1976, brought in enabling legislation to have teachers and other public employees brought under the federal Anti-Inflation Board guidelines, and considering that the enabling legislation was retroactive to October 14, 1975, a period of nine months, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Lee):

REQUEST FOR EARLY DECISIONS ON AID TO ATLANTIC PROVINCES TO REDUCE COST OF ELECTRICITY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, since I would like some understanding of what I am going to say I will wait until the noise subsides.

Pursuant to the usual Standing Order, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing importance, particularly to the people in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island but also of some national importance. Comments by the Acting Prime Minister—I believe he is still Acting Prime Minister—the President of the Privy Council, quoted in the press last weekend would indicate a more positive attitude toward energy cost subventions for the two provinces of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. While indicating a more positive attitude on the part of the federal government, they suggest clearly that no decision will likely be taken until the end of this year. Because of the undue hardship which such a delay in the decision-taking will cause for those on low and fixed incomes, I move, seconded by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse):

That this House urge the government to arrive at its decision, at least in principle, prior to the middle of next month, November 15 of the current year.

Mr. Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43 the unanimous consent of the House is required for the presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

HAMILTON—ALLEGED CONFLICT OF INTEREST IN AWARDING MORTGAGE FOR LIMITED DIVIDEND PROJECT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Is the minister aware of an article which appears in today's edition of the Hamilton Spectator in which a former aide of the Minister of Labour admits intervening in a mortgage application under the limited dividend provisions of the act involving a former law partner of the Minister of Labour, and if so, what steps did the minister take to determine the impact of this conflict of interest on the awarding of the mortgage, since two other applications for the same area were turned down?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen this morning's Hamilton Spectator yet, but I understand that this is a matter which is before the courts. I understand the Hamilton Spectator printed an apology, but there is court action upon which I cannot comment.

SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION OF STAFF REDUCTIONS AND FUTURE PLANS OF COMPANY IN NEWFOUNDLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my motion under Standing Order 43 reads as follows. The announced reduction of CN staff in the province of Newfoundland is not only evidence of CN determination to

I have heard of turning the other cheek and was also taught to love my enemies, but I was not taught to provide the knife with which my enemy would cut my throat. The approach to publicly financed broadcasting in Canada must be re-evaluated in the light of the vastly improved communications facilities in this country.

If the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is to remain free of interference at the federal political level, it must be equally free of union interference and of political party interference by infiltration. I suggest that henceforth publicly financed television and radio broadcasting that uses in excess of $400 million of taxpayers' moneys each year restrict itself to cultural and educational programming, plus factual news reporting only. Otherwise the price will be freedom of the majority.

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has dealt with many matters with which I would not have time to deal before the adjournment. Let me try to deal with the hottest ones, for example, the case of Lise Payette who is a candidate in the Quebec provincial election. I am informed that according to CBC program policy when broadcast personalities capture nominations as candidates in an election they are obliged to withdraw immediately from the programs of the corporation. Pursuant to this policy the contract with Lise Payette has been terminated and the program has been cancelled. Now, what if Lise Payette is not elected? In this case I am informed that, given the mandate of the CBC which is to promote national unity and reinforce the Canadian cultural fabric as espoused in the broadcasting act, it would be difficult to envisage the possible return of Lise Payette to CBC employment.

With regard to Lloyd Robertson it may be that one of the reasons he left the CBC is that as a CBC announcer he wanted to be able to gather news and was unable to do so because news gathering is within the jurisdiction of the CBC newsmen's union. Questions of union jurisdiction as between announcers and newsmen in the CBC have nothing to do, however, with questions of freedom of information.

So far as the question of the use of pre-recorded announcements by Premier Bourassa is concerned, I think this has been put in proper context by a reply of CBC President Johnson to Mr. Ben Payer, President of the Liberal Party in Quebec. In his reply Mr. Johnson pointed out the full responsibility for its program content assumed by the CBC under the provisions of the Broadcasting Act, and the fact that accordingly the CBC must exercise editorial judgment to the best of its ability and with complete freedom. He added that in his opinion broadcasting organizations retained the prerogative to make use of such a recorded message or not to do so, or to present it in whole or in part in accordance with their editorial evaluation. The CBC's language networks each broadcast a short extract from Premier Bourassa's message, while the French network declined to do so, nevertheless presenting all the essential details of this important event. Thus each network simply exercised freely its prerogative and journalistic responsibilities without any constraints or external influences.

additional 200 employees at the Sydney Steel Corporation. As the minister mentioned yesterday, the announcement of this lay-off came at a time when all available funds have been allocated to the 264 constituencies. It will be readily understood that program funds, as initially allocated, are currently being committed and the figure earmarked for each constituency cannot be adjusted.

I can well understand the plight of the workers affected by the current lay-off at the Sydney Steel Corporation. The employment situation has suffered sudden and severe deterioration in several other areas of the country as well. It is hoped that these problems will be somewhat alleviated in the near future by the re-allocation of those funds which will remain unutilized once the current LIP assessment-approval phase is completed.

It should be noted, for the time being, that $379,000 has been allocated to the constituency of Cape Breton-East Richmond under the 1976-77 program, and these funds will be committed to projects which will in the very near future create jobs in the constituency.

The hon. member alleges a 65 per cent discrepancy. Although different sources can produce different estimates, the minister very much doubts that his figures can be accurately compared with the ones used in the formula across Canada. If he will supply the figures he uses, along with a clear statement of the time period and the geographic area they will cover, I will ask the department's statisticians to review them and analyse any differences. Should the figures of the department's estimates used for the allocation prove to be wrong, they will, of course, be changed.

May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that although the formula used in the distribution of funds by constituency has its limitations, it is the best we have been able to devise. Each year efforts are made to render it more objective and accurate. This year the weighing factor and the ruling that no constituency would receive less than one third of last year's allocation were introduced to this end. If the estimates of unemployment were made on some other basis, the results would no doubt be different from place to place. No change in the methodology for estimating unemployment could, however, change the total amount of money available for distribution. We cannot use one system of measurement here and another system there. What we have done is to use the best estimates, consistently across provinces and constituencies, in order to produce the fairest and most accurate set of results that we can.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—ALLEGATION OF BIAS IN PROGRAMMING—SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday of last week I proposed the following motion:

> That the government cause to be brought immediately before the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts, the responsible officers of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for the purpose of explaining the circumstances leading to the recent affront to the premier of the province of Quebec, the response of the officers to that action and the intentions of Radio Canada to prevent similar future interference with free communication in publicly financed television programming.

[Mr. Portelance.]

I followed this up with a question to the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts). I asked:

> Is the minister aware of the often expressed criticism of bias in the programming of the publicly financed Canadian Broadcasting Corporation? Has he investigated the veracity of one of the reasons given by Lloyd Robertson for his recent resignation, and how does he reconcile this with this week's well publicised action of Radio Canada in Quebec?

The answer of the Secretary of State suggested that he did not understand the basic thrust of the question.

What is at issue is the integrity of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the very independence or so-called independence of which successive ministers have been boasting, or were these same ministers just looking for an excuse to get themselves off the hook? Were they looking for a means by which they could explain to the public why, though the public is financing the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to the extent of over $400 million per annum, the public is to have no say through its elected representatives in just how these moneys are to be spent? The so-called independence of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is too often the answer given by the responsible ministers to stop the questioning of politicians.

Also is it wise to spend $400 million per annum for a service used by less than 10 per cent of the population? To what extent is Canadian culture influenced or affected by publicly financed programs that are not being received by an apparently indifferent population?

It was of considerable concern to me to read one of the reasons why Lloyd Robertson has moved from CBC to CTV. Union regulations restricted his reporting freedom. If we are so up-tight about political interference, should we not be equally concerned with all freedom restrictions?

● (2220)

It is argued by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, when it gives broad coverage to the separatist P.Q. party, that the suppression of news and the suppression of news commentary are a threat to democracy in a free society. Why then is the same freedom not accorded to those who present the news? If it was bad for Lloyd Robertson to comment on the publicly financed outlets, are we now being brainwashed by his newfound freedom on the independent network?

I will also ask to what extent the taxpayer should finance the separatist point of view, which seeks the very destruction of the institution which gives the P.Q. party its principal source of publicity? The huge salary paid to Lise Payette helps her to attempt to destroy the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as we know it today. For certain, if her party were to gain power she would not be without a job in a new Quebec government sponsored television outlet. Lise Payette is certainly a very capable performer. But then she has no worries. If she loses the election, she returns to her big salary paid by all Canadian taxpayers.

MANPOWER—LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR EXTRA FUNDS FOR CAPE BRETON AREA

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in reference to the questions I raised in the House yesterday concerning the rationing of Local Initiative Project funds in the constituencies of Cape Breton Island where the unemployment situation is so grave that it threatens to become destructive of human, social, and economic values. When I return to my constituency for office hours and chat with the people in the general industrial area I meet with an increasingly sad situation.

It is all right for people who enjoy the security of good government jobs or who live in a section of the country where there is a vibrant industrial base to say, "Why don't they get out of there?" The historical truth is that they have been getting out, but there are so many barriers of age, transferable skills, education, home and neighbourhood attachment that the suggestion, for all but a minority of the people there, is both impractical and, in my view, inhuman. Most of the mobility in the post-war period has been to Ontario, and it is today, and has been for several years now, hardly a place to come looking for work unless you are very well educated and specialized.

We have hopes in the long run for a new steel complex that could, if realized, turn around the economy; but in the meantime the severity of the unemployment means that short and medium term projects must be used in areas of chronic, structural unemployment. This is especially true when there are such high national levels of unemployment that are largely cyclical in nature, and enhanced by the restraint and control program, so that mobility even to the prosperous Halifax-Dartmouth metropolitan area is affected because of increasing unemployment there.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has recently said that he expects unemployment is going to remain at high levels up to the 1980's. Given this situation, Mr. Speaker, the government must come up with new job creation programs. This is not the place, nor do I have the time, to discuss the merits of the programs which the minister announced last Thursday and that apparently are to begin next spring. My concern now is with this winter and the severe cuts in the LIP programs in my own area and constituency. In answering my supplemental question yesterday the minister said that his information is that the formula used for the distribution of funds to the constituencies was basically the same as last year, with some modifications to ensure that the funds were directed to areas of highest unemployment.

The minister is probably now aware of the letter I wrote to him on October 8, 1976, showing that, in essence, the formula used was downplaying the amount of unemployment in my constituency by a statistical sleight of hand. His departmental representatives in Halifax, who have so heartily co-operated with me are not responsible for this but rather the blame lies with some of those in Ottawa who live in their ivory towers and apparently have never seen the stark, ugly reality that confronts the unemployed who no longer have UIC benefits and detest the dole.

The minister in answering yesterday the question of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) regarding the accuracy of the statistics of the labour force survey which were included in the formula, said that "we should go back to the original system of having members of parliament in the area figure out some pooling arrangement". That seems to agree with my suggestion that the minister meet with the three Cape Breton members affected and with the managers of their Manpower offices to get a more accurate picture of what is ahead this winter regarding the employment situation. I do hope he will act on this suggestion. If it is impossible for the minister to be present, he could delegate a top knowledgeable and humane official.

I do not want to have to rise in this House again this winter and ask for emergency meetings to meet the unemployment situation in Cape Breton. Last year we had three such meetings. Those meetings were attended by Manpower officials, a DREE representative, MP's and MLA's from the area, as well as Premier Regan of Nova Scotia and the president of the Cape Breton Development Corporation. The consensus of opinion was that in the long run a new steel industry was the only permanent answer to the problem. At one of those meetings it was agreed that Canada Manpower be requested to put special funds into a retraining program in the Cape Breton area to upgrade the quality of the labour force supply, both actual and potential, in the construction trades sector. The idea was that it would be a vitally important step if a new steel complex were to be initiated and become a reality with as reasonable a construction cost and timetable as would be considered possible. If the steel complex did not become a reality, then the consensus was that it would be government money well spent.

It is now near November and all we have heard from the government so far is the bad news about the serious reduction in LIP funds. I hope the minister will call the meeting referred to above on the LIP allocations soon. After all, there were over $2 million in projects applied for and I am asked to settle for $379,000 as against $810,000 last year. If the unemployment situation were to be so improved, I would indeed be a happier man, but I know the area too well and so do the Canada Manpower managers in that region, to accept that reasoning. After all, the formula is based upon last year's figures rather than current ones. We desperately need more LIP funds and special funds for the retraining mentioned above. Today's Ottawa Journal quotes the new Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) as saying he was told to "bring compassion to the job". This is an occasion for compassion and an opportunity to practice social justice also.

Mr. Arthur Portelance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises two questions which are not related, and I will reply first of all to his question about the lay-off of an the firm which for many years tended to the needs of military flying in the Atlantic provinces. The present firm was established at the urging of the government. It came into being after a certain contract came to an end, the original company having made a long and useful contribution to our national defence effort. The company was taken over by a group of men in the industry who had faith in its possibilities and continuance. They do good work. They have mastered the intricacies of the Argus, the Tracker, the Sea King helicopter, and of other, smaller aircraft used by the Canadian Armed Forces. They have the prime contract for the Argus.

Let me state my concern. It would be logical if they were to carry on with the basic overhaul, repair and maintenance work which will be needed with respect to the Aurora, when it enters service. But the full facilities of the work force, now in place and trained, probably will not be needed until the first aircraft comes off the line, has been in service two or three years, and is performing its military function and related roles. The question is, what is to happen in the meantime?

In order to tide us over the interim period, we obtained assurances from the government that work would be found for our industry in the development of the Orion. Of course that work has not been forthcoming, and I do not know whose fault it is. This evening I want to know if the government is prepared to honour its general commitment, to make certain that the aerospace industry in the Atlantic provinces, particularly in Nova Scotia, will be given work, as promised. I am concerned about IMP and Enamel Heating at Amherst. Will such companies be given the work which the government assured us would be made available? Will those company officials be able to say to their employees—and this is my primary concern—"Yes, we know where we are going, know where we are, and know how we will fill the vacuum between the end of the Argus program and when the Aurora will enter service and need our full facilities for maintenance"?

I hope that the Aurora, the Canadian substitute name for the Orion, the aircraft which is to replace the Argus, will not find itself placed in the same category as that other Aurora which fired the opening shot in the Bolshevik revolution in 1917 and, in so doing, sank the remnants of a proud aerospace industry of the Atlantic provinces.

[Translation]

Mr. Arthur Portelance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member, I will say that replacement work for the aerospace industry in Canada was one of the basic conditions laid down at the beginning of the LRPA program, and the amount of industrial benefits promised at that time had a lot of importance in the choice of the Aurora aircraft by the Canadian government.

The department wanted Canadian businesses in the aerospace industry to benefit most from it. So the Lockheed Aircraft Company and Boeing were encouraged to look up all possible sources in Canada, including Nova Scotia. Two Nova Scotia firms were selected, Enheat of Amherst and IMP of Halifax, because of their excellent past performance and their importance to their community. On representations by the minister and the department, the two companies were included in the final proposal by Lockheed as the eventual supplier of P3 components. Subject to final negotiations between the companies involved, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce expects that Enheat will produce firing domes and elevation and direction rudders for all P3 planes produced by Lockheed and not only for the Cp140 (Aurora) while IMP will produce the electrical gear for all P3 planes and do additional work for which it is competent.

Enheat is entirely equipped to manufacture the P3 structural components and has a good reputation as far as quality, costs and delivery schedules are concerned. During the recent labour difficulties at Enheat, the department and Lockheed were naturally concerned because the time necessary to meet Lockheed's delivery schedule was running short and Nova Scotia risked losing the work by default. Therefore, official representatives of the department and Lockheed had discussions with spokesmen for the company and the government of Nova Scotia to try and speed up the settlement of that issue. In the opinion of the minister, that intervention paved the way toward bringing management and labour together in the conclusion of an agreement earlier than would have been possible otherwise.

It should be noted that IMP has no manufacturing capability but is used as a repair and overhaul base for all Argus planes. The compentence of that company is clearly in the area of repairs and overhauling.

The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce had great difficulty finding some manufacturing work to cover the gap left by the progressive removal of the Argus and the introduction of the Aurora and this without doubling the manufacturing capacity already existing at Enheat and in several other areas in Canada. However the electrical gear provided for IMP requires extensive manpower, a minimum of producers' goods and can be carried out with relatively unskilled personnel.

Lockheed and the department are seriously trying to find other gears or other similar works for that company, because the minister and the department feel that such a step would be beneficial to the government and the Canadian aerospace industry, contributing to maintain IMP as a very competent and productive centre of repairs and overhaul.

The comprenhensive worth of replacement works for the Aurora now under negotiation for Nova Scotia amounts to some $12 million and this figure is subject to increase during the Aurora program and could reach $17 million.

We have every reason to believe that the negotiations between Lockheed and the companies involved will soon be completed and that a contract will be awarded.

their performance today—they could not even organize "no". They could look too at the way people reacted a week or ten days ago in two by-elections. And why did a handful of people in this country manage to throw out what in my judgment was a very good piece of legislation, Bill C-61 for consolidation of the old Canada Shipping Act, in the form of the new maritime code? They threw it out because they no longer have any trust in this government. They no longer have faith in its ability to make regulations or bring in changes in tariff rules. But these things do not bother the government one whit, Mr. Speaker.

Our professional and technical designers have been told that they build good ships but that they are awkward, clumsy, and not nice and shiny like the hydrofoil that runs to the Isle of Capri. Who wants a hydrofoil that could run to the Isle of Capri when we have four feet of ice between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick and the straits across to Newfoundland, or when we have to haul cargo out of the St. Lawrence River to Newfoundland? We do not need a fancy, shiny MG; we need a three-ton truck designed to meet our requirements with respect to the protection of the environment.

In our ships we need good hull design, environmental protection systems, double hulls to protect against oil pollution and ruptured tanks. We have the capability in Canada, but do we protect our professionals? They were sold down the river by a former distinguished member of this House many, many years ago, and it is to our discredit that we have not done anything to restore the opportunities in this highly professional area of endeavour or to restore the confidence in us.

When the day comes that this country buys engineering plans from an American firm that it bought in Denmark which it originally bought from us, then I shall be on my feet hollering. I shall make a little bit of noise to express my regret. I am not suggesting this could happen, Mr. Speaker; I am telling you it did happen.

Why did the Americans build those two big polar ice-breakers? Was it to operate them in the Gulf of Mexico of Baja, California? No. They were built to operate in our Arctic. That is where they are going to operate, not off New York State, not off Boston, not off Portland or Seattle—there is no ice there. Those are class 7 and class 8 ice-breakers. We could do that type of engineering work in this country if only the government would display faith in our professionals in legislation like Bill C-15.

I could go on and on, Mr. Speaker, but those are just two little items. Another is kayaks. Nobody in North America is going to build a professional racing kayak in the next 20 or 30 years if we charge 25 per cent or 30 per cent import duty. The import value of kayaks this Olympic year was about $40,000 or $50,000, and yet we allow millions and millions of dollars worth of professional design work into this country without import duty, which could create thousands of jobs for engineers and consultants.

I see by one clock it is ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and by another it is one minute to ten. May I call it ten o'clock, please?

Adjournment Debate

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order may I ask the government chief whip his intention with respect to the business of the House for tomorrow?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could indicate that. Due to a long-standing engagement I cannot be here tomorrow to continue with this item. My colleague, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), will therefore introduce Bill C-2 at second reading stage. When that is dealt with, my parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan), will introduce on my behalf Bill C-5. I expect to be back in the city on Thursday when I hope to continue with this item, No. 15 on the order paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

INDUSTRY—REDUCTION IN WORK ALLOTTED NOVA SCOTIA AEROSPACE COMPANIES UNDER AURORA PROGRAM

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I shall only take a few more minutes of the time of the House to raise a question on the adjournment debate this evening. On October 20 I put a question in connection with the reduction in the work allocation under the Argus replacement program, or the so-called Orion program. I shall quote briefly from page 262 of Hansard for October 20 when I put the following question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien):

> Has the minister any explanation as to why it is that the aerospace industry in the Atlantic provinces, specifically Nova Scotia, having been offered a $6 million part of that program over a six-year period, now in fact finds that their program is $600,000 over the same period of time?

● (2200)

That $6 million has dwindled to $600,000, which means that the work can be done in a much shorter period of time.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) replied:

> Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any such specific commitment. Evidently, I am not responsible for the allocation of contracts. I will inquire and report immediately to the hon. member.

I am not particularly interested in who is or is not responsible for the allocation of contracts, having long ago learned that this government is over-zealous in keeping such information confidential. Nevertheless, when the allocation was made, that ministry made great and elaborate promises.

At present the position is this: Industrial Marine Products, aerospace division, located at Halifax International Airport, is in a difficult position. It is the successor to Fairey Aviation, nothing we would rather see, and the government can bank on our wholehearted and most sincere cooperation to the extent where it proves that it is really concerned about serving the people.

● (2140)

[English]

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) would pay attention he would learn how little some members of parliament know about the item in front of us, but he would also learn how deeply concerned many of us who are speaking here today are about this item with respect to the way in which the government has treated the aspirations of Canadians and Canadian businessmen.

The item before us fails in a number of respects, and I want to touch this evening on one or two of them which are of some concern to me. I touch on them in the hope that I can bring to the attention of hon. members opposite some of the concern small businessmen have, for example, in the field of design work. They are concerned when they see their government choosing to ignore the plight of people in some pursuits in the Canadian industrial sector, and also when they see a government which is indifferent to the needs of a country which must pull itself up by its bootstraps very quickly.

We have the phenomenon of a very strong Canadian dollar. We have no export sales, but a very positive dollar on world markets. I suggest that part of the reason for this is demonstrated within Bill C-15, the tariff changes which are suggested. They clearly typify the attitude of the government, not necessarily by the selected items it has chosen to bring forward in this particular bill, but rather in its attitude toward unemployment. In the part of the country I come from, which has perhaps the highest unemployment rate in the land, no effort is being made. This bill is an instrument the government has available to it to try to rid the country of regional disparity, to try to bring about equity in our manufacturing sectors and to try to afford protection where protection is needed, but the indifference of the government to the pleas of a number of sectors of industry is a little discomforting.

As I mentioned, I want to touch on a few matters. I want to touch on maps, drawings, architectural prints, machine design, tool design and, good God, even building designs which are imported into this country without charge, although they may be worth millions of dollars, at the expense of the design industry in this country. That is just one area.

I will elaborate on these areas and show the breadth of the government's disregard. For example, it is not possible in this country to buy a racing kayak. That is a small racing shell which is paddled and which is used in this country by thousands of young Canadian boys and girls. It is not possible to bring one of them into this country without paying the general tariff. Not only are these items not made in this country, but there is also not a sufficient market to warrant the development of an industry for their production. Yet all our boat clubs and canoe clubs pay 35 per cent extra for the privilege of enjoying a piece of equipment which is not made in this country, nor will it be made here for many years. Indeed there are only one or two manufacturers of them in the entire world. With regard to that particular commodity the implementation of the general tariff does nothing to encourage employment or to encourage the development of an industry.

In Halifax we have MAGI, the Metropolitan Area Growth Development Corporation, which was established almost accidentally as a result of a wild promise on the part of the government a few years ago to assist in the development of growth centres. It did not get under way for the first four or five years because time was wasted fighting over who would control the pork barrel.

I was speaking about kayaks and a 35 per cent import duty, yet at Halifax the present government permitted MAGI to pour $1.7 million into a cruise ship to develop industry in the port of Halifax and to create jobs in the port of Halifax. Where the hell are they going to cruise from, Georges Island out to Macnab's and back? Maybe they will go down as far as Ecum Secum and back. The night before last there were winds of up to 40 and 50 knots over the coast, and the temperature was probably well below freezing. What in God's name are they going to do with that ship?

The government had an opportunty to bring about a little easing of a financial burden on an identifiable group of Canadians but chose not to do so. Rather, it went through dozens of pages of items which are important in their own right, but taken either individually or collectively they do not do anything to stimulate employment in the Atlantic provinces. Indeed I doubt if the government does very much to stimulate the confidence of the agricultural industry, the manufacturing industry, the drug industry, or the textile industry. I doubt very much if the government does more than create a raised eyebrow. The government is not concerned about the well being of our country. We can range from peas through to cameras, from parts of cameras through to sugar; we can wade through a whole range of things. Not one job will be created by Bill C-15, Mr. Speaker.

I should like to return to the question of imported technical and architectural plans. We have lost millions and millions of dollars worth of design work to other countries whilst we have people in this country with competence in these areas. The so-called replacement of the Abegweit ferry is an example. The government said that our marine designers were not competent to design a ferry for use in our waters. The hon. member for Stormont-Dundas (Mr. Lumley) laughs, but I would ask him to think about it. He is a distinguished member of this House who has had some municipal responsibility in the past. When the government sends abroad for marine architects and designers while we have people competent to do the job in this country, I think it is time we looked very closely at its performance.

If members of the government want to understand how closely they are being watched they need go no further than guards to our meat and fowl and produce industry faced with massive imports.

These import quotas in various areas about which the government speaks so often could perhaps be applied more seriously and more severely on a periodical basis; for example, during summer when vegetable growers are terribly hurt by imports from various countries. Nobody is concerned about these problems and then we hear about payments to make up for unsold crops and it is always the taxpayer who foots the bill.

I think it is worth talking about its importance. There are almost 100,000 employees in the textile industry and how many thousand more in the footwear industry? I have to make it a point, as other opposition members have done already, to raise these matters, Mr. Speaker, to make sure that these industries employ Canadian manpower. But no, the government has been unwilling to take positive steps. It has not had the courage to face its responsibilities and it now asks us to pass social legislation to keep 800,000 unemployed in this country and favour the passage of supplementary estimates for social welfare.

And without realizing it this government is spoiling our generation with social measures instead of advocating work incentive measures. I am not against social measures, Mr. Speaker, but I am accusing this government of being responsible for deliberately creating 800,000 unemployed. This is a burden for our country. They give us some arguments, they make some comments. As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, it is exciting for my friends opposite to be told that the measures and efforts, if any, have obviously been inadequate.

We are asking the government to introduce more energetic measures which would be more effective. Is this government short of any positive ideas, of at least acceptable alternatives? That is one thing the Canadian people may wonder about.

Mr. Béchard: What are yours?

Mr. La Salle: We are asked, what are ours. First my best proposal would be that this government should resign and give way to a team which is ready to administer this country. This would be a good solution. It has been proved that positive solutions have been lacking for ten years, and I am asked: What is the solution? Courageous measures aimed at protecting Canadian industry, and restrictions on imports into Canada.

Mr. Speaker, for years now we have been advocating such things as the steady growth of our industry, some expansion where possible, of course, but is it reasonable, is it humane to let our Canadian industry go to pieces? This government could not care less and the best example of that, the most recent example, as many members are well aware, is found in the last dairy policy announced last April. They have literally given up our dairy industry, without a thought about its importance, its survival, they have given up this important economic factor in our economy. The same goes for textile, footwear, meat—as has been stressed earlier—vegetables, etc.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would not want to be charged with wasting the time of the House. I believe it is nevertheless necessary . . .

An hon. Member: That is nothing new!

Mr. La Salle: Our friends opposite have one quality, Mr. Speaker, they are not wasting the time of the House, they do not take the time of the House because they figure it is useless to remind the minister of his responsibilities. Yet voters in Quebec as well as all other Canadians would like the government members to remind from time to time their own minister of his responsibilities, but that is not done.

Apparently this is the role of the opposition and we are doing our duty. We regard it as our responsibility to remind the minister in charge and this responsible government of their obligations and we believe that we have been elected respectfully and sincerely to represent our electors' wishes. That is what I am doing this evening, that is what my colleagues did this afternoon and that is what they have been doing for ten years, although we keep receiving negative answers from the government which does not dare accept our suggestions no matter how good they are.

They did accept one of our suggestions, Mr. Speaker, but failed to implement it, therefore it may be said that they did not accept it 100 per cent. I am referring to the control legislation. They could have applied to the letter the measures advocated by our former leader (Mr. Stanfield), Mr. Speaker, but as usual they refused consultation and preferred confrontation. They would rather upset the provinces, unions and business. They lied to the people and now we gather as we sow, the voters' distrust and lack of faith. Have a look at the latest by-elections.

I know my opponents don't like to hear about that but still, it is a pleasure to mention it from time to time, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: It is not a very positive suggestion!

Mr. La Salle: Perhaps not, but it is a warning which should encourage the government to wake up before it is too late. As for me, I do feel it is too late already but some show of good will on the part of the government could help, and we would be willing to support measures to reduce the difficulties, the hardships Canada knows at the present time.

Mr. Speaker, I trust that the responsible minister will feel even more committed than the colleagues I face tonight. We will therefore take the opportunity tomorrow, it is not too late, to discuss and enlarge upon our remarks, so that the minister will be forced to act, because I am quite convinced that he is not willing to answer and suggest serious solutions to our difficulties.

Under those circumstances, we beg the government to show greater understanding of the present hardships of Canadians, to suggest much more interesting solutions than those, and to prove that it does promote the maintenance of the existing industry. It must be saved and remedial steps must be taken to expand it and to reduce unemployment and inflation. There is

[Translation]

And in the very near future, we will note a price increase on the Canadian market and there will be no benefit for Canadian consumers.

[English]

So I just want to reiterate my disappointment that a measure such as the customs tariff now being brought before the House has not addressed itself to a major problem not only in the province of Quebec but across this country. I will not be irresponsible and demagogic about it. Unemployment and industrial decline create hardship beyond belief wherever we find them, but I wish the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, in a very cool, calm and collected way would visit some of these one-industry textile towns and see the havoc that their lack of policy has created among families. Hardship and unemployment among a labour force which is mobile are one thing, but unemployment within an immobile labour force is another thing and is a cruel hoax. I would hope that the next time a measure such as this is brought before the House——that this government will do something by taking such a step to help the textile industry throughout Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few remarks, because I saw that my colleagues opposite were showing some interest in that question of the customs tariff. It seems that this bill, as many others, is still very important. When my colleague from Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) made his remarks, I felt that my colleagues opposite were a little bit nervous. I recognize that it is not always very pleasant to be accused of being inactive. I also understand that it was fair for my colleague to tell hon. members from Quebec, and to all our colleagues opposite, what are their responsibilities.

The way things are shaping up now it is obvious that we can expect more signs of nervousness. In recent weeks some members have chosen other responsibilities and the conditions in which we live, the economic context are all reasons liable to irritate our colleagues opposite to the point that we feel we must be ready to assume the leadership of our country because the public loses more and more its credibility in the present government.

Mr. Speaker, when I say that this bill is important, I also recognize that Canada as a whole is going through a difficult period. Maybe we should ask ourselves who is responsible for the context in which we now live. Quite often we are criticized for not finding wonder solutions; we are asked to give some advice. God knows how many members on this side have done that in the past ten years. We also perfectly remember the warnings we gave to this government a few years ago concerning the difficulties we are facing. However, no action was taken. Much too often, they preferred the status quo. Now we are in a very difficult situation, everybody recognizes that our exports are decreasing and our imports of foreign products are increasing. We wonder what is the reason for this situation.

[Mr. Grafftey.]

We hold inflation as being responsible for our difficulties. However I do recall that in 1968 this government had assured and promised us to reduce inflation and unemployment. Earlier, my colleague from Brome-Missisquoi spoke about results; the results are inflation. We know the difficulties that go with it. The number of unemployed in our country rose from 168,000 in 1968 to 800,000 today.

• (2130)

This is the performance of the present administration that forces them to make some corrections and propose partial answers. We declare them insufficient as do the people of Canada. They show a lack of confidence in this government. When we say it in this House we faithfully reflect the views of Canadians, and our opponents get nervous and pretend that we have no reason to bring up this situation here in Parliament.

Of course, with the increase in manpower we are less competitive on foreign markets but we must ask ourselves the following question: has the government done enough to protect our industries, conserve and improve our manpower? Has this government made sufficient efforts to create new jobs? I am ready to admit that it has provided important credits for job creation, but I am not ready to believe that this government has made sufficient efforts to protect our Canadian production via a Canadian consumption for and by Canadians. The government is to blame on that respect.

We are told about protection for a series of products. A little earlier, one of my colleagues spoke about farm products. Everybody knows how much this industry has suffered from the lack of measures concerning importations detrimental to us and to Canadian manpower. I wonder if this government has not deliberately acted to reduce manpower in the textile industry mentioned earlier by my colleague. We could also discuss the footwear industry. Dairy producers have also suffered not long ago. All this because of the lack of measures and the government does not act.

We know full well that the reports which are submitted and the statements made by the ministers have no valuable results, and the textile industry for instance has lost some ground, I do not know to what extent. What they ask is that we save what is left over in Canada. And anyway, there is no guarantee that what is left can be saved in the textile industry, nor in the footwear industry. There is no guarantee that things will not be worse in future months. There is no way those industries and their employees can believe this government will deal seriously with the problem. However, the government ask that we trust them and support half-measures.

In the face of such general dissatisfaction shown these last months in particular throughout the country and across the board, it seems to me the government should be much more attentive to the current problems facing Canadians.

Job security is important to what is left of the labour force, but this government offers them no degree of assurance, no practical measures. Therefore, how can we give unreserved support to this half-measure that takes no account of the textile and footwear industries for instance and gives no safe-

Mr. Grafftey: I know the government whip is under deep pressure these days and it has obviously affected his manners.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I can take a joke, but we do not see you around this place too often.

Mr. Grafftey: I know you are not looking forward to your caucus tomorrow after what happened this afternoon.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Will the hon. member please address the Chair?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Come into the House a little more often and we will notice you.

Mr. Grafftey: After making my initial remarks relating to a textile policy, I am not going into the details of what we on this side of the House have recommended vis-à-vis rectification of the problem. All I can say is that during the last session of parliament we had a full debate, so we thought, on the subject of textiles. We had an open exchange. The then Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, now the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson), assured us that something would be done immediately. Therefore I do not think we are drawing a long bow when we on this side of the House say we regret very much that we do not see action in measures such as the one before the House. It is obvious that the government does not have an industrial strategy, be it for secondary industry or otherwise. It certainly is apparent if you discuss the textile industry.

[Translation]

Hopefully I can still hope that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien), who comes from my province and who is one of my close friends, is aware of the problem. Even if we do not take any concrete action in the House of Commons this evening, I hope that with such a minister we can remain hopeful.

[English]

Certainly the present attitude of the government vis-à-vis an industrial strategy in general and textiles in particular convinces me that the government is still willing to live dangerously on the short-term selling of our non-renewable natural resources. This is being done in relation to our trade. I agree entirely with the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) that if members of the present government are lousy traders, it is because they have become soft. Year after year they have been fire-saleing our non-renewable natural resources.

Unless we get an industrial strategy integrated with our customs tariff policy much sooner than later, the chickens will come home to roost with obvious results. Until the government shows me differently, I remain convinced that senior ministers of the Crown have been convinced by senior bureaucrats that the textile industry in this country is expendable. What else can I think when I see the sort of attitude displayed by the government now and over the past years?

I want to reiterate from this side of the House, time and again, what we have said before. I am not entirely aware of the details of the problem relating to textiles all over the country, but for perhaps the fiftieth time I will outline the problem before this House as it affects not only my constituency but many areas in the province of Quebec. Talking about regional development or integrated economic planning or industrial planning, we do not share the same experiences as the province of Ontario. In Ontario there are many economic areas centering around Toronto, Ottawa, Hamilton, Windsor, and the Lakehead. However, in the province of Quebec—

[Translation]

. . . we have the large economic district of Montreal with some three million inhabitants. We have of course very important centres such as Quebec City and Sherbrooke. However the economic planning of our province, compared with that of Ontario, is entirely different. We have rural centres . . .

Mr. Béchard: There is Montreal and the remainder of the province.

Mr. Grafftey: We should be proud. I do not blame anyone.

[English]

Outside the economic area of Montreal we have a much different economic situation than in Ontario or many other provinces of this country. To a great extent we find our textile industry in rural and what is often termed small-town Quebec. In my area, for example, many of the towns of 12,000, 15,000 or 20,000—whether we are talking about Saint Hyacinthe, my own riding, Magog, Downsville, Sutton, Farnham or Bedford—are one-industry towns and that industry is the textile industry. Very often the pay is low, although I admit it is getting better.

• (2120)

For reasons that I think members of the opposition should have convinced the cabinet of long ago, it is not a very mobile labour market. Contrary to the brainwashing the treasury benches have received from high officials, most of our plant is the most modern in the world and yet we still do not compete because of the bone-headed attitude of the government. When we have one-industry towns, a lack of mobility in the labour market for reasons I shall not go into now, and a modern plant, I find it difficult to understand, unless the government is keeping something from us which it will not admit, why it has the attitude that the textile industry in this country is expendable.

I ask again and again: why do the backbenchers from Quebec on the government side not convince the Treasury Board that it is in measures just like these in respect of the customs tariff where we could begin carrying out the recommendations, whether they be those of the Senate or otherwise? There is the argument in favour of the consumers, that by letting low priced imports in from certain other countries the consumers will be the beneficiaries of the low prices; but we have seen time and time again that the minute low priced imports are able to come into the country and finally and completely kill the production of a specific industry in Canada, then the exporting countries take advantage of the situation.

presented in the first few weeks of the session with measures which the government says are simply housekeeping measures. As the hon. member who preceded me said, we on this side of the House believe that items such as budget resolutions should indicate not that they are just nuts and bolts, ad hoc, housekeeping measures; items as important as budget resolutions should address themselves to the central economic problems of the country today. I submit they should at least be part and parcel, if you will, of an industrial strategy, whether it relates to tariffs or otherwise.

I want to discuss in particular the textile industry in Canada today. In this regard we have had studies, promises, delay, inaction from the government, as well as some far-flung Senate recommendations. We have had commission piled on commission, recommendation piled on recommendation. One minister after another, be it the finance minister or the minister who preceded him, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien), or the one who preceded him, has dealt with this issue.

[Translation]

They made a lot of promises to the textile industry but without acting and getting results. Considering the prevailing situation in the textile industry not only in the province of Quebec but across Canada, I wonder to what extent the ministers concerned listened to the advice of Quebec members when they met in caucus. Or still, with the results we are now getting in the House of Commons I wonder whether Quebec members actually discussed those problems in their own caucus! I ask what steps did they take and what results did they get?

An hon. Member: What do you know about textiles!

Mr. Grafftey: You keep talking but where are the results?

[English]

If ever, Mr. Speaker, there was an occasion when this House, or management and labour should have expected action, it surely should be in this measure put before the House tonight. But having had promise after promise after promise, we come to the House of Commons and once again experience inaction. It is a cruel hoax after the promises—

[Translation]

Mr. Béchard: Name one!

Mr. Grafftey: You talk a lot but I am convinced that you should speak openly to the people of the province of Quebec. Are you really satisfied with the Liberal party and the results of this government with respect to the textile industry? You are satisfied? Never!

Mr. Béchard: We are never satisfied!

[Mr. Grafftey.]

Mr. La Salle: Neither are we!

• (2110)

[English]

Mr. Grafftey: If the government were really serious about an integrated industrial policy for this country in general and, more specifically, a realistic policy in textiles, surely after the promises that it has made we would see action, not a measure such as brought before the House tonight; but we do not.

[Translation]

We had promises during the last session before the holidays. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) made them when he was Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. On several occasions, prodded by questions put by the opposition, he assured the House, the textile owners, workers, not only in my province but across Canada, that we could expect concrete action in the near future. And today what do we have in terms of proposals from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), what do we have for the textile industry? Nothing. I hope members on the government side will exercise pressures very soon to correct that very serious situation.

[English]

After the Senate recommendations, the commission reports, and all the millions of dollars the government has spent on commission after commission, there is no government in the free western world that has made more studies at greater cost to the taxpayer than this government, without carrying out one iota of their recommendations.

Whenever the Trudeau government gets a problem before it, it has a royal commission, it has a study and it spends millions and millions of dollars. From one end of the country to the other there are Senate recommendations and royal commission reports, but not one recommendation is followed.

Mr. Béchard: Tell that to your friend from Central Nova.

Mr. Grafftey: The hon. member screams and yells because I am telling the truth and it hurts. Excuse me, but you are bothering me.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest that hon. members carry on their conversations behind the curtain.

Mr. Grafftey: Would the whip carry on his business elsewhere?

Mr. Goodale: Are you going to ask Stanley to leave too?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. If the hon. member would say something worth while or something that made sense, I would stay in my seat.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I suggest to the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) that that is not a point of order. It is a point of debate.

Today in Ottawa there was a representation from the Canadian Cattlemen's Association. I do not propose to discuss this issue in any detail because that will be done on another occasion, but one thing came through to me. Inconsistency in government policies affects these men very greatly especially when there are higher tariffs on the export of their product from Canada to other countries than there are on imports into Canada from those same countries. On the one hand, the government says Canada must compete in overseas markets, and on the other it makes it very difficult to compete.

The "on and off" policies of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) have a lot to do with this situation. The minister has approved certain policies which will, he says, stabilize the price paid for farm products. What he does not tell consumers is that the price will not level out at a rate equal to the average of the highs and the lows, and that the public will end up paying the higher price all the time. We have only to look at the quotas imposed on efficient producers who are told they cannot produce as much as they would like. There are boards that control the production of eggs, milk and butter. I do not know how many millions of pounds of butter or how many thousands of dozens of eggs have been spoiled as a result of this policy. The supply of turkeys and chickens is either controlled already, or will be controlled before long. I speak for the consumer because I represent a community of 80,000 consumers.

Finally I want to say I am glad that the Consumers' Association of Canada has taken up the case against some of these government policies which it realizes are not in the best interests of the public though they are in the best interests of inefficient producers. This has become evident to those who are able to make price comparisons by shopping across the line in the State of Washington, for example. It is time we re-examined the claims of the consumer and the principles involved in the implementation of the various customs tariffs.

I believe the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) returned from Japan today. It is evident that the Japanese want to buy more raw materials from Canada. Free from the high costs and labour troubles so familiar here, Japan is readily able to produce and sell goods manufactured from the raw materials we supply. At the same time Canada as a nation wishes to manufacture and export more finished goods. Since we have the raw materials, perhaps we should control them and see to it that we do export more finished goods. Developing this proposition I would ask why Canadians should pay higher costs on imports subject to tariff, or higher costs on goods manufactured in Canada. This is not to say we want to be the hewers of wood and drawers of water we have sometimes been depicted as being. What that is to say is that the policies that have led us to the position we are now in need to be re-examined.

It is entirely possible that the people who are presently engaged in manufacturing goods that we could more cheaply buy from other countries could have their efforts diverted into jobs that would manufacture commodities produced from Canadian raw materials. It could easily come to a balance where the consumer would benefit from the lower prices available to him by importing goods from other countries at lower prices, in most cases at much lower prices, and would also benefit from the tax and trade revenues received from exporting goods produced in Canada from our raw materials. As it is now, Mr. Speaker, the ordinary taxpayer is called upon not only to subsidize in many cases the producers of this country but is also called upon to pay a much higher price as a result of the involvement of the government in this sort of thing.

It is not too difficult to trace many of the problems of our exporters to other policies of the government which have made it difficult for Canada to compete in foreign markets. However, we do have many examples of industries that are still able to operate and export to world markets, such as the forest industry, such as British Columbian lumber, plywood, and pulp. Pulp from British Columbia is sent all over the world.

Opponents of my suggestion may say that the loss of jobs in the manufacturing industry would cause greater unemployment and ultimately be a greater burden on the taxpayer. I think that is something that could be examined. My contention would be that the net saving to the consumer would more than offset any loss that might be occasioned from greater unemployment. If, of course, the end result were greater production of goods, then on balance I think it would work the other way. Anyway let us not make small adjustments to, and temporary cuts in tariffs when obviously there is a deeper problem. I think it is wonderful to be a Canadian and to have Canadian industries, but I am not sure that Canadian consumers want always to be called upon to pay the very high prices that they are called upon to pay in order to support Canadian industry, and so that some consumers may work in Canadian industries.

I suggest an examination by the government might also uncover different policies that would reduce costs for the consumer. In the long run we might have better jobs for those people now employed in the manufacturing industries. In short, let us not close our eyes to deep policy examination. Let us not just patch up existing tariffs with temporary cuts or temporary anythings which are going to expire in one year, and then are extended for two, three or four years. Let us have a deep enough examination to get to the root of these problems.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, in addressing myself to this measure I should like to continue on in the same vein as the most able speaker who has just preceded me. I do not want to discuss so much what this bill pretends to do but rather, as the previous speaker so ably did, I want to address myself to what, in my view, the bill does not do.

I can almost hear the finance minister arguing that, like most of the items presented to the House at the opening of a parliament, this bill is merely a housekeeping measure. We on this side of the House do not accept the thesis that after a long summer's break, with the economy as it is, we should be pulled into the debate and ask the government to take further action on behalf of friends, constituents or others.

This afternoon I find myself agreeing with what an hon. member to my left, the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) was saying in this debate. I do not often find myself agreeing with members of his party, except on humanitarian values where I find we are very close.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Sojourn down here.

Mr. Clarke: Sometimes I think I spend too much time sitting near hon. members to my left. At any rate the hon. member for Timiskaming said he was not in favour of extending temporary tariff cuts and mentioned two valid points, or two matters, which give businessmen much difficulty. He mentioned freight rates, which are completely beyond the control of the businessman but may affect him greatly, and referred to the customs tariff, which again is completely out of his control—the tremendous swing effects may affect particularly the small businessman who may be in difficulty through no fault of his own, owing to pressure brought to bear on the government.

The hon. member for Timiskaming also deplored the extent of government intervention in small business. I think he actually said—I mention this in case my remarks are reported to him—that he would keep government out of business. It was refreshing to hear that from a member of the NDP. I understand that party loves freedom and believes in the freedom of the individual. I certainly agree with that position. Many of our business troubles would be easier to treat if there were less government involvement with business.

When governments involve themselves in business, the inequality of treatment they mete out is one of the difficulties we encounter. It does not seem to matter which sector of the economy the government wants to help; it ends up hurting just as many, or even more people. I suppose the most recent example of the ineffectiveness of a particular government policy is the so-called peace and security package which was brought forward in the previous parliament. Before we had finished debating it at committee stage, the government itself had proposed 50 amendments to the legislation drafted under the aegis of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford).

Our customs tariff contains not a few inequities; some have been reported to the government; some I have myself reported. Unfortunately the present bill does not attempt to correct them. May I give you, Mr. Speaker, and my colleagues some examples of what I mean.

One example has to do with a hobby which interested me greatly even before I came to this place, the hobby of vintage cars. For a long time vintage car enthusiasts have been trying to persuade the government to give them relief. Those Canadians are trying to preserve part of the history of Canada, if you will, and want to restore automobiles, many of which were made in Canada. They want to keep their hobby alive in Canada. But instead of obtaining relief from the government this group of Canadians find themselves penalized at every turn. For example, they have to go to the United States to get the old tires they need for their vehicles, and when they bring them in, the full rate of tariff is imposed on them. The same applies to the parts for these vehicles which are not manufactured in Canada. The whole history of tariffs is disregarded.

● (2050)

It might be said that, after all, these are automobiles and that there can be no exception for automobiles. But bear in mind that these are historic automobiles. No exception has been asked for any vehicle less than 30 years old. On the other hand the tariff does provide, in a complete about-face, that antiques—furniture and other non-mechanical things—are exempt. Anything over 100 years old is covered by the definition and is allowed into the country duty-free. The exemption applies, as well, to original works of art as long as they cost more than $20 or something like that. Any hon. members who know people who have smuggled paintings into this country can tell them they have wasted their time because they would have come in free anyway.

There is a direct relationship between original works of art and antique or vintage automobiles. Many people think of the latter as works of art and they are by definition, certainly antiques.

That is one example. The Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin) gave us another today. Obviously our efforts will be in vain for many months, in any event, but in answer to questions about delay caused by people returning to Canada at the border crossing at Douglas, British Columbia, the minister indicated that more staff had been hired and, since the traffic problem seems to have been caused by Canadians returning to this country after shopping in the United States, and the fact that the groceries for which they shopped incurred duty at different rates, which involves unpacking and repacking, she would try to get the tariff changed as it affected the casual importation of groceries. I am not certain whether she intended to make it easier for Canadians by removing the duty on casual importation of groceries, or whether it was her intention to ban the casual importation of groceries, an action which would certainly have an effect in dealing with the traffic problem at the Douglas border crossing.

We find that the pressure goes on, certain businesses react to it, the business cycle is upset, and we get into more trouble than ever. There are examples I could give. Clothing manufacturers, providing jobs in Canada, have found for a variety of reasons that their operations were impracticable and they have ceased to manufacture. As a result hundreds of workers have been thrown on the job market. This is not the fault of the customs tariff, it is the fault of other government policies. The firms concerned are not going out of business. They find they can import the goods which they formerly manufactured in Canada, pay the duty, and still sell at a profit here. Jobs have been lost, but the companies stay in business by taking advantage of conflicting government policies and there is no evidence that the proposal before us has taken account of these deep-seated problems.

From January 1, 1976, to September 5, 1976, compared to the same period last year our exports of fresh and frozen pork were minus 90 per cent; hams minus 13 per cent; backs and loins minus 10 per cent; bellies minus 4 per cent; shoulders and picnic plus 13 per cent; side and spare ribs minus 19 per cent. In processed pork, cooked hams were up 26 per cent; cured hams minus 50 per cent; backs and loins minus 62 per cent; bellies minus 24 per cent; shoulders and picnics minus 48 per cent; pickled in barrels plus 3 per cent—that must be the prime promotion of the Minister of Agriculture—canned hams minus 82 per cent; other canned pork plus 83 per cent; boneless pork minus 14 per cent, and pork with bone in minus 54 per cent. The average was minus 10 per cent over last year.

These figures are taken from the Canada Livestock and Meat Trade Report so I have not just taken them out of the air. They are available to everybody and we have to accept them as authentic.

The Minister of Agriculture and his colleagues, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and the Minister of Finance, will have to get busy and develop policies that are acceptable to the industry. If they do not, we are going to be in serious trouble because there is no way we can survive in an economy that is showing a $5 billion trade deficit while our export trade continues to fall off.

We have been relying on our grain a great deal to counteract this trade deficit. Grain trade alone amounted to about $3 billion last year but, since July 1 this year, the price of wheat has dropped 70 cents per bushel and all the other grains have fallen in price as well. We also realize that we can no longer rely on those countries that have bought our grain in the past. There are reports that Russia has a surplus of grain this year.

I bring these matters to the attention of the Minister of Finance so that he can give greater consideration to the rural parts of Canada. It may be that since he lives in Toronto he is not too worried about the production of food, but those in the industry know that we have to plan now for produce that will come to market in three years time. The government must not hesitate to develop good trading patterns with our customers to ensure a market for our surplus. These patterns should be developed particularly between western Canada and the northwestern United States, and the Montreal-Toronto area with the eastern United States. I should also impress upon the Minister of Finance that financial policies have a direct bearing upon whether we win these markets or not. He should keep in mind as well that income tax and other forms of taxation have a direct bearing on the output of the labour force. The minister must accept his responsibility in this regard; if he does not, Canadians will suffer the consequences.

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, in rising to examine the merits of Bill C-15, the adjustments to the customs tariff, I feel I should address myself first of all to a little of the history involved with tariffs in general. Some time in the distant past tariffs were imposed by various countries for the protection of their home industry. We find that probably every country in the world now has some kind of customs tariff ruling. They are changed from time to time, but probably none so often as those in Canada.

In 1973 the minister of finance was Mr. John Turner.

An hon. Member: Who?

Mr. Clarke: In introducing his budgetary measures on February 19, 1973, he said he was introducing temporary cuts on a wide range of consumer products. It would be difficult not to agree with some of the reasons the minister gave for proposing those cuts. The important thing was, they were temporary cuts. I found it easy to agree because in my constituency, Vancouver Quadra, there are not what one might call specialized groups. For instance, in my riding there are no agricultural producers, in fact no farmers of any kind, and no manufacturers as such. On the other hand I do represent some 80,000 consumers. I find that there is no spokesman for these consumers who, after all, must pay the bill and pick up the tab after everybody else has had his little bite.

In that very same debate in 1973 my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), took issue with the minister about the temporary nature of those tariff cuts. He said, as reported at page 1,522 of Hansard for February 21, 1973:

> These will not be temporary. I do not anticipate the minister having the opportunity of announcing in the House that he is revising these tariffs and increasing them again.

History has again proved the hon. member for Edmonton West to be absolutely correct. The minister never had the opportunity to increase the tariffs. His own actions, of course, prevented his doing anything of that kind.

Since that first action taken by the then minister of finance in 1973, we have seen further extensions of these tariff cuts. At present we are considering a further extension, as proposed last May by the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald).

As I mentioned, other countries have introduced customs tariffs to protect their own interests. I shall touch on other methods which other countries use as an adjunct to the formal type of customs tariff. These adjuncts are known as non-tariff barriers. For example, a non-tariff barrier could consist of a provision restricting bids to businesses resident in that particular country. Another could be impractical documentation requirements. Documents may be required in a particular language, or in a form which may be impractical for businesses in other countries to use. Another example might be an unrealistic financing arrangement which would serve to keep foreign businesses out of the market in the particular country passing the regulation.

It seems, in the matter of tariffs, that the squeaky wheel gets the grease. It often seems that if a particular industry or business is big and gets into difficulty, for any reason, it appeals to the government for protection. We on my side of the House sometimes fall into the trap. Sometimes friends, constituents or others appeal for help and, although we say there is already too much government involved in business, we are

The government should become involved in the development of our processing plants. This is what I am talking about. That is what we need in western Canada.

In a moment I intend to refer to a speech made by the premier of the province of Alberta along these lines. In any event, Mr. Harris went on to say:

"Tax laws also can be terribly important. It seems to me one thing when you talk about risks of Bell Canada or International Nickel, but something else when you talk about XYZ Manufacturing.

We in western Canada need companies like XYZ which will process our meat products so that we can capitalize on that northwestern United States market.

"You expect better returns (from XYZ), but it requires a great deal more patience. It is highly questionable whether you should have the same tax structure for these two very different types of equity investment."

He advocates tax incentives to investors to provide the risk capital for companies like XYZ, and to entrepreneurs to develop businesses they can pass on to their families without onerous succession duties.

Without external financing, such companies must deploy retained earnings, bring in partners (often big corporations, therefore hastening business concentration) or stop growing.

"We think this is an important area of Canadian business planning."

This is where the Canadian government, through the Minister of Agriculture and his colleagues in the cabinet, is failing. There is not adequate planning for the development of an industrial base.

Just the other day, on October 13, the premier of the province of Alberta spoke to his legislature, and I want to put on the record some of the statements he made, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, we have to find new markets for our agricultural products. The United States provides one of the best potentials for markets. One of the better areas is processed boxed beef. But we have to make some changes in the tariff and trade situation. We allow it to enter Canada at a duty of 3 cents a pound. But when we want to sell it from the west into the northwest or into California, the United States has an ad valorem tax of 10 to 15 cents a pound. Now it is important for us to make some breakthroughs in these trade and tariff areas. When I was in Washington in June, I spent a fair amount of my time discussing it with senators, congressmen, and the administration.

I might say just in passing that this is one of the breakdowns of development in Canada. That is because the federal government is not seizing the initiative to develop these foreign markets. The federal government is leaving it to the premiers and to departments of several provinces, for example, the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario. They all send their trade delegations to foreign markets, to the European Common Market, Japan, and wherever they can find a market.

The premier went on to say the following:

But let's recognize how important it is for Alberta. It's key in the Alberta economic strategy for agricultural processing, Mr. Speaker, and trade and tariff arrangements are going to become more and more the attention of the Executive Council of Alberta, and I hope of the whole legislature. Canada's negotiations on GATT are critical to Alberta, and hopefully we can move more effectively in bilateral negotiations with the United States, particularly in the area of agriculture.

We are going to be involved, and we want to be involved, in a very high risk area of agricultural processing. For we must process these agricultural products in this province, and we must get into the world markets. We must become less dependent merely on the price situation of the basic grains, and the China and Russia crop situation. In international marketing it has been our policy for five years, through our agencies, to do what we can to move in and find new markets. And we have had some important successes.

Mr. Speaker, in terms of economic strategy—and we have them—in the fall of 1974 it was outlined. We have made considerable progress in agricultural processing, both in terms of the support we have given and the initiatives we have made, but equally because we have created a climate here. We have seen concerns come to this province to process our agricultural products, and so there have been. Later in the fall we will have further elaboration on some very important steps forward in this area.

Why in the world should a provincial government have to do this by itself? Why does the federal government not get involved? After all, regardless of what happens, the federal government has to sanction trading agreements which are made, and certainly the federal government and the Minister of Finance would be well advised to get involved in this at the initial stages, become a part of the process and develop it. The minister would then feel better because he would have achieved something worth while.

I want to impress upon the House the importance of the process about which I am talking. We have to develop a trading relationship with our friends to the south because of the importance of that trading relationship to us. This year, from January 1 to September 25, our imports from the United States of pickled and cured beef are up 100 per cent plus. Our importation of cooked beef is up 63 per cent and our canned beef is up 69 per cent. That is only for three quarters of this year because the last week of September and the months of October, November and December have yet to be added, so the situation will be much worse.

Imports of fresh and frozen pork give the following story: carcasses and sides up 100 per cent; hams up 62 per cent; backs and loins up 20 per cent; bellies up 100 per cent; shoulders, butts and picnics up 69 per cent, while side and spare ribs are up 91 per cent. Processed pork, cured hams were up 100 per cent plus—and we have a falling pork market in this country, Mr. Speaker. Cooked hams were minus 66 per cent, so we seem to have a market for cooked ham. Backs and loins were up 100 per cent plus; bellies, sides and bacon up 47 per cent; shoulders, butts and cottage rolls up 100 per cent plus; pickled in barrels minus 3 per cent; canned hams, shoulders and picnics up 100 per cent plus; other canned meat up 25 per cent; other pork with bone in up 100 per cent plus, and other boneless pork up 100 per cent. The average was up 79 per cent over last year.

Canadian agriculture cannot withstand that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Whelan: Canadian exports of beef were up.

Mr. Towers: The minister says our exports of beef were up but I would remind him that our quotas of dressed beef going to the United States are full for this year. The last two months of this year will create serious problems for our beef producers.

Our export picture is exactly the opposite, Mr. Speaker, and I should like to put the figures on record. I think they will show the minister that he has a job to do.

but a heinous reply to a definite need for action. As I mentioned earlier, it would take a concentrated effort on the part of the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand), and frankly he will not get the support he needs. He may well be the sacrificial lamb for a cabinet which is not doing the job which the Canadian public demands of it. If we could have more responsible action, we would not be in the shape in which we find ourselves tonight.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, as I rise to take part in the debate on this bill I am particularly pleased that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has seen fit to come to the Chamber this evening. Judging by his performance in the last four years, unless he changes his policies and his pattern, I do not expect too much to come from the present policies of the minister. I have greater hope in the leadership of the hon. gentleman who is in the gallery tonight representing the Canadian Department of Agriculture because that is where our strength lies at present, certainly not in the Minister of Agriculture because when he first came to the House of Commons he said that he would be a minister who answers his telephone. I want to tell hon. members that this is the highest priced answering service that Canadian agriculture has ever had.

An hon. Member: Just like the Liberal whip's check-off system.

Mr. Towers: Canadian agriculture has been going through a traumatic experience in the last several years. It cannot continue to suffer the consequences of bad policies, or lack of policies, because the producers are being placed against the wall. If agriculture is to survive, it will require the assistance of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) and of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) as well as new direction from the Minister of Agriculture because of the fact that we have been enjoying high prices especially in our pork industry. I will deal later with some of the schedules that are part of Bill C-15 now before us. I believe that, with the recent drop from 35 per cent to 40 per cent in the selling price of pork and cattle, the pork producer is hardly making a profit.

We are all very much aware of the fact that the beef producer has been operating at a loss for the last three or four years. The hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis) mentioned the fact that representatives of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association are now in Ottawa trying to encourage the Department of Agriculture to adopt policies which will be beneficial not only to the producers but also to the consumers, and to our trading partners in the world. They are very much aware of what has happened in the last eight or ten months. Imports of beef from the "down-under countries" has increased by 60 per cent. We know what this has done to the selling price of beef in Canada. Actually the cow-calf operator here has been the victim of circumstance over the past several years. For this reason it is of fundamental importance that the government, through the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and the Department of Finance, bring in policies which will alleviate the situation.

The producers cannot stand it much longer. They are going just as far down the road as they can go. Many are going into bankruptcy and selling their herds because of the fact that there has been a fait accompli; they are finished. What will happen if the government does not bring in policies to encourage production? The consumers of Canada will either have to depend on world markets or go without. That is a serious choice to make, and now is the time to adopt policies which will be of benefit to producers and which will ultimately benefit consumers.

Just today in the Toronto Globe and Mail there was an article referring to Canadian manufacturing. When I say "Canadian manufacturing" I am not only referring to textiles and other forms of manufacturing but also to the manufacturing and processing of beef.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is in the House this evening, and he is well aware of the difficulties we have in Canada due to transportation problems. It is a costly venture to bring produce from western Canada to the eastern market in either Toronto or Montreal. It would be far better for us in western Canada today if we could market our produce in the northwestern United States, but that is a sophisticated market. You cannot send live cattle; in most cases you cannot send carcasses down. We have to cater to that market, and this is where government policies come into play. This is what we are dealing with in this ways and means bill. We should be developing ways and means of encouraging western producers to capitalize on that market in the northwestern United States.

By the same token, the market available to the western producer in Toronto and Montreal could be turned around and supplied by the producers in the eastern United States. However, this would require reciprocal trade arrangements, and this is where this minister and his compatriots, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance, are falling down. They are not using any innovative process to bring this about, and this is causing a great many problems for the beef production industry in Canada.

I referred earlier to an article in the Globe and Mail of this morning, and this is what it said:

> Canadian laws make it difficult for small and medium-sized companies to get the required financing for growth and as a result "we're developing a nation of very few corporations," Peter Harris, president of A. E. Ames and Co. Ltd. of Toronto, says.
> He was referring to companies beyond the venture capital stage as "the people in that business (venture capital) tell me the problem is finding attractive deals. They think if anything there's too much venture capital."
>
> To emphasize the problem, he questioned what secondary manufacturing operations can survive in Canada, as even companies that have an established market have serious financing problems.
> Mr. Harris acknowledged that the Canadian business environment, with small markets and high labour costs, is a problem not easily solved. But governments should help, he insisted, for example by the "recognition of the importance of investing laws for insurance companies, banks, trust companies and pension funds.

This is a good industry. It is a capable industry, but it is an industry which is facing decline. Unless there is some support forthcoming from the federal government we will not have an industry in the very near future. Korea, Taiwan, and Hong Kong are shipping in something in the order of $250 million worth of textiles every year. We have watched Sweden completely lose its textile industry.

I have seen problems relating to the lack of controls particularly in my community. The Government of Canada must realize that if it lets this industry go down not only will many jobs disappear but, as has happened in other industries, prices will soon rise to a point above that which Canada is producing the products for and, if this happened at a time when our outside sources could be cut off, we would be in serious difficulty. There is a need for quotas and regulations. Other countries much larger than ours, for example, the United States, control their imports, and we certainly should.

While I have mentioned the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien), I wish to make one last remark in this particular area. It seems a sad state of affairs when the president of a multinational corporation in Canada, which has a large plant in the city of Belleville, cannot get to see the Deputy Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce before 10 o'clock in the morning or after four o'clock in the afternoon, and even then has to wait six or seven weeks to get an appointment to talk to him. This is typical of the type of approach we have had from this government.

I want to spend a very few moments discussing another industry. I am glad the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is in the House because I wish to talk about agriculture. It seems to me this is so basic an industry that we should certainly be giving it top priority attention, yet in Prince Edward county just south of Belleville some 4,000 acres lie fallow this year. The vegetable producers in that area presented their case to the Department of Agriculture months ago. They made it very clear what is necessary to keep this industry alive. The answer from the Department of Agriculture, which really was no answer, was that they wanted to wait to see what the pack looked like. Of course they did not get a whole pack but they got a very good pack of what there was, and now the processors are selling the product for $1 a case less than it cost them to produce it.

● (2010)

These producers are not trying; however, they are quite prepared to meet a fair market. As a matter of fact they are prepared to take on the major producer, they are prepared to take on the United States on an open market basis. They are capable of meeting that kind of competition but they are not capable of meeting competition from other countries such as the ones I mentioned earlier, from countries like Taiwan and others where the rate per hour is less than 10 per cent that paid in Canada, and the cost paid by producers for the raw product is less than half that being paid in Canada.

We know that at one time there was a commercial strawberry crop in Canada. Without support, that crop vanished completely. The consumer in Canada is paying a whole lot more for strawberries coming in from abroad. Since there is no competition here, they will have to pay what the market will bear.

At one time there was a binder twine industry in Canada. Again, with no support from the government, the industry folded and, as every farmer in the country knows, they are now paying over four times for binder twine what they paid seven or eight years ago.

Meeting with many of the members of our caucus right now in this building are members of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association. I do not intend to intrude on the areas under the jurisdiction of my colleague, the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave), who knows that industry particularly well. Let me just say that they have presented to us the case they put to the federal cabinet recently for a fair and responsible beef import law. The government has seen fit to do absolutely nothing about it. They are not only the laughing stock of the world but they are taking the butt of the criticism of world beef producers because not only are they not protecting themselves but they are causing chaos in the rest of the world market.

Finally I should like to speak about an area of agriculture about which I know a little, namely, the dairy industry. We have had so many problems in the dairy industry this year that it is not even funny. Early in the year the Minister of Agriculture decreed that we had to stop producing milk. A few days ago, the quotas were increased. Surely the Minister of Agriculture knows that on the south end of a north bound cow there are no taps. You cannot turn them on and off again.

It takes a lot of time to bring an animal to milk production, and you just do not turn it on or off that quickly. In my particular part of the country where the finest cheese in the world is produced cheese factories are now finding that they are only producing five days a week instead of the normal six days, and very soon they will have to cut down to three days a week because of shortage of milk. I make no bones of the fact that I accuse the cabinet of doing this maliciously. We are now importing something in the order of 50 million pounds of cheese a year, and I suggest that two years down the road, with the shortage of cheese right now, there will be a shortage of well cured old Canadian cheddar which is so popular. Sure enough, that will be the justification for importing more cheese.

What I have outlined very briefly are the problems that I have encountered in Hastings and Prince Edward counties. I am confident that they are multiplied in every area of small manufacturing and in the rural agricultural industry throughout the whole of Ontario. After listening to my colleagues I am reasonably certain that the same is the case in the rest of Canada. If you multiply the problems I have outlined throughout the whole of Canada, you will have some idea of the great problem with which we are faced.

Looking at the throne speech I see one of the answers which the government puts forward is that it is prepared to create jobs directly in some locations. This is not only not the answer previous agreements. Safeguards would now provide for the timely detection of the diversion of significant quantities of nuclear material for the manufacture of nuclear weapons or explosives or to purposes unknown, and for the deterring of such diversion by early detection.

From 1970 on, safeguards continued to develop. Nuclear suppliers, who have certain generally defined obligations under Article III of the NPT, consulted for a number of years to develop the complex technical details of those international safeguards. In 1974 one major phase of this development was reached when a substantial number of supplier countries reached a consensus on their obligations and notified the IAEA in some detail of their interpretation of their obligations. Subsequently a number of bilateral discussions have been initiated by Canada to examine the question of safeguards in great detail. It is my understanding that there have been diplomatic discussions of a sensitive nature and in such cases it is up to the participants, if they so wish, to outline their role and policy.

