

IMAGE EVALUATION
TEST TARGET (MT-3)

Photographic Sciences Corporation

23 WEST MAIN STREET
WEBSTER, N.Y. 14580
(716) 872-4503

15 28 25
12 18 22
10 20
8

CIHM/ICMH
Microfiche Series.

CIHM/ICMH Collection de microfiches.

Canadian Institute for Historical Microreproduction / Institut canadien de microreproductions historiques

10

© 1981

Technical and Bibliographic Notes/Notes techniques et bibliographiques

The Institute has attempted to obtain the best original copy available for filming. Features of this copy which may be bibliographically unique, which may alter any of the images in the reproduction, or which may significantly change the usual method of filming, are checked below.

L'Institut a microfilmé le meilleur exemplaire qu'il lui a été possible de se procurer. Les détails de cet exemplaire qui sont peut-être uniques du point de vue bibliographique, qui peuvent modifier une image reproduite, ou qui peuvent exiger une modification dans la méthode normale de filmage sont indiqués ci-dessous.

- Coloured covers/
Couverture de couleur
- Covers damaged/
Couverture endommagée
- Covers restored and/or laminated/
Couverture restaurée et/ou pelliculée
- Cover title missing/
Le titre de couverture manque
- Coloured maps/
Cartes géographiques en couleur
- Coloured ink (i.e. other than blue or black)/ Encre de couleur (i.e. autre que bleue ou noire)
- Coloured plates and/or illustrations/
Planches et/ou illustrations en couleur
- Bound with other material/
Relié avec d'autres documents
- Tight binding may cause shadows or distortion
along interior margin/
La reliure serrée peut causer de l'ombre ou de la distortion le long de la marge intérieure
- Blank leaves added during restoration may appear within the text. Whenever possible, these have been omitted from filming/
Il se peut que certaines pages blanches ajoutées lors d'une restauration apparaissent dans le texte, mais, lorsque cela était possible, ces pages n'ont pas été filmées.
- Additional comments:/
Commentaires supplémentaires:

- Coloured pages/
Pages de couleur
- Pages damaged/
Pages endommagées
- Pages restored and/or laminated/
Pages restaurées et/ou pelliculées
- Pages discoloured, stained or foxed/
Pages décolorées, tachetées ou piquées
- Pages detached/
Pages détachées
- Showthrough/
Transparence
- Quality of print varies/
Qualité inégale de l'impression
- Includes supplementary material/
Comprend du matériel supplémentaire
- Only edition available/
Seule édition disponible
- Pages wholly or partially obscured by errata slips, tissues, etc., have been refilmed to ensure the best possible image/
Les pages totalement ou partiellement obscurcies par un feuillet d'errata, une pelure, etc., ont été filmées à nouveau de façon à obtenir la meilleure image possible.

This item is filmed at the reduction ratio checked below/
Ce document est filmé au taux de réduction indiqué ci-dessous.

10X	12X	14X	16X	18X	20X	22X	24X	26X	28X	30X	32X
				✓

The copy filmed here has been reproduced thanks to the generosity of:

National Library of Canada

The images appearing here are the best quality possible considering the condition and legibility of the original copy and in keeping with the filming contract specifications.

Original copies in printed paper covers are filmed beginning with the front cover and ending on the last page with a printed or illustrated impression, or the back cover when appropriate. All other original copies are filmed beginning on the first page with a printed or illustrated impression, and ending on the last page with a printed or illustrated impression.

The last recorded frame on each microfiche shall contain the symbol \rightarrow (meaning "CONTINUED"), or the symbol ∇ (meaning "END"), whichever applies.

Maps, plates, charts, etc., may be filmed at different reduction ratios. Those too large to be entirely included in one exposure are filmed beginning in the upper left hand corner, left to right and top to bottom, as many frames as required. The following diagrams illustrate the method:

L'exemplaire filmé fut reproduit grâce à la générosité de:

Bibliothèque nationale du Canada

Les images suivantes ont été reproduites avec le plus grand soin, compte tenu de la condition et de la netteté de l'exemplaire filmé, et en conformité avec les conditions du contrat de filmage.

