The Stream of Time

BY JOHN SWAIN It is a silent stream; Calm as a quiet sleep To a strange repose The still stream flows Where the mourners cease to weep

It is a wide-spread stream And every valley fills It covers the plains. And the high domains Of the everlasting bills

It is a ceaseless stream. For ever flowing fast Like a solemn tide To the ocean wide, Of the fair unfathomed pas

It is a mighty stream; Resistless in its sway The loftiest kings, The strongest things It carries with ease away

It is a precious stream; Four pearls of price untold Reward the care Of the searcher there And its sands are sands of gold

Through silent realms of night Through every glorious clime By night and day, On its wide-spread way Fast flows the stream of time.

The camp meeting boasts over half a century of successful life. Its history is its deence. It is no exaggeration to say, that tens of thousands have been converted through its influences; many of whom, in extravagances, and believe them to be alike been savingly reached by the ordinary means triflers, wretched apostates, and daring infidels have yielded to the power, the tenderness, the sweetness of the spirit, which usuhave become so filled with spiritual life, with it in the tents. True, at the have become so filled with spiritual life, ill trained and extravagant minds develop quent experience has been enriched thereby. And not unfrequently, churches have been led into glorious revivals through the instrumentality of such of their members as have been quickened there. Indeed, it may be and conservative minds, who merely object and conservative minds, who merely object the same meeting attend it, where provide comfort and counsel to large numbers in so effectual a manner, that few have left it with-

THE FLOWER AND THE STAR. A little flower, by human eve.

Unpoliced, on the ground, Was gazing in the far blue sky As evening clos'd around

In handful- 'er the sky, But one-a love one, charm'd the flower, With beauty born on high.

The love-sick flower so sad and lone In earthly darkness veil'd, Unclos'd its crimson petals wide, And thus the planet hail'd:

Oh my sick heart is sad, fair star The night of earth is cold-I yearn to love some glorious thing Like thee, pale star, of old !"

Poor little flower! the star shone on Unmindful of the cry-The flower shrank back to earth again

And was the star so far away It could not hear the sound ?-Or was it cold to leaf and flower That deck'd such shadowy ground

Ah, no the star had heard it wellli sent a dew-drop fair. And fill d the flower's fragrant cell Itself to image there

So that my darken'd soul within May mirror back thy love.

Like heavenly dew-drops fair-So when the night is darkest round I'll find thy image there. Guyshorough, June 29.