Since Canada is a founding member of the NPT we, in conjunction with all other non-nuclear weapon state members, have IAEA safeguards applied to all of our nuclear facilities. Our position is fully consistent with the developed consensus that restricts transfers of certain equipment, materials, and technology to those countries from which we have formal governmental assurances which exclude uses which would result in the production of any nuclear explosive device. These transfers would also trigger the application of the safeguards system of the IAEA, and their retransfer to any third country could only be done on the basis of the consent of the Government of Canada.

These safeguards also apply to items covered for their useful life as well as the subsequent generation of any nuclear material which might be produced. Agreements are in place to deal with provisions for mutual concurrence on the arrangements which a recipient might wish to reprocess, store, use, transfer or retransfer any plutonium or highly enriched uranium that is covered. Standards of physical security are covered. Canadian policy is also progressive in its promotion of other international co-operative means for non-proliferation such as internationally controlled regional fuel centres.

These are policies in effect and which are shared by other supplier countries concerned about the problem. What we have seen develop is a consensus expressed in unilateral form by a number of countries to accept certain safeguard principles in all cases of nuclear exports to non-nuclear weapons states.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I ask if the House would be willing to consider the suggestion made by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) that this bill retain its position or, if it cannot be at the top of the list, at least that it stay as No. 5 under Public Bills so that further discussion can be had at a later date?

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, although I did not hear the original remark by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), our general inclination would be to deal with this matter in the normal course. It is of course a subject of great public importance, but we expect the subject matter can again come before the House of Commons in a variety of ways. I think we should deal with it in that fashion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In other words, the hon. member is saying no.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): There is no unanimous consent. The hour for private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CUSTOMS TARIFF

MEASURE TO AMEND THE CUSTOMS TARIFF

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that Bill C-15, to amend the Customs Tariff, be read the second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, the hon. member for Hastings has the floor.

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, when the hour for the consideration of private members' business arrived I had just completed a discourse on the problems relating to the lack of government intervention in the tariff field and other fields in respect of certain industries in and around Hastings county.

For a moment I wish to talk about another industry which is hard-pressed throughout Canada at the present time. In my area there are a number of textile related industries, manufacturers of clothing. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce does not appear to be taking any action in this area under its new minister from Quebec despite the fact that there are some 200,000 jobs in Quebec in this industry; actually almost one out of every four working people is engaged in this industry. There would seem to be a lack of good will on the part of the government which has trading agreements with some of the underdeveloped countries where wages are less than 10 per cent of those in Canada. We have the highest wages in the world in this particular industry, and at the same time are faced with lack of interest on the part of the government in this particular field.

The parliamentary secretary says that it is difficult to get everybody to agree, and I admit that. It is not easy to deal with all the countries that manufacture reactors and sell uranium. I hope the time will come when we will get this kind of international co-operation. However, I submit that we ought not to hide behind the fact that we have not been able to get all of the nuclear countries to act in concert.

There is an old saying which goes like this: "I can't do everything, but I can do something, and what I can do, by God's grace I will do". I plead with the government and the members of the House to face up to this moral issue, to let this bill go to committee, and to let the members of the committee discuss this question to see whether it is not possible, either in the terms of this bill or in an amended bill, to put on the statute books of Canada the kind of binding safeguards which, in so far as it is legally possible, will prevent reactors that we sell to other countries from being used for the ultimate destruction of mankind.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) and the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) that this is indeed a very important matter which the government takes very seriously, that of nuclear proliferation in the world.

It seems to me that many of the objectives outlined in clause 3 of the hon. member's bill have already been satisfied. He proposes that our exports meet the minimum criteria of the International Atomic Energy Authority. Of course that is so. Clause 3(2) refers to the re-export of spent fuel rods and would prohibit the use of fuel which has gone through a Canadian reactor to be further processed. These are the standard requirements of our export agreements at the present time under the International Atomic Energy Authority, the NPT and, of course, the nuclear suppliers group. Such objectives are applauded and encouraged by all Canadians because they naturally want to ensure that our technology, our reactors, and uranium fuel are used for peaceful purposes.

The bill proposes that we bring before parliament every agreement regarding the sale of nuclear technology, nuclear fuel, and nuclear equipment. It seems to me there would be many practical problems in doing this. Think of what is involved if every box of valves which could be used in a nuclear reactor, every agreement for the sale of every kind of equipment used in reactors, or every agreement for the sale of uranium had to be brought before parliament for consideration.

Under our traditional parliamentary practice treaties have been executed by the executive branch, the governor in council. Under our British parliamentary traditions it has not been the practice to bring treaties before parliament for ratification, such as they do in the United States and in other jurisdictions.

● (1750)

The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands suggested that the treaties which we have now, the International Atomic Energy Agency agreement, the NPT, and the nuclear suppliers' arrangements and safeguards are completely meaningless. The hon. member is very eloquent and capable of very descriptive language, but surely he goes beyond all reason in saying that the safeguard arrangements which we have in the world are completely meaningless. Ever since the beginning of the nuclear age, Canada has been dedicated to a role of peaceful purposes for its technology, reactors, and uranium fuel.

A great deal of the public discussion continues to display a profound lack of knowledge and comprehension of the complexity of the problem of non-proliferation, of the important and far-reaching efforts deployed internationally to solve this problem effectively and of the vast progress achieved in recent years. I feel quite strongly that if this parliament, through some fault of its own were to enact the views expressed by the opposition, this could well be harmful to the active and effective pursuit of an international consensus on safeguards.

I should like to recall that during the debate on nuclear exports last March the then Secretary of State for External Affairs explained at length the pre-occupations of the government in steering a course that permits reaping the full economic benefits of nuclear power while preventing nuclear weapons' proliferation. However, I feel it important to elaborate on these issues and repeat, if necessary, some of the basic principles which have produced a Canadian safeguards policy which is the most stringent and demanding in the world today; principles which have given Canada leadership for safeguards in international meetings.

First, it must be emphasized that national and international safeguards standards have never been static. They have been in continual evolution since the first nuclear co-operation agreements were entered into in the early 1950's, and have developed steadily through innovations made by Canada and other suppliers, through elaborate and detailed consultations, and through international commitments such as the NPT and the consensus among suppliers reached at London last year. Present day levels of safeguards represent the degree of stringency which the major nuclear powers are prepared to enforce. But these are not static either. They represent a threshold from which further progress will hopefully be achieved.

The development to today's high standards has been difficult. The establishment of the International Atomic Energy Agency in 1956 was the initial step to promote multilateral safeguards régimes. At first early safeguards were primarily applied to small isolated reactors rather than to interconnected facilities. This initial system of the Agency was then further defined and extended in 1965, 1966 and 1968. Here the safeguards system was again oriented to individual facilities rather than to the fuel cycle as a whole, but each facility bears the full weight of safeguards.

Then in 1970 international consciousness had developed sufficiently to culminate in the achievement of the Non-Proliferation Treaty. Under this agreement safeguards took on specific technical objectives as opposed to the generalized statements of "peaceful purposes" which were embodied in possible safeguards so that the people of Canada can sell a CANDU reactor in good conscience and with complete assurance that it will not be used for warlike purposes.

It is true, as the parliamentary secretary has said, that the government has attempted to impose safeguards. But in the main those safeguards are meaningless; they represent nothing more nor less than an exchange of opinion accompanied by no sanctions, no arrangements to enforce them or take retaliatory action if commitments are not kept. I believe the legislation before us would help tighten the safeguards. It is true that the only answer, ultimately, is an international agreement under the United Nations, or an international agreement signed by all the nuclear countries so that sanctions could be imposed; those who sell nuclear reactors and nuclear technology could immediately impose sanctions against any country which broke its commitments. However, if such an agreement is impossible at the present time, the legislation proposed by the hon. member for Don Valley is surely far superior to anything the government has suggested or done.

This legislation would require that any agreement signed with countries securing a nuclear reactor would involve, on their part, compliance with the latest criteria established by the International Atomic Energy Authority. I myself would go much further. I should like to see a receiving country required to sign and ratify the non-proliferation treaty.

This legislation would require that in any agreement between Canada and a purchasing country the receiving country would agree to Canada controlling the disposition of the radiation wastes—it could bring them to this country or take whatever action it wished. Moreover, the recipient country should not be able to re-export any of the nuclear technology or nuclear fuel, and would be forbidden to acquire a reprocessing plant. This is the nub of the whole question, Mr. Speaker.

Countries such as Argentina, South Korea, Pakistan—and now Brazil—have all been negotiating with France or with West Germany for the purchase of a reprocessing plant, and it has been said many times in this House that there can be no purpose whatsoever in acquiring a reprocessing plant except to extract plutonium, enabling the nation concerned to manufacture nuclear bombs.

The legislation which has been put forward forbids the purchasing country itself to construct a reprocessing plant and use the nuclear waste from the reactor. I might add that it is not difficult to construct a reprocessing plant. Scientists in India have themselves built a reprocessing plant. As the former secretary of state for external affairs admitted in the House, Argentina has already built a small reprocessing plant which it says is for experimental purposes only.

I think the most important part of this proposed bill is that it would require the government, prior to signing an agreement for the sale of a nuclear reactor, to table the documents in the House, to send the matter to a committee of the House of Commons and Senate, which must report to the House within 20 days so that the House would have an opportunity by vote to agree with or reject the proposed agreement.

The parliamentary secretary has put forward two objections to such an arrangement. First of all, he says that the matter of entering into treaties comes within the royal prerogative. I would remind him, first of all, that a declaration of war comes within the royal prerogative. Way back in the twenties the Right Hon. Mackenzie King himself pledged that no Liberal government would declare war on its own, that any declaration of war would have to come from parliament, and he carried out that pledge in 1939. Surely this is equally important. Such an agreement could precipitate war in some part of the world. The signing of an agreement to sell a CANDU reactor to some other country, particularly an unstable country in a troubled area of the world, is equally important and ought to be submitted to parliament.

I know the old nineteenth century argument that the executive has the right to make treaties and that, if the House of Commons does not agree, it can vote no confidence. Well, with the majority that this government has and which many governments have had and others may have in the future, that is no safeguard.

The other argument is that the voters can reject them at the next election. It will not be much protection for humanity, Mr. Speaker, after you have sold a nuclear reactor and you find the recipient has used it for warlike purposes, to ask the electorate then to deal with the government. The damage has been done.

I was amazed at the final argument that was put up by the parliamentary secretary. He said that if we had to delay the sale of a nuclear reactor until parliament dealt with the matter, it would damage our credibility and—I took down his words—"we would lose trade advantages". I repeat, Mr. Speaker, "we would lose trade advantages". If the parliamentary secretary is speaking for the government, the government should be ashamed to say that trade advantages are more important than having the elected representatives of the people given an opportunity to say whether or not Canada should place in the hands of another country the power to devastate their countryside and possibly to precipitate a nuclear war.

A nuclear war, Mr. Speaker, is not like a conventional war. Conventional wars have laid waste countries, and devastated cities. But a nuclear war has given man the capacity to destroy all life on this planet and to leave it a burnt out cinder revolving in space. Surely on a moral issue as vital as this the government is not going to refuse the elected representatives of the people a voice in determining whether or not such a formidable and important step should be taken by the Government of Canada.

I say with great seriousness to members of this House that this is not a question which should be dealt with on any political basis. I assume that members in all parts of the House have a deep social conscience as to what we as Canadians are doing with this terrible power which has been placed in our hands.

NPT to share with countries signatories to the treaty the results of its activity in the field of nuclear energy to contribute to the fast development of that form of energy, not only in developing countries but also in advanced countries whose traditional energy resources are being depleted. If our country does not meet its international commitment, it could certainly create a disenchantment concerning the NPT that could have the unfortunate effect of encouraging many countries to withdraw from the agreement while some others could abandon any plan to join.

Lastly, Mr. Speaker, I shall mention the leading role played by our country in the north-south dialogue in which we try, with many countries, to find answers to get through that difficult transition period in the energy field. Since the traditional supply sources are being depleted or becoming less accessible at the same time as we are getting through a crisis caused by an unprecedented increase in oil prices, we should try to find such answers to contribute to the balance of the world economy. Nuclear energy is still a vital alternative that must play an important part in this transition period by relieving the international tension and offering a fair choice to the poorer countries. At the same time, the use of nuclear energy by advanced countries reduces the use of oil and is beneficial to developing countries which lack the resources required to be valuable competitors on the international oil market.

Mr. Speaker, those are additionnal details about our international commitments which I wanted to set out on the occasion of the introduction of Bill C-205 by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies), and which I wanted to submit to the consideration of this House. These additional details complement numerous others put forward to underline the necessity to shoulder our responsibilities not only towards Parliament but also on an international level where we have a part to play and commitments to fulfil.

Mr. Speaker, as long as we do not have any worthwhile alternative to this precious source of energy that nuclear energy is, we will not be able to prevent the international community from gaining accesss to it. On the contrary, we must go on working to introduce still more efficient controls and prevent the transmission of material and equipment considered as critical. Surely this government's policy is not unalterable in matters of nuclear exports, as evidenced by some recent decisions like the end of our cooperation program with India.

My time is up, Mr. Speaker. I would have other remarks to add, but I want to give other hon. members the opportunity to express themselves.

[English]

● (1730)

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of giving my wholehearted support to Bill C-205 and to commend the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) for having introduced it.

[Mr. Leblanc (Laurier).]

The whole question of the proliferation of nuclear weapons is not a matter which ought to be dealt with lightly. There ought to be no gamesmanship to talk this bill out so that we do not have to consider it again this session. I hope all parties will agree to give unanimous consent so that if this bill is not dealt with by six o'clock it will be set at the head of the list again in order that it may be referred to a committee of the House where it can be studied further, and from which it would be reported back to us. I make this suggestion in the belief that the matters raised in the bill before us constitute the greatest moral issue of our time.

In the past 50 years science has made more advances than were made by mankind in all the previous thousands of years in which man has inhabited this planet. The progress of science has been so rapid that social ethics and public morality have not had an opportunity to bring to bear upon the results of research the type of restraint which is necessary if man is to survive.

The two men who were the leading figures in splitting the atom, Dr. Albert Einstein and Dr. David Oppenheimer, were tremendously perturbed that this devastating power which they had placed in the hands of the people of the world might be used for destructive purposes. Thirty years ago only the United States possessed this atomic capacity. Later, the Soviet Union acquired it. As long as the two superpowers maintained a balance of terror we had some feeling of safety. Today, however, nuclear capacity has been extended to nation after nation and all the indications are that yet more nations are acquiring the capacity to produce nuclear weapons.

Canada has a major responsibility in this area because, through the work of our scientists, we have produced the CANDU reactor—and for this they deserve credit; it is probably one of the safest reactors. But it is also the reactor from which it is easiest to make use of the radiation wastes for the extraction of plutonium from which nuclear bombs can be made.

I was surprised to hear the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Leblanc) say that only one or two countries had tricked us. That is the point of the legislation we are considering. We only need one or two countries to trick us. As a matter of fact, every time a country tricks us and uses the CANDU reactor to produce plutonium and nuclear weapons, it stimulates its neighbour to do likewise. We already have the example of India which used the reactor to produce an explosive device, a course of action which has encouraged Pakistan to do likewise. The fact that we are selling a reactor to Argentina has set Brazil in that country's footsteps. This process of proliferation is going on at an alarming rate.

The parliamentary secretary has put forward an argument which the former secretary of state for external affairs regularly advanced, namely, that Canada has a responsiblity to ensure that the scientific know-how which we have acquired is shared with less developed countries. I believe we do have such a responsibility but I claim equally that the developing countries also have a responsibility, which is to accept the tightest ments we are negotiating with other countries. Such a process would jeopardize not only our international credibility but also the resulting commercial advantages of such a sale, treaty or contract.

In this field, as in many others, the executive power must be able to assume its responsibilities by retaining the initiative of its negotiations with regard to nuclear exports. Needless to say, that initiative is conditional upon certain criteria which, in the last few years, as all hon. members know, the present government made it its duty to elaborate with a view to preventing the proliferation of nuclear arms, which threat must command the utmost awareness and which, because of the importance it is given, on a daily basis must hold the complete attention of those who are responsible for formulating that policy.

Indeed, because we are aware of the extreme importance we must give our nuclear policy, the former Minister of External Affairs, the Hon. Allan MacEachen, endeavoured to explain to the House, during the debate on March 23 last, the guidelines of our policy as well as its inherent characteristics.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to refer to that debate since it gives an account, in clear and specific terms, of just how concerned this government is about checking the proliferation of nuclear arms while allowing those developing countries, that have the infrastructure and the guarantees of security required for cooperative agreements in that field, to have access to the technology we are in a position to supply them. I have no intention of reviewing the agreements put forward over the years in this regard, but I would like to remind you that the government has the duty of assuming its responsibilities in such a way as to make sure that we participate actively in the economic development of those countries—those with which we deal—while at the same time respecting our international responsibilities to avoid nuclear arms proliferation. It is certainly not by staying aside and burying our heads in the sand that we will finally help efficiently reduce nuclear proliferation after considerable investments were made to develop a nuclear technology which, despite its risks, solves, in an adequate and economical way, the crucial problems we are facing.

We must pursue our endeavours to establish additional mechanisms to ensure the peaceful use of this new source of energy, and I think the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) raised the problem with Bill C-205 because it seems that occasionally some countries do not always make a peaceful use of the products we export, in opposition to the agreements we made with them.

I suggest that it is a challenge we have to take up, which the present government did with great success—I say this in spite of the little experience I have gathered in this area up to date, I must confess—since our nuclear technology remains accessible to those who express a legitimate need to purchase it and the will to accept some safeguards and conditions which rule out any possibility of nuclear explosion or other forbidden uses. It is because we are convinced that the NPT is still the best way to fight against nuclear proliferation that we decided to be more active, in order to complete the adherence to the treaty of the fifteen-odd larger countries which are not yet signatories to it.

An eventual decision by Canada to end its sales of nuclear reactors would surely remove a major factor in the foreign policy of Canada at a time when our country is considered as playing an active role in such a delicate sector. We will never insist enough on the fact that proliferation can be prevented or at least reduced as a long term danger only through coordinated and constant action by the various supplier countries and their customers. We must realize that we are not the only country which supplies nuclear materials and we do not have all the customers in the world; other countries are clients or suppliers.

Now unless there is complete and total agreement among all those countries, it is rather difficult, as I said, to reduce the long term danger. Withdrawal of Canada from the international market would only remove the influence and the role which we have played up to now not only in restricting the danger of proliferation but also in being party to drafting more effective international safeguards. It is with that mind that Canada has lately made increased efforts to set more rigorous standards in such key sectors as reprocessing, recycling, storing, selling or reselling plutonium as well as enriched uranium. Nobody ignores that as a country exporting nuclear reactors Canada has been in a position up to now to contribute to the development of solutions in those sectors, which solutions have gone a long way, in my opinion, toward clarifying the situation and lessening international stress.

I am quite delighted in that respect at the recent statements of France's Higher Council for Foreign Nuclear Policy and at the indications given in American newspapers as to the future direction of the American nuclear policy which show more restrictive policy as far as exports are concerned while insisting on the necessity of a common and coordinated rather than unilateral approach to the problems of proliferation. Of course we are encouraged by these signs which are, in several cases, similar to criteria already included in the Canadian nuclear policy and which are consistent with principles of the utmost importance for us in Canada.

Such an initiative in countries among the more active in the nuclear field can only encourage us to continue our action. On the other side, we can only recall that on another occasion, the adoption of much stricter safeguards in the nuclear policy endorsed by the government in December 74, our action was also exemplary since it encouraged the group of supplier countries known as the London Club to adopt guidelines similar to ours in 1975. During the same period we have witnessed the development of existing international consultation mechanisms and a greater cooperation to encourage supplier countries to control more efficiently their radioactive material reprocessing plants by looking for practical arrangements concerning the management of plutonium.

I shall also remind hon. members that Canada has also committed itself, according to the terms of clause 4.2 of the

In addition, the bill requires that all safeguard agreements be permanent and, most importantly, that every safeguard agreement signed by the government of Canada comes to parliament for ratification before it is signed. Any proposed agreement would have to be submitted 25 sitting days before the intended date of signature to a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate. That committee would have to report back to the House, and within 20 days that agreement would have to be called for debate in the House, and within five days after being called it would have to be put to a vote.

Surely, it is the responsibility of every member of parliament to be concerned about this matter. Surely, it is common sense for something which is so important to the future of mankind to be debated in our House of Commons. Even in the United States, where there is a complete separation of the legislative and administrative functions, legislation has been passed so that there has to be positive affirmation on the part of Congress before there can be an export of nuclear technology. Surely, we cannot accept the proposition that we must make this nuclear technology available to less developed countries immediately in order to help their development. It defies logic to suggest that it is more important for an underdeveloped country to have a nuclear potentiality today—even though we do not have the necessary safeguards—than it is to wait until such safeguards can be developed in an effective fashion. Indeed, the argument that we are only selling to less developed countries is strange in the extreme when we talk about exporting to Japan and had negotiations with Iran about nuclear reactors.

It is argued that if we do not make nuclear technology available, other countries will. But surely that cannot be the issue. On something as important as the risk of weapons being developed by other countries, we cannot decide the issue on the basis of commercial considerations. It is a moral question. All that Canada brings to the field of international negotiations is its moral position and surely Canada has the moral responsibility of slowing down the possible spread of nuclear weaponry.

If one wants to use the commercial argument, there is need for power development in this country. We can use all the nuclear reactors we can build and all the heavy water we can produce domestically. However, aside from that, it is wrong for Canada to be involved in the export of nuclear reactors when we know that the product of reactors can be used—because it has been used in India—for the development of atomic weapons.

I urge everyone in this House to allow this bill to go forward—and not to talk it out—so that years from now every member of parliament can say that when he or she was called on the issue of what Canada should do about the spread of nuclear potentiality, he or she had an opportunity in the House of Commons or in the Senate to vote on it.

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I must say first of all that it is the first time that I have the honour and the pleasure, since my appointment as Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to take part in a debate in this House about the responsibilities of that department. I also wish to commend the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) for introducing Bill C-205. Of course, I agree with many points raised by the hon. member who took it upon him self to introduce such an important bill.

However, before taking a definite stand on the bill, I do not think we should, as a government, impute motives to those countries we deal with in that area. It may have happened on one or two occasions that some countries played dirty tricks on us following a sale. But I do not think that principle applies generally to all the countries we deal with. I feel it is also important, Mr. Speaker, to remind this House of a few highlights of the Canadian nuclear policy and to express my views on the constitutional question as to the necessity of securing parliamentary ratification, and I refer to section 5 of Bill C-205, for the export of nuclear fuels, equipment and technology.

As hon. members know, it is not customary for this House to seek parliamentary approval in order to ratify a treaty or to commit this country through international agreement or treaty. In Canada, and the hon. member for Don Valley knows it better than I do, the constitutional authority to enter into arrangements such as treaties is part of the royal prerogative commonly exercised by the governor in council. Such ratification is therefore incumbent upon the executive. However, this government has always made it a point, and I want to emphasize this, to distribute to the hon. members any important documents related to nuclear exports. Besides, it is in this spirit that on January 30 last, the executive tabled copies of the nuclear co-operation agreements with the Republic of Korea and the Republic of Argentina. It is in this same spirit of cooperation that we have tabled the statements concerning Canadian policy on safeguards to clear the matter and provide hon. members with important and necessary information about government action in this field and to supply them with all the data which, in our own view at least, are relevant to those agreements and policies.

Furthermore, hon. members—in particular the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies)—have doubtless realized, upon reading those various papers, that several prerequisites such as financial conditions, safeguards and some more comprehensive ones of a commercial order must be met at the same time to enable us to arrive at a consent confirming their acceptance. I do not see how we could act efficiently if we had, after all those conditions have been fulfilled, to wait again for several months for Parliament's approval. We all know that it sometimes takes a long time for a bill to be passed in the House. Sometimes we have to wait several months for Parliament's agreement before signing those business contracts and agree-

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley) moved that Bill C-205, respecting the parliamentary ratification of the export abroad of nuclear fuels, equipment and technology, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think everyone on all sides of the House of Commons would agree that there is no more pressing matter facing all mankind than the capability of various nations to develop nuclear weaponry which has the capacity of destroying all mankind. The existence of this capability has grown tremendously during the last two decades. Immediately and for a decade after world war II only a few nations possessed the capability of destroying the world with nuclear bombs, and the balance of power at that time made the possibility of such destruction taking place reasonably slight, but today, as the Stockholm Peace Institute has reported, 35 countries will have nuclear weaponry by 1985. The institute reports, further, that with 35 countries having the capability of exploding nuclear weapons, the possibility of maintaining peace, and indeed the world, until the end of the twentieth century is slight indeed.

It seems to me that it is unfortunate that Canada has become one of the nations which is in the forefront of the spread of nuclear technology throughout the world by pressing the sale of our nuclear reactors to various countries. We know all too well what happens when we sell these nuclear materials without appropriate safeguards. In our sale of nuclear devices we have been, essentially, double-crossed by India, which is now one of the dictatorships of the world. We know that unless there are appropriate safeguards it is almost certain that some of our nuclear reactors will be used for other than peaceful purposes.

I was astonished to read in the newspapers today that it is hoped that one of the things which will come out of the trip of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to Japan is an opportunity to sell more nuclear reactors to that country and to thereby contribute to the possibility of power struggles in the Far East. We have supplied a reactor to Argentina, one of the most unstable countries in the world, and while I want to debate this point as a moral issue and not as a commercial one, it is interesting to note that we not only supplied a reactor to Argentina but we did it at enormous cost to Canadian taxpayers. We are supplying reactors to Korea, a country which spends more dollars per capita on weaponry than any other country in the world. We know that the safeguards on the export of nuclear technology are not adequate. In the report issued by the Atomic Energy Commission it is stated that the safeguards are not adequate at the present time. Therefore, it seems to me to be common sense, if nothing else, that every member of parliament should be concerned about what has to be one of the most important issues in the world today.

The bill I introduced, and for which I ask the support of all hon. members, proposes—and I do not see how anyone can oppose this—that Canada not sell nuclear devices, as defined in the bill, nuclear reactors, technology and fuels, to any country which does not sign the safeguards agreement of the International Atomic Energy Agency. Second, the bill calls for the return, if appropriate, of spent fuel from the reactors to Canada. This is the only true safeguard in the control of the use of nuclear reactors at the present time. The bill would forbid the re-export of any technology, equipment or fuel from a country which buys them from us, and it would prohibit the importing country which buys a nuclear reactor from us from acquiring a reprocessing plant, so that it cannot take the material which comes from our reactors and reprocess it into a fuel which can be used for a weapon.

One of the issues of debate today is the fact that France is trying to sell to Pakistan a reprocessing plant. There is no reason in the world for any country to buy a reprocessing plant if it does not want to get involved in the weaponry business. That is what a reprocessing plant is all about. We should not allow our reactors to go to a country in which there is any possibility that a reprocessing plant will be acquired.

Some comments have been made this afternoon by various members who have preceded me on the question of perhaps never needing tariffs, the controversy of free trade versus fair trade. I should like to think that in many instances we do not want tariff protection, and shortly I will dwell on a few of those instances. But in fact industry in Canada is about one-tenth the size of industry in the United States, obviously because the population, the community to which we sell our goods, is one-tenth the size of that in the United States. Unfortunately, however, in many of the industries, and a few in my own riding, the unions have brought the rates and the benefits which they are claiming up to well above their U.S. counterparts. As a consequence, their ability to compete is drastically hindered.

I should like to make a point regarding the small community in the southeast portion of my riding which until about two years ago had produced a very fine product. They sold it in Canada reasonably competitively, but when the market in this product depressed in the United States, the major American producers merely had to slough off about 10 per cent of the surplus production to completely dominate the Canadian market at a price with which the Canadian producer in my riding could not compete. There was no protection. This factory was particularly efficient for its size. It was relatively new, it turned out a good product; but without protection it was unable to compete in the depressed market.

The effect of taking away some 325 jobs in a small community of about 1,500 souls in total was devastating. It has been quite a while since we have had such a blow. But the federal government would not protect the industry, and when the industry finally closed its doors and people were out of work, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion would not assist in any way because they said unemployment was not high enough. I do not know how high it has to go in a small community before they are prepared to intervene.

Let me say, in passing—and I am not in particular trying to blow my own horn—that we were successful. I was instrumental in bringing a new industry to the vacant factory. They are not going to have as many men as were there before. This new industry is part of a large international industry. They will be able to compete. The government of Ontario saw fit to help them with $500,000—but, once again, DREE was not prepared to help. Fortunately, their product is one which comes under the auto pact and they will not need the tariff protection which the previous tenants had. The only help we got from the federal government is that which you get when you start any plant under Canada Manpower in support of the initial salaries of employees.

The problem of getting a plant like that started brings up another point to which I would like briefly to refer in passing. In the throne speech, a great to-do was made about the Federal Business Development Bank. It is the same thing as the Industrial Development Bank, the same bird, the same feathers—and, frankly, it will produce the same kind of fertilizer as the IDB. With their usurious rates, their unreasonable collateral requirements, and their shameless loss record, they do nothing to encourage Canadian industry. A few years ago I spent a good deal of time going into that matter in some detail, and I do not intend to do so now.

Closer to my own home, right in the city in which I live, is an industry that for many years has been competitive in the market. About two years ago they brought to my attention a problem they were having with the Department of Finance. They pointed out that one of the major products which they use could be brought in from France and Italy at a lower price than they could produce the product in Belleville, simply because of the taxes that were applied to the product made in the Belleville plant. I took this matter up with the then minister of finance and, suffice it to say, since then I have a file many inches thick. In effect, the department has acknowledged that there is a problem and that sooner or later they will do something about it. I hope they will do it soon because that plant has announced they are closing their doors, which they will do in December of this year, at which time they will lay off some hundreds of employees. They will start to package their product in a much smaller warehousing operation in Belleville.

While it is not entirely the result of this tax problem, in my opinion the correcting of the tax problem expeditiously would have prevented them from taking action for the time being. Once again, in 1967-68 they were assisted by the provincial government when they were having some problems, and they fulfilled their responsibilities to the provincial government and were kept running for another seven or eight years. That extra employment in a small community the size of Belleville, which numbers some 35,000 people, is worth-while.

These are some of the things that the new minister faces. Since I have left ten more minutes of my time, Mr. Speaker, and it is nearly five o'clock, I would like to call it five o'clock and continue after dinner.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrester) —Industry—Reduction in work allotted Nova Scotia aerospace companies under Aurora program; the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan)—Manpower—Local Initiatives Program—Request for extra funds for Cape Breton area; the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert)—Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—Allegation of bias in programming—Suggested investigation.

A deficiency payment program of $11 million to $12 million brings total returns well within the level of the previous year and fully meets the intent of the act.

The intent of the act had to be changed if it fully met that. The minister talked about bringing it to the level of the previous year. However, production was away down the previous year, and then up the next year. We can talk about dollar values, tons or pounds. The dollar value was similar, on a much higher production: the reason was competitive prices in another country, and imports into Canada.

● (1640)

So far as apples are concerned, about five years ago we had a balance of trade with about one million bushels going each way. Today, two or three times as many apples have been coming into Canada. This is what we must compete with. It might be said that much of this is caused by the higher wages paid in Canada, or because of the higher interest rates. If this is the case, and we have higher wages and higher interest rates, and therefore higher costs in Canada, the government has a great obligation. We hear about border crossings in respect of food, especially along the border of British Columbia. I suspect this situation exists all across Canada. I am sure it exists in Ontario, except that the news people are not watching the situation as closely there. Certainly, the situation exists in British Columbia. Can we have it both ways? Can we expect to have higher wages and take this money out of the economy and buy our food more cheaply across the border? Surely people will do this. People are built this way, and this is what they will do.

The government, however, has an obligation. It was here when the situation was created. The government allowed this to happen and has an obligation to do something about it. The fruit farmers in the Okanagan tell me that they can grow fruit as cheaply as anyone. They have to pay more for spray. They go across the border and bring it in, in order to become competitive.

There is another area where they cannot do this. I refer to the matter of water for irrigation purposes. The producers in Washington state, in the United States, use pretty well the same water we use, except that we must pay more for it because we have had the expense of putting in the dams and the systems to hold it back in the hills, and they pick it up when it is down in the mainstream. Because of this, the Americans do not have the same expense that we have. We can go across the line and bring in equipment duty-free, if someone will sell it to us. They do not want to guarantee it when it is to be brought in here. There are problems in respect of parts, and so on. But we can compete and grow products just as cheaply, even in the face of many of these barriers. But after the products leave the farm gate there are many added costs such as those I mentioned in respect of transportation and higher rail costs.

The farmer does not want a stabilization program. If rail costs are higher in Canada, and if the railways have decided they will take all that the traffic will bear, stabilization should be placed on them and not on the backs of the farmers at the farm gate.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to this House that the time for action is here. We cannot carry on in this manner. I do not think we will need $350 million worth of make-work programs. It is said that part of this money is to come from the UIC. The UIC is in a deficit position. How can the government get anything from the UIC? We need healthy farm, textile and manufacturing industries in Canada in order to create jobs for Canadians. Let the market go to work and let the manufacturers go to work creating jobs. If the government wishes to spend $350 million, it should spend it to help put our trade in the right perspective. It should not put people out of work and processors and manufacturers out of business. We should put them in business. I welcome the fact that this bill is to go to the committee state, where we will be able to debate it further.

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I, also, intend to intervene briefly in respect of Bill C-15, the Customs Tariff bill. I will attempt to limit my remarks so that I can close by five o'clock. At the outset I should like to take the opportunity, because I did not speak in the throne speech debate, to publicly express my congratulations to you, sir, in your new position. We will look forward to your wisdom and guidance from the chair, and I am confident that all members will respect your judgment.

Tariffs can usually be equated with protection. Had I spoken on the throne speech, I would have spent most of the time talking about the problems of small industry and other production facilities in the Hastings area which are in difficulty. This bill, however, gives me a much better platform from which to express these views. Also, had I spoken in the throne speech debate I would have had a few words to say about some of the members of the cabinet. I will, for the most part, limit my thoughts to the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand) who has been appointed Secretary of State for some ambiguous purpose of assisting small industry.

It is very commendable that all of a sudden the government has realized that small industry has a place in Canada and that the people who work in small industry are taxpayers who would benefit from a strong, industrial community in Canada. I believe, however, that the minister will end up having the sympathy of most members of the House because, frankly, I am not at all sure what it is he is to do. True enough, the throne speech devoted a whole paragraph to the high regard in which the government holds small industry. It seems that the minister will be doing quite a bit of travelling. He is already on his way to Russia. Frankly, I do not think he will sell much over there. I am not sure what they could teach us in the way of free enterprise. In his new position, I think the new minister should attempt to obtain some co-operation. It seems to me he could co-ordinate some of the awkward functions of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Department of Revenue, the Department of Regional Economic Affairs, and last, but not least, certainly the Department of Finance. If he did this, he would really be doing something.

asked what we expected to trade to Japan, what they needed from us, the answer was, "CANDU reactors and STOL aircraft". I do not think we need to trade-off our natural resources in this manner. I do not think the Canadian people believe we have to, either. We do not have to be soft in our trading with other countries which need our natural resources. It is because they are necessities to they them that we can be hard.

Duties and tariff policies in Canada have not kept pace with inflationary tendencies, and to further aggravate the problem there have been two duty reductions in the past four years on virtually all food items. Let me put on the record some examples of Canada's cheap food policy. In 1975 this country imported 83 per cent more dairy products than in 1973. Likewise, in 1975 Canada imported 370 per cent more berries than in 1973. Some 58 per cent more apples were imported in 1975 than in 1973, 200 per cent more honey, 74 per cent more jams, 294 per cent more chicken, 33 per cent more canned ham, and 1,086 per cent more tobacco, though only a few us eat tobacco.

In 1974, Canada imported five million pounds of chicken from the United States, which amounted to less than one-tenth of 1 per cent of Canadian production. In the same year, 1974, this country exported 12 million pounds of chicken to Cuba. However, in 1975 Canada had literally no exports of chicken—so hon. members can see just how fast we were kicked out of Cuba. Nevertheless, we imported over 12 million pounds from the United States, making an increase of nearly 250 per cent in the import figure. This year the trend has continued at an ever faster rate. Figures up to June, 1976, show that Canada has imported 22 million pounds of chicken from the United States. Year-end imports are estimated to be 50 million pounds, up 400 per cent over 1975 and equalling 7 per cent of Canada's total production.

This is the sort of thing being experienced by Canadian food processors today, Mr. Speaker. Food processors and canners in Canada are in very dire, desperate straits. They are going out of business because they cannot compete with imports of canned, processed products from other parts of the world. Last year, the big canning companies and some of the big chain stores sent their labels to Australia and the United States to be put on canned goods in those countries and sent back to Canada.

As far as the manufacturing was concerned, the only job that we in Canada got was the labels. Possibly that was because of the bilingual requirement on labels. That could not be done there, so it was necessary to have it done here. Just think of the number of people in Canada being put out of work as a result of this. What is happening in the farm production area? This is the trend in Canada today. This government must accept responsibility for this trend. They have made it very easy to do this kind of thing. There is no real farm policy or food policy, only a cheap food policy. When these companies go out of business, we will be subject to the whims of other countries. We do not have the kinds of policies that would do anything in the event of a national emergency.

Fresh fruit and vegetables are another example of the bad position that producers are in across Canada. There are unnatural barriers in these areas as far as tariffs are concerned. Transportation cost on fruit coming from the Okanagan Valley to eastern Canada are as much as one cent a pound higher than the rates being paid by United States competitors. They have this one-cent a pound advantage even though part of their shipping is done on Canadian railroads. When the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) visited that area about a month ago, the producers asked him about this and the minister replied that if they could ship cheaper on American railways, that was the way they should do it. I submit that that is not a very good way for this government to be talking to producers in Canada.

Stripped potatoes coming into British Columbia have been affecting potato prices. These potatoes are stripped off crops in the United States. They are not put on the American market because that would upset their market price. Instead, they are sent to Canada, upsetting our market price. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) was asked about this. He replied that the government would stabilize prices. Our producers want to operate on a competitive basis. They do not want stabilization. However, they have had to accept stabilization because they do not get anything else from this government. Because of the cheap food policy, the producers must accept large hand-outs from the government. I wonder whether Canadians would not pay the price rather than have their tax dollars go toward stabilization. How long can we operate in this way?

It is time that we took a serious look at the automatic surcharge. This has been used in Canada before, but we seem to be araid of it. I believe the automatic surcharge would stop this kind of situation. When we stop to take a good look at the situation, we see that the consumer does not benefit. The consumer does not get the product any cheaper. The one who gets it cheaper is the person who brings it into Canada. By the time the consumer gets it, it is the same price as the top Canadian product. With these cheaper imports, the Canadian producer cannot sell without cutting his price down to that of the import price. However, the price to the consumer does not change. There are many examples of this. One occurred here in Ottawa last year. Even though the consumer had to pay a good price for apples, the producer received very little. This is what happens in the marketing system.

Stabilization is open to many abuses. All the producer wants is to get his money from the marketplace. Early last spring I asked the minister about Canadian apple producers having to pay higher transportation costs than their competitors in the United States. I pointed out that this was a trade barrier. The minister replied that if we could prove that, he would provide stabilization. Well, it was not hard to prove. However, when it came time to get stabilization for apples, the cabinet used the gimmick of limited production at both the top and the bottom. I wrote to the minister, and he replied:

make the statement that it could, if it wished, manufacture that product in Canada—although they have not done so and, in my opinion, do not intend to do so—will not do our own entrepreneurs any good.

These matters are undoubtedly very complicated, but it seems to me we have given the civil servants in the Customs Tariff branch a great deal of leeway for a long time, and that the average member of parliament ought now to look into this question and decide whether it is time for most of them to retire or else justify their existence.

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to talk on the Customs Tariff bill. I should like to express my appreciation of the eloquent speech delivered by my hon. friend from Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) on this subject. He set the tone for the debate which should be carried on with respect to this subject.

These are times in which many Canadian industries are facing serious hardship. The minister maintained, in the course of his speech, that the Customs Tariff left room for accommodation in cases of genuine hardship. But although we know that a lot of hardship is being experienced, we cannot find any use being made of this leeway, or whatever the minister had in mind. At the present time, a serious situation faces those engaged in the manufacture of textiles, shoes, mobile homes, boats, farm products, electronics and a number of other commodities.

I read in the newspaper the other day that the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) was calling for a federal inquiry into the price of food in British Columbia. The hon. member for Windsor West was minister of consumer and corporate affairs at one time, and I would remind the House that this is a situation which has been developing over many years; it did not arise overnight. Moreover, it is not confined to British Columbia. I wonder why he is not calling for a federal inquiry into prices across Canada generally, including the price of hardware, chemicals and equipment where the cost of importation appears to be disproportionately high.

Let me take, as an example, the sprays we use in orchards in British Columbia. These are manufactured in the United States; they come up through the valleys of Washington into the valleys of British Columbia, and they are duty-free. A year ago it was impossible to buy them without paying 30 or 40 per cent more than the price just across the border. In other words, the border crossing, without duty, raised the price by between 30 and 40 per cent. This is not a tariff barrier, Mr. Speaker; it is a border barrier, one which is manufactured, nobody knows why. I know this to be the case because fruit growers in my area were crossing the line to buy their sprays in the United States: it was the only thing they could do if they were to remain competitive with fruit growers in that country.

Some might say that a situation of this kind is not the responsibility of the federal government. In my opinion, it is. Why does this sort of thing happen? Situations of this kind need to be investigated, as well as the high price of food, and I hope the hon. member for Windsor West will urge the government to broaden the inquiry he proposes and extend it to other areas. Indeed, he should have taken action along these lines when he was minister of consumer and corporate affairs.

As far as imports into Canada are concerned, the two industries most seriously affected are farming and textiles. Canada is the only country in the world which fails to protect farm products. We are aware of the great outcry among Canadians in favour of preserving our farmlands, the general feeling that no more of it should be paved over or otherwise destroyed. Yet that has been the response of government, especially the federal government? We are the only country in the world that does not protect farm products. How can we have one without the other? Many other countries of the world have goals for food production which are intended to maintain the level of production and guarantee a reasonable supply of a particular commodity in times of international emergency. We do not have any such thing and are trying to preserve farmland.

Other countries have tariffs and quotas and they also have trade barriers. I think the worst of these is the trade barrier. The hon. member for Timiskaming said that we should not close our border and make it easy to create a situation where we accommodate companies and industries that are not competitive and efficient. I agree with that. I do not think anyone is asking that our borders be closed so that we can accommodate inefficient industries, but what we do want is the same kind of deal that other countries have.

As far as trade barriers are concerned, I have made reference to a certain spray which is manufactured by another country. This is the sort of thing that happens in Canada, yet our government sits idly by and does absolutely nothing about it. Other countries have quotas to protect their farming industry. If their farming industry becomes endangered, they erect trade barriers, just as the Japanese have done against apples from British Columbia. They say these apples have codling moth and therefore they cannot accept them. We have proved beyond a shadow of doubt that their apples also have it, but it does not matter; they do not want our apples anyway. That is the kind of trade barrier they have erected. We do not do this sort of thing. Canada can rightly be described as a saint in a world of sinners. I say, let us have free trade. I think most Canadians are not against free trade so long as it is fair trade.

The hon. member for Timiskaming also said that if we had free trade in this world we could produce, manufacture and compete. I believe that is very much the case, but we cannot do so under the structure we have in the world today. We do not have fair trade, yet we are calling for free trade. Under this guise of free trade, Canada has a cheap food policy. We trade-off our raw materials and natural resources with another country in return for food and textiles, the basic commodities that we have in Canada. That is the kind of trade-back we get on almost every occasion when we want to sell a CANDU reactor or a STOL aircraft. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has been in Japan on a trade mission, and when it was schedules and rates are established and say, "These rates are sacred." It is almost as if the tariff structure were the unchanging Bible or Talmud of the Tariff Board.

I wish the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) would involve himself less with agriculture. It has been said that we turn to the Minister of Finance when the agricultural industry is in difficulty. I think international agriculture would be a lot better off if governments stayed out of the field, and I mean provincial, federal and other governments. All over the world governments are involved with agriculture. All over the world governments pay subsidies to agriculture. Every time a subsidy is paid, or one country's tariff is adjusted, the effects are felt in all other countries.

I agree with the Minister of Agriculture that, whether we like it or not, we are dealing in an international market and are affected by it. What the Australians do with their beef affects the market in the United States, Canada and even the Common Market. Beef sales affect the sale of pork, eggs and other protein foods. Therefore, changes in one part of the world in one commodity affect markets in many other countries in that same field. Yet it is difficult to make changes; and changes, even when needed, are slow in coming. The Egg Marketing Board, previously mentioned, contends that it has the right to limit the number of eggs coming into the country. I think they should have that right. Before they can exercise it, they must go to the Minister of Finance. He must allow the required time to go by before acting, consult people in the field, check with the interested people in GATT and then introduce changes. But the effect of such changes may be detrimental, not advantageous. It seems to me that such action is not really what we need. If we are to compete with other countries we must process more of our raw materials in labour-intensive industries.

Mr. Speaker, factories in the area I represent deal probably with every country of the world. They export diamond drilling equipment and diamond drill-bits to almost every mining venture in the world. It has not been easy for them to compete. Whenever a new development, new process or new piece of machinery is introduced, they immediately run up against our entire tariff structure. They have survived because they are probably more competent than others in the field anywhere in the world. My point is this: we must increase our capacity for employing people, because many of the commodities we used to export from this country are no longer abundantly available.

It was easy to run up a favourable balance of trade when you could export oil as if it were going out of style, or ship out in a totally unprocessed state this country's mineral wealth. Now, many commodities are in short supply. We now know that we do not possess endless resources of coal, oil, iron ore as well as other basic commodities. Therefore, we must process these commodities in this country and make sure we do it in a way which will allow us to compete.

If we lived in a world of free trade, a world in which governments did not intervene in the market, I am sure that we could, to our great advantage, trade with other countries around the world. Unfortunately, we do not live in such a world. We have earned money with raw material exports, but have spent large sums in subsidizing commodities exported.

Let me give an example, Mr. Speaker. We, in northern Ontario, a few years ago were shipping iron pellets to Pittsburgh. It cost us 2½ times as much to ship the iron out as it did to bring in the clay necessary for making those pellets. Why did this happen? The Ontario government owned the railway serving the area and heavily subsidized the goods going out. I did not subsidize anything coming in. If we are to compete, we must do better than this. Too many road-blocks have been thrown up by governments. If we are to compete, we must tear them down. I related the example of the glue. Mr. Speaker, in that case the company hired an expert consultant from Germany. He had been the consultant to almost every plant on the North American continent built to make that kind of product. But our Tariff Board was not sympathetic. It said that we would eventually be able to develop that kind of glue in this country; therefore, the tariff on it would not be removed. That tariff added considerable cost to the finished product and made it harder for companies using the glue to remain competitive.

This story has been repeated in other areas. For example, in my area a manufacturer wanted to erect a plant in which he could assemble stoves prefabricated in the United States. The stoves were to be sent to my area; they were not built in Canada, Mr. Speaker. Yet the tariff cannot be removed because, they say, another stove manufacturing company possesses a number of patents in the same field and maybe intends to manufacture that commodity.

• (1610)

In my view, the tariff structure of this country has not been advantageous to the small manufacturer. Looking down the list, I find myself wondering whether the minister can explain why the tax is 35 per cent in some cases and 10 per cent or 5 per cent in others. Take, for example, preparations of cocoa and chocolate in powdered form. The British preferential tariff is 10 per cent, the most favoured nation tariff is 10 per cent, and the general tariff is 35 per cent. What protection are we seeking? It does not seem likely to me that we are competing in growing cocoa.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Processing.

Mr. Peters: I don't know. Maybe Cadbury makes it up and sends it somewhere. My point is that it would be interesting to look into the background of some of these things, to consider them in relation to their effect in Canada on the prosperity of the manufacturing industry, especially in areas which are employment-intensive. Manufacturers in this country find themselves obliged, at least in the initial stages, to import some of the material they require. We might find that the Customs Tariff Act was operating to the advantage of firms outside Canada rather than to the benefit of our own companies. I say so for this reason: if Shell, for instance, does not manufacture a product in Canada, the company can manufacture it in the United States or IndoChina or somewhere else. For Shell to

● (1550)

We should also examine the question of the purchase of men and women's clothing and children's outer clothing. Is there a Canadian-made man's raincoat on the market today, or even a few? Why not? They have been pushed off the domestic market by well-made imports. These imports are not the shoddy goods they were at one time when cheapness and shoddiness were synonymous. Another problem has joined the two problems of inflation and unemployment, and that is intensive trade. Three of the four feared horsemen are now riding hard on the horizon. What will the fourth be, and where will the Canadian economy be when it arrives?

These remarks are rather wide-ranging, I admit, Mr. Speaker. We could examine the schedules in detail, but we will do that at committee stage. I think these proposals, minor as they are in themselves, should be considered carefully by the minister. I hope he will invite his colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien), to examine the situation with him. Perhaps he could also consult the Minister of Agriculture about a national food policy: are we going to have a cheap food policy, or a dear food policy? If it is to be a dear food policy, what will be done about cheaper imports? These are the problems we face, and I must underline their seriousness to hon. members.

With these remarks, Mr. Speaker, I trust we have set the tone of this debate and that this House will give serious attention to these problems, particularly the third one I mentioned. It is not something that is over the horizon; it is with us today and has been with us for a considerable length of time, but I regret that outside of some symbolic gestures, such as the trip of the Prime Minister to Japan, it does not seem to have been recognized. Perhaps something will come out of his visit to the Common Market. These gestures mean that we in the House of Commons, and our counterparts in the other place, must turn our attention to the solution of the problems. Unless we solve them, the hope expressed in the motion on which we voted earlier this afternoon is mere puffery, a figment of someone's imagination and dangerous demagogy at worst, because there is nothing with which to pay.

We cannot look after the social structures of this country unless we have a strong economy on which to base them. At the moment, the economy is not strong and it is not getting stronger. Unless we take drastic steps we will have much greater difficulty in the near future than we have had in the past.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the previous speaker that our economy is not strong and it is not getting much stronger. I disagree, however, with his contention that we can solve this problem with additional changes to the Customs Tariff arrangements. I was not able to ascertain whether he favoured a closed market or an open market, but I agree that for years we have played with this Customs Tariff question. It may turn out to be the deciding factor in what happens to our developing industries in Canada.

I also agree with him that we must develop a more labour-intensive industrial strategy for the country, but if it is not developed on a sound basis we will be in serious trouble. We must realize the dangers of closing off our border and providing the kind of protection that would allow the development of inefficient domestic industries. In the end, the cost would be greater than the advantages.

In the years that I have been a member of parliament it has become apparent to me that there are two areas of the Canadian economy of which members have no knowledge and over which we have no control. The first of these is freight rates. It has been said that in order to do anything about freight rates we would have to bring an expert in from the United States because we do not have anyone who understands the tariff and freight structure involved in moving goods about this country.

The second area is the Customs Tariff. Of the thousands and thousands of tariffs we have, it seems to me that any changes made to them are almost entirely made at the wish of the civil servants who administer them. I shall cite an example from my constituency, Mr. Speaker. A small, innovative company holds patents on a number of processes in its field and qualified for a DREE grant. As an aside, I received an invitation from the patent office to a celebration on the issue of the millionth patent in this country. Some of these patents have been valuable and show our ability to develop industrial processes and items.

Going to the Tariff Board is something like going to China, Mr. Speaker: I choose China because I do not understand anything about its character structure or language, and our tariff structure is something like that. This company asked for the removal of duty on a certain kind of glue imported from the United States. The Tariff Board sought outside opinion and eventually turned down the application because Shell claimed they knew how to make the glue and would make it some time in the future. Because it might be made in Canada in future, the duty could not be removed. The glue is an expensive part of the covering used on flake-board in this country. Interestingly, some companies were buying the flake-board from manufacturers in Portland, Oregon, and shipping the finished product to major television and stereo manufacturers in New York. But the Tariff Board could not see merit in reducing or removing the tariffs which drove up the price of this product. Consequently, the particular company of which I am thinking made less money and was less competitive than similar companies making the finished product in other countries. This sort of thing happens all the time.

● (1600)

Who will correct the situation? Nobody will, apparently. Nobody, including the minister, will talk to the people on the Tariff Board. The minister is a smart man; he has learned another language, but I do not think he can talk in tariffese, or whatever you may call the language spoken by the people on the Tariff Board. They do not understand the problem. They merely look at the thousands of commodities for which further ahead. Other countries specify that financial documentation shall be of a special form and in one language, and they will be handled through certain specified financial institutions.

One can be as cute as one wants in non-tariff barriers: it is like punching a pillow. Therefore, it is quite easy for these various countries to impose quotas or introduce non-tariff barriers, and Canada does it, too. We negotiate quota restrictions with, shall we say, a big club. In the field of quota restrictions on textiles we are acting like every other country in the word. There is not a country in the world which does not protect its textile industry. The only industry which usually gets greater protection is the agricultural industry, and here in Canada that is certainly the case. My colleagues will tell us just how far we go to protect our agricultural industry. It is not a matter of whether the tariff is high or low; it is a question of whether there is actually a national food policy.

● (1540)

It may be suggested that I am straying some distance from the Customs Tariff, but I am not. Second reading, particularly of a bill to amend the Customs Tariff, is the appropriate time to discuss whether there should be a continued reduction of rates or a temporary increase which may become a permanent increase; whether there should be quota restrictions, which have been resorted to by the Minister of Agriculture with regard to meat; or whether there should be quota restrictions which are negotiated with a number of third world countries with regard to synthetic textiles.

In outlining the problem, I am not going to say that I have a solution, but there is a situation with regard to Canadian manufacturers and Canadian supplier and it is the responsibility of the government to respond. But there has been a deafening silence from the ranks of the government. It is no answer to ask what we should do. Hon. members opposite have prided themselves on the fact that the Canadian people have put their confidence in them. Well, let them assume their responsibilities. Liberal governments have been in office now for 13 years and the problem of trade imbalances on the commodity side has been ever present. There has been the odd year when there has been a trade surplus, but those where the years when we were exporting petroleum, natural gas, iron ore and semi-processed nickel in vast and increasing quantities.

The Liberals have been the ones who have created the big surplus on the commodities side, but let us deal with labour-intensive commodities. Let us deal with Canadians in small towns. It is not big cities like Toronto, Montreal, Edmonton, Vancouver, Winnipeg, Calgary or Hamilton which face the major problems. I invite hon. members, particularly hon. members from the province of Quebec and from small communities in Ontario, to tell us at great length the difficulties occasioned by the closing of this plant or that business employing 60 to 100 employees. These are things which knock the heart out of those communities.

We are at the core of these problems, but how do we handle them? Should the answer be to offer palliatives? Is the answer to offer grants? Is the answer to keep pumping hundreds of millions of dollars through a DREE program, which is just like putting sand into a sack which is full of holes? What good does it do to pump into a town a few hundred thousands dollars to, so to speak, rehabilitate a business or establish a business which goes out of operation in three years time? There has to be a much more fundamental attack on the problem. We can have the best commodities, the best machinery, the best clothes and the best shoes, but if we cannot sell them either abroad or at home we cannot build enough shelves upon which to store them and we do not have enough money to finance all that inventory.

I challenge hon. members to listen not only to other hon. members in this House but also to other Canadians who are equally concerned about this problem. Let us hear from newspaper editors who are all too ready to provide quick solutions and advice. Let us hear from academics in universities who are also quick to tell parliament, and particularly the government, how to do its business. All Canadians must participate in solving this problem.

We have been caught up in a fight against inflation. In budget debates going back to the early 1970s, and even before, I and my colleagues have spoken about the dangers of inflation and how it was a real cancer which has rooted into the Canadian economic body. Thank goodness I have the speeches on record; it is not a matter of merely saying, "I told you so". Our warnings were brushed aside and pooh-poohed. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that we lived in the best of all possible worlds. Where are we today? We have gone through a violent spasm with regard to inflation, and we are not over it by a long shot.

In addition to inflation we have an unemployment problem. I would like to hear suggestions from members of the New Democratic Party and others who profess a professional interest in unemployment other than raking leaves. We can all rake leaves at minimum wages, but we get nowhere. One can say that investment can be directed to produce anything, but unless those goods and services which are produced are bought, and unless they are produced at economic and competitive prices, the whole exercise is a sham and a hypocrisy. We want to hear about solutions now. I ask hon. members to offer suggestions, because centred on these tariff changes we are looking at problems of international trade. Let us remember that international trade is not just selling goods abroad.

There is another item with regard to international trade, and that is the matter of imports. I referred to people in the lower mainland of British Columbia driving across the border to buy their groceries. I am sure that the same is being done in the Windsor-Detroit area and everywhere along the United States border where there are major shopping areas close by. There is presently a constant drive by Canadians to buy on the other side of the border at worth-while prices. That is lost business; it is all imports. Maybe it is a good thing to be able to buy Dare biscuits manufactured in Surrey, British Columbia, at 20 cents per pound cheaper in Bellingham, Washington, but I think it is a problem that we have to tackle.

particular connotation with regard to the expectations of this government. Perhaps they think that by lowering this tariff item they might establish better relations with the United States.

Mr. Paproski: Do you like Jimmy Carter, Don? Is that what it is?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I like them all.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Many of my colleagues have indicated to me that they wish to speak on particular items. Several speeches will be made, for instance, in respect of meat and meat products, fruits and vegetables, textiles and certain types of machinery. But basically I say to the minister and to members of this House that concern has been expressed with increasing tempo by leaders in industry and business and even by responsible trade union officials who experience a great deal of apprehension and discomfort at Canada's trade position today, particularly with respect to manufactured goods and semi-processed goods, by reason of the fact that Canada has an increasing deficit in its commodity account.

● (1530)

Serious predictions are being made by people who know, people who are in the export business, that our position will worsen a great deal. The only commodities that have continued at a high level have been raw materials, petroleum and petroleum products and extractive, primary products. They are not the ones that provide a high labour content in this country. One may wonder why we have a nagging and persistent high level of unemployment in this country in particular areas. The primary reason is the decline in the actual volume of goods—because inflation has many victims elsewhere—that are sold not only abroad but right here in Canada, arising out of Canadian manufacturing and processing. We have figures, and my colleagues can speak in greater detail and with more knowledge on this than I can, but I think I should outline our stand with regard to international trade.

The minister has not spoken to us about what the government has foreseen with regard to the trade development pattern, not as of yesterday but in the three or four years during which we saw inflation rise at a gallop. The government took the rather extraordinary flip-flop step of imposing controls about a year ago. I wish the minister would listen to colleagues from other regions in the country, members representing areas on the Pacific coast, for instance. I wish he would listen to the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) with regard to the price of groceries in the lower mainland of British Columbia. Where are people shopping in that region? They are going across to the United States where they can save up to 40 per cent on groceries.

Mr. Peters: Is there no duty on groceries?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): There is duty on certain groceries coming back to Canada, but on a $70 purchase it is about $1.50, when already $20 to $25 has been saved. It is peanuts. They provide for peanuts in this bill. The point that I want to emphasize is the rapid escalation in wages in this country, not only wages of manufacturers producing goods but wages of management and executive salaries. These are all expenses added to the cost of goods and services. It is not just the man who is on the lathe whose wages have gone up, or the wages of the truck driver. It is also front-office salaries.

We have also seen tax and utility bills from the municipalities. Municipal taxes go up by fantastic amounts. Even last year municipalities increased fees by hundreds of percentage points in the belief that they were not bound by controls. Some people have lost their sense of proportion. That applies not only to those on the workbench; it applies also to government administrators at all levels in this country. Here, at the federal government level, we have departments exempting themselves from AIB guidelines. For instance, we see officials of the Ministry of Transport increasing fees to a level far in excess of any guidelines. All these increases can be seen in the increased costs. They are translated into the price of goods that we sell abroad and the price of goods we sell to our Canadian consumers. Is it any wonder that we are now finding more intense competition from suppliers abroad, imports in traditional Canadian markets, in foodstuffs, wearing apparel, manufactured goods, from distant corners of the world?

We have keener competition from the United States, from Japan and the very able manufacturing industry in Taiwan. We sit here crying in our beer about it. Every day there are delegations and trade associations which come to parliament to see the government. They want help in selling textiles, shoes, electronics or call for restrictions and quotas. We see delegations from the agricultural industry as well. I should like to see where we do not have supply management and restrictions. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is the greatest one for imposing restrictions on imports. Why is that? For example, when medium eggs in Bellingham, Washington, are selling at 66 cents, the Egg Marketing Board puts them on the market at 89 cents. Does it cost that much more in Canada to produce a dozen eggs?

We talk about Canada facing a dilemma. It is here that we are facing it. On the one hand there was the Kennedy round of some years ago which resulted in a number of reductions in tariffs. These are rates to which Canada adhered but, like a foolish virgin, we entered the league and said "Yes, we will reduce many of our customs rates." But other countries, many of them our major trading partners, particularly in Europe, resort to non-tariff barriers. So it is downright foolishness to think that we would gain by a reduction in certain rates. It is naive, because Britain, for instance, does not have to do anything; it can lower its rates on the importation of generators, something which Canadian manufacturers are well able to do. But let a Canadian manufacturer go to the electricity board in the United Kingdom to get the specifications on which to tender: the board replies that on instruction from the government, tenders are restricted to the sufficient number of British manufacturers in existence. Canadian manufacturers cannot even get the specs to tender, but Britain could have lowered the customs rate, and likely did, yet Canada is not any herring to 10 per cent, from 5 per cent, which is tariff item 12200-1. The purpose of this change is to correct a printing error that occurred when the budget papers were being prepared.

The second change is an amendment to tariff item 69605-1 which provides free entry for a wide range of goods including scientific preparations imported by hospitals and other institutions. The provision for scientific preparations had been restricted to preparations used directly in scientific research. However, a recent Tariff Board decision had the effect of broadening the interpretation of this provision to the point where virtually all preparations used by hospitals and other institutions would be entitled to duty-free entry. Many of these preparations are available from Canadian producers. The amendment will restore the coverage of this item to that which prevailed before the Tariff Board decision. These changes came into effect on October 14, the day following the tabling of the new ways and means motion.

The principal provision of this bill will continue, until June 30, 1977, a number of the temporary reductions which were first introduced as an anti-inflationary measure in the budget of February 19, 1973, and which had been scheduled to expire on June 30 of this year. Several food products have been added to the list of items on which temporary tariff cuts were in force prior to June 30. These include fresh pork, ham, bacon, macaroni and other pasta products. In addition, deeper cuts than those previously in force have been made on certain canned meats.

I should mention, however, that tires, tubes and scissors have been dropped from the list because it was judged that the tariff reductions previously in force were causing serious problems for Canadian producers and adversely affecting employment in Canada. The tariff cuts on these products were simply allowed to expire, as previously scheduled, on June 30, 1976. If it should turn out that the temporary tariff cuts on any of the products, particularly with regard to imported meat products, that remain in the package are causing genuine hardship to Canadian producers or workers, there is authority in the bill to restore tariff protection to previous levels by order in council prior to the proposed new expiry date of June 30, 1977.

In the food sector, reductions are being continued on such products as raw and refined sugar, certain fresh and processed vegetables, a number of fish products and prepared cereal foods and biscuits. In the non-food sector, reductions are being maintained on such products as drugs and pharmaceutical products, kitchen and dinnerware, plumbing fixtures, hand-tools, photographic equipment and sporting goods. The temporary reductions proposed in this bill affect imports of consumer goods valued at about $1.6 billion in terms of 1975 imports. Close to half of these are in the food sector, about $727 million worth.

As was mentioned in the budget speech, the continuation of these temporary tariff cuts until June 30, 1977, should not prejudice our position in the multilateral trade negotiations. The reductions are temporary and they will not be the base from which we will be negotiating in Geneva. The bill also provides for the introduction of a number of miscellaneous tariff changes. I think it would be fair to say that the most significant of these miscellaneous amendments is the introduction of tariff item 42701-1. This new item provides for the withdrawal from Britain and Ireland of the 2½ per cent British preferential tariff on compressor sets and electricity-generating sets. Commencing on May 26, the day following the budget, the most favoured nation tariff of 15 per cent became applicable. Remission of the duty will still be allowed, however, under the machinery program in respect of any sets which are not available from Canadian production.

The tariff on this machinery is being increased because Canadian manufacturers were finding it increasingly difficult to compete against imports over the 2½ per cent tariff. A number of major contracts for this kind of machinery are expected to be let in the next few years, and the government decided that inasmuch as we are no longer obliged to accord preferential tariff rates to Britain and Ireland following their joining the European Community, the time had come to provide Canadian manufacturers of compressors and generating sets with the same level of protection against imports from these sources as they receive against imports from other countries. The study of the tariffs on other machinery which was announced in the budget speech is now well under way. Officials of the Department of Finance have solicited the views and comments of interested Canadian firms on the pros and cons of continuing the preferential rates for such machinery.

The other miscellaneous tariff changes proposed in the bill are designed to facilitate imports. They include provision for the continued duty-free entry, on a temporary basis, of aircraft and aircraft engines and of certain printing plates and irrigation equipment. A number of new tariff items are being introduced to provide free entry for such goods as low-protein and protein-free products and other special dietary foods required by persons afflicted with hereditary metabolic diseases, and—this is of particular interest to the petroleum sector—computer tapes containing seismic data. Finally, it is proposed to amend the wording of several existing tariff items either for purposes of clarification or to broaden the coverage.

This is by way of introduction of the bill. We will have an opportunity to look into the items in committee of the whole. I shall look forward to questions by members and will do my best to answer them.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, under normal circumstances one would have expected to deal with the changes not long following the budget debate when matters which had been discussed during the budget debate were still germane in the minds of members. In the interval, however, many months have passed and there have not been many great changes. Shall we say that there is no great value in getting overly excited about this particular bill? It may be a pure accident—and there, again, we would have to be advised by the minister's officials as to what they meant—but bearing in mind the electoral contest taking place to the south of us, there is a change in item 1805-1. It is the reduction in the tariff on peanut butter. I am wondering whether that has any

NATIONAL DEFENCE—COMMISSIONING OF WAR ARTISTS

Question No. 376—Mr. McKinnon:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 5,714 of the First Session of the 30th Parliament, which stated in part that four artists participated in the Canadian Armed Forces Civilian Artists Programme (CAFCAP) from 1968 to 1975 (a) what are the artists' names (b) how much was each paid?

Hon. Barney Danson (Acting Minister of National Defence): (a) Mr. Richard Nevitt; Mr. Peter Spuzak; Mr. William Houstoun; Mr. William Johnson. (b) These artists were not paid. There were no costs other than those shown in part 1 of question No. 5,714 published in Hansard No. 335 page 15078, dated July 6, 1976.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—PERSONNEL STRENGTH AS OF JULY 1, 1976

Question No. 377—Mr. McKinnon:

What was the total (a) regular military (b) reserve (c) civilian strength of the Department of National Defence as of July 1, 1976?

Hon. Barney Danson (Acting Minister of National Defence): (a) 78,114; (b) 21,153; (c) 39,510 (This includes 7,103 term employees).

GIFTS—VISIT OF PRIME MINISTER TO LATIN AMERICA

Question No. 579—Mr. Reynolds:

What were the gifts, and what was the cost of each, the Prime Minister took to (a) Cuba for Premier Castro and any other Cuban dignitaries (b) Mexico for President Luis Echeverria Alverez and any other Mexican dignitaries (c) Venezuela for President Carlos Andres Perez and any other Venezuelan dignitaries and, in each case, how many gifts were received by the Prime Minister and Mrs. Trudeau while on such visits?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Prime Minister's Office is concerned, the Prime Minister received six substantial gifts.