Les exemplaires originaux dont la couverture en papier est imprimée sont filmés en commençant par le premier plat et en terminant soit par la dernière page qui comporte une empreinte d'impression ou d'illustration, soit par le second plat, selon le cas. Tous les autres exemplaires originaux sont filmés en commençant par la première page qui comporte une empreinte d'impression ou d'illustration et en terminant par la dernière page qui comporte une telle empreinte.

Un des symboles suivants apparaîtra sur la dernière image de chaque microfiche, selon le cas: le symbole \rightarrow signifie "A SUIVRE", le symbole ∇ signifie "FIN".

Les cartes, planches, tableaux, etc., peuvent être filmés à des taux de réduction différents. Lorsque le document est trop grand pour être reproduit en un seul cliché, il est filmé à partir de l'angle supérieur gauche, de gauche à droite, et de haut en bas, en prenant le nombre d'images nécessaire. Les diagrammes suivants illustrent la méthode.

ails
du odifier une mage

rrata to pelure, n à

32X

CANADA

NATIONAL LIBRARY

BIBLIOTHÈQUE NATIONALE

FC 98

C 45

RES.

The Fiddle-dum-dee Papers.—No. 1.

THE CHILDREN OF
MRS. DOMINION;
HOW THEY QUARRELLED, AND WHAT CAME OF IT.

Toronto:
HUNTER, ROSE AND COMPANY.
1871.

Entered according to the Act of the Parliament of Canada, in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-one, by HUNTER, ROSE & Co., in the office of the Minister of Agriculture.

t
t h
v
P
c l
I t r t
s

THE CHILDREN

OF

MRS. DOMINION;

HOW THEY QUARRELLED, AND WHAT CAME OF IT.

MRS. DOMINION was a buxom widow, with a family of five sons, who, having lost her husband and not feeling herself altogether able to undertake the charge of the boys (they being rather troublesome youths), had allowed them pretty much to take care of themselves for some time. This arrangement, however, did not please their grandmother (Mrs. Britannia), who found herself frequently very much annoyed by her precocious grand-children, and therefore she gave her daughter (Mrs. Dominion) a quiet hint that she had better look after her offspring a little more closely. Old Mrs. Britannia was not quite consistent in this advice, which, to tell the truth, was given more in the light of a command, for whenever Mrs. Dominion proposed any important changes in her household affairs, she had first to consult Grandma before they could be carried out; and no matter how much the perplexed widow wished certain things, if her mother decided against her having them, she could not get them. It must, therefore, be acknowledged that it was not quite fair on the part of the elder lady to place the responsibility of taking charge of a troublesome family on her daughter's shoulders, unless she intended to allow her free scope in the management thereof.

Mrs. Dominion was, however, an obedient daughter, and no doubt hoping that her mother would be more considerate towards her if she gathered her boys around her, she sent words to each of those living at a distance to come home and for the future live under one roof.

The names of the Dominion boys were Willie, Johnny, Bunsy, Sandy and Toby. The two former were twins and the eldest born of the family; the last mentioned one was so young at the time of which we are writing, that his mother finally concluded to allow him to remain with a friend who had been taking care of him, more especially as Mrs. Britannia professed to feel a motherly interest in him. We will have a good deal to say regarding this Toby later in the day, as he proved for a time to be the most troublesome, although the youngest of Mrs. Dominion's children. Willie and Johnny had always remained more with their mother than any of the other children, and were consequently her favorites; they therefore hailed with satisfaction this assembling together of the members of the family, more particularly Willie, who, on account of his being the strongest and most vigorous of the boys, felt that he would be a sort of monitor over the rest.

Johnny, it is true, felt as strong as Willie, but in reality he was not; for, unlike his brother, he was fonder of pleasure than work, and consequently his frame did not acquire that strength and power of endurance which is the invariable result of industrious habits; and it was therefore clearly to be seen that he would have to give way eventually before his more spirited and enterprising brother.

Mrs. Dominion found a good deal of difficulty in persuading Bunsy and Sandy to come home; and, had it not been for their Grandmother, it is very uncertain whether they would have come at all. The fact is, they felt very little interest in the family circle, and preferred being left to their own resources, the more so as they felt that at home they would be in the minority, on account of the great influence possessed by Willie and Johnny over their mother. Another reason for this strange want of affection on the part of Bunsy and Sandy, was the pernicious control which an uncle of theirs named Samuel exercised over them. This uncle was a sly crafty old fellow, and he tried his utmost to persuade the two boys to come and live with him instead of going home, thereby hoping to gain the benefit of their labour on his farm; and as both Bunsy and Sandy were experienced hands in the management of a boat, Uncle Samuel, who was passionately fond of sailing, felt that they would be of great service to him in assisting to take care of a favorite yacht in which he made a practice of sailing about.

To tell the truth the minds of the two boys were very much divided between a sense of duty to their mother and a desire to enjoy more of the society of Uncle Samuel, who was a very enticing, agreeable sort of an old man, so long as he was the gainer by being so.

Uncle Samuel knew better than to try any of his tricks openly, and therefore used all sorts of underhand means to make the boys dissatisfied with the prospect of living under the immediate care of their mother, and to paint in the most glowing terms the freedom and happiness they would enjoy under his own bachelor roof. He pictured on every occasion the entire absence of all restraint in his domestic arrangements ; how they could go and come at their pleasure in his house, and that instead of being tied to their mother's apron strings, as they would be if they went home, they would feel themselves men at once under his care.

It is hardly to be wondered at therefore if Bunsy and Sandy entertained a very high opinion of their uncle, especially as they came a good deal more in contact with him than any of their brothers. Mrs. Dominion consequently found a great unwillingness on the part of her two sons to place themselves under her maternal protection, and in fact they absolutely refused to enter her door unless she promised to place them on an equal footing with their elder brothers, and it is needless to say Uncle Samuel patted them on the back when he heard of their resolution ; the sly old fellow doubtless thinking that their mother would not consent to their demand. The perplexed widow now had to act as a mediator between her own children, and although her heart yearned towards her eldest born, yet she felt that in justice to her absent boys she ought to show no partiality to one over the other, and therefore she told Willie and Johnny that they would have to share and share alike with Bunsy and Sandy. The twins at first did not like this arrangement; because, as they said, they had stuck more closely to their mother, and were moreover the oldest and biggest of the family, and accordingly had a right to the largest share of the family property.

Bunsy and Sandy happened, however, to reveal to their mother their predilections in favour of their uncle, and she knowing by experience his sly and grasping ways, and being also aware that he was in the habit of constantly visiting them, at once concluded that he had something to do with this strange desire on the part of her boys to keep away from home.

Now it may be well to mention here that Uncle Samuel and his sister Mrs. Britannia were not at the time on the best of terms, through some interference on her part in his private affairs. In fact the old lady had an unfortunate habit of frequently mixing herself up in other people's business, and she seldom received any credit for doing so. She was, however, a very powerful and influential dame for her age; and although folks used to call her "old womanish" in her ways, few of them cared about exciting her to anger, as she was very apt to use her fists to some purpose, when there was any real cause for doing so.

Uncle Samuel made a great ado about Mrs. Britannia having hindered him in settling a difficulty that had occurred in his household; but at the same time he took very good care to refrain from any open act of hostility towards her. He took other and, it must be said, meaner ways of annoying her, one of which was by presenting her with a large and rather visionary account which he declared she was in duty bound to pay. He also threw every obstacle in the way of her grand-children, Willie and Johnny, to harass and trouble them, and prevent them from enjoying that freedom from care which boys are generally so accustomed to. He even had the impudence to propose taking the care of her grand-children off her hands, on the plea that the benefit he would derive from their labour on his farm, as well as the advantage of having the control of their property, would serve as an off-set to the account which he held against her.

Now Mrs. Britannia was a proud old dame in her way, and although she could now and again act somewhat unjustly towards her own children and her children's children, she would on no account permit anyone else to interfere with them. She, therefore, told Samuel very distinctly that if he could prove his account to be a correct one, she would settle it, but she never would listen to a proposition from him to take charge of any of her children or grand-children.