CLOSURE OF DURHAM MEMORIAL HOSPITAL

Question No. 645—Mr. Beatty:

1. Has any request been received from the Government of Ontario for permission to amend the Memorandum of Agreement, dated March 3, 1958 between the federal and Ontario governments as the agreement relates to Durham Memorial Hospital?

2. Does the government consider the agreement still valid and binding on both parties?

3. Would the closure of Durham Memorial Hospital be affected in any way by the Memorandum of Agreement?

4. Has the government made any representations respecting the future of hospitals in Ontario threatened with closing and, if so, what is the nature of such representations?

5. What is the government's contribution to the operation of hospitals in Ontario (a) in dollars (b) as a percentage of the total cost?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Please see answer to Parliamentary Enquiry number 5,747 of the last session, tabled on July 5, 1976 (Hansard Volume 119, Number 334, page 15016).

ART LAING BRIDGE

Question No. 578—Mr. Reynolds:

1. What is the name and occupation of all persons invited to the opening of the Art Laing Bridge?

2. How many were present from (a) the Department of Transport (b) other government departments and what are their names and positions?

3. How many hours were the (a) northbound (b) southbound lanes of the Bridge closed and for what reason?

4. What was the cost of the reception at the Airport Hyatt?

5. Who on the Minister of Transport's Ottawa staff attended the opening of the Bridge and what was their method of transportation to and from Vancouver?

Return tabled.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-15, to amend the Customs Tariff, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-15 is intended to implement the proposed tariff changes which were before the House at the conclusion of the last session in the form of Bill C-95. That bill was based on the notice of ways and means motion which was tabled with the budget of May 25, 1976. As the bill had not been passed when parliament prorogued on October 12, the proposed tariff amendments were reintroduced in a new notice of ways and means motion on October 13. The present bill, which was given first reading on October 22, flows from that motion.

Only two changes are being made to the May 25 motion. The first is a provision which will restore the rate on canned

CIL—EXPLOSIVES AND SHELL FILLINGS

Question No. 372—Mr. McKinnon:

Is the Canadian Industries Limited plant in Valleyfield, Quebec, which manufactures explosives and shell fillings for the Canadian Armed Forces, closing this summer and, if so, what are the government's plans to meet this contingency?

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): The Canadian Industries Limited plant in Valleyfield, Quebec has been closed since late February 1976 due to strike action by process workers. The government has contracts with the Company for both propellant and explosives. At the completion of the current propellant contract, the Company has announced that it will discontinue propellant manufacture at the Valleyfield site. Unless other arrangements can be made for an alternate Canadian source, Canadian propellant requirements will be procured from outside of Canada. Procurement of explosives will continue from the CIL plant. However, should the labour dispute not be resolved in a time frame to meet our contract delivery schedules, it may be necessary to procure some of this material outside of Canada.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—NEGOTIATIONS WITH INDIANS ON CAMP IPPERWASH

Question No. 373—Mr. McKinnon:

1. Are negotiations between the Department of National Defence and the Union of Ontario Indians and the Kettle Point Band, concerning compensation for Camp Ipperwash in an active state and, if so, what was the amount of the last offer made by DND and on what date was it offered?

2. Has such an offer been refused by the Kettle Point Indian Band and, if so, on what date does the Department intend to make another offer?

Hon. Barney Danson (Acting Minister of National Defence): 1. Discussions are in progress to determine an acceptable basis for negotiating the claim submitted by the Band. Various amounts have been considered during the course of these discussions.

2. Discussions are still in progress.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—PERSONNEL STRENGTH AS OF JUNE 1, 1976

Question No. 374—Mr. McKinnon:

As of June 1, 1976, what was the strength of the Canadian Armed Forces and how many civilians were employed by the Department of National Defence?

Hon. Barney Danson (Acting Minister of National Defence): Military Personnel, 78,359. Continuing full-time Civilian Personnel, 32,375. Non-continuing Civilian Personnel, including Seasonal part-time employees and leave replacements, 6,510.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—CBC PROGRAM "THE NATION'S BUSINESS"

Question No. 375—Mr. McKinnon:

1. Was the programme entitled "The Nation's Business" shown on CBC on June 27, 1976 at approximately 11.15 p.m. produced by the Department of National Defence or by the Liberal Party?

2. Was the Department reimbursed by CBC or by the Liberal Party for the use of the Department's film clips?

Hon. Barney Danson (Acting Minister of National Defence): 1. Liberal Party.

4. If no dividends have been paid and there has been no return paid CNR to date, is it anticipated that in the immediate future, i.e. within one year, an attractive return on investment will be paid and, if so, what rate of return is anticipated?

5. Was the investment of CNR money in Intercast S.A. contingent on the successful takeover of Manchester Liners and/or Furness Withy and, if so, were such conditions met?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian National Railway Company advises as follows: 1. Yes.

2. (a) CN holds equity in the form of Swiss Francs with a value of 217,300 Sw. fr. (Approximately $100,000 Canada). This represents 18 per cent of the total. (b) Acquisition was made on 31 October 1975.

3. (a) The anticipated rate of return on the investment is not less than 15 per cent. (b) No dividends have been declared to date and it is not anticipated that profits will be distributed in the form of dividends in the near future.

4. It is anticipated that the value of CN's equity in the CAST Group of companies will continue to increase.

5. No.

LAND FILL COSTS—PORTS OF HALIFAX AND QUEBEC

Question No. 175—Mr. Forrestall:

1. (a) Who provided the 5.8 million cubic yards of land fill used at the Beauport Flats harbour facility at the Port of Quebec (b) what is the government's best estimate of the commerical value of the fill?

2. Was a payment of any type made to any entity in respect of the fill and, if so, how much and to whom?

3. Is the government aware that the Fenco report, Alternative 3, calls for 2,321,000 cubic yards of fill for the Fairview Cove harbour facility in the Port of Halifax-Dartmouth?

4. Is the government aware that a price of $4.50 per cubic yard is indicated for fill for alternative 3 in the Fenco report?

5. Did the federal-provincial task force studying the Fenco report produce a quantity or price different from those cited above and, if so, what were the revised figures?

6. On the basis of the task force report, if different from the Fenco findings, what is the government's best estimate of the land fill cost for the Fairview Cove site?

7. Could the government justify treating land fill costs for the national harbours differently at the Port of Halifax- Dartmouth than at the Port of Quebec and, if so, in what way?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The National Harbours Board advises as follows: 1. (a) The National Harbours Board provided the 5.8 million cubic yards of fill at Beauport Flats as spoil resulting from normal harbour dredging operations. (b) The land fill is evaluated at $1.50 per square foot for municipal taxation purposes.

2. An amount of $4,490,130 was paid to Marine Industries Limited for dredging berths at Beauport Flats, and the spoil used to created land instead of being dumped in the river which would have resulted in increased costs.

3. Yes.

4. Yes.

5. Yes. Quantity 2,250,000 cubic yards. Price $3.25 per cubic yard.

6. $7,312,500 plus contingencies.

7. Yes. The fill at the port of Quebec was obtained as a result of necessary dredging operations. The fill at the Port of Halifax-Dartmouth would be from a land source, acquired specifically for the proposed terminal.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL PROGRAMS AND ACTIVITIES, 1975

Question No. 282—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Was approval given to publish "Federal-Provincial Programs and Activities 1975" and, if so (a) on what date (b) by whom (c) for what purpose?

2. What was the printing cost for each English and French edition?

3. What was the cost in man-years and dollars to design, research, organize and edit the publication?

4. How long did it take to assemble and publish the information?

5. How much of the information already appears in other publications and documents?

6. In deciding to publish the book, what persons or institutions was it felt were not aware through existing information services of material in the book, and which parts had not already been published in existing publications?

7. What unit in the Bureau of Federal-Provincial Relations was responsible for this publication?

8. What percentage of the distribution list was by request from (a) government departments (b) provincial government officials (c) researchers (d) members of the public, etc.?

9. How many copies were printed and who received them?

10. What was the total cost of publishing the document calculating all elements per volume in both official languages?

11. In what vote in the estimates and for what year is the expenditure for the publication located?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): 1. Approval was given to publish "Federal-Provincial Programs and Activities 1975", (a) on June 25, 1975, (b) by Mr. Gordon Robertson, Secretary to the Cabinet for Federal-Provincial Relations, in order to revise a dated publication of 1973. (c) The purpose of this publication is to make available information about federal-provincial programs, and especially about the transfer payments made by the federal government to the provinces.

2. The printing cost for the English edition was $6,600.89, and $1,672.00 for the French.

3. Nine-tenths of a man-year and $19,020.61.

4. Nine months, from May, 1975 to January, 1976.

5. Very little of the information is contained in its present form in other publications or documents.

6. The information in the publication is of particular interest for purposes of work of the federal and provincial governments involved in federal-provincial consultations, negotiations and programs; municipal governments and their various sub-organizations; and to many agencies needing to have a comprehensive knowledge of the programs available to them through the federal-provincial system.

7. The Studies and Research Group of the Federal-Provincial Relations Office was responsible for this publication.

Order Paper Questions

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Total cost: $68,385.42.

OIL SPILL CLEAN-UP OF ST. LAWRENCE RIVER, BROCKVILLE, ONTARIO

Question No. 109—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What has been the total cost to the taxpayers of the Canadian participation in the clean-up of the oil spill in the United States waters of the St. Lawrence River west of Brockville, Ontario in June of 1976?

2. Have steps been taken to recover these funds from those responsible and (a) if so, what steps (b) if not, for what reason and will steps be taken?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Canadian Coast Guard costs for the Nepco 140 spill approximate $850,000 but have not been tabulated in final form. These costs are not divided as being east or west of Brockville, but reflect clean-up along the entire Canadian border that was affected by this spill. Canadian Coast Guard activities were confined to Canadian waters and shoreline.

2. Canadian Coast Guard costs will be forwarded to the United States Coast Guard under the terms of the Joint Canada-United States Marine Pollution Contingency Plan for cost recovery, with the result that the Canadian taxpayer will not be financially responsible for this undertaking.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—AUTOMOBILES SHIPPED TO AND FROM EUROPE

Question No. 161—Mr. Forrestall:

1. For each year since 1970, how many automobiles belonging to service personnel were shipped (a) to (b) from Europe and the United Kingdom by the Department of National Defence?

2. For each year, what number of automobiles were shipped through each Canadian port?

3. Of the total automobiles shipped by the Department how many had origins or destinations in the Atlantic Region?

Hon. Barney Danson (Acting Minister of National Defence): 1. The entitlement to ship automobiles at public expense to or from Europe and the United Kingdom only became effective April 1, 1973. Therefore there is no data available for the period prior to that date. (a) 1973-74, 325; 1974-75, 400; 1975-76, 371; (b) 1973-74, 977; 1974-75, 1,111; 1975-76, 991.

2. Montreal: 1973-74, Eastbound, 325; Westbound, 977; 1974-75, Eastbound, 400; Westbound, 1,110; 1975-76, Eastbound, 371; Westbound, 964; Halifax: 1973-74, Eastbound, Nil; Westbound, Nil; 1974-75, Eastbound, Nil; Westbound, 1; 1975-76, Eastbound, Nil; Westbound, 20; Vancouver: 1973-74, Eastbound, Nil; Westbound, Nil; 1974-75, Eastbound, Nil; Westbound, Nil; 1975-76, Eastbound, Nil; Westbound, 7.

MEDICAL RESEARCH COUNCIL SUPPORT IN NOVA SCOTIA

Question No. 170—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What is the government's best estimate of the dollar level of funding provided by the Medical Research Council of Canada to recipients within the Province of Nova Scotia for each year since its inception in (a) 1975 dollars (b) actual dollars at the time the money was spent?

2. Will any benefit accrue to the medical community of Nova Scotia, and particularly that of metropolitan Dartmouth and Halifax as a result of recently announced changes in the levels of funding provided to the Medical Research Council of Canada and, if so, what are they?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Medical Research Council support for research in Nova Scotia:

Year	In 1975 dollars ($000's) using as inflator the Implicit Price Index of Gross National Expenditure	In current dollars ($000's)
1961-62	333	166
1962-63	344	174
1963-64	448	231
1964-65	590	311
1965-66	749	408
1966-67	1,095	623
1967-68	855	506
1968-69	1,159	708
1969-70	1,447	923
1970-71	1,316	878
1971-72	1,419	977
1972-73	1,275	922
1973-74	1,289	1,018
1974-75	1,243	1,122
1975-76	1,542	1,542

2. In so far as medical scientists in the health science faculties of Dalhousie University in Halifax are concerned, six additional investigators will receive new grants and three investigators holding grants for only part of the current year will receive unconditional grants for the full twelve month period, thus bringing the total number of investigators receiving unconditional grants to the same level as in 1975-76. In addition, the General Research Grants to the deans of medicine, dentistry and pharmacy have been increased.

CNR'S INTEREST IN INTERCAST S.A.

Question No. 171—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Is CNR represented on the Board of Directors of Intercast S.A.?

2. (a) How much equity does CNR hold in this company in terms of dollars and as a percentage of the total (b) on what date was such equity taken?

3. (a) What is the anticipated rate of return on the investment in the first year (b) have any dividends been paid to date and, if not, on what date will they be paid?

(d) With regard to part 3 (a) of Question No. 3,140: 16 prosecutions under the Narcotic Control Act and the Food and Drugs Act for the Department of National Health and Welfare. Two prosecutions under the Income Tax Act for the Department of National Revenue—Taxation. With regard to part 3 (b) of Question No. 3,140: It is not in the tradition of a non-political public service to disclose the names and addresses of officials who performed tasks in the course of their duties.

NOTE: The legal fees paid to Mr. N. D. Dixon of Smith Falls, Ontario for the fiscal year 1974-75 were reported as totalling $15,585.53 in the reply to Question No. 2,232. Further research has revealed a clerical error and the correct amount is $5,585.53.

LEGAL WORK DONE BY MR. N. D. DIXON, SMITHS FALLS, ONTARIO

Question No. 36—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the government officially aware that Mr. N. D. Dixon, a lawyer in Smiths Falls, Ontario, named in the answer to Question No. 2,232 of the First Session of the 30th Parliament as having received government business, was President of the Leeds Liberal Association immediately prior to the time he received $15,585.53 worth of government legal business?

2. Is it the policy of the government to reward those who have served as presidents of liberal associations on their retirement to the position of past president with government legal business?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): 1. Mr. N. D. Dixon of Smith Falls, Ontario was first appointed a legal agent for the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada in 1963. Mr. Dixon has been re-appointed as a legal agent at various times since 1963 in light of the competent manner in which he has carried out the mandates previously assigned to him. He was not re-appointed because of any position he may have held in any association or organization.

2. No.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—AIRCRAFT LOCATED AT SASKATOON AIRPORT

Question No. 47—Mr. Cossitt:

1. How many Department of National Defence aircraft have been located at any time this year at the Saskatoon Airport and, in each case (a) what were the type of aircraft (b) how long and for what reason were they there (c) are the aircraft in storage and, if so, for what purpose and for what reason are they at a non-military airport (d) have arrangements been made for their sale and (i) if so, which ones and when will the sales take place (ii) if not, why have they been removed from service?

2. What was the date that the answer to this question was prepared?

LEGAL WORK DONE BY MR. N. D. DIXON OF SMITHS FALLS, ONTARIO

Question No. 35—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 3,140 of the First Session of the 30th Parliament, which stated in part that the details of legal work done for the government by Mr. N. D. Dixon of Smiths Falls would be communicated to the Member for Leeds at a later date (a) for what reason has the information not been forthcoming (b) what departments are involved in compiling such information and on what date did they begin such work (c) has the compiling of the information been completed and, if so, (d) on what date will the government forward the requested information to the Member for Leeds?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): In so far as the Department of Justice is concerned: (a), (b) and (c) Through an administrative oversight, the question was not attended to.

listed in part 5 of this question; (d) In possession of the members listed in part 5 of this question.

The following reply applies to questions Nos. 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 26, 27, 28 and 32.

PRIVATE RAILWAY CARS

Question No. 11—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answer to Question No. 4,777 of the First Session of the 30th Parliament, which stated in part that the Minister of State for Urban Affairs travelled at public expense by private railway car between Ottawa and Vancouver from August 19 to September 3, 1975, will the Minister make public (a) the exact purpose of the trip (b) the names and addresses of all those on board the car during the trip (c) all the reasons justifying this expenditure of public funds (d) the reason it took 16 days to travel what is normally a three day journey (e) a list of all stops en route and the purpose in each case (f) the total number of miles travelled at the stated cost of $1.95 per mile (g) the number of personnel on duty to operate the services in the car?

2. Will the Minister make public this information and, if not, for what reason?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Prior to 1959, varying numbers of rail cars have been owned or on loan from Canadian National Railways and were assigned to various Ministers and Departments. During 1959, the matter of rail car use was reviewed by the Government and it was decided that the cars be reduced in number to two for the use of any Members of Cabinet, by arrangement. This recommendation was accepted with two cars being returned to CN and the remaining two (along with the 2 car unit assigned to the Governor General) put under Transport Canada's jurisdiction and assigned to the Prime Minister and Minister of Transport respectively. Four car stewards presently share the required duties as two man teams on the four rail cars and constitute the major fixed cost along with basic supplies and maintenance such as: heating, cleaning, replacement of equipment, parts, etc. Any charges from the railways for special switching, food or train requirements are charged to the user of the car. On the basis of this decision by the Government in 1959 the cars, when not in use by the assigned Ministers, have been made available on a first come-first served basis for foreign dignitaries, Members of Cabinet and senior officials of the Canadian Transport Commission. Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railways issue passes for Ministers authorizing use of the rail car plus the two attendants. Any other persons on the cars are charged by the railway for first class passage (unless they hold railway passes in their own right). As with the CN and CP passes issued to Members of Parliament, the purpose of the trip has never been requested and Members and Ministers may exercise the use of their passes for whatever purpose they choose. Other than the first class charge for any passengers, the railways have traditionally hauled the four rail cars at no cost on regular train operations. This means that with most of the costs being of a fixed nature, there is very little difference in cost whether the cars are in use or on standby. The fact that accommodation and meeting rooms are not required is an additional incentive to use the cars rather than commercial facilities. It is necessary to maintain this small number of rail cars in Ottawa in any case for matters of state and the use therefore, by approved officials, becomes an efficient use of facilities that are already paid for. There is periodic assessment of the feasibility of hiring rail car stewards from the railway as required rather than paying annual salaries and to date it has been considerably more economical to pay annual salaries. The rail cars allow the necessary privacy required for working conditions while travelling and allow maintenance of the level of security needed for the Prime Minister and for foreign dignitaries (see page 8618 of Hansard for December 11, 1973). In addition to the security features and controlled working environment, there has traditionally been, in the use of these cars by the Government's most senior representatives, the recognition of their need to travel to various parts of the country as part of their responsibilities. The cars have never been restricted to any specific use other than during general election campaigns.

Question No. 12—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answer to Question No. 4,777 of the First Session of the 30th Parliament, which stated in part that the former President of the Treasury Board and present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce travelled at public expense by private railway car from Ottawa to Shawinigan, Quebec from December 30, 1975 to January 3, 1976, January 23 to January 26, 1976 and February 27 to March 1, 1976, will the Minister make public (a) the exact purpose of each trip (b) a list of any stops en route (c) the names and addresses of any others on board the car at any time (d) the number of personnel on duty to operate the services in the car?

2. Has the Minister stated his desire to cut government expenditures and, if so, in what manner does he justify this expenditure of public funds?

3. Will the Minister make public this information and, if not, for what reason?

4. In what constituency is Shawinigan, Quebec located?

Question No. 13—Mr. Cossitt:

Will the government prohibit further use, by Cabinet Ministers at public expense, of private railway cars for personal travel in keeping with its announced programme of restraint and (a) if so, on what date will such prohibition begin (b) if not, for what reason?

Question No. 14—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answer to Question No. 4,777 of the First Session of the 30th Parliament, which stated in part that the former Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and present Secretary of State for External Affairs travelled at public expense, by private railway car from Ottawa to London from November 14 to 16, 1975, will the Minister make public (a) the exact purpose of the trip (b) the names and addresses of any others on board the car at any time (c) all the reasons justifying this expenditure of public funds (d) the number of personnel on duty to operate the services in the car?

2. Will the Minister make public this information and, if not, for what reason?

Question No. 15—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answer to Question No. 4,777 of the First Session of the 30th Parliament, which stated in part that the Minister of Supply and Services travelled at public expense by private railway car from Ottawa to Quebec City from June 13 to 15, 1975, will the Minister make public (a) the exact purpose of the trip (b) the names and addresses of any others on board the car at any time (c) all the reasons justifying this expenditure of public funds (d) the number of personnel on duty to operate the services in the car?

2. Will the Minister make public this information and, if not, for what reason?

Question No. 16—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answer to Question No. 4,777 of the First Session of the 30th Parliament, which stated in part that the former Minister of Finance,

Mr. MacEachen: With regard to the question period, I have no intention of healing the hon. member's self-inflicted wound.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: That is a great way to get out of the question period.

Mr. Wagner: They will try it every day now.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton has raised, by way of a point of order, the question as to whether or not the oral question period ought to take place. I take it from his remarks that there is no disagreement with the clear wording of Standing Order 15(2) which indicates that Routine Proceedings shall be taken up at 3 p.m. There could be no clearer language. The provisional orders under which we are operating at the present time state that Routine Proceedings shall be taken up at three o'clock or presumably as soon thereafter as possible. There is no disagreement with that. However, there has been a suggestion by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton that the House may be disposed to having a question period. That can only be done with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Paproski: I did not hear any "no".

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I will speak clearly so that all may hear. The following questions will be answered today: 4, 11 to 21 inclusive, 26, 27, 28, 32, 35, 36, 47, 48, 49, 76, 109, 161, 170, 171, 175, 282, 368, 372 to 377 inclusive, 579 and 645.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—PURCHASE OF SAIL BOAT MATERIALS

Question No. 4—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Were materials purchased by Canadian Forces Base, Kingston on February 5, 1975, from Queen City Distributors Limited of Downsview, Ontario and, if so (a) was such material composed of various items for the making of fibre glass pleasure sailboats (b) was the invoice number from Queen City Distributors Limited No. 08024 (c) what was the total cost of the material purchased and what is an itemized list of the material (d) who signed for receipt of such items (e) does the name M. M. Marshall appear on the invoice and, if so (i) what is his job designation or rank with the Canadian Armed Forces (ii) who authorized him to make the purchase?

2. Was the Canadian Armed Forces reimbursed for the material purchased and, if so (a) who made such reimbursement (b) on what date (c) to whom was it made?

3. Is it the policy of the Department of National Defence to allow the purchase of materials by the Canadian Armed Forces for use of officers for their own private purposes such as the construction of sailboats and, if so, who authorized such a policy and on what date?

4. What are the general regulations pertaining to the purchase of materials by the Canadian Armed Forces that are used for private purposes by personnel?

5. What are the (a) names (b) job designations of all members of the Armed Forces or civilian employees who took part in the construction of sailboats at Kingston?

6. (a) How many such boats were constructed (b) who used the boats (c) who is now the owner of the boats (d) where are the boats now located?

Hon. Barney Danson (Acting Minister of National Defence): 1. yes; (a) Yes; (b) No; (c) Cost of Material, $775.75; List of Material: 10 oz Cloth Fibreglass, 125 yards; Resin, 45 gallons; Hardener for Resin, 18 lbs; Gel Coat Spray, 20 gallons; Yellow pigment, 9 lbs; Black pigment, 12 lbs; Mould release agent, 1 gallon; Acetone, 5 gallons. (d) Base Supply Officer, CFB Kingston. (e) Mr. Marshall's name appeared on the invoice. (i) Supervisor Local Procurement (CR 5) (ii) Base Procurement Officer

2. Yes. (a) Base Supply Officer on behalf of the Canadian Forces Sailing Association; (b) April 11, 1975; (c) Receiver General of Canada.

3. No.

4. The general regulations as defined under Queen's Regulations and Orders Chapter 36, Section 1, Article 36.05 state that no material may be issued or used by an officer or man for private or other purposes unrelated to either the performance of military duty, recreational activity, or his status as a member of the Canadian Forces. The Canadian Forces Sailing Association established pursuant to Section 45 (1) of the National Defence Act is an approved recreational activity and as such is permitted to use certain approved DND facilities and materials to further the knowledge and training of its members.

5. (a) and (b) Particulars of the members of the Canadian Forces Sailing Association who took part are as follows: Col. M. J. Braun, Commandant; Cdr. R. G. Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost. Presenting reports from standing and special committees.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

● (1510)

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order that I am raising, I hesitate but I must observe that this is an indication that this government cannot even organize "no".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Social Security

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I am sure that even those who have catapulted themselves into the position in which they found themselves a few moments ago would—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton raises a point of order. I would like to hear him develop it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I want to assure my friends on the other side that I was really only clearing my throat.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): We can take a joke.

Mr. Clark: You are a joke.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): In any event, as a result of what just happened here in the House today and Your Honour's call for the next item of business, it has become apparent that you have passed over the normal question period. I am sure it would not lie in the mouth of the government House leader, even in the face of the ineptitude that we have just seen, to deny the people of Canada and their elected representatives this opportunity to question the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I assume it would be of interest to hon. members on both sides of the House to learn what may or may not be revealed in the question period today, and of interest to some of the ministers as well. In view of the rules which Your Honour has interpreted by your actions—an interpretation with which I cannot quarrel—I wonder if the question could be put to the House as to whether there might be unanimous consent—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): —for us to follow the normal parliamentary practice and have a question period.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I mean no disrespect when I ask this of the government, because it has become apparent to everyone in this House and the country that the legislation which awaits the care of this House is not so important as to deprive this House of its privilege of the question period.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, I just want to advise my hon. friend that we on this side of the House have welcomed the opportunity to take a stand for fiscal responsibility.

That this House direct the Postmaster General to make a statement on motions on the effectiveness of sanctions imposed by this government on employees who engage in illegal strikes.

REFERENCE TO GOVERNMENT MEMBERS TAKING PART IN THRONE SPEECH DEBATE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I move under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That this House express its appreciation to the chief government whip and his deputy for the splendid arrangement of the list of government speakers in the throne speech debate which gave those who have lost hope of elevation to the cabinet such prominence, and requests that a list of those with similar views who were unable to speak because of the limited time be tabled.

PROPOSAL THAT SURVIVORS' PENSION BE NOT LESS THAN SEVENTY PER CENT OF CONTRIBUTOR'S PENSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the many speeches being made these days, especially by cabinet ministers, calling for equality between men and women, I feel it is a matter of urgent and pressing necessity that something be done about the inequality suffered by widows with respect to their pensions. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

● (1410)

That this House urges the government to review all the employee pension plans that come under its jurisdiction, and to take the necessary steps to provide forthwith that in all cases the pensions of widows (or of widowers where applicable) will be not less than 70 per cent of the contributor's pension, and that the eventual goal be a full 100 per cent pension for either survivor.

[Mr. Hnatyshyn.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion cannot be presented to the House pursuant to Standing Order 43 without unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: There being unanimous consent for the presentation of such a motion, I therefore put the question. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF ACTION AGAINST PERSONNEL CONNECTED WITH INTERNATIONAL PROGRAMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, further to oral and written questions I have asked on attempted censorship or influencing by external affairs and CBC hierarchy of news broadcasts by CBC's international service to eastern Europe, as well as my requests for copies of internal documents criticizing this signed by CBC senior international personnel which were made public. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That the government make an immediate explanation why three senior CBC persons signing these internal documents registering constructive criticism, namely M. Mogilyansky, head, Russian section, L. C. Chipman, East European program supervisor and Axel Thogerson, assistant director Radio Canada international, have been demoted by the CBC, reprimanded in writing, instructed to state they have been laterally transferred and finally, that the government explain why it permits such a vendetta or persecution to occur against such high quality personnel.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION OF DECISION TO CHANGE AGREEMENT WITH MANITOBA FRONTIER SCHOOL TEACHERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I move under the provisions of Standing Order 43:

That the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) investigate the decision of the Anti-Inflation Board to cut back the salary and isolation benefits agreement arrived at between the Frontier school division teachers in Manitoba and their employers so that the salary increase of 14 per cent was reduced to 11 per cent and the isolation allowance provisions agreed to after three years of negotiations, under which these teachers would have received an increase of 27 per cent, which would have brought these allowances to the level paid to other provincial employees working in the same area, were cut to 8 per cent; and that after the investigation the minister take whatever steps necessary to make effective the original agreement in order to prevent mass resignation of the teachers and the resultant deterioration of the schools in that area.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF PARLIAMENTARY CALENDAR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that the 30th Parliament is at the beginning of its second session and that members of parliament have often expressed the wish to have a calendar with fixed periods to determine the sittings of the House, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That the House strongly urge the leader of the government in the House to submit as soon as possible a parliamentary calendar taking into consideration the school calendar so as to enable all hon. members to have a normal family life too.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

EFFECTIVENESS OF SANCTIONS AGAINST EMPLOYEES ENGAGING IN ILLEGAL STRIKES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that in Ottawa, for example, striking post office employees lost $50 each as a result of what is described by this government as the one-day illegal strike on October 5, 1976, and secondly, as a presidential election, and has to feed people at $85 a plate, in order to make its political money. At this time the leader of this party can go into any city in western Canada, or into any city in Canada for that matter, and do very well. He went into the province of Quebec and had 1,200 people out for lunch.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Reynolds: I ask hon. members to look at the polls at the moment in the province of Quebec. Look at what happened in Hochelaga, a seat which the Liberals had held for years. Let hon. members opposite sit there and laugh. Next time it will be this party that will form the government opposite. I am glad to see them so touchy about importing a United States senator, who had been thoroughly defeated in the presidential race, to speak for their party. I think it is a sad commentary on the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who has lost so much support in most parts of the country that he cannot send one of his own party members to speak at this dinner.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being ten o'clock p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to section (5) of Standing Order 38, and also pursuant to the agreement reached earlier, to interrupt the proceedings at this time to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the main motion.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion (Mr. Harquail) agreed to.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board) moved:

Business of the House

That the Address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), in accordance with Standing Order 58:

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Can the government whip convey to us what will be the government's business tomorrow and the next day? Perhaps he can say what the business will be as far ahead as he can contemplate.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we should begin with the customs tariff, Bill C-15, if time permits we would carry on with advance payments for crops, Bill C-2.

Mr. Alexander: What about Bill C-83?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being after ten o'clock this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m.

At 10.04 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

people that it is a truly independent inquiry and would not break down into a partisan debate.

I think we have to give the new Solicitor General the chance to get into his new job. I watched him all during the debate on capital punishment when he did not have too much concern for the minority on that committee. As recorded at page 25 of the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee proceedings on June 22 last, the Solicitor General said this:

> . . . professors such as Mr. Ehrlich and those who are opposed to Mr. Ehrlich's views, have had the opportunity to have their works published, read, debated, refuted and commented on ad nauseam; and now it is proposed that this nauseating debate continue here in committee.

The part that scares us as an opposition party, Mr. Speaker, is that the Solicitor General felt this way just a few months ago about closing off the debate on capital punishment. Because of the shortness of time that he has allowed for this committee, we are hoping that the members on his side will not sit on that committee with the attitude that they have the majority and they will do what they want. The government has not solved the penitentiaries problem. I have only been in this House four years, Mr. Speaker, but the problems have been getting worse. None of the programs the government has set up have helped at all.

The British Columbia Penitentiary is in total chaos right now. The Solicitor General says that it is going to close down in 1979, yet he is willing to approve $1.5 million to repair the damage the inmates have done. I have not heard the Solicitor General say that perhaps the inmates who did that damage inside the institution should form the labour force that puts it back together, or that they can stay in the gymnasium until the government is ready to replace that penitentiary. I do not know why we have to feel sorry for people who bust their penal institution down to the ground and then complain that the living conditions in the gymnasium are not so good.

I think it is time that the government took a tough line with inmates inside our maximum security institutions. We do take a fairly tough line inside our medium and minimum security institutions. We have very tough rules there and, if they are broken, prisoners are sent back to a maximum security institution. In most of the medium and minimum institutions I have visited in this country everything runs fairly smoothly because there is some sense of law and order inside the institutions. It is in our maximum security institutions that the administration and the classification sections have taken a very soft attitude toward the very vicious people who are inside them. In the B.C. penitentiary the authorities went out of their way to make the institution a better place to live. Then, after a couple of million dollars worth of improvements, the inmates tear the place down. This is the sort of problem that this committee will have to face, Mr. Speaker, and hopefully come up with some recommendations that will be acceptable to the government.

I want to stress that the Conservative party did have its committee set up ready to investigate penitentiaries. If we are not satisfied at the end of this committee hearing, or if the government tries to close off the hearing before the reports are ready to be made, or if we feel we are not getting to see the people we went to see, or that we are not able to spend the amount of time with them that we want to spend, we will continue our own task force. It is our right as members of parliament to visit penitentiaries in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reynolds: I have before me a copy of a report that was sent to the former Solicitor General by the late hon. member for Louis-Hebert, Mrs. Morin, who served on the last committee, and I must say that her presence in this House is sorely missed. She was very concerned about this problem and I have the reports which she completed after the last investigation.

Most of the reports of the hon. lady are very condemnatory of the government, and sometimes I wonder whether that is not one of the reasons why the reports were never made public. There was a list of proposed recommendations contained in the report of the penitentiaries sub-committee made at this time, which would have been 1974. These recommendations called for tight perimeter security coupled with optimal internal conditions, and very little has been done in this regard in the penitentiaires about which I have been talking.

Another recommendation is decentralization of the penitentiary service structure, and that has not taken place yet, Mr. Speaker. Another is an eight hour day and salaries for inmates, something which perhaps we will have to examine in our maximum security institutions to keep the inmates busy for some time of the day, instead of locking them up in their cells for 24 hours a day. The recommendations also called for the upgrading in quality of prison staff, and obviously called as well for an urgrading of their salaries. I know this is one of the problems in British Columbia where the sheriff's department working at Oakalla are making more money than federal penitentiary guards. That has to change.

I see I have a couple of minutes left, Mr. Speaker. I have completed my remarks about penitentiaries and will continue my comments in the committee hearings that start tomorrow. I saw an ad in the Vancouver Sun as I was coming to Ottawa yesterday and I thought it was quite appropriate to the Liberal party whose fortunes are so low in western Canada, at this time. I guess in British Columbia and Alberta they probably rank as the third party, not as the second party any more. This ad states:

> The International Speakers Forum cordially invites you to attend a dinner and speech at the Hotel Vancouver.
> The guest speaker will be United States Senator George McGovern of South Dakota. He will take as his subject, "The new administration".

The International Speakers Forum, is an arm of the Liberal party. At the bottom of the ad it says in very fine print, after telling you that it costs $85 per person to attend the dinner:

> $50.00 of the $85.00 ticket price will be treated as a political contribution and receipts for income tax purposes will be sent to each individual purchaser by mail following the dinner.

I think it is a pretty sad day in western Canada, Mr. Speaker, when the Liberal party has to go searching in the United States for a Senator who was thoroughly defeated in a ly, but they certainly used their money in order to help defeat their government. That is a positive way of doing things. It is better than a negative way which the union leaders of our country are advising right now. They are leading their members down a false path which is getting them nowhere at all, and if they want to change a government they had better use other tactics in the future.

I want for a little while to talk about the inquiry which is being set up into the maximum security institutions of this country by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox). I want to thank him for following the example set by the leader of my party in setting up a task force in my party to investigate penitentiaries very shortly after the disturbances in the B.C. Penitentiary and the Laval Penitentiary. Our leader showed an example by setting up a committee to try to find solutions to the problem, and we give the Solicitor General credit for following this example. He is new at his job and maybe it took him a few days to get through the bureaucracy before taking the action necessary to set up the committee.

Members who were here in 1972-73 may recall that I proposed a motion in the House that a committee be set up to investigate the question of the security of our penitentiaries. I brought the subject up under Standing Order 26, and a motion was put forward by agreement later that day which resulted in a committee being established to investigate penitentiaries. Members from all parties were represented on that committee. They investigated penitentiaries for more than a year—I do not know with what result, because it does not appear we are getting anywhere with the operation of the penitentiary system right now. But they spent a year going back and forth across the country visiting penitentiaries, coming up with ideas and making recommendations. Unfortunately I do not have the time tonight to discuss the reports in detail, those I managed to get my hands on. I might add that those reports were never formally presented in the House of Commons; the results of their findings were never published.

Anyway, they took a year to do this work, yet the Solicitor General is now asking us to come up with a report by February 28. I really think he must be looking for some kind of report which will cover up what is really going on if he expects us to produce a report so quickly. Nevertheless, I hope we shall receive co-operation from members on the government side of the House and an understanding that if we do not finish our investigation by the date which has been proposed we shall be allowed to continue until the work has been done. It is time we looked closely into the situation and produced positive solutions on a non-partisan basis. I say this because there are problems in the system which we simply must solve and we cannot do so if we sit on a committee on a partisan basis, trying maybe to cover up mistakes in the ministry or in the bureaucracy.

It is our duty to get the facts and come up with solutions, and we in the opposition parties must make sure that those solutions are presented before the government loses power in the next election, and make it known that we support the action which has to be taken and that we approve the expenditure of funds which will be necessary to clear up the mess in our penitentiary system.

I want to show that things really have not changed since that committee was set up in 1973. The members of that committee said the entire system was in disarray. I quote:

> Guards did not seem to understand Ottawa's aims where detention and possible rehabilitation of inmates were concerned.

A recommendation was made along this line at the time to initiate regular meetings between administration and guards to increase their awareness of the objectives of the system. Has this been done? Are guards and administration communicating, and is the administration more aware of the action of the guards than it was in 1973? One member of the committee noted that within our women's prisons there was no program of work or rehabilitation. A further observation urged the Department of the Solicitor General to implement a training program which would encourage inmates to rehabilitate themselves. Has this recommendation been carried out?

It is unfortunate that the recommendations of the committee back in 1973 were not listened to by the government. This makes one wonder whether the committee now proposed will really work. Despite the many committees and commissions which have been set up to investigate in this field,—I have in mind the B.C. Penitentiary riots and the Steinhauser affair—nothing seems to have been done. I myself, as a member of the House, have spent a lot of time visiting penitentiaries, talking to all sides. One of the frustrations which visitors to these institutions encounter is this: the people who work there say they have read all these reports and are aware that nothing has been done about them.

Further in the report by the committee which investigated the situation in 1973, we read that it was no secret then, as it is no secret now, that access to drugs in prison is too easy. One observation was: "In prison there seems to be no problem about obtaining drugs." Apparently the administration accepted this situation because of the pacifying effect on inmates. Well, if that is not encouraging a problem it is certainly condoning one. If you encourage drugs in institutions you are encouraging people who are lowly paid on the scale to smuggle drugs into the institutions. You are encouraging friends of the underworld who are visiting inmates to bring them into the institution.

The pressures that exist in our federal institutions are numerous and well known. The problems brought to light by numerous commissions and sub-committees seem to repeat themselves in most of these studies. But we have yet to rectify the problem. I sincerely hope that we will have the total co-operation of the government, which has insisted on having a majority on this committee. We as an opposition party hope to talk to the Solicitor General about setting up the committee on the basis that the opposition parties may outnumber the government. We would put on the committee members who were sincere in their objectives so that it would show the English, or to learn English if they are French, or that they must be bilingual.

The current emotional holocaust is so unnecessary. The young people today may survive it because so many of them want to travel, want to learn, want to expand their professional opportunity by learning both languages and more.

I wish all hon. members could have seen the show from an Edmonton classroom where the French language is being studied. One little fellow stood up and said that the fight over bilingualism is a pile of garbage. Another youngster said that he would have a better job opportunity because he has two languages.

Not everyone in English Canada has to learn French, nor does everyone in French Canada have to learn English. I am sure that a small group of public servants, comparatively speaking, are already bilingual, and more are trying. Certainly the children who move through the educational process now will add to this group.

To the western separatists, and this is becoming a powerful movement with some very impressive names, I say that if we balkanize, if we break up into three states or four, or more, we will have to learn French and use French if business and industry want to deal with Quebec. And the Quebec people who talk of separation and think they can be unilingual are also not thinking; they will have to learn English to communicate with the unilingual English nations that were once provinces of Canada, and with the English if they decide to move north and south in their dealings instead of east and west.

And in the west, we 2.2 million people will not be able to afford the expensive road network of a huge, mountainous land mass, nor the education system we now have, nor medicare, welfare, police, courts and all the rest which the tax base from a huge central population now helps us support. In order to exist we may have to unite with Washington and, in turn adopt their more difficult racial problems.

The anger that is now dividing Canada will not have a solution in separation. We will never be as strong divided as we are even now, with all our anguish, anger, and frustration.

Communication as we all know is a binding force—whether it is in the home between members of a family; whether it is in trade unions at the bargaining table; whether it is in a nation of two or more cultures, actually a source of our intellectual and sociological richness.

But conversely, lack of communication can be suicide; destructive of family, of unions and their health, and of Canada. I pray and hope for your prayers with me that we will communicate, that we will stop hating, stop committing national suicide.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am told there seems to be a disposition not to see the clock in order to allow the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) to speak. The Chair will put the question at ten o'clock instead of 9:45, by unanimous consent.

[Mrs. Holt.]

• (2140)

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there is unanimous consent and I should like to thank the government whip for his consideration.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In view of the fact that no one intends to insist on a recorded vote at this time we think it a matter of courtesy that the hon. member should be allowed to speak and that the question be put at ten o'clock.

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank hon. members for allowing me the courtesy of speaking for the next 15 minutes and winding up this debate. I should also like to thank the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) for cutting her speech short so that I might have this opportunity to take part, and, I guess, I should thank my whip for getting me into the debate at all.

I had intended to deliver a speech on the penitentiary system, but the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway touched on a few subjects which I should like to mention before I proceed further. One was the Anti-Inflation Board. She had a lot of ideas, and she knocked the NDP, but what I was wondering, when I was thinking of that protest day coming up, was whether we would not have done better as an opposition—and this applies too to members on the government side—if we had advised the workers that they might have been better off staying on the job that day and protesting by donating a day's salary to the opposition parties in the federal parliament to help defeat the Liberal government which is causing the whole problem.

Mrs. Holt: They would donate it to the NDP.

Mr. Reynolds: I hear someone say they might donate it to the NDP.

Mrs. Holt: They already donate to the NDP.

Mr. Reynolds: Well, I get elected by a big majority in my riding where a lot of the electors are working people who did not want to take a day off on that day. I know they liked the idea of donating a day's pay to the political system, and the irony of this situation is that if they did devote a day's pay toward defeating the government which is causing the problems in this country, the government would have been obliged to return 75 per cent of their donations in tax credit.

An hon. Member: The members of the opposition ought to give one day's pay and show an example.

Mr. Reynolds: I believe a number of people did donate a day's pay. The Premier of British Columbia made it very plain he had donated a day's salary, and I think it was a very good example to the working people of our province. I remember when the teachers of British Columbia wanted to replace a provincial government which they did not like. They donated a day's pay to help defeat the government, and they certainly did defeat it. I do not know what the end result was; I think most of them were back voting for the former government eventual-for an ouster of the executive but could not get a seconder for the motion because of fear or threats.

• (2130)

The night of October 13 a call came to my Ottawa office from a busdriver who told me that the British Columbia Federation of Labour intended to mount pickets to stop the drivers, and if the drivers tried to move the buses there would be bloodshed. The caller said, "I intended to go to work Thursday, it is my right to work. We voted and I will be there." There was a pause, and then he said, "Mrs. Holt, who will look after my family after this is all over?"

An hon. Member: The Liberal government.

Mrs. Holt: If you people did something positive once instead of tearing the whole of our society apart, we could all live in peace.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: I lived in your kind of society—an NDP society—for three years. It was bankrupt, it was sick, and it was evil.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Holt: I will put that aside for a moment to discuss what might be done to correct the incessant industrial paralysis. I would like a little more time to tell hon. members about a process called "Med-Ar" and a man named Sam Kagel, a leading western American lawyer who specializes in labour relations. Sam Kagel is a legend in the west. I called him the other day to ask him to share his wisdom in dealing with labor strife in Canada. I would like to say what he told me, but I will have to save it for another time since there is another subject that is very important that I think should be discussed. I refer to my concern for Canadian unity.

I feel compelled tonight to deal with the unity of Canada and the suicide course we are on as a nation because we will not understand. Perhaps we are not listening and will not communicate. Many Canadians are uneasy. They are angry because we are making judgments about fellow Canadians without knowing them, and without full knowledge of what it is all about.

Racism is rampant in Canada and it is alive and thriving in this very House of Commons. I hate to say that. This place where we know each other, were we want to understand the great differences that we share in our representation of 264 constituencies, where we are the microcosm of the disparities and the richness of cultural and regional variations, we should be engaged in mending and melding this country.

And I plead with the Fourth Estate up there to use their important communications service to play a positive role—not the game of provocation a few are engaged in—to save the unity of Canada.

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I heard with very considerable distress the remark of the hon. member, and it is so recent in my memory that I can quote it, that racism is rampant in this very House of Commons. I hope the hon. member will see fit to withdraw that remark because it seems to be a very general application.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking the Chair to pass judgment on the hon. member's speech or the validity of her remarks. That is not the responsibility of the Chair. The hon. member is making a point of debate which he can resume at another time in making his own speech. Unless the hon. member has a point relating to the rules, the use of parliamentary language, or reflecting on members of the House or the House itself, this point of order is not valid.

Mrs. Holt: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to offend the House or its members. However, I have heard many remarks here. I, personally, have felt a great deal of it. It is not just on the Anglophone or the Francophone side. It is in other respects as well. It is unfortunate because we reflect the nation.

Mr. Paproski: Just withdraw it.

Mrs. Holt: I will withdraw it and go on and discuss it another day. It is a matter of great seriousness and concern to me that we stand here and do these things to each other.

Even we do not understand it all fully, and many of us who never knew the people of the founding culture until we came here, want to understand. Canadians want their children to live in a single Canada, not Canada dismembered for superficial reasons or because of misunderstanding of what the bilingual program means.

In my constituency office, hundreds of people come in or phone. So often the phrase comes up "jamming French down our throats", a phrase that should be dropped forever from both the English and French language. In fact the other day I heard it from a sports commentator in the United States. It is a terrible phrase, an excessive phrase.

Quebec members keep hearing about English being "jammed" down their throats. No one is jamming anything down anyone's throat. If that were true, we would be a nation with perpetual sore throats and headaches.

Perhaps something is happening to our minds, to our psyches, perhaps even to our souls in all this resentment. It is because we are not communicating. We who are here to represent all Canadians are not saying it clearly and simply: not everyone is expected to speak French. Not everyone must speak English. Not everyone must be bilingual. If we choose we can learn two languages and of course have a bonus in our cultural and communication depth. Perhaps some of those with other cultures in Canada, besides having both of the founding languages, might also have their own and be richer than any of us.

But what a disaster if Canada is torn apart because people really believe that they are forced to learn French if they are sanctions, pickets, accusations of scab for all who worked that day, and all the devices of the most heinous strike were used, it is strike. It was a deliberate attempt to debilitate, if not tear down the economy of Canada.

The claim was that it was to fight inflation, but the leader of the Canadian Labour Congress, in an address to the trade union congress in Britain told them that really was not the reason; that he wanted the power of the tripartite, that new huge bureaucracy in which he would play a major role in running the economy and the social structures of Canada. It was a great lie, and the workers of Canada were forced to lose a day's pay by intimidation, threat and fear, for this man's power trip.

It was a mischievous and immature act. Perhaps the NDP might know the real reasons since they shared in the conspiracy. Many could perceive it as a conspiracy of subversion to manipulate and force 2.5 million good and responsible citizens, who belong to the Canadian trade union movement, to participate in a project with one goal—a despicable goal—to damage Canada's delicate economy.

October 14 may have had a positive backlash that the CLC, the NDP, and those other few in the plan did not anticipate. The rank and file trade unionists are angry—angry at their loss of freedom—angry at their lost wages, without having a right to vote on the matter. It was a strike with all the goon and bully-boy techniques.

It was rather interesting that the vice president of the CLC called October 14 "Labour's finest hour". God help the mass of people in the trade union movement if things ever get bad and this is the best their leaders can do. I would have thought a more accurate description would be "the nation's greatest industrial abortion".

To enlarge this point: thousands of trade unionists, well aware of the threat to their job opportunities in the future and threats to their very lives and the lives of their families, treated it as an enforced holiday; tens of thousands were deprived of their salaries; not only was there no secret ballot for many but in some cases—and, Mr. Speaker, I can prove this and I am ready to go to court if I am required to—they actually had their ballots torn up by International Woodworkers of America leaders. Is this what they call their finest hour?

There are about 30,000 International Woodworkers of America in British Columbia. They did not get a vote. They were told they must stay off work because their leaders had made the decision. Even with that and with British Columbia being the most militant trade union province in Canada, and Vancouver its front line of militancy, the turnout for this demonstration was 7,000, by a generous estimate.

This might interest those who participated so excitedly in this demonstration: that 7,000 represented half the numbers of buttons I gave out to trade unionists who wanted to go to work. The button said: "I'm going to work for Canada today".

Even more interesting is the composition of the demonstrators—the CLC in the lead, then the communists, Trotskyites, the Maoists, and then the Gay Liberation Alliance! The first groups were together with one cause—disruption of the economy—on the pretext of fighting anti-inflation controls. Hon. members who served on the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and heard witnesses for the Gay Liberation Alliance, learned then what controls they wanted removed—controls over their sexual freedom, and the age limit for their sexual partners lowered to 16, as I recall. Thus, to build statistics the CLC and the NDP who were part of it—certainly in the west and here—embraced the Gay Liberation pickets, backed by the NDP—allegedly to fight controls. What controls were they fighting, Mr. Speaker?

In that "finest hour" the CLC had to rent pickets on the prairies. When asked if he would have done it without pay, one of these hired mercenaries in the CLC war on Canada, smiled wryly and said, "I don't think so".

On Parliament Hill newspaper reporters could have counted the demonstrators as easily as we and the police did. The count was 700. The Globe and Mail, that great newspaper of record, reported 1,800 on Parliament Hill, and headlined that 1,035,-445 participated in the protest. If they were 200 per cent wrong on the Parliament Hill statistics, then we can gauge their accuracy on the other figures, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: I want to tell one story as an example of the determination of the CLC to stop the workers in Vancouver and possibly throughout Canada. It was an attempt to disrupt transportation in order to keep people from their jobs. The details of the story poured out in my constituency office. It began with one bus driver who came in to get some of the buttons I was giving out, for a group of drivers who were revolting against the executive decision to stop the buses. The stoppage was based on a vote of 69 out of 3,000 members; the membership had not been advised in advance of this June vote.

The drivers posted a petition on the bulletin board near the end of September demanding a full membership right to vote to reverse the decision of the executive. A union official ripped it off the bulletin board. The drivers then circulated it by hand and called a meeting for October 4 because of the massive response. At that meeting all attempts to persuade them to support the executive strike plan failed. Those opposed to the executive were ordered to stand on one side of the room and those who supported the strike on the other. It was deliberate intimidation. But, Mr. Speaker, those wearing my buttons stood together. Suddenly others donned their buttons in protest against this technique, and joined them.

The executive then demanded a referendum for 4 days later—Friday, October 8, because they were not satisfied. Even though they got their troops out, there again an overwhelming majority opposed the executive strike order. The executive would not tell the public or the press the result but I will tell the public and the press, Mr. Speaker. It was a vote of 1,485 to 460 in favour of working that day. The executive is refusing to reveal the results because it was a vote of non-confidence in the leadership. The members tried to get a seconder part of the government in directly or indirectly supporting research with the provinces into providing adequate and better ventilation in the mines or into providing a mask which miners can wear to protect their lungs. The federal government has also failed to provide compensation to injured uranium miners who come under its jurisdiction. Again, that is a shortfall and a lack of policy on the part of the government.

I could go into all kinds of problems which arise from lack of policy in energy terms. I have spoken about that on many previous occasions. Time does not permit me now to go into the way the Canadian people have been duped by multinational oil companies operating in Canada, how they have deceived this government in terms of the supply of oil we have on hand, or how they have been able to manipulate prices and cause them to rise, to the detriment of Canadian consumers. That is another story for another time. However, in the couple of minutes remaining I would like to make some comments on the issue of bilingualism.

Although the government is a strong supporter of bilingualism, it can be faulted on the way its program has been implemented. I am a personal supporter of the concept that Canadians of either of the official language groups have the right to deal with their federal government in either of those languages, and that support remains unaltered. I support that concept entirely.

However, what I object to is the way the Liberal government has been implementing bilingualism, specifically in connection with language training for civil servants. I have only to quote from the findings of Professor Gilles Bibeau of the University of Montreal who made a study of the bilingualism policy. His report is a damning condemnation of the insensitivity of the government and the inadequacy of the way it goes about implementing bilingual training. The report shows that there was no reason to designate as bilingual most of the positions—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue, however, with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to congratulate our newest member, the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail), for moving the motion of acceptance of the Speech from the Throne. I would also like to congratulate the seconder, the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance), our youngest member, who gives all of us who are older such pride and joy in his intellectual insight and diplomatic skills, a promise of great service to Canada, beyond measure at this time.

I would also like to refer just briefly—because my time is limited—to the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) and to his attack on the anti-inflation program. The government succeeded in doing what the NDP failed to do. Even with labour's excessive demands, and the NDP support of these demands, they failed. The controls increased the actual purchasing power of the dollar 3 per cent, and thus increased the real worth of salaries. So perhaps it is time members of the NDP started worrying about the real truth and about the rank and file of the trade union movement, about whom they seem not to care one whit.

Hon. members of the NDP talk and hide behind the skirts of the old, the poor and the worker, but they would not go and pick one of them—a hungry person fallen on the street or save the threatened worker from the Joe Morrises and his ilk.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: However, to come to the essence of my response to the throne speech, the mood and forces within our huge and disparate land are such that they could even now solidify confederation or tear it apart. Two major factors which affect Canada's future, whether we commit national suicide or whether we pull together, are the essence of what I want to speak about tonight.

● (2120)

We have only one choice, and that is to use our differences as a blend for the greatness, beauty, enrichment, and to continue the building of a strong and unified Canada—this wonderful, wonderful land that so many of us have shared in building, as did our parents and forefathers of many cultures, including the two founding cultures.

One of the two forces that could disrupt confederation is the unreasoning anger and intransigence, born of misunderstanding on both sides of the official languages debate; the other is the senseless strikes in which a few leaders have recklessly, and perhaps deliberately, deprived tens of thousands of workers of their democratic right, the choice to work. You people over there can answer for that. The other day I tried to bring in a motion in this House to protect the rank and file from the threats, intimidation, to give them a free vote in making decisions governing their economic well-being—to give them the same freedom we expect for all our citizens in our democratic society. The only voice opposed was the so-called "people's friend" over there, the NDP. Everyone else in this House agreed that protection of the freedom and the very safety of the rank and file trade unionists was vital.

Today the strike is a needless tool. When the founders of the great institution of collective bargaining risked their jobs and careers, it was important; but today, if both sides negotiate in good faith, they know they can get a contract. They know they do not have to go out on strike and that even if they do strike they must eventually return to the bargaining table. That is where it is settled.

I think the most shocking example of the abuse of the strike tool and also the exploitation of rank and file trade unionists, was the October 14 attempt by the Canadian Labour Congress to mount a national general strike. The leadership would like to dignify it by calling it a protest, but when threats, job

Another study conducted in California involved placing nineteen hyperactive children on the special diet for a period of two to three months. This particular study revealed a significant difference between pre-test and post-test population means. No significant changes were noted by teachers' evaluation.

The validity of these findings is questionable, and has been criticized for the lack of adequate control for dietary intervention and the introduction of numerous biases. These biases occurred by exposing the parents and children to the anticipated outcome of the study at the beginning, by rewarding children for staying on the diet, and by sending an informative letter to teachers reflecting what beneficial effects may be expected.

Perhaps the most significant of all studies is that conducted by a team at the University of Wisconsin. This research, funded by the Food Research Institute of the University of Wisconsin, Madison, represents the first systematic investigation of the hyperactivity-food additive hypothesis. It includes objective psychologic, psychophysiologic and classroom observational data in addition to parent and teacher ratings of behavioural change associated with dietary manipulations. The study was designed in such a way that teachers, parents, clinical investigators and classroom and laboratory observers of the children's activity level were unaware throughout the course of the investigation whether the child was on the special diet or on a diet containing artificial colours and flavours. Both the experimental and control menus were prepared from commercially available food stocks.

Available results indicate that of the 36 mothers with boys in the 6-12 year group, 13 rated their son's behaviour as improved on the special diet, while six rated their child's behaviour as worsened. Of the 30 fathers rating the behaviour of this same age group, 14 rated their son as improved, three as worsened and 13 essentially unchanged. In comparison to the parent ratings, classroom teacher ratings showed a marked decline in the frequency of judgement of behavioural improvement during the experimental diet period. Only six of the teachers rated the child as less hyperactive, 10 rated the child as showing more active behaviour while on the experimental diet, which is supposed to improve the child, and 30 of the teacher ratings showed little change between the two diet conditions. Agreement between parent and teacher ratings of improved behaviour while on the experimental diet occurred in only four of the 36 children.

The observational data collected on a number of behaviours in the classroom and in a standardized laboratory task yielded very few ratings of improvement in association with the experimental diet. Preliminary statistical analysis of these data has been completed and no—I repeat, Mr. Speaker, no—statistically significant diet effect was apparent.

The younger children aged 3 to 6, however, showed a greater positive response on the experimental diet as indicated by parent rating. All 10 mothers in this group rated their child's behaviour as improved, as did four of the seven fathers in this sample.

Thus with the possible exception of the youngest age sample, the preliminary analysis completed to date in the Wisconsin study does not appear to offer strong support for the efficacy of the experimental diet, at least with respect to group effects. The University of Wisconsin research team, however, has repeatedly emphasized the still incomplete status of their project, saying that a number of the objective measures obtained on the subject have not yet been tabulated.

A research proposal was submitted to the food and drug administration of the U.S.A. by Dr. Leon S. Otis, of Stanford University, requesting funds to study development of behavioural aspects of food additives on mice and rats. This proposal has not been funded to date. Members of the National Institute of Mental Health in the U.S.A. and Dr. Frank Cordle of the U.S.A. food and drug administration are not aware of any related studies being conducted at Stanford University. Dr. Cordle is familiar with all interagency funding in the U.S.A.

A study was recently conducted in Canada at the University of Western Ontario to determine the relative effectiveness of dietary and drug management of hyperkinesis. Preliminary findings suggest that the effect of diet was ambiguous. Parents and teachers were of the opinion that dietary infractions involving artificial food colours and flavourings had minimal and insignificant effects.

The aforementioned studies conducted to date clearly indicate the potential difficulties in any attempt to test the food additive-hyperactivity hypothesis. The small sample size used reduces the significance of all findings and makes the use of statistical analysis extremely difficult. Furthermore, the use of outpatients in all these projects makes difficult the control of compliance. Also, specificity of responsiveness must be studied by challenging subjects with individual groups of substances such as artificial colour or flavours or salicylates. Finally, results are meaningless if strict adherence to guidelines is not preserved throughout the entire duration of an experiment.

Several other studies currently under way have been funded by the U.S. food and drug administration. These include a study on the hyperkinetic syndrome in children, being conducted at the Kaiser Permanent Foundation Research Institute in California. The study should be complete in about one year. A second study at the University of Wisconsin is designed to identify children who respond to the K-P diet.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired, though he may continue if there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Question.

• (1650)

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, now that I have had my cup of tea and a couple of Arrowroot biscuits, perhaps I might say a word. One thing which is quite clear is that there are not any additives in Arrowroot biscuits which produce hyperactivity or anti-social behaviour. Certainly there cannot be any red dye in Arrowroot biscuits.

This debate this afternoon has been typical of many debates. My friend, the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk), feels the government is doing far too little, almost nothing, in the field of studying the relationship between food additives and hyperactivity. On the other hand my friend from Halton speaking from the government side assures us that the Department of National Health Welfare is doing everything that needs to be done in this field. I suspect the truth is somewhere in between, and even though the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook) seened to be making a case that a good deal of research has been done in this field in the United States, which seems to carry with it the suggestion that we do not need to respond to the plea of the hon. member for Athabasca, it strikes me that the wide disparity between the number of additives banned in the United States and the number banned in this country is something that should be considered.

Despite the efficacy of the experiments and research projects conducted in the United States I think we should have our own as well. Perhaps a good place to begin studying diets would be among the now 259 members of the House of Commons. It would be a very interesting study, especially on a Friday, to assess the behavioural patterns of the various members and then to check their diets. So, Mr. Speaker, if we can cut through all the usual confrontation we have had, I believe that the suggestion made in the motion put forward by the hon. member for Athabasca is a good one and I would like to see the House endorse it this afternoon.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take only a moment or two to congratulate the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) for introducing this motion.

I would point out that in the city of Vernon, B.C., in my constituency, on October 1 an international conference on hyperactivity was held. The conference started off in a small way. A maximum of 500 people were expected. Before the opening evening it was found that the demand was much greater and space had to be added for an extra 100 people. The accommodation provided proved to be inadequate for the number of persons applying to be present and eventually the venue for the meeting had to be changed to a larger auditorium in order to accommodate something approaching 1,000 people. This, I believe, is an indication of the great need that underlies the motion presented by the hon. member for Athabasca.

Although I do not have the time to expand any further on the activities of that conference—and I do not wish to cut off the vote—may I say I know a wide range of speakers was heard from several areas on the very important subject of additives and their relation to hyperactivity. I wish to congratulate the hon. member, and urge that we pass this motion.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I must also compliment the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) for raising this question and bringing it to the floor of the House. I think this is an extremely important area. It is important to look at the question of food additives and their effects, particularly as the number of additives in relation to food is growing at such a great rate.

I am sorry the hon. member was not able to develop his thesis on the relationship between food additives and hyperactivity to the extent I would have liked him to do. I particularly would have liked to have heard him develop the thesis of Dr. Feingold, although the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook) dealt with that. I think it is a great mistake to assume or to claim, as the opposition tends to do, that we are not interested in this. This is not true. I think the hon. member for Halton outlined in some detail the kind of safety standards we have, the need for nutritive value, the use of additives as preservatives and so on, and the acceptable levels beyond which there is some danger, and indeed the work of the Health Protection Branch.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being five o'clock the hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has expired.

At five p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, November 1, 1976

The House met at 2 p.m.

NEW MEMBERS

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Chief Electoral Officer a certificate of the election and return of Mrs. Jean Pigott, member for the electoral district of Ottawa-Carleton.

I also have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Chief Electoral Officer a certificate of the election and return of John C. Crosbie, Esquire, member for the electoral district of St. John's West.

SUGGESTED SUPPORT OF CHURCH PROTEST AGAINST PUNISHMENT IMPOSED ON BISHOP LAMONT BY RHODESIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, following upon reports that the Rhodesian government has recently sentenced Bishop Donald Lamont to ten years hard labour for failing to report the presence of guerillas in his diocese, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon):

That the government of Canada support the protest of the Anglican, United and Roman Catholic churches against the cruel and unjust punishment imposed on Bishop Lamont by Rhodesian authorities.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such motion can be presented to the House only with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PROPOSAL THAT MEMBER FOR HIGH PARK-HUMBER VALLEY CONDUCT SEMINARS ON HANDLING CONSTITUENCY WORK—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask the unanimous consent of the House to deal with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of recent revelations regarding the constituency office in High Park-Humber Valley which is discreetly located somewhere in Toronto, and in view of the hon. member's and his riding secretary's very informative opinion on dealing with constituents, I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt):

That this House instruct the Commissioners of the Internal Economy of the House of Commons to immediately have all members of parliament remove all signs which indicate the nature of their offices, and that the savings incurred by this move be diverted into a fund for the member for High Park-Humber Valley, so that the member from High Park-Humber Valley may give seminars to members of parliament on the handling of constituents and constituents' case work.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie).

CUSTOMS

ALLEGED ADDITIONAL DUTIES IMPOSED ON AUTOMOTIVE PARTS IMPORTED INTO MANITOBA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the discrimination being practised by the Department of National Revenue against the automotive replacement industry in Manitoba by refusing to allow entry into Manitoba of automotive parts at the import duty rates being allowed elsewhere in Canada and claiming up to 15 per cent additional import duties on shipments cleared in the Manitoba region and taking into consideration that this puts the automotive replacement industry in Manitoba at a disadvantage with similar businesses elsewhere in Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage (Mr. Masniuk):

That this House directs the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue to take immediate action to rectify the unjust and discriminatory import duties being levied against automotive parts coming into the Manitoba region.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion can only be presented to the House with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Oral Questions

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN SPEAKER'S GALLERY OF REPRESENTATIVES OF VARIOUS LEGISLATURES

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before beginning the oral question period, may I take just a moment to bring to the attention of hon. members the presence in our gallery of a very distinguished group of people. I hope I will do them justice in attempting to single out one or two of my counterparts in the provinces. Perhaps the right thing to do would be to ask all of them to stand.

This week we are hosting, as we do every year under the auspices of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, the Canadian Regional Parliamentary Seminar. We have invited one representative from the Caribbean Parliamentary Association which is represented in the person of the Speaker of the Barbados parliament, Mr. Speaker Hinds. Mr. Speaker Hinds might now stand up.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: In addition there are members of all provincial legislatures here, some of which are represented by their Speakers. I would ask them all to stand. I can say at a cursory glance that I know it includes Mr. Speaker Smith of British Columbia, Mr. Speaker Brockelbank of Saskatchewan, Mr. Speaker Ottenheimer from Newfoundland, Monsieur le président, M. Lavoie de la belle province de Québec qui est bien occupé maintenant avec tous les autres collègues, and also Mr. Speaker Fox from Manitoba, Mr. Speaker Woodroffe from New Brunswick and Mr. Speaker designate Doucet from the province of Nova Scotia. May I ask them and others with them to stand?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Oral Questions.

STATISTICS CANADA

REASON FOR FAILURE TO PROSECUTE EMPLOYEES FOR EXTRACURRICULAR ACTIVITIES—AUDIT OF CONTRACTS WITH OUTSIDERS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. On October 25 the minister referred to an impending meeting between himself and the Chief Statistician of Canada. In view of continuing revelations in the Ottawa press about the extracurricular activities of Allan Jeffery Associates and, now, the assistant chief statistician, and the issue of whether or not there was tacit or implied consent for those activities by those in responsible positions, can the minister say whether or not the fact that no criminal prosecutions or major disciplinary actions were taken reflects the feeling of the police or law officers of the Crown that it was precisely because there may have been such authorization, tacit or implied, no mens rea could exist in the criminal sense and it would have been difficult to secure a conviction?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I already answered this question. I believe the hon. member put 22 questions on the order paper. I hope to answer every one of them by next Wednesday.

About the other civil servant mentioned by name by the hon. member, this person acts as adviser to universities after his working hours without using in any way confidential information related to his position. This civil servant has already made a statement on this matter and I see nothing improper in that, but Dr. Kirkham informed me that new instructions had been issued on this matter and I hope that the integrity of Statistics Canada will be preserved.