Uncle Samuel took this rebuff very complacently, and in the meantime continued his scheming designs upon Bunsy and Sandy, until at last Mrs. Dominion almost gave up hope of seeing them under her roof.

Willie and Johnny about this time consented to receive their brothers on an equal footing in their mother's house, and at the same time Uncle Samuel received a quiet hint from Mrs. Britannia to stop his tricks with Mrs. Dominion's children. This brought things to a crisis, and Bunsy and Sandy, being for a time left to their better judgment, at last consented to join hands with their brothers and pay proper respect to their mother, which all good boys ought to do. The first of July was therefore set apart for a grand family union, and when that day arrived Bunsy and Sandy put on their good clothes and set out for their mother's house, where Willie and Johnny were already waiting to receive them. It had been agreed that the two elder boys should give their younger brothers a certain portion of the good things which they had been in the habit of receiving from their mother, as an equivalent for certain comforts which Bunsy and Sandy were bringing to the family circle. This arrangement appeared so satisfactory to all parties that there was every reason to believe that Mrs. Dominion's troubles were at an end, and that her boys would unite in making her home a comfortable and happy one in the future.

The 1st of July was a great day for the now happy widow. She decked her house with garlands and flowers to make it pleasant for the reception of her boys, and as she sat at the head of her table and heard her sons pledging all sorts of brotherly love towards each other, her kind, good heart swelled with pride, and for the moment she forgot all the inconsiderate conduct of Mrs. Britannia towards her, and even went so far as to express a regret that Uncle Samuel was not there to join in their reunion.

That wily old fellow was not far off, for he was actually looking in at the window upon the scene, and, in his own peculiar way, drawing his conclusions therefrom.

“ Oh! ho!” thought he, “ Mrs. Dominion you think that you have got them all right, but you’ll soon find to your cost that your troubles have only commenced, and before long, instead of finding the members of your household united, you will have them fighting like cats and dogs, the end of which will be your family compact knocked into a cocked hat. Haven’t I some experience in such matters? It is true I have no sons, but I have worked my farm on equal shares, which is better than on the principle of brotherly love, and look at the result? Why only the other day one half of my partners kicked up a row with the others, and I thought at one time during their quarrel that my whole house would come tumbling down upon my head, and if Mrs. Britannia had carried out her interference a little further, I certainly would have been half ruined. Perhaps it is just as well I did not induce Bunsy and Sandy to come over to me just now, for when they break with their mother (which they certainly will do) I will get them without any trouble. They’re two fine boys are Bunsy and Sandy, and I do not mean to give them up so easily as Mrs. Britannia imagines. And then there is Toby, he has not yet joined the family circle. He is very young, but there is every prospect of his becoming a stout lad if properly cared for, and he will certainly be of great use to me if I get him. Besides all this, there is Columby, a sort of protégé of Mrs. Britannia’s, whom she wishes Mrs. Dominion to adopt. Poor old lady! she has so many children she doesn’t know what to do, and therefore wishes to get those of them off her hands who are of the least benefit to her. I wonder if she would let Indy go in this manner." Thus thought Uncle Samuel, as he peered in at the window pane, looking with envious eyes on the four happy boys who seemed to be perfectly contented under their mother's roof.

"Now," he said to himself, "there is my account which Mrs. Britannia has not settled. She is very much mistaken if she thinks she can allow her great big ships to run down and destroy my little boats without having to pay for them. I'll just keep that as a balance against her, and she may yet be very glad to let me have Toby and Columby as an offset against it. It is worth trying for, especially as I know Mrs. Dominion has set her heart upon bringing her youngest child home, and Mrs. Britannia is also determined that her daughter shall adopt Columby. I'll just leave this happy family for the present in their glory, and see what I can do about Toby and Columby, and in the meantime I'll send Mrs. Britannia another 'reminder' that I expect her to settle my claim for damages without any unnecessary delay."

Mrs. Dominion now set about arranging her house, in doing which she called in the assistance of her four sons, giving to each of them a proportionate share in the work. She felt the greater necessity for doing this on account of her mother, Mrs. Britannia, withdrawing a great deal of that assistance which hitherto she had rendered her daughter. This was not quite fair on the part of the old lady, but the truth must be told, she was beginning to be very penurious and selfish, and in fact people were saying that she preferred making and hoarding up money to upholding the dignity of her family relations; and preserving her own position as a just and respected dame, which she has enjoyed and deserved for so many years.

It is true she had promised to assist Mrs. Dominion and her boys should they at any time be in need, but it would have been better had she kept up more friendly relations with her daughter, to show to the outside world that, although apparently sundered to a certain degree, they were in reality as closely united as ever.

Mrs. Dominion felt this conduct on the part of her mother very much, as it seemingly confirmed a rumor which had come to her ears that Mrs. Britannia, in desiring a union of the Dominion family, only wished to be free from any further annoyance or trouble from the boys, and that she intended to allow them to paddle their own canoe for the future.

Just as the widow was beginning to feel happy in the society of her boys, to be thus shunned as it were by her mother, it was very hard, very hard indeed. But the worst of it all was that the old lady would not even then allow her daughter to have full control over her own house. Grandma still had to be consulted on all important matters.

The greatest blow of all, however, to poor unhappy Mrs. Dominion was when she found out to her cost that there did not exist amongst her boys that sincerity in their union which she had expected to see.

Little bickerings began to creep in amongst them, jealousies sprang up when they were least expected, each one in fact seemed to dread that the others would get a head of him; and thus they kept their poor mother in a constant stew.

This latter feeling was more plainly to be noticed between Willie and Johnny, who being twins, thought of course that one should not be allowed to over-reach the other. Willie, moreover, was a rank Protestant, and Johnny as rank a Catholic, and the two boys very foolishly allowed their religious prejudices to make their mother's home very miserable, by quarrelling and fighting over a subject the chief principle of which is "peace." Then again Johnny, knowing Willie to be a pushing sort of a fellow, used his utmost influence with his mother to prevent his twin brother from getting ahead of him.

Bunsy and Sandy, seeing the example set them by the elder boys, took it into their heads now and again to grumble and kick up their heels, and on certain occasions offended their mother greatly by expressing a wish to leave home and return to their former mode of living. They even at times hinted very seriously at going over to Uncle Samuel. There were many other excuses for quarrelling made use of by the four boys, but they were too numerous to mention here.

During all this time, notwithstanding the troubles in her family, Mrs. Dominion found her household affairs prospering, and felt the benefit of having her sons around her; indeed, if they had only agreed better together, she would have had nothing to complain about.

Willie used to continually taunt his brother Johnny, (and it must be confessed not altogether without reason) with being lazy and careless in the management of his portion of the work ; and it was as much as Mrs. Dominion could do sometimes to prevent an open rupture between the twins. She regretted this the more, as previous to the union they had quarrelled in the same way, and she had hoped that after they came to live together under one roof, they would cease their wrangling.

It may be easily imagined, from what we have already seen of Uncle Samuel, that he chuckled heartily over these disputes in the Dominion household. "Ha!" thought he to himself, "this is but the beginning of the end, for if they go on much longer at this rate, I will have the whole family over—under my care ; and poor Mrs. Dominion will not look quite so happy as she did on that 1st of July, when I looked in at her window."