[English]

Mr. MacKay: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I share the minister's wish and do not intend to reflect on the integrity of Statistics Canada. Is it true that the chief statistician has now ordered an audit of all contracts entered into by Statistics Canada with outsiders? Can the minister give some information as to who is in charge of such audit or investigation and when we can expect its completion. Would the minister be willing to table in the House the results of such an audit?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I have personally asked the chief statistician of Canada to carry out a full investigation on possible illegal or improper activities by government employees. His reply was that he was carrying out this investigation. I do not think that public interest would be served by any disclosure, as long as I am not advised that this investigation has been duly completed. However, from my conversations with Dr. Kirkham, I do not feel there is cause for concern about this for the time being, and I am sure that the integrity of Statistics Canada remains intact.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

ALLEGED OFFERS BY EMPLOYEES OF STATISTICS CANADA TO SELL INFORMATION—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a final supplementary question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs? Can the minister indicate whether there were any transactions or offers of transactions between Allan Jeffery Associates or people connected with them and the National Capital Commission for the transmission of data for a price, and can the minister confirm that Statistics Canada employees provided information to United States consultants on a commercial basis while, at the same time, denying information to the NCC?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would have to check on this information. I have no knowledge of it.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE WITH MR. GALLANT CONCERNING ALLEGED OFFER BY STATISTICS CANADA EMPLOYEES TO SELL INFORMATION

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs particularly concerns his last answer. As the House knows from news reports, the then chairman of the National Capital Commission, a distinguished public servant, Mr. Gallant, raised this matter with a senior public servant. I would not think he would have written his letter and communicated as he was supposed to have done without some basis. I say this particularly since the communication, as was alleged in news reports, was such as to shock Dr. Ostry who was then in charge. In view of this communications having emanated from a public servant of the position, standing and prestige of Edgar Gallant, I wonder if the minister who since the news reports came out must have taken the time to examine Edgar Gallant can report to the House exactly what Mr. Gallant said—assuming that such an investigation took place. Also, is the minister in the position today—and if he is not in the position today will he put himself in the position—to table the correspondence which passed between the then chairman of the National Capital Commission, Mr. Gallant, and Mr. Gordon Robertson. Would he do that?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will look into the situation. I do not know the circumstances. It is possible I was aware of it, but at this moment I am not sure and would like to refresh my memory.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): My supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, is based on the answer the minister gave me today and gave the hon. member for Central Nova. Is it the position of the minister that after all the newspaper reports which have been published about this matter, and the distinguished Mr. Gallant's involvement in it, that he, the minister, is not even in the position to answer the simple question I put to him relating to the facts of this case? Is that the position the minister is in today?

• (1420)

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, it is Monday, and I had a very difficult weekend.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to know that in the circumstances the minister realizes this is Monday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I hope he understands the seriousness with which this affects not only Statistics Canada but the reputation of some distinguished public servants in the Public Service of Canada. It being Monday and the minister having been forewarned, will he check the record tonight and be prepared to answer my questions on Tuesday or on Wednesday? I would be satisfied with that.

Mr. Danson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. That was the essence of my answer to the hon. member for Central Nova, that I will look into it and have the information available to answer questions in the House tomorrow.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST MEMBER FOR CALGARY SOUTH RELATING TO DEALINGS WITH SUPPLY AND SERVICES

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Supply and Services, may I direct my question to the acting minister or the Prime Minister. In view of the fact it has come to light that the hon. member for Calgary South participated in and obtained contracts with the federal government through the Department of Supply and Services, the latest being in January, 1975, which the member says he personally helped to arrange, does the acting minister or Prime Minister know whether the officials of the Department of Supply and Services were aware of the implication of negotiating a contract involving federal funds with a member of parliament? If the officials were aware of that, did they bring that information to the attention of the minister? If so, what did the minister do about it? Now that the minister does know, if he did not know previously, what is he now going to do about it?

Mr. Rod Blaker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if the hon. member will accept a reply from the parliamentary secretary to the minister in view of the discussion on Friday. If so, I will take notice of the question. Second, I point out to him that the hon. member apparently discussed the matter with the Speaker and the parliamentary law counsel much, I may say, to his credit.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blaker: However, I will pursue the matter with the minister.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST MEMBER FOR CALGARY SOUTH— REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the government House leader, but I do not see him here. Possibly the Prime Minister can reply. In view of the fact the government must have all the facts concerning this case in their possession, and the hon. member for Calgary South has publicly implicated Your Honour by insinuating your blessing on the deal—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: You can howl. It is alright for you to complain about conflict of interest on the other side of the House but when the shoe is on the other foot, you squeal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: Will the Prime Minister consider sending this whole matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections in order to determine whether the hon. member for Calgary South is in contravention of the House of Commons Act?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the matter has just been brought to my attention. Like the hon. member, I have read the article relating to this issue. It is one that we take most seriously. I have read all the allegations in the article and can assure the hon. member that this will be looked at very seriously. I accept the proposition which the hon. member has presented. We will look at that seriously as well. I am sure all hon. members are very concerned about the implications in this particular article.

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—INQUIRY IF THERE IS A SURPLUS OF PRODUCTS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

Considering the contradictory reports on the supply and storage of milk products in Canada, can the minister tell the House whether there are now large quantities of milk products such as butter and milk powder in storage or whether production is in a deficit position? I am asking this question to be able to inform milk producers for the future.

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): These figures are made public. There is no shortfall. We have ample butter stocks in storage. We have more than ample skimmed milk powder in storage and if the hon. member knows of any possible sales, or of anybody in need, he should get in touch with the Canadian Dairy Commission.

[Translation]

DAIRYING—INQUIRY IF DAIRY COMMISSION HAS MADE PROJECTION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Considering the minister's answer, and in order to avoid giving wrong guidance to milk producers in Canada, is the minister in a position to tell the House whether the Canadian Dairy Commission gave the projection for the next few months, to be able to move this production in the right direction?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker. That is why the Dairy Commission is trying to develop programs which will provide milk for these companies which are producing specialty dairy products. If necessary, the Commission will be withdrawing the offer to purchase butter and skimmed milk powder so as to encourage companies to go into the manufacture of other products which may be in scarce supply before the dairy year is over, if they have not done so.

STATISTICS CANADA

POSSIBILITY EMPLOYEES HAD PERMISSION FOR EXTRACURRICULAR ACTIVITIES—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the acknowledgement today by the hon. gentleman to the effect that the assistant chief statistician in the statistical services field serving in the SX-3 rating with a salary of $43,000 a year is presently engaged in extracurricular activities related to his work within the department, can the minister now tell us whether he has been informed of any partnership this civil servant was engaged in with a senior research advisor, whether he is prepared to table the advertisements which were put out by this business and whether he has questioned the people involved as to whether they had permission either in writing or orally before getting into this business.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I have looked into this situation and it is a very difficult one. I remember very well when I was a student in law at Laval University that some of the best teachers we had were civil servants coming in to give lessons at eight in the morning. I never felt that because they were getting up in the morning and offering their services to students they were in breach of conflict of interest guidelines. This particular civil servant is an expert in his field. He has helped some universities to develop programs. And, of course, because he was working outside his hours of work, for which he received remuneration, I am having some difficulty in feeling he was guilty of doing anything wrong. I feel we should not deprive the universities of Canada of some of the best brains we have around here when there is no conflict with public duty. I do not want to try to destroy this very good civil servant because he has been willing to help some university, accepting compensation, as long as I am satisfied he has not used any confidential information in the course of this work. If we are to make a ruling in this case, perhaps we shall have to decide that no civil servant can do anything else outside his employment, even be a policeman at the weekends to help in an arena or a stadium. Where is the line to be drawn?

POSSIBILITY OF GUIDELINES FOR EXTRACURRICULAR ACTIVITIES OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Certainly the problem here, as the minister has pointed out, is lack of clarity with respect to guidelines. I am sure they would be the first to want to know what the guidelines are. I ask the Prime Minister whether he has been made aware of these particular activities and whether he condones extra-curricular activities by senior civil servants—whether he would condone them if the material used, even if not confidential, was material obtained at public expense or perhaps in the course of regular employment?

● (1430)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I had not known of these particular allegations until they were mentioned in the House today, but there are guidelines which exist. Whether they should be applied in this particular case in any particular way is a matter that the minister has considered and I abide by his judgment.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INQUIRY IF INVESTIGATION OF EXTRACURRICULAR ACTIVITIES OF EMPLOYEES OF STATISTICS CANADA HAMPERED

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a final supplementary question in connection with this particular matter to the Solicitor General. Would the Solicitor General inform the House whether the investigation by the RCMP in these particular instances was hindered or hampered in any way by the fact that the alleged improper activities by employees of Statistics Canada were reported first to Statistics Canada rather than the RCM Police?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have no information whatever that indicates that the RCMP would have been hindered or hampered in any manner in connection with this investigation.

TRADE

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO CORRECT IMBALANCE IN TRADE WITH UNITED STATES IN AUTOMOBILE PARTS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As the joint study by the Canadian and United States governments on the automotive industry shows that the Canadian deficit in automotive parts, which reached $2.4 billion in 1975, is already $100 million more than that amount in the first eight months of this year and well on the road to becoming a deficit of $4 billion by year's end, would the minister take the first opportunity on motions to advise the House what his department intends to do to correct this very serious situation, particularly in view of the letter written by the Prime Minister to the Canadian auto parts industry just before he left for Japan, which stated that "there will probably be no immediate action to adjust tariffs to encourage foreign car makers to place more auto parts orders in Canada"?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member that the problem is extremely complex: generally speaking, relations between Canada and the United States with regard to the automotive agreement have been good. But the problem at this time is this: we have a deficit in the manufacturing of automotive parts. I must say to the hon. member that we have a large surplus of automobiles assembled in Canada and exported to the United States. The deficit is still considerable. I am now in the process of studying the problem but I must say to the hon. member that I have no magic solution. If the hon. member has one, I should very much like him to tell me about it because I would ask him for his help when possible.

[English]

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to call on the minister and give him some ideas because he seems to be singularly lacking in them. He has not answered my question at all. With leadership like this, is it any wonder that the automotive parts industry is in the condition it is in today?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Eglinton.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PROPOSAL TO TELEVISE PROCEEDINGS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: Go get 'em, Mitch.

Mr. Sharp: —this is the first time I have had the privilege of addressing a question to my former colleagues. I would have addressed it to the House leader but since it concerns government policy in general I will address it either to the House leader or to the Prime Minister. Is it the intention of the government to reintroduce the motion to approve the broadcasting by television of the proceedings of this House and, if so, will the government call that motion for debate early enough so that, if approved, all necessary steps could be completed to enable our proceedings to be televised before the end of this parliament?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can say that it is the intention of the House leader to proceed with this. He hopes to be successful well within the framework of time for which the hon. member asks. I do not know if he has yet had discussions with leaders on the other side of the House and, if so, whether they have indicated a willingness to co-operate, but I hope that would be the case.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND

ATTITUDE OF CANADA TOWARD APPLICATION FOR LOAN BY UNITED KINGDOM

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. As a distinguished member of the International Monetary Fund, having recently attended the meeting in Manila, I would ask the minister what is the attitude of Canada toward the application of the United Kingdom to the International Monetary Fund to secure some $3.9 billion by way of loan in order to tide the United Kingdom over the serious crisis that it now faces?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should tell the House and the right hon. gentleman that Canada has participated, along with other members of the fund, in standby assistance to the United Kingdom for the past several months by way of a central bank swap. The purpose would be to replace the terms of that swap with a longer term draw from the International Monetary Fund, and subject to the United Kingdom meeting the conditions set forth by the fund we would support that kind of financial assistance to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. What is the attitude of the government toward the application for this loan of $3.9 billion? The minister mentions that there would be certain requirements. Is the government of the United Kingdom justified in having the chancellor of the exchequer state that those requirements would place Britain in an impossible position and would not in any way meet the serious situation in which the pound now finds itself, which situation, unless action is taken, may well spread the crisis to other countries?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I cannot evaluate that at this point. The United Kingdom has been discussing with the staff of the fund the nature of the assistance and the conditions of such assistance. When the staff have completed these discussions it will be a matter of their reporting to the executive board of the fund, on which Canada is represented, to determine the manner in which this assistance would be provided. Then at that time it will be for the government to decide, along with the other executive directors, as to the appropriateness of the terms, given the situation of the United Kingdom.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

BASE AT EAGLE RIVER, LABRADOR—POSSIBILITY BASE USED FOR PURPOSES OTHER THAN TO TRAIN SEARCH AND RESCUE PERSONNEL

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of National Defence. Can he give the House an assurance that the $340,000 spent so far this year on a search and rescue base at Eagle River, Labrador, which incidentally happens to be one of the best salmon rivers in the area, was in fact used to train search and rescue personnel and not to provide salmon fishing for high ranking military brass?

Hon. Barney Danson (Acting Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. member has raised a question that has been raised so many times before. I believe he well knows that this is a base for search and rescue operations. It is used about three to four weeks of the year by senior officers from the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada who pay their own out-of-pocket expenses. It is a rather primitive base with two log cabins built, I believe, in the last century, and others are under canvas, so it is hardly a luxury resort. It is used for search and rescue and on occasion senior officers from the three countries do meet there for informal discussions and I hope they catch some fish.

Mr. McGrath: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister telling the House that, at a time when his predecessor was telling this House that it was not cost-effective to deploy helicopters to Newfoundland, two of these search and rescue helicopters were used over a period of 14 days, during which period they were in fact used to ferry in high ranking military brass for salmon fishing?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I think if the hon. member will check he will find that those operations take place anyway as part of the regular search and rescue training. I would refer the hon. member to the time when the question was raised before, when a reporter from the Globe and Mail of that great city of Toronto went to see the site for himself and to check out the operations. I have a three page article here written by this reporter. If the hon. member is interested in the facts and wants to judge the source, I would be very pleased to let him have it.

AIRPORTS

VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL—SUGGESTED ENVIRONMENTAL STUDIES IN CONNECTION WITH PROPOSED THIRD RUNWAY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport regarding the proposed third runway at Vancouver airport. A week ago the minister said that further studies of an environmental nature would seem to be necessary. On September 16, in view of this fact, a spokesman for the government at a symposium in Vancouver said that an environmental panel had been selected but was no longer in existence. Would the minister tell the House exactly what environmental studies are taking place, and will the public be able to examine and comment on those studies after they have been completed, if they are in fact taking place?

● (1440)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the reference would be to the panel that was and is not to be. My view is that the panel that is to be, is still to be and there will be an announcement on that in due course.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that in September a member of the government said to a symposium in Vancouver that the environmental panel had been established but was no longer in existence, I should like to ask the minister if he will make specific inquiries concerning whether or not there is even in fact any work being done now, keeping in mind the fact that this all began three years ago?

Mr. Lang: Well, Mr. Speaker, I have given the hon. member the facts as I have them. I think any reference may have been to previous work in connection with the public participation and the planning for the airport which is all well known to him. There was of course environmental work in that connection, but we have seen the need for some further work before anything further in the way of a final decision is taken. I will let him know where that stands as soon as I have further information.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF DECISION NOT TO RENEW SUBSIDY TO NORTHLAND NAVIGATION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. It concerns the decision to discontinue the subsidy of Northland Navigation. That period ended yesterday and of course Northland Navigation has now laid off 150 employees. In view of the fact that the minister's officials have held discussions over the weekend, will the minister advise the House whether he has reconsidered the decision that was taken not to renew that subsidy? Is the decision final that the subsidy will not be renewed for Northland Navigation on the Pacific coast?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the exact arrangements to ensure that there is no diminution or change in the nature of the service in the area are still going on and I would not want to comment in detail upon them. We have looked at a variety of techniques to ensure there is service, including discussions with the provincial government. These I think likely will lead to a new arrangement with the province with regard to service. We are of course looking at the other carriers to make sure in one way or other that services adequate for the individuals who are involved in the various communities along the shore, up the north and on the Queen Charlotte Islands, are indeed provided.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, would the minister, in view of his answer to the effect that discussions are still going on, be prepared now to advise Northland Navigation not to lay off the 150 employees to whom they have given notice and to hold their decision in terms of their operations on the coast? Is that what the minister is advising the House; that in fact there is some hope now that Northland Navigation will be allowed to continue that service?

Mr. Lang: I am simply saying, Mr. Speaker, that discussions are going on. So far as the particular employees are concerned, Northland itself is quite aware of the state of the discussions and I need add nothing further by way of distant intervention in the discussions.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

ALLEGED DISRUPTION OF SERVICE AT TRENTON BY MOVEMENT OF HELICOPTERS TO ATLANTIC REGION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of Defence. In a move to cover an obvious lack of responsibility in rescue capability which was pointed out last week by my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East, the minister has moved suddenly and callously Voyageur helicopters from Summerside to Newfoundland, has moved Voyageurs from Trenton Ontario to Summerside and has left Trenton covered only by the "Twin Hueys" which are woefully inadequate for the search work necessary. Accepting the fact that it was absolutely essential to send the equipment to Newfoundland, was it really necessary to disrupt the entire air-sea rescue structure in eastern Canada to accomplish this?

Hon. Barney Danson (Acting Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has the names of some of the helicopters mixed up. He has interesting sources of information. The point is that when we do feasibility studies we want to check the different movements of various types of aircraft. At least that is one of the reasons we are doing it. Certainly, there is adequate backup for Trenton both from Petawawa and Ottawa. There are other aircraft at Trenton. This is the whole purpose of the feasibility study, to see what the effect of different movement of aircraft is to our response capacity, right down the line.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, I would love to challenge in a debate the minister's knowledge of this equipment. In any event, the result of this hurried and poorly thoughtout action will clearly result in the resignation of some senior people who are fed up with the lack of proper equipment.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, may I put this: Can the acting minister indicate whether these moves are permanent, whether new or at least satisfactory equipment is to be provided for the Great Lakes area or does he intend to replace everything and leave Canada'a east coast again unprotected?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the feasibility study is to find out what is feasible.

INDUSTRY

TEXTILES—POSSIBILITY OF SURVEY TO DETERMINE NUMBER OF JOBS LOST

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and is supplementary to that raised by the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo on Friday relative to some 30 job layoffs in the textile industry in his area. Given that more than 200 textile workers were laid off at Celanese Canada Limited, Millhaven, during the weekend and that other similar occurrences are imminent at other plants, has the minister made any assessment, in conjunction with industry, to determine how many textile jobs will be terminated in the next six months?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have no definitive answer to give in that regard. When I was appointed Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I started immediately to look into the matter because, in my own area, many people work for the textile industry; I immediately imposed certain quotas in an effort to limit the number of imports. But, Mr. Speaker, some time always elapses between the time when quotas are imposed and the time when the situation becomes normal. I believe there will be temporary layoffs for a few months, but I trust the imposition of quotas in the last few weeks will have expected results in the coming months. Still, I must admit that in coming weeks there will be layoffs in the textile industry. I trust, however, that the situation will go back to normal a little later on in the year.

[English]

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, by way of supplementary I should like to ask the minister just how many textile workers must be unemployed before the government takes more effective measures to deal with the deterioration in the industry?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Vegreville.

[Mr. Speaker.]

ENERGY

HEAVY OIL—MEASURES TO STABILIZE INDUSTRY

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It has to do with the continuing difficulties experienced in the heavy oil industry, particularly in the Lloydminster area. I want to thank the minister for making the effort to visit the Lloydminster area and look at the situation firsthand. The fact of the matter is that there are now close to 1,000 wells closed. Can the minister advise the House whether any new policy initiatives are being actively considered so that they may be put in place in the immediate future. Further to the 25,000 barrels a day inside quota requirement for heavy oil, I ask if the minister is considering exempting the heavy oil from the quota restrictions or amending the export tax in an effort to stimulate and stabilize this very important industry and thereby avoid disruptions in the economy?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad the hon. member has raised this question. I consider it to be a very important potential resource for Canada. I am very hopeful that some of the considerations that are presently being given to this problem both by my own department, by the industry and I hope by the National Energy Board will bring about a solution for this area. I think the 25,000-barrel a day tied quota the National Energy Board introduced for this current month is a step in the right direction. I very much hope that in their own wisdom as they consider the merits of the case—and as you know they are presently considering a number of proposals from the industry—they will consider other measures to help solve a very difficult problem in that part of the country.

Mr. Mazankowski: Am I to take it that we can expect an announcement in the next two or three months about further policy initiatives to be put into effect to alleviate the immediate difficulties which we are now facing because of the drop in demand for heavy oil in the off season period?

Mr. Gillespie: Of course, parliament set up the National Energy Board to deal with these kinds of questions. Hon. members will realize that I have no authority to intervene in these proceedings. I hope that the representations which have been made to the National Energy Board, and the concern which has been expressed by members on both sides of the House on this question, will bear some fruit. I expect that their report might be in my hands in a matter of some weeks, certainly by the end of the year.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

FAILURE TO REINSTATE WILLIAM BIGGS—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence, and it is one of which I have given him notice. Mr. William Biggs, an employee of the Department of National Defence in Germany, was hailed into a German court by the Department of National Defence on two charges. During the investigation he was suspended from work and then dismissed from his employment. He was subsequently found innocent of all charges, but has not been reinstated in his employment. Will the minister undertake to have an inquiry into this matter conducted by an impartial body so that justice can be seen to be done in this case?

Hon. Barney Danson (Acting Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am looking into the case of Mr. Biggs. Mr. Biggs' solicitor has been in touch with the Assistant Judge Advocat General. The Judge Advocat General is quite prepared to meet with Mr. Biggs and his solicitor at this time, and I myself am looking into this case personally.

PUBLIC SERVICE

RELOCATION OF DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS—DISCUSSIONS WITH EMPLOYEES

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I know perfectly well, Mr. Speaker, that it is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who has been appointed, on a purely personal basis, minister of state for the decentralization of departments.

[English]

But since, in the final analysis and as matters now stand, it is the President of the Treasury Board who is in charge of welfare and the working conditions of public servants, I will address my question to him. Is he prepared to state, with reference to the transfer of the Department of Veterans Affairs to Charlottetown, whether there have been any discussions before this announcement was made either with the Public Service Alliance of Canada or with employees of the department, and whether he would be prepared to table the results of those discussions.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated the other day, the responsibility for this program lies in the first place with my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. There were discussions before that decision was made and, according to my information, these discussions were in fact satisfactory.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

RELOCATION OF DEPARTMENT—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF ANY MEMORANDUM OF AGREEMENT WITH EMPLOYEES

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I still think I would like to address a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs to ask him whether there has been any memorandum of understanding concluded with his department with regard to the fate of these particular members of his department on matters covering guarantees of employment, career security, transfer of homes, and such matters, and if he would be prepared to table such an agreement.

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, may I say in answer to the hon. member's question that this has been worked on by my department, by the Treasury Board and by the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce for over a year. All the matters referred to were taken into consideration, such as guarantees of employment, etc. This policy has been proclaimed by the government for some time; it has been in operation, and I have no fears regarding the future employment of these people. They have an opportunity to take the jobs or to move out if they wish, and no great concern has been expressed by my department's employees. This will work out quite well.

DATE OF DECISION ON CHANGE IN STRUCTURE AND LOCATION OF BASES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of National Defence, who has left his seat for the moment, I see. Now that he is back, would he advise the House of the stage of his dealings with regard to the change in size, structure and location of military bases in Canada, and would he explain whether a decision is being arrived at within his department or is he at the stage of making recommendations to the cabinet, and will the decision be announced as a total package or will it come in dribs and drabs?

Hon. Barney Danson (Acting Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I said to the hon. member last week, I think, that some response will be forthcoming sooner or later. I am familiarizing myself with the situation at this time. The response will be forthcoming in a logical way. If it means a blanket statement or one that is properly phased and staged, it will not be in dribs and drabs but it will be done in the appropriate way and in the best interest of the armed forces of the country and the personnel involved.

Oral Questions

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

ALLEGATION BORROWERS ASKED TO USE LAWYERS SELECTED BY CORPORATION

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Can he indicate whether the government will now renounce the practice of making borrowers from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation pick from a selective list of lawyers, in effect making a Crown corporation the only mortgage lender in Canada which picks the lawyers for its own borrowers?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I wish it were Tuesday. I will be pleased to review this with the hon. member. I think he will find that the lawyers for the majority of loans and subsidies placed through CMHC are chosen by the borrowers themselves.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Danson: If hon. members are interested in facts rather than fiction, I will be pleased to indicate the number.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You don't believe that, Barney.

Mr. Danson: Obviously, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentlemen opposite are not very interested in the facts.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Danson: In fact, the vast majority of loans today are the result of the activities of CMHC which are increasing at an astounding rate, with borrowers choosing their own lawyers. There are selected cases where it would be only appropriate that the lawyer act on their behalf.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I did not hear a word of the answer. Perhaps I had better protect myself by saying ten o'clock and we will see what happens when I read the answer.

EAGLE RIVER BASE, LABRADOR—REQUEST FOR TABLING LIST OF PERSONNEL, OTHER THAN SEARCH AND RESCUE PERSONNEL, USING BASE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Minister of National Defence, supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for St. John's East. Since the matter of money which was voted for search and rescue operations, possibly being used for providing holiday accommodation at the Canadian armed forces Eagle River camp in Labrador, has aroused a good deal of concern, and in view of the fact that the government certainly has done nothing to set that alarm at rest, I want to ask the acting minister if he would undertake to table in the House the list of all persons who have stayed at the camp during the past year, other than those who are part of the search and rescue operations, and state the amount of money which they paid for the accommodation as well as the means of transportation which was used to get there.

[Mr. Danson.]

An hon. Member: A good question for ten o'clock on Tuesday.

Hon. Barney Danson (Acting Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the list of people includes senior officers from the allied forces with whom we work and who have operations at Goose Bay. I do not know if it would be appropriate to list the names of visitors from other countries. The cost for the accommodation is $25 a day. The total cost of the operation is some $3,000 to $4,000 a year. The out-of-pocket expenses are paid by host officers or from their mess funds. The helicopters used to go in there fly on such operations at least twice a day, destined there or to other places, so there is no additional cost in that respect.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Would the minister at least table the number of persons who used this accommodation during this past year? Will he tell us the cost to the Canadian taxpayer of providing this hospitality and whether or not any civilians made use of this fishing resort?

• (1500)

Mr. Danson: I think it would be very difficult to differentiate between those who were on certain rescue operations and those who were guests of senior officers of the Canadian Armed Forces. I think that would be particularly difficult to do, and as far as any cost involved in the operation is concerned, I would be pleased to get that precise information, in addition to that which I have already given, and to make it available to the hon. member.

COMMUNICATIONS

POSSIBILITY OF PUBLIC HEARINGS ON PAY TELEVISION PROPOSAL—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications. I would like to ask the minister if any decision has been reached on having public hearings on the pay television proposal and what success she has had in discussions with the chairman of the CRTC.

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, when I delivered a speech on pay television, I had precisely in mind to open a public debate on that matter. So I asked the CRTC chairman permission to receive submissions or briefs from various groups likely to be interested. We have received 91 reports. We are compiling and analyzing them. I do believe we must go on with discussions. As for me, I have nothing against the CRTC holding public hearings about pay television but it is up to its chairman to make the decision.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: I thank the minister for that answer, as far as it goes, but will the minister use the weight and good grace of her office—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Careful, boy.

Mr. Nowlan: I hope the minister will use grace or the moral suasion of her office, rather than weight, so that some assurance will be given that before this matter gets to cabinet and a recommendation and directive from cabinet is issued, the public, which will be fundamentally affected by this technology or development, will have some say in the deliberative process.

Mrs. Sauvé: While the hon. member decides whether I should use my weight or grace, I will tell him that I am discussing this with the president of the CRTC. There is no question that the cabinet will give consideration to proceeding with public hearings, but it is not improper—nor, indeed, excluded—for these discussions to occur between myself and the president of the CRTC.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ALL PHASES OF DECENTRALIZATION PROGRAM

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. A moment ago the President of the Treasury Board said that it was his understanding that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was responsible for the first phase of the decentralization program. That admission of uncertainty by the minister concerned as to what he is responsible for adds further confusion to this whole matter, and I wonder if the Prime Minister could give us an undertaking that there will be a statement on motions by either himself, the minister responsible for phase one or the minister responsible for phase two as to just who in the ministry is responsible for all phases of the program dealing with decentralization, what procedures of consultation are in place regarding public servants affected, what departments are under consideration now for decentralization and what sites in the country are being considered now to receive decentralized departments.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is the intention of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to make a statement on the whole operation of decentralization. The reason the distinction of phase one has arisen is that it is an operation which was well under way and well defined at the time of the movement of ministers. For that reason alone we are talking about phase one. There is no phase two contemplated, but the certainty is—

Mr. Fairweather: Then why say phase one?

Mr. Trudeau: —that I wanted to ensure that this operation, which was begun in the Treasury Board and which is an operation seen as a whole, will be continued by the minister who has been handling it so well and so effectively. When this is terminated, of course, the responsibility for one of the government's priorities, that of decentralization—which incidentally is something the Leader of the Opposition supports and campaigned for in his leadership campaign—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): So did Mr. Stanfield.

Mr. Trudeau: —will then return to the new President of the Treasury Board, and whether he wants to contemplate any further action, which presumably would become phase two, is a matter which has not been envisaged, but which he will consider in due course.

MINISTER RESPONSIBLE FOR CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): In that same spirit I wonder if the Prime Minister could enlighten the House as to which minister is now responsible for the present phase of CIDA, whether the principle the Prime Minister articulated is going to be carried out and that responsibility for CIDA will travel with the now reinstated President of the Privy Council, and if that is the case, whether it will rest with him or whether that responsibility will transfer back to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, because the present House leader had been such an effective co-chairman of the Conference on International Economic Co-operation in Paris, I asked him to continue to be chairman of that operation until the end of that conference.

An hon. Member: Or he asked you.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: If I were Andras or Jamieson, I would be mad.

Mr. Trudeau: The question of CIDA was raised at the same time, and it had been the intention of the department and myself to consider naming a minister expressly for the purpose of CIDA.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: That proposition has been under examination for several months now. The fact that the cabinet shuffle took place before the decision was actually made led me to discuss with both ministers the possibility of not having a junior minister for CIDA but using the present House leader to continue his excellent direction of CIDA, and that is a matter which is still under discussion between the House leader and the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister had told us that he does not know which minister is responsible for CIDA—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: —and I think the House would like to know who is the minister responsible now for CIDA and whether that responsibility will rest with that minister, whoever it is.

Mr. Trudeau: I assumed that the Leader of the Opposition would have drawn the conclusion from what I stated that there has been no announcement of any change of minister for CIDA; therefore, the Secretary of State for External Affairs is still responsible for CIDA. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has been travelling somewhat, and the acting minister, who is also the House leader, has been answering in his stead.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BAWDEN—ANSWER TODAY DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, by reason of the manner in which a question was raised today by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), I think it is appropriate to clear the air and deal with this matter by way of a question of privilege in this House so that all hon. members will be aware of all the details and events and there will be no misunderstanding.

Early in 1975, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police contacted Emden Limited, a company of which I am the sole shareholder, concerning the sale of its turbo Beaver aircraft with amphibious floats, skis and a number of spares and expressed a requirement in the exchange that an existing, older piston-engine Beaver aircraft with floats be accepted as a trade-in. At that time I sought legal advice, and after careful review of the Senate and House of Commons Act, I was advised that section 21(a) of that act provides that it does not extend to disqualify any person as a member of the House of Commons by reason of his being a shareholder in any company, except in the case of a company which undertakes a contract for the building of any public work.

It was my desire at that time to have the absolute authority rule on this matter, because two years earlier—in the spring of 1973—another company of mine, of which I am a substantial shareholder, Peter Bawden Drilling Services Limited, sold a twin-engine turbo-prop aircraft to the Ministry of Transport. At that time I acted on the same legal advice. It was my decision, however, to disclose these earlier transactions to Mr. Speaker and to advise him in writing of the sale of the turbo Beaver aircraft to the RCMP. I therefore wrote to the Speaker on January 23. I took this letter to him personally at the meeting in the afternoon of that day. At that meeting, the Speaker advised me that the sale by a company in which a member owned shares would not contravene any of the provisions of the Senate and House of Commons Act.

I asked the Speaker at that time for a letter concerning the matter. He said this would necessitate a study of all the details; that it was a large task, and really unnecessary. He did, however, advise me that he would have Mr. Maingot, legal counsel of the House of Commons, speak to me in this regard. Two weeks ago, in view of the possibility that this matter might be raised, I had a further discussion with the Speaker of the House and I met with parliamentary counsel. At that time, with parliamentary counsel I went over each of the transactions; that is, the sale of the King Air aircraft and the sale of the Beaver aircraft. I also advised Mr. Maingot that Emden Ltd., the company of which I am the sole shareholder, owns a hangar at the Calgary international airport and thus has a lease with the Department of Transport. This lease was inherited from Trizec when Emden purchased the hangar, Trizec being the previous owner, and the lease was assigned entirely in its original form. I further discussed with the parliamentary counsel, at that time, Emden and its subsidiary company, Business Flights Ltd. which offers an aircraft charter service from Calgary and provides for those requesting it a fuelling service and hangarage to a number of tenants and transient aircraft.

I advised Mr. Maingot that from time to time government aircraft used this facility, and that the charter service of Business Flights Ltd. was available and must be available to all, by law, at public and approved tariffs. Mr. Maingot wrote to me on October 27, subsequent to the meeting I had with him when I discussed all of the activities I have just explained. I will quote what I believe to be the most significant paragraph of his letter as follows:

> You asked my opinion whether there was any impediment in law to a member being the major shareholder of a limited company contracting with the government of Canada. The answer which I gave you then, and which I now repeat, is that as long as the contract is between the limited company and the government of Canada, the requirements of section 21 of the Senate and House of Commons Act are met. In such case, the limited company, and not the member, is contracting with the government.

It is my view, Mr. Speaker, that the position of a member in opposition is entirely different from what it would be if one were sitting on the other side and in the cabinet.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: He said "cabinet".

Mr. Bawden: Mr. Speaker, the companies I have described offer their services on a competitive basis, and I expect that purchasing by anyone, including agencies of the Crown, on the basis that the quality of service and the price is at least equal to and probably better than can be found elsewhere. The same rights apply to oilwell drilling services which are almost always contracted on a competitive bid basis. If the low bid for drilling the well was rejected, this would likely result in substantial additional cost to the Canadian taxpayer; that is, if a government oil company were involved in the circumstances I have described.

I have been advised, further, that I could have placed the shareholdings of these companies in a blind trust. I have rejected this alternative because I think that it would serve no purpose. In fact, if anything, it would be a sham. It would change nothing, for many of the activities I have described are reported in trade magazines. In the case of small, privately-held companies such as these, no meaningful result is gained from a blind trust.

In view of the fact that this came up in the way it did, I would seek the consent of the House to move a substantive motion of privilege. I, therefore, move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That the question of the rights, privileges and obligations of members of parliament granted and imposed by the House of Commons Act and other relevant federal statutes be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that the said committee report to this House on the parameters of such rights, privileges and obligations of members pursuant to such legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member rose on this question of privilege it was my intention to rise on a question related to the whole matter but one slightly different in emphasis. Some of the comments of the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden) make me feel that it is even more urgent that I raise the particular angle that bothers me.

When the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blaker) answered a question put to him earlier today by my colleague, the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), he said that, to his credit, the hon. member for Calgary South had consulted Your Honour. There may have been more in that sentence, but I think I am repeating faithfully what the parliamentary secretary said when he indicated there had been consultations between the hon. member for Calgary South and Your Honour as Speaker. I am not thinking about the fact that this statement seemed to take the hon. member off the hook. What really concerns me is that the word "consultation" implies advice or consent—maybe even a blessing. If it were true that Your Honour, as Speaker, gave consent or even advice to a member of this House in a matter like this, that in itself would be something very serious and ought to be investigated by the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

An hon. Member: Oh, come on.

Mr. Fraser: That is ridiculous. Where are you supposed to go?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friends say there is nothing wrong with that; it is perfectly—

Mr. Fraser: I said, what is unreasonable about going to the Speaker of the House?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just a minute. My hon. friend can speak if he wishes. It is one thing to go to the Speaker to inform him of something that is being done, and as far as I can sift through it, that is all that happened. If that is all that was done, there is nothing wrong; but it is the suggestion that the Speaker gave an opinion, gave advice or gave his blessing which I think is serious to this House. If there is one thing we have to count on in this House—and I say this to my friend, the hon. member from Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) and all the others—it is the impartiality of Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member for Calgary South made a statement just now, and I listened to it very carefully. I did not see in that statement a suggestion that he got a blessing or even advice.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If that is true, then in the words that the parliamentary secretary used—no doubt innocently, but nevertheless the words that he used—saying that this was after consultation with Mr. Speaker, in itself casts a reflection upon Your Honour and your impartiality. If that is true, then it ought to be investigated.

I did not know, of course, that the hon. member for Calgary South was going to raise a question of privilege. In my own mind I was thinking that I would have to say this is a difficult question because it involves Your Honour, and that you might have to take it under consideration. I am still inclined to say that it involves a good deal and that Your Honour may well have to consider it.

As for the motion that the hon. member has asked leave to move, it seems to me that it is too broad and too general simply to ask the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections simply to interpret, in a vacuum, the provisions of an act. That is not what is called for in this situation. If anything has to be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, it is the matter suggested by the hon. member for Nickel Belt, namely, the actual sale of certain equipment to the government by the hon. member for Calgary South or his companies.

The more this goes on, Mr. Speaker, the more it seems obvious to me that the matter ought to be investigated, but not in the broad and vague terms that the hon. member has proposed. I also feel that there is something more important than the fact that the hon. member made a sale, or that he is spokesman for his party on supply and services, and all that.

● (1520)

The thing which concerns me most is the impartiality of the Chair. I am quite satisfied, from the way Your Honour has operated, that you would not think for a moment of giving your blessing or consent to a matter like this. If that is the case, the aspersion involved in the statement made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Supply and Services should be corrected.

Perhaps Your Honour thinks that the question, involving yourself as it does, should be held over, or maybe Your Honour wishes to hear other members speak. But I hope the point about which I am concerned, the impartiality of the Chair, will not be lost in the bickering between the government and the opposition with respect to the particular sales that were made.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief. As your Honour knows, there was tabled in this House a report relating to conflict of interest involving members of parliament. That report was presented because, among other things, it was recognized that there was no mechanism whereby advice could be sought and obtained on issues such as the one the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden) presently faces. Like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I am most concerned because Your Honour is placed in a difficult position.

Having read the statute, but not having analysed it completely, I am of the opinion that we face a legal question of serious import. It relates to the conduct of the hon. member for Calgary South; and I cast no aspersions: evidently the hon. member did quite a bit to neutralize any possible negative effects of this particular action. Nevertheless, we must remember that a section of the Senate and House of Commons Act prohibits members of the House of Commons dealing with the government or benefitting from any contractual dealings with the government. There is no question about it; that matter must be sorted out.

I now come to the hon. member's motion. With respect, I feel that it is altogether too wide. The effect of the motion will be to open up the whole debate which members of this House have faced as a result of the green paper on conflict of interest. I have no objection to the hon. member's motion being referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, but I think the hon. member ought to amend his motion so that it relates more closely to the facts of the situation. In that way, the question of the effect of section 16, in light of any other section or language contained in the Senate and House of Commons Act, can be dealt with and disposed of expeditiously. To launch ourselves into a long debate on something which has already been before the House or the privileges and elections committee would not answer our purpose.

Mr. Nielsen: But it was not decided.

Mr. Blais: It was not decided, as the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has interjected. That is why the Senate report related to the green paper previously mentioned. This is a timely discussion and may well serve a useful purpose. I submit that the hon. member's motion referring this matter to the privileges and elections committee ought to be more narrow; it ought to deal with the specific circumstances affecting the hon. member for Calgary South. Otherwise, we would waste valuable House time and drag this matter out in a way which would suit nobody's purpose, including that of private members of this House.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I was disturbed by the words of the NDP House leader. It seems to me that the tactic of that party is to make an accusation on the one hand and then to scurry away under cover of sanctimonious dishonesty on the other.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I am surprised to note that the motion has the support of some on the government side, since the chairman of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, the hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore (Mr. Blaker), has indicated that according to his experience the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden) acted properly in doing what he did.

Now let me deal with the precise question raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and alluded to by the deputy government whip, the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais), namely, the breadth of the motion. It is not for the Postmaster General to say that the motion as worded would lead to a long, haranguing debate on conflict of interest, because, Mr. Speaker, that matter ground to a halt and was left to die in committee.

Mr. Blais: Come on, Walter.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The question was left to die in committee. It was not brought back to the House of Commons before the end of the last session. So when we hear a lot of verbiage, I can only conclude—

An hon. Member: You are casting aspersions.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): With respect, I am not casting aspersions. I say that the only matter before us is section 16 of the relevant statute mentioned. That question having been brought to the fore by the motion put by the hon. member for Calgary South, a motion which has to do with circumstances as they affect him, it is important that we engage ourselves in this debate. I say this because, as I look around the House of Commons, I note many members who are justifiably and honestly concerned about conflict of interest and how such conflicts may affect the carrying out of their duties. If we were not concerned about such conflicts, we would not be worthy of being members of this House. In that sense, I hope I speak for all hon. members when I congratulate the hon. member for Calgary South for facing the problems confronting him and asking us to do something about it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Next I raise the position of the Speaker of this House. What is the Speaker of the House of Commons? Our Speaker in this House represents a constituency, as does any other hon. member. He knows the difficulties of his own riding, and faces them. But he has been chosen by the members of this House to preside over their sittings and deliberations. He is still a member of parliament, in the full sense of the word, as we are. He is not superior to us except by virtue of the dignity of his office. Otherwise, he is a member of his House. What is more, he is a servant of the members of the House of Commons. If members of parliament who face a difficult situation cannot, in our parliamentary system, go to the Speaker for advice, I do not know to whom they could go; I do not know to whom they could speak in the House. Surely this is not the first time the Speaker has been approached by a member of parliament for advice. This is not to suggest lack of impartiality, discrimination or anything of that kind. It means that we look upon the Speaker as one whose judgment is trusted. I assume that is why the hon. member for Calgary South went to the Speaker.

I do not know what the investigation of this matter will show, but I am satisfied it will show that the hon. member was advised to talk to parliamentary counsel. That would not have been an unreasonable suggestion for the Speaker to make. The hon. member did this; he got advice from parliamentary counsel who is a servant of this House in its corporate sense. The hon. member acted on that advice. Like all hon. members who from time to time become involved in situations of this kind, the hon. member acted. I think he took the proper course. To put it bluntly, we ought not to nit-pick about terms of reference.

• (1530)

The motion that has been put forward allows this particular conflict of interest to be dealt with. If, in the course of dealing with this alleged conflict of interest, there is something broader with regard to the whole study of the matter, then the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections does not need to come back to this House to get further terms of reference.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I think that makes eminently good sense. I urge all of my colleagues—

An hon. Member: What about members on this side?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton); The hon. member speaks of hon. members on the other side of the House. In my judgment, and for the purpose of my remarks, backbenchers on the other side of the House are in no different position from members on this side. There must be a difference in terms of the cabinet, but not in terms of backbenchers. I think that is what the hon. member for Calgary South said. I invite hon. members to check Hansard, where they will see that is what was said.

Given that set of circumstances, and given the importance of allowing this matter to go to the committee, we are not only doing a colleague in the House a disservice by arguing and debating the terms of reference in a narrow sense, but perhaps we are doing this institution a disservice if we do not allow this motion to go now in the broad sense in which it is couched.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before we go further with the discussion, there is a fundamental point of difficulty here. The matter has been raised by the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden). He has said, in the terms of the motion which he proposes to put before the House, that he will do so if he has the consent of the House to put the motion. In his motion the hon. member is dealing specifically with the question raised by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), which was the question alluded to at the start. The terms of the motion, obviously, deal only with the question which concerns the hon. member personally.

What the hon. member is endeavouring to do by the terms of his motion is, with the consent of the House, to have the House order an investigation into the general question of rights and privileges of members with regard to contracts with or sales to the Crown, bearing in mind the Senate and House of Commons Act. Therefore, what I have to decide at this point is whether the hon. member has the unanimous consent of the House. I allowed the question to go on in order to attempt to define itself. I also had some idea that others may be raising questions of privilege relating to the same subject. It is now getting into a general discussion as to whether the motion ought to be put, whether it should be referred to or put to the House for a vote.

The fact is that discussion is very much germane to a specific question of privilege by a member which requires the Chair to decide whether there is a prima facie case of privilege which ought to stop the proceedings of the House and be put to the House for decision. The difficulty at this moment is that the Chair has not been asked to make that decision: it has not been asked to put a question to the House with regard to a question of privilege but, rather, has been asked to seek the unanimous consent of the House that this general matter be investigated.

The terms of the motion which I have before me reads in part:

I seek the consent of the House to move a substantive motion of privilege as follows:

That procedure is somewhat different from regular questions of privilege. I have difficulty in letting the discussion go on too long, because consent of the House has been sought. Rather than an extensive discussion on the merits of the motion or the merits that would ordinarily follow, if it were an ordinary question of privilege put forward with respect to a specific member's complaint, seeking within the bounds of a question of privilege that a decision be made by the Chair as to whether to put the question to the House, we would be in a different situation.

In view of the fact that I am really being asked to look for the consent of the House to refer this general matter, I feel I ought to ask whether the hon. member has the consent of the House which he seeks. The hon. member asks consent to put a motion which is as follows: Moved by the hon. member for Calgary South, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That the question of the rights, privileges and obligations of members of parliament granted and imposed by the House of Commons Act and other relevant statutes be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that the said committee report to this House on the parameters of such rights, privileges and obligations of members pursuant to such legislation.

Does the hon. member have the consent of the House to put that question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Blaker: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore (Mr. Blaker) was seeking the floor on a point of order. I did not hear the response to the question. Does the hon. member have the consent to put such a question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Blaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I know that under the rules of the House it would be improper for me to refer to the decision just taken with respect to the question of privilege. However, I wish, under a point of order, to establish that the answer I gave was in some measure either misquoted or misunderstood. I shall be brief. I do not want to be a contributor to the issue, but because of the fact that I used certain wording in my response to the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), I wish to review it so that hon. members are "au courant", so to speak.

The hon. member for Nickel Belt asked whether the Department of Supply and Services, or the minister thereof, was aware of certain problems relating to a sale made by the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden). I gave a three-part answer. I would like to advise hon. members very clearly of the words that I used. I said, "I do not know if the hon. member will accept a reply from the parliamentary secretary, but if he will do so, I will take notice of the question. "Second, I pointed out to him that the hon. member apparently discussed the matter with the Speaker and parliamentary law counsel. That was the second part of the answer. As it happened, I did not use the word "consult" with regard to yourself, Mr. Speaker, or the parliamentary law counsel; I used the words "apparently discussed". The third and final comment I made in my reply was, "However", I will pursue the matter with the minister."

To the extent that my reply is in any way contributing to a question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) or the hon. member for Calgary South, I want to say on this point of order that I used the words "apparently discussed".

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I want to express my personal thanks, and I am sure I speak for the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden) and all my colleagues, for the clarification that has just been given by the parliamentary secretary.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): In view of that clarification, I wonder whether Your Honour would see fit, or whether the House would be agreeable to put again the question which was denied a few moments ago, to see whether there is unanimous consent.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary South sought the consent of the House. Consent was asked for; it was not forthcoming. Similar motions, although different, are not restricted in their scope and can be put at different times by different members. However, I do not see any procedure by which I can repeatedly put a question for the seeming consent of the House when, in fact, consent has been denied.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BILLS

TABLING OF FIRST REPORT OF EXAMINER OF PETITIONS RESPECTING BILL SUBMITTED BY IAC LIMITED

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the table the first report of the examiner of petitions for private bills relating to a bill submitted by IAC Limited.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NIELSEN—CROWN-GRANTED FEDERAL LEASES

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of privilege arising out of similar circumstances. If any further consideration is being given with regard to sending to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections the reference in the terms made by the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden), I hope that the privilege being raised by me now might be taken into account. Hon. members might think that the only purpose to be served in reference to a standing committee would be the specific instance which was raised today concerning the hon. member for Calgary South.

Hon. members who were here at that time will remember that a reference with regard to my right as a member of parliament to purchase lands from the Crown was made to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections a few years ago because upon application I was refused that right by officers of the federal government on the basis that I was a member of parliament. The standing committee rectified that in short order by saying that rights of members of parliament in that regard placed them in no different position that any other Canadian. However, since that time I have seen, in Crown-granted federal leases, a provision written right into the lease that no interest in that lease can be held by any member of parliament. The same is true with any agreement for sale or purchase of lands from the Crown. No interest in that agreement for sale can be had by any member of parliament. These are federal documents of which I am speaking.

I was once refused the right to participate as a member of parliament, because I was a member of parliament, in a Crown Assets disposal sale. I think I should have the same right as any other citizen to bid on the disposal of such assets. I should have the same right to participate in a lease from the Crown or an agreement of sale from the Crown. I also wonder about the rights of members of parliament with regard to CMHC retainers.

The three examples I have given are those in which I have acted in my own personal circumstances. I was refused the right to participate in that kind of transaction. Using the Senate and House of Commons Act as prohibition against my so participating because I am a member of parliament is absolutely wrong. This applies to all members. They may not think so, but it does. I urge any member to try and take out a lease with the Crown where they are paying the Crown money; they cannot do it. Try to buy some land from the Crown under an agreement of sale; see if you succeed in that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: Hon. members who say they are not interested, do not live in areas where there are substantial Crown lands and the only place you can buy land is from the Crown. These are matters of very real concern to all members. Questions such as these can only be determined by an inquiry into the general rights, privileges and obligations of members, not one specific member. Therefore, the reference that was attempted by the hon. member for Calgary South in moving his motion to get the whole question before the standing committee is one to which I look forward. It would clear up this kind of thing, the application of federal legislation toward members of parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member sought the floor and has been recognized on a question of privilege. The question of privilege, if it does exist, would interrupt the proceedings and permit some question to be put which are out of the ordinary. While the hon. member may be developing a very interesting point, so far he has brought no immediacy to the question of privilege that he has in mind, and I would welcome his doing so.

● (1540)

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I thought I was doing that. Your Honour must have missed the main thrust of my question of privilege. I am sure Your Honour remembers the reference made to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections respecting my right as a member of parliament to purchase Crown lands. This was ruled by the Chair a valid question of privilege and was referred to the standing committee, which reported back to the House that a member of parliament had the same right as any other citizen to purchase federal lands.

My question of privilege today is that because I am a member of parliament I am refused participation in a lease of land with the Crown, which is the same question that was ruled on as being a valid question of privilege, as Your Honour will recall. Because I am a member of parliament, I am also refused participation in an agreement for sale with the Crown, which raises the same sort of question of privilege. That is the thrust of my privilege, and if I move a substantive motion which is based on the previous precedent in this House, the matter will go before the same committee.

Therefore, why should it not go before the committee as a general, broad question? The only reason that I do not move a substantive motion is that I believe the whole broad question should be referred to the standing committee, and I was looking forward to that motion being accepted by the House. When a similar motion goes forward, if it does, by the deputy House leader, I hope that it will be broad enough to include that kind of general inquiry into the rights, obligations and privileges of members of parliament under the Senate and House of Commons Act. It should not be specifically directed to the one question because there are other privileges of members involved here.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think we had better keep our proceedings on tracks. The hon. member for Calgary South sought the consent of the House. He did not get it. If other members wish to seek the floor to raise a question of privilege, surely they must be aware that if they wish to stop the proceedings, have the Chair put the question immediately and take precedence over every other piece of business before the House, there must be a motion related to the specific matter that asks the Chair to put the question. If there are other substantive motions of a general nature, they can be put to the House at any time in the normal way. There is no restriction on the scope of any motion that the House may want to put from either side, with the proper notice and within the normal terms of the Standing Orders.

The question that the Chair always has to decide is whether there is, in fact, a question of privilege which ought to stop the proceedings, take precedence and be put to the House for a decision. If other hon. members want to make a contribution at this time on a question of privilege, I will have to insist that there be some definition of a question of privilege in order to enable me to decide whether or not that ought to take place. If there is to be discussion of a general motion of some sort, that general motion will have to come before the House, however desirable it might be, in accordance with the general application of the Standing Orders.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I simply want to correct two impressions which have been left by hon. members—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Presenting reports by standing and special committees.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My point of order is that I was one of the first members of the House to rise on this matter, and I think it only fair for me to get recognition on this particular point.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The press gallery has gone home now.

Mr. Leggatt: The hon. member may make all the snide remarks he wants, but out of fairness I ask for recognition as a member of the House. I might say, Mr. Speaker, that I was prepared to put a specific motion before the House exactly in accordance with Your Honour's warning that we were getting off the point and into a very general area. It seems to me worth while to have the House come back to the point, which concerns the delicate position in which we place the Speaker of this House when this kind of problem arises in the media. I want to deal with that aspect briefly and also put a specific motion to the House so as to get this matter back on track. Therefore, I wonder whether Your Honour would recognize me.

Mr. Speaker: In the circumstances, it appears to me that the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) may have a separate question of privilege altogether. That I do not know; I have not heard it. In any case, the reason I did not go on to recognize other hon. members is that the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden) had not put to the House a question of privilege in the ordinary sense but, rather, had sought the consent of the House. I therefore felt that we should not get into a discussion as to whether or not consent is forthcoming. When consent is sought, it is asked for; if it is turned down, the House goes on to some other aspect of its business.

As for the motion before the House, putting forward a potential question of privilege is quite a different situation. If that is what the hon. member for New Westminster is seeking the floor on now, I will be glad to see him.

Mr. Leggatt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I did not want the House to get back to the point made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). This question comes about as a result of a report in the Ottawa Journal which simply said that the Commons Speaker denied that he sanctioned a business transaction, and then goes on to say that "Mr. Bawden said earlier this week the sale for $120,000 and the trading of an aircraft by Emden Limited, a company owned 100 per cent by the Bawden family, to the RCMP was cleared through Mr. Jerome".

I accept completely what the hon. member for Calgary South said today, but I think what we as House should do is to attempt to avoid this kind of conflict between Your Honour and any member being dealt with in this way, because it is very erosive of the kind of objectivity that must be in the House at all times if this House is to work. Therefore, it was for the purpose of protecting Your Honour that this matter was raised.

I must say I was sorry that I did not hear the hon. member for Calgary South deal with that aspect of the news report. I wish he had dealt with the question of what appears to be a conflict between reports in the press concerning what was done and what was not done with regard to the Speaker in the course of this transaction. I am sorry the House rejected the previous motion, but I should like to take another crack at it. Therefore, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez):

That this specific matter be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for study and report and that a report be made re-examining the role of the Speaker in these kind of problems so that a repetition of them will not occur.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I do not want to add to what has happened here today. This is, quite frankly, becoming just a bit of a comedy. But if the Chair needs any defence, I will rise to the defence of the Chair in terms of what happened in this particular matter, because I must say that if we have come to the position where we cannot, as members of parliament, talk over some personal difficulty with the first Commoner, we have fallen into a sorry state.

In any event, I doubt the propriety of the motion being put forward. Your Honour would, of course, have to ask for consent in this matter and, frankly, I am not inclined to give it. My hon. friend from Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has just drawn my attention to the significance of Standing Order 17(2) in the matter. I think it would perhaps be best if we all sat back and realized we are not talking about a narrow partisan issue, even if it did start out in that way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We are talking about the privileges, not of one member of parliament but of all members of parliament, and I would hope that, given a period of grace such as might be provided by the rest of the afternoon and this evening, those who are opposed to us on the other side might change their views on the particular motion which is presented. As I tried to say—and I do not think this was lost on hon. members; certainly it was not lost on the hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore (Mr. Blaker)—once the committee got into a matter of this nature it would be coming back to the House to broaden its terms of reference anyway.

After the subject had been examined in the broadest way, members of parliament would have available to them a reasonable guide, something they do not have now, and I think it is important they should have a guide in the particular part of the twentieth century in which we live.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I rise simply to repeat that the government is presently considering two reports, one from the House of Commons and the other from the Senate, relating to conflict of interest. One is the product of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The debate has taken place in the Committee on Privileges and Elections and in this House. That matter has been disposed of and there is no need now to have a general, wide survey or study of the matter. This seems to me to be self-evident.

Mr. Blaker: I want to make only a brief intervention on this subject. I would not have been content with the motion originally proposed by the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden). I do not know whether he was aware that the Committee on Privileges and Elections, of which I happen to be the chairman, has spent many months on the whole subject of conflict of interest. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) was one of the members of that committee, and we worked to do the best job we could. I believe we did a fair job.

On the second matter, I should like to agree with the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). The proposal by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) does not in my mind constitute a question of privilege, though it does seem to place Your Honour in the position of having to appear before a committee and go through all the details concerning the theory of privilege.

There is, however, a simple solution which I would propose. We on this side would have little hesitation about agreeing, should the hon. member for Calgary South wish to send the matter—not the general matter, but the specific matter he has raised and which is referred to in the Globe and Mail—to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. We on this side would certainly extend that courtesy to him so that he might be heard and so that he might redress any unfairness or injustice which he may feel has been done him. But these general motions get us nowhere at all, and I do not think I could support the one suggested by the hon. member for New Westminster.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I thought I should say a few words on this motion of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) because I raised a question today in the question period for very good reason. At this time we hear all sorts of things outside the House about politicians and the way we go about doing our business. I am concerned when I see the Edmonton Journal and the Herald carrying all kinds of headlines. There is a feeling outside this place that the House of Commons is a club and that a member of the club can get all kinds of things out of the club if he behaves himself. This bothers me, as a relatively new member of the House; I am concerned about this.

I am also concerned about Your Honour's position. You are impartial. You have no voice to defend yourself when headlines scream. "Jerome denies sanctioning Bawden deal", and when a report goes on to say, "Bawden says he has received a very positive response from the Speaker about the situation." When these things start to run around in a community, I am concerned because they erode the confidence of the people in their leaders—and we need only look to the south to see what happens when confidence is eroded, especially with respect to those who are supposed to be impartial. I raised the matter in that spirit. I know it is said outside the House—although I do not necessarily think so—that the Conservative party is forever stirring up scandal in the House of Commons, and I thought this was a wonderful opportunity to put the matter before the Committee on Priviliges and Elections and let the word go forth throughout Canada that there was nothing unbecoming or unseemly in the case of the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden).

One report quotes the House of Commons Act and gives the impression to the people at large that a member who has shares in a company cannot deal with the government even through his company. The newspaper says clearly that there must be no direct or indirect contact with the government with respect to any deals involving members of the House of Commons. I know Your Honour would appreciate an opportunity to come before the committee and tell the committee your side of the story with respect to this situation. We heard the hon. member set out his own position this afternoon. He is an honourable gentleman, and I accept what he has said. But there is an impression left in the mind of the public, and I think that impression should be cleared up to the satisfaction of all concerned. That is the reason I support the motion of my colleague, the hon. member for New Westminster. That is the committee set up by parliament, and that is the committee which ought to consider evidence from all those concerned and should make a decision one way or the other.

● (1600)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Whether or not it is an inviting opportunity for me or for any other member of the House of Commons to clarify this matter, the fact is that if this is to be done it will have to be done correctly. We have never accepted, as a prima facie question of privilege—if that is the proper term—a motion which describes anything in terms of saying "this matter be referred". That is a luxury of terminology which has never been allowed. "This matter" obviously has a different definition to individual members who use the words. If there is a specific matter which by its nature is such as to qualify as a question of privilege, and therefore deserving of being presented to the House for decision, then that matter will have to be clearly defined in terms of the motion.

I must say that neither do I find it inviting to consider, as a question of privilege of an emergency nature, that an investigation ought to be made by a standing committee, no matter how inviting an opportunity that might give me to state my side of the interpretation of the conversations that have been alluded to by the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden). If that is to be done, surely it will not be done on an emergency basis by a standing committee to investigate the role of the Speaker vis-à-vis the members of the House of Commons.

If there is a desire, as there seems to be on all sides of the House, that this matter be referred to a committee, or that it be taken under consideration in some way, it seems to me that some reflection and some careful draftsmanship concerning the kind of motion to be undertaken by the House really will do the House a great deal of good, and in the circumstances I think the matter ought to rest there at this moment.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BORROWERS AND DEPOSITORS PROTECTION ACT

MEASURE TO REGULATE INTEREST ON JUDGMENT DEBTS AND AMEND CERTAIN STATUTES

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) moved that Bill C-16, to provide for the protection of borrowers and depositors, to regulate interest on judgment debts, to repeal the Interest Act, the Pawnbrokers Act and the Small Loans Act and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is naturally a great privilege for a relatively new minister to introduce a bill in parliament, especially his first. The bill is of very great importance to an enormous and ever-growing number of Canadians who borrow and deposit money. The complex and novel approach of this bill is the product of considerable effort by the officials of my department. I am grateful to them for their dedication, as I am to those of my predecessors who as ministers advanced the cause to this point. Naturally, no bill such as this would be brought into being without exhaustive and careful discussions with officials of other departments. Needless to say, the Department of Finance played a particularly vital and important role in the discussions. I am most grateful for the co-operation of all the officials involved.

In placing this bill before the House, I would not wish to leave the impression that Canadians are ill-served by the overwhelming majority of their lending institutions. Our banks are rightly acknowledged as some of the largest and best run in the world. Other lending institutions serve effectively and honestly the credit needs of Canadians. If the impression has been created that the government believes otherwise, I would like to correct such an impression at the outset.

It gives me gratification that this bill is one that promises to be a considerable advance in social legislation, and it should appeal to and win support from all sides of this House and from Canadians generally. The legislation is long overdue.

Mr. Grafftey: You can say that again.

Mr. Abbott: The legislation is long overdue. The field of interest, under the British North America Act, falls within federal jurisdiction. The existing legislation dealing with this area is hopelessly out of date. The Interest Act was last amended in 1917. The Small Loans Act has not been amended for 20 years. In the last 30 years alone, total consumer debt—not including mortgage debt—has increased from less than $1 billion to more than $23 billion. More than 65 per cent of that increase has occurred since 1967. Today, excluding mortgages, consumer debt represents more than 22 per cent of our total disposable personal income. In the period from 1947 until 1975, non-mortgage debt has increased fully three times as quickly as income.

[Translation]

In light of that spiralling increase it is obvious that the government must take its responsibilities and examine the existing legislation to guarantee consumers feeling such a weight all the protection it is able to give them. This bill is not only the result of such an examination but also the result of a vast consultation with consumers, lenders, deposit institutions and provincial governments across Canada. It was not always possible to incorporate their ideas in our proposals but we considered all their suggestions carefully.

[English]

The bill has three main goals. The first is to impose uniformity in the practices used for the calculation, crediting and description of interest on all those who take deposits from or make loans to consumers in Canada, and to require a full, uniform and comprehensible disclosure system so that the consumer, before he enters into a deposit or borrowing transaction, will know all his rights and the obligations he will have to bear. The second goal is to faciliate the proper functioning of the market by encouraging more vigorous competition and providing the consumer both with protection and with the right of civil recourse. Thirdly, this bill will establish a clear and easily provable criminal offence to act as a strong deterrent to the cancer of loan sharking that has spread throughout this country.

● (1610)

May I speak first about deposit protection, since it is a clear demonstration of the purposes of this bill. At the present time in Canada there are many different formulas for the calculation of interest paid on deposits. For exactly the same amount of money deposited, a quoted 8 per cent rate, using one formula, will provide a much different interest payment than another quoted 8 per cent rate that is calculated differently. Both rates are arguably and legally 8 per cent. We do not believe that this kind of confusion serves the interests of the consumer. The bill, therefore, requires that a uniform formula for calculating and crediting interest on deposit accounts be used.

In practical terms, this will mean that for the first time, whenever two deposit-taking institutions both offer an interest rate of 8 per cent, the consumer will get a true 8 per cent return, no matter which institution he selects. This represents plain common sense. The cost of loans is also the subject of far-reaching reforms. The bill defines loans in such a way as to include, not merely formal cash loans negotiated from lending institutions but also other consumer credit vehicles such as department store credit cards. The first and most basic reform is that a statement of the cost of a loan will have to include the true total cost of that loan.

It is now possible for lenders to stack a variety of other charges on top of the quoted cost of borrowing. Insurance premiums, various administrative charges, legal costs, registration costs and the like are very often charged to the consumer and, in most cases, excluded from the calculation of the cost of borrowing. As a result, the consumer is not apprised of the real interest burden that he actually has to carry. Let us take the following example: let us take a loan of $4,000, at the declared rate of 12 per cent per annum, received from four different lenders. The first lender makes no deductions. At the end of three years you will pay $4,782.96, which means an effective rate of 12.68 per cent per annum. The second lender deducts a total of $50 for insurance and registration. You get $3,950. the total you pay over three years is still $4,782.96, but the effective rate is 13.66 per cent per annum. The third lender deducts $250 for registration, insurance and legal fees. You now get only $3,750. The repayment total over three years is still $4,782.96, but the effective rate is now 17.86 per cent. Finally the fourth lender deducts $650 for life insurance, registration, legal fees, finders fee and bonus. You now get a mere $3,350. The repayment over three years is still $4,782.96, but the effective rate has climbed to 27.84 per cent per annum. Thus, Mr. Speaker, this relatively simple example demonstrates how a similar quotation of 12 per cent per annum, or 1 per cent per month, can vary considerably, depending on the kinds of charges that are folded into the transaction, amounting, in the last example, to more than double the rate the borrower is told that he will be paying.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I hesitate to interrupt the minister, Mr. Speaker, but I wonder if by the time he completes his explanation on this point he could tell me how he believes he can lump together charges under provincial legislation for the registration of chattel mortgages or other forms of incumbencies with interest charges that are to the benefit of the lender. Those are two different things. I should like to know how the minister believes he can lump together apples, oranges, cherries, bananas and other things in the same basket and come out with common interest charges and rates.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I would prefer not to attempt to answer that question because it opens the problems of provincial instruments, a matter which may not provide an easy explanation. So although I would like to answer my hon. friend because he is always very fair, I do not think I can do so at this point.

I should like to continue my remarks by saying that in order to remove this confusion, the bill requires that all costs related to a loan be included in the total credit charge and be clearly disclosed to the consumer in a uniform manner, regardless where he may reside and the kind of loan that he is undertaking. Once again, the practical effect of this requirement will be that where a consumer is dealing with different lending institutions quoting the same rate on their loans, the actual costs of the loans will be exactly the same, rather than merely appearing to be the same.

There is another aspect to disclosure with which we are concerned. I am sure that most of us are aware that very seldom do we see credit advertising that mentions in any clear or complete way the costs and other obligations that consumers will have to assume. If the advertisement succeeds in persuading them to use the credit offered, the objective of the lender is reached without, necessarily, any concern as to whether the borrower is aware of the true cost of that credit. Typically, credit is advertised almost as an attribute of products—be they new cars, boats, or vacations—that the consumer may be induced to buy, whether he can afford to or not. Credit is promoted as a convenience for buying things, and the accompanying cost burdens are ignored.

The advertising regulations, pursuant to this bill, will require that all advertisements for any form of credit include clear statements of the cost of the credit being advertised, of all other obligations that the consumer will have to carry, and of any special lender policy or borrower qualification that will impose additional burdens on the borrower.

The only protection against excessive credit charges that the consumer enjoys today is found in the Small Loans Act. This act, however, applies only to loans of $1,500 or less, and it does not apply uniformly to all lenders. Vendor credit—the kind of credit you get at a department strore, and credit you get from banks which provide about 60 per cent of the total consumer credit used in Canada—is not covered by the Small Loans Act. There is no legal limit on credit charges for loans over $1,500 or on loans from lenders not covered by the act. The failure of the Small Loans Act adequately to protect the consumer has become more and more apparent. The fact is that loans between $1,000 and $1,500 are today rarely made. In 1966, for example, the total value of loans granted that would be defined as small loans under the act was $647 million. By 1974, that total had fallen to only $296 million. The overwhelming bulk of these is for amounts less than $300. That is why we propose the repeal of the Small Loans Act. In its stead we are proposing a strong and comprehensive set of protective devices applicable to all forms and levels of consumer credit so that consumers will be assured of access to loans bearing fair and reasonable credit charges.