Now Uncle Samuel somehow or another shewed a great deal of ill-will towards both Willie and Johnny, more particularly the former. He was afraid, however, from a dread of Mrs. Britannia, to use any open measures of hostility against either of the boys. But he managed, in an underhand way, to annoy them on several occasions by sending a number of ragged good-for-nothing boys to pelt stones at them, trample over their gardens, and rob their henhouses, &c., &c. Both Willie and Johnny proved themselves more than a match for those "raggedy" boys, and "wholloped" them so severely on every occasion, that they ran back blubbering to Uncle Samuel, who of course had to afford them protection. The sly old fellow, in order to "make believe" that he had nothing to do with it, pretended to punish some of them, and in one instance locked one of the biggest of them up in a room, and at the same time read the whole of them a lesson, to refrain from annoying the Dominion family any more. This of course was all a farce on the part of Uncle Samuel, for while he was reading the lesson to the ragged urchins with one eye, he was winking slyly at them with the other, as much as to say "gammon." The old fellow did not show his usual shrewdness however in this little game of his towards the Dominion boys, for he forgot that Mrs. Britannia, notwithstanding her age, had a very penetrating, calculating eye, and that for every pane of glass broken, every flower and vegetable destroyed, and every egg stolen from the hen houses by the ragged crowd, he was debited on her books with the value of the same. He therefore found out afterwards to his cost when he came to settle up accounts with the old lady, that the broken glass, &c., very nearly balanced his claim against her for the loss of his boats.

Samuel, however, began at last to see that neither Mrs. Britannia nor the Dominion boys would stand any more of his pranks, so he wisely desisted from them.

Strange to say, the crafty old fellow never troubled Bunsy and Sandy in the same way as he did Willie and Johnny; indeed he seemed to try and keep on the best of terms with them, no doubt hoping thereby to gain their good will, and ultimately persuade them to come over to him; but, as it will be seen, his calculations were all astray.

Uncle Samuel was very fond of the good things of this life, especially apple-sauce, pumpkin-pie, peanuts, pop-corn, lemonade and such like; but he had also a great partiality for fish, and it happened that he could not get a sufficient supply of that commodity without having to trespass on Mrs. Dominion's property. The old fellow used to think this very hard, and made a practice of slyly sending boats to the prohibited place; but whenever Mrs. Dominion caught these emissaries of Uncle Samuel at work, she, to use a vulgar phrase, "gobbled them up," fish, boats, and everything belonging to them.

This fishery question was a sore point with Uncle Samuel, so in order to try and get permission from Mrs. Dominion to fish on her property, he determined upon seeing what he could do with her Grandmother, and hinted to the old lady that he might be induced to allow the fishery privilege to take the place of an offset against his claim upon her, if she would agree to it.

Our readers will probably conclude that Uncle Samuel was making the most of his claim against Mrs. Britannia; but they must remember that the old fellow was noted for being pretty much of a sharper, and he was no doubt feeling his way to see how far he could go in the matter. The result was that Mrs. Britannia very foolishly allowed him to impress her with the idea that he was a much wronged man in the affair of the boats, and so worked upon her that actually, after a time, she began to think that she ought to really pay him something for his losses. At the same time, however, she did not forget the broken glass, stolen eggs, &c.

About this time Mrs. Dominion began to think seriously of bringing her youngest child Toby home from the care of the person who had him in charge; and, on this account, she despatched a preceptor to look after him on the way.

This preceptor was named Dugald, and had the name at one time of being a clever, competent person, although it is true that he had given Mrs. Dominion a good deal of trouble in his day, by a cranky, cross, satirical sort of manner which he was unfortunate enough to possess. He had moreover at one time in his life a very strong liking for Uncle Samuel, but, through receiving a few presents and other considerations from Mrs. Dominion, he had turned round and sworn unalterable allegiance to the buxom widow. It was unfortunate that Dugald was selected as the person to direct the footsteps of Toby, as that youngster was rather a troublesome boy for his age, and inclined to kick up his heels when he did not get everything quite his own way.

Be that as it may, Dugald started on his mission, but found on arriving at his destination that young Toby would have nothing to do with him, for in fact the precocious youth shut the door altogether upon him, and would not let him enter the house. Dugald then, unfortunately for himself, quite lost his temper at this treatment, and, instead of taking matters coolly as he ought to have done, he raged and tore about like a demented person, threatening, at the same time, all sorts of vengeance against the youngster. This, however, did not frighten Toby in the least, for he told Dugald to go and be hanged; and further, that he did not believe him to have any authority or right to act as his preceptor.