The requirement that all costs associated with a loan be clearly disclosed in the credit charge is one such device. The second is the concept of the unwarranted rate. Where a rate appears to be excessive in view of the security involved, the risk characteristics of the particular consumer, and prevailing market conditions, the consumer will be able to apply to the court for a determination that the rate charged is unwarranted. To assure that this recourse will not be an involved or costly procedure for the consumer, the bill provides that the onus will be on the lender to establish that a rate is justified. While I do not expect a flood of litigation, we expect that lenders will be very careful to charge rates which are warranted under current market conditions and will not run the risk of incurring legal penalties and costs.

Mr. Clarke: Who is going to decide?

Mr. Abbott: I believe that this provision will encourage self-policing by lending institutions and will also act as a considerable incentive to lenders to see that a truly competitive situation is reflected in their credit charges. I should reiterate that it is not our intention to promote excessive litigation. Rather, we expect that the availability of these tools to borrowers will exert a significant restraining force in the consumer loan market.

A primary purpose of this legislation is to protect the low income borrower. It is only too obvious that the existing rules do not do that effectively. Existing ceilings on small loans, rather than providing the low income borrower with money at a reasonable rate often provide him with no money at all. Legitimate lenders, finding that ceiling rates are too low, invest elsewhere, leaving the low income borrower with only one recourse, the loan shark. To overcome this we are, first of all, imposing heavy penalties on loan sharks. Second, through the disclosure provisions we are imposing strong financial incentives for lenders to make complete and open disclosure of the charges they impose. Low income borrowers will know at once, and before they borrow, just what kind of burden they are being asked to bear. For the first time they will be able to understand clearly what they have at stake and will be able to make an informed decision as to whether they ought to borrow at all.

Third, I remind the House of the prepayment privilege and the unwarranted rate provision. A low income borrower who is a good risk—and many of them are—is entitled to get a rate which takes that fact into account. His credit rating may be as good as and perhaps better than that of higher income people, but because he is ill-informed, timid, or a person alarmed by forms, he will tend to avoid institutions which will gladly deal with him. Now this borrower can go freely to any institution, obtain a loan at rates commensurate with his true credit risk, and prepay the higher rate loan he is carrying. This prepayment feature is another incentive for lenders to charge warranted rates so that they will not lose income because of turn-around costs.

Finally, our concern for the low income borrower does not stop with this bill. My department has instituted studies in the whole field of credit for low income borrowers. We are especially interested in such activities as community branch banks, the so-called storefront banks that some of the chartered banks have already begun to operate. Following passage of this bill, it will be our intention to mount a comprehensive program to assist low income borrowers in the marketplace.

Mr. Clarke: What about the regulations?

Mr. Abbott: Wait for them. There is a third important market protective device in this bill. The bill bars any lender from charging any borrower a penalty for paying off a non-mortgage loan before the term of that loan has expired. Where a consumer discovers that he is being charged a higher credit charge on his loan than he need pay, by the simple expedient of finding that he can make the same loan more cheaply elsewhere, he need only borrow the money from the cheaper source at the lower rate and repay the first loan immediately and without penalty.

The only exceptions to this unlimited right of prepayment will be mortgage loans. However, before I get to mortgages I would like to explain that at the present time even where there is no formal penalty for prepayment of a loan, the most common method employed by Canadian lending institutions in calculating interest due on a prepaid loan results in the levying of interest charges which are in excess of the true amount of interest which would be payable if interest was to be calculated accurately. This calculating method, called the rule of 78's, is used across Canada and is still another unnecessary burden to the borrower. The bill requires that interest rates be calculated to reflect precisely the rate quoted.

The particular nature of mortgage loans and of the mortgage loan market makes this kind of unlimited prepayment privilege unworkable with respect to mortgages. I do believe, however, the penalties currently in use in cases of prepayment of mortgages are often excessive and unnecessarily restrictive. Therefore, the bill provides limited prepayment privileges in the case of mortgages as well. This proposal extends the current NHA provisions to the whole of the mortgage market. The consumer will be permitted to prepay up to 10 per cent of the principal amount of a fixed rate mortgage on each of the first and second anniversaries of the effective date of the mortgage. After the third anniversary the borrower will enjoy a much more extensive right to prepay principal, and the maximum penalty the lender may charge will not exceed three months' interest on the amount prepaid at the agreed credit charge rate.

Mr. Clarke: That's what it is now.

Mr. Abbott: No, it is not now. The bill also deals with variable rate mortgages, limiting the frequency of rate increases and permitting the borrower to prepay after the first year. These proposals should enable wider use of this form of mortgage instrument and curtail certain practices now being used to achieve the same effect without adequate protection for borrowers.

[Translation]

Before getting into a description of the proposed provisions to punish and discourage loan sharks I would like to address the House more particularly on a widespread practice in Canada which consists in lending on social welfare cheques and anticipated income tax reimbursements.

Under that practice which could nearly be classified as a theft, a person or company buys an individual's anticipated income tax refund at a substantial discount. This can also be done by purchasing social welfare cheques before they are issued, once again at a substantial discount. Those so-called purchases are actually loans on which the interest is the difference between the amount lent and the one to be received by the lender.

[English]

The effective credit charges made by these operators are often so high that we have concluded they should be characterized as criminal. In cases where they are much above current lending rates, the unwarranted rate protection available to the consumer will apply to these "discounters" as much as to any other lender.

To give the House some impression of the growing problem of loan-sharking in Canada, I should like to mention just three facts. The first is that police estimate that loan-sharking has become a $3 billion per year business in Canada. The second is that police estimate that loan-sharking has become the second greatest source of income for organized crime, second only to the illicit drug traffic. The third, and perhaps most disquieting fact, is that in Canada today it is possible for a loan shark to make a loan—and most of these loans are made to the poor—and charge an interest rate higher than 1,000 per cent, yet be guilty of no criminal offence.

The legal sanctions now in force have proved entirely inadequate to stop or even to control the spread of loan-sharking. Neither the disclosure provisions in some provincial consumer protection acts, nor the Small Loans Act provide penalties sufficient to deter or even inconvenience loan sharks. Up to now threats or intimidation have been very difficult to prove, but the bill goes into considerable detail in defining harassment, coercion, threats and intimidation and imposes heavy penalties for their use. To deal with these problems I have introduced in this bill the concept of a criminal rate of credit charge. Any person who makes a loan in excess of this rate is subject to criminal prosecution.

An hon. Member: What rate is it?

Mr. Abbott: It is proposed that the rate will be defined specifically in the regulations.

Mr. Clarke: Why not put it in the bill?

Mr. Gilbert: Are you going to consult the mafia?

Mr. Abbott: The offence is complete once it is established that the rate charged is greater than the criminal rate.

Mr. Clarke: But you are not going to tell us about it.

Mr. Abbott: I hope the hon. member will sit in the committee, where we will have the benefit of his advice.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Abbott: Violations can be dealt with either by summary conviction or upon indictment, and penalties go up to a maximum of $10,000 in fines and five years' imprisonment. Armed with this legislation, we believe that for the first time our police forces will be able to move effectively against loan-sharking and loan sharks. Finally, there are a number of other criminal offences dealt with in the bill: incorrect or inadequate disclosure, violations of advertising regulations, false or inexact statements of credit charges or interest rates, failure to maintain adequate records, and extortionate collection practices. These are punishable by fine and imprisonment. These are the essential features of the Borrowers and Depositors Protection Act.

[Translation]

I think this is a wise legislation that will permit us to improve our market system and competition in the important area of consumer credit.

[English]

I look forward to committee stage, when the bill has received approval in principle, because it will be an opportunity for hon. members to bring in valuable suggestions. I hope the committee will invite representations from outside groups. I stand ready to welcome constructive suggestions. We do not view this bill as the final word, the ultimate wisdom. We recognize there may be defects. It is a complex bill, and I can assure hon. members that we stand ready to view constructive suggestions warmly. I hope, and believe, that hon. members generally will regard this bill, whatever its defects, as a major step in a most important field.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, in rising to reply to the minister's opening statement in this debate, I can say that we on this side of the House are, naturally, adopting what I underline as broad and general support of some of the principles and objectives set out in it. I say, and I underline again, that we are in broad and general support; but I do not think I am hiding anything from the minister when I say that in committee and at other stages of this debate he can anticipate lively participation in a real spirit of trying to improve the legislation. As the minister himself said, the last word is not in, and there will probably be many amendments. Having debated this issue in our policy sessions on this side of the House for many years, we will have some useful, additional things to say about the bill.

Back in 1970, when I had the privilege of being chairman of this party's policy committee on consumer protection, we had the general clause that the consumer has a right to be protected against financial contracts which are not clearly spelled out, and that interest rates, legal conditions and other terms of finance and loan contracts should be clearly and honestly spelled out. This is a problem that has caused concern on this side of the House for many years.

As I understood the minister, in his speech he said there were three objectives in the bill, yet in press releases he said there were four. We are not quite sure which to believe or interpret, but that may or may not be splitting hairs. I understand the objective of the bill is, first, to protect Canadian borrowers against loan-sharking and all forms of excessive interest charges. Second, the minister stated, both inside and outside the House, that an objective of the bill is to provide the public with more and better information on all credit and deposit dealings. Third, an objective was to eliminate unnecessary complexities and confusion in the credit field and, finally, to define strict and uniform rules to protect all borrowers and depositors, and to rationalize federal credit legislation. It is within the parameters of these objectives stated by the minister that we will debate this afternoon.

The minister made one interesting remark at the beginning of his speech in which I think he subconsciously revealed the attitude of the government. He said he was proud that he had discussed this matter with other departments of government—the Department of Finance, for instance. Taking him at his word, Mr. Speaker, he obviously discussed it with other departments and agencies, but if he went to sit in my office for more than three days he would be convinced he had not adequately consulted the parties affected by the bill. I know he will say he talked to them for a few minutes on the telephone or had a meeting in his office. On this side of the House, however, we know there will be a lot of trouble with this bill because, in typical government fashion, the minister did not consult the Canadians concerned. He should level with us. Did he really consult the financial institutions, for instance? On this side of the House we have a different definition of the word "consultation". If I might make a comparison, Mr. Speaker, when Polonius gave advice to his son who was going to college, he used an expression that we have heard on many occasions, "Neither a borrower nor a lender be".

Mr. Speaker, remarks from behind the curtain are not going to add anything to this debate. I know it is boring to be a supporter of this government.

Mr. Rodriguez: Do not do what Hamlet did to Polonius through the curtain.

Mr. Grafftey: The Canadian consumer, although he might have heard the advice Polonius gave to his son, has not taken it seriously. In 1948, consumer credit outstanding was in the neighbourhood of $835 million; today it has been cited on many occasions, since the bill was given first reading, at somewhere around $24 billion—three times as much. Consumer credit is growing three times as fast as disposable income, Mr. Speaker, and that has very grave and obvious significance.

I will not outline in lecture form to individual members of the House the far-reaching social consequences, especially on low income Canadians, of lending and credit phenomena. I do not think I am getting on a soap-box or being demagogic when I say those of us who are constituency-minded members, whether we have a constituency office or visit individual electors in their homes, are often saddened at the plight of low income Canadians, as they are in many ways throttled by credit.

[Translation]

Let me add a few words. The other day I had the privilege to visit my very good friend, the leader of the Social Credit Party of Canada (Mr. Caouette) at the Ottawa General Hospital. He is a sincere and dynamic man who dealt, both in the House of Commons and outside, with many questions relating to credit as it affects Canadians, especially the poor. I am sure that if the leader of the Social Credit Party were here, he would have some extremely important and profound things to say about the effects of our loan and credit system on Canadians. I am sure my colleagues in the House of Commons will be in full agreement with me when I say that I hope he will be back with us in the near future.

● (1640)

[English]

I repeat—without getting into semantic dificulties—that we shall support most of the broad principles of the bill. Although the minister paid tribute to his predecessors in the portfolio, I would not be surprised if, after he hears what we on my side and interested parties inside and outside the committee have to say, he introduced amendments to the bill.

The minister said that this bill had been long delayed. It has been. I know that the question of credit which involves our financial institutions and consumers is one of considerable complexity. Yet when all is said and done, even though the minister admits the subject is complex. I say this legislation has been too long delayed. In typical government fashion, we have had study after study and committee after committee looking into this question. There has been no real consultation, let me add: Then, when it is too late, this bill is brought before the House. I know the popular adage, "Better late than never." I agree. But I suggest to the minister that the government, in delaying the introduction of this legislation, has done a real disservice to Canadians individually and collectively.

Mr. Fraser: In this case it is not better late than never; it is very late, and not much better.

Mr. Grafftey: The minister is concerned about loan-sharking. We are concerned. I agree with those who told me in private that they see nothing in this bill which will come to grips substantively with that problem. Surely the minister did not learn yesterday that loan-sharking is as bad as he now says it is. The problem has become worse because of this government's failure to introduce meaningful legislation on the subject. Therefore, I suggest, without being irresponsible in my remarks, that some of the blame for the sorry plight of many of our borrowers, especially those involved with loan sharks, rests on the government. Loan-sharking affects low income people more than others. I repeat, the difficulties of low income earners who becomed involved with loan sharks have been exacerbated over the years because the government has failed to act in this field.

No country in the western world studies problems to death more than we do. When historians write the history of the present government, they will write of commissions studying commissions, of study groups set up to study other study groups, and of this government's doing less than any other government in the free world. That can be said about the very matter we are considering.

Mr. Gilbert: Yes, but let's hear what the Tories have to say about this bill.

Mr. Goodale: They have nothing to say about it.

Mr. Gilbert: I want to hear what the Tories have to say.

An hon. Member: Let's ask Sinc Stevens.

Mr. Goodale: They are trying to think of something.

Mr. Grafftey: The minister said that he and his predecessors had consulted the provincial premiers. I share the concern of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert): Did they really consult the provincial premiers? We shall delineate some of the difficulties the bill will encounter. I suggest they might not have arisen if the government had consulted the provincial premiers. I know the minister is new in the portfolio, but deep down in his heart can he really say that he consulted consumers, consumer associations and financial institutions in this country? I say no, Mr. Speaker, it is not good enough to prepare draft legislation, to give it hasty first reading and to claim that the process constitutes consultation. As with so much of its legislation, the government is treating interested parties like fools.

The minister may think that some in this country, when discussing the subject, react like Pavlovian dogs, that is, assume that there is an automatic conflict between this country's financial institutions and consumer associations, etc. Perhaps the minister is saddened by such automatic reactions on the part of interested groups in this country. To some extent, the minister is the victim. That brings me to my point, Mr. Speaker: I am sick and tired of hearing conventional wisdom say that consumer and corporate interests are mutually exclusive.

An hon. Member: Whose side are you on?

Mr. Grafftey: There you are; there is the Pavlovian dog reaction of our socialist friends. Socialists never solve problems; they just make them worse. Look at what happened in the United Kingdom. The socialists love the notion that there is an automatic confrontation between consumers and corporations. They have never been able to solve a problem—

Mr. Gilbert: Whose side are you on?

Mr. Rodriguez: What is your interest?

Mr. Grafftey: I am speaking for the general interest.

Mr. Rodriguez: And what side is that?

Mr. Grafftey: If hon. members insist on prattling such nonsense—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: He is on the general interest side.

Mr. Grafftey: Hon. members insist on taking sides. As long as they prattle the conventional wisdom, they will get nowhere.

Mr. Fraser: The government wants people to borrow money but not pay it back.

An hon. Member: What do the Tories say?

Mr. Grafftey: Liberals and socialists say that there is automatically confrontation between the consumer and the corporate interest.

Mr. Rodriguez: You are on the corporate side.

Mr. Grafftey: Previous ministers in charge of the department brought the department into disrepute because of that attitude. We on my side of the House say you will get nowhere with legislation like this unless you delineate, initially, the common interest of consumer and corporate entities.

Mr. Gilbert: Let's hear Sinc.

Mr. Grafftey: Progressive Convervatives do not accept the conventional wisdom which has been aided and abetted by government stupidity. It is not easy to put conventional wisdom aside. You must consult both sides.

Mr. Rodriguez: And you are talking on behalf of one side.

Mr. Grafftey: I thought we set up the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in the first place in order to bring about some degree of understanding, communication and co-operation between the consumer and corporate sectors and government. Only after such understanding, communication and co-operation had been achieved was there to be action. If the department failed to act in the areas of concern to consumers and corporations—and I hope the minister will rectify this—the reason is that the present government accepted the outdated conventional wisdom which has been prattled for years by socialists, to the effect that there is an automatic, built-in conflict between consumers and corporate entities.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Grafftey: We do not believe in that.

Mr. Gilbert: I think he is filibustering this bill.

Mr. Grafftey: We think that we can only have progressive consumer protection, or legislation protecting Canadian borrowers—and I know those to my left will not like this—if we truly conserve the constructive viability of our lending institutions.

An hon. Member: Explain.

● (1650)

Mr. Grafftey: If I have to explain that to you, you are lost before you begin. Since the creation of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, this government has done an appalling job of demonstrating a mutual interest in producers, manufacturers and consumers. We on this side believe that while government must often be willing to take tough and unpopular decisions, we are going to get nowhere without a high degree of co-operation and communication between government, producers and consumers. Frankly, if this sounds like a motherhood truism, it is. I believe it has to be repeated and repeated and repeated—

An hon. Member: And repeated.

[Mr. Fraser.]

Mr. Grafftey: —and repeated, because of the confrontation attitude of this government up to now with this department. The minister would privately admit to me that the record of the department has been pretty sad to date. The government's approach to this bill, in many ways laudable in intention, is horrendous in its execution. Why? Because of delay. It is the kind of thing that should have been brought in by any government worthy of calling itself a government, five years ago.

An hon. Member: Why didn't your government bring it in?

Mr. Grafftey: That was 13 years ago. There has been lack of real consultation. Look at how this bill was introduced into the House. It was barely mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. Nothing was ready. After a long, long recess we came to the floor of the House of Commons. Obviously, no significant legislation was ready. I can just see the cabinet meeting last week "Somebody produce something". The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Abbott) said he had something kind of ready. Therefore, last Thursday we were informed we would deal with second reading of a fairly important bill. It may turn out to be a paper tiger, but I will call it important at this stage. Our House leader was advised that it would be given second reading today.

An hon. Member: Aren't you ready?

Mr. Grafftey: I am not like the socialists. We examine things a little more. We do not have this Pavlovian gut reaction to everything. This bill was presented to the House on the valid assumption and I sincerely think it was a valid assumption that the opposition really wanted to help in making this kind of legislation better and making a constructive contribution. I say to the minister, is this really the way to conduct government business?

To get into some of the specific interests of the bill—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: The minister said that he consulted the provincial authorities. Has he ever heard of property and civil rights? With regard to some of the disclosure provisions, some of the unwarranted interest rate provisions, I really wonder if some of the officials or some of the members of the government have studied constitutional law at all. We on this side of the House hope that the pitfall has been avoided.

I listened with great interest to the question put by the hon. member for Edmonton West. I am concerned about some of the constitutional provisions in the bill, certainly in the province of Quebec, which would involve property and civil rights. In other provinces there are other considerations. I ask the minister whether he has read the Saskatchewan brief on this whole matter. Frankly, from reading the bill and some of the provisions in it I doubt whether there has been real consultation with the provincial authorities vis-à-vis the constitutionality of it.

Maybe I am not up to date with respect to some of my legal principles, but I always thought that no matter what we said here in the House of Commons, it was a long-standing principle of law that it was incumbent on the plaintiff to prove his case. The minister will surely have to prove his case to us both in the House and in committee. No doubt the law is fraught with exceptions to the general rule, but I rather doubt that this is one of them.

I see all kinds of difficulties from a practical as well as from a legalistic point of view about asking the defendant to prove his case, as now seems to be proposed. I always thought it was a principle of law that innocence was presumed until the contrary was proved. Some of the thinking behind this provision is certainly foreign to me. I note the minister has expressed the hope that there will not be much litigation as a result of this bill. But where litigation does arise, it will come before courts under provincial jurisdiction whose judges will have the last say as to who is going to prove what, how and where. Seriously, I wonder to what extent the provinces have been consulted in relation to this bill. When we get into committee, and later on in the debate, the minister will certainly be called upon to allay our fears on this point.

The hon. gentleman has already stated that the first purpose of the bill is to protect Canadian borrowers—

An hon. Member: Five o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave)—Agriculture—Beef—Request for restriction of imports; the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—Government administration—Possibility of moving part of Veterans Affairs to Prince Edward Island; the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil)—Industry—Toho lead and zinc refinery.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions (papers), private bills and public bills.

Changes in Standing Orders

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SUGGESTED MODIFICATION OF STANDING ORDERS

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants) moved:

That, this House do modify its Standing Orders and practices, to the end that it bring its affairs more closely into conformity with modern (that is, acceptable mid-20th century expectations), by

1. Cutting by one-half the time limits for speeches where such time-limits are set forth in Standing Orders;

2. Setting up a committee composed of members of all parties, and of members of the parliamentary press Gallery—each component to number seven—which shall supervise the rules to govern the recording by instruments capable of radio broadcasting and of telecasting of the proceedings of this House and of any committee or other recognized entity thereof, and the public use thereof;

3. Providing that the rules for the so-called late show, or adjournment debate, be altered to provide for the participation of five instead of three, and that the Speaker have absolute discretion to extend the time for reply by up to three minutes;

4. Providing that no member of this chamber shall have to wait for recognition by the Chair for longer than three oral question periods if that member has risen in each of such three consecutive question periods, such question and recognition by the occupant of the Chair to be recognized upon the request of such member at the conclusion of the third such period;

5. Providing that the government through its House leader may designate up to six measures per session for consideration and disposition by legislation where such proposals reflect these principles:

(a) an amendment to existing legislation which shall incorporate not more than one major change, the final opinion in any dispute to be that of Mr. Speaker;

(b) the government does not propose to amend such legislation in any other manner in that calendar year without unanimous consent;

(c) the speeches by the mover and the designated replier for each party shall not exceed fifteen minutes, and by subsequent spokesmen of not more than five minutes;

6. Setting at five the number of those who may oppose unanimous consent to any motion made in this chamber.

He said: Mr. Speaker, these are six ideas, and any other member of the House could, I imagine, present six alternative ideas of equal validity for the reform of our practices and procedures. I framed my motion in such a way as to directly develop interest among hon. members. I think this afteroon we shall have the privilege of welcoming back an old friend into the debate, making his maiden speech as a backbencher. I refer to the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCleave: I will say simply that I hope when the committee on procedure is reconstituted he will be in his place at the head of the table. He has done a thoroughly excellent job in that committee.

Mr. Speaker, were this a gathering of physicians it would be inappropriate that somebody should die of a cold, and this being a gathering of parliamentarians I do not think it would be appropriate if I talked the motion to death and used up all the time allotted to me. I have 20 minutes, and I am going to try to make my contribution in ten, thus leading up to the very first point that I make, to cut by one half the time limit for speeches in this chamber, the exception being the "late show". I don't know how you can make do with much less than four minutes in presenting a case, with three minutes for reply, but everything else I would chop in two. As for supplementaries during the question period, what I would do to those who ask them goes beyond anything I should like to state to the House now.

The first point, then, is an obvious one. I do not regard it as a major cure for procedural ills, though. I think that means restoring debate in committee of the whole. However, that is rather too large an idea to put forward in a motion such as I am presenting this afternoon. The second point calls for a committee composed of members of all parties and of members of the parliamentary press gallery to solve the problems of broadcasting and telecasting. Perhaps this is not generally known, but our sound system is such that all the radio correspondents we have in the gallery—there aren't any there now, I guess; we have the usual lone minion from Canadian Press, God bless him—could, at the start of the day, if they were given the authority, plug into our sound system and questions and answers could be sent forth immediately to a waiting public.

It would not take very much to bring that about. What it would take is unanimous agreement by everyone in this chamber. I do not intend to scout the idea at any greater length, except to say that I can see disputes ahead. I can see misuse in certain quarters of facilities for broadcasting the proceedings of the House. I know there is some suspicion on the floor of this chamber as to what might happen if broadcasts from the chamber were left, without any check or balance whatsoever, to the mercy of some people who pass for journalists in this country. So this is a way of giving some protection at least to members.

A week ago I was listening to a program called "Here Today" out of my own CBC station in Halifax. In this one-hour program, this is what I was fed as an innocent bystander. First, a speech by Mr. Mitchell of the Liberal cabinet in Halifax. Then a speech by none other than the Liberal premier of Nova Scotia. Then a speech by somebody from the other place—but, again, a Liberal. The fourth one—and here we get to the national scene—was the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc). Next was the Prime Minister of the country (Mr. Trudeau). That was Liberal number five. He was followed by the parliamentary secretary to the minister who speaks on urban affairs every day except Monday. He got in there as number six. Finally, the prime minister of Quebec, Mr. Bourassa, got in there. That made seven Liberals.

The leavening of political virginity in this one-hour program came in the form of the Premier of Saskatchewan who happens to belong to the NDP. No other political party need have applied. From the party to my far left and my own particular party there was not one person who said anything that day which could find a place on that program in Halifax. It was an almost incredible turn of events. Eight voice clips, and not one of them from the official opposition, not one of them from the Creditiste party. It was a most shameful abuse by a handful of people posturing as trying to present an objective picture of the news. The only honourable exception I would make is that the weather forecast had no political slant and I thought the sports program was rather well presented.

When something like that is happening, you know as a member of parliament that if you allow a very large machine such as a television camera to come into this place, there must be some mechanism by means of which a member of parliament can voice his displeasure at the way in which the editors are using their material if he feels he is being mistreated.

I turn, now, to point number three, concerning the "late show". I think the "late show" is the best thing to have happened in this parliament for ten years by way of reform. I would simply extend the three units to five, so that anybody who has a grievance would not be obliged to wait around for a long time but could be heard quickly.

The fourth point concerns the problem of recognition by the Chair during the question period. This is something which often bothers members. It may surprise my listeners on the government side, but there are a number of us on this side of the House who do have this difficulty. In my own case, I think I am as tall as the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) and we weigh about the same, but I can remember one occasion when he was recognized four times running in the course of a single question period, and I was not recognized at all. I do not think this was because I failed to catch the eye of the Speaker, but I think the hon. member for Calgary North was perhaps a little more adept at catching the Speaker's ear. My proposal is that anybody who is persistent for three consecutive days should have his moment in the sun at least at the end of the third question period.

My fifth point is one which I consider to be important. I share the concern of many about the pace, or lack of pace, at which business is done in this chamber. What I am suggesting is a method of dealing with what I call good housekeeping legislation, much of which arises out of decisions of courts which seems to be at variance with what we in parliament thought we had done when we passed certain legislation. My proposal would offer a quick way, for example, of amending the divorce legislation without holding up every aspect of it, whether relevant or not, for debate in this chamber.

Some day we shall have to adopt my suggestion, or a suggestion of a similar nature, if the necessary amount of legislation is to pass through this chamber. I suggest that if we fail to take such measures, the device of taking action by way of order in council, regulations and the like will increasingly become standard procedure, which again removes us one step further from parliamentary control. I therefore suggest that whether this be the formula or something else be the formula, some thought has to be given to good housekeeping procedure, so I have set it forth. My final point is that if unanimous consent is required, it can be resisted but it would take five people to do so. This would end the present abuse of one or two members who would stand together until hell freezes over, resisting anything sensible which was being suggested in the House about prolonging debate or doing something when unanimous consent was required.

May I say, finally, Mr. Speaker, how much I appreciate the fact that as a result of the draw I had the opportunity to make this subject number one on the list of private members' motions. I am sure it will not be the last dealing with procedure in our chamber. I anxiously await the speeches which will be made on the subject this afternoon, including that of the newly-discovered backbencher, the hon. member for Eglinton.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, this is a day of beginnings for me. Today I asked my first question of the ministry, in the House of Commons and now I am making my first speech as a backbencher. I find both these duties quite congenial and I intend to continue to harass the government and participate in debate.

● (1710)

I begin by commending the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) for his initiative in sponsoring this motion. The hon. member has a well-earned reputation in this House for impartiality and fairness. His work as the co-chairman of the joint committee on statutory instruments is well known and quite outstanding. Personally, I appeared before that committee on a number of occasions in my previous ministerial capacity as president of the privy council and have always been greatly stimulated by the cross-examination to which I was subjected. I look forward particularly to the conclusions of that committee, and hope that the co-chairman will urge his co-members to bring in a report as soon as possible on that vexed question of access to documents. I am sure the government will be waiting anxiously to see what advice the committee offers.

The hon. member is also a member of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization and has participated in the debates there. The motion before the House is, therefore, more than normally significant because it is being put forward by a leading and respected member of the opposition. He is a man of long experience, of outstanding ability and with a well-earned reputation for objectivity. No one can accuse him of having any ulterior motive in putting forward this motion, and particularly no one can accuse him of wanting to help the government by the reform of the rules that he is advocating.

My views on this question are very similar to those of the hon. member. The procedures of this House are outdated. They have become obsolete. Our proceedings should be televised, because this is a modern and effective method of communication which was not available to the previous generation and which we should make use of now since it is available. Just as at one time Hansard was introduced as a modern method, strongly resisted, it has now become accepted as a logical way of communicating to the public the words uttered in this House.

This House of Commons is the heart and centre of our democratic institutions, and it is not an exaggeration to say that the people of Canada judge the health of our democracy by the functioning of this parliament, and particularly of the House of Commons. I think it almost goes without saying that our procedures do need reform. Surely no one who looks at the way we use our time is satisfied that we use it profitably. Surely the time has come when we should face up to the necessity for modernizing our procedures.

I was particularly happy to see in the motion put forward by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants that he linked together changes or reforms of the rules and procedures with the televising of the proceedings of this House. I think the question that ought to be addressed to those who would resist procedural reform is whether they would be satisfied to see the House proceedings being televised according to the rules that now prevail. I ask them, for example, if it were technically possible—and I think shortly it will be—to have a continuous live broadcast of the proceedings of this House, how long people would be content to look at the televising of our proceedings if members made 40-minute speeches? I am quite sure that after one or two, people would shut off the television and say, "I have heard it all before. This is just repetition and a quite unnecessary way of debating the affairs of the country".

So why do we continue to make 40-minute speeches if they cannot stand the light of day, or shall I say the light of television? Is it because members are trying to persuade one another to change their point of view? I do not think so. I think it might be necessary—I am sure the hon. member will agree with me—for the leaders of the parties or the principal spokesmen on these subjects, to be permitted to speak for 40 minutes, or even longer if necessary, in order to put forward the respective views of their parties or the school of thought they represent. But I have observed this House now for 13 years and, as I see it, most of the speeches that are made by ordinary backbenchers and not by the leading spokesmen for the parties are intended to be for the record, whether for reference later or in order to distribute them to constituents.

If we were to televise our proceedings there would be great urgency to revise our procedures, to shorten our speeches, to be able to forecast with some certainty what we were going to be debating within the next few days. We would want to show the public that we were focusing our attention upon the issues that were of concern to them, upon the leading issues of our time. Television would certainly affect parliament. I have heard the criticism that parliament would change if television were introduced. Of course it would change—and for the better, just as it changed when we brought into our proceedings the idea of writing down with an independent hand the words that are uttered in this House. That did change the House of Commons. It changed it for the better. In my judgment, televising the House would also change it, and for the better. It would be as if all the people of Canada were watching us.

When it is televised, in my judgment the House of Commons will once again become the focus of debate on public affairs. What seems to be more important today is not what goes on in the House of Commons but what goes on outside the House of Commons, in the interviews of members of parliament by the press who meet us downstairs in the "scrum" and say, "What is that you said in the House of Commons. Did you really mean it?" Or they put to a member of parliament another question that was not asked in the House of Commons at all.

Surely the time has come when we members of parliament should see that what goes on here is accurately reported to the people of the country so they can judge for themselves.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: That is not now possible. I do not blame the media for the distortion that goes on, I blame ourselves. The media dominates us because we do not use it to televise our proceedings. That is the problem. People criticize the media—I do occasionally—for the distortion that takes place, but the remedy lies in our hands. We can have our proceedings made known to the public at large through television; we do not have to depend upon the media.

It is possible, of course, that the television stations that relay shots of our proceedings will distort by selection. That is possible, and I am sure it can and will happen when we do have television in this House. But if televising is carried out under the control of the Speaker, as I gather is the view of the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants, and as was the intent of the motion that was on the order paper in the last session, then distortion is minimized. At least the television cameras are not going to distort what is going on in the House of Commons, because those television cameras will be under our control, under the control of our president, the Speaker, and I would hope of the members of the House as proposed by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants. At least the public will see their elected representatives in action in the House of Commons.

What a difference there is, for example, in the cross-fire here between the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the cross-examination by the press of either of these gentlemen. This is the place where this debate should be seen, and not as distorted inevitably by the media who have an interest which differs from that of the members of the House of Commons.

Moreover, it seems to me that if we did televise our proceedings, then the media could perform its function much more effectively. Then the commentators could comment on what went on in the House of Commons, the public having had a look at it. The press, in their interviews, and so on, would have what went on in the House of Commons as the basis for their reports. Now they can only refer to what went on in the House of Commons, and no one except a few people who happened to visit or to be in Ottawa and in the gallery would have seen it.

Television would make it possible for the whole of the country to see what we are doing at any time. During the debate on the budget I took the occasion to deal with the televising of the budget debate. At that time I pointed out the advantages which would follow if there were a live broadcast of the minister of finance delivering his budget address, and of the spokesman for the opposition delivering his rebuttal. How much better that would be than the hocus-pocus we go through now of hiding people away in a locked room where they learn what is contained in the budget while the rest of us are ignorant until the minister of finance gets up in the House and delivers his speech.

One could have gone out into the lobbies during the last budget debate and heard the minister of finance giving his comments in advance in the locked room. That is practical. Moreover, if the budget debate were televised, then there is no need for any problems about anticipation. The budget speech could come on earlier and everybody in the world would hear the minister of finance simultaneously. This we are denying ourselves by refusing to allow cameras, under the control of the Speaker, to be brought into this House.

It may be that we are closer than we think to technological advances that will enable live continuous broadcasting of our proceedings. I had occasion, when I was president of the privy council, when I had some responsibility for these matters, to look into these possibilities. It would appear, because of the large number of channels now available to cablevision, to have either simultaneous or soon-after broadcasting of the proceedings of this House. That is perfectly possible. We should be thinking in these terms, and not only in terms of televising the proceedings of this House that is not live or from which excerpts will be taken. That is one possibility, and the most likely one immediately.

I think, however, that it will be possible for parliament to have its own channel, and not too expensively. Think, then, of the advantage of that available broadcast. It is true that most people would not want to take the time to watch continuously the televised proceedings of parliament. But think of the farmers, for instance, who would have an opportunity to hear what the minister of agriculture and his principal critics are saying about dairy policy, and so on. They could hear it. They could turn on the television set and hear it themselves, rather than having to depend on the media. It would not be wasteful to have that material broadcast continuously. I think this is the way in which we should be thinking. We should be thinking about the possibilities which exist now for this House to have its proceedings televised for the general advantage.

In respect of the particular proposals made by the hon. member for revisions of the rules, I shall not comment on them particularly except to say that I rather favour their direction. The standing committee has considered a number of proposals along the same lines, some of which do not go quite as far, and others which go much further than the hon. member has proposed in his motion. These are all to be found, as members of the House know, in the report of the Committee on Procedure and Organization of last session, dated September 30, 1976. As an addendum to those minutes, there are a number of proposals made by subcommittees which are now before caucuses for their consideration. I urge all members of the House carefully to study those proposals. I urge them to look at them not as supporters of the government or as members in opposition, but from the viewpoint of the functioning of this House.

I repeat again that I think the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants has performed a notable service by giving all of us an example of objectivity and non-partisanship. He speaks as a parliamentarian who is concerned, as we all should be, that this institution not lose its credibility. That is the danger we now face. It is not something we can do or not do. Our own reputation and the reputation of this institution is at stake. I cannot agree more with what the hon. member said when he talked about the urgent necessity of modernizing the rules of this House so that they have some relationship to the nature of the problems we now face.

Finally, let me express my general views in summing up. This House spends too much time on unimportant matters, and too little time on important matters. It sits for too many hours a week. It sits for too many days a year. Its agenda is too uncertain. The rules create unnecessary difficulties for members in looking after their constituents. These rules were not made for modern days; they were made for some situations, sometime ago, when there was less business to do and less urgency in getting it done. The sooner we wake up to this and get down to a serious look at our rules, the better it will be for all of us.

I know that reform of the rules will not turn this House into an ideal forum. That depends on the nature and characteristics of members of this House. What it could do is enable both the government and opposition to perform their role more effectively—and it is urgent, in the words of the motion before us, that we get down to business immediately.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if, as I hope will be the case, the media reports the debate of this hour, I imagine there will be emphasis on the discussion that is taking place with regard to the broadcasting by radio and television of the proceedings of this House. That being the case, I should like to join the two distinguished members who have already spoken in making it unanimous, and I hope that by the time the hour is over that unanimity will still stand.

The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) has put quite a bit in his motion. There are some details with which I might quarrel, and there are certain other rule changes he has not included which I might think should be in such a motion; but rather than detract from the unanimity in which I should like to join, I prefer to leave those details alone and concentrate my few remarks on the matter the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp) spoke about just now.

● (1730)

I agree with both of the preceding speakers that it does not make sense at all in the latter part of the twentieth century, when everything else that happens is heard on radio or seen on television by our people, for this institution not be heard or seen by them directly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As others have pointed out, not only today but on other occasions, sometimes I think it is even worse than that because of the false impression that is given of this place by the interviews that take place downstairs. They do not do this institution justice.

I recognize that there would be problems. If cameras were in here this afternoon, they would have had a great time panning over empty seats. Hon. members will have to do something about their attendance. Also, we will have to do something about the length of speeches. We will have to do something so that when there is conflict, it is audible. There were times today when modern electronics at its best would not be able to report what was happening.

I can foresee problems associated with members wanting to get the floor. There are about 258 or 259 prima donnas in this place. I am trying to count everybody but myself to recall how many we now have. I believe there are 259 with the two who came in today.

Notwithstanding the problems, this is something with which we should proceed without further delay. As I have already said, I can see some problems with the changes that may be required in terms of the rules, but the hon. member for Eglinton is perfectly right that, if we are going to have our proceedings broadcast, we will have to make some changes. So I welcome the fact that this afternoon his first question as a backbench member—it is an interesting phrase, a backbench member sitting in the front bench—to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was about broadcasting of the proceedings of this House. I hope it will come along very soon.

I said I would be brief. I will leave it at that. That is three of us who favour broadcasting the proceedings of this House by radio or television. I hope that whatever happens to the motion, that will still be the unanimous position by the time this hour of debate is over.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to commend whole-heartedly the mover of the motion which is now before us, as it is a very important motion dealing with procedure in this House. It aims at determining the best way to proceed to administer this country as well as possible. I listened with great interest to the mover's words and I am convinced that they will pave the way for a review of the Standing Orders of the House.

Like hon. members who spoke before me, I believe we should be able to go through more legislation in a shorter time therefore I am not opposed to—and I have even said before that I would support—a modification of Standing Orders to cut the time limits for speeches. I agree with the mover that the modern languages we know lend themselves to a more succinct expression. All we have to do is investigate the matter deeply; in this way we would enact legislation which would be clearer and the voters would have a better opportunity to judge the efficiency of Parliament.

Another point which has caught my attention and about which I have already personally introduced motions to try to correct situations I sometimes consider as something farcical, dealt with Standing Order 43. We have witnessed one of those situations last week when a very important motion was introduced which seemed to meet with general acceptance in the House. But unfortunately the Chair, with much hesitancy, did not accept the fact that there was unanimous consent. I have discussed this fact with Mr. Speaker who told me that a "no" had been heard. Everybody from every corner of the House was wondering whether someone had actually said "no".

The mover of the motion said earlier that on the unanimous consent requirement, the Standing Orders should be amended so that it would take five members to have a motion rejected when unanimous consent is required. And I would add that those five members should be identified and their names printed in Hansard. Some Canadians and people specially interested in the work of the House have asked me time and again how is it that when someone moves a motion one member alone can stand up against 200 others and we do not know who he is or what is his name? I think that if we would bring forward such an amendment to the rules, it would be a significant improvement.

We are now talking about televising the debates. Obviously it is a matter of a very high importance. It might prove very effective to shed more light on the Canadian Parliament but it could give rise to some disadvantages like those mentioned earlier by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) when he spoke of seats which are so often empty and of the numerous questions that Canadians would ask themselves when viewing that on the screen.

Mr. Speaker, this leads me to make a suggestion about how to attain this goal and I think we are capable of doing it. Given the considerable number of House committees and since their work terminates in this very place, we can conclude that they play a leading role.

Well, I feel that days should be designated for committees to sit, and others for the House to sit, but on one condition: that hon. members must be very punctual, both in committees and in the House. However, hon. members should not think: This is not the week when my committee is sitting, or neither the committee nor the House is sitting on Monday, Tuesday and Friday of this week, which means that there will be only two working days this week. I think this would be an abuse of our Standing Orders I agree that more hon. members should be freed from their personal duties to devote more time to the good operation of Parliament and the good administration of our country.

I hope therefore that the Committee on Procedure and Organization has already looked into this, but it should intensify its study and not let this issue drag on. If this is something which will be good in two or five years, it ought to be good also this year, and it should be possible to adopt this regulation without delay.

Before the proceedings of the House can be televised, I have a suggestion to make. I think it could interest the public. Each day the House is sitting—10.30 p. m. would probably be the best time—one member of each party who took part in the debate, as the one on Bill C-16, would be requested to go on the air to inform the Canadian people about the position of his or her party. Thus the public would be informed of the legislator's intent, without the help of the commentators who are well intentioned but who do not always respect the legislator's true intent.

If a member is requested to go on television each evening at 10.30 or 10.45 p.m. to repeat before the whole Canadian population what he said on such or such bill and why he said so, he will think twice in the House because he will have to report immediately, on the same day, what he said and what was his position on a very important matter. All issues are important, but more so Bill C-16 because it concerns all comsumers.

I make that suggestion and trust that, in the not too distant future, a way will be found to give the people more information. I have always noticed, Mr. Speaker, that a well informed people is a people who cooperates and is easier to govern.

For many years I worked for a municipality. Though the law did not oblige me to do so, through news releases I informed the public of the decisions made by the members of the council, so that they might know about the administration. In the light of that experience, I found out that we could get far more cooperation. The work of the mayor, the councillors and the secretary treasurer was made that much easier. People did not disturb them uselessly because they had received the news releases.

I should like to deal very briefly with the calendar of the business lined up for a given session. On that motion last week, everyone seemed to agree that the government should have to draw up the work program for the various sessions. This is the second session of this Parliament. When the session opens, we should be advised of its duration, keeping in mind, as much as possible, the breaks for Christmas, for Easter, and for the summer holiday at the end of the school year, to allow parliamentarians to have some family life while the children are on holidays. Parliamentarians should also have some holidays, and know ahead of time when these will come. It is always annoying not to know what is coming up.

At Christmas time, we wonder whether the House will adjourn on December 20, 22, 23, 24 or 25; nobody knows and everybody is nervous; our wives are nervous and our children say: Daddy will not be here. This situation becomes depressing and if we are unable to adjust ourselves and work as everybody else, we do not prove to be very intelligent.

We should also insist so that this change be final. When I know beforehand how many days I have to do a given work, I take the necessary arrangements to be able to complete that work. I am convinced that our proposals, whatever they may be, would match those of the government so that our legislation is not passed in a hurry but rather in an intelligent manner, in order to give our country a healthy administration but within a specific time limit. We might get used to work in such a spirit and I am convinced we would manage to do something wonderful. We would really safeguard the function of this institution which is called Parliament, the highest authority in this country. At the same time, we would show the people that we are serious, aware of our responsibilities, and we would show them an example of good management rather than looking like people who are hesitating, who do not know where they are heading to.

These are, Mr. Speaker, the few comments I wanted to make and before concluding my remarks, I would like to say the following: In the House, some ideas are communicated through members of Parliament who represent many people. One day I heard the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) say something which I liked and I enjoy repeating it to the people. He said it during the debate on an election funds bill. At that time, of course, everybody thought the same thing: what difference could it make, how could we help make electoral funds more democratic? And the Prime Minister said that all political parties have the same obligation to communicate the views of the people they represent.

Even though everybody does not share the government's view, whether they are Liberal or Progressive Conservative, people with different opinions are nevertheless as good Canadians as others; but they do not share the same view. At that time, it was said that the people are entitled to be well represented and to have their views communicated to the House. We tried to make electoral funds more democratic to give equal opportunity to all these opinions. This is democracy. This is how I understand it and I am pleased that this is the way it was accepted.

If it has been possible to reform that matter, it should also be possible to do so in the area of procedure, a reform that would receive the approval of all members and of those who will follow us. Such a reform would allow the House to be more efficient, to pass better legislation, because there would be improved drafting; instead of being tiring for members, it would take the best of them and give them the opportunity to do something better. I apologize for taking more than five minutes, but in any event I assure you that if the House does modify its Standing Orders, regardless of the time limits for speeches, I shall abide by it.

[English]

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I can appreciate the need for rule changes in this parliament. To some degree I can accept a call for greater efficiency, although a chill goes up and down my spine whenever I hear that word used in relation to the democratic process. Democracy is notoriously inefficient, but it is far better than some of the alternatives we have seen in the world which could lay a great claim to efficiency.

While I could support many aspects of the motion put forward by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave), I do not at all see that we should confuse the issue of reforming the rules of this House with the far different idea of broadcasting or televising directly the proceedings of this Chamber. I do not at all mind destroying the unanimous agreement to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) so fondly referred.

I do not at all mind being flatly contradictory to many of the remarks made by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp), who I know has been attached to the dream of televising this Chamber for a long, long time. Since he has been relieved of higher responsibilities it seems that he is about to devote himself to a drive to achieve that particular aim. Throughout all the speeches, particularly those of the hon. member for Eglinton and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, we find this absolutely naive faith in the powers of television somehow to improve the functioning of this Chamber. I cannot understand how people as sophisticated as these two hon. members in so many fields of endeavour can remain so totally innocent of the effect television has on the institutions it touches. I am altogether unable to comprehend that.

One would assume that the world has been improved in every way in the years since television became widespread in North America, but we can look around us and see what seems to be the opposite. Sport is not better because it is televised. The Olympics, in a sense, are not better events because they are televised. All kind of things creep into the sports world because of television.

Crime is rampant in North America. One could assume that if television could improve a situation then by televising police stories and so on we would have developed a more peaceful and pleasant society. But that is not the case, Mr. Speaker. Yet we are asked to believe that somehow televising this institution would have a salutary effect, not only on it, but that democracy would be enhanced in this land. I would say that is utter illusion; worse, it is folly, and beyond that it is dangerous to democracy itself.

One of the things at stake is the representative nature of our democratic system. I know there are people who hark back to dream of direct democracy and feel that somehow democracy which started in some small city state in Greece, where everyone could be present, was the epitome of democratic government and that everything we have had subsequently, because of larger areas and greater populations, has been a poor substitute. I do not believe that, Mr. Speaker. I believe the representative system of democracy that has been developed, particularly through the British tradition of a constitutional monarchy, is the best guarantee of democracy that the world has ever seen. This would be endangered by televising this Chamber, and it would be altered by televising this Chamber in a way that the hon. member for Eglinton and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre cannot predict.

I would remind the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants of a television panel on which I sat some eight years ago when I was first a member of this House. This was broadcast over an Ottawa station. I would ask them to cast their minds back to it. One thing it showed was that you could not predict in advance just how television is going to work.

I am not the only person who suggests this. People who know the medium well, such as Malcolm Muggeridge, that long time television personality, agree. He has said that the media enormously distort life.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: He says that people are given a surface picture which they come to believe—the legend made visible, the word become television. He contends that it promotes complete conformism, and that words like "population explosion" are bandied about as if they meant something.

Blaik Kirby, writing in the Globe and Mail and speaking of Muggeridge's series "A Third Testament", said something that could be applied to this subject when he said that nothing can be done really well on television that is not properly adapted to the visual medium, and that mere illustrations and background music do not make a program.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: I hope those hon. members who are applauding will really let that sink in because I am afraid it is only on the surface as yet. We come here to debate and to legislate; that is the onus on us as representatives no matter how far we have come. Once we begin televising this institution the demand will change, however, and it will not be for better debate and certainly not for better legislation, but for better television.

As one listens to hon. members one would think it was not this country that produced the prophetic figure of Marshall McLuhan who said, and was so much misunderstood, "The medium is the message". It is the medium itself that intervenes, alters, and ultimately destroys. We must approach it with extreme caution.

I find nothing in the remarks of hon. members to suggest that we have reached the point of control over that technology where we can safely televise this institution without endangering democracy itself.

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say in the few moments left that the House of Commons has reached a point in its development in Canada where it will have to make some difficult choices in the direction it wants to take. The hon. member who has just taken his place said that the media distorts. I would submit that any medium of communication distorts. The dilemma facing us in the House of Commons is that we exist in a vast chamber very seldom heavily populated, and our words of wisdom are filtered out through the medium of print.

If we look at statistics of how people obtain their news in our society, unfortunately for those in the written press who sit up and smile down at us, it is television from which most people obtain their understanding of the world. What do we do as politicians who seek to communicate with as many people as we can? We sit here and say that that medium which is declining in influence, the written press, is the medium we choose to communicate with the Canadian people. That is obviously a foolish proposition.

The idea of having television in the House of Commons is to try to reach the community we seek to represent in a way which is important and meaningful. I recall in the good old days when all we had were our lungs to reach an audience, and great speakers were developed with tremendous voices that could carry over thousands of acres. But radio came along and a different kind of voice was required. The great orator of the nineteenth century disappeared and a new kind of voice, such as that developed by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale), emerged.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hour appointed for consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BORROWERS AND DEPOSITORS PROTECTION ACT

MEASURE TO REGULATE INTEREST ON JUDGMENT DEBTS AND AMEND CERTAIN STATUTES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott that Bill C-16, to provide for the protection of borrowers and depositors, to regulate interest on judgment debts, to repeal the Interest Act, the Pawnbrokers Act and the Small Loans Act and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, before being interrupted at five o'clock I had been talking about the aims of the bill. I asked, will it protect Canadian borrowers from loan sharking and all forms of excessive interest? We hope that the bill will prove a step forward in this regard. As the minister said, information received from our police authorities shows that loan sharking at present is a $3 billion annual industry which feeds on the abject misery of low income earners especially. I know we shall want to examine critically those aspects of the bill in committee, to make sure that we are making progress in this field.

I repeat that I do not lay all the blame for what has happened on the minister's shoulders; yet we, on my side of the House, feel that the delay in introducing this kind of legislation is somewhat, although not totally, responsible for the amount of loan sharking which has grown up in this country over the years. We do not say that loan sharking does not take place in other countries, in the western hemisphere especially. The point is that we are concerned about what happens in this country.

Some talk of usury, as it was called in biblical times; some call it loan sharking; others, the charging of excessive rates of interest. Whatever one may call it, the point is that the rectifying of such problems should be one of the central thrusts of this legislation. Having said that I add that we, on my side of the House, are not convinced that the measures as outlined in this bill will by themselves rectify the problem of loan sharking.

The minister has already outlined some of the approaches he will take vis-à-vis criminal sanctions. It is our hope that, apart from anything this bill may attempt in the near future in relation to loan sharking, clear and explicit proposals will be brought forward for amending the Criminal Code, to include loan sharking. We say that such provisions should be added to the Criminal Code.

I now mention the recommendations made by the province of Saskatchewan in this regard. It is the opinion of that province that the question of loan sharking has not been dealt with to any great depth in this proposed legislation. Further, the appropriate body in that province has expressed the opinion that loan sharking cannot be prevented, and can be effectively dealt with only by specific legislation aimed at the practice. Loan sharking should be an offence under the Criminal Code, and attempts to deal with it within an act intended to regulate legitimate lenders only reduce the ability of the act to deal with legitimate lenders. Similar language is to be found in other briefs, whether emanating from consumers' associations in Canada, provinces, or other interest groups.

Having said that let me add that we, on this side of the House, intend to make sure, by introducing amendments if necessary, that the loan sharking provisions have teeth in them. I want the minister to listen to us. We are in favour of clear sanctions against loan sharking being included specifically in the Criminal Code.

What can one say about the minister's stated goals relating to protection against excessive interest charges? I will not be definitive. Members on my side have listened to the representations of interested parties; frankly, although we have not made up our minds, we remain unconvinced about the effectiveness of some parts of the bill. We feel that loan ceilings and rate limits ought to be included in the bill. Perhaps as we consider this bill further the minister will tell us more about his concept of the unwarranted rate.

I refer once more to the Saskatchewan brief.

Mr. Gilbert: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: It says that the customers of this country's finance companies will only benefit from a borrowers protection act if that legislation includes provisions for loan ceilings and rate limits. I believe the Consumers Association of Canada also says something pretty pointed about this. The brief goes on to say that without such provisions the improvements made will be minor compared to the cost to the consumer, and the legislation may well prove to be a paper tiger which works to the detriment of the consumers it intended to help. As the brief says:

> The elimination of loan ceilings and rate limits may eventually only lead to demands for the re-introduction of same, in much the same way as the repeal of the usury laws led to demands for the re-introduction of similar legislation.

The minister, as the bill proceeds through its various stages, will have to come clean with the opposition and reveal exactly what he means by unwarranted rates. He will have to come clean with the Consumers Association of Canada with regard to the proposed abolition of fixed interest rates for small loans. I question it. I know that the traditional stance from critics of the opposition will be, "Make up your minds".

We do not think that the last word is in here. I say to the minister that it will be a very important aspect of the legislation when we hear the various representations before committees and otherwise. I simply repeat, with the Consumers Association of Canada, that we seriously question the proposed abolition of fixed interest rates for small loans, whether we intend to define in the bill or in the regulations what constitutes a small loan.

In relation to the minister's approach to the unwarranted rate, he has already stated that he does not expect much litigation to arise from this aspect of the bill. I agree with him. Historically speaking, it has been proven over the years, certainly in the past 50 years, that low income borrowers, and that is essentially who we are talking about, are not very litigious in this regard. Therefore it will not be through litigation that we will solve this. At least the minister does not expect much litigation.

Mr. Gilbert: Low income people cannot afford litigation.

Mr. Grafftey: They cannot afford it. That is quite true. At any rate that is another reason why we on this side want to hear a lot more about the basic philosophy and the practical application of the unwarranted rate as it affects consumer borrowers in general and low income people in particular.

I intend to read from the Consumers Association of Canada report. I am not just going to quote it. I will make quite sure as I put these thoughts on record that I am speaking for myself and, I hope, this side of the House. I quote:

> The CAC's most severe reservation concerns the government's proposal to eliminate the limits on interest rates for small loans. Until now these have been regulated under the Small Loans Act.

The minister mentioned that in his opening remarks this afternoon.

> —government officials may believe that the free market is the best mechanism for ensuring that interest rates are reasonable.

I speak for myself in this regard and, I think, for many members in this House who have met with low income credit consumers who were in an awful bind. I believe that the free market is not necessarily the best mechanism for ensuring that interest rates are reasonable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: It further states:

Most people are not very sophisticated money shoppers,—

This does not necessarily just refer to the low income shopper. When people really want credit, maybe they are not always sophisticated shoppers.

—and they do need the protection that realistic interest ceilings afford to prevent price-gouging by relatively powerful lenders.

I say to the minister, let's not dream, let's not kid ourselves. Basically I am a free enterpriser. However, if we are going to be serious about legislation like this, we should pay very close attention to those remarks.

Overburdening high-risk people with loans at say 48 per cent or 55 per cent will not do much to help them deal with the everyday problems of being poor . . . low-income people will be much better off if government decides to help them directly—through . . . community debt counselling facilities and other programs implicitly designed to meet the needs of the poor.

It further states:

A major objection relates to the decision to drop federal licensing of small loans companies.

In my view that could be a very major objection. The evidence is not all in, but possibly we will have a major objection relating to that decision.

As well, the bill allows consumers only limited means to obtain restitution for losses incurred as a result of illicit lending practices.

We then come to another question put by the minister in terms of his goals for this bill. Will the bill provide the public with more and better information on all credit and deposit dealings?

Obviously the minister is starting out by making progress in this regard. However, if one looks at the Senate and joint hearings of the past, the various commission recommendations, and at what has been said by previous ministers, we on this side cannot be blamed for being just slightly confused by what the government has said to date in this regard.

Webster defines interest as "the price paid for borrowing money". I am not too shy to admit in this technical area of these considerations, whatever that means, that how we define interest affects the notion relating to the minister's stated principle of eliminating unnecessary complexities and confusion in the credit field. We do not think the last word is in this part of the bill about full and complete disclosure, be it interest rates or ancillary costs which the minister talked about in his opening remarks.

I have had consultations with many financial institutions, consumers, and consumer bodies. It seems to me that we can ensure that the individual consumer can do realistic comparative shopping from one institution to another if we make sure in this legislation that the interest rates and ancillary charges are clearly delineated and spelled out.

Let us not rush into this proposal. I rather think the minister is contemplating a few amendments to the legislation in front of us. I know that in spite of Webster's definition that interest is the price paid for borrowing money. We can get into the concepts of money rent and that sort of thing.

We would be very negligent if in our approach to this part of the legislation we forgot entirely about common usage over the past years. Interest is interest, and with regard to these ancillary charges of on-loan contracts, whether they are insurance or administrative, as the minister so ably delineated and made comparisons about in his opening remarks, we have to be very careful in this part of the legislation. The minister is on the right track, and that is very laudable, in making sure that the individual borrower, and borrowers collectively, can really do comparative shopping and get the best deal. We have to ensure that part of the legislation spells out clearly interest plus the ancillary charges. Whether we want to lump them all together in one rate is another matter. I warn the minister that we may have lively meetings in committee unless some minds are changed in this regard. I believe we must approach this part of the bill with great care. I know that economists can be very confusing in this regard. They talk about "retaining flexibility, then money rent will be a working definition of interest."

● (2020)

We can listen to economists until the cows come home, but it is possible that what we have to do in this legislation is make sure we spell out to the consumer the real cost he is paying on one hand and separate the charges on the other. If, in some ancillary part of the information given to the consumer, we want to calculate the real interest rate he will be paying, as the minister did so ably in his remarks, well and good. But I am a little leery of accepting the computation of interest rates by lumping them in holus bolus with ancillary services because, if you carry that principle over to transactions outside the field we are discussing, we could end up in some degree of confusion. The minister's argument in this regard appears at first glance to be inconsistent with the recommendations on consumer credit made by the Joint House and Senate Committee on Consumer Credit and the Cost of Living.

We hear time and time again that the interest rates and ancilliary costs must be properly presented. That goes without saying. The first recommendation of the committee, dealing with truth in lending, says that every person or financial institution extending consumer credit—shall be required by law to disclose to the consumer the total cost of that credit, expressed both as a lump sum and in terms of simple annual interest.

There is no mention here of potential income forgone, not of an "effective" rate of interest. I am taking a fair amount of time to deal with this important aspect of the bill because it is one which must be handled with care to make sure we have drafted the best clause possible.

The committee, in its report, expressed a desire to ensure that the consumer was aware of both the dollar cost of credit and of this cost expressed as a percent per annum of the amount borrowed. It took the view that since the role of both the minister and the committee was to ensure cost of credit disclosure so that the consumer could make a reasoned decision about using credit and obtain credit from the most economical source, the apparent disagreement among the minister, the committee, and the Canadian Consumer Loan Association is one based upon methods rather than goals. We recognize this, but again I have to ask the minister: did his department really consult the Consumers Association and the financial institutions with regard to the method of disclosure, comparative shopping, rate shopping? We shall have more to say in this regard.

The final goal, as stated by the minister, was to define strict and uniform rules to protect all borrowers and depositors and to rationalize federal credit legislation. It is a worthy objective, but will it be achieved? We have to move into this legislation with the greatest of care because, as a result of delay on the part of the federal authority, the provinces have naturally moved to a greater extent in this field. This is one reason for suggesting that we move forward into this aspect of the legislation with great care, though not necessarily slowly.

I should like to terminate by addressing my remarks to those aspects of the bill which particularly affect people with low incomes. I believe that if each and every member of parliament could get up in the House and recount his or her experiences of credit problems involving low income people, some tragic stories would be put on record. I share the view of the Consumers Association of Canada that part of the answer to low income credit problems lies in society assuming responsibility for providing an adequate level of basic support so that credit is not needed. This is why it is very wise that the bill before us should be given to the committee on social welfare.

Moreover, since the unwise use of credit is often cited as one of the major sources of personal bankruptcy, public counselling under the sponsorship of credit institutions and government should be vastly extended. Whether we can amend this particular bill in such a way as to make provision in this regard is yet to be seen. The feasibility of providing low cost credit in certain circumstances should also be explored. In any case the vulnerability of the low income population with credit difficulties is now well known and should therefore be a priority target. The minister is making a beginning with this bill. Maybe through detailed and meaningful hearings at committee stage we can do more in this regard, and if the minister decides to take such a course he will find us, on this side of the House, most co-operative. We wish to say, in fairness to the minister, that we too favour the retention of licensing requirements for regulated lenders subject to exemption of lenders already governed by federal or provincial licensing requirements.

Along with the Consumers Association I am worried about the special hardship which could be associated with the use of people's homes as security for consumer loans. This is another aspect we should be very careful about as we proceed.

● (2030)

Both the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Abbott) and the joint committee recommended that a mechanism be established to supply credit at reasonable interest rates to those on low incomes. A low income does not necessarily render credit infeasible or unwise—the minister has already alluded to that—and credit supplied to those in need may well assist them in breaking out of the poverty circle.

In his opening remarks the minister said that very often a low income borrower does not in itself necessarily mean a high risk borrower. Past ministers have referred to experiments undertaken by the Royal Bank in a low income district of Montreal. There credit is granted to low income workers and welfare recipients at low rates of interest. Assisted by credit counselling from bank officers, the repayment record of those granted credit in this experiment has been excellent.

The joint committee recommended a federally controlled extension to the banking system to grant credit that "would be repayable over an extended period . . . would bear a low rate of interest" and "would be made only for provident and productive purposes related to the preservation of home and family". With the addition of financial counselling services, a low income credit scheme would be a practical mechanism. I am not suggesting, of course, that we delineate a vast low income scheme in this bill, but I would hope that with the provisions contained in the bill we can make some progress in this regard.

We must also consider the establishment of a low income credit scheme. Credit education is a must. There are so many things that fall within the purview of the minister in the area of consumerism, whether it be motor vehicle safety, drugs, food or what you will. We can work, and work, sincerely, across the floor of this House for the benefit of consumers, but unless they are properly informed as a result of our actions in this House or elsewhere, and by education at the grass roots level, if you will, we will not make much headway. Therefore it is my hope that provincial education systems will consider adding a compulsory personal money management course to their curricula. Perhaps this would have been impractical in a bygone age, Mr. Speaker, but in this day and age we should encourage our provincial counterparts to take this step so as to complement what we are trying to do on the floor of this House. In the view of those on this side of the House, this is a classical problem that involves government, the consumer, and the corporate entity.

I congratulate the minister for much that he said today. I do not doubt his sincerity, and again I say that we are in accord with most of the basic principles of his approach. We will work hard with the minister to produce a better law, but in spite of the ruckus when I said this before the dinner hour I am certain that unless we can delineate a common interest between the corporate sector, the consumer sector, and government in its general interest role, we will get nowhere.

I have been told time and time again that the consumer and marketing boards, for example, are mutually exclusive, that you will either be before the consumer or before marketing boards. I do not accept that. I accept that you must have viable producers before you begin to protect the consumer; but that does not mean to say that often the government does not have to take tough and unpopular decisions. After all, you cannot please everyone all the time.

At the risk of sounding repetitive, let us all on both sides of the House resolve to help the minister draft a good law. By consultation and by opening up communications we can show both the corporate sector and the consumer that their interests are enhanced; we must demonstrate to each where their mutual interest and common ground lies. Again I congratulate the minister for his major thrust in this House. We on this side of the House will be here through all stages of the debate and in committee so as to make sure that this is the best possible law.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, having listened to the previous speaker dealing with the free market and the provision of credit to low income borrowers I think he advanced light years for both himself and his party in saying that he recognized that the free enterprise system is not necessarily the best way of ensuring credit to low income earners.

I would be less than honest if I did not say that the minister knows that there was a great deal of trepidation when it was announced that he was going to be the new Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs since many people in this country saw him as the representative of corporate interests. I think he had to deal with that in the early weeks of his appointment, and I sympathize with him in his dilemma. I think this is why this particular bill has been brought forward. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Abbott) is being resurrected as the defender of the consumers of Canada. At least that is what appears on the surface. But when you examine the bill very closely, Mr. Speaker, you will see that this is the biggest con job ever perpetrated on the consumers of Canada.

As for the few positive aspects of the bill, finally the government has realized that in a progressive society legislation respecting consumer credit protection and a declaration of interest rates ought to have been in the federal statute books a long time ago. Indeed many of the proposed changes in this bill have already been accepted by the provinces, many have legislated many of the items being regurgitated in this bill. Indeed all the industrialized countries of the western world have much more progressive credit legislation for consumers and consumer protection as they grovel and jostle for credit in the market.

The prime purpose of the bill appears to be an attempt to meet the credit needs of low income borrowers. As I have just said, it is meeting a need for law that has not been previously enacted by federal legislation. For example, I might point out how dated some of these provisions are. The Interest Act has not been amended since 1917. In effect the minister is finally coming into the twentieth century with some kind of legislative progressivity.

There is no doubt that some of the provisions in the bill will go some way toward providing protection for consumers. Our concern is that we feel there are fundamental changes outlined in this bill which, contrary to what the minister said in his back-up paper, and in the House when he spoke earlier today, in some instances will do a disservice rather than a service to the low income borrower.

● (2040)

One of the greatest problems has to be, as pointed out by the Consumers Association of Canada, the lack of research concerning the credit needs of low income people. I tried to obtain some of that information from the minister's department. I told them they must have some research in respect of incomes of low income earners from which they could furnish me some of the background papers and research done in respect of this bill. There certainly is a lack of any kind of research concerning the credit needs of low income people.

Fortunately I happen to know a consumer researcher who has done some research in this field, Michael Decter, presently of Manitoba. He points out the following in his paper:

> . . . generally speaking, those who borrow from finance companies are in financial difficulties of some sort, and have been enable to obtain credit elsewhere . . . statistics show that finance company clients are lower middle income wage earners who work at skilled or semi-skilled or clerical jobs. Middle income and lower middle income people, who are primarily wage earners, form the bulk of the finance companies' clientele, while the poor are ill-served by the industry. About half of all applicants for credit are turned away by the finance companies . . .

These I suspect are in the wage bracket of less than $5,000 a year.

> Those who are not turned away are using the money primarily for necessities. The major purpose of loans is to consolidate debts, usually as a sign of financial difficulty.

These loans by low or middle income people are being made at rates of 24 per cent to 33 per cent. The industry blames the high cost of loans on the risk it faces. I shall quote the industry. It is stated that loss ratios for consumer loan companies range from 1¼ per cent to 1¾ per cent of outstanding receivables, and for sales finance companies about half of one per cent of receivables. These losses are higher than those of the banks but certainly are not unmanageable. The concept of risk is very important because in Clause 8 of the bill one of the factors to be determined in calculating the cost of the loan is the degree of risk assumed by the lender on the lending transaction. There is also the matter of collateral, the age, the capacity, the financial position, and the mental and physical health of the borrower to be considered.

The bill claims to protect that one half of the people who are turned away by the finance companies because of high risk and low income. These were the people whom Captain Henri Marchessault found in a two-year study to be likely to use the services of loan sharks. He found that of 7,000 clients only 20 per cent had criminal backgrounds, which incidentally might explain their inability to get other credit, while the remainder were low income earners with nowhere else to go. From this we see that the people who take advantage of the present high rates of finance companies do so out of necessity. Those who go to loan sharks, because of their very low incomes, probably require money for their necessities as well, but they obviously cannot get it from the lending institutions.

The government appears to have looked at this situation and decided to attack loan sharking, while at the same time opening up lines of credit for those whose earnings are less than $5,000 by eliminating interest ceilings on small loans. While this may have some effect on legal loan sharking its other effect will be to make an already profitable business more profitable. Considering that most of these loans are taken out to meet necessities it will also mean that young people with low incomes will go into perpetual poverty through debt to pay for their necessities, at rates of interest as high as 60 per cent or 70 per cent. It should also be noted that these higher interest rates undoubtedly will also apply to many of those people presently receiving loans at 33 per cent.

Moreover, since the bill allows a person's age to be taken into consideration, then because of risk—and this is in Clause 8—it also means that young persons starting out in life will be starting out with very heavy burdens even to buy their furniture. This all seems very unfair, considering the low rate of non-payment of the finance companies and presumably among loan sharks as well.

The elimination of the ceiling on interest rates is one of the two fundamental changes in the bill which will hurt the position of low income borrowers. The other change is the one which forces the borrower to take legal action to have any wrongs redressed. The Consumers Association rejected this and it was pointed out that low income earners, the ones whom this bill is purportedly aimed at, are the very ones least likely to use or to know how to use the courts.

The government suggests that competition in the market place will be the device which prevents interest rates from rising unreasonably for low income earners. We can reject that argument without discussion at this point. In other words, what the bill does is send the low income earners from the loan sharks to the finance companies which have no limit on their interest rates. As my colleague points out, the lawyers also probably will be involved in this.

There are other solutions. The least radical of the solutions would be one put forward by the government in the 1974 election. At that time the government promised a loan insurance scheme for people establishing credit. This is another promise the government has not kept. This would eliminate the risk for the finance companies and, given the low rate of loan defaults among low and middle income earners, would probably necessitate only a minimal increase in interest rates. This is the one part of the bill we on this side of the House could never accept.

The government has said that the rationale, the main purpose in introducing this bill is to get people away from the loan sharks. To do this it will provide and ensure that the low income worker can obtain a loan from the lending institutions. Of course in order for it to be profitable for the private sector, the finance companies and the banks, to go into this business there has to be some assurance, a minimization of the risk, because the low income earners are poor risks. It has to be made worth their while. The interest rate will be one which, as set out in Clause 3, "may provide for any rate of interest that is agreed upon." Well, that is very broad.

I say to the minister that in effect a person who would come to borrow money from a person with money to lend is prepared to accept anything close to what the minister calls the criminal rate. I say he wisely calls it that. In effect the criminal rate could be 60 per cent. Here we have a person who has no credit rating at all coming to borrow money and entering into an agreement for a rate of interest that is agreed upon. The interest rate could very well be 50 per cent. The minister might say it is better for the low income borrower to pay a rate of 50 per cent than a rate of 1,500 per cent to the loan shark. Both instances are totally unacceptable. They are totally unacceptable for the low income earner. I think the minister will agree with that.

• (2050)

This clause setting the interest rate agreed upon between the borrower and the lender is supposed to be in keeping with the minister's statement that this bill underlines his determination to help police forces fight the ever increasing crime of loan sharking. Where I come from in the Carribean we have a fish which is even more dangerous than the shark, and that is the barracuda. It seems to me that we will take these people away from loan sharks and leave them at the mercy of barracudas for whom it will be quite legal to charge 50 per cent interest, or as close to that rate as possible. It seems to me that this is not the solution for low income earners. The government set out the problem very well. It wants to get these people away from loan sharks and into legitimate institutions. I wonder if it is not rather like jumping from the frying pan into the fire.

Mr. Fraser: Where would you go if not to a legitimate institution?

Mr. Rodriguez: How does the minister expect these low income earners to get some measure of justice if they think that somehow or other they are getting taken? The onus is now in the low income earner to take the institution to court. I can just see a person making $5,200 a year in Nickel Belt taking IAC, AVCO, or the Royal Bank to court because he thinks he is paying too much interest. The minister probably would say that under the bill he can stop making payments on his loan and then the institution will take him through the court process. But low income earners are threatened by and are leery of the court system and of the whole process.

The minister hopes the system will work with enlightened people, when by and large the low income group are afraid of the whole system, and certainly they are not aware of their rights. We know, all of us who have riding offices in prominent locations, of the problems that our constituents bring to us; we know the kind of help they need as they go through the maze of bureaucratic red tape, and I think the minister also is well aware of that.

We have suggested an alternative. We think that the present system of loan ceilings should be retained. It eliminates risks, and it seems to us that that is the crux of the problem and why the so-called private sector people, banks and finance companines, will not lend money to low income earners. It seems that risk is the problem.

An hon. Member: What happened to free enterprise?

Mr. Rodriguez: Even in that system we think there is a solution. Certainly the government can guarantee the loans, and this is not a unique idea. We do it for student loans, we do it for loans for farmers and for fishermen; we do it right down the line. We do it through EDC. Imagine a bank guaranteeing INCO a loan at small interest rates. Study after study carried out by committees of this House and of the other place have pointed out that people in this sector of society are locked into poverty, and we have not done a thing to change that pattern. We have tinkered with the income tax structure, but they are still locked in. Here is the minister bringing in a bill trying to use what he thinks is the free enterprise system to solve the problem.

We think that one possible solution to eliminate the risk is to guarantee the loan, so if perchance a person falls short on a loan the lender will not lose as a result of it. It seems to us on this side of the House that this would be a better approach to the problem.

We also think that the ceiling ought to be maintained, otherwise how is the interest rate going to be determined? According to the bill the interest rate would be determined on the basis of the applicant's background, his age, his financial stability in terms of his job, his physical health, his mental health, etc. But here is the crux of the problem, even with that simple approach.

When a person goes to borrow money from the bank or from the finance company, if this bill is passed the way it is the lender could ask to see the interest rate he is being charged. How generous that is! But does he have the right under the bill to ask how his interest rate is determined, what factors were used to determine it? Is he allowed to say he does not agree with those factors and to ask where they got them, whether they got them from his neighbour? He has no control over information regarding his personal life. He cannot even ask to see it. That is a fundamental shortcoming in the bill. It is even more ridiculous. If he wants to find out about the institution with which he is doing business, such as information on how many times it was brought to court for an infraction of this act, he has to go to the administrator and pay a fee. Imagine, he has to pay a fee for information about the institution with which he is doing business!

This puts another burden on low income earners to get the necessary information on which to make decisions within their ability to decide. I do not think that is fair. Furthermore we surround this administrator with secrecy. He cannot reveal anything about the operation which he may be investigating. He cannot reveal that information to the person who may come to him and, for a fee, ask pertinent questions. We think that a change in this regard should seriously be considered.

We also think that there should be a credit ombudsman under this legislation so that if a low income earner thinks he is being taken to the cleaners with respect to the interest he is being charged, or with respect to any other item under the bill, he could apply to the ombudsman. The ombudsman could then investigate the matter and, if in his opinion there was an infraction of the act, he could take the matter to the administrator who would lay a charge against the lending institution. The state would pay the cost to take the case through the courts of the land. It seems to us that this would prove to be far more fair and would provide protection for the low income earner who tries to obtain credit in the market. We do not think the onus should be placed on the low income earner, on the borrower, to take the institutions to court. What we are proposing, we think, is a very viable solution to the problem.

We also have positive suggestions for the government on a matter which was touched upon earlier. We certainly think that one of the problems of our society is the improper use of credit. We do not think we have really done our utmost in this area or that we have done everything possible to provide funds for credit counselling. Certainly the minister put out press releases about the $300,00 granted to the Consumers Association and $100,000 elsewhere. That just scratches the surface. We have to make an effort to educate our people to the use of credit, not the abuse of credit. That goes not just for low income earners but for middle income earners as well.

We are discovering that we should be spending more money on teaching French in our elementary schools, and everybody is beating his breast saying that is what should be done, but in this area as well money should be spent to teach young people the wise use of credit. It seems to me we can do that through the school systems, community colleges, the Consumers Association of Canada, and community oriented groups which operate in every community across this land. We could spend all kinds of funds. There was a $3 million surplus as a result of tickets left over after the Olympic lottery. Surely that should be put into a fund for these kinds of community programs. There are funds available, and we should set the right priorities.

As I have said before, we think that the administrator should have more power than he is given under this bill. As we see it, the role of the administrator is simply to collect data and information, and for a fee he can dispense part of that information to an applicant. Under a previous consumer bill a couple of sessions ago, Bill C-2, the competition bill, the administrator had considerable power to decide cases, and those cases can be taken to the courts. We say that the administrator in this particular instance ought to have that same kind of power.

We think also that there ought to be some changes made with respect to the whole question of discounting tax and social security payments. This bill proposes to get rid of the worst aspects of this particular practice by defining this operation as a lending transaction. We think that leaves a lot to be desired, and that it just exposes the low income earner to a mutually agreed upon interest rate. That particular clause ought to be changed and made more effective.

Clause 37 ought to be changed as well. It defines offences and punishments for such offences. Clause 37 outlines offences with respect to interest rates, and we think it should be beefed up considerably. It has been argued in this House that the stronger the punishment, the greater the deterrent. I have heard that for the last year. Many Conservative members have argued that in this House.

An hon. Member: Hang them.

Mr. Rodriguez: The hon. member wants to get back to hanging. Following the logic of members of the Conservative party, we should tighten the bill up. We do not think that for gouging poor people a $10,000 fine is enough. We would like to see a $250,000 fine or 10 years in jail, or both on summary conviction. It seems to me that with respect to offences and punishment clause 37 could be tightened up considerably.

With respect to advertising, the bill ought to contain some provision with regard to our free and easy way of advertising credit. That is contrary to the very thing we talked about earlier, credit counselling. We are all acquainted with this little gimmick: "After you have decided on leather, paper or wood, and after you have decided on yellow, green or brown, isn't it nice to be asked, 'Will that be cash or whatever?' " It seems to me that that does not teach people the wise use of credit.

Whenever we can create a need, we can go out and buy something, and all we need is a little plastic card. The minister says that all the bill proposes to do about that is to make sure that advertising includes the rate of interest. Again that does not get at the crux of the problem. We would like to see that kind of advertising abolished altogether. We do not need that kind of free and easy approach to advertising credit, and in our opinion putting in the interest rate is not in line with proper consumer education with respect to the use of credit.

The main thrust of the bill is the question of ensuring that low income earners do get credit. We cannot agree with the government, and with the minister in particular, that the bill will ensure protection for low income earners and that they will get credit. We think the scales are tipped against the low income earner but that they can be evened up.

This bill could be much fairer, and in committee we are going to try—as we have with the last two consumer bills—to put forward amendments which will provide some protection for consumers. The minister will have a chance to prove himself to be a friend of the consumer. We will judge his performance by his willingness to accept amendments, and we hope the amendments we put forward will make the bill much fairer for low income earners. We will try to be as constructive as we can, but we must tell the minister quite frankly that the crux of the bill is the area I have just delineated, and we must make some changes. Our support for the bill will depend upon what changes are made at the committee stage, and at report stage when the bill comes back to the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I must thank the minister and the government for bringing forward Bill C-16, which gives us the opportunity to discuss this very important subject, namely the very wise use of one's credit to ensure one's future and to protect one's dependants.

As a matter of fact, it is a very important subject and in the release, dated October 27 which was distributed to us by the minister, I find the following in the second paragraph:

> This bill on credit has several goals:
> 1) to protect Canadian borrowers from loan sharking and excessive interest rates.

We have been in favour of this objective for a long time, Mr. Speaker. Furthermore, I think we said it often enough in this House to convince every Canadian.

> 2) to increase the quatity and the quality of information on credit available to the public, thus eliminating unjustified complications and causes of confusion in this area,
> 3) to establish strict and consistent regulations in order to protect all borrowers and depositors
> 4) to rationalize federal legislation on credit.

I say that all these goals are highly commendable, Mr. Speaker, and that is way the day after the bill was tabled in the House of Commons, there were big headlines in the newspapers: Measures to protect consumers and borrowers from loan sharking.

Then a deep sigh of relief was breathed by those whom the bill is designed to protect. They told themselves: at last, the government is going to protect the little people, the underprivileged. Yet, it must be remembered that here, in this very House, bills as commendable as this one have been introduced and passed, bills which are now in our statute books but have failed to bring the expected results. It does not mean that the law is not good. It is because it is not being strictly enforced. Laws are applied slackly to the big interests, to those who control our economy and our credit.

It has often happened that legal proceedings were taken against monopolies and then the case dragged on before the courts, and finally, after a hearing was held, those companies were imposed fines with as much impact as a quarter for ordinary people. A fine of $25,000 for corporations which have earned millions and millions of dollars of excess profits looks good in the eyes of the public, but it is not what one might call a very effective law.

That is why, as far as this bill is concerned, I consider that those sanctions provided here are not severe enough. We will still witness circumstances allowing people who are used to live as hangers-on at the expense of the low-income earners to make tremendous profits by circumventing the law. If by any chance some organizations are sued, the poor judge who on the bench convicts those organizations or individuals must abide by the law and enforce the maximum penalty, which I think is far too weak.

Mr. Speaker, rates of interest are the basis for the major issue in our country—inflation. And in the communiqué as well as in the bill, we see that interests will now be cataloged. There will be interests that will be called legal interests. There will also be what will be called usury interests. Some others will be called unwarranted interests and criminal interests. But who will determine what interest rate the consumer, the borrower is dealing with. He will have to complain, to appear before agencies, even to take legal action in order to establish that the law gives him no protection, even if it says: The lender has to establish that the interest rate is warranted. There are two sides to every question. If the complainant wants to show his side of the story, he will have to pay, Mr. Speaker, in order to establish that he is really penalized by an interest rate which is exorbitant, unwarranted or even criminal.

Then, in such circumstances, I think it would advisable, when the bill is before the committee, to bring forward an amendment in order to clarify the situation and to determine once for all what should be a normal interest rate, a specified rate, and never mind the rest. I believe that all other rates are usurious, either unwarranted or criminal, it is loan sharking. And the government itself must presently suffer the consequences of such loans at exorbitant interest rates; that is inflation.

The same thing occurs in industry, trade, business, everywhere unduly high interest rates. That is why prices are rising. That is why many businesses are in a difficult position. That is why we have inflation and also unemployment. All these things go hand in hand.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, the release reads as follows:

> Consumer credit has shown a tremendous increase since the last war. In 1948, the outstanding consumer credit totalled $835 million. By 1967, it had spiralled to $8.6 billion and, finally, to almost $24 billion by 1975.

Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to believe that private individuals go into debt in a thoughtless and excessive way, but are the governments setting a good example in this connection? Are the governments not going too far? Are the governments speaking the voice of reason in this matter?

Whether it is the central government, the provinces or the municipalities, let us examine the statistics. Let us compare them with statistics on personal indebtedness and we will discover that our governments have really not set a good example in that regard. We are drawn by an example. When the example is good, so much the better; when it is bad, so much the worse. But just the same we are imitators.

Mr. Speaker, there are all kinds of factors inciting the small wage earner to spend hastily. How many ads are shown on television? We know, Mr. Speaker, how costly is the use of television whether for advertising or for political information to the public. It is exceedingly costly. Throughout the day we have TV programs inviting people to spend. All the fine points of such and such a product are shown, even when it is beyond one's means, today there is the advantage of credit cards for ladies and gentlemen. Spend, mortgage your future. That is done under the complacent eyes of governments, members of Parliament, like us. And little is done, not by members of Parliament because quite often they are too busy, but in any event we all know this is going on almost if not 24 hours a day.

Just look at the pages of your papers, particularly those dealing with credit. Look at the enticing ads inviting people to spend, and in the other page: Madam, order your Master Charge, Chargex, or any other credit cards. Yet we know that the use of credit cards requires moderation. It is very useful to travel. It is excellent. But one has to know how to use it. When there is exagerated advertising like that it is not surprising that at a certain moment individuals should be in debts over their heads for years and years to come.

Mr. Speaker, I remember Commander Desjardins, the founder of the caisses populaires, who was an officer in this House when he was younger, an exemplary man, a man who practiced what he said. It is a lot, Mr. Speaker, to practice what one says. To tell others is nice but to practice it is better because the example, as I suggested earlier, is much better than words—acting.

What did Commander Desjardins do? He realized that the little French Canadian people in our community had possibilities but that our money was not being used as it should. While I was still very young I attended a meeting with my father in a school room—not like the nice ones they have today but with little tilt-over seats. Everybody tried to fit in—it was fine for the smaller ones but the taller ones had problems. And for the first time I heard someone say that thrift is a virtue, and since it is a virtue it must be practiced. We were shown that if we wanted to cooperate, if we wanted to put our pennies, our dollars together it was possible to use them in our community to prepare the future of our children. I understood the lesson, I took note of it, and several people my age noted the idea. We understood that thrift is a virtue. We have tried to put it in practice. It has therefore become the practice to think before spending, to earn first and spend later. Today, with the advantages of the credit system which is made available to them, people are led to believe that the best way to live is to spend today what they will earn in five, ten or twenty years if the Good Lord keeps them healthy. It is not surprising that figures show that people are in debt and that they have mortgaged all their credit.

Mr. Speaker, I think we should also take action in this bill to limit this exaggerated publicity, this invitation to spend, thinking that there will be no end. We should be careful, Mr. Speaker! Here is an example of this: Suppose there is a refrigerator full of food in the house. Because it is full, everyone has the right to take from it, but no one has to replenish it. Will it become empty? Of course, it will, and very soon! In our country, we are living somewhat in this way. We have the impression that we are entitled to everything and that we have no obligations. This is why there are so many people who do nothing and who produce nothing. This is why the economic situation of our country is going down and this is why our country is in a slump.

I have just dropped my glass. This is not a great loss. If there were only one glass lost in the administration of the government, I think we could show a surplus at the end of the year.

Mr. Speaker, we are asking people to make sacrifices and to tighten their belts. Let us look at what happened at the Olympic Games. We were supposed to have modest Games. We were told the Games would not be too expensive. I too like beautiful games! Recently I got a French a deck of cards and I found it very beautiful. That is fine, but we must restrain ourselves.

We also had a lottery and this is a modern or ancient way to finance the public sector. People were urged to buy tickets in order to win a million dollars. I have known poor people who needed a higher income so as to pay their debts, but they took chances because there was a catch behind the ticket.

What happened during the Olympic Games? In order to go and see foreigners run for 15 days, we have mortgaged the Canadian people for 20 or 25 years. Children yet to be born will have to pay taxes for such wastefulness. The same amount could have been spent on more profitable projects. If homes had been built for low or middle income families, the same number of jobs would have been created and we would have something to show for it. Now we are caught as well as the mayor of Montreal and also Mr. Bourassa who is having a hard time in the province of Quebec precisely because of the positions he took on those issues.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be considered as a member of Parliament, a Quebecer who is against those organizations. Indeed not. But I want to prove that they really went too far. Today we are asking Canadians: Tighten your belts, you must absolutely practice restraint and economy.

● (2130)

Mr. Speaker, this bill contains other good provisions and gives some advantages to small earners who sometimes will have to take legal action. The loan aspect has been looked after to prevent unwarranted rates and the credit rating must be taken into account, but we do nothing about the true rate which is charged and which is responsible for small interest rates. I said several times in this House that I am not an expert but it does not matter, we have eyes to see and ears to hear. Interest rates are controlled by chartered banks. The minister says in his statement and I quote:

> Banking institutions issue a large part of consumer credit and are exclusively under federal jurisdiction.

It means that banking institutions are our chartered banks and that we should have a provision in this bill about the power that should be given to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, a very special provision to ensure that interest rates be somewhat reduced so that they will not increase excessively. And if we exceed the ceiling provided in this bill, we must have the guts to take legal action, even against the big institutions that create 95 per cent of the money supply in our country. Mr. Speaker, this is the main source of credit.

I know that individual credit is controled, that the credit to small enterprises is controlled, but we should control the credit of the community and stop getting money from institutions that charge unwarranted rates, and it should be provided in this bill.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, I know that during the debate on this bill, in committee, at the report stage and on third reading, we shall have the opportunity to study the question further. At that time we should study many other clauses. We should say frankly what we think about them and I encourage all my colleagues in this House to study the matter further before they pass the bill with which I agree in principle, but some details should be adjusted. I ask that we study this bill very carefully and, when it will be passed, that the minister and his senior advisers make it work efficiently so that it will not be a mere joke.

M. Speaker, those are the comments I wished to make at the second reading stage. I shall take the floor again a little later.

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Matane): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate on second reading of Bill C-16 which we are beginning to consider today. It is certainly one of the most important bills introduced in this session of Parliament. Also, there is the fact that we have been longing for this day when the federal government would take its responsibility under the constitution in this area of interest rates.

Obviously this bill covers all aspects of the cost of loans, which could give rise to the issue of constitutionality, since it covers all financial institutions and does not make any distinction between the various kinds of loans. For instance this legislation covers both the amount owing a seller and the loan obtained from a bank. Clearly the latter case has always been a federal matter, but the former is much less evident. I hope at the committee stage the minister will clear that constitutional matter for all aspects of this bill. I take pleasure in stating this, because we have here in the gallery a distinguished visitor, the Minister of Equipment of the province of Quebec, and a former Minister of Financial Institutions and Co-operatives in the Quebec government, the hon. William Tetley.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate, because this bill meets a number of problems concerning trade practices, and interest rates, an area where there has been an obvious lack of consumer protection. Let me give you two examples only. There is nothing in our statutes to protect consumers against loan sharks, whose interest charges are as high as 1,000 or 2,000 percent, and there is no current provision either under which depositors or borrowers could know precisely the yield on their savings or their borrowing costs. Such is the sad fact in our country today, and this bill will certainly meet all such problems faced by consumers. Of course, the legislation covers a number of other problems also. For instance, if no interest rate is specified in the contract, the applicable rate is the prime rate. If information is not disclosed in the manner specified in the act, no credit charge is payable. A borrower may choose at any time to terminate a non-mortgage loan simply by repaying the principal and interests, without incurring any penalty.

If a borrower feels he is charged an unwarranted rate, because he finds another lender offering the same kind of loans under similar circumstances but at a significantly lower rate, he may elect either to change his loan to get a similar rate, or to enter into a new loan with the other lender at a lower rate, and repay his first loan without incurring any penalty.

I see the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) does not take seriously this last mentioned feature. He is critical that the legislation does not provide an interest rate ceiling. I will speak on that later on, to show that the ceiling so much talked about by the hon. member for Nickel Belt is a false protection. It was tried in the United States in a number of states, and also in Britain where the socialist government dropped it last year, because there is no way that such methods can attract savings, since they cause distortions in the market by ignoring current yields. Money will go where the yield is higher.

Finally, but without limiting the list of subjects covered by the bill, I would remind that if a borrower feels he is being charged an unwarranted rate, he may make an application to the court, and the latter will determine whether the rate is warranted or not, or wait for the lender himself to take the initiative, and then the burden will be on the latter to prove that such rate was warranted.

Finally the borrower will be able to take legal action if, in his view, he has been charged too high an interest rate, notwithstanding any settlement or payment he may have made. Moreover the legislation provides for stiff penalties for loan sharking such as fines of at least $1,000 and up and five years' imprisonment.

I mentioned a few aspects of this bill and a few of the problems it aims at solving but its impact is far greater. I commend the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Abbott) for bringing it forward but regret it was so long overdue, since the federal government has not dealt much with interest rate matters since 1956. So much so that most provinces took the issue into their own hands, which resulted in the motley and even inconsistent legislation that we have in Canada today.

The banks, which granted about 30 per cent of all personal loans in Canada hardly ten years ago, now account for 60 to 70 per cent of all loans. This shows how this bill was necessary because, of course, banking operations do not fall within provincial jurisdiction.

Evidently, the first thing that strikes us is that in our country, up until today, it was almost impossible for a consumer to know what was the cost of his loan or the yield of his deposit. This is the first problem with which this bill comes to grips. Now, all institutions will have to calculate in the same way the yield on deposits and on loans. For example, as far as deposits are concerned, in the case of savings accounts, there will have to be monthly balances instead of a quarterly, half-yearly or yearly balances. This represents for thousands of depositors fairly important aggregates. Up until today, it was impossible for the consumer to know the real cost of his loan not only because each lending company or each institution which granted credit, such as the stores or the retail houses, calculated the changes differently but because each could have additional costs, the so-called service costs, bonuses, life insurance costs, withdrawals on the capital that was lent. Because of this situation, there was a lack of uniformity in the way of calculating and of indicating the costs and interests as far as borrowing and saving was concerned. Of course, this situation was particularly unfair to the consumers.

In the case of mortgages especially, there is a serious lack of uniformity and of fairness in the disclosure and in the computation of interest on bonuses, discounts and commissions. Consequently, it is not easy to compare between the various credit institutions or even between the different possibilities of credit or of saving offered by the same institution. The notion according to which the cost of a loan depends on the risk that the lender is taking is of course rather artificial since a person who goes to a bank and uses different plans of that bank is going to borrow money at different rates. If he uses his credit card, Chargex or Master Charge, the interest rate is about 18 per cent and, in the case of a term deposit, in general, the interest rate will be about 14 per cent and if he chooses a negotiated loan, today the rate is about 12 per cent.

If somebody borrows from the same institution under three different systems, the rate is of course much higher with the credit card. I am quoting only this example but if we make a further comparison between many banking institutions, which apparently makes no difference for the borrower, it will be even more obvious that all methods of computation always manage to go against the consumer's interest.

I am concerned by two other aspects of the bill, Mr. Speaker. Today, in spite of all the studies which have been made, we still have no specific information in this field, which represents nevertheless 22 per cent of Canadians' available income. This bill will finally enable full and precise disclosure of all terms concerning credit transactions, at every stage of loans, from the request prior to the contract to its expiration. Banking institutions will have to maintain a register of all their transactions and submit it to the administrator who will be responsible for the enforcement of this legislation.

Second, this legislation is proposing measures designed to standardize basic concepts used in credit and deposit activities. They will include in particular various forms of charges and costs related to a lending transaction, which will all have to be lumped together in one credit charges rate, the method of calculating rates, both on loans and deposits, and the way and frequency in which payments on loans or yields on deposits will have to be credited.

As for the point raised by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) concerning the reduction of the effect of unwarranted credit charge rates, I am convinced that this goal will be pursued both directly and indirectly. Indirectly through more competition resulting first of all from increased and improved disclosure of information related to credit and, secondly, from the standardization of the credit notion into basic concepts used in credit matters.

First of all, in the case of an unwarranted credit charge, in any dispute the onus to justify the credit charge lies upon the lender according to the risks that the borrower represents and according to the capital cost and the operating expenses. The purpose of this provision is to establish ceilings on the credit rates by requiring lenders to take into account the risk which a given borrower may represent. It eliminates the obligation to establish a ceiling on the explicit rates, fixed at a constant value, which were not efficient enough as I said before, as a means of control on the credit charges and for the allocation of credit.

Secondly, and especially in order to control loan shark practices, including its latest forms, which several members of Parliament have denounced these last few years, and I will give you just a few examples of these such as loans on the anticipated reimbursement of taxes or on the anticipated welfare allowances. The provision concerning the ceiling of credit charge rates will punish with fines and imprisonment those who lend money at a rate in excess of the designated illegal rate. One has to note that people who loan money on anticipated tax refunds and loan sharks now lend money at annual rates varying between 300 per cent and 2,000 per cent. Loan sharking represents the second major source of income for organized crime, second only to drug traffic. The heavy penalties provided in the bill will at last give police the means to fight efficiently against those offering such criminal rates.

The other objective is to rationalize the federal legislation and establish high standards for the protection of the Canadian borrower. Today, as the minister indicated, the federal legislation is scattered over the Small Loans Act, the Pawnbrokers Act and the Interest Act. These three acts are incorporated into Bill C-16, so that we may now find some sort of consistency and standardization in the federal legislation.

A while ago I was also referring to the lack of information in this area. This bill will finally provide for the creation of a Canadian data bank on the granting and use of consumer credit, which will provide the government and those who are interested in protecting consumers' interests with exact data on the nature and extent of the indebtedness within the various strata of the Canadian public, the availability of credit and its accessibility to the various categories of borrowers—including the terms of loans—the need for and use of credit.

The fact that it is now incumbent upon the lender to prove that his rates of interest are justified, that severe sanctions are now provided for plus a competent application of the act should help interest rates to fluctuate with the market and related transactions to be both fair and equitable.

One of the most important concepts in this bill, Mr. Speaker, is that requiring a single global cost of the loan. Credit costs will include all expenses, costs and fees which the borrower must pay to make a loan, other than registration costs and similar costs. Present practice has it that additional costs are added to the official rate of interest thereby hiding from the borrower the real cost of his loan.

By prescribing that all costs be included in the cost of credit and be calculated in the same way by all lenders, the act will at long last give a true idea of the real cost of a loan and enable accurate comparison of various conditions offered by lenders.

Again with regard to the point brought up by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), I would remind him, as I said in my opening remarks, that the experience was made in England where it proved conclusively that interest rates imposed upon the borrowers represent a high risk, that they tend to be set just below the criterion rate and that borrowers very seldom contest them before the courts. On the other hand, the burden of the proof falling to the lender, as Bill-16 stipulates, this will encourage lenders to regulate themselves.

The borrower who feels that the interest rate is either unjustified or illegal can stop his payments, wait till the lender sues him before the courts, and the lender will have the onus of the proof, in that he will have to prove that his rate of interest is justifiable in view of the risks taken.

Mr. Rodriguez: And he won't be able to get any more credit!

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Speaker, as you are aware, the hon. member for Nickel Belt, for lack of rational arguments to support his point of view, resorts to insults and foul language which, to my mind, is the most obvious proof that he has absolutely no argument to refute the position taken by the government.

What the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) does not tell us is that although he would impose an interest ceiling, he cannot say by what mysterious alchemy he will force savers to go to such or such a sector if the rates imposed are not in line with the risks they will face. The best way to prove it is to consider the evolution of loans granted by loan companies since 1968, in this margin up to $1,500, with a regulated interest rate. We thus realize today that merely 20 per cent of the loans are granted in this sector and that, in spite of that, loan companies are losing money. So that explains why this financing source is dried up and people representing high risks are now at the mercy of loan sharks.

Another item which is highly important in the bill, Mr. Speaker, and which was detrimental to borrowers, is the possibility, if we except the mortgage which is another matter, for them to prepay their loans, without paying any penalties beside the normal interest and also that the penalty for late payment will not be over 1 per cent. In my opinion, this is very important and all active lawyers know to what extent some lenders will go to force borrowers to borrow for rather long terms with no possibility of prepayments.

The bill also includes the illegal interest rate which is different from the unwarranted interest rate. The illegal interest rate means a rate highly superior to the current rate, so much that it becomes completely unwarranted and it will obviously be necessary to penalize and discourage unacceptable practices such as loan sharking, loans with excessive rates on tax refunds and on various government allowances. Police authorities maintain that loan sharking is now the second revenue source of organized crime in Canada, after drug traffic. It yields at least $3 billion a year.

Till now, no federal or provincial legislation could fight efficiently against such practices as loans on income tax refunds, old age security or welfare cheques mainly because the penalties provided for in the legislation were ridiculous compared to profits realized.

Finally, with regard to the removal of interest rates ceiling on which I would like to insist, I want to point out that if the ceiling is set above the rate essential to the lender to operate in a certain sector of the market, the market rates will prevail and the rate ceiling will become useless. On the other hand, if the set rate is below the rate essential to the lender, he will withdraw his money from the regulated sector. In fact, the lenders will reduce the loss risks until the profits with element of risk in the regulated sector balance with those on the market generally.

In the United States, a good many states have set ceilings on interest rates. Experience has shown that when ceilings are higher than the set rates on the market, there is no real difference between rates asked for in regulated sectors and others. However, in the states with ceilings below the set rates on the market, the rates tend to get close to the ceilings.

Mr. Speaker, I call it ten o'clock, and I hope I will be allowed to go on with my remarks at the next sitting of the House.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, at the conclusion of today's sitting I wonder whether I might ask the deputy House leader on the government side whether he would let us know what the business of the House will be for tomorrow, and for any additional days he cares to comment upon.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I am always ready to provide the hon. gentleman with as much information as I possess. In this instance I would indicate to him that tomorrow we will be proceeding with the bill presently under study. In the unlikely event that we will complete that business, we will proceed to order No. 5, the bill to amend the Currency and Exchange Act, and subsequent to that we will undoubtedly have further consultations.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AGRICULTURE—BEEF—REQUEST FOR RESTRICTIONS OF IMPORTS FROM AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, my remarks in this adjournment debate this evening are in response to my question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) on October 15 relating to offshore imports of beef from Australia and New Zealand. I was deeply concerned that although the minister had announced his individual permit requirements before any beef imports would be permitted into Canada—that was after October 17—he had not indicated that he intended to use this device actually to restrict beef imports.

Later on October 19 the joint statement of the Department of Agriculture and Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce did announce Canadian beef import quotas of 17.5 million pounds to apply to all countries importing into Canada as from October 18 to the end of the year, and notably to Australia, New Zealand and the United States.

I acknowledge that this long delayed action will limit beef imports for the remaining two months of this year. But surely as every cattleman in Canada knows, the damage already has been done. The fact remains clear that until this announcement of October 19 Canada was the only country in the world to permit unrestricted access to our beef markets.

In spite of our small human population Canada now ranks as the fourth largest importer of beef in the world. Actually in 1976 Canada is first on the basis of per capita consumption. This is the situation even in the face of our record high domestic production of cattle and beef, especially steers and cows. In spite of the repeated statements by the Minister of Agriculture that these offshore beef imports did not depress our own domestic beef and cattle markets, there is ample evidence to show this is not true and that these massive beef imports, starting after August 12, 1975, have seriously depressed and continue to depress our fed cattle markets and our cow and feeder markets.

In June, 1974, the Montreal Beef Wholesalers Association made available data that clearly support this statement. In addition a comparison of price spreads in Canada and the U.S.A., between hind and front quarters and between all grades of cows, shows up this depressing element in Canada which of course is directly related to the price discounts permitted by Canada on these offshore imports compared to the same imports into the U.S.A. If more evidence is needed on this issue there is an economic paper by Freebairn and Rausser in the November, 1975, issue of the "American Journal of Agricultural Economics" dealing directly with price changes due to beef imports.

There can be no doubt now, three weeks after the U.S.A. triggered its meat import law, that Canada's level of beef exports was the final action that brought on President Ford's October 9 action to control the level of imports into his country. That action was reflected in every cattle and beef market in Canada. Even at Walsh on that same day, which is in my market area, where we had 1,500 feeder yearlings, including my own, there was a drop of about $2 per hundred weight in response to this U.S. action.

Widespread concern by all Canadian cattle producers is now most apparent. Public meetings are being held in every cattle producing region. Very little advance publicity is necessary to get a crowd of cattlemen to discuss this cattle crisis. Three weeks ago in Lethbridge 300 feeders and cow-calf operators turned out with only two days' notice to let off steam, if you like, and draft an appropriate resolution to the minister. I was there and spoke to them. Then on October 22 in Stettler 800 concerned cattlemen held another somewhat similar meeting. The Minister of Agriculture will be hearing more about that.

Perhaps the most unique evidence of this national cattlemen's concern is the class action legal suit brought by three Maple Creek, Saskatchewan, ranchers for $52 million against the Minister of Agriculture for failing to take adequate action to curtail Oceanic beef imports. That represents $1 million a week for a 12-month period which, in their opinion, represents only a nominal loss to the Canadian beef producers. This class action suit is for real and has been properly served by lawyers acting for the Maple Creek ranchers on behalf of all Canadian cattlemen. Those of us who are old enough to remember Canada's flourishing sheep industry under range conditions, especially in western Canada, cannot help but speculate somewhat fearfully that Canada's cattle industry could go down the drain with another big push from these Australian and New Zealand imports, just as was the case in respect of lamb, mutton and wool imports from the same countries 30 years ago.

The answer, of course, is some specific policy direction to control offshore imports to reasonable historical levels and to establish further fair bilateral trade policies in beef and cattle with the U.S.A. I do not mean a supply-management policy promoted by the Minister of Agriculture. His description of the U.S. cattle industry as supply-management oriented because of its meat import law with power to impose import quotas is sheer nonsense.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a couple of things on the record. We have asked for positive evidence to be presented to us regarding the importation of Australian and New Zealand beef affecting the price of finished beef which, as the hon. member knows, is based on Omaha prices. We have always stayed ahead of Omaha prices. U.S. prices have always been under ours, which is the normal pattern. When our prices climb much higher than theirs, they ship meat from the United States.

When the hon. member refers to controls, I say he must have a very short memory because the government had controls on U.S. meat. Let us not forget that there were times during our weeks of slaughtering when the U.S. took over 68 per cent of the slaughtering in this country. That was when people asked me to put on controls. I did so, I put on quotas, but I did not hear any American say that the President of the U.S. was protecting American prices when he triggered his program, not only with respect to Canada but with respect to the 24 countries that ship meat into the United States. To insinuate that this market belongs to the American producers is quite wrong because the American price on finished beef in Canada and the United States is still based on the Omaha price, and it has stayed constant. The U.S. was bringing in Australian meat at the same time at between 65 cents and 70 cents a pound.

On October 15, and again on October 27, the hon. member asked for clarification of the steps which have been taken to protect Canadian beef producers as the result of the implementation of quotas by the United States. I trust that the following explanation will adequately serve this purpose because of the action we took when the President of the United States put his supply-management system into force. That is what it is, no matter what anybody says. He was trying to run it through voluntary quotas. It did not work, so he triggered his meat import law and he hopes that will work. Nevertheless it is a supply-management system. He says, "That portion of the market belongs to you, that belongs to you, and that one to someone else." If that is not supply-management, I would like to know what in heaven's name it is, because he is using his law for that.

In a press release dated October 13, 1976, I announced that the government was acting to protect our beef markets from any disruption due to the U.S. action, thus clearly conveying the intention to restrict Australian and New Zealand imports if they threaten to disrupt Canadian markets. This statement is quite contrary to the comment made by the hon. member in his question of October 15, which was to the effect that nowhere does the statement indicate the intention to restrict or reduce Australian and New Zealand imports. This is quite false.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION—POSSIBILITY OF MOVING PART OF VETERANS AFFAIRS DEPARTMENT TO PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, on October 22 I inquired of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) concerning the move of a segment of the Department of Veterans Affairs to Prince Edward Island. He indicated that his colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien), was responsible for such matters. On Thursday it was their colleague, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald), who made the announcement in Charlottetown.

As I indicated in my original question, the date of November 8 is significant. On that day four provincial by-elections are being held in Prince Edward Island and it is generally conceded that the Progressive Conservative party under the leadership of a former member of this House, the Hon. Angus MacLean, is heading for strong gains in these contests. One is loath to suggest partisan motives, but I would have been very much surprised had the announcement been made on November 9.

● (2210)

I am slightly embarrassed that anyone should consider for a moment that the judgment of the P.E.I. voters will be influenced next Monday in four by-elections by a promise on something to commence four years hence. I can assure the House that the electors involved will come to their own intelligent verdict on November 8 and will not be misled by anything extraneous to their desire to elect the best possible candidates in the four by-elections.

In any case, as a long time advocate of decentralization, I welcome this move. I shall certainly extend a hearty welcome to those public servants who will be moving to my constituency. Prince Edward Island is a good place in which to live, and those who leave Ottawa will find a good and warm reception in the beautiful island province.

While welcoming this move, I must ask some questions. One concerns the number of Prince Edward Island people who will find new job opportunities as a result of this move. Ours is a high unemployment area. Statistics month after month and year after year show Prince Edward Island as being at or near the top in this unwelcome area. It is not a very good league in which to attain a leading status.

While agreeing with the principle of decentralization as I do, and while welcoming this particular aspect of it as I do, it is still incumbent upon me to ask some specific questions.

I take it from the minister's press release in Charlottetown that nothing will happen, there will be no transfers of personnel nor will there be any new job offerings before four years have elapsed. This is now the estimated time for completion of the new federal building in Charlottetown. We all know that not all buildings are completed on schedule.

If nothing is to happen for four years, one again wonders about the great urge to make the announcement. I did not have to be a major or a minor prophet to forecast, as I did last week, that the announcement was to be made before November 8. The Minister went to Charlottetown on October 28, 1976, to announce a move that will begin, not end, in 1980.

Speaking of the art of prophecy, the air over Parliament Hill was filled with rumors that the announcement would not be made until after the Ottawa-Carleton by-election, but would be announced before the November 8 provincial by-election contests. It was therefore not too hard to make a fairly accurate prediction, and this I was glad to do to help out my hon. friend, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, by getting him a little extra advance publicity.

If members of the staff of DVA feel that they were not fully consulted, these important political dates will suffice as substantial explanation. Never has there been such a long period of time between the publication of the bans and the actual wedding ceremony. Even the most confident marriage partners might exhibit a little anxiety over such a protracted waiting period. I would like to know what is being done during the four years between the sounding of the bugle and the beginning of the advance.

We are told there will be new jobs for island people. What provisions are to be made for training? It is unlikely that new personnel would assume their offices immediately upon the opening of the building in 1980 or perhaps later. Therefore I would like to know something about what will take place in the four intervening years.

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member commenced by saying that he hopes the people of the island which he represents will exercise their good sense and good judgment in the by-elections on November 8. My understanding is that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien), who is responsible for decentralization, did not have this in mind when the announcement was made on his behalf in Charlottetown last week by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald). If I may express a personal view, as the hon. member did a moment ago, I really do not think the premier of that province, Alex Campbell, the good Liberal he is, really needs much help other than that which he is already getting in the province.

As the hon. member knows, the program of decentralization has been strongly supported, and indeed advocated by the leader of his party and by earlier leaders of his party. The hon. member says he supports that principle too.

How are the people of this good city going to be trained for these jobs over the next few years? I submit, if the hon. members does not know, that they have the capability of learning this most important work and doing it for the people of Canada from Charlottetown. It is very important that those who will be moving from the Ottawa area to Charlottetown have sufficient time to make arrangements to go to what the hon. member calls a most glorious part of Canada. Others who wish to be relocated here may also have the opportunity to do so.

May I say that the bulk of those to be transferred are generally in the clerical classifications. The number involved in this and other transfers has been calculated at about 5,500 permanent employees and 6,100 temporary employees in the total decentralization program, according to the information I have.

The Department of National Revenue has transferred some branches—to Surrey, British Columbia, a Conservative riding; to Winnipeg, a Liberal and New Democratic Party riding; to Shawinigan South, a Liberal riding; to St. John's, Newfoundland, a Conservative riding; to Jonquière, a Liberal riding; and the superannuation division to Moncton, and the cheque redemption centre to Matane, also a Liberal riding. As I go over this list I do not think politics is involved, but rather it is an attempt to provide the people of Canada with the opportunity to be served.

INDUSTRY—TOHO LEAD AND ZINC REFINERY—POSSIBILITY OF CLOSURE AND RESULTANT LOSS OF EXPORT TRADE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, last Friday I put a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) with respect to the report that the Toho Lead and Zinc Refinery in Japan was considering the possibility of closing down as a result of the strike at the Cyprus-Anvil Mine in the Yukon or, alternatively, was looking to Australia and the United States for supplies. I asked the Prime Minister if Canada was likely to lose this export trade, and his answer was a flat no. I followed this by asking if he would intervene in order that a more realistic settlement might be arrived at so that the miners could go back to work. The Prime Minister responded as reported at page 579 of Hansard:

> I find it a little extraordinary that the hon. member should be suggesting to me that the ruling of the AIB and the Administrator should not be upheld

Earlier in the week I presented a motion under Standing Order 43 requesting that the Minister for Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Allmand) take immediate steps toward consultation with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) and representatives of the Yukon legislative assembly to resolve the problem of the strike. This was given a resounding "no" by members on the other side of the House, and by members of the New Democratic Party to my left.

The Cyprus-Anvil Mine is the largest mine in the Yukon and when it is in full operation it mills some 10,000 pounds of lead zinc ore per day. The strike has carried on for some three months and at least 100 of the 410 employees have resigned or left. This means that not only 100 employees but also their wives and families are leaving with them.

Early this evening I spoke to a representative of the White Pass and Yukon Railway, the largest transportation company in the Yukon. I was advised that some 250 of their employees have been laid off. These employees are in Whitehorse, Skagway, and Vancouver. Of these 250, there are some 100 truck drivers, 70 maintenance personnel, and the balance are railway employees. In addition I understand that the shipping schedule out of the Port of Vancouver that was to carry this ore has been cut by approximately 50 per cent.

If you total the 410 employees out of work at the Cyprus-Anvil Mine and add the 250 employees of the White Pass and Yukon Railway that makes over 600 employees not working because of the strike. The total work force of the Yukon is approximately 10,000 people, so at the moment between 6 per cent and 7 per cent of that work force is unemployed because of one strike.

The Assistant Commissioner of the Territories is quoted as saying that because of the strike and its effect on the trucking industry the territorial government of the Yukon has lost over half a million dollars in fuel taxes. The Northern Canada Power Corporation, the Crown corporation which produces power in the Yukon and is the largest customer of the Cyprus-Anvil Mine is losing some $200,000 a month as a result of the shutdown. This will have a tremendous effect on the rates of that company which recently during the course of the summer raised some of its commercial rates by 80 per cent.

Talks are continuing between the company and the union; both are anxious to resolve the problem and get back to work. Frankly I was appalled by the answers and attitude of the Prime Minister who does not seem to care about the possible loss of our exports of lead and zinc to Japan. I am particularly appalled at his callous attitude to the critical economic situation in the Yukon.

I understand that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development will be in the Yukon tomorrow for the opening of the Yukon legislative assembly. While I am not suggesting that he should interfere with the powers of the Yukon assembly, I hope, while he is there, that he will apprise himself of the economic situation and seek advice as to how this strike may be settled. We are well aware how the minister conducted himself in his previous portfolio, particularly with respect to the penitentiary question. If the minister hopes to be successful in his new portfolio it will be necessary for him to impress on his cabinet colleagues, particularly the Prime Minister, the critical nature of the problems in the Yukon and the need for an immediate settlement to resolve the situation.

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member suggested that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) should intervene in the industrial dispute at Cyprus-Anvil Mine—

Mr. Nielsen: He did not.

Mr. Baker (Gander-Twillingate): —with the aim of getting that mine into production again.

Mr. Nielsen: That is a new version of the twist.

Mr. Baker (Gander-Twillingate): The second part of the hon. gentleman's question to the Prime Minister suggested exactly that, that the Prime Minister intervene. He said, as reported at page 579 of Hansard:

> . . . would the Prime Minister intervene in order that a more realistic settlement might be arrived at . . .

Therefore the hon. gentleman said what I suggested.

The implication is that if the Prime Minister were to intervene, to permit these workers to obtain more than the law allows, the workers would return to production. Given the strike record of that mine, where only the latest strike was related to the anti-inflation program, that is a questionable assumption.

Mr. Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Is the hon. member asking that special treatment be accorded to these workers? If so, what would be the reaction of thousands of Canadian workers whose negotiated wage levels have been rolled back by the AIB and who accepted those rollbacks, albeit with no enthusiasm, and continued working? Intervention in this case would clearly be unfair to them. The anti-inflation guidelines on the basis of which the Administrator's order was drawn up apply uniformly to all cases referred to his office. Bear in mind that, in this instance, it was the union leadership who requested that this referral be made.

This is the point, Mr. Speaker—if I may say so without going into figures and facts behind the Anti-Inflation Board and the duties of the Administrator: The AIB does not have to follow the letter of the guidelines. It has been given certain discretionary power to take other factors into consideration. The AIB therefore was able to award the workers of Cyprus-Anvil more than a strict application of the guidelines would permit.

Mr. Nielsen: Eight per cent.

Mr. Baker (Gander-Twillingate): But according to the act, the Administrator must follow the letter of the guidelines. I repeat that the case was referred to the Administrator by the union leadership. It is open to either party in the case to refer the matter to the Anti-Inflation Appeal Tribunal, where the Administrator would be required to justify in a legal hearing the rationale for his order.

Mr. Nielsen: Just compare this case with the one at Thompson last week.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m.

At 10.26 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

SUGGESTION PRIME MINISTER CLARIFY CONFLICTING STATEMENTS ON JAPANESE INVESTMENT IN TAR SANDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that in response to a question I put to him on October 28 as recorded in Hansard at page 540, the Prime Minister told this House that during his visit to Japan he had conducted no negotiations with the Japanese concerning possible Japanese investment in the Athabasca tar sands; and in view of the fact that the very next day in response to another question as recorded in Hansard at page 549, the Prime Minister told the House that he had tried to interest the Japanese in the "continuing development of the tar sands" I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds):

That the right hon. gentleman explain to the satisfaction of this House, on motions, the discrepancy between his two remarks.

ALLEGATION MINISTER MISLED HOUSE CONCERNING AGREEMENT ON LES TERRASSES DE LA CHAUDIÈRE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the statement of the former minister of public works in the House on July 13, 1976, that no agreement had been entered into with Campeau Corporation on the Les Terrasses de la Chaudière project, and whereas the Campeau Corporation had under date of June 28, 1976 an information circular outlining in detail the arrangements made with the government based on an agreement dated November 18, 1975, which was signed on behalf of the Deputy Minister of Public Works, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That this House instruct the Minister of Public Works to make a statement at the earliest opportunity on motions that will clarify this matter and remove any suspicion that the former minister misled this House intentionally or otherwise.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 such a motion can be presented to the House only with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

PROPOSED REFERENCE OF MATTERS RELATING TO MEMBER FOR CALGARY SOUTH TO COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask leave of the House to present a motion under Standing Order 43 which relates to the matter which was under discussion for some time yesterday as a result of a question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden). I have tried to draft a motion that is specific in its terms of reference but which does not pass judgment: in other words, it leaves the matter to the appropriate committee I have shown copies of my proposed motion to a representative of each of the other parties and also to Your Honour. I, therefore, ask leave to move seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent):

That the sale in 1975 by Emden Limited to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police of an aircraft and certain parts and the sale in 1973 to the Ministry of Transport by Peter Bawden Drilling Services Limited of an aircraft, including the involvement of the hon. member for Calgary South in these transactions, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for consideration of the said transactions in relation to the conflict of interest provisions of the Senate and House of Commons Act, that the said committee also consider reports of discussions on these transactions purported to have taken place between the hon. member and Mr. Speaker, and that the said committee report its deliberations and conclusions to the House not later than December 10, 1976.

PROPOSED INQUIRY INTO FINANCING OF LES TERRASSES DE LA CHAUDIÈRE PROJECT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask the unanimous consent of the House to deal with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. As it appears that certain Canadian financial institutions will be advancing $50 million to Campeau Corporation on December 1, as set out in a confidential memorandum dated June 28, 1976, with respect to Les Terrasses de la Chaudière property to be rented to the Government of Canada; as it has been revealed that there is considerable question as to the circumstances surrounding this transaction, including the need for the property itself; and in view of certain financing techniques which it appears will cost the Government of Canada tens of millions of dollars, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise):

That this House direct the Minister of Finance to immediately inquire into this project and the financing thereof with a view to determining if the project and its financing is necessary in this period of restraint, and to report back to this House upon his findings within the week.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST THAT CORPORATION CONTINUE TO BROADCAST BBC NEWS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to raise a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Effective yesterday, without prior notification, the CBC ceased to carry the BBC news direct from London, after over 30 years of daily presentation. I do not wish to quarrel with the reasoning that the Canadian network is adequately staffed to provide extensive foreign coverage without having to depend on outsiders; but the BBC presents the world news with a non-Canadian slant, which is an advantage to all who take their news seriously.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clarke: I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That the Secretary of State be asked to approach CBC officials, with a view to restoring the BBC news to the daily schedule of the CBC.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such motion can be presented to the House only with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDUSTRY

EFFECT ON DRUG INDUSTRY OF CERTAIN FINANCIAL MEASURES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Montreal-Bourassa (Mr. Trudel):

That the government recognize the outflow of investment capital from Canada and that the adoption of compulsory licenses coupled with unrealistically low royalty awards has had a depressing effect on industry without providing related benefits to the economy; and that it has had the effect on the drug industry of increasing imports, reducing Canadian production, reducing the growth of pharmaceutical research and removing the incentive to manufacture in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such motion can be presented to the House only with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLIC WORKS

LES TERRASSES DE LA CHAUDIÈRE PROJECT—REQUEST FOR REPORT—REASON FOR AGREEING TO ADDITIONAL PAYMENT ON OPTION TO PURCHASE

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. In his absence I shall direct it to the acting minister. As the minister knows, I have been exploring the question of Les Terrasses de la Chaudière deal made by the government with the Campeau Corporation for some time—by way of order paper questions, Standing Order 43, oral questions in the House and in private discussions with the minister. The answers to these efforts have caused me increasing concern. Can the minister now report to the House, after having spoken to his departmental officials and called for a report regarding the Les Terrasses deal, if the project is really necessary and if it is the most economical and satisfactory way of providing office facilities for federal government needs in the national capital region?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Acting Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, answering on behalf of my colleague who is not in the House today, I should like to say that I am well aware, as the House is also aware, of the interest of the hon. member in the question. The minister is also aware and is taking the necessary steps to provide answers to the questions put by the hon. member.

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, we have been waiting many weeks now for the report that the minister promised the House. Can the minister advise why the government agreed to the additional $54 million option to purchase Les Terrasses de la Chaudière, given the fact that the $16.7 million annual rent it will be paying over 35 years will amortize the complete project including the shopping plaza, the hotel and the parking lot?

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, I suspect that my colleague is also aware of what the hon. member is saying. In any event, I will ensure that he is aware of the point the hon. member is making. He probably will be in the House and will be in a position to answer the full question of the hon. member.

LES TERRASSES DE LA CHAUDIÈRE PROJECT—POSSIBILITY OF CANCELLING CONTRACT

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): The same minister has expressed his concern in the House that the agreement entered into with the Campeau Corporation is "a confirmed and binding contract". Given the fact that the agreement is unsatisfactory for the people of Canada, can the minister advise if he is considering a method to cancel the contract, thereby saving the Canadian taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars, even if it has to pay what appears to be a standard Liberal penalty similar to the $16 million Orion penalty?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Acting Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I will make sure my colleague is aware of the question raised by the hon. gentleman.

LES TERRASSES DE LA CHAUDIÈRE PROJECT—SUGGESTION DEVELOPER PAY IN ADVANCE FOR LEASE OF PART OF COMPLEX

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I also have some questions for the acting Minister of Public Works. Is he aware that the cost of the Les Terrasses de la Chaudière project will be underwritten from the revenues of the lease from the government, leaving the income from the rest of this vast project as gravy for the developer, and further that if the government does elect to exercise the option to purchase the development after 35 years, the developer, in addition to the $54 million that it receives at that time, will also have the right to lease the parking lot, the shopping plaza and the hotel areas of the complex for $1 each per year? Perhaps the minister ought, as a symbolic gesture, to insist that the $75 payable for the 25 year period be paid in advance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Oral Questions

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REPORT OF UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO INSTITUTE ON UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Given the fact that Canada is losing about $18 million in the production of goods and services every day as the result of current employment levels, can the minister tell us if he has received the as yet unpublished forecast by the University of Toronto Institute for Public Policy that unemployment will rise even higher in 1977 reaching 8 per cent, and if so, does he intend to act on their recommendation that the most effective immediate step to deal with that unemployment is to bring forward some tax cuts?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, having checked into some of the statistics quoted before by the leader of the New Democratic Party, I will want to take a second look. I notice that he always takes the highest possible statistics, never the lowest, when talking about unemployment. I am not satisfied that the tax cuts suggested by the hon. member would be the appropriate approach in view of the fact he is not talking in amounts. He is not saying to what extent we would have to increase the deficit or to what extent we would have to go to the market to borrow which would push up interest rates and hurt the very people he proposes to help.

Mr. Broadbent: The minister may not think my questions are improving with time. I can assure him that his answers are getting worse.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I did a politeness to the minister. I could have quoted published forecasts that reach as high as 8.1 and 8.5 per cent. I picked a low one for the minister today. I now want to shift to the Prime Minister. Given the fact that unemployment in Canada has increased by more than 9,000 for every month since the July 1974 election for a total increase during that period of time of more than a quarter of a million people unemployed, and considering the fact that Professor Wilson of the Institute for Public Policy was recently a personal economic adviser to the Prime Minister, will the Prime Minister tell the House if, unlike one of his ministers and given the serious level of unemployment, the government will consider bringing forward a tax cut and do so soon?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the suggestion of the hon. member will be taken into account along with many others when we prepare the budget.

Mr. Broadbent: The Prime Minister clearly takes a different attitude from his minister. He said he will consider that in the preparation of the budget. In the meantime, nothing of substance is going to be done in terms of the government's announcement in the throne speech and the appropriate minister's speech contribution during that debate, until April 1977.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he can assure the House that something will be done to deal with the serious situation likely to arise in the coming winter, one which, it is anticipated, will see the highest rate of unemployment since the great depression of the 'thirties.

● (1420)

Mr. Trudeau: Any announcement to be made will be made in the House in the normal course of events.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT OF REGULATION CONCERNING WAITING PERIOD

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Could the minister tell this House whether he agrees with his predecessor who proposed to amend the four-week rule in the Unemployment Insurance Act which demonstrated, to his predecessor, that this experience did in fact discourage the recipients from going back to work.

[English]

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I am not sure I heard the translation correctly, but if the hon. member was referring to the move from eight to 12 weeks, there has been no change in that intention.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to repeat my question because it has been misinterpreted.

Does the minister still agree with his predecessor who proposed to take the four-week rule out of the Unemployment Insurance Act and does he want to have this act amended? At the present time, a recipient who finds employment during the extension period of four weeks or more automatically loses all his rights if a company goes bankrupt and if he is forced to turn back to unemployment insurance.

[English]

Mr. Cullen: There will be some changes which will make provision for the problem the hon. member is suggesting may occur.

FINANCE

FINANCING OF LES TERRASSES DE LA CHAUDIÈRE PROJECT—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance and it has to do with the Campeau Corporation's scheme to construct and lease property known as Les Terrasses de la Chaudière to the government. Would the minister tell us whether he is familiar with a pending $148,500,000 finance arrangement for that corporation and, if so, would he inform the House whether he is aware that these funds are being raised by Campeau for a period of 15 years against Canada's covenant at an effective interest rate of 11¼ per cent per annum, which is to be paid indirectly by Canadian taxpayers and which is approximately 1⅓ per cent above the going interest rate for comparable Canadian financing, representing a net additional cost to the treasury of almost $2 million a year?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I have not been directly involved in this transaction, one which is primarily the responsibility of my colleague.

Mr. Stevens: As certain major financial institutions in Canada, supervised under the minister's direction, have declined to participate in this Campeau financing arrangement and have expressed apprehension in respect of the transaction, would the hon. gentleman state whether he has been contacted by one or more officials of these institutions, including some whose head offices are in his riding? Have they conveyed their anxiety to him and, if so, would he indicate the nature of their objections and of his reply?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I, personally, have not been so contacted.

Mr. Stevens: A final supplementary. Would the minister assure the House that he will object to any similar deals being signed in the future by the Department of Public Works or others in the government since it appears such deals are in blatant circumvention of restraint guidelines, resulting in a huge and unnecessary cost to the people of Canada.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I do not know how well founded the hon. gentleman's allegations are—

Mr. Stevens: Very well founded.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): —but I would say to him that under our system of government Treasury Board has the responsibility for scrutinizing all government expenditures of this kind. An expenditure of this kind would in due course have to receive Treasury Board approval.

STATISTICS CANADA

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF CONFLICT OF INTEREST SITUATION OF CERTAIN EMPLOYEES

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and it is in respect of the matters I raised yesterday relating to StatCan. Having regard to the Canada Gazette publication respecting public servants conflict of interest guidelines, I wonder whether the minister would indicate if the chief statistician called for all senior executives to file statements on conflict of interest in June, 1974 and, if so, whether or not the assistant chief statistician and his senior advisor made statements and got clarification of their position with respect to any conflict that might arise by virtue of their working outside of their employment?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it is impossible for me today to answer the detailed question of the hon. member. I hope to be able to do so tomorrow. By the way, I would like to tell to the hon. member for Central Nova that tomorrow morning, when the orders of the day will be called, I will table the answers to the 23 or 24 questions he asked about Statistics Canada.

[English]

TYPE OF PRIVATE BUSINESS CONDUCTED BY CERTAIN EMPLOYEES

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. This matter has, of course, been before the minister and I wanted to ask him today whether or not he is in a position to let us know if there is in his possession or in the possession of the department any advertising brochure or prospectus put out by this firm, and whether the assistant chief statistician and his senior adviser were in partnership or carried on the business of giving professional services to private firms.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I would like the hon. member to clarify. There is the assistant chief statistician and then there is the Jeffery Associates. I should like to know to which he is referring.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I am referring specifically to the assistant chief statistician, Mr. Fellegi, and to Mr. Sunter, a senior research adviser. These are the two people in question. This question was raised yesterday with the minister at some length.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. member to put all these questions into writing. The hon. member for Central Nova did this last week. Then, I will be in a position to reply. This is all very technical, involving dates and so on, so I think it would be proper to give a written reply.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE WITH MR. GALLANT CONCERNING ALLEGED OFFER OF STATISTICS CANADA EMPLOYEES TO SELL INFORMATION

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, following along this matter I should like to ask a question of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Yesterday, as reported at page 617 of Hansard, I put this question to the minister:

—I wonder if the minister who since the news reports came out must have taken the time to examine Edgar Gallant can report to the House exactly what Mr. Gallant said—assuming that such an investigation took place. Also, is the minister in the position today—and if he is not in the position today will he put himself in the position—to table the correspondence which passed between the then chairman of the National Capital Commission, Mr. Gallant, and Mr. Gordon Robertson.

To that inquiry the minister said he would undertake to have the information available to answer "tomorrow", as he said then. It is now Tuesday. Is the minister in a position to answer this question and would he do so now?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, seeing that it is Tuesday I am now in a position to do so. I find that the correspondence to which the hon. member referred took place in 1944, on February 22.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fraser: So we are referring to Mackenzie King, are we?

Mr. Danson: Of course, I mean 1974, before I assumed this portfolio. Nevertheless, I find that Mr. Gallant acted in an exemplary manner. When he found a situation which he thought was not totally correct, he did the quite appropriate thing, as the gifted public servant that he is, and made contact with Mr. Gordon Robertson, secretary to the cabinet. Things were taken on from there, as was appropriate to Mr. Robertson.

• (1430)

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister for his answer as far as it went. Was the contact that he was talking about a letter in accordance with the reports? If so, would the minister table that letter today? If it was not a letter, would the minister make a statement in the House now in answer to the questions which he undertook to answer, namely, what was the purport of the conversation between Mr. Gallant and Mr. Robertson, what circumstances was the distinguished public servant, Mr. Edward Gallant, complaining about when he either spoke or wrote to Mr. Robertson, and what is the detail with respect thereto?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, Mr. Gallant was acting as he should, as I indicated. It was a written report, a report which was confidential between him and Mr. Robertson. It is the sort of report that I think even the hon. member opposite, who might have some concern for allegations made with relation to specific public servants, would not want made public. I think that is appropriate. If further action is taken and there is need for disclosure at that time, disclosure should be made. On this particular document, the situation might bear investigation. I would prefer not to table that at this time because it mentions individuals by name. What happened in the subsequent investigation, I am unable to report.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister must have read page 617 of Hansard and the question I put to him as recorded there. The minister knows that it was prefaced by the remark that public servants generally must have their reputations protected, and I think he recognizes that concern of mine. I suggest that part of that protection is the complete and full disclosure, and I would like the minister to reconsider his answer to me just now, particularly in view or his specific and unequivocal undertaking that he would have the information available to answer questions in the House tomorrow, that being today.

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I am answering to the extent that I am able and prepared to do so. As the hon. member knows, the investigation was continued. There are specific questions on the order paper in this regard, and I believe my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, is dealing with those.

LABOUR RELATIONS

INQUIRY IF MINISTER HAS RECEIVED COPY OF TREMBLAY REPORT

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour.

The longshoremen issue has always been of deep concern to me because 250 of these people live in my riding. On June 26, 1975, the minister appointed Mr. Roland Tremblay, Q.C. as mediator in the interpretation and application of some provisions of the Montreal longshoremen's collective agreement. Since then, over a year has passed. I wonder if the minister now has a copy of the Tremblay report?

[English]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I do have such a copy.

[Translation]

Mr. Lavoie: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

Since the minister read the report, could he tell the House what are the main recommendations?

[English]

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): They are very detailed indeed. Rather than go into them all—and I think it would only mislead hon. members to go into them in such detail—I would be more than happy to send a copy to the hon. member, and then he can ask further questions if he so wishes.

CANADAIR—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DOCUMENTS AUTHORIZING LOAN GUARANTEE AND SPECIFYING ORDERS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. As Canadair is now owned by the taxpayers of Canada and as the board of directors has a majority of senior civil servants presumably representing the taxpayers' interests, will the minister table the document whereby the government authorizes the loan guarantee so that the taxpayers of this country can see what kind of deal the government is getting them into?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, last Friday in Montreal I held a press conference on this matter during which I gave all the information. We guarantee a loan of $50 million, the government of Quebec a loan of $20 million and the balance of the program will be financed through two Canadian banks. Until now the Learstar program is extremely interesting. Fifty-three orders have already been obtained by Canadair's sale committee. I think we must all be pleased that Canadair landed such an interesting program.

[English]

Mr. McKenzie: Will the minister table the documents which show that Canada has firm orders for 53 Learstars and has extracted deposits from customers for this number of aircraft, who are these customers, and at what price has Canada promised to deliver these aircraft?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I cannot table those documents because I think it is extremely important that Canadair do business as any other corporation. In my opinion, the government has the duty to help both these companies, Canadair and de Havilland, create as many jobs as possible in Canada and I was very happy to be associated with such a beneficial undertaking as that launched by Canadair under this program.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

LEGALITY OF PLACING BRITISH COLUMBIA TEACHERS RETROACTIVELY UNDER BOARD—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Could the minister report on the situation in British Columbia where the legality of the retroactive placing of last year's arbitrated and legally binding teachers' salary agreements under the authority of the Anti-Inflation Board is being questioned, now that the board has completed the process of rolling back all these settlements?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I cannot report today but I would be glad to seek a more detailed report and give it to the hon. member.

HEALTH

SWINE INFLUENZA—TIME LAPSE FROM VACCINATION TO IMMUNITY—AVAILABILITY OF CERTAIN VACCINES

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, one of the advantages of sitting in the wings is that you have to participate in Participaction that the minister advocates. My question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare has to do with swine 'flu. In view of the many conflicting reports regarding the time lapse from vaccination to peak immunity and the length of the immunity conferred, and taking due account of variations in people, is the minister able to state what the time lapse and the period of immunity are, and if there are other vaccines available combining the Hong Kong, Port Chalmers and Scotland varieties that have been used on a yearly basis?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the first part of the question may I say how much I regret certain statements on this very important question made by some CBC reporters which seem to have been made without checking with us. The shelf life of the influenza vaccine from laboratory tests has been estimated to be about 12 months. Based on experience in the United States with type A influenza strains, it is believed that immunity after vaccination could last up to three years in a significant portion of the population, provided there were no changes in the antigenic makeup of the virus.