This was hitting the truth in earnest, for, although the boy only made a random assertion, the fact was that Dugald had really started from home without receiving full powers from Mrs. Dominion to take charge of her child. The preceptor, however, endeavoured to frighten Toby into obedience, by showing him a bogus letter, to the effect that he was to come home with Dugald, whether he liked it or not.

Now Toby was rather a smart boy for his age, and at once saw through this device on the part of Dugald, and from that moment determined that he would have nothing more to do with him. When, therefore, the preceptor tried again to open the door, Toby got quite mad and kicked up such pranks that he actually frightened the person he was living with, and, moreover, did some things which he had reason to regret afterwards. Dugald at last became utterly disgusted with the whole affair, and returned home angry with himself, Mrs. Dominion and Toby, all at the same time.

To tell the truth, Toby had some reason to kick up a fuss, for Mrs. Dominion, it seems, proposed keeping him rather too much under her thumb, which the youngster (having enjoyed a great deal of freedom from his birth) would not stand.

The end of all this was that Dugald was dismissed, and Toby received a promise from his mother that he would be properly cared for if he would come home ; at the same time the anxious parent sent the excited youngster a bottle of soothing syrup to calm his overtaxed nerves. This was all very good, but Mrs. Britannia now stepped forward, and, in consort with Mrs. Dominion, sent up another preceptor,—this time with a good sound rod to chastise the boy, if he would not take the medicine which had been sent to him.

But Toby was not a bad child at heart, for as soon as he found out that he was to receive that treatment from his mother which he had a right to expect, he swallowed the whole bottle of soothing syrup at one gulp, and immediately began preparations for going home.

The preceptor with the rod, therefore, found the child quite calm on his arrival, and, consequently, had no chastising to do.

This affair being all arranged, Mrs. Dominion had now five sons instead of four under her roof, and matters again appeared to be going on swimmingly with the widow. Uncle Samuel, during the fuss with Toby, did all in his power to encourage the youth in his rebellion; it was, therefore, a sore day for him when he saw another added to the table of Mrs. Dominion; but he did not give up hope of yet securing not only Toby but also Bunsy and Sandy. About this time Mrs. Britannia determined to send a servant to Washington, the name of Uncle Samuel's principal residence, to arrange, if possible, about a settlement of their accounts; and Mrs. Dominion, being also an interested party in the affair, on account of her proximity to the old bachelor, as well as the longing eyes which he was continually casting towards her fishing grounds, was invited to take part in the conference. The widow, therefore, sent a servant to Samuel at the same time that Mrs. Britannia sent hers.

At first Uncle Samuel rode the high horse,— spoke of receiving Toby and Columby as an equivalent for the losses he had sustained, and made several other propositions equally absurd ; but the whole matter was finally arranged by all parties agreeing to allow Samuel a share of the fishing grounds, and, at the same time, Mrs. Britannia gave the old rascal a certain sum of money which, in her honest heart, she believed she had a right to pay him. Uncle Samuel, on the other hand, agreed to live on more friendly terms with the Dominion boys, and to allow them certain privileges which came within his scope to grant them.

One benefit arising from this settlement between Uncle Samuel and Mrs. Britannia, was his allowing Mrs. Dominion the use of a road through his farm to connect Toby's garden with his mother's property ; for it unfortunately happened that a great many rocks, swamps and rapid streams intervened between Mrs. Dominion's farm and her youngest child's garden, thus making it a hard road for him to travel when he wished to visit his mother's house. And, by having the use of a part of Uncle Samuel's iron road, it made the route more convenient for both Mrs. Dominion and Toby, as well as being a benefit to Samuel, for the boy and his mother were sure to drop a few flowers here and there as they passed to and fro. Uncle Samuel now appeared more contented for a while and desisted from his tricks, and Mrs. Dominion was beginning to flatter herself that her troubles were indeed over at last.

But alas! for human expectations, no sooner had Uncle

Samuel been quieted than the row commenced again at home. It was Willie and Johnny at one time, and the next Bunsy and Sandy, and frequently the four elder boys pitched into their younger brother Toby, who, by this time, had grown to be quite a big boy and pretty well able to take care of himself. Columby, who had been adopted by Mrs. Dominion, notwithstanding Uncle Samuel's schemes against it, generally took sides with Toby; and so it went on until at last Mrs. Dominion was at her wits' ends; and Uncle Samuel slyly shook his old head, and, putting his finger to the side of his nose, exclaimed: "Ah, I told you so."