With regard to various other strains of vaccine such as the Hong Kong 'flu vaccine, a Canadian manufacturer is engaged in the production of bivalent A/Victoria and B/Hong Kong vaccine. Deliveries have not yet been received. It is hoped that the vaccine will be available for the coming 'flu season. In so far as A/Port Chalmers and A/Scotland influenza are concerned, no vaccine is available in Canada at present for either virus.

An. hon. Member: What about the Lalonde 'flu?

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that three years have passed now and of our knowledge of the fact that swine 'flu or any of the varieties of 'flu have a habit of repeating themselves in two or three years, is anything being done now to study this possibility and arrange for the manufacture of the vaccine if necessary?

Mr. Lalonde: I missed the latter part of the hon. member's question. What possibility did he refer to?

Mr. Rynard: The possibility of having preparations made in case the swine 'flu repeats itself as it did in 1917, 1918 and 1919.

Mr. Lalonde: I will certainly take the suggestion of the hon. member under consideration and discuss it with my officials.

SWINE INFLUENZA—DECISION OF SOME PROVINCES NOT TO VACCINATE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question also relates to the swine 'flu program. In view of the late delivery of the vaccine to the provinces and perhaps a failure to ensure supply in keeping with the demand, some of the provinces have decided not to participate in the monovalent vaccination program. Can the minister say whether he has any plans which will counteract the action by the provinces not to vaccinate so that the Canadian people indeed will have the kind of protection he wants them to have.

● (1440)

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to reassure the hon. member that the decision by some provinces not to vaccinate everybody has nothing to do with the delays which might have occurred to vaccine deliveries. Seemingly, these decisions were made for other motives. As to the availability of the vaccine for all Canadians, I tabled in the House last week a report by a committee of distinguished scientists in this field, the best immunologists in Canada. This paper recommends general vaccination, and I sent the report to all my colleagues encouraging them to follow the recommendations by that committee of experts, as the federal government will do. Unfortunately, I do not think I can do better; for I cannot impose a solution to the provinces.

[English]

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister can further elaborate. Can he confirm reports that the imports of Bivalent vaccine will be in approximately 40 per cent shortfall supply.

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: No, Mr. Speaker, such is not my information. The information I got is that we will have available for all Canadian citizens enough Bivalent vaccine to meet the demand. But if my hon. colleague has any specific information in that regard, I would be interested in looking further into that question.

ENERGY

REASON FOR FAILURE TO SUBSIDIZE COST OF ELECTRICITY IN ATLANTIC REGION

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Can the minister confirm to this House whether the total revenue of the oil export tax and the special 10-cent a gallon excise tax which the Minister of Finance indicated would be used for the eastern oil import subsidy is now running in the 12 months ending September, 1976 at a profit of close to $100 million. If so, can the minister indicate why the Government of Canada refuses to provide special assistance to Atlantic Canada and particularly Nova Scotia which is facing oil generated electric power rate increases of up to 65 per cent?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to confirm the point raised by the hon. member. I would point out to him that the government's budgeting is done on a fiscal year basis and that we may well be faced with a substantial increase on January 1 of this year if we are to believe what we read in the newspapers or what our embassies report from abroad in respect of the actions of the OPEC nations. So we have to look at the whole question of our balance in terms of a longer period than the period to which the hon. gentleman referred.

As to the second part of his question, I have pointed out on a number of occasions that as a result of the equalization arrangement entered into by the federal government and the province a substantial, by far the greatest, proportion of the increase in the cost of oil-fired generation which was made necessary by the oil price increase of the federal government will be taken care of by an automatic increase in equalization this year.

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Speaker, the minister talks nonsense when he talks about equalization grants being controlled by the federal government. Since the minister cannot confirm the confidential internal revenue figures I have received from sources within his department, will he report back to the House tomorrow providing us with his information and at the same time will he explain why the Government of Canada is profiting from funds intended to assist in the reduction of the high energy prices in Atlantic Canada? If he is taking a longer period than just this year and looking forward to prospective price increases which might come, will he guarantee that the surplus will be used to help Atlantic Canada and especially Nova Scotia?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, for the reasons I have already given I am not in a position to confirm that number. It is quite clearly a situation which has to be looked at over a longer period. I would ask the hon. member to look at the record and look at the figures. By the end of this year the federal government will have provided very close to $1 billion in support to Atlantic Canada and in that regard probably very close to the highest per capita assistance has been given to the citizens of his province.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

EFFECT OF MOVING HELICOPTERS FROM TRENTON TO ATLANTIC AREA

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is an attempt to clarify an answer given yesterday by the Acting Minister of National Defence to my colleague from Hastings respecting air facilities for search and rescue missions as of 1976. As a member for a Lake Ontario constituency where we have had problems in the past regarding the adequacy of facilities for search and rescue operations in the Great Lakes basin, I should like to ask the minister whether the movement of helicopters to Newfoundland in any way would downgrade the facilities for search and rescue anywhere else, specifically in the Great Lakes Basin and the rest of the area.

Hon. Barney Danson (Acting Minister of National Defence): Actually, Mr. Speaker, I do not think they will be downgraded. They will be reorientated in this feasibility study. Indeed, I think it in some ways would upgrade them. The helicopters being moved from Trenton are being replaced by others from Petawawa which are in back-up position and can serve a much broader area as I see it, and also by the Chinook helicopters which are located here in Ottawa. So there is a reorientation. Indeed, this is the purpose of the feasibility study which is to see where they can operate from at the very best. Indeed, one helicopter at this moment cannot land in St. John's because of weather conditions there. If it were posted there and there was an emergency it might not take off from there. These are the things we are trying to work out at this time.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, the minister uses the word "upgrade". We have already drawn to his attention this afternoon a press release issued at five o'clock last evening after he gave his erroneous impression in this House yesterday afternoon. Perhaps I might quote one short paragraph from this press release. It states:

> Although the deployment of SAR Labrador helicopters will provide an improved posture in the Newfoundland area, the overall search and rescue capability for the maritimes and central Great Lakes areas will be degraded during this period.

How does he reconcile the fact that he claims there is an upgrading and the Department of National Defence claims there is going to be a degrading of the facilities in the rest of the country, especially in these two crucial areas right now.

Mr. Danson: Well, I think, Mr. Speaker, likely a public relations officer may be degraded.

FINANCE

ALLEGED REPORT OF TASK FORCE ON FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. It is supplementary to a question that I asked the Acting Prime Minister last Wednesday. I apologize to the Minister of Finance for the delay in presenting the supplementary, but in light of certain measures on my part during the last two or three months I find that my recognition factor is still quite low. In response to a question about a report from a task force that was investigating European methods of foreign exchange control the Acting Prime Minister said he had not received any such report. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if he could tell the House when the task force will be reporting and also what preparations the government has made to impose controls which would stop the outflow of Canadian capital to tax havens and other jurisdictions.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my advice is that there has been no such task force nor is there any now in existence. Since I have been in this office I have given no consideration whatsoever to foreign exchange control.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's West.

ENERGY

POSSIBILITY OF RE-ACTIVATION OF REFINERY AT COME-BY-CHANCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I would like to ask the minister whether any group has approached the Canadian government to ask for assistance in connection with the re-activation of the oil refinery at Come-By-Chance, which has been closed since the end of 1975. What assistance, if any, is the Canadian government prepared to give by way of grant or loan for the purpose of re-activating that oil refinery?

In addition, could the minister tell the House whether he has received a report from Petro-Canada, which was supposed to be investigating the feasibility of its doing anything in connection with that oil refinery?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, may I take this opportunity to welcome the hon. member to the House—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: —and to congratulate him on a very impressive win. I have enjoyed the opportunity in the past of discussing mutual interests in the energy field with the hon. member, and I look forward to doing so in the future.

As to the question of whether a group has approached us for assistance in the restoration of the refinery at Come-by-Chance, I have heard rumours, but quite frankly I myself have received no propositions or proposals. On the question of Petro-Canada, yes, Petro-Canada did have a survey, analysis and study completed for it with respect to the Come-by-Chance refinery. I cannot say more than that at this time.

Oral Questions

PETRO-CANADA

POSSIBILITY OF DISPOSING OF COMPANY TO PRIVATE ENTERPRISE

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. A former deputy minister of industry, trade and commerce questioned the political reasoning behind creating Petro-Canada, and he was reported to have said, and I quote: "It is a political mentality turned loose on the oil and gas business, with no rudder, no compass and no anchor; all wind and sail". Does the government have any intention of disposing of this national calamity?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am not responsible for Petro-Canada. I will ask my colleague to give an answer, but I do not think he has any intention of disposing of the corporation.

Mr. Towers: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the throne speech referred to the possibility of Crown corporations being returned to private industry, would Petro-Canada fall within that category?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will return to the throne speech, he will see that the words he uses are not there.

AIR CANADA

LOWERING OF COMPANY'S SHARE OF TRANSCONTINENTAL TRAFFIC—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the minister's statement and policy that transportation should be paid for by users, will the minister be lowering the 75 per cent mandatory share of transcontinental air passenger traffic which Air Canada now enjoys in preference to other air carriers, which should increase competition and make for more efficiency and better passenger service?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, first let me say that the hon. member inaccurately summarizes a much more complicated statement about the appropriate way to get proper transportation services in Canada.

An hon. Member: All your statements are complicated.

Mr. Lang: I see no connection whatever between that statement, in any case—or any part of it—and the following part of his statement.

Mr. Ritchie: Is the minister considering lowering this mandatory proportion of transcontinental air passenger service which Air Canada enjoys?

Mr. Lang: The whole relationship of Air Canada to particular services being offered is a matter being reviewed with a view to maintaining the most effective air service in Canada at the least cost to passengers.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REASON FOR FAILURE TO BARGAIN WITH EMPLOYEES OF CHAPMAN TRANSPORT

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport and concerns the 200 workers of Chapman Transport in British Columbia. That company is a subsidiary of CNR. The workers who are on strike there are seeking only the same settlement awarded to other transport companies in B.C., which has been approved by the Anti-Inflation Board. Can the minister confirm whether the CNR is intending to close down Chapman Transport, and if not, can he tell us why the CNR is not bargaining in good faith?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I certainly cannot confirm that. I have only seen press reports on the matter. As far as negotiations are concerned, I would not want to comment, and any such question would have to be looked at from a labour point of view.

PUBLIC SERVICE

POSSIBILITY OF STRIKE BY PRISON GUARDS—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PROVIDE SECURITY

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr Speaker, my question is to the President of the Treasury Board. It is with respect to questions I asked him last Friday which appear on page 580 of Hansard. I wonder if the minister has a reply to those questions now.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I promised an answer yesterday and tried to seek the floor, as the hon. member knows.

There have been a number of negotiations between the parties, and approximately two thirds of the articles of agreement have been signed off. The negotiations are still in progress. They are with regard to penitentiary personnel and the PSAC. There is tentatively a meeting scheduled for the week of November 8. As the hon. member knows, people in this service in the main are designated and therefore would not be able to participate in a work stoppage and be acting legally. However, that designation is still a matter of discussion with the PSAC and is somewhat in doubt. We have contingency plans ready, but I hope and feel that they will not need to be implemented, in view of the fact that we feel that the negotiations will be successful.

PENITENTIARIES

REQUEST FOR RELEASE TO COMMITTEE OF STUDIES OF CORRECTIONAL SYSTEM

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Solicitor General arising out of reports of a speech he made in Vancouver describing the correctional service in Canada as a total failure. He is also reported to have said that management and staff at all levels in the correctional system, as well as prisoners and some representatives from the private sector have spent the last year studying the system and that the results of such a study would be released. I wonder if the minister could make available the results of those studies today to the special subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, which is looking into the penitentiary system, so that members of that subcommittee might have the benefit of the studies conducted to date in the work they have to have completed for parliament by the end of February.

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am ready to make copies of my speech available to him and to other hon. members of the House so that they can understand fully the context of the quotation the hon. member took out of my speech.

As for the work of the task force on the role of federal corrections, we are presently assessing the studies which have been made, and we hope to make the document on the role of federal corrections public early in the new year.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ALLEGED HARASSMENT OF DR. MORGENTALER—POSSIBILITY OF MINISTER INTERCEDING

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice, if someone would attract his attention. My question concerns the case of Dr. Henry Morgentaler in Montreal. This individual has now been acquitted on three separate occasions of charges laid against him in Montreal, and he has served ten months in jail even though acquitted of the particular offence. I am wondering if the Minister of Justice can advise the House whether he has interceded. I realize he does not have jurisdiction, but has he interceded with the minister of justice of Quebec with regard to what appears to the Canadian people to be harassment of this individual?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not. Whether people are prosecuted under the Criminal Code is a matter within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction, and responsibility, of provincial authorities, and any intervention by me would be contrary to the relationships and responsibilities which exist under the Criminal Code and would be improper, as would have been any intervention by the province of Quebec with regard to the exercise of my jurisdiction in the matter in ordering a new trial.

• (1500)

Mr. Leggatt: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the importance of this matter and the widespread concern there is in the country I wonder if the Minister of Justice could advise the House whether in his view the actions taken by the provincial Minister of Justice are correct in terms of his perspective of the proper and appropriate way to go about laying charges where they all come about in one day and they are now being laid separately one at a time against this individual? Is his objective—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CONSUMER PRODUCT WARRANTIES ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR STANDARDIZATION OF WARRANTIES

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-376, to amend the Combines Investigation Act to provide for the standardization of warranties and to define the minimum provisions thereof.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. McKenzie: This is a bill to amend the Combines Investigation Act to provide for the standardization of warranties and to define the minimum provisions thereof. All too often the consumer purchases an automobile, refrigerator, or any one of hundreds of products covered by warranty, only to have the product break down. When the consumer reads the warranty's fine print, he discovers that the document is so full of exceptions and qualifications that it is almost useless. This bill will correct these anomalies.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL TERMINOLOGY BANK

Question No. 33—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 4,109 of the First Session of the 30th Parliament, referring in part to efforts to establish a National Terminology Bank by the Secretary of State in conjunction with the University of Montreal, what (a) is a description of this proposed facility and its purpose (b) is the estimated cost (c) are the reasons for its creation (d) are the number of public service personnel to be involved and their estimated annual salaries?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): (a) The terminology bank will involve the computerized collection of terminology in use or likely to be used by government services. Each term in the bank will be defined or used in context, and access to the terms will be provided by various parameters or combinations of parameters (e.g.: area of usage, source, reliability, geographic origin), in each language for which the term exists. The terminology will be multilingual to the extent that the government requires terms in non-official languages. The bank will be instrumental in centralizing available terminological information, particularly for the purposes of translation within government departments, and invaluable in meeting the requirements of language standardization in the Public Service, especially that of providing work instruments in both languages. (b) According to estimates, the terminology bank will cost $953,500 in 1977-78 and $1,717,500 in 1978-79 (in 1975 constant dollars). (c) The Translation Bureau must be provided with the necessary means to verify terminological data and standardize vocabulary, in accordance with the mandate, conferred upon it by the Cabinet, to verify and standardize the terminology used in both official languages within the Public Service. A terminology bank is the most effective means of keeping up with rapid developments in technical and administrative language and preventing duplication of terminological research, the proliferation of terms and wasted research efforts. It will also be instrumental in meeting the increasing need for terminology when texts are drafted in both official languages, official documents translated, specialized and bilingual personnel trained, uniform work instruments created and statutes or regulations drafted. It will be used to meet the requirement of communication with the public, specialists, units working in French and international organizations involved in standardization and technical or scientific research. (d) According to estimates, 52 persons earning an average salary of $10,663 (in 1975 constant dollars) will be assigned to bank operations in 1977-78, and 77 persons earning an average salary of $11,396, in 1978-79.

CARSON ROAD LANGUAGE TRAINING CENTRE

Question No. 77—Mr. Cossitt:

1. On or about Wednesday, June 23, 1976, were Anglophone language students at the Carson Road Language Training Centre subjected to a lecture in the French language dealing with the subjects of reincarnation and hypnosis and, if so (a) how many language students were required to attend the lecture (b) what is the name and address of the person who gave the lecture (c) what was the fee paid to the lecturer (d) was it announced that one of his qualifications was that he had at one time "studied electronics" (e) what is the name and job designation of the highest ranking person authorizing the lecture (f) what are the reasons justifying such a performance and how is this consistent with the school's stated objective of teaching the French language and French culture to Anglophones?

2. Who owned the electronic equipment, including TV equipment etc., that was used to cover the lecture (a) who were the cameramen and any others on duty who operated such equipment (b) who paid their salaries and if they were paid by the government what was the amount involved?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows: 1. Students at the Carson Road Language Training Centre were given the opportunity June 23, 1976, to attend a lecture in French, dealing with reincarnation and hypnosis. (a) About 150 students in the second level of language training attended the lecture voluntarily. Attendance was not compulsory. (b) The lecture was given by Mr. Jean Roussier, président de la Société de Métempsychologie du Québec. His address is: 1042, rue Écho, Ancienne-Lorette, G2E 1K2. (c) The fee was $300 inclusive of all expenses. (d) In response to questions by students concerning his previous activities, Mr. Roussier noted in part that he had studied electronics. (e) The lecture was authorized by Bertrand Desbiens, Director of Pedagogical Services, Language Bureau. (f) This lecture was a part of the activities which are organized to help students to improve their oral expression and auditive comprehension of the second language. The subjects of such conferences are chosen to encourage the greatest possible participation of the students. As such, the subjects must be of a general nature, and interesting to the majority of the students. A number of subjects are identified by the students, and the most popular of these are selected as themes for conferences. To augment discussion, the students are asked to prepare questions in advance of each conference with the help of their teachers.

2. The electronic equipment used to cover the conference is owned by the Staff Development Branch of the Public Service Commission. (a) The cameramen and others on duty are employed in the media services unit of the branch. (b) These employees being full time public servants, the amount involved is included in their salary.

PSC COMPETITIONS IN ATLANTIC CANADA

Question No. 164—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Has the government given any consideration to studying whether the Public Service Commission, by its own volition or by legislative restraint, operates competitions in Atlantic Canada which cannot be entered by members of the Canadian Armed Forces who, while posted elsewhere, formerly resided in Atlantic Canada and wish to return to employment in the Public Service in Atlantic Canada and, if not, for what reason?

2. What is the government's considered view of the effect such a policy might have on Atlantic Canada's efforts to prevent the permanent exodus of talented individuals?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows: 1. The answer to this question is negative because of the following: The Public Service Commission is restrained by legislation in determining who is eligible to compete in competitions. When selection is to be made from among persons employed in the Public Service, the candidates' eligibility for appointment, known as the area of competition, is determined by the positions in which they are employed. When selection is to be made from among applicants from outside the Public Service, eligibility for appointment is defined in terms of the area in which candidates must reside. The Public Service Commission has however, established a policy that recognizes the special circumstances confronting retiring members of the Canadian Armed Forces seeking employment in the Public Service. The policy provides, that, where the area of competition includes residency requirements, members of the Canadian Armed Forces may claim entitlement to compete on the basis either of the locality where they are stationed or where their immediate families reside. In its opinion, the Commission can offer no greater flexibility in its policies for the determination of area of competition without both exceeding the provisions of the Public Service Employment Act and being discriminatory in favour of the Canadian Armed Forces.

2. Having no data on the incidence of the return of members of the Armed Forces to Atlantic Canada upon leaving the Forces, the Commission can express no views in response to this question.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Question No. 342—Mr. McCleave:

1. Is posted mail sent to particular locations for sorting and, if so, what mail is sorted in Montreal from areas other than the Province of Quebec?

2. Has any mail, sent for sorting in Montreal, been redirected to Saint John, New Brunswick and, if so, in what quantities and for what reasons?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): 1. Mail is first sorted at the office at which it is posted. The practice is to send mail matter directly from the office of origin to the office of address. Where, because of lack of volume for a particular office of address, this is not possible, mail is sent to an intermediate office for further sorting. The intermediate office most used by post offices in Canada for the province of Quebec is Montreal, and therefore mail originating all across Canada is sent to Montreal to be forwarded to its final destination in the province of Quebec. In addition to this, Montreal is one of the main terminating points for air mail from overseas destinations, and mail addressed to many points in Canada is sent to Montreal by foreign administrations for transmission to points in Canada.

2. No, except that mail originating in Quebec province addressed to smaller places in New Brunswick, which had been sent to Montreal by smaller post offices in the province of Quebec because there was not enough to make a direct despatch, may have been sent to Saint John for transmission to points in New Brunswick.

PROCESSING GOVERNMENT CHEQUES

Question No. 574—Mr. Reynolds:

Can all government cheques be processed through the automatic mailing machines in post offices?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): All government cheques which bear a valid postal code can be processed through the equipment, provided the envelope and its enclosures meet Canada Postal Standards.

APPEARANCE OF MR. DAVE McINTOSH ON CBC NATIONAL TELEVISION NEWS

Question No. 769—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did Mr. Dave McIntosh of the National Capital Commission appear on CBC National Television News on September 2, 1976 and refer to certain statements made by the Honourable Member for Leeds on the subject of the Prime Minister's summer residence at Harrington Lake with the words: "That's a lot of crap" and, if so, is the government aware that the CBC script for the National Television News of that date quotes Mr. McIntosh as using such words?

2. Is it the policy of the government to permit public servants to refer to statements made by elected representatives of the people as "crap" and (a) if so, on what date was this policy instituted and by whom (b) if not, what steps are being taken to see that public servants use proper language when making statements of any kind to members of the news media?

3. Who instructed or authorized Mr. McIntosh to give interviews to various news media on the date in question and what is their job designation?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): In so far as the National Capital Commission is concerned: 1. Yes.

2. No. (a) not applicable (b) In this particular case a more proper word might have been "rubbish".

3. No one.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BORROWERS AND DEPOSITORS PROTECTION ACT

MEASURE TO REGULATE INTEREST ON JUDGMENT DEBTS AND AMEND CERTAIN STATUTES, BILL C-16, CONSIDERATION RESUMED ON THE MOTION, MR. ABBOTT, FOR SECOND READING AND REFERENCE TO THE STANDING COMMITTEE ON HEALTH, WELFARE AND SOCIAL AFFAIRS

The House resumed, from Monday, November 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott that Bill C-16, to provide for the protection of borrowers and depositors, to regulate interest on judgment debts, to repeal the Interest Act, the Pawnbrokers Act and the Small Loans Act and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Matane): Mr. Speaker, as I said last night on this bill, we rejoice in its presentation though I regret, naturally, that the government as a federal institution, should have waited so long before bringing forward this very important piece of legislation.

I also said that, Canadian personal debts having increased considerably in the last ten years, to the extent of now representing almost 22 per cent of their disposable income, it is that much more imperative for the government to present those amendments today. What makes this bill interesting is the fact that, once again, its scope is extremely vast. It encompasses all transactions that can concern Canadians individually, and small businesses in the field of borrowing, as well as all Canadians with regard to managing their savings.

In addition, it increases the quality and quantity of credit information; it eliminates useless complications in the field of credit, it reduces to a large extent the possibility of excessively high rates of interest on credit, for we are introducing here the concept of unwarranted interest rates by making it incumbent upon the lender to prove that the interest he charges the borrower is in fact a just rate considering the risks involved and the cost of the capital. We are also introducing the concept of a criminal rate in that when the lender's rates clearly exceed justifiable ones, the guilty is liable not only to a fine but also to imprisonment.

Through this bill, we are also able to rationalize the federal legislation and to establish a strict and uniform legislation regarding consumer credit regulations. Yesterday I expressed some doubts about the constitutional character of this bill and I asked the minister to dispel the fears expressed on this matter by some hon. members, particularly by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). I think a good way to understand the significance and timeliness of this bill would be to give examples of some conditions we have today in Canada and against which there is absolutely no legal protection. For example, most depositors are not really paid interest on their deposits as the computation of interest on deposits is made half-yearly on the lowest balance in their accounts. Consequently, tens and tens of millions of dollars are thus lost because that procedure is precisely opposite to that used by lenders when they compute the rate of interest for borrowers.

Another example. If we think that our solvency will allow us to get lower monthly interest rate levied on our loan, we are no doubt deluding ourselves. Yesterday, I referred to the same individual who applies to the same institution but does not use the same system to borrow money, either a bank credit card, a negotiated loan or a term loan. He will be granted a loan with different interest rates.

It is the same for advertising. The various financial institutions are allowed to announce a certain interest rate on savings when in fact the interest rate is much lower. For example, it is quite possible to announce that an interest rate of 8 per cent will be paid on deposits when indeed it will be 5 or 5.2 per cent while this reference to 8 per cent in an advertisement is legal. At the same time, interest charged to borrowers is often greater than the interest rate announced. This is another area that will be settled through this bill. As I said yesterday, this legislation will provide us with the necessary means to pursue lenders who charge usurious rates: 300, 400, 500, and sometimes as much as 2,000 per cent. I recalled yesterday that according to the best information we have, police forces feel that loans at usurious rates now constitute the second financing source of organized crime, of the underworld, the mafia.

This piece of legislation will also provide police force with a tool to dry up this very important source of financing organized crime in Canada. These are but a few aspects of this bill and I hope that through committee deliberations all hon. members of this House will entertain the same spirit to improve the bill where they think certain aspects deserve to be improved. I would like some explanations on the possibility of calculating interest rates on a daily basis. I would like to know to what extent this responsibility will be feasible under this bill for small lending companies. Would not calculation on a monthly basis be more realistic? It is up to the minister to supply us with figures. The responsibility should not be too costly for lending companies or, conversely, it would frustrate borrowers of very important sums. But, on first approach, it seems to me that generally, for relatively small loans, calculation on a monthly rather than on a daily basis would be adequate.

[Mr. De Bané.]

Mr. Speaker, I am glad this bill has been introduced and I hope it will not be the object of a filibuster similar to that which marred the introduction of the first bill on competition. I think that Canadians generally agree that we have not really done much up to now to protect them in this area. In my opinion that is why this bill, which meets a pressing need on the part of Canadian consumers, arrives in the nick of time.

• (1510)

[English]

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in the debate on Bill C-16, the borrowers and depositors protection act. I acknowledge that this is an important bill and wonder, with respect to a bill of this magnitude, of such far-reaching effect on the social scene and to the financial community of Canada, why the opposition was given only 120 hours between first reading and second reading to prepare itself for debate. We are left in this position: as debate proceeds, research papers 60 and 70 pages thick are arriving. We are supposed to know the contents of those papers to make sure the people of Canada are getting improved legislation in this area. I ask, what is the rush with this bill? It is important legislation.

I am greatly concerned because the bill relies heavily on regulation. Throughout the bill there are references to regulations, which indicates to me that the homework done by its drafters was somewhat inadequate. I noticed that in his introductory remarks the minister complimented his staff. I congratulate him for acknowledging the hard work they have done and the extensive communications his departmental people entered into with other departments of government. But having read the bill two or three times, together with some of the available research material, I am led to conclude that there has been little consultation with the business community on some of the spin-off effects of the bill in the private sector. I ask, why would a new, ambitious, obviously smart, somewhat brilliant and youthful minister rush in—

An hon. Member: Don't get carried away.

Mr. Huntington: He is a pretty bright guy. Why would this minister rush into a portfolio from which a wise, respected old owl saw fit to rush out? In my opinion, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has not brought forward much successful legislation, its legislative record is not good. Nor has it been able properly to enforce existing consumer legislation. Perhaps I can say that the only reason I am in the House today is my astonishment with a former minister of that department who was unable to understand that there can be two points of view.

I am deeply concerned about some aspects of this bill, and completely sympathetic to others. I wonder why the bill was not given the benefit of further consultation with other interested parties affected by it, so that we could look beyond the purview of political opportunism and not get caught in the fly-paper, which is what I feel will happen. The political anxiety to serve the consumer will create secondary effects which, with more preparation and more listening to a wider audience, could have been prevented.

Let me now list those parts of the bill of which I fully approve. I compliment the government on requiring full and complete disclosure of all loan costs. I think this step is past due. Also, credit charges are to be calculated on a net principal sum, which means the net money the borrower actually receives. This, too, is a step in the right direction. The bill deals with control of advertising, which I agree is important. We agree with some provisions of the bill which apply to some lenders. The bill contains provisions with respect to the prepayment of fixed rate mortgages. I agree with the implementation of this aspect of the bill in a market of rising interest rates. However, I do not think provisions concerning variable mortgage rates have been well thought out by drafters of the bill and I shall deal with that point as I proceed with my remarks.

I believe that the maintenance of requisite records is necessary if the bill is to be meaningful, but wonder how many man-years of employment will be created in any new bureaucracy set up to deal with such matters. As the minister said in his press release, the bill places great emphasis on the curtailment of loan-sharking. I agree that coercive acts, threats or certain misrepresentations in this regard on the part of lenders should be brought under the Criminal Code. There is not any member on my side of the House who does not recognize that these are important aspects of the bill, and I hope that other parts of the bill can be improved as we study it. We hope that eventually good legislation will be placed in the statute books. However, I would not want to see the very positive aspects of the bill disrupted or discouraged, with unforeseen hazards and damaging repercussions to the business sector of this country. One thing that has happened to this country since 1972 and that we are paying for today is disruption of the decision-making base. We have a tendency to legislate in order to curb and correct abuses. This is good. However, let us make sure that we do not add more confusion to the productive sector of the economy which is having great trouble today.

I have said before in this House that one of the problems we are having in the west with this type of legislation and legislation that relies extensively on regulation is that we do not trust the federal scene anymore. That is why I have offered some comments about my concern as to why this bill is being rushed into the House and why it is being put before the health and welfare committee instead of the finance committee. I repeat my regret that I have not had an opportunity to become fully researched and aware of all the implications of this legislation.

Having seen how some of the committees have been manipulated and handled in the past, I have to wonder how extensive a hearing the bill will receive in committee, and to what kind of manipulation it will be subjected by the steering committee and the standing committee it goes before. Will the banks, trust companies, mortgage companies and financial institutions in this country be encouraged to present briefs so that we can minimize the spin-off, detrimental effects that some of these measures might have within the country? Like some of my colleagues, I have very real concern about the effectiveness of the committee system as it is presently being managed by some ministers.

In the research leading to this bill there have been extensive briefs from consumer organizations. As far as my files are concerned, there is an absolute dirth with regard to briefs from the industry which have been the subject of this legislation; this is a void of which industries, if they read Hansard, should be aware. When the bill comes back into this House at report stage, I hope that suddenly many aspects of the Canadian community do not only then wake up to the fact that very serious legislation is being imposed upon them. I would like to see full input at the committee stage of this bill. I hope the minister will encourage that type of activity in the steering committee proceedings and in the committee proceedings.

There are some spin-offs that will be quite serious in the Canadian community in the attempts to bring about legislation that will protect the low income borrower. I hope these spin-offs can be prevented and the bill can be kept within its original intent and principle. I wonder if the authors of the bill and the minister are fully aware of the changes that will be forced upon the community.

In the time allowed me to participate in this debate I will try to bring out one or two areas of real concern. Is the bill going to dry up funds and aggravate, rather than alleviate, the situation for the marginal borrower? I hope that in committee there will be full exploration of that aspect and that there will be incentives left or placed within the industry to serve the needs of the low income borrower. To what extent will the bill centralize the lending power of the industry into federal hands? Do the provinces really agree with this centralization? Has the minister had full discourse with his counterparts on the provincial scene? According to a paper that I was able to have typed up just yesterday, there are extensive legal debates ahead for this piece of legislation as it is presently drafted. I have been talking to people in two provincial departments. I find that they are going to resist any centralization of these powers or interference with powers that they are already enjoying in legislation that they implemented well in advance of this bill being presented to the House of Commons.

Is the minister fully aware of who will be the real beneficiaries as a result of this legislation? The reason I ask a question of that nature is that we jumped into the situation where we could offer the Canadian taxpayer tax relief through registered retirement savings plans. We now find our mailboxes filled with letters from people cashing in their registered retirement savings plans for the annuities that are allowed. These annuities are going into the insurance companies of Canada. All the holders of RRSPs are getting back is a rate of interest return on their principal which is less than the interest rate the government will be paying on the Les Terrasses de la Chaudière project. The principal remains for the benefit of the issuer of the annuity. That is a secondary effect respecting which we will have to offer corrective legislation. I trust that in our committee deliberations we will not fall into that kind of situation with this bill.

There is another matter that causes concern. I ask this question in all sincerity. What will be the extent of the abuses leading to some chaos within the industry if borrowers arbitrarily stop payments? If this risk exists, who will lend money under that kind of program? What worries me is a newspaper report which appeared in the Globe and Mail. You get this kind of implication on this aspect of the bill, "If you think your loan rate is too high, you can simply stop making payments and force the lender to take you to court. The lender must then convince the court that the rate is not too high." If there is one problem we have in this country, it is that our judicial system is not working. It is overloaded; it is abused. Yet here we are creating a situation where if an individual feels an interest rate is too high, he can stop payment and force the lender to take him to court, further adding to the burden on the justice system and choking it.

I should like to examine the clause dealing with variable rate mortgages. It was reported almost two years ago that trust companies in Canada encountered serious liquidity problems on a break-up basis. I wonder whether the minister has considered this aspect of the legislation and the effect it will have on the industry. At the present time the industry is working within five-year term mortgages. Lending institutions borrow on five-year guaranteed income certificates and lend their money on five-year term mortgages. It is considered sound practice that the certificates be back-to-back against mortgage lending, and the mortgage companies will probably want deposits to match their obligations.

What will happen to companies which have committed themselves to five-year certificates at, say, the present rate of 10½ per cent, when the government comes along and changes the rules? As you know, Mr. Speaker, the government has a record of creating confusion by changing the rules in midstream, and I am afraid this is what is being done now. It has changed the rules by allowing prepayment without penalty after 36 months. What this means is that three-year term mortgages, not five-year mortgages, will be the mode of the day.

It is my belief that in the government's anxiety to get this bill before the House it has failed to consider the disruption the legislation will cause in the country. Has the minister really considered all the consequences of what he is proposing to do? For instance, how can a new family formation commit itself to a mortgage for a long-term need on the basis of three-year term renewals? Is this fair to the borrower? What assurance is there that he can afford the renewal?

We find ourselves approaching the definition of the demand term of money. It is likely that many borrowers would not have the opportunity to obligate themselves with respect to a long-term financial need when the rules of the game covering their commitment get narrower and narrower. Today, in Canada, our prime lending rate is about 4 per cent higher than the prime lending rate in the United States—10½ per cent as compared to 6½ per cent. Perhaps this country will return to sanity. Perhaps interest rates will go down and the right to own private property will be within the grasp of the rank and file of the emerging generation in Canada.

Maybe we shall accomplish a decrease in the cost of living and increase the purchasing value of the wage dollar. Maybe after the next election a measure of sanity will return to the Canadian scene and the gap between interest rates here and in the United States will narrow. Should these things happen, mortgage rates would fall and there would be a rush of prepayments on the thirty-sixth month anniversary. What happens then to the company which has covered these funds with five-year guaranteed income certificates at 10½ per cent?

I ask the minister this question, also: Where does this legislation offer an incentive to drop interest rates? There is nothing here which would encourage an adjustment in the rate on the part of the lender. I suggest that this prepayment clause is likely to have serious secondary effects and would lead to three-year mortgages which offer no protection to the borrower with a long-term need. Short terms for long-term borrowing purposes represents a definite change in our system. It is my belief that even variable rate mortgages should provide for five-year fixed payments if the real interest on the unsophisticated low income borrower is to be served.

I would be the first to agree that some trust and life insurance companies have been most unfair in enforcing penalty clauses on borrowers in a rising interest market. Such greed and stupidity deserve corrective legislation. I have no argument with that idea at all. When a man managing the affairs of a corporation wants more from the community than he should clearly be asking, we have no choice but to legislate against such excessively self-interested behaviour. However, I should like to see such corrective legislation take into account all the spin-off reactions. The problem which would face the community as a result of the variable rate mortgage provisions is one of them.

In light of possible risks to the liquidity of trust companies in consequence of this legislation—and I pointed out earlier that the companies have already encountered serious liquidity problems—I wonder whether the government should not increase insurance requirements on deposits from the present $20,000 limit up to, say, $50,000 or even $100,000. I make this suggestion bearing in mind that the deposit-taking institutions are being exposed to new risks, and in these circumstances an increase in deposit insurance should be considered parallel to the present bill becoming law.

To return to the subject of the variable rate mortgage for a few moments, one of my concerns is this: what will be done with the principal amount if there is a fixed payment for a term and a variable is interjected? There is a difference here which must be considered. This brings us to the question: Under this legislation, is the review period now to be three years? How, and where, is the difference to be applied? Will it be applied to the principal outstanding, or to the interest on the transaction, or to the term of the transaction? It would appear that a fixed term is needed for the sake of the borrower. I have already stated my view that three years is too short and that we should be looking at a five-year term as a minimum. If a borrower has not paid in enough money, he will be short at the end of the term. The little person, the unsophisticated borrower we are trying to protect, will not know how much he is short, or over. If he is sucked into a mortgage in a low interest period, perhaps he will be outside the guidelines under which he qualified for the mortgage in the first place.

For example, a man raises a $40,000 mortgage, a high ratio mortgage under which 95 per cent is advanced against it. He has a $40,000 need, and he borrows $38,000. Being a low income borrower, he will need insurance, so let us add another $400. He has now borrowed $38,400 against a $40,000 need. The mortgage is now at 96 per cent; the ratio has increased. Assume there is a 1 per cent interest change three years down the road. This will mean that this low income borrower will have a shortfall of $1,000. In this case the mortgage could be worth more than the house cost. If the market is not up, or if the house is in bad repair and the lender does not want to renew the mortgage, what is this low income borrower going to do?

One question which I do not find answered in the legislation is this. Is any provision made for a renewal clause for the protection of the borrower who finds himself in circumstances such as I have described? Or are we getting borrowers into long-term debt with a short-term demand, and is there any stability in such a situation for them? If existing mortgages can be prepaid, I submit that trust companies are opened to a new exposure which heretofore has not existed. This is why we need to know what will be the new regulations that are continually referred to throughout the bill. I think many of the unknown factors that have created the kinds of concerns I have described will become more serious as we conduct research and discuss matters with the institutions affected.

Another situation that I do not see covered by the bill is that of a company which owns its own mortgage company. A company in that position could put a loss leader on the mortgage and make an excessive profit on the price. What is the low income borrower going to do in that kind of situation when he has a short-term renewal on the mortgage? I have to ask, how far does the government want to go in protecting the unsophisticated borrower? Perhaps the answer lies in a very carefully designed educational program and in giving more assistance to our primary, secondary and tertiary educational institutions to teach the public these very simple facts of life.

Although I have not had a chance, as I have said, to hear from the various institutions affected by this bill, Mr. Speaker, I hope their concerns will be made known to us before the bill gets to committee. I have not had a chance to prepare myself in a technical way for this debate, but I have taken the opportunity to describe one or two aspects of the bill which are of concern to me.

I think this bill is major departure from past statutory schemes, and we will have to be very careful in our deliberations to become fully aware of the legal debate that we are creating between provincial and federal jurisdiction. The provinces really do not want provincial responsibilities interfered with, and this bill, along with the Bank Act, is of concern to certain provinces. I am sure that others will also participate, on this aspect in the coming debate.

The minister goes far beyond his press releases when he submits to the people of Canada that this bill is designed to protect consumers from loan-sharking. The bill has many ramifications for the social scene, some of them very beneficial. I believe all of us have a real challenge ahead in committee to try to create out of this bill a piece of legislation that will be of benefit to the Canadian community as a whole.

There is one other small point that I overlooked, Mr. Speaker. The Post Office says that mail is the property of the receiver at the time of the postmark. The bill implies that lending institutions have an obligation to debits and credits on the date of the postmark. I do not have to remind all members of the House of the chaotic state of the postal service in this country today. We do not give the lender a fair chance to adjust to the ever-lengthening time that it takes to deliver mail or to the mail load that arrives on a Monday. Where in the legislation is it provided that the lender cannot throw away the postmark, and how are we ever going to get ourselves into a situation where we can administer a statute which provides that the postmark applies when dating debits and credits in an account? These are matters that I should like to see cleared up.

I also note that we are talking of a prime times seven factor as being a criminal rate of interest. I do not know where that came from, and some time during this debate I should like to hear the reasoning behind and the rational for a 73.5 per cent rate as being anywhere within the ball-park of a borrower's needs in Canada. I believe my time is up, Mr. Speaker, and that is about the limit of the meaningful comments that I can offer to the minister and his staff on this bill at this point in the debate.

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, I was somewhat amused by the remarks of the last speaker when he said he had not had a chance to prepare himself for these discussions or to confer with the institutions involved. I find it amusing that the official critic for the opposition was critical of the time it had taken to produce this bill. Most of us have known that the bill has been in the works for a considerable period of time, and those of us who had a genuine interest took the trouble to contact the institutions and other persons interested in the bill in order to find out their opinions so as to try to provide that input.

The borrowers and depositors protection bill which we are debating today is consumer-oriented legislation which should meet with general approval. The objectives of protecting Canadian borrowers against loan-sharking and excessive interest charges, and of providing the public with more and better information for all credit deposits and transactions, should be accepted by everyone. However, the intention to define strict and uniform rules to protect all borrowers and depositors could result in some disagreement as to the degree and extent to which these rules should apply. Canadians have the right to demand a high minimum standard of protection in their consumer credit ratings. The new bill requires savings institutions to disclose fully such information as the effective annual rate of interest offered and the true amount of service charges, and to credit interest to depositors' accounts at least monthly so that savers can earn the best possible return on their savings dollar. It is this point to which I shall refer later.

For the first time, all borrowers will have the unlimited right to pay off any mortgage loan at any time without penalty charges. This unlimited right of free payment will enable the borrower to retire a higher interest rate loan and to change, without penalty, to the lowest cost loan available to him or her. Under the new bill, mortgage lenders will be required to disclose fully all costs and terms of a loan at each stage of a credit transaction. Their advertising will have to spell out the rates and all the other conditions under which credit is given. Their collection methods will be regulated and subjected to criminal prosecution for harassment, threats and other coercive practices.

The BNA Act gives the federal government exclusive jurisdiction over interest, and all transactions where interest is involved must therefore be considered to be within federal jurisdiction. Banking institutions grant a major part of consumer credit and they fall exclusively within federal jurisdiction. May I add that a mortgage borrower should be fully protected at the time of a mortgage transfer. It must be made obligatory that an institution or individual selling a mortgage to another must advise at that time of any difference in the principal amount outstanding from the sum which the borrower would have normally believed to be outstanding under the principal repayment terms contained in the original agreement.

The bill is also aimed specifically at loan-sharking which is now big business in Canada, exceeding $3 billion annually and still growing. Police investigations show that real rates of interest charged by loan sharks can range as high as 1,500 per cent. However, nearly two-thirds of consumer credit is granted by institutions falling exclusively under federal jurisdiction, such as chartered banks.

I have some misgivings that certain provisions in this bill would better not be considered with the upcoming revisions to the Bank Act. I fully support the establishment of a national data bank on the extent and use of consumer credit. It is of prime importance to set up a national data bank to determine and monitor the extent and uses of consumer credit. Lenders will have to keep records and submit reports their lending activities. The data obtained will be very useful when the time comes to formulate new policies on consumer credit at both the federal and provincial levels. I assume that committee discussion will adequately reassure those who are concerned about any invasion or loss of privacy in this particular section.

Now I would refer briefly to another of my concerns. It is always difficult when we discuss a good bill such as this not to appear to be against the bill if we criticize certain provisions. Nevertheless, the bill will be thoroughly discussed in committee, and presumably the minister is noting my comments. It was reported that the assistant deputy minister of consumer affairs said that the new consumer credit bill would encourage deposit-taking institutions to move gradually toward the daily calculation of interest payments. According to the Montreal Gazette, it was stated that a person with $200 in an account at the beginning of the month and who saves $50 a week would receive $2.31 interest that month, based on daily calculations at 8 per cent. Calculated on the monthly minimum balance basis now used at most banks, the interest payment is $1.33, a difference of about $1.00.

I know that the provisions of the bill have been changed somewhat from the documents that were originally given to us, in that now the daily balances are added so that there will be one monthly computation. Nevertheless, the effect, so far as the borrower is concerned, on his interest payments will remain the same. The previous minister of consumer and corporate affairs wrote to me as follows:

> The present banking system of computing interest on the smallest balance in a six-month period permits the banks to use the full total of deposits at their disposal for that period, which they loan out at the highest attainable lending interest rate, and for which they pay the lowest possible deposit interest rate. This proposed legislation is intended to correct that imbalance.

Then he went on to say:

> —there is no requirement for banks to pay any interest on any type of deposit. They do this only as an inducement to obtain funds which they can then lend at a profit.

Computing interest costs about 20 cents per calculation and entry to the account costs another 20 cents. Thus, there is a cost involved. I want to emphasize that point and I will be coming back to it. The banks have paid interest on minimum balances to keep the costs of administration down, not to reduce the cost of funds. The banks also make available a range of certificates of deposit of varying maturities from 30 days to five years on which interest is paid at rates higher than the true savings deposit rate.

Any regulation has a cost, and that cost must be paid by the consumer. So we must examine who will benefit and who will pay, and from that assess the advisability of the regulation. The banks many years ago changed their system to attempt to eliminate the fluctuating overdraft account. In its place the borrower, by demand note, stabilized his borrowings. This system, whilst costly to the heavily fluctuating account, had little or no effect on the longer term borrower. Undoubtedly, the consumer ultimately pays for all costs resulting from government regulation. I should interject here that this is not an argument against government regulation; it is just recognition of this fact before we proceed any further.

The daily addition for interest will, obviously, involve a charge that will be passed on to the customer, presumably in the form of reduced interest rates. Such a reduction will be applicable to everyone having money on deposit at the bank. It will thus impose a penalty on those who will receive no increase in revenue from the revised method of calculation. Those who have fluctuating sums on deposit will be encouraged to delay payments. They are the least preferable accounts for the banks, yet are the only ones that may obtain some very slight benefit from the new system.

The three points that I have raised are not, under any circumstances, of such import that I would consider protesting to the minister about this particular bill, but they are points which I think are worth raising at this time for committee investigation. Let me reiterate those three points. Forcing the bank to compute interest on a certain basis without being able to determine what the interest rates will be, or whether, for that matter, the banks should pay any interest at all, seems to me an exercise in futility.

I also raised the subject of mortgage transfers. I did that because of my very serious concern about the manner in which mortgages have been transferred or sold between one financial institution and another to the point that the householder may not be advised, because there is nothing in the legislation to ensure that he is advised, that there could possibly have been an error in calculation, or possibly all kinds of trouble, and at the end of the period of the mortgage, whether it is 20 years or 25 years, at which time he expects he will have finished paying off the mortgage, he finds there is a principal sum outstanding. Instead of 20 years, it is now 21 or 22 years, or instead of 25 years it is 26 or 27 years. He might be too far down the road before he realizes there could have been an error of which he was not aware because there is no regulation which requires he be brought up to date.

● (1600)

My third point concerns privacy. The data bank is an excellent idea. I assume many people will be concerned that the information gained by this bank could become too readily available. At the present time there is no doubt that credit information is passed between groups without the knowledge of the individual involved. Although this perhaps applies more when we consider the revisions to the Bank Act, nevertheless it is also applicable to this bill. There is at the present time the practice where a borrower does not have the freedom to go from bank to bank to try to obtain the best deal. In fact, if a person should go to another bank it is almost certain that an inquiry will be made of the banker with whom the person has previously borrowed money. The borrower is likely to be told "I am sorry: we cannot lend you the money you wish". The reason, simply, is that there is co-operation—I will use that very general term—between the banks, which means there is not the same freedom for a person to shop for a loan from a bank as there is when shopping to buy a suit or, for that matter, when one goes to various stores to establish a credit account.

Perhaps it is not in the consideration of this bill that this particular point should be raised, but I hope that in committee this matter will be explored. I have already said that my three concerns are not major concerns, but nevertheless I thought them to be of sufficient importance that they should be brought to the attention of the minister on second reading.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, as the previous speaker mentioned, it appears that the minister has taken a first step in the right direction. I think most of us will agree there are clauses in this bill which are worth while, but the more one reads it and the more one listens to the speeches made, the more one wonders how much good it will do in the direction in which it is going.

I listened to the two previous speakers. The argument was made that they did not have too much time to talk about the details or to examine details. But they did a heck of a good job on behalf of the finance and trust companies of this country. They have talked to them, and it appears to me that they have forgotten about the people who will be involved in these loans.

Mr. Abbott: Who says so?

Mr. Peters: I say so, because I am one of them. I speak from experience. I have had many contracts with Household Finance and one or two other finance companies, and I know how they work.

Mr. Fraser: You know about a bad loan?

Mr. Peters: Yes. I would be happy to tell you about my experience concerning what they considered to be a bad loan. These finance and trust companies are not the great heroes they are made out to be. They receive a parasitic benefit from their financial structure which should not make anyone proud to defend them, because they operate upon the misery of those who need to obtain goods and services and who can obtain those goods and services only by borrowing money at great expense.

The hon. member asked whether I have had any experience with bad loans. This is something the member perhaps should think about. I can remember when I was a miner in Timmins having a loan, as did many members of the union, with Household Finance. I remember that I owed them $300. I was maybe a little more practical than some of the other miners, because I had $300 in the bank. However, being one of the union lads, and since no one else could make their payments to the finance companies, I would not make my payments either.

When I travelled around the country raising money for the strike at that particular time, it was not unusual for me to find a representative of Household Finance waiting for me at my hotel room at 11 o'clock at night. He would harass me. He wanted me to give him $1 on account. This would not pay for the bother of harassing me, but he harassed me every night. He wanted to know who was paying for the hotel room. He wanted to get his finger on one dollar. I refused to give him one dollar, because if none of the other miners could pay one dollar, why should I pay him?

When I went to Windsor, the same thing happened. Another man was at the hotel and there was more harassment. It was interesting talking to these people. They could not understand why I would not make a payment when I had the money in the bank. They did not see the principle that was involved in my not paying them. It is also interesting that when I went to pay them after the strike, I paid them off in full and they did not charge me any interest for the period during which I had made no payment: there was no penalty.

This talk about penalties and assessments is a lot of hogwash. It depends on the circumstances. This is not really where the problem lies. The minister has considered floating the interest rate on loan companies. I was here, as I believe were some other members. When we last changed the Bank Act. This minister should be fairly familiar with some of the changes which have taken place in the Bank Act, since he comes from a family which had something to do with some of the changes in days gone by. What statement was made when we changed the interest rate from a fixed rate of 6 per cent? We were given a great deal of hogwash from the financial institutions. Everybody went around and saw them. They were well prepared. We were told that if the ceiling was taken off interest rates, they would go down. So I presumed that instead of having a 6 per cent interest rate we would have a rate of 2 per cent or 3 per cent. That did not happen.

When interest rates are not controlled, they go up and up. What really shocks me is that the minister has not talked to anybody who wants to borrow money. He has not talked to any workingmen or poor people who are going to borrow money. They do not care how it is listed; they want money and they want to know how much they will have to repay. They really do not even care how much it will cost, because if they are told it costs less over 36 months as opposed to 24 months, most of them will choose the longer period, and the difference is quite substantial. They will not go to a finance company and ask about interest rates. They are not interested in financial statements, last year's report or how much money these institutions make. They are not interested in how much they have lent, or how secure they are. These people go to finance companies and say that they want to buy a car or a trailer, that they want to take a summer vacation or buy a new stove, that they want to go on to the consumer market or, if they have sick children, to get medicine.

Working people will go into a credit office asking for a loan, and all they are concerned about is whether they are able to give a good enough story in order to get a loan. Very few of them go to a bank, and the reason is that the bank will send them immediately to see the manager. The manager will give them a big song and dance and they will not get the money they want. I once went to a finance company. The reason I went was that that company advertised on the radio, "Come down and see your friendly Household Finance dealer; he has money to lend you." When I needed the money, like everybody else I had that ad in the back of my mind. I went in, and I wanted the money right then. I wanted to spend the money right away. That is why I wanted to borrow it. If I had wanted to think about it for six months, I wouldn't have needed to borrow it; I would have lost interest in whatever it was I was going to buy.

A finance company credit officer will ask where you work, how many children you have, whether you are married and how long you have been at your job, and then he will give you the money.

Mr. Fraser: Only if he finds that you are an MP.

Mr. Peters: When I came here, members of parliament were the last people who would have any success at a financial institution. I would think they had the worst credit rating in the city of Ottawa, and probably across the country. However, years have gone by and, hopefully, our credit rating is better. It would not have mattered even if a member of parliament went to Household Finance. They probably would not have got a loan from a bank, but if they had gone to Household Finance, even they might have been able to borrow.

Interest rates were never a problem. That did not matter, and it does not matter now. The only thing that matters is whether a loan can be made and how many months it will take to pay it back. Why do interest rates not matter? I have not gone to a finance company for many years, but interest rates do not matter because people assume that the government has fixed an interest rate limit for finance companies. If people borrow more money, we get into the mortgage field and there is a different rate, but the government is going to take care of that.

What will happen under the proposal of the minister? I wonder if he ever really thought about it. A worker will go to a finance company and he will be asked whether he is married. If the answer is yes, the credit officer will write down a couple of figures. The worker will then be asked whether he has any children, and another figure will go down. He will then be asked whether he owns his own house and whether it is mortgaged, and a few more figures will be put down. He will be asked whether he has a car and how long he has been at his job, and a few more figures will go down. Then the worker will be told that he is not a good risk and that his rate will be, for example, 24 per cent.

Another fellow might come in with a different set of answers, and taking the minister's "x", "y" and "z" factors into account, his rate might be 17 per cent. So there is another price to pay for this latter applicant. Everyone who goes into a finance company and has a different set of "x", "y" and "z" factors will have a different rate, from the criminal rate right down to a rate at which even the finance company cannot borrow from the bank. The only thing the finance company will have to do is periodically declare its costs, which will have already been negotiated. It is true that a person might be able to go down the street and get a better deal, and that will mean that people might shop around. That might be a good thing. But it seems to me that we are not talking about downtown Montreal, Vancouver or Toronto. In many cases we are talking about places where there is only one financial institution. In those cases, a person may find that he is paying a different rate from his friend, and his friend is paying a different rate from another friend. Everybody who goes there will have a personalized rate.

The minister will make darned sure that the risk will not be higher than the return, and for this reason, as I see it, he will allow all kinds of rates if people want to negotiate their rates on the basis of these many factors. I think that would be a disaster. The less capable a person is of understanding the rate he is to pay, the more financial institutions will be able to charge him, and he will be charged a high rate. Those who are astute with regard to business practices will not go to finance companies in the first place. They will go to a bank. However, if people are not astute, they are poorly equipped to deal with the information the minister says he is going to provide and they will pay more. Is it not possible for us to go back to a fixed rate?

Hon. members have talked about a criminal rate. When we talk about 73 per cent, we are talking about downtown Toronto, Vancouver or Montreal where the mafia will put a person into a pair of cement shoes if they do not make their payments. That is loan-sharking. Let us not confuse loan-sharking with what happens in the normal course of events. The loan-sharking the minister talks about might be totally different from my understanding of that term, but to me loan-sharking is an unconscionable transaction brought about because a person cannot borrow from anywhere else and he has to pay whatever the situation demands. If necessary, he may have to sign over his life. When the general public reads about loan-sharking, they read about people who pay with their lives.

Mr. Abbott: Oh, come on; that isn't true at all.

Mr. Peters: That is what the general public thinks loan-sharking is.

Mr. Abbott: No, it is not.

Mr. Peters: Over the past year I have been reading about investigations in the city of Montreal into the loan-sharking practices which have been taking place there. What is loan-sharking in the city of Toronto? In Toronto that activity takes place on skid row and people pay with their lives or at interest rates which are sometimes 100 per cent per day. Today a person might borrow $100, and tomorrow he will have to repay $200. When you are borrowing for an emergency, payments of that kind are sometimes warranted. Companies do not borrow this way when they are a little short of cash for a contract and they need a few dollars. That is not loan-sharking as we know it, unless they are dealing with the mafia or the underworld.

● (1620)

I am sure the minister is not prepared to say the legislation will stop that. He has not even taken the precaution of making it mandatory that everyone who enters into any kind of loan arrangement should be licensed. These arrangements that the general public understand as loan-sharking occur in pool rooms and such places. The minister is a lawyer, and I presume he has handled not only corporation law but has acted as defence counsel. If he has, he will know the kind of people the general public consider to be in the loan-sharking business and will no doubt have defended some of their victims. But maybe he has a new definition of loan-sharking, Mr. Speaker, just as he has a new definition of "reasonable interest," meaning whatever can be charged, taking the risk into consideration.

The committee should look carefully at the general problem of interest rates. I consider, as I think anyone with a protestant work ethic background would, that a 10 per cent interest rate is usury.

Mr. Goodale: That is an anti-Catholic remark.

Mr. Peters: As a young person I was exposed to the Protestant ethic. The Roman Catholic philosophy probably has the same kind of ethic and believes that more than 10 per cent interest is thievery. Yet today there are very few house mortgages—and a house is a necessity, not a luxury—where the interest rate is not in excess of 10 per cent.

To get away from dogma, Mr. Speaker, I suppose we could think back to biblical times when Christ threw the moneylenders out of the temple. I used the Protestant ethic as an example because that is the one I was raised under; but I suppose moneylending goes back a long way. Lending money as a result of somebody else's misfortune has never been an honourable profession, but if there is to be any justification for it, then it seems to me the minister has to do a number of things. In the last election campaign the Liberals promised that moneylenders would be licensed in order to control cheque-buying and loan-sharking. I suppose loan-sharking, in common terminology, extends to that dangerous level of the criminal element of our society where people go for money they cannot get elsewhere. If I were to put an interest rate on loan-sharking, I would certainly put 10 per cent in that category; but apparently the minister does not. In the last election campaign the Liberals also indicated that by the end of 1974 they would increase the number of consumer storefront offices to 20. I do not know whether they have done that, but I doubt it very much.

Perhaps we could learn something from the election campaign in the United States. Even in that great, free enterprise empire they are talking about trying to pay their way. Mr. Carter has said it should be mandatory that government expenditures be justified for programs included in the budget.

Mr. Goodale: What do you think we are doing?

Mr. Peters: We are not doing it in this bill. We do not even indicate to people that it may be worth their while to pay for things out of the money they have, rather than the money they may earn tomorrow. The Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) advanced a very good idea, as a private member, that many of us supported, for a card called "Cashex". He suggested that if you took this card to a store when you made a purchase, you should get a premium for paying cash. Unfortunately, in these days many stores are not equipped to deal with cash and only have credit card facilities.

I think the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Abbott) has an obligation to set up an agency that will inform the people of the advantages of paying cash and will advise individuals how to handle their income in the best way possible. Through advertising the consumer is encouraged to go out and buy, buy, buy. The agency would be able to advise people of the cost of borrowing, and in some cases might even be able to talk them out of making purchases.

I spoke earlier about the role of the banks, Mr. Speaker. When you apply to a bank for a loan, first of all the accountant asks if you have any money in the bank. I can never understand why you would borrow money if you already have some in the bank. At one time I wanted to buy a new car. I had a $5,000 bond in the bank, so I cashed it. I did not spend all of it on the car. Later I found that it cost me $1,500 or $2,000 to cash that bond, whereas if I had borrowed the money I would have come out ahead; the interest rate would have offset the income tax, but nobody explained that to me. A consumer credit advisory bureau would explain to people the best way of handling their money. I do not think the average person has this knowledge.

If the minister is honestly interested in this problem, he should spend a few days talking to the working poor of the country and to the middle income people who are earning good salaries. I think the very poor should not be allowed to borrow money under any circumstances: we should be giving them money instead of asking them to borrow it at interest rates which are unconscionable. If someone is living on welfare or drawing an allowance under one of the federal or provincial programs, it is not always their fault if they have to borrow money from a finance company; it is ours. In my opinion they should not be allowed to borrow. If they can establish the need, there should be an agency to advise them.

To be fair, some agencies and family services in Ontario will help with roof repairs and heating repairs. If someone living on welfare needs money for this sort of thing, it is made available in addition to welfare. That is how it should be handled. You should not ask a person to go to IAC, Household Finance or the friendly finance company for money at high interest, because such borrowing acts like a snowball; pretty soon such people are deeper and deeper in trouble until they must use the bankruptcy structure which this government recently provided.

Incidentally, I heard a story about a young chap who borrowed money from a finance company to go into bankruptcy. He went to a finance company and said, "Lend me $300 to enable me to go bankrupt." The question is, why should a finance company lend him money if he intends to go bankrupt a couple of days later? But the company did lend it. I will tell you why: the guy borrowing the money said, "I will pay you back." This story highlights something very interesting. In the high income brackets of this country you will find cheats of all kinds, those who cheat on a huge scale, those who cheat on income tax, etc. The little guy at the bottom of the scale who works in the mine or factory does not cheat on anything. He has no expense account; he cannot write anything off against income tax. That does not apply to people in the higher income brackets who can even write off their meals. You see them all over Ottawa, eating in restaurants and writing their meals off against income tax. But you and I, Mr. Speaker, as members of parliament are not quite in that position. We are more like the wage earner; we pay for our meals and do not write them off.

An hon. Member: But the price is right.

Mr. Peters: Not even the minister has that privilege, I think.

Mr. Beatty: Pretty soon people will be feeling sorry for us.

Mr. Peters: Not really. The point is that in so many ways this country's poor and those living on salaries are in much the same position: they do not cheat because the system does not allow it. I suppose they might cheat if it were possible. Members of parliament are almost in that category unless they happen to own a business or are involved in some outside interest. They can only claim exemptions for their wives, children, etc.: they claim the normal deductions.

Mr. Gilbert: Unless they sell aircraft.

Mr. Peters: Some, with businesses, are in a somewhat different position. It seems to me that the banks have looked after themselves very well. A few years ago the banks claimed that the 6 per cent interest rate was too low, but in the last four or five years their profits have been so large that their stocks have probably been the most attractive investments available. Where did the banks acquire this extra money? They got it from borrowers. As interest rates rose, they lent money at between 14 per cent and 18 per cent and did very well.

The finance companies did well, too. Banks own, directly, four or five finance companies and lend them money at 10 per cent or 11 per cent interest, money which the finance companies will, in turn, lend at up to 28 per cent interest per annum. I am told that such rates are comparatively low; sometimes money is lent at greater rates. I have heard people talk of finance companies lending at between 11 per cent and 24 per cent. Frankly, I do not think any finance company in this country lends money at such low rates. Most of them borrow money from banks at about 9 per cent or whatever the prime rate is. The record of the financial transactions of some companies is so bad that they can only borrow money at 11 per cent or 12 per cent interest. That matter was not taken into consideration in this bill.

It seems to me that if the minister is saying that interest rates should be in keeping with the risk, he should look at the other side of the coin. Should not the rate bear some relation to how cheaply trust companies, finance companies and other lending institutions get their money? If they borrow cheaply, why can they not lend cheaply? I suppose the minister says that the lender has the right to a fair return. But if he gets his money cheaply, he will make more than a fair return even if one uses the minister's criteria. It is well known that the repayment record of the poor and the low wage earners of this country is good. The man who borrowed $300 in order to go bankrupt repaid the loan although he was under no legal obligation.

An. hon. Member: What about the other guy?

Mr. Peters: To heck with the other guy; the man went into bankruptcy to get away from him. If you push a guy to the wall, he will go into bankruptcy.

An hon. Member: It is dishonest.

Mr. Peters: Not at all. How many of the hon. member's friends in business have gone bankrupt two or three times and made $1 million?

Mr. Parent: My friends?

Mr. Peters: I assume that some hon. members of this House are on the side of the financial institutions. If a person cannot make it, so to speak he has recourse to bankruptcy. On the other hand, the little guy who borrowed $300 repaid his loan with interest. It has been suggested that we should act in this field as we acted with respect to farm credit, small business loans, student loans and other areas coming under federal legislation. In other words, we ought to guarantee the risk by insurance. The cost of the scheme could be borne by the borrower, who might pay an extra 1 per cent. I believe that for farm credit the borrower pays an additional 1 per cent for supervision and insurance. Under other legislation interest is calculated in much the same manner. It seems to me that with regard to loans under $5,000 we could add an additional 1 per cent to the going interest charged of, say, 17 per cent for administration, and guarantee such loans.

There would be little risk and little expense, since the record shows that there has been default in only 1.5 per cent of all loans made to low income people by finance and trust companies. By doing this we could make more money available. If hon. members believe in the free enterprise market system and in money circulating, by adopting the scheme suggested they could make money circulate. What is more, money would be available at the lowest possible cost to borrowers. Money really has no value except in what it does. It provides a service, as my friend told me a few minutes ago. It does not grow; you cannot plant it. It provides a service, and that is all. It seems to me that people who live off lending money are really not providing a service. They are living off the misery of others.

If the government really wants to help those with very low incomes, they should bring in an insurance program with a fixed interest rate. This would be fair to both the borrower and the lender, and at the same time it would be as fair as possible to those in the most unfortunate position in our economic structure, namely, the poor. I am sure this kind of interest rate has been initiated by the finance companies. They have risk insurance. All I ask is that the interest rate reflect the ability of the finance companies to recover. In order that we will know what that recovery will be, we should set an insurance rate for a certain loan level and make that available to the general public.

I next want to deal with the matter of taking a finance company to court. Big deal! A person is not going to hire a lawyer so that he can sue a finance company because he feels the interest is too high. He would have to borrow from another finance company in order to do that. It may cost him $1,000. The person, already having indicated that he has bad judgment, will probably end up with a bum lawyer. The minister says that rather than go that route, he can let the finance company sue him. Such a person may not have steady employment. Because he does not have much training, he may have a hard time getting a job in the first place. What would happen to his credit rating if he were sued by a finance company? He would never again be able to get credit, so he likely would not follow that route either. If we are going to protect people against money lenders, why ask someone else to do the protecting? Why ask someone to go through the courts? Such a person probably does not have enough money to get a divorce, let alone sue a finance company. We are talking about people the minister does not know anything about. We are talking about half the people of this nation who were not born with a silver spoon in their mouth.

Mr. Fraser: He probably did not have enough money to get married in the first place.

Mr. Peters: The hon. member is correct. In Ontario now it does not matter whether you are married or unmarried; it does not make any difference.

Guaranteed insurance could be provided at a reasonable price. If necessary, the government could carry it. If a loan is insured, the borrower will repay it and interest rates will be kept at a fixed level. There has been talk about small business loans. Why were they not successful? Because the banks would not get involved in them. That may happen with this program if interest rates are too low. I have one other point I wish to make. It is with regard to people cashing cheques at a discount. If there is a postal strike, the government either holds up cheques or sends them out early.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. He may continue only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Peters: The government may send out early family allowance cheques, DVA allowances or DVA pensions. A person may be totally dependent on the cheque for his existence. It is only enough for him to get by without any luxuries for a month. If such a person is allowed to cash his cheque early, the next month will be impossible; he will have no money.

I strongly urge the minister to not legalize that practice even if he believes it will eliminate abuses that have occurred in the past. Maintenance cheques should cover only one month. If they happen to arrive a little early one month, they should not be able to be cashed early, so that people will have the maintenance in the month for which it was intended. I strongly urge the minister not to proceed with that particular clause.

I thank hon. members of the House for the extra few minutes I have been permitted.

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to take part in this debate. I want to say, as have other speakers of my party, that we support the principles of this bill and will co-operate with the minister in moving it through the House of Commons and into committee. We will, of course, have a number of questions to ask when it gets into committee. Hopefully, with the co-operation of other members, we will be able to make some improvements.

Having listened to all the speeches so far in this debate, I think it is important that we remember—and it is obvious from looking at it—that this bill was not brought into the House just to go after so-called loan sharks or the hard-core criminal element which deals in lending money to certain people who as some hon. members said, must pay back at 100 per cent or more interest or, in extreme cases, be killed or, in less extreme cases, be beaten up. It is in fairness to the vast majority of honest people in the financial institutions of this country that we say that now.