Things went on in this way until it began to look very serious; and there was every reason to fear a downright split amongst the Dominion boys. Mrs. Britannia even having no power to control them. At this stage the better judgment of the boys prevailed, and one day they all met together to talk over matters and see what could be done towards an amicable arrangement. It was then discovered that, although they professed to be governed by their mother, they, in reality, were not. Each boy, as it were, governed himself, and, therefore, when the six met at the common table it was hard to get them to agree on subjects about which each held an entirely different opinion from the others; and it was also found that this principle of each acting on his own hook, when out of the house, prevented him from working in consort with his brothers at home.

It was, therefore, decided that some plan must be adopted by which the brothers could feel a common interest in each other's welfare, and, as it were, become more united together. It was also felt by the boys that, as Mrs. Britannia was doing very little, if anything, for them, it was high time that she should allow them to act more independently in the management of their own affairs. "We have a home, it is true," they said, "but how can we feel any just pride in it when that home has no position worth noticing in society? Whenever there is a party given we are looked upon if we go to it as children, and have to give place even to our sly old Uncle Samuel, when, in fact, we are as good as, and, indeed, much better than, many of the guests invited to assemblies now-a-days by Mrs. Europe."

Now it happened that a Mr. Kingdom had been casting loving glances at the buxom widow for some time, and as he was a great friend and near relative of Mrs. Britannia, the boys decided that their mother ought to accept him as her husband, more especially as they all liked him very much and felt that they could be happy under his fatherly care.

Mrs. Dominion blushed very much when her boys made this proposition to her, but as Mrs. Britannia seemed to desire it, and promised to remain her firm friend and ally after her marriage, and as her sons agreed to be guided entirely by Mr. Kingdom if she would marry him, she at last consented, and the 1st July (the anniversary of her family union) was set apart (Mr. Kingdom being agreeable) for the marriage day.

Wasn't Uncle Samuel raging at this, and wasn't he dumbfounded just. He swore and tore his hair and vowed that if Mr. Kingdom (for whom he had a great dislike) came to live next door he would "punch his head" on every opportunity that occurred. But the Dominion boys stepped forward, all six in a row, and told him that if he didn't "shut up" they would thrash him within an inch of his life.

Mrs. Britannia also told the sly old fellow pretty plainly that if he did not mind his own business and cease meddling with her grand-children's affairs, she would be obliged to destroy a few more of his boats, and this time she wouldn't pay for them.

The marriage morning came in all its joyousness. Mrs. Dominion looked blooming, Mr. Kingdom fresh and hearty; and the six boys shook hands all round on that day, and forever afterwards threw aside their prejudices and self-counsellings and agreed to work all together hand and glove with their father, Mr. Kingdom. Uncle Samuel did not even look in at the window this time, for he shut himself up in his own big house and snarled; but he knew better than to try and bite, for the "Dominion boys" now transmogrified into "Kingdom" had grown so stout and strong, especially Toby, who, in fact, eventually became larger than any of his brothers, that the crafty old fellow felt it wiser to keep "mum" and "mind his own business." Mrs. Britannia interfered no more with the six boys, although she remained their firm friend, and they, feeling an honest pride in their father, worked unitedly in making his house happy and prosperous.

Mr. Kingdom, through the assistance of his sons, became a very influential man in a short time; so much so, that

Willie, Johnny, Bunsy, Sandy, Toby and Columby all felt decidedly proud of being connected with him ; and, instead of sneers, Uncle Samuel learned to bestow praise and friendship on the now perfectly united family.

Mrs. Dominion's troubles, therefore, came to an end at last, and, when some time afterwards she died, the last words she uttered, as she smiled sweetly on her husband and boys were,—

“PERFECT UNION, AND THAT IS WHAT CAME OF IT.”