It is very easy, especially if you listen to what some hon. members have said and what sometimes appears in the media, to come to the conclusion that this bill is designed to wipe out all criminal activity in this country. Clearly, it is not designed to do that. As my friend, the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), said a few minutes ago, it will not do that. Of course it will not.

What is this bill trying to do? No one can expect it to wipe out the hard-core criminal element. It may be helpful in at least making it more difficult for the quasi-criminal loan outlet which is using laundered money to operate rapaciously or unfairly. However, what it is really aimed at is establishing a more reasonable environment within which people in lower income levels or in need of large loans can borrow money with more certainty, knowing the deal they are entering into. That is what this bill is all about.

Some hon. members have pointed out in quite a compelling way that there are problems when unsophisticated borrowers go to finance companies. They have referred to problems when people are in desperate straits through no fault of their own and have to get money very quickly. It is no good telling them they are in no position to borrow. They are in no position to do anything but borrow, unless they steal. That is the dilemma they are in. These people will need money from time to time. There will always be people to whom the wisest advice you could give would be, "Don't borrow any money." They are often the people who desperately need money, and they have to know what the deal is.

Some speakers before me, including the last speaker, suggested that the bill should include a vast counselling service so that everybody who contemplates taking out a loan could receive advice on whether they should be taking such a step and, if so, what would be the best kind of loan to take out. It would be nice if we had the resources in this country to give that kind of counselling to everyone who is likely to borrow. But there are practical difficulties as well as philosophic ones in the way of such a proposal.

The practical difficulties are extraordinary when one considers that in 1950 the amount of consumer credit outstanding was $1.2 billion, representing 10.2 per cent of total personal expenditure in that year, and that by the end of 1974 the figure had risen to $20.6 billion, representing 25.8 per cent of the year's consumer spending. To seriously consider that the bill before us can make provision for a counselling service for the benefit of anybody and everybody who wants to get a loan in this country is, in my view, being unrealistic. I am not at all sure that from a philosophical point of view it is wise to take the attitude that people cannot make their own decisions about their affairs. Moreover, I am not at all sure the people concerned would thank us one bit if we set up an expensive bureaucracy to advise them how to manage their personal financial transactions.

I want to emphasize that the bill is designed to create an atmosphere of fairness and certainty in connection with legitimate dealings within the financial market. It is not designed to wipe out the hard-core criminal or even to wipe out the quasi-criminal. It is important to remember that many people who borrow money do not borrow it from financial institutions. They borrow it from each other. A newly-married couple borrows money from parents-in-law or from relatives. Young people borrow from older friends, and friends borrow from each other.

A large number of people who may in the course of a lifetime make only one or two loans are, nonetheless, within the contemplation of the bill before us. I bring this to the attention of the House so that we might avoid the danger of slipping into the assumption that anybody who makes a loan is in the position of being a powerful financial institution knowing exactly what the ground rules are.

I am glad to see the minister in the House, as he has been throughout most of the debate. I say to him, through you, Mr. Speaker, that the measure is a complex one. We understand the reason for its complexity; it deals with a complex subject. But as I was saying, it will govern lenders who are by no means in the position of being powerful financial institutions in receipt of expert advice. It applies to loans made between families or friends, which form part of the financial arrangements made by a great many people in this country. This being the case, we must look carefully at the details of these provisions to ensure that in seeking to create a climate of greater fairness and certainty we do not impose burdens on innocent lenders or upon innocent borrowers which we did not intend to impose.

I would ask the minister, therefore, to make a note that in committee we ought to look carefully to make sure that the penalty clauses will not rebound against people who, when making loans to their sons-in-law or to their nephews, say, fail to set out all the terms of the loan as required under the legislation. Having been a lawyer myself, and knowing that lawyers have never been the most popular people in the community—we have always come just after that most unpopular person, the moneylender—

An hon. Member: Or politician.

An hon. Member: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Fraser: I would point out to some of my colleagues that they would find themselves in considerable difficulty if they were unable to find any money to borrow when they needed it.

Some hon. Members: Five o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR PERMANENT VOTERS' LIST

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta) moved that Bill C-204, to amend the Canada Elections Act (permanent voters' list), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to be here this afternoon speaking on this problem. I am somewhat out of breath: we were sitting in the committee on justice this afternoon and I was still questioning Mr. Terry at five minutes to five. I shall be very quick. I have notes for a short speech about the benefits which, hopefully, would flow from this bill and I trust hon. members opposite will agree to let it go to committee.

The preparation of a voters' list is one of the most important stages in a general election. The fair and comprehensive compilation of such a list is one aspect of electoral reform to which a great deal of time has been devoted, yet this remains an area of differing opinions. To adequately answer the question as to which system has the least drawbacks and most advantages, we should look at this problem within the framework of some criteria. The first and foremost criterion is the inclusion of the greatest number of names of eligible voters and, conversely, of the least possible number of eneligible voters. The second criterion is the relative cost of preparing the list of voters.

My bill, Mr. Speaker, calls for a continuous, permanent list in which the initiative for registration should lie with the individual. This is not to say that the Crown should not exercise some influence. As is the experience in many American states, unless there is some degree of compulsion or scheme of intensive publicity campaigns, reliance on voter initiative is unlikely to produce a very complete list. What we would have is a combination of systems placing the primary responsibility on the voters to register themselves, and also introducing a considerable measure of follow-up action and publicity by election officials to ensure that the greatest possible number of voters do in fact exercise their right. Two examples of this system would be New Zealand and Great Britain.

It is my feeling that Canadian election campaigns are unduly prolonged, not so much to allow the campaign strategists to exercise their talents but more to allow for an election list to be compiled as accurately as possible in a given time. Surely, Mr. Speaker, a permanent, continuous list would alleviate some of the cumbersome and time-consuming qualities our system now exhibits. A permanent, continuous list would indeed be fair for all parties and allow campaign organizers to have a copy of a list of voters at any given time and allow more time for workers and supporters to canvass prospective voters.

In a study in 1968, the Canadian representation commissioner found that:

> The system of continuous electoral rolls currently in use in the Commonwealth of Australia, including the method of compulsory registration on the part of the electors, can be adapted for use in federal elections in Canada to reduce the time required for the holding of elections and to provide improved facilities for voting by electors—

There have been arguments, Mr. Speaker, that to effectively and adequately institute a continuous, permanent voters' list involves the outlay of a sufficient amount of money. Firstly, this conclusion has been arrived at not out of practice but out of guesswork. Not since 1935, by way of the Dominion Franchise Act of 1934, have we tried a permanent list. By the chief electoral officer's own words, the permanent list was not that disfunctional. Many feel that in order to set up a continuous, permanent voters' list an electoral office must be set up in each constituency. I do not think this is necessary, and in order to cut down the expenses one central office could surely handle compilation of a list that effectively puts the onus on the voter to register himself. Naturally, an annual update of the list would have to occur and then review officers could be sent out to the constituencies to update the list, making deletions and noting changes.

One way, Mr. Speaker, of facilitating the actual registration voters could be by way of incorporating a section on our personal income tax forms. The names and related documentation could easily be handled by the revenue department's computer with considerable ease, thus alleviating some of the paperwork, added confusion and extra expenditures. I am told the cost of conducting the enumeration in the last federal election in 1974 cost $29 million. I think one can question not only the cost but the accuracy of the enumeration and the number of individuals disenfranchised in each election because of haphazard enumeration. A permanent list with yearly updates by way of constituency reviews can surely incorporate the greatest number of eligible voters at any given time. Surely this is what we should be striving for in electoral reform, Mr. Speaker.

Not since 1938, under the Dominion Elections Act, has the process of registering voters changed. I am not saying the permanent list is the answer to all the problems, but I do think this bill should be referred to committee for study. Perhaps there we can carefully and accurately ascertain which system best suits our needs. I do not think it is fair to dismiss the permanent voters' list as expensive. It does hold some redeeming value in the enumerating process, and I think with a carefully constructed combination of primary responsibility on the voter, and exact follow-up action on a yearly basis, we can have a system that will be envied.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make reference to a comparison of the percentage of the total voting age populations which were registered on official voters' lists. The most recent figures I could obtain are from the 1966 census, but I think they will nonetheless explain my point. At that time the voting age was 21 years. The number of voting age population, according to the 1966 census, was 11,260,202. The number of electors on voters' lists for that time was 10,274,-904, a difference of 985,298, all of whom were disenfranchised. I am well aware that those institutionalized or those classified as transients sometimes lose their vote, but a figure close to one million causes me some concern. I have to ask myself how thoroughly our present enumeration is being carried out, and for that reason alone I think this bill should be referred to committee.

Finally, I should just like to say this, Mr. Speaker. In getting the bill into committee, one aspect we will have to examine, and one of the matters we have talked about in the privileges and elections committee last session, is the length of time of elections. We are managing to knock a few days off at times, but the election now going on in the province of Quebec is going to last 28 days. I think that should be the maximum time. A month is more time than we need for an election in the electoral process of this country.

The cost of keeping a permanent voters' list may be more than an enumeration every two, three or four years whenever an election is called. The cost saved to the public purse in cutting down the length of an election would, however, be tremendous. It would also mean that parliament would not have to be in recess for such a long time. Therefore, I hope hon. members on the other side will see fit to send this bill to committee. We did not come up with a final answer last session, but if the bill does go back to committee we may be able to come up with a solution this time which will save the voters of this country another long election, whenever it may be.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the criteria set out by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds). We should evaluate the various systems of preparing electoral rolls in existence in Canada. The two criteria which should be used to evaluate the systems, or which could be used in the registration procedures, would be as follows. The first criterion is the inclusion of the greatest number of names eligible, and the least possible number of ineligible names. The second criterion, of course, is the relative cost of preparing the list of voters.

Always keep in mind, Mr. Speaker, that even with the most perfect list of voters that we could have, it still would not guarantee a good voter turnout. This is the experience in the United States today, where they estimate they might get 50 per cent of the voters out. I am told they do have obligatory and continual permanent voting, if you will, in many of the states, if not all of them, though I do not know whether that is the federal fact. I think we should surely take this into consideration in our discussion of a permanent voters' list and its place in Canadian society.

[Translation]

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us first examine the features of the different voter registration systems. Voter registration has been accepted in western democratic countries as a protection against fraud. It makes possible advance identification of such voters who are really entitled to cast their ballots so that we may be sure that only they will exercise their rights to vote. With this in mind, democratic countries have enacted various legislation providing for voter registration.

[Englishs]

Voter registration systems were gradually adopted in most countries in the latter half of the nineteenth century and arose out of a general need to bring administrative order to the election process. Some countries created systems that placed responsibility for registration on individual voters, but Canada made public authority, not the individual, legally responsible for the burden of voter registration. This distiction between government initiated systems and those which depend on the personal initiative of voters is a fundamental dimension that can be used to characterize voter registration systems.

Let us consider two kinds of government-initiated registration systems. In countries where there is a register of internal migration, a list of eligible voters is generated from information recorded in a general population register. In West Germany, for example, the state maintains a continuous record of important demographic events for each citizen. This record includes birth, death, marriage, divorce and migration. It is the recording of this last event, migration, that makes possible the compilation of an extremely accurate electoral register. Each German citizen must register changes of residence with the local authorities. There is a fine for non-compliance. If the move is between cities, the citizen must notify the officials in both places. All of this information is recorded in a central municipal office. An electoral official examines each new registration to see that that registrant is qualified to vote. If so, the name and credentials are placed in a special file of qualified voters. At the time of an election, the file is used to print lists of qualified voters. Similar systems of automatic registration are used in Sweden and in Switzerland.

I do not know if the Canadian people as a whole would readily accept this kind of documentation of their citizens travelling between cities. I would remind my colleagues that in Canada you can go from coast to coast without registering, so long as you are a citizen, and even if you are not, no one will bother you. I do not know if it is in the nature of a Canadian citizen to accept this kind of documentation with the purpose of finding out where you are and where you are going, all in the name of voter registration, in the name of controlling the movement of citizens. Perhaps it is acceptable in Europe, but I suggest that it would not be totally acceptable to those of us who live in Canada.

[Translation]

The second registration formula initiated by the government is a kind of census carried out by a government agency. This is the case in England and in Canada where there is no mandatory registration and no internal migration. In England a fresh list of electors is drawn every year for each Federal constituency. The municipal clerk sends application forms through the mail to each household in the constituency. The head of the household has the responsibility under the law to list all qualified voters residing with him and mail back the list to the municipal clerk.

[English]

If the response to this direct mail canvass is not satisfactory, the clerk sends door-to-door canvassers to those areas with low response rates. The list developed through the canvass is used for any and all elections held during the year following the end of the canvass and the official closing of the next list on February 15 of the following year. In Canada, a new list of qualified voters is developed prior to each federal election. A complete door-to-door canvass is made in urban areas, which are defined by law as cities of 5,000 or more. In rural areas the lists are made up by registration officials through a door-to-door canvass or other inquiries.

Government-initiated registration systems can be further distinguished by their effectiveness in registering the eligible electorate. I note that the hon. member in his remarks to us in the House referred to the success of a permanent list. I think he should be made aware of the results of the permanent lists which are used in England. Systems of automatic registration obviously are most effective, depending only on the accuracy of the population register. In countries with a compulsory registration system, the electoral list should be virtually a complete accounting of the potential by qualified electorate, minus people in transit at the time of an election. The canvassing techniques used in Canada and England also produce lists which accurately mirror the potential electorate. The Chief Electoral Officer of Canada, who supervises the conduct of federal elections, estimates that for the 1972 election approximately 90 per cent of all eligible voters were registered.

What about the British lists? These are permanent voters' lists. How do they compare with the system currently in use in Canada? We should look at the two so as to compare them. First of all, the British lists are a little less accurate, depending on when an election is held. In Canada, registration is conducted only before each election and the lists are no more than 2½ weeks old by election day. In Britain, registration is done annually and the lists are closed on February 15 of each year. No new registrations are added after the closing date, but people who move after the close of the lists may vote from their former residence in parliamentary elections. This means that elections held toward the end of the 12-month period in which the electoral register is in effect will be conducted under old, and thus more inaccurate, list. An election held in December, for example, would be conducted with a list 9½ months old. Nonetheless, the electoral register still accurately lists approximately 85 per cent of the people living in a constituency even at the end of its one-year life. I suggest that this is nowhere near the 98 per cent which we have currently in Canada.

A study of the accuracy of the 1966 register in England produced the following findings. On the qualifying date, October 10, 1965, they were able to list 96 per cent of all the people who were eligible to vote, not 98 per cent but 96 per cent to begin with. When the register came into force on February 16, 1966, the list was down to an accuracy of 93 per cent. Halfway through the life of the register in August, 1966, it was down to 89 per cent and, as I mentioned before, at the end of the life of the register on February 15, 1967, it was down to 85 per cent. I suggest that this is not acceptable when we can get more up-to-date lists.

Registration systems in which the burden for initiating registration lies with the individual citizen appear to be limited to the United States, as I mentioned earlier, to the province of British Columbia where the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta comes from, to France, and to a few Latin American countries.

Who is to be entrusted with the gathering of all this information, always keeping in mind that here in Canada at least we have government-initiated programs where the government is the authority which gets this information, not the individual? We know that the returning officers appoint two enumerators in each urban polling division. These enumerators are chosen from lists supplied by the two candidates who have received the highest number of votes in the preceding election. This bipartisan feature is intended to serve as a check against attempts to falsify the registration lists. The enumerators are paid a flat fee of $35, plus an addition of ten cents for each name added to the list. Most enumerators earn between $50 and $60.

As to the method of gathering information, the enumerators must visit each dwelling place in the polling division. If there is no one at home on their first visit, they must leave a card stating the date and time they will call again. If there are two visits, one must occur between 9 a.m. and 6 p.m. and the other between 7 p.m. and 10 p.m. For each person enumerated they must leave a form notifying the individual that he or she will be included on the list of eligible voters.

So here we have a counter check by which to make sure that the people who are directly involved in the voting process will know not only that they are eligible but that they are on the list, so that on election day they will be able to take part in the democratic process. In Canada the information obtained by the enumerators includes only name, address and occupation. I would point out, again, that at least to me this information about internal migration in our country is just not acceptable. No signature is obtained from the elector, nor can enumerators demand identification such as a driver's licence, birth certificate and the like.

It is possible for aliens such as United States citizens or citizens from any other country living in Canada to appear on the enumerator's list. They are not required to obtain information directly from each eligible voter but many obtain it from other sources such as members of the family. The printed list sent to candidates and voters serves a number of purposes. It is primarily a device for ensuring accuracy. People listed incorrectly can have corrections made at a later revising period. At the same time, those voters such as resident aliens listed improperly may be challenged, and those left off the list may be added.

Since the list is so widely available and a common object of public knowledge, it is believed there is little opportunity for fraudulent registrations. The printed lists also serve an important information function, noting the times and locations for revising the lists, procedures for challenges and corrections, information about advance polling and the location of polling places. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta mentioned that in Canada a new list is prepared for each federal election. Indeed it is. The lists are used for that election only and then discarded. This system has been in use since 1920 with the exception of the 1935 general election when permanent lists were used.

[Mr. Parent.]

This was repealed in 1938, allegedly because of the excessive cost and the inaccuracy of the voters' lists obtained. I refer to the criteria, once again, which the hon. member has raised. Let us evaluate the various systems for preparing electoral rolls in existence in Canada. Two criteria, as was mentioned, would be used to evaluate the registration procedures. The first criterion is the inclusion of the greatest number of names of eligible voters, and the least possible number of the ineligible.

The second criterion is the relative cost of preparing the list of voters. From the first criterion, which is that of the quantity of names of eligible votes included, and the accuracy of the list, it seems a system of continuous lists with compulsory registration by voters is the best system. Yet the only continuous list in existence in Canada, which is the British Columbia system, does not require compulsory registration. Experience in many American states indicates that unless there is some degree of compulsion, or a scheme of intensive publicity campaigns, reliance on voter initiative is unlikely to produce a very complete list.

Now I should like to quote from the same source as the hon. member. In his report on Methods of Registration of Electors and Absentee Voting (1968), the representation commissioner of Canada commented on the problems of a system employing voluntary registration as the sole method of updating the rolls. He said:

> Because of the general apathy with which electors view registration, few avail themselves of the opportunity to register or correct existing registration either by personal attendance before, or by mailing the prescribed forms to, a registrar, in the period between elections.
> When a general election is imminent and during the short period of time between the date an election is called and polling day, there is an impetus for some electors to register. However, such a last minute rush tends to cause the system to break down under its own weight. It is impossible to deal adequately with a large number of new registrations at a date so close to polling day.

It is too soon to make a judgment on the system of a permanent list drawn up by enumeration established by Quebec and Prince Edward Island. Generally speaking, the free election enumeration procedure in effect in Canada and in most provinces has been satisfactory. This system produces what is surely the most up-to-date list of voters possible. The main source of error on the list is not so much the omission of the eligible as the inclusion of the ineligible, especially the non-citizens.

With regard to the second criterion, which is that of the cost of making the lists, it is the temporary list system that is the least costly. If I may quote the figures of the hon. member, he said that the cost in 1974 was $29 million. I ask myself and I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and other members of this House what would be the cost of permanent, ongoing lists if they were more than the $29 million which has been quoted?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Parent: The cost of the continuous list system with compulsory registration has been assessed by the representation commissioner in his report as being very high. He concludes:

> However, it is my belief that the adoption of such a system would prove to be very costly. The setting up of a permanent office in each electoral district, the recruitment of a great many permanent and casual employees, and an annual house to house canvass by review officers in order to purge and up date the existing lists of electors would be the major items of expense.

Likewise, the system of an annual enumeration in Quebec is very costly. The cost in Quebec is estimated to be $3 million a year. I must hasten to point out that lists of electors in Quebec are placed at the disposal of school boards and municipalities for electoral purposes throughout the province. This reduces the cost of elections for these institutions. The list is also used for drawing up jury lists. In conclusion, I ask what the cost will be and, indeed, how much more effective, if at all, permanent voters' lists will be.

● (1730)

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in spite of the attempt of the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Parent) to demolish this bill, I still rise to support it. Indeed, as I was listening to the hon. member, I was wondering what he would do with that speech if the government he supports were to turn around and bring in a permanent voters' list.

Mr. Parent: I'd revise it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is one of the most honest interjections I have ever heard from the government side of the House.

Mr. Parent: I didn't say how; I just said I would.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He is right. He would either have to revise it, or the words he would have to eat would give him indigestion from head to toe!

I commend the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) for bringing in this bill and also for addressing himself to what I think is the only serious question which applies to it, namely, the question of cost. I do not think there is any doubt that it would be a costly proposition to have a permanent voters' list, although as the hon. member pointed out, if it could result in election campaigns being much shorter than they are now, then the amount of money we could save, not just from the public purse but across the board, would be tremendous.

Let me get back to the hon. member for St. Catharines. He is a young member and a young man, but he is a debater of the old school. The thing I enjoyed was the way he took the simple request of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta that there be a permanent voters' list and developed it into almost a Nazi type of registration of people with respect to everything they are going to do. He had my friend's permanent voters' list completely wiping out freedom of movement and all the other freedoms we enjoy in Canada. It was really tremendous. As a debating effort it would sound tremendous in any high school debate on this subject.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Goodale: That is what the Tories did to Bill C-83.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): However, we are not talking about a system of limiting people's movement from one part of the country to the other. We are not talking about a registration of everything which goes on in the private lives of our citizens. We are talking about one thing only, a permanent voters' list, so that it can be more correct than the lists which are made up during election periods and so that an election campaign can be conducted in a much shorter period than is now the case.

I think the arguments are all in favour of it, and if one examines the studies of the matter which have been made it will be found that in principle those studies come down on the side of a permanent voters' list, the only problem being cost. There are many things in this country which are costly, but we decide that we want them and that they are worth the cost. I think it would be worth a few extra dollars to have a permanent voters' list, and I hope, despite the tradition around here as to what happens to private members' bills, that the subject matter of this one might yet get to the committee. Toward that end I hereby abbreviate my remarks and indicate my support for the bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to make a remark before going any further in this speech since the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Parent) mentioned that it would cost too much. I would simply like to point out to him that this government is spending astronomical amounts every day to deport large numbers of immigrants whom we do not want to keep here. So when talking about the cost, one should perhaps check all departments.

Coming back to the permanent voters list, Mr. Speaker, may I first say that I am doubly happy to support my colleague because in 1974 I had indeed prepared a rather comprehensive paper advocating the establishment of such a list. First it would allow a lot of people to vote, particularly when an election takes place during the summer—for example, on July 8, 1974. How many people were deprived of their right to vote simply because they were away on holiday when all of a sudden the election was called.

The enumeration and the revision take place, and people are deprived of their basic right. It is not a matter of telling someone that he has to go and vote; but for the one who wants to vote and has his right taken away from him in that manner there comes a time when we have to make up our minds to find the necessary means to allow those people to go cast their ballot. There are many other things in such system that could result in other people being able to vote in their place.

In any case, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to dwell on the subject. I hope the House can at least allow this bill to go to the appropriate committee. I want to assure my colleagues on both sides of the House if they want I will send them all the documentation to know how a permanent voters' list could be put together in this country. I have it in both official languages. I will be pleased to have copies made of it and distributed.

I remember the case of a lady of almost 90 years of age;—not at the time of the 1975 by-elections because at that time those things did not happen—she cried because her name had been left out in the list when the enumerator had gone around. When the list was revised and the error was noticed, it was too late to do anything about it. There again, there have been many cases of injustice.

There is a form bearing No. 7 and entitled "Enumerators' Notice to Elector". A candidate never knows how many of those forms are in the possession of the returning officer. The social insurance number is not even indicated on those forms. How can there be any control? Not that I want to cast any doubt on the integrity of the returning officers, but the fact remains that there are always a few dishonest people who manage to get those documents and make counterfeits. I can assure you that there are many ways to get votes and win an election dishonestly.

A permanent voters' list would, finally and once and for all, enable us to have honest elections in Canada. And, I am convinced of it, when my colleagues read the document I will send them, they will see that the truth exists and that facts prove it.

Of course, when we talk about a permanent list, in my opinion and according to the working paper that I have here, it is out of the question to have a yearly registration. It is also out of the question to change everything completely. Certain people do not want to register because they do not want to be checked upon, like the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Parent) said so well. Of course, they are not being checked upon. If you move and go from one province to another, your health insurance card and other proofs of identity follow you.

I think that we must eliminate this fear factor. These papers could easily include a voter card. I have heard people talk for many years. I have heard so-called experts talk about voter cards and permanent lists, but no sincere person ever dared submit something concrete. I am not saying that it is perfect. I am not saying that it is 100 per cent. But if it can help my colleagues, we should at least accept that this bill be referred to the appropriate authority, and then, in the light of suggestions from all sides of the House and of this working paper, Parliament would be able to decide whether we should adopt a permanent voters list in Canada and how it should be done. It is important to know this. But for the moment, it is important to know whether the House will at least accept to study the bill submitted by my colleague. I shall come back to this point at a later date if the bill reaches second reading, and I hope it will.

[Mr. Lavoie.]

[English]

Mr. Jack Pearsall (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with mixed feelings to the speeches this evening on a subject in which I have been involved for many, many years and I should like to comment on some of the remarks that have been made. I hope that I can straighten out a few facts as well.

It is ten years since I was first summoned to Ottawa and during my time here parliament appointed me returning officer for the riding I now represent.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pearsall: Between 1966 and 1972 I participated in two federal elections as returning officer for that riding. During my training course one of the questions I put to the Chief Electoral Officer was on whether there had been any discussion about a permanent voters' list. He replied that it had been raised many times that a number of private bills had been introduced, and died on the order paper. I have been given to understand that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked the same question on his first day in the House and perhaps he could confirm that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I did a long time ago, but that was not my first question. My first question was about unemployment.

Mr. Pearsall: Perhaps the two countries which best illustrate the use of the permanent voters' list are Australia and New Zealand. There is also West Germany. In Australia, however, there is the additional factor of a penalty for those who fail to vote. I think hon. members will recall that through many elections in Australia, as in Canada, one party stays in for very long periods of time. Indeed before the last Australian general election the Governor General saw fit to remove the prime minister from office. He then dissolved parliament and called another election.

In Australia the permanent voters' list is revised at a specific time—it is like bringing in your car to be tuned; voters get tuned at certain times of the year. In the instance I have cited the election came six months too soon and, as a result, many Australians were disfranchised. This points out the weakness of the system, Mr. Speaker; to be effective it should be kept up almost on a monthly basis.

One of the most ideal countries in the world for the operation of a permanent voters' list would be the United States. It is ironic that we should be discussing this today when they are in the throes of an election. Every four years in the United States there is a presidential election. Even if a president should die during his term, or be removed from office, the vice president carries on until the term expires. It happens quite frequently in that country that the elected President and the Senate and House of Representatives are of the opposite parties. I think the last time the president was of the same party as the house was during President Johnson's term. The United States is one of the few countries in the world that could use a permanent voters' list on a federal basis. Some hon. members have stated that there is a permanent voters' list in the United States, but I would point out that it does not apply to all states; there are two or three states with no such system.

It has been mentioned already that Canada tried this system in July, 1934. But in the 1935 election very few people came out to vote, using the normal procedures. In the end many of the members who were elected on that occasion had to go out and find the people and get them registered because there was no proper system. As the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Parent) pointed out, the arrangement had to be abandoned.

Some hon. members have touched on the question of costs. The hon. member for St. Catharines hedged on the costs of the 1974 election and the possible cost of the next one. But, Mr. Speaker, I do not mind putting a figure on it. It will be anywhere from $30 million to $32 million. As the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) suggested, by reducing the election period from 60 days to 47 days, $2 million could be saved. But here we are playing around with $4 million to $6 million for a permanent voters list.

It is also likely that an additional 1,200 to 1,300 civil servants would be required to keep a permanent voters list up to date. If we want to hold costs down we must think of these things.

The hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Lavoie) referred to the problem of people being missed by enumerators. A permanent voters list would correct that problem.

I would like to ask the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to join with me in trying to find a way to take care of the absentee vote which is something we do not have in the present Federal Elections Act. The matter of the proxy vote was brought up some years ago by a former member for Coast Chilcotin, Mr. Paul St. Pierre. I do not mind saying that I assisted him as a returning officer and helped him to prepare the proposal. It was milked down considerably in committee. When the matter came before the House of Commons for a vote, it was not in the form I had anticipated. The proxy vote has its weaknesses. It has been abused in two elections. I came across a number of abuses in the 1972 election, and I know there were abuses in the 1974 election.

● (1750)

Hon. members should know that any permanent voters' list would involve high expenses. We ought to be most concerned about those who must be away from home, who are travelling or on holiday and, under the present Canada Elections Act, are denied the privilege of voting, and not so greatly concerned about a permanent voters list.

Let me touch on something else. We spoke of enumerators, but now I raise the matter of participation. We all know what it means, especially when we run political campaigns. Instead of being concerned about a permanent voters' list, it would be better if people would take a greater interest in the political process. I would hope that as many Canadians as possible would participate in any general election, would think highly of those who are elected, and take a great interest in individual candidates.

It is possible that if you do away with enumeration and the enumeration system you will take many hundreds of people out of circulation. The hon. member for Hochelaga touched on various subjects and talked about voters' lists. During my six years as a returning officer I knew of no instance of any returning officer anywhere in Canada being involved in underhand dealings involving voters' lists and wrongfully giving out information pertinent to the electoral process. I want to make that point clear because it is possible that allegations of bad dealing have been made by some who could not back up their statements.

As a former electoral officer I have great respect for my former chief, the Chief Electoral Officer, and for all my other colleagues who worked with me during that period.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pearsall: I have been touching areas I had not expected to touch on, Mr. Speaker. I should like to wind up my comments by bringing forward a fact or two. If we introduce any permanent voters list we should need to use some sort of computer system; I do not know if one would be handy or if we could borrow one from some department of government. I have visions of the Chief Electoral Officer being forced to double, even triple his staff here in Ottawa alone if there is to be installed a computer system which will handle everything necessary for making up a permanent voters' list. Frankly I do not think the people of Canada want this. The load put on the Chief Electoral Officer would be enormous, so great that almost a brand new office would be created in the process.

What worries me most is that if we are to establish a permanent voters list—and I have heard few suggestions as to how this is to be done—the Canada Elections Act would become a thing of the past. Mr. Speaker, many years of hard work have gone into the formulation of the act. Members of this House have contributed to it. Hon. members have suggested amendments which are now included in the act and govern the way we conduct our elections.

I can tell hon. members that in the eyes of other countries, Canada's electoral system, based on our present system of enumerating in federal elections, is one of the finest in the world. Other countries look up to us for the way in which we do these things. We are in constant touch with the elector and are involving Canadians in the job they have to do.

I have spoken much too long, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Please continue.

Mr. Pearsall: I will, if hon. members wish me to continue. I wish to touch on some other points which I think should be brought forward.

An hon. Member: Brisco wants to speak for a couple of minutes.

Mr. Pearsall: I know of the hon. member.

Mr. Brisco: Then why don't you sit down and let me have a crack at speaking?

Mr. Pearsall: Mr. Speaker, this afternoon's discussion does not involve just one side of the House. I have before me, in printed form, the comments of hon. members opposite, of all three parties; they participated in discussions on this subject before the privileges and elections committee during the previous session of parliament. It is most interesting to read some of those comments. One hon. member learned a number of years ago, when touring with the committee, just how good the Canadian electoral system is. He was told in Puerto Rico that, "We respect the Canadian system for the holding of elections." This story was told by an NDP member; I do not think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will object if I reveal that the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) mentioned this in committee. He has always been an active member of the committee.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question.

Mr. Pearsall: I am coming to the final part of my remarks. I emphasize, as has been said, that at election time we deal with people. It is all very well to have a permanent voters' list. You can have 21 million or X number on your voters' list; but that is not what counts. What counts is the people who turn out to vote. It does not matter how many are on the list; what matters is how many people become involved in the actual election. That is why our system is so good. The enumerator reminds people they have a job to do, that they must come forward and play their part in the election. Let us not forget that the ballot in Canada is still secret. We are very fortunate in being able to step forward and cast our vote in secret. It is a privilege. I particularly wanted to make that point.

Let me deal with another point which may not have been mentioned. Statistics for the years 1965 to 1971 show that 50 per cent of the people of Canada tend to change their residences within a certain period. We are somewhat nomadic. I understand the figure recently rose to 70 per cent, and the most recent figure may even approach 75 per cent. Our people are not just confinned to Canada, Mr. Speaker; we are to be found all over the world. We are travelling, as never before—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Pearsall: Mr. Speaker, I was hoping to finish my sentence—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

[Translation]

It being six o'clock, the hour appointed for consideration of private members' business has expired. I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BORROWERS AND DEPOSITORS PROTECTION ACT

MEASURE TO REGULATE INTEREST ON JUDGMENT DEBTS AND AMEND CERTAIN STATUTES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott that Bill C-16, to provide for the protection of borrowers and depositors, to regulate interest on judgment debts, to repeal the Interest Act, the Pawnbrokers Act and the Small Loans Act and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, before the dinner adjournment, as a result of a moment of enthusiasm on the part of some of my colleagues, I was interrupted. One of the consequences of that is that it compels hon. members to hear again what I was saying at the end of my remarks before private members' hour began.

In response to what some hon. members have said throughout the debate so far, keeping in mind that sometimes, perhaps out of thoughtlessness, the thrust of the remarks has almost been an attack on all those who are in lending institutions in this country, and in the financial part of our commercial world, I was pointing out that, next to lawyers, money lenders over the centuries, as literature shows us, have been most unpopular.

An hon. Member: Just speak for yourself.

Mr. Fraser: That remark was made before the dinner hour. You will have to come up with some new ones now.

The point I am making in all seriousness is that in the commercial world in which we live, and in the economic system which we have, there are legitimate lenders and there are legitimate borrowers. Our particular economic system would probably be in severe difficulty if we reverted to the narrow concepts of the Middle Ages and referred to all those who are in lending institutions or who loan money, whether it be privately in terms of their private friendships or family relationships, or in the commercial world, as a group within the community that are worthy to be the subject of vituperation and attack by either the media, members of parliament, other politicians, or frustrated or antagonistic members of the public. I want to emphasize that almost all of us at one time or another have to borrow money.

I want to re-emphasize the point that I made before the dinner hour. It is my view that this bill, despite a great deal of talk about loan-sharking and some talk about the criminal element in the country, is not likely to do very much to cure crime in Canada. The real purpose of the bill, as I see it, is to bring about an environment of certainty so that those who do borrow and those who lend clearly understand the arrangement and the deal.

I have a great deal of sympathy, especially with those in a low income position, who often do not have the business experience or sophistication in commercial matters to be able to judge competently when and under what circumstances they should enter into a particular loan transaction.

● (2010)

I said before the dinner hour that one of the suggestions made during the debate was that we should establish, at public expense, agencies which would advise all those who borrowed so that they would not make mistakes. This is probably impracticable because of the amount of borrowing which takes place in this country. I also pointed out that one must consider the philosophic implications of such a course, one which might involve the protection of the public to such an extent that it was difficult for them to exercise any free choice at all; I doubt very much whether the public would thank us for setting up a bureaucracy which, in the end, might be an important factor in determining not only where people could best borrow but whether, in the circumstances, they ought to borrow at all.

It very often happens, in my experience, that when they have no choice but to borrow, people in receipt of low incomes have the determination and capacity to pay back their loans over a long period of time. It is essential though that the environment in which arrangements are made are such that those who borrow know precisely what they are borrowing and what the cost will be.

In his speech, as I also mentioned, the minister commented on the nature of the sanctions imposed against those who offend against the provisions of the bill. These are severe. If I remember correctly, the fine goes up to $10,000, and imprisonment to five years. During yesterday's debate there was some discussion among certain hon. members in the course of which it was suggested that there might not be a jail in the country now which could keep anybody for five years. I know this is not the concern of the minister who is in charge of this bill but it is certainly a matter of concern to some of his colleagues, and to the general public. In any event I did point out that in considering these criminal sanctions we have to bear in mind that there are many people who are not part of any powerful financial institution, and who are not lending as a business, but who occasionally make loans to friends and relatives. These people too will have to pay attention to the law and bear in mind the complexity of its provisions, a situation which could lead to some obvious injustices, and results which no hon. member would desire. In this regard I would draw attention to clause 37 of the bill in which offences are dealt with.

We ought to be very careful when we introduce what amounts to criminal legislation in statutes which are outside the Criminal Code. One of the cardinal rules of British criminal justice is that before a person can be found guilty of a criminal offence there must have been intent, or, in the words of the Latin scholars, mens rea. In other words, the person concerned must have had the intention of acting contrary to the law. Well, clause 37(1) reads as follows:

> Any person who (a) stipulates for, demands, exacts or collects from a borrower a credit charge in respect of a lending transaction at a credit charge rate that exceeds the rate prescribed by the regulations for the purposes of this paragraph that was in effect on the day the transaction was entered into . . . is guilty of an offence and liable . . .

—liable to a fine or to imprisonment, or to both. I would point out there is nothing in this clause which requires intent to do wrong.

The minister is again with us this evening and I say to him once again that this aspect of the legislation should be considered seriously because many people who may make one loan in their whole lifetime to a son-in-law, niece or daughter, or to some other relative, will be caught by the provisions of the act and they could easily stumble into the most innocent mistakes having regard to the complexity of the measure. I believe all of us should be deeply concerned that we do not frame the sanctions in such a way as to bring fines and impose penalties for an innocent mistake on the part of someone who did not knowingly commit any offence, penalties which are not really related to any crime at all. I note, in this regard, that in the offences section, 37(b), the draftsman has gone back to the concept of fault because he says: "Any person who for the purpose of avoiding compliance with this act or the regulations . . ." and so on. Here we are looking at something in the proper criminal sense and, of course, I have no objection to that.

On the question of the criminal aspects of the bill I would say there are about 44 clauses in it, and in about 20 of them the law will not be clear until we see the regulations which the minister proposes to promulgate at some future time. It does not take much imagination or understanding to realize that when we get into a bill which has criminal overtones and, in some cases, substantive criminal provisions, it is extremely dangerous to be passing criminal legislation in a measure which is outside the Code and where delineation of offences depends upon regulations to be passed at some future date, regulations which might well have to be changed from time to time depending upon circumstances. I raise this point not as an attack upon the bill per se but as one it would be appropriate to consider when we get into committee.

Mr. Abbott: I should like to ask the hon. member a question. When he refers to 20 instances in which regulations would have to be passed he is surely not suggesting that there are 20 occasions on which offences would be prescribed?

Mr. Fraser: No, Mr. Speaker, I said that out of 44 clauses there are 20 which would require regulations and that some of those regulations will establish a situation which requires those affected by them to act in a certain way, breach of which would result in the commission of criminal offences under the act. From a question the minister was asked it does appear he is quite aware of the problem, and I am sure we will have his sympathy in committee.

I notice that in an early burst of honesty in his speech yesterday the minister said this legislation is long overdue. That, of course, is no argument for passing this bill in its present form. However, it is a reminder to all hon. members that the government party has been in power since 1963 and that for some reason legislation along these lines has not been introduced until now.

Before the dinner adjournment I gave some statistics showing the changing amount of credit in the commercial world in Canada. The minister made reference to another reason for bringing in the bill, and that was that the criminal or near criminal elements have, in the minister's opinion, been taking advantage of the law as it is now and as it will remain unless this bill changes it. I think it is very important that during committee hearings we have the widest ranging evidence possible on this particular aspect that the minister claims is of concern to him, as I am sure it is, as well as other matters.

The bill reaches into what is essentially a very complex part of the economic community and will have effects that probably will not become clear, in some cases, unless the people intimately connected with the day to day workings of the commercial, financial, and lending world are brought before the committee. It is my hope that the committee, with the minister's concurrence, will be generous in the matter of bringing before it the witnesses that are required. I see that the minister is nodding to indicate what seems to be, at least at this moment, general approval.

The minister and others on the government side, in the speeches which have been made so far, have said quite a lot by way of reinforcing their assumption that this bill is completely constitutional and lies entirely within the ambit of federal jurisdiction under the British North America Act. It may, Mr. Speaker, but then again it may not. Speakers for the government have emphasized that it is, Mr. Speaker, but I would draw to the minister's attention the fact that clause 8 of the bill seems, at least on the surface, to be in conflict with section 2 of the Ontario legislation, which is the unconscionable transactions relief act. If I remember correctly, there has been litigation on that particular statute but it has been found to be valid provincial legislation. While it is one thing to say that this bill deals with interest—although there are new words for that in the bill—and that it is clearly within federal jurisdiction, I point out the bill also deals with contracts and with the question of property and civil rights, so I put forward the caveat that this bill require some careful consideration in committee.

Clause 8 of the bill deals with the method by which the court, upon application by a borrower, determines whether or not a particular lending transaction is one for which the credit charge is warranted. In the drafting of this particular provision the court is directed to look at five particular considerations in determining whether or not the credit charge rate is warranted. This kind of legislation is unusual for what amounts to establishing what can be a criminal offence. It does not go unnoticed that they are closed categories in that the court cannot look beyond them to something else.

I bring to the minister's attention the fact that in an ordinary real estate transaction in which there is the transfer of a deed to real property and a mortgage back, especially from a private vendor to a private purchaser, often the interest rate and terms of repayment are a factor of price. I would also say to the minister that such is the case with agreements for sale of land in some provinces, certainly in the province of British Columbia. I would ask the minister to consider that question as it will be raised in committee. Our concern here, of course, is that we must be careful not to draft legislation that restricts the court from considering every aspect that should be taken into consideration in establishing what is proper and fair.

In his speech yesterday the minister said that the object of this whole exercise, among other things was:

> —to require a full, uniform and comprehensible disclosure system so that the consumer, before he enters into a deposit or borrowing transaction, will know all his rights and the obligations he will have to bear.

I think that, more than anything else, is the thrust of this legislation. However, I point out to the minister that out of 44 clauses we seem to have 20 cases that will require regulation in order to clarify the meaning of the legislation. I hope that during committee hearings the minister will agree with us that some of what he plans to place in the regulations would be appropriate to place in sections of the statute.

In his speech yesterday the minister also illustrated the effect of different interest rates on loans which apparently have the same face value. The minister took a number of examples. On a $4,000 loan with a declared rate of 12 per cent per annum, depending on deductions from the loan for various charges and other things, you could end up, Mr. Speaker, with a different interest rate. This illustration appears at page 635 of Hansard.

As his first example the minister took a loan of $4,000 with no deductions. At the end of three years the borrower would pay $4,782.96, an effective interest rate of 12.68 per cent per annum. Then the minister illustrated higher deductions from the borrowed amount. In one case there was a deduction of $50 for insurance and registration. In other case it was $250 for registration, insurance and legal fees. In yet another case it was $650 for life insurance, registration, legal fees, finder's fee and bonus.

● (2030)

Keeping away entirely from the aspect of provincial registration fees and other things over which a particular lender has no control, the fact of the matter is that when you get items which are deducted, such as the cost of life insurance and other things, those are of clear advantage to the borrower and it makes the example which the minister put forward a little dubious because, after all, if somebody is using part of the borrowed money to take an advantage, then of course it is going to change the interest rate on the balance outstanding after the advantage deducted has worked to the benefit of the borrower. That is something that should be taken into consideration just so as to keep everything here in perspective.

The minister said the following in his speech yesterday, as reported at page 636 of Hansard:

> Following passage of this bill, it will be our intention to mount a comprehensive program to assist low income borrowers in the marketplace.

I do not know quite what the minister has in mind, and I think that while that does not seem to be an aspect of the provisions of the bill, it seems to be a statement of intention on the part of the minister relating to what will be government policy in his own department.

I think that before the debate is over it would be appropriate if speakers on behalf of the government enlarged a little on the bill at second reading to let us know what the government has in mind because those words can be innocuous enough until we start to find out, as we may well do, that the comprehensive program to assist low income borrowers in the market place may indeed be the structure of a whole new bureaucracy. We have no idea what this involves, and while I think that many of us have some understanding of some of the problems that the minister is concerned about in this bill, we have considerable sympathy for trying as much as is reasonable and possible to educate people not to make foolish mistakes in entering into long obligations. Nonetheless it is important that we know exactly what the minister has in mind. It may well be—I can only say this in speculation—that his department already has decided that if this bill becomes law it will be necessary to have a very extensive and quite possibly expensive counselling service across the country so that people can cope with the bill. If that indeed is the result that the minister foresees, then the bill will have to be looked at most carefully, and I invite the minister to consult with some of his colleagues and let us know before this debate is over just exactly what he has in mind.

I want to emphasize again that this party supports this bill in principle. I think that in the remarks which all hon. members have heard from members on this side of the House concern has been expressed that the bill be efficient, effective, fair and that it works. In this spirit may I say that I hope that some of the comments that I have made tonight will be considered by my colleagues on all sides of the House, and I look forward to working with all our colleagues in committee as this bill is given more careful and appropriate examination.

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the previous speaker, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser), for his usual fair and intelligent if somewhat lengthy approach to this particular subject.

Mr. Fraser: It takes time to make sense.

Mr. Philbrook: Even more so I wish to congratulate the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Abbott), as well as his two predecessors, for a highly successful effort in drafting a piece of legislation which offers such comprehensive protection to the Canadian consumer in search of financial assistance. It has been some time now since this legislation was first proposed to us, but I think the end result has fully justified the wait. It is clear that no effort was spared to obtain the views and assistance of experts in this field—from police authorities, to lending institutions, to the borrowers themselves. Under this legislation the borrower will be provided with the best possible protection, but at the same time without any interference in normal, legitimate financing practices.

It has been noted already in this debate that outstanding consumer credit went from $835 million in 1948 to $8.6 billion in 1967, and amounted to almost $24 billion in 1974. As this has been going on there has also been a concomitant rise in interest rates. This is as it should be; the laws of supply and demand call for it. This legislation is very timely, therefore, because as more and more people borrow money they must have an assurance that the laws of supply and demand work with them rather than against them.

Borrowers are usually very vulnerable people and are easily taken advantage of by unscrupulous lenders. The normal relationships between supply and demand can tend to be distorted therefore when a borrower needs a lender more than the lender needs the borrower. Thus every precaution must be taken to help maintain an equitable balance between these two parties. The borrowers and depositors protection bill does just that.

On the one hand this legislation provides straightforward legal sanctions against usurers and loansharks who prey on people who are often desperately short of money. On the other hand it enables the consumer to protect himself, by providing greater access to information regarding any such financial transaction. Together these dual roles will maintain the crucial balance which permits the relationship between supply and demand to work most efficiently and equitably.

I believe these two functions are of equal importance to the effectiveness of the legislation. I shall leave it to others to expand on the merits of the latter, concerning increased availability of information to the borrower. Instead I wish to focus my discussion on the specific means proposed to do away with one of the most despicable practices of our society.

This legislation is intended to replace the present concept of fixed ceilings on interest rates with three distinct rate categories: normal or "legitimate" rates; "unwarranted" rates; and "criminal" rates.

Presently the vicious business of loan sharking is, in a sense, indistinguishable from the more subtle practices of "expensive" lending firms or the entirely legitimate terms of a reputable financial institution. All are equally legal under today's inadequate usury laws—at least in so far as their monetary transactions are concerned. While the Small Loans Act, for example, sets a maximum interest rate of 24 per cent per year on loans of less than $1,500, the lender can charge any interest he wants, no matter how exorbitant, on loans above $1,500. Moreover, even when violators of the Small Loans Act are caught, the fines are too small—compared to the usual yield of the loans themselves—to provide any kind of deterrent.

The borrowers and depositors protection bill rectifies this incongruous situation through its differential rate structure. By establishing an "unwarranted" rate category, this legislation draws a clear distinction between legitimate interest rates on personal loans as determined in a competitive market and rates which are unnecessarily high. As the minister has explained, the "unwarranted" rate enables the borrower to take recourse against credit terms which cannot be justified by the nature of the risk involved—as in the case of especially low-risk loans—or by prevailing market conditions.

The "criminal" rate category, meanwhile, is directed specifically at loansharks and userers who run clandestine operations and who charge far more exorbitant rates than even those in the unwarranted category. Conviction for this type of offence would incur a realistically stiff penalty of up to $10,000, and two years in jail under the proposed legislation.

It has been the contention of some members of the opposition that, even with a criminal rate, the borrower is still not given adequate protection because the rate shall be set too high. To make such a claim is to ignore the need for flexibility in setting interest rates according to appropriate criteria, such as risk and duration, and to display a serious misunderstanding of the intention of the legislation as a whole. It is not a set of artificially conceived interest rates divorced from the realities of the market place, but a comprehensive, integrated program designed to bring social and economic priorities into balance. Caution must be taken not to let the criminal rate interfere with legitimately high rates. The range of legitimate rates will be made evident from the combined factors of full disclosure at the time a loan is made, the unwarranted rate range, and the new provisions for penalty-free prepayment on outstanding debts.

May I dwell for a moment, Mr. Speaker, on this last factor, the prepayment of loans? Quite simply, this provision will allow a borrower to repay any non-mortgage loan, in part or in full, before the allotted time has expired, without having to pay a penalty. This means that the borrower will only have to pay for funds for as long as he borrowed them. Here again the internal logic of the market place is reinforced as the borrower is released from unrealistic constraints and is allowed to move freely from one lender to another whenever and wherever more favourable rates can be found. This will have the inevitable effect of making the cost of borrowed money more elastic and will force lenders to police themselves so that they may keep rates down to competitive levels.

There is yet another major innovation provided in this bill which is designed to bolster the borrower's bargaining position and, thereby, provide him with more effective means to protect himself. This is the reversal of the present principle that the burden of proof rests with the borrower in loan disputes. Instead this bill would place the onus on the lender to prove that his interest charges were not unreasonable. In this fashion we can expect borrowers, who until now have had to fear reprisals and legal fees, to stand up and expose the usurers at whose mercy they have been for too long.

Once again, the net results can be none other than increased self-control by the lender and more reasonable rates for the borrower. With an estimated annual return of about $3 billion, loansharking has become the second largest source of income for organized crime after drug trafficking. Because the loan shark tends to prey on the poor, however, few of us realize just how big a big business it really is.

Let us look at some more startling statistics. According to revelations made at the Quebec inquiry into organized crime, 1,496 counts of shylocking were made under provincial laws and the small business loans regulations in 1973. This amounted to $3.5 million in loans and, according to inquiry officials, approximately $35 million in profits. Most startling of all, this amount was accumulated by only the 29 people who happened to be brought to justice, representing somewhere between 1 per cent and 5 per cent of the estimated total number of loan sharks operating within the Montreal area alone. This is not a very good conviction rate.

Perhaps even more dangerous to society as a whole than loansharking itself is the fact that it fosters and provokes many other forms of crime. People victimized by loan sharks can themselves be driven into criminal activity. When a borrower is terrorized with violence for defaulting on payments, he or she often chooses to push drugs, or counterfeit money, rob, or turn to prostitution; anything becomes preferable to dismemberment or death.

Along the same lines, loan sharks are a common source of funds needed for illicit purposes, such as the purchase of stolen or illegal goods, which a reputable lender would never provide. It is quite evident therefore that the effects of loansharking go well beyond the crimes perpetrated by the loan shark himself.

Just this morning on the front page of the Globe and Mail I noticed an article which speculates about the growth of yet another crime syndicate, this one in the Toronto-Hamilton area—my area where I am aware of certain concerns. What is one of their main activities? Loansharking. What are some of the consequences reported? Three deaths, an OHIP swindle amounting to about $150,000 and, most frightening of all, some curious connections with officials of the Ontario government.

If this bill does not pass with its strongly anti-loansharking provisions intact, police authorities will continue to be frustrated in their attempts to break a most vicious cycle of crime which is fueled by such activity. The loan shark will continue to prey on the most disadvantaged and those who are least capable of getting out of debt. He will continue to discount UIC cheques and welfare payments at a fraction of their cost from those who can least afford to lose them. In a more general sense, he will continue to terrorize all of us as organized crime grows into a bigger and bigger big business.

If this legislation is passed, however, we shall witness some much needed changes in the nature of borrower-lender relationships in this country. When artificial rate ceilings are removed and the equity of competitive rates reinstated, we will have reduced much of the need for borrowers to turn to, and support, socially undesirable sources. Let me emphasize once again therefore how this bill can be expected to have far-reaching effects, not only in bringing the usurers to justice, but in reducing related crimes in other areas as well.

Neither I nor the government wish to discourage borrowing. It is an accepted way of life in the modern age, and it is generally regarded as a good and proper means of maintaining growth. Of late, however, we seem to have reached a peak in borrrowing. With interest rates steadily on the rise and the uncertainties about the furture brought on by inflation, consumer borrowing has actually begun to diminish slightly since the summer of 1975. I believe it is the responsibility of this House to assure the consumer that he can borrow money for legitimate purposes from ligitimate sources without having to worry about hidden fees, disguised costs, and perpetual indebtedness. The consumer should be allowed to borrow intelligently, so that he may feel confident to spend whenever the need arises.

Consumer spending would help the recovery this year by promising retail business and, consequently, industrial production. Consumer borrowing would contribute immensely to the recovery process as long as it is channelled properly, according to the dictates of the open market, into proper investments under equitable terms. This bill should do just that.

In closing I should like once again to congratulate the new Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and wish him well in his new career.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, allow me first of all to say how pleased I was to hear the minister introduce Bill C-16 whose object is to give some measure of protection to borrowers and depositors. This bill is an act to, and I quote:

provide for the protection of borrowers and depositors, to regulate interest on judgment debts, to repeal the Interest Act, the Pawnbrokers Act and the Small Loans Act to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof.

Mr. Speaker, I did say "some measure of protection" because, on reading the bill, I find that the government avoided attacking the root of the problem, namely excessive interest rates which are the major cause of the inflation we know today.

In introducing his bill, the minister is disconcertingly timid when he says and I quote:

I would not wish to leave the impression that Canadians are ill-served by the overwhelming majority of their lending institutions. Our banks are rightly acknowledged as some of the largest and best run in the world.

He could at least have added that they are also among the most favoured and protected in the world by their governments. If the minister is really convinced of that, why then did he ask his civil servants to think out and draft such a bill? The fact that the act has not been revised in 20 years does not necessarily make it obsolete, as the minister claims.

If it has become obsolete, it is because of the tolerance and "laissez-faire" attitude of succeeding governments in an effort to serve, first of all, big finance. Also, the taxpayers were left completely at the mercy of loan sharks whose pecuniary appetites are never satiated. Today the government discovers that consumers are too much in debt. That discovery comes at least 20 years too late since, from 1947 to 1975, personal debts increased three times faster than personal incomes.

How can we hope, with a timid piece of legislation such as this one, to keep afloat consumers as a whole who are sumerged under this nountain eh debts? I say this bill is only a gleam of hope, which might be the last one, with which we lure the Canadian people to enable them to avoid being in the most complete deficit situation.

Let us talk a little about the interest paid on deposits and about the way to figure out this interest. I think not a single bank gives the same interest rate on deposits in savings accounts and the way they pay this interest is still worse. To do justice to depositors the interest should be calculated each month so that if a depositor withdraws money occasionally, this is not reflected on the interest for the other months. We must keep in mind, and the people as a whole should be well informed in this regard, that these savings accounts of the workers build up the reserves of chartered banks. According to the Bank Act, the banks have the power to increase the value of these savings five times and to lend the total at an 11 and even 12 per cent interest rate.

In brief, if the bank agrees to open a savings account for a depositor, every $100 deposit he makes allows the bank to lend $1,500 at 10 or 11 per cent, and even at a higher rate sometimes, to a potential lender. In other words, the bank will pay the depositor $8 in interest while on that same $100 it will be able to get up to $160 in interest. So every $8 spent in interest by the chartered banks brings in $160. And then the banks tell us that money is expensive for them. Worse still, these same banks try by every possible means to reduce the depositor's interest. Therefore, I say that in addition to proposing a uniform interest formula, this bill should also provide that interest in the accounts—being in fact the bank's legal reserve—be paid each month.

Let us come back now to the lenders who have been given free way over the last few years. What else could be expected when the example came from the top? Everybody remembers that when the Bank Act was last amended the Liberal government removed the interest ceiling for chartered banks. Chartered banks—the most important institutions in Canada—are now allowed to ask any interest rate they want simply because the government has suppressed the interest rate ceiling. And after such an aberration, we wonder about the inflation rate.

Mr. Speaker, I said it time and again in this House that inflation started when the government removed all restraints to banking operations. You know very well, Mr. Speaker, that when a bank is permitted to charge rates of 10 and even 12 per cent, no lending institution will likely operate below that level. I do not say that I agree with excessive rates practiced by some private lenders but I suggest that we should start from the beginning. Let us take the bull by the horns instead of trying to hold it back by the tail.

This is why I was saying at the outset that this government was afraid of coming to grips with this problem. It is constantly trying to evade the issue, making people believe that one day—not today and not tomorrow either—the government is going to be logical and tackle the real problems facing the workers. Meanwhile, through Bill C-16 it will try to cool off the small lenders who, as we all know, are taking unfair advantage of the consumers.

Bill C-16, dealing with prepayments, has a clause according to which a borrower who wants to make a prepayment is not liable to any penalty when he comes to pay the total amount outstanding under the transaction. For example, say a finance company makes a loan repayable over 36 months, and the borrower finds a way to pay back within 10 or 12 months. Why should the borrower have to pay interest for 36 months or even for 5 or 6 months more only because he wants to get rid of his debt? We should not forget, Mr. Speaker, that when the lending institution gets full prepayment from the borrower, it can lend this very amount on the following day and for months get double interest on the same loan. And the government was well aware of these legal thefts. Why did it tolerate them? The other governments were also aware of them. Why have they tolerated them during the last twenty years?

Another sad situation, like the minister indicated, is the widespread practice in Canada of lending money on welfare cheques or tax refunds. This practice is quite widespread in areas of high unemployment and welfare. It is very natural for a family man who has four or five children to feed and who has to wait for his unemployment cheque for one and maybe two or three months to try to find some money somewhere. This is quite natural. He must find money to feed his family. When a man who is unemployed comes to see me and I read on his benefit card "Case under study", I know that the situation is serious, Mr. Speaker. For weeks and weeks it is written on top of his card "Case under study". I wonder if the minister, who gives overly strict orders to his officials when he demands lengthy investigations like those that are still being carried out for forest workers, is well aware of the damage that he is doing to these family men.

I have just learned that in a case which has come up in the last few days, a delay of eight to ten weeks in the payment of benefits was caused by the fact that the official must enquire personally from each forestry employer to ensure that the beneficiary is really entitled to the stamps. Mr. Speaker, nothing could be more ridiculous. We shall soon need an army to go through forestry sites to check if such or such a forestry worker is entitled to unemployment insurance. This is shocking! That is why forestry workers must go to pawnbrokers to whom they will sometimes give up to one third of their benefits to feed their family. Who must we blame, Mr. Speaker, in such circumstances?

Before putting the blame on lenders, I must put the blame on the minister because of his restrictive laws whose impact is amplified by regulations which are even more restrictive. Thus, we can wonder if the Unemployment Insurance Act was not made in the first place for civil servants so that the greatest number of people could work in the civil service. Sometimes you feel that the unemployed is considered a criminal because he cannot find a job. His family will be left to vegetate and his children will be in danger of getting ill. I could give similar examples about welfare recipients who are obliged to call upon such lenders as are mentioned in Bill C-16. In the case of income tax refunds, the situation is also quite bad. Some people are waiting for their income tax refund cheque and must borrow money to pay their debts.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand why a responsible government cannot take the necessary measures so that everything could be done in time. However, we feel that the number of employees is quite sufficient. To my mind, they are so numerous that they create a state of confusion and quite often the cheques are lost because we have too many civil servants.

To sum up, I would say that all these cases are due to bad management by the departments concerned. These lenders could not survive if the government could better understand the social problems and if it were more conscious of its responsibilities. Finally, I would like to come back to the subject of mortgage loans. I wonder why the minister makes a difference between ordinary loans and mortgage loans when it comes to prepayments. I cannot understand why insurance companies or other lending institutions that grant mortgage loans would punish a borrower who wants to repay his loan.

Maybe somebody will tell me that it is because the lending company had to make a contract or raise mortgages, but we should not forget that it is the borrower who pays, it is not the company, all the costs are to the borrower. I could understand the situation if the lending insurance company had to respect the original interest rate. But, every five years, the companies have the right to increase their interest rates so that a loan granted at a rate of 6 or 7 per cent a few years ago can reach an interest rate of 10 to 12 per cent according to the whims of the lending companies.

And this is done with the blessings of our governments. The ony apology the minister gives us for his apathy is that, because of the particular nature of mortgages and of the mortgage market, he can do nothing but accept the present situation. Did anybody take into consideration the excessive profits of insurance companies? Did anybody wonder where these companies took the money to build their huge skyscrapers? From the pockets of those who will be all their lives the victims of those companies.

Those lending companies cling to their customers as leeches cling to their victims. They set insurance premiums, the amounts of municipal rates, school, taxes and all through the year they collect them and hand them over at the very end of the year and often two months late. What do they do with the money they collect each month? They lend it for 12 months and draw the interests and thus all those interests are added to the interests levied on mortgages. The government does not want to legislate in those fields. Is it an accomplice or does it merely ignore what is going on?

Mr. Speaker, we approve Bill C-16 and hope it will be referred to the committee of the whole to make the necessary amendments and make it more acceptable and more effective for all Canadians.

• (2100)

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, this Bill helps carry out, with certain important exceptions which I shall mention shortly, the key plank in the election platform on which the Liberal party fought and won the election of July, 1974. The fact that the bill came some 2½ years after that election makes it no less welcome. It represents a long overdue and greatly needed reform and updating of federal law dealing with consumer credit.

I am pleased to see the bill since the carrying out of such a reform and updating of federal consumer law was an initiative I announced as minister before the 1974 election, and work on this was under way as the campaign began.

• (2110)

The bill has many desirable features. For example, two were stated in the 1974 election platform in these terms: "Legislation requiring disclosure of the effective rate of interest in all interest-bearing transactions" and, "Legislation allowing the buyer to pay off residential mortgages during the first five years of the agreement without excessive penalties." However, the many desirable features of the bill were outlined by the minister is his speech opening the debate on second reading, as well as in the material he released at the time the bill was first tabled in the House a few days ago. Therefore I do not intend to state them all again at this time. However, I do want to make some comments and raise some questions about some of the things that are in the bill and, more important, about some of the things that are not.

My purpose is a constructive one. My aim is to help ensure that by the time it is adopted the bill is the best one possible and, therefore, the kind of legislation that Canadian consumers are entitled to get from their federal government. In spite of all the good features of the legislation I do not think a case has been sufficiently made as yet that it is already at this level of achievement.

It is good to know that the bill will require a lender to inform a consumer of the true total cost of a loan and that the lender must include it in the total credit charge. However, the question remains as to whether the bill deals in the best way with the problem of excessive credit charges, of excessive interest rates. The bill proposes the repeal of the Small Loans Act with its ceiling on interest rates charged on loans of less than $1,500. In its place it proposes that there be what in effect is a maximum permissible ceiling set by regulation—the criminal rate of interest—and that any rate below this is acceptable unless a court rules it is unwarranted. The minister has not yet said what this criminal rate will be. I gather it is intended to be very high. I understand that a rate of at least 70 per cent per annum is being contemplated.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Gray: All this means that the only recourse a consumer will have if he is charged a rate which is high but below the very high criminal rate is to ask a court to rule that it is unwarranted, or not to pay it and wait until he is sued, at which time the lender will have to prove that the rate is not unwarranted.

The act also says that the borrower can pay off the loan at any time, assuming of course that he is able to find the necessary funds at a lower rate. However, this latter opportunity also has its limitations and problems which I will refer to in a moment. Frankly I do not think that it is totally realistic to expect the average consumer-borrower who does not like the rate he is being charged for a transaction to have recourse to the courts as his basic form of relief. We are talking about people who, in many cases, are of low income, of limited education, and who are hesitant and unsure of themselves when it comes to dealing with large organizations, whether they be business or government. They find, as do most Canadians, our court system to be forbidding and unknown territory which is difficult and costly to enter or to leave. The bill does nothing to remove these legitimate kinds of concerns.

The borrower can apply to a court to review the transaction and to ask that the credit charge be declared unwarranted. But to what court can he apply? According to the bill it will not be to a small claims court with its relative lack of paper work, formality and cost. Instead he will have to apply to a county court or some other superior court, with all this means in terms of red tape, formality and expense, including the practical necessity of having a lawyer.

The borrower can cease his payments and wait until he is sued for payment, hoping that the court will say the lender has not discharged the onus the bill will put on him to prove the rate is unwarranted. However, the borrower will them have the often frightening experience of being served legal papers and going into the unfamiliar environment of the court system, with the cost of legal representation and so on.

The burden of proof, the onus, may be on the lender to prove the rate is warranted. However, this does not mean that the burden can never be discharged by the lender and that the court will always, or even generally, find in favour of the borrower and will declare the rate to be unwarranted and, therefore, not payable. The proceedings in question will be civil and not criminal in nature. This means the lender will not have to prove his case beyond a reasonable doubt, as he would in a criminal case if the onus of proof were on his shoulders. The benefit of any doubt will not, therefore, have to be given to the borrower, as has to be done for the defendant in a criminal case. All the lender has to do is to prove his case, as the bill says, "to the satisfaction of the court," which I presume means discharging the burden of proof in civil cases, proving his point on a balance of the probabilities and in the light of the factors set out in the bill in this regard.

It may well be that the judges will not find it difficult in many cases to do this after looking at such factors as "the cost of funds to the lender at and about the time the lending transaction was entered into;" "other costs to the lender of doing business that are reasonable having regard to the nature and scale of business of the lender;" and, "the degree of risk assumed by the lender having regard to the nature and value of any security provided, and the age, business capacity, financial position and mental and physical health of the borrower", and they will find the lender has proved his point.

The protection the bill promises the unwarranted charge concept will bring may well prove to be an illusion for many borrowers once it becomes law, especially those who now benefit from the maximum ceiling rates under the Small Loans Act for loans under $1,500. The minister in the speech in which he opened this debate talked about the limited protection now given by the Small Loans Act, pointing out that it does not apply to loans over $1,500. He pointed out as well that the total amount of loans made under the ceiling has been steadily declining in recent years. This may well be generally true. However, there are still very substantial numbers of people obtaining loans under the $1,500 ceiling and therefore benefiting from the approach of the existing Small Loans Act.

The latest report of the Superintendent of Insurance on the operations of small loans companies and money lenders licensed under the Small Loans Act is for the year ending December 31, 1974. The report states that in 1974 there were $412,204,415 in loans made under the $1,500 ceiling involving a total of 647,739 accounts. The minister said in his speech that only $296 million was lent in 1974 under the Small Loans Act ceiling. This does not appear correct from my reading of the 1974 report. Perhaps he will explain this discrepancy when he winds up the debate.

What will happen to the more than half a million people who apparently have been benefiting from the step rate and ceilings approach of the Small Loans Act, if this bill is passed in its present form? They will be left to what may turn out to be the illusory protection of the unwarranted rate concept with which the government proposes to replace what presently exists. We have had something like the unwarranted rate concept in the unconscionable transactions relief acts that have been in place for many years in most if not all of the provinces. The fact is, however, that they have been rarely used by consumer borrowers and, when used, rarely found beneficial by them. Also, what is to prevent a lender or a group of lenders from having an informal black list of people who have gone to court to complain that a credit charge is unwarranted? Will someone who asks a court to declare a credit charge unwarranted ever be able to get a loan again from the lender in question, or any lender? The bill does not deal with this particular problem that could be created by the unwarranted rate concept it proposes.
